(2) De Hist. Lat. pag. 48. de Poet. Lat. pag. 15.

sius who made use of it (2); but yet true in the main. There are many other wrong citations in this article of Moreri's Dictionary: Pliny is cited there twice, and the first time falsely. The 5th chapter of book 3d of de re rustica of Varro, and the 13th of book 3d of Macrobius's Saturnalia, are not just quotations; and shew that Moreri did not take care to verify, whether the Printers of Vossius had put one figure for another.

Here follow the words of Valerius Maximus, which I promised to cite. Hortensia Q. Hortensii filia cum ordo Matronarum gravi tributo à Triumviris esset onerata, nec quisquam virorum patrocinium eis accommodare auderet, causam fœminarum apud Triumviros constanter & feliciter egit. Representata enim patris facundia impetravit, ut major pars imperatæ pecuniæ his remitteretur (3). i. e. "Hortensia, the daughter of Q. Hortensius, upon the Triumviri's laying a very heavy tax on the Ladies of Rome, and no man's daring to appear in their favour, pleaded their cause with great resolution and success before the Triumviri; for by her eloquence, which was equal to that of her father's, she prevailed so far as to get the greater part of that tax remitted."

(3) Valer. Max. lib. 8. cap. 3. Moreri has cited lib. 3. Hofman lib. 2.

[A] Antonius Augustinus had no reason to rank this family among the Patricians.] The tract written by Antonius Augustinus de Romanorum Gentibus & Familiis, which I make use of, was printed at Lyons in 1592, in 4to. We there find word for word, on the family Hortensia, what Richard Streinnius relates concerning it, in the book written by him on the same subject in 1559. Both proceed on a false foundation, in order to make this family Patrician, viz. that Cicero, say they, bestows the epithet noble on Hortensius, in his speeches against Verres. Who does not know that the epithets nobilis and plebeius were consistent in old Rome?

[B] Above an hundred years after . . . QUINTUS HORTENSIUS the Dictator.] It would be very difficult to find exactly the year when our QUINTUS HORTENSIUS was Dictator. I fancy Sigonius was right in fixing it to the year 467. Father Hardouin (1) doubtless approved this opinion; but the printers of his work, by omitting a letter, make him say that the sedition of the people, which was quieted by Hortensius the Dictator, happened in the year cclclxvii. St. Austin is of opinion, that Hortensius was created Dictator, on account of the peoples retiring at that time to the Janiculum, which is very probable. Post graves & longas Rom. seditiones quibus ad ultimum plebs in Janiculum hostili diremptione secesserat, cujus mali tam dira calamitas erat, ut ejus rei causa, quod in extremis periculis fieri solebat, & Dictator crearetur Hortensius, qui plebe revocata in eodem magistratu expiravit, quod nulli Dictatori ante contigerat (2). i. e. "The Plebeians in Rome, after several grievous and long seditions, withdrew at last in an hostile manner to the Janiculum, which occasioned so dire a calamity, that on this account, as when the State was in imminent danger, Hortensius was created Dictator, who having brought back the people, died in his

(1) In Plin. lib. 16. cap. 10. pag. 239. tom. 3.

(2) August. de Civitate Dei, lib. 3. cap. 17.

"office, which no other Dictator had ever done before."

[C] . . . and enacted a law, viz. that thenceforward all the Romans should be obliged to obey the ordinances of the people.] An author cited by Aulus Gellius informs us, that the ordinances made by the report, or at the desire of the Tribunes of the people, were not properly called laws, but plebiscita; and that the Patricians, till the Dictatorship of Hortensius, were not subject to such kind of Ordinances. Ne leges quidem proprie sed plebiscita appellantur, quæ tribunis plebis ferentibus accepta sunt, quibus rogationibus ante Patricii non tenebantur, donec Q. Hortensius Dictator eam legem tulit, ut eo jure quod plebs statuisset, omnes Quirites tenerentur (3): now Livy tells us the very contrary of this; for he says that Lucius Valerius, and Marcus Horatius, who were appointed Consuls in the year of Rome 305, began to shew their complacency for the people, by enacting a law, which left it no longer in doubt, whether the laws established by the people, were binding to the Senate. That law decided this affair to the advantage of the people. Omni primum cum veluti in controverso jure esset tenerenturque Patres plebiscitis, legem centuriatis comitiis tulere, ut quod tributum plebes jussisset populum teneret, qua lege tribunitiis rogationibus telum acerrimum datum est (4). i. e. "First of all, it having been controverted in some measure, whether the ordinances of the people were binding with respect to the Senators; they enacted a law in the Comitia Centuriata, that whatsoever the Plebeians or Commons might decree in their tribes, should bind the whole Roman people; which Law enforced prodigiously all the motions the Tribunes might make." The Magistrates called Decemviri had been just before put down; and the seditious populace, who had retired to mount Aventine, recalled. The new Consuls did all that lay in their power to make themselves popular. Quintus Capitolinus acknowledged the same of this new law three years after; when representing to the people all the advantages which the Senate had granted them, he brings into the account scita plebis injuncta patribus (5). This law was renewed in the year of Rome 415, Publius Philo the Dictator having ordained that the Plebiscita should oblige all the Romans (6). The author quoted by Aulus Gellius was therefore not justly informed. Had he said that the Senators were so very artful as to elude the decision; and therefore that it was found necessary to renew it in an authentic manner, under the Dictatorship of Quintus Hortensius, he would not be the just object of our criticism; but this he has not done. Pliny (7) speaks of what was enacted by this Dictator in favour of the people, without saying whether ever such a law had, or had not, been enacted before. Sigonius did not know what had been transacted under Valerius and Horatius the Consuls; he saying (8), that Hortensius's law had been already enacted by Publius Philo the Dictator, in the year of Rome 414.

[D] Moreri has committed strange mistakes with regard to this Dictator.] Two gross blunders in a few words; one is, in saying that he was a famous Civilian

(3) Lælius Felix, apud A. Gellium, lib. 15. cap. 27.

(4) Livius, lib. 3. cap. 45.

(5) Idem, cap. 47.

(6) Ut plebiscita omnes Quirites tenerent. Livius, Dec. 1. lib. 8. cap. 12.

(7) Lib. 16. cap. 10.

(8) In Fast. ad ann. 467.

He who made himself the most famous, is HORTENSIVS the Orator of the following article.

lius and Legislator; the other, the affirming that Hortensius the Orator was his grandson. Were ever such Magistrates, in the Commonwealth of Rome, who had procured the enacting of some laws, called Legislators? Had this been, the number of the Roman Legislators would be exceedingly great; neither are they the set of people called Jurisperiti or Civilians. Now it is very plain, that Moreri knew no circumstance relating to Q. Hortensius the Dictator, but that he had enacted a law, whereby the Senate was subjected to the Plebiscita. Farther, since Moreri observes that the Dictatorship of this Hortensius falls under the year of Rome 468, how could he take him for the grandfather of Hortensius the Orator, who, according to him, was a military Tribune, in the year of Rome 664? How shamefully inattentive and negligent must he have been on this occasion!

HORTENSIVS (QUINTUS) contemporary with Cicero, and almost as great an Orator, was born the year of Rome 639 (a). He pleaded his first cause at nineteen years of age, and with such success, that he not only gained the applause of his hearers, but also that of the two Consuls, who were the greatest judges of eloquence in that age [A]. This was the cause which he pleaded for Africa, before the Senate, under these two Consuls. He pleaded, some time after, for the King of Bithynia, and with still greater success than before. The social war breaking out the year of Rome 663, so entire a stop was put in the city to all judicial proceedings, that Hortensius embraced a military life (b). He was a military Tribune so early as his second campaign; but I believe he rose no higher; and that those who declare him to have been Lieutenant General under Sylla, in the Mithridatic War, mistake him for another [B]. He filled, successively, all the exalted employments of the Commonwealth, such as those of Quaestorship, Ædileship, Prætorship, and even that of Consulate, which he obtained in conjunction with Q. Cæcilius Metellus the year of Rome 684. The lot fell upon him to go into Crete, to reduce the inhabitants of that island; but as his eloquence made him triumphant in Rome (c), he chose to display his talent at the bar, rather than to march into the field. Accordingly he gave up that employment to his colleague, who there gained the honour of a triumph, and the surname of Creticus. Hortensius had a most wonderful memory [C]. He used a great deal of action when he

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) Cicero in Bruto.

(c) Xiphilinus ex Dione, lib. 35. initio.

[A] He gained the applause . . . of the two Consuls, who were the greatest judges of eloquence in that age.] These were Lucius Crassus and Quintus Scævola, the former of whom was one of the greatest Orators, and the latter one of the greatest Civilians, that had ever appeared in Rome. Eloquentium jurisperitissimus Crassus, jurisperitorum eloquentissimus Scævola putaretur (1). This Consulship falls under the year 658; so that as Hortensius was then but nineteen years of age, he consequently was born in 639; which we may likewise gather from Cicero's being eight years younger than he; Cicero, I say, who was born in 647. Me adolescentem (Hortensius) nactus octo annis minorem quam erat ipse (2). Here follows the proof of what I said with regard to the first cause which Hortensius pleaded (3): Q. Hortensii admodum adolescentis ingenium, ut Phidias signum simul aspectum et probatum est. Is L. Crasso, Q. Scævola Coss. primum in foro dixit, et apud eos ipsos quidem Consules, et cum eorum qui assuerunt, tum ipsorum Consulium qui omnes intelligentia antebant, judicio discessit probatus; undeviginti annos natus erat eo tempore. i. e. "The genius of Quintus Hortensius, whilst he was young, like the statue of Phidias, was no sooner beheld but it was immediately admired. The first made his appearance at the bar, under the Consulship of L. Crassus and Q. Scævola; though but eighteen years old at that time, he pleaded in presence of the Consuls with the applause, not only of the whole auditory, but of the Consuls themselves, who were the most consummate judges of that time." Cicero (4) makes this L. Crassus speak thus: Ego esse jam judico (omnibus istis laudibus, quas oratione complexus sum, excellentem Hortensium) et tum judicavi cum me Consule in Senatu causam defendit Africa, nuperque etiam magis cum pro Bithyniæ rege dixit. i. e. "I am now of opinion, that Hortensius merited all the applauses which I bestowed upon him; and I thought this, when, during my Consulship, he pleaded in favour of Africa in the Senate; and still more so, when he lately undertook the cause of the King of Bithynia."

(1) Cicero in Bruto, cap. 39.

(2) Idem, in Bruto.

(3) Idem, ibid. cap. 64.

(4) De Orat. lib. 3. sub fin.

Lieutenant. Plutarch represents him as a man who was perfectly well skilled in the arts of war, and who never yielded (5); and relates some actions achieved by him, which suit only an old experienced Officer, and that refer to the year of Rome 667. But where should Hortensius the Orator have gained this experience, since he did not embrace a military life till the year 663? And had he gained it, and had signalized himself under Sylla, how comes it that these circumstances were not spoke of, in those places where he is applauded, and said to have been a military Tribune, even in his second campaign? Judicia intermissa bello . . . Erat Hortensius in bello primo anno miles, altero Tribunus militum (6). Glandorpius was doubtless mistaken (7), in supposing him to be Sylla's Lieutenant-General. But what need is there to take advantage of Cicero's silence? What he says is much more favourable to me. Do not the three years during which Hortensius made the greatest figure at the bar, because of either the death or absence of the most renowned Orators, correspond with the time that Sylla had the other Hortensius in his army? Triennium fore fuit urbs sine armis, sed oratorum aut interitu aut discessu, aut fuga . . . Primis in causis agebat Hortensius, magisque quotidie probabatur.

(5) Strabonius de Asia lib. 12. Vir rei bellicæ parvitas. Plutarchus in Sylla pag. 461.

(6) Cicero in Bruto.

(7) Onomasticon pag. 404.

(8) Cicero, in Bruto.

[C] Hortensius had a most wonderful memory.] He delivered his pleadings directly as he had meditated them, without writing down so much as a single word, and did not forget one particular which had been advanced by his adversaries. Primum memoria tanta, quantam in viro cognovisse me arbitror, ut quæ secum commentatus esset, ea sine scripto verbis ipsæ redderet quibus cogitavisset. Hoc adjumento illo tanto sic utebatur, ut sua et commentata et scripta, ut nullo referent omnia adversariorum dicta meminisset (9). What Seneca says of him, is still much more remarkable. Upon a challenge that was made to Hortensius, he staid a whole day at a public sale, and repeated in order, the several things which had been sold, to whom, and at what price. His recital being compared with the account taken by the Clerk, it appeared that his memory had not made him mistake in one particular. *Hortensius à Sisenna provocatus in auctione perdidit diem totum, et omnes res, et pretia, et emptores ordine suo, argentarius recognoscitibus, ita ut in nullo falleretur, re. Præfat. lib. 2. *Controvers.

(9) Cicero in Bruto. See also Tuscul. 1. et Academic. 2. init.

(10) Seneca, Præfat. lib. 2. Controvers.

he pleaded [D], which once drew upon him a very severe stroke of rallery in presence of the Judges; L. Torquatus giving him the name of Dionysia, who was a famous female dancer. The answer which Hortensius made to him is seen in Aulus Gellius. It cannot be denied but that he was vastly affected; or at least, that he was excessively nice and finical in his dress [E]. He used to consult his glass very earnestly, all the time he was dressing; and it is said that he commenced a suit against his collegue, for discomposing or ruffling the order and symmetry of his gown, as he was passing through a narrow place (d). He had amassed great riches, of which he was no ways sparing, to procure himself conveniences and pleasures both in town and country. He had several country-houses [F]; and being a great lover of sumptuousness, he opposed the sumptuary laws which the Consuls would have enacted the year of Rome 699. He applauded them so very artfully for the splendor and magnificence in which they lived, that they did not dare to insist farther on preferring of a law, which agreed so little with their own conduct. He was the first who eat peacocks (f), of which he had a course, in an entertainment he gave to the college of Augurs. He was very curious and splendid in his parks and fish-ponds (g), and was as solicitous for the health of his fish [G], as for that

(d) Macrobius Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 9. Moresi, after Vossius, cites lib. 3. cap. 13. Now there are but twelve chapters in the 3d book.

(e) Dion. lib. 39.
(f) Varro, de Re rustica, lib. 3. cap. 6. Plin. lib. 10. cap. 20.
(g) Elian, lib. 5. Histor. Anim. cap. 21. Tertullian. de Pallio, sub fin.

(g) Varro, de Re rustica, lib. 3. cap. 13 & 17.
of

[D] He used a great deal of action when he pleaded.] Nescitis utrum cupiditas ad audiendam eum, an ad spectandum concurreretur, sic verbis oratoris aspectus, & rursus aspectus verba serviebant. Itaque constat Aescopum & Roscium ludicra artis peritissimos viros illo casus agente in corona frequenter assistisse, ut foro petitos gestus in scenam referrent (11). Though his action was so fine, as to make the two finest Actors of that time (Aescopus and Roscius) ambitious of imitating it on the stage, it is yet certain that it exceeded the just bounds of the Oratorical Art: Vox canora & suavis, says Cicero in his Brutus, motus & gestus etiam plus artis habebat quam erat Oratori satis. Moresi does not relate Torquatus's jest or rallery faithfully. He used to move about so much in making his speeches, that the name of Grasshopper, Dionysia Saltatricula, was given him. What person would not suppose from these words, but that Hortensius had been plagued with this nickname in every part of the city? and yet there was but one man, who, on a single occasion, gave him the name, not of Grasshopper, but of Dionysia, who was a famous female dancer. It is a very false translation to render the words Saltatricula, Grasshopper. Here follows the passage from Aulus Gellius, Chap. V. Book I: Cum L. Torquatus, subagrasti homo ingenio & infestivo, gravius acerbisque apud consilium judicum, cum de causa Sulla quereretur, non jam bistrionem eum esse diceret, sed gesticularium Dionysiamque eum notissimam Saltatricula nomine appellaret; tum voce molli atque demissa Hortensius, Dionysia, inquit, Dionysia malo equidem esse quam quod tu Torquate, ἀγροκόττα, ἀγροκόττα, ἀγροκόττα. i. e. "Lucius Torquatus, a rude, morose sort of a man, having declared, in Sylla's cause, after a harsh and severe manner, before the Judges, that Hortensius did not then behave as an Actor, but like Dionysia the famous female dancer; Hortensius replied as follows, in a soft low tone of voice, "I had rather be Dionysia, than, like you Torquatus, void of all taste for learning, inelegant, and without understanding."

(11) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 10.

[E] He was excessively nice and finical in his dress.] The following passage from Aulus Gellius, which precedes the words above cited, serve both to prove Hortensius's fondness for action, and his too great niceness with respect to dress. *Hortensius omnibus ferme Oratoribus vetatis suae nisi M. Tullio clarior, quod multa mendacia & circumspicit compositaeque indatus & amictus esset, manusque ejus inter agendum forent argute admodum & gestuose, maledictis compellationibusque probroque jactatus est, multaque in eum quasi in bistrionem in istis causis inquit judiciis dicta sunt. i. e. "Hortensius who was almost the greatest orator of his time next to Cicero, being extremely nice and finical in his dress, and studied in his pleadings, employing a great deal of action, was rallied and abused, and was often reproached, in open court, with being a player rather than an orator." With regard to the action he took out for the ruffling the folds of his robe, here follows the proof or testimony of it: *Hortensius vit alloquin ex professo mollis & in praecinctu ponens ornem decorem; fuit enim vestitus ad munditiam curioso, & ut bene amictus iret, factem in speculo ponebat: ubi se intuens togam corpori sic applicabat, ut rugas non forte sed industria locatas artifex nodus constringeret, & finas ex compositio defluens nodum lateris ambiret. Is quondam cum incederet elaboratus ad speciem collega de injuriis diem dixit; quod sibi in angustis obvius offensu fortuito structuram toga destruxerat, & capitale putavit quod in humero suo locum ruga mutasset (12). i. e. "Hortensius was professedly soft and effeminate, and made all decency to consist in outward shew. He was vastly finical in his dress; and to adjust it the better, he employed a looking-glass, by whose assistance he so disposed of his gown, that the plaits did not fall at random, but were disposed very carefully by means of a knot; and the fold or lappet flowing or falling down with art, went round the knot at his side. As Hortensius was one day walking in his elaborate dress, he took out an action against his collegue; because that, meeting him in a narrow passage, he had accidentally ruffled the order and oecconomy of his gown: looking upon it as a capital crime, because his collegue had changed one plait on his shoulder."

[F] He had several country-houses.] Pliny (13) mentions Hortensius's Tusculanum, where he placed the Argonauts of the painter Cydias, which cost him fourteen thousand four hundred French livres, according to Father Hardouin's computation. He had a house at Bauli (14), one near Laurentium (15), and another near Porta Flumentana (16). The reader may judge of his expences, by the great number of hogsheads of wine, above ten thousand, which he left to his heir. Hortensius super decem millia cadum heredi reliquit (17). Here follows the proof of what I said with regard to the care which he himself took to pour wine, with his own hands, on his plane-trees. Is Hortensius platanos suas vino irrigare consuevit, adeo ut in actione quadam, quam habuit cum Cicerone susceptam, precario à Tullio postulasset ut locum dicendi permutteret, abire enim in villam necessario se velle, ut vinum Plantano quam in Tusculano posuerat ipse suffunderet (18). i. e. "It was Hortensius's custom to refresh his plane-trees with wine, in which he was so exact and punctual, that being engaged in a cause with Cicero, he begged him to change the place of pleading, being, as he declared, under an absolute necessity of going into the country, to pour wine on a plane-tree which he himself had planted at Tusculanum."

(12) Macrobius Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 9.

(13) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 11.

(14) Cicero, ad Acad. Quaes. Varro, de Re rustica, lib. 3. cap. 17.

(16) Cicero, ad Atticum, lib. 7. Epist. 3.

(17) Varro, apud Plin. lib. 14. cap. 14.

(18) In the body of this article, citation (b).

(19) Macrobius Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 9.

[G] He was solicitous for the health of his fish.] Varro (20) relates some very singular particulars on this subject. Hortensius acted with regard to his fish, just as misers do with respect to their money; I mean he did not dare to make use of it, but chose rather to buy fish in any of the neighbouring towns, than take any out of his own fish-pond. Not satisfied with sparing his fishes, and not suffering them to be killed for his repasts, he used to have them fed very plentifully and delicately. Neque satis erat eum non pasti piscinis, nisi eis ipse pasceret ultro... Celerius voluntatis Hortensii ex equili educeres rbedarias ut tibi haberes mulas, quam è piscina barbati nullam... Non minor cura ejus erat de aegrotis piscibus, quam de minus valentibus servis: itaque minus laborabat ne servus aeger, quam aquam frigidam biberent sui pisces. i. e. "Nor was it enough for him that he did not eat of the fish out of his own ponds, he himself feeding them very carefully... Such was Hortensius's turn of mind, that he would sooner have given the mules out of his

(20) De Re Rustica, lib. 3. cap. 17.

of his footmen. Hortensius must have had a strong passion for plane-trees, since he used to refresh them with wine instead of water; and so far was he from making a secret of this, that he one day desired Cicero to change with him the hour in which he was to plead; for I myself, says he, must go and pour wine on a plane-tree, which stands in one of my country-houses (b). Those who are ever so little acquainted with human nature, will wonder much more that these two great Orators should have given each other such strong testimonies of friendship on several occasions [H], than to hear that they were not always true friends; for, after all, Cicero was the cause why Hortensius did not preserve the glory which he had enjoyed a considerable time, viz. of being the first Orator in Rome; and Hortensius was the cause that Cicero was not without a dangerous rival, who trod close upon his heels. Hortensius had published, not only orations and annals, but also lascivious poems [I]; but none of these compositions have been transmitted

“ his stable, than a mullet out of his fish pond. He was equally solicitous of the health of his fish as of that of his servants; and, when any one of these was sick, he was less anxious about his having fresh water, than about the ordering it for his fish.” We are told he was so passionately fond of a lamprey, that he bewailed the death of it with tears. Apud Baalos in parte Baiana Piscinam habuit Hortensius Orator, in qua Murenam adeo dilexit ut exanimatam fesse creditur (21). Which circumstance Porphyry (22), Macrobius (23), and Tzetzes (24) have related of Crassus the Orator.

[H] People will wonder . . . that these two great Orators should have given each other strong testimonies of friendship.] Perhaps there is nothing in which jealousy is more apt to occasion hatred between people than eloquence. I cannot say whether beauty or poetry are not to be excepted. We seldom find that two celebrated Preachers love one another; and a trifling matter shall make them quarrel with one another. It is much if they can conceal their jealousy and save appearances; so that we may justly admire what Hortensius did in Cicero's behalf; but we are not to be surpris'd to hear of any ill offices he might have done him privately. He got him admitted into the college of Augurs (23); he gave him the noblest applauses at a time when encomiums might be of service to him. At Hercule alter tuus familiaris Hortensius quam plena manu, quam ingenue, quam ornate nostras laudes in astra sustulit, quam de Flacci Prætura & de illo tempore Allobrogum diceret. Sic habeto nec amantius, nec honorificentius, nec copiosius potuisse dici (26): he ran the hazard of losing his life for Cicero's sake: Vidi, vidi hunc ipsum Q. Hortensium lumen & ornamentum Reipub. penè interfici servorum manu cum mihi adesset (26); and Cicero himself owns, that they always indulged good offices one to the other. Cum præsertim non modo nunquam sit aut illius à me cursus impeditus, aut ab illo meus, sed contra semper alter ab altero adjutus, & communicando, & moriendo, & favendo (28). i. e. “Particularly as neither of us opposed the interest of the other; but on the contrary, gave mutual assistance of counsel and favour.” We are not to wonder so much at Cicero's good offices with regard to Hortensius, as those of Hortensius towards him; because though Cicero's heart, naturally speaking, for many years, must have harboured the rancour of jealousy, we must suppose that he threw out half of it when he found himself the superior. There was a time when he did not equal Hortensius; another time when he equalled him, and a third when he excelled him. This last period is an excellent medicament against jealousy. But, on the contrary, how violent a heart-burning must it be to Hortensius, to see the man who did but follow him in the beginning, overtake him some time after, and at last get beyond him? Hortensius . . . qui diu Princeps Oratorum, aliquando æmulus Ciceronis existimatus est, novissime quoad vixit, secundus. These are Quintilian's words in Chapter III, Book XI. I am sensible that it was not disadvantageous to Hortensius to have such a rival as Cicero. The honours of the Consulship had so much slackened the ardent and indefatigable application with which he had cultivated his mind from his younger years, that people took notice daily, that he flagged (29). However, he roused his spirits, when he perceived the great progress which Cicero's glory made; but he certainly would have dispensed with such an incentive or spur, since it cost him the first place. There were few great causes but these two famous Orators were employed in them; sometimes for the same, and at other times for contrary parties (30). Verres that renowned plunderer, was to have Hortensius for his Lawyer: which was one of the strongest reasons Cicero alledged, in order to exclude Cæcilius from being the accuser. The reader may see by that pleading (31), how capable Hortensius was of managing such causes as he undertook. Cicero had all kinds of advantage on this occasion. He was the accuser; and it is said that he made Hortensius resolve not to plead in favour of Verres (32), so numerous were the charges and proofs brought against him. Multis diebus prima actio celebrata est, dum testes Verris producuntur criminum diversorum, dum recitantur publicæ privatæque literæ. Quidus rebus adeo stupescens Hortensius dicitur, ut rationum defensionis omitteret (33). We have seen how Cicero has declared that Hortensius would never do him an ill office; and we may see, in the same place, that he refutes those who thought that Hortensius was not favourable to him. Dolebam quod, non ut ple- rique putabant, adversarium aut obsecratorem laudum mearum, sed socium potius & consortem gloriosi laboris amiseram (34). i. e. “I was afflicted, not as most people imagined, because I had lost an adversary and an envious rival, but rather a companion and sharer in my glorious labours.” Nevertheless it was in a different strain he wrote to his brother Quintus, when he expressed himself as follows. Quantum Hortensio credendum sit nescio: me summa simulatione amoris, summaque assiduitate quotidiana sceleratissime infidiosissimeque tractavit, adjuncto quoque Arrio: quorum ego consiliis, promissis, præceptis destitutus in banc calamitatem incidi (35). i. e. “How far Hortensius may be trusted, I cannot say; he and Arrius have treated me, on the specious pretences of affection and friendship, in the most wicked and most insidious manner. I am involved in this calamity, by my being deprived of their advice, their promises and directions.” How few, even of those who pass for honest men, but have two sorts of language, the one for printed books, the other for those letters they write their friends? See the remark [M] of the article GROTIUS. So long as they are kept in manuscript, the insincerity or amphibious language does not appear; but I surely expect to find these at the publication of their letters. It would very much vex certain authors, should they be obliged to repeat or to hear repeated in conversation, the same encomiums which they gave in a book. Prefaces, citations, the pleasing necessity of composing a funeral panegyric, what multitudes do you impose upon! Be this as it will, it has been justly considered as the marks of a wonderful address in Pomponius Atticus, that he was able to preserve the intimate friendship both of Cicero and Hortensius, and to have kept them from falling out. Utebatur intimè Q. Hortensio, qui iis temporibus principatum eloquentiæ tenebat, ut intelligi non posset, uter eum plus diligeret, Cicero an Hortensius; & id quod erat difficilimum efficiebat ut inter quos tantæ laudis esset æmulatio, nulla intercederet obsecratio, essetque talium virorum copula (36). i. e. “He had contracted an intimate friendship with Hortensius, who was the greatest Orator of the age, inasmuch that one could not tell, whether he was best beloved by Cicero or Hortensius: and he so ordered matters, a most difficult circumstance, that no jealousy broke out between these two mighty rivals; he being as the band, which held these two friends together.”

[I] Hortensius published . . . lascivious poems.] This Ovid informs us, in his second book De Tristibus, where he gives us the list of those men, who had written Love Poems or Books with impunity.

(b) See the remark [F].

(21) Plin. lib. 9. cap. 55.

(22) De Abst. lib. 3.

(23) Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 11.

(24) Chil. 8. Hist. 174.

(25) Cicero in Bruto, initio.

(26) Idem, ad Attic. Epist. ult. lib. 2.

(27) Idem, pro Milone.

(28) Idem, in Bruto.

(29) Cicero in Bruto, sub fin.

(30) Sepe in iisdem, sepe in contrariis causis versati sumus. Cicero, Divinat. in Q. Cæcil.

(31) Divinatio in Q. Cæcilium.

(32) It is to be observed that Hortensius did not abandon Verres so far but that Quintilian, Book 10. chap. 1. speaks of his Pleadings for him.

(33) Afcon. Perdian. in Proœmio Act. in Verrem.

(34) Cicero in Bruto, initio.

(35) Idem, Epist. lib. 1. ad Quintum fratrem. See also Epist. 9. ad Attic. lib. 3.

(36) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Pomponii Attici.

mitted to posterity; and it must be confessed that he was a much better speaker than a writer [K]. Though he won the cause of Messala, his sister's son, in whose favour he had employed the utmost efforts of his eloquence [L], finding him accused of engaging in a faction, he yet did himself great injury by it; and occasioned his being laughed at and hissed in his old age, which ridicule he was the only man who had escaped before (i). He died the year of Rome 703, aged three score and four years, forty four or forty five whereof he had spent with great glory and reputation at the bar (k). Some author says, that he wore out his voice to such a degree, that he quite lost it before he died. Others have

(11) Epist. 2. Ciceron. ad Famil. lib. 8.

(k) Est autem L. Paub, C. Marcellus Cof. mortuus, ex quo videmus eum in Patronorum numero annos quatuor & quadraginta fuisse. Cicero, in Brutus

*Is quoque Phasiacas Argo qui duxit in undas
Non potuit Veneris furta tacere sua.
Nec minus HORTENSI, nec sunt minus improba Servi Carmina. Quis dubitet nomina tanta sequi?*

“ He, whom fam'd Argo set on Phasis' shores,
“ Could not conceal his private love-intrigues.
“ Hortensius, Servius, both obscenely write:
“ Who could refuse such mighty names to follow ?

(37) Lib. 19. cap. 9.

(38) Lib. 1. de Annal. apud Corradum in Cic. Brutum, pag. 428.

(39) Ibid.

Aulus Gellius doubtless hints at the same verses of Hortensius, when he says (37) that they were ungraceful, invenusta. I know not whether the Poem which Varro (38) ascribes to him be another work. As to the Annals, they have been cited by Velleius Paterculus. I believe Hortensius was a man of learning, for Cicero has bestowed that elogium on him; but I do not see that his Poem, his Annals, and the proffer of Lucullus, are such good proofs of his erudition, as Corradus would persuade us. Sanè, says he (39), videtur bene doctus fuisse, siquidem Poema scripsit, ut Autor est Varro libro primo de Analogia, & Annales, ut Paterculus affirmat: Et certè cum Sisenna & Lucullo de Græco Latineque scribendo venit in eam contentionem, quam Plutarchus in Lucullo refert. i. e. “ He seems indeed to have been a man of learning, for he wrote a poem, as Varro tells us, Book I of his Analogy; he also drew up Annals, as we are assured by Paterculus; and he certainly contended with Sisenna and Lucullus, with regard to the superiority of writing, in Greek as well as in Latin, as Plutarch relates in the Life of Lucullus.” I do not see that Corradus understood Plutarch's meaning; for he does not there speak of a challenge between Hortensius, Sisenna and Lucullus, but of a small presumption of the last mentioned, who boasted, in presence of the other two, that he would write the social war, either in Latin or in Greek, in prose or verse, as chance should decide it. Plutarch conjectures, that the Greek prose fell to him by lot, since the History of that War, composed in Greek prose by Lucullus, was extant in his time: but once again, this does not signify in any manner that Hortensius and Sisenna would have engaged in the same work, had the lot fell to them. Catanzus who relates it thus (40) is mistaken.

(40) In Plin. Epist. lib. 5. pag. m. 283.

[K] He was a much better speaker than writer.] This we are told by Quintilian, Chap. III, Book XI, where he observes that action has a very peculiar force or strength in an orator; and the great talent of Hortensius lay here: when his pleadings or speeches came to be read, they were not found worthy of the author's reputation. M. Cicero, says he, unam in dicendo actionem dominari putat, hac . . . Antonium & Crassum multum valuisse, plurimum verò Hortensium, cujus rei fides est quod ejus scripta tantum infra famam sunt . . . ut appareat placuisse aliquid eo orante, quod legentes non invenimus. i. e. “ Action, according to Tully, is the chief talent of an Orator . . . Anthony and Crassus were eminent for it; but above all Hortensius, a proof of which is, his writings falling so much below his reputation; so that one would conclude, that they had certain charms whilst he was repeating them, which are quite lost to us in the reading.” How many Preachers have we, to whom this may be applied? Mr. Morus is an instance of this.

[L] He had employed the efforts of his eloquence.] This cause he pleaded the year of Rome 702. Hortensius was then sixty three years of age, notwithstanding which he made an excellent plea. Brutus, who always thought him a great orator, had never admired him so much as he did on that day. The rest of the auditors formed the same judgment; and Cicero having read the plea, published word for word as it had been spoke, formed the same judgment as the rest. Hortensium magnum Oratorem semper putavi maximeque probavi pro Messala dicentem, cum tu absuisti. Sic ferunt, inquam, idque declarat totidem quot dixit, ut ajunt, scripta verbis oratio (41). If Hortensius was hissed next day, it was not because he pleaded with less eloquence than usual, but because people were vexed that he had brought his client off. The people had already shewn their resentment against the Judges in this cause. Clamoribus scilicet maximis iudices corripuerunt, & ostenderunt planè esse quod ferri non posset . . . Accessit huc quod postredie ejus absolutionem in Theatrum Curionis Hortensius introiit, puto ut suum gaudium gauderemus. Hic tibi strepitus, fremitus, clamor, tonitruum & rudens tum fibilus. Hoc magis animadvertendum est, quod intactus ab sibilo pervenerat Hortensius ad senectutem. Sed tum ita bene ut in totam vitam civis satis esset, & pariter eum jam vicisse (42). i. e. “ They made a great outcry against the Judges, and shewed that it was not to be born with . . . Farther, Hortensius, the day after he was cleared, went into Curio's theatre, probably, in expectation of being congratulated: but so far from it, he was received with clamours and hisses. The more notice was taken of this, because Hortensius had, till then, attained old age without ever being hissed; but he then got so much of it as was sufficient for a person's whole life, and which made him sorry that he had gained his cause.” He pleaded a few days before his death, as Cicero informs us. He certainly was one of those great men, who long preserve their genius and fire. It is true indeed, that he shone more in his youth than in his more advanced age, which he ascribed to two causes; the one, because he had made choice of the Asiatic eloquence, which was more becoming in young people than in those advanced in years; the other, that his application was greater in his younger years. Si quaerimus, cur adolescens magis floruerit dicendo, quàm senior Hortensius, causas reperiemus verissimas duas: primum, quod genus erat orationis Asiaticum, adolescentiæ magis concessum, quàm senectuti. Genera autem Asiaticæ dictionis duo sunt . . . Hæc . . . genera dicendi aptiora adolescentibus, in senibus gravitatem non habent. Itaque Hortensius utroque genere florens, clamores faciebat adolescens . . . Sed cum jam honores, & illa senior autoritas gravius quiddam requireret, remanebat idem, nec decebat idem: quodque exercitationem studiumque dimiserat, quod in eo fuerat acerrimum, concinnitas illa crebritasque sententiarum pristina manebat, sed ea vestitu illo orationis, quo consueverat, ornata non erat (43). i. e. “ If we should enquire, how Hortensius came to be more famed for eloquence in his youth than when he came to advanced years, two substantial reasons will be found for it: first, because he made choice of the Asiatic style, which is more allowable in young, than in old men. The Asiatic eloquence is of two kinds . . . These . . . are better adapted to young people, but have not gravity enough for old age. As Hortensius, therefore, excelled in both, he could not fail of gaining the highest applauses. But when the honours he had obtained, and the authority which age gives, required a graver species of eloquence, he yet retained the same, though it had no longer its former grace. Farther, having abated very much of his application and study, which had once been very great; the former neatness and frequency of his sentences remained, but the elegant dress in which he used to clothe them was now gone.” He was fortunate even in the time of his death; he dying just before the breaking out of the dreadful confusions into which the commonwealth was plunged. Perpetua quadam felicitate usus ille cessit à vita suo magis quam suorum civium tempore, & tum occidit cum lugere facilius Rempub. posset si viveret, quam juvare (44).

(41) Cicero in Brut.

(42) Cælius ad Ciceron. Epist. 24 lib. 8. ad Famil.

(43) Cicero, in Bruto, sub fin. pag. m. 451.

(44) Idem, ibid. in.

have mistaken this thought so far, as to suppose it had been told of Hortensius, that he died as he was pleading, the efforts of his voice having killed him. But this may be looked upon as a fiction, since he pleaded, a few days before his death, an important cause [M]; and since Cicero, so far from saying that Hortensius died in the above-mentioned manner, as he doubtless would have done had the Orator in question met with such an end, gives us reason to conclude otherwise. Consult, with regard to all this affair, the remark [M]. Hortensius married a daughter of C. Catulus in his younger days (l). I am not very sure whether she was likewise the daughter of Ser-villa (m) a Lady of as high quality as any in Rome. He was his son-in-law during Verres's trial. But nothing perhaps is more singular than his marriage with Marcia [N] wife

(1) Cicero, de Orat. lib. 3. sub fin.

(m) Ex sacra tua, femina primaria Servilia. Idem. Ver. 4.

[M] Some writers say . . . that he quite lost . . . his voice, others have mistaken this thought. . . But this may be looked upon as a fiction, since he pleaded, a few days before his death, an important cause.] The proof of the first of these particulars is found in the following passage of Quintus Serenus Samonicus.

Sic est Hortensius olim
 Absumptus, causis etenim confectus agendis,
 Obtulit, cum vox domino vivente periret,
 Et nondum extincti moreretur lingua disertii.

The sense is,
 "Hortensius, worn with pleading, still survived
 "His voice, which quite forsook him—"

Glandorpius did not understand the meaning of these verses. Decessit à vita, says he (45), sub bellum civile Cæs. & Pompeii . . . clamore in actione causæ disruptus, ut indicat Q. Serenus. i. e. "He died in the time of the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey . . . having burst himself as Serenus relates, whilst he was pleading a cause with too great vehemency." The following words of Cicero do not agree with the passage above cited of Samonicus. Perpaucis ante mortem diebus una tecum socerum tuum defendis Appium. . . Q. Hortensii vox extincta fato suo est, nostra publico (46). i. e. "Not many days before his death, he and you defended Appius your father-in-law. . . Hortensius's voice was silenced or lost by his own fate, but ours by that of the public."

(45) Glandorp. Ommest. pag. 405, 406.

(46) Cicero in Bruto.

[N] But nothing can be more singular than his marriage with Marcia.] Plutarch relates it in the manner following (47). Hortensius desired Cato to give him his daughter Porcia in marriage, she being wife to Bibulus, and having had two children by him. Give her also to me (said he to Cato) like a fruitful field wherein I may sow children. I am sensible, says he, that, according to the common way of thinking of the world, there is some absurdity in this; but, in reality, can any thing be more excellent or more beneficial to society, than not to suffer the fruitful field of a young woman to lie uncultivated; and, on the other side, not to permit such a one to bring too many children into a family, which is already burdened with them? Not to mention that the reciprocal lending of wives, among men of honour, diffuses virtue among a greater number of families, and forms a greater number of alliances in the State. But in case Bibulus shall not be willing to quite give up his pretensions to Portia, I promise to restore her to him, after she shall have brought me some children, which may prove a sincere bond between you, him, and myself. Cato did not think proper to treat about this affair. But when Hortensius told him he had a mind to Marcia, Cato's wife, considering that she was still very young, and that Cato had children enough; the latter promised to acquiesce with his desires, provided Martius, his wife's father, would agree to it. Martius gave his consent, upon which Marcia was immediately transferred to Hortensius. When she became afterwards, both his widow, and the heiress to his estate, she was wife, a second time, to her first husband, a circumstance which Cæsar did not omit in his Anti-Cato. "If he had need of a wife, says he (41), why did he give her up to another? And if he had no occasion for a wife, why did he take her back? Does not this shew that he employed this by way of lucre, in order that, by lending a young wife to Hortensius, he might get her back very rich?" Strabo (49), having related that the Tapyres (50), had a law among them, by which their husbands gave up their wives to others, when they had had two or three

(47) Plutarch. in Catone Utic. pag. m. 770.

(48) Idem, lib. pag. 784.

(49) Strabo, lib. II. pag. 355.

(50) A people living near the Parthians.

children by them; adds, that Cato had done the same thing, in order to gratify Hortensius, who requested his wife Marcia; and he observes that Cato did but follow an ancient custom of the Romans. There is room to doubt whether this was their ancient custom; for we not only find so few examples of it, that Tertullian cites only that of Cato (51); but we see also that Hortensius owned there was something very singular or very new, in his design, according to the common opinion of mankind. Δόξη μὲν γὰρ αἰθρῶπιος Ἰσοκράτης ἴδου τὸ τοιοῦτον, φήσει δὲ πολλοὶ καὶ σοφιστῶν. Nam mani Catois, qui esse hominum quidem illud opinionis novum (in this manner Xylander translates) natura pulchrum tamen & civile (52). i. e. "This, in the opinion of the world, seems strange and odd; however, it is naturally decent and politic." He does not oppose to this opinion the ancient laws, or the ancient custom or practice of the Romans, which so great a Civilian would not have failed to alledge on this occasion; he, I say, opposes only nature. Bodinus (53) answers Plutarch without reason, as though the latter had said, in the life of Cato Uticensis, that the Romans were allowed to lend their wives; for this historian does not speak of it, as of a custom founded on the laws, or as a thing that was usually practised; on the contrary, he introduces Hortensius, who owns that his proposal seemed odd or new. The abovementioned Bodinus is very rash, in not believing that Cato lent his wife; for this is a story which Thraseas had taken from the writings of Munatius, Cato's friend. Cæsar would not have dared to reproach Cato for it, had it not been pretty well known (54). The reason on which Bodinus grounds his not believing that story is a new fault: It is, says he, because by a law enacted by Romulus, and according to the ancient practice revived by Tiberius, relations used to chastise at pleasure such wives as committed adultery. But what does this make against Cato's wife, who was given up, by her father and husband, to another man? I shall not animadvert on the following words, Plutarchus & Strabo Parthos æque ac Lacedæmonios mutuas uxores amicis dare consuevisse ajunt (55), though they may very easily mislead the reader; for who, in reading these words, would not conclude, but that Plutarch ascribes this conduct to the Parthians, and that Strabo imputes it to the Lacedæmonians? Nevertheless Bodinus's meaning is, that Strabo ascribes it to the Parthians (56), and Plutarch imputes it to the Lacedæmonians. This way of quoting is but too common, and it misleads people; it seeming to give many testimonies or vouchers of the the same thing, when there really is but one. Bodinus seems to say, that both Plutarch and Strabo declare, that the Parthians, as well as the Lacedæmonians, used to lend their wives. I have read in Menage, that Casaubon affirms that Plutarch speaks of the marriage of Hortensius and Marcia, as a thing he doubted of. Ad quem Strabonis locum notat Casaubonus, Plutarchum de Catone rem ita narrare ut de ea dubitasse significet (57). Menage had reason to declare that this is false: Plutarch does not express his doubt with respect to the fact itself, but says only that this part of Cato's life is like that part of a play, where the plot is not opened; that is, in my opinion, people formed a very different judgment of it.

(51) Ex illa, credo, majorum & sapientissimorum disciplina, Græci Socratis & Romanorum Catois, qui esse hominum quidem illud opinionis novum (in this manner Xylander translates) natura pulchrum tamen & civile (52). i. e. "This, in the opinion of the world, seems strange and odd; however, it is naturally decent and politic." He does not oppose to this opinion the ancient laws, or the ancient custom or practice of the Romans, which so great a Civilian would not have failed to alledge on this occasion; he, I say, opposes only nature. Bodinus (53) answers Plutarch without reason, as though the latter had said, in the life of Cato Uticensis, that the Romans were allowed to lend their wives; for this historian does not speak of it, as of a custom founded on the laws, or as a thing that was usually practised; on the contrary, he introduces Hortensius, who owns that his proposal seemed odd or new. The abovementioned Bodinus is very rash, in not believing that Cato lent his wife; for this is a story which Thraseas had taken from the writings of Munatius, Cato's friend. Cæsar would not have dared to reproach Cato for it, had it not been pretty well known (54). The reason on which Bodinus grounds his not believing that story is a new fault: It is, says he, because by a law enacted by Romulus, and according to the ancient practice revived by Tiberius, relations used to chastise at pleasure such wives as committed adultery. But what does this make against Cato's wife, who was given up, by her father and husband, to another man? I shall not animadvert on the following words, Plutarchus & Strabo Parthos æque ac Lacedæmonios mutuas uxores amicis dare consuevisse ajunt (55), though they may very easily mislead the reader; for who, in reading these words, would not conclude, but that Plutarch ascribes this conduct to the Parthians, and that Strabo imputes it to the Lacedæmonians? Nevertheless Bodinus's meaning is, that Strabo ascribes it to the Parthians (56), and Plutarch imputes it to the Lacedæmonians. This way of quoting is but too common, and it misleads people; it seeming to give many testimonies or vouchers of the the same thing, when there really is but one. Bodinus seems to say, that both Plutarch and Strabo declare, that the Parthians, as well as the Lacedæmonians, used to lend their wives. I have read in Menage, that Casaubon affirms that Plutarch speaks of the marriage of Hortensius and Marcia, as a thing he doubted of. Ad quem Strabonis locum notat Casaubonus, Plutarchum de Catone rem ita narrare ut de ea dubitasse significet (57). Menage had reason to declare that this is false: Plutarch does not express his doubt with respect to the fact itself, but says only that this part of Cato's life is like that part of a play, where the plot is not opened; that is, in my opinion, people formed a very different judgment of it.

(52) Plutarch. pag. 771.

(53) Bodin. Method. lib. cap. 4. pag. m. 78.

(54) Plutarch. in Catone, pag. 770.

(55) Bodin. Method. lib. pag. 78.

(56) He should have said to the Tapyri, not to the Parthians.

(57) Menag. Anan. Juris, cap. 10. I do not find this in Casaubon's Notes on Strabo.

wife to Cato Uticensis, and daughter to Marcius Philippus. He begged her of Cato by way of loan, and obtained her without much difficulty, though the child she was at that time going with, shewed that there was no very great misunderstanding between Marcia and her husband. He had a son, who proved the occasion of great sorrow to him; so that when Hortensius pleaded for his nephew, he declared that he had made choice of him for his heir, in prejudice of his son; and yet, if Valerius Maximus may be credited, he left his estate to this unworthy son. See the following article.

ing this. Mr. Dacier thinks so too. "This is true, says he (58), of Lycurgus; but it does not appear to me in any manner that Numa ever had such a design. It might even be easily proved, that this community of wives did not begin at Rome under Numa, but much later, and that it was not general."

Lucian supposes that Marcia, being left a widow by Hortensius, went to Cato, and besought him most humbly to take her again. She declared to him, that being of years so as to be past child bearing, she only desired to be his wife nominally: She said, that she would lead a life of continence with him; and only wished to divide with him the troubles and fatigues, which the unhappy situation of the affairs of the government had brought upon him. Lucian adds, that these words of Marcia struck Cato; and although that was not a time proper for marriage, he yet granted her request. It is true indeed that all the nuptial ceremonies were omitted, without even excepting that which is considered as the principal, and the completion of the work. Marcia did not lay aside her widow's weeds, but embraced her husband as a mother does her child.

*Sic ut erat, mæsti servans lugubria cultus,
Quoque modo natos, hoc est amplexa maritum* (59).

Cato grieved so much at the calamities of his country, that, ever since the civil war, he deprived himself of diversions of every kind: He let his beard grow, and spent his days like a man who was in a state of mourning. Marcia's offers were accepted in a literal sense. Lucian puts the following words into her mouth.

*Dum sanguis inerat, dum vis materna, peregi
Jussa Cato, & geminos excepi sæta maritos.
Visceribus lassis, partique exhausta reverter
Jam nulli tradenda viro: da sædera prisca
Illibata tori: da tantum nomen inane
Connubii: liceat tumulo scripsisse, Catonis
Marta: nec dubium longo queratur in ævo,
Mutarim primas expulsa, an tradita, tædas.
Non me lætorum sociam, rebusque secundis
Accipis, in curas venio, partemque laborum.
Da mihi castra sequi* (60).

"Whilst nature yet with vigour fed my veins,
And made me equal to a mother's pains,
To thee obedient I thy house forsook,
And to my arms another husband took;

HORTENSIUS (QUINTUS) son of the preceding, behaved so unworthily of such a father, that he had like to have been disinherited by him [A]: but if he is the same who was Proconsul of Macedonia after the death of Julius Cæsar, we may presume that he

[A] He had like to have been disinherited.] Cicero hints pretty plainly, in his epistles (1), that Hortensius's son was a worthless creature; and that his depraved disposition (2), and a freedman called Salvius, had quite corrupted him. Illa Hortensiana omnia fuere infantia: ita fiet homo nequissimus: à Salvio liberto depravatus est (3). He seems to say that his father did not love him (4); but let us hear Valerius Maximus, who is more than ordinary clear on this occasion. Quæ Hortensii, qui suis temporibus ornamentum Romæ eloquentiæ fuit, admirabilis in filio patientia extitit. Cum enim eo usque impietatem ejus suspectam & nequitiam invidiam haberet, ut Messallam suæ sororis filium heredem habiturus ambitus reum defendens judicibus diceret, si illum damnasset nihil sibi præter osculum nepotum in quibus acquiscerat superfluum: Hac scilicet sententia, quam etiam editæ orationi inseruit, filium potius in tormento animi quam in voluptatibus reponens: tamen ne naturæ ordinem confunderet, non nepotes sed filium heredem

"My powers at length with genial labours worn,
Weary to thee and wasted I return;
At length a barren wedlock let me prove,
Give me the name without the joys of love:
No more to be abandon'd let me come,
That Cato's wife may live upon my tomb,
So shall my truth to latest times be read,
And none shall ask if guiltily I fled,
Or thy commands estrang'd me from thy bed.
Nor ask I now thy happiness to share,
I seek thy days of toil, thy nights of care.

Rowe.

It is my opinion, that had Lucian been as fond of fiction throughout his work, as in the above cited passage, he would not have been accused of adhering too closely to history, and of not throwing his work into a form that was sufficiently poetical. But be this as it will, here follows what he says concerning the extreme rigidity of Cato.

*Ille nec horrificam sancto dimovit ab ore
Cæsariem, duroque admisti gaudia vultu.
(Ut primum tolli feralia viderat arma,
Intonsus rigidam in frontem descendere canis
Passus erat, mæstamque genis increfcere barbam,
Uni quippe vacat studiisque odii que carenti,
Humanum lugere genus) nec sædera prisca
Sunt tentata tori: justo quoque robur amori
Restitit: hi mores* (61).

(61) Idem, ibid. ver. 372.

"Nor he, the chief, his sacred visage chear'd,
Nor smooth'd his matted locks or horrid beard,
Nor deigns his heart one thought of joy to know,
But met his Martia with the same stern brow.
For when he saw the fatal faction's arm,
The coming war, and Rome's impending harm,
Regardless quite of every other care,
Unhorn he left his loose neglected hair;
Rude hung the hoary honours of his head,
And a foul growth his mournful cheeks o'erspread.
No stings of private hate his peace infest,
Nor partial favour grew up in his breast,
But safe from prejudice he kept his mind,
Free, and at leisure, to lament mankind.
Nor would his former Love's returning fire
The warmth of one connubial wish inspire,
But strongly he withstood the just desire.

Rowe.

reliquit (5). i. e. "The patience, which Hortensius, (5) Val. Max. who was the glory of the Roman eloquence in the lib. 5. cap. 9. num. 2. age he lived in, discovered with regard to his son, is wonderful. For notwithstanding that he was so highly exasperated against him, on account of his ungracious and shameful behaviour, that he declared to the Judges, in a speech he made in defence of Messala, his sister's son, whom he then intended to appoint his heir, that, should they condemn him, the only comfort left him would be in the fondling of grand-children: He shewed by this sentence, which he also inserted in his speech, when he published it, that he looked upon his son as a torment, rather than a pleasure to him. However, that he might not act contrary to the order of nature, he appointed his son, and not his grand-children, his heir." It is something odd that Hortensius should have discovered, that he had appointed his nephew for his heir; for in case he thought that his son de-

(58) Dacier, in a marginal note of his translation of Plutarch, in the parallel between Lycurgus and Numa, pag. 362, 363. Dutch edit. [pag. 399. Not. 10. tom. 1. Amsterd. edit. 1724.]

(59) Lucan. lib. 2. ver. 365.

(60) Lucan. ibid. ver. 338.

(1) Epist. 3. lib. 6. ad Attic.

(2) Natura mutanda est; hæc Curionem, hæc Hortensii filium, non patrum culpa corruptit. Ibid. lib. 10. Epist. 4.

(3) Ibid. Epist. 12.

(4) Ibid. Epist. 3. lib. 6.

he changed his conduct. He sided very warmly with the fautors of liberty; and joined strenuously with Brutus, in order to raise such armies as might be powerful enough to maintain the cause for which they had drawn the sword (a). He was taken at the battle of Philippi; and put to death by way of reprisal, by Mark Anthony's command, upon the grave of Caius Antonius. Some are of opinion that our Hortensius is the same with him who had sided with Julius Cæsar against Pompey [C]. Now as those who mention him intimate plainly enough that he was Hortensius's only son, we may consider him as the father of Q. HORTENSIUS CORBIO, and of MARCUS HORTENSIUS HORTALUS, the former whereof was a monster of impurity and debauchery [D], and the latter fell into poverty; but was so wise as not to marry, till Augustus had given him money sufficient to support a family (b); but as the sums bestowed by the beneficence of that Emperor, were not sufficient to supply the necessities of all the children who sprung from this marriage, Hortalus implored the assistance of the Senate [E]. Tiberius rejected, at first, this petition with great severity; but observing afterwards that the Senate disap-

(a) Cicero, Philippi, 10.

(b) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 37.

served to be disinherited, could not he bequeath or transfer his estate to his grand-children, as he said he should be forced to do, in case they should condemn his nephew? A strange grandfather sure, not to think of his grandsons, but after the failure of his sister's son! Valerius Maximus has perhaps maimed this incident, by suppressing some essential clauses. Perhaps too we are to consider Hortensius's declaration no other wise than as a rhetorical figure. There are some stratagems in this profession, which our author knew how to make an advantage of. He wanted to excite the pity of the Judges, in discovering a strong desire to have his client discharged, as one who should be as son to him. Others say that Hortensius's wife inherited his estate (6); the wife, I say, which Cato had lent him, whom he took back after the death of Hortensius.

(6) Plutarch. in Catoe min. pag. 784.

[B] He was put to death by way of reprisal . . . upon the grave of Caius Antonius.] To know what was meant by these reprisals, the reader must call to mind that Caius Antonius, brother to Mark Anthony, fell into Hortensius's hands, during the disorders and confusions which followed Julius Cæsar's death, and that Brutus having heard that the Triumviri, in their fury, had put to death, among other illustrious personages, D. Brutus and Cicero, he therefore commanded Hortensius to sacrifice his prisoner to their manes (7), which was accordingly done. Such was the end of Caius Antonius, and in this manner was his death revenged.

(7) Plutarchus in Bruto. See also Velleius Paternulus, lib. 2. cap. 71. who declares that Hortensius's son lost his life in that war.

[C] Some are of opinion, that our Hortensius is the same with him who had sided with Julius Cæsar against Pompey.] A circumstance which causes some difficulty here is, that Hortensius's son was in Laodicea, in the year of Rome 702, and led a most scandalous life in that city (8). How is it probable then, will some say, that, two years after, he should have ingratiated himself so well with Cæsar, that this conqueror should entrust him with the command of his troops, the day that he designed to cross the Rubicon, and seize upon Ariminum, which was the first push to be made in the grand affair that was to determine the fate of the Empire? Yet this is what Cæsar did to Hortensius, who was in his party (9). He, some time after, gave him the command of a fleet on the coast of Italy (10). We ought not to determine simply on appearances.

(8) Cicero, Epist. ad Attic. 3. lib. 6.

(9) Plutarch. in Cæsar. pag. 723.

(10) Appian. lib. 2. Brutus. Bell. Civil.

(11) Orosiast. pag. 406.

(12) Lib. 6. cap. 35.

(13) Epist. ad Attic. 4. 16, 17; 18. lib. 10.

(14) Philip. 10.

(15) In Plin. Epist. lib. 5.

(16) Lib. 3. cap. 5.

I do not find in Eutropius what Glandorpius (11) pretends to have taken from Book VI, viz. that Octavius and Libo, Pompey's Lieutenants, defeated this fleet of Hortensius. It is Orosius who informs us of this particular (12). However this be, Glandorpius insults that the Admiral of this fleet is the same son of Hortensius the Orator, of whom Valerius Maximus says so many ill things. He goes on a pretty good foundation here; for Cicero (13) does not leave us room to doubt, that Hortensius's son in question went over to Cæsar's party. I have not been able to find the time when he left it, nor in what manner he obtained the Pro-consulate of Macedonia, an employment wherein he merited the applauses of Cicero (14). Catanzæus (15) confounding the father and son, falsely charges the Orator with joining in Pompey's party; with putting to death Caius Antonius, and being put to death by Mark Anthony.

[D] Q. HORTENSIUS CORBIO, . . . was a monster of impiety and debauchery.] Valerius Maximus (16), giving a list of those children who have verified the proverb Heroum filii noxa, forgets the son (17), but not the grandson of Hortensius. Q. Hortensius . . . nepos Hortensius Corbio omnibus scortis abjectiorem & obscenorem vitam exegit, ad ultimumque lingua ejus tam libidini cunctorum inter lupanaria profusus, quam avi pro salute civium in foro excubuerat. i. e. "Hortensius Corbio, grandson to Q. Hortensius, led a life still more miserable and beastly than the most abandoned whores; and at last his tongue was no less prostituted to the lust of every one in the stews, than his grandfathers had been active for the safety of the citizens in the forum." Had Lipsius remembered, that this author mentions the grandsons of Hortensius in the plural number, in Chap. IX of Book V, he would not have supposed (18) Hortensius Hortalus, and Hortensius Corbio, to be the same person. The character, which Tacitus gives the former, distinguishes him visibly from the latter. Moreri and Hoffman commit the same error as Lipsius, since they cite Valerius Maximus, Chap. V. Book III; Tacitus in Book II of his Annals; and Suetonius in the life of Tiberius, with respect to Hortensius's grandson who was prodigiously dissolute. Vossius occasioned their error, by his referring these quotations to a grandson of Hortensius, as tho' they had related to the same person (19).

(17) He speaks of him on another occasion, as has been seen in the note [A].

(18) Comment. in Tacit. Ann. lib. 2.

[E] M. HORTENSIUS HORTALUS implored the assistance of the Senate.] This speech is found in Tacitus (20). He had brought with him his four little sons (20) and shewing them to the Senate, he besought them to shew some regard to the descendants of so many Consuls and Dictators, en stirps & progenies tot Consulium, tot Dictatorum. In Lipsius's (21) opinion this hyperbole is something strong, since the family of Hortensius has given but one Consul and one Dictator. He endeavours to excuse Hortensius, by saying that he perhaps had his mother's ancestors in view. Ryckius (22) speaks in a more confident manner; and lays it down as a thing undeniable, and thinks that Hortensius had chiefly in view the Marcii Philippi, from whose family, according to him, Marcia, Hortalus's grandmother, descended. But this last circumstance has not the least shadow of probability; for, on one side, it does not appear that Hortensius the Orator had above one son, who was grown up to man's estate when Cicero passed through Laodicea, in the year 702. On the other side, Cato could not be very young, when he resigned Marcia to Hortensius, since his daughter Porcia had, at that time, born two children (23). Now Cato died at forty eight years of age, the year of Rome 407 (24). If therefore we suppose, as it is very probable, that he was at least five and thirty years old, when he gave up Marcia to Hortensius; we must conclude that this marriage was solemnized in the year of Rome 694. It is not therefore possible, that the son of Hortensius, whom Cicero saw in the city of Laodicea, in the year of Rome 702, should be Marcia's son. But why should we have recourse to conjecture, there being a particular in Plutarch which decides the question? Marcia was still Cato's wife, during the expedition of Cyprus (25), that is, in the year of Rome 696. We must not omit that Hortalus is called a young man by Tacitus, under the year of Rome 769; which could not coincide very well with the supposition, that Hortensius's only son is the debauchee hinted at by Cicero

(19) Vossius, de Hist. Latin. pag. 48.

and

(20) Annal. lib. 2. cap. 37.

(21) Comment. in Tacit.

(22) In Tacit. pag. 41.

(23) Plutarch. in Catoe min. pag. 770, 771.

(24) Ibid. pag. 794.

(25) Ibid. pag. 794.

(26) Ibid. pag. 794.

(27) Ibid. pag. 794.

(28) Ibid. pag. 794.

(29) Ibid. pag. 794.

(30) Ibid. pag. 794.

(31) Ibid. pag. 794.

(32) Ibid. pag. 794.

(33) Ibid. pag. 794.

(34) Ibid. pag. 794.

(35) Ibid. pag. 794.

proved of it, he said that in case they desired it, he would give a certain sum to each of Hortalus's sons (c) [F]. They thanked him for it; but Hortalus, either out of fear, or from a greatness of soul, which he roused on that occasion, said not a word; and from that time, as Tiberius did not assist him in any manner, Hortalus fell by degrees into the extremes of misery. Egere alii grates; siluit Hortalus, pavore an avita nobilitatis etiam inter angustias fortunæ retinens. Neque miseratus est posthac Tiberius, quamvis domus Hortensii pudendam ad inopiam dilaberetur (d).

(c) Ducens septuaginta singulis qui summo virilis essent. Tacitus, ibid. Rijkcius makes this amount to 5000 Ducatoons.

(d) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 38.

and Valerius Maximus, who lost his life a little after the battle of Philippi, in the year 712. But it is much more natural to conclude, that Tacitus was not so accurate as he ought to have been with respect to Hortalus's age, than to cavil about the speech which Valerius Maximus had read, and which Hortensius spoke a little before his death. Now it is manifestly supposed in this speech, that he had but one son; for if Hortensius, besides the profligate youth who waited upon Cicero in the city of Laodicea, had had one son or more by Marcia, he would not have been obliged to appoint his grandsons for heirs, in default of a debauched son, and of Messala his nephew.

[F] Tiberius . . . said . . . that he would give a certain sum to each of Hortensius's sons.] This would incline one to suppose, that Hortalus had brought only his four sons with him, and had left some daughters at home; so that, to speak with accuracy, we must not say with Suetonius (26), that his wife had brought him four children; for had she brought him no more, Tacitus would ascribe an absurdity to Tiberius. Neither do I think that, strictly speaking, it can be affirmed that Tiberius gave nothing to Hortalus (27). Did not he offer to give him a sum of money, in case the Senate should approve of his so doing? Was he not thanked for it? Could he suppose that the assembly would not be inclined to favour this poor Senator? It is therefore highly probable that this sum was given, but as that Prince did not indulge him any further liberality, it did not prevent Hortalus from falling into want. Let not Suetonius be urged (28), who pretends that the benefactions which Tiberius bestowed on the poor Senators, were made on certain conditions that excluded the person in question. These conditions, says he, were, that those who desired the benefactions, should discover their indigence to the Senate (29); quo pacto plerisque modestia & pudore deterruit, in qui- bus Hortalum & Hortensii Oratoris nepotem. i. e. "The greatest part, through shame and modesty, were hindered by those conditions; and, among the rest, Hortalus, Hortensius the Orator's grandson." But it is a great falsity to assert, that either shame or modesty prevented the grandson of Hortensius from fulfilling the condition. Did he not confess the miserable state to which he was reduced? Did not he bring his four sons, in order to beseech the Senate to indulge them their compassion? Did he not implore the Emperor to keep them from starving? Nec ad invidiam ista, sed conciliandæ misericordiæ refero: adsequuntur florente te, Cæsar, quos dederis, honores; interim & Hortensii prænepotes, divi Augusti alumnos ab inopia defende (30). i. e. "Nor is this petition offered up invidiously, but in order to excite compassion. O Cæsar, these children, in the course of your auspicious reign, may attain those honours which you will please to bestow on them; in the mean time preserve them from want, for they are the great grandsons of Hortensius, and the foster sons of Augustus." Achilles Statius (31), who said that our Hortalus is perhaps the person mentioned in the sixty seventh epigram of Catullus, did not consider that what he relates out of Tacitus, and which the reader has just now seen, relates to the year of Rome 769. I know very well that Catullus did not die in 697. Scaliger refutes, in a solid manner, this falsity of St. Jerom, but it is no ways probable that he lived till the year 763. I have refused Joseph Scaliger on this head in the article CATULLUS. It is certain that the Hortalus of this antient Poet was Hortensius rather than his grandson; and I cannot forbear being surprized that Isaac Vossius, in the same book (32) where he asserts against Scaliger, that Catullus died in the year 704 or 705 of Rome, should pretend (33) that the Hortalus of this Poet is the same with him mentioned by Tacitus.

(26) In Tiber. cap. 47.

(27) This is affirmed in the Dutch edit. of Moreri, under the word Hortalus.

(28) In Tiber. cap. 47.

(29) Tacit. Ann. lib. 1. cap. 75. says the same.

(30) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 37.

(31) Nait, in Catull. Epigr. 67.

(32) Observat. ad Catull. pag. 83.

(33) Pag. 252.

HORTENSIUS (JOHN) in French DES JARDINS, Physician to Francis I, was born in the neighbourhood of Laon in Picardy, and son to John Des-Jardins Captain of de Hamelle Castle, in the Diocese of Laon. He taught Classical Learning at Paris in Cardinal le Moine's College; and afterwards applying himself to the study of Physic, took his Bachelor's degree therein in the year 1514; that of Licentiate in 1517, and his Doctor's degree in 1519. It appears by the Registers of the University of Paris, that he was Regent-Doctor there in 1521, and Dean of the Faculty in the year 1524. Being perfectly well skilled in the Greek, he strongly exhorted his pupils to study that language; and, in order that every one might have an opportunity to consult Galen in the original, he made a present of the Greek edition of that antient Physician to the Library of the Faculty; for the Physicians of Paris at that time had a public Library in their schools (a). He acquired so great a reputation, that he was thought able to cure diseases of every kind, provided the fatal hour was not come (b). That only was excepted [A]; so that the following proverb was commonly applied to him, Contra vim Mortis non est medicamen in Hortis (c). He is applauded in several books [B]; but he himself never printed any thing; and no composition of his was published after his death.

(a) Hemerius, Differt. de Academ. Parisiens.

(b) Balzus, Hist. Academ. Parisiens.

(c) He was called, in Latin, Hortus, or de Hortis.

[A] That only was excepted.] Vulgarly speaking that is saying a great deal; but, in reality, it was excepting a great deal, for provided death does not interfere, there is no disease but is within the reach of the Physician's skill. Nature only, on this occasion, may work a perfect cure. Nevertheless, according to our usual way of judging things, figuring to our selves a numberless multitude of very possible Conditions, which would change the chain and the course of events, it is giving a very high idea of a Physician, to say that he will restore a patient to his health, provided a superiour force does not interpose. This recalls to my mind the too blunt expression ascribed to certain Admirals, who, being ready to engage the enemy under favourable circumstances, and after having taken the best measures, declared that they were sure of gaining the victory, provided God would stand neuter, and leave the combatants to themselves.

[B] He is applauded in several books.] Ménage (1) (1) Remarques sur la Vie de Pierre Myrault, pag. 150. cites Arnaud d'Ossat, in his exposition against James Charpentier; Renatus Moreau, in the Life of James Sylvius; du Boulay, in the History of the University of Paris; Louis d'Orleans, in the Plante humaine; Peter Myrault, in his books de Ordine judiciario; John Vassé, in an Epistle Dedicatory. Ei præterea & Martino Acacia & Michaëli Dumontio, Medicis Parisiensibus doctissimis interpretationem librorum Hippocratis & Galeni de vitæ ratione in morbis acutis nuncupavit Johannes Vassæus Medicus & ipse Parisiensis doctissimus (2). (2) Ménage, in eodem Volumine, pag. 512.

(d) It is in Latin, in the volume he published at Paris in the year 1675 in 4to, containing the Life of Ayrault, of William Menage, &c. with a great number of remarks.

(3) Ibid. pag. 514.

(4) Menage, Revolutions sur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 517.

(5) All this is found ibid. pag. 514. The French Sonnet is in pag. 510.

(a) Occiso in oculis filio suo naturali. Valer. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 613. But it is to be observed, that Brandt in his Flemish History of the Reformation, under the year 1584, pag. 702, 703, speaks of Jesom Hortensius Minister of the Hague, and afterwards at Wafsenae, who, he says, was son to Lambert.

(b) His name was Weldam.

(1) Athen. Belg. pag. 508.

(2) Admodum doctissimus, pag. 615.

(3) Pag. 806.

death. He married Jane Bourdin in 1520, and Mary le Tellier in 1541, leaving seven children by the former, and four by the latter. The settlements they had [C], and the real estate he left, are a proof that he had amassed great sums. He was seized with an apoplexy of which he died, whilst he was at an entertainment which he gave his relations and friends, on his birth-day, in the year 1547; a circumstance which gave occasion to a fine sonnet of Des-Portes [D], which is taken, entire, into the remarks. Menage, who sprung from John Des-Jardins by the mother's side [E], has given us his life (d), whence we have extracted this article.

[C] The settlements . . . which his children . . . had. Menage speaks as follows (3), Prædixit fuisse, ut tum erant tempora, testantur & ejus ædes plurimæ, & prædia multa & liberi undecim, qui nido majores pennas, ut Flacci verbis utar, extenderunt. By the particular account we have of the eleven children mentioned in this Latin passage, it appears that the daughters were married to persons of figure; the first to William Verforis, Counsellor in the Chatelet, son of John Verforis, a famous Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris; the second to John Metayer, Counsellor of the Exchequer; the third to Peter Ayrault, Lieutenant-Criminal of Angers. One of the sons was Counsellor at the Chatelet, another was Canon of Senlis, and a third was Counsellor in the Exchequer. This Counsellor in the Chatelet left a son who exercised the same employment; was Echevin of Paris in 1600; and left a son, to whom was brought, among other children, the wife of Denys Godefroi, Historiographer of France. There survived, among all the descendents of John Des-Jardins, only one person who bore his name, at the time that Menage was writing this book. Petrum Hortensium militem strenuum, qui Margaretam de Gra-

[D] His death . . . gave occasion to a fine sonnet of Des-Portes. The reader will not be displeas'd to meet with it here. It was translated into Latin by father Vavasseur, and Menage compos'd an epigram on the same thought (5).

*Après avoir sauvé par mon art secourable
Tant de corps languissans que la mort menaçoit,
Et chassé la rigueur du mal qui les pressoit,
Gagnant comme Esculape un nom toujours durable.*

*Cette fatale sœur, cruelle, inexorable,
Voyant que mon pouvoir le sien amoindrissoit;
Un jour que son courroux contre moi la pouvoit,
Finit quant & mes jours mon labeur profitable.*
PASSANT, moi qui pouvois les autres secourir,
Ne dis point qu'au besoin je ne me pus guerir,
Car la mort qui doutoit l'effort de ma science,
Ainsi que je prenois sobrement mon repas,
Me prit en trahison, sain & sans des fiance,
Ne me donnant loisir de penser au trespas.

The sense is,

"After having saved by my friendly art such a number of languishing bodies which were threaten'd with death, and expelled the fury of the disease that attacked them; gaining, like Esculapius, an ever-memorable name: That fatal, cruel, inexorable being, observing that my power lessened his; one day, that he was highly exasperated against me, at once put an end to my conquests which were so advantageous to human nature. Passenger, say not that I, who was so good a friend to the rest of the world, could not, when sick, perform a cure upon myself; for Death, who dreaded the efforts of my skill, as I was taking a meal calm and undisturbed, seized me treacherously at a time when I did not harbour the least suspicion; not allowing me leisure to think of the other world."

[E] Menage . . . sprung from John Des-Jardins by the mother's side. Peter Ayrault, grandfather by the mother's side to Menage, married Anne Des-Jardins, daughter to our Hortensius, and of Mary le Tellier his second wife, who was of the same family from which Chancellor le Tellier descended (6).

(6) Menage, Revolutions sur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 515, 517.

HORTENSIVS (LAMBERT) born at Montfort in the Province of Utrecht, the first of April 1518 [A], has been ranked among the learned men of the age in which he flourished. He studied with extreme application the learned languages at Louvain, under very excellent masters, and also heard Ludovicus Vives on Logic. He published a translation in Latin verse, of Aristophanes's Plutus, with notes, and thereby shewed what advances he had made in the Greek tongue. He wrote several other books [B]. He taught school a great number of years at Naerden in Holland; and very narrowly escaped being taken, when that town was plundered by the Spaniards in 1572, under the conduct of Frederic of Toledo, son to the Duke of Alva. This house had been plundered; a bastard son of his had been killed before his face (a); and he himself, though a Priest, was going to be murdered; but by good luck a Gentleman (b), who had been his scholar, and carried arms under the Spaniards, happened to be there very seasonably to save his life. It was observed that he was solicitous of saving nothing from the common wreck but his Notes on Lucan's Pharsalia. He wrote a Description of the plundering and slaughter of Naerden, the manuscript whereof is at Utrecht. Hortensius did not long survive that catastrophe, he dying in 1573 (c) in a country seat near Naerden (e).

[A] He was born at Montfort . . . the 1st of April 1518. I differ, on this occasion, from Valerius Andreas, my author, who declares that he was born in 1500. He doubtless was misled by the following words of Swertius (1) Nascitur anno cdo. Id. xviii. Kal. Aprilis. He doubtless imagined that these numerical letters xviii referred to the word Kalends, for want of calling to mind, that there is not, in the Roman Calendar, any eighteenth day before the Kalends of April. This is not the only reason which determined me to joyn xviii with the preceding letters; I having been also prompted to it from the following consideration. Valerius Andreas says that he was very young (2) when he came to study at Louvain, under Rutgerus Rescius, Professor of the Greek tongue; now he says in another place (3), that Rescius died in 1545, at which time he had sat near seventeen years in the Professor's chair, and consequently he did not begin to fill it till the year 1528. How therefore was it possible for Hortensius to come and study very young under this Professor, if he was born in 1500? But if he was born in 1518, all is easily reconciled. Paul Freherus (4) is mistaken, both in the year of his birth and in that of his death, since he says that Lambert Hortensius was born in 1501, and died in 1577.

[B] He wrote several other books. Here follow the titles of them: Enarrationes in Virgilio Aeneida, in fol. Explanationes in Lucani Pharsaliam, printed at Basil in 1578, folio. Satyram in ævi sui vitia & mores libri II. Epithalamiorum liber I. Secessionum cæsarum Ultrajectinarum libri VII. De bello Germano à Carolo V. Cesare gesto libri VII. Tumultuum Anabaptistarum liber I (5).

HORTENSIVS

(4) In Theatra, pag. 1473. König says likewise that he was born in 1501.

(5) I have quoted the remark [B] of the article PLE-CARDS. I add here, that it was reprinted at Amsterdam in 1636, with the Historia Anabaptistica de factione Monasteriensis of Conrad Heresbachius, under the direction of Thodore Strackius, Minister of Burik, in Cleves.

HORTENSIVS (MARTIN) a native of Delft in Holland, and Professor of Mathematics in Amsterdam, might have made a very great progress in the Sciences he professed, had he not been snatched away in the flower of his age (a) in the year 1639 [A]. The preface he wrote to a work of Philippus Lansbergius, translated by him into Latin, and wherein he raises very strong objections to Tycho Brahe's system, shews in what manner he cultivated the study of Astronomy; wherein he was assisted by the conversations of Lansbergius, to whom he was recommended by Beekman, Rector of the school of Dort, a man very much spoken of in Des Cartes's history. That book of Lansbergius is intitled, Commentationes in motum terræ diurnum & annum, & in verum aspectabilis cæli typum, and was printed at Middleburg in the year 1630, in 4to. Hortensius also translated the astronomical institution of William Blaeuw; and wrote a Dissertation de Mercurio sub Sole viso & Venere invisâ, inscribed to Gassendi; and an answer to what Kepler had prefixed to his almanack in 1624 (b). The letters which Gassendi wrote to Hortensius, shew that he had a singular esteem for him. Hortensius's letters to that famous Philosopher are printed among those of the latter. I thereby found that he was born in 1605 (c), and had been admitted Professor in Amsterdam in the year 1634 (d). He did not appear satisfied with his condition; and he speaks (e) of the spirit that prevailed in that renowned city, as a man who was highly offended because people did not come to his Lectures, nor encourage the making of those machines he had projected, and from which he expected such a success as would be superior to any thing Tycho Brahe had done (f). He has left some Orations, one De utilitate & dignitate Mathematicos, and another De Oculo ejusque præstantia. He says in one of his letters to Gassendi (g), that the only reason why the publication of his answer to the book which Peter Bartholinus had published against him in defence of Tycho Brahe, was deferred, was for want of paper. In all probability that work kept company with the Pleiadographia (b), which our author left in manuscript at his death. Des Cartes has not spoken advantageously of his abilities: As to the School-professors, says he (i), not one of them understands my Geometry; no not Golius, much less Hortensius, who has not made a sufficient progress for that purpose.

(a) Val. And. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 652.

(b) See Vossius, de Scient. Math. pag. 201, 202.

(c) Oper. Gassendi, pag. 418. tom. 6.

(d) Ibid. pag. 422. tom. 6.

(e) Ibid. pag. 429.

(f) Ibid. p. 423. See also pag. 429, and 432.

(b) Val. And. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 652.

(i) Lettres, tom. 3. pag. 191.

[A] He might have made a very great progress in the sciences he professed, had he not been snatched away in the flower of his age in the year 1639. I have not here followed Valerius Andreas, who says that he died in 1640. The circumstance, which prompted me to depart from him is, a passage of Des Cartes that deserves to be copied. I extract it from one of his letters to Father Merfenne (1); which, though it be not dated, yet fixes in a solid manner the date I want; since the author informs us in the very opening of his letter, that he wrote it in answer to a letter of the last day of December 1639. Here follows what I judged proper to transcribe from it. "Hortensius being in Italy some years since, set about calculating the scheme of his own nativity; and told two young men of this country who were with him, that he should die in 1639, and that they should not live long after him. Now he dying this summer as you know, the two young men abovementioned were seized with such a pannaic, that one of them is already dead; and the other, who is Heinsius's son (2), is so melancholy, and in so languishing a condition, that he seems to do whatever lies in his power, to verify the Astrologer's prediction. This indeed is a fine science, which kills people, who perhaps would not otherwise have been sick." It would be wrong in any person to object to me, that Des Cartes might have writ this letter, after the summer of the year 1640, and consequently that he does not contradict Valerius Andreas; for he had so frequent a correspondence with Father Merfenne, that such an objection cannot but be false. But farther, I find in a letter of Boxhornius (3), dated the 13th of September 1639, that he bewailed the loss of Hortensius, who was lately dead.

(2) It is doubtless Nichol. Hortensius, who died but in 1681. Baillet says the contrary, he declaring that Heinsius had two sons; and that he of whom Des Cartes speaks actually died, and that his name was Daniel.

(3) See Epist. Boxhornii, pag. 144. edit. Francof. 1679.

(1) It is the 35th of volume 2. in the edit. of 1659.

HOSIVS (STANISLAUS) Cardinal and Bishop of Warmia, was one of the greatest men that Poland ever gave birth to. He was born at Cracow in 1504. The reader will find in Moreri (a) an account of his actions, and the honours to which he was raised. It was not thought, whilst he was one of the Presidents of the Council, that he was master of all the address requisite for such a station [A]. His controversial writings are very

(a) And still better in the Sieur Bullart, Academie des Sciences, tom. 1. pag. 64, & seq.

[A] It was not thought, whilst he was one of the Presidents of the Council, that he was master of all the address requisite for such a station. The Cardinal of Mantua dying the 2d of March 1563, those who had presided with him in the Council, sent immediate notice of it to the Pope. He who was the first President (1), required to have a Legate sent that should be above him. Hosius desired that leave might be given him to go into Poland; but Simonetta advised the Pope not to send a new Legate to Trent, hoping thereby to get possession of the direction, not only because Cardinal Seripando was grown weary of this Council, and did not care to have the direction of it any longer, but because Cardinal Hosius was a weak man, who was easily governed. Simonetta desideroso che la somma di guidare il Concilio restasse à lui, & havendo speranza di condurlo bene, con sodisfazione del Pontefice, & honor proprio; considerando che Seripando era satiato di quel negotio, & poco inclinato a volerlo guidare, & che Varmiensis era semplice persona, disposta a lasciarsi reggere; mise in consideratione ael Pontefice, che, ritrovandosi le cose del Concilio, &c (2). Any one will easily perceive that Amelot has not translated these words faithfully. Here follows his version. "Simonetta earnestly desiring to have the direction, and hoping to acquit himself of it with honour, and to the Pope's satisfaction, represented to him; that as affairs were not in a very happy posture, the least novelty or innovation would only make them go worse; so that he did not see, there was occasion of lending another Legate; that since Seripando who hated trouble, had not a mind to have the direction of the Council; and that the Bishop of Warmia was a weak man, and entirely governed by other people, he offered to go in their stead, boasting that he would steer the ship happily (3)." 1. The original does not say, that Hosius was entirely governed by other people. 2. It is not true, that Simonetta told the Pope by letter, that Hosius was a weak man. He thought so indeed, and built upon it; but then he did not inform the Pope of this circumstance. Father Paul distinguishes very clearly what was thought, from what was written by him, which distinction ought to have been observed by the translator.

(3) Hist. du Concile de Trente, pag. 6. 7. 658. edit. d'Amsterdam. 1686.

It is to be observed that Cardinal Palavicino (4) pretends to prove, by authentic pieces, that whatever Father Paul advances with regard to the ambitious artifices of Simonetta is a falsehood.

(4) Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. 20. cap. 6. num. 6.

(1) It was Cardinal Sepizando.

(2) Fra-Paolo, Istoria del Concilio di Trento, lib. 7. pag. m. 693. Compare with this the passage of book 6. pag. 548. It is page 517. in Amelot's translation.

very little inferior to the best of that age. Casaubon is not in the wrong, for charging him [B] with apologizing for what a controversial writer had advanced, viz. that the holy Scriptures, were it not for the authority of the church, would have no more weight than Esop's fables. The Jesuit who criticized Casaubon on that occasion, did but betray his ignorance (b). Hofius died near to Rome the 5th of August 1579. Moreri has committed some errors [C].

(b) See the remark [B].

This

[B] Casaubon is not in the wrong for charging him [C]. Let us go on with the progress of that dispute, and begin with the words of that great critic (5).

(5) Casaubon, in Verbo Dei viventis scripto minus etiam tribuit (Scioppius in Ecclesiastico, cap. 135.) quam sive Pighius, sive alius qui dixit Patrum memoria: Scripturam, si auctoritate Ecclesie destitueretur, non plus per se valere quam fabulas Esopi. Quod blasphemum dictum postea defendere ausus est Cardinalis Hofius. i. e. "Scioppius in Ecclesiastico, Chap. 135, ascribes not so much authority to the written word of the living God, as Pighius, or another person, who said in the memory of our Fathers, that were the Scriptures divested of the authority of the Church, they would be of no more authority than Esop's fables; which blasphemous expression Cardinal Hofius dared to defend." Eudæmon-Joannes the Jesuit asserted, that this was a calumny invented by Brentius, and he pretends to prove it in the following manner. Jam vero quando non memorat, neque quis Esopice hujus fabulæ auctor sit; neque quo loco eam Hofius defenderit, vel ne convinci imposturæ possit, vel quod in aliquo alio rem eam legerat, et auctorem, et calumniam ex Hofio detegam: videant deinde lectores, quam bona fide infideles isti fidei patroni disputent. Is igitur lib. 3. in prolegomena Brentii, ipso fere initio: Magna pars, inquit, libelli prolegomenorum Brentii non aliunde constant, quam è fannis, dictionibus, conviciis; in quo sic etiam ludit Scripturis, sic eas tractat joculariter; ut verè de ipso dici possit, quod venerabili viro Petro à Soto falso impingit, eum haud aliter Scripturis, quam Esopi fabulis uti. Non est igitur ea Catholicorum injuriam Scriptoris vox, sed calumnia Brentii: quam vir illustrissimus falso in virum doctissimum excogitavit, in auctorem ipsum vere convenire defendit (6). i. e. "Now since he does not mention who was the author of this Esopic fable, nor in what place Hofius defended it, and this either to prevent his being found guilty of an imposture, or because he had read this incident of some other person; I will point out both the author and the calumny from Hofius himself; and after this let the reader judge, in how ingenuous a manner these faithless defenders of the faith dispute. Hofius therefore, in Book III, in opposition to the Prolegomena of Brentius, almost at the beginning says; the greatest part of the Prolegomena of Brentius, are made up merely of sneers, taunts and reproaches, wherein he is so ludicrous with the Scriptures, and treats them in so burlesque a manner, that we may justly say of this writer, what he falsely ascribes to the venerable Peter à Soto; that he used the Scriptures just as one would use Esop's fables. This therefore is not the assertion of any Catholic writer, but a calumny of Brentius, which our most illustrious author shews to be a false invention with regard to that very learned man, and to belong properly to the inventor himself." We here have four things. I. A complaint that Casaubon did not specify the place in Hofius's work where this is to be found. II. That Brentius accuses Soto of making the same use of the Scriptures as of Esop's Fables. III. That Hofius asserts that such an accusation is a slander with respect to Soto, and very true with regard to Brentius. IV. That these words of Hofius gave occasion to the reflection or reproach mentioned by Casaubon. The first of these four particulars is just. We cannot complain too much against the negligence of those writers who do not quote the particular chapter, in accusations of importance. Great authors are most subject to this fault; they imagine that the public will believe them on their bare words, and so they will not give themselves the trouble to quote: it is enough for them to say, Plutarch, Cicero, St. Austin, say this. Numberless readers had rather give credit to what they say, or continue in doubt, than be at the trouble of verifying such an assertion. Although Casaubon did not really intend to hinder any person from discovering whether his accusation was true or false, he yet has given occasion to such a suspicion. Why did he quote after so random a manner? The second and third of these four things form two indisputable facts (7), but then they are absolutely nothing to the dispute itself. But the fourth is a notorious blunder of the Jesuit, as the reader will see below. The confidence with which he accuses Casaubon of slandering Cardinal Hofius, raises I know not what prejudices to the disadvantage of that Critic; but when we see the apologist for Casaubon stop short, and flatly own that he has no book of Hofius, we are prompted to conclude that the accusation of Eudæmon-Joannes is well grounded. Si nihil gravius dixit Hofius, erit hæc in Brentium calumnia, non in Spiritum S. blasphemia. Ego Pighii, Hofii, nihil habeo, nec Hermanni, cui blasphemam hanc Scripturæ cum Esopi fabulis comparationem tribuentes viros magnos audivi (8). Can one easily believe that a Minister who undertakes to refute the censurer of Casaubon should not search for Hofius's works till he finds them? Are they so hard to be met with? One is apt therefore to suspect, that this confession of his want of them is a subterfuge, invented on purpose that we may not be forced to own this Cardinal's ignorance. However, the reader need not be in pain about Casaubon, he charging Hofius with nothing but what is perfectly true. Fingamus autem nunc verum esse, hæc sunt Hofius's words (9), in the same book (9) Hofius, lib. 3. in Prolegomena Brentii, pag. 230. quem narras, nam nomen non exprimis, ac fieri potest ut sit commentum tuum, Scripturas valere quantum fabulas Esopi, si destituantur auctoritate Ecclesie. Cedo, Brentii, num hic minus reverenter de Scripturis loquutus est, quam qui vocat eam librum Hæreticorum (10), cum tamen nullorum sit minus quam Hæreticorum: est enim Catholicorum propria, qui tot seculis in ejus possessione præscripserunt. Et potuit illud tamen pio sensu dici, quem homo pius, qui charitatem habeo, quæ non cogitat malum, ex iis verbis eliceret. Nam revera, nisi nos Ecclesie doceret auctoritas hanc scripturam esse canonicam, perexiguum apud nos pondus haberet. i. e. "Let us take it for granted that it is true, which you declare to have been written by some one or other, for you name no person, and it may perhaps be a fiction of your own, viz. that the Scriptures, were it not for the authority of the Church, would be of no more value than Esop's fables. But Brentius, did this man speak less reverently of the Scriptures, than he who calls them the Book of Heretics, when indeed they belong to none less than to the Heretics; these being certainly the property of the Catholics, who, by a possession during so many ages have a right to them? Nevertheless these words might have been said in a pious sense, which a pious man, who has a spirit of charity and harbours no evil thought, may draw out of them. For indeed, did not the authority of the Church teach us, that these Scriptures are canonical, they would have very little weight with us."

(6) Andr. Eudæmon-Joannes, Cassigat. Exercit. Isaac Casauboni, lib. 2. cap. 5. pag. 147.

[C] Moreri has committed some errors.] I. It was not to Pavia, but to Padua, that Hofius's relations sent him to study. Moreri might have found his error, had he known that Lazarus Bonamici, whom he declares to have been Hofius's master, was Professor in Padua. Du Saussai (11) supposes that Hofius having been sent into Italy, by the advice of Peter Thomicki Bishop of Cracow, stopt at Bologna. Now this is not distinguishing particulars justly. He should have said that Hofius having studied some time at Padua, went to Bologna, and there took his degrees of Doctor of Laws. Pataxii, dein Bononiæ... Jurisprudentiæ industriam primo addixerat, et lauream sub ipso Hugone Boncompagno qui S. S. Gregorii XIII. nomine dein præfuit, postremo adeptus est (12). i. e. "He first applied himself to the study of the Law in Padua, and afterwards in Bologna; and at last took his degree under Hugh Boncompagnus, who afterwards sat in the Pontifical chair, and was called Gregory XIII."

(7) Hofius's words quoted by Eudæmon-Joannes, are found in book 3. of Brentius's Prolegomena, pag. 196. Colen. edit. of 1558, folio.

(8) Jacobus Caspellus, Vindic. Is. Casaub. lib. 3. cap. 5. pag. 78.

(9) Hofius had said just before that Luther called the holy Scriptures the Book of Heretics. Greiser remarks this also in Proleg. Exam. Mysteriorum Plessigum, pag. 90. and cites Luther's words in Postil. Eccl. Domin. 8. post Trinitat.

(11) Continuat. de Script. Eccl. cap. 32. pag. 23.

(12) Thuan. lib. 68. sub fin. pag. 297.

This Cardinal was thought to be the author of an anonymous piece that was highly injurious to the Swifs, which was refuted by Bullinger, in the preface to Josias Simler's

(c) See Hottinger in Pentate Dif- fert. Miscell. pag. 214.

(d) Crenius, Part 12. Anim. pag. 65. says only, that it is reported.

treatise de æterno Dei filio (c). He certainly (d) wrote the anonymous piece just mentioned. He composed it in 1564; and intitled it, Judicium & Censura de Judicio & Censura Ministrorum Tigurinorum & Heidelbergensium de dogmate contra adorandam Trinitatem in Polonia nuper sparso. It has been inserted in the collection of his works (e), and I don't doubt but that it is taken into the editions which the author himself published. I believe that the most complete edition of his works, is that of 1584 [D]. It contains a volume of posthumous works, among which are a great number of letters, where Cardinal Hosius repeats often the same particulars, viz. that the heretics must be extirpated, and their divisions discovered sufficiently the injustice of their pretended reformation. He had studied with great application the writings which the Zuinglians and Lutherans had published against one another, and those concerning the violent disputes which had broke out among the Lutherans. He was for ever drawing odious conclusions from them; and he artfully took advantage of this circumstance, viz. that these new Doctors wrote books in defence of penal Laws against those who erred; and that such as were most powerful among the Schismatics which divided the Lutherans, banished, imprisoned, &c. those Lutherans who differed from them.

(e) From pag. 669. to pag. 707. tom. 1. of the Colen edit. My copy is dated, in the title 1639.

HOSPINIAN

This shews the second falsity of Moreri. He says that Hosius took his Doctor's degree at Pavia. III. He was made Bishop of Culm, at the request of King Sigismund I: but this is another error, Sigismund Augustus having procured him that Bishopric. IV. How could it have been possible for Sigismund I to send him to Rome, to Pope Julius III? for he died in 1548, and this Pope was not raised to the Papal throne till 1550. V. He should not have said, that retiring to Poland, after the conclusion of the Council, he wrote those admirable works which are extant of his; for he is declaring, that he had not wrote any books before that time, and yet it is certain, that his answer to Brentius was printed at Colen in 1558; it is a folio volume, and consists of four hundred pages. His book intitled Confessio Catholicae fidei Christiana (13), had been published already in Mentz. His work De Communione sub utraque specie, that De Sacerdotum conjugio, and that De Missa vulgari lingua celebranda, had been published at Paris in 1561 (14). Du Sauffai (15) ought to be censured a little here; he inserting moit of these works in the catalogue of books which Hosius caused to be printed after the holding of the Council. VI. He should not have said in general, that there were thirty two editions of Hosius's works during his life-time; but ought to have made some exception to this, as Bullart has done. Several of his works, says he (16), have been printed thirty two times, during his life, in the chief cities of the Christian world; and translated into French, Italian, German, Flemish, Polish, English, Scotch, and the Armenian language. De la Rochepezai (17) is wrong in making no exception. Read the following remark.

(13) See the preface to his Answer to Brentius's Prolegomena.

(14) Oldoinus, in Aiben. Romano, pag. 615.

(15) In Continuat. de Scriptor. Eccles. pag. 23.

(16) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, tom. 1. pag. 70.

(17) In Nomenclatore Cardinalium, pag. 151.

I take no notice of what Moreri says, concerning the reasons which obliged Cardinal Hosius not to be present at the twenty fourth session. He declares that it was because Hosius did not approve those decisions which had been made with respect to clandestine marriages. It is very certain that he disapproved of this decision, and endeavoured three or four times to get it repealed, a circumstance which made him be looked upon as an obstinate man (18); but it is no ways certain that his absence is grounded on the reason given by Moreri; for he was present in the precedent session, notwithstanding he disapproved part of the particulars which had been decreed therein, with respect to the sacrifice of the mass. He did not scruple to oppose them. Why therefore did he not dare to do as much with respect to clandestine marriages? Would he not have been seconded by Cardinal Simonetta his colleague, and by some others? Did he not send his opinion, in writing, which was contrary to the decree? Did he not declare, in writing, that he referred with regard to all those things, to the Pope's judgment? In a word, his sickness was very real, and of very long continuance. These are most of the reasons which was to pass into a law. Sometimes writers have reason to say, that the sicknesses of persons in high station are either counterfeit, or mere political grimace; but then Historians who are over speculative, are also sometimes mistaken in making such assertions.

