tainti'd instruction (c 130 A.D.), I. 105 tainta' to instruct, teach. So med.L., F., Ger., etc. taintad. From its primary sense of 'teaching, instruction, learning', the word was applied to the teaching or instruction continued in a biblical text, and to the body of traditional learning possessed by a particular Rabbi; but it came to be applied distinctively to the discussion, explanation, and illustration of the body of traditional law contained in the Mishnah, and so to the concrete collection of this teaching. In the wide sense, The body of Jewish civil and ceremonial traditionary law, consisting of the ceremonial traditionary law, consisting of the Mishnah or binding precepts of the elders, additional to and developed from the Pentateuch, and the later Gemara or commentary upon these, forming a complement, explanatory, illustrative, and discursive, to the Mishnah. The term was originally applied to the Gemara, of which two recensions exist, known respectively as the Jerusalem (or Palestinian) and the Babylonian Talmud; to the latter of which the name is in strictest use confined.

The precepts of the Mishnah were collected and codified about A.D. 200; the redaction of the Jerusalem Talmud had reached almost its present form by A.D. 408; that of the Bahylonion Talmud extended from A.D. 400 to 500. 1532 More Confut. English use the name has become csp. associated with the political and municipal corruption which at varions times has characterized the government of New York.

Tamanen, Tamene, Taminent, Taminy was the name of an Indian chief with whom W. Pean had transactions for land 1683 and 1697. Some time prior to 1771 the name became 'canonized', and from 1772 for about twenty years 'Saint' (or 'King') Tamina, Tamany, Tamany (generally identified with the chief of Penns; time) was regarded as the tutelar saint of Pennsylvania and other northern colonies or States, and the day assigned to him, May 1st (Old Style), May 12th (New Style), appropriated to popular celebrations, festive gatherings (often with some benevolent object), etc. From 1782 the name became associated with Societies established on a more or less permanent basis, of which that organized in New York is mentioned in 1787. The one which in 1790 is recorded as the 'Society of St. Tammany' and 'the Sons of St. Tammany and Columbian Order', and which in its constitution is claimed to he 'founded on the true principles of patriotism, and has for its motives charity and brotherly love', soon developed strong political activity, and by c 1810 had become the Fead-quarters of the Democratic Party (then called the Republican Party) in the State and City of New York (From notes supplied by Mr. A. for curved surface), i.e. meets it at a point and being produced does not (ordinarily) intersect it at that point.

In Higher Geometry a tangent is regarded as the limiting position of a line intersecting a curve when the two (or more) points of intersection coincide, and is hence defined as a straight line passing through two (or more) consecutive points of the curve. If the curve be conceived as traced by a moving particle, the tangent at any point of it represents the direction of motion at that point; hence a body moving in a curve, when the restraining force is withdrawn, flies off at a tangent, i. e. along the tangent (cf. the fig. use in c). At a point of inflexion, where the curvature (i. e. deviation from the straight line) changes its direction, the tangent intersects as well as touches the curve.

Tank (tenk), 56.1 Forms: 7 tanke, tanque, tancke, tanck, 7- tank. [In sense 1, perh. immediately from an Indian vernacular: cf. The 17th c. Eng. forms tanque and tanke appear to be taken from the Pg.; tanck, tank, on the other hand, with It. tancho (Varthema 1510), may have been from Guz. tānkh. As to the Eng. use in senses 1 b and 2, it is not clear whether this came from Anglo-Indian usage, or was immediately related to Pg. tanque. It could scarcely arise out of earlier Eng. or Sc. stank 'pond, fish-pond, stagnant pool, ditch', since this never in sense approached that of tank.]

Tannin (tænin). Chem. [a. F. tanin 1]

Tannin (tenin). Chem. [a. F. tanin, 'le principe tannant' (1798 Proust in Ann. de Chimie XXV. 225), f. tan Tan sb.1+ In 1,] Any member of a group of astringent vegetable substances, the tannins, which possess the property of combining with animal hide and converting it into leather.

