The word was revived early in the 17th c. in Latin and vernacular forms, to denote a kind of speculation, such as is found in the Jewish Cabbala and is illustrated by the writings of Cornelius Agrippa (1486-1535), Paracelsus, Robert Fludd, and others, which sought, usually by the doctrine of the macrocosm and microcosm, to derive from the knowledge of God contained in sacred books, or traditions mystically interpreted, a profounder knowledge and control of nature than could be obtained by the methods of the Aristotelian or other current philosophy. The name theosophy was often applied specifically to the system of Jacob Boehme (1575-1624), which, though not claiming to the same degree traditional authority, was largely expressed in language borrowed from writers of the school in question. The word has then and since been applied to more ancient and more recent views having more or less affinity to those already mentioned. already mentioned.

4. Used unemphatically to introduce a sentence. 4. Used unemphatically to introduce a sentence or clause in which, for the sake of emphasis or preparing the hearer, the verb comes before its subject, as there comes a time when, etc., there was heard a rumbling noise. In interrogative sentences there comes between the verb and subject, as Breathes there the man, etc.?, or follows the first word of a compound verb, as Does there breathe a man?, Shall there be any notice taken of it? The same order was formerly observed after an introductory adv. or clause, as Then came there a voice, Soon shall there arise a prophet.

Grammatically, there is no difference between There comes the train! and There comes a time when, etc.; but, while in the former there is demonstrative and stressed, in the latter it has been reduced to a mere anticipative element occupying the place of the subject which comes later. Preceding or following a main verb, or following any verb, there, thus used, is stressless (proclitic or enclitic: e.g. there ca'me, brea'thes there, visthere, wi'll-there), but preceding he or an auxiliary, there has a slight stress, and the verb is enclitic (e.g. the're-is, the're-was, the're-will). a. with intransitive verbs.

Bolton The Evolution of the Thermometer (Easton Pa. 1900), Renon Hist. du Thermomèter (Versailles 1876), Burckhardt Zur Geschichte des Thermometers, 1902.

The earliest form was an air-thermometer invented and used by Galleia a 1597, for indicating the temperature of the atmosphere; alcohol thermometers were used c 1650; the device of a fixed zero (orig, the freezing-point) was introduced by Hooke, 1665. The fixing of the zero at an arbitrary point below the freezing point is attributed to Fameshert of Amsterdam, who made mercurial thermometers c 1720, and his scale has been in general use in England since c 1724. The zero of Reachmuk (1730), and of the Centicator of the thermometer of Celsius (1742), now largely used in science, is (like that used by Hooke and Sir I. Newton) the freezing-point. The ordinary form is now a slender hermetically sealed glass tube with a fine bore, having a bulb at the lower end filled with mercury, or with alcohol or other liquid, and adjusted to a graduated scale; variations of temperature being indicated by the varying beights of the column of liquid in the tube, due to its expansion and contraction.