(18) Palavic. Hist. Conc. Trid. lib. 22. cap. 9. num. 6.

(19) Ibid. lib. 23. cap. 7. num. 17.

[D] I believe that the most complete edition of his works, is that of 1584.] It was printed at Cologne by Maternus Cholin, and consists of two volumes in folio. The first volume containing the works which had been already published, but then they were printed, as last revised by the author. The second volume consists of pieces that had never been printed; and which were collected by Stanislaus Rescius, who dedicated them to Stephen Battori, King of Poland. His Dedication is dated from Rome the 1st of September, 1582. From the manner in which Crenius delivers himself (20), I conclude that the Treatise entitled Judicium & Censura, &c. is not inserted in the Antwerp edition of 1566 in folio; but I think it is in the Venice edition which the author himself dedicated to Pope Gregory XIII, the 15th of August 1573. He had revised and enlarged his works, for that edition. He dedicated the first treatise of it to Henry de Valois, King of Poland; and dates the Epistle Dedicatory, the same day with that of the whole volume. This first treatise is entitled Confessio Catholicae Fidei Christianae. The author had wrote part of it three and twenty years before; and that part being sent to Rome by the Archbishop of Geneva, was approved in that City; so that Cardinal Otho Truchses, Bishop of Ausburg, had it printed in his own City of Dillingen. The things that were wanting having been added, the whole work was printed at Mentz, under the direction of the Archbishop of Gnesna. This edition was soon followed by others. Hosius's name was not yet prefixed to the work; and was not printed till Ruard Tapper intreated the author to put his name to it, because it was usual in Germany to discourage the sale of anonymous books (21). This met with the best reception of any of Hosius's works. Pope Pius IV made Paulus Manutius print it in Rome (22). If there be no hyperbole in the thirty two editions spoken of (23), it must relate chiefly to this piece. Rescius extends it to all the works published by Cardinal Hosius: Ipsa etiam Authore vivente bis & trigesies in praecipuis Christiani Orbis urbibus, Latina, Germanica, Gallica, Flandrica Lingua omnes Hosii Libri typis expressi, in Polonicam etiam & Italicam translati videbantur, & fortasse etiam in Armenicam, sicut ex sermone viri cujusdam in hac urbe illustrissimi accepimus (24). "All Hosius's works were printed thirty two times in his life-time, in the chief cities of Christendom, in the Latin, German, French and Flemish tongues; they were translated into Polish and Italian, and perhaps into the Armenian language, as I have been told by a most illustrious man in this city." But as his posthumous writings, which make a pretty large volume in folio, ought to be excepted; I had just reason for answering Moreri's too general expression on this occasion.

(20) Crenius, Animadv. Part. 12. pag. 65.

(21) Extracted from Hosius's Dedication, to Henry de Valois King of Poland.

(22) See the same Epist. Dedicat.

(23) See the preceding remark citation (16).

(24) Stan. Rescius, Epist. Dedicat. tom. 2. Operum Hosii, fol. 3 verso. edit. Coloniae apud Cholinum 1584.

HOSPINIAN (RODOLPHUS) in Latin Hospinianus, was one of the greatest writers that Switzerland has given birth to. He was born at Altorf, a village of the county of Kiburg in the canton of Zurich, the 7th of November 1547; and was sent, at seven years of age, to Zurich, there to begin his studies. He made a great progress in them, under the direction of John Wolphius (a) his uncle on the mother's side; and having lost his father (b) in 1563, he found a most affectionate Patron in Rodolphus Gualterus (c) his godfather. He left Zurich in order to visit the other Universities in March 1565, and staid two years in Marpurgh, where he distinguished himself by the assiduity with which he applied himself to his studies, and by his good behaviour. He did the same at Heidelberg during the six months he spent in that city; after which he was recalled by his Superiors, and received into the ministry in the year 1568, and this was to go and preach twice a week in a country church, four or five leagues from Zurich. He discharged these several duties very exactly for eight years together, though he had a great deal of other business in the city; for he was appointed master of the third class or school in 1569, and was made Provisor of the Abbey-school in 1571. He was Provisor of Caroline-school five years after; and it was a kind of Sisyphæan stone, which he rolled with prodigious patience during nineteen years [A]. He obtained the freedom of the city (d) in 1569, and was happily married the same year [B]. His pastoral labours were somewhat lessened in 1576, he being appointed Minister of a Church that stood but a league from Zurich. Though his school engrossed so much of his time, he yet had courage enough to undertake a noble work of a vast extent [C]. As he devoted all his leisure moments to the study of Ecclesiastical History, he laid down the plan

(a) He was a Minister, and has published several books.

(b) He was a Minister in Altorf.

(c) He was a famous Minister, and wrote several Homilies in Latin.

(d) Jus Civitatis Tigurinae rara felicitate ipsi collatum est. Heidegger ubi infra Citat. (e).

[A] It was a kind of Sisyphæan stone, which he rolled with prodigious patience during nineteen years. I borrow this thought from the author of his Life. Hanc quoque Spartam ornavit, says he (1), quantum potuit, saxumque hoc vere Sisyphium voluit revolvitque, & novemdecim annorum orbe circumegit indefessus athleta pari & industria & successu. i. e. "He also adorned this profession exceedingly, and rolled this truly Sisyphæan stone with incredible labour during nineteen years, with equal industry and success." What he says a little afterwards is very judicious. He is surprized that Hospinian's genius was not debased by these painful employments. Ferream certe adamantinumque dixeris qui tot labores exantlare, & simul ingenium à situ & squalore vindicare possit.

(1) Jo. Henr. Heidegger, in Vita Hospiniani, pag. 8.

[B] He was happily married in 1569. His wife was Anne Lavater, daughter of Lewis Lavater, at that time Archdeacon of Caroline church, and afterwards principal Minister. He was son to Rodolphus Lavater, Burgomaster of Zurich. The mother of Anne Lavater was daughter to Henry Bullinger, one of the chief Reformers. Our Hospinian lived in great unity for upwards of thirty years with his wife; Annoque plurquam triginta concorde in matrimonio tenuit (2); and had fourteen children by her, the youngest of whom, Elizabeth, was living in 1681. She was the widow of Rodolph Stuckius, fourscore and eight years of age; and as she had preserved her judgment and memory, she furnished materials to the author of her father's life. Quæ annum agens 88, sic satis vegeta etiamnum integro judicio & memoria, ex qua non pauca mihi suggestit historiam hanc locupletantia, pollet (3). JOHN HENRY HOSPINIAN, her brother, was Minister of Bulac church, and Dean of the Chapter of Reinburg. RODOLPHUS HOSPINIAN, his brother, Professor of Hebrew in Zurich, and Deacon of the Caroline Church, left two sons, RODOLPHUS HOSPINIAN, who was Provost of the Chapter of the same city, when Heidegger was writing the Life of our Rodolphus, and JOHN HENRY HOSPINIAN, Minister of the Church of Glattfeld. Heidegger gives an account of several other persons descended from our Rodolphus, who losing his wife in 1612, made such reflections as became a good Christian, and it was not long before he sought for consolation in a second wife. Patienter tamen domesticam illam calamitatem, utcumque acerbam, tulit, memor utique, & mortalem se duxisse, & ad æternam beatitudinem præmississe. Consolabantur etiam mox orbitatem ejus secundæ nuptiæ cum matrona honestissima Magdalena Wirzia, nobilis & eximii viri Conradi Wirzii, Præfeti quondam Vadivillani, filia, bonis omnibus contractæ, & d. XIII. Maji An. M. DC. XII. solemniter celebratæ (4). i. e. "He yet submitted with patience to this domestic and bitter calamity, calling to mind that he had married a mortal woman, and that she was gone before him to everlasting bliss. He consoled himself for his widowhood some time after,

(2) Idem in Vita Hospiniani, pag. 9.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, pag. 23.

"by his marrying for his second wife a most virtuous matron named Magdalen Wirz, daughter to that renowned and good man Conrad Wirz, formerly Governor of Wedischewyl; which nuptials were solemnized the 13th of May, 1612." He had found by experience, that a wife did not interrupt his studies in any manner. Cujus consortium tantum abest ut, quod Romanenses nostris objiciunt, impedimentum aliquod studiis ejus piis objecerit, ut magno illi contra & dulci ad omne opus bonum incitamento adjumentoque fuerit (5). i. e. "Whose company and fellowship was so far from being an hindrance to his pious studies, as the Romans object to us, that it was a sweet excitement and help to every good work."

[C] He . . . had courage enough to undertake a noble work of a vast extent. This was the History of the Errors of Popery. The circumstance which first suggested this thought was, upon his engaging in conversation, in a country alehouse, with the landlord, who was so silly as to imagine, that the monastic life came immediately from Paradise. Fassum aliquando ferunt, cum illa excursionem necessum haberet in hospitio pernoctare, hospitem rusticum non incuriosum crebra secum colloquia miscentem, & de Origine Papatu, vitæ in primis Monastica, quam ille pro simplicitate sua ex Paradiso arcessendam ridiculè sustinuerit, anxie inquirentem, ansam sibi libros de Origine errorum scribendi præbuisse (6). He considered that the Papists, when defeated by the holy Scriptures, had recourse to tradition; and were for ever vaunting their antiquity, and despised the Protestants for their being so modern. Now Hospinian, to deprive the Papists of this sanctuary, searched into the rise and progress of the Romish doctrines and ceremonies; and by what gradations the truth, which had been taught by Christ and his Apostles, had given way to innovations. Impetum concepit animo suo plane heroicum, & laude nunquam intermoritura dignissimum fidei illius vetustatis spectrum debellandi, Gibonitasque artes & fraudes, monstratis genuinis errorum, qui paulatim Ecclesiam inundaverant, originibus detegendi, convellendique. Et magnæ quidem molis, immensæque laboris opus aggrediebatur, cum de cælesti doctrina, & ceremoniis veræ primitivæ Ecclesiæ, tum de inclinatione & depravatione ejusdem doctrinæ, deque ceremoniarum mutatione, autione, & progressu iis seculis, quæ Christum & Apostolos primum, deinde verò Constantinum Imperatorem, imprimis autem Gregorium M. secutæ sunt (7). i. e. "He meditated a design that was truly heroic, and worthy of immortal honour, viz. of subduing that spectre of fictitious antiquity; and of discovering and rooting out all their gibberish arts and frauds, by exhibiting the real and genuine origin of those errors, which overspread the church by insensible degrees. And indeed the work in question was of vast importance and of immense labour, it being to treat, not only of the celestial doctrine, and the ceremonies of the truly primitive church;

(5) Heidegger, ibid.

(6) Ibid. pag. 2.

(7) Ibid. pag. 11.

plan of a work, which might shew the Roman Catholics, that it is idle in them to boast of the conformity of their doctrines to antiquity. He could not complete his work, but then he published considerable parts of it [D], which gained him great reputation; and obliged his Superiors to take him out of the dust of the schools, in order to fix him in a higher station. He was appointed Arch-deacon of Caroline Church the 25th of September 1588; six years after which he was appointed Minister of the Abbey Church; a function, which was so much the more commodious, as it did not prevent much his continuing the great work he had in view. The work he published on the Eucharist, and that which he intitled, Concordia discors, exasperated the Lutherans in a high degree. They exasperated him by their answers [E], to which he did not finish his reply, because

“ church; but likewise of the decay and corruption of that doctrine, as well as of the change, increase and progress of these ceremonies; first in those ages which followed our Saviour and his Apostles, and then in those which followed the Emperor Constantine, but particularly in those ages which came after Gregory the Great.” He intended to write chiefly concerning Baptism, the Eucharist, Churches, Feasts, Fasts, Orders, Monks, the Pope’s Primacy, and Burials (8). He also began to write the Lives of the Popes, and some animadversions on Gratian. Anti-Gratianum insuper moliebatur, quo demonstrare instituerat, Gratianum in suo Decreto multa falsa, pugnancia, commentitia & nota recitare, tum vero impudenter, fallaciter, malitiose & impie corrumpere (9). He was above forty one years of age when he meditated this vast design.

(8) Heidegger, ibid.(9) Idem, ibid.

[D] . . . he published considerable parts of it.] Here follows a catalogue of the books he published. The first was an Oration of origine & progressu Rituum & Ceremoniarum Ecclesiasticarum. He spoke it in an academical assembly, and printed it in 1585. Two years after he published his Treatise de Tempis, hoc est de origine, progressu, usu, & abusu Templorum, ac omnino rerum omnium ad Tempia pertinentium. In 1603 he published a second edition of it, not only corrected, but also greatly augmented; he adding to it a confutation of the arguments which Bellarmine and Baronius had alledged, in behalf of those of their party on that subject, since the first edition. In 1588 he published a Treatise de Monachis, seu de origine & progressu Monachatus ac Ordinum Monasticorum, Equitum militarium tam sacrorum quam secularium omnium. He published a second edition of it in 1609, in which he confuted Bellarmine’s book de Monachis, published since the first edition of his work. In 1589 he was just going to publish a Treatise de origine & progressu Fejuniorum, when he found by a work of Bellarmine just printed, that this Jesuit promised to write a book on that subject; for which reason he suspended the publication of his work, till he might annex to it a confutation of what Bellarmine should alledge. However, having applied himself to other matters in the mean time, he never completed that treatise. These other matters were the Feasts or Holy Days, on which he published two volumes, the first in 1592, and the second in 1593. The first Treatise, de Festis Judæorum & Ethnicorum, hoc est de origine, progressu, ceremoniis, & ritibus festorum dierum Judæorum, Græcorum, Romanorum, Turcarum, & Indianorum. He printed it in 1611, with several corrections and additions. The second volume treats de origine, progressu, ceremoniis, & ritibus festorum dierum Christianorum. He printed it in 1612, with considerable supplements, which were of use to refute Bellarmine upon the idolatry of the church of Rome, and James Gretser on Corpus Christi day. In 1598 he published the first volume of his Historia Sacramentaria: Hoc est libri quinque de Cæna Dominiæ prima institutione, ejusque vero usu & abusu in primitiva Ecclesia, nec non de origine, progressu, ceremoniis, & ritibus Missæ, Transsubstantiationis, & aliorum pæne insinuatorum Errorum, quibus Cæna prima institutio horribiliter in Papatu polluta & profanata est. i. e. “ Five books relating to the institution of the Lord’s Supper, and of its true use and abuse in the primitive church; also concerning the origin, progress, ceremonies and rites of the Mass, of Transubstantiation, and almost numberless multitude of errors, whereby the primitive institution of the Lord’s Supper has been horribly polluted and profaned in the Romish church.” Four years after he published the second volume of this History, containing the contests that have been carried on between those of the Aufburg Confession, and other Protestants, with regard to the Lord’s Supper. This work is intitled, de origine & progressu Controversiæ Sacramentariæ de Cæna Domini inter Lutheranos & Orthodoxos quos Zwinglianos & Calvinistas vocant exortæ, ab anno Christi Salvatoris 1517 usque ad annum 1602. i. e. “ Concerning the origin and progress of the Sacramentarian Controversy, with regard to the Lord’s Supper, between the Lutherans and those of the orthodox faith called Zwinglians and Calvinists, from the year of our Lord 1517, till 1602.” In 1607 he published a work intitled, Concordia discors, seu de origine & progressu Formulæ Concordiæ Bergenfis. i. e. “ The discording Concord, or of the rise and progress of the Formulary of the Concord of Berg.” In 1619 he published a work against the Jesuits: Historia Jesuitica, hoc est de origine, regulis, constitutionibus, privilegiis, incrementis, progressu, & propagatione Ordinis Jesuitarum, item de eorum dolis, fraudibus, imposturis, nefariis facinoribus, cruentis consiliis, falsa quoque seditiosa & sanguinolenta doctrina (10). i. e. “ A History of the Jesuits, that is, of the origin, rules, constitution, privileges, increase, progress and propagation of the Order of Jesuits; also of their treacheries, frauds, impostures, wicked crimes, and bloody counsels; their false, seditious, and bloody doctrine.” Here he put an end to his compositions, being resolved to spend his life hereafter in nothing but prayer, in the perusal of good books, and in pious meditations.

[E] Two of his works . . . exasperated the Lutherans in a high degree. They exasperated him by their answers.] The History of the Sacramentarian War between the Lutherans and Calvinists, and the History of the Formulary of Concord, shew so much confusion, so much passion, shuffling, and cavilling on the Lutheran side, that it would have been a miracle had not these two books exasperated the Saxon Divines in a furious manner. In Saxony they choose to refute Hospinian, a man who was fit to dazzle and impose on the public; a man, I say, who treated his adversaries in the most contemptuous manner, and assumed a magisterial air. Nothing is so well adapted as this, to conceal the bad or weak sides of a cause. Historiæ Sacramentariæ pars posterior & concordia illa discors vehementer eos, qui Lutheranorum partium asseclas se professi sunt, urebant; qui eorum operum vim Chrysippeis sophismatis, & tortuosis argutiis, acribusque diceriis convellere maximopere laborabant. Constat autem, utriusque operis refutandi in Saxonici oris negotium Leonardo Huttero, Wittebergenfi Professori, homini arroganti & prave facundo, datum esse. Et primum quidem Ann. M. DC. XI. personatus ille, uti prudenter conjectabam, prodiit, larva scilicet assumpta cujusdam Christophori à Vallo, S. Theologiæ Candidati, sub qua adversus ea, quæ Hospinianus in Annalibus Sacramentariis ad annum M. DC. XI. (11) gesta prodidit, vernacula scriptione ingenii sui libidinem procaciter satis exercuit (12). i. e. “ The second part of the Sacramentarian History, and the discording Concord, greatly exasperated the Lutherans, who employed their utmost endeavours to defeat the effect they might have, by sophistry, cavilling, and scoffing. It is certain that the task of refuting them both was given to Leonard Hutterus, Professor at Wittenberg, a man whose wit was of an arrogant and peevish cast. He first appeared in public in the year 1611, disguised, as was well conjectured, under the name of Christopher à Vallo, student in Divinity. In this fictitious dress he haughtily exercised the licentiousness of his wit, in his native tongue, against those particulars which are con-

(10) Extracted from his Life wrote by Heidegger.

(11) This is an error of the press, it should be M. D. XXIX.

(12) Heidegger in Vita Hospiniani, pag. 22.

cause he was sensible that the common enemies of the Protestant Faith were too much diverted with such a scene; but he turned his arms against the Jesuits. I don't doubt but that some Princes were pleased that he had suppressed his reply [F]. He was deprived of his sight for near a year, by a cataract, notwithstanding which he preached as usual; but he was happily couched the 18th of September 1613. At threecore and sixteen years

"tained in Hospinian's Sacramentarian History, till "the year 1529." The instant David Pareus had seen this first work of Hutterus (13), he gave Hospinian notice of it, and advised him to draw up an Answer in the German language, without waiting till his adversary should finish his confutation. Adversus Commentarium tuum alterum de re sacramentaria, nec non Concordiam discordem comperimus, mandatum ex aula Saxonica D. Huttero datum, historiam tuam ut refutaret. Laborasse etiam illum ea in re ex domesticis meis studiosis cognovi. His nudinis Lipsensibus prodiit Germanica hæc Historia Sacramentariae consignatio, usque ad annum 29 deducta. Credo vobis non esse visam. Auctor magna pollicetur, & triumphus est, ut audio, nostris vicinis, &c. Percurri librum. Præter magnifica mendacia nihil video novi. Suaferim ut vestigia hujus scriptoris, qui haud dubiè est ille Hutterus, premas illico, neque expectes, dum tota moles te opprimat. Feceris magnum operæ pretium Germanicè respondendo (14). i. e. "I am

(13) It is to be observed that some say, that Christophorus Wilhelmus à Vallo, was Chr. Wilh. Walpurgus, a Divine of Leisfic. See Mollerus, Isagoge Hist. Oberjonesi Cimbricæ, Part 3. pag. 133.

(14) Heidegg. in Vita Hospiniani, pag. 22.

"of Saxony, to answer the second part of your Sacramentarian History, and your discording Concord; and some students who lodge with me, say, that he has been employed for some time in it. The German refutation of this Sacramentarian History, continued to the year 1529, was published last Leipzig fair. I believe you have not seen that piece. The author promises mighty things; and it is said that our neighbours triumph upon it, &c. I have perused the book, and find nothing new in it, but notorious falsehoods. I would advise you to tread close upon the heels of this writer, who doubtless is the abovementioned Hutterus; and not wait till you are oppressed with the whole load. It would be of great use to answer him in the German language." Hospinian immediately drew up a reply, but did not publish it. Non defuit bonæ causæ Hospinianus, utpote qui . . . personato larvam egregiè detraxit, adornata scriptione vernacula, quo & historia à se consignatæ veritatem in arce collocavit, & adversantis vanitatem solidè detexit. Neque tamen responsio ihibet, omnibus numeris absoluta, lucem vidit (15). In 1614 a new work of Hutterus was published, entitled Concordia concors, seu de origine & progressu formulæ Concordiæ Ecclesiarum Confessoris Augustanæ. i. e. "Concording Concord; or, concerning the origin and progress of the Formula of Concord of the Churches of the Aufburg confession." In this work Hutterus undertook to deprive Hospinian of all the reputation he might have gained, either with respect to learning or candor. Quo quantum de libro ipso, tantundem de eruditionis, candoris & judicis Hospiniani fama, suæque Ecclesiæ infamia se detrabere posse speravit. Opus ipsum haud exiguè molis, & multa πολλὰς Φαρλασίας prodiit, ast si inanem verborum strepitum, & rerum, convitiatorum, splendida-rumque calumniarum tumorem ei demeres, tantum non ad incitas redigi, atque in nihilum recidere liquebat (16). i. e. "Wherein he hoped to take as much from the

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Idem, pag. 24.

"fame of Hospinian's erudition, candor and judgment, and from the infamy of his own Church, as he could detract from the book in question. This work, which was of no inconsiderable size, made its appearance with mighty pomp; but should we substract or take from it the empty sound of high-flown words, and the idle reproaches, and slanders, it would be reduced to a very narrow compass." Hospinian's friends advised him to draw up an answer immediately, and to humble his adversary's pride. Sine mora reprimendam exultantem hominis audaciam (17). He immediately took up the pen, and set about an answer, but never finished it. Heidegger assures us that this is an excellent work. In all probability the author was disheartened, because he had to do with so abusive an enemy. He also was afraid of affording the Jesuits too great a farce, in case he should still carry on the civil war; but however this be, his work was never published. Neque tamen opus isthoc ad metam perduxit, seu tædio victus est male-dicentiæ adversarii, qui nescio quibus agitatus furis ubi-

que insultare, quàm cum ratione quadam disputare maluit; seu fastidium subitit ducendi junem molestæ ad eam contentionis, qua non tantum animos veritatis suæ copîa sauciatos ægroque magis exulceratum iri, sed etiam capitales religionis hostes, Jesuitas cumprimis, inaususti certaminis illius futuros spectatores avidissimos, delicias jucundo ejusmodi spectaculo sibi facturos . . . metuit (18). (18) Idem, ibid.

[F] I do not doubt but that some Princes were pleased that he had suppressed his reply.] About the time that Hospinian printed his Concordia discors, Frederic IV, Elector Palatine, wrote to the magistrates of Zurich, concerning a conference that was negotiating between the Lutherans and Calvinists, to search out expedients for an accommodation which might serve as a league among the Protestant Princes, against the bloody designs of the Jesuits. For this reason Hospinian was thought to have published his book very unseasonably. He justified himself as to that affair in the best manner he could, in a letter which he wrote to Maurice Landgrave of Hesse. He says, that though these conferences are only apt to inflame the wound, as has been often found by experience, he yet would have suspended the impression of his work, or even kept it in manuscript in his closet, had he known the intention of the Princes. Libri intempestivi editi culpam, . . . sic studiose amolitur, ut simul de institutis ejusmodi Colloquiis sententiam graviter proferat hunc ferè in modum: Etsi ego de hujusmodi colloquio nihil boni polliceri possim, & majores animorum distractiones & conturbationes, odia item, contentiones, ac dissidia post illud nocentissima vehementer metuum, præsertim si mecum reputem, quæ Marpurgensè, Maulbrunnensè, Mompeigardensè, & Ratisbonensè colloquia secuta sint; & adversarii palam protestentur, se non dicere, sed docere, & ne in minimo quidem articulo sententiam mutare, sed in semel concepta opinione firmiter permanere velle: nihilominus editionem hujus libri vel in aliud tempus rejecissem, ac reservâssem; vel, si ex usu ecclesiæ fuisset, prorsus suppressissem, si hoc consilium & institutum Illustriss. Principum vel ante semestrem mihi cognitum fuisset, ne illud impedivisse accusari meritò possem (20). i. e. "He apologizes (20) Vita Hospiniani, pag. 21. for his having published his book so unseasonably; and at the same time gravely delivers his opinion, with regard to such sort of conferences, as follows. Though I myself cannot hope for any good from such a conference, but am prodigiously afraid that it will be followed by still greater distractions of men's minds, stronger hatred, contentions, and most dangerous divisions; particularly when I reflect on what were the consequences of the conferences at Marpurg, Maulbrun, Montbeliard, and Ratisbon; and that the adversaries protest publicly, that they will teach but not learn; that they will not alter their opinion in the least article, but adhere stedfastly to the principles they first imbibed: nevertheless I would have suspended the publication of this book for some time; or, had it been of advantage to the Church, would have suppressed it intirely, had I but known the intention of these illustrious Princes six months ago, in order that I might not be justly accused of hindering it." The fear he was under lest he should displease some Princes, and expose great numbers to very grievous dangers, obliged him not to insert in his work all he knew. (21) Fassus est in- (21) In Literis ad genue, operi illi de Concordia discorde, deesse plurima: Wolfbangum Amlingum, Ecclesiæ Servianæ manus suas plura non pervenerint; tum quod nonnulla de-Pastorem & Sum-dita opera, omitti consultius visum sit, propter ad-perintendentem, monitionem ex aula potente insinuatam, ut in scribenda die 22 Aug. ea historia caute circumspicteque agat, si quid secretorum ex cameris Principum, præsertim vero exori Saxonicis habeat. Fore alioquin, ut res hæc ingenti periculo 1607.

(e) Extracted from his Life wrote by John Henry Heidegger, and prefixed to the edition of his works printed in 1681.

years of age he grew childish; and continued in that wretched condition till his death, which happened the 11th of March 1626, he being then in his threescore and nineteenth year. The public had entertained so high an idea of his learning from his writings; that he was exhorted from all quarters to refute Baronius's Annals; and no one was thought to have greater abilities for such a task (e). A new edition of his works was published at Geneva in the year 1681, in seven volumes in folio [G].

(22) I fancy it is an error of the press for Peuceri-ani.

non careat, propter orthodoxos iis in locis suspectos, ne cum iis ludus Crellianus vel Procerianus (22) ludatur. i. e. He frankly owned, that many things were wanting in the Discordant Concord; however, that this was no way his fault, but was partly occasioned, because many particulars never came to his knowledge; and because he had thought it more advisable to omit certain things on account of an admonition which had been sent him from a very powerful Court, viz. that it would be proper for him to act very cautiously in composing that History, in case he had got any secrets from the cabinets of Princes, particularly those who sided with Saxony. That otherwise, this might be of very dangerous tendency with respect to the welfare of such of the orthodox as might be suspected in those places, and the Crellian and Procerian game might be played a second time." It is therefore probable enough, that he laid aside his answer, because, among other reasons, he should be considered as the cause of an Ecclesiastical War, which might prevent the several Protestant powers from pursuing, in concert, their common interest (23). We may be very well assured, that both the Lutheran and Calvinist Princes of the Empire were highly pleased at his continuing silent; for we are told by the history of that period, that the quarrels between Divines perplexed Princes very much; and they every now and then, even to this day, cause the greatest uneasiness to magistrates in several Imperial cities. Was not Hamburg lately (24) involved in great troubles, occasioned by the contests and disputes of the Clergy, which divided the people, and occasioned seditious assemblies? An end is very seldom put to these contests, except by the exile of him whose faction is weakest; so that, if one might dare to employ comparisons, it might be said that the quarrels in question are like those of two bulls who fight for a heifer; the weaker bull runs away and hides himself.

(23) Heidegger, in Vita Hospiniani, pag. 21.

(24) About two or three years ago, the Flemish Newspapers spoke of nothing else. I write this in Sept. 1695.

Nec mos bellantes una stabulare: sed alter Vitus abit, longeque ignotis exulat oris, Multa gemens ignominiam, plagasque superbi Victoris, tum quos amisti inultus amores: Et stabula aspectans regnis excessit avitis (25).

(25) Virgil. Georg. lib. 3. vers. 224.

"Nor when the war is over, is it peace;
"Nor will the vanquished bull his claim release:
"But finding in his breast his antient fires,
"And cursing fate, from his proud foe retires.
"Driven from his native land, to foreign grounds,
"He with a generous rage reforms his wounds;
"His ignominious flight, the victor's boast,
"And more than both, the lives, which unreveng'd
"he lost.
"Often he turns his eyes, and, with a groan,
"Surveys the pleasing kingdoms once his own.
Dryden.

Perhaps the reason I took notice of, might oblige Hospinian not to complete his History of the Reformation, projected in Saxony under the Elector Christian. Some

HOSPITAL (MICHAEL DE L'), Chancellor of France in the seventeenth Century, was one of the greatest men of his age. He was of Auvergne; and of a family not very considerable. He raised himself by degrees [A], and was Counsellor in the Parliament

[A] He was of Auvergne, and of a family not very considerable. He raised himself by degrees.] His father was a Physician, and in that quality served the Constable Charles de Bourbon. He never abandoned him, attending him in disguise, sharing in all his misfortunes, seconding him in all his designs against the King, against the Emperor, and against Rome, the Cardinals, and the Pope himself (1). When he followed him in his re-

(1) Nouvé, Coqs d'Etat, cap. 5. pag. 287.

Memoirs had been communicated to him, which might have exasperated his successors. The title of this History was to have been as follows. Christianus redivivus, hoc est, de ortu & progressu susceptæ a Christiano-Electore Saxonie Ecclesiarum & Scholarum in Saxonia superiore Reformationis Historia, ex actis & originalibus, ut sint optimi Principis defuncti vindiciæ perennes, fideliter congesta, & tribus libris comprehensa (26). i. e. "Christianus redivivus, that is, a History of the rise and progress of the Reformation of the Churches and Schools in upper Saxony, begun by Christian Elector of Saxony. Faithfully taken from originals and authentic papers, that they may serve for ever as a lasting apology for that best of Princes. In three books." Heidegger says as follows, concerning the memoirs which had been furnished. Grande scilicet volumen ex Saxonia submissum in hæredum manibus versatur, quo Christiani Electoris illius Principis & pietissimi & fortissimi, dicere crebrò soliti: Ego nec Calvinianus sum, nec Flaccianus, sed Christianus. Habent Flacciani suum Cœium, in quo etiam ipsum orcum collocant; Ephemerides accuratissime texuntur, & instituta ab ipso Ecclesiarum Saxonicarum Reformatio, subita & improvisa ejus morte interrupta, plenissime exponitur, ex quibus, aliisque etiam irrefragabilibus monumentis Christianum illum redivivum orbi Christiano, non parum arte pia Principis illius meditata admiratur, representare statuerat (27). i. e. "His heirs are possessed of a large volume, sent him from Saxony, wherein are very accurately drawn up the annals of Christian, that most pious and most courageous Prince, who used often to say; I am neither a Calvinist, nor a Flaccian, but a Christian. The Flaccians have their heaven, wherein they place even hell itself. This work contains likewise a complete History of the Reformation of the Saxon Churches, begun by our author, but interrupted by this sudden and unexpected death, from which, and several other indisputable authorities, he intended to exhibit his Christianus redivivus to the Christian world, which could not have failed greatly to admire the pious designs of that Prince."

(26) Heidegger, in Vita Hospiniani, pag. 22.

(27) Idem, ibid.

[G] A new edition of his works was published at Geneva, in the year 1681, in seven volumes in folio.] The editors did not insert any tract of the author, but what had been completed by him. His heirs have followed very religiously his intentions, they not being willing to communicate them to the public, but only furnished a few remarks, which the author had added to his works after they were in print. Neque contemnenda etiam illa quæ inchoata & affecta, quod nondum justus ordo, lima & colophon iis adhibita, ultimaque manu necdum perpolita essent, neque ipse superstes prodire passus est, ceu imparia sustinendæ famæ nominis sui; neque præter ejus voluntatem & consilium hæredes, cimetiorum istorum custodes, edere voluerunt (28). We are told in his life, what pieces he had advanced very far in, as well as those that were but just sketched by him; circumstances which represent him as a very learned and very laborious writer.

(28) Idem, ibid. pag. 11.

He left "in France all his children, both sons and daughters, who being very young could not bear the fatigues of such a journey. Our Michael was at Toulouse, and aged eighteen years; and though he lived there on no other account than that of his studies, he was seized upon suspicion, and committed to the public prison till there was an express command from the King to release

Parliament of Paris, when the Princess Margaret, sister to King Henry II, having had the Duchy of Berri settled on her, chose him for her Chancellor (a). He continued in the same post under her in Italy after she had married the Duke of Savoy, and he was at Nice, when he was raised to the dignity of Chancellor of France under King Francis II in the year 1560 (b). It was thought that the Guises had procured him this post, and that they did it with no other view, but that they imagined, as he had an obligation to them [B], he would do whatever they should desire. They were mistaken; for he proposed as his maxim the good of the Kingdom and the true interests of the King his master. It is true, he was obliged to use address [C]; for if he should have openly opposed the designs of the Guises, he would not have been in a situation to remedy the confusions of France. It was necessary for him therefore to swim between two streams, and by

(a) Pasquier, Lettres, lib. 22. pag. 758. of the second tome.

(b) La Planche, Hist. de François II, pag. m. 228.

(2) Thevet, Elog. tom. 7. pag. 363. edit. in 12mos. He has taken this, as he owns, from the will of the Chancellor l'Hospital. See the Bibliothèque Colbertine of Colomiés, pag. 53.

(3) Ibid. pag. 369.

(4) Ibid. What he says is to be found in the Chancellor's will. See the Bibliothèque Colbertine of Colomiés, pag. 53.

(5) Observe that there is a mistake with regard to the time in Moreri, where we are told, that he was Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris in 1524, and that his post of Chancellor to the Princess Margaret was posterior to all the rest except that of Chancellor of France.

(6) Thevet, Elog. tom. 7. pag. 371.

(7) Testam. de l'Hospital, cited by Colomiés, Biblioth. Colbertine, pag. 55.

(8) Belcarius, lib. 28. num. 57.

(9) Varillas, Hist. de l'Hérésie, lib. 22. pag. m. 170. Dutch edit. He has taken this from Beaucaire, lib. 28. num. 57.

(10) Hist. de François II, pag. m. 194.

(11) Teissier, Addit. aux Elog. tom. 1. pag. 396. edit. 1690.

(12) Ibid. tom. 2. pag. 413. edit. 1683.

“ release him, that he might pursue his studies, since he was not found engaged in any design, that could render him criminal (2).” He went to see his father at the time, when the Constable being returned found affairs much embarrassed there (3); for Francis I had laid siege to Milan (4): and “ because this siege would probably last long, that Physician fearing left his son, by too great a discontinuance, should make a dangerous breach in his studies, ordered some Couriers to take him away with them from Milan disguised like a Muletier; and he passed, not without great danger of his life, the river Abdua, and afterwards went to Padua, where from all antiquity the study of law had flourished. In this University his father left him for the space of six years, and then sent him to Bologna and Rome, where he was honoured with the place of Judge, under the title of Auditor of the Rota. But resigning this by the advice of his father on account of the promises made to him by the Cardinal de Grandmont of advancing him to the highest posts in his country, he was disappointed of his expectations both ways; for the post of Auditor was given to another person; and the sudden death of the Cardinal de Grandmont frustrated the hopes, which had engaged him to return to France. Being in this situation he applied himself to the Bar, where he had not continued three years before he married Mary Morin, daughter of the Lieutenant Criminal Morin, who brought for a portion the place of Counsellor in the Parliament (5), which he held about nine years, and afterwards was sent Ambassador to Bologna for King Henry, where the general Council of all the Bishops had been appointed in order for some reformation.” Thevet adds, that he was afterwards Chancellor to the Duches of Berri, and then “ Head and Superintendent of the Finances of his Majesty in his Chamber of Accounts, and after the death of King Henry was chosen of the Privy Council (6).” Observe, that his father, after the Constable's death, followed some time the Court of the Emperor Charles V (7), and afterwards entering into the service of the sister of his first Patron René de Bourbon, wife of Anthony Duke of Lorraine, spent there the rest of his life (8). He has been represented as the son of a man, who was born, and always lived, and died a Jew in the city of Avignon (9). Mr. Varillas, from whom I borrow these words, remarks in another place (10), that Michael de l'Hospital's father was a Jew. He is very subject to this kind of confusion. Monsieur Teissier assures us, that Mr. de Mezerai relates, that the Chancellor's father was son of a Physician to a Queen of Navarre, wife of Anthony de Bourbon (11). He cites (12) page 1156 of the second Tome of Mezerai's History of France. I find nothing relating to the Chancellor l'Hospital in the second Tome to that author. I only see in page 22 of the third Tome, that he was the son of the Physician to Renée de Bourbon, wife of Anthony de Lorraine.

[B] It was thought, that the Guises had procured him this post, and that they did it with no other view but that they imagined, as he had an obligation to them, &c.] Lewis Regnier Sieur de la Planche relates, that after the death of the Chancellor Olivier they offered his post to Morvilliers Counsellor in the Privy Council, and Bishop of Orleans. . . a servant very zealously attached to their family, and that they artfully served themselves by his refusal. “ For imagining that they could make better use of Michael de l'Hospital, brought up, advanced, and formed by their hand, they took Morvilliers at his word, and sent for the other from Nice, where he was Chancellor to the Duches of Savoy, who was given to understand that the King “ out of regard to her would take her Chancellor for his own (13).” But other Historians say that the Queen-Mother was the real cause of this choice, being urged to it by the Duches of Montpensier, who designed to lay an obstacle in the way of the ambition of the Guises. See the article of LONGVIC (14). Thuanus (15) adds, that when they agreed to this choice the affair was already concluded, and that Catherine de Medicis informed Monsieur de l'Hospital, that it was not at their recommendation, but at hers, that the King had honoured him with that dignity; and that therefore she hoped to see him more attached to the interests of his Prince and those of the Queen-Mother, than to those of that family, whose ambition was detested by the whole world. The same Historian observes, that it was the more easy for the Queen-Mother to succeed, because Monsieur de l'Hospital was very much in favour with the Cardinal of Lorraine. Remark, that Mr. Teissier is mistaken in saying under the quotation of the twenty fourth book of Thuanus, that Catherine de Medicis obliged Henry II to make Michael de l'Hospital Chancellor of France (16). He should have said Francis II.

(13) La Planche, Hist. de François II, pag. m. 228.

(14) Remark [1].

(15) Thuanus, lib. 25. sub fin.

(16) Teissier, Addit. aux Elog. tom. 1. pag. m. 396.

[C] He was obliged to use address.] Let us again make use of the Sieur de la Planche for a Commentator upon this text. “ As to the Chancellor de l'Hospital, few persons were pleased at first to see him raised to that dignity, who had been so familiar with the Cardinal (17); so that it was supposed, that he would not venture to contradict him in any thing, having received so many favours and preferments from him. But as he knew the disposition of the Guises, having had long experience of it, he was dextrous enough to prevent their stratagems, if not as he ought, at least as he could, considering the iniquity of the time, warding off their most furious blows with a peculiar industry. For having resolved as soon as he was settled in his post to proceed in a right course like a prudent man, and not to favour either one party or the other, and by this means to serve his King and country, he was obliged to make use of wonderful address in order to restrain the house of Lorraine within their proper bounds. This he was desirous to perform in such a manner, that they might not perceive, that he designed in any point to oppose or displease them, knowing, that if they once conceived such an opinion of him, he should be able to do nothing of consequence. Thus with a great deal of dissimulation many things passed through his hands, which were thought to be of a very dangerous nature. Notwithstanding this he kept a medium, giving hopes to those who loved the public interest, that every thing at last would turn to its advantage, provided he was suffered to bring it about. Few people understood his intention; but time shewed, that he had pursued the service of the King and the safety of the people in a way quite different from what had been imagined. And to speak the truth, his prudent management cannot be sufficiently display'd. For certainly, though if he had taken a shorter way in opposing resolutely what was wrong, he would have been more to be commended, and God perhaps would have blessed his constancy; yet as far as we may judge, he alone, by his moderate conduct, was the instrument made use of by God to stop those impetuous waves, which would have drowned all France; and yet the outward appearances were against this. In short, when he was put in mind of any approaching misfortune, he had always this expression in his mouth; patience, patience, all will go well (18).”

(17) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(18) La Planche, Hist. de François II, pag. m. 228.

(19) Remark [1].

(20) Thuanus, lib. 25. sub fin.

(21) Teissier, Addit. aux Elog. tom. 1. pag. m. 396.

(22) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(23) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(24) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(25) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(26) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(27) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(28) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(29) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(30) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(31) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(32) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(33) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(34) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(35) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(36) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(37) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(38) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(39) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(40) Thuanus, lib. 13. sub fin.

(c) Dated in May 1560.

(d) These restrictions displeased the zealous Roman Catholics. See the remark [E] towards the end.

(19) Ibid. pag.
361.

(20) Hist. de
l'Herésie, lib. 22.
pag. 170.

(21) This edict gave the Bishops alone the cognizance of the crime of heresy, and took it away from the King's Judges.

(22) Eloge du Carnet de Montmorency, tom. 2.
of his Mémoires,
pag. 89.

REFLECTION upon moderate measures generally displeasing two opposite parties.

by this management he diverted several storms which threatened the Kingdom, he retarded some others, and found means to do good service to his country as far as the unhappy condition of the time would permit him. He prevented among other things the introduction of the inquisition, by agreeing to an edict (c) much severer against the Protestants than he could have wished [D]. It was that of Romorantin. There is no doubt but that if he had had the whole management of these affairs, he would have procured a full toleration for those of the reformed Religion. His good offices and his address were undoubtedly one of the causes, which changed the disposition of people in their favour; this change was so remarkable, that in the second year of his administration there were almost as many voices for them as against them in the council, which examined the petition, which they presented to the King [E] to desire the free exercise of their religion. His influence was no less effectual in the restrictions of the edict of July 1561 (d), and in the liberty which they had of not observing it (e). The edict of January

(e) See the remark [F] citation (33).

which

[D] He prevented the ... introduction of the inquisition, by agreeing to an edict much severer against the Protestants than he could have wished.] Here is the sequel of the Sieur de la Planche's account (19). "To make short, when the question was about expediting the edict for the Spanish inquisition, he knowing that the members of the Privy Council and the Parliament had agreed to this, moderated the affair by an express edict, and gave such cogent reasons, that the Guises themselves, who had procured the former edict, were of his opinion, and obliged the Spaniards to approve of it, who had been desirous, that France should be regulated after their model. This happened in May in the city of Romorantin, and that edict was ever after called the edict of Romorantin." Mr. Varillas observes (20), that "this moderate conduct displeased the Calvinists, and did not satisfy the Catholics. The Calvinists complained, that those of the opposite party and their irreconcilable enemies were made their Judges (21); and the Catholics suspected from that time that the Chancellor was of the new religion. They reproached him with going to mass merely for form-sake, and used the Chancellor's mass as a proverb to express a mass, which people went to only out of obedience to the King. The House of Guise had not a better opinion of that magistrate, and repented of having contributed with the Dukes of Savoy to the making him what he was. They imagined that this able Politician would endeavour to throw off his dependence on them, by forming at Court a third party with the Queen-Mother, which might balance the other two in such a manner that the one might not supplant the other." This puts me in mind of the following passage in Brantome (22). He was taken for an Huguenot, though he went to Mass; but it was said at Court, God keep us from the Mass of Mons. l'Hospital.

This is the common fate of those, who seek a medium between the pretensions of two opposite parties; they satisfy neither of them. But this inconvenience is sometimes a less evil than accommodating one's self to the passion of one of the parties; and there are many conjunctures, in which the greatest good, which can be done, is to divide the disadvantages, that each may have his share. Our Chancellor would have ruined all, if he had undertaken at first to give full satisfaction to the Guises. This would have been running upon a rock. Prudence required, that he should not attack that faction but by a side-wind; they had the wind in their stern, and it was not proper to steer against that wind. I believe that many Calvinists, who had more zeal than knowledge of the world, always condemned this conduct of the Chancellor. They would have had him declare himself openly and resolutely the protector of their cause: but could he have maintained his post three months together, if he had not used some management? He knew well enough, that the best way of opposing a storm, was that mentioned by Plutarch, when he speaks of the government of commonwealths. "As Mathematicians tell us, that the sun does not absolutely follow the course of the firmament, and yet his motion is not quite opposite or contrary, but declining a little, and taking an oblique course, by this means preserves all things, maintaining the world in proper temperature. So in affairs of government, to oppose upon all occasions, and in all points the inclination of the people is too harsh and severe a method of acting; as on the other hand an easiness to be led away by the disposition of the people is a very dangerous precipice. But the middle way, in submitting sometimes to the humour of the people in order to make them obey in other points, and granting them a thing which is agreeable, in order to demand a thing which is useful, is a safe method of governing men, who are prevailed upon by gentle means to perform a great many things, which they would refuse to do, if they were required in a violent and magisterial way (23)." Our Chancellor was not ignorant of what Cicero observes, that politicians ought to imitate sailors. An, cum videam navem secundis ventis cursum tenentem suum, si non ea eum petat portum, quem ego aliquando probavi, sed alium non minus tutum atque tranquillum, cum tempestate pugnam periculose potius, quam illi salute præsertim proposita obtenturam? et paream? neque enim inconstantis puto sententiam tanquam aliquod navigium, atque cursum ex Reipub. tempestate moderari (24). i. e. "Shall I, when I see a ship carried on by the winds, though it does not go towards the port, which I before desired, but another no less safe and calm, expose myself to danger by contending with the storm, rather than give way to it for my safety? For I do not think it to be the sign of inconstancy to govern one's resolution like a ship, and to steer one's course as the storms which agitate the commonwealth direct." Though he had not the good fortune of that Lepidus, who maintained the esteem of Tiberius by a just medium between low flattery and too great stiffness; yet he deserved the commendation which Tacitus has expressed in this manner. Hunc ego Lepidum, temporibus illis, gravem et sapientem virum fuisse comperio. Nam pleraque ab sævis adulationibus aliorum in melius flexit: neque tamen temperamenti egebat, cum æquali auctoritate et gratia apud Tiberium vigeret. Unde dubitare cogor, sat et forte nascendi, ut cetera, ita principum inclinatio in hos, offensio in illos: an sit aliquid in nostris consiliis, liceatque inter abruptam contumaciam, et deforme obsequium, pergere iter ambitione ac periculis vacuum (25). i. e. "This Lepidus I find to have been a man of gravity and prudence in those times. For he softened and diverted the cruel measures proposed by the flatterers, and yet did not want address enough to preserve still an equal share in Tiberius's favour. This leads me to doubt whether there is not a certain fatality in this, as well as other things, that Princes are inclined toward some persons, and averse to others; or whether this does not depend upon our own management, and we have it not in our power to pursue a course free from ambition and danger by steering between harsh stiffness and mean flattery."

[E] There were as many voices for them as against them in the Council, which examined the petition which they presented to the King.] This particular seems to me curious, and I imagine that the reader will not be displeased to see the circumstances of it here. I make use of the commentary, which a Catholic writer furnishes me with (25). "The Huguenots presented a petition to the King, in order that they might be allowed to have a separate Church from ours. The King referred this petition to the Parliament, to consult about it with the Lords of his Council. They have declared their opinions there on both sides with great freedom; some for the Catholic party, and others for those of the new religion. The Catholics carried it by three voices, it being resolved by them, that in Pbocone, init.

(23) Plutarch,

(24) Cicero, Orat. pro Plancio, cap. 39. pag. m. 619. See also Epist. 9. lib. 2. ad Famil. pag. m.

(25) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 20.

(26) Pasquier, Lett. lib. 4. pag. 196. of the 12th tome.

which they obtained some time after, was undoubtedly his work; now this edict allowed them public assemblies and many other privileges. This was the only remedy for the evils of the Nation; all the shocking misfortunes, which afflicted the Kingdom for thirty years, sprung from the infraction of that edict; and after these dreadful calamities it was necessary to make use of the same remedy in a stronger dose. It was necessary to grant the edict of Nantes, which was much more advantageous to the reformed Church, than that which the Chancellor Hospital had procured for it. But I own likewise, that the Romish Religion did not run so great a risque, when the edict of Nantes was granted, as when he procured the edict of January [F]. The obstacles to be surmounted by him were not removed after he had sealed it; new ones arose upon its being registred

“ that people shall be obliged either to follow the “ Church of Rome like our ancestors, or to leave the “ Kingdom with permission to sell their estates.
 “ When the voices came to be cast up, there was no “ small murmur; because those of the other party “ asserted, that in a point of such importance it was “ not reasonable, that on account of three voices all “ France should be reduced to a flame; as this meth“ od of banishment was impossible to be executed, “ and as besides this, to oblige those, who continued in “ France, to submit to the Romish Religion against “ their conscience, was an absurd attempt, which “ was equal to an impossibility. The Admiral and “ some other Lords cannot be silent. Monsieur de “ Guise on the other hand, though the time “ seemed to oppose his intention, declared openly and “ plainly, that since it had been resolved so, it was “ necessary to stand to that determination, and that “ his sword should never rest in his scabbard, when “ it should be questioned whether that decree was to “ take effect. Things in this contest passed without “ conclusion . . . (27). Afterwards to satisfy both parties “ by a kind of neutrality, there was published an “ edict in July last (28). The zealous Catholics com“ plain of this edict, and say, that those of the new “ or pretended reformed religion being not to be “ searched for in their houses, it is in plain terms “ making the first article of the edict a mere illusion,
 “ and yet releasing them from the power of a magistrate;
 “ which will afterwards occasion an opportunity to “ shake off the yoke entirely from their neck (29).”

[F] The Romish religion did not run so great a risque, when the edict of Nantes was granted, as when he procured the edict of January. Those of the reformed religion were very near gaining the ascendant in the beginning of the reign of Charles IX; and if they had gained it, God knows what would have become of the religion, which had persecuted them under the three preceding reigns. If the King of Navarre, who had declared resolutely for them, had been able to perceive the snare, which the other party had laid for him, he would have continued firm in their communion. Nothing more was wanting to procure them the superiority; for he possessed the post of Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, and it would not have been difficult then to oblige Catherine de Medicis to profess the reformed religion (30). But he suffered himself to be deceived by chimerical hopes; he had not sagacity enough to discover the grossness of the snare: he took the island of Sardinia, a country of banishment, a country miserable and disgraced (31); he took it, I say, so well he knew the map, for one of the fortunate islands mentioned in the fables. Being so grossly imposed upon by these artifices of the Spaniards and the Cardinal Legate, he abandoned the reformed (32). See here how very little was wanting to render them masters. I am going to cite a passage, which will inform us of the interests which they had by his favour among the States of Orleans, and the liberty, which they enjoyed under his protection. They assembled publicly, even in the capital of the Kingdom before there were edicts, which permitted them to do so. But we are to observe, that the Queen Regent, Catherine de Medicis, agreed with the King of Navarre in this point (33). (34) The Huguenots . . . reposed all their confidence in this King (35), as one whom they had supported upon their shoulders, and for whom they had procured the government of France by their intrigues and practices in the assembly of the three States. And indeed as an acknowledgment of this he had by connivance allowed them to preach with the doors open, not only

“ at Paris, but even at the Court of St. German en “ Laye. In truth, it was very difficult for him to “ support himself in his grandeur, except by the means “ of those, who on the other hand received their as“ sistance and support from him. However he chang“ ing his mind, was the first instrument by which the “ Catholics armed themselves against the others. But “ because this is a secret to many persons, and per“ haps you have not heard in what manner these prac“ tices were carried on, you must know, that the “ Pope seeing the measures taken by us, sent the “ Cardinal of Ferrara, uncle to Madam de Guise, “ Legate into France, with very ample powers . . .
 “ (36) We have likewise there the Lord of Charenton-“ neuau, son of the late Chancellor Granvelle. This “ Ambassador of King Philip is said to be gained by “ some of our great Princes, who did not approve “ of this diversity of religions. He, according to “ the agreement between them, went disguised to the “ King of Navarre, assuring him, on the part of his “ master, that as soon as he would undertake the pro“ tection of the Church of Rome, he would restore to “ him the Kingdom of Navarre, or at least an equi“ valent, in as rich and fruitful a country. This “ scheme beginning to work, the Legate applied himself “ on the other hand, and promised on the part of the “ holy see the county of Venaisin, and to obtain for “ him from the Catholic King the island of Sardinia, “ which the Pope would erect into a Kingdom, in case
 “ that King would not restore to him the Kingdom of “ Navarre. It is said, that the Constable and Mar“ shal de St. André used their endeavours to make “ him relish these promises. That this is as true as
 “ the Gospel, I would not venture to assure you;
 “ but the common report was so (37). This I can “ affirm, that in an instant his countenance and dif“ position were seen to be changed with regard to the “ Huguenots. For he forbid the Ministers to preach
 “ at the Castle, as they had taken the liberty to do
 “ five or six months before. Even in the assembly
 “ of St. German, where the cause of the two churches
 “ was debated, he opposed the reformed to the utmost
 “ of his power; but the Prince of Condé, the Ad“ miral, and others, who then enjoyed not the least “ share of the King's favour, opposed him, and car“ ried the point with regard to the publication of the “ edict (38).” The same author proceeds to inform “ us of the prosperity, which the reformed enjoyed, even “ before the edict of January, and while Anthony King
 “ of Navarre favoured them. “ The same day, that is,
 “ the 29th of September 1561, the Queen of Navarre,
 “ in the sight of all the people, caused the marriage “ between young Rohan and the Lady Brabançon, “ niece to Mademoiselle d'Estampes, to be solemnized
 “ by Beza, after the manner of Geneva, at the Bo“ rough of Argenteuil. There were present the “ Prince of Condé and the Admiral. This being “ done without any controul near the gates of Paris,
 “ and St. German en Laye, where the King resided, “ greatly raised the spirits of the Ministers. And in “ fact in October following they preached without the “ walls of Paris, near the Monastery of St. Anthony “ des Champs, between eight and nine thousand per“ sons being present. Upon their return a popular “ sedition was raised, which was easily suppressed by “ the authority of the King of Navarre. They after“ wards proceeded still further. For on the eve of “ All Saints day there was held a public assembly in “ the house of the Countess de Senignan, which was “ guarded by the Provosts of the Marechals and their “ Archers, to prevent any commotion of the people.
 “ A few days after, without confining themselves to
 “ the

(36) Pasquier,
 Lett. tom. 1.
 pag. 219.

(37) This common report was true: the most faithful Historians own it.

(38) That is to say, the edict of January 1562.

(27) Ibid. pag.
 197.

(28) In 1561.

(29) Pasquier,
 pag. 198.

(30) See the remark [B] of the article SOUBISE
 (John &c.)

(31) See above
 the remark [C] of the article
 CHATEL (Tannequi du) and Tacitus, Annal. lib. 2.
 cap. 85.

(32) See the remark [L] of the article HENRY
 IV.

(33) Beze, *Hist.
 des Eglises*, liv.
 4. pag. 670. and
 Beaucaire, lib.
 29. num. 34.
 pag. 966.

(34) Pasquier,
 Lett. liv. 4. pag.
 218. of the 1st
 tome.

(35) That is, the King of France.

registred in Parliament; and he was obliged to make use of the utmost efforts of his genius

(39) Pasquier, lett. tom. 1. lib. 4. pag. 200, 201.

(40) Ibid. pag. 202, 203, & seq.

(41) Lib. 2. pag. 145, 150, 155. edit. Hal. 1698.

(42) Ibid. pag. 155.

(43) In a letter written Jan. 27, 1562, the edict was then made, but not registred) he affirms, that there were present in the assemblies between 30 and 40000 people, and that two or three Ministers were obliged to preach at the same place and time. Ibid. pag. 196.

WHETHER it can be said, that the Reformed behaved in too ostentatious a manner.

“ the edicts of the King, but breaking through that of July, they undertook to preach two sermons alternately, one in the suburbs of St. Marcellus, in the place called the Patriarch, the other without the gate of St. Anthony, in the place called Popincourt. It would be incredible to relate what a multitude of people flocked to those new devotions. Gabaston, Captain of the watch, and his Archers, guarded them. L'Aulnay and l'Estang preached at Popincourt, Malo and Viret at the Patriarch. The Catholic Lords seeing that it was necessary to give way to the storm, Monsieur de Guise in a rage retired to his house at Nanteuil, the Cardinal of Lorraine to his Bishoprick of Reims, Monsieur de Nemoux to Savoy, the Constable to Chantilly, &c. (39).” See in others of Pasquier's Letters (40) the prodigious multitudes which flocked to these assemblies, and the support afforded them by the secular arm. The reader may also consult the Letters of Hubert Languetus (41), where he will find among other things (42), that the assemblies held near Paris consisted sometimes of fifteen thousand persons (43), the women in the midst being surrounded with men on foot, and the latter surrounded by others on horseback; and during the sermon the Governor of Paris caused the avenues to be guarded by soldiers, who beat, or imprisoned, or repressed in any other manner all those, who attempted to disturb the devotions of the assembly.

Many persons, who judge of things only by the event, will be very apt to say, that those of the reformed religion would have acted more prudently, if they had affected less haughtiness at that time, for this ostentation of their numbers was reckoned a bravado, which exasperated their enemies, and induced them to have recourse to the most pressing remedies. We see from a letter of the Cardinal Legate, that he hoped for a fortunate issue of these haughty proceedings. His letter is dated at St. Germain's, February 27, 1562. Here is a passage of it. “ There happened lately a contest between those of the two religions, in which some were left dead upon the place; and yet the danger proved greater than the loss. The Catholics are immediately come hither, to complain of the insolencies of the Huguenots. They have remonstrated, that for their part they had, according to his Majesty's express order, laid down their arms, but that their enemies had done quite the contrary. For this reason they earnestly requested, that they might be permitted to resume them, in order to secure themselves from their ambuscades, which had made them apprehensive, upon good grounds, that being encouraged by these soldiers, they might hereafter do violence to their goods and persons. But the others on their side did not fail to excuse themselves, or to alledge, that the jealousies raised in them every day by the Catholics on account of their great number, were the reasons why they did not lay down their arms. The answer of the King and of Navarre was greatly favourable to those of our party; for they invited them to take courage, and even promised them, that they would take great care to provide for their particular safety, and the common repose of the city. So that after such obliging words from the mouths of their Majesties, by which they declared more affection than was before imagined, they returned fully satisfied. On the contrary the Huguenots were astonished, when they were told in very rough terms, that if they would not be more quiet, and refrain from such violencies, they should be taught how to behave. The King of Navarre went much farther, for he said to the Queen in their presence, that her Majesty needed only to command, and that when she thought proper, she would find means to stop the course of their insolence. I shall add this particular, which is no inconsiderable one, that not only their Majesties, but all other people in general, are greatly scandalized, that Beza goes about Paris, attended constantly by Monsieur d'Andelot, and a great number of Gentlemen. After all, notwithstanding disorders and scandals are almost always prejudicial, they sometimes produce

“ this advantage, that by raising the resentments of the great men, they engage them in generous enterprises. This leads me to think, that we ought so much the less to be uneasy at this, since it is probable, that in the temper in which the minds of the most powerful men now are, these disorders will immediately fall on the heads of those, who occasion them (44).” However let us observe to these Critics, that it was very natural for those, who had groaned near forty years under so severe and cruel an oppression, to make a full use of their liberty, and to spread like waters upon the opening of the sluices. There were even reasons of prudence, which might urge them to this conduct. They might reasonably imagine, that it would be thought necessary to treat well a party, whose power would appear formidable. Lastly, I observe, that neither the Ministers nor private persons could prevent Monsieur d'Andelot, and other brave men of quality, from mixing with their zeal for religion the airs of Soldiers and Gentlemen, which courage and habit made them assume. However that be, the other church escaped narrowly; for if notwithstanding the desertion of the King of Navarre, the Protestants supported very well the first war, what would not they have done under the protection of the Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, which would undoubtedly have procured that of the Queen-Mother? Languetus informs us of the good opinion one might have of their forces. Re patefacta plerique nostrorum venerunt armati ad Concionem, & jam idem quotidie faciunt, & inter reliquos studiosi magno numero. Iis præbent se Duces Dandelotus Frater Admirali, Princeps de Roban, & Frater nobis Reginae Scotiae, ac alii illustribus familiis nati, quod, meo judicio, non faciunt sine consensu Reginae: aliter enim graviter peccarent in lege regni. Monmorantio causis præsertim mandatum est, ut huc inducat, præsidii causa, duas alas equitum, & certum numerum peditum, quibus præerit Dandelotus. Interea autem dum isti milites præsidarii expectantur, nobilitas & studiosi funguntur eorum officio, & tota urbs armis perstrepsit. Pontificii desperant fere de reliquis urbibus Galliae, sed existimant summam rerum in hoc consistere, ut hanc sibi addictam retineant. Verum ita crescunt hic studia factionum, ut verear, ne eam omnium primam amittant. Quamvis enim à partibus eorum sint plures Cardinales, Episcopi, Abbates, Præsides, Assessores, & alii, qui opibus & auctoritate valeant; nostri tamen viribus & ferocia videntur esse potiores, & si ad vim deveniat, totius ipsorum sapientiae nullus erit usus. Mihi venit in mentem factum dictum Ludovici 12 Regis Galliae, cui suscepturo bellum adversus Venetos, cum quidam dicerent fore periculosum illud bellum propter eximiam Venetorum sapientiam obruam: ego, inquit, multitudine studentum ipsorum sapientiam obruam. . . . Hæri hic celebrarunt Jubileum, ex mandato Legati Pontificii: nostri vero convenerunt (ut existimo) ad quadraginta milia, & præcipuas plateas urbis armatis compleverunt. Tres concionatores tantæ multitudini vix sufficiebant (45). i. e.

“ The thing being discovered, and most of our party came armed to the sermon, they now do the same every day, and among the rest a great number of students. They are headed by Monsieur d'Andelot, brother of the Admiral, the Prince of Rohan, and the bastard-brother of the Queen of Scotland, and others of noble families; and this they do, in my opinion, not without the consent of the Queen; for otherwise they would greatly offend against the laws of the Kingdom. Montmorency, Governor of the City, has been ordered to bring hither, as a guard, two squadrons of horse and a certain number of foot, which will be commanded by d'Andelot. But while these guards are expected, the Gentlemen and Students supply their place, and the whole City resounds with arms. The Papists despair almost of the rest of the Cities of France; but think the whole affair turns upon retaining this City in obedience to them. But the other party gains so much ground here, that I am apprehensive, the Papists will lose it first of all. For though the Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots, Presidents, Assessors, and others eminent for their riches and authority adhere to them; yet our party seems superiour in strength and resolution,

(44) Negotiation, ou Lettres d'Affaires ecrites au Pape Pie IV, & au Cardinal Borromée, par Hippolyte d'Est, Cardinal de Ferrare, Legat en France, pag. 93.

(45) Hub Languet. Epist. 70. lib. 2. pag. 207, 208. It is dated at Paris in March 1562. See also the 67th Letter of that book.

genius and the resolution of his mind, to surmount the scruples and ill humour of the Parliament of Paris [G]. The speeches which he made in order to inspire a spirit of toleration rendered him very much suspected to the Roman Catholics, and extremely odious to the Court of Rome [H]; and because he was perpetually declaring against a civil war, he was prevented from being present at the councils of war (f). He appeared

(f) See the remark [H] citation (*).

“and if the affair comes to force, all their wisdom will be of no use. There comes into my mind a witty saying of Lewis XII, King of France, who undertaking a war against the Venetians, and being told by some, that it would be dangerous on account of the admirable wisdom of the Venetians, answered; I will overwhelm their wisdom by a multitude of fools. . . . Yesterday the Jubilee was solemnized at the command of the Pope's Legate: but our party met, to the number, I think, of forty thousand, and filled the chief streets of the City with armed men. Three Preachers were scarce sufficient for so great a multitude.”

[G] He was obliged to make use of the utmost efforts of his genius, and the resolution of his mind, to surmount the scruples and ill humour of the Parliament of Paris. This Parliament refused to register the edict of January, and deputed to the King a President and Counsellor to make their remonstrances. These two Deputies having laid before the King all that induced the Parliament not to receive the edict, the Chancellor, on account of the dignity of his office, and the minority of the King, undertook to speak, and told them, that he did not doubt, but that all the reasons represented by them were of great weight; but yet he desired them to consider, that they had not been forgot in the Grand Assembly at St. German; that the question before them was one of those, which had its difficulties, on whatever side it was viewed; and to speak the truth, in the resolution of it, the Magistrate was to be excused, whatever side he might take. He owned, that the foundation of a State required, that there should be but one religion; but when things were come to such a pass, as they were then in France, whoever rejected the edict, must choose one of these two things; either to put all the adherents of the new religion to the sword, or to banish them intirely, allowing them to dispose of their effects. The first point could not be executed, since that party was too strong both in leaders and partizans; and though it could be done, yet as it was staining the King's youth with the blood of so many of his subjects, perhaps when he came to age, he would demand it at the hands of his governors. And with regard to the second point, it was as little feasible; and though it could be effected as we intend, it would be raising by this means as many desperate enemies as exiles. With respect to the edict of July, though there was a plausible pretext for it, yet it would lead men to Atheism, by allowing them not to frequent the Catholic Churches, and yet prohibiting the exercise of their religion. To obviate therefore all these inconveniencies it had been thought proper to establish in France two Churches, till God should please to reunite them; and this had been formerly practised by the Emperors Galerius, Maximian, and Constantius, in order to compose the divisions between the Christians and Pagans; remonstrating to them and desiring them to give way to the present necessity; in short, to tolerate this scandal to avoid a greater; and that if they committed a fault in this, it was in imitation of the neighbouring nations, which in such an exigence had been obliged to do the same. This answer being reported to the Parliament, and the Chambers again assembled, they did not change their opinion (46). This opposition of the Parliament troubled the Court, and a new consultation was held there with some of the Deputies of Paris, what was to be done (47). The plurality of voices carried it for maintaining the edict, and “it was committed to the Prince de la Roche-sur-yon to procure it to be published in Parliament, with express orders, that if they refused or delayed to do it, he should cause it to be published without the judicial forms, being assisted only by some private Counsellors, whom he should choose. This commission was violent; but the prudent Prince executed it in a very gentle manner, remonstrating that

(46) Pasquier, Lett. lib. 4. tom. 1. pag. 212, & seq.

(47) Ibid. pag. 214.

“the King's intention was founded upon the necessity of the times; that the Court of Parliament might know well enough what passed in their fight in Paris, but was not acquainted with the complaints which came daily from all parts of the Kingdom to the ears of the King and his Council; desiring them to resolve immediately, and without any long discourse, whether to answer yes or no. Upon this it was agreed unanimously, that all who had been present at the Council of St. Germans should have a deliberative voice in that affair as well as others; so that at last it was resolved that the edict should pass.” Indeed in the execution they “shewed plainly, that it was by a forced consent; for on Friday the 26th of March, an extraordinary day of pleading, it was confirmed with all the marks of constraint, since with the edict were published all the orders of the King, which was not customary in such publications. Besides, the Attorney-General required nothing publicly, but declared that he had given his conclusions in writing. It was ordered therefore by the Court, that upon the back of the letters it should be written, that they had been read, published, and registered, after the King's Attorney-General had been heard, but without any approbation of the new religion; the whole by way of provision, and till the King should otherwise order. Thus passed this edict at Paris (48).” This (48) Ibid. has some connexion with the History of Monsieur l'Hospital, and contains such particular circumstances, which are not to be found so minutely in a general History, that the reader will have some reason to be pleased with my mentioning of them.

[H] The speeches, which he made, in order to inspire a spirit of toleration, rendered him very much suspected by the Roman Catholics, and extremely odious to the Court of Rome. We have seen above (49) in a passage (49) In the from Varillas, what was said in France by way of mark [D] citation (20). raillery of the Chancellor's maifs. Beaucaire de Poignillon, speaking of the assembly of St. German (50), (50) Held in and reporting the substance of the speech, which the 1561. Chancellor l'Hospital made there, observes, that this first magistrate served as an example to Judges, who favoured the sectaries, and that he loved only the Calvinists. Deinde Regios ministros, qui juri dicundo præsumunt & Regia edicta non satis accurate exequuti sunt, excusat: inter quos ille merito accusatus est, qui illis exemplo erat, & nullos, nisi Calvinianos in oculis habebat: quique præclara hac oratione, & multis aliis perverfis machinis ad condendum satis celebratum postea summi Jamarii sequentis edictum viam præparavit (51). i. e. (51) Belcar. lib. 29. num. 30. He then excuses the King's Judges, who had not been careful in executing the King's edicts; among whom he was justly accused, who had been an example to them, and regarded none but Calvinists, and by this excellent speech and many other perverse arts prepared the way for forming his famous edict of January following.” This Historian has the assurance to call that great man atheist: here is what he says, when he remarks that the Cardinal of Lorraine procured him the dignity of Chancellor. Interim Olivario Cancellario vita functo Cardinalis Lothariæ præter domesticorum suorum omnium ac familiarium sententiam, ut Michael Hospitalis homo quidem doctus, sed nullius Religionis, aut ut vere dicam &c. in ejus locum surrogaretur, effecit (52). i. e. “In the mean while (52) Idem, lib. 28. num. 57. upon the death of Olivier the Chancollor, the Cardinal of Lorraine, contrary to the opinion of all his servants and friends, procured, that Michael l'Hospital, a man of learning indeed, but of no religion, or, to speak truly, an atheist, should be advanced to his post.” Something has been said elsewhere (53) concerning this accusation. Odoric Raynaldus has revived this cruel reproach, and made use of the very expressions of Beaucaire. It is in that passage where he speaks of a certain attempt of the President du Ferrier, which I have mentioned above (54). Monsieur Cousin is justly angry at this injustice and outrage of Raynaldus, and quotes a fine passage from the letter, which the RIER (Arnaud), the peared to be greatly afflicted, when he saw that both parties were preparing to take arms after the affair at Vassi. He declared his sentiments plainly upon that point; and returned a good answer to the Constable, who had said to him, that it did not belong to men of the long robe to give their judgment with relation to war: though such men, answered he, do not know how to bear arms, yet they know when they ought to be used (g). Cardinal Hippolyto

(g) Paquier, Lettres, tom. 11 lib. 4. pag. 226. See also Baptiste Grain, lib. 1. of the History of Henry IV. p. m. 129, 130. where he commends him as much as he blames those who excluded him from the council of war.

(63) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 85.

(64) Ibid. pag. 296.

(65) See Spooner, ad ann. 1573, num. 15. pag. m. 74-5.

(66) Ad ann. 1561, num. 18. pag. 609.

(67) Beza in Iconibus, folio V. iii.

(68) See the Biblioth. Cloisse de Colomes, pag. 70.

(69) Ad ann. 1573, num. 15. pag. 74-5.

(70) Hist. du Calvin, pag. 105. See what has been answered to him in the Critique Generale of his book, Letter 16. num. 3.

(71) D'Aubigné, Hist. Universelle, tom. 1. lib. 2. cap. 18. pag. m. 129.

(72) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 22.

gated with the most beautiful colours, was concealed " a most deadly poison, which by flattering would " prove fatal (63)." She had no reason to say, that Monsieur de l'Hospital was a dangerous enemy; for if he favoured the Protestants, it was not by disloyal artifices, but by maxims the most conformable to the interest of the Kingdom and the service of his Majesty. The integrity of his manners, his experience, and prudence in the management of affairs, were allowed by all the world; as his unbiassed affection to the interest of the Kingdom, the preservation of the Laws, and the ease of the people, and his constant resolution in opposing the injustice of great men, were highly applauded by good men (64). Catherine de Medicis spoke the truth, when she affirmed that the Chancellor's family was of the reformed religion (65). Now this is a good proof that he disapproved of the doctrines of the Church of Rome. He has been pictured with a lighted candle behind him in the Icones of Theodore Beza, to signify, says Mr. Spondanus (66), that he carried a torch to light others, but not to light himself. The discourse, which attends this Icon, informs us, that two reasons restrained him from publicly professing the truth. He was apprehensive of losing the means of serving the cause, and he hoped, that the time would come, when he should not any longer be obliged to dissemble. He in vain expected this conjuncture, and afterwards being desirous of declaring himself he could not execute his resolution. He sacrificed himself, for others. Beza's Latin expresses this very well. Haec... ad justum laudis cumulum id videtur desuisse, quod partim ne sibi ad pias juvenas aditum praestruere, si veram religionem aperte professetur, partim vana quadam expectatione delusus, eo tuto ex quo erutos omnes optabat, penitus extricare sese quam diu neglexisset, postea volens id praestare non potuit. Sed equis illius memoriam non celebravit, qui, ut a iis consuleret, seipsum tamdiu pene neglexit (67)? i. e. " This seems to have been wanting to complete his character, that partly lest he should disqualify himself from assisting the faithful, if he should openly profess the true religion, and partly being deluded by a vain expectation, after he had long neglected wholly to extricate himself from that mire, out of which he desired all might be rescued, when he afterwards desired to do it, he had not the power. But who would not celebrate his praise, who so long almost disregarded himself, that he might serve others?" His will is a proof, that in his heart he was not a Papist: there is no mention in it of the Mass, or Purgatory, or Priest, or any thing of that kind; and he observes there, that Christians have no great esteem for funeral ceremonies or burials (68). Spondanus pretends, that this is the language of a profane person (69); and Monsieur Maimbourg says these terms are unworthy of a Christian (70). Genebrard had already shewn his repentment against these expressions in the funeral oration of Peter Danes. Observe, that it is said, that Monsieur de l'Hospital had been engaged in the enterprise of Amboise. Consider well these words of the Sieur d'Aubigné. " The Chancellor Olivier dying at that time in the manner which we have represented, l'Hospital, a man highly esteemed, succeeded him, though he had been one of the Conspirators in the affair of Amboise. This I affirm in opposition to every thing which has been written, since the original of the enterprise was consigned into the hands of my father, in which was his name at length between that of Andelot, and one Spifame; a thing, which I have shewn to many persons of distinction (71)." Mezerai endeavours to refute all this by a very weak reason: it is, says he (72), that l'Hospital departed from France in the month of November. But did not he know how many journeys la Rezaude caused to be made? Was it so difficult to dispatch one of the accomplices to Monsieur de l'Hospital in Piedmont? However this be, I imagine, that if he signed this conspiracy, he was shewn only the fair side of it, and that he never expected, that it should

(95) See Journal des Savans of Feb. 28, 1689, pag. 118, 119. of the Dutch edit.

(96) History of the Council of Trent, lib. 5. pag. 438. of Amelot's version.

(57) Ibid. lib. 6. pag. 437. ad ann. 1562.

(*) He accommodated himself in the Council to the designs of the Queen, who had secretly instructed him; but because he voted for peace contrary to the sentiments of the Duke of Guise and the Constable he was ill treated by both parties, and under pretence that he was a man of the gown, he was excluded from the councils of war, where the Queen afterwards found that she wanted one of her chief Ministers. Davila, Hist. lib. 2.

(58) Negotiations ou Lettres d'Affaires ecrites par le Cardinal de Ferrare Legat en France, pag. 224, 225.

(59) Ibid. pag. 240, 241.

(60) Varillas, Hist. de Charles IX, of tom. 1. pag. m. 151.

(61) Ibid. pag. 353.

(62) See Negotiations du Cardinal de Ferrare, pag. 308.

the Chancellor l'Hospital wrote to Pius IV, September the 29th 1562 (55). Father Paul (56) informs us, that this Pope found the speech the Chancellor had made at the conference of Poissy to be heretical in many points. He adds, that the same Pope threatened even to summon him before the inquisition, and that the Court of Rome, where copies of that speech had been dispersed, spoke very ill of him, and supposed, that all the Ministers of the Kingdom, had the same sentiments of the Court; and the French Ambassador had much ado to defend himself. Observe, that Pius IV having resolved to give the King of France an hundred thousand crowns by way of present, and to lend as many more, stipulated among other things, that the Chancellor, the Bishop of Valence, and some others whom he named, should be imprisoned (57). We shall quote here a passage from a letter, which the Cardinal Legate Hippolytus d'Este wrote to that Pope June 14, 1562. It is dated at Bois de Vincennes. " It is not one of the least difficulties to remove from Court the Chancellor and many other persons of rank, as your Holiness desires. For you place in this number both heretics, and those who are suspected of heresy. But if it be necessary to remove from Court all the latter, it would undoubtedly be empty, these new opinions having already made such an impression upon the minds of the Courtiers, that these are but few, who have not at least some small tincture of them... But to return to the most turbulent of the Court, your Holiness is not ignorant, how difficult it was to remove the Chastillons... But as for the removal of the Chancellor, which is desired, it is quite another thing; for besides that his post does not permit him to absent himself from Court except on very important reasons, he cannot yet be deprived of his place without express orders from the King, or for some considerable fault, if he has committed any; nor can it be justly said, that he has deserved death, unless it be shewn by indubitable proofs. Now to bring him to a trial upon such an accusation cannot be done without employing a great deal of time in the affair. Besides, such an accusation would undoubtedly be ill grounded, since he is commonly seen to go to mass, to confess, and to communicate, so that he cannot be openly convicted of not being a Catholic (58)." The letter, which he wrote the day following to Cardinal Borromeo shews, that Catherine de Medicis was not pleased with his proposal of removing certain persons, and that she was still more angry than before, when he named particularly the Chancellor according to express orders, which he had from Pius IV (59). Hence it appears, that Mr. Varillas is greatly mistaken, when he lays, that the Triumviri obliged Monsieur de l'Hospital to retire, and that the Queen made a sacrifice of him (60). He asserts, that this pretended retreat preceded the declaration of April the 7th 1562, and that it continued during all the first war (61). This is contradicted both by the silence of the other Historians, and the letters of the Legate dated June the 15th and July the 8th 1562 (62).

It was not a mistake to believe that Monsieur de l'Hospital approved in his heart the doctrine of the reformed. Catherine de Medicis did not advance any falsity in all the discourse, which is related by Monsieur de Mezerai. " She used all her arts to sap the credit, which he had gained with the young King, whom she assured by her confidants, that he certainly was a favourer of heretics; that his wife, daughter, son-in-law, and all his family, being of that religion, there was no doubt but he was so in his heart, and that he was only restrained by the apprehension of losing his post from publicly professing Calvinism. Therefore as concealed enemies are much more dangerous than open ones, it was necessary to be more cautious of him than of the Admiral; and that his Majesty ought not any longer to suffer him to poison his whole Council by these fine maxims of peace, under which, as under the skin of a serpent varie-

Hippolyto d'Este, Legate à latere in France, received orders to endeavour to remove him from Court, but he returned answer to the Pope, that he saw no probability of succeeding in that affair (b). He proposed it however to the Queen-Regent, who was extremely angry at it. If Mr. Varillas had known this, he would not have committed the mistake, which we shall see below (i). The pacific counsels of the Chancellor contributed more to his disgrace than any thing else; I have given good proofs of this (k). He retired voluntarily, when he saw that his enemies had exasperated the King against him; and he spent the remainder of his life in a country seat (l), which he had in Beauce. He retired in June 1568. The seals were demanded of him some days after. He resigned them very readily, saying that indeed he was not any longer fit for the affairs of the world, which he saw to be too much corrupted (m). We ought not to think it more strange, that he could support himself seven or eight years in so corrupt a Court, than to find that he fell at last into disgrace. There would have been something wanting to the lustre of his virtue and glory, if he had continued in the post of Chancellor till his death; for under such a reign it was a kind of blemish and an ill sign to be thought very proper for that great office. A man of integrity was not what those, who had the direction of affairs then, wanted. We may remark, that Monsieur de l'Hospital took care however to procure excellent laws [I], and flattered neither the subjects nor the Prince. He had a great zeal for maintaining and confirming the Royal Majesty and Authority, and by the gravity

(b) See the citation (58) about the middle.

(i) Citation (60).

(k) In the remark [H] towards the end.

(l) Named Vignai and not Vignan, as Mezerai calls it, pag. 186. of the 3d tome of his larger History. He is not exact in proper names.

(m) Brantome, au Discours du Connétable de Montmorency, pag. 17. of tome 2.

should be executed in the manner in which it was concerted.

Father Garasse, transported with a blind desire of censuring the Protestants, has charged them with calumny in endeavouring to persuade all France, that the Chancellor de l'Hospital was of their faith. He compares them to the Novatians, who published in lying writings, that St. Cyprian died in their communion; and he says, that this has been from all antiquity an ingenious piece of malice of wicked men (73). He only discovers his ignorance.

(73) See Doctrina Curieuse de Garasse, pag. 918, 919.

I cannot avoid inserting here two observations, which I find in an anonymous piece, which is an excellent one. They inform us of the causes of the Chancellor's disgrace. I do not think, says this unknown author (74), "that a great Minister, who is employed in the important affairs of a Prince, ought to be silent, whatever may happen; otherwise he would be the cause of his master's ruin by his silence, as well as others by their attempts and conspiracies. For this reason I cannot be of their opinion, who think that the Chancellor de l'Hospital had no occasion to insist so strongly against the resolution which had been taken  contrary to the prudent advice of the late Constable, of engaging the King to depart  at the beginning of the second troubles. For since that wife and prudent Minister judged, and judged very rightly, as the event shewed, that this suddain departure being put in execution... would undoubtedly prevent a reconciliation, and reduce matters to extremities; there is no manner of doubt, but that if he had concealed his opinion, and not insisted upon it, as he did, he would have been guilty of a baseness unworthy of a man, who had been raised by his virtue only to so high a dignity. For though afterwards he was sinking, and his enemies, that is, the enemies of his virtue, integrity, and sincerity begun from that time to conspire to remove him; yet this was not any reason for him to fail in his duty, since the aim of those, who have the honour to be employed in such posts, ought not to be to keep them by injuring their honour and conscience, but to serve well and faithfully. Besides, matters taking the turn, which they did afterwards, a man of great probity and courage, as this worthy Chancellor was, ought to be very well satisfied with retiring... (75). A good Minister, who is really a man of virtue... will never give his advice contrary to his opinion, and being commanded to speak, and declare his sentiments, will acquit himself faithfully and courageously. This is what the same Chancellor did, when the question was about the bulls, which allowed the sale of the Church-Lands to the value of an hundred and fifty thousand livres, for the extirpation of heretics; for this clause being contrary to the edicts of the pacification, the maintenance of which the Chancellor thought necessary to the good of the Kingdom; besides that as they had been granted solemnly, he thought they could not be contravened, and that this was one of the effects of the league, which was then concerting; and therefore he declared openly his opinion, which was followed, that they should procure new bulls without that clause, which was the last stumbling-block and occasion of involving that great man under the suspicion of heresy, and depriving him of the seals, in order to give them to a man, who was thought more proper for the time; and soon after every thing was disposed for war."

(75) Ibid. pag. 97. & seq.

[I] He took care however to procure excellent Laws.] Stephen Pasquier has furnished me with this reflection. I shall quote his words (76). "We have seen in our time a young King Charles IX in France, whose minority at first, and afterwards the extraordinary violence of his temper gave him no leisure to make Laws; yet never any King before him made so many excellent edicts as he did; witness that in 1560 in the States held at Orleans; the other, which he made at Rouffillon in 1563; and the third at Moulins in 1566. These three edicts contain a prodigious number of articles in point of policy, and excellent regulations, which vastly surpass our ancient ordinances. To whom do we owe this advantage? To no other than Michael de l'Hospital, his great and wise Chancellor, who, under the authority of the young King his master, was the principal mediator of the first, and instigator, promoter, and author of the two others. And I should be extremely glad that they were observed with the same zeal as they were introduced." I am surprized that Pasquier does not mention the excellent edicts, which Monsieur de l'Hospital procured under Francis II. An Historian of that time (77) speaks of three, which were very good and of great use. I shall shew what the first consisted of; it was that which regulated wills or donations of widows, who quickly married again. I shall make use of the words of an author of that age (78). "It was at the solicitation of the Chancellor de l'Hospital, that several ordinances, edicts, and statutes were made and published by our Kings of France for the relief of the people, and the maintenance of justice. Among others we have the edict of King Francis II, which restrains second marriages by taking away the liberty, which those women who married again, had to give more to their second husbands, than to one of the children of their first. The occasion of this edict was, that it happened, that a woman of this Nation, who was very rich, fell in love with a young Nobleman, who, because she seemed too old, had no inclination to marry her. She was so transported by her passion after him, that knowing he loved money, she gave him all her estate, reserving only what belonged to her children by her first husband as their lawful portion. So that her children for a morsel of bread were in a manner deprived of their mother's inheritance, which was transferred to a second husband. To prevent such frauds the Chancellor introduced into France the ordinance of the Emperor Leo, mentioned in the Law hac Edictali 6, tit. de secund. nupt. in the gravity of his censures knew how to make Parliaments sensible of their ill conduct in disobeying their King [K] ; but on the other hand he took care, that the Prince should obey

(76) Pasquier, Lett. lib. 19. tom. 2. pag. 520, 521.

(77) Lewis Reig-nier, Sieur de la Planche, Hist. de François II, pag. 515, & seq.

(78) Thevet, Elég. tom. 7. pag. 375.

“ fifth book of the Justinian Code, which prohibits “ the giving or leaving to a second husband more “ than to one of the children of the first.” It was very just and very necessary to renew this Law for the interest of the children of the first husband ; for there were too many women, who being desirous to marry again, would deprive them of their rights, in order to make themselves the more agreeable to their new husbands. They would supply by their liberality the charms which time had deprived them of ; and besides, the liberty of disposing of their estates would expose them to lovers, who otherwise would not come to disturb the resolution, which they might have taken of edifying their neighbours by a virtuous widowhood.

[K] Knew how to make Parliaments sensible of their ill conduct in disobeying their King. An Attorney could not reprimand a Clerk who has committed a gross blunder, more severely than the Chancellor de l’Hospital did the Parliament of Bourdeaux, when Charles IX held his bed of justice there April the 12th 1564 before Easter. “ The King, says he (79), has found a “ great many faults in this Parliament, which having “ been the latest erected, since it is but of an hundred “ and twelve years standing, you have the less excuse “ for departing from and neglecting so soon the an- “ tient ordinances, which would be excusable in other “ Parliaments, that are old ; and yet you are as much “ or more corrupted than the old ones . . . I have “ received a great many complaints of your diffen- “ sions . . . See here an house ill governed ; and you “ are accountable for it. The first fault is your diso- “ bedience to your King ; for though his ordinances “ are presented to you, you observe them as you “ please. If you have any remonstrances to make to “ him, bring them immediately, and he will hear “ them. You rob him of his royal power, when you “ refuse to obey his royal ordinances, which is worse “ than to rob him of his demesnes. I am informed “ that the ordinance made at the request of the States, “ is not yet published here. And addressing himself “ to the President and King’s Council, he said, I shall “ now speak to you, President and King’s Council, “ who ought to require and sollicit the publication of “ the edicts and ordinances of the King ; and you “ President, ought to propose, for you are the King’s “ President in the Court. I am also informed, said “ he, that the ordinance of justice has not been pub- “ lished. I have likewise an account of some others, “ which I shall not insist upon to avoid prolixity. I “ think, that you imagine yourselves wiser than the “ King, but your wisdom is limited to judge of pro- “ cesses ; do you not think your selves wiser than the “ King, Queen, and his Council ? He has procured “ peace, and at present there is war between him “ and his Court of Parliament . . . (80). You despise “ the Queen and King’s Council. I see that you “ value your own decrees so highly, that you prefer “ them to ordinances, which, after you receive them, “ you interpret as you please. It is not your business, “ but the King’s, to interpret ordinances, even those “ which concern the public good.” I omit the con- “ clusion of his discourse, which is still more severe than what I have cited. Observe, that this is a Com- “ mentary on what the King had said in a few words in “ this Parliament, “ that he would for the future be “ not suffer any of his subjects to take arms without his “ leave ; and that he would likewise have his edicts “ observed (81).” It is undoubted, that Monsieur “ de l’Hospital suggested to him this discourse, as also “ the vigorous declaration, which had been made by “ the same Prince sometime before to the Deputies of “ the Parliament of Paris. He had made remonstrances “ to him concerning the edict of his majority, which “ they had not registered. “ The King, whose vece- “ verity, answered them, that they must obey ; that “ they should not interpose any more in public affairs ; “ and that they should divest themselves of this old “ error, that they were tutors of the King, defenders of

“ the Kingdom, and guardians of the City of Paris. “ The Deputies having made their report to the “ Court, it was divided (82),” and they sent a new “ deputation to the King, “ who ordered that the “ edict should be published and registered without de- “ lay, and that all the Presidents and Counsellors “ should be present upon pain of interdiction (83).” It is easy to conceive, considering the King’s age, that in this case he only repeated the lesson of Monsieur de l’Hospital. “ He made once a speech to the “ Parliament with the doors open, upon their refusing “ to pass some of his edicts . . . and complaining of “ the administration of justice and corruption there, “ and the rejecting of his edicts, said with a noble, “ and at it were menacing resolution, It is your “ business to obey my ordinances, without disputing “ what they are, for I know better than you what is “ proper for the good of my Kingdom. Though “ he had not yet any beard, he spoke thus before “ these old and wise persons, who were all surprised “ at this resolute and grave speech, which favoured “ more of his own generous courage, than the lessons “ of Monsieur Amiot his Preceptor (84).” Brantome “ should have added that this speech was dictated “ to him by Michael de l’Hospital. The Prince, who had “ already disgraced him (85), well remembered the in- “ structions which he had received from his Chancellor, “ that it was of importance to him to humble the pre- “ sumption of the Parliament of Paris, which was so “ pernicious at that time to the whole Kingdom.

Here I ought to examine in a few words the discourse which we hear every day, and which represents as a principle of misery the suppression of the right, which Parliaments had formerly of rejecting those edicts, which appeared to them unjust. This, it is said, was a bank, which prevented the people from being drowned under the arbitrary power of the Monarch. The breaking down of this bank ought to be compared to the blow, by which Æolus shook the mountain, which served as a prison to the winds.

*Cavum conversa cuspide montem
Impulit in latus : ac venti, velut agmine facto,
Quâ data porta, ruunt, & terras turbine perfiant.
Incubere mari, totumque à sedibus imis
Unâ Eurûsque Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis
Africus ; & vastos volvunt ad littora fluctus.
Insequitur clamorque virum, stridorque rudentum* (86).

“ He said, and hurl’d against the mountain’s side “ His quiv’ring spear, and all the God apply’d : “ The dancing winds rush thro’ the hollow wound, “ And range aloft in air, and skim along the ground : “ Then settling on the sea the surges sweep, “ Raise liquid mountains, and disclose the deep, “ South, east, and west, with mix’d confusion roar, “ And roll the foaming billows to the shore ; “ The cables crack, the Sailors frightful cries “ Ascend, and fable night involves the skies “ And Heav’n itself is ravish’d from their eyes.

DRYDEN. They illustrate this with a great many maxims, which have a great appearance of solidity ; but they go no further ; they never turn the tables ; they never consult experience ; they never examine whether a person may not answer, I appeal to experience. Now this is the weak side, for it is easy to prove, that France never was so distressed and unhappy, as when the Parliament most enjoyed the authority of rejecting the edicts and ordinances of the Prince under Charles IX and Henry III. It is easy to prove also, that the exercise of this authority was the principal source of the calamities of the Kingdom from the year 1562 to 1594. The Chancellor de l’Hospital had laid the foundation of the public peace by the edict of January. The Church of Rome had no longer any reason to fear the danger, which I have mentioned above (87) : the King of Navarre had abandoned the Huguenots ; Catherine de Medicis no longer thought of taking off the mask. They would have been satisfied with having their fill of preaching ; and thus the Kingdom might have (79) See Recueil de divers Mémoires, printed at Paris by Peter Chevalier 1623 in 4to, pag. 424.

(80) Ibid. pag. 426.

(81) Ibid. pag. 421.

(82) Mezerai, Abregé Chronolog. tom. 5. pag. 80. ad ann. 1563.

(83) Ibid.

(84) Brantome, Eloge de Charles IX. pag. 33, 34. of the 4th tome of his Mémoires.

(85) Without doubt Brantome speaks of the same speech of Charles IX, which Mezerai mentions under the year 1571, pag. 239. of the 3d tome of his Great History.

REFLEXION on what is said by many people, that it is for the interest of the Kingdom of France, that Parliaments should have much more authority than they have.

(86) Virgil, Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 85.

(87) In the same mark [F].

obey justice and reason. He opposed to the utmost unjust edicts, and if notwithstanding he was obliged to seal them, he shewed that it was against his will [L]. One of the occasions, in which he displayed his great presence of mind, was when the demands of the Embassadors of England concerning the restitution of Calais were considered in the King's Council. He answered with so much force their first reasons and replies, that he manifestly have continued in peace, if the edict of January had been observed. But the Catholics infringed it, and this occasioned the first religious war, the root of all the evils, which afflicted the Kingdom till the extinction of the league; for all these evils were grafted upon or sprung from one another, by a well connected train of causes and effects (88). Now to what must we principally ascribe the infraction of this edict of January? Is it not to be imputed to the Parliament of Paris? Did not they encourage all the world not to observe it? They did not register it without defaming it (89), that is, after three commands, and with such restrictions and clauses, as shewed, that they only registered it by compulsion, and as a transient and very pernicious regulation. Who after this would scruple to break such an edict? Might not one be assured, that a Parliament, which judged in this manner, would not trouble themselves with punishing those, who should infringe it? Now at that time it was absolutely the same thing to be accessory to the infraction of the edict, and to sound an alarm for a civil war. Observe Monsieur Varillas's words, when he begins to relate the measures taken against those of the reformed religion a little before the massacre of Vassy. The house of Guise, says he (90), judged from the opposition, which the edict of January had met with in the Parliament, that it would not subsist long, and did not doubt but that civil wars would soon break out. Let us say in general, that the Parliaments of France, by refusing to register the edicts of pacification, or by registering them with an ill grace, and afterwards by a natural consequence not taking care to see them observed, were one of the principal causes of the long calamities, which distressed the Kingdom, and were very near destroying absolutely the Monarchy. If Charles V had reigned at that time, it would infallibly have become a province to his dominions, and been divided into a thousand pieces.