The first member of this group isolated and so named was the tannin of gall-nuts, subsequently also called Tannic axid; and to this the names tannin and tannic axid are still often specifically applied. But the discovery that the astringent principles of other vegetable substances were not chemically identical with that of gall-insts made it needful to distinguish the various tannins. The original or 'ordinary tannin' became distinctively GALLOTANIN, other members of the group being named cafictannin, catchulannin, kinotannin, quercitannin, actor. (cf. Tannic), or particularized as oak-bark tannin, according to their source. 1801 Nicholson's Jrnl. II. 193 Abridgment of a Memoir of Mr. Proust on Tanin and its Species. 1804 Phil. Trans. The actual history is uncertain, chiefly from the ambiguity of the spelling target. The current pronunciation with 'hard g' '(g) is carried back to 15th c. by the spelling target (so in 16th c. guet), but the early spelling target might be (taudzhet), which would have been the natural English diminutive of Targe. In French also, the ordinary form was targete, targette (*zhet); but, alongside of this, targette (*get), is cited of 1494, and *gnette in 16th e. (possibly after Pr. targuetta or 1t. targhetta). It is possible that Eng. target had at first 'soft g' (dzh) after targe and OF. target(t)e, but that this was at an early date changed to the present pronunciation with 'hard g', after F. targuet(te, and the Prov. and Italian forms.)

The meit is al miskareit.

[Note. It cannot be disputed that the ME, forms of this verb are identical with those of Taav 'to provoke, irritate, harass, vex, excite', both being in ME. tery., tary. (the spelling tarry heing rare before 1500). Original identity with tary, and thus derivation from OE. teryan, would also account for the apparent identity of tarry and Tarrow, since both could go back to the OE. variant types teryan (targan), terw(i)an (tarw(i)an), with phonetic development according to the position of the z and win different inflected forms: cf. Harrow and Harrow, word and Worden. The consequent identification with OF. tarier might also help to explain the existence of the derivatives tarriage, tarriance, tarryment, with French suffixes (although it is to be noted that these appear as derivatives of tarry and not of tary).

But no sense in the least approaching 'tarry' occurs in OE. tergan, tervo(t)an, or in OF. tarier, and the difficulty of deriving this sense from that of 'provoke, vex, harass' seems almost insurmountable. Some have suggested an influence upon tarry of the synonymous Tage v.¹, OF. targier; but this seems impossible. Others, seeing that ME. tervuen, terre, Tar v.² and Tary had both a (rare) sease (2) 'to weary, fatigue, tire' (as if influenced by OE. teorian, ME. tiere, tere, Tare) have thought that this sense provided a connecting link between the notions of 'vex' and 'delay, retard'; but there is nothing in the quotations to confirm this view, and the actual history of tarry in its existing sense remains unascertained.]

The original name (by which the people in question either called themselves or were designated by their neighbours) is generally beld to have been, as in Persian, etc., Tātār, as to the language and meaning of which various conjectures have been put forth; but in Western Europe, they appear from the first as Tartari, Tartares, or Tartars, their name being apparently associated with Tartarus, hell. See the saying attributed by many historians to St. Louis of France a 1270, in Littré, s.v. Tartare, and a translation in quot. 1842 below. The form Tātar and its derivatives are now often used in ethnological works in sense 1, but the long-established Tartar is always used in the derived senses, and is also held by some to have been the original name; see quot. 1885, and its context.]

First known in the West as applied to the Mongols, Tartars, Turks, etc., mingled host of Mongols, Tartars, Turks, etc., which under the leadership of Jenghiz Khan (1202-1227) overran and devastated much of Asia and mingled host of Mongois, lattars, luins, etc., which under the leadership of Jenghiz Khan (1202-1227) overran and devastated much of Asia and Eastern Europe; hence vaguely applied to the descendants of these now dwelling in Asia or Europe; more strictly and ethnologically, to any member of the Tâtar or Turkic branch of the Ural-Altaic or Turanian family, embracing the Turks, Cossacks, and Kirghiz Tartars. The most likely suggestion is that the sb. arose from the Fr. phrase tant pour tant, 'one for another, tit for tat', lit. But the chronology of the sb. and vh. makes this doubtful.

