2. Mechanics Adouted as the name for that type

2. Mechanics. Adopted as the name for that type of 'simple machine' which is exemplified in the 'lever' (sense 1). It consists of a rigid structure of any shape (a straight bar being the normal form), fixed at one point called the fulcrum, and acted on at two other points by two forces, tending to cause it to rotate in opposite directions round the fulerum.

to cause it to rotate in opposite directions round the fulcrum.

The force which is regarded as intended to be resisted by the use of the lever is called the weight, and the force which is applied for this purpose is called the power. Levers are said to be of the first, second, or third kind or order according as the fulcrum, the weight, or the power is in the midmost position of the three.

was exidently the calculation of the Liberals in the Reichstag, when, they began a series of attempts to cobble at the Constitution.

b. in British politics.
Early in the 19th c, the sh. occurs chiefly as applied by opponents to the advanced section of the Whig party: sometimes in Sp. or Fr. form, app, with the intention of suggesting that the principles of those politicians were un-English, or akin to those of the revolutionaries of the Continent. As, however, the adj. was already English in a laudatory sense, the advocates of reform were not reluctant to adopt the foreign term as descriptive of themselves; and when the significance of the old party distinctions was obliterated by the coalition of the moderate Whigs with the Tories and of the advanced Whigs with the Radicals, the new names 'I theral' and 'Conservative' took the place of 'Whig' and 'Tory' as the usual appellations of the two great parties in the state.

The spelling license, though still often met with, has no justification in the case of the sb. In the case of the vb., on the other hand, although the spelling license is etymologically unobjectionable, license is supported by the analogy of the rule universally adopted in the similar pairs of related words, fractice sb., fractise vb., prophesy vb. (The rule seems to have arisen from imitation of the spelling of pairs like advice sb., advise vb., which expresses a phonetic distinction of historical origin.) A slight argument for preferring the s form in the vb. may be found in the existence of the derivatives licensable and licensure (U. S.) which could not conveniently be spelt otherwise.

Johnson and Todd give only the form license both for the sb. and the vb., but the spelling of their quots. conforms, with one exception, to the rule above referred to, which is recognized by Smart (1836), and seems to represent the now prevailing usage. Recent Dicts., however, almost universally have license both for sb. and vb., either without alternative or in the first place.]

1. An act or instance of lying; a false statement made with intent to deceive; a criminal falsehood. Phrase, to tell (+ formerly to make) a lie. + Also, without lie, no lie, truly (often as an expletive in

ME. poetry; cf. without fable).

ME. poetry; cf. without fable).

In mod. use, the word is normally a violent expression of moral reprobation, which in polite conversation tends to be avoided, the synonyms falsehood and untruth being often substituted as relatively euphemistic.

ugius, legius, = Pr. litge, It. ligio; the ultimate derivation is disputed.

The prevailing view that the word represents an adoption of OHG. ledig free (mod. G. ledig unoccupied) is supported by a passage in a charter of 1253 (Du Cange, s.v. Ledigham, which contains the words 'ligius homo, quod Teutonice dictur Ledighaman'. The assumption of 'free' as the primary sense also seems in accord with the meaning of the med. Locum tenens.

The origin of the β type of forms (which survives in the usual British pronnciation, though the spelling represents the a type) is difficult to explain. The hypothesis of a mere misinterpretation of the graphic form (u read as v), at first sight plausible, does not accord with the facts. In view of the rare OF form lue for lieu (with which cf. esp. the 15th c. Sc. forms luf- lufftenand above) it seems likely that the labial glide at the end of OF. lieu as the first element of a compound was sometimes apprehended by Englishmen as a v or f. Possibly some of the forms may be due to association with Leave sb. or Lief a.

In 1793 Walker gives the actual pronunciations as (lev-, livtenant), but expresses the hope that 'the regular sound, lewtenant' will in time become current. In England this pronunciation (lintenant) is almost unknown. A newspaper quot, of 1893 in Funk's Standard Dictionary says that (leftenant) is in the U.S. 'almost confined to the retired list of the navy'.]

The verb which occurs in the phrase lntenn and leften (see Lour v.), very frequent in the Ormulum, but not found elsewhere, has been commonly identified with this vh., but neither the form nor the sense favours the identification.