But some body will say, you alledge only the abuse which the Parliament then made of the right, which they had to reject the edicts of the Prince. To this I answer, are tyranny and most other disorders any thing else than the abuse of good things? It is sufficient to refute your reflections, that it may be said, that this bank or barrier, which you speak of, and which properly speaking includes this contradiction, that a State is and is not monarchical, cannot be reckoned a good remedy, since it has done much more harm than good. What comparison is there between the advantages, which result from the rejecting of some pecuniary edicts (91), and the deplorable ruin, which the Kingdom suffered for above thirty years? These horrible calamities are much less to be imputed to the Court, than to the Parliaments. The Court was become wise through the instructions of a very able and very virtuous Chancellor. Monsieur de l'Hospital had induced it to prevent, by the edict of January, all misfortunes, and to destroy the root of civil wars. The Parliaments instead of seconding this, opposed and rendered ineffectual the remedy which he had found; a remedy which could not but be good, since there was no other (92). The Court would have followed the steps which the Chancellor had directed it to; and left it only on account of the confusions, into which the Kingdom fell, through the fault of those, who disobeyed the edict; and these were the Parliaments, which opened a wide path to this disobedience. They are answerable therefore for the profanation, plundering, and demolishing so many Churches, of which some are pleased to give catalogues, in order to render the Huguenots odious. It was not owing to them, that the miseries of the Kingdom were not perpetual, even after the League was subdued. They opposed the edict of Nantes, the only remedy for the intestine disorders; the Parliament of Paris would never have registered it, if Henry IV had not made use of intreaties, but with a tone, which shewed, that he knew how to make himself obeyed (93). Observe, that the speech of Monsieur de l'Hospital to the Parliament of Bourdeaux (94), shews, that at that time, when little regard was paid to the King's ordinances, the administration of justice was full of corruption and shocking disorders. Let us conclude with remarking, that a popular government is something so perplexed, that the remedies, which seem to be the best, are sometimes worse than the disease, and the source of the greatest disorders. I have just given an eminent instance of this.

[L] If he was obliged to seal unjust edicts, he shewed, that it was against his will. A Minister of State, and especially a Chancellor to a King, ought to do two things, if he would discharge his duty. One is to recommend very strongly to subjects submission and obedience; he ought not to speak to them of any thing else; let him not amuse himself with disputing with them, whether they have a right sometimes of taking up arms, and refusing to obey the ordinances, which they think unjust and burthenome. He must lay it down as a thing incontestible that they have no such right. The other thing, which he ought to do, is to represent in a lively manner, and incessantly to the Prince, that the royal authority does not dispense him from an absolute submission to justice, and that he has no right, nor privilege, to violate justice, equity, his word, &c. Monsieur de l'Hospital acquitted himself exactly of both these duties. He took the part of the King before his subjects, and the part of the subjects before the King. He repressed with great vigour those, who made any attempt upon the royal authority. See (95) the censures, which he made, or which the King made to the Parliament, by his advice. See also (96) what he answered to the Deputy of the Parliament of Dijon. But you will now see with what integrity, with what firmness, he resisted the unjust propositions, which were suggested to the King. He opposed them by his reasons as far as was in his power; and if his remonstrances did not prevent the conclusion of the affair, he washed his hands of it, he shewed, that he did not give his consent to it. "Ah, Sir, what a foul and venomous tail it is in an edict, when the registering of it is stopped by these words, by the express command of the King often repeated, which produce only a condemnation among wise and good men, against the injustice of it, supported only by the commands, which the Chancellors are frequently obliged to seal contrary to their opinion, in which are seen these odious and reproachful words: Notwithstanding all the remonstrances made and to be made, which we hold as heard and understood, and for which we will not have it deferred: That is to say, in despite of reason, by a malignant counsel, by an unjust will, by a precipitate deliberation, by the rebuke of virtue, by the toleration of evil, by the hatred of honour, and by an affected ignorance, and the contempt of right. It was therefore to avoid partaking in this disgrace, that the good and very worthy Chancellor de l'Hospital wrote generally these words with his own hand upon the back of such letters, Me non sentiente, that is to say, I have been obliged to seal them against my will; as he did in the letters about the reception of the powers of the Cardinal of Ferrara, sent as Legate into France by Pope Pius IV (*), to which resolute conduct of the Chancellor, the Court of Parliament having seen these words upon the back of the letters, joined themselves, and would never register these powers (97). The President de la Place will inform us more particularly of what relates to this last fact. "Now for as much as among other articles decreed in the States, it was ordered, that the benefices of this Kingdom should be collated by the Ordinaries, each in his diocese, and no longer by the Pope, and that no dispensations should be admitted; there was a great difficulty to admit the powers of the said Legate, the Chancellor remonstrating, that he could not do any

(88) Compare this with the remark made by d'Aubigné chap. 2. lib. 5. of the 3d tome of his History, pag. m. 628.

(89) See remark [C].

(90) Varill. Hist. de Charles IX. tom. 1. pag. m. 121. ad ann. 1562.

(91) The 9th of September 1578, the Parliament registered but two pecuniary edicts of 22 which were presented. See Faucher du Londe's Fastes, pag. 88.

(92) Optimum remedium quia unicum.

(93) See Matherieu, Histoire de la Paix, liv. 2. Narrat. 1. num. 7. pag. 210. & seq.

(94) I have cited it above quotation (79).

(95) In the preceding remark.

(96) In the article BEGAT.

(*) La Popeliniere, lib. 7.

(97) Le Grain, Décade d'Henri le Grand, lib. 8. pag. m. 898.

(n) See Thuanus, lib. 41. pag. 840, 841. ad ann. 1567. and Villars, Histoire de Charles IX. pag. m. 39, & seqq. of the 2d tome. See also pag. 256. of the 1st tome.

manifestly had the advantage (n), and gave the King his master occasion to flatter himself, that by keeping that place he should not contravene the treaty of peace of Cateau. His vigilance, great as it was, could not secure him from the artifices of a Secretary, who was a dishonest man [M]; and this gave him great uneasiness. It was observed, that he resembled Aristotle in the face [N]. Some ascribe to him the comparison of the apes; and probably “ any thing contrary to what had been so readily resolved and concluded by the said States. But notwithstanding this, the said Legate giving them to understand, that as he was allied to the house of France, it would be a great reproach and dishonour to him to be the first Legate refused there, offering not to make use of his said powers, but to return immediately after the registering of them; the Chancellor was ordered to seal the letters, which he did after many altercations between the said Legate and him; and after he had written under the seal of these letters with his own hand these words, me non consentiente, that is to say, against my consent: Which being seen by the said Court, they were refused, and it was declared, that they could not and ought not to receive them (98).” There are some Historians, who say that at last the Legate, notwithstanding the Chancellor’s opinion, procured that his powers should be admitted in the Council of State, in which he was allowed a seat (99).” Every one knows the vast authority of the Guisies under Francis II; yet it was not capable of biasing the Chancellor: he was the only person, who refused to sign the sentence of death against the Prince of Condé (100).

(98) La Place, Commentaires de l’Etat de la Religion & République, lib. 6. fol. m. 214. verso, ad ann. 1561. See concerning this Legate the book de l’origine des Cardinaux, pag. 265, & seq. Dutch edit. 1670.

(99) Le Grain, Décade de Henri le Grand, lib. 1. pag. 118.

(100) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. pag. 109.

Languetus has preserved a lively repartee, which the Chancellor made to the Legate. The latter had presumed to charge him with not knowing what his post required of him. At least, replied the Chancellor, I have endeavoured to learn it; but you, who hold several Bishoprics, have never had any thoughts of instructing yourself in the duties of the Episcopal function. Solus cancellarius pertinacissime resistit, & dixit in ea re fieri summam injuriam Regi puero, ac regni Gallici jura, & Majestatem profuturi, nec se passurum, ut Regio sigillo sibi concedito ad eam rem abuteretur. Ad quæ incandescens Ferrarivensis, dixit eum ignorare, quæ essent sui muneris & officii. Ego vero, inquit Cancellarius, hoc saltem egi, ut id intelligerem, sed tu ne quidem cogitasti unquam quod sit officium Episcopi, cum tamen aliquot Episcopatus possideas. Tandem vicus aliorum importunitate tradidit eis Regium Sigillum, sed tamen voluit instrumento permissionis inseri, se contradicente hoc esse permissum (101). i. e. “ The Chancellor alone resolutely opposed it, and urged that by this affair a great injury would be done to the King in his minority, and that the Privileges and Majesty of the Kingdom of France would be prostituted; and that he would not suffer them to abuse to such a purpose the King’s seal intrusted with them. The Cardinal of Ferrara being provoked at this, said, that he did not know what belonged to his office. But I, returned the Chancellor, at least have done thus much, that I have endeavoured to understand it; but you have never thought of what is the duty of a Bishop, though you are possessed of several Bishoprics. At last being overcome by the importunity of others he delivered up the King’s seal to them, but would have it inserted in the instrument of permission, that this was done against his will.”

(101) Languet. Epist. 62. lib. 2. pag. 157.

Here follows a passage of Bodin. “ It is very certain, that the Laws, Ordinances, Letters Patents, Privileges, and Grants of Princes have no force but during their life, if they are not ratified by the express consent or at least the permission of the Prince, who has the cognizance of them . . . This was the reason that Monsieur de l’Hospital Chancellor of France, refused to seal the confirmation of the Privileges and exemption from taxes for St. Maur des Fossés, whatever orders he had to do it, because they contained a perpetual exemption, which is against the nature of personal privileges, and lessens the power of successors, and cannot be given to any bodies of men or colleges, except during the life of the Prince, who grants them, although the word perpetual be inserted (102).”

(102) Bodin, De la République, lib. 1. cap. 8. pag. m. 131, 132.

[M] His vigilance . . . could not secure him from the artifices of a Secretary, who was a dishonest man.] I shall cite upon this subject what I have read in a book intitled, La Fortune de la Cour. The Chancellor de l’Hospital, who was blamed because being naturally very severe in expediting justice, and still those who came to solicit him, yet was not so with regard to his domestics, and especially his Secretary Bouvaut, who surprized him as often as he thought proper; which he continued to do till complaint was made to the Council upon occasion of a very rude letter. The Chancellor was ashamed to be surprized in this manner, and was obliged to turn away, with a thousand reproaches, a servant whom he had a great affection for before (103).” The author mentions another thing, which has no relation to my text; but I shall quote it, as it is a remarkable fact. “ He was likewise severely reprimanded by the late Monsieur de Montpensier in a full Council, because having shewn himself almost inexorable to pass the Grants, which the King had made him of no large sum, yet some days before he had received from the Treasurer fifty thousand livres in ready money; and he was greatly reproached for it, though it was certain, that the King, even of his own accord, had pressed him to take it (104).”

(103) Fortune de la Cour, pag. 349. This book was printed at Paris in 1642 in 8vo. See Bibliothèque Francoise de Sorel, pag. 414. edit. 1667.

[N] It was observed, that he resembled Aristotle in the face.] Theodore Beza assures us of this in very strong terms. Ut ex antiquissimo numismate apparuit, summum illum omnium Philosopherum principem Aristotelem sic ore toto restulit, ut alterius ex altero imago expressa videri posset (105). i. e. “ It appears from a very old coin, that he so much resembled Aristotle, the Prince of Philosophers, in the face, that the picture of one might seem to be taken from the other.” Thevet refuses this. And with regard to the resemblance, says he (106), which Beza feigns between Aristotle and our Chancellor, if he means the traces and lineaments of the face, there is no man, who compares the true picture of Aristotle, which I have given above, with that of the Chancellor, which had been drawn to the life, but will perceive at first sight, that there is a difference. But Stephen Forcadel informs us of the circumstances, which favour Beza. He tells us, that while Charles IX visited the cities of his Kingdom, there was dug up a statue, which bore the name of Aristotle, and perfectly resembled Michael de l’Hospital. He adds, that verses were written upon it, which pleased the Chancellor. I shall cite at large his words, because they contain the praises of this great man, and because my Dictionary ought, at least sometimes, to resemble those compilations in which are collected the judgments of learned men upon eminent persons. Here then is what Stephen Forcadel writes (107). Legis pervigil & excellens custos Cancellarius: qualem re ipsa se præbuit, dum viveret, ideo que à fato maxime laudabilis vir Michael Hospitalis, cui Musæ statuatim libentissime poverent, nisi Jurisprudencia, simulque Philosphia hoc decus præripuisset. Idque non ambigue significatum est superioribus annis, Carolo IX Rege suam Galliam oppidatim lustrante, cum forte eruta fuit, & è sinu terræ alius effossæ statua inciso Aristotelis titulo, quæ apprimè M. Hospitalium lineamentis ac figuram referebat, ut nec sibi ipsi magis sit ille similis, sicut nec animi dotibus ab insigni Philospho multum differat. Unde bene ominare cæpi de componendo turbulentiæ Reipublicæ statu, quia Gallorum Cancellarius Regi maximo intitus Magni illius Alexandri doctorem effigie exaquasset. Nos itaque Hospitali humanissimo viro, honoris gratia, tunc versatulos dedicavimus comiter supra expectationem accipiendos:

(104) Ibid. pag. 350.

(105) Beza, in Iconibus, fol. vij.

(106) Thevet, Etage, tom. 7. pag. 367.

(107) Stephanus Forcadelus, de Gallor. Imperio & Philosphia, lib. 7. pag. m. simulque Philosphia hoc decus præripuisset. Idque non ambigue significatum est superioribus annis, Carolo IX Rege suam Galliam oppidatim lustrante, cum forte eruta fuit, & è sinu terræ alius effossæ statua inciso Aristotelis titulo, quæ apprimè M. Hospitalium lineamentis ac figuram referebat, ut nec sibi ipsi magis sit ille similis, sicut nec animi dotibus ab insigni Philospho multum differat. Unde bene ominare cæpi de componendo turbulentiæ Reipublicæ statu, quia Gallorum Cancellarius Regi maximo intitus Magni illius Alexandri doctorem effigie exaquasset. Nos itaque Hospitali humanissimo viro, honoris gratia, tunc versatulos dedicavimus comiter supra expectationem accipiendos:

Quisquis Aristoteli doctam te contulit, idem Blanditus docto fertur Aristoteli.

i. e. “ A Chancellor, a vigilant and excellent Guardian of the Law, as Michael l’Hospital really shewed himself to be, while he lived, and therefore deserved the highest commendations after his death. “ The Muses would gladly raise a statue to him, if “ Civil probably they do in this point what is very common, not only with those who talk at random, but even with writers; I mean, that they ascribe to one what belongs to another [O].

(o) See remark He made an excellent will, which has been printed, and he expressed in it among other things his inclination to peace [P], and his indifference for funeral solemnities (o). He died

" Civil Law and Philosophy had not beforehand taken away this honour. And this was plainly signified some years ago, when during the time that Charles IX made a progress through the cities of France, a statue with Aristotle's name upon it was dug up, which so much resembled Monsieur de l'Hospital, that he was not more like himself, as he was not much unlike that famous Philosopher in the endowments of his mind. Hence I began to presage that the turbulent state of affairs in the Kingdom would be composed, because the Chancellor of France, who was intimate with our great King, resembled the Tutor of Alexander the Great . . . I therefore wrote verses in honour of de l'Hospital, a man of the utmost humanity, which were received beyond my expectation.

" Who'er compared you to learn'd Aristotle, Paid him the greatest compliment in nature."

(108) Qui non vultu tantum Aristotelis os, quod ex utriusque imaginum ubique profertur comparatione constat, sed Solonis . . . referretur . . . referretur. Thuan. lib. 56, pag. 43.

Thuanus confirms what Theodore Beza has asserted (108). Observe that Brantome mentions another resemblance. The Chancellor de l'Hospital, says he (109), had all the appearance of Cato, a great white beard, a pale countenance and grave air, so that to see him, one would have said, that he was the true picture of St. Jerom; and several persons at Court said the same.

[O] Some ascribe to him the comparison of the apes, and probably . . . they ascribe to one what belongs to another.] They transfer to the Chancellor de l'Hospital a thought of his predecessor. Read the following words of Montagne (110): "I have found the shortest and easiest way . . . to rid myself of this desire, and to fit still . . . judging rightly of my powers, that they are not capable of great things; and remembering the saying of the late Chancellor Olivier, that the French are the apes, which leap up a tree from branch to branch, and do not stop till they reach the highest branch, to shew their breach when they are there (§2)." Mr. Menage (111) cites these words of Montagne, after having quoted some Greek verses (112); in which Scaliger made use of the same thought against Lydiat, and the Latin verses, which Salmastius wrote against Father Petavius; and which turn upon the same comparison. Coltar intimates that the Chancellor spoke thus in a speech. This is what I am not easily led to believe. The Chancellor Olivier, says he (113), made no scruple publicly to compare the French to apes, which leap from branch to branch, and shew their breach when they are at the top of the tree. We shall see presently, that an Advocate of the Parliament of Paris ascribes this comparison to the Chancellor de l'Hospital. This Advocate is little known but by the name of Gubertius (114), which may be translated five or six different ways, without receding from the analogy, according to which the French latinize their names. Let this be said by the bye. Here is the fact. Sæpe ego audiivi à fori nostri principibus viris, Michaëlem Hospitalium Franciæ Cancellarium, cui nulla ætas habuit parem, solitum dicere, multos, qui ad honores à fortuna pelluntur, simiarum esse simillimos, quæ altiorem arborem nactæ, eousque conscendunt, ut cum ad summum arboris fastigium evaserint, foliis vento stridentibus operientur totæ posteriora tantum prætereuntibus ridiculè ostentant (115). i. e. "I have often heard of the principal men of our Court of Judicature, that Michael de l'Hospital, Chancellor of France, whose equal has been in no age, used to say, that many persons, who have been raised to honours by fortune, are very like apes, who meeting with an high tree, mount to the top of it, but the wind moving the leaves they expose themselves to laughter by shewing only their breach." There are a thousand instances which prove, that the same thought is ascribed to several persons. I shall mention but one, which relates to the reign under which our Monsieur de l'Hospital held the office of Chancellor. "It was said one day to Monsieur de Villeroy, that

(109) Brantome, Mémoires, tom. 2, pag. m. 73, in the Elogium of the Constable Montmorenci.

(110) Montagne, Essais, lib. 2, cap. 17, pag. m. 576, 577.

(111) Menage, Modi di dire Italiani, at the end of his Etymologies of the Italian Tongue.

(112) You will find them translated into Latin in Vossius de Scient. Mathem. pag. 237.

(113) Costar, Suite de la Défense de Voiture, pag. 189.

(114) His French name was Gubertius, as I learn from the Sieur Guichenon, pag. 36, of the Hist. de Bresse.

(115) Jacobus Gutherius, de Jure Manium, lib. 2, cap. 26, pag. 351, edit. Lips. 1671.

" he was the fittest man in the world to write the History of Charles IX, since he had a share in the whole of it; and that upon this account he ought to write it. I have too many obligations to that Prince, said he, and I love his memory too much to write his history (§2); meaning, that the truths which he should be obliged to relate, would be a disgrace to the King (116)." This is what the author of the book, intitled, La Fatalité de Saint Clou, says; but Mr. le Laboureur (117) tells us, that Morvillier made that answer. I should choose to follow this latter tradition.

(§2) The edition of Montagne's Essays in 16mo printed at Lyons by Francis le Fevre 1595 has suppressed this as injurious to the French Nation. However it is no more than that of Livy, lib. 10. Galorum prima prælia plus quam virorum, &c. a saying, which Rabelais has not scrupled to put into the mouth of one of Garagantua's Generals, in a speech which he makes in a full council, and before his master. CRIT. REM.]

(§3) It is probable that this repartee, which in Matthieu's History of Louis XI, pag. 571, edit. 1610, is related of a certain Lord to one Monsieur de Tinteville, who had said to him, that none could write the Life of his late master better than he, was originally made by Chancellor Morvillier, whom Lewis XI had affronted by disowning some severe words which he had charged him to deliver in his name to the Count of Charolois. CRIT. REM.]

[P] He expressed in his will his inclination to peace.]

He was desirous, in this last act of his life, to do himself honour on account of the same thing, which Cicero boasted in a full Senate. Quo quidem in bello, said that great Roman Orator, semper de pace agendum, audiendumque putavi; semperque dolui, non modo pacem, sed orationem etiam civium pacem efflagitantium repudiari; neque enim ego illa, nec ulla unquam secutus sum arma civilia: semperque mea consilia pacis, & togæ sociæ, non belli, atque armorum fuerunt. . . . Quod quidem meum consilium minimè obscurum fuit, nam & in hoc ordine, integra re, multa de pace dixi; & in ipso bello eadem etiam cum capitis mei periculo sensi (118). (118) Cicero, i. e. "In which war, I always thought it was proper to treat of peace, and was always sorry, that not only peace, but likewise the petitions of the citizens for it, were rejected; for I never followed those nor any other civil wars, and my advices have been constantly on the side of peace, and not of arms . . . This opinion of mine was far from being concealed; for in this assembly, while affairs were yet entire, I spoke amply in favour of peace, and during the war itself I declared my sentiments to the same purpose even to the danger of my life." There is scarce any thing in this but what Monsieur de l'Hospital might have said; but here is what he wrote in his will (119). "I can affirm, that tho' arms have been taken up four times, and four or five battles have been fought, I always advised peace, esteeming nothing so injurious to a country as a civil war, or more advantageous to it than peace upon any terms whatsoever (120)." Having afterwards spoken of the enemies whom that maxim had raised against him, and the misfortunes in which France was plunged, &c. he adds (121): "I gave way to arms, which were the strongest, and retired into the country with my wife, family, and little children, requesting but this one thing of the King and Queen at my departure, that since they had resolved to break the peace, and pursue by war those, with whom a little before they had concluded a peace, and since they had removed me from Court, because they understood, that I was averse to and had a bad opinion of their design; I requested the King and Queen, I say, if they would not acquiesce in my advice, yet at least, soon after they had satiated and glutted their heart and thirst with the blood of their subjects, that they would embrace the first opportunity of peace, which should offer, before things

(116) Fatalité de Saint Clou. I have mentioned that book in the article of HENRY III, quotation (89), and at the end of the remark [R].

(117) Le Laboureur, Audit. aux Mémoires de Castelnaud, tom. 1, pag. 522.

(118) Cicero, pro Marcello, pag. m. 581.

(119) Testament de Michel de l'Hospital, quoted by Colomies, Biblioth. Choise, pag. 60.

(120) See Pasquier's Letters, lib. 10, pag. 626, & seq. tom. 1, in which he represents the misery of civil wars.

(121) Testament, &c. Biblioth. Choise, pag. 62.

died March the 13th 1573, aged about sixty eight years [Q]. He made his only daughter, whom he had married to Robert Hurault, his heirs, and left his library to Michael Hurault, his second grandson, who has been well known by the name of Monsieur du Fay [R]. I could have mentioned a great many other particulars, but I have omitted them because they may be met with in Moreri, and in Monsieur Teiffier's Additions to the Elogies of Thuanus, or in the Elogies of Thevet, or in Brantome's Memoirs. This last, who was a man of the sword, has succeeded better in the elogium of this Chancellor (p), than all the professed writers, whom I have read, though I own, that Thuanus, and Scevola Sammarthanus have written very fine elogies on him. Ronfard's

(p) It is inserted in that of the Comtable de Montmorenci.

(q) It is the 10th of the 1st book. Richelet, who has commented on it, says, it is a master piece in Poetry. See also Paquier, lib. 22. of his Letters, p. 758.

(r) Brantome, Memoires, tom. 2. pag. m. 85. See in Varillas, Hist. de Charles IX. lib. 6. pag. m. 5. & seq. a particular account of this dispute.

(s) Brant. Mem. tom. 2. pag. 87, 88.

(t) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, cap. 5. pag. m. 784.

(u) Fortempesce animam, mortis terrore vacentem, &c.

Ode (q), designed as a compliment on this great officer of justice, has been esteemed an excellent one ; but in short, in some respects, I think nothing equal to Brantome's description. It shews us, that Monsieur de l'Hospital was a person, who might be opposed to all great and generous men of the gown among the antient Greeks and Romans. I shall quote in my remarks so many other passages, that to avoid prolixity, I shall wave citing what Brantome has written. I only desire my readers to consider two things. The first is, what he remarks concerning the dispute which the Chancellor maintained with the utmost resolution against the Cardinal of Lorraine, who demanded, that the Council of Trent should be received (r); the other relates to the intrepidity which Monsieur de l'Hospital shewed after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, when he had reason to believe, that the assassins had received orders to do execution in his house (s). I will add this one particular more. A famous author (t) having defined the force of the soul to be a " certain temper and disposition of mind always equal in itself, firm, stable, heroic, capable of seeing every thing, hearing every thing, and doing every thing without trouble, confusion, or amazement," adds, that this is very near the same with what Juvenal has described in six fine verses of his tenth satyr (u). " The Chancellor de l'Hospital, continues he (x), who was endowed with this strength of mind as much as any who went before him or followed him, described it still more briefly, though in terms much bolder, which he had taken for his device, Si fractus illabatur Orbis, impavidum se- rient ruinae (y)." See the margin (z). Shall I forget the services which he did even after his death? Is it not just to observe, that the maxims of State, upon which he regulated himself, were of great advantage to France, since he formed some disciples, who opposed in proper time the pernicious attempts of the Leaguers, and rendered them abortive [S].

(x) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, pag. 785, 786.

(y) These words are Horace's, Ode 3. lib. 3. and signify, that if the world should fall in ruins about him, it would not strike him with the least terror.

(z) The vigour which the Court of France shewed in 1565 against the Pope, who had cited the Queen of Navarre, &c. and who had been obliged to revoke his monitory, was the work of Mons. d'Hospital and the Comtable Montmorenci. See Thuanus, lib. 80. pag. m. 32, 33.

I shall

" things were reduced to extreme destruction ; for whatever would be the issue of that war, it could not but be very pernicious to the King and Kingdom."

[Q] He died . . . aged about sixty eight years.] He begins his will in this manner (122): " I have always been uncertain about my age, because my friends said that they have had various accounts from my father (*), who sometimes said that I was born before the war against the Genoese, sometimes said, that I was born at the time when that war was concluded by the late K. Lewis XII, in which my father served as Physician to Charles Duke of Bourbon." It would be strange, that an ignorant stupid peasant should not know the age of his son, and yet even this happens but seldom : but it is very strange, that a man of parts and learning, as Michael de l'Hospital's father was, should vary in that point not a day or a week, but several months. His son determines (123), that he was eighteen years old when the Comtable of Bourbon left France (124); he thought therefore, that he was born in 1505. Observe, that the war of Lewis XII against the Genoese was concluded in April 1507. Brantome, who has inserted in his memoirs (125) the Chancellor's will, does not omit the preface (126), which declares that the testator was sixty eight years old. The will is dated the third (127) day of March 1573. This is still placing his birth in 1505. If Thuanus (128) and Scevola Sammarthanus (129) had attended to these particulars, they would not have said, that Michael de l'Hospital lived about seventy years.

[R] His second grandson . . . has been well known by the name of Monsieur du Fay.] We see in his elogium written by Sammarthanus, that he was a man of considerable parts and learning, and Chancellor to the King of Navarre, and that he might have been advanced to the dignity of Chancellor of France, if instead of engaging unseasonably in the profession of a soldier, he had continued to apply himself to the functions and business of the gown. We find there that he died of regret in 1592, on account of his having been obliged to resign the government of Quillebeuf (130); but we do not find there, that he was actually of the reformed religion. Some have charged him with being ready to change his religion. See the Confession Catholique de Sanci (131), and the notes, which accompany it in the edition of 1699. He wrote in 1588 a piece intitled, Le franc & libre Discours (132), which was reckoned an excellent one. See the Perroniana in the word Fay, and Thuanus L. XCII.

[S] He formed some disciples, who opposed . . . the pernicious attempts of the leaguers, and rendered them abortive.] An anonymous author, whom I have already cited, furnishes me with a commentary, which I have occasion for. He says (133), that " if the devotion of a Minister or Counsellor of a Prince is not well grounded, and his zeal well regulated, it is impossible to imagine the evils which he may do. First, he suffers himself to be deceived, and afterwards deceives his master. For in the affair of devotion the ablest men are imposed upon. Many persons think themselves extremely pious and devout, if they are greatly ignorant of what concerns religion, for which they refer themselves to those whose business it is; some of whom, being practised upon, lead them a fine dance. We have spoken of the great misfortunes, into which several great Princes, who were otherwise men of prudence, have been involved for want of understanding this cabal. We shall speak one word of some of their Ministers . . . There were two sorts of them; for those, who had been educated under the discipline of the Chancellor de l'Hospital, held maxims, that were not only agreeable to Christian piety and moderation, but likewise useful for the preservation of the peace, and the maintenance of the King's authority. The rest, on the contrary, whether through conscience, without much knowledge, or in order to make a separate party, applied themselves in such a manner to the externals of religion, that they thought it better to suffer the Kingdom to fall into a combustion, than to allow the least accommodation in points of religion. Now the consequence of this diversity of opinions was, that this latter greatly assisted in forming, raising, and strengthening the league; and the other in destroying it and restoring the Kingdom, which the contrary faction had brought very near to ruin."

(131) Chap. 5. lib. 1. and cap. 9. lib. 2.

(132) It is inserted in the 3d tome of the Mémoires de la Ligue, pag. 1, & seq. under the title of Excellent & libre Discours sur l'estat présent de la France.

(133) Fragment de l'Examen du Prince de Machiavel, pag. 83, & seq.

(122) Ibid. pag. 52.

(*) John de l'Hospital.

(123) Ibid. pag. 53.

(124) He departed in 1523.

(125) Tom. 2 in the Eloge de Comtable de Montmorenci.

(126) It is not in the edition of Colomes.

(127) The 12th in Colomes's edition.

(128) Thuan. Hist. lib. 56. in fin. pag. 43.

(129) Sammarth. in Elog. lib. 1. pag. m. 60.

(130) See the Elogia of Sammarthanus, lib. 2. pag. m. 177, & seq.

(aa) In the remark [R].

I shall add something to the remark, which relates to Mr. du Fay, his grandson (aa) [T].

[T] I shall add something to the remark which relates to Monsieur du Fay, his grandson.] He wrote several treatises upon the affairs of those times. There are ascribed to him the Anti-Sixte, Anti-Espagnol, and the Francophile contre les Conspirations du Roi d'Espagne, du Pape, & des Rebelles de France (134). Mr. Baillet, from whom I take this, doth not give us any character of the first of these three tracts, and I know not whether he means a book which I have seen an edition of printed at Cologne by Herman Jolin (135) in 1586 in 8vo. The title of it is, Moyens d'abus, entrepries & nullitez du rescrit & bulle du Pape Sixte V du nom en date da mois de Septembre 1585, contre le Serenissime Prince, HENRY DE BOURBON, Roy de Navarre . . . & HENRY DE BOURBON . . . Prince de Condé, par un Catholique, Apostolique, Romain: mais bon François, & très-fidèle Sujet de la Couronne de France. i. e. "A Proof of the Abuses, Incroachments, and Nullities of the Rescript and Bull of Pope Sixtus V, dated September 1585 against the most serene Prince, Henry of Bourbon King of Navarre, and Henry of Bourbon . . . Prince of Condé . . . by a Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman, but a true Frenchman and faithful Subject of the Crown of France." As for the second edition of these three tracts, Mr. Baillet writes as follows. The Anti-Espagnol "has been printed at different times with some alterations. That which was published in 1594 in 12mo, is intitled. L'Anti Espagnol, & Exhortation de ceux de Paris qui ne se veulent faire Espagnols, à tous les François de leur parti, de se remettre en l'obéissance du Roi Henry quatrième, & de se delivrer de la Tyrannie de Castille. i. e. The Anti-Espagnol, and Exhortation of such Parisians as are unwilling to become Spaniards, to all the Frenchmen of their party, to return to their obedience to King Henry IV, and to de- liver themselves from the tyranny of Castille. It is the fourth and last of these excellent discourses concerning the state of France, published in 1695. But that which was afterwards revised, was published with the title of L'Anti-Espagnol, ou Brief Discours du but où tend Philippe Roi d'Espagne se meslant des affaires de France. i. e. The Anti-Espagnol, or a brief Discourse concerning the Designs of Philip King of Spain in meddling in the affairs of France. It is inserted in the fourth volume of the Memoirs of the League, published in 1604 by Samuel du Lis (136). There is an edition antecedent to both these, printed in 1590 in 8vo, and intitled only, Coppie de l'Anti-Espagnol fait à Paris. i. e. "A Copy of the Anti-Espagnol composed at Paris." My edition of the fourth volume of the Memoirs of the League is printed in the year 1595; the Anti-Espagnol is inserted in it at page 230. If Mr. Baillet saw an edition in 1604, it is not the first. What I shall now quote may serve as a supplement to a remark in the article of Gregory VII (137). It is that in which I observe, that it is not a certain method to judge of Princes by the pieces, which are published against them during the violence of factions. "It is usual for all factions to produce libels. He who wrote the Anti-Sixte, would not have stopped there, if he had not had express orders from the King to do so, long before he had the happiness of being reconciled to the Church. His Majesty, who never had any esteem for these turbulent and violent spirits, ordered that satyrical piece to be suppressed. But it was impossible to do so; and if it be preserved to another age, it will be made use of as a sword and shield by the enemies of the Church, who will rise out of the ashes of these people, to attack the head of the Church, according to their custom (138)." (136) Baillet, Recueil des Anti, Art. 122. (137) It is in remark [O]. (138) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Pape, cap. 16. num. 3. fol. 406.

HOSPITAL (FRANCIS DE L'), created Marechal of France April the 23d 1643 (a), was stiled before that time Monsieur du Hallier. Moreri copying Father Anselme speaks amply of his genealogy, and mentions his exploits and dignities; but he says nothing of a thing which I have read in an account of the State of France [A]. I shall relate it. I shall give likewise a supplement to an observation which I have made above concerning the first wife of the Marechal de l'Hospital [B].

I have

[A] Moreri says nothing of a thing, which I have read in an account of the state of France.] It is, that Marechal de l'Hospital "was originally of Calabria, of a very noble family, having had a great many alliances with the Kings and Queens of Naples. But the affection, which his predecessors had for Charles of Anjou second King of Naples, engaging them in his interests in opposition to the King of Arragon and Castile, they were obliged to retire into France, when these Spanish Princes refused the sceptre of that Kingdom (1)." Since Father Anselme has omitted this, he must either have been ignorant of it, or thought it not certain. He begins the genealogy of that family with one Francis de l'Hospital, who lived in 1314 and 1338 (2), and in another work (3) he goes no higher than Francis de l'Hospital, Chamberlain, &c. to Charles VI in 1404, and fifth grandfather to the person who is the subject of this article (4). Observe, that the author of the notes upon the Coups d'Etat of Gabriel Naudé is extremely mistaken in asserting that our Marechal de l'Hospital was descended from the Chancellor of that name.

[B] I shall give a supplement concerning the first wife of the Marechal de l'Hospital.] We have seen elsewhere (5), that he had no little delicacy, that he made no scruple to marry Charlotte des Essars, mother of several illegitimate children, some of whom she had by King Henry IV, and others by the Cardinal de Guise. I forgot, when I wrote that remark, what I had read in the notes upon the amours of Henry the Great. But since I recollect it now, it is necessary to inform the reader of a new circumstance concerning the victory which Mr. du Hallier had gained over matrimonial scruples. You will see, that Charlotte des Essars was a bastard herself, and that after the death of the Cardinal de Guise, she was mistress to another Prelate.

Henry IV "was still fond of Charlotte des Essars, the natural daughter of the Baron de Sautour in Champagne, and the Lady de Dheny, by whom he had two daughters. She had attended the Countess de Beaumont Harlay in her embassy to England. Then she was mistress to the Cardinal de Guise, who had several children by her, the Count de Romorantin, the Abbe de Chailly, the Chevalier, Madam de Rhodes, &c. Then she was mistress to Monsieur de Vic, Archbishop of Auch, three years. Then she married Francis de l'Hospital, Count de Rofnay, Baron de Beine, Marechal of France (6)." Father Anselme informs us, that she married about the year 1629, and that her husband "married for his second wife, August the 28th 1633, Frances Mignot, by whom he had a son, who died a few days after he was born (7)." Moreri observes, that the adventures of this Francis Mignot are very singular. This has been suppressed in the Paris Edition of 1699. The Marechal de l'Hospital's stars were not fortunate in that point.

Father Anselme (8) remarks, that Charlotte des Essars died in the year 1651. It must be concluded from this, that our Francis de l'Hospital procured his marriage to be dissolved, for he married another wife in 1633 (9). I know nothing how this affair came about, nor whether there are any books, which give us the particulars of it. I believe that many of my readers will imagine, that he discovered his mistake after he had committed it, and that in hopes to repair it, he carried on a suit against his wife. He did not perhaps find her so rich as he had thought. He probably imagined, that a woman, who had been successively mistress of the King of France and two Archbishops, had amassed a vast fortune; and that if a man of quality is allowed to marry a maid of mean birth,

(a) Anselme, Hist. des grands Offic. pag. 266.

(1) Etat de la France, printed in 1657, pag. 92, 93.

(2) Anselme, Palais de l'Honneur, pag. 414.

(3) Idem, Hist. des grands Offic. pag. 232.

(4) Pag. 905.

(5) Above remark [B] of the article GUISE (Lewis de &c.)

I have said in the second edition of this Dictionary, that Father Anselme has not observed, that the family of this Marechal was originally from the Kingdom of Naples, as another writer, whose words I cited, had remarked. I shall confirm this by the testimony of another author, and shew that the Marquis de l'Hospital, one of the most profound Mathematicians of the seventeenth Century, was of the same family with this Marechal of France [C].

birth, but who brings him the treasures of a financier, he ought not to be blamed for putting his own affairs into a good condition by marrying a woman, whose gallantries had raised her a great fortune. If he reasoned in this manner, and found afterwards that the Lady's fortune would not repair either her want of youth or reputation, what remained for him to do but to annul the contract? However that be, the Lady gained the great end of those of her sex: she had an husband; she entered the port in spite of so many storms and shipwrecks. It is very probable, that the notion of her being rich procured her an husband. Let us conclude this remark with some verses of Regnier:

*Je ne suis point adroit, je n'ay point d'éloquence
Pour colorer un fait, ou destourner la foy,
Prouver qu'un grand amour n'est sujet à la loy,*

*Debaucher une fille, & par vives raisons
Luy monstret comme Amour fait les bonnes maisons,
Les maintient, les esleve, & propice aux plus belles
En bonneur les avance, & les fait Damoiselles.*

*Et pour le faire court
Dire qu'il n'est rien tel qu'aymer les gens de court
Allegant maint exemple en ce siecle ou nous sommes
Qu'il n'est rien si facile à prendre que les hommes,
Et qu'on ne s'enquiert plus s'elle a fait le pourquoy,
Pourveu qu'elle soit riche, & qu'elle ait bien dequoy.
Quand elle auroit suivy le camp à la Rochelle,
S'elle a force ducats elle est toute pucelle.
L'honneur estropié, languissant, & perclus,
N'est plus rien qu'un idole en qui l'on ne croit plus (10).*

" I have no art nor eloquence to colour
" A faulty action, or to overthrow " Justice and right, or prove that powerful love
" Is subject to no law.

" Debauch a girl, or shew her by sly reasons,
" That love's the cause of raising families,
" Exalts the fair, propitious to their fortune,
" And gives to them the rank of Gentlewomen.

" And in short, to say,
" 'Tis honourable to intrigue with Courtiers,
" Urging examples of the present age;
" That men are easy to be gain'd upon,
" And that the only question now in vogue,
" Is what a woman has, not how she got it;
" And tho' to Rochelle she the camp has follow'd,
" If she be wealthy, she is still a maid.
" Honour's an idol now no longer worshipp'd."

(10) Regnier, Sat. 3. fol. m. 12. He says in Sat. 13. fol. 66 verso, que lors qu'on a du bien, il n'est si decrepité, Qui ne trouve (en aimant) couverte à sa marmite.

(a) Thus he writes his name at the beginning of his books. Many persons write it Hottomanus, or Hottomanus.

(1) Born at Emmerick in the county of Cleves, according to Mr. Baillet, tom. 2. of the Anti, p. 131. (2) Thus I correct the mistake Ludovic VI, in the Life of Hotman in the edition

HOTMAN (FRANCIS), in Latin Hotomanus (a), was one of the most learned Civilians of the sixteenth Century. He was born August the 23d 1524 at Paris, where his family, originally of Silesia [A], had flourished for some time. At fifteen years of age he was sent to Orleans to study the Civil Law, and he became capable of a Doctor's degree in three years. His father, a Counsellor in the Parliament, who had already designed his employment for him, sent for him home, and placed him at the bar. But the young man was soon displeas'd with the chicane of the Court, and applied himself vigorously to the study of the Roman Law and of Polite Learning. He relished the new opinions, on account of which a great many persons were put to death in the Kingdom; and finding that he could not profess them at Paris, went to Lyons in the year 1547, where he published a book. This was the second work which he had com-

[A] His family was originally of Silesia.] There are several families of the name of Hotman at Breslaw, the capital of Silesia, and from these are descended several others settled in Lusatia, in Misnia, in the country of Cleves, &c. LAMBERT HOTMAN (1) went into France to bear arms in the service of Lewis XI (2), and married advantageously at Paris. JOHN HOTMAN,

There are truths as well as hyperboles in the expressions of this Satyrift. See the margin (11).

[C] I shall confirm this by the testimony of another author, and shew that the Marquis de l'HOSPITAL, one of the most profound Mathematicians of the XVIIth century, was of the same family with this Marechal of France.] The Count de Sainte-Mefme, who died December the 4th, 1701, " was of the family de l'Hospital, a family much more illustrious of itself (since the origin of it is lost in royal and consular families) than celebrated for the great posts and high dignities, which it held in France for above four hundred years, that it was settled there. It was originally of Naples, and bore the name of Gallucy; which it quitted to assume a French name, which was that of the Estate of L'Hospital, which one Gallucy, the head of that house in France, bought upon his arrival there (12)." You will observe, that this Count de Sainte-Mefme was descended (13) of ALOLF DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Choisy, Captain of the Forest of Orleans, elder brother of CHARLES DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Vitry, from whom the Marechal of France sprung. These two brothers were sons of HADRIAN DE L'HOSPITAL and Anne Rouhault, daughter of Joachim Rouhault, Marechal of France. He paid homage to the King at Paris, November the 27th, 1498. The Count de Sainte-Mefme was Lieutenant-General of the King's armies, Governor, Bailif, and particular Judge of the Waters and Forests of the County of Dourdan, first Master of the Horse to Gaston of France, Duke of Orleans, Gentleman of Honour, and first Master of the Horse to the Duchess Dowager of Orleans (14), and afterwards to the Great Duchess of Tuscany (15). You will find his elogium in the book, which I quote (16). He was married to Elizabeth Gobelin, daughter of Monsieur Gobelin, Counsellor of State and Intendant of the Ar-mies, and left two sons. The elder is the Marquis DE L'HOSPITAL, Author of the Analyse des infinites petits. The younger is the Count DE L'HOSPITAL, who enjoys the same place under the Duchefs of Tuscany, which his father held (17). The Marquis de l'Hospital, Author of the Analyse des infinites petits, and one of the greatest Mathematicians of our age, died at Paris the 2d of February 1704, aged forty three years. See his elogium in the Memoirs de Trevoux (18), and in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (19). " He married Mademoiselle Romille de la Chenelaie, with whom he lived always in so perfect an union, that he communicated to her his genius for the Mathematics. He left four children, a son and three daughters (20)."

(11) See the remark of the article ESSARS (Charlotte des) you will find there that the second marriage of our Marechal was posterior to the death of his first wife.

(12) Mercur Galant, for Jan. 1702, pag. 170, that this Count de Sainte-Mefme was descended (13) of ALOLF DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Choisy, Cap-tain of the Forest of Orleans, elder brother of CHARLES DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Vitry, from whom the Marechal of France sprung. These two brothers were sons of HADRIAN DE L'HOSPITAL and Anne Rouhault, daughter of Joachim Rouhault, Marechal of France. He paid homage to the King at Paris, November the 27th, 1498. The Count de Sainte-Mefme was Lieutenant-General of the King's armies, Governor, Bailif, and particular Judge of the Waters and Forests of the County of Dourdan, first Master of the Horse to Gaston of France, Duke of Orleans, Gentleman of Honour, and first Master of the Horse to the Duchess Dowager of Orleans (14), and afterwards to the Great Duchess of Tuscany (15). You will find his elogium in the book, which I quote (16). He was married to Elizabeth Gobelin, daughter of Monsieur Gobelin, Counsellor of State and Intendant of the Ar-mies, and left two sons. The elder is the Marquis DE L'HOSPITAL, Author of the Analyse des infinites petits. The younger is the Count DE L'HOSPITAL, who enjoys the same place under the Duchefs of Tuscany, which his father held (17).

(14) Wife of Gaston of France. (15) Mercur Galant, January 1702, pag. 169-170. (16) Ibid. pag. 172, & seq. (17) Taken from the Mercur Galant, ibid. pag. 179, 180.

(18) In the Addition to the month of Feb. 1704, pag. 24, & seq. of the edit. of France. See also June 1704, pag. 1014, & seq.

(19) June 1704, Art. 2.

(20) Journal de Trevoux, June 1704, pag. 1016.

his eldest son, was so rich, that he disbursed very great sums for the ransom of Francis I (3). PETER HOTMAN, the youngest of the eighteen children of Lambert, was Chief-Justice in Eyre, and afterwards Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris. FRANCIS HOTMAN was his eldest son (4). The Supplement to Moreri asserts, that HENRY HOTMAN, born at Cleves in the year of Leipzig 1686, and that of Amsterdam 1700.

(3) Redimendo Franc. Regi ad Titulum capto, ingentem pecuniam solus fide sua curaverit summo Gallie bono, summa sua cum laude Petrus Neveletus Dofchius, in Vita Fr. Hotmanni, pag. m. 208. 1466, (4) Idem, ibid.

mitted to the prefs [B]. Seeing that he had nothing to hope for from his father for his subsistence, he went to Lausanne [C], where the Magistrates of Berne gave him the place of Professor of Polite Literature. He published there some books, and married a French Gentlewoman (b), who had retired thither on account of Religion. His merit was so well known in all parts, that the Magistrates of Strasburg offered him a Professorship of Civil Law; and while he was discharging the functions of it, he received invitations from the Duke of Prussia and the Landgrave of Hesse. He did not accept of those invitations; but he did not refuse to go to the Court of the King of Navarre at the beginning of the troubles. He went twice into Germany, to desire assistance of Ferdinand in the name of the Princes of the blood, and even in the name of the Queen-mother (c). The speech which he made at the Diet of Francfort is published. Upon his return to Strasburg he was prevailed upon by John de Monluc to go and teach Civil Law at Valence [D]; which he did with such success, that he raised the reputation of that Univerfity. Three years after he went to be Professor at Bourges, at the invitation of Margaret of France, sister of Henry II; but he left that city in about five months, and retired to Orleans to the heads of the party, who made great use of his advice. The peace made a month after did not prevent him from apprehending the return of the storm; upon which account he retired to Sancerre, and waited there for better times. It was there that he wrote an excellent book de Consolatione (d). He returned afterwards to his Professorship at Bourges, where he was very near being killed in the massacre in 1572. But having the good fortune to escape he left France, fully resolved never to return thither, and went to Geneva. He read there Lectures upon Civil Law, and published books against the persecutors with such strength, that great promises were made

(b) She was of Orleans and her name was Claudine Aubelin. Petrus Niveletus, ubi infra, citation (e).

(c) See below the citation (23).

(d) His son published it after his father's death.

1466, was the first of that name, who came into France, and that he came thither with Engilbert, Duke of Cleves, who was the first Duke of Nevers.

[B] This was the second work which he had committed to the Press. For he had already published a little Tract de gradibus cognationis, which was greatly esteemed. Pene puer libellum de gradibus cognationis adjuncto diagrammato publicavit à doctissimis viris in precia habitum, & mox à quodam haud ignobili Jurisconsulto probatum, ita ut eum suis in institutiones commentariis vehementer commendatum insereret (5). i. e.

(5) Idem, Neveletus in Vita Hotmanni, p. 210.

“ While he was very young he published a small tract of the Degrees of Affinity, to which he added a table, and this tract was highly esteemed by men of the greatest learning, and approved of so much by a considerable Civilian, that he inserted it with great commendations in his Commentaries on the Institutions.” The second work was a Commentary ad titulum Institutionum de actionibus. The beauty of the style, and the knowledge of the Roman antiquities, which were very conspicuous in this piece, made it prodigiously esteemed (6). Mons. Teiffier (7) ought not to have applied this fine encomium to the little tract upon the Degrees of Affinity. If he had consulted with a little more attention the work, which he quotes (8), he would not have taken one for the other.

(6) Juriconsultis etiam magnis gratum ob Latini sermonis elegantiam, & Rom. antiquitatis exquisitam scientiam. Idem, ibid.

(7) Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 2. pag. 115.

(8) Nevelet, Vita Hotmanni.

(9) Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 2. pag. 115.

La Croix du Maine will inform you, that the French translation, which Hotman made of the Apology for Socrates, written by Plato, was printed in 1549 at Lyons, by Sebastian Gryphus, in 8vo.

[C] He went to Lausanne. Mr. Teiffier says, that Francis Hotman, when he left France, retired to Geneva, and lived some time in Calvin's house (9). I believe that he is in the right, though the Life of Hotman, which he quotes, mentions nothing of it. It seems that Nevelet has suppressed a particular, which he ought not to have omitted. Is it not very probable, that the Magistrates of Bern should offer a Professorship in Polite Literature in the University of Lausanne to a youth of three and twenty years old, who lived at Lyons. But it is probable that they offered it to him, if we suppose that he lived at Geneva, and that he had gained the affection of Calvin. Here we see the want of exactness, which is to be found in the best books, because good Authors generally are those, who value themselves upon making their Narration concise. They do not always consider, that by contracting it in this manner they sometimes strangle it.

(10) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 25, 26.

Brevi esse lubero, obscurus sibi (10). This may have been the case of Nevelet here: or we may say, that not having seen in the memoirs given him the journey from Lyons to Geneva, he thought, that Francis Hotman did not leave Lyons till he went to be Professor of Polite Learning at Lausanne. In urbem Equestrum . . . ad humaniorum quæ dicuntur literarum professionem honorifice à Senatu Bernensi Reipub. evocatus, cujus in ditione urbs illa se consulit (11). But let us not determine in favour of what is most probable, for as there was then at Lausanne several eminent Refugees, who knew and had a great esteem for the merit and piety of Francis Hotman (12), they might easily obtain of the Magistrates of Bern to send an invitation to him, while he lived at Lyons. Mr. Teiffier observes, that it was by mediation of Theodore Beza, that the city of Lausanne offered to Hotman the post of Professor of Polite Learning. I believe, that he is mistaken, and that he should rather have said, that it was by Calvin's mediation; for Hotman was Professor at Lausanne, before Theodore Beza went to be Professor of Greek there: Erant Lausannæ tunc temporis doctrina & pietate viri insignes Petrus Viretus Ecclesie Pastor . . . Franciscus Hotmannus eloquentiæ Professor (13): And it is certain Theodore Beza had occasion for the interest of Calvin to obtain that Professorship. Is it possible, that a man should procure for another a Professorship in a city, where he is not, and in which he cannot settle himself but by the interest of another? Mr. Teiffier undoubtedly thought, that Beza was Professor of Greek at Lausanne before Hotman was sent for thither. Judge how important it is in a narration of this sort of little particulars, to consult well the dates and niceties of Chronology.

(11) Neveletus, in Vita Hotmanni, pag. 211.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) In Vita Theodori Bezae, apud Melchior Adam, pag. 205.

[D] Upon his return to Strasburg, he was prevailed upon by John de Monluc to go and teach Civil Law at Valence. If Thuanus had consulted dates, he would not have said, that John de Monluc took Hotman from Lausanne, to settle him at Valence. Lausannæ primum docuit, inde à Joanne Monlucio Valentis Episcopo, & postea à Margarita Biturigum Duce evocatus repetitis vicibus Valentis & Avarici Biturigum, ubi cum aliquando audiivi, evocatus, &c. (14). i. e. “ He first taught at Lausanne, and thence was sent for by John de Monluc, Bishop of Valence, and afterwards by Margeret Duchefs of Berry, two several times, to Valence and Bourges, where I heard him.” These words repetitis vicibus, were not understood by the French translator: he thought that they meant, that Hotman taught Civil Law by turns, sometimes at Valence, and sometimes at Bourges (15). It is not so: he did not teach again at Valence after he had once left it. It should therefore have been said, that the Duchefs of Berry sent for him twice to Bourges, as may be seen in the body of this article. Those who see in the life of Francis Hotman the series of his removals from one City to another, will pay no regard to the Memoirs given to Thuanus, since he says, that after the massacre in 1572, Hotman went to Montbelliard, and thence to Basil. He should have said, that he went to Geneva, thence to Basil, thence to Montbelliard, afterwards to Geneva, and at last to Basil.

(14) Thuan. lib. 99. pag. 373, ad ann. 1590.

(15) See the Eloges tirez de Mr. de Thou par Mr. de Teiffier, tom. 2. pag. 136. edit. 1696.

to him, to engage him not to write any more in that manner; but he did not regard those offers [E]. Some time after he went to Basil, and taught Civil Law there. The plague obliging him to leave that city he retired to Montbelliard, where he lost his wife. He went afterwards to Geneva, and wrote a book there upon the rights of the King of Navarre [F]; after which he returned to Basil, and died there February the 12th 1590. He

(16) Menard was mistaken in saying in his Great History, tom. 3. pag. 293. that Francis Hotman was a refugee in the Palatinate, when he published his Franco-Gallia.

(17) Pag. 227.

JUDGMENT concerning the book intitled, Franco-Gallia.

(18) This is only a translation of the Latin of Thuanus, lib. 57. pag. 49. ad ann. 1573.

(19) Teiffier, Ad-ditions aux Elo-ges de Mr. de Thou, tom. 2. pag. 139.

(20) It was written from Strasburg in 1595 upon the subject of the Life of Francis Hotman written by Nevelet.

(21) It is in the original la doute; but I think it ought to be la douleur.

(22) Lettres de Bongars, pag. 651. edit. de la Haye, 1695.

[E] He published at Geneva (16) books against the persecutors with such strength, that great promises were made to him... but he did not regard those offers.] Here is what the author of his life says (17). "Ad Allobroges igitur iterum tanquam in portum se refert, scriptisque aliquot eruditissimis contra fidem immo per fidem ipsam cælorum innocentiam constanter tuetur: Et quidem adeo efficaciter, ut qui mollem putabant futurum ejus in tanta calamitate animum, prolixis sollicitationibus hortarentur ab istiusmodi scriptis genere abstinere; quibus ille hoc tantum reposuit, Nunquam sibi pro pugnatam causam quæ iniqua esset: nunquam quæ jure & legibus niteretur, desertam præmiorum spe vel metu periculi; opprimi enim in bona causa melius, quam male cedere. Non modò non excusandum parricidium, ultro etiam defendendam causam innocentium." i. e. "He retires therefore again to Geneva, as to a secure haven; and in several learned treatises boldly defends the innocence of those, who were killed contrary to all faith, nay on account of their faith; and this he did with such force, that those, who thought his mind would be broken in that great calamity, urged him with large promises to refrain from that way of writing; to whom he made only this answer; that he never defended an unjust cause, and never deserted a good one through hope of reward or fear of danger, since it was better to fall in a righteous cause than to retreat with dishonour. That the massacre was so far from deserving to be defended, that the cause of the innocent ought voluntarily to be undertaken." A little after he mentions the book de Regni Gallie statu, which Hotman published about this time under the title of Franco-Gallia. It is a work valuable on account of its learning, but very unworthy a French Civilian, even in the opinion of many Protestants. Here is what Mr. Teiffier says. "His book intitled Franco-Gallia drew upon him WITH REASON the censure of true Frenchmen. For in this work he endeavours to prove (18), that this Kingdom, the most flourishing one in Christendom, is not successive, as the inheritances of private men are; and that antiently persons were advanced to the Crown only by the suffrages of the nobility and people; so that as antiently the power and authority of electing Kings belonged to the States of the Kingdom, and to the whole nation assembled in a body, so it was the States who deposed them from the government. And to this purpose he produces the examples of Philip de Valois, John, Charles V, Charles VI, and Lewis XI. But what he principally insists upon is to shew, that as it has always been judged, that women were incapable of the crown, so they ought always to be excluded from all public posts and administration (19)." Let us join to this passage of Mr. Teiffier the following judicious words of Bongars, extracted from a letter to Thuanus (20). "I will frankly own to you, de Franco-Gallia, vellem parcius, both because the book is unseasonable, and it seems to me, that the good man is grossly mistaken in this dispute. Grief (21) gave some colour to this work, when it was printed at first; and we suffer a great many words to escape us in extreme sorrow, which we should be ashamed to have represented to us, after our passion is over. I write you what I think, not knowing your judgment about it. I am sorry, that I did not do it sooner. I know well enough that the good man was pleased with this piece; he shewed it by the repeated editions of it. It is a disease, which many, too many of our nation are seized with, who would gladly reduce our monarchy to an anarchy. If there be any evil in a thing, we must not say therefore, that it ought to be destroyed (22)." Bongars, it will be said, put his finger upon the wound; Hotman was in a passion against his country, when he wrote that book; and not content with having revenged himself upon those, who governed at that time, endeavoured to discharge his resentment upon the monarchy itself, and the whole body of the nation; and this with so little judgment, that he furnished very strong arms to the league for the exclusion of Henry IV; for according to his principles, the Catholics of France had a full right to elect the Duke of Guise King, to the prejudice of the Princes of the Blood. A passionate writer (will it be farther said) is not capable of considering what may happen: he thinks only of the present: he does not reflect that times may change, and that the doctrine, which agrees at present with the interest of our cause, will be one day favourable to our enemies. This is what happened in France under Charles IX and under Henry III: each party was obliged to confute itself, as Montagne has finely observed. See the remark [7]. It is certain that if Catherine de Medicis had espoused the reformed religion, and established it in France, Hotman would have wrote an excellent book to prove that the regency of women is a very good thing, and agreeable to the design of our fundamental laws. With what force would he have confuted the Papists, who should have written against that Queen? The strongest reason, which the Protestants of France urged to justify their first taking of arms, is what Catherine de Medicis wrote to the Prince of Condé. They owned therefore the authority of that woman. Did not Hotman desire assistance in Germany in the name of that Queen? Ab his paulo post, immo & ab ea, quæ tum minore annis regem regnumque administrabat, in Germaniam bis missus est de Regis regni rebus legatus, & auxilium à Caf. Ferdinando ordinibusque Germaniæ rebus ruentibus petere jussus. Exstat dicta tum ab eo in comitiis Imperii Francofordiensibus oratio (23). i. e. "He was soon after (23) Nevel. in sent Ambassador into Germany on account of the affairs of the King and Kingdom by these, and also by the Queen who was Regent during the King's minority, and was ordered to desire assistance from the Emperor Ferdinand and the States of Germany to prevent the ruin of the Kingdom. His Speech made in the Diet at Francfort is still extant." We shall see elsewhere (24), that he was accused of want of sincerity in his Franco-Gallia, and we shall endeavour to say something in favour of this learned man.

[F] . . . and wrote a book there upon the rights of the King of Navarre.] It was that concerning the right of the Nephew against the uncle. Vexatam illam rebus ita postulantibus & magnis viris hortantibus tractavit controversiam, de successione inter patruum & fratris filium, atque in universum de jure successionis regni in regno Gallie (25). The league had put it into the head of Cardinal de Bourbon, uncle of the King of Navarre, to set up for the lawful successor, and they employed an Italian Civilian, who wrote a treatise Of the Right of the Uncle against the Nephew. Francis Hotman refuted it learnedly. Let us cite Father Maimbourg: "Anthony Hotman, says he (26), Advocate General of the league in the Parliament of Paris, wrote the treatise Of the Right of the Uncle against the Nephew to succeed to the Crown. But it happened by a lucky and pleasant co-incidence, that Francis Hotman the Civilian, brother to the Advocate, seeing this book, which was sold in Germany, where he was at that time, maintained with great strength and learning the right of the nephew against the uncle, and shewed plainly in a learned treatise, which he published upon that subject, the weakness and all the false reasonings of his adversary's book, without knowing that it was his brother who had not put his name to it." There are several mistakes in this passage. I. It is not true that Francis Hotman wrote against an unknown author. He wrote against one Matthew Zampini, of Recanati, an Italian Civilian. Id Mattheus Zampinus Rucanatenensis de trivio J. C. & federatis pecunia subornatus, edita consultatione probare conatus fuerat, quam Fr. Hotomannus magni nominis nostra ætate J. C. contraria consultatione itidem edita confutavit.

(e) Taken from his Life written by Petrus Neveletus Dofchius, whom we shall speak of below in the remark [O]. It is one of the ten Lives of Civilians, reprinted by Leickherus at Leipzig 1686. I make use of that edition.

(27) Thuan. lib. 81. init. ad ann. 1585.

(28) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 999.

(29) Thuan. lib. 91. sub finem. See also Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 708.

(30) Epitome Biblioth. Gesneri, pag. m. 239.

(31) Placcius, de Pseudon. p. 233.

(32) Idem, ibid. pag. 153.

(23) Baillet, tom. 2 des Anti. pag. 156.

(34) Lib. 82. pag. 33. ad ann. 1585.

(35) De Scriptis adelpotis, pag. 84. edit. 1686.

He had refused to go to Leyden, where there had been offered him a Professorship. He had time to put his works in order for a new edition (e), which was not published till a long time after his death in three volumes in folio (f). It does not contain all that he had published [G]. His Franco-Gallia, which he greatly valued (g), is that of his writings which is least approved of, and has persuaded some persons that he was the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos [H], which is a book entirely conformable to Republican notions. fatavit (27). i. e. "Matthew Zampini of Recanati, a mean Civilian, being hired by the Leaguers, endeavoured to prove this in a dissertation, which he published, and which was confuted in another treatise, published by Francis Hotman an eminent Civilian of our age." II. Consequently it is not true, that he wrote against his brother. III. It is not true, that he wrote this book in 1589 (*): he wrote it about the year 1585, as Thuanus observes; which agrees with Nevelet, who represents him as sixty years old at that time. IV. He was then at Geneva, and not in Germany. V. Anthony Hotman was not one of the Advocates General of the League in 1589: he was not so till two years after (28), when John le Maître, who performed that office with Lewis d'Orleans, was advanced to the Post of President au Mortier. The President Brisson was then dead. VI. It was Anthony Hotman, who wrote against his brother Francis Hotman, and not Francis who wrote against Anthony. Postea & peculiari libro quem consulationi à Francisco fratre pro Navarro edita... opposuisse videtur voluit. (Antonius Hotmannus) rationes amplificata (29). i. e. "Afterwards the arguments were proposed more amply in a particular book, which he (Anthony Hotman) seemed to oppose to a discourse published by his brother Francis in favour of the King of Navarre."

§ (a) I have a treatise intitled, Ad Tractatum Matthæi Zampini J. C. Recanatenfis, de successione prærogatiuæ primi Principis Franciæ; Ornatissimi viri P. C. A. F. Civis Parisiensis & Regii Consularii Responso. It is in 8vo, and consists of 80 pages, printed by the heirs of Wechelius 1589. Francis Hotman was a Parisian, and also Counsellor of State to the King of Navarre, who came to the Throne of France by the name of Henry IV during the life of Hotman. So that this may be his book. CRIT. REM.]

[G] It does not contain all that he had published. There are not inserted the burlesque pieces, which he wrote against Matharel and against Papyrius Masso, nor the book which he published at Geneva in 1553 under the name of Francis de Villiers, Ad Remundum Rufum defensorum Rom. Pontificis contra Carolum Molinæum de statu primitivæ Ecclesiæ &c (30), nor the Nullitatis protestatio adversus formulam Concordiæ (31), which he published under the name of Johannes Palmerius; nor the apology for this last book, in which he disguises himself under the name of Johannes Franciscus Apostolis Salassi V. D. M. (32). There is omitted his Anti-Tribonianus, which was published in French in 1603, and a Latin translation of which was printed at Hamburg in 1647. See concerning this book the curious Mr. Baillet (33). Lastly they have left out his Brutum Fulmen, which is not a burlesque piece, as Thuanus affirms. It is a work intirely serious, in which Francis Hotman refutes the bull, which Sixtus V published in 1585 against the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé. Postea, says Thuanus (34), & in censuram illam scripsit Franciscus Hotmannus J. C. joculari isto stilo, libroque Brutum Fulmen titulum fecit, quo & de B. Francisci & B. Dominici vita ac moribus veteres historiæ, ab obsolete devotis viris scriptæ ridicule discutuntur. i. e. "And Francis Hotman, a Civilian, wrote against that bull in a burlesque style, and intitled his book Brutum Fulmen, in which the old accounts of the lives and actions of St. Francis and St. Dominic, written by superstitious men, are exposed to ridicule." Francis Hotman treats of nothing less than of this subject.

Deckher (35) was misled in this point by Thuanus, but he has committed an error of his own: he asserts, that this learned Civilian was banished France on account of this piece. This is a mistake. Hotman left France in the year 1572, fully resolved never to return thither. Neque unquam postea induci potuit, ut in patria consistendum sibi judicaret: non Lindegawensis ipsius Ducis literis inflexus, non promissis, non denique cum ab eo Magister supplicum apud se libellorum dicitur esse:

(f) They were printed at Geneva by the care of James Lectius in 1599. (g) See the remark [E].

boc sæpe usurpans: Frustra Neptunum accusat, Jtesum qui naufragium facit (36). The Brutum Fulmen was published in 1585, as Deckher observes against Goldait, who has placed the edition under 1586. I have said nothing of the treatise de regno Vulvarum, which d'Aubigné ascribes to our Hotman in the second chapter of the first book of the Confession of Sancti: I know not what it is (3).

§ (3) The following epigram was in every body's hands about the year 1561 (*), occasioned by the greatest part of the Kingdoms of Europe being then governed by women, or at least under their administration.

Vulva regit Scotos (a), hæret (b) tenet illa Britannos, Flandros & Batavos nunc nostra vulva (c) regit. Vulva regit populos quos signat Gallia partu (d) Et fortes Gallos Italia vulva regit (e). His furiam furis, vulvam conjungite vulvis, Sic natura capax omnia Regna capit. Ad Medicem (†) artem incertam Gallia faucia tendit (†) Non uti Medicis est medicina tibi. Non credas Medicis, vena qui sanguinis hauria Conantur vires debilitare tuas. Ut Regi, matrique suæ sis fida Deoque, Utere concilio Gallia docta meo. Et pacem tu inter proceres non ponito bellum, Hospita (f) lis Artus rodit agitque tuos.

This possibly is the pretended treatise de Regno Vulvarum, ascribed to Francis Hotman by d'Aubigné. This Civilian was a Latin Poet, and his Franco-Gallia, which he published about twelve or thirteen years after, shews, that he did not approve of the administration of women. REM. CRIT.]

[H] Persuaded some persons that he was the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos] When I spoke of this work in the plan of this Dictionary, I said (37), that the mistake of those, who ascribed to Francis Hotman the book of Junius Brutus, is a small one. Hotman, continued I, "left France on account of religion, and though he was not like those, who fly from persecution, breathing out threatenings and slaughter (38) as vehemently as the persecutors themselves, yet he complained and murmured in his retreat. He wrote a book intitled Franco-Gallia, to shew, that the French Monarchy is not what it is supposed to be, and that in right; the people are the true Sovereigns in it. Here is what made it believed, that he also wrote the book of Junius Brutus, besides that we see a great many maxims of the Franco-Gallia dispersed in it. Barclay shews only this last reason, which seems to him plausible enough, and pretends to overthrow it by something still more plausible: It is, says he (39), that Brutus makes use of divers arguments, which Hotman had ridiculed and confuted, and that he falls into such childish errors with regard to the Civil-Law, as such a man as Hotman could not be capable of. This is more obliging towards this learned Civilian, than what Boeclerus says. I wish, says he, that Hotman had not affected so obstinately to appear among those writers, who sound an alarm against Kings, and who by their private authority convert them into tyrants, by means of chicaneries, which corrupt not only true Philosophy, but also the holy Scriptures. I wish that he had not shewn this bad example to others in his Franco-Gallia, and had not falsified History more than once, in order to indulge his prejudices with too servile a complaisance. Boeclerus's Greek phrase has much more force than this, Εἰς τὸ δαδῆσαι τῇ ἱστορίᾳ, etiam historiam non semel corruptit (40). . . . (41) I cannot forbear saying, that Boeclerus extremely ill treats Hotman, who, once more, was not one of those men, who after the example of some English Catholics of the last age, left their country for religion with threaten-notions. His own maxims were retorted upon him some time after [I]. It is difficult to avoid this inconvenience when a person writes upon certain subjects. He was well rewarded ning air, casting out fire and flame, vomiting a thousand imprecations, thundring out Maranatha, seeking to return thither sword in hand, or by the assistance of the most exterminating armies; in short, desiring a return, preceded, like the departure from Egypt, by all the plagues of Pharaoh, not excluding the passage of the destroying angel. Hotman was contented with the severity of his pen, and touching upon certain things, which were not agreeable. It is true, that without thinking of it, he laboured for the League (42), and forged arms for Bellarmine. It is true likewise, that his blows were like those of the Parthians (43); I mean, that in the condition of a fugitive he fought better than he could have done, if he had not retired; but his writings by no means deserve the blame, which ought to fall on others, which have been published in the same circumstances. For instance, the English Catholics in vain wrote satires and violent invectives against Queen Elizabeth (44): these writings are all lost, and the least use is not made of them by any party. However that be, the appearances were a little against Hotman with regard to the book of Junius Brutus; and as I have already observed, it was a very slight error to make him the author of the Vindicia contra Tyrannos.

(*) Le Laboureur, Addit. au Mémoires de Castelneau, tom. 1. pag. 773. (a) Mary Stuart. (b) Queen Elizabeth. (c) Margaret, Duchesse of Parma, natural daughter of Charles V. (d) Catherine of Austria sister to Charles V, widow of John III King of Portugal, and Regent during the minority of Sebastian her son. (e) Catherine de Medicis. (†) Medicam. (‡) Tendis. (36) An allusion to the name of the Chancellor de l'Hospital, to whom Catherine de Medicis chiefly owed the Regency. (37) Pag. 90. (38) Ἐμύριον ἀπειλιὰς καὶ ἐόντου, says the Scripture in the Acts of the Apostles, cap. ver. 1. concerning Saul. (39) Barclay, contra Monarchomacos, lib. 3. cap. 2. pag. 316. (40) In Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. 1. cap. 4. pag. m. 275. (41) In the Plan, pag. 92.

[I] His own notions were retorted upon him some time after.] It was by accident, and by a very common fatality, which changes the interests of parties, that Hotman's book was subject to the inconvenience, which I speak of. The revolutions in France changed the scene in such a manner, that the maxims of the two parties passed reciprocally to the direct contraries. It is pleasant to see how finely Montagne ridicules the Catholics. "See, says he (45), the horrible impudence, with which we throw about divine reasons, and how irreligiously we have rejected them and taken them up again, according as fortune has altered our situation in these public storms. This so important a proposition, whether it is lawful for a subject to rebel and take up arms against his Prince in defence of religion, you may remember to have been last year zealously affirmed by a certain party, and denied by the other party. But observe now in what quarter the affirmative is maintained, and whether arms rattle less for this cause than that. We burn those persons, who say, that truth should submit to the yoke of necessity; and yet how much worse does France than say so? &c." While the world continues as it is, there will always be every where ambulatory doctrines, dependent upon times and places; true birds of passage, which are in one country in summer, and in another in winter; and wandering lights, which like the comets of the Cartesians, inlighten by turns different vortices. Whoever should endeavour to act the Censor upon this occasion, would only be considered as an ill-natured Critic, a native of Plato's Republic. So that Hotman is not answerable for what the famous Advocate of the holy League found means to take advantage of from the Franco-Gallia. "They cannot complain, (it is Lewis d'Orleans who speaks in the name of the English Catholics), that the same measure is meted out to them as they have meted out to others. Follow their counsels, tread in the paths which they have taken to establish themselves, you will establish yourselves, and cover them with shame and confusion. In their Franco-Gallia, which is one of the most detestable books ever published, and written on purpose to throw all France into a combustion, they affirm, that it is lawful to choose a King to one's taste. Say therefore to the Heretics, that the King of Navarre is not to your taste, and therefore let him stay in his own country of Bearn, till you have an inclination for him. Thus should they be whipped with the rods which they have made, that they may know, that the powerful hand of God chastises them by their own evil counsels and pernicious writings (46)." This book of Hotman is at the bottom an excellent one, well written, and full of learning, and so much the more troublesome to the contrary party, as the author contents himself with alludging facts, as he represents himself to his censurers.

Cur vel Massonus, says he (47), vel Matharellus Franco-gallia scriptori & simplici historiarum narratori ita terribiliter irascitur? Nam ut dicit Sylva nup. lib. 1. num. 10. quomodo potest aliquis ei succensere qui est tantum relator & narrator facti? Franco-gallia enim tantum narrationi & relationi simplici vacat, quod si Antonii Matharelli. It is a piece of the Macaronic style. Why is Masson or Matharellus so terribly angry at the author of the Franco-Gallia, who is a mere relator of facts? For as the Sylva Nuptialis says, how can any person be displeased at one, who only gives an account of the fact? The writer of the Franco-Gallia does nothing but lay down a plain narrative: and if his quotations were removed, there would be nothing left but blank paper." He was reproached, that his book appeared to be the production of a man drunk, furious, and mad: he answers, that this reproach is a piece of impudence, which deserved punishment, since he had always kept up in this book the character of a moderate and cool relator. Quod dicit Franco-Galliam compositam ab auctore bene poto in aliqua anopolo, & eum evomuisse scriptum plenum furoris & insanie, video multos auctoris amicos, dictum istud appellare meretriciam impudentiam flagris & carcere dignam. . . . Ubi ullum iracundi animi signum? Ubi vox ulla perturbati animi in toto libro, ac non potius sedata & moderata narrationis (48)? This is a vast advantage in such kind of books. For the rest, though his answer is written in a burlesque style, it contains a thousand things, which must be seriously understood. Ridentum dicere verum quid vetat (49)? Such, for instance, is what he says there to his antagonist, that it is not sufficient that he had brought in his accusation, and given security de Lite prosequenda; but that he ought likewise to engage expressly to suffer the Lex Talionis, in case he should be convicted of calumny. Sed adhuc requiritur tertius ut se expresse obliget ad penam talionis, in casu quo probatur calumniator; quod probatur per L. ult. C. de calumniat. & omnes Canonistas; sed maxime per Hieronym. de Zanetinis in repetit. cap. 1. Extr. de accusat. De quo fit sumus concordet, & Matharellus se subiciat talioni in casu quod calumnia convincatur, totum negotium nostrum bene vadit, nisi forte, &c. (50).

If we believe an Historian, who had been a Minister, this book of Hotman did not please all who were of the Reformed Religion, and did not displease all the Catholics of France, and was not written without some relation to the cabal of the Marechal d'Amville. "A little after, says he (51), the Duke of Alençon, brother to his Majesty, retired from the Court with several Lords, being practised upon by the said Marechal d'Amville, and taking the name of malecontents joined themselves to the Huguenots, some of whom began then to write differently from what they had done before; and Hotman the Civilian in his Franco-Gallia undertook to shew, That the French people had a sovereign authority, not only to elect Kings, but also to reject the sons of their Kings, and elect strangers: and he says upon this subject many things, commending those people, who restrain the licentiousness of their Kings, and reduce them to reason. He proceeds, after discoursing upon other points, to except against the regency of Queens, the mothers of Kings; which he did, because the Queen-Mother had been declared Regent, till the return of the King of Poland her son. In short, he cited our antient Histories, right or wrong, according to his passion. This book was agreeable to some of the Reformed, and to some united Catholics, who wanted innovations, but not to all." D'Aubigné (52) gives the same plan of this book; but he represents it as being published in 1573, during the life of Charles IX. Thuanus (53) and Mezeris (54), who give the same plan, place it, the former simply in the reign of Charles IX, the latter before the departure of the King of Poland. This overthrows the hypothesis of Cayet, viz. that the Regency's being conferred on Queen Catherine at the time of the death of Charles IX, was one of the grievances of Francis Hotman. It is certain, that his book was printed before the Queen was declared

(42) See the following remark.

(43) Navita Bosphorum Parnus perborrescit. . . Miles sagittas & celerem fugam Parthi. Horat. Od. 13. lib. 2.

(44) See the remark [K] of the article ELIZABETH.

(45) Essai, lib. 2. cap. 12. pag. m. 193. Mezeris makes the same remark, pag. 792. of the 3d tome of the History of France.

(46) Advertissement des Catholiques Anglois, pag. 74. 75. edit. 1587 in 8vo.

(48) Idem, ibid.

(49) Horat. Sat. 1. lib. 1.

(50) Matagonis Monitoriale, &c.

(51) Peter Victor Cayet, Avant-propos de la Chronologie Novenaire.

(52) Hist. Univers. tom. 2. pag. 670. Simler, Epit. Bibliob.

Gesneri fixes the impression of the Franco-Gallia in 1573, and he is in the right.

This book was printed at Geneva by Jacobus Stoecrius in 1573.

The epistle dedicatory to the Elector Palatine dated Aug. 21, 1573.

(53) Thuan. Hist. lib. 57.

(54) Hist. de France, tom. 3. in fol. pag. 293.

(b) Nevelet in Vita Hotmanni, pag. 229.

warded for his Brutum Fulmen [K] by the King of Navarre. He was one of those who would never consent to be painted (b), but his picture was taken while he was in his last agony. He left two sons and four daughters. JOHN HOTMAN Sieur de Villiers, his eldest son, passes for the author of the Anti-Chopinus, a burlesque piece, and of the Anti-Colazon, which is an apology for his treatise of the Embassador, in which it was said, he had been a plagiarist from Charles Paschal. See Mr. Baillet (i). Moreri has not committed many mistakes [L]. I am surprized that there has been omitted in the Life of Francis Hotman a particular, which is very much to his honour: it is, that at the age of twenty three years he read public Lectures in the schools of Paris [M]. There is likewise no mention (and I do not wonder at it) of certain things which Baudouin had published against him, and which would blacken his memory horribly, if they were true [N]. One could not credit them, without declared Regent by the edict of the 30th of May, 1574; but he forefaw perhaps that she would be so; and it is very probable, that he had her in his view, in what he wrote against the Regency of women. He remembered the evils, which that Princess had caused during her first Regency. This able Civilian, who had quitted the place of Counsellor of Paris for his religion, would have done better to answer his adversaries (55) in a serious and modest manner, than to make use of the Macaronic stile. See what Mr. Baillet says in pag. 336 of the second Tome of the Anti.

(i) In the first tome of the Anti, pag. 120, & seq.

(55) Anthony Matharel, and Papyrius Masso.

[K] He was well rewarded for his Brutum Fulmen.] Let us begin our Commentary by these words of the Author of his Life. His meritis præmium deberi cum intelligeret Henricus tum Navarrae Rex, ultro codicillos ad eum misit Senatoriæ in Consistorio suo dignitatis: cujus tamen eum fructum non tulit, quem beneficis Princeps voluerat: ac opinor in tantis rerum omnium angustiis factum, ut ex annuo quod debebatur salario, vix ad eum quidquam, sicut audio, pervenerit (56).

(56) Nevel. in Vita Hotmanni, pag. 225.

i. e. "Henry then King of Navarre finding, that a reward was due to him on account of these merits of his, he sent him of his own accord a patent to be one of his Counsellors of State; but he did not enjoy that advantage of the place, which the generous King intended; and I believe it happened through the distres of the affairs, that of his annual salary scarce any thing came to him, as I am informed." Bongars, to whom Nevelet addresses the Life of Hotman, has made a reflection upon this passage. (57) There is another passage. After having said, that the King had, on account of his Brutum Fulmen, given him the place of Counsellor of State, cujus tamen eum fructum non tulit quem beneficis princeps voluerat (58: I assure you, Sir, that the King never bought a book so dear as that: it was paid for much above the value of it. It will be said to me, that I ought to have delivered my opinion upon these passages sooner; but it often happens, and to me too often, that we never consider till after the thing is done. I wrote to Mr. Hotman what I thought about the first (59); I do not touch upon the second; he might be offended, not knowing how the affair passed." Observe, that Nevelet does not speak there of the Brutum Fulmen, as Bongars supposes, but of the book against Zampini de Successione inter patrum & fratris filium.

(57) Lettres de Bongars, p. 651. printed at the Hague 1695.

(58) These words are full of mistakes in the edition of the Lettres de Bongars, which I quote; I cite them as they ought to be.

(59) That is, of what relates to the Franco-Gallia. See above the words of Bongars, remark [E] citation (22).

[L] Moreri has not committed many mistakes.] I. He fallacily supposes, that Hotman was saved by his scholars at Bourges, at a different time from that of the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day; that is, of one event he makes two. II. The year of his death is not rightly expressed: it should be 1590, and not 1591. And III, this mistake should not be imputed to Spondanus in citing him under the year 1591, n. 22. for it is under that numero in the preceding year that he speaks of Hotman's death.

[M] At the age of three and twenty years he read public lectures in the schools of Paris.] I prove this by the following words of Stephen Pasquier (60). "I can tell you, that one of the most lucky things which happened to me in my youth, was, that the day after the Assumption of our Lady in 1546, Hotman and Baudouin began their lectures of Law in the schools du Decret of this city of Paris; the former at seven in the morning, reading upon this title, De notionibus; the latter at two in the afternoon, reading this title, De publicis Judiciis, in a great assembly of Auditors. And the same day,

(60) Pasquier, Lettre a Mr. Loyfel. It is in the 19th book of his Lettres. The words, which I quote, are in page 501. of the 2d tome.

"under these two learned men, I began to study the Law."

[N] Certain things which Baudouin had published against him: . . . would blacken his memory horribly, if they were true.] Baudouin affirms; that Hotman was excommunicated at Strafburg for the crime of adultery.

Argentinae propter adulterium excommunicatæ sodalium tuum Hotmannum (Petrus Alexander) (61). i. e. "Peter Alexander excommunicated your companion Hotman at Strafburg for adultery." These words are addressed to Theodore Beza. The author had already mentioned this fact with more circumstances, (61) Respons. ad Calvin. & Bezaam pro Franco-ciso Balduino, folio 77.

and added, that the same Hotman lost likewise his canonry and office in the university. Recitata tunc quoque nostris fuit causa tui Hotmanni, nempe propter quod facinus illic aliquando primum fuisset excommunicatus ab suo Gallo Concionatore Petro Alexandro, te quidem propter antiquam societatem submurmurante, sed assentiente tamen tuo si minus parente, ac certe avo Gulielmo Farello, sæpius illum jurisperditum appellante. Addebant & complura ejusdem generis quæ per vulgata erant per Joannem Infantium, testem valde idoneum, & cujus non solum opera, sed & opibus quamdiu opus habuisti, tam liberalliter es abusus, ut fidem ei detrabere vix audeas. Altera causa fuit exposta cur tuus ille Hotmannus (cujus causa non est abs te sejuncta) ut antea Ecclesia, sic deinde schola & suo Canonatu pulsus esset: tandemque quid in eo Sturmianus ipse gravissimus accusaret narratum est, & perlecta Sturmiana adversus eum terribilis expostulatio, quæ profecto non modo de istius flagitiis, sed de vestrae conjugationis mysteriis narrabat nimis multa (62). i. e. "Then

"the case of your friend Hotman was related to us, viz. for what crime he was excommunicated there formerly by his own French Preacher Peter Alexander, while you complained on account of your old friendship with him, though at the same time William Farel, who is, if not your father, at least your grandfather, consented to it, and frequently styled him Jurisperditus. They added also a great many other things of the same kind, which were told about by John L'Enfant, a competent witness, whose assistance and wealth you made use of so freely, as long as you had occasion, that you will scarce presume to detract from his credit. There was another story related, why your friend Hotman, whose cause is connected with yours, was deprived of his school and canonry, as he was before expelled the Church; and at last the grievous charge laid against him by Sturmianus was told, and Sturmianus's terrible expostulation against him was read, which gave an account of too many things relating not only to his crimes, but likewise to the mysteries of your cabal." All these things were before the year 1562.

(62) Ibid. fol. 70 verso.

Baudouin a little after (63) mentions, that having known Hotman at Paris to be a man, who loved learning, he advised him to go and visit Geneva; that he entertained him in his house at Strafburg, with all possible civility, as an old friend, when Hotman retired thither, after having desired his interest for a professorship of Civil Law, and declared a great deal of dislike to teaching at Laufanne; Alterum Balduini ex non dissimili errore peccatum quod fuit Hotmanni tui Laufannæ languentis & in cædendis quos in tuo ludo Grammaticam docebat, pueris defatigati, & ex eo carcere liberari misere cupientis, & commendatione Balduini ad aliquam juris professionem redire literis temere crediderit (64); that he soon perceived, that he kept a viper in his bosom, since Hotman used all his endeavours to supplant him by secret artifices. Here follows one of his tricks: having by fraudulent inventions engaged Duanus

(63) Ibid. fol. 86.

(64) Ibid.

without believing, that it is much easier to be a perfect scholar and a great enemy to the persecuting religion, than to be a tolerably honest man. I shall speak one word concernrenus to address to him an invective against Baudouin, he dispersed it all over the city, taking care at the same time to conceal it from Baudouin. At last he was obliged by Sturmius to go to him, and bear his reproaches, and expressed great regret for his conduct. There is cited (65) a fragment of the letter, which Sturmius wrote to him, in which he accuses him of having employed a great many artifices to supplant Baudouin. They succeeded; for he made Baudouin weary of Strasburg, and induced him to seek another post (66), and Hotman succeeded him. All these particulars are found in the third reply of Baudouin to Calvin. He had before cited in the second Reply this letter of Sturmius, and had drawn from it a great many things disadvantageous to Hotman. He had mentioned a passage, which contained a reproach of an execrable perjury. Hotman, the same day that he received the communion, protested to Sturmius, that he prayed to God that the sacrament, which he received, might change him to a Devil, if he falsely denied what he denied (67). And yet adds Sturmius, he denied a thing which was very true. Baudouin mentions this as a proof, that his antagonist, who undertook to dispute about the Lord's Supper, paid no great regard to it; and he takes that opportunity to reproach him with being excluded from the sacrament in Germany on account of adultery. Etiā de mysterio Cæcæ Dominicæ disputat, & me cum sua Gallica (ut vocat) Ecclesia non idem sentire narrat, qui ab ea propter Cladianum facinus in Germania incommunicatus aliam quæcunque illi forte patuit mensam occupavit. Vis scire quanti facinus totum istud mysterium tuus Mystagogus? Audi Sturmium (68). i. e. "He also disputes concerning the

(65) Ibid. pag. 87.

(66) He went to Heidelberg.

(67) Balduin. Responsio altera ad Joann. Calvin. pag. m. 176.

(68) Idem, ibid.

(69) Idem, ibid. pag. 181, 182.

(70) These words are addressed to Calvin.

(71) It is a Libel, which I speak of in the article of GUISE (Francis) remark [I].

(72) That is to say, in these times one ought to seek the shades.

" whose tongue he proves to be as dangerous as poison
" itself? Is it not he, who some years ago described " his or your tumult at Amboise, and brought forth
" the Tiger, and is daily composing libels of the same " kind? Lastly, is it not that knave, who wrote to me
" formerly, that *in these times one ought to seek the
" shades?*"

Here is the reason why I made a distinction between what we read in the third reply of Baudouin, and what is in the second. Theodore Beza has refuted the second, but said nothing in answer to the third; so that the third is not of such great consequence against our Civilian Hotman; for we may presume, that if Beza had answered it, he would have justified that Civilian. We ought therefore to attend more to the reproaches contained in the second, since they may be compared with a piece, in which Theodore Beza refuted it. We must judge by that refutation, what might be the foundation upon which Baudouin proceeded. I have found, that his antagonist advances nothing, which may clear Hotman: he only says, that the reproach of ignorance in Latin, and being an atheist would not at all trouble Hotman, who would not condescend to open his mouth with regard to the latter charge. Magnum tibi certamen superesse video. Nam quæ tibi objecit magnam inscitiam arguunt, quæ tamen (ut ajunt) refellere non possit. Illa verò quæ regeris, cujusmodi sunt quæso? Latine scilicet nescit, ut cum oportuerit ad Latinam epistolam scribendam alterius operam requirere. Crimen autem atheismi, est omnium est gravissimum, ille tamen, ut opinor, ne responso quidem dignam putabit. Quid enim hoc aliud est quam latrare (73). i. e. "I see, that you have a hard " task to undertake. For what he objects to you,

" are marks of great ignorance, which, they say, you " cannot confute. But what is it, that you say in re" turn? He does not understand Latin; so that he " was obliged to make use of the assistance of another " person in writing a Latin letter. With regard to the " charge of atheism, though it is the most grievous of " all, yet he, I believe, will not think it worthy " of an answer. For what else is this but mere bark" ing?" There is nothing in this relating to the ac" cusations, which I have transcribed, and which are " to be found in page 176, 180, 181, 182 of Baudouin's
" second reply. All that Beza has answered in defence " of Hotman relates to page 175, where we find I, that
" Francis Hotman took to himself an Epistle Dedicatory,
" which Sturmius had composed. II. That he then com" mended the same works of Duarenus, which he had " despised before when he wrote against Rufus of Du " Moulin. III. That an elegant master of Cicero's " atheism is not a fit person to catechise others. *Noster
" magister Latinitatis prius quam de meis scripturibus gar-
" riat, suarum oblitus respondeat Sturmio & aliis à quibus
" accusatus est quod suo nomine ediderit epistolam abs Sturmio
" scriptam, eamque institutionibus præfixam tamquam
" suam vendiderit Duci Saxonie. . . Oportet istius tui pa-
" troni incredibilem esse, non jam dicam, impudentiam quia
" latitat, sed nequitia cum quidem posteaquam edito libello
" de sacerdotiis adversus Ruffum pro Molino, proscidit il-
" los Beneficiarios commentarios (Duareni) nunc eos se ad-
" rare fingat. . . scilicet religionem nos docebit elegans ma" gister Ciceronianæ* (74).

(73) Beza, *Re-
" spons. ad Balduin.*
" sub finem, pag.
" 223. tom. 2.
" Operum.

(74) Balduin.
" *Respons. altera ad
" J. Calvinum,*
" pag. 175.

I am certain, that all my readers will agree, in comparing these passages of Baudouin with that of Beza, that nothing could be more disadvantageous to Hotman than to answer as Beza has done. Silence would have done him infinitely less harm. To complete the misfortune, Beza published (75) a letter of Sturmius, which disowns all that could be alledged from him to the disadvantage of Calvin and Beza; but there is nothing of this kind with regard to Hotman.

(75) Beza, *Re-
" spons. ad Balduin.*
" Oper. tom. 2.
" pag. 234.

Languet, a true Refugee, and a perfectly honest man, having seen Sturmius's accusations against Hotman, made several very sensible reflections, and worthy of a pious man; but it was with a severe regret, that his countrymen should behave so scandalously in Germany, and that persons, who under pretence of religion sought only to gratify their vanity, did more injury to the Protestant Religion, than the King of Spain and the Pope. He could not believe that Hotman could forget

(k) In 1700 in ing the author of the Life of Francis Hotman [O]. The work printed at Amsterdam (k) under the title of Francisci & Joannis Hotomanorum Patris ac Filii & clarorum Virorum ad eos Epistolæ would furnish me with a great many additions to this article, with regard to our Civilian's application to the search after the Philosopher's stone, which was very injurious to his circumstances (l), and to many other particulars of his life; but it is better to refer the reader to Monsieur Bernard's Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (m). The extract which he gives of that work leaves nothing wanting. The reader may also consult the first volume Observationum selectarum ad Rem Litterariam spectantium printed at Hall in 1700.

(l) See the Funeral Oration of Scipio Gentilis apud Witte, Memor. Juriscons. pag. 33.

(m) March 1701, pag. 268, & seq.

forget himself so much as to be guilty of such crimes. Let us quote his own words. Hæc sunt levia si considerantur cum turpibus factis nostrorum hominum in Germania, & quidem eorum qui ornati sunt eruditione, & religionis specie, infirmarunt se in amicitiam bonorum virorum, qui ipsi summa beneficia exhibuerunt. Ut alios omittam, nuper vidi accusationem Sturmii adversus Hotmannum, quæ, si vera est, miseret me Sturmii; & pudet alterius, sed talia sunt, ut mihi videantur vix posse venire in mentem erudito viro. Quidam mecum egerunt, ut ipsius accusationis capita, ad te prescriberem, sed a talibus ministeriis ego plane abhorreo, cum præsertim sciam, te nec voluptatem nec utilitatem ex iis percipere posse, & ad me nihil pertineant, nisi forte infamiae pars in me redundet, eo quod a nostris hominibus talia perpetrentur in ipsa Germania. Hæc sane tanto dolore me afficiunt, ut nesciam an ex ulla re majorem unquam senserim. Video ubique eorum ambitionem, qui prætextu religionis sua querunt, magis odesse ipsius religionis progressui, quam Pontificem Ro. Regem Hispaniæ, & omnes ipsorum ministros. Sed de re odiosa nimis multa scribo (76). i. e. "These are light things, if compared with the scandalous behaviour of our countrymen in Germany, and indeed of those who are eminent for their learning, and under pretence of religion have insinuated themselves into the friendship of worthy persons, who have done them the highest services. To omit others, I lately saw Sturmii's accusation against Hotman, which, if true, I pity Sturmii, and am ashamed of Hotman; but the facts are of such a kind, that I scarce think that a man of learning could be guilty of them. Some persons have desired me to write the heads of the accusation to you; but I am greatly averse to such an employment, especially as I know, that you can find neither pleasure nor advantage from it, and as they have no relation to me, unless perhaps part of the disgrace is reflected upon me, because such things are done by our countrymen in Germany. This gives me so much regret, that I know not whether I ever felt greater upon any occasion. I see every where, that the ambition of those, who under pretence of religion seek their own interest, is more injurious to the progress of religion itself, than the Pope, the King of Spain, and all their adherents. But I insist too long upon a disagreeable subject." The letter from which I extract these words, is dated at Paris December the 11th 1561. Another of his letters dated at the same city January the 23d 1562 informs us, that the Duke of Guise, who was gone to meet the Bishop of Strasbourg at Saverne (77), had begun a prosecution against Francis Hotman for defamatory libels; and that many persons affirmed, that in consequence of this he had undertaken that journey. Languet could not think, that so slight a motive would have engaged the Duke of Guise to go to Saverne: but I do not doubt but that he judged it to be a disgrace to Hotman to be prosecuted as a libeller.

