(1) The g of the modern form (see γ -forms below) cannot be accounted for by any known OF. or AF. forms (but med.L. zugurum occurs); cf., however, AF. segerstaine, Norman F. segrestein = OF. secrestain (see Sexton), and Eng. flagon representing F. flacon. (2) The quantity of the vowel of the first syllable appears to have been variable from early times (cf. the spellings suigur, sewger, seukere, and suggur), but the development of initial (si) into (f) makes it probable that the long \vec{u} prevailed (cf. sure), and that shortening took place afterwards; (siu go1) survives in some north midl. districts. (3) The Sc. forms (8) pronounced (surker). show a survival of the short vowel type from F. (sikr), but LG. influence is also possible.

substances. In popular and commercial language it is otherwise known as Brimstone. (See also Sulphur vivum.) In Chemistry, one of the nonmetallic elements: atomic weight 32, symbol S. Sulphur exists in two distinct crystalline forms and in an amorphous form. It is manufactured largely from native sulphides of copper and iron; when refined and cast into moulds, it is the roll or stick sulphur of commerce. It is highly inflammable, and is used in the manufacture of matches, gunpowder, and sulphuric acid, for vulcanizing rubber, in bleaching, and as a disinfectant.

I. 1. The brightest (as seen from the earth) of the heavenly bodies, the luminary or orb of day; the central body of the solar system, around which the earth and other planets revolve, being kept in their orbits by its attraction and supplied with light and heat by its radiation; in the Ptolemaic system reckoned as a planet, in modern ofer-, etc. Over-.)

A certain number of important Latin compounds, chiefly verbs, belong to the classical period, but the great majority are of later date, and many are re-corded first from Christian writers. As a living prefix in English, super- first appears about the middle of the 15th c.; it became frequent in Elizabethan times, and in the 17th c. it was very widely used. In more recent times it has been extensively introduced into the nomenclature of chemistry and other sciences as a correlative to SUB-. In technical language it sometimes varies with SUPRA- (of which the strict correlative is INFRA-), e.g. superlocal and supra-local, superorbital and supra-orbital, superlapsarian and supralapsarian.

The more important and permanent compounds are entered in this Dictionary as main words; the present article includes such compounds of a general character as have not a permanent status, and scientific terms of which the meaning may (for the most part) be gathered from the meaning of the prefix and that of the radical element.

the prefix and that of the radical element. A considerable number of Latin compounds were adopted in 'learned' form in OF., as superabonder, supereminent, supererogation, superfix, superintendance, superscription, supersder; a few of such compounds became permanently established, as superficie, superilatif, superstition, but the majority have been superseded by forms with the 'popular' representative of L. super., viz. sur'; e.g. surabonder, suréminent, surérogation, surintendance; cf. the parallel form superfin, surfin in mod.F.

1. The last meal of the day; (contextually) the hour at which this is taken, supper-time; also, such a meal made the occasion of a social or festive gathering. Often without article, demonstrative, possessive, or the like, esp. when governed by a prep. (to have supper; at, to, for, after supper).

Formerly, the last of the three meals of the day (breakfast, dinner, and supper); now applied to the last substantial meal of the day when dinner is taken in the middle of the day, or to a late meal following an early evening dinner. Supper is usually a less formal meal than late dinner.

Supra · (siū · prā), prefix, repr. L. suprā - = suprā (related to super and ultimately to sub) adv. and prep., above, beyond, in addition (to), before in time, occurring in a few compounds in classical and late Latin; in med. and mod.L. it is mainly restricted to technical terms. Its meanings in English are for the most part parallel to, in much less vogue than, those of Super-; but it is more prevalent than the latter in certain uses, e.g. the scientific uses in I a and I b, in which it is most commonly employed as a living prefix.

The stressing is as in compounds of Super-, q.v. p. 166/3.
