[Note. The introduction of some form of tennis into Florence by the French knights in 1325, and the use of the name tenes, appear not to be recorded elsewhere than in Velluti's Cronica, nor does either game or name appear to have been long retained; the name was manifestly foreign, and opposed to Italian word-formation. But its use in Florence at least 30 and perhaps 70 years before the carliest known English example, implies either that the Eng, name came from Italy, or that both had a common source. The latter is the more likely; it was French knights who introduced the game at Florence, and the Eng. tenets, teney 8, with their final stress, imply French origin. The difficulty is that the game has app, never borne any such name in Fr., where, from 1350 or earlier, it has been called la paulme,
the only Fr. word akin in form is tenes (AF. tenets), 2 pers, pl. pres. indic, and imper. of tenir 'to hold', also 'to take, receive what is offered'. Hence the suggestion made by Minsheu 1617, and favoured by Skeat, Jusserand, and others, that the name originated in the Fr. imperative tenez 'take, receive', called by the server to his opponent. There is of course the difficulty that no mention of this call has yet been found in French, where it must have been used if thence taken into It, and l.ng. But in the Colloquies of Cordier and Erasmus, the server's call is latinized as accipe and excipe, and in the Carmen de ludo pilar reticulo of R. Fressart, Paris, 1641,
'excipe', 'pilam excipe', 'mitto pilam in tectum, excipe',
with other uses of excipere and accipere, occur eight times in the portion printed by Julian Marshall Annals of Tennis 27-20. These La Tennis 27-29. These Latin words witness to the use of tenes or some equivalent call in French, and favour the conclusion that this call gave rise to the 14th c. It. and Eng. name.)

stretcher, agent-n. from tend-ire to stretch, which suits the sense; but neither the OF. nor the L. word is known in the sense 'tenter'.

The rare form tenture is equated by Promp. Parv. with L. tentura, but this ought to mean the process of stretching or its product: cf. F. tenture action of stretching, also tapestry hangings; which does not agree with the sense of 'stretching instrument or apparatus'. On the other hand, if the word were merely an Eng. agent-n. from Tent.'s, it would be difficult to account for the various forms of the ending. The forms in teynt, taynt, teint, taint-also offer difficulty, suggesting some association with F. teint dye.]

The etymological history of some of the prec, forms (as in other numerals) presents points of which the explanations are more or less conjectural. The direct Orleut. rep. of Indo-Eur. dekmtos was by Verner's Law tegundos; with this the Gothic taihunda, O.S. tehando, O.H.G. zehando, agree, except in having h for ga, apparently under the influence of the cardinal *tehun, an. The O'Cut. tezundos, whence O.S. and O.Fris. tegutho, -a, O.Anglian teologolamplies a pre-Teut. *dekmtos, with shifted stress (implied also in some other ordinals). Assimilation of this form also to the cardinal would give *tehundo-, whence *tehūda, teoh(o)āa, teoāa. The history of tēnde is more uncertain: the four ordinals, *sefende, eştende, neṣnde, tēnde, in M.E., Northern and Kentish, form a group of which only the first is known in O.E., repr. by *siofunda, seofonda, in the Lindistand Rushw, glosses. *Siofunda, like Goth. *sibunda, O.S. sibundo, O.H.G. sibundo, represents an O'Ceut. *sibundo, Indo-Eur. *sep(*pmtos. O'E. nizenda (a no66), O.S. nigundo, OHG. *niunto, Goth. niunda, 'had prob. a parallel history. The M.E. *ethende appears to have been conformed in itsending to *sefende; and tende, from its late appearance, was prob. formed from ten on the same model. *Ten-th has the suffix which in O.E. appears in *fenda, seofolda, eathoda, nizoda, teogeda, and sixta (OS. and OHG. sehsto, Goth. saihsta, O'Teut. *sixfiyofo. *ta, OHG. fmpto, Goth. finfu, O'S. and O'Fris. fifto, *ta, OHG. fmpto, Goth. finfu, O'S. and O'Fris. fifto, *ta, OHG. fmpto, Goth. finfu, O'S. and Sixta (OS. and OHG. sehsto, Goth. saihsta, O'Teut. *sexto-), which in O.E. was also used in enlefta (ellefta) and twelfta, and in North. and North-Midld. dialects has since been extended to all the ordinals from fourt to hundert.}

