PREFACE TO VOLUME VI.

THIS volume, of which a large part of the cost of production has been defrayed by the murificence of the Goldsmiths' Company, contains L and M, edited by Henry Bradley, and N, edited by W. A. Craigie. It may be remarked that in several recent Dictionaries the space occupied by the part of the English vocabulary here treated amounts almost exactly to one-tenth of the whole.

For observations on the etymological and other characteristics of the words included in the three divisions of this volume, and for detailed statistics relating to the number of words of various classes, and the number of quotations, the reader is referred to the separate prefaces to L, M, and N. The following recapitulation of some of the figures there given may be found convenient:—

ne or the ag	Main words.	Subordinate words.	Special combinations.	Obvious combinations.	Total of words.	No. 01 quotations.
L (528 pages) M (820 ,,) N (277 ,,)	7,049 12,988 3,484	2,669 6,422 2,298	2,34 ² 2,986 44°	2,929 3,636 1,570	14,989 26,032 7,792	65,44° 99,255 36,859
· (-11), /	23,521	11,389	5,768	8,135	48,813	201,554

The aggregate numbers for the first six volumes of the Dictionary are as follows:—

PREFACE TO THE LETTER L.

THIS half-volume, containing the words with initial L, includes 7,049 Main words, 2,342 Special Combinations explained and illustrated under these, 2,669 Subordinate entries, and 2,929 Obvious Combinations; in all 14,989 words. Of the Main words, 1,945 are marked † as obsolete, and 330 are marked | as alien or not completely naturalized *.

In the prefatory note to G it was pointed out that the portion of the English vocabulary under that initial letter was characterized by the entire absence of the words with Greek, Latin, French, and English prefixes, which under nearly all the other letters of the alphabet are abundant, and by the unusually large number of words (chiefly of Old English, Scandinavian, or early French origin) expressing notions of extreme generality, which have branched out into a great variety of special senses. The L portion of the vocabulary is also distinguished by both these characteristics, and the consequence is that the L words, like the G words, have in this work a proportionately much larger space than is allotted to them in dictionaries which do not follow the historical method of treatment.

The proportions in which the component linguistic elements of the English language are represented in the words with initial L are probably not far from the average. The native English element has numerically only the second place; but it comes unquestionably first with regard to the importance of the words belonging to it, and the amount of space which they occupy in the Dictionary. Typical examples of the wide and often interesting ramification of meaning characteristic of this oldest portion of the language may be seen under lady, land, lag vb.1, let vb.1, lie vb.1, life, light sb., adjs. and vbs., long adj., look, lord, lose vb.1, lot, love sb.1, vb.1, lust, lusty. The Scandinavian words are perhaps somewhat less numerous than in some other letters, but several of them, as law, leg, left (whence lefty), loose adj. and vb., low adj., are more than ordinarily frequent in use, and rich in variety of senses and applications. The Romanic and Latin words outnumber those from all other sources together. Many of them, as usual, are of rare occurrence; but the great importance of this element may be seen from such examples as label, labour, language. large, letter, liberty, library, line. liquid, literature, locomotive, ledge-to mention only a few of the most prominent. The Greek derivatives are mainly scientific terms of modern formation; among those of earlier introduction and wider currency are lexicon, lexicography, logarithm, logic. The quasi-suffixes -loger, -logian, -logic, -logical, -logue, -logy, representing the terminal elements in certain Greek compounds of λόγος, and in derivatives of these, are so common in English that it has been found convenient to treat them in special articles. From Dutch or Low German we have the important words luck and loiter, besides several others little used or obsolete. The list of Celtic words is even shorter than usual; whether it should include leop sb.1 is doubtful; the only other L words of Celtic origin that are at all widely known are loch 1 (lough), leprechaun, and lymphad. Of words from extra-European languages there are the Hebrew leviathan, Levite, log sb.2, the Arabic latic, leban, lohoch, the Indian lac 1, lac 2. langooty, langur, lascar, lat, lathee, lingam, lodh, loot, lootie, lota, lungi, lunkah, the Chinese langshan, li 1, li 2, liang, likin, ling sb.3, litchi, longan, loquat, the Malay lanchara, lata, lorikect, lory, the African lamba, leche, lhiamba, limbo², loa, lobola, and the South American llama and lucuma.