(76) Languet. Epist. 64. lib. 2. pag. 186, 187.

(77) Idem, Ibid. Epist. 67. pag. 197.

[O] I shall speak one word concerning the author of the life of Francis Hotman.] His Latin name Petrus Neveletus Dofebius, signifies Peter Nevelet, Lord of Osche. The title of this Lordship is given him in Pasquier's letters, as also that of Advocate in the Court of Parliament at Paris (78). He was son of a sister of Peter Pithou, as appears from a letter, which that uncle wrote to him, and which was printed at the end of Quintilian's declamations in some editions. Isaac Nicholas Nevelet his son published Æsop and the other ancient Fabulists, with notes in 1610. It was the first fruits of his studies, and he dedicated it to his father.

(78) See the 8th book of Pasquier's Letters, pag. 467. of tome 1.

HOTTINGER (JOHN HENRY) one of the most famous authors of the seventeenth Century, was born in Zurich the 10th of March 1620. The progress he made in his first studies gave such promising hopes, that the trustees of the schools resolved to send him to study in foreign countries, at the expence of the public. He began his travels the 26th of March 1638; and went to Geneva, whence, after two months stay, he went to France. He afterwards visited Flanders and Holland, and made choice of Groningen for the seat of his studies; but being very desirous of improving himself in the Oriental tongues, he went, a year afterwards, to Leyden (a), to be tutor there to the children of Professor Golius, who was the best skilled in those languages of any man in the world. He improved greatly, by the instructions which Golius gave him and the assistance of a Turk, in the study of the Arabic. He would have followed the Embassador (b) of the States General in 1641, in quality of Chaplain, to Constantinople, had the Magistrates of Zurich consented to it; but they chose rather to recall him, in order to employ him for the glory and advantage of their public schools. They permitted him to visit England before he returned to Switzerland; and the instant he was returned from that country, they appointed him (c) Professor of Ecclesiastical History; and a year after they gave him two Professorships, that of Catechetical Divinity, and that of the Oriental Tongues. He married at twenty two (d), and set up for an author at twenty four years of age [A]; and was so well pleased with

(a) In 1639.

(b) William Botwell.

(c) In 1642.

(d) See the remark [F].

[A] He set up for an author at twenty four years of age.] And this was not for a small enterprize, but to attack, on a very delicate and knotty subject, one of the most learned men of Europe at that time; Hottinger undertaking to refute father Morin's dissertations on the Samaritan Pentateuch (1). We may therefore apply to him the following words of the Chaplain de-coiffé.

(1) Printed in 1631, and not in 1651, as is said in Father Morin's Life, pag. 22. edic. Francof.

Mes pareils avec toi sont dignes de se battre, Et pour des coups d'essai veulent des Henriis quatre.

"My equals, sure, are worthy of engaging "With thee; and, for their first essay, would write
"An Epic Poem."

This work, which he intitled Exercitationes Anti-Morinianæ, was greatly approved by the Protestants, either on account of the author's erudition, or from the matter and subject, which could not be more favourable, since Hottinger defended the Hebrew text of the Bible, whose authority father Morin did all that lay in his power to enervate. In Mr. Simon's opinion this is one of the

with that character, that he afterwards was for ever publishing books [B]. This was not very difficult for him to do, he being extremely laborious, and was blessed with a very happy memory. It is nevertheless surprizing, that a man who had possessed so many academical employments, and was so often interrupted by visits, and by the very extensive literary correspondence in which he was engaged [C], should have found time to write the best works that Hottinger ever published; so that we may say that his first attempt was his master-piece. I will quote the whole passage of Mr. Simon, which is far from being advantageous to the memory of the Swiss doctor. "Had Hottinger observed some moderation in his works, and not dwelt so long upon trifles, we might find some useful things in them, with respect to the understanding the literal sense of the Scriptures. But as he generally writes for a party, and used to compose his works with too much precipitation, he is liable to frequent mistakes. One of his best works on this subject, is that written by him against father Morin's Exercitationes Samaritanæ; but neither is he quite accurate in this work (2)."

(2) Simon, Histoire Critique de vieux Testament, liv. 3. chap. 19. pag. m. 474.

[Father Morin had asserted, in the strongest manner, that this Samaritan Pentateuch was authentic, and preferred it to the Hebrew text, upon pretence that the latter had been corrupted by the Jews; and it was to combat this opinion that Hottinger wrote the work in question. Addition by the Translator.]

Mr. Simon criticized, in another book, this work of Hottinger; but then he does this in the most gentle manner, and without really designing to prejudice him.

(3) In Vita Job. Morini, pag. 36. 37.

His words are as follow (3): *Joannes Henricus Hottingerus, qui statim à Libri sui limine cujus hæc est inscriptio, Exercitationes Anti-Morinianæ de Pentateucho Samaritano ejusque ıdentica authentica; Morinum appellat Monachum qui communem Monachorum sortem superet. Ille de Samaritanis & eorum codicibus differit, putatque Samaritanos à Judæis Pentateuchi sui exemplar hausisse; sed conjecturis tantum, non autem firmissimis rationibus, ut ita sentiret, adduci potuit; istud minus accuratum esse probat exemplis aliquot pleonasmorum, vocum vel mutatarum in alias vel omisarum, similibusque erroribus quos profert, & ex quibus confici posse arbitrat, non magis credendum esse Samaritanis Pentateuchum suum jactantibus, quam Ebionitis verum & solum Matthei Evangelium Hebræum venditantibus, qua in re profecto gravissime hallucinatus est Hottingerus, qui tam venerandæ antiquitatis Pentateuchum Samaritanum cum adulterato Ebionitarum Evangelio comparare audeat. Morinum etiam imperitiæ arguit Hottingerus, quasi Rabbiorum quorundam quos laudaverat mentem baud affectus fuisse. i. e. "John Henry Hottinger, at the very opening of his work intitled, Exercitationes against Morin, with regard to the authenticity of the Samaritan Pentateuch, calls Morin a Monk, more learned than his brethren are generally found to be. In the work in question he treats concerning the Samaritans and their copies, and is of opinion that the Samaritans had their copy of the Pentateuch from the Jews; but he must have been prompted to think so, merely from conjectures, and not from any very solid reasons; he proves this to be less accurate, from some examples of pleonasm, omissions or changes of words, and such kind of errors; whence he thinks it may be proved, that we ought not to give greater credit to the Samaritans when they boast their Pentateuch, than to the Ebionites, when they pretend their being possessed of the only true Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew.*

(4) Jo. Henr. Heideggerus, in Vita Hottingeri, ad ann. 1644.

(5) The following words of Hottinger bear a relation to this; Non displicuerant hæc primitiæ viris eruditiss, qui hinc inde novo Morini conatus sine impostum publicis testatur scriptis. Hottinger in Biblioth. Tigurina. pag. 122.

"On this occasion Hottinger has been grossly mistaken, in daring to compare the Samaritan Pentateuch, so venerable for its antiquity, with the spurious Gospel of the Ebionites. He also charges Morin with ignorance, as not understanding some Rabbins he had praised." Heidegger had reason to observe, that father Morin's silence was a glorious circumstance with respect to our Hottinger; but I question whether he understood father Merfenne's thought (4). Liber totius erudito orbi charus, acceptusque fuit. Constat Morinum diu ad huc superflitem librum accepisse & legisse, neque contra mutire ausum (5). Et Merfennus, cui Hottingerus librum adjunctis literis misit, id solum respondit, nec sibi Hottingeri juvenilem ardorem satis probari, nec Hottingerum Morinum penitus nosse. Quasi videlicet juveni integrum non fuerit senum deliria taxare, & ipse Mori- *nus interiorem animi sui notam in vulgus edito libro non patefecerit. i. e. "This work met with a gracious reception from all the learned world. It is certain that Morin, who lived a long time after, received and read the book in question, but did not dare to speak or write against it. And father Merfenne, to whom Hottinger sent a copy of his work and a letter, answered only this, that he did not approve of Hottinger's juvenile fire, and that he (Hottinger) did not know Morin thoroughly. As tho' it were not just for a young man, to answer the dreams and chimera's of old men; and as though Morinus had not discovered sufficiently to the public, his design in publishing the book in question." In my opinion, father Merfenne meant only this, viz. that Hottinger did not know father Morin very well: and I do not doubt but the sense of his answer was this: *The fire of youth has carried you too far; and were you but fully acquainted with father Morin's merit, you would not treat him after this manner. Do you pretend to confute this, by saying that father Morin has laid open, by this work, the most hidden recesses of his heart? I will grant that he showed his intention was to raise the credit of the Latin translation of the Bible, and to weaken the authority of the original text; but is not this the interest, and general design of the controversial writers of the Romish communion? Hottinger knew but little of father Morin, since he took him for a Friar.

[B] He afterwards was for ever publishing books.] If the reader is desirous of seeing an exact catalogue of all the works he published from the year 1644, till the year 1664, let him peruse his Bibliotheca Tigurina (6); where he will find the History and Chronological Catalogue of his compositions; and another catalogue where they are ranked and digested according to the order of the subjects. The Author of his Life has also drawn up, in a Chronological order, all the works published by him. The number of them is astonishing.

[C] He was . . . so often interrupted by visits, and by the very extensive literary correspondence in which he was engaged.] The particulars of this will be seen in the following quotation. Non publicis tantum Eis, quibus districtus fuit, curationibus vigilantissimè vacavit, & quotidie calamum in exarandis, quos in publicum mitteret, libris exercuit: verum etiam amicorum, peregrinorum & hospitum, qui ipsius videndi & audiendi gratiâ huc commearunt, desideriis satisfacit. Erat enim ipsius domus plena semper & frequens concursu splendidissimorum hominum. Quoties aliquid abditum quærebatur, ille thesaurus, ille delubrum adibat. Ex omnibus, quæ ei obvenerunt, negotiis miro vigore & industria se explicavit. Neque etiam deficiebat ad subita extemporali facultate. Veniebant omnium Ordinum, omnium ætatum viri: percontabantur de arduis, de dubiis questionibus, quarum ille pondus præsentis semper animo exceperit. Quid molestiam epistolarum & scribendi ad amicos hic recenseam; quo nonnunquam solo perire sibi diem sæpe quærebatur? Quotidie aut Galli, aut Germani, aut Belgæ, aut Angli, aut Dani, aut Itali ad ipsum Epistolas misistavere de literis, de casibus Ecclesiæ, de Civilium rerum momentis, de aliis, quibus ille graviter & promptissimè respondit (7). i. e. "He not only performed very diligently the duties of his public profession, and was daily employed in preparing books for the press; but also gratified the desires of such friends and strangers, as came hither from all parts to see and hear him; for his house was ever full of the noblest company. Whenever any difficulty occurred, people consulted him as though he had been an oracle. He acquitted himself of all business with a surprizing vigour and application of mind; and was very quick and ready on all occasions. He was visited by persons of all ranks and ages; and consulted upon the hardest and most doubtful questions; all which he answered in the most satisfactory manner. I might mention the great pains he used to take in writing to his friends, which alone, as he frequently

(e) Artium Rhetoricarum ordinarius, & Theologiae Vetus Test. atque Controversiarum extra ordinem Professor designatus. Heidegger, ubi infra, Citation (g).

write so many books. New Professorships were bestowed upon him in 1653 (e), and he was admitted into the College of the Canons. Two years after he was sent, for three years, to the Elector Palatine, who was desirous to employ Hottinger, in order that he might restore the fame and reputation of the University of Heidelberg; but before he set out for that city he went to Basil, and there took his degree of Doctor of Divinity (f). He arrived at Heidelberg in August 1655, and was very graciously received in that city. Besides the Professorship of Divinity of the old Testament and the Oriental tongues, he was appointed Principal of the Collegium Sapientiae, and raised to the dignity of Ecclesiastical Counsellor. He was Rector of the University the year following, and wrote a book concerning the re-union of the Lutherans and Calvinists, which he did to please the Elector who was pretty zealous on this occasion; but he met with the same obstacles as had so often put a stop to the like design [D]. Hottinger accompanied this Prince to the Electoral Diet of Frankfort in 1658, and there had a conference with Ludolf on important matters [E]. He was not recalled to Zürich till 1661, his superiors being so complaisant as to prolong the term of years for which they had lent him to the Elector Palatine. He was immediately elected President of the Commissioners who were to revise the German translation of the Bible. A civil war breaking out in Switzerland in the year 1664, Hottinger was sent into Holland on state-affairs. The University of Leyden offered him a Professorship of Divinity in 1667; but not obtaining leave of his Superiors, he refused it. The Dutch were not disheartened at this refusal, but insisted that

(f) He took it the 26th of July 1655.

“ frequently complained, would often employ whole days; for he was perpetually receiving letters from the Literati of France, Germany, Holland, England, Sweden, Denmark, and Italy, with regard to learned matters, and affairs relating both to church and state, to all which he gave the most exact and speedy answers.” Some pages after a list is given of all those persons who corresponded by letter with Hottinger, and their names take up above two pages. Among the foreigners who came to visit him, we must not forget the Deputies of the Janseuists; he having several conferences with them, when they passed by Zürich in 1653, in their return from Rome to Paris. An account of these conferences was found

(8) At the end of among his papers, and lately published (8). Historia Janseuismi, published by Leydecker at Utrecht, in 1695.

[D] He met with the same obstacles to that reunion which had so often put a stop to the like design.] These obstacles, according to Heidegger, are party animosities, and a certain itch for disputation, which subsists upon contests, in the same manner as the Cameleon does on air. Conciliis de pace Reformatos inter & Lutheranos faciendis, à Serenissimo Principe, tum temporis saxum illud magna contentione volvente, implicitus, aliquot disputationes Irenicas ad ventilandum proposuit, non eo tamen eventu, quem calidis votis boni omnes præceperunt. Obstabant eadem, quæ antebac, impedimenta, odia parum pia partium, & ingeniorum, quæ rixis haud secus quàm Chamæleon vento pascuntur, scabies (9). i. e. “ He aided the most serene Elector with

(9) Heidegger, in Vita Hottingeri, folio D 2.

“ his counsels, in order to bring about an union between the Calvinists and Lutherans, which that Prince greatly desired; and proposed some Irenical disputations in order for the promoting of this; but they were not crowned with the success which all good men wished. The same obstacles that had formerly been so hurtful, now rendered these endeavours fruitless; I mean, the strong animosity of the parties one against the other; and a sort of itch of some people’s minds, which is fed with contest as the Cameleon is with air.” Spanheim observes, that the pacific design of the Elector Palatine, was defeated by a too passionately-zealous Treatise, written by

(10) Frid. Spanheim, Elencho Controversiarum, pag. 335, edit. 1694.

Danhawerus, a Lutheran Professor in Strasburg. Qualiter etiam hoc sæculo in Colloquio Lipsiaco, anno 1631 ubi ad tria capita dissensus omnis rediit; tum sub Carolo Ludovico, Electore Palatino, Heidelbergæ quum profiterer, cujus pacificum institutum intervertit præcipue J. Conr. Danhawerus, A. 1658 scripto virulento Teutonico, Reformatorum salve, ad lapidem Lydium exactum, &c. (10). It is certain that a union between the Lutherans and Calvinists would have been brought about long since, had it depended on Princes; but as that affair depends on the Divines, it could never take effect, and in all probability never will. It is not I who form this judgment in general (11) of these

(11) In this manner all these phrases ought to be understood: they do not relate to any person in particular, and leave room for exceptions.

Gentlemen; it is one of their own body, and he who can best speak of this, from experience. He says that the secular Magistrates, not the Clergy (12), ought to be chiefly employed in order for bringing about the union in question; for the Divines, says he, are extremely tenacious of their own opinions, and not very just with respect to those who think in a different manner from them They should not dispute concerning the truth of the doctrines; for disputes rather create new wars, than put an end to the old ones. Disputants do not seek for concord, but for victory; and those who find themselves defeated, grow haughtier and more passionate. Were an assembly to meet, in order for treating of an union, the Divines in it should be allowed no more than barely to plead as Council; they should be heard but not be received as Judges; only the secular Magistrates should be allowed to act in that character; and it would even be proper to make the Divines promise, upon oath, to obey the sentence which the political Judges shall pronounce. Theologi sint advocati, loquantur; Politici audiant, & sint judices sub auctoritate principum. At ante omnem disputationem Theologi ambarum partium fidem suam juramento obstringant se judicio delegatorum obtemperaturos, nec quidquam adversus pacem molituros (13). Hoc opus per manus præsertim Virorum Politicorum, non autem Ecclesiasticorum est tractandum & inchoandum. Theologi sunt suorum placitorum tenacissimi, parum placitis alienis æqui (14) In colloquiis quæ de pace inveniendâ habebuntur, de veritate dogmatum nullo modo erit disputandum. Pugnae non dirimunt bella, sed faciunt. In illis disputationibus non queritur pax, sed victoria. Nullus se victum unquam fatebitur, & si sentiat se dejectum aut prostratum, tantum abest ut ad concordiam fiat prior; contra ferocior evadet iratus & indignans, quod res ipsi male cedat (15). This author was not capable of succeeding better in any description than in this.

(13) Petrus Jurinus, de Pace in secunda, pag. 263.

(14) Idem, ibid. pag. 262.

(15) Idem, ibid. pag. 263.

I must not omit that in 1666 Tobias Wagnerus, Chancellor of the University of Tübingen, attacked Hottinger’s book concerning the re-union, in his Inquisitio Theologica in Acta henotica nostro potissimum tempore inter Theologos Augustanæ Confessionis & Reformatæ Ecclesiæ à Reformatis resuscitata (16). Hottinger wrote a defence of himself, not in a work written expressly for that purpose, but transiently, and occasionally: It was in a synodal dispute, where he proved that the Reformed or Calvinist Church is not schismatical (17).

[E] He had a conference in Frankfort with Ludolf, on important matters.] It is known universally that Job Ludolf has acquired a vast knowledge of Ethiopia; and he, in conjunction with Hottinger, concerted measures for sending into Africa some persons skilled in the Oriental tongues, and who might make exact enquiries with regard to the state of the Christian religion in that part of the world. Agitata præterea inter eos sunt secretiora consilia de mittendis Principum auctoritate & impensis in Africam juvenibus uno vel duobus, in Orientalium idiomatibus & rebus paulo jam provectoribus, qui Africanarum, imprimis Ethiopicarum Ecclesiarum arcana paulo penitus indagarent, & novis monumentis ibi collectis copias nostras auferent (18). I believe this was the chief subject of the letters which they wrote to one another after the Diet of Frankfort; but I make no doubt that they began to speak of it in that city.

(18) Idem, ibid. folio D.

that Hottinger should be lent to them; upon which the Magistrates of Zurich having consented to this, in complaisance to the States of Holland who had interested themselves in this affair, he accepted the offer. As he was preparing all things for his journey, he unfortunately lost his life the 5th of June 1667, in the river which passes through Zurich (g) [F]. He had often refused the Professorships which were offered him [G]. The most violent adversaries who wrote against him were, Leo Allatius, Abraham Ecchellenfis and father Labbe [H]. Arnauld had a fling at Hottinger, but

(g) Extracted from his Life, written by Joh. Henr. Heidegger, and prefixed to tom. 9. of Hottinger's Ecclesiastical History.

[F] He unfortunately lost his life . . . in the river which passes through Zurich. He went into a boat with his wife, three of his children, his brother-in-law, a good friend, and a maid-servant, in order to go and let out, upon lease, an estate he had two leagues from Zurich. The boat striking a peer, which the swelling of the water hid, overset. Hottinger, his brother-in-law, and his friend escaped by swimming; but when they saw the danger the rest of the company were still in, they jumped back into the water. It was then Hottinger, his friend, and his three children (19) lost their lives; but his wife, his brother-in-law, and servant-maid were saved (20). His wife was the only daughter of John Henry Huldric, Minister of Zurich, a man of very great learning (21). She brought him several children; for besides the three who were drowned with him, and those who died before, he left four sons and two daughters.

(19) A son and two daughters; his eldest and youngest daughter.

(20) Heidegger, in Vita Hotting. folio F 4. See also the Letter which he wrote to the Curators of the University of Leyden, the 9th of June 1667. Crenius has published it in Part 1. of his Animadversiones Philologicae & Historicae, Rotterdam, 1695.

[G] He had often refused the Professorships which were offered him. The magistrates of Deventer earnestly solicited him in 1661, to accept of the professorship of Divinity, in the room of Henry Dieft, who on account of his old age, was declared emeritus (22). The Landgrave of Hesse would have got him to Marburg, to be a Divinity Professor there, and ordered Felix Platerus, a Physician of Basil, to negotiate that affair. He also had invitations from the magistrates of Amsterdam, and those of Bremen (23).

[H] The most violent adversaries who wrote against him were Leo Allatius, Abraham Ecchellenfis, and Father L'Abbe. Here follows the account, which Heidegger gives, in Hottinger's life, of the fury of the first (24). Quorum in numerum refero imprimis Labbeum Lojoltam miserum & rancidum, nec non morosum illum & tristem Senecionem Cbium, Allatium, qui vel solum illo libro contra Hottingerum furis inspirantibus & mentem ac calamum stentibus scripto, apud bonos omnes cognomen Leonis conturbavit ac decoxit, & Canis plusquam Epirotici jure meritoque obtinuit. Quae enim, malum, haec feralis insania est, quis furor, quae canina rabies, leviter sibi contradicentem, & contradictionem argumentis talibus, quibus si error insuisset, hominis tamen non pecoris eum fuisse apparuerat, munientem, non aequo animo tolerare, non somentis, malagmatis & lenibus remediis curare, sed probris veluti de playstro congestis non cumulare sed obruere, & eidem convitia ac maledicta atrocissima non medio nec trimodio, sed toto horreo admittiri? Quae obscenitas ad nomen ita alludere, ut castae aures & purus animus abhorreat? Canem haec, non Leonem generosum, non hominem, nudum Christianum obolent. Fuerit Allatius, ille Gigantum frater, paulo in Graecorum, imprimis eorum, quae baenus inedita nobis fortuna invidet, monumentis versatior. Habuerit senex ingenium (25) ad corrumpendum & detorquendum, ad dolos ac fallacias instruendum, ad parasitandum denique subactius. Haec enim sola laus ipsi propria & eximia esse potest. Quamquam hominum in Graecia natum, Graecum idioma caluisse paulo exactius, mediocri in laude ponendum mihi videtur. Sed fuerint haec, quae dixi, in eo summa. Quo pacto ille assurgat ad gloriam Hottingeri, qui, praeterquam quod veritatis & Orthodoxiae studio ductus sub signis Christi militavit, etiam excelluit non in vernaculo sibi idiomate, sed in Hebraico, Chaldaico, Syriaco, Arabico, Coptico, Persico, in quibus singulis Allatius non tantum nihil vidit, sed Talpa Tiresia caecior fuit? Olim Cbii in senatu Attico data est licentia vomendi. Credidi igitur lecto Allatii Cbii libro, quod tot convitia in Hottingerum nostrum non jactavit, sed vomuit, gentis suae antiqua licentia eum uti voluisse. i. e. "Among whom I first reckon Labbe, that churlish and wretched disciple of Ignatius Loyola; and that old Chian Allatius, who, were it only for the book, which he, his mind and pen being inspired by the furies, wrote against Hottinger, has forfeited and lost, in the opinion of all good men, the surname of Lion; and deserv'dly got, instead of this generous one, that of more than Epirotic cur. For what fury, what deadly horrid rage could prompt a man to fall foul on a person who had only contradicted his notions in the most gentle manner; and had enforced his objections or criticisms by such reasons, as proved that he was an opponent who was far from being contemptible; what deadly rage, I say, could prompt him, instead of bearing this with patience, or endeavouring to heal it with gentle remedies, to almost overwhelm him with loads of injurious words or scurrilities? Then, how could he pun on his name in so obscure a manner as could not but raise an abhorrence in pure and chaste ears? This is acting more like the dog than the lion; not like a man, much less a Christian. If we should take it for granted that this mighty Allatius was a little better skilled in the Greek authors, particularly in such as still continue in manuscript; though we should suppose that he had a genius more fit for artifice, for cunning, and for playing the parasite; for in these things only he is particularly eminent and excellent; though I cannot look upon it as a very great merit, for a Greek to be well skilled in the idiom of his native language: but taking it for granted, I say, that he possessed all these advantages, with what justice can he be compared with Hottinger, who, besides his fighting for the truth and orthodoxy under Christ's banners, excelled, not only in his mother tongue, but also in the Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Coptic and Persian languages, in every one of which Allatius is blinder than Tiresias? The natives of Chios were antiently allowed by the Athenians, the liberty of vomiting; and therefore I, on reading this book of Allatius the Chian, imagined that he, laying hold of the antient privilege of his countrymen, rather vomited than threw out these reproaches on Hottinger." Hottinger defended himself in few words (26); and as for Ecchellenfis, he put him a little in mind (27) of the blunders he had been convicted of, and pointed out some others. Praefatus est illi libro de gradibus studii Philologiae, inserta 1662. simul Apologia brevi adversus Abrahamum Ecchellensem, qui Praefatione in Catalogum librorum Chaldaeorum Hebed Jesu Metropolitanæ Sobensis, traduxit Seldenum, Hottingerum nostrum, Calixtum, Ludovicum de Dieu, Constantinum L'Empereur, Salmasium, eo potissimum nomine, Pentagetti, quod Orientalibus studiis intenti, germanam tamen verborum, significationem, ut plurimum non deprehendant, ambigua & obscura pro certis & luculentissimis statuant, atque interim ea, quae in clarissima luce versantur, quod ipsum commenta radicibus extirpent, omnino praeterant. Verum non aliam defensionem tum sui, tum virorum bonorum doctissimorum, quos eadem accusationis involverat adversarius, Hottingerum paravit, quam in memoriam revocatis Ecchellenfis errorum playstis, quae ipsi à contribulibus Flavignio, Gabriele Siomita, Johanne Morino objecta sunt; nec non ex proprio ingenio demonstratis notioris sphaematis, quae ille in tractatu Arabico-Latino, Synopsis propositorum sapientiae Arabum Philosopherum inscripto, adversus genium Arabicæ linguae admisit (28). i. e. "He drew up a preface to the work (28) concerning the degrees of the study of Philosophy; and introduced therein a short apology for himself in opposition to Abraham Ecchellenfis, who, in a preface to a catalogue of the Chaldee books of Hebed Jesu, Metropolitan of Seba, traduced Selden, our Hottinger, Calixtus, Lewis de Dieu, Constantine l'Empereur, and Salmasius; charging them, that notwithstanding their application to Oriental Learning, they nevertheless had commonly mistook in the true and genuine signification of words, and given doubtful and obscure matters as certain and manifest truths; though they quite passed over many particulars that were clear as noon day, only because but was taken up for it by Claude [J]. [We shall add a few particulars to this article [K], especially with regard to the pieces he wrote on the Oriental affairs or literature [L].]

(25) See Claude's words in the following remark.

“ they quite invalidated their forgeries. Now Hottinger did not make any other defence either of himself, or of those learned men whom his adversary had involved in the same accusation, but to remind Ecchellenfis of the great number of errors with which he had been charged by those of his own tribe, viz. by Flavigny, Gabriel Sionita, and John Marin; taking notice also of some egregious mistakes which Ecchellenfis had fallen into, in opposition to the genius of the Arabic Tongue, in his work written in Latin and Arabic, intitled Synopsis professorum sapientia Arabum Philosophorum.”

[J] Arnauld had a sting at Hottinger, but was taken up for it by Claude. [29] Viz. that of Cyril Lucaris, Patriarch of Constantinople. “ I relate this whole history chiefly on the credit of Allatius, who took a particular care in informing himself of this; and who, being a native of Greece, ought to be believed sooner than Dutch or Swiss Ministers; and, among others, than Hottinger, who is one of the fiercest and most insincere writers I ever read.” These are Arnauld’s words (30), and here follows Claude’s answer (31). “ For what reason would Arnauld have us give credit to Allatius sooner than to Hottinger? The former has the characteristic of a headstrong writer who is ever misrepresenting things; the latter, on the contrary, in spite of all Arnauld may say, has all the marks of a sincere man, who relates things as he heard them. I own that the former is more polite and elegant, but the other is the more ingenious and sincere. Allatius says whatever he pleases out of his own head, whereas Hottinger produces his vouchers.”

[K] We shall add a few particulars to this article. [As Hottinger was born with a great genius for languages, he soon learnt the Latin, Greek and Hebrew. When he was at Geneva, he studied two months under Frederic Spanheim. At Groningen he studied Divinity under F. Gomarus and H. Alting, and Arabic under Matthias Pasor. As Grotius had a considerable number of Arabic manuscripts, Hottinger copied a great many of them for his own use, during the fourteen months that he resided in Leyden. Whilst he was in England, he contracted a great intimacy with several learned men of that country. When Hottinger was invited by the Elector Palatine in 1655, it was with difficulty that the Senate of Zurich, so great was their regard for him, were prevailed upon to let him go. And when that body desired him back again of the Elector, at whose Court he had resided six years, that Prince dismissed him with great regret; and, before he went away, honoured him with the title of Ecclesiastical Counsellor (32).]

[L] Particularly with regard to the works he wrote on the Oriental affairs or literature. [We may first mention his *Theaurus Philologicus, seu clavis Scripturæ, quæ quicquid serè Orientalium, Hebræorum maxime & Arabum habent monumenta de Religione ejusque variis speciebus, Judaismo, Samaritanismo, Muhammedismo, Gentilismo, de Theologia & Theologis, Verbo Dei &c. breviter & apboristicè ita referatur & operitur, ut multiplex inde ad Philologiam, Theologiam studiosos fructus redundare possit. Tiguri 1649, 4to. Secunda Editio in qua Samaritica, Arabica, Syriaca, suis quæque nativis characteribus exprimentur. Tiguri 1659, 4to. The next is *Historia Orientalis, quæ ex variis Orientalium monumentis collecta agit. 1. De Muhammedismo ejusque causis tum procreantibus, tum conservantibus. 2. De Sarracenis, seu Religione veterum Arabum. 3. De Chaldaismo Superstitione Nabateorum, Chaldeorum, Chæranæorum. 4. De Statu Christianorum & Judæorum tempore orti & nati Muhammedismi. 5. De variis inter ipsos Muhammedanos circa Religionis dogmata & administrationem, sententiis, schismatis, & hæresibus excitatis. 6. Accessit, ex occasione Genealogiæ Muhammedis, plenior illustratio Taarich Beni Adam, quæ, ex ipsis Arabum Scriptis, vita & res gestæ Prophetarum Patriarcharum, quorundam etiam Apostolorum, Regum Persiæ, aliorumque ab Adamo ad Muhammedis usque natales in orbe de gentium, explicantur. Tiguri 1651, 4to. Secunda Editio auctior. Tiguri 1660, 4to. No man was better qualified to write on Oriental affairs than Hottinger, as he was skilled in most of the languages, which were anciently, as well as at present, spoke in the East, viz. the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldeæ, Arabic, Turkish, Persian and Coptic languages. Hottinger wrote also eight dissertations on the use and advantage of the Oriental Tongues. He wrote also the following work, *Promptuarium sive Bibliotheca Orientalis, exhibens catalogum sive Centurias aliquot tam Auctorum, quam Librorum Hebræicorum, Syriacorum, Arabicorum, Ægyptiacorum; addita Mentissa Bibliothecarum aliquot Europæarum. Heidelbergæ 1658, 4to. Mr. Baillet does not speak advantageously of this work of Hottinger, whom he accuses of not being very accurate in any of his compositions. Hottinger published in 1661, Etymologicum Orientale, sive Lexicon Harmonicum Heptaglotton; cum præfatione de gradibus studii Philologici, & Apologetico brevi contra Abrahamum Ecchellensem Maronitam. Francofurti, in 4to. The seven languages contained in this Lexicon are, the Hebrew, Chaldeæ, Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, Ethiopic and Rabbinical. We omit several other pieces of our author, written on Oriental matters (33); and shall conclude with ob-]

(32) Heidegger, in Vita Hottingeri, & Homines illustres du Pere Nicéron, tom. 8.

(33) Idem, ibidem, serving, that Hottinger though a very great man, is thought by most to have writ in too great a hurry.

HOWE (JOHN), a learned Non-conformist Divine in the seventeenth Century, was a Minister’s son, and nephew to Mr. Obadiah Howe, Vicar of Boston in Lincolnshire. He was born May the 17th 1630, at Loughborough in Leicestershire, of which town his father was Minister (a), being settled there by Archbishop Laud, though afterwards ejected by that Prelate, on account of his adherence to the Puritans; upon which he went with his son, our author, to Ireland, where they continued till the Irish Rebellion broke out, when they returned to England, and settled in Lancashire, where our Author was educated in the first rudiments of learning and the knowledge of the tongues (b). He was sent pretty early to Christ College in Cambridge, where he continued till he had taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and then removed to Oxford (c), and became Bible-Clerk of Brazen-Nose College in Michaelmas Term 1648 (d), and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts Jan. the 18th 1649 (e). He was made a Demy of Magdalen College by the Parliament Visitors, and afterwards Fellow (f); and July the 9th 1652 took the degree of Master of Arts (g). Soon after this he became a Preacher, and was ordained by Mr. Charles Herle at his Church of Winwick in Lancashire, and not long after became Minister of Great Torrington in Devonshire (h) [A], and on the 1st of begged a blessing on the work of the day; and afterwards read and expounded a chapter or psalm, in which he spent about three quarters; then prayed for about an hour, preached for another hour, and prayed for about half an hour. After this he retired, and took some little refreshment for about a quarter of an hour or more (the people singing all the while), and then came again into the pulpit, and prayed for another

[A] Became Minister of great Torrington in Devonshire. [His labour in the discharge of his duty here was very great, especially on the public fasts, which in those times returned pretty frequently, and were generally kept with great solemnity. He informed Dr. Calamy (i), that upon these occasions it was his common way to begin about nine in the morning with a prayer for about a quarter of an hour, in which he

(1) See Memoirs of the Life of the late Reverend Mr. John Howe, collected by Edmund Calamy, D. D. pag. 14.

(29) Viz. that of Cyril Lucaris, Patriarch of Constantinople.

(30) Perpétuité defendue, liv. 4. chap. 6. pag. 561. Brussels edit. in 1700.

(31) Réponse à la Perpétuité de la Foi, liv. 3. chap. 12. pag. m. 467.

(32) Heidegger, in Vita Hottingeri, & Homines illustres du Pere Nicéron, tom. 8.

(33) Idem, ibidem.

(a) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1014. 2d edit.

(b) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 69.

(c) Idem, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(d) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 99.

(e) Idem, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(f) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 99.

(g) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 99.

(h) Memoirs, pag. 12, 13.

- (i) Ibid. pag. 25. March 1654 married the daughter of Mr. George Hughes, Minister of Plymouth (i). He was afterwards appointed Household Chaplain to Oliver Cromwell the Protector [B], and became Lecturer of St. Margaret's Westminster (k). Upon the death of Oliver Cromwell, his son Richard succeeding him as Protector, Mr. Howe stood in the same relation to him of Chaplain, as he had done to the father; and though he meddled not with State-affairs either then or afterwards, yet he was in his judgment very much averse to Richard's parting with his Parliament, which he foresaw would prove his ruin (l) [C].
- (j) Memoirs, pag. 25. When the army had set Richard aside, Mr. Howe returned to his people at Great Torrington, among whom he continued till the Act of Uniformity took place August the 24th 1662 (m), after which he preached for some time in private houses in Devonshire (n). In April 1671 he went to Ireland, where he lived as Chaplain to the Lord Massarene in the parish of Antrim (o), and had leave from the Bishop of the Diocese and the Metropolitan to preach in the public Church of that town every Sunday in the afternoon, without submitting to any terms of conformity (p). In 1675, upon the death of Dr. Lazarus Seaman, he was chosen Minister of his congregation, upon which he returned to England, and settled at London (q), where he was highly respected not only by his brethren in the Ministry among the Dissenters, but also by several eminent Divines of the Church of England, as Dr. Whitcote, Dr. Kidder, Dr. Fowler, Dr. Lucas, and others (r). In August 1685 he travelled beyond sea with the Lord Wharton (s), and the year following settled at Utrecht, and took his turn in preaching at the English Church in that city (t). In 1687, upon King James's publishing his Declaration for liberty of Conscience, Mr. Howe returned to London (u). He published a considerable number of works [D]. He died at London April the 2d 1705, and was interred in the Parish Church
- (k) Ibid. pag. 27-30.
 (l) Ibid. pag. 37.
 (m) Ibid. pag. 51, 53.
 (n) Ibid. pag. 54.
 (o) Ibid. pag. 58, 67.
 (p) Ibid. pag. 67.
 (q) Ibid. pag. 113.
 (r) Ibid. pag. 126.
 (s) Ibid. pag. 131, 132.

ther hour, and gave them another sermon of about an hour's length, and so concluded the service of the day, at about four of the clock in the evening, with about half an hour or more in prayer.

[B] He was afterwards appointed Household Chaplain to Oliver Cromwell the Protector.] Dr. Calamy tells us (2), that while he was in this station, he behaved in such a manner, that he was never charged, even by those, who have been most forward to inveigh against a number of his contemporaries, with improving his interest in those, who then had the management of affairs in their hands, either to the enriching himself, or the doing ill offices to others, though of known differing sentiments. He readily embraced every occasion, that offered, of serving the interest of religion and learning, and opposing the errors and designs, which at that time threatened both. The notion of a particular Faith prevailed much at Cromwell's court; and it was a common opinion among them, that such as were in a special manner favoured of God, when they offered up prayers and supplications to him for his mercies, either for themselves or others, often had such impressions made upon their minds and spirits by a divine hand, as signified to them, not only in the general that their prayers would be heard and answered, but that the particular mercies, which were sought for, would be certainly bestowed; nay, and sometimes also intimated to them in what way and manner they would be afforded, and pointed out to them future events beforehand, which in reality is the same with inspiration. Mr. Howe told Dr. Calamy, that not a little pains was taken to cultivate and support this notion at Whitehall; and that he once heard a sermon there from a person of note, the avowed design of which was to defend it. He said, that he was so fully convinced of the ill tendency of such a principle, that after hearing this sermon, he thought himself bound in conscience, when it came next to his turn to preach before Cromwell, to set himself industriously to oppose it, and to beat down that spiritual pride and confidence, which such fancied impulses and impressions were apt to produce and cherish. He observed, while he was in the pulpit, that Cromwell heard him with great attention, but would sometimes knit his brows, and discover great uneasiness. When the sermon was over, a person of distinction came to him, and asked him, if he knew what he had done? and signified it to him as his apprehension, that Cromwell would be so incensed at that discourse, that he would find it very difficult ever to make his peace with him, or secure his favour for the future. Mr. How replied, that he had but discharged his conscience, and could leave the event with God. He afterwards observed, that Cromwell was cooler in his carriage to him than before; and sometimes he thought he would have spoken to him of the matter, but never did (3).

[C] Was in his judgment very much averse to Ri-

chard's parting with his Parliament, which he foresaw would prove his ruin.] Dr. Calamy tells us (4), that he had been informed by a friend, that discoursing once freely with Mr. Howe about the setting Richard aside, he intimated to him, that it was but a parenthesis in a public paper, which was the occasion of the great ill will of the Officers to him, which rose at length to that height, that nothing would satisfy but the pulling him down. And when the same person signified to Mr. Howe, that he had heard Richard reflected on as a weak man, he with some warmth made this return: "How could he be a weak man, when upon the remonstrance that was brought from the army by his brother Fleetwood, he stood it out all night against his whole Council, and continued the debate till four of the clock in the morning, having none but Thurloe to abet him; maintaining that the dissolving that Parliament would be both his ruin and theirs?" Upon some further discourse upon the same subject, Mr. Howe said, that Fleetwood undertook with great solemnity, that if Richard would but comply with the proposal which was made him, the army should not do him the least damage. And when Fleetwood was afterwards put in mind of this, all the answer he returned was, that he thought he had had more interest in the army than he found he had. Mr. Howe added, that accidentally meeting with Major-General Berry, who was in those times so active and busy, some time after the Restoration, when he was but in very mean circumstances, he very freely told him, with tears running down his cheeks, that if Richard had but at that time hanged up him and nine or ten more, the Nation might have been happy.

[D] He published a considerable number of works.] they are as follow: I. A Sermon from Eccles. vii. 29. preached at St. Giles's in the Fields in May 1659, and intitled, Man created in an holy but mutable State, published in The Morning Exercise methodiz'd, printed in 1660, in 4to. II. The Blessedness of the Righteous laid open and further recommended from the Consideration of the Vanity of this mortal Life, on Psal. xvii. 25. London 1668 and 1673, in 8vo. III. The Vanity of this mortal Life, or of Man considered only in this present mortal State, from Psal. lxxxix. 47, 48. London, 1671, in 12mo. The Dedication to John Upton, of Lupton in Devonshire, Esq; his kinsman, is dated at Antrim April 12, 1671. IV. Treatise of delighting in God, in two parts, from Psal. xxxvii. 4. London, 1674, in 8vo. V. The Living Temple: or a designed Improvement of that Notion, that a good Man is the Temple of God. London, 1674, in 8vo. VI. The Reconcilableness of God's Prescience of the Sins of Men with the Wisdom and Sincerity of his Counsels and Exhortations, and whatsoever other Means he uses to prevent them. London, 1677, in 8vo. written by way of Letter to Robert Boyle, Esq; Mr. Theophilus Gale, his old fellow-

(3) Ibid. pag. 22, 23.

(4) Ibid. pag. 25.

(w) Atb. Omm.
ubi supra.

Church of Allhallows Breadstreet; and his funeral Sermon was preached April the 8th by Mr. John Spademan from 2 Tim. iii. 14. Mr. Wood tells us (w), that he was a person of neat and polite parts, and moderate and calm in those smaller matters under debate between the Church and his party; and that his books are written in a fine, smooth, and natural style. But this last observation is undoubtedly a mistake, since Mr. Howe's style is generally allowed to be very harsh, embarrassed and obscure. Dr. Calamy, who has given his character at large, observes (x), that he was a man of great prudence, affability, moderation, and charity, pleasant and facetious in conversation, and of extensive learning, and strong judgment. (x) Memoirs, pag. 237, & 399.

(5) See the 4th part of The Court of the Gentiles, pag. 522. edit. London 1677.

fellow collegiate, publishing about this time the fourth part of The Court of the Gentiles, made some animadversions upon this treatise of Mr. Howe (5), upon which our author added to his book a Postscript containing a defence of it, printed the same year, and added to those copies of it, which were not then sold. Mr. Thomas Danfon wrote likewise against our author's book a tract, intitled, De Causa Dei: A Vindication of the common Doctrine of Protestant Divines concerning Predestination [i. e. the Interest of God as the first Cause in all Actions as such, of all rational Creatures] from the invidious Consequences, with which it is burdened by Mr. John Howe in a late Letter and Postscript of God's Prence. London, 1678, in 8vo. In answer to this was published Remarks upon a late disingenuous Discourse writ by one T. D. under pretence De Causa Dei, and of answering Mr. John Howe's Letter and Postscript of God's Prence, &c. affirming in the Protestant Doctrine, that God doth by efficacious Influences universally move and determine Men to all their Actions, even to those that are most wicked. London, 1678, in 8vo. This was written by Andrew Marvel, Esq; VII. A View of Antiquity presented in a short but sufficient Account of some Fathers, &c. London, 1677, in 8vo (6). Some animadversions were made on this, and interspersed in a book intitled, Remarks relating to the State of the Church of the three first Centuries, written by Abedn. Seller, and printed in 8vo. VIII. A Letter written out of the Country to a Person of Quality in the City, who took offence at the late Sermon of Dr. Stillingfleet, Dean of St. Paul's, before the Lord Mayor. This was occasioned by the Doctor's Sermon, preached on the first day of Easter-Term 1680, on Phil. iii. 16. and intitled, The Mischiefs of Separation. IX. Of Thoughtfulness for To-morrow. London, 1681, in 8vo. To this are added an Appendix concerning the immoderate Desire of fore-knowing things to come; and A Discourse of Charity, in reference to other Men's Sins, from 1 Cor. xiii. 6. X. A Funeral Sermon on the Decease of Mrs. Margaret Baxter, who died Jan. 28, 1687, on 2 Cor. v. 8. London, 1681, in 4to. XI. The right Use of that Argument in Prayer, from the Name of God, on behalf of a People that profess it, from Jer. xiv. 21. London, 1682, in 8vo. XII. Self-Dedication, discoursed in the Anniversary Thanksgiving of a Person of Honour (7) for a great Deliverance. London, 1682, in 12mo. XIII. A Sermon at the Funeral of that faithful and laborious Servant of Christ Mr. Richard Fairclough late of Bristol, who deceased July 4, 1682, aged 61 Years, from Matth. xxv. 21. London, 1683, in 4to. XIV. About the same time he drew up those Annotations on the three Epistles of St. John, which are published in the second volume or continuation of Mr. Matthew Poole. XV. A Sermon from Col. ii. 2. upon this question, What may most hopefully be attempted to allay Animosities among Protestants, that our Divisions may not be our ruin? printed in the Continuation of the Morning Exercise. London, 1683, in 4to. XVI. The Redeemer's Tears wept over lost Souls, a Treatise on Luke xix. 41, 42. London, 1684, in 8vo. With an Appendix, where somewhat is occasionally discoursed concerning the Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and how God is said to will the Salvation of them that perish. XVII. The Case of the Protestant Dissenters represented and argued. Printed at London 1689, in a single sheet of paper. XVIII. Humble Requests both to Conformists and Dissenters touching their Temper and Behaviour towards each other upon the lately passed Indulgence. Printed in another sheet of paper. XIX. A Funeral Sermon for Mrs. Esther Sampson, late Wife of Henry Sampson Doctor of Physick, who died November 24, 1689, on

Luke xiii. 16. London, 1690, in 4to. XX. The Carnality of Christian Contention, in two Sermons preached at the Merchants Lecture in Breadstreet 1693. XXI. A calm and sober Inquiry concerning the Possibility of a Trinity in the Godhead, in a Letter to a Person of worth. To which are added some Letters written formerly to Dr. Wallis on the same subject. London, 1694. In this Inquiry Mr. Howe asserts, that "the persons in the Trinity are distinct essences (8); distinct numerical natures, beings, and substances (9). That there is a variety of individual natures in the Deity (10). That there are in the Godhead three distinct intelligent hypostases, having each his own distinct singular intelligent nature (11). That these three divine persons maintain a delicious society, no enjoyment being pleasant without consociation therein; and we must needs think this is a more blessed state, or a more perfect idea of blessedness, than can be conceived in an eternal solitude (12)." (8) Page 110. (9) Page 112. (10) Page 140. (11) Page 126. (12) Page 55. As to the question, If each of these persons and beings is God, how can it be said, that all three are but one God? he answers (13), that each of the three persons conceived by itself is an individual essence; but conceived together they are the intire essence of God. This Inquiry was animadverted upon in a Treatise intitled, Considerations on the Explications of the Doctrine of the Trinity, printed in 1694 in 4to, and a Postscript to the Defence of Dr. Sherlock's Notions of a Trinity in Unity. Upon which Mr. Howe published a Letter to a Friend concerning that Postscript. He published also in 1695 a View of the Considerations on the Explications above-mentioned, in a Letter to a Friend. XXII. A Discourse relating to the much lamented Death and solemn Funeral of Queen Mary, on Heb. xii. 23, latter part. London, 1695, in 4to. XXIII. A Sermon on the much lamented Death of that reverend and worthy Servant of Christ Mr. Richard Adams, M. A. sometime Fellow of Brasen-Nose College in Oxon, afterwards Minister of St. Mildred's Breadstreet, London; more lately Pastor of a Congregation in Southwark, who deceased February 7, 1695. XXIV. A Sermon preached on the Day of Thanksgiving December 2, 1697. XXV. A Sermon preached before the Society for Reformation of Manners, from Rom. xiii. 4. London, 1697. XXVI. A Sermon on the Death of that reverend and most laborious Servant of Christ in the Work of the Ministry, Mr. Mathew Mead, who deceased October 16, 1699. XXVII. The Redeemer's Dominion over the visible World, and the Entrance therinto by Death: A Discourse preached on the occasion of the Death of John Hoghton, Esq; eldest Son of Sir Charles Hoghton of Hoghton-Tower, in the County of Lancaster, Bart. London, 1699. XXVIII. Funeral Sermon for that excellent Minister of Christ, the truly Reverend William Bates, D. D. London, 1699. XXIX. A Twofold Discourse of Man's Enmity against God; and Reconciliation between God and Man, from Col. i. 21. London, 1701. XXX. Some Considerations of a Preface to an Inquiry concerning the Occasional Conformity of Dissenters. XXXI. The Second Part of The Living Temple, containing Animadversions on Spinoza, and a French writer pretending to refute him; with a recapitulation of the former part, and an account of the distinction and restitution of God's temple amongst men. London, 1702. XXXII. A Sermon preached at the Funeral of Mr. Peter Vink, B. D. London, 1702. XXXIII. A Sermon on Coloss. i. 13. preached Nov. 5, 1703. XXXIV. A Discourse of Patience, relating to the Expectation of future Blessedness. London, 1705. His Works have been reprinted together in one volume in folio, at London. H.

(6) Wood, Atb. Omm. vol. 2. col. 3015.

(7) The Earl of Kildare.

(a) Wood, Hist. & Antiq Univ. Ox. l. 2. p. 321.

HOWELL (JAMES), a voluminous writer of the seventeenth Century, was born (b) at Abernant in Caermarthenshire (a), of which place his father was Minister (b). He was born about the year 1594 [A], and educated in grammar learning in the free-school of Hereford, from whence he was sent to Jesus College in the University of Oxford in the beginning of the year 1610 (c) where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts December the 17th 1613 (d). He afterwards left the University, and in 1619 went to France, Spain, and Italy, as Agent for Sir Robert Mansell, the Earl of Pembroke, and others, to procure workmen and materials for making of glafs [B]. In 1622 he was sent into Spain, in order to recover a rich English ship, seized on by the Viceroy of Sardinia for his master's use, on pretence of its having prohibited goods on board [C]. In 1623, during his absence abroad, he was chosen Fellow of Jesus College (e); and two years after his return to England, he was made Secretary to Emanuel Lord Scrope, Earl of Sunderland, and Lord President of the North [D]; in which post residing at York, he was by the Mayor and Aldermen of Richmond chosen a Burgess for their Corporation in the Parliament which began at Westminster in 1627 [E]. In 1632 he went Secretary to Robert Earl of Leicester, Ambassador Extraordinary from King Charles I to the Court of Denmark, where he made divers speeches in Latin (f), shewing the cause of their Embassy, which was to condole the death of Sophia Queen Dowager of Denmark, grandmother to King Charles I. Afterwards passing through several beneficial employments, particularly the assisting of the Clerks of the Council, he was at length in the beginning of the civil wars, appointed one of those Clerks; but in 1642 he was seized by order of a certain Committee, and committed to the Fleet [F], where he supported himself for many years by writing and translating of books [G]. Though he had been a zealous Loyalist, he afterwards flattered Cromwell, and joined with

(b) Id. Atb. Omm. vol. 2. col. 382. ed. 2. Lon. 1722. was

(c) Idem, ibid. and Atben. Oxon. ubi supra.

(d) Idem, Fassi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 194.

(e) Idem, Atben. Oxon. col. 382. See Howell's Familiar Letters, vol. 1. Sect. 2. Letter 6. edit. 5. London 1678 in 8vo.

(f) Familiar Letters, vol. 1. Sect. 6. Letter 2.

(1) Lib. 2. pag. 321.

(2) Vol. 2. col. 381.

(3) Familiar Letters, domestic and foreign. Divided into four Books. vol. 1. Sect. 6. Letter 60. 5th edition London 1678 in 8vo.

(4) Ibid. vol. 1. Sect. 1. Letter 2.

(5) Ibid. Letter 5.

(6) Ibid. Letter 22.

(7) Ibid. Letter 27.

(8) Ibid. Letter 39.

(9) Ibid. Letter 44.

(10) Sect. 2. Letter 1.

(11) Sect. 2. Letter 6.

(12) Sect. 3. Letter 1.

[A] He was born about the year 1594. Mr. Wood tells us in his Historia & Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis (1), that he was entered in Jesus College in Oxford in 1610, in the 16th year of his age; ad Collegium istud literas sublimiores hauriendi avidus accessit Ann. Dom. 1610cx, ætatis xvi; and in his Atbenæ Oxoniensis (2) he observes the same, assuring us, that he was sent to that College in the beginning of 1610, aged 16 years. And yet the same Historian just before remarks, that in what year Mr. Howell was born, he cannot precisely tell. Mr. Howell observes himself (3), that "at his nativity his ascendant was that hot constellation of Cancer about the midst of the dog-days." [B] In 1619 went to France, Spain, and Italy, as Agent for Sir Robert Mansell, the Earl of Pembroke, and others, to procure workmen and materials for making of glafs. In a letter to his father dated in Broadstreet in London, March 1, 1618 (4), he observes, that he had been Steward of the Glais-House in Broadstreet; and that he was then upon the point of going beyond sea. "The main of my employment, says he, is from that gallant Knight Sir Robert Mansell, who, with my Lord of Pembroke, and divers other prime Lords of the Court, have got the sole patent of making all sorts of glafs with pit-cole, only to save those huge proportions of wood, which were consumed formerly in the glafs furnaces. And this business being of that nature that the workmen are to be had from Italy, and the chief materials from Spain, France, and other foreign countries, there is need of an Agent abroad for this use; and better than I have offered their service in this kind, so that I believe I shall have employment in all these countries before I return." His first letter from Amsterdam is dated April 1, 1619 (5). We have another letter of his dated at Barcelona Novem. 10, 1620 (6); another dated from on board the ship before Venice May 5, 1621 (7); another dated at Naples October 1, 1621 (8); another at Lyons December 5, 1621 (9). It appears from a letter of his dated at London February 2, 1622 (10), that he was then just returned to England. [C] In 1622 he was sent into Spain, in order to recover a rich English ship seized on by the Vice-Roy of Sardinia for his master's use, on pretence of its having prohibited goods on board. In a letter of his to his father, dated at London September 8, 1622 (11), he gives us an account of his being engaged in this affair. His first letter from Madrid is dated December 28, 1622. Another letter of his to his father dated at London December 10, 1624 (12), shews, that he was newly returned from Spain. [D] Made Secretary to Emanuel Lord Scrope, Earl of Sunderland, and Lord President of the North. In a letter of his to his brother, dated at London March 15, 1626 (13), he takes notice of that place being lately conferred on him. [E] Chosen a Burgess for the Corporation of Richmond in the Parliament, which began at Westminster in 1627. In a letter of his dated March 2, 1627 (14), he observes that he had been just chosen; and on the 24th of that month he wrote a letter (15) to that Corporation to thank them for his election. [F] In 1642 he was seized by order of a certain Committee, and committed to the Fleet. Mr. Wood tells us, that being prodigally inclined, and therefore running much into debt, he was seized on by order of a certain Committee, after the King was forced from his Parliament, and committed prisoner to the fleet. But let us hear Mr. Howell's own account of the affair in a Letter to the Earl of B—, dated November 20, 1642 (17). "I was come lately to London upon some occasions of my own, and I had been divers times in Westminster-Hall, where I conferred with many Parliament-men of my acquaintance; but one morning betimes there rushed into my chamber five armed men with swords, pistols, and bills, and told me that they had a warrant from the Parliament for me. I desired to see their warrant; they denied it. I desired to see the date of it; they denied it. I desired to see my name in the warrant; they denied it. At last one of them pulled out a greasy paper out of his pocket, and shewed me only three or four names subscribed, and no more. So they rushed presently into my closet, and seized on all my papers and letters, and any thing that was manuscript; and many printed books they took also, and hurled all into a great hair-trunk, which they carried away with them. I had taken a little physic that morning, and with very much ado they suffered me to stay in my chamber with two guards upon me till evening; at which time they brought me before the Committee for examination, where I confess I found good respect, and being brought up to the close Committee, I was ordered to be forth-coming till some papers of mine were perused, and Mr. Corbet was appointed to do it. Some days after I came to Mr. Corbet, and he told me he had perused them, and could find nothing, that might give offence. Hereupon I desired him to make a report to the house; according to which, as I was told, he did very fairly; yet such was my hard hap, that I was committed to the Fleet, where I am now under close restraint. As far as I see, I must lie at dead Anchor in this Fleet a long time, unless some gentle gale blow thence to make me launch out." It appears from some of his letters, that he was in the Fleet in 1648. [G] Supported himself for many years by writing and translating of books. We shall give a catalogue of his writings. I. Dodona's Grove: or the Vocal Forest. London,

(13) Sect. 4. Letter 26.

(14) Sect. 5. Letter 3.

(15) Ibid. Letter 4.

(16) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 381.

(17) Familiar Letters, vol. 1. Sect. 6. Letter 47. The date in this Letter is 1643; but it appears to be a mistake for 1642.

with the prevailing party; so that upon the Restoration he was not restored to his place of Clerk of the Council, but only made Historiographer to the King, being the first in England who enjoyed that title. He died in the beginning of November 1666 (g), and was

don, 1640 and 1644, in 4to. The third edition, more exact and perfect than the former, was printed at Cambridge 1645, in 12mo. To this edition are subjoined two other tracts; viz. 1. England's Tears for the present wars, which for the Nature of the Quarrel, the Quality of the Strength, the diversity of Battles, Skirmishes, Encounters, and Sieges, happened in so short a Compass of Time, cannot be paralleled in any preceding Age. This piece had been published at London, 1644, in two sheets and an half in 4to. and was reprinted at London 1650 in 12mo. It was translated into Latin under the title of Anglie Suspiria & Lacrymae, &c. and printed at London 1646 in 4to. 2. The Pre-eminence and Pedigree of Parliament. Whereunto is added a Vindication of some Passages reflecting upon the Author in a Book called The Popish Royal Favorite, penned and published by Mr. Prynne, wherein he styles him, No Friend to Parliaments, and a Malignant, pag. 42. With a clearing of some Occurrences in Spain at his Majesty's being there, cited by the said Master Prynne out of the Vocal Forest. By J. H. Esq; one of the Clerks of his Majesty's most honourable Privy-Council. Published by special Order. London, 1645. The Dedication to his worthy honored Friend Sir W. S. Kn. is written from the Fleet-prison. In this piece he asserts (18), that "the principal fountain, whence the "King derives his happiness and safety, is his Parli- "ment." With regard to the imputation, thrown upon him by Mr. Prynne, that he was no Friend to the present Parliament; "therein, says he (19), I am "traded, and I am confident it will be never proved "against me from any action, words, or letters, tho' "divers of mine have been intercepted, or any other "misdemeanour, though some things are fathered up- "on me, which never dropped from my quill. Alas, "how unworthy and uncapable am I to censure the "proceedings of that great Senate, that high Syne- "drium, wherein the wisdom of the whole Senate is "epitomized!" II. The Vote; or a Poem-Royal, pre- sented to his Majesty for a New-Year's-Gift, by way of Discourse 'twixt the Poet and his Muse. Calendis Januarii, 1641. London, 1641, in two sheets in 4to, and reprinted before his Familiar Letters. III. Instruc- tions for sorraine Travell; shewing by what Cours, and in what Compass of Time, one may take an exact Sur- vey of the Kingdomes and States of Christendome, and arrive to the practicall Knowledge of the Languages to good purpose. London, 1642, in 12mo. Dedicated to Prince Charles. It was reprinted in 1650 in 12mo, with additions. IV. Casual Discourses and Interlocu- tions between Patricius and Peregrin, touching the Dis- tractions of the Times. It was written by the Author in the Fleet-prison, soon after the battle of Edge-Hill, and was the first book, which came out in vindication of the King (20). V. Mercurius Hibernicus: Or a Discourse of that horrid Insurrection and Massacre, which happened lately in Ireland. Written in the Fleet 1643. It was printed at Bristol, 1644, in two sheets and an half in 4to. VI. Parables reflecting upon the times. London, 1644, two sheets in 4to. at the latter end of the second edition of Dodona's Grove. VII. Epistolæ Hæc-Elianzæ. Familiar Letters Domestic and Foreign, di- vided into sundry Sections, partly Historical, partly Po- litical, partly Philosophical. London, 1645, 1647, in 4to. 1650, 1655, 1678, in 8vo. Mr. Wood tells us (21), that "many of the said letters were never "written before the Author of them was in the Fleet, "as he pretends they were; only feigned, no time "being kept with their dates, and purposely published "to gain money to relieve his necessities; yet give a "tolerable History of these times." VIII. A Nocturnal Progress: or a Perambulation of most Countries in Christendom, performed in one Night by Strength of Imagination. Written in the Fleet in 1645. IX. Lultra Ludovici: Or the Life of Lewis XIII, King of France, of his Cardinal de Richelieu. London, 1646, in Fol. It is divided into seven Lustræ, and dedicated to Prince Charles, at his Court in the Isle of Jersey. X. An Account of the deplorable, and desperate Condition, that England stands in, Anno 1647, in a Letter to Francis Cardinal Barberini. Written from the Fleet 1647.

XI. A Letter to the Earl of Pembroke concerning the Times, and the sad condition both of Prince and People. Printed 1647 in two sheets in 4to. XII. Bella Scot- Anglica. A Brief of all the Battles and Martial En- counters, which have happened 'twixt England and Scot- land from all Times to this present. Printed in 1648. XIII. Corollary declaring the Causes whereby the Scot is come of late Years to be so beighned in his Spirits. These two last are in three sheets in 4to. XIV. The Instruments of a King; or, a short Discourse of the Sword, Sepire, and Crown, &c. London, 1648, in two sheets in 4to. XV. Winter-Dream, 1649, in three sheets in 4to. XVI. A Trance, or News from Hell, brought first to Town by Mercurius Acheronticus. London, 1649, in two sheets and an half in 4to. XVII. Inquisition after blood, to the Parliament in itatu quo nunc, and the Army Regnant, &c. Printed in 1649, in two sheets in 4to. XVIII. Vision or Dia- logue between the Soul and the Body. London, 1651, in 8vo, &c. IX. Survey of the Signory of Venice, of her admired Polity, and Method of Government. Lon- don, 1651, in a thin Folio. To this is added, A Discourse of the Interests of the Republic of Venice, with the rest of the States of Italy. Printed with the Survey. XX. Some sober Inspections made into the Carriage and Consults of the late Long-Parliament, where- by occasion is taken to speak of Parliaments in former Times, and of Magna Charta; with some Reflections up- on Government in general. London, 1653, in 12mo. Dedicated to his Highness the Lord Protector. In the Dedication he writes as follows: "Among the multi- "tude of mighty achievements, which your Highness "hath performed so much to the astonishment of man- "kind, the dissolving of the late Long-Parliament may "well deserve to be ranked in the number. For "thereby your Highness, Hercules-like, may be said "to have quelled a monster with many heads; such "a monster, that was like to gormandize and devour "the whole nation, as will appear in the whole dis- "course, which though small in bulk, yet the subject- "matter is of the greatest concernment (otherwise I "had not ventured on so high a Dedication) for it "was of the power and practice of English Parlia- "ments in former times, with the first rise of the "House of Commons, and of the Magna Charta, " &c. which will be found to have had but hard "births." He observes, that the quotations here pro- "duced, (whereof there are many) are all true, and ex- "tracted out of antient records. "But what consequen- "ces foever, says he, are drawn from them, the judg- "ment is still reserved for your Highness, on dernier "ressort. There is a memorable saying of Charles "Martell in that mighty revolution in France, when "he introduced the second race of Kings, that in the "pursuit of all his actions, he used to say, that he fol- "lowed not the ambition of his heart as much as the in- "spiration of his soul, and the designs of providence. "This may be applied to your Highness in the con- "duct of your great affairs and admirable successes." This Tract is written by way of dialogue between Pbi- langlus and Polyander; the first, as our author observes in his Preface, a good Patriot, and a great lover of the English; the other a person, who had seen much of the world abroad, and studied men. In the close of it (22) Polyander is introduced recommending "the "modesty and practice of Parliaments in former "times, who declined high affairs of State, especially "foreign, much more to arrogate to themselves the "supreme power; for sovereignty may be said to be "an indivisible ray, derived and darted from the "Divine Majesty itself. It cannot be divided among "a multitude. We never read, that the people were "called God's, or the Lord's anointed, or Nursing Fa- "thers; nor do we read of any Aristocracies or Demo- "cracies at all in the holy Scriptures. Therefore I "subscribe to his judgment, who holds, that the firmest "and most compendious way of government is when "the supremacy resides in one person, whom the peo- "ple ought to trust by an indispensable necessity for "their own advantage in steering the great vessel of "the Commonwealth, with the advice of a select Council.

(b) Col. 381,
382.

was interred in the North-side of the Temple-Church in London, where a monument was erected to his memory [H]. Mr. Wood tells us (b), that " he had a singular command of his pen whether in prose or verse, and was well read in modern histories, especially in those of the countries wherein he had travelled; and had a parabolical and allusive fancy, according to his motto, Senesco non segnesco;" but that " his writings having been only to gain a livelihood, and by their dedications to flatter great and noble persons, are very trite and empty, stolen from other authors without acknowledgment, and fitted only to please the humours of novices."

HUARTE

" Council. And herein a State may be compared to a gally, wherein some are to observe the compass, others to furl the sails, others to handle the ropes, others to tug at the bar, others to be ready in arms; but there is but one Pilot to sit at the Helm. It is requisite also, that this single person should be attended with a visible standing veteran army, to be paid well, and punish'd well, if there be cause, to awe as well as to secure the people; it being the greatest solecism that can be in Government, to depend merely upon the affections of the people; for there is not such a wavering windy thing, not such an humourfome and cross-grain'd animal in the world, as the Common People; and what authors soever, either Greek or Latin, have pretended to poe, liey, affirm so much." The fourth edition of this book was published in 1660, with several additions, containing Reflections upon Government in general. XXI. History of the Wars of Jerusalem epitomiz'd. Printed in 8vo. XXII. Ah, Ha; Tumulus, Thalamus: Two Counter-Poems; the first an Elegy upon Edward late Earl of Dorset; the second an Epithalamium to the Lord Marquess of Dorchester; with an Hymenaeum or Bridal Sonnet of four Stanzas, according to a choice Air set thereunto by Mr. Will. Webb. London, 1653, in two sheets in 4to. XXIII. The German Diet: or the Ballance of Europe, wherein the Power and Weakness, Glory and Reproach, Virtues and Vices, &c. of all the Kingdoms and States of Christendom are impartially poised. London, 1653, Folio. The Author's Picture at whole length, is set before the title. XXIV. Parthenopoeia: or the History of the most renowned Kingdom of Naples, with a List of their Kings, &c. London 1654 in fol. The first part of it was written by Scipio Mazzella, and translated into English from the Italian by Sampson Lennard, Herald of Arms. The second part was compiled by Mr. Howell. XXV. Londinopolis: An Historical Discourse or Perustration of the City of London and Westminster, with the Courts of Justice, Antiquities, and new Buildings. London 1657 in folio. XXVI. Discourse of the Empire and of the Election of the King of the Romans, &c. London 1658 in 8vo. XXVII. Lexicon Tetraglotton: An English-French-Italian-Spanish Dictionary. London 1660 in fol. To this is added A particular Vocabulary or Nomenclature in English, Italian, French, and Spanish, of the proper Terms belonging to several Arts and Sciences, to common Professions and Callings, both liberal and mechanic, &c. and also Proverbs; or, old sayed Sawes and Adages in English (or the Saxon Tongue) Italian, French and Spanish; whereunto the British, for their great Antiquity and Weight, are added. XXVIII. A Cordial for the Cavaliers: London 1661. This was answered immediately after its publication by Mr. Roger L'Estrange in a book intitled, A Caveat for the Cavaliers; which having given offence to divers persons, he published a second edition of it with his name, and a preface to it. Soon after Mr. Howell published a vindication of his Cordial under this title, XXIX. Some sabel Inspections made into those Irregularities, that want to the Composition of a late Cordial for the Cavaliers. London 1661. Upon which Mr. L'Estrange animadverts briefly in the close of a piece of his intitled, A modest Plea both for the Caveat and Author of it. XXX. A French Grammar, and a Dialogue consisting of all Gallicisms, with additions of the most useful and significant Proverbs &c. Printed at London twice, the last time in 1673 in folio. XXXI. The Parley of Beasts: or Morpbandra Queen of the enchanted Island, &c. Tom. I. London 1660 in folio. XXXII. The Second Part of casual Discourses and Interlocutions between Patricius and Peregrin, &c. London 1661. Printed in a book intitled, Divers Historical Discourses of the late popular Insurrections in Great Britain and Ireland. To this is added An Apology for Fables mytho-

logized. XXXIII. Twelve Treatises of the late Revolutions. London 1661 in 8vo. XXXIV. New English Grammar for Foreigners to learn English; with a Grammar for the Spanish or Castilian Tongue; with special Remarks on the Portuguese Dialect, for the service of her Majesty. London 1662 in 8vo. XXXV. Discourse concerning the Precedency of Kings. London 1663 in folio. Translated into Latin by B. Harris, and printed at London 1664 in 8vo. XXXVI. Poems on several choice and various subjects, occasionally compos'd by an eminent Author. Collected and published by Serjeant-Major P. F. [Payne Fisher]. London 1663 in 8vo. Dedicated by the editor to Dr. Henry King Bishop of Chichester. In the preface the editor tells us, that our author " may be called the prodigy of the age for the variety of his volumes; for from his Απολογία or Parly of Trees to his Θυρολογία or Parly of Beasts (not inferior to the other) there hath passed the press above forty of his works on various subjects, useful not only to the present times, but to all posterity. And it is to be observed, that in all his writings there is something still new, either in the matter, method, or fancy, and in an untrodden tract." XXXVII. Treatise concerning Ambassadors. Translated into Latin by John Harman of Magdalen College Oxford. London 1664 in 8vo. XXXVIII. Concerning the surrender of Dunkirk, that it was done upon good Grounds. London 1664 in 8vo. He likewise translated from Italian into English, 1. St. Paul's late Progress upon Earth about a Divorce 'twixt Christ and the Church of Rome by reason of her dissoluteness and excesses, &c. London 1644 in 8vo. The author of this book published it about the year 1642, and being obliged to fly from Rome on that account in the company and under the conduct of one, who pretended friendship to him, was betrayed at Avignon, and there hanged, and then burnt. 2. A Venetian Looking-glass: Or, a Letter written very lately from London to Cardinal Barberini at Rome by a Venetian Clarissimo, touching the present distempers in England. Printed in 1648 in three sheets in 4to. 3. An exact History of the late Revolutions in Naples, and of their monstrous Successes not to be paralleled by any antient or modern History. London 1650 in 8vo. This book was written in Italian by Alexander Giraffi. 4. A Letter of Advice sent from the prime Statesmen of Florence how England may come to herself again. Dated at Florence the 12th of March 1659. Printed at the end of The second Part of casual Discourses &c. abovementioned. He translated from French into English, The Nuptials of Pelens and Thetis; consisting of a Mask and Comedy, or the great Royal Ball acted lately in Paris six times, &c. London 1654 in 4to; and from Spanish into English, The Process and Pleadings in the Court of Spain upon the death of Anthony Ascham, Resident for the Parliament of England, and of John Baptista Riva, his Interpreter, &c. London 1651 in folio. He published A French-English Dictionary compiled by Mr. Randal Cotgrave: with another in English and French. Whereunto are newly added the Animadversions and Supplements &c. of James Howell Esq; London 1650 in folio. He published also Cotivini Posthuma: divers choice pieces of that renowned Antiquary Sir Robert Cotton, Knights and Baronet. Preserved from the injury of Time, and exposed to the public light for the benefit of Posterity. By J. H. Esq; London 1651 in 8vo. He published also The late King's Declaration in Latin, French, and English, ann. 1649.

[H] Where a monument was erected to his memory. The following inscription is upon it: JACOBUS HOWELL, Cambra-Britannus, Regius Historiographus, (in Angliâ primus) qui post varias peregrinationes tandem naturæ cursum peregit, satur ævorum et fama, domi forisque huc usque erraticus, hic fixus 1666. This monument was taken down in 1683, when the Temple-Church was repaired. T.

HUARTE (JOHN) lived in the sixteenth Century, and gained great fame by a work he published in the Spanish tongue; which has been translated into several languages, and borne several impressions [A]. He therein treats of the examination of such genius's as are fit for the study of the Sciences, and lays down many things which may make one believe, that he did not follow the common road of Physicians; but was able to make a great many new discoveries, by his profound meditations, and a very close application to the study of the Antients. However, it would not be prudent for any person to trust, either his maxims or all the authorities he alledges; for he is not to be trusted on either of these heads (a); and his hypotheses are frequently chimerical, especially when he pretends to teach the formalities which must be observed by those who would get children of a virtuous turn of mind. There are, in this part of the book, a great many particulars repugnant to modesty, and which Gabriel Chappuis has translated in too gross a manner. He deserves censure for publishing, as a genuine and authentic piece, a pretended letter of Lentulus the Proconsul, from Jerusalem to the Roman Senate; wherein a portrait is given of CHRIST JESUS, a description of his shape and stature, the colour of his hair, the qualities of his beard &c. A criticism has been made of Huarte's work [B]. He was thought to be a Spaniard, which

(a) See Apologie de Costar, pag. 213, 214.

(1) He had been Professor at Padua.

(2) See Du Verdier, Biblioth. Française, pag. 432. The title is a little altered in the edition I make use of, which is that of Roan, printed in 1583, 12mo.

(3) Sorel, de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 327.

(4) Anthony Zara, who wrote a work of the Anatomy of Genius's and Sciences, Peter Charon, and others, revive the doctrine of this Spaniard, almost without the least restriction, Ibid., pag. 335.

[A] He gained great fame by a work he published in the Spanish tongue; which has been translated into several languages, and borne several impressions.] It was translated into Italian by Camillo Camilli, and this version was dedicated by Nicolo Manassi, to Frederic Pendafius, Professor of Philosophy in Bologna (1). The Dedication is dated from Venice, the first of March 1582. The edition I make use of is of Venice, presso Aldo 1590 in 8vo. The book in question was translated into French by Gabriel Chappuis anno 1580. The title of this version is as follows, Anacrase ou parfait Jugement &c. i. e. Anacrisis or perfect Judgment and Examination of such Genius's as are fit for acquiring the sciences, and were born such: wherein by marvellous and useful secrets, drawn from true Philosophy both natural and divine, is shewn the difference between the gifts and abilities found in men, and for what kind of study the genius of every man is adapted; in such a manner that whoever shall read this book attentively, will discover the properties of his own genius, and be able to make choice of that science, in which he will make the greatest improvement (2). There is a better French version than this, I mean that printed at Amsterdam, for John Ravelein, in 1672, and the translator's name is Francis Savinien d'Alquie. He has taken in the additions which John Huarte had inserted in the last edition of his book. These are considerable both as to quality and quantity: but the translators in question could not intert them in their respective places, and so were forced to throw part of them at the beginning, and the rest at the end of the work. I know only by the Bodleian catalogue the Latin version of this book, by Æsch. Major, printed anno 1622 in 8vo. [I have the following edition of this work, the title of which runs thus, EXAMEN DE INGENIOS PARA LAS SCIENCIAS. Donde se muestra la diferencia de habilidades que ay en los hombres, y el genere de letras que a cada uno responde en particular. Es obra donde el que leyere con atencion hallara la manera de su ingenio, y sabra escoyer la sciencia en que mas ha de aprouechar: y si por ventura la vuere ya profesado, entendera si atinó a la que pedia su habilidad natural. Compuesta por el Doctor Juan Huarte, natural de sant Juan del pie del Puerto. EN LEYDA Con Licencia, por Juan Pats. MDCXCI. It is in 12mo, a handsome letter, and dedicated A la muy magnifica y illustre senhora Donna Penelope Riche. The writer of it subscribes D. C. I likewise have Gabriel Chappuis's French version of the Examen de ingenios, but printed at Paris, in 1619. There are two prefaces to my Spanish edition of the Examen &c. abovementioned; but only the second is translated by Gabriel Chappuis, and prefixed to his French version. We also have an English translation of it.] Addit. by the Transl.

[B] A criticism has been made of Huarte's work.] It is intitled L'Examen de l'Examen des Esprits. i. e. The Examination of Genius's examined. The author of this criticism was Jourdain Guibelet. Here follows a passage from Sorel (3). "The Spanish author of the Trial or Examination of Genius's (4) has been followed by some authors (4), and condemned by others. I shall pass over those things which he was accused of, viz. of ascribing so much power or

" efficacy to corporeal qualities, that the soul seems to be dependent on them; and that this would prevent one from believing it to be immaterial and immortal, as it really is. But he has defended himself sufficiently on this head, by shewing, that the soul acts only on man according to the disposition of the organs; nevertheless it is thought, that he has still subjected too much this spiritual substance to gross and corporeal parts; and that the comparisons which he has drawn from brutes, and even the most imperfect of them, such as insects, reflect a dishonour on so excellent an animal as man; that it is also ridiculous to ascribe aridity or dryness to ants and such insects, because they are prudent or wise, and to draw a consequence from thence, viz. that prudence or wisdom must necessarily be found in dry constitutions; for by what art has he been able to discover, that there is less moistness than dryness in the brain of flies which seem to be very moist? Farther, how has he observed the difference between the brain of the bees, from that of common flies, the former of which are looked upon as wise, and the latter as foolish? No great difference, in case of a dissection, will be found in their brain; and when he affirms that the brain of the one is moist and those of the other dry, it is because he saw that the one were prudent and the other imprudent, and did not judge of their prudence or imprudence from their dryness or humidity. . . . Some object likewise to the author of the Examination of Genius's, that he has not justly settled the constitutions or temperatures for each faculty of the soul; and that he should not have ascribed to dryness or aridity the judgment or understanding only, but likewise memory; and that these two faculties are not incompatible. Thus several of his propositions are found fault with, which prompted a French Physician to draw up a criticism of his Examination, wherein he strongly refutes the greatest part of his doctrine, which he treats as he pleases, in a book of the same size with the other (5)." (5) Sorel, de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 327, 328.

Sorel afterwards makes some remarks against the doctrine of the author of the Examination of Genius's, among which is the following. "Some writers have sought out methods in order for putting the natural faculties in a good state or condition. To form the better judgment of them, they are not contented with observing men in themselves, by their external marks; but have even carried their enquiries so far as the causes, viz. to the time and place of their birth, and above all to the parents who begat them, who are the true sources of constitution, and have a very great influence with regard to the forming of their humour. This being allowed, in order to make their doctrine the more acceptable, they have pretended at the same time to prescribe remedies for the bad qualities which they discovered, or to administer help towards the attaining of good. And in order to enquire out the perfection of man in his most distant origin, they have endeavoured to make their birth as propitious as possible; and direct their parents to employ all the precautions imaginable, in order that they may come into the world with such qualities as may be desired. Some naturalists have enquired which was a mistake, he being a native of the French Navarre (b).

(b) At St. John de Pied de Port. See du Verdier, Bibliob: Française, pag. 432.

"enquired what constitution and age a man and woman ought to be of, in order for marriage; and in what manner they ought to conduct themselves, as what aliments it will be proper for them to take, in order for their procreating sound and healthy children. The author of the Examination of Genius's has added to this, the manner of begetting them of such a constitution, as shall give them a disposition for acquiring arts and sciences. Both the one and the other declare, that in marrying persons, great care ought to be taken, viz. to joyn a man of a hot complexion to a woman who is cooler, and who has the moistness he wants, in order for the forming a perfect constitution. But it would be difficult to make such enquiries, because a great many other things are required in order for the making an agreeable match, which are principally regarded. It is generally thought, that with regard to corporeal qualities it is enough that those who marry are free from any bodily infirmity or deformity. With regard to the manner in which married persons ought to live, and of the times fit for procreation, and other observations prescribed in order for the getting of boys or girls; and even for causing them to be brought into the world with a complexion or disposition fit for certain professions, though these do not always succeed so exactly as one could desire, they yet cannot but be attended with happy consequences. Some men, though less circumspect than others, do yet enjoy all these advantages without all this care; but that was owing to the great vigour of their constitutions (6)."

mind of man is so short and limited, that it is scarce sufficient to one thing; I was ever of opinion that it is impossible for any person to attain a perfect skill in two arts, and that he must necessarily be ignorant of one of them; which made Plato say in his book concerning Laws, Nemo ærarius simul & lignarius faber fit; duas enim artes, aut studia duo, diligenter exercere humana natura non potest. i. e. "No man can be a good Copper-smith and Carpenter at one and the same time; it being impossible for human nature to excell in two arts or studies." It is therefore my opinion, that wise and learned men ought to be appointed to judge of the genius and capacity of children from their infancy; and in order to oblige them to apply themselves to that science for which they are best qualified, without leaving it to their own fancy; for fear lest they should make such a choice, as might be not so advantageous, or even prejudicial to them. Were this done, your Majesty would have the ablest artists, and the finest works in the world in your own Kingdom; and persons who unite most happily art with nature. I could also wish that the like method might be taken in your Universities; and that as they do not permit the students to pass from one faculty to another, till they are well skilled in the Latin tongue; so they also would appoint persons to examine, if a student who would apply himself to Logic, to Philosophy, Physic, Divinity and the Laws, has the genius requisite for succeeding in those several sciences; for besides that it is doing great prejudice to the public, for a man to exercise an art of which he is ignorant; so it is a great presumption for a man to labour and rack his brain about a thing, which it will be impossible for him ever to effect or complete with honour. What our author says in another place, would be still more perplexed and dubious in practice. "In a well regulated commonwealth or government there ought to be match-makers, who should know by rules of art, the qualities requisite in two persons who would marry for their reciprocal advantage. Hippocrates and Galen made some attempts in the affair; and have given rules to distinguish a fruitful from a barren woman; and betwixt a man who has abilities for procreation and another who is otherwise. But they have writ little on this subject, and not so distinctly as they ought, at least as is necessary for the present occasion (8)."

(6) Ibid. pag. 335. 336.

(7) Huarte, E- p. 8. Dedicat.

It cannot be doubted but that John Huarte has laid down some general maxims which are very just and true, as for instance, that it is of advantage to devote every individual to the employments for which nature has formed him; that some persons would have made a figure in the Law had they not been made Physicians; and that great inconveniences flow from the little regard that is had to the natural disposition in the choice of employments; but it would be extremely difficult to prevent this disorder. The expedient which our author proposed to Philip II of Spain, would not be attended, in practice, with all the advantages which might be expected from it. As I observe, says he (7), that the

(8) Huarte, Ex- amen des Esprits, chap. 15. folio 207, verso. I make use of Chappuis's version.

HUDIBRAS, a celebrated English Poem, the author of which, Mr. SAMUEL BUTLER, was born in the parish of Strensham, in the county of Worcester, and baptized there the 13th of February 1612 (a). His father, named Samuel Butler, was a person of a competent estate near three hundred pounds per annum; but most of it in lease-lands [A] held of Sir Thomas Ruffel, grandfather to Sir Francis Ruffel, Baronet, Lord of the manor of Strensham beforementioned (b). Finding that his son had an early inclination to learning, he made shift to have him educated (c) [B] in the College-school at Worcester, under Mr. Henry Bright (d); where, having past through the several classes, and becoming an excellent school-scholar (e), he went for some little time to Cambridge [C]; (or, according to others, to Oxford) (f), but was never matriculated,

(a) I am assured by Charles Longueville Esq; that Butler was born about the year 1600.

(b) Wood. Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 452. 2d edit.

(c) Butler's Life prefixed to his Hudibras, pag. v. London 1710, 16°.

(d) Wood, ut supra.

(e) Butler's Life, ut supra.

(f) I am assured by Mr. Longueville that Butler never resided in Oxford.

[A] His father was a person of a competent estate . . . but most of it in Lease-lands.] Thus speaks our Oxford Antiquary; and the author of the Life of Samuel Butler, prefixed to his Hudibras, says "that Butler's father, who had the same Christian name, was an honest country farmer, who had some small estate of his own, but rented a much greater of the Lord of the Manor where he lived (1)." The last mentioned Life-writer says; since most men have a curiosity to have some account of such (2) anonymous authors, whose compositions have been eminent for wit or learning; I have been desired to oblige them with such observations as I could receive from those who had the happiness to be acquainted with him, (Butler); and on this occasion, also to redress the MISTAKES of the Oxford Antiquary, in his Athenæ Oxoniensibus concerning him (3). This Biographer wrote this about the year 1710, which was but thirty years after Butler's death; consequently many of that Poet's friends might be still living, whereby he very possibly was enabled to get the most exact informations concerning him; but whether we have most reason to give credit to Mr. Wood, or the Life-writer in question, shall be considered in the course of this article.

[B] His father . . . made shift to have him educated.] Thus says the anonymous Life-writer, who, by the expression made shift, seems to hint as though Butler's father was in narrow circumstances, which does not appear from Mr. Wood (4).

[C] He went for some little time to Cambridge.] I should rather give credit to the Oxford Antiquary on this occasion, who informs us that he continued some years in Cambridge (5). It will be best to transcribe the whole passage. From (the School at Worcester) he went, as his brother NOW LIVING affirms, to the University of Cambridge; yet others of the neighbourhood say to Oxon (6), but whether true I cannot tell. It is certain that one Samuel Butler was elected from Westminster School, a student of Christ Church, ann. 1623, but making little stay there he was not matriculated, and

(4) Mr. Longueville tells me that his father was in narrow circumstances.

(5) This is confirmed by Mr. Longueville who believes he was not matriculated.

(6) This has been proved a falsity.

(1) Butler's Life prefixed to Hudibras, pag. v. London 1710, 16°.

(2) I don't know why he uses the epithet anonymous; since Butler was well known to be the author of Hudibras.

(3) Idem, pag. iv.

culated, his father not being able to defray the expence of an academical education (b). As he continued some years in Cambridge, though he was not matriculated, I don't see why the anonymous Life-writer should express himself as if it was a misfortune to Butler, not to have been instructed in a regular, academical way [D]. Our Poet returned soon to his native country, and was clerk to one Mr. (i) Jefferys of Earls-Croom [E], an eminent Justice of the Peace in that county, with whom he lived some years in an easy and no ways contemptible station. Here, by the indulgence of a kind master, he had sufficient leisure to apply himself to whatsoever learning his inclinations led him, which was chiefly History and Poetry; joining to these, for his diversion, Music and Painting (k), in the last of which arts we find, by our Oxford Antiquary, that he had made a great progress. Some Paintings by Mr. Butler remained in Mr. Jefferys's family [F]. The affinity between the arts of Poetry and Painting is so great [G], that those who excell in one of them, frequently apply themselves to, or at least, have a great inclination for the other. Mr. Butler was afterwards recommended to that great encourager of learning, Elizabeth Countess of Kent [H], where he had not only the opportunity to consult all kinds of learned books, but also to converse with that living library of learning Mr. Selden (l) [I]. Our author lived likewise some time with

(b) See the note [B].

(i) Mr. Longueville Esq; never heard of Butler's living with this Mr. Jefferys, but believes he might.

(k) Butler's Life, ut supra, pag. v.

(l) Idem, pag. vii.

so consequently the place of his nativity and age are not remaining on record; otherwise had he been made a member of the University, it would have been known whether he was the same, who was afterwards the famed author of Hudibras. After Samuel Butler had continued in Cambridge six or seven years, but in what college or hall his BROTHER knows not &c. (7). As Wood tells us, that Butler's brother, then living, affirmed that he went to Cambridge, I believe we may prefer his authority to that of the other persons in the neighbourhood, who declared that he was sent to Oxon; or at least if he did go thither, it is highly probable he made but a very short stay, and went soon after to Cambridge (*).

(7) Wood's Art. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 452. 2d edit.

(*) This matter is fully settled by Mr. Longueville as the reader may have observed in citation (f) of the text.

(8) Life of Butler, prefixed to Hudibras, pag. ii.

[D] Why the anonymous Life-writer should express himself as though it were a misfortune to Butler not to have been instructed in a regular academical way.] The Life-writer in question, after expatiating on the great poetical merit of Butler, and applauding his works says, "the author of this celebrated poem (Butler) was of this last composition; for although he had not the happiness of an academical education, as some affirm; it may be perceived, throughout his whole poem, that he had read much, and was very well accomplished in the most useful parts of human learning (8)." As our Oxford Antiquary declares expressly, that Butler resided some years at Cambridge, the anonymous Life-writer in question need not have discovered a sort of regret at our Poet's being deprived of the necessary helps to improve his genius, though he were not entered in any of the colleges. For as he had a good foundation of classical learning, and was master of a great deal of wit, his company must necessarily have been agreeable to many of the brightest men of the University, who no doubt took a pleasure in directing him in the course of his studies. It is indeed certain, that the regular and periodical instructions of a learned and ingenious man may be of great service to a young student; but then, on the other side, it is well known that a youth of good sense and genius, who has got a tolerable foundation of learning, is able to make a vast progress in his studies, with no other assistance than that of books; and especially if he has an opportunity of conversing sometimes with learned and ingenious men. But such as are born great Poets, have least occasion to be taught the mechanical part of their art. "With regard to Poets, says an ingenious French writer, the principles of the practice of their art may so easily be understood and put in execution, that they do not even want the assistance of a master to direct them in the study of those principles. A man, born with a genius, may, in two months, teach himself all the rules relating to French Poetry. He even is soon able to go back to the source of those rules, and to judge of the importance of each, from the importance of the principles on which it is founded. And the world never thought it a glory to that man who had taught the elements of Poetry to one who afterwards became a very great Poet. No mention has been made of those who instructed Virgil and Horace in the mechanical rules of their art. We our selves do not know who taught Moliere and Corneille (though alive not many years since) the causa and measure of our verses. It was not believed that those instructors had so much share in the reputation of their pupils, as to deserve to have their names enquired after or remembered (9)."

[E] Was made Clerk to one Mr. Jefferys of Earls-Croom.] This circumstance is not related by Mr. Wood, who, on the contrary, seems to hint, as though he had been taken into the service of Eliz. Countess of Kent (10), immediately after his coming from Cambridge (11). However, as the anonymous Life-writer mentions the person and the place, this incident may probably be true.

[F] Some Paintings of Mr. Butler remained in Mr. Jefferys's family.] This we are told by the anonymous author of his Life. "I have seen, says he, some pictures, said to be of his drawing, which remained in that family. This I mention, not for the excellency of them, but to satisfy the reader of his early inclinations to that noble art; for which also he was afterwards entirely beloved by Mr. Samuel Cooper, one of the most eminent Painters of his time (12)." Though this Life-writer says, he does not mention Mr. Butler's paintings for the excellency of them, yet, if Mr. Wood is to be credited, he had made a very great progress in that delightful art. Mr. Butler, says he, at length became so noted for the former (painting), that he was entirely beloved by Samuel Cooper, the Prince of Limners of his age (13). It is very probable, that the great progress Butler had made in Painting, very much contributed to strengthen the affection, which so great an artist as Mr. Cooper had for him.

[G] The affinity between the arts of Poetry and Painting is so great.] This has been observed by the most ingenious writers, both ancient and modern. The author of a late agreeable Essay, makes the following reflections on this subject. "Almost all the parts of Poetry are found in Painting. . . The nearer the Poet approaches to the Painter, the more perfect he is; and the more perfect the Painter, the more he imitates the Poet, in drawing the manners and passions with life and spirit. The Painter is to animate a form, and the Poet to lend a form to sentiment and discretion: One is to give life to beautiful proportion, and the other strength and figure to sublime thought. The Painter, like Prometheus, lights up a spirit in the body, while the Poet seeks a body, to maintain and support that spirit; which is one of Homer's greatest praises; for, by the fire of his great genius, he has given form to almost all things, and made them appear, as it were, alive (14)."

[H] Mr. Butler was . . . recommended . . . to Elizabeth Countess of Kent.] This the Life writer declares, in which he agrees with Wood; except that the latter tells us, that he was taken into the Countess's service (15). (16) We find by the Oxford Antiquary, that our Poet made great improvements during his abode with the Countess. In this family, says he, living several years, he did, for his diversion, exercise his parts in Painting and Music (17).

[I] To converse also with . . . Mr. Selden.] This is confirmed by Mr. Wood. "Great Selden, says he, who was much conversant in the family of that Countess, (of Kent) had an esteem for, and would often employ him to write Letters (18) beyond sea, and translate for him (19)."

(9) Reflexions Critique sur la Poësie & la Peinture, vol. 2. pag. 23, 24. Paris, 1733. 12mo.

(10) Art. Oxon. ut supra.

(11) Mr. Longueville, as I before observed, does not remember to have heard of our Poet's living with this Mr. Jefferys.

(12) Butler's Life, ut supra, pag. vi. edit. London 1710.

(13) Art. Oxon. ibid. ut supra.

(14) Of the Superior Arts; an Essay. By Hildebrand Jacob Esq; pag. 4. London 1734, 8vo.

(15) Wood, idem ibid. ut supra.

(16) Mr. Longueville believes he lived with that Countess, but in what quality he knows not.

(17) Idem, ibid.

(18) I am told by Charles Longueville Esq; that our Poet was Selden's amanuensis.

(19) Idem, ibid.