The quarterly terms in Scotland, fixed by Acts of 1600 and 1693, were Candlemas Feb. 2, Whitsunday May 15, Lammas Aug. 1, Martinnas Nov. 11. At the change of style in 17522, Old Style was observed in most parts of Scotland for the terms, making the dates practically in use eleven days later. By an Act of 1886, the 'Removal terms', for change of houses, etc., were fixed as May 28 and Nov. 28, the dates fixed 1690-93 remaining for purposes of rent, interest, etc. 1426 Coldstream Chartul. 6. Law. An estate or interest in land, etc. for a certain period; in full, term of or for years.

Outstanding term, Satisfied term: An estate for a long term of years was given, usually to the trustees of a strict settlement, to secure to beneficiaries under the settlement the payments due to them periodically from the tenant of the settled land. If these payments were not made, the trustees could take possession of the land for the term, and sell or mortgage it, to raise the money needed to make them. When the purposes for which the estate was created were fulfilled (e.g. by the death of all the beneficiaries) it was called a satisfied term; but unless express provision had been made that it should then cease, or unless it was conveyed to the tenant of the freehold so that it was destroyed by merger in the freehold, it continued to exist for the period for which it was created. It was then known as an outstanding term, or an attendant term, i.e. a term accompanying the inheritance. By Act 8 & 9 vict. c. 12 provision was made for the cessation of satisfied terms.

Tern (tōm), sb.¹ Also 7 terne. [Of Norse origin: cf. Da. terne, Sw. tärna, Norw, and Færo. terna:—ON. perna, the tern or sea swallow.

Some consider tern to be related to stearn, stern, which occurs in OE. as a bird-name, and, in the form starn, is a name in E. Anglia of the Common and the Black Tern; it is mentioned by W. Turner Avium pracipuarum historia, 1544, as 'nostrati lingua sterna appellata', whence Linnacus took Sterna as a generic name.]

The common name of a group of sea-birds of the genus Sterna, or sub-family Sterninæ, akin to the gulls, but having generally a more slender body, long pointed wings, and a forked tail; a sea swallow. Of the species, which are widely diffused from Arctic to extreme southern coasts, the British Musenm Catalogue reckons more than 50, of which 33 are placed in the genus Sterna, and about 18 distributed in ten other genera. Of these, six are considered indigenous to the British coasts, and many more to those of N. America. The Common Tern of Britain and N. America is Sterna hirundo (or funciatilis); the Sandwich T., the largest British species, now scarce, is S. cantiaca; the Arctic T., S. macrura; the Roseate T., S. duagalli; the Little T., S. minuta; the Black Tern, Hydrochelidon (formerly Sterna) nigra.

11. In Christian Latin use of testamentum.

Orig. a misuse of the word, arising from the fact that Gr. διαθήκη, disposition, arrangement, was applied both to a covenant (pactum, fadus) between parties, and to a testament or will (testamentum). Prob. largely due to the use of διαθήκη (in the sense 'covenant') in the account of the Last Supper immediately before Christ's death, and its consequent association with the notion of a last will or testament. Their first seat was at Acre; after the fall of the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem, they settled at Marienburg on the Vistula, and carried on a crusade against the neighbouring heathen nations of Prussia, Livonia, etc. Their conquests made them a great sovereign power, but from the 15th c. they rapidly declined, and were abolished in 1800. (Note. Late Roman writers reckoned the Teutonics among the peoples of Germania, and Teutonicus became a common poetic equivalent for Germânicus. It is now however held by many that they were not a Germanic people. But, before 900, German writers in Latin began to follow Latin poetic precedent by using Theutonica lingua instead of the barbarian or non-classical Theotisca, to render the native ituitisch, thitsch (OHG. duttisc, mod. deutsch=OS. thiudisc, OE. Péodisc, literally 'national, popular, vulgar') as a designation of their vulgar tongue in contrast to Latin, as if this German adj. were identical with the ancient ethnic name. In 1200 lingua Teutonica was similarly used, and thenceforth Teutonicus became a usual L. rendering of Deutsch or German. Some Early German comparative philologists (e. g. Bopp in 1820) used Teutonisch as the name for the family of languages including Gothic, German, Scandinavian, and English; but for this Germanisch is now more used in German, and Germanic be ya many in English. But in English there is an awkwardness and sometimes ambiguity in using Germanic beside German (in its ordinary political sense), which does not arise in German or French, where germanisch and germanique are entirely distinct from deutsch and allemand. To avoid this, many English scholars prefer Teutonic's as the term for the linguistic family, and it is commonly so used in this dictionary.]