Other suggestions, for vb. or sb., are OF. tanter, variant of tenter to try, prove, tempt; MHG. tant empty talk; and Du. tanden 'impetere, invadere aliquem' (Kilian), none of which seem adequate.]

Ely): A silk 'lace' or necktie, much worn by women in the 16th and early 17th c.; sometimes taken as a type of female adornments.

[As to the origin of the name, it is told, originally by Bæda (Eccl. Hist. IV. ix.), and after him by Ælfric in the Life of St. &Beloryth, Virgin (Ælfric's Lives of Saints, ed. Skeat, 188, xx. il, 49-60), that St. Andrey died of a tumour in her throat, which she considered to be a just retribution, because in her youth she had for vain show adorned her neck with manifold splendid necklaces, 'forðan þe ic on ingoðe frætwede mine swursa mid mænifealdum swurbeagum'. In the 16th century, N. Harpsfield, Archdeacon of Canterbury under Philip and Mary (died 1588), after relating the story in his (Latin) Historia Anglicana Æcclesiastica (Douay 1622), adds 'Our women of England are wont to wear about the neck a certain necklace [Lorquem quendam], formed of thia and fine silk, perchance in nemory of what we have told'. See also, more particularly, quot. 1674 below. Skinner in his Etymolegicon (licensed 1668), explains Tawdry lace as' Ties, firinges, or hands, bought at the fair held at the fine of St. Etheldreda, as rightly points out Doctor Th. Henshaw'. There is no discrepancy between the two statements. 'St. Andrey's laces' would naturally be largely offered for sale at her fair, and though this did not give the article its name, it doubtless made it more widely known, and led to the production of cheap and showy forms for the 'country wenches' (see Nares s.v.), which at length gave to tawdry its later connotation.]

commodities, transactions, etc., now at fixed rates, mostly proportional to the amount on which the contribution is levied.

'Tax' is the most inclusive term for these contributions, esp, when spoken of as the matter of taxation, and in such phrases as direct and indirect tax (see Direct a. 6. e., Indirect 2.), including also similar levies for the support of the work of such local or specific bodies as county or municipal, conneils, poor law or school boards, etc. But in British practice few of the individual imposts are called by the name, the most notable being the Income Tax, Land Tax, and Property tax (also dog-tax, match-tax, window-tax), the rest being mostly styled 'duties', as excise, import, export, estate, house, stamp, death duties, etc. The 'taxes levied by local bodies are usually called 'rates', e.g. borough, country, poor, school, vacter rate, etc. In U.S. 'tax' is more generally applied in ordinary language to every federal, state, or local exaction of this kind: ef. the combs in 7.

II. To show by way of information or instruction. (Now the leading sense.)

In this group the original construction had an accusative of the thing imparted, with dative of the person or recipient when expressed. The loss of the dative inflexion, or, as in the pronouns, its identification with the accusative, was sometimes replaced by the preposition to, but oftener left two objects, of which the indirect, denoting the recipient, became more and more viewed as the direct object, and as such was made the subject of the passive voice, not only when the original direct object was an infinitive, as he was taught Latin, in preference to Latin was taught him.

b. The right or prerogative of jurisdiction in a suit of team, together with the fees and profits thence accruing; from the 11th c. usually included in charters granting land (in which it regularly followed toll, esp. in the formula with sac and soc, iollowed 1011, esp. in the formula with sac and soc, toll and team, infangthief, etc.).