Sir Samuel Luke, who was of an ancient family in Bedfordshire, but, to his dishonour, an eminent Commander under Oliver Cromwell; and, it is said, Butler then composed his Loyal Poem (m). It is very reasonably supposed that fate, more than choice, threw him into this family [K]. As Sir Samuel Luke is generally supposed to be shadowed under the character of Hudibras, it is very probable Mr. Butler might have received some disgust in that Knight's family. At riper years he studied the Common Law, but did not practise it. After the Restoration of King Charles II, the persons at the helm minding money more than merit, our Poet found a famous maxim of Juvenal verified but too exactly in himself (x) [L]. Being endued with that innate modesty which rarely finds promotion in Courts, he was made Secretary to Richard Earl of Carbury, Lord President of the Principality of Wales, and the Marches thereof, who appointed him Steward of Ludlow-Castle, upon the revival of the Court there (o). About this time he married one Mrs. Herbert, a Gentlewoman of a very good family, but not a (p) widow, as our Oxford Antiquary relates. She had a competent fortune, but the greatest part of it was lost, by being put out on ill securities, whereby it was of little advantage to him (q) [M]. Mr. Butler is said to have been Secretary to George Villiers Duke of Buckingham, when he was Chancellor of the University of Cambridge (r), but whether that be true or not, it is certain, says the author whom I quote, that the Duke had a great kindness for, and was afterwards a benefactor to him (s). This assertion of the anonymous Life-writer, viz. that the Duke assisted Mr. Butler, is absolutely denied by a late ingenious (t) writer [N]. He had promises of places and employments, of great value and credit, from Edmund Earl of Clarendon, when he was Lord High Chancellor of England, especially for this cause, that his Majesty had a respect for him, and the more for his Poem called Hudibras (u). No man was a more generous (w) friend to him, than that Mæcænas of all learned and witty men, Charles Lord Buckhurst, the late Earl of Dorset and Middlesex [O], who being himself an excellent Poet, knew how to set a just value upon the ingenious

(m) Mem. ibid.

(n) Atb. Oxon. Ibid. ut supra.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Mr. Longueville is of opinion that she was not a widow.

(q) Butler's Life, prefixed to Hudibras, pag. viii.

(r) Wood, Atb. Oxon. ut supra.

(s) Butler's Life, pag. vii, viii.

(t) I am informed by Charles Longueville Esq; that Butler never received any favours from Villiers Duke of Buckingham.

(u) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 452, 453. edit. ut supra.

(w) I believe we are to except Mr. William Longueville of the Temple, father to Charles Longueville Esq; so often mentioned in this article; several persons having assured me, that that Gentleman was infinitely the best friend Butler ever had.

[K] Fate, more than choice. Though fate, more than choice, says the anonymous Life-writer, seems to have placed him in the service of a Knight so notorious, both in his person and politics; yet by the rule of contraries, we may observe throughout his whole Poem, that he was most orthodox, both in his religion and loyalty. And I am the more induced to believe he wrote it about that time, because he had then the opportunity to converse with those living characters of rebellion, nonsense and hypocrisy, which he so lively and pathetically exposes throughout the whole work (20). This conjecture, that our Poet wrote his Hudibras during his abode with Sir Samuel Luke, is not altogether improbable; for as Sir Samuel was so great a stickler in the Oliverian cause, and doubtless had a large portion of the then modish cant and enthusiasm; himself, as well as his whole family, must appear in a very drole light to a man of Butler's burlesque temper and principles; they all must have seemed as so many anticks in his eye, and this, consequently, must raise his poetic fire. One reason why Butler is supposed to have ridiculed Sir Samuel Luke, under the character of Hudibras, is from an imperfect verse, at the latter end of Canto I, Part I, of Hudibras.

*'Tis sung, there is a valiant Mamaluke
In foreign land, jely'd — —
To whom we have been oft compar'd
For person, parts, address, and beard, &c.*

Now it is supposed that this chafm is to be filled with the words Sir Samuel Luke. What, I think, strengthens this conjecture, is, that the line before it is of ten syllables, and the measure of the verse generally used in this Poem, is of eight; at the same time that the words Sir (21) Samuel Luke, make the corresponding verse full ten syllables.

[L] Our Poet found a famous maxim of Juvenal verified but too exactly in himself. It is this:

*Haud facile emergunt, quorum virtutibus obstat
Res angusta domi:*

That is,
" Rarely they rise by virtue's aid, who lie
" Plung'd in the depth of helpless poverty.

DRYDEN.

But some will perhaps not think his fate so very hard, he having the not altogether uncommon; felicity of being almost worshipped after his death, though so greatly neglected whilst living.

[M] His wife's fortune . . . was of little advantage to him. The Oxford Antiquary says the very reverse of this (22). He did not practice the Law, but lived on the jointure of a widow that he had married (23).

[N] This last assertion that the Duke assisted Mr. Butler, is absolutely denied by a late ingenious writer. It is Major Richardson Pack, who gives us the following relation. Mr. Wycberley had always laid bold of any opportunity which offered, to represent to his Grace how well Mr. Butler had deserved of the Royal Family, by writing his inimitable Hudibras; and that it was a reproach to the Court, that a person of his loyalty and wit should suffer in obscurity, and under the whims he did. The Duke seemed always to hearken to him with attention enough: and, after some time, undertook to recommend his pretensions to his Majesty. Mr. Wycberley, in hopes to keep him steady to his word, obtained of his Grace to name a day, when he might introduce that modest and unfortunate Poet to his new patron. At last an appointment was made, and the place of meeting was agreed to be the Rot-Buck. Mr. Butler and his friend attended accordingly; the Duke too joined them. But as the Duke would have it, the door of the room where they sat was open; and his Grace, who had seated himself near it, observing a pimp of his acquaintance (the creature too was a Knight) trip by with a brace of Ladies, immediately quitted his engagement to follow another kind of business, at which he was more ready than in doing good offices to men of desert; though no one was better qualified, than he, both in regard to his fortune and understanding, to protect them; and from that hour to the day of his death, poor Butler never found the least effect of his promise (24). If this story may be depended upon, it seems quite to invalidate what is asserted by Mr. Wood and the anonymous Life-writer on his authority, viz. that Butler was Secretary to the above-mentioned Duke of Buckingham. It also seems to contradict the report which prevailed, viz. that the Duke of Buckingham, author of the Rehearsal, had therein, as it was then said, the assistance of Dr. Thomas Sprat, his Chaplain, Martin Clifford and Samuel Butler, alias Hudibras, in the composing thereof (25). Though our Poet does not stand in need of any reputation but that which arises from his famous Poem, it yet would be some addition to it, could this circumstance be proved. But however it be, the bare report shews the high opinion the public entertained of Butler's genius (26).

[O] But none was a more generous friend to him . . . than Charles . . . the late Earl of Dorset [An eminent English Poet, in a Dedication to the present Duke of Dorset, where he gives a character of his noble father, says, Butler owed it to him (the late Earl) that the Court tasted his Hudibras (27).

(22) Mr. Longueville believes he did not reap much benefit by his wife's fortune.

(23) Atb. Oxon. ibid. ut supra.

(24) Atb. Oxon. ibid. ut supra.

(25) Atb. Oxon. ibid. ut supra.

(26) Mr. Longueville is of opinion that Butler was not personally known to the Duke of Buckingham in question.

(27) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(28) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(29) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(30) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(31) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(32) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(33) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(34) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(35) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(36) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(37) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804. edit. ut supra.

(20) Butler's Life, prefixed to Hudibras, pag. vii.

(21) Whilst this sheet was at press, I was assured by Mr. Longueville that Sir Samuel Luke is not the person ridiculed under the name of HUDIBRAS.

ingenious performances of others, and has taken care to relieve and supply the necessities of those whose modesty would prompt them to conceal themselves; of which Mr. Butler was a signal instance. In fine, the integrity of our Poet's life, the acuteness of his wit, and easiness of his conversation, had rendered him vastly acceptable to all men; and yet he prudently avoided a multiplicity of acquaintance, and wisely chose such only, whom his discerning judgment prompted him to converse with (x). According to our Oxford Antiquary, Mr. Butler was a boon and witty companion, especially among those with whom he was very well acquainted. Having lived to the age of threescore and eight, he died of a consumption in the year (y) 1680, and was interred, at the charge of his good friend Mr. L——vil (z) of the Temple in the Churchyard of St. Paul's Covent-Garden at the West-end of the said yard, on the North-side under the Church wall (aa). He was buried, at his own request, six foot deep in the ground. It is universally said, that he had struggled with numberless difficulties. The ingratitude of the court and age towards him has been set in a very strong light by a famous English Satyrift [P]. For many years he had no funeral monument, till at last Alderman Barber, late Lord Mayor of the City of London, generously paid the tribute due to Mr. Butler's memory, by erecting, at his own expence, a monument to him, among the Poets in Westminster-Abbey. As his bust was at first placed very low, it was smeared and defaced by boys and idle people; upon which the Gentleman abovementioned had it beautified, and fixed out of reach, in the place where it now stands. I shall give the inscription on his monument [Q]. Many pieces are ascribed to him besides his Hudibras [R], some of which being very obscene and trifling, would not do honour either to his genius or his morals. Our author's Hudibras gave him the great fame he has acquired [S], and was frequently read by King Charles II, whom, says a writer, the judicious part of mankind will readily acknowledge to be a sovereign judge; and who was so great an admirer of it,

(x) Butler's Life, pag. viii, ix.

(y) I am assured by Mr. Longueville that here is a double error, Butler dying of old age, and not of a consumption; and not at sixty eight years of age, but at fourscore, or thereabouts.

(z) The person here meant is Mr. William Longueville. I can't conceive why the writer in question did not put his name at length.

(aa) Butler's Life, pag. x. and Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 453.

[P] The ingratitude of the Court . . . towards him, has been set in a very strong light, by a famous English Satyrift. It is Oldham. A reader of taste and humanity cannot but be pleased with the noble indignation which fired him on this occasion.

On BUTLER who can think without just rage,
The glory, and the scandal of the age?
Fair stood his hopes, when first he came to town,
Met every where with welcomes of renown;
Court'd, and lov'd by all; with wonder read,
And promises of Princely favour fed:
But what reward for all had he at last,
After a life in dull expectation past?
The wretch at summing up his mispent days,
Found nothing left, but poverty, and praise;
Of all his gains by verse he could not save,
Enough to purchase flannel, and a grave:
Reduc'd to want, he in due time fell sick,
Was fain to die, and he interr'd on tick (28):
And well might bless the fever that was sent,
To rid him hence, and his worse fate prevent (29).

(28) As Butler was buried at the expence of Mr. W. Longueville, we must suppose that Oldham employ'd the expression, upon tick, as being strong and poetical; and to set the ingratitude our Poet met with in a still more odious light.

Let a young Poet of genius, in unhappy circumstances, but listen (if possible) attentively to these lines, in the height of his poetic fever, and there is no doubt but they will contribute to cool it, and restore him to his senses again. If not, it is a thousand to one but misery and rags will be his portion.

[Q] I shall give the Inscription, hereunder. It is copied exactly from the monument itself.

(29) Poems and Translations, by J. Oldham, pag. 173, 174. London 1683, 8vo. We find that this Miscellany was printed out three years after Butler's death.

(30) This must be an error, as I observed, Butler being born about the year 1600. See the beginning of the text in the margin.

M. S.
Samuelis Butleri qui Strenhamiæ in agro Vigornienfi natus (30) 1612 obiit Londini 1680.
Vir doctus imprimis, acer, integer:
Operibus ingenii, non item præmiis felix; Satyrici apud nos carminis artifex egregius:
Quo simulatae religioni Larvam detraxit, & perduellium scelera liberrime exagitavit:
Scriptorum in suo genere primus & postremus.
Ne cui vivo deerant fere omnia
Deesset etiam mortuo tumulus,
Hoc tandem posito marmore curavit
Joannes Barber civis Londinensis. 1721.

[R] Some pieces are ascribed to him besides his Hudibras. These, according to Wood, are, Two Letters, one from J. Audland, a Quaker, to William Prynne; the other William Prynne's Answer . . . The Assembly-Man, said to be writ by Abraham Cowley, . . . and Hudibras alias Butler. Mola Afunaria, or the unreasonable and insupportable burden now pressed upon the shoulders of this groaning Nation. Ascribed to W.

Prynne. But these, says Wood, were written by Samuel Butler, author of the much-celebrated Hudibras (31). (31) Atb. Oxon. Not long since, these and several other pieces were published in one volume in 12mo, 1730. But few of them, I believe, were written by our Poet (32). A late writer says, "In justice to the public, it is thought proper . . . to declare, that all the manuscripts of Mr. Butler left behind him, are now in the custody of Mr. Longueville (33), (among which, the most considerable is one intitled, the History of Learning, written after the manner of Hudibras), and that not one line of those poems lately published under his name is genuine (34)." The following lines which are ascribed to Butler, and are said to have been given by him to Mr. Aubrey, have all the characteristics of our Poet's wit and genius.

No Jesuit e'er took in hand,
To plant a church in barren land:
Nor ever thought it worth the while,
A Sweed or Rus to reconcile.
For where there is no store of wealth,
Souls are not worth the charge of healib;
Spain in America had two designs,
To sell their Gospel for their mines.
For had the Mexicans been poor,
No Spaniard twice had landed on their shore.
Twas gold the Catholic religion planted,
Which, had they wanted gold, they still had wanted (35).

(32) I have been since told by Mr. Longueville that part of those remains are spurious. This Gentleman is possessed of all our Poet's genuine remains, which are very numerous, both in prose and verse, and among the rest, of a Poem intitled, The History of Learning.

(33) This Gentleman's true name is Longueville, as I always write it.

(34) Poetical Register, vol. 2. pag. 21. London 1723 in 8vo.

(35) Butler's Life, prefixed to Hudibras, pag. xiv.

The author from whom I borrow these verses, had said a little before, "the golden remains of Mr. Butler are in the custody of Mr. L——vil (Longueville); but I have not the happiness to be very well acquainted with him, nor interest to procure them." It may be observed of works published after the decease of an author, that many of them, so far from adding to his reputation, are often a draw-back upon it.

[S] But . . . Hudibras . . . gave him the great fame he has acquired. We find that the whole was not published together. The first part, says Wood, came out in 1663, and was not only taken into his Majesty's hands, and read by him with great delight, but also by all courtiers, loyal scholars, and gentlemen, to the great profit of the Author and Bookseller. Afterwards came out a second part, and both printed together with several additions and annotations. And at length, a third and last part, but without annotations, as by the copy printed in 1678 appears (36). In the latter editions there are annotations to this part also. In 1682 was published, in 8vo, Butler's Ghost, or Hudibras, the fourth part; with reflections on these times (37). This last is a spurious piece.

(36) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 453.

(37) Idem, ibid.

(bb) Preface to Hudibras, pag. iii. edit. ut supra.

(cc) Butler's Life prefixed to Hudibras, pag. xiii.

(dd) Butler's Life prefixed to Hudibras, pag. xii.

it, that he would often pleasantly quote it in conversation (bb). We are told that some verses, for reasons of State, were omitted in the first impression (cc). There have been many editions of it, but none I believe equal to the merits of the work. Mr. Hogarth, whose genius seems very much allied to that of Butler, has etched a series of copper plates, containing the adventures of Hudibras and Ralph his Squire, with all the pleasantries and humour requisite to the subject. There have been many imitations of this delightful Poem [T], such as the second part of Hudibras: afterwards came out the Dutch [U], Scotch, and Irish Hudibras; Butler's Ghost [W]; Mercurius Menippeus; the Loyal Satyrist, or, Hudibras in Prose; the Occasional Hypocrite, and some others of the same nature, all which, Virgil Travesty excepted [X], deserve to be condemned to the most servile offices. Some vain attempts have been made to translate Hudibras into Latin, but with little success (dd) [T]; and indeed, as the subject, and the several parts of it are humorous, and relate entirely to England and English customs, I presume it will be scarce possible for Hudibras to appear to very great advantage in a translation [Z]. It is pity we have not a complete commentary on that Poem (ee), it being certain that many passages in it lose considerably of their beauty, force and vivacity, from our not being well enough acquainted with them; not to mention, that a writer of genius might make such observations on the contrivance, the conduct, the machinery, the similes &c. of it, as would give the generality of readers a better idea of the beauties of that Poem. Our

(ee) An attempt has been made this way, in the Grubstreet Journal, by an ingenious writer who signs himself M. J. from whom I have borrowed several particulars. See Num. 39, 41, 45 and 63 of that paper.

author

[T] There have been many imitations of this delightful Poem. No sooner does some original beauty appear in the world, but she is immediately ap'd by the inferior fry. The moment after the famous Captain Lemuel Gulliver came abroad, many claimed kindred to him; started up like so many mushrooms; and fatigued the public with their stupid adventures. The celebrated Macheath was attended by a long train of insipid Ballad-Operas; nor could even honest Robinfon Crusoe escape the mimicks. We may consider these as so many ill-favour'd, awkward creatures, who are appointed by Apollo as foils to these original beauties, and to give the world a stronger idea of their perfections. I would call such imitations echos, were not the resemblance too remote; an echo giving, at least, an imperfect idea of the original sound; whereas these pieces are generally the very counter-part of those they pretend to imitate. And therefore I am afraid they can hardly come under the denomination of even Ghosts or Shadows. . . . Several reasons, I believe, might be given, why imitations, or sequels of fine original pieces, seldom or never reach the beauties of the latter. In the first place, writers of great genius think it beneath them to be copists. As these have a fund of invention of their own, they consequently do not care to borrow from others. Again, the writer who strikes out some pieces of a new kind, is generally so filled with the idea, that he considers it in all the lights in which it can appear to any advantage. "How often, says a writer, the imitation of Hudibras has been attempted, and with how little success, I leave the reader to judge: In the year 1663, there came out a spurious book, called, the second part of Hudibras; which is reflected upon by our author, under the character of Whachum, towards "the latter end of his second part (38)." I suppose the lines hinted at here, are these.

*Quoth he, where am I,
Alive, or dead; or which way came I
Through so immense a space so soon?
But now I thought myself i'the moon;
And that a monster with huge whiskers,
More formidable than a Switzer's,
My body through and through had drill'd,
And Whachum by my side had kill'd:
Had cross-examin'd both our hose,
And plunder'd all we had to lose;
Look, there he is, I see him now,
And feel the place I am run through (39).*

(38) Butler's Life prefixed to Hudibras, pag. xi, xii.

(39) Hudibras, Part 2. Canto 3. ver. 1129 to 1147, inclusive.

(40) Very possibly Edward Howard Esq; the dramatic Poet, is hinted at on this occasion. He being, at that time, his the butt of most of the wits.

(41) Poems and Translations, by J. Oldham, pag. 233. edit. ut supra.

[U] Afterwards came out the Dutch Hudibras. This is sneered at by Oldham, in his slashing verses against a Printer, who had grossly maimed a piece of

May'st thou print H—— (40) or some duller ass, Jordan, or him that wrote Dutch Hudibras (41).

[W] Butler's Ghost. The complete title of this piece is, Butler's Ghost, or Hudibras. The Fourth Part. With Reflections upon these Times.

[X] All which, Virgil Travesty excepted. Methinks the Life-writer should not have reckoned that piece among the imitations of Hudibras; the original of Scarron naturally suggesting to a witty English translator the expressions in which Mr. Cotton has clothed his Travesty.

[Y] Some attempts have been made to translate it into Latin, but with little success. These, as they necessarily must, fall short of the sprightliness and vivacity of the original. It is said that some similes were translated by the learned Dr. Harmer, once Greek Professor at Oxford, one of which is the following.

*So learned Talicotius, from
The brawny part of porter's b --, &c. (42).*

(42) Hudibras, Part 1. Canto 10. Line 281, &c.

*Sic adscititios nasos de clune torosi
Vectoris, doctâ secuit, Talicotius arte;
Qui potuere parem durando æquare parentem
At postquam fato clunis computruit, ipsum
Una sympathicum coëpit tabescere rostrum (43).*

(43) Butler's Life prefixed to Hudibras, pag. xii.

I am told that a Gentleman of Southampton has translated a great part of Hudibras into Latin, with great wit and sprightliness.

[Z] It will be scarce possible for Hudibras to appear to very great advantage in a translation. An ingenious foreigner makes some reflections on this subject, in a letter to a friend. "There is one English poem, especially, which I should despair of ever making you understand, the title whereof is Hudibras. The subject of it is the civil-war in the time of the grand rebellion; and the principles and practice of the Puritans are therein ridiculed. It is Don Quixot, it is our Satyre Merippie blended together. I never met with so much wit in one single book, as in this, which at the same time is the most difficult to be translated. Who would believe that a work which paints in such lively and natural colours the several foibles and follies of mankind, and where we meet with more sentiments than words, should baffle the endeavours of the ablest translator? But the reason of this is, almost every part of it alludes to particular incidents. The clergy are there made the principal object of ridicule, which is understood but by few among the laity. To explain this, a commentary would be requisite, and humour, when explained, is no longer humour (44)." Some of these reflections seem very just, but others, I believe, are not so. He says, that the subject of Hudibras is, the civil-war in the time of the grand rebellion. It is certainly not the civil-war itself, but the ridicule of it; none of the transactions thereof being mentioned, except, occasionally; and a series of low incidents, of a quite different nature, are told, which banter the Roundheads, who engaged in that war. His enquiry concerning the difficulty of translating that poem, will, possibly, be found

(44) Voltaire's Letters concerning the English Nation, pag. 212, 213. London 1733, 8vo.

author just borrowed the hint of his Hudibras from the admirable Don Quixot of Cervantes, but in all other respects he is perfectly an original; the sentiments and diction being entirely new. The Poem of Hudibras seems to be of the same kind with the Margites of Homer, which, according to Aristotle, bore the same relation to comedy, as the Iliad and Odyssey to Tragedy. In Homer's time, the various States of Greece were in danger of being enslaved by an Asiatic Monarch. Now nothing could be of greater advantage, at this juncture, than to shew the dangers that would ensue to the Grecians from their being at variance; and, on the contrary, the great advantages which would result from their union. The former is proved by the calamities which arose from the quarrel of Agamemnon and Achilles, the latter from their reconciliation. Such was the design of the Iliad. In Virgil's time, the form of government being quite changed, his aim was, to reconcile the minds of the Romans to a very amiable Prince, against whom nothing could be objected, but the manner by which he had raised himself to Empire. For this purpose, the Poet exhibits the entire subversion of a great people, and their voluntary submission to a new Prince, from whom Augustus was proud of being thought to descend. He therefore represents him as possessed of all the virtues that adorn a Monarch; makes him the darling of his subjects; and, after struggling with many difficulties, brings him off victorious over all his enemies. This was the design of the Aeneid. With regard to Hudibras, the design of it is as follows. As the time in which the author of it lived was famous, as is generally thought, for hypocrisy, and a pretended zeal for religion and liberty, which had subverted the laws and religion of England, and thrown all things into anarchy and confusion; at such a juncture, nothing could be of greater service to our Poet's views and those of all the Cavaliers, than to pull off the vizor, and paint the persons who had concealed themselves behind it in the most ridiculous colours, in order to render them as contemptible as possible; and therefore he did not censure them in a serious way, but with humour and pleasantry, which is well known to be a much more successful method. For this purpose, our Poet supposes, that the almost impracticable maxims of the Puritans with regard to the very strict distribution of justice, had turned the brain of his Knight, in the same manner as the poring over books of Chivalry had quite distracted Don Quixot. Sir Hudibras therefore sets out upon his rambles, in order to restore to every man his rights and privileges; and even bears themselves, who were carrying to a fair, not for their own profit but for that of the persons who were dragging them to it; he also supposing, that these animals had been arbitrarily deprived of the liberty they were born to, without being first duly tried, according to Law, and by their Peers. As the entire cast of the Poem is perfectly humorous, consequently the several adventures of the doughty Knight and his ridiculous Squire, must proceed, and end in the same strain. The construction and cast of the whole is so new, that it is distinguished by the title of the Hudibrastic way of writing. Some have called it a burlesque Poem, others a mock-Heroic, and others again a mock-Epic (ff), which name I should rather choose, were the measure of the verse the same with that of an epic Poem; for in most other respects it agrees with that species. An ingenious writer whom I have already cited, observes, that "the Hudibrastic (gg) is to differ from the Epic, as comedy does from tragedy. It must be narrative like the epic; it must, like that species of Poem, have its fable, its variety of characters, and its proper style; but all these in such a manner, as to move, not terror or compassion, as in tragedy; but laughter, as in comedy. The Fable must be formed by the narration of one, entire, ridiculous action: the characters must be such as either occur in low life, or are in their own nature odd and ridiculous; and these in as great a variety as possible; and the style or language must be contrived so as to heighten the ridiculousness of the representation (bb)." This writer is afterwards more particular with regard to the action, the characters and language [AA]. Perhaps Hudibras cannot be looked upon as a perfect

(f) The Dunciad, I believe, may be considered, in all respects, as a perfect mock-epic Poem.

(gg) Perhaps he had better expressed himself thus: A Poem written in the manner of Hudibras.

(bb) Grubstreet Journal, Num. 39.

fect

found not very just. He should have said that a translation of this Poem would be difficult, because it paints in such lively and natural colours the several foibles and follies of mankind, and has . . . more sentiments than words: and not, merely, because almost every part of it alludes to particular incidents. He afterwards tells his friends, that the Clergy are there made the principal object of ridicule. I believe he should have said, the Puritanical Preachers, otherwise a reader who should be unacquainted with Hudibras, and the history of the times it alludes to, might suppose this spoken of the Episcopal Clergy, or that of all religions. Though I have taken these liberties with the author of the Letters concerning the English Nation, it is with pleasure I acknowledge, that I have received infinite satisfaction from his writings, which have all the fire and enthusiasm of the great Poet.

[Ad] The author is afterwards more particular, &c.] He begins with observing, that the action of Hudibras, is the Knight's setting out on a series of ridiculous attempts, to gain the heart of a perverse widow with whom he is in love. It begins with a revival of his passion, which had slept for some time; and concludes with his utter disappointment. The whole is carried on in such a manner, as renders the principal actions of it sufficiently ridiculous (45). I believe this ingenious writer is mistaken in his account of the action of this poem: Hudibras (methinks) not falling forth, to gain the heart of a widow, but upon martial feats of a new kind, as we are told in the beginning of the poem:

And out he rode a colonelling (46).

As to his adventure with the widow, it is only brought in by way of episode. The author proceeds to the Characters. There is, says he, the greatest variety imaginable of odd and low characters. The Knight and Squire are exceedingly odd; and at the same time entirely different. The several persons who compose the bear-baiting mob are admirably well drawn, and keep up their own low characters whenever they are introduced. The Widow, the Astrologer, his Man, the Lawyer, are fect mock-epic Poem, because of its ending abruptly (methinks) with the two epistles of the Knight and the Widow. I fancy the ingenious writer just cited must be mistaken, when he says, "Although perhaps he (Butler) never read Aristotle, or any other critical writer, yet nature and good sense taught him to write in such a manner, that I shall not fear to enter upon his examination, by such rules as we find in that Prince of criticism (ii). As our Poet was so extensive in his reading (which is manifest from his admirable Hudibras), I don't doubt but he had studied the famous critics of antiquity, though he very probably had too much sense and taste, to lose his time in some of the insipid ones among the moderns. Our author's Poem has been frequently cited and applauded by the greatest writers his contemporaries, and others who have wrote since. Mr. Addison calls his Poem the incomparable Hudibras (kk), and the famous Earl of Rochester [BB] pays the greatest deference to his taste and judgment. Mr. Prior speaks also very advantageously of our Poet [CC], giving him the title of consummate Master in Poetry, in the humorous lines quoted below; and, at the same time, writes with the ut-

(46) Hudibras, Part 1. Canto 1. Line 15.

(ii) Idem, ibid.

(kk) Spectator, vol. 1. Num. 60.

(47) Grubstreet Journal, ibid. at supra.

(48) Ibid.

(49) Spectator, vol. 1. Num. 66. ad finem.

(50) Idem, vol. 1. Num. 63.

are all excellent in their kind, and consistent (47). He afterwards observes in the 53d paper, that Hudibras has that variety of distinct characters, which is essential to a poem of the epic kind. And . . . that there is a great, if not a greater, variety, than in any other poem extant. They are all low and ridiculous, whereby this kind of poem is distinguished from the epic." He then speaks of the diction. "The language, in Hudibras, contributes very much to the ridiculousness of the representation, by the odd, and often new words the author makes use of; by the measure of his verse, and by the very rhymes. . . . As to the double rhymes in Hudibras, though some have looked upon them as a blemish, it is generally the reverse; "they heightning the ridicule that was otherwise in the representation, of which many instances might be produced (48). A very great English writer (Mr. Addison) is of a different opinion, he considering the double rhymes as one species of false wit. "I must subjoin, says he, the double rhymes, which are used in doggerel Poetry, and generally applauded by ignorant persons. If the thought of the couplet in such compositions is good, the rhymes add little to it; and if bad, it will not be in the power of the rhyme to recommend it. I am afraid that great numbers of those who admire the incomparable Hudibras, do it more on account of these doggerel rhymes than of the parts that really deserve admiration. I am sure I have heard the "Pulpit drum ecclesiastic,

"Was beat with fist instead of a stick.
"And
"There was an ancient sage Philosopher
"Who had read Alexander Ross over.

more frequently quoted, than the finest pieces of wit in the whole poem (49). This excellent author is certain in the right when he says, that double rhymes cannot recommend a bad thought; however, I believe it sometimes very much heightens the ridicule of an humorous one. The same admirable author explodes double rhymes in the vision where he fancies himself in the region of false wit. Speaking of a quarter of the Temple of the Goddess of Dulness, called the great magazine of Rebus's; and of a cluster of people who were laughing very heartily, and diverting themselves with crambo, there, says he, I heard several double rhymes as I passed by them, which raised a great deal of mirth (50). Mr. Dryden has also given his opinion of the versification of Hudibras, in his Epistle Dedicatory to the late Earl of Dorset. "The sort of verse which is called burlesque consisting of eight syllables, or four feet, is that which our excellent Hudibras has chosen. I ought to have mentioned him before, when I spoke of Donne; but by a slip of an old man's memory he was forgotten. . . . His satyr is of the Varronian kind, though unmix'd with prose. The choice of his numbers is suitable enough to his design, as he has managed it: but in any other hand the shortness of his verse, and the quick returns of rhyme had debas'd the dignity of style. And besides, the double rhyme, (a necessary companion of burlesque writing) is not so proper for manly satyr, for it

"turns earnest too much to jest, and gives us a boyish kind of pleasure. It tickles awkwardly with a kind of pain to the best sort of readers; we are pleas'd ungratefully, and if I may say so, against our liking. We thank him not for giving us that unseasonable delight, when we know he could have given us a better, and more solid. He might have left that task to others, who not being able to put in thought, can only make us grin with the excrecence of a word of two or three syllables in the close. It is indeed below so great a matter to make use of such a little instrument. But his good sense is perpetually shining through all he writes: it affords us not the time of finding faults. We pass through the levity of his rhyme, and are immediately carried into some admirable useful thought. After all, he has chosen this kind of verse; and has written the best in it: and had he taken another, he would always have excelled. As we say of a Court favourite, that whatever his office be, he still makes it uppermost and most beneficial to himself (51). The author of Hudibras seems to have endeavoured, on a great many occasions, to employ the most trite expressions possible, in order to heighten the ridicule of the objects he represents. The same motive, I presume, which made him employ the lowest images possible, made him use the lowest expressions, which after all, he perhaps has done too often. An ingenious English writer has made some good remarks on this subject. *When a pleasant thought plays in the features, before it discovers itself in words, it raises too great an expectation, and loses the advantage of giving surprize. Wit and humour are no less poorly recommended by a levity of phrase, and that kind of language which may be distinguished by the name of Cant. Ridicule is never more strong than when it is concealed in gravity. True humour lies in the thought, and arises from the representation of images in odd circumstances and uncommon lights. A pleasant thought strikes us by the force of its natural beauty, and the mirth of it is generally rather pallid, than heightned by that ridiculous phraseology, which is so much in fashion among the pretenders to humour and pleasantry. This tribe of men are like our mountebanks; they make a man a wit, by putting him in a fantastical habit. . . . Our little burlesque authors, who are the delight of ordinary readers, generally abound in these petty phrases which have more vivacity than wit (52). He, in another place, censures (53) some of our Poets, for their indiscretion in imitating Hudibras's doggerel expressions in their serious compositions, by throwing out the signs of our substantives, which are essential to the English language (53).*

[BB] Has been applauded . . . by the famous Earl of Rochester.] It is in here he concludes a satyr (in which he ridicules several eminent Poets) and names those persons whose approbation he values.

I loath the rabble, 'tis enough for me,
If - - -
Godolphin, BUTLER, Buckhurst, Buckingham,
And some few more, whom I omit to name,
Approve my sense, I count their censure same (54).

[CC] Mr. Prior also speaks very advantageously of our Poet.] It is in his humorous Poem entitled Alma, or the Progress of the Mind, at the opening of the second Canto.

(51) Dryden's Juvenal, in Dedication to Lord Dorset, London 1726, 12mo.

(52) Spectator, vol. 8. num. 616.

(53) Spectator, vol. 2. Num. 136.

(54) The Odes and Satyrs of H. Pope, translated by the most eminent Hands, pag. 164 London 1715, 12mo.

But

most modesty of himself. Mr. Dryden calls it the excellent Hudibras, and says farther, The worth of this (Butler's) Poem is too well known to need any commendation, and he is above my censure (ll); he also has four lines concerning him [DD]. The reflections he afterwards makes on the versification of that Poem I have inserted elsewhere (mm). I shall give below the character of Hudibras from an ingenious French writer [EE]. Among other particulars for which Hudibras has been very much admired, are the parodies of the poetical machinery [FF]. Some are of opinion, that the parody of noble compositions is injurious to them, and shews a contempt that is highly indecent. But, as an ingenious writer observes very justly, "Parody and burlesque allusion may move laughter in those who have the highest veneration for the writings alluded to, and who at the same time admire the wit of the person who makes the allusion (nn) [GG]. This Poem is admired by all persons of wit and taste; and indeed, the whole cast of it (ll) Dryden's Journal, Dedication, pag. c. London 1726, 12mo.

(mm) In the note [AA] after the referring figures (50).

(nn) Hibernicus's Letters, vol. 1. pag. 79. London 1729, 8vo.

*But shall we take the Muse abroad,
To drop her idly on the road?
And leave our subject in the middle,
As Butler did his bear and fiddle?
Yet he, CONSUMMATE MASTER, knew
When to recede, and where pursue:
His noble negligencies teach,
What others toils despair to reach.
He, perfect dancer, climbs the rope,
And balances your fear and hope:
If after some distinguish'd leap,
He drops his pole, and seems to slip;
Strait gathering all his active strength,
He rises higher half his length.
With wonder you approve his flight,
And owe your pleasure to your fright.
But like poor ANDREW, I advance,
False mimic of my master's dance;
Around the cord avabile I sprawl,
And thence, tho' low, in earnest fall (55).*

(55) Prior's Poems, vol. 2. pag. 46. edit. 2^a supra.

By the way, Prior seems to have borrowed part of this thought from Dryden, where speaking of Virgil, he says. That Poet "pretends sometimes to trip, but it is only to make you think him in danger of a fall, when he is most secure. Like a skilful dancer on the ropes (if you will pardon the meanness of the similitude) who slips willingly, and makes a seeming stumble, that you may think him in great hazard of breaking his neck, while at the same time he is only giving you a proof of his dexterity (56)." [DD] Dryden . . . also has four lines concerning him.]

(56) Preface to Dryden's Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, pag. liii, liv. London 1716, 8vo.

Unpity'd Hudibras, your champion friend,
Has shewn how far your charities extend,
This lasting verse shall on his tomb be read,
He sham'd you living, and upbraids you dead (57).

(57) Hind and Panther, in Dryden's Miscellanies, vol. 4. pag. 213. 5th edit. London 1727, 12mo. The Hind (or Church of Rome) is supposed to object the above lines to the Panther (the Church of England) as a proof of her hardness of heart, even to her greatest friends and benefactors.

[EE] I shall give the character of Hudibras from an ingenious French writer.] With regard to burlesque the English have a Poet whose reputation is equal to that of Scarron among the French; I mean the author of Hudibras, a comical history, in verse, written in the time of Oliver Cromwell. It is said to be a delicate satyr on that kind of interregnum; and that it is levelled particularly at the conduct of the Presbyterians, whom the author represents as a senseless set of people, promoters of anarchy, and compleat hypocrites. Hudibras, the hero of this Poem, is a holy Don Quixot of that sect, and the redresser of all the imaginary wrongs that are done to his Dulcinea. The Knight has his Rosinante, his burlesque adventures and his Sancho; but the Squire of the English Poet is of an opposite character to that of the Spanish Sancho; for whereas the latter is a plain unaffected peasant, the English Squire is a taylor by trade, a tartuff or finished hypocrite by birth; and so great a dogmatic Divine, that

*He could deep mysteries unriddle,
As easily as thread a needle,*

(58) Dissertation sur la Poësie Angloise, in the Journal Littéraire, tom. 9. pag. 165, 166. a la Haye, 1717, 12mo.

As it is said in the Poem. The author of Hudibras is preferable to Scarron, because he has one fixed mark or object; and that, by a surprizing effort of imagination, he has found the art of leading his readers to it, by diverting them (58).

[FF] His parodies of the poetical machinery.] I shall mention but one, and that is the description of Fame, from Virgil. And that the reader may be more sensible of the humour in the parody, it may not be improper for him to contrast it with the serious description of Fame, as translated by Dryden. Nothing can be more whimsical than the figure and dress of Fame in Hudibras; and the advices she is said to bring are equally pleasant. The giving her two trumpets makes a pretty distinction. . . Mr. Addison has also taken notice of the beauty with which Butler ridicules one species of false wit used formerly, viz. of making an echo talk sensibly, and give rational answers. It is where Bruin is described bewailing the loss of his bear to a solitary echo, who, as the abovementioned author observes, "is of great use to the Poet in several distichs, as she does not only repeat after him, but helps out his verse, and furnishes him with rhymes (59)." No-

(59) Spectator, vol. 2. num. 59.

*Quoth he, O wretched, wicked Bruin,
Art thou fled to me — Echo, Ruin?
I thought th' hadst scorn'd to budge a step
For Fear. (Quoth Echo) Marry Guelp.*

*Have these bones rattled, and this head
So often in thy quarrel bled?
Nor did I ever winch, or grudge it
For thy dear sake — (Quoth she, Mum Budget).
Think'st thou 'twill not be laid i' th' dish
Thou turn'd'st back? — Quoth Echo — Pish.
To run from those th' hadst overcome
Thou cowardly? — Quoth Echo — Mum (60).*

(60) Hudibras, Part 1. Canto 3. beginning at line 199.

One of these Echo's is introduced in the famous Pastor Fido of Guarini.

[GG] Parody . . . may move laughter, in those who have the highest veneration for the writings alluded to, and for the allusion.] This passage is extracted from a piece, of which laughter is the subject; wherein the author combats the opinion of Mr. Hobbes, viz. that laughter is nothing else but sudden glory, arising from some sudden conception of some eminency in our selves, by comparison with the infirmity of others, or with our own formerly. One of the arguments he employs, to prove that laughter often arises without any imagined superiority of our selves, is from the parody and burlesque allusion. . . "Many a profound admirer, says he, of the machinery in Homer and Virgil, has laughed heartily at the interposition of Pallas in Hudibras, to save the bold Talgol from the Knight's pistol, presented to his skull:

*"But Pallas came in shape of rust,
"And 'twixt the spring and hammer thrust
"Her Gorgon shield, which made the cock
"Stand stiff, as 'twere transform'd to flock.*

"And few who read this, imagine themselves superior to Homer or Butler; we indeed generally imagine ourselves superior in sense to the valorous Knight, but not in this point of firing rusty pistols. And pray, would any mortal have laughed, had the Poet told, in a simple, unadorned manner, that his Knight attempted to shoot Talgol, but his pistol was so rusty that it would not give fire? And yet this would have given us the same ground of sudden glory from our superiority over the doughty Knight. . . Again, to what do we compare ourselves, or imagine ourselves superior, when we laugh at the fantastical imitation of the poetical imagery, and similitudes of the morning?

is so very whimsical, and the several parts of it are drawn with so much pleasantry, that it must necessarily delight all such; the author of it having hit upon that point, which is ever sure of diverting multitudes. [HH]; and this point is humour; but as his verification is often not very musical, it consequently must distaste many readers of a delicate ear, who are pleased with such numbers only as are harmonious and flowing. If we consider the pleasure which arises from the perusal of a serious epic Poem, such as Homer and Milton; and that which the perusal of a mock Poem, such as Hudibras, gives to a reader who has a taste both for serious and humorous compositions, those pleasures must be found very different. The perusal of the former inspires the soul with solemn transports; raises it to such an extasy, that it seems to quit its terrestrial part, and wing its way to the skies; whilst the reading of the latter fills us with a joy that only wantons round the heart, and plays upon the face. These different pleasures seem to resemble such as would arise from a sprightly song, sung by a delightful voice, and accompanied by a fine violin; and the Te Deum of Mr. Handel, himself touching the organ, and accompanied by the finest voices and instruments. Hudibras is the idol of the high-church party (if party may be mentioned on this occasion) as a late writer has observed [II]. And we may all remember, in the late reign (oo), how frequently and with what emphasis four lines of Hudibras used to be repeated by the disaffected, at the time when people were required to take an oath to the Government [KK]. The generality of Dissenters consider, as it is natural for them to do, this Poem in a very odious light. Mr. Fenton, in his beautiful Epistle to Mr. Southerne, where he alludes to the times which are the subject of Hudibras, supposes very pleasantly, that when the Theatres were shut up, comedy appeared under another dress, and in another place, the Conventicle

(oo) I write this in 1737.

"The sun, long since, had in the lap,
Of Thetis taken out his nap;
And like a lobster boil'd, the morn
From black to red began to turn (61)."

(61) Hibernicus's Letters, pag. 79, 80. London 1729, 8vo.

He afterwards observes, "that there are innumerable instances of laughter, where no person is ridiculed, and where he who laughs does not compare himself to any thing whatsoever. What relation, says he, to our selves or to our affairs has that simile in Hudibras,

"Instead of trumpet and of drum,
Which makes the warrior's stomach come,
And whets men's valour, sharp like beer
By thunder turn'd to winegar?"

(62) Idem, pag. 84, 85.

"The laughter is not here raised against either valour or martial music, but merely by the wild resemblance of a mean event (62)." To shew that a reader may have the highest veneration for a noble, serious author, and at the same time admire the wit of one who had parodied finely upon his images, I may add the famous simile in Mr. Addison's Campaign, in which the Duke of Marlborough's calmness and presence of mind, in the midst of all the horror of battle, are compared to an angels who

Rides in the whirlwind, and directs the storm; and the parody made on it by our great Poet, where he represents Mr. LUN, in the Dunciad, in one of his theatrical flights. On this occasion, I believe, there are very few but admire the nobleness of the original simile, and the wit of the Poet who has so finely burlesqued it. It is very possible that a fine writer, so far from being chagrined at a witty parody that should be made on any part of his compositions, would himself be very much delighted with it. As Mr. de Scudery, in his commendatory verses prefixed to Scarron's famous Travesty, says of Virgil, that he would split his sides with laughing, were he to see his Æneid in so comical a disguise.

*Quel est ce déguisement ?
O quelle métamorphose,
O Dieu, la plaisante chose !
Le rire m'a suffoqué :
Et dans ce plaisir extrême,
Virgile viroit lui même,
De se voir si bien masqué (63).*

(63) From the commendatory verses prefixed to, Les Oeuvres de Monsieur Scarron, tom. 1. Amsterdam 1699.

[HH] Hit upon that point which is always sure to divert multitudes. This is humour, as the writer who is the boast of Ireland observes, in a paper where he makes some reflections on the celebrated Beggar's Opera.

VOL. VI.

"Although, says he, an evil taste be apt to prevail both here (Dublin) and in London, yet there is a point, which whosoever can rightly touch, will never fail of pleasing a very great majority; so great, that the dislikers, out of dulness or affectation will be silent, and forced to fall in with the herd: the point I mean, is what we call humour, which in its perfection is allowed to be much preferable to wit, if it be not rather the most useful and agreeable species of it (64)." After justly observing, that it is not peculiar to the English nation, and that very few have a taste for, or can judge of the excellencies of Poetry and Eloquence, he says, that a taste for humour is in some manner fixed to the very nature of man, and generally obvious to the vulgar, except upon subjects too refined, and superior to their understanding. And as this taste of humour is purely natural, so is humour itself; neither is it a talent confined to men of wit or learning; for we observe it sometimes among common servants, and the meanest of the people, while the very owners are ignorant of the gift they possess (65). Speaking afterwards of critics, (the heavy part of them he must mean) "I know very well, says he, that this happy talent is contemptibly treated by critics, under the name of low humour or low Comedy; but I know likewise, that the Spaniards and Italians, who are allowed to have the most wit of any nation in Europe, do most excell in it, and do most esteem it (66).

(64) The Intelligencer, Num. 3. pag. 15, 16. London 1729, 8vo.

(65) Idem, ibid.

(66) Idem, ibid.

[II] This Poem... is the idol of the High-Church party, as a late writer has observed. "Hudibras, says he, which is a daily High-Church entertainment, and a pocket and travelling High-church companion, must necessarily have a very considerable effect, and cannot fail forming in men that humour and vein of ridicule upon Dissenters, which runs through that work (67)."
[KK] Four lines of Hudibras used to be repeated by the disaffected.]

(67) A Discourse concerning Ridicule and Irony in Writing, pag. 42. London 1729, 8vo.

*He that imposes an oath, makes it ;
Not he that for convenience takes it ;
Then how can any man be said
To break an oath he never made (68) ?*

(68) Hudibras, Canto 2. Part 2 ver. 377, to 380, inclusive.

I believe these are the lines hinted at by Mr. Addison, in a famous political paper of his writing, where he speaks of some who did not scruple to ridicule and make a jest of an oath. "A poor conceit, says he, of their own, or a quotation out of Hudibras, shall make them treat with levity an obligation wherein their safety and welfare are concerned both as to this world and the next. Raillery of this nature is enough to make the hearer tremble (69). We may observe, that Mr. Butler puts the four lines abovementioned in the mouth of his Hudibras, whom, it is well known, he every where represents as a wrongheaded knave.

(69) Freeholder, num. 6. pag. 30. London 1716, 12mo.

F f f

ticle being her stage. As the Reformation which succeeded the death of King Charles I, was so very precise and severe, it was natural for a Poet of Mr. Fenton's airy genius to sneer at it [LL]. Some Roman Catholics have introduced Hudibras, in the idle jokes they levelled against the Church of England writers; and one among the rest rallies very impertinently a famous English Divine as follows: Sure the Doctor erred in his vocation: had he quitted all serious matters, and dedicated himself wholly to drollery and romance, with two or three years under Hudibras, he might have been a master in the faculty; the Stage might have been a gainer by it, and the Church of England would have been no loser (pp). A noble author of our country has endeavoured to fix the rule and measure of ridicule [MM].

(pp) Preface to Stillingfleet against Stillingfleet.

Whilst I was compiling this life, I made all the enquiries possible concerning our Poet; and was told many particulars which were injurious to him. However, I afterwards had the great satisfaction to find they were only flying false reports; and indeed it was scarce possible but such must be raised against a man, who had gained the greatest reputation possible by satyrizing a party, and exhibiting it in the most ridiculous, and at the same time, most odious light. I was told that King Charles II gave Butler a handsome employment in the Custom-house, but have since found that this was not true [NN]. I also was falsely informed that the abovementioned Monarch had bestowed three thousand pounds on our Poet, as a reward for his Hudibras; but that Butler soon spent it, and afterwards satyrized the royal benefactor [OO]. I was favoured with some particulars from a venerable Gentleman, whose dramatic pieces afford the most agreeable entertainment [PP]. It was some time before I could get an opportunity [LL] It was natural for a Poet of Mr. Fenton's airy genius to sneer at it. The verses are these.

*An age most odious and accurs'd ensued,
Discoloured with a pious Monarch's blood:
Whose fall when first the Tragic Virgin saw,
She fled, and left her province to the Law.
Her merry sister still pursued the game,
Her garb was altered, but her gifts the same.
She first reformed the muscles of her face,
And learnt the solemn screw for signs of grace;
Then circumcis'd her locks, and formed her tone.
By humming to a Taber and a Drone;
Her eyes she disciplin'd precisely right,
Both when to wink, and how to turn the white;
Thus banish'd from the stage, she gravely next
Assumed a cloak, and quibbled o'er a text. . . .
But when by miracles of mercy shewn,
Much suffering Charles regained his father's throne,
When peace and plenty overflowed the land,
She strait pull'd off her fatten cap and band:
Bade Wycherly be bold in her defence,
With pointed wit and energy of sense:
Etheridge and Sidley joined him in her cause,
And all deserved, and all received applause (70).*

(70) Fenton's Poems, pag. 71, 72. London 1717, 8vo.

[MM] A noble author . . . has endeavoured to fix the rule and measure of ridicule. "How comes it to pass, that we appear such cowards in reasoning, and are so afraid to stand the test of ridicule?—O! say we, the subjects are too grave—Perhaps so; but let us see first whether they are really grave or no: for in the manner we may conceive them, they may peradventure be very grave and weighty in our imagination; but very ridiculous and impertinent in their own nature. Gravity is of the very essence of imposture. It does not only make us mistake other things, but is apt perpetually almost to mistake itself. For even in common behaviour, how hard is it for the grave character to keep long out of the limits of the formal one? We can never be too grave, if we can be assured we are really what we suppose. And we can never too much honour or revere any thing for grave, if we are assured the thing is grave, as we apprehend it. The main point is to know always true gravity from the false: and this can only be, by carrying the rule constantly with us, and freely applying it not only to the things about us, but to ourselves. For if unhappily we lose the measure in ourselves, we shall soon lose it in every thing else besides. Now what rule or measure is there in the world, except in the considering of the real temper of things, to find which are truly serious, and which ridiculous? And how can this be done, unless by applying the ridicule to see whether it will bear? But if we fear to apply this rule in any thing, what security can we have against the imposture of formality in all things? We have allowed ourselves to be formalists in one point; and the same formality may rule us as it pleases in all others (71)."

[NN] King Charles II . . . did not give Butler . . . an employment in the Custom-house. I first applied myself to a worthy Gentleman, my friend (72), who, in the conclusion of his letter dated 14 July 1735, says, "I have asked several Gentlemen if they ever heard that the author of Hudibras was an Officer of the Customs, but none remember any such particular." [OO] That the Monarch bestowed . . . three thousand pounds on our Poet, as a reward for his Hudibras. The person who informed me of this, declared, that the late Reverend Mr. Gosling, Sub-Dean of St. Paul's, had assured him, that the circumstances relating to the recompence bestowed by the King, and the ingratitude of our Poet, were fact. But being resolved not to take things upon trust, I wrote to the son, a Clergyman also, of the abovementioned reverend Gentleman, and he was pleased to favour me with the following answer.

(71) Lord Shaftsbury's Characteristics, vol. 1. pag. 11, 12. London 1727, 8vo, 4th edit.

(72) Mr. Sc. Lazenby, Land-Writer in the Port of London.

"Sir,
"Your letter needed no apology, for I should be proud to give any assistance to a Gentleman, who is so desirous to do justice to perhaps the best natured Prince and the most humorous Poet, England has to boast of.

"With regard to the story you mention, as related by my father, I can hardly believe he told it; I am sure I never heard it from him.

"I have heard him say, that King Charles ordered Butler a sum of money (I believe it might be three thousand pounds) but the order being written in figures, somebody through whose hands it passed, by cutting off a cypher reduced it to three hundred, which the Poet disdain'd to accept of, and from that time chose to live in obscurity.

"This I have heard him often tell, for he was fond of talking of King Charles's days, and as fond of quoting Hudibras, which occasioned his frequent repeating of this story.

"As to the place in the Custom-house, I cannot say that I remember any thing about it.

"I heartily wish success to your design, and am Canterbury July 21, 1735,
Yours, &c.
William Gosling.

"P. S. I ought to tell you, that my father was not acquainted personally with Butler, but told his story as what was the report at Court."

[PP] A . . . Gentleman . . . whose dramatic pieces &c. This is the ingenious T. Southerne Esq; author of Oroonoko &c. who, on my desiring a Gentleman (73), (73) The Lett- to write to him, he being then in Cheshire, in order to get some particulars relating to Butler cleared up, if of the Naval History, &c. possible, was so kind as to write the following answer.

"Sir,

of seeing the so often mentioned Charles Longueville Esq; who, at his coming to town, was so kind as to solve all my difficulties; and, as I read over this Life of our Poet, was pleased to make the corrections which the reader has seen in the course of it; and to favour me with the particulars mentioned below [22], which will be a sufficient answer to the many aspersions that have been cast on Butler's memory, and transmit it to posterity in the fairest light. I never met, in the course of my reading, but with one person who presumed to censure Butler as a writer [RR]. I must take notice of some mistakes of the learned Father Nicéron [SS].

" Sir,

" I should be glad to give you any certain information relating to Hudibras Butler, but cannot any from my self, but can direct you to a Gentleman, whose father was Mr. Butler's greatest friend, supported him in his age, and buried him at his own charge in Covent-Garden Church-yard, the North side of the Church. The Gentleman I speak of is Charles Longueville Esq; a Member of Parliament, who lives in Norfolk Street in the Strand, and knows more of him than any person else. He has Butler's picture, a half length, which he values much. As for my self, I never heard of Butler's extravagance in confounding so large a bounty of the King's as three thousand pounds, nor that the King's bounty was in any comparison of that sum; I never heard that he had a handsome place in the Custom-house, nor of his profuseness that obliged him to sell it and spend the money arising from the sale, nor that he wrote a severe Poem against the King and his Mistresses (74). I hope the persons concerned to write the character of so great a man, in his way, will not defame him to posterity, by giving any account in print like what you have heard without the fullest proof, which you are most likely to have from the abovementioned Charles Longueville Esq; in Norfolk Street . . . I am

(74) This, among other particulars, I had been told, but it proves a falsity. The circumstance I suppose which gave rise to such a report was, there is inserted in the remains ascribed to Butler, an obscene Poem, which is wrote with great virulence against King Charles II, his mistresses &c.

How great the service I how trifling the recompence!

(75) This Gentleman was father to Mr. Longueville, to whom I am obliged for so many particulars.

" July 23, 1735, from Woodcote.

" Sir
Yours, &c.
Thomas Southerne.

" P. S. Butler did not die in a garret."

[22] Charles Longueville Esq; . . . was pleased to favour me with the particulars mentioned below.] King Charles II, who was a prodigious admirer of Hudibras, and sometimes saw the author of it, never ordered him but one gratuity, and that was three hundred pounds, which had this compliment paid to it, that it past all the offices without any fee, at the solicitation of Mr. William Longueville of the Temple (75); Lord Danby being at that time High-Treasurer. Mr. Butler never had any employment in the Custom-house, or elsewhere. He was a very modest man, and did not shine in conversation till he had taken a chearful glass, but was no drinker. He saw but little company, except what he was in some measure forced into; his Hudibras having gained him such reputation, that most persons of distinction at that time were extremely desirous of his company, and yet not one of them contributed to the advancement of his fortune. The greatest part of the remains ascribed to Butler are spurious, and among the rest the Poem against King Charles II, his Mistresses, &c. Our Poet was not profuse in his disposition; his circumstances indeed having always been so narrow, that he never had an opportunity of being so. He lived for some years in Rose Street Covent-Garden, and probably died there. Mr. W. Longueville would fain have buried Butler in Westminster Abbey; and spoke in that view to some of those wealthy persons, who had admired him so much in his life-time; offering to pay his part, but none of them would contribute; upon which Mr. Longueville buried him with the greatest privacy, (but at the same time very decently) in Covent-Garden Church-yard, at his own expence; himself and seven or eight persons more following the corps to the grave. Charles Longueville Esq; has a half length of our Poet, which was given his father by the late Earl of Rochester (76), for whom Butler sat to Sir Peter Leij. He is drawn in a night-gown and peruke; and his countenance, which is pale, seems thoughtful, and no way expressive of the gaiety that appears in all his compositions. A proof of the great honour and honesty of our Poet is this; that upon his being ordered the three hundred pounds abovementioned by the King, he called to mind that he owed more than that sum to different persons from whom he had borrowed monies, or otherwise contracted debts; for which reason he intreated Mr. Longueville to pay away the whole gratuity, who accordingly did so, and Butler did not receive a shilling of it. But notwithstanding the many disappointments our Poet met with, Mr. Longueville is firmly persuaded that he never was reduced to any thing like want and beggary, and that he did not die in any person's debt. [RR] . . . but one person who presumed to censure Butler as a writer.] This is the anonymous author of a Session of the Poets, who does not express himself either wittily or genteely on this occasion. His lines are these.

(76) Dr. Mead has also a picture of Butler, drawn by Mr. Z. . . The ingenious Mr. Wood, Painter in Bloomsbury Square, a very great admirer of Hudibras; has several sketches, representing some of the principal incidents in that Poem, drawn with the utmost nature, vivacity and humour, by that great Historiographer, Painter Mr. Co. k. an Englishman, who seems to have been as well acquainted with the Poem as the author himself.

Then Hudibras boldly demanded the Bays,
But Apollo bade him not be so fierce;
And advised him to lay aside making his Plays,
Since he already began to write worse and worse

(77) Dryden's Miscellanies, vol. 2. pag. 57. 5th edit. London 1727, 12mo.

As this author insinuates that Butler attempted to write Dramatic Pieces, I consulted Mr. Longueville upon that subject, who told me that he believed our Poet never had any such design.

[SS] Some mistakes of Father Nicéron.] Besides two or three errors he was led into by Wood, and the anonymous author of Butler's life, Father Nicéron should not have barely said that Butler was buried in London, in the Church-yard of St. Paul's (78), but ought to have added Covent-Garden, otherwise his readers may suppose it to be the cathedral of St. Paul's. He says afterwards, that to the Poem of Hudibras is annexed two epistles in verse; the one from Hudibras to his wife, and the other from Hudibras's wife to her husband (79). Now this is an error; the woman in question not being Hudibras's wife, but his mistress. What misled Father Nicéron, or the person he copied, I suppose, was the titles of those epistles, viz. An heroic Epistle of Hudibras to his Lady &c. which a translator who had not read the epistles in question, might naturally suppose to mean wife. I.

(78) Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des Hommes illustres &c. tom. 9. pag. 270. Paris 1729, 12mo.
(79) Idem, ibid.

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 940. 2d edit. London 1721.
(b) Idem, ibid.
(c) Antonii Hall Prefat. ad Joann. Hudsoni Editionem Flavii Josephi, Oxon. 1720, fol. 2 vol.
(d) Ibid.
(e) Ibid.

HUDSON (Dr. JOHN), was son of Mr. James Hudson (a), and born at Widehope (b) or Wedehop (c) near Cocker-mouth in Cumberland in the year 1662 [A]. He was educated in Grammar-learning by Mr. Jerom Hechstetter (d), and in 1676 he came a poor serving child in Queen's College in Oxford, and applied himself, under the tuition of Mr. Thomas Crothwait, to the study of Philosophy, in which he made a vast progress, as well as in polite Literature (e). July the 4th 1681 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (f), and on the 12th of February 1684 that of Master of Arts (g), and afterwards that of Doctor of Divinity. In the beginning of 1684 he was elected a Fellow

(f) Wood, Fossi Oxon. vol. 2. col. 217.
(g) Idem, ibid. col. 225.

(1) Athen. Oxon. [A] Born . . . in 1662.] Mr. Wood informs us (1), that he was fourteen years of age, when he was entered into Queen's College in the beginning of the year 1676. Dr. Hall observes (2), that he was born soon after the Restoration, paulo post instauratam apud Britannos Monarchiam; and that he was about fifty seven years old, when he died on the 27th of November 1719.

(b) Idem, Atb.
Oxon. ubi supra.

Fellow of University College, where he became an eminent tutor (b), and celebrated for his extensive learning, which from evident in his works [B]. In July 1701, upon the death of Dr. Thomas Hyde, he succeeded him in the place of Keeper of the Bodleian Library

(3) Wood, Atb.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
941.

[B] His works.] They are as follow. I. M. Vellei Paterculi quæ supersunt, cum variis Lectionibus optimarum Editionum, doctorum virorum conjecturis & castigationibus, & Indice locupletissimo. Oxon, 1693, in 8vo. This book was published at the charge of Arthur Charlet, D. D. Master of University College, to be given to his scholars and friends, at New-Year's-Day 1692 (3). To this edition are prefixed Mr. Henry Dodwell's Annales Velleiani; but Mr. Hudson thought proper to omit them in the second edition of Paterculus at Oxford 1711 in 8vo, because those Annales had been printed separately in 1698; and he has substituted in the room of them two Chronological Tables, one by Mr. Dodwell, and the other by Cellarius. The notes likewise in the first edition are enlarged in the second. II. Thucydidi de Bello Peloponnesiaco Libri VIII. Oxon, 1696, in Folio. This edition is a very beautiful one, and well disposed. The Latin version of Æmilius Portus is printed in two columns at the bottom of the page, with some short notes. There is one great advantage in this edition, that we find the years of the Peloponnesian war, of the Olympiads, and the foundation of Rome, marked at the top of every page. Mr. Dodwell was the author of this, who published in 1702 at Oxford, the reasons of that Chronology in his Annales Thucydidei. III. Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci minores Græcè & Latine, cum dissertationibus & annotationibus Henrici Dodwelli: accedunt Geographica Arabica cum Notis. Oxon, 1698, in 8vo. This volume begins with the Periplus of Hanno the Carthaginian, which Isaac Vossius considered as the most ancient remain, that has escaped the injury of time. But Mr. Dodwell has proposed very strong reasons why it cannot justly pretend to so great antiquity; and shewn, that Hanno did not write the Periplus mentioned by the ancients, but some Greek, who was a friend to the Carthaginians; and that the Periplus, which we have extant, is very different from that cited by Pomponius Mela, Pliny, Solinus, &c. Next follows the Periplus of Scylax, which has likewise been esteemed very ancient, and vindicated in point of antiquity from the exceptions of the two Vossius's by Gronovius. But Mr. Dodwell has shewn, that this Scylax is not the ancient one quoted by Herodotus, but another, who was contemporary with Polybius; and that what he borrowed from other writers, might make a shew of antiquity, by which means the learned may have been led into mistakes about his age. After this follows an Epitome of Agatharchides concerning the Red-Sea, which piece Mr. Dodwell shews to have been written in the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy Alexander, King of Egypt, to whom this author was Tutor and Library-Keeper. The next piece is a Periplus of the Red-Sea, commonly ascribed to Arrian, though falsely, as was suspected by Salmasius, Vossius, and Hardouin; who imagined, that the author of it lived in the time of Augustus. Mr. Dodwell agrees with them, that Arrian could not be the author of this piece, but differs from them in all other respects; first demonstrating that it was written after Trajan and Hadrian, and consequently not by Arrian; and then offering very probable reasons, that the writer lived under the Emperors Marcus and Verus. Then follows a Periplus of the Euxine-Sea, which bears the name of Arrian, and was undoubtedly written by him in the time of Adrian, as the inscription shews. But it appearing that Arrian was Prefect of Cappadocia, when he drew up this account of the people bordering on the Euxine-Sea for the Emperor Hadrian, Mr. Dodwell concludes, that it was written about the year of Christ 137. In the next place we have another piece of Arrian taken out of his Indica, which contains the voyage of Nearchus by the command of Alexander the Great. This Mr. Dodwell supposes to have been finished by Arrian after his Expedition of Alexander, and before the Geography of Ptolemy was known to the world. Dr. Hudson having a manuscript of Arrian in the Bodleian-Library, has given us from thence several emendations of the text; and tells us, that the rest of Arrian's works might receive much light and improvement from that ancient copy. Next follows the Periplus of Marcianus Heracleota, first published by Hæschelius, with several other pieces of the same kind. But this had not the good fortune to be reprinted or translated, till Dr. Hudson bestowed his pains upon it; who has by conjecture corrected a great number of passages, and annexed to it the fragments of Artemidorus and Menippus. In the last he gives us a Periplus of the Euxine-Sea, which we owe to Isaac Vossius; but neither he, nor any one else, has yet been able to recover the author's name. His age likewise, as well as that of Marcianus Heracleota, is very uncertain. The second volume of Dr. Hudson's edition of the Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci minores was published at Oxford 1703 in 8vo, with a Latin version and notes; to which are prefixed six dissertations by Mr. Dodwell. The first Geographer in this volume is Dicæarchus, who has partly in verse, and partly in prose, given us the state of Greece in his time, with a description of mount Pelion. Mr. Dodwell thinks, that Dicæarchus wrote the Poetical part towards the latter end of the CXVIth Olympiad, and the Prose about the end of the CXVIIth Olympiad. With regard to the fragment concerning mount Pelion, he supposes it to be written by Dicæarchus after the second year of the CXXIst Olympiad. The next Geographical writer, whose fragments Dr. Hudson has presented us with, is Isidorus Characenus, whose tract de Mansionibus Particis, was published by Hæschelius in his Collection; and afterwards, when it was enlarged by the Paris edition, it was communicated by Fabricius to our Editor. Mr. Dodwell is of opinion, that this Isidorus wrote after the year 36, and before the year 162; that Pliny's Isidorus Characenus was a quite different person from this Isidorus; that he only wrote a Periplus, whilst the other wrote a Periegesis; that the latter very probably lived nearer the time of Lucian than that of Pliny, and that Solinus was more modern than our Geographer. The next Geographical writer is Scymnus of the island of Chios, whose description of the world is written in verse, and translated into Latin by Paulus Vindingius. This piece was falsely ascribed to Marcianus of Heraclea, and published under his name by Hæschelius in 1600. Dr. Hudson has added several fragments of Scymnus collected and translated by Lucas Holstenius. Mr. Dodwell tells us, that we have two sufficient marks of the time, wherein Scymnus lived, taken from the succession of the Kings of Pergamos and Bithynia, since he dedicates his works to Nicomedes, King of Bithynia; and he asserts, that Scymnus was born in Varro's 610th year, and could not possibly write either before the 625th, or after the 679th year. Then follows Plutarch's little tract concerning Rivers, which was first published in Greek only by Sigismundus Gelenius at Basil, in 1533. A more beautiful and correct edition was published at Tholouse in 1615, by Philip James Mauffacus, who translated it into Latin, and illustrated it with a great many notes. Dr. Hudson has revised this translation, which he carefully collated with the version of Natalis Comes, and Hadrian Turnebus. Mr. Dodwell observes, that the learned are divided in their opinions about the author of this treatise. Some ascribe it to Parthenius, others to Antonius Liberalis, others to Plutarch, but not the Chæronensian; whilst Mauffacus alone attributes it to that Plutarch. Mr. Dodwell is persuaded, that it belongs not to Parthenius, nor to Antonius, but to one, whose real name was Plutarch; though who he was, is very uncertain. Agathemerus follows next, whose piece Godefridus Venedelinus had designed to have published, but was prevented by death. His copy fell into the hands of Tennullius, who published it at Amsterdam, 1671, with a Latin version and notes. After this Gronovius rendered it more compleat by making some few alterations in the text, but a great many in the Latin translation, much for the better. Dr. Hudson follows this edition of Gronovius. Mr. Dodwell remarks, that Agathemerus had consulted Ptolemy's Geography, and consequently wrote after Ptolemy; though he was not much later than that writer, since he mentions Spain and Gaul, which were names but lately in use among the Library in the University of Oxford; which place he held till his death. In 1712 he was appointed Principal of St. Mary Hall in that University, at the solicitation of Dr. John Radcliffe, the Physician (i). His health declined a considerable time before his death; but at last being seized with a dropsy, it proved fatal to him on the 27th of November 1719, being then about fifty seven years of age. He married Margaret, daughter of Sir Robert Harrison, by whom he had a daughter, who married July the 29th 1731 Mr. John Boyce, son of Sir John Boyce of the city of Oxford (l). Dr. Hudson held a correspondence with the most eminent learned men of his age; particularly

(!!) See a Pamphlet intitled, The Contract violated, or the Hasty Marriage, printed at London 1734, in 8vo.

(i) Hall, ubi supra.
(l) Idem, ibid.

the Greeks, when Agathemerus wrote his treatise. Mr. Dodwell further observes, that our Geographer was more modern than Marcianus Heracleota, and that he wrote in the interval between Septimius Severus, and Gallienus, since he mentions Babylon's being in possession of the Romans, which was not reduced into a Roman Province till the time of Severus in the year of Christ 201; and by consequence our author was later than him. The last piece of Geography contained in this volume is the Epitome of Strabo, never printed but once before, which was at Basil in 1533, to which Dr. Hudson has added the Latin version of Jerom Gemuseus, corrected in a great many places. And that we may the better compare this Epitome with the original, our author has all along taken notice of the passages in Strabo, which correspond with the words of the epitomizer. Mr. Dodwell tells us, that the author of this epitome was of later date than Ptolemy, Arrian, and Marcian, and that he did not imitate Marcian in his manner of epitomizing, since the titles of Marcian's Abridgments were always Ἐπιτομαί, whilst that of this author is Χρησολογία, a term not known in Marcian's days. He remarks, that the epitomizer of Strabo lived when the Slavonians were in possession of Macedonia, Greece, Epirus, and Peloponnesus; which he proves from the words of that writer: Καὶ οὖν ἡ πᾶσα ἧμερον ἢ Ἑλλάδα σχεδὸν, ἢ Πελοπόννησον, ἢ Μακεδονίαν, Σκυθίας, Ἑλλάδος τοὺς νότιους: From which words Mr. Dodwell remarks, that we may gather two marks of the time, wherein this epitomizer lived, viz. that he was not older than the time, when the Slavonians became masters of the countries, which he mentions, nor later than the age, in which they lost that empire. Mr. Dodwell concludes, that they were not intire masters of those Provinces till the time of Basil the Bulgarian Prince, between the years 976 and 996; and that it was about that time the epitomizer lived. The third volume of our author's edition of the Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci minores, was printed at Oxford, 1712, in 8vo, and contains eleven pieces; the first of which is a Latin extract of the Navigation of the Bosphorus Ibraicus, written in Greek by Dionysius Byzantinus. The second is a Description of the Euxine Sea, falsely ascribed to Arrian. The third is a Description of the World and of the Nations by an anonymous Latin author, who lived under Constans and Constantinus. The fourth piece contains various readings on an anonymous Latin Geographer of Ravenna. The fifth contains the situation of places in Arabia by Ptolemy, corrected by an antient manuscript. Mr. John Greaves, Professor of Astronomy in the University of Oxford, had fitted this piece for the press. The sixth is the Description of Chorasnia and Marwarahnabra, or of the countries on the north side of the river Oxus, taken from the Tables of Abulfeda Ismael, Prince of Hamah in Syria. He wrote that work in Arabic in the year 1221; and Mr. Greaves published it at London in Arabic and Latin, in the year 1650. The seventh is a Description of Arabia Felix, and the adjacent Seas, by the same author. The eighth contains two Tables of the Longitude and Latitude of the southern places of Africa and Asia, from the Canary Islands to China. The first is of Nassir-Eddin, a famous Persian, and the second of Ulug-Beig, a Tartar or Tatar, as the eastern nations pronounce it, who was grand-son to Tamerlane. Mr. Greaves had also published them. The ninth piece is an extract of the Persian Syntaxis of George Chrysoecca, containing a Catalogue of the Longitudes and Latitudes of the principal cities, particularly of Arabia. The tenth is such another Index of remarkable cities by Ptolemy, taken from a manuscript, and collated with others. The eleventh piece is concerning the constellations of the two Hemispheres by the same author, with the degrees of Longitude and Latitude revised by Dr. Edmund Halley. These tables are only in Greek. The fourth volume was printed at Oxford, 1712, in 8vo. It contains a posthumous Dissertation of Mr. Dodwell upon Dionysius the Geographer, wherein he asserts, in opposition to the common opinion, that this Dionysius is not the same with him, who is mentioned by Pliny, and was contemporary with Augustus, and born at Charax-Spasinus, a city of Sufiana, the country of Isidorus abovementioned; but another of Corinth, and who lived after Caracalla. This dissertation contains also several remarks upon Dionysius. Then follows Dionysius in Greek and Latin, with Eustatius's Commentary subjoined. There are four Maps in this edition; the first of Africa; the second of Europe; the third of Greece, and the neighbouring parts of Italy, and those of lesser Asia; and the fourth of Asia. Dr. Halley has set down in them the degrees of Longitude and Latitude, which had been omitted in the maps of the former edition of Dionysius of Oxford. Next follow, 1. The Description of the Earth by Rufus Festus Avienus, in 1393 Hexameter verses. 2. That of Priscian, in 1087 verses. 3. The Description of the Sea-Coasts by the same Rufus Festus Avienus abovementioned, in Iambic verses, whereof we have only 705. Under the text of these Poems are placed the various readings of the manuscripts and of the editions, with the conjectures and remarks of several authors. There are likewise under Avienus's two poems the conjectures and corrections of our author and Dr. Hody. These Latin Geographers are followed by the Greek Paraphrase of Dionysius, and some Scholæ never published before, and some small fragments relating to Geography. Lastly there are corrections, various readings, and remarks by Dr. Hudson and other learned men, particularly by Holstenius, on Dionysius and Eustatius. IV. Dionysii Halicarnassensis Opera omnia Græcè & Latine cum Annotationibus. Oxon, 2 Tomes in Folio, 1704. Dr. Hudson's Preface to the first Tome is addressed to Laurentius Alexander Zacigni, Keeper of the Vatican Library, and to James Perizonius, Professor of Rhetoric, History, and Greek at Leyden; in which he returns his acknowledgments to those learned men for their assistance, and particularly to Zacigni, who had communicated to him the collation of Dionysius with a copy in the Vatican-Library. The Doctor has made use of several editions of that author, and kept close to the Greek copy of Sylburgius with respect to the Greek text, and at the bottom of each page set down the various readings of the Vatican Manuscript, collated partly by Josephus de Juliis, and partly by J. Theodorus Calliergus. Among these various readings he has interspersed, where it was necessary, several notes of Sylburgius, Portus, Stephens, Casaubon, Valesius, and others, with some remarks of his own. As to the Latin version, he thought fit to make use of Portus's, which he has corrected in several places, and divided into sections for the greater ease of those, who are not very well versed in Greek. In the Ursinian fragments he has followed the version of Stephens, and in the Peiresidæ that of Valesius. To these he has added an Appendix by Sylburgius de Legibus veterum Romanorum; because by it the mutilated passage of Dionysius, pag. 689, may in some measure be applied. Lastly he has at the end of the second volume given us Mr. Dodwell's Chronology for the clearing up the series and times of the History down to the days of Augustus; which will be of very great use for Livy's History likewise; and Mr. Dodwell has added the Chronology on the pages of the History. To the first volume are prefixed the testimonies larly Muratori, Salvini, and Bianchini, in Italy; Boivin, Kuster, and Michael Lequien, the editor of Damascenus, in France; Godfrey Olearius, John Burchard Menckenius, John Christopher Wolfius, Henry Lewis Schurtzfleisch, John George Eccard, and John Albert Fabricius, in Germany; Eric Benzelius in Sweden; Frederic Rostgard in Denmark; James Perizonius, Hadrian Reland and John Le Clerc in Holland; besides his intimacy with all the great men of his own country (m). Dr. Anthony Hall tells us (n), that he was a man of great probity, an agreeable countenance, and moderate stature, and enjoyed a very vigorous constitution till he broke it with his intense application to his studies.

(m) Hall, ubi supra.

(n) Ibid.

testimonies concerning Dionysius and his Antiquities by Strabo, Plutarch, Eusebius, and others. In the Preface to the second Tome, addressed to Michael Lequien, he makes his acknowledgments to that Gentleman for collating the works of Dionysius with several manuscripts, and communicating the same to him. In the second Tome the Doctor has ranged all Dionysius's works relating to Rhetoric and Criticism in the same order, that they are in the edition of Sylburgius; but that the true disposition of them may be distinguished from the vulgar one, he has given us a catalogue of the works, both these that are extant, and those that are lost. With regard to the Greek text he has generally followed the edition of Sylburgius, which he has corrected in many places, as well as the Latin versions. V. Dionysii Longini de sublimitate Libellus, cum Præfatione de Vita & Scriptis Longini, notis, indicibus, variis Lectionibus. Oxon, 1710, in 4to, 1718 in 8vo. This edition is a very beautiful one. The notes are very short, as all those of Dr. Hudson are. VI. Mæris Atticista de Vocibus Atticis & Hellenicis. Gregorius Martinus de Græcarum Literarum pronuntia- tione. Oxon, 1712, in 8vo. This piece of Mæris, whom some manuscripts call Eumaridas, though well known by means of Photius, and by being cited by a great many learned men, had never been printed till now. The letter of Gregory Martinus was added only to make the volume of a reasonable size. Martinus in this Letter defends the modern pronunciation of the Greek language with great learning and spirit. VII. Fabularum Æsopicarum Collectio quotquot Græcè reperiuntur. Accedit Interpretatio Latina. Oxon, 1718, in 8vo. Dr. Hudson published this edition of Æsop's Fables for the use of those, who begin to learn the Greek tongue. VIII. Flavii Josephi Opera que reperiri poterunt omnia. Ad Codd. MSS. diligenter recensuit, novâ versione donavit, & notis illustravit Joannes Hudson. Oxon, 1720, in two volumes folio. This edition is the most exact of any which had ever been published of that author. The Doctor died while it was in the press; and Dr. Anthony Hall, who married his widow, took the care of printing the last sheets. T.

☉ HUET (PETER DANIEL), a very learned French writer [A] in the XVIIth Century, was son of Daniel Huet, Esq; and Isabella Pillon de Bertouville, and was born

(1) Preface de Virgile, num. 22.

[A] A very learned French writer.] His works are as follow. I. De Interpretatione Libri duo. Paris, 1661, in 4to. Stadæ, 1680, in 12mo. Hague, 1683, in 8vo, with his Treatise concerning the original of Romances, translated into Latin. This book is written in the form of a Dialogue between Isaac Casaubon, Frontô Ducæus the Jesuit, and Thuanus. Monsieur de Segrais tells us (1), that nothing can be added to this treatise either with respect to beauty of stile, strength of reasoning, or variety of learning, which was very extraordinary in a person so young as Monsieur Huet. then was. II. Origenis Commentaria in sacram Scripturam, Græcè Latine, cum Latinâ Interpretatione, Notis, & Observationibus Petri Danielis Huetii. Roan, 1668, two volumes in folio. Cologne, 1685, three volumes in Folio. III. L'Origine des Romans. Paris, 1670, in 12mo. London, 1672, in 12mo, translated into English. Amsterdam, 1679, in 16mo, translated into Low Dutch by Mr. Broekhuisen, Hague, 1683, in 8vo, translated into Latin by Mr. Piron, and subjoined to his book de Interpretatione. Paris, 1685, 1693, 1709, in 12mo, with an addition of a Letter concerning Honoré d'Urfé, author of Astrea the Romance. In 1715 there was published at London in 12mo an English translation under the following title: The History of Romances; an Enquiry into their Original; Instructions for composing them; an Account of the most eminent Authors; with Characters and curious Observations upon the best Performances of that Kind. Written in Latin by Huetius: made English by Mr. Stephen Lewis. This translator is mistaken in asserting, that Monsieur Huet wrote this piece in Latin; so that it is evident that he never saw the original. IV. Discours prononcé à l'Académie Française. Paris, 1674, in 4to. V. Animadversiones in Manilium & Scaligeri Notas, published at the end of Monsieur de la Faye's Manilius ad usum Delphini. Paris, 1679, in 4to. The design of Monsieur in his notes is to show, that Joseph Scaliger ought not to have considered his edition of Manilius as an accurate or considerable performance. VI. Demonstratio Evangelica. Paris, 1679, and 1687, in Folio. Amsterdam, 1680, in 8vo, in two volumes, published by Christopher Sandius. Amsterdam, 1694, in 4to. Paris, 1690, in Folio, recognita, castigata, & amplificata. Leipzig, 1694, 1704, and 1722, in 4to. To support the title of this work he shews, that religion is founded upon moral demonstrations, depending on certain experience, and the unanimous consent of mankind. He disposes the principles after the method of Geometricians in definitions, postulate, and axioms. He endeavours to prove, that they are no less certain than Geometrical demonstrations; from whence he concludes, that since the Christian religion has as much or more certainty than what the human mind believes to be most certain, namely Geometry; it is a prodigious instance of insatiation to despise it, and a strange obstinacy to contradict it. These principles being laid down, the author infers his demonstrations, which consist in ten propositions, which amount to this: That the books of the Old and New Testament are true: that those of the Old Testament contain several Prophecies of the Messiah: that those prophecies are accomplished in the Messiah: that the books of the New relate facts and miracles, which cannot reasonably be doubted, and which prove invincibly the truth of the Christian Religion. To evince the genuineness of the books of the Old Testament, he examines the authority and antiquity of every book in particular. He shews that the Pentateuch was written by Moses, and answers the objections of Spinosa. He asserts, that all the ancient Deities of the Phœnicians, Egyptians, Persians, Indians, Northern and Western nations, and even of some of the Americans, Greeks, and Italians, were only Moses in several disguises: for instance, that the Adonis of the Phœnicians, the Mercury, Osiris, Serapis, Anubis, and other Deities of the Egyptians, the Zoroaster of the Persians, the Deities of the Western nations, Apollo, Priapus, Æsculapius, Prometheus, and other Gods of the Greeks, Janus, Faunus, Vertumnus of the Latins; in short all the fabulous Deities are only Moses, whose History has been disguised. He treats of the ancient Greek versions of the books of the Old Testament, of the Hebrew language, of the Canon of the sacred books of the Old Testament, and of every thing relating to the critical knowledge and antiquity of those books. He vindicates the truth of the History of the New Testament. But the most considerable part of this work is that, in which he shews that the Prophecies of the Messiah contained in the Old Testament are accomplished in the person of Christ. To the edition of 1690 he prefixed a Preface in answer to some objections born at Caen in Normandy February the 8th 1630. He lost his father at the age of eighteen months, and his mother four years after; and was delivered to his guardians, who were very negligent of him, and put him out to board in the city, where though he had but little assistance and bad examples before him, he passed through his course of humanity-studies before he was thirteen years of age. In the prosecution of his philosophical studies he happened upon an excellent Professor, Father Mambrun, a Jesuit, who after Plato's example directed him to begin with learning a little Geometry. Our author went farther in it than he desired, and contracted such a relish for Geometry, that he made it his chief study, and in a manner slighted the writings which his master read to him. He went through all the other parts of the Mathematics, and maintained public theses at Caen, a thing never before done in that city. Having passed through his classes, it was his business to study the Law, and to take his degrees in it. But two books published objections against this work. His opinion, that Moses is to be found in the greatest part of the Deities of the Phœnicians, Egyptians, Greeks, &c. had met with most opposition. He affirms, that this was not impertinent to his subject, since proving the antiquity of Moses was proving at the same time the antiquity of the books of which he was author. Now nothing shews this antiquity more clearly, than to prove that what the ancients esteemed most ancient and venerable, their Gods and Heroes, were nothing else but Moses. It is allowed, that this would be of great advantage; but the evidence of these arguments is not so readily admitted. If Monsieur Huet had given them as conjectures, or well imagined co-incidences, they might have passed; but they will not be received as demonstrations. Besides, this was not believed to be his intention; and all that he alleges in justification of himself, proves only, that he might urge such kind of arguments, since several writers had done so before him. Artapanus maintained that Mercury and Musæus were Moses; Vossius the Elder and Bochart have affirmed the same of Bacchus; Justin Martyr of Mnevis an Egyptian God; Bochart of Typhon. Vossius asserted that Hercules is the copy of Joshua; Bochart, that Saturn and his three sons, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, were formed upon Noah and his sons; Apollo Pythius upon Phut; Mercury, upon Chanaam or Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses; Bacchus, upon Nimrod; Prometheus, upon Magog; Apis, Serapis, and Mnevis, upon Joseph; Ilithus, upon Lilith; Silenus, upon Shiloh, who is the Messiah. Some have conjectured that Zoroaster was the same with Moses; that Ham is Misraim, or Japhet, or Ebus, or Assuerus, or Nimrod. A learned man has likewise affirmed, that Jabel and Jubal are Mercury and Apollo; that Ada and Zilla the wives of Lamech, are Juno and Latona; that Naomi is Venus; that Tabalcain is Vulcan; and that Mercury Trimegistus is the eternal word. Monsieur Huet having defended his opinion by authority, endeavours to support it by reason; and taking Zoroaster for an instance, shews several great co-incidences between the life of Moses and what is related of Zoroaster. The names of their fathers resemble each other very much. Both of them are said to have smiled as soon as they were born. Both of them wrote five books of the origin of things; and prohibited idolatry under severe penalties. Their Kings endeavoured to destroy them; but God preserved them by sending venomous flies against their persecutors. They avoided this danger by flight, and passed over rivers dryshod. Both of them being banished their country retired to a mountain, which appeared to them covered with a celestial fire; and they could not look upon God, who was surrounded with the flames. They received from him the book of their laws, which greatly resembled each other. They returned from the mountain covered with a radiant light. They were supported in the desert with miraculous food, and at last disappeared without any person's discovering the manner of their death. If we add to this, that several eminent writers have asserted, that there never was such a person as Zoroaster, Monsieur Huet thinks it cannot reasonably be denied, that Zoroaster is Moses himself. It must be owned, that this instance has some probability attending it; but the greatest part of his other instances are not favoured by such co-incidences. He asserts for example, that Janus is Moses, because Albricus, who wrote concerning the images of the Gods, says that he was commonly painted with rays about him, holding a staff in his hand, with which he struck a rock, whence proceeded water.

This is not at all convincing. But what follows is less so. When we see, says Monsieur Huet, Venus in the hymns ascribed to Orpheus, dancing with her Nymphs upon the shore of Syria, who brings incense from a place near the waters of Egypt; do not we immediately perceive Miriam the sister of Moses dancing and singing with her companions in Syria, near the country where the incense grew upon the shore of Syria, which she had just passed over? Do not we perceive in this Miriam and her companions the origin of the Fable of the Muses, who took their name from that of Moses famous for his songs, whom the Greeks called Μουσαῖος or Μοῦσα, and whose sister ought to be called Μοῦρα, and her companions Μοῦραι. But nothing gave so much offence as his asserting that Priapus was the same with Moses. Priapus idem ac Moser. He vindicates himself from the raillery which this exposed him to, by saying, that we ought to fall likewise upon Artapanus, who affirmed that Moses is Mercury, the God of thieves, a thief himself, and the pander of criminal love. That we ought to reproach Bochart, who said that Moses is Typhon, an impious and barbarous monster, and an enemy to the Gods; and the Shiloh or the Messiah is Silenus, that ridiculous Deity, who is always reeling with drunkenness. Priapus and all other Heathen Gods are representations of Heroes, or of things natural. He represented the vivifying power of the sun, and fecundity of nature. He is, according to some, the symbol of the sun; according to others, the God Pan, or Bacchus, Apollo, Mercury; Typhon, whom learned men have thought to be Moses. Would they therefore have made any difficulty of saying the same of Priapus? Add to this, that the same obscenity, which appears in the images of Priapus, is to be met with likewise in these of Pan, Orus, Osiris, Mercury, Marsyas, and Terminus. Our author in his Commentarius de Rebus ad eam pertinentibus owns, that this work of his met with better success among foreigners than among the French, many of whom considered it as a book full of learning, but void of proofs; which occasioned several persons to say, that he had demonstrated nothing but his extensive reading. Others less equitable borrowed from it, and at the same time attacked it, in order to cover their own plagiarism. Monsieur Huet complains particularly of Monsieur Ferrand and Frassen, especially the latter, whom Monsieur de Harlay, Archbishop of Paris obliged to give him satisfaction. Monsieur Simon had a design to make an abridgment of this work; but Monsieur Huet being informed, that it was to alter it as he thought proper, desired him to excuse himself that trouble. The first edition of 1679 is most sought after, because there are some passages in it, which are not to be found in the editions of Paris in 1687 and 1690. VII. Censura Philosophiæ Cartesianæ. Paris 1689 in 12mo. Helmstadt 1690 in 12mo, published by Henry Meibomius. Frisiæ (perhaps Franeker) 1690 in 12mo. Hanover 1690. Campis 1690 in 12mo. Paris 1694 with additions. When Monsieur Huet wrote this book, says Monsieur Themiseul in his Letters, he was greatly piqued against the Cartesians, as appears by the eighth chapter of this work. He was displeased that those Philosophers infinitely preferred those who cultivate their reason, to those who only cultivate their memory, and require, that men should endeavour more to know themselves than to know what was done in former ages. "What, says he, because we are men of learning, shall we become the subject of the raillery of the Cartesians? VIII. Quæstiones Ainetanae de Concordiâ Rationis & Fidei. Caen 1690 in 4to. Leipzig 1692 in 4to. Leipzig 1701 and lished at that time interrupted his application to that course of study, and diverted it to another. These two books were Des Cartes's Principles, and Bochart's Sacred Geography. He admired Des Cartes at first, and adhered to his Philosophy for several years. Bochart's Geography made a great impression on him by its vast extent of learning; and being full of Hebrew and Greek, he resolved to make himself a master of these languages; for which purpose he applied himself to them with great vigour, and contracted an intimacy with Monsieur Bochart, who assisted him in his studies. At the age of twenty years and one day the custom of Normandy delivered him from the tuition of his guardians, who had been very sparing in their allowance to him. His strongest passion, and that which he first gratified, after he became master of himself, was to see Paris, not so much out of curiosity, as to furnish himself with books, and introduce himself into the acquaintance of learned men. Two years after Christina Queen of Sweden having invited

1709 in 4to. This is written in the form of a dialogue after the manner of Cicero's Tusculan Questions. It is divided into three parts: lays down general principles concerning the certainty of reason and faith, the use of reason in points of faith, and of faith in points not discoverable by reason; and he proposes methods of reconciling them. He endeavours to shew, that those things which appear most opposite to our reason, though proposed by religion to our belief, are not more extraordinary than many things, believed by the Pagans in their religion. For this purpose he compares the doctrines and practice of Christianity with the sentiments of the Philosophers, the fables of the Poets, and the practice of the people, in which consisted their divinity, and which were the foundation of their religion. IX. De la Situation du Paradis Terrestre. Paris 1691 in 12mo. Leipzig 1694 in 16mo, translated into Latin by John George Pritius, a Divine and Minister of Francfort. Leipzig 1694 in 4to, in Latin, with his Demonstratio Evangelica. Amsterdam 1698 in 12mo, in Latin, with the Dissertatio de Navigationibus Salomonis. Amsterdam 1698 in folio, in Latin, in the Critici sacri. Amsterdam 1701 in 12mo. Amsterdam 1716 in 12mo, translated into Low Dutch. In this treatise our author places the terrestrial paradise upon the canal formed by the Tygris and Euphrates after they have joined near Apamea, between the place where they join and that where they separate in order to fall into the Persian Gulf, on the Eastern side of the South branch of the great circuit, which this river makes towards the West, which is marked in the maps of Ptolomy near Aracca about 32 degrees 39 minutes North latitude, and 80 degrees ten minutes longitude. X. Nouveaux Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Cartésianisme. Paris 1692 in 8vo. Amsterdam 1698 in 12mo, with additions. The first edition appeared under the name of M. G. de P.A. that is, Monsieur Gilles de l'Aulnoy, a man of character, who had conferences at his house at Paris, and who lent his name to this book. The second edition was published under the name of M. G. de l'Academie Française, through a mistake of the Bookfeller in Holland, who mistook the initial letters in the first edition. XI. Statuts Synodaux pour le Diocèse d'Avranches, lus & publiez dans le Synode tenu à Avranches l'an 1693. XII. Trois Supplémens aux dits Statuts Synodaux, lus & publiez dans les Synodes tenus à Avranches dans les années 1695, 1696, 1698. Caen. in 8vo. XIII. Carmina Latina & Græca. Deventer 1668 in 8vo. Amsterdam 1672 in 16mo, published by Mr. Hogerfius. Utrecht 1664 in 8vo and 1700 in 16mo, published by Mr. Grævius. Paris 1709 in 12mo, the fifth edition published by the Abbé d'Olivet, who likewise published a new edition at Paris 1729 in 12mo. XIV. De Navigationibus Salomonis. Amsterdam 1698 in 8vo. It is reprinted with the Critici sacri; and translated into French, and published by Mr. Bruzen de la Martiniere in a collection intitled, Traitez Geographiques & Historiques pour faciliter l'Intelligence de l'Ecriture sainte par divers Auteurs celebres. Hague 1730, two volumes in 12mo. In this treatise he enquires, how Hiram King of Tyre could send his ships from Tyre, which lies upon the Mediterranean Sea, to Ezion-geber upon the Red Sea; and observes, that there was a canal made by art from the Nile into the Red Sea. He proves this from the testimony of the Arabians, who assert that there was a canal from the time of Abraham. Strabo says that Sesostris caused it to be made; and Herodotus tells us, that it was done by Nechius, the grandson of Sesostris. Some authors affirm, that this work was left unfinished; but perhaps a small canal might be opened, and the great one never have been finished. He then examines into the situation of Opbir and Tbarsis. He imagines Opbir to be the South coast of Africa, called by the Arabians Zanguebar, and particularly Sophala upon the same coast. Tbarsis he supposes to be the Western coast of Africa and Spain towards the mouth of Bœtis. XV. Notæ in Antologiam Epigrammatum Græcorum. Utrecht 1700 in 16mo, published at the end of Grævius's edition of our author's Poems. XVI. Les Origines de la Ville de Caen & des Lieux circonvoisins. Roan 1702 in 4to. The second edition printed in the same city in 1706 in 8vo is greatly enlarged. XVII. Lettre à Monsr. Perrault sur le Parallele des Anciens & des Modernes, du 10 Octobre 1692, inserted in the third part of the Pieces fugitives without the author's knowledge. In this letter he attacks Monsieur Perrault with great vigour and force of reasoning. XVIII. Examen du sentiment de Longin sur ce passage de la Genèse, Et Dieu dit, que la Lumiere soit faite, & la Lumiere fut faite, par Mr. Huet, ancien Eveque d'Avranches: inserted in the tenth tome, art. 3. of Monsieur Le Clerc's Bibliothèque Choise. We shall give an account of the occasion of this piece. Monsieur Huet in his Demonstratio Evangelica had maintained, that this passage of Moses, God said, let there be light, and there was light, was perfectly simple, and not sublime and figurative, as Longinus in his treatise Of the Sublime had asserted. In 1682 Messieurs de Port Royal gave a French translation of Genesis, with an Exposition of the Literal and Spiritual Sense thereof, drawn from the holy Fathers and Ecclesiastical Authors; and in the Preface, after having produced the authority of Longinus to shew, that there is the sublime and grand in the style of that History, which being tempered with a divine simplicity, is every where stamped with the character of truth, they report the opinion of this able Rhetorician upon the passage abovementioned, to which they add the remark, or, to use their own words, the wise reflection made thereupon by Monsieur Boileau in the preface to his translation of Longinus printed with his works in 1674. All this gave occasion to Monsieur Boileau to make an addition to the preface to that translation, wherein he expresses his surprize, that Monsieur Huet should disown the sublime in this passage, and congratulates himself upon the suffrage of Messieurs de Port Royal, who had made a very different judgment from that Prelate. Monsieur Huet having read that passage of Monsieur Boileau's, thought it concerned him to defend his opinion, and wrote a letter of some length to the Duke of Montausier, the Dauphin's Governor. It is not to be doubted, but that the Duke soon communicated this piece to Monsieur Boileau; yet it is not probable that he was convinced by Monsieur Huet's arguments; since in all the following editions of his works, he never altered that passage in his preface, which had occasioned Monsieur Huet's complaint. Neither did he make any answer to that dissertation, probably because it was not made public. For Monsr. Le Clerc having inserted it in 1706 in his Bibliothèque Curieuse with several judicious remarks in confirmation of Monsieur Huet's opinion; Monsieur Boileau wrote an answer. XIX. Lettre à M. Foucault Conseiller d'Etat sur l'Origine de la Poésie Française, du 16 Mars 1706, inserted in the Memoires de Trevoux in 1711. XX. Lettre de M. Morin de l'Academie des Inscriptions à M. Huet (that is, of Monsieur Huet himself) touchant le Livre de M. Tolandus Anglois, intitulé, Aëidæmon, & Origines Judaicæ: inserted in the Memoires de Trevoux for September 1709, and in the collection, which the Abbé invited Monsieur Bochart to her court, Monsieur Huet accompanied him, and set out on the journey in April 1652. Monsieur Bochart did not meet with the reception which he expected. For the Queen's health being infirm, and too much study having injured it, Monsieur Bourdelot her Physician, an artful courtier, who had studied her temper as well as constitution, prevailed on her to break off all conversation with the men of letters, in hopes to govern her alone himself. Monsieur Bochart was the sufferer on this account; for Monsieur Huet's youth prevented him from appearing formidable to the Physician. He often visited the Queen, who would have engaged him in her service; but he being sensible of her mutable temper thought proper to return to France at the end of three months; the chief fruit of his journey being a copy of a manuscript of Origen, which he transcribed at Stockholm, and the acquaintance which he had contracted with the learned men in Sweden and Holland, through which he had passed.