'H, in words of Old English or Old Norse origin, and in words from Greek, is a consonantal graph representing a simple sound, or rather (in Teutonic words), a pair of simple sounds, breath and voice, indicated in this dictionary by the OE. letters (b) and (d); the former, as in thin, bath (pin, bab), being the breath dental spirant akin to I, and the latter, as in then, bathe (8cn, bet8), the voiced dental spirant akin to d. The group t, d, p, δ , corresponds to the group p, b, f, v. The breath spirant is identical with modern Greek theta (Θ, θ) , and approximately with Spanish z (or ϵ before ϵ , i). The Greek letter, which corresponds etymologically to Sanskrit U dh (and so, by Grimm's Law, to Teutonic and English D), was in early inscriptions represented by TH, and was a true aspirate; it was subsequently often written $T\Theta$, $\tau\theta$, and had prob. the sound (tb); but by the second century B.C. it had sunk into a simple sound, = our (b). The Romans, having neither the sound nor the symbol, represented the letter by sound nor the symbol, represented the letter by TH, as in Θάψο, Thapsus, but app. this was pronounced, at least in late Latin (whence in all the Romanic languages), as simple t; cf. Greek θεωρίο, I. theoria, It. and Sp. teoria; in Pg. theoria, Ft. theorie, spelt with th, pronounced with t; also Gr. Θωράς, I.. Thômās, It. Toma, Sp. Tomás; Pg., F., Eng. Thomas all pronounced with T.

(2) In Teutonic the breath spirant (b) was very frequent, being the regular etymological representative of Indo-Eur. t initially or after the stressed vowel, as in OTent. *prijiz, Goth. preis, OE. preo, Eng. three, = Indo-Eur. *treies, Skr. trayas, Gr. τρείs, L. trēs; OTeut. *brôper, Goth. brôpar, OE. bropār, brādor, Eng. brother, = Indo-Eur. bhrātēr. Gr. φράτηρ elansman, L. frāter. | The voiced spirant in brādor, etc., was a later development (c 700 in in brobor, etc., was a later development (c 700 in English) from the breath sound between vowels or voiced consonants, as in the parallel v and z from f and s. Initially, the same change of (b) to (δ) took place during the Middle English period in the demonstrative group of words, the, that, and their kindred, this, these, + tho, those, there, then, than, thence, thither, thus, etc., and in the pronouns of the second person singular, thou, thee, thine, thy:
these constitute the only words in English with initial (8). In the same group of words in the cognate Teutonic languages (b) has passed through
(8) into (d); thus Ger. das, Du. dat, Da., Sw. det

(a) Into (d); thus Ger. das, Du. dat, Da., Sw. dat that'; in High Ger., Low Ger., and Du. the same has taken place even in other original th words which retain (b) in English; e. g. Ger. dach, denken, ding, dick, donner, drei = Eng. thatch, think, thing, thick, thunder, three.