In a very large number of instances the etymology of words will be found to be more correctly stated or more fully discussed than in any previous English dictionary. Attention may be specially called to the etymological notes on lad, larch, lass, laudanum, lavendar, law-abiding, lawn sb.1, lectern, Lenten, leprechaun, less, lewd, ligure, like adj., lobby, lobe, lobster, locomotive, lodge, lose vb.1, louver, lozenge, lucern 1, lymph. In the articles on the suffixes -let, -lewe, -like, -ling 1, ling 2, -ly 1, -ly 2, the history and functions of these formatives are explained with greater fullness than has been attempted elsewhere.

The material originally collected for the letter L was laboriously and efficiently sub-edited, about twenty-five years ago, by Mr. W. M. Rossetti, whose work was continued by the Rev. C. Y. Potts, of Ledbury. Subsequently the portion from L to Lusus was taken in hand, for the incorporation of the new quotations, by the late Mr. E. C. Hulme, and that from Lut- to the end of the letter by Mr. E. Warner, of Eltham. The work of these gentlemen was completed in 1885-6, since which time a large mass of additional material has been accumulated.

* The following table illustrates the scale of this work as compared with that of certain other Dictionaries:

		Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic' (including Sup- plement 1902).	'Century' Dict.	'Funk's Standard.'	Here.

	Number of illustrative quotations	4,017	2,787	6,279	999	65,440
	The number of quotations in the L	portion of R	ichardson's Diction	arv is 3.321.

PREFACE TO THE LETTER L.

Amongst those who have rendered assistance in the preparation of the articles in this half-volume, especial thanks are due to Prof. Sievers, of Leipzig, M. Paul Meyer, of Paris, Prof. Napier, of Oxford, Prof. Kluge, of Freiburg-im-Breisgau, and Prof. Morsbach, of Göttingen, for help in the treatment of etymological questions; to Mr. James Platt, jun., for information relating to the origin and history of words from American and other little-known languages; to Dr. W. Besant, of Cambridge, and Prof. Love, of Oxford, for help with terms of mathematical and physical science; to Prof. J. K. Laughton, for much information on the nautical uses of words; to Prof. J. Cook Wilson, of Oxford, for important suggestions relating to the article Logic; and to Sir Howard Elphinstone, Bart, and Sir W. R. Anson, Bart., M.P., for information on the legal sense of Lien. The verification, in the British Museum Library, of references to books not accessible at Oxford has been done, at no small cost of time and labour, by Mr. E. L. Brandreth. Mr. R. J. Whitwell, of Oxford, has frequently rendered help of various kinds. Dr. Furnivall's multifarious services to the Dictionary have been no less abundant than in the former volumes.

The proofs have been regularly read, and many valuable suggestions furnished, by Lord Aldenham, the Rev. Canon Fowler, of Durham, Dr. W. Sykes, F.S.A., of Exeter, Mr. W. H. Stevenson, M.A., the Rev. Prof. Skeat, the Rev. W. B. R. Wilson, of Dollar, Mr. A. Caland, of Wageningen, Holland, and latterly by Mr. H. Chichester Hart, who has supplied many important additional quotations. The first 64 pages had the advantage of being read in proof by the late Dr. Fitzedward Hall, whose invaluable services have been acknowledged in all the foregoing instalments of the work.

The assistants who have worked with me in the preparation of this half-volume are Mr. G. F. H. Sykes, B.A., Mr. Walter Worrall, B.A., Mr. C. T. Onions, M.A., Mr. W. J. Lewis, Mr. H. J. Bayliss, Miss E. S. Bradley, and (in the later portions) Mr. James Dallas.

Lifehood. Delete quot. 1484: lyuchode is an error in the modern reprint for lyuelode.

Lift, $sh.^2$ 11. Add to the definition:—Also—Lock $sh.^2$ 9 c. For the quotation read as follows:—1825 [see Lock $sh.^2$ 9 c]. 1875 in KNIGHT Dict, Mech.

Lighthouse. Earlier example:—1622 BACON Hist, Hen. VII 142 They.. were executed..at divers places upon the Sca-Coast.. for Seamarkes or Light-houses, to teach Perkins People to avoid the Coast.