Forms: see below. [This word has a complicated history. The OE. pl. of δes , $\delta \acute{e}os$, $\delta \acute{e}os$, δis , was $\delta \acute{a}s$, less commonly $\delta \acute{e}s$ (:—OTeut. * $\acute{p}ai$ -se, -si), dat. $\delta iosum$, $\delta is(s)um$, gen. $\delta issa$, $\delta isra$. The form $\delta \acute{a}s$ remained in ME. as $\delta \acute{a}s$, which was duly retained in the north, and by regular phonetic development became bos in midland and south. The OE. dws gave ME. pws, pes, pess, and their local variants, including s. w. pus. A frequent form of pes from the 12th to the 16th c. was pis, identical with the sing. : see y below. The two forms \hat{fes} and \hat{fas} became differentiated in use after 1250-1300, \hat{fes} and its variants remaining in the south as plural of This, while has became synonymous with ha, the plural of se, seto, pet, That. This was prob. due to assimilation, pēs, pis, etc. being more like the singular and the dat. and gen. pl., while pās was in vowel like pāt and pā. Apparently the assumption of pās as pl. of pat began in the north, and slowly spread to the south in the form bos: see Those. But from the 12th c. there was evidently a tendency in the midl. dialects to differentiate the plural of this by adding -e, as in the plural of adjs. (al, alle, sum, sume, his, hise, etc.), so that from c 1200 to 1500 a frequent midland form was pis-e (2 syllahles in Ormin, etc.); in c, midl. also pese appears c 1200. Even the s. w. piis varied with piise. Of all these varieties, these was the survivor. Also, of tho and thos, the two plurals of that, the former was finally dropped in the course of the 16th c.; so that there now remain in standard English only the two forms these and those (thoos, thōs)—both in their origin plurals of this; the original plural of that being lost in standard English, though in Scotland and the northern counties of England it snrvives dialectally as thae, theä, theä: see THAE. In the same district these has been superseded by THIR (thur, thor). (The original pl. has, has is treated under Those, to which it belongs in form, though in meaning it belongs here.)] A. (Thick (Sik) is in dialect use from Cornwall and Hants to Worcester and Hereford; and also in Pembroke, Glamorgan, and Wexford. In many parts it has also the form thicky, thickee, or thicka. It is sometimes indefinite, and has to be made definite, as thick here, this, thick there, that. In Somerset and Dorset, thick and thesis are used only of individual shaped things, as a man or tree, while that and this are used of formless substances in the mass, as flour, milk, marble. See Eng. Forms: see below. [OE. pync(e)an, pihte, zepiht = OS. thunkian, thûhta (Du. dunken), OHG. dunchan, dihta (MHG. dunken, G. dünken, däuchte), ON. pykkja, pôtta (:—*puŋkja, *pihta) (Sw. tycka, Da. tykkes), Goth. pugkjan, pūhta,:—OTeut. *puŋkjan, *puŋxta to seem, appear. Although in Gothic and all the Teutonic langs. puŋkjan is inflected as a weak verb, with forms parallel to those of paŋkjan (Think v.²), it is generally held to have been (THINK v.2), it is generally held to have been originally a strong vb., the present stem of which was formed with -ja suffix, like *ligjan, *sitjan, etc., on the weak grade of an original ablaut series *high., *payk., *fugk- (see Think v.2), which subseq. passed into the first class of weak vbs. (cf. bubseq. passed into the first class of weak vds. (cf. brûkjan, brûhte, bugjan, bauhte, etc.). In OE., as in the cognate langs., the forms of this vb. and Think v.² remained quite distinct; but in ME., owing to the fact that both pyne- and pene- gave ME. pink-, and both piht and poht appeared in ME. as boust thought they became confused and ME. as boust, thought, they became confused and finally fell together. The contiguity of sense also helped: see Think v.²]

Think (piŋk), v.² Pa. t. and pple. thought (pēt). Forms: see below. [Ol., penc(e)an, pohte, (ge) poht, = OFris. thinka (WFris. tinkje, tinze); OS. thenkian, thāhta (Du., L.G. denken), OHG. denchen, dāhta (MHG., Ger. denken, dachte), ON. pekkja, patta (*peykja, *pāhta), (Sw. tānka, Da. tanka), Goth. pagkjan, pāhta (:-*payxta). In form, a factitive vb. ſ. paŋk-, strong grade of ablaut series piŋk-, paŋk-, puŋk-:-pre-Teut. *teng-, *tong-, *tng-: cf. Think v.¹ The original meaning may thus have been 'to cause (something) to seem or thus have been 'to cause (something) to seem or appear (to oneself)'. In ME., penk (as was normal with the groups -eng, -enk) became pink, with the result of confusing this in the present stem with the prec. vb., of which the pa. t. puhte was also from 13th c. written poughte, thought(e, so that the forms of the two verbs became completely identical. The practical equivalence of sense between me thinks, him thought, etc., and I think, he thought, etc., also contributed to this result, there being no difference of import between 'such compani as him thought [= OE. him puhte] competent' (see Think 71.1 B. 2 a) and 'such company as he thought [= OE. he pohte] competent '.]

name for the group SII in combination, analogous to hydroxyl, OH.

It indicates the presence of an -SH group (or an -SR group, where R is an alkyl radical), as in methyl-thiol.arbamate, H₂N. CO. SCH₃, as distinguished from methyl carbamate, H₂N. CO. OCH₃, and also from methyl-thion.carbamate, H₂N. CO. OCH₃, see Thions. The introduction of the word app. coincided with the change of has in the north from being plural of this to being synonymous with $p\bar{a}$, pl. of that: see These, Those, Tho. The earliest evidence is that of Cursor Mundi and the northern works of 1300-1350, in which jas and ja appear as plural of that, and thir in various spellings is the established plural of this, = southern thēs, midland thise, these. Some suggest its adoption from ON. peir, par 'those', pl. masc. and fem. of the simple demonstrative sá, sú, pai, of which the plural was used also as 3rd pers. pron. pl. 'they'. Others have suggested a combination of pe with $h\bar{e}r$ 'here', as if = the here, those here. Both suggestions present difficulties. See Note.]