Apparently the phrase (which is followed by a dat, of person) means 'to show respect to' (a superior), 'to condescend graciously to' (an inferior). It does not seem possible to connect leften with OE. lyfettan to flatter.]

d. In scientific use. The word light has been used in six special senses The word light has been used in six special senses; (a) the thing (variously conceived as matter or energy) which is communicated from a luminous body to the body illuminated by it; (b) this thing regarded as producing sensation; (c) the sensation produced; (d) the process (variously conceived as rectilinear motion of corpuseles, undulatory motion of the ether, or periodic change of electrical and magnetic states) by which the communication is made; (e) certain characteristics of such processes (rays or waves; (f) physical energies and processes of the same type as those involved in the production of vision, but having possibly a different range of periods (e, g. Röntgen rays). The sense (e) (rare in actual use, though not uncommonly expressed in definitions) agrees with an occasional use of the word in popular language; we should, e.g., usually apply the name light to the sensation experienced when the optic nerve is excited mechanically without the intervention of a luminous body. In the sense (d) the word light is equivalent to the process of transmission of light; in the sense (e) it is equivalent to rays of light.

condemned as vulgar or slovenly, though examples may be found in many recent writers of standing. This use originated purtly in an ellipsis of as or an extension of the quasi-prepositional function of the adv. (sense 1) to govern a clause instead of a sb., and partly in an anaconthic use (somewhat common in the 16th c.) by which the sb. or pronoun which is primarily a dative governed by like is used as the subj. or obj. of a following clause. A good example of this anacoluthon (but with to instead of simple dative) is the following:

1396 Spenser F. Q. V. iv. 42 Like to an Eagle, in his kingly pride Soring through his wide Empire of the aire why channee buth spide A Goshnuke.

-like, suffix, forming adjs. and advs. In strictness, the words containing this suffix are compounds of LIKE a. and adv., in the senses in which these words govern a dative or are followed by an adj. (see Like a. 1 b, Like adv. 1, 3). The compounds so formed not unfrequently resemble in sense the derivatives formed with -lik(e, ME. dial. form of -Ly I, -Ly 2, but the two formations are entirely distinct: thus ME. gredilike adv. (= greedily) is astinct: this ME. greatifile adv. (=greediff) is not the same word as the mod. Sc. greedy-like.

1. Appended to sbs. a. Forming adjs. with the general sense 'similar to —', 'characteristic of, befitting—'. Early examples are circlelyk (a1420), chieftainlike (e1470 Henry Wallace VI. 489), devillike (c1470), godlike (1513), hishoplike (1544), flesh-like (1552). The suffix may now be appended to almost all sbs., including proper names; in formations intended as nonce-words, or not generally current, the hyphen is ordinarily used. current, the hyphen is ordinarily used.

mations intended as nonce-works, or not generally current, the hyphen is ordinarily used.

Some particular writers have shown an extraordinary fondness for words of this formation; e.g. more than 60 occur in Bailey's Festus.

b. Forming advs. with the sense 'in or after the manner of —', 'so as to resemble —'. Early instances are fellow-like (c1530), gentlemanlike (1542), Alades in the sense 'in or after the manner of —', 'so as to resemble —'. Early instances are fellow-like (c1530), gentlemanlike (1542), manner of —, so as to resemble —. Early instances are fellowlike (1530), gentlemanlike (1542), phraselike (1549), bishoplike (1555). These advs., and the method of formation, are now perh, to be regarded as obsolete or at least archaistic, the apparent examples in recent use being explicable as quasi-advb. uses of the adj.; at least, the advs. or quasi-advs. are now employed only to characterize the subject of the sentence, not, as formerly, to indicate the manner of an action. In accordance with this change of signification, -like in the dance with this change of signification, -like in the quasi-adverbial use now takes optionally a second principal stress, and is nearly always hyphened.

3. The alkaline earth which is the chief constituent of mortar; calcium oxide (CaO). It is obtained by submitting limestone (carbonate of lime) to a red heat, by which the carbonic acid is driven off, leaving a brittle white solid, which is pure lime (or QUICK-LIME). It is powerfully caustic and combines readily with water, evolving great heat in the process, and forming hydrate of lime (slaked lime).

The designations carbonate, phosphate etc. of lime are still current in popular use, though in technical language they have given place to the more systematic terms calcium carbonate (or carbonate of calcium), etc. Chloride of lime:

In algebra the term limit's applied to two quantities, one of which is greater and the other less than another quantity; and in this sense it is used in speaking of the limits of equations, wherebytheir solution is much facilitated.

28. A department of activity; a kind or branch of business or occupation.

The sense seems to be largely due to the influence of quot. 1611, where, however, line (= Gr. κανών, lit. 'measuring rod', R.V. 'province') was prob. meant by the translators in a sense belonging to branch II. The phrase line of things, sometimes used instead of line in the sense above explained, certainly arose from misapprehension of this text, where the words' in another mans hine' are parenthetical.

-ling (lin), suffix 1, appended to sbs., adjs., vb.stems, and (rarely) advs., to form sbs., is a Com.
Tent. formative (OE., OS., OHG. -ling, ON.
-ling-r, Goth. -ligg-s in gadiliggs). It doubtless arose from the addition of the suffix -ilgo-z -ING 3 to noun-stems formed with the suffix -ilgo-(EL 1, -LE 1), but in all the historical Teut. langs. it has the character of a simple suffix.