(3) In the demonstrative and pronominal groups of words, change of initial b to t, by assimilation to a preceding dental (t, d, s), appears in earlier English. OE. het be became hat-te, hatte; he last be appears in the 11th c. as he heste, whence modern lest. In the last section of the OE. Chronicle, from 113, he after t or d regularly becomes te (e.g., pat te king, and te eorles). In the Ormulum and the Cotton MS. of Cursor Mundi, this assimilation is seen in all the words of the the-thou group (Orm. hatt tatt te goddspell meneby, wrohnt tiss boc, and tatt te folle all bess te bett; Cursor, ne was lar, here and tare, scho served taim, als sais te sau). So in Ancren Riwle (and tet is, et tesse nerse, beo bet tus doð, and tes oðer, etc.). In the course of the 14th c, this assimilation was given up, and the spirant reappeared (as 3).

(4) In the Runic alphabet (futhore) the breath spirant had to itself a symbol b or b (called thorn); but in the earliest known OE. writings in the Roman alphabet this was represented by th, the Roman alphabet this was represented by th, the voiced spirant being often represented by d (δ) (sometimes by th). Before 700 probably, the character δ , formed by a bar across the stem of δ , was introduced; it appears in a charter of Wihttæd, king of Kent, 700-715 (Sweet Oldest English Texts 428). Apparently it was first used to denote the voiced spirant: see the proper names in the Moore MS. of Bæda, e 737, and the Liber Vita, Cott. MS., e 800, and charters before 800 generally. But in the ninth century it was used for both spirants, as in the Vespasian Psalter, c825 (e.g. lv. 5 δa δe cweoδaδ), and in a West Saxon charter of 847 (O. E. T. 433). a West Saxon charter of 847 (O. E. T. 433). Somewhere about 800 apparently, the thorn, p, was adopted from the Runic futhore, the earliest charter showing it being one of Coenwulf, king of Mercia, of 811 (O. E. T. 456); but it was not much used till late in the 9th c. A Surrey charter a 889 (ibid. 451) has 34 examples of 8 initial, and 25 medial or final, with 49 of p initial, and 1 medial. From the later years of the 9th c. 8 and p were used promiscuously in West Saxon works, with some preponderance of p initially and 8 finally. This continued in ME. till the 13th c. On the other hand, the Durham Kilnale and the Lindisfarne hand, the Durham Rilnale and the Lindisfame Vol. 1X.

Gospel Gloss, $250, have uniformly of in all positions (except in the compendium $ for \(\tilde{\tau} \ell \), as has also the East Anglian Genesis & Exodus, 1250; while the Mercian portion of the Rushworth Gospel Gloss, 1975, and Ormin, 1200, have only b. After 1250 the 8 speedily became obsolete: b remained in use, but was gradually restricted more or less to the pronominal and demonstrative words. In later times its MS. form approached, and at times became identical with, that of y (the latter being sometimes distinguished by having a dot placed over it). As the continental type used by Caxton had no b, its place in print was usually supplied by th for both sounds and in all positions. But in Scotland, the early printers, especially in the demonstrative and pronominal words, continued the p as y, as in y", yis, yat, you '= thou), a practice also common in England in MS., and hardly yet extinct. Confusion with the modern y consonant, ME 3, was avoided in Scotland, sometimes by writing the latter yh, but usually by continuing ME.; in the form 3 or z, so that ye zeer stood for he zeer, i. e. the year. It is remarkable that, when OE. h and of were both in use, no attempt was made to differentiate them as breath and voice spirants, and app. no serious attempt even to distinguish them as initial and medio-final, as was done in Norwegian when the Roman alphabet was adopted, c1200, and in Icelandic before 1300. At an earlier date (prob. $600) the character of was partially adopted from OE, in Old Saxon, and was used generally in the middle and end of words, while th was usual as the breath spirant initially.

was used generally in the middle and end of words, while th was usual as the breath spirant initially.

(5) In a few compounds, as anthill, outhouse, lighthouse, Chatham, Wytham, Yetholm, etc., t and h come together but do not form a digraph; and in a few foreign words, chiefly East Indian, as Thakoer, Thing, th represents Skr. It has a spiration (th, th), in Eng. commonly reduced to t.