[Note. Difficulties of derivation from ON. Peir, Pér are: (1) The retention of inflexional -r, otherwise unexemplified, and the fact that Peir had already been adopted in its pronominal sense as Pess, they, thei, in the north Pair, Pay, and was in full use in Cursor M. and other northern works: see They. Moreover, neither thir nor ther appears to represent Peir phonetically, as Ormin's Pess and E. Midl. Pei did. (2) The sense is quite different; the ON. word means 'those' or 'they', distinct from Pesser, ar' these'; while thir has been from the beginning emphatically 'these', as distinct from Peir, Phose', The explanation 'the here', 'those here' suits the sense; but (1) no trace has been found of these in an uncombined form; and (2) the addition of here to a demonstrative, common in the midlands and south of England (see Here 1 d), is not known as a northern idiom.]

(Note. The fribborh of prithborgh was orig, the 'association of ten men in common responsibility' to prevent crime and breach of the peace. In ME, legal use the word was worn down to fridborgh, friborg, and freeborg, and, the first element being associated with free 'free', was rendered in Anglo-Fr. frank plage, Anglo-L. francum flegium. The head man of the frithborh was in the 12th c. called fribborg-head or frithborges head, 'head of the frithborh' (Lause of Edioc. Conf. 20 (or 10; § 3), and was later known as borr/powhead, head bor(on/gh, bor (h)s-holder, and burrow-clder (--)*corheaddor), also in Anglo-L. freque capitalis' 'head or chief pledge'. In Fleta 1. xlvii. § 10, it is said, 'frithborgh [printed frich-] est Lundabilis homo astrarius testimonii ... per quem omnes invta ipsum commorantes firmiori pace sustententur sub stabilitate fideiussionis eius vel alterius per denarium numerum, unde quilibet est quasi plegius alterius. In this we see the transition of frithborh from the association to its individual members, and esp. to the headborough. In certain cases the latter acted with two of his fellows, 'duos de melioribus suorum frithborgorum' (Lause of Eduv. 20 (or 12), § 3), and this association of thee may have contributed to the change of name from fridborgh to thridborgh and third-borough. The probable connexion of thridborya with freedorth was suggested by Cowell: see quot. 1607.]

If this was the etymology the name would be applicable to the Cetacea generally, although from the quots. it was, at least often, specifically applied. But the etymology is itself rendered doubtful by the synonyms Whirtpool. (1552: see quot. 1538) and Hurtpool. (1556), which show that in the 16th c. the first element was sometimes taken as Thirk. 13 to hun, whirl, and the name thus app. identified with Whirtpool., a vortex, from the commotion caused by its spouting or blowing. Later the compound was felt as a single word and inflected at the end, the initial & being also exinflected at the end, the initial being also extended to the m. and f. nom. sing., making *ph-si, *pu-si, in ON. pesse, -i, in OE. pe-s, pho-s or pho-s. Gothic expressed the sense differently, viz. by adding to the demonstrative sa, sb, pata, the strengthening particle -tuh, making sah, soh, patuh, pl. m. phin. The OE. nom. pl. was phis, less commonly phis, ME. pts; the former now represented by Those (which functions as pl. of that), the latter by These q.v. In OE. the word was thus inflected:

In form, thivel seems to correspond to OE. hyfel bush, leafy plant', but no links of connexion between this and the modern sense have been found. Thorough (burð, burð), prep. and adv. Chiefly archaic or Obs. Forms: see below. [A disyllabic development of OE. purh, Through, when fully stressed, which appeared already in later OE. as purth (cf. OHG. duruh, durah, durth, Os. thuru), and has regularly become thorough in mod. Eng., and has regularly become thorough in mod. Eng., as burh became buruh, borough, furh furrow, borh borrow, sorh sorrow, mearh marrow. Thorough is thus the direct representative of the full-stressed OE. purh; and it is owing to the fact that purh was chiefly a preposition, and thus usually proclitic and stressless, that it is now, in this use represented by through (unstressed bru, new-stressed $pr\bar{u}$). The stressed form was naturally used when burh was a separate word, i. e. an adv., adj., or sb., or the stressed part of a compound, as in tho roughfare; and, as prepositions were sometimes emphatic and stressed, the puruh, thorough form remained also as a prep. beside the unstressed hurh, hur, pruh, pru, etc.; on the other hand, the new-stressed form through (bra) of the prep. has in more recent times been taken also by the adv., while thorough remains in both as an archaic form, and as that of the derived adj. and sh. In the adverb its function is largely taken over by its derivative thoroughly.