1. In OE., -ling added to sbs. forms sbs. with the general sense 'a person or thing belonging to or concerned with (what is denoted by the primary sb.), as hirling hireling, ieroling ploughman (i. iero ploughing), rapling prisoner (i. rap rope). The derivatives from adjs. have the sense 'a person or thing that has the quality denoted by the adj.', e.g. déorling darling, efenling an equal, feoroling quarter, farthing, geongling youngling, gesibling, sibling kinsman; similarly from an adv., underling subordinate. One or two names of birds have this suffix in OE, as swertling? some black bird (?f. sweart black), stærling starling; here it may possibly have a diminutive force (see 2 below).

In ME. and mod.E. the suffix continued to be freely employed with the same function as in OE; examples are atterling, deathling, fatling, firstling, grayling, nestling, nursling, sapling, suckling. The personal designations in -ling are now always used in a contemptuous or unfavourable sense (though this implication was not fully established before the 17th c.), as courtling, earthling, groundling, + popeling (= papist), vainling, worldling.

On the analogy of words like nursling, where the grammatical character of the initial element is ambiguous, a few sbs. in -ling have been formed on vb.-stems (taken in passive sense), being personal designations of contemptuous import, such as shaveling, starreling; of similar origin is stripling, though it has lost its primary derisive sense.

The suffix is no longer productive in the uses above explained.

2. In ON, the suffix had a diminutive force, of which there are only slight traces in the other Teut, langs, (cf. OE. startling mentioned above, and G. sperling sparrow); chiefly in words denoting the young of animals, as gésling-r gosling, kelling-r kitten, kiölin-gr young kid, † kidling', but also in a few other words, as békling-r booklet, retling-r glove, yrmling-r little worm. In Eng. the earliest certain instance of this use appears to the codling, recorded ϵ 1314 (kitling, which appears a 1300, being of dubious formation), in the 15th c, we find gosting (of which the earliest quoted form, gesling, points to adoption from ON.), and duckling. In the 16th c. and subsequently the suffix has been employed in many new diminutive formations, chiefly contemptuous appellations of persons, as godling, lordling, kingling, princeling; in this use it is still a living formative.

In the formation of diminutives expressing merely smallness of size, -ling has never been extensively used; a few writers of the 19th c. have so employed it in nonce-wds.

It in nonce-wos.

-ling², -lin(g)s, suffix, forming adverbs, most of which survive only dial. The Teut. root *lings-, langs-, langs-, to extend, reach, appears in its three ablaut-forms as the terminal element in certain (1) and the appearance of the state of the stat OE. advs. expressive of direction or extent, as in bæcling BACKLING; andlang (see ALONG, ENDLONG); backing Backling; andlang (see Along, Endlong); nihilanges for a night; grundlinga (also grundlinga) to the ground. In certain instances the suffixes -linga, -lunga, were already in OE substituted for -inga, -lunga, advb. terminations originating in some case (? ablative) of sbs. in -ing, -ung (see -ING 1); so in néadlinga, néedlinga, whence, with adverbial (genitival) es, the ME. nedlingis NEEDLINGS, of necessity. The original OE use (in which the suffix is added to sbs. to form advs. of direction) is continued in the later formations grafelyng (Grovelling), headling(s, sideling(s; more numerous, however, are the words sideling(s; more numerous, however, are the words in which the suffix forms advs. of condition or situation from adjs., as blindling(s, darkling(s, firstlings, flatling(s, hidlings, mostlings.

[The mod. form represents an adoption (first appearing ε 1200) of AF. liun (F. lion), a Com. Rom. word = Pr. leo, Sp. leon, Pg. leão, It. leoné, lione:—L. leõnem, nom. leo, a. Gr. λέων (stem λέοντ-, perh. alteted from an earlier *λέξον-). The Gr. word was perh, adopted from some foreign lang; a note-worthy similarity of sound is presented by lleb. $\frac{1}{2} \frac{1}{ab\bar{t}}$ lion (pl. $\frac{1}{b}\hat{a}\bar{t}m$), also occurring in the sense 'lioness' with the vocalization $\frac{1}{b}\frac{1}{b}\frac{1}{b}\frac{1}{b}\frac{1}{b}$; cf. also Egyptian labai, lawai lioness. The synony-mons Gr. Ais (cf. Heb. & layish) is not etymologically connected.

Before the adoption of the Fr. word, English possessed forms directly representing the Latin leo, leonem. The word was used, with difference of gender and inflexion, both for 'lion' and 'lioness', the L. lewna not having been adopted. Owing to the two-fold form of the L. word in the nom. and the oblique case, the declension in OE. is irregular the contique cast, in the recorded forms are: nom. sing. léo Anglian léa), gen. sing. léon (Northumb. masc. léas), dat. sing. léon, léone, léonan, acc. sing. léona, léona, gen. pl. léona, gen. pl. léona,