-lock, suffix, in mod. Eng. occurring only in wedlock, represents OF. -lác, the second element of numerous compounds (usually neuter-rarely mase.) in which the first element is a sb. OE. had about a dozen of these compounds (those in which -lác means 'offering', Lake sb.1, are not counted); in all these the second element may be rendered 'actions or proceedings, practice', as brivillác nuptials, beadolác, feohlác, headolác, warfare, hémedlác, wiflác, carnal intercourse, reaflác robbery, weedláe pledge-giving, also espousals, nuptials, witelác punishment, withthat calimny. The -lác of these compounds should probably be identified with lác play, sport, Lake sb.2; the words meaning 'warfare', which may have been the earliest examples of this use, may be compared with the synonymous compounds in -plega play. Of the OE. compounds of lác three (brýdlác, feohlác, ráflác) survived into early ME., and weedlác still survives with altered meaning. In ME, the suffix was sometimes assimilated in form to the etymologically equivalent but functionally distinct Scandinavian-Lake. A few examples, not recorded in OE., appear in early ME.: dweomerlak (DEMERLAYKE), FERLAC, SCHENDLAC, TREWLAC, WOHLAC (the last from a vb.-stem, woo) to woo); but none of these survived later than the 14th century.

Long standing. The origin of this phrase seems to be illustrated by the following passage:—a 1568 ASCHAM Scholem. 1. (Arb.) 34 Except a very fewe, to whom peraduenture blood and happic parentage, may perchance purchase a long standing upon the stage.

Look, v. The synonymous MDu. loeken should have been cited as cognate.

Loot, sb.1 See LUTE sb.3, which is etymologically identical.

:- = cxtant representative, or regular phonetic descendant of.

(el), the twelfth letter of the modern and the eleventh of the ancient Roman alphabet, represents historically the Gr. lambda and ultimately the Semitic lamed. The earliest known Semitic forms of the character are 2 and 1; both these occur in early Greek inscriptions; the latter was adopted from the Greek into the Latin alphabet, and is the ancestor of the modern Roman forms, but in Greece itself was superseded by the inverted form \(\), which eventually became \(\Lambda \).

The sound normally expressed by the letter is the 'point-side' consonant, i.e. a sound produced by

The sound normally expressed by the letter is the 'point-side' consonant, i.e. a sound produced by the emission of hreath at the sides, or one side, of the oral passage when it is partially closed by contact or the 'point' of the tongue with the gums or palate. In phonetic treatises is used as a general name for consonants produced by lateral emission of breath, whether the stoppage is produced (as above) by the 'point', or by some other part of the tongue; thus we speak of a 'guttural?' and a 'palatal?' as occurring in various foreign languages. The 'point-side' consonant admits of considerable diversity in mode of articulation and consequently in acoustic quality. The Eng. i differs from that of Fr. and Ger. in being uttered with the 'front' of the tongue more concave; hence its sound is 'duller' or 'thicker'. Its precise place of articulation varies according to the nature of the adjacent sounds. In Eng. it is normally voiced; an unvoiced I with a preceding or following unvoiced consonant. Like r and the nasals, I may be used as a sonant or vowel (in the phonetic notation of this Dictionary indicated by 'l); but this occurs only in unstressed syllables, as in little (lit'!), buckled (bwk'ld).

The mod. Eng. I represents not only the OE. I, but the OE. M(early ME. IM) and w.
In certain combinations an original I has regularly become silent, after having modified the sound of the preceding vowel. In most of these cases the I is still written, and serves to indicate the pronunciation of the preceding vowel. The following combinations of letters (when occurring in the same syllable, or in derivatives of words in which they were tautosyllable; may be regarded as compound phonetic symbols of almost unvarying value: alf (af), alve (av), alm (am), alk, aulk (ak), aulm (am), alk, aulk (ak) and (am) or numerous than in standard Eng.; cf. Sc. avfi, fou. ca. etc.; in Sc. the regular representative of old is a sume

Lad (læd), 5h. I Forms: 4-6 ladde, 6-8 Sc. lawd, 7 ladd, 5- lad. [ME. ladde, of obscure origin. Possibly a use of the definite form of the pa. pple. of LEAD v.; in ME. lad is a dialectal variant of led pa. pple. The use might have originated in the application of the plural ladde elliptically to the followers of a lord. Actual evidence, however, is wanting. It is noteworthy that a 'Godric Ladda' attests a document written 1082-1123 (Earle Land Charters 270). If this cognome be (as is possible) identical with ME. ladde, its evidence is unfavourable to the derivation suggested above.