is largely taken over by its derivative thoroughly. As both thorough and through are existing words, distinct in spelling and still more in pronunciation, it seems best to make two articles, placing under Through the various monosyllabic forms, including the obsolete phrh, thurgh, hurh, burth, and the now dialectal thruff, and treating under Throught the less numerous disyllabic variants. This entails some duplication of the definition, but appears preferable to treating through merely as a variant of through. It must be remembered however that both fruth, through, and furuh, through, developed by insensible gradations out of furth, thurgh, and that therefore the a-forms under Through belong, down to 1300 and 1400, really as much to the history of thorough.

Pron. {adj. thy , yours your.}

1. The pronoun by which a person (or thing) is addressed, in the nominative singular; the pronoun denoting the person (or thing) spoken to.

Thou and its cases thee, thine, thy, were in OE. used in ordinary speech; in ME. they were gradually superseded by the plural ye, you, your, yours; in addressing a superior and (later) an equal, hut were long retained in addressing a single person, though now less general; still in various dialects used by parents to children, and familiarly hetween equals, esp. intimates; in other cases considered as rude. In general English used in addressing God or Christ, also in homiletic language, and in poetry, apostrophe, and elevated prose. For details of dialect use, see Wright, Eng. Dial. Dict., Thou II, Eng. Dial. Gram. § 404.

In ME. freq. combined with its verb when this precedes, the being then absorbed in the preceding t, as arrow art thou, hastow = hast thou. The initial p also became tafter s, t, or d, as hauis tu = hast thou, bat tu, and tu: see T 8.

Thrash (praf), thresh (praf), v. Forms: see below. [OE. perscan (pa. t. perscan, purscon, pa. pple. porscen), rately and late prescan, pryscan; a Common Tentonic verb, = OLG. *perscan (MLG., MDu., Flem. derschen; also MDu., Du., LG. derschen, LG. drosken, EFris. dërsken; OHG. dreskan (MHG., Ger. dreschen); ON. preskja, weak vb. (Norw. treskja, Da. tærske, Sw. tröska); Goth. priskan (*prask, *pruskans):—OTeut. *presk. —Indo-Eur. *tresk-exemplified also in Lith. trasck-eti to rattle. make a noise. Russ. Theograph, treskati eti to rattle, make a noise, Russ. Tpeckath treskati (refl.) to burst, crash, crackle: cf. OSlav. Theorems. sh. a crash. The metathesis persk- for presk- is found in OE., LG., Du., and Da. The meaning in OTeut. was prob. 'to tramp or stamp heavily with the feet', including both the action and the noise, as shown by the senses in which the word was taken into Romanic: Prov. tresc-ar, dresc-ar, It, tresc-are, OF. trescher to dance, Sp., Pg. trisc-ar to make a noise with the feet (see Diez s. v. trescare). The word came to be applied esp. to the act of treading out corn by the feet of men or oxen, and thus to the action of threshing by this or any later method. This is the only sense known in Gothic, OHG., and ONorse; but within historical times the chief mode of threshing was beating with the flail, whence the word came to be applied fig. to knocking, beating, or striking generally, and esp. of a person in battle or in punishment. In English this appears already in the OE. period; in German it is later (Grimm). The historical form in Eng. is thresh; a dialectal variant thrash, faintly represented in early times, came into literary use near the end of the 16th c., and became established in the 17th c., esp. in the sense 'to beat, flog, or belabour', for which it is now the ordinary form, while thresh is still largely retained in reference to corn. By this means, to thresh (corn) and to thrash (an offender or an opponent) have become to a considerable extent differentiated, so as almost to be felt as distinct words, esp. since the use of the flail has become so much superseded by mechanical means. Another form throsh, with the vowel of the pa. pple. as in Du. and LG., was frequent in late ME, but is now only dialectal.]