In a few proper names and other words derived from or influenced by French, as Thomas, Thompson, thyme, th is pronounced as t; several other words were formerly so treated, and even spell with t, e.g. theatre, theme, theology, throne, anthentic, orthography: t has become the did not the as to free led to the spelling it where two etymological, as in Thames, Sathan; in amazanth, amianthus, anthore, etc., the corruption has also affected the pronunciation. See the individual words. In some ME. MSS. th frequently appears for t or for d: e.g. tho to, thyll till, myghth might, myghth wight, solythe white; thed deed, there deer, thegree degree, thepartyth departed, tho do, thogh doth, abethe abode, groundeth grounded, itedeth yelothed, freich loud, rothe rood, unther under. Early ME, scribes (prob. Norman) often confounded the English letters by or \(\theta\) and 3, writing e.g. 3 etc., fixe for property and fine confounded the English letters by or \(\theta\) and 3, writing e.g. 3 etc., fixe for property is more fine, the (b) often represents an OE, d, esp. before r or er, as in father, mother, gather, word, word, treather, etc.; dialectally, this sometimes extends to other words, as brother, further, rather, southern-wood, wether. In hurden and murder, d represents the earlier \(\theta\) of bother hand some dialects retain original d, and extend it to other words, as brother, further, rather, southern-wood, wether. Dialectally this sometimes substituted for f, and vice versa: e.g. thane, thetch, thistolow, thrail, thrae, throm, thurrow, for fane, fetch (vetch), fistula, frail (flail), frae, from, furrow; also fill, Fuirsday, for Tmit, Thursday. The Welsh name Llewelyn appears in Eng. as Thievelyn (Rolls of Parl. 1, 463/1, Edw. I or II), and Fluellen (Shaks, Hen, V), Th also occurs dialectally for wh, as in thirl, thertteberry, thort, for whirl, whortleberry, whorl. -th, suffix 2, forming ordinal numbers; in modern literary Eng. used with all simple numbers from fourth onward; representing OE. -/a, -/e, or -o/a, -o/e, used with all ordinals except fifta, six/a, ellefta, twelfta, which had the ending -ta, -te; m Se, north. Eng, and many midland dialects the latter, in form -t, is used with all simple numerals for the first of the control of the cont after third (fourt, fift, sixt, sevent, tent, hundert, etc.). In Kentish and O.Northumbrian those from seventh to tenth had formerly the ending -da, -de. All these variations, -th, -t, -d, represent an original Indo-Eur. -tos (cf. Gr. $\pi \epsilon \mu \pi - \tau os$, L. quin-tus), understood to be identical with one of the suffixes of the superlative degree. In OE. fifta, sixta, the original t was retained, being protected by the preceding consonant; the -fa and -da were due to the position of the stress accent, according to Vener's Law.

The ordinals from treentieth to ninetieth have seth, Ob., sole. In compound numerals sth is added only to the last, as $1\frac{1}{3}47$, the one thousand three hundred and forty-fifth part; in his one-and-twentieth year.

'n. [OE. panne, ponne, pænne, also pan, pon; originally the same word as THEN (OE. panne, ponne, pænne), the adv. of time. Its employment as the connective particle after a comparative (= L. quam, F. quam) is a pre-Encilsh development, existing already que) is a pre-English development, existing already in WGcr.: cf. OHG. thanne, danne, MHG. danne, denne, Ger. denn (now largely supplanted by als), OS. than, MDu. danne, dan, Du. dan, all used after the comparative. (Not so in Gothic or Scandinavian.

How the conjunctive use arose out of the adv. of time is obscure. Some would explain it directly from the demonstrative sense 'then', taking 'John is more skilful than his brother' as = 'John is more skilful; then (= after that) his brother'. Others derive it from the relative or conjunctive use of OE, honne (Then 6),= 'When, when as', thus 'When as (whereas) his brother is skilful, John is more (so)'. The nanlogy of L. quam favours a relative sense.