Quite inadmissible, both on the ground of phonology and meaning, is the current statement that the word is cognate with the last syllable of the Goth. Juggalants syoung man; the ending Jants (stem Janda adj., landi sh.), which does not occur as an independent word, has in compounds the sense 'having (a certain) growth or size', as in hwellants how great, swalatus so great, samalaus ealso worthless: the Welsh lawd is a dictionary figment invented to explain the feminine 'lodes (in Dictionaries llodes), which Prof. Rhys has shown to be shortened from herbodes, fem. of herlawd, a. ME. herlot Harlot; and the frish lath does not exist in either the earlier or the later sense of 'lad', hut means 'hero' or 'champion'.]

Like the corresponding mase, designation hidford, Lord, the word is not found outside Eng. (the leek laft) is adopted from ME.). The etym, above stated is not very plausible with regard to sense; but the attempts to explain hliefalize as a deriv, of hidford are unsatisfactory: the fem. suffix in OE, is ligg, not light and the umlant in the first syllable is difficult to explain on this supposition.

The OE, it being regularly shortened in ME, before two consonants, yielded regularly at and it according to dialect. The ME, lift(it, lift(it), lift(it), is represented by Sc. leddy. The other form laft(it) = "lavdi") became litredit is syllables, and by regular development litredit; afterwards the e became silent and the er was dropped; hence the mod. Eng. form.

The genitive sing. (OE, hlift[day]) became by regular phonetic change in ME, coincident in form with the nom.; hence certain syntactical combs, have the appearance of proper compounds, as lady-bird, Lady-day, Lady-chaptel.]

8. As a phonorific title

6. As an honorifie title,

a. A prefix forming part of the customary designation of a woman of rank. Also in My lady, an appellation used (chiefly by inferiors) in speaking to or of those who are designated by this prefix. In the 15-16th c., The (or My) Lady was prefixed to the Christian name of a female member of the royal family, as 'Princess' is now. With regard to the use of the prefix in the titles of the nobility of the British Isles, usage has varied greatly at different times, but the following rules are now established: (1) In speaking of a marchioness, countess, viscountess, or baroness (whether she be such in her own right, by marriage, or by courtesy), the prefix Lady is a less formal substitute for the specific designation of rank, which is not used in conversational address: thus 'the Marchioness (of) A.' is spoken to, and informally spoken of, as 'lady A.' (2) The daughters of dukes, marquises, and earls have Lady (more formally, e. g. on a superscription, The Lady) prefixed to their Christian names. (3) The wife of the holder of a courtesy title in which Lord is prefixed to a Christian name is known as '(The) Lady John B.' (a) The wife of a baronet or other knight ('Sir John C.') is commonly spoken of as 'Lady C.', the strictly correct appellation 'Dame Mary C.' being confined to legal documents, sepulchral monuments, and the like. ing to or of those who are designated by this prefix.

obscure. In some parts of England fog, seg, lag, or foggie, seggie, laggie, are used in children's games as substitutes for 'first, second, last' (see Eng. Dial. Diel. s.v. Fog). This suggests the possibility that lag may have originated in the language of sports as an arbitrary distortion of last; but even in that case the word may have coalesced with a homophone of independent origin. The current hypothesis that the adj. is a. Welsh llag (earlier llae), Ir. and Gael lags, slack, weak, is highly improbable. There is some affinity of sense between lag and Lack a. and v. (cf. to come lag and to come lack); the former might conceivably be an alteration of the latter under the influence of words like Flag v.¹, Fag sb.² Cf. further MDa. lakke to go slowly (Kalkar).]