Upon

Tilladet published of Monsieur Huet's works under the title of Dissertations sur diverses matieres de la Religion & de Philologie, Paris 1612, two volumes in 12mo. Hague 1714 two volumes in 12mo. XXI. Histoire de Commerce & de la Navigation des Anciens. Paris 1716 in 12mo. Brussels 1717 in 12mo. This has been translated into English. XXII. Commentarius de Rebus ad eum pertinentibus. Amsterdam 1718 in 12mo. XXIII. Traité Philosophique de la Foiblesse de l'Esprit humain. Amsterdam 1723 in 8vo. It is a sceptical piece, and unworthy of our author. Father Castel the Jesuit has undertaken to shew in the Memoires de Treux for June 1725 p. 989, that this treatise was not written by our author. But the Abbé Olivet has proved the contrary in a pamphlet published at Paris 1726 in 12mo, under the title of Apologie. This treatise has been translated into English, and published in 8vo. XXIV. Huetiana, ou Pensées diverses de M. Huet. Paris 1722 in 12mo. XXV. Diane de Castro; ou le faux Incas. Paris 1728 in 12mo. This romance was written when he was very young. XXVI. In the second volume of Father Desmolet's Memoires de Litterature there is printed a Latin preface to our author's Traité de la Foiblesse de l'Esprit humain. He left behind him a Latin translation of Longus's Loves of Daphnis and Chloe; an Answer to Monsieur Regis with regard to Des Cartes's Metaphysics; his Notes upon the Vulgate Translation of the Bible; and collection of between five and six hundred letters in Latin and French, written to learned men. We shall give the reader some written to Dr. Thomas Gale, and communicated to us by the learned Roger Gale Esq; the Doctor's son.

Clariss. ornatissimoq; Viro Thomæ Galeo,
S. P. D. Petr. Dan. Huetius.

" Jamblichum tuum accepi, Vir doctissime, cum & ejus jam compositum esse, nam statim atq; ad me perlatum est eum labore tuo excultum, & doctrinæ tuæ monumentis insignem prodiisse, nihil mihi ad eum comparandum reliqui feci, cum propter scriptoris singularum eruditionem, per quam me plurimum profecisse memineram, cum nondum Græcæ extaret, tum propter accuratam tuam Interpretationem & Annotationes non vulgaris saporis, quas adjecisse te accerperam. Præclarè enim merito meritis es de re literariâ & literatis omnibus nobili hac Lucubratione, nominisq; tui famæ egregiè consulisti. Ego vero pro tam splendido munere gratias ago tibi habeoq; quam possum maximas. At futurum speraveram, ut omnes Jamblichi reliquias colligeres, & in unum Corpus digeres. Id profecto & Rei Dignitas & Auctoris præstantia, & reliquorum ejus operum Commendatio postulabat; nos verò id à te nunc expectamus. Atq; utinam diligentiam tuam quoq; conferres in excolendum Porphyrium, hominem excellentis ingenii & doctrinæ. Nihil profecto literarum bono, cui natus es, vel gloriæ tuæ utilius præstare quires; nihil eximie tuæ eruditioni expromendæ commodius posses reperire. Quamobrem te magnoperè hortor, ut hanc Spartam ornandam suscipias. Hoc si feceris, nullis omnino officiis deero, si quæ à me ad præclarum hoc institutum promovendum poterunt proficisci. Et verò sunt mihi ad manum nonnulla, quibus non parum locupletari possent hæc Editio. Digna quoq; res esset studiis tuis sparsa Procli monumenta recomponere, viri magni, qui clarissimas disciplinas animo pervagatus est, & acutis commentationibus illustravit. Harum collectionem nos quoq; juvare, & collatis symbolis amplificare possimus. Ac sæpe numero sum miratus neglectos

" jacuisse hætenus tam locupletes & luculentos Auctores, neq; inter tot eruditos homines, qui Veterum emendandis & edendis scriptis industriam suam commodarunt, extitisse quenquam, qui ad hæc excutienda & publicanda animum appelleret. Nempe uni tibi Laborem hunc destinabat Deus, ut qui alios doctrinâ superes, idem auctores eruditione cæteris præstantiores curis tuis perpolires. Cæterum sapere tibi Demonstrationem meam Evangelicam per mihi gratum perq; jucundum est, cum ipsum te norum quam limari sis & subacti Ingenii Judicii; Miserram exemplaria Libri hujus ad clarissimi Judicii; Miserranum, Vossium, Bernardum, & Belgium; quæ an ad vos pervenerint, nullus scio. Ex te velim intelligant hostra adversum eos observantiæ significationem hanc me dedisse. Vale. VI Cal. Septembr. MDCLXXXIX. Lutet."

" Cl. eruditissimoq; Viro Thomæ Galeo,
S. T. P. P. D. Huetius.

" Quanti interest literariæ Reipublicæ exire in lucem publicam quæ a Simplicio in Jamblichum disputata sunt, præsertim si labor tuus accesserit & diligentia, præclare intelligo; neq; operæ ulli vel labori parcendum mihi esse duco, quoad ejus compos fieres. Verum scito Romæ perpaucos esse, qui Græca Exemplaria versare, pauciores qui describere consueverint. Esurientes quidam Græculi operam olim suam ad id locabant; qui quæstus, quoniam exilis erat, neq; æφιλία satis largiter suppeditabat, egestate coacti ad alias artes animum studiumq; converterunt. Est equidem nunc illic Petrus Possinus, Græcarum Literarum apprime sciens, mihiq; amicus. Verum ab homine ætatis jam affectæ suis studiis intento, suisq; meritis percelebri, hanc operam nec postulare æquum est, nec expectare. Si quid tamen vel precibus aliunde efficere poterò, vel auctoritate, vel etiam pretio, non patiar officium ullum erga te meum desiderari. De colligendis & componendis atq; etiam exornandis Porphyrii Operibus sermo te cogitare vehementer sanè lætor. Præclarum enim verò Consilium, nobis utile, & tibi perquam honorificum; quo & eos, qui severiores sectantur discipulis, & qui aetate tibi devincuntur. Equidem enim Doctrinæ genus, quam Literarum partem non attingit Vir ille, maximus? Macste igitur esto hoc animo, doctissime Galæe, & in eam curam cogitationemq; incumbere, hanc uni tibi palmam esse repositam, quam Eruditorum omnium Plausus excipiet, immortalis Gloria consequetur. Fertur isthic apud vos prodiisse ante hos quatuordecim annos Dissertatio de Paradiso terrestri, Anglico sermone scripta. Velim ex te scire quid sit illud Operis; unde si quidquam discere nos posse putes, peto abs te ut Librum ad me mittas: dabo operam ut statim tibi pretium renumeretur. Vale IV Eid. Jan. MDCLXXX. de Sangermano.

" Clariss. doctissimoq; Viro Thomæ Galeo,
S. P. D. P. D. Huetius.

" Literas tuas ad XIII Cal. Martias tertio circiter quartoo; postquam scriptæ erant mense, vix tandem accepi. Lutetiâ enim profectus IV Cal. Maii inferiore, non longè Cadomo distans; atq; illuc post longos & diuturnos circuitus agrè tandem pervenerunt Literæ tuæ. Ad eas sic habetò: Scribam ad Petrum Possinum, vel operam, ut Simplicium illum, quem postulas, det per se, vel per amicum in Biblio-

" thecâ

Upon his return to his own country he resumed his studies with more vigour than ever, in order to publish his manuscript of Origen. Two Academies, one of which had been established during his absence for polite Literature, and of which he had been elected a member without his knowledge; and another, which he founded himself for Natural Philosophy, served to divert him in his fatigue, or rather made him change his labour from time to time. Sixteen years after his return from Sweden his edition of Origen appeared. These sixteen years he spent without any employment but his studies, though he went every year for a month or two to Paris. During this interval he had several advantageous offers, which he refused. Queen Christina, who upon her abdication of the Crown of Sweden had retired to Rome, invited him thither in 1659. But the treatment of Monsieur Bochart, who had met with such neglect from her in Sweden after he had been sent for with such assurances of favour, deterred him from accepting her invitation. He tells us likewise,

“ thecâ Vaticanâ, aliisq; quæ Romæ sunt, conqui-
 “ rat. Sed quoniam homo senio est confectus, & ho-“ rarum suarum perparcus, auctor tibi sum, ut literas “ meas mittas ad Nazarium tuum, negotiumq; ipsi
 “ des uti Possinum conveniat, redditisq; meis Literis “ paratum se dicat, quæcunq; vel suaserit vel jussit “ exequi; se modo auctoritate suâ, ope, concilio, of“ ficiis adjuvet. Quod facturum libenter virum hu“ manissimum spero, atq; etiam recipio. Hoc tibi si “ probabitur, Literas ad Possinum statim à me habe-“ bis. Libellum Anglicum de Paradiso Terrestri una “ cum Literis tuis accepi. Habeo gratiam; referam “ etiam, si potero; majorem tamen habuissim, si pre-“ tium à me representari passus esses. Nam quo pro“ motior est Liberalitas tua, eo parcius hic mihi “ utendum est. Procli Dissertationes in Parmenidem
 “ si quando nanciscar, tibi redimam. Verum rarè “ venales prostant Libri hujusmodi calamo exarati.
 “ Si uspiam occurrat, atq; ejus describendi faculta“ tem impetraverimus, non male nobiscum ageur.
 “ Vale. Id. Sept. MDCLXXX. Alneto ad Adonem “ fluvium.”

“ Cl. doctissimoq; Viro Tho. Galeo, S. P. D.
 “ P. D. Huetius.

“ Eram Lutetiz, cum mihi reddite sunt ante aliquot
 “ menses postremæ Literæ tuæ, quibus velle te signi“ ficare, ut Romam ad Petrum Possinum scriberem
 “ de Simplicio, adituq; ad Bibliothecam Vaticanam “ hominibus tuis patefaciendo. Fecissim illico, nisi
 “ ad me perlatum fuisset de humanissimi hujus viri “ obitu; quod etsi non certè & affirmatè dicebatur, “ mihi tamen expectandum esse duxi, quoad certius “ aliquid acciperem. Id ipsum verò ad te scribere “ distuli, quod & Lutetiz Valetudine satis diu ten-“ tatus sum, sic ut Lestione & scriptione mihi à Medi“ cis interdiceretur, & post restitutam sanitatem statim “ huc me contuli, confirmandi mei causâ. Cum “ ergo de Possini vitâ incertus sum, ne nunc quidem
 “ ad eum scribo, ne frustra scribam. Quod si res “ adhuc intègra est, & perseveras in proposito scribam
 “ ad eminentissimum Cardinalem Estræum, qui Literis “ Literatisq; impensè favet, literarum omnium ipse “ peritissimus, ut Nazarium tuum auctoritate suâ ad-“ juvet, ad ea consicienda quæ ipsi demandasti. Id “ tibi si probari intellexero, statim à me Literas ad “ eum accipies. Utar ad id Mabilionii nostri operâ “ quoad ex te sciam, quo eas ad te recta destinari, “ quoq; modo inscribi jubeas. Tu tuas ad me mittes
 “ Lutetiam, apud Andræam Pralard Bibliopolum, “ Viâ Jacobæâ, qui eas quocunq; loco futurus sim, “ diligenter curabit. Ita nullius interpositione egebi“ mus. De studiis & Lucubrationibus tuis valde velim “ ex te cognoscere. Vale. Cal. Septemb. MDCLXXXI.
 “ Alneto.”

“ Præstantissimo Viro Thome Galeo, S. P. D.
 “ Petr. Dan. Huetius, Episcopus Sues“ nensis designatus.

“ Accepi Literas tuas, eruditissime Galeo, singularis “ adversum me benevolentiz significatione plenas, qui“ bus novâ dignitate auctum me gratularis. Etsi ve“ ro perhonorificum mihi est hoc de me maximi Regis “ judicium, qui tanto muneri nec impari nec inde“ corem fore me censuit & probari tamen abs te non “ exigua mihi est honoris accessio. Quanquam si non “ inopus mei æstimator esse velim, iuipicari fortasse “ debeo nos id tam ab existimatione tuâ quam ab “ amiciâ proficisci. Etsi vero nova ac priori longe “ dissimilis vivendi ratio jam inde mihi ineunda est,

“ nunquam tamen à me impetratum iri sentio, ut ci“ tibatâ carentem fenestram, hoc est, ut Literarum nostrarum “ expertem, agere possim. Nam in quarum sinu “ natus & eductus sum, quæ nobis jucundissimæ & “ individuz comites ita adhæserunt, ut rebus afflictis “ solatio, lætis & florentibus oblectationi semper fue“ rint, quarum muneris est quod Spiro & placeo;
 “ si modo placeo; eas affectâ jam ætate aspernari, “ illiberale esse duco. Quamobrem nihil est cur du-“ bites, quin eodem animo accipiam excellentis doc-“ trinæ tuæ scetus, iisq; evolvendis par studium ad“ hibeam ac feci olim, cum nullæ curæ otium nos“ trum interpellarent. Libellus Originis de Oratione, “ quem ad me miseris, intra ipsius Angliæ fines à “ prædonibus interceptus est. Si quando promissum “ de edendis Originis opusculis exolvere potero, non “ parum ex Labore hoc tuo ad nostram Editionem “ accedet ornamenti. Nondum puto in Galliam per“ latum fuisse Spenceri librum de Legibus Ebraeorum.
 “ Magnum aliquid & a singulari Auctoris eruditione, “ & ab argumenti hujus dignitate expectamus. Tu
 “ vero, Vir eximie, in nobis amandis perge: id pro-“ fecto, si non virtute, at nostro ærga te cultu & ob“ servantiâ promeremur. Vale. Lutetiz Paris. VI Eid.
 “ Aprilis MDCLXXXVI.

“ Ornatissimo & eruditissimo Viro Thome “ Galeo, S. T. P. Petrus Daniel Huetius, “ tius, Episcopus Suesion. designatus.

“ Jam diu sum in ære tuo, doctissime Galeo, cum ob-“ egregium illud Munus, quo nos profectus es, lu“ culentum Librum de Piscibus a Mabilionio tuo nobis “ nomine redditum, de quo maximas habeo ti-“ bi agoq; gratias; tum multò magis ob tuam in “ retinendâ nostrâ necessitudine constantiam & fidem.
 “ Nos verò huic minimè desumus; & quamvis non “ patitur moles Negotiorum, quibus in administrandâ “ amplissimâ Dicecesi non premimur modo, sed planè “ obruimur, ut frequenti literarum commercio bene-“ volentiam tuam colere, nostramq; tibi testificari pos-“ simus; viget tamen ea apud nos magnâ excellentis “ tuæ eruditionis admiratione conjuncta. Subit in“ terdum invidere Justello nostro, qui eandem tecum “ urbem habitat, & sedens adversus identidem te af“ peccat & audit. Verum quoniam ita terrâ mariq; “ disjuncti sumus, ut mutuo colloquio aspectusq; frui
 “ nobis non liceat, at animorum certè conjunctione “ nostri desiderium solemur. Vale Lutet. Parisiorum “ X Cal. Martias MDCLXXXVII.

“ Eximio Viro Thome Galeo, S. P. D. Pe“ trus Daniel Huetius, Episcopus Sues“ sionensis designatus.

“ De Manilio edendo nunquam equidem cogitavi, Vi-“ rorum omnium optime & humanissime; & si cogi“ tâssim, nunc mihi variis occupationibus & gravibus “ curis impicito hujusmodi cogitatio omnino esset ab“ jicienda. Liceatne verò hæc studia persequi, cui res“ pirare non licet? Et nunc quod in hoc secessu pos“ sum otiosus videri, non ita sane est; nobiscum “ atulimus negotia nostra. Meministi Horatianum “ illud, Post equitem sedet atra Cura. His negotiis “ alia succrescunt indies, nec literas nostras respicere, “ nedum retractare sinunt. Cur autem Manilii Editi-“ onem suscepisse vel dictus sim vel creditus, duo viden“ tur effecisse; & quod notæ quædam nostræ ad cal-“ cem Delsinianæ Editionis adjectæ sunt octo abhinc
 “ annis; & quod Auctoris hujus Codicem quandam
 “ MS. misit ad me nuper Vossius. At notas expresse“ runt à me Fajii Editoris flagitationes assiduz: Codi“ cem

likewise, that he received an offer from Sweden to take upon him the education of the young King, who in 1660 succeeded Charles Gustavus, successor of Christina, but that he excused himself. However, this fact is fully refuted by the authors of the Acta Litteraria of Sweden. Ten years after Monsieur Bossuet being appointed by the King Preceptor to the Dauphin in the room of the President de Perigny, who died in 1670, his Majesty chose Monsieur Huet for his colleague with the title of Sub-Preceptor to the Prince, which he had long before designed to honour him with, but had been dissuaded from it by Monsieur de Montausier, though otherwise a friend to our author, at the desire of Monsieur de Perigny, who was jealous of the merit of a colleague of so great a character. He came to court in 1670, and continued there till 1680, when the Dauphin married. His employment taking up a considerable part of his life, he stole several hours from sleep to compleat his Demonstratio Evangelica, which was begun and ended amidst the embarrassment of a court. He refused for a long time the sollicitations of several members of the French Academy, who would have engaged him to desire a place in that illustrious body; but at last he consented, and was admitted there in 1674. Though the first idea of the Commentators for the use of the Dauphin was started by the Duke de Montausier; yet it was Monsieur Huet, who formed the plan, and directed the execution of it, as far as the capacity of the persons employed in that work would permit. While he was engaged in writing his Demonstratio Evangelica, the sentiments of piety, which he had from his earliest years, prompted him to enter into holy Orders, which he did at forty six years of age. In 1678 he was presented by the King to the Abbey of Aunay in Normandy, which was so agreeable to him, that he retired there every summer, after he “ cem verò hunc pervolare fivit otium, quod ætate

 “ hac proximâ præstiturunt nobis aque Borbonienses, “ ad quas Valetudinis causâ me contuli. Etsi vero il“ lustrandi Manilii nullum omnino cepi consilium, “ quod si tamen perficere possis, ut studiosus aliquis “ Codicis Oxoniensis cum Editione Scaligeranâ conten“ dendi Laborem in se volet recipere, & variantes Lecti-“ ones ad te transmittere, quas mecum deinde commu“ nices, rem mihi feceris longè gratissimam. Per“ sbyrii Editionem ἐπι ἰμανίλων ἀποχρῆς benè tibi ver-“ tere cupio. Doctus & plenus bonæ frugis Libellus, ut
 “ alia omnia magni illius Viri, cujus utinam univer“ sas scriptionis in unum aliquando corpus possis collig“ gere. Poteris quidem, si voles, voles autem, si me “ audias, nam qui pro dignitate operis rectè exequi “ possit, præter te nemo homo est. Lutetizæ recudi“ tur Demonstratio nostra Evangelica. Illuc post fe-“ mestrem absentiam revolare cogito. Et verò conti“ nui Imbres, qui totum hunc fœdarunt Septembrem, “ ex amœno hoc secessu me invitum extrudunt. Tu “ bene vale. IV Non. Octobris. MDCLXXXV. ex
 “ Alneto.”

“ Ornâtissimo Viro Thomæ Galeo, S. P. D.
 “ Petrus Daniel Huetius Episcop. Sueff.
 “ designatus.

“ Literas tuas ad VII Cal. Quintil. datas Idibus Octo-“ bris accepi in Alnetano nostro, quæ est Abbatia “ Neustriæ inferioris. Tum autem me comparabam
 “ ad reditum pro more meo. Sic enim annis ab hinc “ aliquot vitæ tempora partiri soleo, ut Vere & Æstate “ rusticus sim, hyeme urbanus, Lutetiamq; repetam, “ Nihil autem mihi magis præter spem potuit con-“ tingere, quam variantes Lectiones Maniliani Codi-“ cis Mertonensis, tuo amicorumq; tuorum studio ex-“ ceptas, accipere. Nam quid tantum de te prome“ ritus sum, omnium quotquot sunt hominum op-
 “ time & benignissime, ut tantum Laborem subire, “ totq; bonarum horarum jacturam meâ causâ facere “ velles? Equidem si te ex scriptis duntaxat tuis nos-“ sem, primum te gentis eruditæ sine cunctatione
 “ ac fortasè etiam primum principemq; ponerem.
 “ Nunc cum ad singularem illam doctrinam huma“ nitas inusitata & expromta Liberalitas accesserint, “ nihil a me dici potest tam magnificè quin Virtus
 “ tua exuperet. Quamvis igitur gratias habeo tibi “ agereq; immortales debeo, referre certè neque pos“ sum, neq; posse unquam spero. Cæterum quod ais, “ geminam tibi videri hujus operis Editionem pro“ diisse, in eo facilè tibi assentior; nam & in aliis “ idem deprehensum est à me, maximè verò in Jo“ sephi ἀρχαιολογίᾳ, quod & clarissimum Bernardum
 “ monui. Cuiam verò discrepantiæ hæc Maniliani “ Astronomici accepta referenda sit, an Auctori ipsi, “ alteri, statuere sanè promptum non est, ei præsertim, “ cui perspecta sit infinita Criticorum licentia. Nam ne “ recedamus ab hoc opere, si quis Scaligeri Editiones cum “ prisicis, vel ipsas etiam inter se contulerit, Manilium “ pene quærat in Manilio, ea fuit hominis Confidentia.

 “ Gratissimum mihi fuit eximium Aristarchi Libellum, “ nativò ornatu excultum, & insigni fragmento Pappi
 “ cinctum prodire. Atq; utinam idem studium in re-“ liquis Mathematicis a Commandino Latinè editis, “ longeque etiam pluribus, qui latent in forulis Biblio“ thecarum, ponat aliquando doctissimus Wallisius.
 “ Multos in iisdem argumentis versatos jam olim pa“ raverant Prælo, qui Regiæ huic Bibliothecæ tum “ præfecti erant; quidam etiam typis sunt excusi, sed “ nondum venæunt. Interpretandorum eorum curam “ demandaverat illustrissimus Colbertus Henrico Valefo, “ Viro cætera doctissimo, at Mathematicarum Disci“ plinarum imperito. Hinc maxima succrevit Erro-“ rum Seges, qui vel primo intuitu incurrunt in oc-“ los. Plurimos facilè reperias scientiæ hujus, pluri“ mos Græcæ Linguz gnaros; perpaucos utriusq;
 “ ac ferè nullos; pauciores etiam qui veterum Mathe“ maticorum Libros versaverint. Fugerat me penitus “ insigne illud, quod indicasti, Bedæ testimonium de “ Purpurâ vestrate Britannicâ, ex quo liquido cognosci-“ tur, neq; unquam intercedisse omnino Purpuræ usum, “ contra ac multi putant, & hanc quæ nuper apud
 “ vos reperta est, illam ipsam esse, quæ Bedæ tempo-“ ribus erat in pretio. Perge verò excellenti tuâ Eru-“ ditione doctiores nos facere. Ego quidem libentes “ tibi μαθητεύω. Vale. Lutet. Paris. Cal. Decemb.
 “ MDCLXXXV. III.”

“ Viro amplissimo D. D. Petro Danieli “ Huetio Abrincotensium Episcopo Thomas
 “ Gale, S. P. D.

“ Nobilis Vir Robertus Boyle ὁ μανυρίτης, libris eru“ ditus Philosophiam, vitâ sanctissimâ Religionem plu“ rimum promovit. Idem legavit stipendia, quo eruditus “ quispiam instrueretur ad bellum contra Atheos geren-“ dum, quâ scriptis, quâ concionibus, per omnem poster-“ ritatem. Non est dissimulandum multa apud nos effe“ buisse Atheorum Examina: otio suo assidue abutuntur in “ traducendo Moyse. Julianus Simplicius, aliiq; rectè, “ aiunt, pronuciavere totam κοινογραφίαν *Moyse*icam ex “ sacris Ægyptiorum fabulis desumptam fuisse. In “ tempore igitur, S. Antistes, edidisse videris elegan“ tem de Paradiso libellum. Multi cum legunt &
 “ laudant: ut idem faciant plures, curabo ut nostra “ sermonem publicum prodeat. Hoc meum consilium “ oro in bonam accipias partem, veniamq; impertias “ quod te inconsulto rem istam aggressus sim. Emisi hoc “ anno duo Volumina Historicorum, qui res Anglica“ nas olim Latinè tradiderunt. Ubi primum claudetur “ Janua, hos ad te, venerande Præful; mittam, “ observantiz mese testes. Emendavi ad MSS. veteres “ Iamblichi libros, quos prius evulgavit Arcegius.
 “ Isti cum versione meâ exhibunt, vere appetente. E-“ jusdem Iamblichi opusculum ἐπι κοινῆς Μαθηματικῆς “ tuo beneficio jampridem nactus sum. In eo inter-“ pretando,

he had left the court, and wrote a great many of his works there. In 1685 he was nominated to the Bishopric of Soissons. But before the bulls for his institution were expedited, the Abbé de Sillery having been nominated to the See of Avranches, they exchanged Bishoprics with consent of the King; though by reason of the differences between the court of France and that of Rome they could not be consecrated till 1692. This delay was no great uneasiness to Monsieur Huet, who had more relish for a private and studious life than that of a Bishop, and accordingly resigned his Bishopric of Avranches in 1699, and was presented by the King to the Abbey of Fontenay near the gates of Caen. His love to his native place determined them to fix there, for which purpose he improved the house and gardens belonging to the Abbot. But several law-suits coming upon him, he removed to Paris, and lodged among the Jesuits in the Maison Professe, whom he had made heirs to his Library, reserving to himself the use of it during life. Here he lived the last twenty years of his life, dividing his time between devotion and study. He employed himself chiefly in writing notes on the vulgate translation; and read over for that purpose the Hebrew text four and twenty times, comparing it with the other Oriental texts. He spent every day two or three hours in this work from 1681 to 1712. A severe distemper, which attacked him that year, and confined him to his bed for near six months, weakened extremely his body and memory, but not the vivacity of his genius. However when he had recovered his strength, he applied himself to the writing of his life, which he did in a very elegant manner, though not with the same order and exactness as his other works, his memory being then decayed, and afterwards more and more declining; so that he was not any longer capable of a continued work, but only committed to writing detached thoughts, which are published under the title of Huetiana. It is remarkable that two or three hours before his death he recovered all the vigour of his genius and memory. He employed these moments in acts of piety, and died January the 26th 1721, aged ninety one years. He had a strong constitution, which was never altered by his intense study; he had a lively genius and solid judgment, and an easy affable temper, and was a man of a very agreeable conversation and strict probity (a).

(a) See his Commentar. de Rebus ad eum pertinentibus; his Eloge by the Abbé Olivet, prefixed to the Huetiana, and to his Traité Philosophique de la Foiblesse de l'Esprit humain; and Memoires de Trevoux, Avril 1721.

“pretando nolui tempus perdere. Lacunis ubiq; scatet “ofcitantia Librarii, quo apud vos usus sum. Mol-“liora tempora video mihi expectanda, ut hic Libel-“lus sanitati suæ restitatur. Deus O. M. Orbi “Christiano pacem, tibi, O Galliarum Lux & Orna-“mentum, vitam ad multos annos concedat. Vale.
“Dub. Lond. Kal. Novembres Anno MDCXCII.”

“Præstantissimo Viro T. Gale, S. P. D.
“Petrus Daniel Huetius Episcopus Abrin-“censis.

“Dici non potest quam mihi jucundæ fuerunt Lite-“ræ tuæ. Nam cum propter insignem Eruditionem, “quâ paucos hac ætate pares habes, neminem supe-“riorem, carus sis omnibus, mihiq; adeo ipsi, multo “mihi carior es certè ob eximiam bonitatem, mo-“destiam, liberalitatem, cæterasque Dotes, quas in te “jampridem expertus sum, atque earum prædicandi “nullum finem facio, quotiescunq; in eruditissimæ “gentis tuæ mentionem incido. Quamobrem sic ve-“lim existimes esse me virtutum tuarum non admira“torem modo summum, sed etiam assiduum Præco-“nem. Quo mihi gravior accidit diuturna illa litera“rum intermissio, quæ ex ferali hoc orta bello, sua“vissimum nobis ademit tuæ consuetudinis fructum. An “enim ad te perventuræ sint Literæ istæ, ne satis qui-“dem certus sum, nedum editos à me libellos in lu-“cem, ad te, ad Justellum, ad Berrardum tuto possim “transmittere. Miror itaque penetrare ad vos po“tuisse Dissertationem nostram de Situ Paradisi ter“restris; cum vix duo Exemplaria, perfractis claustris

“ad hujus regni aditus oppositis, in Hollandiam eva“serint, et si benè multa per Germaniam illuc cu“randa fides hominibus tradideram. Quæ si perve-“nissent ad destinatum finem, pars aliqua ad vos itura “erat; sed ea demum intercederunt. Gratissimum “autem mihi est atque etiam honorificum operâ tuâ “libellum hunc in vestram Linguam transferri; nam
“quod desit ab Auctore, vel ad Elegantiam & Orna-“tum, vel ad Doctrinæ Copiam, largiter farciatur ab “Interprete. Ejus quidem Latine vertendi Laborem “viri aliquot nostrates in se receperunt. De Scripto“ribus Anglicanæ Historiæ a te editis aliquid ex li“terariis Ephemeridibus cognoveram. Libros istos in “Galliam nusquam extare puto. De Jamblichio salivam “mihi movisti. Valde mendosa est Arceriana editio, “nec multo sanior Interpretatio. Scriptor tibi fami“liaris, à me non alienus certè; in quo exornando “quicquid collocatum à te erit temporis & laboris, “tibi honori, nobis emolumento erit. Vale, erudi-“tissime, & quod mihi longe pluris est, optime Vir.
“Luter. Paris. XV Kal. Febr. MDCXCIII.” T.

HUGUES (JAMES) a Divine and Canon, born at Lisle in Flanders, printed at Rome in 1655, a work of a very singular kind, considering the wild chimæras it abounds with [A]. He dedicated it to Pope Alexander VII, and interspersed his epistle dedicatory with many ridiculous applications.

☞ HUMPHREY

[A] He . . . printed . . . a work of a very singular kind, considering the wild chimæras it abounds with.] Here follows the title of it: Vera Historia Romana, seu Origo Latii vel Italiæ ac Romanæ Urbis: è tenebris longæ vetustatis in lucem producta. Liber primus qui primordia Europæ ac Latii primævi Annales demonstrat atque Urbis conditæ. Romæ, typis Francisci Monææ, M. DCLV. i. e. “A true Roman History, or the “Origin of Latium or Italy, and of the city of Rome, “brought to Light out of the Darknes of distant “Antiquity. Book I, containing a relation of the “beginnings or first peopling of Europe, the annals
“of old Latium, and of the building the city of Rome.”

It contains 284 pages in 4to (1). The following pas- (1) König ob-sage from the Memoirs of Trevoux, may serve as a serves that this specimen of this whimsical book. According to James work was printed Hugues, “there never were such men as Janus, Æneas, at Rome in the “or Romulus. Whatever has been related of them, is I don’t know “taken from the predictions of I know not what Sy- that edition.
“bil, who, in her Prophecies relating to St. Peter, (2) Father “had given to this Saint, the name of those heroes; Tournemine, in “and who, agreeable to the style and genius of Pro- a Memoir inserted “phetic writings, had employed the past tense instead in the Journal “of the future. This author’s book of the origin of de Trevoux, for “Rome, is full of chimæra’s no less extraordinary Feb. 1704, pag.
“than that just now related (2).” 335, 336. Tre-voux edit.

HUGHES (JOHN), an ingenious and polite writer in the eighteenth Century, was son of a worthy Citizen of London by Anne the daughter of Isaac Burges Esq; a Gentleman of an antient family and good estate in Wiltshire, and was born at Marlborough in the said county on the 29th of January 1677, but educated in London, and received the rudiments of learning at private schools. In the earliest years of his youth he applied himself with ardour to the pursuit of the sister-arts, Poetry, Drawing, and Music; in each of which, by turns, he made a considerable progress; but, for the most part, followed these and other studies of humanity, only as agreeable amusements, under frequent confinement from indisposition, and a continual valetudinary state of health. He had for some time an employment in the office of Ordnance, and was Secretary to two or three Commissions under the Great Seal for purchasing lands for the better securing the Docks and Harbours at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Harwich. In the year 1717 the Lord Chancellor Cowper, to whom Mr. Hughes was then but lately known, was pleased of his own accord, and without any previous sollicitation to make him Secretary for the Commissions of the Peace, and to distinguish him with singular marks of his esteem [A]; and upon his Lordship's resigning the Great Seal, he was, at his particular recommendation, and with the ready concurrence of his successor, continued in the same employment under the Earl of Macclesfield. He held the said place to the time of his death, which happened on the 17th of February 1719, the very night, in which his Tragedy, intitled, The Siege of Damascus, was first acted at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane. He was then forty two years of age. His body was privately interred in the vault under the chancel of St. Andrew's Church in Holbourn. His writings have gained him an established reputation [B]. He was happy in the acquaintance and friendship of several

[A] Distinguish him with singular marks of his esteem.] Mr. Hughes, as a testimony of gratitude to his noble patron and friend, gave his Lordship a few weeks before he died, his picture drawn by Sir Godfrey Kneller, which he himself had received as a present from that admirable painter. The value his Lordship set upon it will best appear from the letter, which he wrote to Mr. Hughes upon this occasion.

“ 24 January, 1719-20.

“ Sir,
“ I thank you for the most acceptable present of your picture, and assure you, that none of this age can set a higher value upon it than I do, and shall, while I live; though I am sensible posterity will outdo me in that particular. I am, with the greatest esteem and sincerity,

“ Sir,
“ Your most affectionate and “ obliged humble Servant,
“ COWPER.”

[B] His writings have gained him an established reputation.] We shall first give an account of his Poems and Dramatic works, and then proceed to his translations and writings in prose. The Triumph of Peace was his first Poem of any length, that appeared in public. It was written on occasion of the Peace of Rastatt, and printed in the year 1697. The Court of Neptune was written upon King William's return from Holland, two years after the Peace, in 1699. The House of Nassau, a Pindaric Ode, printed in 1702, was occasioned by the death of King William. The Translation of the Third Ode of the Third Book of Horace, and the Paraphrase of the Twenty second Ode of the First Book, were both written when he was very young; and the latter of them was his first Poetical Essay that appeared in print. The Paraphrase of the sixteenth Ode of the second Book of the same author, printed in the sixth volume of Dryden's Miscellanies, was written in 1702. The six Cantata's, set by Dr. Pepusch, were designed as an Essay, (which was the first in the kind) for compositions in English after the manner of the Italians. They were written before the introducing Italian Operas on the English stage, though not published till afterwards. The success, which they met with, encouraged our author to write occasionally several others in the same manner. As his Odes for Music, Cantata's, and Songs, are allowed by the testimony of the best Judges to be extremely well adapted to that art, they have likewise had the advantage to be set by the best masters. The Tenth Book of Lucan was translated by Mr. Hughes long before Mr. Row undertook that author. The occasion of it was this. Mr. Tonson Senior solicited a translation of Lucan by several hands. Mr. Hughes performed his part; but others failing in their promises, the design was dropped; and Mr. Rowe was afterwards prevailed upon to undertake the whole, which he performed with great success. In 1709 Mr. Hughes obliged the public with an elegant Translation of Moliere's Misanthrope. This has been since reprinted with the other Plays of that admirable author translated by Mr. Ozell; but no notice is taken by what hand it was omitted. In 1711 Sir Richard Steele and Mr. Clayton had concerts of music in York-Buildings; on which occasion they sent Mr. Hughes the following letter:

“ Dear Sir,
“ Mr. Clayton and I desire you, as soon as you can conveniently, to alter this Poem (1) for Music, pre-^{(1) Alexander's Feast: or the Power of Music: An Ode for St. Cecilia's Day.} serving as many of Dryden's words and verses as you can: It is to be performed by a voice well skilled in recitative; but you understand all these matters much better than

“ Your affectionate humble Servant,
R. STEELE.”

According to their request, he made several alterations in it; but it appears from a letter from Mr. Hughes to Sir Richard Steele, that Mr. Clayton's composition did not satisfy the Connoisseurs in music. The Opera of Calypso and Telemachus was performed at the King's Theatre in the Hay-Market in the year 1712. We shall take notice of one circumstance concerning this Opera, as it relates to the history of music in England, and discovers the great partiality shewn at that time to Operas performed in Italian. After many such had been encouraged by large subscriptions, this originally written and set in English after the Italian manner (though not at first) was performed with the usual expence of scenes and decorations; and being much crowded and applauded at the rehearsals, a subscription was obtained for it as usual. This alarmed the whole Italian band, who had interest enough (the late Duke of Shrewsbury being then Lord Chamberlain) to procure an order the day before the performing this Opera, to take off the subscription for it, and to open the House at the lowest prices or not at all. This was designed to sink it; but failed of its end. It was however performed, though under so great discouragement, and was revived some years ago at the Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. Mr. Addison in the Spectator (2) (2) Vol. 6. num. speaking of the just applause given this Opera by Signior Nicolini, (who, he says, was the greatest performer in Dramatic music, that perhaps ever appeared upon a stage) has these words: “The town is highly obliged to that excellent artift for having shewn us the Ita“ lian

of the greatest men and finest genius's of the age, particularly Earl Cowper, Dr. Benjamin Hoadley, now Bishop of Winchester, the late Lord Chief Baron Gilbert, Sir Godfrey Kneller, Mr. Congreve, Mr. Addison, Sir Richard Steele, Mr. Southerne, Mr. Rowe, &c. (a). Sir Richard Steele, immediately after the death of Mr. Hughes,

(a) Mr. Duncombe's Account of the Life and Writings of John Hughes Esq; prefixed to the first volume of his Poems on several Occasions; with some select Essays in Prose. London 1735, in 12mo.

drew his character in a very just and pathetic manner in a paper published by him, and intitled, The Theatre (b); wherein he says, that our author, "could hardly ever be said to have enjoyed health; but was in the best of his days a Valetudinarian. If those who are sparing of giving praise to any virtue, without extenuation of it, should say, that his youth was chastised into the severity, and preserved in the innocence, for which he was conspicuous, from the infirmity of his constitution; they will be under a new difficulty, when they hear that he had none of those faults, to which an ill state of health ordinarily subjects the rest of mankind. His incapacity for mere frolic

(b) Num. 15, from Tuesday Feb. 16. to Saturday Feb. 20, 1719-20.

"diversions

lian music in its perfection, as well as for that generous approbation he lately gave to an Opera of our own country, in which the composer endeavoured to do justice to the beauty of the words by following that noble example, which has been set him by the greatest foreign masters in that art." The Ode to the Creator of the World, occasioned by the Fragments of Orpheus, was printed in 1713, at the particular instance of Mr. Addison, and is mentioned with applause in the Spectator. This and The Ecstasy, published since the death of the author, are esteemed two of the noblest Odes in our Language. In the latter there is a fine compliment to Sir Isaac Newton. The Tragedy of Cato was first acted in the same year, 1713. We take notice of this particular, because we are informed by a late writer (3), that its being then brought upon the stage was in a great measure owing to Mr. Hughes. We shall give the writer's own words. "It has been often said by very good judges, that Cato was no proper subject for a Dramatic Poem. That the character of a Stoic Philosopher is inconsistent with the hurry and tumult of action and passion, which are the soul of Tragedy. That the ingenious author miscarried in the plan of his work, but supported it by the dignity, the purity, the beauty, and justness of the sentiments. This was so much the opinion of Mr.

(3) Mr. Oldmixon in his Essay on Criticism, printed in 1728 in 8vo, pag. 6.

(4) Arthur Maynwaring, Esq; Author of the Madley, &c.

Maynwaring (4), who was generally allowed to be the best critic of our time, that he was against bringing the Play upon the stage, and it lay by unfinished many years. That it was play'd at last, was owing to Mr. Hughes. He had read the four acts which were finished, and rightly thought it would be of service to the public to have it represented at the latter end of Queen Anne's reign, when the old English spirit of liberty was as likely to be lost, as it had ever been since the conquest. He endeavoured to bring Mr. Addison into his opinion, which he did so far as to procure his consent, that it should be acted, if Mr. Hughes would write the last act; and he offered him the scenery for his assistance, excusing his not finishing it himself on account of some other avocations. He prest Mr. Hughes to do it so earnestly, that he was prevailed on, and set about it. But a week after seeing Mr. Addison again, with an intention to communicate to him what he had thought of it, he was agreeably surprized at his producing some papers, where near half of the act was written by the author himself, who took fire at the hint, that it would be serviceable; and upon a second reflection went through with the fifth act; not that he was diffident of Mr. Hughes's ability, but knowing that no man could have so perfect a notion of his design as himself, who had been so long and so carefully thinking of it. I was told this by Mr. Hughes; and I tell it to shew, that it was not for the love-scenes that Mr. Addison consented to have his Tragedy acted, but to support the old Roman and English public spirit, which was then so near being suppressed by faction and bigotry." The Siege of Damascus was acted at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane in the year 1719 with great applause. Mr. Hughes drew up the dedication of it to Earl Cowper but ten days before he died. It is indeed surprizing, that he should be able to form a piece so finely turned, and with so much spirit at such an hour, when he had death in view, and was too weak to transcribe it himself. It is generally allowed, that the characters in this Play are finely varied and distinguished; that the sentiments are just, and well adapted to the characters; that it abounds with beautiful descriptions, apt allusions to the manners and opinions of the times, where the scene is laid, and with noble morals; that the diction is pure, unaffected, and sublime, without any meteors of style, or ambitious ornaments; and that the plot is conducted in a simple and clear manner.

Mr. Duncombe (5) observes, that the only objection which he had ever heard, related to the plan of it. "There does not appear (say some, who are esteemed persons of very good taste and judgment) a sufficient ground and foundation for the distress in the fourth and fifth acts. For what is Phocyas's crime? The city of Damascus is besieged, and fiercely attacked by the Saracens. There is little or no prospect of relief. It must therefore probably fall into their hands in a short time, be sacked and plundered, and the garrison and citizens enslaved. At this dangerous juncture Phocyas assists the enemy to take it in a few days sooner. But upon what terms? That all who lay down their arms, shall be spared, and liberty granted to every citizen, that shall choose it, to leave the city, and carry off with him a mule's burden of his goods; the Chiefs to have six mules, and the Governor ten; with arms for their defence against the Mountain-Robbers, (Act IV. Scene I.) in so much that Daran says, (Act V. Scene I.) The land wears not the face of war, but trade; and looks as if its merchants were sending forth their loaded caravans to all the neighbouring countries. What is there in all this, that a virtuous man might not have done for the good of his country? If Phocyas is guilty, his guilt must consist in this only, that he performed the same action from a sense of his own wrongs, and to preserve the idol of his soul from violation or death, which he might have performed laudably upon better principles. But this (say they) seems not a sufficient ground for those strong and stinging reproaches he casts upon himself, nor for Eudocia's rejecting him with so much severity. It would have been more rational (considering the frailty of human nature, and the violent temptations he lay under) if he had been, at last, prevailed upon to profess himself a Mahometan; for then his remorse and self-condemnation would have been natural, his punishment just, and the character of Eudocia placed in a most amiable light."

(5) Account of the Life and Writings of John Hughes Esq; prefixed to the first volume of his Poems on several Occasions, pag. 26. edit. London 1735, in 12mo.

Mr. Duncombe (6) owns himself at a loss for an answer to this objection; and therefore thinks himself obliged to acquaint the reader, in order to do justice to the author's judgment, that he had formed the play according to the plan here recommended. But when it was offered to the managers of Drury-Lane Play-House in the year 1718, they refused to act it, unless he would alter the character of Phocyas, pretending that he could not be an hero, if he changed his religion, and that the audience would not bear the sight of him after it, in how lively a manner soever his remorse and repentance might be described. "But surely, says Mr. Duncombe, when in the agony of his soul, and distracted with passion, he is at last prevailed upon, though with the utmost reluctance and horror, to kiss the Alcoran, he rather appears an object of pity than of detestation. How tenderly and reasonably passionate is the scene here referred to, as it stands in the original draught of the play, and what scope does it give a masterly actor to display his skill!" However the author, who was then in a very languishing condition, finding, that if he did not comply, his relations would probably lose the benefit of the Play, he consented, though with reluctance, to new model the character of Phocyas. He wrote, when he was but nineteen years old, a Tragedy, intituled,

“diversions never made him peevish or sour to those, whom he saw in them; but his humanity was such, that he could partake and share those pleasures he beheld others enjoy, without repining that he himself could not join in them. No, he made a true use of an ill constitution, and formed his mind to the living under it, with as much satisfaction as it could admit of. His intervals of ease were employed in drawing, designing, or else in Music or Poetry; for he had not only a taste, but an ability of performance to a great excellence in those arts, which entertain the mind within the rules of the severest morality and the strictest dictates of religion.” His brother, Mr. JABEZ HUGHES, who had a place in the Stamp-Office, and died at London January 17, 1735, aged forty six, was a man of a very good genius and considerable learning, and published a Translation of Claudian's Rape of Proserpine, the second edition of which was printed at London 1723 in 12mo under the following title: The Rape of Proserpine from Claudian. In three Books. With the Episode of Sixtus and Erictho from Lucan's Pharsalia, Book VI. Translated by Mr. Jabez Hughes. The second edition, corrected and enlarged with notes. A collection of original Poems and Translations, with some occasional letters on important subjects, was prepared for the press by this Gentleman a little before his death, and is expected to be soon published.

intituled, AMALASONT, Queen of the Goths, which displays a fertile genius, and a makerly invention; but as it was never designed by him for the press, nor revised and corrected in his riper age, the diction in general was too much neglected. Mr. Duncombe tells us (7), that he has “attempted to correct the style, and altered some incidents, which were thought not likely to succeed. This may be presented to the view of the public, when it can be brought on the stage without having too much injustice done it in the performance.” The same Gentleman collected our author's Poems, and published them at London, in 1735, in two volumes in 12mo, under the following title: Poems on several Occasions. With some select Essays in Prose. In two Volumes. By John Hughes, Esq; Adorned with Sculptures. We shall now take a view of Mr. Hughes's Translations and Writings in Prose. The Advices from Parnassus, and the Political Touchstone of Trajano Boccalini, translated by several hands, were printed in Folio in 1706. This translation was revised and corrected, and the preface to it was written by Mr. Hughes. His translation of Monsieur de Fontenelle's Dialogues of the Dead, with two original Dialogues, were published in 1708. The greatest part of it had lain by him above six years. He afterwards translated Monsieur de Fontenelle's Discourse concerning the Antients and Moderns, which is printed with his Conversations with a Lady on the Plurality of Worlds, translated by Mr. Glanville. The History of the Revolutions in Portugal, written by the Abbé de Vertot, and translated by Mr. Hughes, was printed for S. Buckley in 1712, without the name of the translator. The translation of the Letters of Abelard and Heloise was so well received by the public, that there have been five editions of it in the compass of a few years; though it has been but lately known by what hand it was performed. He wrote the Preface to the Compleat History of England, printed at London in 1706 in 3 vol. in Folio, and reprinted in 1719 (8). In the Tatler he wrote, vol. II. No. 64, A Letter, signed Josiah Couplet. No. 73. A Letter against Gamesters, signed William Trussy. Mr. Tickell alludes to this Letter in a copy of verses addressed to the Spectator, Vol. VII. No. 532.

*From felon Gamesters the raw Squire is free,
And Britain owes her rescu'd Oaks to thee.*

No. 113, The Inventory of a Beau. In the Spectator he wrote, Vol. I. No. 33, A Letter on the Art of improving Beauty. No. 53, A second Letter on the same subject. No. 66, Two Letters concerning fine Breeding. Vol. II. No. 91, The History of Honorio, or the Rival Mother. No. 104, A Letter on Riding-Habits for Ladies. No. 141, Remarks on a Comedy intitled, The Lancashire Witches. Vol. III. No. 210, On the Immortality of the Soul. No. 220, A Letter concerning Expedients for Wit. No. 230, All, except the last Letter. No. 231, A Letter on the Awe of appearing before public Assemblies. No. 237, On Divine Providence. Vol. IV. No. 252, A Letter on the Eloquence of Tears and Fainting-Fits. No. 302, The Character of Emilia. No. 311, A Letter from the Father of a great Fortune. Vol. V. No. 375, A Picture of Virtue in Distress. Vol. VII. No. 525, On Conjugal Love. No. 537, On the Dignity of Human Nature. No. 541, Rules for Pronunciation and Action, chiefly collected from Cicero. No. 554, On the Improvement of the Genius, illustrated in the Characters of Lord Bacon, Mr. Boyle, Sir Isaac Newton, and Leonardo da Vinci. Mr. Duncombe (9) observes, that he has not been able to learn what papers in the Guardian were written by Mr. Hughes besides No. 37. Vol. I, which contains Remarks on the Tragedy of Otello. Our author is supposed to have written the whole, or at least a considerable part of the Lay-Monastery; consisting of Essays, Discourses, &c. published singly under the title of the Lay-Monk. Being the Sequel of the Spectators: the second edition of which was printed at London 1714 in 12mo. It contains forty papers, the first of which is dated Monday November 16, 1713, and the last February 15, 1714. Mr. Hughes published, in the year 1715, a very accurate edition of the works of Mr. Edmund Spenser, in six Volumes in 12mo. To this edition are prefixed the Life of Mr. Spenser; an Essay on Allegorical Poetry; Remarks on the Fairy-Queen, on the Shepherd's Calendar, and the other writings of Spenser; and a Glossary explaining the old and obscure words; all written by Mr. Hughes. Charon, or The Ferry-Boat, A Vision, first appeared in the year 1718. This, and Mr. Walth's Æsculapius, or Hospital of Fools (10), are perhaps the two finest Dialogues in our Language, as well as the most lively imitations of Lucian.

(7) See The Life of Dr. White Kennet Bishop of Peterborough, pag. 33. edit. London 1730 in fol.

(8) See The Life of Dr. White Kennet Bishop of Peterborough, pag. 33. edit. London 1730 in fol.

(9) See The Life of Dr. White Kennet Bishop of Peterborough, pag. 33. edit. London 1730 in fol.

(10) See The Life of Dr. White Kennet Bishop of Peterborough, pag. 33. edit. London 1730 in fol.

(9) Ubi supra, pag. 36.

(10) This Dialogue is printed for J. Pemberton at the end of a Miscellany of Poems and Translations in 1714.

HUMPHREY (LAURENCE), a learned English writer in the sixteenth Century, was born at Newport Pagnell in Buckinghamshire, about the year 1527 [A], and educated in the Greek and Latin Languages at Cambridge, and in 1547 became Demy of Magdalen College in Oxford (a). In 1549 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b), and was chosen perpetual Fellow of his College (c). In 1552 he took the degree of Master of Arts (d). About that time he was made Greek Reader of his College, and entered into holy Orders. In June 1555 he had leave to travel abroad [B], and went to Zurich,

(a) See Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 208, 209.

(b) See Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 208, 209.

(c) See Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 208, 209.

“also for the excellency of his learning and wit, that he might freely for the cause of study travel into parts beyond sea for one year, conditionally that he contain himself from those places, that are suspected to be heretical or favourers of heresy; and that also he refrain from the company of those, who are or were authors of heresy or heretical opinions, &c.

Zurich, and associated himself with the English exiles there, who had fled their country on the account of Religion. After the death of Queen Mary he returned to England, and was restored to his Fellowship in Magdalen College, from which he had been expelled, because he did not return after his time of leave was expired (e). In 1560 he was appointed the Queen's Professor of Divinity at Oxford (f); and December the 11th 1561 elected President of his College (g). June the 10th 1562 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, and July the 10th the same year that of Doctor (b). In 1570 he was made Dean of Gloucester upon the promotion of Dr. Thomas Cooper to the See of Lincoln; and in 1580 removed to the Deanery of Winchester in the place of Dr. John Watson, which was the highest preferment, which he enjoyed, on account, as it was thought, of his not consenting altogether to the ceremonies of the Church of England (i) [C]. He published several works [D]; and was a man of extensive learning, and a profound Divine. He spent the greatest part of his time in a studious and retired manner, and died February the 1st 1588, aged sixty three years, and was interred at the upper end of the Inner-Chapel of Magdalen College, where a monument was erected to his memory [E]. He married in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign Joan, the daughter of Andrew Infordby of Ipswich in Suffolk, by whom he had seven sons and five daughters. She died August the 27th 1611, aged seventy four years, and was interred in the Chancel of Steple-Barton Church in Oxfordshire; over whose grave her eldest daughter Justina, wife of Caspar Dormer of the said place Esq; erected a fair monument (k).

(e) Idem, Atb.
Oxon. col. 241.

(f) Idem, Hist.
& Antiquitat.
Univerf. Oxon.
lib. 2. pag. 37.

(g) Idem, ibid.
pag. 191.

(b) Idem, Fafsi
Oxon. vol. 1. col.
91.

(i) Idem, Atb.
Oxon. col. 242.

(k) Idem, col.
243.

[C] Not consenting altogether to the ceremonies of the Church of England. Mr. Wood tells us (3), that our author "from the city of Zurich and the correspondence, that he had at Geneva, brought back at his return to England so much of the Calvinian both in doctrine and discipline, that the best that could be said of him was, that he was a moderate and conscientious Nonconformist." However Gabriel Harvey L. L. D. who was his contemporary, and knew him, observes (4), that he and Dr. William Fulke of Cambridge, whom he styles Standard-bearers for a long time of the Nonconformists, did grow conformable in the end, as they grew ripper in experience and sager in judgment.

(3) Athen. Oxon.
vol. 1. col. 242.

(4) Pierce's Sup- pererogation: or a new Praise of the old Ass. A preparative to certain larger Discourses, intitled,
Nashe's Fame,
pag. 92. edit.
London 1593 in
4to.

[D] He published several works. They are as follow. I. Epistola de Græcis Literis, & Homeris Lectione & imitatione, ad Præsidentem & Socios Coll. B. Mar. Magd. Oxon. prefixed to a book of Hadrian Junius, intitled Copia-Cornu, printed at Basil 1558 in folio. II. De Religionis conservatione & reformatione, deq; primatu Regum. Basil 1559 in 8vo. III. De ratione interpretandi Auctores. Basil 1559 8vo. IV. Obadias Propheta, Hebraicè & Latinè, & Philo de Judice Græcè & Latinè: printed at the end of the preceding tract. V. Optimates, sive de Nobilitate, ejusque antiqua Origine, Naturâ, Officiis, Disciplinâ, &c. Libri tres, Basil 1560 in 8vo. This was translated into English by an anonymous person, and printed at London 1563 in 8vo. VI. Philo Judæus de Nobilitate, interprete Laurentio Humfredo: subjoined to the preceding tract. VII. Oratio Woodstockiæ habita ad illust. Reginam Elizabetham 31 Augusti 1572. London 1572 in 4to. VIII. Jobannis Juelli, Angli, Episcopi Sarisburiensis, Vita & Mors, ejusque veræ doctrinæ Defensio, &c. London 1573 in 4to. IX. Oratio in Aulâ Woodstockianâ habita ad illust. Reginam Elizabetham anno 1575. in 4to. X. De Fermento vitando: Concio in Matt. 16. Marc. 8. Luc. 12. Jesus dixit illis, Videte & cavete a fermento

Phariseorum. London 1582 in 8vo. Rupell. 1585 in 8vo. XI. Jesuitismi pars prima; sive praxis Romanæ Curie contra Republicas & Principes. London 1582 in 8vo. XII. Jesuitismi Pars secunda: Puritano-Papismi seu Doctrinæ Jesuiticæ aliquot rationibus ab Edm. Campiano comprehensæ, & a Joanne Duræo defensæ, Confutatio. London 1584 in 8vo. XIII. Apologetica epistola ad Academiæ Oxoniensis Cancellarium. Rupell. 1585 in 8vo. XIV. Seven Sermons against Treason, on 1 Sam. c. xxvi. 8, 9, 10, 11, &c. London 1588 in 8vo. XV. Concio in die Cincrum, in 8vo. XVI. He also revised and corrected Joannis Shepreth summa & Synopsis Novi Testamenti distichis ducentis sexaginta comprehensa, first printed at Strasburg about the year 1556 in 8vo, and published it at Oxford 1586 in 8vo. XVII. He likewise wrote, in conjunction with Robert Crowley, a book against that of Miles Hoggard, published under the reign of Queen Mary against the Protestants.

[E] Where a monument was erected to his memory. The epitaph on it is as follows.

M. S.

Laurentio Humfredo S. S. Theologiæ in hac Academiâ Doctori & Professori Regio per annos 28. P. M. bujus Collegii Præsidi, Justina Dormeria filia natu maxima, Patri suo venerabili æviterni obsequii ergo, H. M. mærens posuit. Obiit Kal. Februarii anno salutis 1589 ætatis suæ.

*Tumulum recentem, sive, (moræ precium est) lege
Novè ad sepultum heic quenquam cave creduas.
Humfredus Alpha Theologus subitus situ'st,
Studio, labore, lectione, acumine,
Varro alter, Helluo literarum maximus.
Pietatis orbis Christianus testis est,
Venta boic Decano, Magdalenâ Præsidi Perhospitali debuit. Sat, Hospes, i.*

T.

HUNGARY (MARY Queen of), the sister of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, was married in the year 1521 to Lewis King of Hungary, who was unfortunately killed in the battle of Mohacks in the year 1526. His widow was made Governess of the Low-Countries in the year 1531, and acquitted herself of that employment with great courage and prudence [A]. She continued in that employment till Charles the Fifth's abdication, when she accompanied him into Spain, where she died October the 18th 1558. She was very

[A] She acquitted herself of that employment with great courage and prudence. Read Brantome; he tells you, that "this Queen of Hungary was a great help to the Emperor, and that she served him so well, that one cannot tell what would have become of him, had it not been for her. And indeed he left all the affairs of his government entirely to her care, so that even when the Emperor himself was in Flanders, he suffered her to manage all the public business of the Low-Countries; the Council was held at her Palace, and she presided in it. It is true that she,

"who was very prudent and wise, depended on his advise, and gave him an account of all that passed in the Council, when he was absent, in which he took a great delight. She carried on great and successful wars, sometimes by her Generals, and sometimes in Person, being always on horseback, like a brave Amazon (1)." What Brantome says (2) of the Oration she delivered the day of the Emperor's abdication, is very curious. We have here an instance which proves that the women are capable of governing.

(1) Brantome,
Dames Galantes,
tom. 2. pag. 91.

(2) Ibid. pag. 95.

very fond of pomp and splendor [B], and took a great delight in hunting [C]. It is reported that she endeavoured to have the punishment of the Reformed mitigated [D]. She understood Latin (a). There arose a personal hatred between her and Henry the second King of France, which occasioned a great devastation; for they did by turns set each other's country-seats on fire. Mary was the first that began to practise that kind of hostility, in order to be revenged of the French for some songs they had made against her reputation [E]. Henry found means to be even with her [F]. He

(a) See the remark [H].

(3) Memoirs, tom. 2. in the Elogy of Henry II, pag. 23.

(4) Memoirs des Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 92.

(5) Hilarion de Coste, Elog. des Dames Illustres, tom. 2. pag. 561.

(†) 1482.

(†) 1496.

(6) That is to say, Margaret, Charles V's natural daughter.

(7) Strada, de Belg. Belgic. lib. 2. pag. 45.

[B] She was very fond of pomp and splendor. Brantome asserts (3) that when Philip II went to take possession of the Low-Countries, he was received in the most stately manner imaginable; "but especially, adds he, the Queen of Hungary made him the most splendid reception in her Palaces of Bains and Marimont, going far beyond what was done by any other person." He gives us afterwards an account "of the representation of a siege, with which this Queen entertained the Emperor and all his Court, at his beautiful Palace of Marimont." He observes in another book (4), "that she entertained the Emperor Charles and his whole Court at her Palace called Bains, when his son King Philip passed from Spain into Flanders to visit her: the stateliness of which entertainment was so wonderful and great, that nothing was mentioned at that time but las fiestas, the entertainments of Bains; thus the Spaniards used to speak. And indeed I remember, that whatever great entertainment was given during the journey to Bayonne, as running at the ring, tournaments, masquerades, and other expensive entertainments, nothing came up to las fiestas of Bains, according to some old Spanish Gentlemen, who had seen those entertainments."

[C] . . . and took a very great delight in hunting.] She followed her husband every where, and even when he went a hunting, "which exercise she loved entirely; so that when she was Governess of the Low-Countries for her brother the Emperor Charles V, she used often to leave her agreeable palaces of Mechlin and Brussels, to go and live in the country at Marimont, and in her other palaces situated near the forests, where from morning till night she took the diversion of hunting: whence the Flemish used to call her the Huntress, and used to draw her like Diana. She raised the same inclination in her niece, Margaret of Austria, Duchess of Parma, who has also been Governess of the Low-Countries. She had inherited a fondness for this laborious exercise of hunting from her grand-mother by her father's side, namely, Mary Duchess of Burgundy, consort to the Emperor Maximilian I. This Princess being a hunting (which diversion she used to take almost every day) fell from her horse and died, to the great grief of the Flemish, and the Emperor her Consort, who lost also his second wife Blanch Sforza by the same accident (5)." This seems to be a translation of the following words from Famianus Strada. Capitulum venandi studio summopere Gubernatrix, plane ut Venatricem vulgo appellarent, habituque venatricis expingerent: neptem videlicet Mariæ Burgundiæ, quæ ab insectandis feris nunquam destitit, donec inter venandum equo excussa vitam amisit (†), fato non tam suo, quam Maximiliani mariti, cujus uxor altera, Blanca Sfortia, in venatione equo decidit, obiitque (†). Ejusmodi autem studium arripuit tam avidè, in eumque laborem duravit adeo membra decennis nondum puella (6), ut amatam per saltus camposque sequeretur impavida (7). The sense of the end of this passage is, that "the Princess Margaret became so fond of hunting, and hardened her body so in that exercise, that being not yet ten years old, she could follow her aunt through fields and woods, without fearing the least danger."

[D] It is reported, that she endeavoured to have the punishment of the Reformed mitigated. When the Court of Spain, in order to satisfy the discontented in the Low-Countries, promised them in the year 1566, that the exercise of the Inquisition should be suppressed, it was added, that the imperial laws, which condemned Hereticks to death, should be mitigated, as they had been in the year 1550 at the Queen of Hungary's request. Immo sic Casarem salutarum fuisse si viveret, quando ipse ob similes difficultates anno millesimo quingentesimo quinquagesimoque, postulante Mariâ Hungariæ Regind ejus sorore, easdem pœnas quas ante statuerat, emendare ac lenire non inutile aut indecorum arbitratus est (8). i. e. "Nay, the Emperor would have done the same had he been alive, since the like troubles happening in the year 1550, he himself did not think it useless or disgraceful to amend and mitigate, at his sister the Queen of Hungary's request, the laws he had made before concerning the punishments of the Hereticks."

[E] She set Henry II's Country-Seats on fire . . . in order to be revenged on the French for some songs they had made against her reputation. Here follows what Brantome relates upon this subject (9). "I have heard it reported, that the chief reason for which the Queen of Hungary kindled her noble fire about Picardy, and in other parts of France, was the impudence of some bold slanderers, who used to talk of her amours, and to sing aloud every where a song intitled Au Barbançon de la Reine d'Hongrie, (to the Queen of Hungary's Barbançon). This was however a rustic song, which plainly appeared to be made by some silly country fellow." It appears from thence that the people are doomed to be punished not only for their Sovereign's faults (10), but even for those of a great many other persons. I shall now quote a passage in which some particulars seem to be omitted. "There was a very great hatred between Henry II, and the Queen of Hungary, the occasion of which I am not acquainted with: I know only that the French soldiers had made some songs upon her and Barbançon, the most handsome Lord at her court (11)."

It was an easy matter to supply what is wanting in this account; it was but observing, that this Queen caused several places in Picardy to be burnt without sparing even the Royal Palace of Folembray. Thus one sees what this personal hatred was grounded upon on both sides. Mary imagined, no doubt, that Henry approved of those songs, and hated him for it heartily; Henry on the other hand took the burning of his own Country-Seat for a personal affront. I do not know what we ought to think of this Princess's amours; I only remember that Brantome asserts (12), "she was very beautiful and agreeable, and very lovely, though she shewed herself somewhat manly: but she was never the worse for it in love affairs, nor in war, which she chose for her exercise."

If you have a mind to know when she committed those excesses in Picardy, read the following passage. "Whilst the Emperor her brother was besieging Mentz, she came into Picardy with the Count de Rœux, to prevent the King from going to the assistance of the besieged, laid all waste before her, set fire to every thing, burnt Noyon, Nefle, Chauny, Roye, Folembray, a Royal Palace built by King Francis I, destroyed seven or eight hundred villages, and besieged Hedin, which she took (13)."

[F] . . . Henry found means to be even with her.] After he had taken Marenburg and Dinant, and laid Bouvines even with the ground, the inhabitants of which had been, some hanged, and the rest put to the sword, he crossed the Sambre, and laid the whole country of Hainault waste. "He burnt Mariemont, a Country-Seat built by the Queen of Hungary, and the pretty city of Bains (14), with the stately Palace which she had built there, and adorned with an immense number of pictures, antient statues, and other ingraven and carved works. The old city of Bavets, concerning the antiquity and greatness of which the old chronicles relate a thousand stories, underwent the same desolation. The burnings and devastations were very much against Henry II's temper, but he thought he was in honour

(8) From Strada, Decad. 1. lib. 5. pag. 217.

(9) Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 388.

(10) Quicquid delirant Reges plebsuntur Achivi. Horat. Epist. 2. lib. 1. ver. 14.

(11) Mezeray, Hist. de France, tom. 2. pag. 1090.

(12) Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 90.

(13) Hilarion de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 7. pag. 567.

He puts in the margin. "Hence came this common saying; She acted the mad woman in Bray, she has been Mary at Bourg, when the French burnt that city."

But it is not an easy matter to guess at the meaning of this marginal note; one cannot make any sense of it; it should be perhaps Marric (Jorry) instead of Marié (Mary).

(14) It should be Binche.

He wished most passionately to take her prisoner [G]. Erasmus dedicated a book to this Princess, in which the Printers committed maliciously a very strange blunder [H]. Father Hilarion de Coste has been guilty of some little chronological errors [I], and Moreri has not followed his account accurately in every respect.

(15) Mezeray, Hist. de France, tom. 2. pag. 1090, under the year 1554. See also Lewis Guicciardini Descript. du Pais Bas, pag. m. 468.

(16) Brantome, Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 92.

(17) Ibid. pag. 93.

(18) Ibid. pag. 94.

(19) Brantome seems to be guilty here of an anachronism; for this Queen had laid Picardy waste before her beautiful palace of Biche was burnt. And besides we do not find that any truce was concluded during Mary's administration after the year 1554. And she was no more Governess when the truce was concluded Feb. 5, 1556.

(20) Farnian. Strada, Dec. 1. lib. 9. pag. 577. ad ann. 1578.

(21) Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 306.

"nour obliged thus to revenge himself for the burning of his palace of Folembay, and because in that same place the Flemish had exposed during two days a picture of his father the great King Francis, to the insults of the soldiers (15)." Let us add to this authority of Mezeray a passage from Brantome, which contains more particulars. "She was the first that kindled those great fires in France, and she burnt beautiful houses and castles, particularly Folembay, a fine and pleasant Palace, which our Kings had built for the pleasure and diversion of hunting; at which the King was so much vexed and exasperated, that he was soon even with her, and to revenge himself he burnt her beautiful Palace of Bains, which was reckoned a wonder of the world, exceeding (if I may say so, and as I heard those say, who saw it in its perfection) the seven wonders of the world so famous amongst the antients (16)." There was in that Queen's room, a tapestry all wove with gold, silver, and silk, in which were represented very naturally Charles V's conquests, and all his expeditions (17). "In a word (18), there was nothing in that Palace but what was excellent and precious; but this poor Palace lost all its splendor some time after; for it was entirely plundered, destroyed, and pulled down. I have been told that when the Princess heard this, she was so much concerned, vexed, and exasperated, that she was a great while before she recovered herself, and as she once passed by the ruins of it, she looked upon it with sadness; and with tears in her eyes swore that France should repent it, and feel the consequences of those burnings, and that she would never be satisfied, till that beautiful Palace of Fontain-bleau, which men did so much admire, was levelled with the ground, so that not one stone should be left upon another. And indeed she did fully satisfy her passion upon that poor Province of Picardy (19), which felt her rage and her flames: and I think that if a truce had not been concluded, her vengeance would have been excessive. For she had an hard and proud heart, which was not easily mollified; and she was reckoned to be a little too cruel, both by her own party and by ours. But such is the natural temper of the women, and even of them that are distinguished by their rank, they are too ready to revenge themselves, when they are injured. It is said, that the Emperor loved her the better for it." Some Historians relate, that Henry II caused an inscription to be engraved on a stone, in which this Queen was stiled a mad-woman, and ordered to remember Folembay. Bincium Mariæ Hungariæ Reginæ olim deliciae, Henrici secundi Galliarum Regis odium expertæ. Feruntque reperit inibi saxum, quod Henricus villæ suæ à Maria vastatæ ultor inciderat in hæc verba: Infana Regina, Folembayum memoria sepete (20). i. e. "Binch, formerly Mary Queen of Hungary's delight, experienced the anger of Henry II, King of France. "It is reported that a stone was found there, on which Henry, in order to be revenged of Mary who had burnt his Palace, caused these words to be engraved, Diffracted Queen, remember Folembay."

[G] . . . he wished . . . to take her prisoner.] Brantome acquaints us with this particular (21). "I have been told, these are his own words, that the late King Henry II, wished nothing more earnestly, than to have it in his power, to take the Queen of Hungary prisoner, not with a design to use her ill, though she gave him sufficient reason for it, by setting all on fire, but that he might have the glory to keep that Queen prisoner, and see what would be her behaviour and contancy in prison, and whether she would be as haughty and proud as she was at the head of her armies: for there is nothing so stout and haughty as a great Lady, when she has a mind to it, and has such a courage as this had, who was extremely pleased with the name which the Spanish soldiers gave her, who as they used to call her brother the Emperor, el Padre de los Soldados (the Father of the Soldiers) so they called her la Madre (their Mother), as formerly in the days of the old Romans, Victoria or Victorina was called in her armies the Mother of the Camp (22)." (22) Brantome is in the right. Hic puerulus a Victoria Cæsar est appellatus, quum illa Mater Cæsarum ab exercitu nuncupata esset. i. e. "Victoria called this little boy Cæsar, as she herself was called the Mother of the Camp by the Army."

[H] Erasmus dedicated a book to her, in which the Printers committed maliciously a very strange blunder.] The book which Erasmus dedicated to her in the year 1529 is intitled, Vidua Christiana (the Christian Widow). The author observes of her, that she took a great delight in the reading of Latin books. Cæsaris germana Maria Latinos codices habebat in deliciis, cui nuper scripsi Viduam Christianam. Id efflagitavit à me quidam Ecclesiastes illi charissimus. Scena rerum humanarum invertitur, monachi literas nesciunt, & sœminæ libris indulgent (23). i. e. "Mary, the Emperor's filter, was extremely fond of Latin books; I have lately dedicated my Christian Widow to her; being desired to do it by a Minister who was very much in favour with her. The world is turned upside down: the Monks cannot read, and the women whence she retired soon after into Moravia (24), not thinking herself safe at Vienna, because of Soliman's invasion. But to mention now the malicious error of the Printers, I must observe that they were vexed because they had not received from the author the presents they expected. Whereupon the hardest drinker among them undertook to revenge them all, and found an infallible method to perform his design: a method which vexed Erasmus to such a degree, that he would have given three hundred golden crowns to have prevented it; but it is such an error of the press as cannot be translated into any language. We must therefore present our readers with the original only. Nuper cum inter imprimendum excusores aliquot conquesti fuissent me sibi xenia nondum persolvuisse, exortus est inter eos quidam cateris vinolentior, qui profiteretur se pœnas à me exacturum, ni darem: atque id profectò veterator tam egregiè effecit, ut aureis nummis trecentis redimere eam ignominiam voluissim. Cum enim in Vidua mea, quam Serenissimæ Hungariæ Reginæ dedicaveram, ad laudem cujusdam sanctissimæ sœminæ inter alia liberalitatem illius in pauperes referrem, hæc verba subjunxi; Atque mente illâ utum semper fuisse, quæ talem sœminam deceret. Unde scelestus ille animadvertens sibi vindictæ occasionem oblatam esse, ex mente illa mentula fecit. Itaque volumina mille fuere impressa (25).

[I] Father Hilarion de Coste has been guilty of some chronological errors.] I. He asserts (26), that our Mary Queen of Hungary was born at Brussels September the 13th 1513. This is false and impossible, since the Archduke her father died in the year 1506. They have put 1503 and not 1513 in Moreri's Dictionary. II. This Prince's nuptials were not celebrated at Buda in the year 1521, to the great satisfaction of Uladislaus (27) King of Hungary; for Uladislaus died in the year 1516. III. Queen Mary did not continue constantly at Linz in Austria (28) during the years 1527, 1528, 1529, and 1530. I have quoted (29) Erasmus, who asserts that he retired into Moravia in the year 1529.

IV. She was not Governess of the Low-Countries twenty eight years (30) but only twenty four (31), namely from the year 1531, to the year 1555. The author, whom I refute, contradicts himself, and owns in page 569, that this government did not last above twenty five years: but he commits in that very passage several blunders. V. He supposes that the Queen of Hungary resigned that government into her brother's hands in 1557. It was October the 25th, 1555. VI. He supposes that Margaret of Austria Governess of the Low-Countries died in the year 1532, whereas she died in the year 1530. He supposes in this Margaret's elogy (32) that she was born January the 10th 1480, and died Dec. 1, 1531, at the age of fifty one (33). Is this knowing how to reckon? VII. He asserts that the Queen of Hungary began to govern the Low-Countries in the year 1532, whereas it was the preceding year. VIII. He says that when she resigned that government to her brother; she made a long speech to the people. The assembly before which Charles V abdicated his Kingdoms ought not to be called thus.

(22) Brantome is in the right. Hic puerulus a Victoria Cæsar est appellatus, quum illa Mater Cæsarum ab exercitu nuncupata esset. i. e. "Victoria called this little boy Cæsar, as she herself was called the Mother of the Camp by the Army."

(23) Erasmus. Epist. 31. lib. 19. pag. 846. See also Epist. 20. lib. 26. pag. 1432.

(24) Idem, Epist. 21. lib. 26. pag. 1434.

(25) Idem, Epist. 68. lib. 30. pag. 1956. dated from Friburg Jan. 9, 1535. This Letter was published by Moreri with the Life of Erasmus, in the year 1697.

(26) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 2. pag. 559.

(27) Ibid. pag. 560.

(28) Ibid. pag. 565.

(29) In the remark [H] quotation (24).

(30) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 2. pag. 566.

(31) Brantome, Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 91.

(32) Pag. 313. of the 2d volume.

(33) Ibid. pag. 319.

spect [K]. I omit mentioning the scandalous report concerning Charles V's amours with this Queen of Hungary [L], who was, they say, Don Juan of Austria's mother.

[K] ... Moreri has not followed his account accurately in every respect. Hilarion de Coste had observed, that the Queen of Hungary died, as she was in her return to the Low-Countries, where she desired to end her days, because she was very much beloved and esteemed by the inhabitants of those countries (34). Moreri instead of keeping within the same bounds, asserts that she died, at the same time when she had just taken again upon her the government of the Low-Countries. He has been more exact in transcribing one of the blunders of that Minim: he asserts with him that this Queen governed the Low-Countries twenty five years till the year 1557, when she went into Spain. I have already observed, that she governed those Countries only from the year 1531, till October the 25th 1555; and I add, that she went into Spain in the year 1556. Moreri ought not to have said, that she was still very young when she married Lewis Jagellon, King of Hungary; for she was eighteen years old when her nuptials were celebrated; one would not give her that age, if one were to judge of it by Moreri's expressions; for it is well known that the daughters and sisters of Kings are sometimes married before they are ten years old.

[L] I omit mentioning the scandalous report concerning Charles V's amours with the Queen of Hungary. See above, the end of the remark [A] of the following of Don Juan of AUSTRIA, and add to it the following words of Gabriel Naudé, The same Emperor... bid all those misfortunes under the cloak of piety and religion, confining himself in a monastery, where he had also an opportunity to repent of the sin he had committed by begetting a bastard child, who was also his nephew (35). (35) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, The Sieur Lewis de Mai justly censures that writer's boldness in asserting such a thing. See the pages 617, 765, 766 of his Remarques sur les Coups d'Etat.

(34) Tom. 2. pag. 570.

(35) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, chap. 4. pag. 617.

HUNGARY (ISABELLA, Queen of), the sister of Sigismund Augustus King of Poland, was a Princess of very great merit. In the year 1539 she married John Zapoliha Vaivod of Transilvania, who had been elected King of Hungary in the year 1526, and who contended vigorously for that crown with Ferdinand of Austria the Emperor Charles V's brother. She was delivered of a son July the 7th 1540. Her husband was so overjoyed at it, that he drank immoderately at an entertainment, and this occasioned his death, which happened the 21st day of the same month [A]. Isabella, not finding herself in a condition to keep for her son a crown which Ferdinand endeavoured to wrest from him, implored the protection of the Ottoman Porte, from whence she received such powerful succours, that Ferdinand's army, which was besieging Buda, was entirely routed. Soliman came himself into Hungary to bring Ferdinand to reasonable terms. He used Isabella's child very kindly [B], and if he refused to see her, it was for such reasons as were very obliging to her [C]. But his ill designs soon broke out; for he made himself master of Buda, and forced Isabella to retire to Lippha (a). This was a terrible vexation to this Princess, who was not a little fond of reigning.

(a) Sept. the 3d 1541.

The

[A] Her husband drank immoderately... which occasioned his death &c. He was gone into Transilvania to suppress a rebellion which Ferdinand's party had raised there. Stephen Mailats the most obstinate of those rebels, had taken shelter "in the castle of Fogarats, to wait for the supply which Ferdinand sent him under the conduct of Nadafdy. The King besieged him there and took him after a long siege. In the mean time there arrived a messenger, who acquainted him with the birth of a son, that God gave him. As such news is always very acceptable to those that have no children, especially to persons who begin to grow old, it is easy to imagine that John was very well pleased with this news: and indeed he indulged himself in some excess, drinking after the Hungarian manner, which increased his distemper, so that he died at Sassebes, a few days after his son's birth, in the 53d year of his age (1).

[B] Soliman... used Isabella's child very kindly. I shall again transcribe the words of the author, whom I have quoted in the foregoing remark. "Soliman I sent presents to the young King... and desired the Queen to let him see her son, giving her his word that it was only with a design to make his own children love the child the more. At the same time the Deputies had orders to tell her, that if he did not go and wait upon her, it was only for fear lest his visit should expose her reputation. The Queen returned thanks to the Grand Signior; and as she scrupled to send her son, George Martinusias told her that she could not refuse it. Being therefore constrained by necessity, she put the infant into a cradle becoming such a child, and having commanded its nurse, some other matrons, and several Hungarian Lords to accompany it, she sent it to the camp. Soliman desirous to do honour to that child had it received by a troop of horse, saw it and caressed it himself, and had it caressed by his own children (2)." Hilarion de Coste gives a very particular account of all this in his elogy of our Queen

Isabella (3). Soliman, says he, sent to the young King "three horses exceedingly beautiful, the harness of which was trimmed with gold, and adorned with pearls and precious stones; as also very rich plumes and Brocado garments. He sent also golden chains and rich robes made after the Turkish fashion to the chief Lords and Barons of Isabella's court... The Queen put her son in a coach that was gilt and very stately, with his nurse, and some Ladies, who had dressed him very fine, that Soliman might like him the better... The Ottoman Prince sent a troop of horse very well equipped, and some companies of Janizaries to receive him in the most honourable manner. As soon as these troops had saluted the young King of Hungary, they put him in the middle of themselves, and in this pompous manner conducted him to their Emperor, who, the moment he saw this little Prince, shewed him great love, and received him very kindly both as a vassal of the Ottoman house, and as a son of John King of Pannonia, whom he had very much beloved and esteemed; having protected him against the attempts of Ferdinand King of Bohemia, and of the Emperor Charles V. He commanded his children, Bajazet and Selim, who were then in the camp, to do the same. These were the sons of the beautiful Rose or Roxelana." This author pretends (4) that Soliman would know "whether this child was a boy or a girl, for there was a report spread through the Turkish army, that it was a girl, and that this was the reason why Isabella Jagellon had it educated secretly."

(3) Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 631 & dec.

(4) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 632.

[C] Soliman refused to see her... for such reasons as were very obliging to her. I have already observed, that he sent this Princess word, that if he did not wait upon her, it was only for fear lest his visit should expose her reputation. This was certainly a very obliging discretion: for it is certain that there would have been a great many slanders dispersed abroad, had there been an interview between Soliman and this Queen. Hilarion de Coste makes the Grand Signior's Deputies al-

3 ledge

(1) Discours Historique & Politique sur les Causes de la Guerre d'Hongrie, printed with other curious pieces at Cologne 1666, in 12mo, pag. 237, 238. See also Hilarion de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 629.

(2) Discours Historique & Politique, &c. pag. 242.

The hopes she had that the Kingdom of Hungary would be restored to her son, as soon as he would be of age, those hopes, I say, grounded on Soliman's promise, were but a very indifferent comfort to her. She behaved with great strength of mind under this heavy trial; and comforted herself as well as she could with the title of Queen-Regent of Transilvania, which Soliman suffered her to bear; but as he left George Martinusias to assist her, she met with a thousand vexations during her Regency. For she had only the name of a Regent, all the authority being lodged with this Monk George (b). She was forced at last to break openly with him, the consequences of which ruined her authority entirely; for her adversary, being supported by Ferdinand, sent for a powerful army, which was commanded by a very cunning Italian (c), who managed matters with so much artifice, that he engaged this Queen to yield Transilvania to King Ferdinand in the year 1551, after which she retired to Cassovia. It was on her journey thither that she carved some Latin words on a tree, which have been mentioned by the Historians [D]. She was not a woman that could lead a quiet life; she did not continue long at Cassovia; she went into Silesia, and thence she retired into Poland with her mother Bonna Sforza, and her brother Sigismund Augustus. She kept up a correspondence with the great Lords in Transilvania, in order, if possible, to have the country restored to her. She applied again to Soliman for his protection, and made use of so many artifices, that at last she entered again into Transilvania in the year 1556. She kept it till her death, and engrossed the whole power as much as she could, without giving her son John Sigismund any share in the administration [E]. The bigots in vain endeavour to excuse such a

(c) John Baptist Castaldo, Marquis of Cassano, who had been educated in the family of Francis d'Avales, Marquis of Pescara. Hilarion de Coste, Eloges des Dames, tom. 1. pag. 644. Delectus est Joannes Baptistus Castaldus Padenæ Comes, et ob res recentior egregie gestas (nam in bello Germanico castrorum praefectus summa cum laude manus obiverat) Cassani Marchio à Caesare creatus. Thuan. lib. 9. pag. 180.

(b) Thus they used to call George Martinusias.

(5) That is to say, Soliman's Deputies or Envoys, who had carried presents to the young King.

(6) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames, tom. 1. pag. 632.

(7) Ibid. pag. 633.

(8) She understood Italian, Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames, tom. 1. pag. 644. asserts, that he harangued in that language, to persuade her son to resign the crown.

(9) Thuan. lib. 9. pag. 182. col. 2. ad ann. 1551.

(10) Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 648.

ledge other excuses, which are not in the least probable. "They (5) said also to this Princess, that Soliman had not less regard and esteem for her, than for the King her son, both on account of her own merit, and because she was the daughter of Sigismund King of Poland, whom he called his father; and that if his religion had suffered him to wait upon her, he would not have failed to do it; and that therefore he could not give her leave to come into his tents, and desired her to send only her son with his nurses (6)." If it was inconsistent with Soliman's religion to receive Isabella in his tents, would that same religion have suffered him to receive there the young Prince's nurse with the Ladies who attended him (7)?

[D] She carved some Latin words on a tree, which have been mentioned by the Historians.] Thuanus in his account of this particular observes that she was learned (8). Quae (Regina) statim, ne privata in eo regno, cui summo cum imperio praesuisset, diutius viveret, convulsatis rebus suis per montes asperos Cassoviam versus iter direxit. Cum propter angustias viarum inter silvas de curru descendere cogere, cum auriga currum traduceret, ipsa retro in Daciam respiciens, pristini culminis, è quo deciderat, memor altum corde suspirium duxisse dicitur, et cum aliud non posset litterata femina, inscripto arbore nomine, haec addidisse, SIC FATA VOLUNT, eoque relicto justis doloris monumento, rursus currum conscendit, institutum iter persequitur (9). i. e. "As this Queen could not bear the thought of living in a private condition where she had enjoyed the sovereign power, she took all that was hers with her, and set out for Cassovia over steep mountains. The road being very narrow through the woods, she was obliged to step out of her coach; and whilst the coachman drove it through the wood, she looked behind her towards Transilvania, and calling to mind the high station from which she was fallen, she fetched a deep sigh from her heart, they say, and having carved her name on a tree, she added these words to it; THUS FATE DECREED IT; which was all that this learned woman could do on this occasion, and having thus left a memorial of her well-grounded grief, she stepped into her coach again, and continued her journey." Hilarion de Coste deserves to be transcribed, because of the particular account he gives us (10). "As this virtuous but unfortunate Princess... was going to Cassovia through the heavy and difficult roads of that country; she was obliged in a very bad place to step out of her coach, and to walk on foot. As the coachman was endeavouring to get the coach clear from that place which was near a wood, this Heroine who was not less learned than magnanimous, cast her eyes towards Transilvania which she left, and calling to mind the honours she had received there, and the condition she had been in, and which was now altered, she could not forbear fetching a deep sigh, and carved on the bark of a tree the three words to express her grief, and shew her skill in the Latin tongue. SIC FATA VOLUERUNT; i. e. Thus fate decreed it, according to what Thuanus and several other (11) Historians relate. Martin Fumée Sieur de Genille relates it thus: he observes that Queen Isabella passing over the mountains which separate Transilvania from Hungary, and coming down a very steep and dangerous side of those mountains, that road being so bad that her coach could not pass through it, she was obliged to walk on foot down hill with the Ladies that attended her, not without much trouble and inconvenience, both because the road was very difficult, and because of a very heavy rain which happened to fall and wet her to the skin (12). The poor Queen of Hungary complained all the way of her ill fate, which persecuted her not only in things of importance, but even in mere trifles, and ascribing this bad luck she had in her passage over that high and steep mountain to the obstinate malice of her destiny, she took a knife, and in order to allay her affliction and excessive grief, she wrote with the point of that knife, on the bark of a large tree under which she sheltered and rested herself during the rain, these Latin words, Sic fata volunt, and under them Isabella Regina. i. e. Thus fate decreed it; Isabella Queen." We have reasons to think that she did not carve that inscription without a disposition to murmur against Divine Providence; for she began the oration she made, when she abdicated the crown, with the most bitter complaints against fate. Though inconstant fortune, said she (13), according to her cruel changings, altering and confounding all the affairs of this world, has perplexed mine to that degree, that at this time my son and I are obliged to leave this Kingdom, &c. This was abusing God's Providence, and charging it with cruelty, as the Heathens used to do in their misfortunes.

(11) Natalis Comes, P. Matthieu, Artus Thomas.

(12) We transcribe this period in the wretched condition in which Hilarion de Coste left it.

(13) Hilarion de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 645. Thuanus, lib. 9. pag. 182. makes her speak thus to her son. Quando tua aut mea potius fortuna non tulit ut regno paterno legibus juris gentium tibi delato uti frui posses, fatorem INIQUITATEM quae nulla vi nostra aut humana industria corrigi potest, aequo animo feramus necesse est.

Cum complexa sui corpus miserabile gnati, Atque Deos atque astra vocat crudelia mater (14).

— His lifeless limbs embraced
—
— Accusing all the Gods and every star."

Dryden.

It is probable that our Princess designed to leave on the bark of that tree a memorial of the injustice she imagined Heaven did her, and to let all the passengers know, that she was bold enough to complain of it.

[E] She engrossed the whole power... without giving her son... any share in the administration.] This may be proved by the remonstrance which Henry II caused to be made to this Princess. John James of Cambray, Dean of Bourges, that Prince's Ambassador, assured her, on his journey to Constantinople, that France would give her all the assistance she could wish; which obliged her to send Christopher Bathori Ambassador into France... to thank the most Christian

(14) Virg. Eclog. 5. ver. 23.

(15) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 657.

(16) The father of the brave and unfortunate Sigismund Bathori Prince of Transilvania. Ibid.

conduct [F]. She died at Alba-Julia, or Weiffenburg September the 15th 1558 (d).

(d) I have extracted the particulars I relate here, from Hilarion de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 624, &c.

“ Christian King for her favour and good will.” Batori was very well received by Henry II, “ who sent him back with Peter Martinez into Transilvania, where they assured Queen Isabella by his most Christian Majesty’s order, that he would make an alliance with her by marrying one of his daughters with her only son John Sigismund, who was then seventeen years old, on condition that she should educate him in a grand manner, and not suffer so many women, and men of a mean extraction to come near him, who are not proper to be educated with Princes, and that she would acquaint him with state-affairs. Petrowitz, and most of the Lords of the Queen’s council gave their approbation to the most Christian King’s advice, even in her Majesty’s presence, and boldly told the French Ambassador that they had already represented this to the Queen their mistress, who from that time began to mistrust that Embassy, and imagined that these Lords had advised the King of France to this.” She consulted her mother, who made her the following answer: “ Daughter, keep always the power in your own hands, and do not suffer your son to have so much authority; for you will lose it all, as soon as you shall have married your son with the daughter of so powerful a Prince as the King of France is. Isabella having followed this bad advice of her mother Bonna, did not make an alliance with the French King; and after that she always hated those, who advised her to let the King her son see the armies, to acquaint him with the affairs of the Kingdom, and to send him to Waradin. She gave the command of all her armies to Michael Balassa, a haughty man, at which

“ her subjects were not very well pleased, for they wished that she would choose a General of a more meek and gentle temper than that man was (17).” [F] . . . The bigots do in vain endeavour to excuse such a conduct. As there is no passion but they endeavour to vindicate at the expence of religion, they made use of this admirable cloak to hide our Isabella’s ambition. Here follow the words of a Minim, who quotes Florimond de Remond. “ The authors who wrote this virtuous Princess’s defence, observe that she did not much like the great Lords of Hungary and Transilvania. Petrowitz was in a particular manner odious to her, because he professed Luther’s heresy, and because under a fair pretence of acquainting him with the affairs of his Kingdom, he endeavoured to estrange him from his mother, that he might the easier make him forsake the ancient and true religion, and admit the new and false one. Which he did after his mother’s death (18).” Father Maimbourg asserts (19), that John Sigismund did not dare declare for the Hereticks during his mother’s life, but that it was not only for that reason, but also because Soliman had written to the Queen, that she must not suffer new sects to creep into the Kingdom, lest they should disturb the tranquillity of it, by dividing the people upon so nice a subject as religion is . . . (20). But the Queen dying soon after, and Selim, who did not much mind the trouble occasioned by religion, succeeding his father Soliman, who died of an apoplexie fit at the siege of Ziget, the Lutherans, the Calvinists, and the Arians entered again into Transilvania, and being supported by Petrowitz’s favour, they took more liberties there, than they had ever done before (21).

(17) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, tom. 1. pag. 624.

(18) Ibid. (19) Maimbourg, Hist. de l’Arianisme, tom. 3. pag. 345. of the Dutch edit.

(20) Ibid. under the year 1555.

(21) Ibid. under the year 1560.

HUNGERUS (WOLFGANG) a Civilian of the sixteenth Century, was born at Wasserburg (a) in Bavaria. He was Professor of the Civil Law in the University of Ingolstat, Chancellor of Frisingen, and Assessor of the Imperial Chamber at Spire (b). He drew up an Apology for the Emperors Frederic Barbarossa, and Lewis of Bavaria, but being a good Catholic, he thought it more adviseable to suppress it [A], than to publish it in such an age as that he lived in. He died of a distemper with which he was afflicted for many years (c), whereby the world was deprived of many useful works they might have expected from so learned a man. We are told that he died in 1555 (d). The notes which he had wrote on the Cæsars of Cuspinian, were published at Basil in 1561; and they rectify and clear up many things which had been advanced either falsely or confusedly in that history of the Emperors, and in some other books. We find in the Epitome of Gesner’s Bibliotheca, a Wolfgang Hungarus, different from our Hungerus; but

(a) Hence comes the Latin surname Aquiburgensis, assumed by him.
(b) See the dedication to the Cæsars of Cuspinian, Basil edit. 1561.
(c) Ibid.