OE. pristan had no etymological connexion with Turkt st, early ME. pristen, prysten, pristen, from ON. prista (OTent. pristjan), nor did the original senses of the two garee. But, app. from the contiguity of the two forms prest, and prist, and possibly from the development in both vls. of the notion of constraint or pressure, the OE. vls. appears to have been, by 1200, identified with the Norse vls., so that in ME. they were treated more or less as parallel forms of one and the same word, and actually appear in some cases as variant MS, readings. In ME., thrust, thrist was esp. northern and north midland, and threst predominantly southern, where it still survived in 1542. Referred in Ruddiman's Glossary, 1710, to Threat sh, and explained as 'a throng, crowd, haste, speed'. Jamieson takes it in the first quot, as 'throng, crowd' (which does not suit the context); the second and third examples he renders 'in haste, eagerly', the fourth 'in pairs, in couples'. In all the passages we have perhaps strained applications of Threat sh, sense 2, 'pressure, etc,' introduced for the sake of rime.

Thrive (praiv), v. Pa. t. throve (prouv); pa. pple. thriven (priv'n). Also pa. t. and pple. thrived (praivd). [ME. prive, first in Ormin (prifenn), ad. ON. prifa-sk refl., to thrive. So Sw. trijvas, Da. trives to thrive, flourish. No trace appears in English of the reflexive suffix, which must have been dropped before the word became naturalized. ON. prifa-sk is in form the reflexive or passive of prifa, recorded in the senses 'to clutch, grip, grasp, lay hold of with sudden effort'. (For the sense-history Fritzner, Falk and Torp compare taka-sk, similarly used. The non-reflexive use may have started from the pa. pple prifinn, thriven.)]

[Throe is a late alteration (noted first in 1615) of the earlier throwe, throw (which survived as late as 1733). The origin and history of ME. prove (found ε 1200), and its northern form praw(e, praw, thrau (known c 1300, and still of ME. prowe (found c 1200), and its northern form prawe, praw, thraw (known c 1300, and still in use in Sc.) is not quite clear.

The normal source of an Eng. bw: Sc. aw, as in blow: blaw, crow: craw, snow: snaw, is an OE. dw: this would lead us to see in prowle: prawle, an early derivative from the verh prowen: prawen, OE. prawa, Thaow v.1. in its early sense 'to twist, rack, torture' (cf. Thaow w.1. in its early sense 'to twist, rack, torture' (cf. Thaow w.1. in continuous prawen, or 1000). Some suggest that the sh. represented OE. prawa, 'painful infliction, affliction, plague, pang, evil' (Boswing), which is perh. favoured by the instance crass of prahes riming with lahes' laws' (if that belougs here). But prawa would normally give in midland and southern Eng. not throwe but thrawe (cf. Claw). On the other hand, a derivation (also suggested) from OE. prowian, Throw v.2 'to suffer', which would suit Eng. throw, and eventually ran together with thraw, It then the word was orig. the OE. prawa, we should have to suppose that this by 1200 (under the influence of prowian to suffer) became prowe, but remained in the north as prawe, thraw, and eventually ran together with thraw, Throw s.1.

The identity of throe with ME. throwe, makes its derivation from OE. pra. ME. Thro, then sb. impossible. The chauge of throve(e to throe was app. merely quasifonce as a 16th c. variant of blow sb., and on the other hand shows own, OE. slituymr; throe would gain favour as making a distinction between this word and throw sh.2 in its ordinary English use. In Scotland, on the other hand, where thraw vh. has kindred senses, thraw remains unchanged as the form of this sh., as in deid-thraw death-throe.]

[OE. &urh, purh, Northumb. &erh, a Common WGer. prep. and adv.: cf. OFris. (from *thurch) thruch, truch (WFris. trach, NFris. truch, trach); OS. thurh, thuru, *thurih (MLG. dorch, dörch, dor, dör, dör, dör, dör, dör, dor, dur, Du. door); OHG. duruh, durih, duri, dur (MHG. durch, dürch, dur, dür, Ger. durch, dial. dur, dör). Not in Scandinavian: in Gothic with different ablant grade hairh (= herh): prob. cases dör). Not in Scandinavian: in Gothic with different ablaut grade pairh (= perh); prob. cases of a sb., belonging to a pre-Teut. ablaut-series *terk-, tork-, trk- to bore: cf. Goth. pairkô hole, and OHG. durhil, MHG. dürchel, dürkel, OE. *pyrhil, pyrel bored, perforated: cf. Thirl. sb. OE. purh with full stress became puruh, now Thomough, as burh has become borough, furh furrow, etc.; when unstressed and proclitic, purh became pür, and with metathesis prih, prii, throi, thrò. The unstressed forms naturally prevailed in proclitic prepositional use, and the stressed in the adverb. prepositional use, and the stressed in the adverb, and its derived adj. and sb. But with the restressing of the prep. thru as through (pru), this form has also become possible as an adverb, while on the other hand the stressed Thorough also survives as an archaic form of the preposition beside the normal through. Thurf is an early phonetic development of purh, and thruf a more recent one of pruh, similar to (roi) for rough, dwarf from dwergh, (bart) for Bargh, (bruf) for Burgh (placenames), (inv f) for enough, (pf) for though, etc. The metathesis of pruh for purh occurs already c 1300 in a s. w. text; but otherwise in ME. is seally nother the property of the purh occurs already. usually northern. From Caxton onwards it was the standard English form.