Saca and soene (without toll and team) is first found in a charter of 1020 or later (see INFANGTHIEF); toll and team talone) is known first in a charter a 1023; the formula combining them appears just after the accession of Edward the Confessor, 1024, and occurs in numerous charters ascribed to him, mostly existing only in later copies. It occurs also in the Laws of Wm. I and Henry 1. The meaning of team was still known when the 'Laws of Edw, the Confessor' were compiled $c$1130-35$ (see above). After the 12th c, it was an obsolete term, the meaning of which was largely a matter of conjecture, and was generally mistaken: see c. 1066 Charter Edw. -teen (tīn), combining element. [OE. *-tiene, -tyne, -téne, ME. -tēne = OFris. -téna, -tine, OS. tein (-tian', LG.-tein, Du.-tien, OHG.-zehan (-zeheni), Ger. -zehn.] An inflected form of TEN, added to the simple numerals from three to nine, to form the names of those from thirteen to nineteen.

the simple numerals from three to nine, to form the names of those from threen to nineteen.

Hence -teenth (-tīn), forming ordinal numerals from the cardinals in -teen, from thirteenth to nineteenth. In ME, this took the place of earlier -tebe, OE, téobe: cf. TENTH and -TH.

In early OE, as in the cognate langs, the simple numerals, from four upwards, had an inflected and an uninflected form, the latter commonly used before a shi, serfon dagas, the former in other positions, e.g., swa ealle serfone. The inflected forms were shs. of the -t declension, with nominative pl. in a (neut. 4, e.g.). Subsequently these forms were levelled, the numerals up to twelve retaining the uninflected form, those from thirteen to nineteen the inflected, as teon, ten, fifteen, fifteen. In ME, the final -e of -têne, -teen became mute; in mod. Eng. -teen it is no longer written, but the stem yowel remains long.

These compounds had originally the stress on the first element (by tin), as in dreit what, tre-dictin, tre-dicti, bibbiosa, etc. In modern Eng. this is retained in counting: 'twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen', etc., also before hundred, as 'eighteen hundred and ni'nety'; but before a st, there is a secondary stress on -teen, as 'eighteen' men'. Otherwise the two elements have usually equal stress, thirteen, seventee'n, eighteen, which in the pause may become:—(not—), as 'at the age of thirteen', 'sweet se ventee'n'. This stressing may have arisen to distinguish them clearly from the numerals in -ty:' not seventee'n but seventy'; 'the forty days have been reduced to fourtee'n'. The stressing of the ordinals in -teenth follows the same lines.

Telescopes are of two kinds: refracting, in which the image is produced by a lens the object glass), and reflecting, in which it is produced by a lens or combination of lenses (the Evertice, q.v.). Large telescopes of both these kinds are used by a stronomers. The smaller hand-telescopes are always refracting, and consist of two or more tubes made to slide one within another for convenience of packing into a narrow compass and for adjusting the lenses as required for focusing the image; cf. [Note. L.temperantia (whence F. and Eng. temperance) was used by Cicero to render Plato's σωφροσύνη 'soundmindedness, prudence, moderation, sobriety, self-control', in Plato and in the Stoics, one of the original four (cardinal) virtues, φρόνησις, δικαιοσύνη, ανδρεία, σωφροσύνη, rendered in L. by Jerome and Augustine prudentia, institia, fortitudo, temperantia; also in Albertus Magnus, Aquinas, and the mediæval writers generally, and in the med.L. version of Aristotle's Nicom. Ethics. Thence the use of temperantic was not orig. a Christian word: it occurs nowhere in the Vulgate or the Antiqua; it is not one of the 'fruits of the Spirit', even in the expanded list in the Vulgate, in Galat. v. 23. By Wyolif, however, temperanuce was used to render L. modestia 'moderation', in the Rhemish, modestie. In the Eng. versions from Tindale onward, temperante or temperance, renders Gr. eykpáreta 'self-mastery or restraint, esp. of certain sensual impulses', in L. commonly continentia. In Acts xxiv. 25 Tindale, Cranmer, Geneva, 1611, and Revised have temperance, where Vulgate has castilate, Wyclif, Coverdule, Rhemish chastile, -tie.