-laik, suffix, in the Ormulum written -lezze, in northern and north-midland texts usually -laik, -layk(e, in the Ancren Riwle (MS. Nero) and a few other 13th c. texts -leic, -lec, -loik; appended in ME. to adjs. to form sbs. of quality, none of which have survived into mod. Eng. Etymologically it represents the ON. -leik-r str. mase. which (with a parallel form -leike wk. masc.) is the ordinary suffix in ON. corresponding functionally to the Eng. -ness; its use in Eng. must have originated in words adopted from Scandinavian, as godle 330 (Orm.) from ON. gooleikr; but already in the Ormulum (c 1200) it is added freely to native English adjs., as in clienle 33c cleanness, gredi 3le 33c Ormin has in all 28 words of this greediness. formation; in some instances he originally wrote -nesse, but -legge has been substituted 'in a ruder but apparently contemporary hand ' (editorial note in Orm. 11. 349); the reason was perh. metrical, as -le33c and -nesse were in Ormin's prosody equivalent only before a vowel. Except in the Ormulum the suffix is somewhat rare, and no instance is known the suffix is somewhat rare, and no instance is known of its being appended to an adj. of Romanic origin. The ON. *deik-r corresponds in form with the OE suffix dac (usually nent., rarely masc.), now -Lock (q.v. for the etymology); but in function the two are distinct, the ON. suffix being appended only to adjs., and the OE, suffix only to sbs. or verb-stems to form sbs. expressive of action. Occasionally the suffix representing OE. dac was in northern or north midland texts written -laik, so that it became coincident in form with the Scandinavina suffix, e.g. in dwimerlaik (Alex.), wedlaik (R. Brunne).

Lama¹ (lā·mǎ). Also 9 erron. llama. [Thibetan blama, the b being silent.] The title given to the Buddhist priests of Mongolia and Thibet. The chief Lamas of Thibet and Mongolia are called respectively Dalai (dalae or delli)-lama, or simply Dalai, and Tesho- or Teshu-lama; the former is Dalai, and Tesho- or Teshu-lama; the former is the higher in dignity, and is known to Europeans as the 'Grand Lama'.

The Dalai Lama lives in the strictest seclusion, and is worshipped with almost divine honours. When he dies, the lamas profess to search for a child who gives evidence that the soul of the deceased pontiff has entered into him; when found, the child succeeds to the office.

f. s- = dis- + pezza piece). For the quasi-Sp. ending of some forms see -ADO; the forms with r are due to association with Sp. presa grip, clutch. The It. word is recorded only in the senses 'one of a prince's bodyguard' and (in pl.) 'soldiers of a superior class not included in the ordinary companies'; Florio (s.v. Spezzato) renders it 'a demi-lance, light horseman'; Italian etymologists suggest that the primary sense was 'one whose lance has often been shivered in warfare, one who has seen nuch service' (Tommaseo s.v. Spezzato). The peculiar Fr. and Eng. sense (= lance-corporal) can be accounted for only conjecturally, but it may have arisen from the practice of appointing specially experienced privates, in emergencies, to act as officers of the lowest grade; a lance-corporal.

a. 6.) The more colloquial or less refined synonym is big.

a. Of material objects. Also in phrases like large of limb = 'having large limbs'.

Not ordinarily said of persons; the occasional use of expressions like 'a large man' is somewhat playful, the notion being 'taking up a great deal of room'. To say 'the larger (='bigger') children' is admissible, if perh. somewhat unusual, but the positive (and, indeed, the comparative in the singular) could not be similarly used.

In the earlier examples there may be some notion of the sense 'ample'.

Possibly it may represent the northern Lake v., as heard by sporting men from Yorkshire jockeys or grooms; the sound (lesk, lesk), which is written lair k in Robinson's Whithy Glossary and in dialect books, would to a southern hearer more naturally suggest 'lark' than 'lake' as its equivalent in educated pronunciation. On the other hand, hin ic hatte, be ba hlasst bere. 1399 LANGL Rich, Redeles iv. 74 Than lay the lordis a-lee with laste and with charge, And bare aboute the barge and blamed the maister.

2. A commercial denomination of weight, capacity, or quantity, varying for different kinds of goods and in different localities. Cf. G. last.

Originally the 'last' must have been the quantity carried at one time by the vehicle (boat, wagon, etc.) ordinarily used for the particular kind of merchandise. As a weight, it is often stated to be (like the Ger. weight of the same name) nominally equivalent either to 2 tons or to 4,000 lbs. In wool weight it is 4368 lbs. (= 12 sacks). A last of gunpowder is said to be 2,400 lbs. (= 24 barrels), and of feathers or flax 1,700 lbs.