Through-, in combination. (See Thorough-)

1. Combinations of Through prep. or adv. with verbs (pples., vbl. sbs.), or adjs. Chiefly Obs.

In OE. through qualifying a verb stood before it regularly in the infinitive and participles, and usually in the finite vb. in subordinate clauses. In such cases there was a tendency for it to be written in comb., as in mod. German durchgehen, durchgehend, durchwachsen. In some words this tendency became stronger in ME., and the combined form was used also in the finite verb. For these see the Main words below. The following illustrate the process, without any attempt to be exhaustive:

+through-carve(-kerf)v., trans. to cut through; through-carved ppl. a., see quot.; through-carved ppl. a., see quot.; through-carvet v. [Cast v. 57], trans. to plaster throughout; through-cut v., trans. to cut through, perforate by cutting; through-drive v., trans. to drive a nail or spike through, to transfix; †through-fi-cehe (thurghe-fyche) v. [FIGHE v.], trans. to pierce through, transfix; † through-formed ppl. a., thoroughly formed; full-grown; † through-gailed pa. pple. Ride v. 2); (b) intr. to penetrate through (cf. Ride v. 9); +through-rive v. (fa. t. purh-raf) [Rive v.], trans. to rive or tear through; +through-[RIVE v.], trans. to rive or tear through; †throughrun (thurh-evrn) v., trans. to overrun; †through-shed (purjsched) v. (L. perfundere), trans. to suffuse; †through-shoot (pa. t. purh-porjschote) v., trans. to shoot through, pierce through; †through-shove v. Thwart (pwoit), sb.2 [app. a sb. use (which came in after 1725) of Thwart adv. and adj., having reference to the position of the rowing benches or seats at/wart or across the boat. Whether its use was partly due to similarity of sound to thaught, thawt, or thought, previously applied to the same thing, is uncertain. Our latest contemporary instance of 'thaught or thought' is of 1721, of thoat 1697, of thout 1725, while our first of 'thaughts or thwarts' is of 1736, so that first of 'thaughts or thwarts' is of 1730, so that the appellations were continuous in use, as if the one had passed into the other. But, for the full determination of the relations between thost, thought or thaught, and thwart, fuller evidence between 1500 and 1700 is needed. Cf. Thort, Thought's, a rower's bench.

ON. pver was shortened from *pverh = OF. pverh, pweorh (genitive pweores, in comb. pweor-) crooked, cross, perverse = OHG. dwerh, dwerah, twerh, MHG. dwerch, twerch, Ger. zwerch- (in composition). the ON. adj. pver-r (Norw. tver, tvær, Sw. tver, perverse = 011G. awern, awern, iwern, initial dwerch, twerch, Ger. zwerch- (in composition), Goth. pwairhs cross, angry, :-OTcut. *pwerh:-*pwerhw-:-Indo-Eur. *twerkw-, whence L. torquēre to twist, Skr. tarku' spindle. In Eng. the adv. is known c1200, first in the combinations pwert ut (Thwert-our) and pwert-over (Thwart-our). OVER), later (c 1300) over-powert (OVERTHWART). It was used as an adj., with a vb. pwerten, both fig., c 1250, and as a prep. bef. 1300. In all these thwert became thwart in the 15th c. Thwart sb.

The ME, material is scanty, and the sense development is not illustrated fully by the extant quotations. The senses are therefore here arranged in what appears to be the logical order.]

The length of the stem-vowel in OE. is disputed; the dictionaries generally have pyfel, viewing it as a derivative of puf, tuff of leaves; Sievers thinks that the y was certainly short. Whether pyfel or pyvel, the form agrees remarkably with that of Thivel a pot-stick; but no connexion of sense has been found, and there is a gap both of time and place between the Dorsetshire puvel of 1250 and the Yorkshire hyvelle of 1433.]