When interrogative or demonstrative words became conjunctive or relative they lost their stress and were liable to weakening. Already in the 8th c. OE, hanne appears as fan, han, than, a form exemplified in nearly every century since, though down to c 1500 the fuller contemporary forms of the demonstrative adv., hanne, henne, hene, etc., were also in use. When the adv. was reduced to hen, from the 15th c. spelt then, there was a strong tendency to spell the conjunction in the same way, which during the 16th c. nearly triumphed; but in the 17th c. the tide turned, and by 1700 or a little later the conjunction was differentiated from the adv. as than. As the latter was, and is, pronounced (5m) or than (5m) with equal approximation to the actual sound.]

1. The conjunctive particle used after a comparative adjective or adverb (and sometimes after other words: see 2-4) to introduce the second member of the comparison; the conjunction expressing the comparative of inequality (cf. As 3). In use it is nlways stressless, usually joined accentually to the prec. word, e.g. more than, less than, other than (mo-uson, lesson, v-voidon).

The two members of the comparison are most commonly of the same grammatical form, e. g. two clauses (the latter of which may be contracted in various ways), two substantives, two pronouns, two infinitives, two adjectives, two adjectives, two adjectives, two adjectives, two infinitives connected by than in mod. Eng. either both have to or are both without it; formerly (until e. 1800), esp. after had rather had better, the second infinitive often had to when the first was without it.)

Instead of than after a comparative, as (like Ger. als) is common in Scotland, the north of England, and in parts of Ireland and the United States; nor (nar, ner) appears to be dialectal everywhere from Shetland to Hampshire and Cornwall, as well as in Ireland and America (see E.D.D.), but seems never to have been literary except in Sc., where also na was fermerly used. In Sc., the relation is sometimes expressed by be (= by) as 'this field is bigger be that (Jamieson s. v. 18).

The regular modern repr. of OE. Jegu, if the word had lived on in spoken use, would have been thain (cf. fain, main, rain), as it actually appears in some writers, chiefly northern, from 1900 to near 1600. But thain was in 15-16th c. Sc. written thane (in L. thanus), and this form, being used by Boece, Holinshed, and Shakspere (in Macbeth), was adopted by Selden, Spelman, and the legal antiquaries and historians of the 17th c. to represent the Anglo-Saxon beggn, and became the usual form in Eng. history. Recent historians, as Stubbs, Freeman, and Green, in order to distinguish the Anglo-Saxon use from the Sc. in sense 4, have revived the OE. Jegn as Theon, q. v.]

+3. Kindly thought or feeling entertained towards any one for favour or services received; grateful any one for favour or services received; grateful thought, gratitude. Rarely in pl. Obs.

The sense of 'gratitude, kindly or loving feeling for favour or benefit' must have been developed between that of 'good will, good feeling' generally, and that of 'the expression of gratitude'. But the feeling passes so naturally into its expression that it is not easy to separate them in the quotations, except by the accompanying verbs: to express one's thanks, and the archaic to con thanks, ought to mean to express one's feelings of gratitude; but to give, offer, return or receive thanks, ought to mean to give or receive the expression of gratitude; so to have thanks, but this is less clear. In many instances it is impossible to say which is meant; some of the examples given here may belong to 4.

B. Signification and uses.

B. Signification and uses.

The pronominal use goes back to the earliest DE. The adjectival demonstrative use in OE. corresponded to that of L. is, ea, id, or the uncorresponded to that of L. is, ea, id, or the unqualified French ce, cette, and is often indistinguishable from that of the modern definite article. But by 1200 the adjectival use of that began also to be more definitely demonstrative (= L. iste, ille, F. ce . . . la), and to be implicitly or explicitly opposed to This (= L. hic, F. ce . . . ci). As this appears first in Ormin, it may have been due to the influence of Norse, in which the adjectival use of pat as a demonstrative, opposed to petta 'this', is of earlier appearance.

a. n thing (concrete or abstract).

Often serving instead of repetition of the name of the thing, and directing the attention back to it (thus more emphatic than it). Also, for emphasis, used pleonastically in apposition to the sh.; also, in mod. use, as in quot. 1880, placed (as subj.) after the predicate sh., with ellipsis of the copula. In quot. 1905, applied to a person contemptuously spoken of as a thing or creature.

form of THAT dem. pron., used to subordinate one predication to another.