(d) Konig, in Biblioth. pag. 412.

[A] He drew up an apology for the Emperors . . . but judged it most adviseable to suppress it.] As he threw all the blame on the Popes, there is no doubt but the Protestants would have taken advantage from his book. But however this be, let us copy his own words. Nos certe pro utrisque optimis imperatoribus Baisario & Enobardo elucubrata Apologia integra, luce ipsa clarius ostendimus, & fabulam illam de Ludovico Baisario vanam, falsam & tralaticiam esse: & Enobardum non tam de verbis quam rebus ipsis contendisse, atque in summa longe alias fuisse summis Pontificibus in hos Imperatores odiorum causas: & quæcumque tandem ea fuerint, saltem negocia ipsa contraversa à Pontificiis ea animorum impotentia, fastu & acerbitate tractata, ut horundem Imperatorum ubique major modestia, mansuetudo, humanitas, adoque innocentia, pietas & justitia eluceat: utcumque insignis ille Theologus Albertus Pighius Campensis, Pontificiorum Hector Li. 5. ca. 14. & 15. Ecclesiasticæ hierarchiæ, causam bujus Ludovici ita proposuerit atque explicarit, ut universam eam damnaret. Sed voluisse ipsum eo in argumento ac præsertim libr. 6. Romanorum Pontificum auribus aliquid dare, jampridem etiam Catholicum veritatis amantissimum Theologum, virum Ecclesiasticum, doctrina & vitæ sanctimoniam, nuper dum viveret, cum primis spectatum, scio pronuntiasse: & ubi necesse sit, ipsius censuram autographam ea de re in medium proferre possum. Neque vero nostro ex capite isti apologiæ nostræ hoc gloriose arrogamus, sed potius concordiam ex calculo ami- corum aliquot, tam ecclesiasticorum quam laicorum qui Catholica in religione juxta nobiscum versantur, & Ecclesiæ statum ac fœdis & perniciosis abusum & vitiorum manstris repurgatum, sartumque & tectum (ut aiunt) jampridem pio zelo, sed hætenus frustra optant, ac super ea apologia ipsis exhibita consulti, etiam scripto sua singuli candido & libere exposuerunt judicium. Attamen & sponte nostra, & præcellentis cujusdam amici benevolæ monitu, hoc tempore domi retinere eandem quam in publicum edere maluimus (1): i. e. “ In an apology written purposely by way of vindication of those excellent Emperors, Lewis of Bavaria and Frederic Barbarossa, I have shewn as clear as the sun, that the story relating to Lewis abovementioned, is idle, false, and trifling; and that Frederic Barbarossa did not contend so much about words as things; lastly, that the hatred which the Popes entertained against those two Emperors arose from quite different causes; and that whatever these were, the controversy was carried on by the Papal advocates with so much passion, pride and rancour, that in every part of it we may perceive, on the side of the abovementioned Emperors, much more modesty, meekness, humanity, and therefore more innocence, piety and justice: nevertheless that celebrated Divine, Albertus Pighius of Campen, the Champion of the Romanists, in book v, chap. 14 and 15 of his Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, has laid down and explained the case of this Emperor Lewis in such a manner, but this is a mistake; which shews that the smallest change of the letters in proper names multiplies writers improperly. We find, in the Epitome just mentioned, the titles of some other works of this Civilian [B].

(1) Hungarus, Annal. in Cæsars Cuspiniani, pag. m. 136. col. 2.

“ as quite to condemn it. But I was told long since
 “ by a Catholic Divine, a man famous for his erudi“ tion and piety, and whose opinion I can produce in “ writing, in case this were required, that Pighius, “ in every part of this argument, and especially in the “ sixth book, was desirous of flattering the Roman “ Pontiffs. Neither do I pretend on my own judg“ ment to arrogate so much with regard to my apo“ logy, but rather in that some of my friends, both “ of the Clergy and Laity, who profess the Catholic “ Religion as I do, who have for a long time, but “ hitherto in vain, earnestly wished that the Church, “ being purged from many shameful abuses and horrid
 “ vices, may be entirely reformed; these persons,
 “ I say, being consulted with regard to this apology, “ candidly and freely gave their respective opinions of

“ it in writing. Nevertheless of my own choice, and “ by the advice of a most excellent friend, I chose to “ keep it by me rather than publish it at this time.”

[B] The titles of some other works of this Civilian.
 It appears that he corrected and published Bartholomæum Bolognium super Authent. habita. C. ne filius pro patre; and that he translated from the Spanish and Italian into the German language. Excitatorium Au-licorum de officio Aulici ut gratiam Principis consequatur & conservet (2). This translation, which was printed at Strasburg in 8vo, anno 1582, is doubtless that of a book of Guevara (3). We see in Draudius's Bibliotheca Classica (4); *Wolffg. HUNGERI Linguae Germanicæ
 Vindicatio contra exoticas quasdam, quæ complurium vocum & dictionum mere Germanicarum, Etymologias ex sua petere conati sunt* (5), Strasburg 1586, 8vo.

(2) Epitome Gesnerii, pag. m.
 824-
 (3) See the remark [G] of the article GUE-VARA, citation (19).
 (4) Pag. 1377.
 edit. Francof.
 1625.
 (5) This word makes a solecism
 in this place.

HUNNIUS (ÆGIDIUS or GILES) born in a village of Wirtemberg December the 21st 1550, was one of the most famous Divines of the Augsburg Confession. He went through his Theological studies at Tubingen under James Andreas, the younger Brentius, and two other Professors; and acquired so much erudition during the eight years he spent in that University, that he was thought capable of being a Professor of Divinity in Marburg, at twenty six years of age. He fully answered the advantageous opinion which had been entertained of his learning; for having read some Lectures and preached some Sermons at Marburg (a), the Landgrave being resolved to retain him, recommended him in a very honourable manner to the Duke of Wirtemberg, in order that Hunnius might be admitted to his Doctor's degree of Divinity. Hunnius returned to Tubingen, and there took his Doctor's degree a few months after his marriage July the 16th 1576. During the first six years of his Professorship he did not publish any books against the Calvinists; but otherwise he was perpetually at war with them [A], and did not spare them in his Academical disputations. At last he published books against them [B] in 1514; and gained so much reputation, that in 1592 he was invited into Saxony there to reform the Electorate. He was appointed chief Professor of Divinity at Wittemberg, principal Minister of the Church of the Castle, and Member of the Ecclesiastical Senate. He applied himself with extraordinary vigilance to detect such as were not true Lutherans [C]; and as he was very successful in clearing the country of them, he was invited to act the same part in Silesia [D]. He was made Superintendent of the Church of Wittemberg in 1595; and the same year he was engaged in a mighty controversy with Samuel Huberus, concerning Election and Predestination [E]. He was

(a) In 1576.

[A] He was perpetually at war with the Calvinists.
 What follows is said of this in his funeral oration (1).
*Quas autem & quam serias, quamque frequentes velitationes in Hassia tam Castellis, quam Marburgi, jam cum clanculariis, jam cum apertis hostibus, quos Sacramenta-rios Lutherani vocant, subire coactus fuerit; quæ & quam gravia certamina, ob sanctissimum Religionis Christianæ articulum, de personâ Christi, ejusque ad dextram Dei sedentis adoranda majestate sustinuerit:
 id Deo, rerum omnium inspectori ac judici, notum est: neque fugit id multos pios & cordatos homines. i. e. “ In “ what strong, as well as frequent contests he was “ forced to engage in Hesse, as well at Cassel as at “ Marburg, one moment against secret enemies, and “ another against open ones, who are called Sacramen-“ tarians by the Lutherans, what mighty combats he “ sustained, on account of that most holy article of the “ Christian Religion, concerning the person of Christ, “ and his adorable majesty sitting at the right hand of “ God: these things, I say, are known to God,
 “ who sees and judges all things; nor are they un“ known to many pious and judicious men.”*

[B] ... He published books against them. We find by the same orator, that our Hunnius did not confine his exploits merely to the Sacramentarian war; he also attacking the followers of the Lutheran Illyricus. In publicum postea scriptis suis progressus sub annum octo-gesimum quartam Danæum imprimis, Urfinum, Peze-lium, Grabium, & alios oppugnavit, editis libellis de personâ Christi, ejusque ad dextram DEI sedentis divina majestate: de altarum abrogatione. Postea & Flacianorum cohorti bellam sacrum indixit, edito libello de substantia peccati originis (2). i. e. “ He after“ wards, about the year 1584, published some pieces
 “ with relation to the person of Christ, and his divine “ majesty sitting at the right hand of God; and con“ cerning the taking away of altars; in which he “ chiefly attacked Danæus, with Urfinus, Pezelius, “ Grabius &c. He afterwards proclaimed a holy war “ against the Flacians, in a treatise relating to the “ Substance of Original Sin.”

[C] He applied himself to detect such as were not true Lutherans. This was a sort of Inquisition, which deprived many people of their employments, and drove them from their country; for whenever a person refused to sign the formulary proposed by Hunnius and his colleagues, he was looked upon as a Calvinist, and found no mercy. Contzen the Jesuit (3) makes himself merry in describing this Inquisition, and observes that Hunnius wrote an apology for it. Quin & Ægi-dius Saxoniam visitationem contra Calvinistas defendit, Refutationem enim scripsit Calvinistici libelli, quo visitatio illa exagitata fuit (4). The cruelties exercised at that time on persons suspected of being Calvinists, as related by Hospinian, strike the reader with horror (5).

[D] To act the same part in Silesia. This we are told by Melchior Adamus. Fridericus IV Lignicensium Parte altera, & Brigensum in Silesia Dux, Hunnii potissimum opera ac studio usus, Ecclesiarum Lignicensium per Silesiam re-formationem suscepit atque perfecit; ejecto inde Leonbardo Krentzhemio, Lignicensium tunc Superintendente; cui Calwinismi crimen impingebatur (6). i. e. “ Frederic IV, “ Duke of Lignitz and Brieg in Silesia, began and “ perfected, chiefly by the assistance of Hunnius, a “ reformation of the Churches of Lignitz in Silesia;
 “ and ejected Leonard Krentzhemius, at that time Su“ perintendent of Lignitz, who was charged with the “ crime of Calvinism.”

[E] He was engaged in a mighty controversy with Samuel Huberus, concerning election and predestination.
 This

(1) *Apud Melchior Adam. in
 Vit. Theolog. pag.
 729.*

(2) *Apud eundem.
 ibid.*

(3) Contzen, in *Jubilo Jubilo-rum, ad ann.
 1592, 1593.*
 (4) Idem, ibid.
 (5) Idem, ibid.
 (6) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 729.

was one of the chief opponents of Gretser and Tanner the Jesuits, in the Conference held at Ratisbon [F] 1602 (b), and died April 4, of the following year (c). He wrote a great number

(b) This Conference, according to most authors, was held in 1601. (c) Extracted from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 723, & seq. He has given an Extract of Hunnius's Funeral Oration, spoke by Leonard Hutterus.

This man had been Minister of a village near Berne; and having examined the acts of the conference of Mombeliard (7), four articles in Beza's doctrine had appeared to him not very conformable to the Scriptures: I. That Christ Jesus did not die for all men. II. That most men are excluded from the promises of grace. III. That the only cause why the reprobate are damned is, merely from the will of God, who created them, purposely to shew in them the power of his anger. IV. That no one can tell whether baptism regenerates children. He had the courage to contradict these four articles, but he was expelled for his boldness; Musculus and Gryneus having successfully attempted his expulsion. He had retired to the territory of Wirtemberg, and got a Church there; after having embraced the Augsburg Confession. Having made himself known to the Elector of Saxony by some books he published, he was invited to Wirtemberg, to be Divinity Professor there. The earnestness with which he refuted the Swiss Protestants on the article of predestination, carried him into another extrem; he teaching publicly, that God has elected all men to eternal life. Hunnius and his colleagues admonished him of his error; but as he did not leave it, he was expelled. He went to Ratisbon, had conferences with some Divines; persisted obstinately in his errors, and published some books at Spire to maintain them. This was the fourteenth schism which divided the Lutheran Church (8). Such was the man our Hunnius had to deal with. He had the good fortune to be victorious on this occasion, he prevailing so far as to get his enemy removed; but he was a little suspected of heterodoxy, and therefore was obliged to write in his own justification. Read the following words of Calixtus. Post annum superioris seculi octogessimam Aegidius Hunnius, nisi fallor, primus vel certe inter primos precipuus, priscam & ante Augustinam in primitiva Ecclesia receptam sententiam revocavit, & in Ecclesiis Sæbælasque nostras reduxit; non tamen sine difficultate, contradictione & insimulatione Pelagianismi (9). Read likewise the following passage. Fortem se & fidum purioris doctrine hyperastissem, adversus inanes Huberi Phœnias eo tempore præstitit Hunnius, dum partim monendo, partim scribendo, errantem Huberum in viam revocare studuit: quod ipsa res loquitur, & monumenta hæc de controversia bene multa edita, cum primis verò ille tractatus Hunni de providentiâ & prædestinatione filiorum Dei, satis luculenter testatur. Diffidio autem illo Huberi remotione sopito, prodit anno nonagesimo septimo epistola: qua variorum errorum, de cœnâ Domini, de baptismo, de libero arbitrio, de personâ Christi, de æternâ prædestinatione fuit insimulatus. Hanc igitur Hunnius eodem anno refutavit, ut & eos qui in Anhaltinis ecclesiis altaria, imagines, organa musica, hostias, & alias ceremonias abrogarant (10). i.e. "Hunnius then proved himself to be a brave and faithful defender of the purer doctrine, in opposition to the idle cavils of Huberus, whilst he used his endeavours, both by admonition and by writing, to bring back the mistaken Huberus into the paths of truth: this is manifest from the thing itself; and the many pieces he published with regard to this controversy, shew this evidently, particularly Hunnius's treatise relating to providence, and the predestination of the sons of God. But an end being put to these contests by the removal of Huberus, an epistle was published in 1597, wherein he was charged with various errors relating to the Lord's Supper, Baptism, Free-will, the person of Christ, and Eternal Predestination. Hunnius refuted this the same year; as likewise those of the Churches in Anhalt, who had taken away altars, images, organs, hosties or sacrifices, or other ceremonies." I add these last words to shew, that Hunnius was not against altars, images, and several Romish ceremonies, which the other Lutherans abhorred.

[F] He was one of the chief opponents . . . in the conference held at Ratisbon. I am persuaded that most of my readers will be very glad to be freed from the trouble of consulting another book, in order to get a general idea of this conference; and for this reason I shall here set down what Peter Matthieu relates concerning it (11). "Maximilian Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria, and Philip Lewis likewise Palatine of the Rhine, Count of Veldents and Sponheim, cousins and united by blood, but separated and very opposite in the union of minds, which is religion; resolved in order to re-unite themselves in the same belief, and bring their subjects to the same confession and profession of faith, to assemble at Ratisbon, the ablest and most famous German Divines in Germany of both religions; that they, by an amicable conference, might clear up the difficulties that occasioned this wretched schism. They disputed only on the following thesis; Whether the holy Scriptures be a sufficient rule with regard to things necessary to salvation. The Roman Catholic disputants were four Divinity Professors of the University of Paris (12), and one of them was a Jesuit. On the side of the Protestants were fifteen Divines of the Palatinate of the Rhine, and of the Dukedoms of Saxony, Brandenburg and Wirtemberg . . . The Presidents were the two Princes; and Gretser the Jesuit, and Heilbrun the Protestant Minister, were the spectators . . . (13). The conference took up fourteen sessions, in which the power of the Judge was for a long time discoursed on with great vehemence, but not with great clearness, since that verbal dispute was followed by long apologies in writing." I here insert the following marginal note of Peter Matthieu. On this disputation at Ratisbon, says he, abstracted from the acts and registers of the Sessions, day by day, there is extant a book intitled Analysis Dialectica Colloquii Ratisbonensis, anno 1601 de norma & judice omnium controversiarum fidei Christianæ habitæ.

The Historian's reflection on these verbal disputations is pleasant enough. "When I consider, says he (14), the little benefit that has accrued from those disputations in different parts of Europe, and that the holy scripture is a field which every man thinks he has a right to combat in; I cannot forbear wishing that there were some severe prohibition against this vulgar treatment of it; and it would be well were it taught, like Epicurus's atoms, Pythagoras's numbers, Plato's ideas, Aristotle's Entelechia, and the figures of the Cabalists; that none, except those who were capable of understanding it, might attain to the knowledge of it. But whilst every one pretends to be skilled in it, it so happens that the faithful, like the bee, from the same flower, gather honey; the disobedient, like the spider, draw poison; and many grow distracted about the beast of the Revelations."

To this passage I will add the following words of Mr. Baillet. "This conference was like those battles, in which the victory is not determined from the number of the slain. Each side boasted their having gained the advantage, both parties drew up relations of it, and books in Latin as well as German, to the number of twenty. Among these pieces I met with one in the vulgar tongue relating to the triumph of the Jesuits, printed at Tubingen, a Lutheran city, in the year 1603 in 4to, and one in Latin written by Hunnius, and published at Wirtemberg in Saxony, the same year and the same size, with the following title, Epistola consolatoria cum nat. . . . Hunnius endeavoured to revenge the cause of his party by an Anti-Tanner . . . and by the Anti-Gretser (15). He had read the historical relation drawn up by Father Tanner, but was not satisfied with a relation which was not favourable enough to his party. To prevent the effects he feared would accrue from the reading of it, he composed a counter-relation of it, that is, a history of the conference at Ratisbon, after his manner, which was published, in 1602, at Wittemberg in Saxony. Peter Tanner did not think it advisable to leave this piece unanswered; and not contented

(7) Between Theodore Beza and John Andrews.

(8) Extracted from Micraelius Synagm. Hist. Eccl. pag. 871.

(9) Calixtus, Consider. Doct. Reformat.

(10) Hutterus, apud Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 729.

(11) Matthieu, Hist. de la Paix, lib. 4. ad ann. 1601. pag. m. 134.

(12) Matthieu is mistaken. Cayet, Hist. de la Paix, pag. 260. is as much in an error in saying, that the Duke of Bavaria's Divines were Hunger and Tanner, Doctors in the Faculty of Paris, and Gretser a Jesuit. Now Tanner had been a Jesuit from eighteen years of age; and consequently was not a Doctor in the Faculty of Paris.

(13) Matthieu, Hist. de la Paix, liv. 4. pag. 135.

(14) Ibid. pag. 136.

(15) Baillet, Art. 21. des Anti.

number of books, and got many children [G]. Some of his sons have got a name by their works [H]; but one of them turned Roman Catholic [I]. Hunnius did not discover greater passion and animosity in any of his works, than in that which he intitled, Calvinus ented with reprinting his relation both in Latin and German at Munich in Bavaria; he also published some reflections on that of Hunnius, entitled, Examen Narrationis quam historicæ Relationis nomine insignitam de Colloquio Ratisbonensi edidit Ægidius Hunnius Prædicans, at Munich 1602 in 4to. It was against this last work that Hunnius wrote his Anti-Tanner, which he printed the same year at Wittemberg. Father Tanner published a reply, in which he drew up a defence of his first confutation . . . and some remarks on the death of the same author (16). It was published at Munich in the year 1603, in 4to, and intitled Apologeticus pro compendiaris relatione de Colloquio Ratisbonensi 1601 adversus Anti-Tannerum, cum Appendice de morte Ægidii Hunnii. Baillet observes, that Father Gretser could not forbear making reflections on Hunnius's Anti-Gretser: They were printed at Ingolstadt some time after, and since inserted among some other of his works, with the following title, Admonitio de Anti-Gretsero (17).

(16) Ibid. Art. 37. num. 1.

(17) Ibid. Art. 21.

This Jesuit published some other piece against the same antagonist. Labyrinthus Critico-Hunnianus, hoc est, Disputatio de Hunnio Prædicante, genioque Lutberano semetipsum contradictionibus implicante & jugulante in aliquot articulis fidei 1602, & Responsum ad Thefes Hunnianas, de Colloquio Pontificiis jucundo (18), una cum sex digressionibus contra ejusdem Hunnii calumnias, 1602 (19). It is to be observed, that the two Bibliothecarii of the Jesuits ascribed to Father Tanner, a book intitled Labirintus Critico (20) Hunnianus, printed at Munich in 1612. Might not one conclude that that there is some error here (21)? Would two Jesuits have made use of the same title, in writing against the same adversary?

(18) This is an error of the press for jucundo. Father Southwell has retained the word jucundo.

(19) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 200.

[G] He wrote a great number of books, and got many children.] An edition has been published of his works in five volumes. Primus variis tractatus de articulis fidei, alter polemica, tertius & quartus commentaria in Matthæum, Johannem, & omnes penes Epistolâs Canonicas, quintus disputationes & orationes varias continet. Edidit etiam vernacula lingua postillam Evangelicam & Epistolicam. Homilias in VI Prophetas, Iteanos & Catechismum, confessionem de persona Christi & id genus alia (22). With regard to his conjugal fruitfulness, we are assured, in his Funeral Oration, that heaven indulged him the blessing promised to the faithful by the Psalmist. Inde divinæ benedictionis vestigia, tum in re familiari, tum in eo potissimum deprehendit: quod juxta promissionem Psalmi, Vidit filios ac filias, sicut plantationes olivarum, in circuitu mensæ suæ (23).

(22) Micrælius, Synag. Hist. Ecclæs. pag. 760.

(23) Apud Melchior. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 730.

(24) Psalm 128.

His wife, like a fair fertile vine,
Her lovely fruit shall bring;
His children, like young olive plants,
About his table spring (24).

TATE and BRADY'S Version.

[H] Some of his sons have got a name by their works.]

NICHOLAS HUNNIUS, Professor in Wittemberg, and afterwards Superintendent at Lubec, has published, Epitome credendorum: Examen errorum Pbotinianorum: Capistrum Lancelotto impati: Necessaria defensio de Papa Antichristo: Refutatio Weigelianæ Theologiæ: Apostasia Ecclesiæ Romanæ: Pellis ovina papistica: Innocentia Lutheranorum: Fundamentalis dissensus Lutheranorum & Calvinianorum: Necessaria Admonitio contra theosophos (25), novellos Prophetas, nomine ministerii Lubecensis, Hamburgensis, & Lunæburgensis, and some other treatises. He died in 1643, aged 58: and GILES HUNNIUS, his brother, died the year before, Superintendent General of Altemburg (26).

(25) See Molleerus, Uagoge ad Hist. Cæsarionis Cimbricæ, Part 3. pag. 469.

(26) Extracted from Micrælius, Synag. Hist. Ecclæs. pag. 760, 761.

[I] One of them turned Roman Catholic.] This was HELFRICUS ULRICUS HUNNIUS, a Civilian. He published at Colen in 1633, a book wherein he pretended to shew, that even by the confession of some learned Protestants, we are bound to restore to the church of Rome the temporalities of the church, of which it was dispossessed during Luther's reformation. Voetius hath been reproached with having stolen from this book the authorities and arguments employed by him against the Canons of Utrecht. Iterato voto, pel-lucem illum centonem, magnam partem confarcinatum esse ex duodecim consiliis Lutheranorum . . . simul editis per Helfricum Utricum Hunnium J. C. filium Ægidii Hunnii, celebri quondam Theologiæ Doctoris & Professoris in Academia Witebergenfi, qui pelleret offa Antichristiana, cum turpissime desecisset ad Pontificios, atque secundum fatum Apostatarum, negligeretur ab iis, qui exemplo diaboli Matth. iv. 9. plurimos sectatores sibi colligere solent, per mysticam illam vocem: Hæc tibi dabo: Colonia Agrippinæ anno 1633 evulgavit duodecim illa Responfa, seu, ut ipse pariter vocat, Præjudicia, inscripta Abbati Fuldensi, cum in finem, ut evinci posset, Lutheranos (per errorem summum iis conjungit Calvinistas, quum neque Matthæus Wesenbecius, neque Hieronymus Treutlerus, prout fingit Hunnius, unquam vixerint in communionem eorum, qui Calvinistæ audiunt) esse vultu-luxurios, atque diſtante propria conscientia, debere restituere bona Ecclesiastica, à se invasa, occupata, direpta, ac prophanata, ut loquitur famelicus Apostata in titulo. Verum esse quod dico, quisvis cognoscat, si instituerit Consilium Theologicum comparare cum hisce Responfis; ubi aut Hunnius, aut ejus Typographus erravit in citandis authoribus, maxime juris Canonici textibus, pariter (respicio primam editionem) errant Architeſti bujus, Kar' ἀντιφασει, Consilii Theologici; quod adeo impudens, ut pag. 25. speciatim in hunc Hunnii tractatum digitum intendat (27). i. e. "I once again take notice, that the greatest part of this tinsel compilation was borrowed from the twelve Councils of the Lutherans . . . published together by Helfricus Utricus Hunnius, a Civilian, son of Giles Hunnius, formerly a famous Divinity Professor, in the University of Wirtemberg; who being ensnared by the bait of Antichrist, scandalously turned Papist; and being (as is the fate of Apostates) neglected by them, who, after the Devil's example, Matth. iv. 9. used to win over the greatest number of profelytes by the mystical words following, all these things will I give unto thee; published in Colen in the year 1633, these twelve answers, or as he calls them, Prejudices, inscribed to the Abbot of Fuld, in this view, viz. to shew that the Lutherans (through an egregious mistake he joyns the Calvinists to them, though neither Matthew Wesenbecius nor Jerom Treutlerus, as Hunnius pretends, ever lived in the communion of those who are called Calvinists) that the Lutherans, I say, are self-condemned, and, from the impulses of their own consciences, ought to restore the Church-possessions by them invaded, possessed, plundered and prophaned, to speak after the title-page of this hungry apostate. Any person may prove the truth of these assertions, who shall compare the theological council with these answers; for in all places where Hunnius or his printer has committed any mistake in citing of authors, particularly in the texts of the canon law, there also (I speak of the first edition) the compilers of this pretended theological council mistake with them; which is so very impudent, that page 25 he points in particular at this tract of Hunnius." Baillet, whom nothing can escape, was not ignorant that this man had changed his religion, but he did not know that it was a son of the author of the Anti-Gretser. His words are these. "When the Protestants, who alledge against us the Anti-Hunnianus, and the Resolutio Anti-Hunniana, of Valentin Bullen a Lutheran, still reckon Hunnius among those of their communion; they either give us occasion to believe that they have confounded Nicholas Hunnius a Lutheran, who died in 1643, with Helfricus Utricus Hunnius a German Civilian, converted from the Lutheran Church to that of Rome, and who was contemporary with the other Hunnius; or they were desirous of concealing his conversion; whether they did not believe it to be sincere, or supposed it to be of short continuance. However this be, Valentinus Bullen printed, in opposition to him, his Anti Hunnius, at Leichen, in the year 1633 in 8vo, with this title Resolutio Anti-Hunniana seu Responfo ad calumniosam Resolutionem tertiam præjudicialium Quæstionum H. Utr. Hunnii. He declares in this work that he is firmly persuaded he did not dissemble in any manner when he

(27) Martinus Schoockius, Exercitat. variar. pag. 52. edit. in 4to.

Calvinus Judaizans [K]. Calvin was there accused of so many heretical crimes [L], that he might have been afraid of being treated like Servetus, had he lain at Hunnius's mercy.

Some

renounced the Lutheran principles: and he shews plainly enough that he had read his book of the twelve unanswerable arguments of the Catholic Religion, printed at Colen in 12mo, 1632 (28). Our Ulric Hunnius published at Gießen, a treatise de Transactione in 1615; four books variarum Resolationum Juris Civilis, at Francfort in 1620; and a dispute de Homicidio & ejus pœna, at Marburg in the year 1625.

[K] He entitled... one of his books Calvinus Judaizans. The complete title runs thus: Egidii Hunnii Calvinus Judaizans, hoc est, Judaicæ glossæ & corruptelæ quibus Joannes Calvinus illustriora Scripturæ Sacræ loca, & testimonia de gloriosa Trinitate, Deitate Christi, & Spiritus Sancti, cum primis autem vaticinia Propbetarum de adventu Messicæ, natiuitate ejus, passione, resurrectione, ascensione ad celos, & sessione ad dexteram Dei, detestandum in modum corrumpere non abhorruit. I am not satisfied with the informations I have hitherto received with regard to the history of this work, and the consequences with which it was attended; but I believe I may venture to affirm, and hope Mr. Baillet (29) will not be displeas'd at it, that this book was not published in 1575. Hunnius was then but twenty five years of age; and had he distinguished himself at that age by such a work, the author of his funeral oration would not have failed taking notice of it, and would not have said that Hunnius began to write against the Calvinists about 1584. The Jesuit Conzen (30) fixes the year 1593, as the date of the impression of the Calvinus Judaizans, and I believe he is in the right for so doing. The circumstance which puzzles me is, to find in Pareus's life, that Giles Hunnius disturbed the peace of the Church in 1595, by accusing the Calvinists, and particularly John Calvin, of judaizing. I will give the passage at some length, because the reader will herein find some touches of our Hunnius's character, according to his adversaries. Repertus est anno deinceps 1595 turbulentus quidam Gracchus, qui pacem Ecclesiæ livido calamo inquietare paravit, ægre ferens, Evangelicorum Principum animos à tribunitiis Ecceholorum concionibus abhorreere, unionemque ac concordiam Christianam serio meditari: quam proinde non alia fabrica melius se disrumpere posse speravit, quam si immani isto convitio gravaret Ecclesias Reformatas, criminatus eas Judaizare: ac CALVINUM primipitarem Ecclesiarum Reformatarum Doctorem, Judaicis glossis pleuraque oracula Veteris Testamenti detemerare. Accusatio hæc tametsi non communem causam Ecclesiarum Orthodoxarum tangeret, proprièque eam spectaret, cujus Episcopus fuisse Calvinus, tamen quia per illius latus cæteræ omnes in capite CHRISTO unitæ petebantur, propudiosis istis calumniis CLYPEUM veritatis Catholicæ de sacrosancta Trinitate opposuit, Eccehasque Orthodoxas, & CALVINUM Electum DEI organum fortissime asseruit: adeoque in who read his conclusion imagine that an end had been entirely put to this contest by Pareus's answer? But it was quite otherwise; for Hunnius replied, and his adversary did the same. Hutterus informs us that Hunnius, in 1598, published two books against Pareus; who had writ in favour of Calvin. Duobus libris: D. Pareo respondit, qui Calvinum patrocinium susceperat (32). Pareus returned to the charge, and printed a book at Neustadt in the year 1599 in 8vo, intitled, Orthodoxus Calvinus oppositus Pseudo Calvinus Judaizanti: which work was reprinted forty two years after in Geneva (33). This I learn from Baillet, which thereby plunges me into a fresh perplexity; for I infer from the preface to the Calvinus Orthodoxus (34), that Pareus compos'd and published it 1594. He says (35) that Calvin had been dead thirty years; and that this apology would have been published at Francfort during the time of the spring-fair, had not the impression been delayed by persons in power (36). He adds (37), they have changed their mind, and approved of my publishing this work. This shews plainly that the Calvinus Orthodoxus was printed in 1594; and nevertheless the author informs us, towards the close of the book, that Samuel Hüberus had been banished from Wittemberg, which, according to Melchior Adam (38), was not till 1595.

[L] Calvin was there accused of so many heretical crimes. Here follows the summary of his Calvinus Judaizans, according to Pareus (39). In ipso libri titulo Calvinum ex Ariano Judæum, vel certe ex Arianozante Judaizantem facit, & amarissime passim insectatur, quod mera ambitione, studio perverso, ludo aleatorio, versutia veleratoria, temeritate desultoria, Scripturam sacras à sensu proprio ad peregrinum inflectat, quod easdem tetris corruptelis, glossis impiis, proditoriis elusionibus, & plenis Judaicæ perfidiæ nequitiaque strophis, ad suam & aliorum perniciem horribiliter alio detorqueat: quod testimonia de Deo uno & trino stropharum suarum spiritus intricat: quod Scripturæ locis æternam Deitatem Christi confirmantibus caliginem Judaicam offendere non reformidet: quod illustrissima vaticinia Propbetarum de Messia Judaicis perversis sensibus involvat; in fraudem Christianæ religionis adulteret: & ad perfidiam Judaicam infidelitatis, Arianæque impietatis retundendam strophis nefariis bebetet, inutiliaque reddat: quod Evangelistarum, Apostolorumque sacrosanctas explicationes nequiter eludat: ipsos Apostolos sub ferulam censoriam revocet; flagellet: quod Scripturarum Ecclesiasticarum, veterum & recentium, piarum interpretationes altissimè despicias & irritas, ipsosque sexagenarios de ponte præcipites, &c. Passim etiam non acerbis modo sarcasms furdo illudit, sed & conviciatur virulentissimè, appellat acutum Diaboli instrumentum, Censorem, Aristarchum, Dictatorem, Apostolo Paulo doctiorem, autodidactum Scripturæ interpretem, Doctorem superciliosum, præstigiarum Judaicarum architectum, colubram, Angelum & Spiritum tenebrarum ex abyssi putio emergentem, & quæ alia hujus generis infinita sunt maledicentiæ ejus emblemata, vel potius convicia, lectu sanè & auditu horrenda. i. e. "He makes Calvin, in the title of the book itself, a Jew from an Arian, or a Judaizer from an Arianizer; and reproaches him in the most bitter terms every where, as a man who merely from ambition, a perverse inclination, gamester-like, with wicked craft, and inconstant rafhness, wrests the holy Scriptures from its natural sense to one that is foreign to it; as a man who, by dark corruption, impious glosses, treacherous mockings, and quirks full of Jewish perfidy and wickedness, horribly perverts the meaning of them to his own destruction and that of others; as a man, who perplexes with his knotty devices the proofs of the one-thrice God; as a man, who is not afraid of spreading a Jewish gloom over those passages in Scripture which confirm the eternal Divinity of Christ; as a man who darkens by Judaical perversions the most glorious Prophecies relating to the Messiah; vitiates them to the detriment of the Christian Religion; and, to lessen the perfidy of Jewish infidelity, and Arian impiety, blunts the edge of them by wicked quirks, and makes them useless; as a man, who wickedly

(28) Baillet, Art. 79. of the Anti.

(29) See Art. 66. num. 1. of the Anti.

(30) In Jubilo Jubilorum, pag. 307.

(31) Philippus Pareus, in Vita Davidis Parai, pag. m. 51.

(32) Apud Melchior Adam, pag. 729.

(33) Baillet, Art. 66. num. 1. of the Anti.

(34) This is the title of the book in the Geneva edition 1641.

(35) Prefat. pag. 4.

(36) Ibid. pag. 14.

(37) Ibid. pag. 15.

(38) In Vita Hunnii, pag. 729.

(39) Pareus, in Prefat. Calvinus Orthodoxus, pag. 9.

Some particulars want to be rectified in the remark where I speak of the Calvinus Judaizans [M].

HUTTEN

“ wickedly eludes the sacred explications of the Evangelists and Apostles, and presumes to censure and defame the Apostles themselves: in a word, as a man, who greatly despises, and laughs at the pious interpretations made both by ancient and modern Ecclesiastical writers; and is for rejecting them as obsolete. He not only throws out the most bitter taunts against him, on all occasions, but calumniates him in the most harsh and virulent manner, calling him the Devil’s sharp instrument, a Censor, an Aristarchus, a Dictator, more learned than Paul the Apostle; a self-instructed Interpreter of the Scriptures; a supercilious Doctor, an Architect or Framers of Jewish incantations; a Serpent, an Angel and Spirit of darkness rising from the infernal abyss; and a numberless multitude of such vile names, shocking to read as well as hear.” It is to be observed he declares, that if he does not plainly shew Calvin’s Judaism, he desires never to be believed upon any occasion (40). One cannot forbear asking the following question: Was he persuaded, or was he not, of the truth of what he advanced? Christian charity obliges us to think he was, for otherwise we must look upon him as the worst wretch that ever lived. Let us therefore conclude that he spoke as he believed; and conclude from thence, that in hot constitutions, like his, zeal is a kind of drunkenness, which so distracts the mind, that all objects appear double and false.

(40) Hoc loco discrete se adstrinxit (pag. 6.) ut nisi Calvinum judaizantem ad oculum demonstraret, nobis sibi ulla unquam in re post hoc fidem adhiberi. Idem, ibid. pag. 16.

(41) Virgil. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 469.

Eumenidum veluti demens vidit agmina Pentheus, Et solem geminum, & duplices se ostendere Thebas (41).

“ Like Pentheus, when distracted with his fear,
“ He saw two suns, and double Thebes appear.”
Dryden.

(42) Ille aper in nostris erat qui maximus agris, Ille mihi serendus aper. Ovid. Metam. lib. 3. sub finem.

The Priestess of Bacchus, who fell violently on her own son, mistaking him for a wild boar (42), whilst he beheld, without any faith, or rather with contempt, the ceremonies of the festival, is an image of the vertigo or giddiness with which the train of zealots are seized. Pareus ascribes all these strange flights of Hunnius to the Devil; it is the Devil, says he (43), employed Hunnius, as a writer every way qualified to compose so slanderous a book. En utro tandem, Christiane Lector, extremæ improbitatis Satanae exemplum. Quasi enim hætenus Nestorianismis, Arianismis, Turcismis, Paganismis, Atheismis, & id genus impurissimis sputis suis Ecclesias nostras parum conspurcarit: nuper easdem etiam JUDAÏSMI stercorebus petulantissimè conspergere est aggressus, constato per idoneum artificem libello mendaci juxta & maleficio, qui titulo CALVINI JUDAIZANTIS circumfertur. i. e. “ Behold, O Christian reader, an example of the extreme wickedness of Satan: as though he had not enough defiled our Churches with Nestorianism, Arianism, Turcism, Paganism, Atheism, and such like impurities: he not long since, most impudently endeavoured to fling Jewish filth at it; by means of a lying and calumniating book, now handed about, and entitled CALVIN TURNED JEW, being composed by an artificer, who was every way qualified for the business.”

(43) Pareus, in Præfat. Calvinus Oribodoxi, pag. 3.

The design, according to Pareus, was to extirpate the Calvinists, in order that the Ubiquitarian Doctors might be highly esteemed. Hinc Pseudo-Calvinus Judaizans, cujus hoc est argumentum & scopus. Calvinus est Judaizans, Arianizans: ergo & Calvinistorum Ecclesie (quas vocant) sunt tales: extirpandæ; ergo cessabunt Ubiquitati facessere negotium; ergo stabit Ubiquitas: ergo in pretio erunt Ubiquitarii Doctores. Hæc est Satana Dialectica (44). i. e. “ Hence the false Calvin judaizing, the scope and argument of which is as follows: Calvin judaizes and Arianizes; therefore the Calvinistical Churches, as they are called, are such; therefore they ought to be extirpated; therefore they will disturb Ubiquity no longer; Ubiquity will therefore stand; the Ubiquitarian Doctors will therefore be held in esteem. This is Satan’s logic.”

(44) Idem in Calv no Oribodoxi pag. 344.

[M] Some particulars in the remark [K] want to be rectified.] The reader must expunge, in the remark [K], the two passages where I suppose that Lipenius is not mistaken, in placing, under the year 1594, the edition of Hunnius’s Anti-Pareus. I now am of opinion, that Baillet was not mistaken in saying, that this date in Lipenius ought to be corrected; for I have a copy of the Anti-Pareus, the title of which declares that it was printed at Francfort ex officina Palibeniæ, in the year 1598; the prolegomena whereof are subscribed Ægidius Hunnius, and dated March 20, 1598. The title of the book, as I have given it from Baillet, is imperfect, and expressed in such a manner as renders it obscure; but here follows the complete title. Anti-Pareus: hoc est invidia Refutatio venenati scripti à D. Davide Pareo, Heidelbergensi Theologo, editi in defensionem srophorum & corruptelarum quibus Johannes Calvinus illustrissima Scripturæ Testimonia de mysterio Trinitatis necnon oracula prophetarum de CHRISTO detestandum in modum corrupit. Scriptus per Ægidium Hunnium. Hunnius declares, that as he was enough employed with other matters, he should not so much as cast his eye on Pareus’s book, had not the advice of friends, and the vanity with which his adversaries was swelled by his silence, made him resolve to answer it (45): such is the excuse he makes for not replying sooner. Now it being certain that the book which he refutes is that which David Pareus has entitled Calvinus Oribodoxus; it follows that this work of Pareus was not first published in 1599, and is not a reply, as Baillet supposes. Let us now positively affirm that it was published either in 1594 or 1595.

(45) Hunnius, in Prolegomenis ad Anti-Pareum.

It is to be observed that Hunnius complains, that Pareus accuses him of having asserted that Calvin was an Arian. He affirms that he had declared the very contrary; and had only shewn, that the sense which Calvin gives to many passages of the Bible is favourable to the Arians. I will now cite a distinction he employs. I will take it for granted, says he, that Calvin had no design to favour either the Arian or Jewish principles; but the spirit (46) which suggested those false glosses to him had a tendency that way. Esse autem, Calvinus ipse srophis suis non hoc sibi habuerit propositum ut Judæorum Arianorumve causam proverberet, sed tantum ut Interpretationis novitate & insolentia sibi præ cæteris doctoribus, veteribus & recentioribus, famam nominis conciliaret: Tamen Spiritus, qui hæc ei glossas & elusiones suggererat, hunc sibi scopum præfixum habuit absque controversia, ut nimirum ambiguis & lubricis hinc srophis unum post alterum de Trinitate Testimonium, aut de Messia oraculum redderet incertum, atque sic hominum animos paulatim à petra certitudinis dejectos in dubitationum fluctus conjiceret (47). i. e. “ Let us suppose that Calvin did not design, by his quirks and devices, to favour the Jews or Arians; but only, by the infrequency and novelty of his interpretations, to gain himself a reputation superior to that of other Doctors ancient or modern: Nevertheless the spirit, which suggested to him those glosses and impositions, had, without doubt, the following view, viz. by these ambiguous and dangerous subtleties, to enervate and render doubtful, successively, the evidence or testimonies concerning the Trinity, and the prophecies with regard to the Messiah; and in this manner to plunge the minds of men, by insensible degrees, from the rock of certainty, into the ocean of doubt.” Here follows another passage, wherein he says that the Devil exhibits the utmost efforts of his malice in Pareus’s book. His expressions are very gross on this occasion. Cum igitur hoc Parei scriptum ita comparatum sit, ut in eo Satanas, non dicam diabolicæ suæ maliitæ vestigia quædam ostendat, sed impurum suum podicem (salva venia) denudatum lectoribus conspiciendum exhibeat, dubitavi, fateor, essetne quicquam operæ impendendum tam flagitiosæ scripti Refutationi: donec vel tandem & inimicorum insulsis gloriationibus, & imprimis amicorum crebris admonitionibus excitatus, hunc quoque laborem, quamlibet molestum, ad vindicandum gloriam Dei, & sacro-sanctam veritatem ipsius, suscipiendum mihi & exantlandum esse duxi (48). i. e. “ Since then this book of Pareus is written in such a manner, that the Devil shews therein, not only some tracts of his diabolical malice, but (if I may use the expression) exhibits his filthy breech to the

(46) i. e. the Devil.

(47) Hunnius, in Prolegomenis ad Anti-Pareum, p. 30. I set down the page, though the Prolegomena are not marked.

(48) Idem, ibid. pag. 3.

(a) It was the feat of the family; it still exists, and makes a figure.

(b) See the list of them in the remark [B].

(c) In 1517.

HUTTEN (ULRIC DE) a Gentleman of Franconia, was born at Steckelberg (a) in 1488. He first went through his studies in Fulde, then at Colen, after at Frankfort on the Oder, where he took his Master of Arts degree in the year 1506, being the first promotion made in that newly-opened University. Having a genius for Poetry, he first set up, as an author, in that species of writing, by publishing a piece in the year 1513 [A], intitled, Vir bonus. The year following Prince Albert of Brandenburg having made his first entry into Mentz, whereof he was Archbishop, gave Hutten an occasion of composing a second Poem; he writing a large panegyric, in verse, in his honour, wherein he included (what cost him no little pains) an encomium on all Germany. He had a cousin, JOHN DE HUTTEN by name, who was Court-Marshal to Ulric Duke of Wirtemberg, and was killed by this Duke in the forest of Beblingen, in the year 1515. Our Poet, waiting for an opportunity of shewing his resentment against this Prince, sword in hand, published several pieces against him (b). He was at that time in Italy [B], where he had given many proofs of his courage [C] in the war which the Emperor Maximilian sustained during nine years in that county. At his return to Germany (c), Conrad Peutinger recommended him in such strong terms to the Emperor, that this Prince bestowed the poetical Crown on him [D]. From that time Hutten had himself drawn in armour, with a crown of laurel on his head, and took vast delight in being represented in that manner. He went not long after to the Elector of Mentz's court, and there wrote a dialogue intitled, Aula, in the year 1518. Hutten went, a little after, to the diet of Aufburg with the Elector his master, who was there honoured with a Cardinal's hat. In this diet articles had been exhibited against the Duke of Wirtemberg, on which occasion the murder of the Marshal of his Court was not forgot. These complaints had not produced any very great effect; but at last this Prince having seized upon the Imperial City of Reuthingen, in January 1519, a league was formed against him in Suabia, and those who formed it did not lay down their arms till they had driven him out of all his dominions, to which he did not return till fifteen years after. Our Hutten served in that war. Believing that the cause in which Luther had embarked was a very good one, he joined in it with great warmth; and published Pope Leo X's bull against Luther in the year 1520, with interlineary and marginal glosses (d), in which that Pope was made an object of the strongest ridicule. The freedom with which he wrote against the irregularities and disorders of the Court of Rome [E], exasperated Leo

(d) They are in vol. 2. of Luther's Works, pag. 53, & seq. in

“ the reader's view; I will confess that I was in “ some doubt with myself whether so scandalous a “ piece merited a refutation; till at length, excited “ by the silly vaunts of my opponents, and particularly “ by the repeated admonitions of my friends, I thought “ it incumbent on me to attempt and go through with “ this enterprize, how arduous soever it might be,
 “ to vindicate God's glory and his holy truth.”

[A] Publishing a piece in the year 1513.] He therefore was five and twenty when he first set out as an author. Moreri then must have mistook, and was not able to copy Melchior Adam justly, when he says that Hutten, when but eighteen years of age, published several works in verse.

[B] He was at that time in Italy.] I have followed the Chronology of Melchior Adam my author; but I ought to inform my readers in this place, that I doubt whether it be just. I do not believe that all the pieces which relate to John Hutten's death, were published before Ulric Hutten's return to Germany. I find in Gesner's Bibliotheca, that the collection of all these writings was printed in the seat or castle of Steckelberg in the year 1519, in 4to. It contained Ulrici Hutteni super interfectione propinqui sui Joannis Hutteni equitis à Wirtembergensi Duce Ulrico Deploratio, heroicis versibus. Ad Ludovicum Huttenum super interemptione filii consolatoria Oratio. In Ulrichum Wirtembergensem Orationes quinque inveniuntur. In eundem Dialogus, cui titulus Phalarismus. Apologia pro Phalarismo, & aliquot ad amicos Epistolae. Ad Franciscum Galliarum regem Epistola, ne causam Wirtembergensis teneatur exhortatoria. Inferuntur etiam Epistolae aliquot ad Amicos. I also find Melchior Adam quoting a speech of Ulric Hutten against the Duke of Wirtemberg, which was wrote but in 1519, that is, two years after the author's return from Italy into Germany. Have I not therefore just reason to doubt of Melchior Adam's accuracy? The circumstances he relates from this speech are of too singular a nature not to be taken notice of in this place. We are there informed that the body of John Hutten was dug up pretty near the forest in which he had been killed; yet it was dug up, I say, whilst the confederates were making war on Ulric Duke of Wirtemberg. The murder had been perpetrated four years, and yet the corps was not rotted, but bled when it was touched, and the face was still to be known; from all which Hutten infers that his cousin was innocent. Rem admirandam, & cujus prope nullius fides capax sit, vidisset. Quartum jam annum defossum corpus non consumptum, non putrefactum, totam adhuc faciem cognoscibilem: quin etiam sanguine commaduit attactum. Ex igitur innocentiae testimonium! Deposuimus Eslinge, inde ad patriam sepulturam devecturi (1).

[C] where he had given many proofs of his courage.] Those he gave in war were no doubt inferior to those he gave in a rencounter. He was gone from Rome to Viterbo, at a time that an Ambassador of France had stopt at the last mentioned city. Now a general quarrel happened to arise, in which Hutten, forsaken by his comrades, was attacked by five Frenchmen at once, and himself put them all to flight, tho' he had received some wounds. He wrote an epigram on that occasion, which may be seen in Melchior Adam, in quinque Gallos à se prostratos, on his putting five Frenchmen to flight.

[D] The Emperor Maximilian bestowed the Poetical crown on him.] He acknowledges himself obliged, for that honour, to the good offices of Peutinger, and returns thanks for it in one of his works (2). He even says that the crown in question had been made in Peutinger's house by Constantia his daughter, whose virtue and beauty he applauds exceedingly. Illam aio coronam, illam lauream quam tu ante domi tuae, accurate contexente & adorante filia tua Constantia, omnium que istic sunt puellarum & forma & moribus praestantissima, apparaveras. This circumstance, for a Poet who loved the fair-sex as dearly as Hutten did, could not but suggest new words and a great many thoughts; and it is a hundred to one but a great many epigrams were wrote on the charming Constantia Peutinger.

[E] He wrote against the irregularities and disorders of the church of Rome.] Hutten published, among other works, an Historical Treatise in the German language, concerning the disobedience with which the Popes had behaved perpetually towards the Emperors. At the end of it we find, that Maximilian I having been imposed on by Leo X, spoke as follows. This Pope

(1) Hutten; in Orat. contra Wirtemb. apud Melchior. Adam. in Vita Jurisconsult. pag. 17.

(2) Praefat. ad Principes German. ut bellum Turcis inferant, apud Melch. Adam. in Vita Jurisconsult. pag. 15.

in the highest degree; and induced him to command the Elector of Mentz to send him to Rome bound hand and foot. Hutten then withdrew from this Court [F], and went to that of the Emperor Charles V in the Netherlands; but did not continue long in it, being told that his life would be in danger. It is some way probable that he withdrew then to the fortrefs of Ebernburg; for it was thence he wrote in 1520 his complaint to the Emperor, to the Electors of Mentz and Saxony, and to all the States of Germany against the attempts which the Pope's emissaries made against him. It was from the same place that he wrote to Luther in May 1521 (e), and published several pieces in favour of the Reformation. We don't know the exact time when he left this castle; but it is certain that in January 1523 he had left Basil [G], where he had flattered himself with the hopes of meeting with a secure asylum; but instead of it he had been exposed to great dangers. Erasmus having politely refused a visit from Hutten, for fear of heightning the suspicions that were entertained against him, as well as for fear of something else which he afterwards owned [H], was soon after severely attacked in a public manner, by Ulric de Hutten. Erasmus answered it [I]; and there is no doubt but Hutten would have made a reply, had he not been snatched away by death, he dying in an island of the Lake of Zurich August the 29th 1523 [K]. He was a man of little stature;

(e) This Letter is in Luther's Works, edit. Witt. pag. 102.

(3) AA. & Scripte. Lutberi, ad ann. 1519.

(4) Melch. in Witz Jurisconsult. pag. 19.

(5) Dated at Basil the 21st of Jan. 1523. Book 4. Epist. pag. 968. apud Melch. Adam. pag. 21.

(6) It is the 113th Letter of book 19. p. 949.

(*) Probably Pox is meant here.

(7) It is very probable that by the word Scabies, he means the Itch here.

(†) Or rather Pox.

Pope has already cheated me in a base manner, and I may truly say that no Pope ever kept his word with me; but I hope, with the grace of God, that this will be the last. Cochleus says (3), that before Luther's name was spread, Ulric de Hutten had published several pieces against the oppressions which Germany suffered by means of the Popes; and that he wrote, in 1519, a small tract entitled Trias Romana, the invention whereof was exceedingly pretty, and which brought a prodigious odium upon the court of Rome.

[F] Hutten withdrew from the Elector of Mentz's court. I do not find, in Hutten's Life, that he was ever seized by order of the Elector of Mentz, as Moreri affirms; all I find is, that he banished him from his court, exclusus itaque aula & urbe Moguntina (4); and that he forbid all persons to sell or read his works upon pain of excommunication.

[G] In January 1523, he had left Basil. This appears from the following words of a Letter of Oecolampadius (5); Sunt hic ex sacerdotibus & theologis, qui de me pessime loqui cupiant, nec desistunt ubi clam conveniunt. Tantum machinati ut Hutteno non fuerit diutius tutum hic agere, unde & nudius tertius hinc discessit, quorum autem nescio. i. e. "Some Ministers and Divines, in this place, desire that I should be extremely ill spoken of, and do not fail to do this in their secret meetings. They went so far in their machinations, that Hutten was not safe any longer here, for which reason he left us three days since; but whither he is retired I cannot say."

[H] Erasmus having politely refused a visit from Hutten, for fear of . . . something which he afterwards owned. Writing to Melancthon in September 1524, (6), he tells him, that he would gladly have received Hutten's visit, without much valuing what the world might say of it; and that the motive of his refusing Hutten's visit, was not merely from the apprehension he was under of making himself odious; but that there was another motive, viz. that he should then have been under a necessity, of taking into his house that boaster, oppressed with poverty and the (*) itch, who only fought for a nest to lay himself in, and to borrow money of every one he met with. Thus we find that Erasmus was more swayed, on this occasion, by interest than by fame. Quod Hutteni colloquium deprecabar non invidiam metus tantum in causa fuit: erat aliud quiddam quod tamen in Spongia non attigi. Ille egens & omnibus rebus destitutus querebat nidum aliquem ubi moraretur. Erat mihi gloriosus ille miles cum sua scabis (7) in ades recipiendus, simulque recipiendus ille chorus titulo Evangelicorum, sed titulo duntaxat. Sletstadii multavit omnes amicos suos aliqua pecunia. A Zuinglio improbe petiit, quod ipse Zuinglius mihi suis literis perscripsit. Jam amarulentiam & gloriam hominis nemo quamvis patiens ferre poterat. i. e. "The reason why I avoided a conference with Hutten, was not only for fear that my reputation would suffer by it; there indeed was another which I have not mentioned in my Sponge. As Hutten was poor, and in want of every thing, and fought only a nest where he might dwell in, I must have taken this braggadocio, with his (†) itch, into my house; and have taken him under the name of one of the Evangelists, though but in name only. He borrowed " money from all his acquaintance in Schleitad; and " faucily importuned Zuinglius for some, as he in- " formed me by letter. The most patient person living " could not bear with the bitterness and vaunting of " this man." It appears by this, that Erasmus was not afraid of our Hutten, because he was a zealous Lutheran, but because he was a plundered officer, who wanted to take up his winter-quarters at Erasmus's. There is no doubt but that Hutten's visits, and his borrowing money on those occasions, were displeasing to many professed Protestants.

[I] Erasmus answered it. This answer is inscribed to Zuinglius, and is entitled Spongia Erasmi adversus aspergines Hutteni. Erasmus there confesses ingenuously, that he desired Hutten might be told not to come and see him, unless some important reason obliged him to it; but he shews that his intreaty was so much softened, and afterwards made so many proposals to this friend, that any reasonable man would have been satisfied with them. The worst circumstance is, he told Mark Laurinus, Dean of Bruges, in a letter, that had Hutten made him a visit, he would not have refused to converse with him. Fuit hic Huttenus paucorum dierum hospes: interim nec ille me adit, nec ego illum; & tamen si me convenisset, non repulisset hominem à colloquio (8). He adds that the reason which prevented their seeing one another, was, Hutten could not be without a stove, and Erasmus could not bear one. We see, by this example, that the most honest people are apt not to express always, in their letters, things as they know them to be. Hutten was highly exasperated at Erasmus, and reproached him, in very disobliging terms, on a thousand accounts. Erasmus made the best justification in his power. After Hutten's death, one Otho Brunfels, a Physician, answered Erasmus in his name.

[K] He died in an Island of the Lake of Zurich. He also was interred there, and some years after a Gentleman of Franconia caused the following distich to be engraved on his Sepulchre.

*Hic eques auratus jacet, oratorque disertus
Huttenus, vates carmine & ense potens* (9).

" Hutten, a Knight and Orator lies here,
" For his bright pen and sword alike renown'd.

The most unhappy circumstance is, he died of the foul disease. Had Varillas related this first (10), I should not be concerned about it; but I find this incident in Gesner's Bibliotheca. After this, who would not deplore the odd character of the man? Hutten, wandering from place to place on account of his religion; Hutten persecuted for his strong zeal, carries the foul disease about him whithersoever he goes, and at last dies of it. What a strange medley is this! He had published, in 1519, a Latin book concerning Guaiacum and the venereal Disease. He at that time could treat of it as a master; for in all probability he did not get this distemper since his abjuration of the Popish religion. By the way Varillas makes a wrong computation. He says that Hutten espoused the interest of Luther five years before he died, and two years after the Diet of Ausburg, where he had opposed the League

(8) Erasmi. Ep. 6. lib. 23.

(9) Gesner. in Biblioth. folio 342.

(10) Hist. de Herese, lib. 4.

figure; of a weak and sickly constitution, but extremely brave, and a little too passionate [L]. A collection of all his Poems was published at Frankfort in 1538 (f). He is thought to have wrote many libels [M].

Part of his library fell into the hands of a Physician, who, as it is said, sold some books belonging to it, to Frobenius. See the beginning of book 2. of Joachim Camerarius's Letters.

The conjecture which was mentioned in the preceding editions, viz. that John de Hutten was suspected to have had too great a share in the Duchefs of Wirtemberg's good graces, is false. It was the Duke who loved that gentleman's wife (g). The Duke has been introduced in a dialogue, as follows: Nobilem juvenem, meum comitem, cum ejus uxorem puellam venustam deperirem, obruncavi (b). i. e. "Being distractedly in love with the beautiful young wife of my companion, a noble youth, I killed him."

(f) Extracted from his Life, in Melchior Adam, in Vitis Jurisconsultor. Germanæ, pag. 13, & seq.

(g) See tom. 4. Observationum Selectarum ad Rem Literariam Joh. Hanium, printed at Hall 1701, pag. 169, 170.

(b) U. Huttenus in Pbalasino, folio Aij.

league which the court of Rome intended to form against the Turks. This Diet was held in 1518, and Hutten must consequently have turned Lutheran in 1520; now he lived but three years after this. Varillas's remark, that he was obliged to live chastely, because he had taken holy orders, is perhaps not altogether false, for we find the following words in Melanchthon's life. Interesserat Hutteno cum Croto Rubiano singularis usus à prima adolescentia, quo autore vel certe adjutore reliquit ille contubernium Fuldanum, in quod puer magis disciplinæ quam religionis causa datus esset. i. e. "Crotus Rubianus was of great service to Hutten. He was at his childhood; for by his counsel, or help, he quitted the Abbey of Fulde, wherein he had been placed, more on a religious account than on that of literature, when almost a boy."

ni facere & admirari propter doctrinæ eruditionem & præstantiam ingenii, sic ab illius natura vehementer excelso animo, & voluntate ad novam rem propensa . . . (16) Nicol. Geronomus timere Philippum Melanchthonem licuit animadvertere. Camerarius (15) who informs us of this, adds, that Ulric Hutten was vastly impatient; and that his air and discourse shewed him to be of a cruel disposition. He applies to him what was said of Demosthenes; viz. that Hutten would have turned all Europe topsy turvy, had his power equalled his designs and enterprizes. Judge of his temper the following specimen. Being told that the Carthusians had wiped their backsides with the prints representing his face, he fined them two thousand pistoles. Huttenus Cartusianos, quia imagine sua pro anitergii usi sunt, in duobus millibus aureorum nummum multavit (16). This was making them pay exceeding dear for the little regard they had shewn to the laurel, which crowned the head of the print in question. Varillas (17) says, that Luther had it placed in the front of his books. I related elsewhere (18) the menaces which Hutten vented against the Pope's Nuncio; and after this I can very easily believe that he wrote thus to the Elector of Mentz: If you burn my books, I will burn your cities (19).

(11) Biblioth. folio 342.

(12) Camerar. in Vita Melanchth.

(13) Luther. tom. 1. Epist. pag. 282 and 285.

(14) Quid Huttenus petat videt, nollem vi & ca. de pro Evangelio certari: ita scripsi ad humanum. Idem, tom. 1. Epist. pag. 332.

[L] He was . . . a little too passionate. Gesner (11) observes that Hutten, at the beginning of the reformation, said and wrote many things with great freedom and boldness against the Roman Catholics, as well as against Princes and the magistrats of the cities. He joined with so much fury with Capnio against the Monks, that after having attacked that faction with his pen, he fell upon it with his sword. Litigantes Monachos cum Capnione variis exagitavit, & illam factionem armis quidem vehementissimis scriptis, sed aliquando post armis quoque expeditis adortus est (12). He acquainted Luther with the double war which he carried on against the Clergy. Hutten literas ad me dedit ingenti spiritu æstivantes in Romanum Pontificem, scribens se jam & literis & armis in tyrannidem sacerdotalem ruere, motus quod pontifex fidas & venenum ei intenterit, ac Episcopo Moguntino mandavit, captum ac vinculum Romam mittere (13). i. e. "I received a letter from Hutten filled with rage against the Roman Pontiff, declaring he would attack, both with his pen and sword, the tyranny of the Clergy; he being exasperated against the Pope for threatening him with daggers and poison, and commanding the Bishop of Mentz to send him bound to Rome." Since Luther did not approve of this man's violent temper (14), we are not to wonder that it gave Melanchthon some uneasiness. He loved Hutten for his genius and learning, but he dreaded his pride and passion, and his innovating temper. Ut virum mag-

Of the following among others; Dialogus Philalethi civis Utopiensis. Oratio ad Christum pro Julio secundo Ligure pontifice (20) Bullicida (21): Prædones: Momus: Carolus: Pistatis & Superstitionis Pugna: Conciliabulum Theologistarum adversus bonarum literarum studiosos. Apebbbegmata Vadisci & Pasquilli de depravato Ecclesiæ statu. Huttenus Captivus, Huttenus illustris, autore S. Abydeno Corallo Germano (22). A burlesque satyr, entitled Nemo, had been ascribed to Erasmus; but Hutten was author of it (23); he himself declaring this, and being angry that the glory of it had been given to another. Some persons affirm that he is author of Epistolæ obscurorum virorum (24). This fiction would be more tolerable than another which is ascribed to him, viz. that he himself drew up the letter, which he published under the name of the Universities of Paris, Oxford and Prague (25). Had he lived thirty five years longer (26), he would have overflowed Europe with a deluge of books and libels.

(15) In Vita Melanchth.
(16) Nicol. Geronomus, Epist. ad vertere.
(17) Hist. de Herese, lib. 4.
(18) In citat. article ALEXANDER JEROM.
(19) Palavicin. Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. 1. cap. 25. num. 1.
(20) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Jurisconsult.
(21) Epitome Gesneri.
(22) Gesner, in Biblioth. who takes the Abydeno Corallo to be a supposititious name.
(23) See Erasmus's Letters, pag. 543 and 575.
(24) See the remark [F] of the article HOCHSTRATUS.
(25) See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccles. tom. 1. pag. 922.
(26) Melchior Adam and Moreri date his birth to the year 1488, and his death to 1523, and yet they say he lived 36 years.

☞ The above article being very imperfect, it will be necessary to add a supplement to it.

HUTTEN (ULRIC DE) was born the 20th or 21st of April 1488; was sent to the Abbey of Fulde at eleven years of age; and took his Master of Arts degree at eighteen, at Frankfort on the Oder. In 1509 he was at the siege of Padua, in the Emperor Maximilian's army; and he owned that it was the want of money which forced him to make that campaign. He returned soon into Germany, and there began to apply himself anew to his studies, contrary to his father's inclination [A]. He went to various places [B]. The correspondence he held with Erasmus was of great advantage to him.

[A] He began to apply himself again to his studies, contrary to his father's inclinations. This old man not having the least taste or esteem for polite literature, thought it unworthy the pursuit of persons of exalted birth; and being angry at his son on that account, he therefore would not give him the supplies he wanted; which very probably was the cause of his being reduced to the necessity that had forced him to serve under the Emperor in Italy. Our Hutten's father would have been glad, as his son was so fond of learning, that he had applied himself to the civil law, since that might raise him in the world; but Hutten had no inclination for that kind of study. However, finding there was no other way of getting himself reconciled to his father, he went to Pavia in April 1511, which city being besieged and taken by the Swifs, he was taken prisoner, plundered of all he had; but was afterwards released, and then went to Bologna in July (1).

[B] He went to various places. From Bologna he travelled to Bohemia and Moravia; and waiting on the him [C]. It was in 1516 that Hutten was honoured with the poetical Crown; and returning to his own country, he did not meet with so kind a reception from his friends as he expected [D]. He was in France in the year 1518; from whence he went to Mentz, and engaged in the service of the Elector Albert. Hutten did not once come to an engagement in the war against the Duke of Wirtemberg; however, the tumult of a camp and the noise of arms soon gave him a distaste for a military life, so that he could not forbear panting after his studies and a retirement [E]. In 1519, his patron the Elector of Mentz permitted him to go and spend some months in the Castle of Steckelberg; but in 1520 Leo X obliged the Elector to dismiss Hutten, that Pope being exasperated against him, for republishing an old book intitled, De unitate Ecclesiæ conservanda, & schismate quod fuit inter Henricum IV Imp. & Gregorium VII Pont. Max. &c. Hutten then withdrew to Brabant, and made some stay in the Court of the Emperor Charles V, but was forced to leave it soon, upon which he retired to Ebernburg [F]. Hutten did not begin to declare openly for Luther till after he had left the Elector of Mentz's Court; but he had wrote to him before from Mentz, and his first letter to Luther is dated June the 4th 1520. Varillas had made some false assertions with regard to our Hutten [G]. During his abode in Ebernburg, he performed a very generous action with regard to his family [H]. It was Francis de Sickingen, Luther's great protector, to whom the Castle of Ebernberg belonged, that had given an asylum to Hutten ever since his retiring to that place; and it is probable that he had accompanied his patron in the expedition wherein he was killed in May 1523. Hutten was now obliged to seek some other shelter, and to wander up and down during the short time he had to live. He then withdrew to Basil, but not being allowed to continue there, he went to Mildehausen, and died in an island called Uffnort [I]. His Panegyrist declares that it is a mere calumny to say that he died of the foul disease; but it is nevertheless probable that he fell a victim to it [K]. Some think very justly that he was never in holy orders.

(1) Hommes Illustres du P. Nicéron, tom. 15. pag. 245, 246.

the Bishop of Olmutz in a very poor condition, that Prelate, who was a great Mecenas, gave our Hutten a gracious reception; presented him with a horse; and gave him money to pursue his journey. Hutten travelled to Vienna, and there saw Joachim Vadianus, to whom he then gave the Poems which Vadianus published afterwards. It is probable that it was from this city that Hutten returned a third time into Italy; and it appears by one of his letters dated from Bologna the 31st of July 1516, that he was then studying the law (2).

(2) Ibid. pag. 246, 247.

[C] The correspondence he held with Erasmus was of great advantage to him. It obtained him particularly a very kind reception from all the Literati in Italy whom he visited, and especially at Venice, from Batt. Egnatius, Ang. Contareni, And. Asulanus, &c. (3).

(3) Ibid. pag. 247, 248.

[D] He did not meet with . . . a . . . kind reception from his friends. As these were told that Hutten had devoted all the time, during which he pretended to study the civil law, to polite literature, his family and friends reproached him grievously on that account. This gave him some uneasiness at first, but he afterwards only laughed at their clamours (4).

(4) Ibid. pag. 248, 249.

[E] He could not forbear panting after his studies. This we find by a letter of his to Frederic Piscator, dated the 21st of May 1519. He there discovers an inclination for matrimony, and expresses himself in a singular way on that occasion. He informs his correspondent, that he wants a wife who may take care of him; and that what advantageous things soever some people might tell him of a single life, he found himself not qualified for it, and did not like to lie alone. That he wanted a partner in whose company he might unbend his mind, joke and tattle with, and sooth his cares. That his wife must be beautiful, young, well educated, merry, modest and patient. That he did not require much money with such a one; and did not so much regard her birth, because she would be sufficiently ennobled by marrying him. Opus, says he to Piscator, uxor est, quæ me curet. Nosti mores; non facile solus esse possum, ne noctu quidem. Facessant mihi enim prædicare quidam cælibatus bona, & solitudinis commoda; non videor esse capax. Me quidem habere oportet, ubi curas & ipsa ubi acriora etiam studia remittam, quicum ludam, quo jocos conferam, amœniores & leviusculas fabulas miscam, ubi solitudinis aciem obtundam, curarum æstus mitigem? Da mihi uxorem, & ut scias qualem, da venustam, adolescentulam, probe educatam, hilarem, verecundam, patientem; satis habeat, non multum. Divitias non quæro enim. Et ad genus quod pertinet, satis nobilem futuram puto, quæcumque Hutteno nupsit (5).

(5) Ibid. pag. 250, 251.

[F] He retired to Ebernburg. Meeting with the famous Hochstratus in his journey thither, he drew his sword, and running up to him, swore he would kill him for what he had done against Reuchlin and Luther; but Hochstratus throwing himself at his feet, conjured him so earnestly to spare his life that Hutten let him go, after striking him several times with the flat of his sword (6).

(6) Ibid. pag. 253.

[G] Varillas has made some false assertions. He says that Hutten declared publicly for Luther five years before his death, and two years after the Diet of Augsburg; and that he there opposed the league which the Court of Rome would have formed against the Turks. This Diet was held in the year 1518. Hutten must therefore have turned Lutheran in 1520; and he lived but three years after this. Besides, it is an absolute falsehood to assert that he opposed the League against the Turks; so far from it he made a speech, which is still extant, to excite the Princes of the Empire to unite together against those infidels. The only opposition he made was, to the tenths which the Pope intended to raise on that occasion, he fearing they would be employed in other uses (7).

(7) Ibid. pag. 253, 254.

[H] He performed a very generous action with regard to his family. Being the eldest son, and succeeding to the whole estate of his father and mother by their death, he gave it up all to his brothers; and even, to prevent their being involved in the misfortunes and disgraces which he expected, by the suspicions that might be entertained against them, he conjured them not to remit him any money, nor to hold the least correspondence with him. It was now that he devoted himself wholly to the Lutheran party, to advance which he laboured incessantly and with indefatigable zeal, both by his writings and actions (8).

(8) Ibid. pag. 254, 255.

[I] He went to Mildehausen and died &c. He concealed himself for some time in the monastery of the Austin Friars at Mildehausen; but being discovered, he fled by night to Zurich, where, as he probably did not think himself more secure, he secluded himself in an island of the neighbouring lake, called Uffnort, and there died.

[K] It is probable that he fell a victim to the foul disease. We don't find that he was married, and yet it appears, by his Letters mentioned above (9), that he could not live without a woman. Hence we may presume that he used to go abroad in quest of pleasures which he had not at home; and that he even was not very cautious in the choice of those women he frequented, since as early as 1518 he had got the infamous distemper, of which Gefner declares he died; as appears by his letter to Pirckheymer, dated

(9) Remark [E] citation (5) above.

(a) See Bayle's article of ULRIC DE HUTTEN, citati- on (b).

orders [L]. The date of the impressi- on of one of his books, shews an error of Melchior Adam, and of Bayle after him [M]. Hutten had a considerable share in the famous book intituled, Epistola obscurorum virorum [N]. We shall here relate the particulars of the murder of John de Hutten, cousin to our Ulric [O] (a). We will likewise the abovementioned year, and by the dedication of his book, De Ligni Guaiaci in Morbi Gallici curati- one viribus, i. e. "Of curing the Pox by Guaiacum wood", where he observes, that having been grievously afflicted with the distemper which is the subject of his book, he recovered his health wholly by the use of this remedy (10).

(10) Niceron, Hommes Illustres, vol. 15. pag. 257, 258.

[L] Some think very justly that he was never in holy orders.] Varillas declared he was, from an inference which he drew (11); but it seems to be altogether false, for Hutten could not have taken holy orders except in Fulde, which he yet did not, since he was placed in that Abbey to study, and not to be made a Monk, Discipline magis quam religionis causa, says Joachim Camerarius (12); since he did not make any vow there; and since although the Abbot of this monastery would have persuaded Hutten to stay with him, he yet must have left his cloyster at about fifteen or sixteen years of age, when he was not old enough to be admitted into holy orders. Not to mention that this particular is spoken of by no author except Varillas (13).

(11) See remark [K], towards the end, of Bayle's article of HUTTEN.

(12) In Vita Melanchth. pag. 93.

(13) Niceron, Hommes illustres, vol. 15. pag. 258, 259.

[M] Melchior Adam and Bayle have committed an error.] These say that the first book Hutten published was his Vir bonus in 1513, and consequently that he was twenty five years of age before he set up for an author (14). But this is a mistake, Hutten having published a treatise on the art of verification two years before; Ars verificandi, Wittenbergæ 1511 in 4to; so that he began to appear publicly as an author at twenty three years of age. This piece has borne a great many impressions.

(14) See the text of Bayle's article of HUTTEN, after the letter [A] See also the remark [A].

[N] Hutten had a considerable share in the Epistola obscurorum virorum.] These Letters were written on occasion of the Controversies which Reuchlin had with the Divines of Colen, occasioned by one Pfefferkorn a converted Jew, who, upon pretence that the books which the Jews had relating to their Religion kept them from turning Christians, obtained an edict from the Emperor, by which they were all ordered to be burnt. In these Epistles the ignorance and presumption of the Friars and Divines who lived in those barbarous times, are painted in the most natural colours. Most of them are addressed to Ortuinus Gratius, because he had wrote an apology for the Divines of Colen in opposition to Reuchlin. It is a whimsical Satyr on the barbarous style of the Scholastic Divines, which is there imitated, but very much heightened, to make it still more ridiculous. The perusal of this work is said to have had a surprizing effect on Erasmus (15). Ortuinus Gratius having been chiefly attacked in those letters, he thought it not adviseable to let them go unanswered; and therefore he published the following piece; Lamentationes obscurorum virorum, non prohibita per sedem Apostolicam. Colonia 1518, in 8vo. This volume contains also, besides the brief of Pope Leo X against the Epistola obscurorum virorum, and Erasmus's letter to John Cæsarius; the following piece; Epistola apologetica Ortuini Gratii, ob primam à parvulo educationem Daventriensis cognominati, Agrippinensis quoque Academiae Philosophi, Christianique Sacerdotis, ad obscuram Reuchlinistarum cohortem, citra bonorum indignationem missa. The other authors of these Epistles, besides Hutten, are said to be Reuchlin, Herman de Neuenar, &c. Hutten seems to own himself one of the authors of them, since he speaks, in his letter to Pirckheymer, of the Lamentationes published against the Epistola obscurorum virorum, as of a work written against him. We do not know exactly the time when those Epistles first appeared in print, the year not being set down in the first edition; but it is certain that they must have been printed before the year 1517, since there is extant a brief of Pope Leo X, dated from Rome the 15th of March of that year, which forbids the reading or keeping them upon pain of excommunication. This is one reason; but a stronger is, that the second edition of them was printed in 1516. The two parts which compose this work were published at different times. The first part appear'd under the following title: Epistola obscurorum virorum ad Magistrum Ortuinum Gratium Daventriensem, Colonia Latinas Literas profertentem. At the end of the book are the following words: In Venetia impressum in impressoria Aldi Manutii, anno quo supra. Etiam cavisatum est, ut in aliis, ne quis audeat post nos impressare per decennium, per illustrissimum Principem Venetiarum: all this may probably be fictitious, and the book may have been printed in Germany. Besides, there is no date, as is pretended in the last mentioned Latin words, and to which the reader is referred. The second part which appeared afterwards, has the title above, together with these words: Non illa quidem veteres & prius vixit; sed & nova & illis prioribus elegantia, argutis, lepore ac venustate longe superiores. At the end are the following words; Quinta Luna obscurus viros edidit. Lector solve nodum, & ridebis amplius. Impressum Romanae curiae. This first edition is in 4to. There have been many editions of this work: Editio secunda cum multis aliis Epistolis annexis, quae in prima impressura non habentur. Venetiis (that is probably in Germany) 1516, 4to. It. Cum dialogo mire festivo, 1556, in 8vo. It. Cum variis additionibus ejusdem argumenti. Francofurti 1581 and 1643, in 8°. But the most beautiful edition is that of London 1701, in 8°. It is surprizing that notes have not been added to it, since they are so very much wanted (16).

(15) See the remark [Z] of the article ERASMUS.

[O] We shall here give the particulars of the murder of John de Hutten.] Lewis de Hutten, father of this John, was very intimate with Ulric Duke of Wirtemberg; and relying on the friendship which that Prince had for him, he intrusted him with John de Hutten, one of his four sons, to be as his companion. The young man behaved exceedingly well, and won the Duke's friendship, insomuch that he trusted him with the most important secrets, and revealed all his designs to him. Some time after John married the daughter of a General of that Duke's cavalry; when Lewis de Hutten, his father, being desirous of settling the affairs of his family, ordered his son to come to him: and as the Duke could not refuse to permit him, he told him that he must confer with him on certain matters before he went away, and for that purpose took him into the country, upon pretence that they should be less interrupted there. But now the Duke carrying him into the forest of Beblingburg, he fell upon Hutten and killed him, and probably had caused ruffians to lie in wait for him. Be this as it will, Hutten's body was found, wounded mortally in seven places. This murder made a great noise, and the occasion of it was long unknown; but at last Ulric de Hutten discovered the whole affair, firmly resolved to do this, because the Duke had afterwards said, in justification of this cruel action, that John de Hutten was a perjured wretch; that he deserved death, and consequently that he had justly punished him. Here follows what we are told concerning this matter. The Duke of Wirtemberg was fallen distractedly in love with John de Hutten's wife, and by the assiduity and warmth of his addresses, had at last disposed her to grant what he so ardently wished for. The only affair now was, to get an opportunity of meeting together privately, which was the more difficult, because the husband, knowing the Duke's designs, kept a very watchful eye over his wife. But these obstacles, so far from extinguishing the Duke's flame, only heightened it the more, and prompted him to behave in a most extraordinary manner. He threw himself at John de Hutten's feet; and, with tears in his eyes, begged that he would permit him to love his wife. The husband, in extreme surprize, conjured the Duke not to request so ignominious a favour, nor to do an action so unworthy a man of his rank. Nevertheless fearing, as it really happened, that the passion which this Prince had for his wife would make him incur his hatred, he informed his friends of the dilemma he was in, wrote to his father about it, and used all the arts possible to disengage himself from the Duke's service, who likewise give an account of some of Hutten's works [P] (b).

(16) Niceron's Hommes Illustres, tom. 15. pag. 271, & seq. and tom. 25. pag. 141.

(b) All these particulars are extracted from Ulric de Hutten's Life, written by James Burchard, and published at Wolfenbittel in the year 1717, in 12mo, and from tom. 15. of Nicéron's Hommes Illustres.

who had just before offered him a considerable employment in their neighbourhood. Hutten's relations did not yet know that the Duke had ingratiated himself into the wife's favour; notwithstanding which they were determined to get him out of the Duke's hands, but unhappily they delayed their resolution too long; for the Duke whose flame raged daily with greater violence was resolved not to let Hutten go, as this would have defeated all his hopes, and yet was determined to get rid of an Argus; which was the motive that prompted him to commit the murder abovementioned. The Duke, after John de Hutten's death, was indulged in all his criminal wishes by the widow, whom he made his concubine (*).

Our Ulric de Hutten, at the time of this murder, was at the Baths of Ems in Germany, and not in Italy as Bayle asserts (17). It was thither that the news was sent him of it by Marquard de Hatssteyn, Canon of Mentz, a relation of his. The five orations which our Ulric de Hutten wrote against the Duke of Wirtemberg were composed at different times. The three first a little after John de Hutten's death, the fourth seventeen months after, and the fifth in 1519, after that the Princes who had made a league against the Duke in question had driven him out of his country (18). The style of all those orations is energetic; the author did not spare invectives, and has employed many odious expressions with the utmost strength and fire; the whole speaks a man who is exasperated at the affront he has received, and which it is not in his power to revenge (19).

[P] We shall give an account of some of our Hutten's works. Those who desire to see an ample catalogue of them may read Father Nicéron's Hommes illustres (20). A singular circumstance in Hutten's book De Guaiaci Medicina, & morbo Gallico liber, first printed in 1519, is, that although it is dedicated to Albert Elector of Mentz, a spiritual Prince, yet Hutten is not ashamed to declare, that after having himself been long a martyr to the disease, he there treats of, the pox, he had been cured only by Guaiacum (21). In the two dialogues entitled Febris, Hutten feigns a discourse between himself and the fever with which he had been long tormented, and therefore intreats it to go and annoy those, who may be in better circumstances to maintain it. Hutten's servant is afterwards introduced, and joins in the conversation. These dialogues are very ingenious, and extremely satyrical, particularly against the Prelates and Monks, whom Hutten inveighs sharply against in all his writings (22). The piece entitled Phalarismus, one of the five satyrs written against the Duke of Wirtemberg (23), consists of a dialogue, the interlocutors whereof are Cbaron, Mercury, the Tyrant, i. e. Duke Ulric, and Phalaris. The author feigns that the Duke, by permission from Jupiter, goes down into Hell, in order to have an interview with Phalaris, and that meeting him in the infernal regions he receives the most horrid counsels from him, all which he promises to put in execution at his return to the earth (24). Besides the two dialogues intitled Febris, Hutten wrote three more, all which were printed together in Mentz, in the year 1520, in 4to, with this title, Dialogi, Fortuna, Febris I, II, Trias Romana seu Vadiscus, Inspicientes. We have spoke of the second and third of these dialogues just above. The first of them intitled Fortuna is very ingenious, as indeed all Hutten's are, which Thuanus declares are not inferior to those of Lucian. The author therein supposes himself to be discoursing with fortune, concerning several things which had befallen him, and of the wishes he had formed in order to attain a happy life. The fourth dialogue intitled Trias Romana, (25) or Vadiscus, is a strong satyr against the Court of Rome. It is intitled, Vadiscus, from the author's feigning that he was told all he related in that dialogue by one Vadiscus, who, in his return from Rome, had passed by Mentz, where he had discoursed with him; and he intitled it Trias Romana, because he always reduces every particular he advances to three points. Thus he begins as follows: Tria Urbis Romæ dignitatem tuentur, auctoritas Pontificis, Reliquiæ Sanctorum, & Merx Indulgentiarum. i. e. "Three things keep up the authority of the City of Rome, the authority of the Pontiff, the relics of Saints, and the trade of Indulgences." The reader may judge by this specimen of the style of the rest of the piece. The fifth dialogue is intitled, Inspicientes, from the two principal interlocutors in it, who are the Sun and Phaeton. These discourse together, and afterwards with the nuncio Cajetan, on the affairs of Germany, and the transactions there in 1618 (26). The letters mentioned by Bayle (27), wrote by the Universities of Paris, Oxford and Prague, were not, as some (28) have objected, forged by Hutten; but being found by him at Bopart, a castle on the Rhine in the Archbishopric of Triers, he published them in some time after. The subject of these six letters relates to the schism that was then in the church; and they were written by the three Universities abovementioned to one another, to the Romans, to Pope Urban, and to the Emperor Winceflaus (29). Besides Otho Brunfels the Physician, who defended Hutten against Erasmus (30), another person wrote a piece in his favour intitled, De Erasmi Spongia judicium Erasmi Alberi, adeoque, quantum illi conveniat cum M. Lutheri Doctrina. 8vo (31). It is to be observed that there was published at Frankfurt in 1538, a collection of all Hutten's Latin Poetical pieces in one volume in 12mo (32). The several Libels, which Bayle (33) is in doubt, whether or no they were wrote by our Hutten, were in all probability composed by him. Those who desire a more particular account of them may read Father Nicéron's Hommes Illustres.

(*) See the last paragraph of Bayle's text of the article ULRIC DE HUTTEN.

(17) See his text of the article ULRIC DE HUTTEN, before the letter [B].

(18) All this clears up the doubts that Mr. Bayle entertained with regard to the times in which these several Orations were written. See the remark [B] of his article ULRIC DE HUTTEN.

(19) Nicéron's Hommes Illustres, vol. 15. pag. 278, & seq.

(20) Tom. 15.

(21) Ibid. pag. 277.

(22) Ibid. pag. 277, 278.

(23) See Bayle's article of ULRIC DE HUTTEN, remark [B].

(24) See remark [E] of Bayle's article of ULRIC DE HUTTEN.

(25) See remark [A] of his article of ULRIC DE HUTTEN.

(26) Conrad Gesner, who has been followed by Pallavicino, Boissart, &c.

(27) Nicéron's Hommes Illustres, tom. 15. pag. 287, 288.

(28) See the end of the remark [I] of Bayle's article of ULRIC DE HUTTEN.

(29) Hommes Illustres, vol. 5. pag. 295.

(30) Ibid. pag. 299, 300.

(31) See the remark [E] of his article of ULRIC DE HUTTEN.

HUTTERUS (LEONARD) Professor of Divinity at Wittemberg, was born in 1562 at Ulm, where his father was Minister. He was so well instructed in the Sciences, and made so great a progress in them, that Hutterus, when but three and thirty, was preferred to a Professorship of Divinity in one of the most famous Universities (a). He discharged the several duties of his employment in such a manner, as got him the character of a laborious man, and as extremely well qualified to teach others (b). He discovered an ardent zeal for Orthodoxy, being a most rigid Lutheran. This zeal appears in every part of his writings [A]; and if we reflect but ever so little on his assertions with

(a) That of Wittemberg.

(b) Extracted from Spizelius in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 32, & seq.

[A] This zeal appears in every part of his writings. See particularly his work intitled, Concordia concors, sive de origine, & progressu formulæ Concordiæ Ecclesiarum Augustanæ confessionis liber unus, Rudolpho Hospiniano oppositus. It is in folio, and was printed at Wittemberg in 1614 (1). See also his Dispute pro formula Concordiæ (2); his Collegium Theologicum de articulis confessionis Augustanæ, & libro Christianæ concordiæ (3); his Irenicum vere Christianum, sive de Synodo & unione Evangelicorum non fucata concilianda Traclatus Theologicus; his Sadeel Elencomenus, hoc est Traclatus pro majestate humanæ naturæ Christi. He wrote with great warmth against Popery. See his Disputes de Sacrificio Romanensium Missatico, ejusque horrenda abominatione: de Transubstantione & Processionibus Pontificiis, pro asserendo integro Sacramento Cœnæ Dominicæ contra Jesuitas. See likewise Refutatio duorum Librorum Rob. Bellarmini de Missa: Triumphus de regno Pontificio: Illas malorum regni Pontificio-Romani, sive Historica Dissertatio injustissimo Pontificis Romani in Ecclesia Dei dominatu: Actio in Jacobum Gretserum de Imperatorum, Regum, ac Principum Christianorum in sedem Apostolico-Romanam munificentia pro Nicolao Clemangis (4). I omit the title of several other of his works, both in German and Latin. His Calvinista Aulico-Politicus, printed at Wittemberg in 1615, shall be cited in the following remark.

(1) See the remark [E] of the article HOSPINIAN.

(2) Printed at Wittemberg in 1605.

(3) Idem, 1610.

(4) Extracted from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 37, 38.

with respect to the martyrs of the Geneva Confession [B], it must be confessed that he ran into extremes. This turn of mind exposed him to many vexatious disputes, in which he was very much slandered [C]. He died in 1616. He must not be confounded with him who published a Polyglot Bible [D].

[B] His assertions with respect to the martyrs of the Geneva confession.] The Elector of Brandenburg had alledged in his edict for toleration, among other particulars, the vexations and punishments which the common enemy had made the Calvinists suffer; but to oppose this our Hutterus observed, that the Arians, the Anabaptists and Antitrinitarians might, in order to obtain toleration, make use of the like maxim. He asserted that the Calvinists had not suffered death, for believing that the blood of Jesus Christ would save them, but for refusing to obey the Pope whom they called Antichrist. Scripterat quondam in Edicto Serenissimus Elector Brandenburgicus, non excludendos esse à Christiana communione Reformatos, qui idem sentiunt in fundamento fidei, in Evangelio cum Lutheranis laborant, certant, luctantur, eoque nomine à communi hoste innumeros cruciatus sustinuerunt, sustinentque quique etiam sanguinem pro confessione illa largissimè profuderunt. Cornua illi obvertere ausus Hutterus in Aulico-Politico cap. 2. pag. 176. &c. ubi regetis, à Papiſtis etiam Anabaptistas, Arianos, Antitrinitarios, aliosque supplicio affectos esse; causam supplicii nostrorum non fuisse, quòd crederint, se per Christum servatum iri, sed quòd Romanum Pontificem non agnoverint Pastorem universalem, sed Antichristum, ejusque jugum detrectaverint ferre (5). The Swifts divine, whose words I borrow on this occasion, makes this judicious remark, viz. that this method of branding the martyrdom of the Calvinists may be employed with equal success against the Lutheran martyrs. He says that, after observing that a Divine of Strasburg employs the same cavil of Hutterus. Gemella his effutivit Dannenhawerus, Argentinenſis Theologus, Colleg. Decalog. p. 394, ubi Reformatorum Martyrium larvatum vocari, & cum Judæorum, Ethnicorum, Arianorum sub Athalario Gotborum Principe religionis causa occisorum Martyrio comparare non erubuit. Certè pædodis talis etiam Lutheranæ Ecclesiæ Martyrii veri palmas laudemque præcideret (6). i. e. "One Dannenhawerus a Strasburg " Divine, published two pieces, wherein he is not " ashamed to call the martyrdom of the Reformed or " Calvinists, masked; and to compare it to the mar- " tyrdom of the Jews, Pagans, and Arians put to " death, for their religion, under the Gothic Monarch " Athalaric. It is certain that such a deceitful con- " struction would likewise deprive the Lutheran Church " of the glory of true martyrdom." Can we enough admire the effects of a headstrong temper or prepossession? And is it not a deplorable circumstance, that a Popish Missionary can object to Protestants, that the martyrdom of their brethren is looked upon, by some Lutheran Doctors, as a false martyrdom? See one of the remarks (7) of the article WESTPHALUS (Foachim). It is to be observed that Pappus calls those calumniators, who accuse the Lutherans of considering the Calvinist martyrs as the martyrs of the Devil, Nulla modo eos habemus pro martyribus Diaboli; quemadmodum accusamus (8).

shall not dispute about these matters because they are not enough known to me; but I shall say in general, that some Doctors are so very passionate, so morose, and allow so little toleration to others, that they create themselves enemies, not because they maintain orthodox principles, but because of their rude way of maintaining them. Their adversaries take their revenge of them by personal reproaches; they publish the most vexatious truths relating to them; prove them guilty of many shameful things, and bring them into such a dilemma that they cannot justify themselves. How do they act then? They make a great merit of their patience, and compare themselves to the Prophets, the Apostles, and even to Christ himself. When, say these, persecuted as they were for the truth, we do not open our mouths when the enemies of the truth revile us. Moliere should introduce this in some scene of his Tartuffe; for it is to be particularly observed, that this sort of people are never silent, when they have any slander to publish against their neighbour, or when they can alledge any thing plausible for their justification. However this be, the panegyrist of our Hutterus bestows the following fine eulogium on him. Sicuti verò summis quibusque Viris non omnia omnino ex animi fluxere sententiâ, sed cruces, calumnie, & persecutiones variæ illos exercuerunt, ita Hutterus certissimo hoc fidelium Dei servorum charactere nequam caruit, quippe quo ab omnipotente Deo, Propheta, Apostoli, & sinceri Ecclesiæ Doctores olim sunt signati... Idem profusus nostro fatum; quod æquo & patienti pertulit animo, magisque de abstergendis calumniis, suis antecessoribus impactis, quam famæ & exultationis propriæ vindicatione fuit sollicitus, baud ignorans, omnes injurias oblivione melius, quam commemoratione sanari, & inimicorum calumnias contemptu potius quam lingua esse vindicandas (2). i. e. "But as all great men have not been " successful in all their desires, but have been exercised " by crosses, calumnies and persecutions; so Hutterus " was not, in any manner without the most evident " characteristic of the faithful servants of God, as " being that, with which the Prophets, Apostles, and " true Doctors of the Church were antiently sealed by " the Almighty... This was entirely the fate of our " Doctor, to which he submitted with an equal and " patient mind; he being more solicitous to blot out " the aspersions cast on his predecessors, than to vindicate his own fame and reputation, well knowing " that all injuries are treated better by being forgot " than remembered, and the calumnies of enemies are " to be refuted rather with contempt than the tongue."

[D] He must not be confounded with him who published a Polyglot Bible.] His name was ELIAS HUTTERUS. He first published a Bible in four languages, in Hebrew, Greek, Latin and German, at Hamburg, in the year 1597: but afterwards added to it the Italian, French, Sclavonian and Saxon. His New Testament was printed in the year 1600 in twelve languages, viz. in Syriac, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Bohemian, Italian, Spanish, French, English, Danish and Polish. He reduced into four the edition of 1603, viz. Hebrew, Greek, Latin and German. This Polyglot Bible is extremely scarce. There is a collection of letters with regard to the judgment of learned men concerning this work (10).

[C] His turn of mind exposed him to many vexatious disputes, in which he was very much slandered.] He is put in parallel, in his eulogium, with the Prophets and Apostles who were persecuted for the truth; and it is affirmed that he answered calumny only by silence and contempt. I

(5) Heideggerus, Dissert. Selectar. tom. 2. pag. 352.

(6) Heideggerus, ibid.

(7) The remark [H].

(8) Joh. Pappus, Epit. Hist. Eccl. pag. m. 49.

(9) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 35.

(10) Extracted from Hottinger, Biblioth. Quadrupartita, lib. 1. cap. 2. pag. 141, 142.

HUYBERT (PETER DE) Lord of Burg, Krayenstein &c. gained very great reputation by the considerable services he did to the Republic of the United Provinces in the Low-Countries, and particularly to the Province of Zealand. His family is very ancient, and has produced several eminent persons [A]. He was born at Middleburg August

[A] His family is very ancient, and has produced several eminent persons.] He was descended from CORNELIUS DE HUYBERT, and Jean Van Haemstede. The family of Haemstede was descended from Witte (of Holland) Lord of Haemstede, natural son of Floris V, Count of Holland and Zealand, Lord of Friesland, &c. by a daughter of the Lord of Heusden (*).