The equivalence of the last of wool with 12 sacks seems to have led to an association of the word with the number twelve. Thus a last of hides was formerly 12 dozen (also 20 dickers of 10 hides each); of beer 12 barrels; of pitch 12 (sometimes 14) barrels; of cod and herrings 12 barrels (but of red herrings and pilchards 10,000 to 13,200 fish).

As a measure for grain and malt, the last was in the 16th c. 12 quarters, but is now 10 quarters = 80 bushels.

Lathe (lib), sb.1 [Late OE. lied str. neut. corresponding to ON. lido (poet.) landed possession, land:—O'Teut. *laph": according to some scholars cogn. w. -lied-in Goth. un-lieds poor (? lit. without landed possessions), OE. un-lied(e wretched. The form lathe (recorded from 14th c.) would, if it represented a pronunciation handed down by oral tradition, imply that the OE. word had a short vowel, and connexion with Ladian, to summon, would then be possible. Probably, however, the word had little oral currency, so that its form may have been influenced by the spelling of early documents. The identity of the word with ON. lido (which involves the conclusion that the OE. form was lido) is rendered almost certain by the following facts. (1) The OE. word is in one instance recorded in the sense of the ON. word, viz., in the legal formula 'ne gyrne ic bines ne lidoes ne landes ne sace ne socne '(Schmid, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, app. xi), where it has the same alliterative association as in the frequent ON. phrase 'land ok lido'. (2) This alliterative association recurs in our first quotation, where the word has its specific Kentish application. (3) Our second quotation implies that 'the lathe of Aylesford' was the territory that was under a jurisdiction attached to the manner of Aylesford, so that the development of the special Kentish use from the general sense of 'landed possession' presents no difficulty. The possibility is not excluded that the Kentish term may represent a coalescence of the original OE.

Lathe (lē\delta), sh.3 Also 5, 7 lath. [Of obscure history; prob. cognate with Da. lad, in drejelad turning-lathe, also in other compounds in which it has the general sense of 'stand, supporting frame-work', e.g. savelad saw-bench, sengelad bedstead, inndelad gantry, vaverlad loom. The Da. word is prob. a special nse of lad pile, heap regularly built up:—ON, hlað, related to hlaða to Lade.

If the coincidence in form and meaning with Da, lad be not purely accidental, the Eng, word must, notwithstanding its late occurrence, have come down from the time of the Danish settlements in England. (A native OE, cognate is out of the question, as it would have had d, not £). The Da, word, in compounds, is cited by Kalkar from the 13-16th c. As the older form of turning-lathe, used as late as the 13th century, was worked by means of a spring-lath overhead (see drawing in Encycl. Brit. ed. 9, XIV. 32.9), it is not wholly impossible that the word may be a modification of LATH &; but against this is the occurrence of the word in the wider Danish sense (see sense 1).

The ON. land (in Dicts, miswritten löð, and explained 'smith's lathe') is commonly given as the etymon, but erroneously. All that is known of the word is that it was used in composition to form poetic synonyms for gold.]

For circle, parallel of latitude, see those words. In their original geographical use latitude (L. latitudo, Gr. πλάτος) and longitude (L. longitudo, Gr. μῆκος) meant quite literally the 'breadth' and 'length' of the oblong map of the known world; this literal sense remained even in the expression 'degrees of latitude and longitude' (μοῖροι πλάτους καὶ μῆκους). By a natural development the terms afterwards came (in late Latin, app. not yet in Greek) to denote the distance of any place, in the breadthwise and lengthwise direction respectively, from the circle assumed as the origin of measurement.]

from the ecliptic: called spec. celestial latitude. (See also ASERNDING vbl. sh., GENCENTRIC a. 1, ILLIOGENTRIC a. 1, HELIOGENTRIC a. 1, HELIOGENTRIC a. 1.)