The Common Indo-Eur, had no relative pronoun, which has been developed separately in the different linguistic families. In Latin it was evolved out of the interrogative, in Teutonic chiefly out of the demonstrative. But even within the Teutonic languages the relative is differently formed (see Wright Gothic Granmar § 270, Old Eng. Granmar § 468). In mod, English it is expressed by that, what (after L. qui, que, quod, F. qui, que, quol) from the interrogative pronouns. In northern dialect, ME, and mod., it is commonly expressed by Ar, 'ar, rel. pron. In OE, it was expressed (1) by the simple demonstrative se, séo,

THAT.

Jext; (2) by the particle Je; (3) by Je preceded by a personal pronoun or the demonstrative. For Je, see This conjunctive particle. The use of the demonstrative as a relative appears to have come about simply by the subordination of the second of two originally consecutive sentences to the first; thus, 'he came to a river; that (or this) was broad and deep', whence 'he came to a river that was broad and deep'. In OE. it is sometimes impossible to determine whether the pronoun of the second clause is still demonstrative or has become relative. Thus the words in the OE. version of Bæda's History, 1. xii. (1890) 52 'Hi waron Wihtgylses suna. pas fæder wæs Witta haten. pæs fæder wæs doen nemed, 'might he read either as short consecutive sentences, 'They were sons of Wihtgyls; 'his father [lit. that's father] was called Witta; ki father was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls whose father was called Witta, whose father was called Witta, and this Wihta's father was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls whose father was called Witta, whose father was called Witta, and this winter was called Witta, whose father was called Witta, whose father was called Witta, whose father was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls whose father was called Witta, whose father was called Witta, whose father was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls whose father was called Witta, whose father was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls whose father was called Witta, those father was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls whose father was called Witta, the was named Woden or 'no 'They were sons of Wihtgyls whose father was called Witta, the was named Woden or 'no 'They were sons of Wihtgyls was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls was named Woden'; or 'They were sons of Wihtgyls was n principal clause being complete without the relative clause). Now only poet, or rhet, the ordinary equivalents being who (obj. whom) of persons, and which of things.

equivalents being who (obj. whom) of persons, and which of things.

But the relative clause is often merely descriptive, stating an attribute of the antecedent; or it may give the reason or a reason of the main statement, and thus be closely connected with it; the use in these cases approaches that in 1. There are thus many cases in which modern use allows either that or who, which, and in which poets prefer that. (That as in quot. c 1450 is now impossible.)

1. Introducing a dependent substantive-clause, as subject, object, or other element of the principal clause, or as complement of a sb. or adj., or in apposition with a sb. therein.

The dependent clause as subject is most commonly placed after the verb and introduced by a preceding it, e.g. 'it is certain that he was there' = 'that he was there, is certain': see IT 4 b. As object, it usually follows, e.g. 'I have heard that he was there'. (For ellipsis of that, see 10.)

[This use of that is generally held to have arisen out of the dem. pron. pointing to the clause which it introduces. Cf. (1) He once lived here: we all know that; (2) That (now this) we all know he once lived here; (3) We all know that (or this): he once lived here; (4) We all know that he once lived here; (5) We all know be once lived here. In 1, 2, 3 that is a demonstrative pronoun in apposition to the statement 'he once lived here'; in 4 it has sunk into a conjunctive particle, and (like the relative pronoun) has become stressless; in 5 it has disappeared, and 'he once lived here' appears as the direct object of 'we know'. After awave, evil tain, conscious, suspicious, assured, informed, pervanded, etc., of or some other prep, seems understood before that: 'I am certain of that: he once lived here'. But 'I am certain that' may have arisen as another way of saying 'I know that'; and so of the other expressions.]