The history of this sense appears to be as follows. Origing the word was applied, on the analogy of the geographical use (see 4) to denote the angular distance of a point in the celestial sphere from the equator, measured alung a secondary to the latter. This, however, was not accurately distinguished by name from the distance of a point from the ecliptic, the terms 'latitude' and 'declination' being employed indiscriminately with reference to both these ways of indicating position. (Cf. quot. 1391.) In mod. use, the terms have been differentiated, declination being appropriated to what was originally and with historical propriety called 'latitude', while latitude became the name for distance from the ecliptic.

c 1391 Chaucer Astrol. u. § 17 Fro the Equinoxial may the declinacion or the latitude of any body celestial be rikned, after the site north or south, . & riht so may the latitude or the declinacion of any body celestial, saue only of the sonne . be rekned fro the Ecliptic lyne. 1551 RECORDE Cast. a reproachful designation for an idle person. Possibly the alliteration of the last-quoted phrase may sufficiently account for the use of the name; some, however, have suggested an allusion to the heat prevalent about St. Laurence's day (Aug. 10). Another conjecture is that there was a joke to the effect that when the martyr St. Laurence told his tormentors to turn him round on his gridiron, it was because he was too lazy to turn himself. It is important to note that the equivalent G. der fault Lenz (Lenz = Lorenz) has been in use from the 16th c.; see Grimm s.v. Lenz.

1) OE. had lafian to wash by affusion, to pour (water), corresponding formally to MDu., Du. laven, OHG. labon (MHG., mod.G. laben) to refresh; ef. OHG. laba, mod.G. labe refreshment. By some scholars the OE., Du., and Ger. words are considered to represent a WGer. adoption of L. lavāre to wash. This view involves some difficulty, as the numerous OHG. examples refer to refreshment by food, drink, or warmth, so that the assumed primary sense 'to wash', if it ever existed, must have been quite forgotten. The L. origin, however, accounts well for the senses of the OE. word, which perh. may be only accidentally similar in form to the continental words. (2) In ME, the representative of the OE, vb. blended indistinguishably with the vb. a. F. laver (= Pr., Sp., Pg. lavar, It. lavare):-L. lavāre=Gr. λούειν, f. It. lavendola (Diez; not in Dicts.), Sp. lavándula (in Dicts. only as a botanical name); also F. lavande (cited from Christine de Pisan, 14-15th c.), It., Sp. lavanda. The med.L. lavendula was taken vande (cited from Christine de Pisan, 14-15th c.), It., Sp. lavanda. The med.L. lavendula was taken into OHG. or early MHG. as lavendla (in MSS. of 12th c.; see Ahd. Glossen III. 105), whence MHG. and early mod.G. lavendele, lobendel, lobengele, laubangel, lavandel, lavander, lafander; the standard form in Ger., Du., Sw., Da. is now lavendel. The enrent hypothesis is that med.L. lavendula is a corrupt form of lavandula, a dim. of the shorter word which appears in It. as lavanda (see nbove). This is commonly identified with It. lavanda' washing', the supposition being that the name refers to the use of the plant either for perfuming baths (so already in 16th c. writers) or as laid among freshly washed linen (see 2 below). But on the ground of sense-development this does not seem plausible; a word literally meaning 'washing' would hardly without change of form come to denote a non-essential adjunct to washing. Besides, the earliest form appears to be livendula; if this could be connected with L. livère to be livid or blnish, the sense would be appropriate, but the formation is obscure; M. Paul Meyer suggests, as a possibility, that the original form may have been 'livindula for 'fividula, l. lividus Livio. (A med.L. word of about the same date and of app. similar form is calendula marigold.) It is not certain that the word has not changed its application, as in early glosses livendula, lavendula, are given as synonymous with samsuns and amaracus, which properly mean 'marjoran'; but plant-names were applied often very loosely. The It. lavanda, F. lavande, would seem to be a back-formation from med.L. lavandula.] sb.

1. The plant Lavandula vera (N.O. Labiata), a small shrub with small pale lilac-coloured flowers, and narrow oblong or lanceolate leaves; it is a native of the south of Europe and Northern Africa, but cultivated extensively in other countries for its perfume. Also applied, usually with defining word, to the two other species of Lavandula, L. Spica (distinguished as French lavender and † Lavender (distinguished as French lavender and † Lavender spike), and L. Stæchas (formerly † Lavender gentle). Oil of lavender, the essential oil obtained by distillation of the blossoms of L. vera, used in medicine and perfumery. An inferior kind is obtained from the two other species, and is used in making varnishes and for other industrial purposes; that from L. Spica is called 'oil of spike'.