Thegn (bēn). Hist. A form used by some recent historians to represent the OE. pegn (pegen, ben), Thane I, in its sense of tenant by military service, and as a term of rank below the ealdor-service, and as a term of rank below the ealdor-man or eorl and above the ceorl, corresponding in its various grades to the post-conquest baron and knight.

The purpose of this spelling is to distinguish the Anglo-Saxon from the Scottish use of Thane 1 (sense 4), made familiar by Shakspere.

Them (Nem, Nem), pers. pron. Forms: see below. [Three types are found in ME. a. pezzm, peym, a. ON. peim 'to those', 'to them', dat. pl. of the demonst. så, så, pat, the plural of which also supplies that of the 3rd pers. pron. (see They). This came down to the 16th c. in Eng. in the form theim, and still exists in north. dial. and in Sc. set theim. B. Northern Fing have some before their and still exists in north. in Sc. as thaim. B. Northern Eng. Pam, app. bef. 1300; this appears to represent hem, ham, dat. pl. of OE. se, seo, pat, pl. há (see That, Tho), found already as accus. in the Rushworth Gospels, where Lindisf. has hia, Ags. Gosp. hig, Hatton hyp, all in the sense 'them'. This came down in Sc. as thame to 16th c. γ. The existing form them, found in R. Brunne ε 1330. This may have originated as an unstressed form (8em, 8am) of peim or (?) pam, or it may actually have represented the OE. Anglian hæm of the Rushworth Gospels.

Jæm of the Rushworth Gospels.

Although the form from Norse is not known before Ormin, it must have been current in the Danelaw much earlier, since it was only dative in Norse, and must have been taken into OE. as dative, and have shared in the peculiar English change by which the accusative and dative of the pronouns were levelled under the dative form. In the singular line, him, instances of this change are seen in the Rushworth Gospel Gloss c975 (see Him 1d); and it is noteworthy that the same Gloss shows the use of ½m as acc., = hia, hiz, lyo, as mentioned above. This use of ½m as pers. pron. may itself have been due to Norse influence, the OE. word being used in the same sense as the Norse ½m. The commoner pron. of 3rd pers. pl. obj. (dat. and acc.) in OE. and ME. was Hem, surviving colloq. and dial, as 'em.]

Theodolite (pipedőleit). Forms: 6-7 theodelitus, 7 theodelite, -dolit, -dilit, 8 -dolet, 7theodolite. [Origin unknown: see Note below.]

A portable surveying instrument, originally for measuring horizontal angles, and consisting essentially of a planisphere or horizontal graduated circular plate, with an alidad or index bearing sights; subsequently variously elaborated with a telescope instead of sights, a compass, level, ver-nier, micrometer, and other accessories, and now often with the addition of a vertical circle or arc for the measurement of angles of altitude or depression.

THEOMORPHIC.

[Note, Gr. θεολογία meant 'an account of the gods, or of God (whether legendary or philosophical) '. Varro, following the Stoics, distinguished three kinds of theologia, mythical, natural (rational), and civil, the last being the knowledge of the due rites and ceremonies of religion. This threefold division is referred to also by Tertullian and St. Augustine. In Christian Greek, the vb. θεολογείν was used = 'to speak of as God, to attribute deity to', whence θεολογία had the specific sense of 'the ascription of a divine nature to Christ', in contrast to οἰκονομία, the doctrine of his incarnation and human nature. Another patristic Gr. use, arising out of the primary sense, was 'the account of God, or record of God's ways, as given in the Bible', whence the late Gr. and med. Lause of theologia for the Scriptores themselves. In the 1sth.c. (1121-40) Abelard applied the term to a philosophical treatment of the doctrines of the Christian religion, which, though at first strongly condemned, became current, and, in this sense, 'theologia' came to designate a department of academic study, the text-books of which were the libble and the Sentences (from the Fathers) of Peter Lombard. Hence the earliest Eng. use. (The passage from Gower in sense is derived ultimately from Aristole's division of the theoretic forms of philosophy into μαθηματική, θυσκή, θεολογική, the last being what we should call metaphysics, which included his doctrine of the divine nature.]]