(*) John the 7th.

This maiden had been kind to Floris only because he had promised to marry her. JACOB and HERMAN DE HUYBERT Cornelius's sons commanded the fleet, which conducted the Archduke Philip and the Queen his consort into Spain in the year 1506. These two illustrious persons were on board the ship commanded by these two brothers. The Fleet, which was very

la. ge.

(*) That is to say one of the Magistrates, not much unlike our Alderman.

(a) The Conferences held at Mechlin in the years 1652, and 1653.

(b) The King of Sweden had begun the war against Denmark, and had conquered all Denmark except the city of Copenhagen.

(c) This treaty which was concluded by the mediation of Sweden, put an end to the war between Charles II King of England and the United Provinces.

August the 1st 1622, and was chosen one of the Counsellors (*) of that city March 24, 1646. He acquitted himself of that function with so much wisdom and ability, that the Province of Zealand sent him Deputy to the Assembly of the States General, and afterwards to the first Conferences (a) that were held between the King of Spain's Deputies and those of the United Provinces, after a long and bloody war, which was gloriously finished at Munster January the 30th 1648, having been continued during fourscore years. He was sent Embassador Extraordinary to the King of Sweden, to the King of Poland, and to the Elector of Brandenburg, during that famous war, in which the Swedes made themselves masters of Poland, and gained so many victories over the King of Denmark, that they forced him to yield them three noble Provinces beyond the Sond. In March 1659 he was chosen Secretary of State to the Province of Zealand, and in May following he was appointed Plenipotentiary for the treaty of peace which was concluded between Sweden and Denmark (b), through the mediation of France, England and the United Provinces, in the year 1660. His Principals were so well satisfied with the ability and integrity with which he had acquitted himself of those great employments, that in March 1664 he was raised to the high post of Counsellor-Pensionary of Zealand. The commission for that post charges the Pensionary, amongst other things, to defend and assert at all times, and on all occasions, the rights and pre-eminence of the State, and the Laws and Privileges of the country; which renders that post very dangerous and difficult; and yet he performed the functions of it during twenty three years and an half, with the approbation of all the world, and to the satisfaction of his Principals; who when they sent him Deputy to the Council of State of the United Provinces, September the 27th 1687, declared expressly in his commission, that they were very well pleased with his long and faithful services, and would always remember them with gratitude. We must not omit to observe that he was chosen Plenipotentiary for the United Provinces in the year 1665, for the treaty of Breda (c). He died at the Hague January the 7th 1697. It was observed of him, that he adhered constantly to the Religion established by the Laws of the State. He was a strenuous assertor of it on every occasion, and would never suffer the least alteration in it, either with regard to doctrine or to discipline (d). I shall mention his three sons in the remark [B]. They had him interred in a chapel of the Church of Burg in Zealand, and caused an epitaph to be engraven on his tomb (e). The reader will find it below [C].

(d) Taken from Memoirs communicated to the Bookseller.

(e) He had herself ordered this tomb to be made, and besides that he contributed a great sum of money towards repairing the church in which he lies buried, he had the direction of the building of that edifice, which is reckoned to be done with a good taste for Architecture.

We

large, went through a great storm in the Channel; several ships were cast away in the Archduke's fight, who yet would not suffer the fleet to put into any harbour of England, because of some affairs which had happened between him and the King of England. But when the two brothers HUYBERT had represented to him the great danger they were in, and that it was absolutely necessary to shelter themselves in the harbour of Weymouth (†), he and his consort submitted to this advice, and abandoned themselves to the prudence and conduct of the two brothers. It was on this occasion the Archduke gave him this motto for his Coat of Arms, WAECKT HUYBERTS, that is to say, WATCH HUYBERTS. The Emperor Maximilian, and the Archduke Charles, in order to testify their gratitude for this great service done to the King of Castile, son of the former and father of the latter, did on March 13, 1513, confer on the three brothers JOHN, Jacob, and Herman DE HUYBERT, and their descendants, the privilege of wearing a sword, with leave to every one of them, to suffer their servants also to wear it, which in those days was a very particular mark of honour and distinction. December 19, 1512, Margaret, Archduchess of Austria, then Governess of the Low-Countries, sent John and Herman de Huybert to Henry VIII, King of England, for some negotiations which she was pleased to trust them with. The Emperor Charles V being at Ziericksee lodged at LIEVEN JACOBSON DE HUYBERT's house, who was then Burgomaster of the city, and Dike-Grave (‡) of the land of Schowen. The three brothers settled in the same city of Ziericksee, and built each of them a house there, and these three houses are still the largest and most considerable buildings at Ziericksee (1).

(†) Mr. Bayle says Weymouth, which is either a mistake of his, or an error of the press.

(‡) That is, Superintendent of the Moles.

(1) Taken from Memoirs communicated to the Bookseller.

(2) In the Account of Don Philip Prince of Spain's Journey through the Low-Countries, in the year 1548, printed at Antwerp in the year 1552, in folio, pag. 203.

Juan Christoval Calvet de Estrella speaks of this family with praise: y no poco nombrados, says he (2), eran los Huybertos de Cirixea per su valor y riqueza. i. e. "The Huyberts of Ziericksee were very famous for their courage and riches." The author of the supplement to the Abbot Ursperg's Chronicle, mentions the person who conducted the Archduke Philip into Spain; but the name he gives him differs from that which is given him in the Memoirs I have quoted. However it be, here follows what that author says. Carolus Quintus rediit in His- panias, Johannes Cornelius nauta navigatione decem dierum ab Anglico littore vehit. Hic nauta regem Philippum illustrissimi Augusti patrem, ultima navigatione, in summa tempestate in Hispanias vexerat, & reginam Danorum una cum Principe Ultrajectino in Daniam vexerat. Vir dives & peritissimus rei nauticae (3). i. e. "Charles the Fifth returned into Spain. John Cornelius (a), Captain of a man of war, conducted him thither in ten days sailing from the coast of England. This same Captain had conducted King Philip, the most illustrious Emperor's father, in his last voyage into Spain, during which they met with a very great storm; he had also conducted the Queen of Denmark, with the Prince of Utrecht, into Denmark, he was a rich man, and a very experienced mariner."

§ (*) John Cornelius. I suppose the author of that Chronicle mistook John for Jacob; and imagined that Cornelius, which signifies Cornelius's Son, was one of this Huybert's Christian names. Add. Rem.

[B] I shall mention his three sons.] The eldest is ANTHONY DE HUYBERT, Lord of Kreuningen, Counsellor in the High-Court of Justice. The second is JOHN DE HUYBERT, Lord of Nootgauw. He entered into the army; and his conduct and courage raised him to the post of Lieutenant General of the horse (4). The third, DAVID DE HUYBERT, has been Counsellor in the Council of Flanders, and is now one of the Directors of the East-India Company (5).

[C] His sons . . . caused an Epitaph to be engraven on his tomb, which the reader will find hereunder. It contains a short account of his life, and his character expressed in the most noble manner.

(3) Paralipomenes, ad Abbat. Ursperg. apud Anton. Mathæum, Var. Aevi Aulici, p. 249.

(4) His Britannic Majesty (King William) raised him to that post after the peace of Ryf-wick.

(5) Taken from the abovementioned Memoirs.

D. M.

Viri Nobiliss. & Amplissimi

P E T R I. D E. H U Y B E R T.

DOMINI. DE. BURG. ET CRAYSTEIN.

antiqua. & multis. imaginibus. clara. familia.

Zeelandica. oriundi.

Natus. est. Middelburgi. propter. ingenii. præstantiam. oris. facundiam. & industriam. singularem. invigilandi. bono. publico. in. Senatum. illius. urbis. cum. vix. adolevisset. est. cooptatus. omnium. expectationi.

(*) He has been Secretary to the city of Amsterdam, and is now Droffuart of Muyden, and Baljaar of Naarden and Grovieland &c. N. B. Droffuart is a kind of Governor, as we might say a Lord Lieutenant of a County, but with a greater power and for life.

We shall add a short supplement to this article which has been communicated to us by that great man's grandson PETER ANTHONY DE HUYBERT (*) Lord of Kreuningen, &c. This supplement is extracted from Luicius's Dutch Dictionary. When Peter de Huybert was sent Deputy from the Province of Zealand to the Council of State of the United Provinces in the year 1687, it was for the remainder of his life, (which was a particular mark of distinction, and a proof of the great esteem the Province of Zealand had for him) and indeed the States of that Province resolved, that as a reward for the pains and labours he underwent a long while for the service of his country, he should enjoy all his life time the same salary, and be free from house-rent, as when he was Pensionary, and should have the same privileges and immunities; and that it would be acceptable to the States, that he should be present in their assemblies, whenever he happened to be in the Province during their meetings. He justly deserved such a reward, since he had acted the part of a true patriot, and boldly assisted his country with his good advice in the most critical junctures [A], pectationi. cum. satisfecisset. post Pacem. Monasteriensem. ad. conventum. Mechlinensem. controversiis. non. decisis. inter. Hispanos. &. Batavos. componendis. dein. ad. Reges. Sueciæ. Poloniæ. Daniæ. &. Elect. Brandeb. missus. fuit. publice. gravissimis. de. rebus. iisque. confectis. ex. sententia. Reip. redux. a. Præpot. Ordd. Zealand. respecta. a. fide. &. prudentia. delectus. fuit. ut. iis. esset. ej. secretis. post. advocatus. perpetuus. Reip. Zealand. est. factus. summo. omnium. consensu. dehinc. ab. Unitis. Belgis. Abligatus. fuit. ad. Pacificationem. Bredanam. tandem. ne. tantæ. prudentiæ. fructum. soli. caperent. Zelandi. passî. sunt. eum. adscribi. Consilio. communi. Ordd. Sociatorum. septem. populorum. ut. omnium. utilitatibus. serviret. ad. has. dignitates. illum. evexit. non. ambitio. populi. &. potentium. sed. testata. cunctis. incredibilis. vigilantia. in. obsequiis. stationis. suæ. munitis. summa. consilii. præsentia. in. celeriter. inveniendis. quæ. tempora. Reip. exigebant. mira. dexteritas. in. efficiendis. quæ. in. rem. sapienter. consuluerat. singularis. sagacitas. in. arduis. &. impedimentis. negotiis. explicandis. &. ingens. robor. animi. in. iis. libere. oppugnandis. qui. recte. sententia. de. Rep. ejus. sæpe. auctor. fuit. adversabantur. partes. nec. fecit. nec. fovit. in. omni. varietate. rerum. &. Reip. vicissitudinibus. statum. &. dignitatem. suam. tenuit. illibatam. fatum. vitam. defletus. bonis. omnibus. &. valde. desideratus. O. D. VII. Januar. An. Ch. MD. CC. XVII. ætat. LXXV. mœtissimi. liberi. P. C.

as

the good advices he had often first proposed for the welfare of the Commonwealth. He never raised nor encouraged parties in the State, and in all the changes and revolutions of the Commonwealth, he always kept his dignity and character without blemish. He died full of days, lamented by all true patriots, and very much regretted, January the 7th 1697. This epitaph his mournful children made for their most beloved father."

[A] He boldly assisted his country with his good advice in the most critical junctures.] We shall give two instances of it, as we find them in the Memoirs that have been communicated to us. The first is as follows: "In the year 1675 the States of Guelderland offered the Prince of Orange (†) the sovereignty of their Provinces, with the title of Duke of Guelderland, and Earl of Zutphen, upon certain conditions. The Prince thought it proper to consult the other Provinces before he accepted that offer. He wrote therefore to the States of Holland, and almost in the same words to those of Zealand and Utrecht; the latter advised the Prince immediately to accept the offer of those of Guelderland. The Prince sent about the same time a letter written with his own hand to the Counsellor-Pensionary, which is still kept in Peter de Huybert's family. This great man had always been of the Prince's party, and had often endeavoured to persuade the Counsellor-Pensionary De Wit to yield some things to the Prince, which could not have been denied him without exposing the State to the danger of being forced by the populace to yield him things of much greater consequence. But yet he was of opinion that if they should advise the Prince to accept the Sovereignty offered him by those of Guelderland, it would be paving the way to make him obtain the Sovereignty of Zealand also. The Prince being acquainted with this opinion of Peter Huybert, desired him to call the States of Zealand together, but not to give his own opinion upon this affair, but to leave the members full liberty to give their votes. De Huybert convened the States accordingly; but as the members were of different opinions, they could not come so soon to a final resolution. At last, however, it was resolved, four votes against two, that the Prince should be dissuaded from accepting the offer of the States of Guelderland; and that notice should be given him of this resolution, in a letter containing the advices of the members, with the arguments alledged to support them: the letter was written to him according to a model, which the Counsellor-Pensionary had drawn up, at the request of the States. The Prince, who being the first and only Nobleman in Zealand, had very great credit there, shewed his discontent in a long letter, wrote March the 18th in the same year; after he had refused the offer of Guelderland, and declared that he would not accept it, when he knew how some of the chief cities of Holland had expressed themselves upon this affair." Here follows another instance of our Huybert's patriotism. "In the year 1684 there were great commotions in Zealand about the levying of sixteen thousand men: the Prince went thither to engage the Zealanders to suffer it. Four of the six cities declared for the raising of those soldiers, and the Prince de- fired that the Counsellor-Pensionary should declare the resolution of the States according to that ma- jority."

(†) William, afterwards King of England.

The Epitaph of that most noble and great man, PETER DE HUYBERT, Lord of Burg and Krayesteyn, descended of an antient and very noble family in Zealand. He was born at Middelburg; and for his eminent genius, great eloquence, and singular care in watching for the public good, he was admitted a member of the City Council, when he was hardly of age: and having fully answered the expectations of his country, he was sent, after the peace of Munster, to the congress that was held at Mechlin, to settle the differences that were not yet determined, between the Spaniards and the Dutch. He was afterwards sent to the Kings of Sweden, Poland, and Denmark, and to the Elector of Brandenburg, upon very important affairs; which having finished to the satisfaction of the Commonwealth, he was appointed by the States of Zealand their Secretary, for they were fully persuaded of his faithfulness and wisdom: some time after he was unanimously chosen Counsellor-Pensionary; he was afterwards sent by the United Provinces to the congress that was held at Breda for a treaty of peace. Lastly, that the Zealanders might not alone reap the benefit of his great wisdom, they suffered him to be sent a Deputy to the Council of State of the seven United Provinces, that he might be serviceable to all. He was not raised to these high dignities by the people's fondness, nor by the power of the great; but by his incredible care in acquitting himself of the duties of his functions, of which all were fully persuaded; by his great presence of mind in quickly advising what was necessary to be done for the public good in every circumstance; by his wonderful ability in executing what he had prudently advised; by his exquisite sagacity in explaining the most difficult and intricate affairs; and by his great courage and strength of mind in opposing those who refused to follow as we shall relate in the Remark below.

(*) Because this was one of those affairs which cannot be determined but by an unanimous consent.

“ But he protested that this was against his oath, against his commission, and against the union of the cities *. Whereupon the Prince himself took the votes, and the next day he delivered to the States a writing drawn up by way of apology, in which it was asserted, that the cities had agreed to determine this affair of raising soldiers, by a majority of votes : and thus this affair ended. All the cities kept silent, except Middelberg, which protested, and soon after Zeiricksee disapproved her Deputies conduct in this affair. As Huybert by such behaviour gained a bad reputation at the Stadtholder's court, he was prevailed upon to resign his post of Counsellor-Pensionary in the year 1687 ; but was fully rewarded for it, as we have seen in the text of this supplement.

We shall observe here that there is now but one branch of the males of this family extant ; namely, that of Anthony de Huybert, mentioned by Mr. Bayle : he died in the year 1702, leaving one son behind him, PETER ANTHONY DE HUYBERT still living, who communicated this supplement to us ; he has several sons.

HUYGENS (CHRISTIAN) one of the greatest Mathematicians and Astronomers of the seventeenth Century [A], was son of Constantine Huygens Lord of Zuylichem, who had served three successive Princes of Orange in the quality of Secretary. His mother's name was Sufannah van Baerle. He was born at the Hague in Holland April the 14th 1629. His inclination to the Mathematics appeared very early. His application to the Latin and Greek Languages did not prevent him from making a surprizing

[A] One of the greatest Mathematicians and Astronomers of the seventeenth century.] This appears from his writings which are as follow. I. Theoremata de Quadraturâ Hyperboles, Ellipsis, & Circuli, ex dato portionum Gravitatis Centro. Quibus subjuncta est Ætiraus Cyclometria Cl. V. Gregorii a S. Vincentio edita anno 1647. Cum assertione hujus Ætiraus. Leyden 1651 in 4to. It is likewise inserted among his Opera Varia, printed at Leyden 1724. This is the first work which our author published, and shewed what might be expected from him afterwards. II. De Circuli magnitudine inventa. Accedunt Problematum quorundam illustrium construtiones. Leyden 1654 in 4to. Reprinted in his Opera Varia p. 351. III. De Saturni Lunâ observatio nova. Hague 1656 in 4to. Reprinted in his Opera Varia p. 523. IV. Ad Cl. V. Francisc. Xaverium Ainscom S. J. Epistola, quâ diluunturea, quibus Ætiraus Cyclometria Gregorii a S. Vincentio impugnata fuit. Hague 1656 in 4to. Reprinted in his Opera Varia p. 341. V. De Ratiociniis in Ludo Aleæ: published at the end of Francis Schooten's book, intitled, Exercitationum Mathematicarum Libri quinq; Leyden 1657 in 4to. Reprinted in his Opera Varia. Our author had written this in Low Dutch, and Schooten, who had been his Master in Mathematics, translated it into Latin, in order to shew the usefulness of Algebra. Huygens is the first, who treated of this subject, which has since been handled by Monsieur Sauveur, Bernoulli, and Montmort in a more exact manner. VI. Brevis Institutio de usu Horologiorum ad inveniendas Longitudines. He wrote this in Low Dutch, and it was printed in that Language in 1657. It is printed in Latin in his Opera Varia p. 193. VII. Horologium. Hague 1658 in 4to. Huygens had exhibited in the preceding work a model of a new invented Pendulum ; but as some persons envious of his reputation were desirous to deprive him of the honour of the invention, he wrote this book to explain the construction of it, and to shew, that it was very different from the Pendulum of Astronomers invented by Galileo. It is reprinted in his Opera Varia p. 1. VIII. Systema Saturnium, sive de Causis mirandorum Saturni Phænomenon, & comite ejus Planatâ novo. Hague 1659 in 4to. Reprinted in his Opera Varia p. 553. Galileo had endeavoured to explain some of the surprizing Phænomena of the Planet Saturn. He had at first perceived two stars, which attended it ; and some time after he was amazed to find them disappear. Huygens being very desirous to account for these changes, perfected the Telescopes, and made himself glasses, by which he might view objects at the greatest distance. He applied himself then to observe all the Phases and Appearances of Saturn, and drew up a Journal of all the different aspects of that Planet, which vary extremely. He discovered the two Satellites, which attend it, and after a long course of observations perceived that the Planet was surrounded with a solid and permanent ring, which never changes its situation, though Saturn turns upon its center in the space of less than sixteen days. He discovered also a third Satellite of Jupiter, which till then had escaped the observation of the Astronomers. This new system gained him the esteem of the most eminent persons in that science. IX. Systema Saturnium ; cum assertione Systematis sui. Hague 1659 in 4to. Reprinted in his Opera Varia p. 619. This tract is designed as an answer to a piece, which had attacked his system under this title ; Estacii de Divinis Septempedani in Systema Saturnium Christiani Hugenii. Hague 1660 in 4to. X. Lettre du 5 Février 1665 sur les Horloges à Pendule. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans for February the 23d 1665. XI. Lettre du 26 Février 1665 sur le même sujet. Inserted in the same Journal for March the 16th 1665, and in Latin in his Opera Varia p. 213. XII. Relation d'une Observation faite dans la Bibliotheque du Roy à Paris le 12 May 1664 d'un Halo, ou Couronne à l'entour du Soleil, avec un discours de la cause de ces Meteores & de celles de Perelles. Paris 1667 in 4to. Our author read the discourse, which accompanied this relation, in an assembly of learned men in the King's library at Paris. It is printed in Latin among his Opuscula Posthuma. XIII. Examen du Livre de M. Gregory, intitulé: Vera Circuli & Hyperboles Quadratura. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans of July the 2d 1668. Printed in Latin in his Opera Varia p. 463. XIV. Lettre à l'Auteur du Journal des Sçavans touchant la Réponse que M. Gregory a faite à l'examen du Livre, intitulé: Vera Circuli & Hyperboles Quadratura. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans of November the 12th 1688. Printed in Latin in his Opera Varia p. 472. Our author in his Examen had asserted, that there were several mistakes in the demonstration, which Mr. James Gregory thought he had given of the impossibility of the Analytical Quadrature of the Circle ; and Mr. Gregory published an answer to his exceptions in the Philosophical Transactions. This engaged Mr. Huygens to write this letter, to which Mr. Gregory wrote a reply printed in the same Transactions. His book and his two replies are inserted among the Opera Varia of our author. XV. Observation de Saturne fait à la Bibliotheque du Roy. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans of February the 11th 1669. Printed in Latin in his Opera Varia p. 637. XVI. Lettre sur le mouvement, qui est produit par le rencontre des corps. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans of March the 18th 1699. Printed in Latin among his Opera Posthuma. XVII. Lettre touchant la Lunette Catoptrique de M. Newton. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans for February the 29th 1672. Printed in Latin in his Opera Varia p. 757. XVIII. Lettre touchant les Phænomenes de l'eau purgée d'air. Inserted in the same Journal for July 1672 : and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 769. XIX. Lettre touchant la Figure de la Planete de Saturne. Inserted in the same Journal for December the 12th 1672, and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 638. XX. Lettre touchant une nouvelle maniere de Barometre qu'il a inventée. Inserted in the same Journal for the same day ; and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 276. XXI. Horologium Oscillatorium ; sive de Motu Pendularum ad Horologia aptato, Demonstrationes Geometricæ. Paris 1673 in folio, and reprinted among his Opera Varia p. 27. This book contains the five following surprising progress at nine years of age in Music, Arithmetic, and Geography, in which he was instructed by his father. At thirteen years of age he was put upon the study of Mechanics, for which he appeared to have a peculiar genius: Two years after, viz. in 1644, he had the assistance of a master of Mathematics, under whom he made a vast proficiency in a short space of time. The year following he went to study Law in the University of Leyden under the learned Civilian Vinnius; but this study did not engage him so fully, but that he continued that of Mathematics under Professor Schooten. He left this University at the end of one year, and went to Breda, where an University had just been erected, the direction of which had been given to his father. He staid in that city in 1646 and the two following years. After his return to the Hague in 1649 he went to Holstein and Denmark in the retinue of Henry Count of Nassau; and was extremely desirous of going to Sweden, in order to see Des Cartes; but the short stay of the lowing discoursés; 1. Descriptio Horologii Oscillatorii.

 2. De Descensu gravium, & motu eorum in Cycloide.
 3. De Evolutione & Dimensione Linearum Curvarum.
 4. De Centro Oscillationis seu Agitationis. 5. Horologii secundi constructio, & Theoremata de vi centrifugâ.
 XXII. Lettre touchant une nouvelle Invention d'Horloges très-justes & très portatives. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans for August the 15th 1678, and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 764. XXIV. Nouvelle Invention d'un Niveau à Lunette, qui porte la preuve avec soi, & que l'on verifie & redresse d'un seul Endroit. Inserted in the same Journal for January the 29th 1680, and printed among his Opera Varia p. 254. XXV. Demonstration de la justesse de ce Niveau. Inserted in the same Journal of February the 26th 1680, and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 258. XXVI. Réponse à une Remarque faite par M. l'Abbé de Catelan contre sa proposition 4^e. du Traité des Centres du Balancement. Inserted in the same Journal for June the 29th, 1682, and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia, p. 222. The Abbé de Catelan's remark, which gave occasion to this answer, was published in the first Journal of the same year. The Abbé replied to Mr. Huygens in two pieces, one inserted in the Journal of July the 20th following, and the other in that of September the 14th: and in that of Sept. 7th, the same year he published Objection contre le mouvement Cycloide des Pendules. Several learned Mathematicians interested themselves in this dispute; and Mr. Bernoulli of Basil seeing that Mr. Huygens had made no reply to the Abbé de Catelan, published one for him in a letter inserted in the Journal of April the 24th 1684. XXVII. Réponse à la Replique de M. l'Abbé Catelan touchant les Centres d'agitation. Inserted in the Journal des Sçavans of July the 3d 1684, and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 231. It does not appear that the Abbé de Catelan replied to Mr. Huygens; but he answered Mr. Bernoulli in a piece inserted in the Journal of September the 11th 1684. Mr. Bernoulli was not silent, but published a reply in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig for the year 1686, p. 356. Six years after this the Marquis de l'Hospital having seen this piece of Mr. Bernoulli, wrote to Mr. Huygens upon that subject. His letter is published in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans for June 1690, p. 440. XXVIII. Remarques de M. Huygens sur la Lettre de M. le Marquis de l'Hospital & sur l'Ecrit de M. Bernoulli. Inserted in the same work, p. 449; and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia, p. 246. These are all the pieces which have been published upon this dispute. They are all printed in Latin among Mr. Huygens's Opera Varia. XXIX. Solutio du Problème proposé par M. de Leibnitz: Trouver une Signe de Descende, dans laquelle le Corps pesant descende uniformement, & approche également de l'Horison en tems égaux. Published in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres of October 1687, p. 1110, and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia, p. 290. XXX. Astroscopia compendiaris, Tubi Optici molimine liberata. Hague 1684 in 4to. Reprinted among his Opera Varia p. 261. XXXI. Traité de la Luminiere, où sont expliquées les Causes de ce qui arrive dans la Reflexion & dans la Refraction, & particulièrement dans l'étrange Réfraction du Cristal d'Islande, avec un Discours de la Cause de la Pesanteur. Leyden 1690 in 4to, and printed in Latin among his Opera varia, Tom. I. p. 1. XXXII. Lettre touchant le Cycle Harmonique. Inserted in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans of October 1691, p. 78, and reprinted in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 745. XXXIII. Solutio Problematis de Lineâ Catenariâ; published in the Acta Eruditorum for the year 1691, p. 281, and reprinted among his Opera Varia p. 292. XXXIV. Construction d'un Problème de Geometrie: Trouver une Ligne égale à une partie donnée de la Ligne Logarithmique: published in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans for February 1693, p. 244; and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia, p. 507. XXXV. De Problemate Bernoulliano in Actis Lipsiensibus anni 1693. proposito. Published in the Acta Eruditorum of the same year, p. 475, and reprinted among his Opera Varia, p. 516. XXXVI. Constructio Universalis Problematis à Joanne Bernoullio proposita. Published in the Acta Eruditorum of the year 1694, p. 338, and reprinted among his Opera Varia p. 518. XXXVII. Epistola ad G. G. Leibnitium, upon the same subject; inserted in the same place. XXXVIII. Remarque sur le Livre de la Manœuvre des Vaisseaux de M. Renau. Inserted in the Bibliothèque Universelle, Tom. 25, p. 195, and in the Journal des Sçavans for May the 9th 1695, and printed in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 292. Mr. Renau having answered this remark in the Journal of the 16th and 23d of May 1695, Mr. Huygens published, XXXIX, Replique à la Réponse de M. Renau; inserted in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans for April 1694, p. 355, and reprinted in Latin among his Opera Varia p. 305. XL. ΚΟΣΜΟΘΕΩΡΟΣ, sive de Terris Cœlestibus eorumque ornatu conjectura, ad Constantinum Fratrem, Gulielmo III. Magnæ Britannicæ Regi a Secretis. Hague 1698 in 4to, and reprinted among his Opera Varia p. 641, and translated into French under the title of Nouveau Traité de la Pluralité des Mondes par feu M. Huygens, traduit du Latin en François par M. D. Paris 1702 in 12mo. The translator of this book is Monsieur du Four, who has prefixed to it a very learned and ingenious preface. The Journalists of Trevoux had no reason to doubt whether this work was Mr. Huygens's; since it is incontestably his, and he had even printed the first sheet during his life, but was prevented by death from proceeding any further. He endeavours to shew in it, that it is probable, that the Planets are inhabited. XLI. In the collection published under the title of Divers Ouvrages de Mathématique & de Physique par Messieurs de l'Académie Royale des Sciences, printed at Paris 1693 in fol. there are some pieces of our author, which have been reprinted among his Opera Varia. XLII. Opuscula Postuma, quæ continent Dioptricam, Commentarios de Vitris figurandis, Dissertationem de Coronâ & Parheliis, Traçatum de Motu & de Vi centrifugâ, Descriptionem Automati Planetarii. Leyden 1703 in 4to. Mr. Huygens had left by will to the University of Leyden his Mathematical writings, and requested Messieurs de Volder and Fullenius, the former of whom was Professor of Philosophy and Mathematics at Leyden, and the other at Francker, to examine these works, and publish what they should think proper. This is what they have done in this volume. Mr. Huygens had written in Low Dutch the second of the tracts, which it contains, and which relates to the art of forming and polishing Telescope-glasses, to which he had greatly applied himself; but Dr. Boerhaave, Professor of Physic at Leyden, had taken the pains to translate it into Latin. XLIII. Opera Varia. Leyden 1724 in 4to. This collection, which contains the greatest part of the pieces, which Mr. Huygens had published separately, is divided into four parts; the first of which contains the pieces relating the Count in Denmark would not permit him. He travelled into France in 1655, and took the degree of Doctor of Law at Angers. He returned to that Kingdom in 1660, and from thence passed over to England the year following. He took a third journey to France in 1663. His merit became so conspicuous in that Kingdom, that Monsieur Colbert resolved to fix him at Paris by settling a considerable pension upon him. Mr. Huygens consented to it, and resided at Paris from 1666 to 1681. But his health, which had obliged him in 1670 and 1675 to visit his native air, at last forced him to leave France intirely, and return to Holland. He died at the Hague June the 8th 1695, aged sixty six years. He had been chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society at London in 1663, and a Member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris during his residence in that city. His whole life was spent in curious and useful researches. He loved a quiet and studious manner of life. He frequently retired into the country, in order to prevent interruption; but he did not at all contract that four and morose temper and behaviour, which are commonly the effects of solitude and retirement (a).

(a) See his Life prefixed to his Opera Varia, and Bisnoge de Baulval's Hist. des Ouvrages des Savants, tom. 11. Août, 1695, Art. 9. 2d edit. 1698.

lating to Mechanics; the second, those relating to Geometry; the third, those relating to Astronomy; and the fourth, those, which could not be ranged under any of these titles. Mr. Gravesande had the care of this edition, in which he has inserted several additions to the pieces contained in it, extracted from our author's manuscripts. The pieces, which were originally in French or Low Dutch, were translated into Latin by John Oosterdyk Schacht, son of a Professor of Physic at Leyden. XLIV. Opera Reliqua. Amsterdam 1728 in 4to, two Tomes. This new collection was published also by Mr. Gravesande. The first Tome contains the Treatises of Light and Gravity, which the Booksellers procured to be translated into Latin; but that translation not being exact, it was carefully revised by the translator of the other works of Mr. Huygens. The second Tome contains his Posthumous Works, which had been published in 1703, but with some corrections and additions. XLV. In the Philosophical Transactions we have the following pieces of his. 1. An Observation of Saturn the 17th of August 1668. Numb. 45, p. 900. 2. A Summary Account of the Laws of Motion: Numb. 46, p. 925. 3. Instructions concerning the use of Pendulum Watches for finding the Longitude at Sea, together with a Method of a Journal for such Watches: Numb. 47, p. 937. 4. Observation of an Halo or Circle about the Sun at Paris May the 12th 1667, together with a Discourse concerning the Cause of these Meteors; as also that of Parhelia or Mock-Suns: Numb. 60, p. 1065. 5. Some Communications confirming the present appearance of the Ring about Saturn;

by Huygens and Hooke: Numb. 65, p. 2093. 6. Concerning the Observation of Saturn shortly to be without the Ansa or Arms: Numb. 78, p. 3026. 7. An Attempt to render the Cause of that odd Phenomenon of the Quicksilver's remaining suspended far above the usual Height in the Torricellian Experiment: Numb. 86, p. 5027. 8. Some Letters exchanged between Monsieur Slysius and Huygens about a considerable Optic Problem of Albaxen: Numb. 97, p. 6119. 9. A Continuation of the Optic Problem of Albaxen: Numb. 98, p. 6140. 10. Thoughts concerning Mr. Hooke's Observations for proving the Motion of the Earth, mentioned Numb. 101: Numb. 105, p. 89. 11. Concerning a new Invention of his of very exact and portative Watches: Numb. 112, p. 272. 12. Some Experiments made in the Air-pump upon Plants: together with a way of taking exhausted Receivers away from off the said Engine: by Huygens and Papin: Numb. 120, p. 477. 13. A Continuation of the Experiments made in the Air-pump by Huygens and Papin: Numb. 121, p. 492. XLVI. In the register of the manuscripts of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris there is a Manuscript Treatise of the Load-stone, written by our author. XLVII. In the hands of William Jones Esq; F. R. S. is an original letter of Mr. Huygens dated at the Hague August the 18th 1662, Concerning the Weight of the Air at a given Height, with a Rule to find that Height; and likewise the Weight of the Air at any place being given, to find the Height of that Place. XLVIII. In the Register Books of the Royal Society there are a great many pieces of our author never yet published. T.

(a) Lives of all the Lords Chancellors, Lords Keepers, and Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal of England. By an impartial hand, vol. 1. in the Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, pag. 1. edit. London 1708 in 8vo. (b) Wood, Art. Oxon vol. 2. col. 533. 2d edit. London 1721.

HYDE (EDWARD), Earl of Clarendon, and Lord High Chancellor of England, was son of Henry Hyde of Pyrton in Wiltshire [A], by Mary, daughter and heir of Edward Langford of Trobridge in the same county. He was born at Dinton near Hindon in Wiltshire on the 16th of February 1608 (a). In Lent Term 1622 he became a student of Magdalen Hall in the University of Oxford (b). February the 14th 1625 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); but failing of a Fellowship of Exeter College, for which he stood (d), he removed to the Middle Temple, where he studied the Laws for several years (e). In 1633 he was one of the chief managers of the Masque presented by the Gentlemen of the Inns of Court to their Majesties at Whitehall on Candlemas Day [B]. In the Parliament, which began at Westminster April the 10th 1640, he served as Burgefs for Wotton-Basset in Wiltshire [C]. But that Parliament being soon after

(c) Idem, F. R. S. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 231. (d) Idem, Art. Oxon. ubi supra. (e) Idem, ibid. and Life of the Lord Chancellor Hyde, prefixed to A Collection of several valuable pieces of the Right Honourable Edward Earl of Clarendon, pag. 2. edit. London 1727 in 8vo.

(1) Life of the Lord Chancellor Hyde, pag. 1, 2. prefixed to A Collection of several Pieces of the Right Hon. Edward Earl of Clarendon, edit. London 1727 in 8vo. (2) Ibid. But Mr. Wood, Art. Ox. vol. 2. col. 532. and the author of The Lives of the Lords Chancellors, &c. in the Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. 1. pag. 1. assert, that Mr. Henry Hyde, was third son of Mr. Laurence Hyde.

[A] Son of Henry Hyde of Pyrton in Wiltshire.] This Gentleman was descended of an antient family, originally of Cheshire (1), and was second (2) son of Laurence Hyde of Guffage St. Michael in Dorsetshire; whose fourth son was Sir Alexander Hyde of Salisbury, father of Dr. Hyde Bishop of Salisbury; Sir Robert Hyde, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; Sir Henry Hyde, beheaded under Cromwell, and eight other sons, all remarkable men, and raised by the Chancellor (3).

[B] In 1633 he was one of the chief managers of the Masque presented by the Gentlemen of the Inns of Court to their Majesties at Whitehall on Candlemas Day.] Mr. Whitelocke tells us (4), that this Masque was held "more reasonable, because it would manifest the difference of their opinion from Mr. Prynne's new learning, and serve to confute his Histrionastix against Interludes." The managers chosen for the Middle Temple were Mr. Hyde and Mr. Bulltrode Whitelocke; for the Inner Temple Sir Edward Herbert and Mr. Selden; for Lincolns-Inn Mr. Noy the Attorney General and Mr. Gerling; and for Grays-Inn Sir John Finch and another Gentleman.

[C] Served as Burgefs for Wotton-Basset in Wiltshire.] In this Parliament Mr. Hyde distinguished himself upon the following occasion. The King in a message to the House of Commons had acquainted them, that as he heard the ship-money was unwillingly submitted to by the people, he would for the future release it in such a manner as the Parliament should advise, if they would grant him twelve subsidies to be paid in three years. This occasioned great debates that day and the next, when Mr. Hamden seeing the matter ripe for the question, desired it might be put, "whether the House should comply with the proposition made by the King, as it was contained in the message?" Hereupon Serjeant Gianville, the Speaker, (for the House was then in a Committee) endeavoured in after dissolved, he was chosen for Saltash in Cornwall in the long Parliament, which began November the 3d the same year. His abilities began now to be very much taken notice of, and he was employed in several Committees to examine into divers grievances [D]; but at last being dissatisfied with the proceedings in the Parliament, he retired to his Majesty, and was made Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Privy Counsellor, and Knight (f). The Parliament were so highly incensed at Sir Edward's leaving them, that in a pathetic speech to persuade them to comply with the King, and so reconcile him to Parliaments for ever. No speech ever united the inclinations of a popular Council more to the Speaker than this did; and if the question had been presently put, it was believed, that few would have opposed it. But after a short silence, the other side recovering new courage, called again with some earnestness, that Mr. Hamden's question should be put, which being like to meet with a concurrence, Mr. Hyde being very solicitous to keep things in some tolerable calmness, then stood up, and giving his reasons for his dislike to that question, proposed, "that to the end every man might freely give his Yea or No, the question might be put only upon giving the King a supply; and if this was carried, another might be put upon the manner and proportion; if not, it would have the same effect with the other proposed by Mr. Hamden." This, after it had been some time opposed and diverted by other propositions; which were answered by Mr. Hyde, would, as it was generally believed, have been put and carried in the affirmative, though positively opposed by Herbert the Solicitor General, if Sir H. Vane the Secretary had not stood up, and assured them as from his Majesty, that if they should pass a vote for a supply, and not in the proportion proposed in his Majesty's message, it would not be accepted by him; and therefore desired, that the question might be laid aside. This being again urged by the Solicitor General, and it being near five in the afternoon, it was readily consented to, that the House should adjourn to the next morning, at which they were suddenly dissolved; and within an hour after Mr. Hyde met Mr. St. John, who was seldom known to smile, but then had a most cheerful aspect, and observing Mr. Hyde melancholy, asked him, What troubled him? who answered, "the same, he believed, that troubled most good men, that in a time of so much confusion so wise a Parliament should be so imprudently dissolved." Mr. St. John replied somewhat warmly, "that all was well; that things must grow worse before they would grow better; and that that Parliament would never have done what was requisite (5)." (5) History of the Rebellion, B. 2.

(3) Life of the Lord Chancellor Hyde, ubi supra.

(4) Memorials of the English Affairs, pag. 19. edit. London 1731.

(f) Lives of the Lords Chancellors, &c. pag. 38. and Wood, Atb. Oxon. col. 533.

[D] Employed in several Committees to examine into divers grievances. Being appointed in April 1641, Chairman of the Committee which took into consideration the state of the court of York, of which the Earl of Strafford had been for some years President; he reported the case to the house; upon which it was resolved, that the commissions and instructions, whereby the President and Council in the north exercised a jurisdiction, were illegal both in creation and execution; and that it was unprofitable to his Majesty, and inconvenient and grievous to his subjects in these parts. Mr. Hyde being chosen hereupon to manage the conference with the Lords touching the same court, made a very eloquent speech, which was printed in Rusworth's Collections (6). But though he was zealous for the redressing of the grievances of the nation, yet he was on the other hand as watchful for the security of the established church; and a short bill being brought in to take away the Bishops vote in Parliament, and to leave them out of all commissions of the peace, or any thing that had relation to temporal affairs, he was very earnest for throwing it out, and said, "that from the time that Parliaments begun, Bishops had always been a part of it. That if they were taken out, there was no body left to represent the clergy; which would introduce another piece of injustice, which no other part of the Kingdom could complain of, who being all represented in Parliament, were bound to submit to whatever was enacted there, because it was, upon the matter, with their own consent; whereas if the bill was carried, there was no body left to represent the clergy, and yet they must be bound by their determination." When he had done, the Lord Falkland, who always sat next to him, which was so much observed, that if they came not in together, as they usually did, every body left the place for him, who was absent, stood up, and declared, that he was of another opinion; and that he never thought, that the constitution of the Kingdom would be violated by the passing that act; and that he had heard many of the Clergy protest, that they would not own themselves represented by the Bishops; but if that could be made appear, it was to be presumed, that the House of Peers, among whom they sat and had their votes, would throw it out; and so facetiously answering some other particulars, he concluded for passing the act (7). Mr. Hyde was averse to the severe proceedings against the Earl of Strafford; but though those Lords and Commoners who were supposed to favour that Nobleman, were branded with the name of Straffordians and betrayers of their country, and a list of them was posted up at the corner of the wall of Sir William Brouncker's house in the Old-Palace-Yard, Westminster, yet such was the prudence of Mr. Hyde in this affair, that he was not included amongst them (8). When the Commons had drawn up a remonstrance of all the grievances since the beginning of the King's reign, and Mr. Hamden moved for an order for the immediate printing of it, Mr. Hyde opposed that motion with so much vigour, that he was committed to the Tower, where continuing some days, he afterwards resumed his place in the House (9). The Commons having prepared a charge against the Lord Chief Baron Davenport, Baron Weston, and Baron Trevor, Mr. Hyde was sent up with the impeachment to the Lords, to whom he made an excellent speech; which begins thus: "My Lords, There cannot be a greater instance of a sick and languishing Commonwealth, than the business of this day. Good God! how have the guilty these late years been punished, when the judges themselves have been such delinquents! It is no marvel, that an irregular, extravagant, arbitrary power, like a torrent, hath broken in upon us, when our banks and our bulwarks, the laws, were in the custody of such persons. Men, who had left their innocence, could not preserve their courage; nor could we look that they, who had so visibly undone us, themselves should have the virtue or credit to rescue us from the oppression of other men. It was said by one, who always spoke excellently, that the twelve Judges were like the twelve lions under the throne of Solomon; under the throne in obedience, but yet lions. Your Lordships shall this day hear of six, who (be they what they will else) were no lions; who upon vulgar fear delivered up their precious forts they were trusted with, almost without assault, and in a tame easy trance of flattery and servitude, lost and forfeited (shamefully forfeited) that reputation, awe, and reverence, which the wisdom, courage, and gravity of their venerable predecessors had contracted and fastened to the places they now hold, and even rendered that study and profession, which in all ages hath been, and I hope, now shall be of an honourable estimation, so contemptible and vile, that had not this blessed day come, all men would have had that quarrel to the law itself, which Marius had to the Greek tongue, who thought it a mockery to learn that language, the masters whereof lived in bondage under others. And I appeal to these unhappy Gentlemen themselves, with what a strange negligence, scorn, and indignation, the faces of all men, even of the meanest, have been directed towards them, since (to call it no worse) that fatal declension of their understanding in those judgments, of which they stand here charged before your Lordships." He concludes thus: "If the excellent, envied constitution of this Kingdom hath been of late distempered, your Lordships see the causes. If the sweet harmony between the King's protection and the subjects obedience hath unlucki-

(7) History of the Rebellion, lib. 3.

(8) Lives of the Lord Chancellors, &c. pag. 19.

(9) History of the Rebellion, B. 4.

(6) Vol. 1. Part 2.

(g) Memorials of the English Affairs. By Bulstrode Whitelocke Esq; pag. 62. edit. London 1732.

(b) Lives of the Lords Chancellors, &c. pag. 46.

(i) Ibid. pag. 46. 70.

that in their instructions to their General, the Earl of Essex, they excepted him, with a few others, from any grace or favour from them (g). In January 1643 he sat as a member of the Parliament assembled at Oxford; and in November 1644 he was one of the King's Commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge. Not long after this treaty, the King sending the Prince of Wales into the West to have the Superintendency of the affairs in those parts, Sir Edward Hyde, and the Lords Capel, Hopton, and Colepepper were appointed to attend his Highness, and to be of his Council (b). Upon the declining of the King's cause, he, with the Lords Capel and Colepepper, fled from Pendennis Castle in Cornwall to Scilly, and thence to Jersey, and afterwards in 1648 to France (i); where, after the death of King Charles I, he was sworn of the Privy Council to Charles II. In November 1649, he and the Lord Cottington were sent Ambassadors extraordinary into Spain. In 1657 he was constituted Lord High Chancellor of England. Upon the death of Cromwell, and the divisions in England, General Monk being supposed to have a favourable view to the King, his Majesty's friends in England began to entertain some hopes of a change; and the year before the Restoration, the Lord Chancellor was indefatigable in writing letters, declarations, &c. to forward it [E], especially during those six months in which the King was absent from Brussels. But while these things were agitating, the Duke of York falling in love with Mrs. Anne Hyde, the Lord Chancellor's eldest daughter, resolved to marry her, which, with all imaginable secrecy both from the King and Chancellor, he performed [F]. Upon the Restoration the Chancellor revisited his native country; and, as he had been the greatest sharer of his master's sufferings, he had a share proportionable of his glory. October the 27th 1660 he was chosen Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and soon after created Baron of Hindon in Wiltshire, Viscount Cornbury in Oxfordshire, and Earl of Clarendon in Wiltshire; and, on the death of Henry Lord Falkland, Lord Lieutenant of Oxfordshire. In the Convention he made a speech by the King's order, desiring a bill of oblivion might be brought in, as the best method to engage his Majesty to his subjects [G]. He took care likewise neither to load the King's prerogative, nor encroach upon the liberties of the people; and therefore would not set aside the Petition of Right, nor endeavour to raise the Star-Chamber or High-Commission Courts again, when it was in his power; nor did he attempt to repeal the bill for triennial Parliaments; though at the same time he took care to repeal all things extorted by the long Parliament from King Charles I, and to settle the militia affairs. But other acts relating to the prerogative he did not touch upon, as tonnage, poundage, ship-money, &c. And when he might have obtained two millions for the standing revenue, he asked but 1200000 l. per ann. which he thought would still put the King upon necessity of having recourse to his Parliaments (k). This just conduct is said to be occasioned by a domestic accident [H]. In 1662 he is said to have opposed the proposal for the King's marriage with the Infanta of Portugal [I], and the sale of

(k) Life of the Lord Chancellor Hyde, pag. 23, 29.

Dunkirk.

ly suffered interruption; if the royal justice and honour of the best of Kings have been mistaken by his people; if the duty and affection of the most faithful and loyal nation have been suspected by their gracious Sovereign; if by these misrepresentations and these misunderstandings the King and people have been robbed of the delight and comfort of each other, and the blessed peace of this Island been shaken and frightened into tumults and commotions, into the poverty, though not into the rage of war, as a people prepared for destruction and desolation; these are the men actively or passively, by doing or not doing, have brought this upon us: Mijera Servitus falso Pax vocatur; ubi judicia deficiunt, incipit Bellum."

[E] Indefatigable in writing letters, declarations, &c. to forward it. A great many of his letters to that purpose are printed in the Appendix to Vita Johannis Barwick, S. P. T. printed at London, 1721, in 8vo.

[F] Which with all imaginable secrecy both from the King and Chancellor he performed. It was done so secretly, that after the Restoration, when the Lady's pregnancy appeared, the Duke was attacked by several of his friends in private with so much vigour and resentment, that he was brought under the strongest temptations to disown the obligation. But the King, though much surprized at the affair, very generously preserved the honour of an excellent servant, who had not been at first privy to it, and assured him, that this accident should not lessen the esteem and favour he had for him (10).

[G] In the convention he made a speech by the King's order, desiring a bill of oblivion might be brought in, as the best method to engage his Majesty to his subjects. The Chancellor was charged with advising the King, that not only clemency, but signal favour should be shewn towards those, who had opposed his father and himself; and at the same time a neglect of those, who had adhered to the Royal Cause; and this upon the following maxim, "that to make his enemies friends, would secure them to him; and the Loyalists had given such proofs of unchanged fidelity, that forgetfulness, and even persecution itself, could never alter their dictates of honour and conscience, and therefore might safely be put off with the satisfaction of having done their duty (11)." This the Chancellor solemnly denied to the last.

[H] This just conduct is said to have been occasioned by a domestic accident. Bishop Burnet informs us (12), that "when he first began to grow eminent in his profession of the Law, he went down to visit his father in Wiltshire; who one day, as they were walking in the fields together, observed to him, that men of his profession were apt to stretch the prerogative too far, and injure liberty; but charged him, if ever he came to any eminence in his profession, never to sacrifice the laws and liberty of his country to his own interest, or the will of his Prince. He repeated this twice, and immediately fell into a fit of Apoplexy, of which he died in a few hours; and this advice had so lasting an influence on him, that he ever after observed and pursued (13) Ibid. "it."

[I] He is said to have opposed the proposal for the King's marriage with the Infanta of Portugal. This is asserted by Bishop Burnet (14), Archdeacon Echarde (14), Coke in his Detention, and other writers. But they are contradicted by the late Lord Lansdown (15), who observes that "the King was newly restored to dominions wasted and impoverished by a long ruinous civil-war. The highest bidder in ready money to supply the necessities of state was the alliance most likely to prevail. Whatever Portugal proposed to give, Spain offered as much; but the performance of promise on that side was suspected; Portugal

(11) Life of the Lord Chancellor Hyde, pag. 26, 27. and Echarde, ubi supra.

(12) History of his own Time, vol. 1. B. 2.

(14) History of England.

(15) Vindication of General Monk, Duke of Albemarle, from some Calumnies of Dr. Burnet, and from mistakes of Dr. Echarde, in relation to the Sale of Dunkirk, and the Portugal Match.

(10) Echarde's History of England, ad ann. 1660, B. 1. c. 1.

Dunkirk [K]. The year following he had articles of high-treason exhibited against him by the Earl of Bristol, but they were rejected by the House of Lords [L]. In 1664

“ was thought the surest bargain, and had the preference. The King had a very ample portion with the Infanta; but being at the same time engaged in honour to stand by his brother-in-law against Spain, he was soon reduced to seek expedients to answer the demands of that service. The readiest that offered was the sale of Dunkirk; an act of necessity, not choice in the Earl of Clarendon.” His Lordship, to prove that the Chancellor proposed this marriage, quotes a long passage from the Memoirs of Portugal, written by the Sieur d’Abblancourt, Resident from France at the Court of Portugal, when this marriage proposal was made, in which France itself, says his Lordship, was too much interested not to be well informed. Thomas Burnet, Esq; in his Remarks upon the Right Honourable the Lord Lansdowne’s Letter to the author of the Reflections Historical and Political, &c. as far as relates to Bishop Burnet, has made some observations on his Lordship’s tract above quoted. And Mr. Thomas Carte (16) citing a relation of Dr. Hough, the present Bishop of Worcester, from the Duke of Ormonde’s mouth, and Sir Robert Southwell, affirms, that the King’s resolution to marry the Infanta, “ was taken without the knowledge, either of the Duke of Ormonde, or the Lord Chancellor Clarendon. The King first communicated it to the Chancellor, and told him at the same time, that he had agreed to the match. The Chancellor said, he hoped his Majesty was not determined, for there were several things deserved to be maturely considered in that affair, which he was ready to offer, if his Majesty had not prevented it by telling him, that he was absolutely determined. The Chancellor acquainting the Duke of Ormonde and the Earl of Southampton with the matter, it was agreed among them, that he should desire the King, to grant them all three an audience together. This was granted: they attended him in the room which was called Tam Chiffinch’s Closet, where the rarities stood; and gave him their reasons against the match. The Chancellor opened the subject, and particularly urged, not only what the Spaniards had objected as to the barrenness of the Lady proposed, but the accounts and reasons, which he had from other hands to believe, that the Infanta would never prove with child. That if it proved so in the event, it would be a great infelicity to the whole Kingdom; and this was a consideration so very important, that the Portugal Minister ought to be talked to plainly on the subject, and the matter seriously examined. The King replied, that he was satisfied, that accusation came originally from the malice of the Spaniards, and was without foundation; and in fine, told them, he had proceeded so far in the matter, that it was now too late for him to retreat, and he must go on with the treaty. During this audience, upon their remonstrating against his marrying a Roman Catholic wife, the King asked, Where is there a Protestant fit for me to marry? It was said, his Majesty could be at no loss in that point, for there were Ladies enough in Germany of that religion, and of families fit for the alliance of any Prince. Cods fish, says the King, they are all foggy, and I cannot like any one of them for a wife. Upon this answer, which excluded at once all Protestants that could be proposed, the Duke of Ormonde was clearly convinced, that the resolution was taken for the King to marry none but a Roman Catholic. It was a point indeed, which his mother, and those of that religion, which were in the secret of the change he had made in his, had extremely at heart, and thought of the utmost consequence, as well to fix him theirs, as to advance the cause of Catholicity.”

[K] And the sale of Dunkirk] Bishop Burnet (17) and Archdeacon Echard absolutely acquit the Chancellor of having any hand in that sale. But the Lord Lansdowne (18) cites the Letters and Negotiations of Count d’Estrades, who was the sole manager on the part of France for the treaty of Dunkirk, to shew, that the first motion came from the Chancellor in a Letter dated at Hampton-Court June 29, 1662, and signed Clarendon. There is good reason to think the Queen-Mother, when she came over into England, was charged with this affair of Dunkirk as well as that of the Portugal match: and though the King did not immediately agree to the sale, yet being soon after reduced to great straits for want of money, unable to bear the expence of the garrison of that place out of the revenue of the civil-list, and unwilling to apply to Parliament for a supply, lest it should fall into the hands of a power, which the late troubles had taught him to dread, he resolved to take that party, and obliged the Earl of Clarendon to enter into a treaty with the Marechal d’Estrades for that purpose. The Chancellor in this point acted Ministerially, it being his general maxim, as well as that of his friend the Duke of Ormonde, to offer their advice freely to the King; but when his Majesty had once taken a resolution, however contrary it were to their sentiments, they presently acquiesced, used great caution in avoiding all reflections on his measures, for fear of making bad worse, and still continued in their respective posts to discharge their duty, and obey those commands which they wished had never been given (*).

[L] The year following he had articles of high treason exhibited against him by the Earl of Bristol; but they were rejected by the House of Lords.] The substance of the whole accusation was as follows: “ That the Chancellor being in place of highest trust and confidence with his Majesty, and having arrogated a supreme direction in all things, had, with a traitorous intent to draw contempt upon his Majesty’s person, and to alienate the affections of his subjects, abused the said trust in manner following. 1. He had endeavoured to alienate the hearts of his Majesty’s subjects, by artificially insinuating to his creatures and dependents, that his Majesty was inclined to popery, and designed to alter the established Religion. 2. He had said to several persons of his Majesty’s privy-council, That his Majesty was dangerously corrupted in his religion, and inclined to Popery: That persons of that religion had such access and such credit with him, that unless there were a careful eye had upon it, the protestant religion would be overthrown in this kingdom. 3. Upon his Majesty’s admitting Sir Henry Bennet to be Secretary of State in the place of Sir Edward Nicholas, he said, That his Majesty had given ten thousand pounds to remove a zealous protestant, that he might bring into that high place a concealed papist. 4. In pursuance of the same traitorous design, several friends and dependents of his have said aloud, That were it not for my Lord Chancellor’s standing in the gap, popery would be introduced into this kingdom. 4. That he had persuaded the King, contrary to his reasons, to allow his name to be used to the Pope and several Cardinals in the solicitations of a Cardinal’s cap for the Lord Aubigny, great Almoner to the Queen: In order to effect which he had employ’d Mr. Richard Bealing, a known papist; and had likewise applied himself to several papist priests and Jesuits for the same purpose, promising great favour to the papists here, in case it should be effected. 6. That he had likewise promised to several Papists, he would do his endeavour, and said, be hoped to compass the taking away all penal laws against them; to the end they might presume and grow vain upon his patronage, and by their publishing their hopes of toleration, encrease the scandal designed by him to be raised upon his Majesty throughout the kingdom. 7. That being intrusted with the treaty betwixt his Majesty and his royal consort the Queen, he concluded it upon articles scandalous and dangerous to the protestant religion. Moreover he brought the King and Queen together without any settled agreement about the performance of the marriage rites, whereby the Queen refusing to be married by a protestant priest, in case of her being with child, either the succession should be made uncertain for want of the due rites of matrimony, or else his Majesty be exposed to a suspicion of having been mar-

(* This remark was communicated to us by Mr. Tho. Carte.

(16) History of the Life of James Duke of Ormonde, vol. 2. B. 6. pag. 254.

(17) History of his own Times, vol. 1. B. 2.

(18) Vindication of General Monk, &c.

1664 he opposed the war with Holland. In August 1667 he was removed from his post of Lord Chancellor [M], and in November following impeached of high treason, and other ried in his own dominions by a Romish priest. 8. That having endeavoured to alienate the hearts of the King's subjects upon the score of religion, he endeavoured to make use of all his scandals and jealousies to raise to himself a popular applause of being the zealous upholder of the protestant religion, &c. 9. That he farther endeavoured to alienate the hearts of the King's subjects, by venting in his own discourse and those of his emissaries opprobrious scandals against his Majesty's person and course of life, such as are not fit to be mentioned, unless necessity shall require it. 10. That he endeavoured to alienate the affections of the Duke of York from his Majesty, by suggesting to him, That his Majesty intended to legitimate the Duke of Monmouth. 11. That he had persuaded the King, against the advice of the Lord General, to withdraw the English garisons out of Scotland, and demolish all the forts built there, at so vast a charge to this kingdom; and all without expecting the advice of the Parliament of England. 12. That he endeavoured to alienate his Majesty's affections and esteem from the present Parliament, by telling him, That there was never so weak and inconsiderable a House of Lords, nor never so weak and heady a House of Commons; and particularly, That it was better to sell Dunkirk, than to be at their mercy for want of money. 13. That contrary to a known law made last session, by which money was given and applied for maintaining of Dunkirk, he advised and effected the sale of the same to the French King. 14. That he had, contrary to law, enriched himself and his Treasurers by the sale of offices. 15. That he had converted to his own use vast sums of publick money raised in Ireland by way of subsidy, private and publick benevolences, and otherwise given and intended to defray the charge of the Government in that kingdom. 16. That having arrogated to himself a supreme direction of all his Majesty's affairs, he had prevailed to have his Majesty's customs farmed at a lower rate than others offered; and that by persons with some of whom he went a share, and other parts of money resulting from his Majesty's revenue." This heavy charge, filled with insinuations and aggravations, appeared rather to have been a personal quarrel, than any serious concern for publick truth and justice. The words concerning the King's private inclinations, here charged as spoken by him, were generally thought to have been the real expressions or suggestions of the Lord Chancellor; but surely it was not altogether without a cause. They may be thought the effect of an indecent freedom, but can hardly be imagined to have proceeded from any want of integrity or loyalty. And indeed there appears a perverse turn in the articles, first to represent the Chancellor as jealous of popery, and complaining of the King's inclination to it by choosing new Ministers popishly affected; and yet after all to make the Chancellor himself the instrument of those very designs laid for popery, and the professed promoter of them. This is somewhat surprizing; and what has since made the design'd revenge more apparent, is that the articles should tax the Chancellor with saying, that Sir Henry Bennet was a concealed papist, when the Earl of Bristol himself, the accuser, was the same, and had been privy to all that the King had done at Fontarabia at the Pyrenean Treaty. And indeed the House of Lords seemed sensible of the Malice of the accusation, as soon as the articles were exhibited and read before them. Upon which, after a short consideration, they made the following order: "That a copy of the articles or charge of high-treason exhibited this day by the Earl of Bristol against the Lord Chancellor, be delivered to the Lord Chief Justice; who, with all the rest of the Judges, are to consider, Whether the said charge hath been brought in regularly and legally; and whether it may be proceeded on, and how; and whether there be any treason in it or no; and make report thereof to this House on Monday next, if they can, or else as soon after as possibly they can." Upon this important occasion all the Judges met at Sergeant's Inn, and the Earl of Bristol repaired to them, desiring to see their order; which being read, he told them, that he came out of respect to know of them, whether they were informed how it came into the House of Peers, whether as a charge or not. But one of the Judges, who had been present when it was delivered in, saying, that they were tied up by their order, the Earl took some exception at the manner of his expression, as if his address were unnecessary at that time; and taking it as a rebuke upon him, departed. But according to their order, which supposed it to be a charge of high treason, and not mentioning misdemeanors, upon consideration they unanimously agreed on this ensuing answer, which the Lord Chief Justice Foster delivered into the House of Lords: "We conceive, that a charge of high treason cannot, by the laws and statutes of this realm, be originally exhibited by one Peer against another unto the House of Peers; and that therefore a charge of high treason by the Earl of Bristol against the Lord Chancellor, mentioned in the order of reference to us of the 10th of this instant July, hath not been regularly and legally brought in; and if the matters alledged in the said charge were admitted to be true, altho' alledged to be traiterously done, yet there is no treason in it." Upon the reading of this answer the Earl of Bristol took exceptions at it; and some of the Lords, who were friends to the Chancellor inter'd, that if it was not regularly and legally brought in, it was a libel, and ought to be condemned, and the author of it censured." To satisfy the House, one of the Judges, upon conference with his brethren, did the next day deliver the reasons of the opinion of the Judges in their answer; when the Earl of Bristol, a little to extenuate the matter, said, that the articles were not intended by him as a charge, but as an information. Hereupon their Lordships, upon a fair debate of the question, did unanimously resolve to declare their concurrence with the opinion of the Judges (19). We

(19) Lives of the Lords Chancellors, pag. 208, & seqq. and Echard's History of England, ad ann. 1663, B. 1. cap. 1.

[M] Removed from the Post of Lord Chancellor.] The great seal was taken from him on the 31st of August 1667, and given to Sir Orlando Bridgman, with the title of Lord Keeper. Mr. Echard observes (21), that it has been often admired, that the King should not only consent to discard, but soon after banish a friend, who had been as honest and faithful to him as the best, and perhaps more useful and serviceable than any that he had ever employ'd; which surely could never have been brought to bear without numerous envious and enemies. To shew how these were raised, we are to remember, that during the height of his grandeur, which continued two years without any rivalry, as well as the rest of his Ministry, he manifested an inflexible steadiness to the constitution of the Church of England, in equal opposition to the Papists on one side, and the Dissenters on the other; so that none of these could be ever reconciled to him or his proceedings. Yet he seemed forward in the beginning to do so much towards the making of a coalition of all parties, that the Cavaliers and strict Churchmen thought themselves too grossly neglected; and many of them, upon that account, though unjustly, entertained insuperable prejudices against him, and joined with the greatest of his enemies. His authority was once so great and prevailing, that even when it was much diminished, the unpopular acts, miscarriages, or misfortunes were generally charged upon him. Besides, his personal behaviour was attended with a sort of a gravity and haughtiness, which struck a very disagreeable awe into a Court filled with licentious persons of both sexes. He often took liberty to give such reproofs to these persons of mirth and gallantry, as were very unacceptable to them; and sometimes

(20) Lives of the Lords Chancellors, pag. 207, 208.

(21) History of England, ad ann. 1667, B. 1. c. 3.

other crimes and misdemeanors by the House of Commons [N]; upon which in the beginning thought it his duty to advise the King himself in such a manner, that they took advantage of him, and as he passed in Court, would often say to his Majesty, There goes your Schoolmaster! The chief of these was the Duke of Buckingham, who had a surprising talent of ridicule and buffoonry; and that he might make way to his ruin, he often acted and mimicked the Chancellor in the presence of the King, walking stately with a pair of bellows before him for the purse, and Colonel Titus carrying a fire-shovel on his shoulder for the pace, with which sort of banter and farce the King was too much delighted and captivated. These, with some more serious of the popish party, assisted by the solicitations of the ladies of pleasure, made such daily impressions upon the mind of the King, that he at last gave way, and became pleased, and willing to part both from his person and services. It is generally believed, that the King had some particular and private resentments against him, as checking of those, who were too forward in loading the crown with prerogative and revenue, and such like proceedings. And more particularly we are told, that he had countermined the King in a grand design, which he had to be divorced from the Queen, under these pretences: "That she had been pre-engaged to another person; or that she was incapable of having children." The person designed to supply her place was Mrs. Stuart, a beautiful young Lady, who was related to the King, and had some office under the Queen. The Chancellor, to prevent this, sent for the Duke of Richmond, who was of the same name, and seeming to be sorry, that a person of his worth and relation to his Majesty should receive no marks of his favour, advised him to marry this Lady, as the most likely means to advance himself. The young Nobleman, liking the person, followed the advice, made immediate application to the Lady, who was ignorant of the King's intentions, and in a few days married her. The King thus disappointed, and soon after informed how the match was brought about, banished the Duke with his new Duchess from Court, and reserved his resentment against the Chancellor to a more convenient opportunity. However this might be, in a letter to the Earl of Sandwich from the Lord Arlington, who never was a friend to the Chancellor, we find these words: "His Majesty hath taken the seals from the Lord Chancellor, and given them to my Lord Bridgman with a great deal of satisfaction to the world and to himself; and he hopes, that rectifying some other important things before the Parliament, he may expect they will deliver him out of the straits he is so unhappily fallen into." As to the private reasons of the King's abandoning the Chancellor, his Majesty wrote an obliging letter to the Duke of Ormonde, then in Ireland, to give him satisfaction in that matter, as knowing him to be his intimate friend. Mr. Echard observes, that this letter was never yet published, nor would a copy of it be granted; but that he had more than once been told the substance of it by those who had read it; and the principal reason there given by the King was, The Chancellor's insupportable Temper. Mr. Thomas Carte in his History of the Life of James Duke of Ormonde, printed at London 1736 in fol. has given a particular account of the reasons of the disgrace of the Chancellor, from which we shall borrow some passages. He observes (22), that his enemies had found means by a swarm of libels, and by an infinite number of little emissaries, to possess the people with a notion, that he was the cause of the late miscarriages in affairs; tho' he had never intermeddled in any part of the management of the Dutch war, to which he had ever been averse. His lease of Worcester-house, wherein he had lived ever since the restoration, expiring this year, and the owner of it resolving to make it the place of his own habitation, he had taken a very unhappy resolution of building an house on a piece of ground, which the King had given him near St. James's. There he erected a magnificent pile at a much greater expence than he imagined or intended, which almost ruined him in his fortune, by loading him with an heavy debt, and at the same time raised the envy of the world, who were willing enough to suppose it built by money corruptly gotten. He had removed thither in April before the affront put upon the nation at Chatham; and the clamours and fury of the populace raised on that occasion, were all levelled at him, whom they were misled to think the author of all the calamities of the kingdom; so that he was in continual apprehensions, that they would pull down his house, and that he should fall a sacrifice to the fury of a misguided and enraged multitude. In this situation he was still intrepid, supported by the clearness of his conscience, and well satisfied, that he had done nothing that he ought to be ashamed of himself, or his friends that he ought to be undeserved misfortune of popular odium some natural ones were added; the Dukes of Cambridge and Kendal, sons of the Duke of York, and the Lady Clarendon died within a few days of one another. He lost on May 16th his chief friend the Earl of Southampton, upon whose death the treasury was put into the hands of the Duke of Albemarle, Lord Ashley, Sir T. Clifton, Sir W. Coventry, and Sir John Duncombe, none of them well affected to the Chancellor. Mr. Carte proceeds to remark, "That the Chancellor was certainly a Minister of as great probity, disinterestedness, and integrity, as hath been known in any age: his whole conduct, and his letters to the Duke of Ormonde (to a Friend, towards whom he had no reserve) are an irrefragable proof of this part of his character. But he seems to have fallen into that very mistake, which he remarks in Archbishop Laud, of imagining, that a man's own integrity will support him in all times and all circumstances of affairs, in the measures which he takes for the public good. He was passionate, and the solemn and cool in debate, did not bear an unreasonable contradiction with that temper, which selfish, artful, and designing men always take care to preserve. He was not without the pride of conscious virtue; and knowing well the just reasons upon which he gave his advice on any occasion, when he found it rejected, he thought himself the less concerned to prevent the ill consequences of measures taken by others counsels in opposition to his own, which were dictated purely by his zeal for the King's service, and his regard to the good of the kingdom. From the time that the Lord Arlington was made Secretary of State, he was apt upon occasion to complain, that he had no credit at Court, which disobliged the King; and to clear himself of having an hand in certain resolutions, which perhaps would otherwise not have been approved in the event; and yet his dislike thereof was still represented as the reason of their miscarriage, and served the advisers for an excuse. He always gave the King prudent and honest advice; but if it was over-ruled, (as was too often the case,) he did not care to intermeddle, but left it to wiser men (as he styled them) to follow their own measures, and to perform what they had confidently undertaken for the King's service. This manner of conduct made him neglect his interest (of which few Ministers have ever had a greater share, and yet founded upon virtue) in the House of Commons, till at last it was utterly ruined." Mr. Carte afterward tells us (23), that the Duke of Buckingham undertook, that the Parliament should do the King's business, if his Majesty would but sacrifice the Chancellor to their resentments. That the King was weary of a Minister, of whom from his early youth he had learned to stand in awe, and who still seemed to keep up an authority over him, by the remonstrances which he made to him on all occasions with great freedom and little ceremony. And that the Chancellor was thought to have promoted the marriage of the Duke of Richmond with Mrs. Stewart, in order to prevent the King from procuring a divorce from the Queen, and marrying that Lady. "Whether he actually encouraged the Duke of Richmond's marriage, doth not appear, says Mr. Carte; but I find, that he was so strongly possess'd of the King's inclination to a Divorce, that even after his disgrace he was persuaded, the Duke of Buckingham had undertaken to carry that matter through the Parliament. It is certain too, that the King considered him as the chief promoter of that marriage, and resented it in the highest degree. Thus affected towards the Chancellor, he easily closed with the Duke of Buckingham, to give him up to the malice of his enemies."

[N] Impeach'd of high treason by the House of Commons.

(22) Vol. 2. B. 6. pag. 349.

(23) Pag. 351.

ginning of December he retired into France, leaving a petition to the House of Lords [O]. Whereupon a bill was passed for banishing him from the King's dominions. He resided at Rouën in Normandy, where he continued seven years to the time of his death. In 1668 his life was attempted at Evreux near that city [P]. He died at Rouën December the 9th 1674, and his body was brought to England and interred in Westminster-Abbey. Besides his History of the Rebellion [Q] he mons.] When the articles were exhibited to the House, Lawrence Hyde, Esq; afterwards Earl of Rochester, being the Lord Clarendon's second son, rose up and said, "That every particular of the charge against his father was groundless; and he was so fully satisfied thereof, that he humbly proposed to the House, that before it was received, his accusers might pitch on any one article, which ever they pleased, and support it by proofs; and if they did so, his father was ready to acknowledge himself guilty of the whole charge." The violence of the Earl of Clarendon's enemies hindered this proposal from being accepted: so that on the 12th of November Mr. Edward Seymour carried up the impeachment of the Earl to the bar of the House of Lords, and desired, that he might be committed to safe custody, till the Commons should make good their charge. But the Lords, dissatisfied at this general way of proceeding, sent to the Commons on the 15th of November, to desire a conference in the Painted Chamber; where they informed them, that they had not confined the Earl, nor sequestered him from Parliament, it being against the Petition of Right so to do, till particular Treason was charged against him. This occasioned warm debates in the House of Commons, who were so highly enraged, as to resolve, "that the Lords not having comply'd with the desire of the Commons in committing the Earl of Clarendon, and sequestering him from Parliament upon the impeachment from that House, was an obstruction to the public justice of the kingdom, and a precedent of evil and dangerous consequence." And upon this they appointed a Committee to draw up a declaration to vindicate their proceedings. During these divisions and debates, the Earl finding the storm to bear very hard upon him from all quarters, and especially from the Court, thought it most advisable to withdraw himself, and retire to Normandy.

[O] Leaving a petition to the House of Lords.] The Lords received it on the 3d of December, and sent two of the Judges to acquaint the Commons of it, and desired a conference; where the Duke of Buckingham, who was plainly aimed at in the petition, delivered it to the Commons, and with his usual way of insult and ridicule said, "The Lords have commanded me to deliver to you this scandalous and seditious paper sent from the Earl of Clarendon. They bid me to present it to you, and desire you in a convenient time to send it to them again; for it has a style, which they are in love with, and therefore desire to keep it." When the petition was read in the House of Commons, it occasioned very warm speeches, and was voted by them, to be scandalous, malicious, and a reproach to the justice of the nation, and that it should be burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

[P] In 1668 his life was attempted at Evreux near that city.] In the Bodleian library at Oxford there is an original letter from Mr. Oliver Long to Sir William Coventry, Secretary of State, dated at Evreux in Normandy April the 26th 1668; in which is the following passage. "As I was travelling from Rouën towards Orleans, it was my fortune April the 23d N. S. to overtake the Earl of Clarendon (then in his unhappy and unmerited exile) who was going towards Bourbon, but took up his lodging at a private Hotel in a small walled town, called Evreux, some leagues from Rouën. I, as most English Gentlemen did to so valuable a patriot, went to pay him a visit near supper-time, when he was, as usual, very civil to me. Before supper was done, twenty or thirty English sea-men and more came, and demanded entrance at the great gate, which being strongly barred, kept them out for some time; but in a short space they brake it, and presently drove all they found, by their advantage of numbers, into the Earl's chamber; where by the assistance of but three swords and pistols we kept them out for half an hour, in which dispute many of us were wounded by their swords and pistols, whereof they had many. To conclude, they broke the windows and doors, and under the conduct of one Howard, an Irishman (who has three brothers, as I am told, in the King of England's service) and an Ensign in the company of canoneers, they quickly found the Earl in his bed, not able to stand by the violence of the gout, where, after they had given him many blows with their swords and staves, mixed with horrible curses and oaths, they dragged him on the ground into the middle of the yard, where they encompassed him around with their swords, and after they had told him in their own language, how he had sold the Kingdom, and robbed them of their pay; Howard commanded them all, as one man, to run their swords through his body. But what difference arose among themselves before they could agree, God above, who alone sent this spirit of dissention, only knows. In this interval their Lieutenant, one Swaine, came and disarmed them; sixteen of the ring-leaders were put into prison, and many of those things they had rifled from him found again, which were restored and of great value. Monsieur la Fonde, a great man, belonging to the King of France's bed-chamber, sent to conduct the Earl on his way hither, was so desperately wounded in the head, that there were but little hopes of his life. Many of these assassins were grievously wounded; and this heinous action is so much repented by all here, that many of these criminals will meet with an usage equal to their merit. Had we been sufficiently provided with fire-arms, we had infallibly done ourselves justice on them; but we fear not but the Law will supply our defect." We shall add here an extract from a manuscript communicated to us by the learned Richard Rawlinson, LL. D. and F. R. S. and intitled Remarks made in a Journey from Exeter 24 Febr. 1667 to Naples and Leghorn, ending 24 March 1672: By John Brooking. The passage is as follows. "The 8th of April 1667. N. S. I paid a visit to the Earl of Clarendon Hyde, quondam Lord Chancellor of England, who was fled hither [Rouën in Normandy] incognito, to avoid the penalties of several accusations, that might have followed on his remaining at home. And chiefly incited were the seamen; for while I was here, there was a Captain of a ship in port, that came to see him, who desired the Captain to send him a piece of English salt beef, which he promised to send him the next day without fail; but as he was putting it over-board, the seamen declared, that if that went over for his Lordship, they would immediately throw the Captain into the sea after it. So the Captain was forced to excuse his promise, and desired my Lord to have patience mixed in his salad; else he might chance to get a stomach, and want what would satisfy it; at least that which he intended should. My Lord received me (in company with Mr. Wilkins) very civilly, entertaining us in discourse near an hour. He is a fair, ruddy, fat, middle statured, handsome man, about 60 years old, mighty affable, (though whence this should proceed, I will not judge). He told us, he was to go hence to Orleans, and thence to Bourbon, to make use of those waters. He seemed much troubled with the gout, had only five or six attendants, and one Gentleman afforded him by the King of France for his safe conduct through his dominions."

[Q] His History of the Rebellion.] The first volume of this work was printed at Oxford in fol. 1702; the second in 1703; and the third in 1704. It has been reprinted several times since in six volumes in 8vo. A French translation of it was printed at the Hague in 1704 and 1709 in 12mo. Dr. Henry Felton (24) styles our author "the noblest and most impartial Historian this nation hath produced. The

(24) Dissertation on reading the Classics and forming a just style. par. 220. 4th edit. London 1730.

he wrote several other works [R].

“ compassion and repentment of his thoughts, the noble openness and freedom of his reflections, the glorious debt he pays to friendship, and the veil he kindly draws over the sorrows and reproach of his country are so admirably and well expressed in such lively colours, that we are struck with sympathy, and do feel by reading, that he wrote from his heart under the deepest sense and most present impression of the evils he bewaileth. I have met with none, that may compare with him in the weight and solemnity of his style, in the strength and clearness of diction, in the beauty and majesty of expression, and that noble negligence of phrase, which maketh his words wait every where upon his subject, with a readiness and propriety that art and study are almost strangers to.” The author of the Critical and Philosophical Enquiry into the Causes of Prodiges and Miracles, as related by Historians. With an Essay towards restoring a Method and Purity in History; tells us (25)

(25) Part 1. pag. 60, 61, 62. edit. London 1727, in 12mo.

Raleigh and Hyde “ are the only two, whom our nation has yet produced of an Historic genius. The first excelling in grandeur and majesty of thought, equal to the subject he undertook: and the latter, for his comprehensive knowledge of mankind, will for ever bear the unrivall'd title of the Chancellor of Human Nature. It is the great Hyde, and he alone, that in the knowledge of mankind is always clear, deep, easy and perfect. I make no scruple to confess, that in the History of the Grand Rebellion there are more offences against the truth of composition than in all the best Greek and Roman Historians put together; and think it no difficulty to prove, that in that single work there are more and far greater excellencies than in the whole body of ancient History. It is indeed the only one of English History we can glory in; the French boast a great number of considerable writers of their own History: but to them we may answer as the lioness in the fable did to an ignoble beast, who set an unreasonable value on the fruitfulness of her womb: It is true, I bear but one, but that one is a lion.” With regard to the Charge of this History's being interpolated we shall refer to the article of ATTERBURY (FRANCIS), and only add here a memorandum written by the late Thomas Slater Bacon Esq; in a folio copy of that History now in the possession of — Gill Esq;

(*) Vol. 2. pag. 445, 446.

“ Easter Sunday 1731, Dover-Street. Dr. Terry of Christ Church in Oxford told my Lord Oxford, Lord Duplin, Thomas Harley, Mr. Wotton, and me, that he was employed at Westminster-School by Bishop Sprat about 1693 to read the MS. of the History of the Earl of Clarendon, the first volume writ by the Earl in a bad hand, but all the volumes were fairly writ by his Secretary. The manuscript was carried to Oxford, when

“ the Bishop, Dr. Aldrich, Mr. Smallridge, Atterbury, Stratford prepared it for the press, and did not alter any thing, only particles and parentheses; and the Earl of Rochester added about fourteen lines of the King's escape from the Spaniards to Breda, out of his father's MS. and there was omitted by the family about the Queen's government, where there is a text, Woe to woman, &c. He had given an account of the Queen's asking at a Play, who that fat man was, pointing to Hyde: the King said, it was he that did all the mischief.” There must be some mistakes in this memorandum or in Bishop Atterbury's Vindication of Bishop Smallridge, Dr. Aldrich, and himself from the scandalous Reflections of Oldmixon, relating to the publication of Lord Clarendon's History; since the Bishop declares in that piece, that himself and Bishop Smallridge were not any ways concerned in preparing that History for the press, nor ever saw it till it was in print.

[R] He wrote several other works.] Several Speeches in Parliament, during his Chancellorship, from the Restoration to the year 1667. They are in number at least ten, and were printed in folio papers. A full Answer to an infamous and traitorous Pamphlet, intitled, A Declaration of the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, expressing the reasons and grounds of passing their late resolutions touching no farther address or application to be made to the King. London 1648 in 4to. The Difference and Disparity between the Estates and Conditions of George Duke of Buckingham and Robert Earl of Essex. Printed in the Reliquie Wottonianæ, London 1672 in 8vo. This piece was written when he was young, and before he had entered on the stage of business. Animadversions on a Book intitled, Fanaticism fanatically imputed to the Catholick Church by D. Stillingfleet, and the Imputation refused and retorted by S. C. By a Person of Honour. London 1674 in 8vo. It was printed twice that year. The Imprimatur is dated November the 29th 1673. A Letter to the Duke of York; and another to the Dutchess of York, upon occasion of her embracing the Roman Catholic Religion. A brief View and Survey of the dangerous and pernicious Errors to the Church and State in Mr. Hobbes's Book, intitled Leviathan. Oxford 1676 in 4to. The Imprimatur by Dr. Ralph Bathurst, Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, is dated July the 1st 1676. The Dedication to his Majesty is dated at Moulins May the 10th 1673. He made likewise Alterations and Additions to a Book, intitled, “A Collection of the Orders heretofore used in Chancery.” London 1661 in 8vo, done by and with the advice and assistance of Sir Harbottle Grimstone Bart. Master of the Rolls. His History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in Ireland was printed at London 1726 in folio. His Essays were printed there in one volume in fol. T.

☞ HYDE (Dr. THOMAS), one of the most learned Writers of the seventeenth Century, was son of Mr. Ralph Hyde, a Minister of Billingsley near Bridgnorth in Shropshire, and descended from the Hydes of Norbury in Cheshire. He was born at Billingsley June the 29th 1636; and having from his youth a strong inclination to the Oriental Languages, began the study of them under his father; and afterwards in 1652 being admitted a student in King's College in Cambridge, he became acquainted there with Mr. Abraham Wheelock, who being an admirable Linguist, encouraged and promoted him in his studies of the Eastern Learning (a). After he had continued a little more than a year in that College, Mr. Wheelock sent him to London, and appointed him one of the correctors of the Polyglot Bible, then about to be published by Dr. Brian Walton, afterwards Bishop of Chester, he being the sole cause and contriver of that excellent work. Mr. Hyde, besides his attendance in the correction of it, he set forth the Persian Pentateuch, and assisted in correcting the Arabic, Syriac, and Samaritan Languages in that work, and in collating various copies [A]. In 1658 he went to the University

(a) Wood, Art. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 973. 2d edit. London 1721.

[A] He set forth the Persian Pentateuch, and assisted in correcting the Arabic, Syriac, and Samaritan languages in that work, and in collating various copies.] He transcribed the Persian Pentateuch out of the Hebrew characters, in which it was first printed at Constantinople, into the proper Persian characters, which by Archbishop Usher was then judged impossible to have been done by a native Persian, because one Hebrew letter frequently answered to divers Persian letters, which were difficult to be known. He translated it likewise into Latin. What he did further in the Polyglot, is specified in the Preface of it by Dr. Walton in these words. Nec prætereundus est D. Thomas Hyde, summa spei juvenis, qui in Linguis Orientalibus supra ætatem

University of Oxford, and was admitted a Student of Queen's College, where he was soon after made Hebrew Reader. In the beginning of April 1659, Richard Cromwell, then Chancellor of the University, sent his letters to the members thereof, which say, that "he is of full standing since his admission into the University of Cambridge for the degree of Master of Arts; that he hath given such public testimony of his more than ordinary abilities and learning in the Oriental Languages, &c." Whereupon the Delegates of the University ordered on the 12th of the same month, that "he should accumulate the degree of Master of Arts by reading only a lecture in some of those Languages, and that he should have such fees remitted to him as belong to the University, &c." This order being confirmed by the Convocation on the same day, he was admitted Master of Arts the next (b), and soon after made second Keeper of the Bodleian Library in the room of Henry Stubbe ejected. In 1665 he published a Latin translation of Ulug-Beig's Observations concerning the Longitude and Latitude of the fixed Stars, with notes [B]; and in December the same year was elected Head keeper of the Bodleian Library upon the resignation of Dr. Thomas Lockey (c). In October 1666 he was collated to the Prebend of Yatminster secunda in the Church of Salisbury, upon the death of Dr. John Wall (d). In 1674 he published a Catalogue of the printed Books in the Bodleian Library [C]. December the 14th 1678 he had the Archdeaconry of Gloucester, vacant by the death of John Gregory, conferred on him by Dr. John Prichett, Bishop of that See, whose wife was nearly related to the first wife of our author (e). April the 3d 1682 he was admitted Doctor of Divinity (f). December the 22d 1691, he was elected Arabic Professor upon the death of Dr. Edward Pocock (g). He published several works besides those already mentioned [D].

(b) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. 974. and Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 126.

(c) Wood, Atb. Oxon. col. 974.

(d) Le Neve, Fasti Eccles. Anglicanae.

(e) Wood, Atb. Oxon. col. 974.

(f) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 219.

(g) Idem, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 974.

He

etatem magnos progressus fecit, quorum specimina deditum in Arabibus, Syriacis, Persicis, &c. corrigendis, tum in Pentateucho Persico characteribus Persicis describendo, qui antea solis Hebraicis existit, ejusque versionem Latinam concinnando.

[B] In 1665 he published a Latin Translation of Ulug Beig's Observations concerning the Longitude and Latitude of the fixed Stars, with Notes.] It was printed in 4to under this title: Versio Latina e Lingua Persica, Commentarii in Observationes Ulugh-Beigi de Tabulis Longitudinis & Latitudinis Stellarum fixarum. This is a small part of an Astronomical work of Ulug Beig. To this Dr. Hyde has added Mohamedes Tizinus's Tables of the Declension and Ascension of the Fixed Stars.

[C] In 1674 he published a catalogue of the printed books in the Bodleian library.] It was printed at Oxford in folio under the following title: Catalogus impressorum Librorum Bibliothecae Bodleianae in Academia Oxoniensi: Cura & Opera Thomae Hyde e Coll. Reginae Oxon. Protobibliothecarii. The Imprimatur is dated November the 26th, 1674. The Dedication to Archbishop Sheldon is dated November the 25th 1674.

[D] He published several works besides those already mentioned.] He published Quatuor Evangelia & Acta Apostolorum Lingua Malaica, Characteribus Europaeis, at Oxford, 1677, in 4to. His Epistola de Mensuris & Ponderibus Serum sive Sinensium, &c. was printed at the end of Dr. Edward Bernard's book, intitled, De Mensuris & Ponderibus antiquis Libri tres, Oxford, 1688, in 8vo. In 1690 he published at Oxford in 4to, Annotatiunculae in Tractatum Alberti Bobovii Turcarum Imp. Mohammedis IV. olim Interpretis primarii de Turcarum Liturgia, peregrinatione Meccana, Circumcisione, aegrotorum visitatione, &c. Subjungitur Castigatio in Angelum a Sancto Josepho, Carmelitarum discalceatorum in Perside praefectum olim generalem. In 1691 he published at Oxford in 4to, Itinera Mundi, sic dicta nempe Cosmographia, autore Abrahamo Peritsol; cum versione & notis Thomae Hyde. At the end of this book he has reprinted the two pieces abovementioned, viz. Tractatus Alberti Bobovii de Turcarum Liturgia, &c. and Castigatio in Angelum a Sancto Josepho. In 1694 he published at Oxford in 8vo, De Ludis Orientalibus Libri duo, &c. The first book is divided into two parts; the first of which parts contains Mandragoras, seu Historia Sbabildii, &c. in Latin; and the second part Hist. Sbabildii, &c. in Hebrew and Latin. This Historia Sbabildii had been published by itself at Oxford, 1689, in 8vo. The second book contains Historia Nerdiludii, hoc est dicere, Truncolorum, &c. He wrote likewise In Historiam Plantarum Oxoniensium Annotationes Nominum singularum Plantarum Lingua Arabica & Persica & Turcica, published by Jacob Bobart in his Historia Plantarum, at Oxford, 1699, in 4to. Mr. Wood tells us (1), that in 1694, he had ready for the press Historia Aegypti naturalis curiose de Animalibus, Plantis, &c. Compendium, Arabicè & Latine, cum Iconibus & Notis, in 8vo. Chinnuch seu Catechismus Ecclesiae Anglicanae Hebraicè versus, cum Notis, in 8vo. Historia Religionis Veterum Persarum eorumque Magorum, cum Zoroastris Vita & praeceptis, ejusque de Christi Vaticinium. Una cum Specimine veteris Linguae & Scripturae Persicae jam postliminio restituta. This was printed at Oxford in 1700 in 4to, under the following title: Historia Religionis Veterum Persarum eorumque Magorum. Ubi etiam nova Abrahami, & Mithrae, & Vestae, & Manethis Historia, &c. atque Angelorum Officia & Praefecturae ex Veterum Persarum sententiâ. Item Persarum annus antiquissimus tangitur, is rû Gjenshâd detegitur, verus rû Yefdegerd de nova proditur, is rû Melishâb, is rû Seljûk & rû Chorzenhâd notatur, & is rûs Katâ & rûs Oighûr explicatur. Zoroastris vita ejusque & aliorum vaticinia de Messiah è Persarum aliorumque monumentis eruuntur: Primitivae opiniones de Deo & de Hominum Origine referantur; originale Orientalis Sibyllae Mysterium recluditur, atque Magorum Liber Sad-dor (Zoroastris praecepta seu Religionis Canones continens) è Persico traductus exhibetur. Dantur Veterum Persarum Scripturae & Linguae (ut haec jam primò Europae producantur & literato Orbi postliminio reddantur) Specimina. De Persicae ejusdemque Linguae Nominibus, deque bujus Dialectis & à modernâ differentiis strictim agitur. Auctor est Thomas Hyde, S. T. D. Ling. Hebraicae in Universitate Oxon. Professor Regius, & Ling. Arabicae Profess. Laudianus. Praemisso Capitulo Elencho; accedunt Icones, & Appendix variarum Dissertationum. This work is dedicated to John Lord Somers, Baron of Evesham. It is divided into thirty five chapters; to which is subjoined a large appendix containing several dissertations. It appears from the title, that Dr. Hyde's design is not to give us a plan of the religion of the modern Persians, which is to be found in the Koran, the Mahometan being the established religion in Persia now. In the first chapter he distinguishes the Persians into ancient and modern. The ancient Persians had a religion intirely different from that of the modern, and it has been still preserved among some of their descendants. The modern Persians are a mixture of several different nations, Saracens, Tartars, Parthians, Medes, old Persians become Mahometans, and women of Georgia and other countries transplanted into Persia, who have formed a language compounded of those of all these different nations. Our author, before he enters into particulars, gives us in this first chapter a general idea of the religion of these ancient Persians. There are some still who profess it, both in Persia and India, and lived separately from the rest as much as possible, and eat only with those of their own religion, in order to preserve their purity. This religion has passed through three different states. The first

(1) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 975.

He died in the middle of February 1702.

HYPERIUS

first was a state of purity; those, who professed it, worshipped only the true God, of whom they had very just notions, which they had received from their ancestors Shem and Elam. The second state is that, in which Sabaism was mixed with the knowledge and worship of the true God. They did not indeed worship the sun and the planets; but they had too much reverence for those stars, and fell into superstition in that respect. Abraham opposed, with the utmost vigour, all kinds of false worship, and all the superstitions of his age; and as the Persians highly revere that Patriarch, and acknowledge that they received their religion from him, Dr. Hyde is persuaded, that Abraham reduced them from their errors, and restored amongst them the worship of the true God in all its purity. But they afterwards fell back into their former superstitions, though without losing the knowledge of the true God, whose service they were always so jealous of, that they abominated all adoration of images. The third state of the religion of the ancient Persians is, when in imitation of the fire preserved upon the altar in the temple of Jerusalem, they kept likewise a perpetual fire upon an altar; which custom was observed likewise by the Greeks and Romans. This gave occasion to the common opinion, that the ancient Persians worshipped fire; but our author endeavours to justify them from that imputation. He owns, that they regarded this fire as a thing sacred, and paid to it a kind of service, which he calls Pyrodulia; but he denies, that they ever paid to it a proper adoration, which he styles Pyrolatria. We are not to be surprized, that practices have been imputed to these people, which they never observed. It is very difficult to know thoroughly their religion, since Zoroaster their great Prophet has expressly prohibited them to instruct strangers in it, or in their language. However our author having desired one of his friends, who lived in Persia, to inform himself of the priests of that religion, concerning the worship paid by them to Mitbra, which is the sun; they answered, that they did not pay any divine worship to it, or to the moon, or to the stars; but only turned towards the sun, when they prayed, because the nature of it nearly resembles that of fire. They regarded it likewise as the image of God; and some of them have said, that God resides in it, and others have imagined, that it will be the seat of the blessed. These are the true grounds of their respect for the sun: but this respect does not go so far as adoration. It is the same case with regard to fire: when they are asked, whether they worship it, they constantly deny it, affirming, that they worship God alone. But as they had a great respect for their sacred fire, if any one of them was obliged to take an oath, he used to do it before this fire burning upon an altar; as the Jews did before the altar at Jerusalem, upon which there was fire. It was likewise the custom of the Pagan Arabians, who when they suspected, that the person, who was about to swear, would take a false oath, they privately cast salt into the fire, in order to strike a terror upon him by the crackling noise, which it made. As the Jews burnt their sacrifices in the sacred fire, the Persians did the same, imagining that the sacrifices would not pollute the fire like other profane things; but if any person threw filth, or spit into it, it was a crime worthy of death. The Kings of Persia, and other wealthy persons, sometimes cast into the fire pearls, spices and precious oils, in order to nourish the flames more delicately, and this they called Fire-Fests. But they did this to the honour of God, and referred to him ultimately all that they did with respect to the fire, or by means of it. But this was not the only element, which they shewed their reverence to; for they respected the air, water, and earth, and considered them as the principles of all things. They had and still have Curators of these four elements, who are employed to take care of the waters, the rivers, and fountains, to prevent as much as possible the air from being infected with any stink, the fire from being polluted with any filth, or the earth with any dead body. It is out of regard to the earth, that they do not bury their dead; and for fear of infecting the air, they keep crows and vultures, to devour the corpses, which have no other tombs than the entrails of these birds of prey. It was for the same reason, that Numa appointed, that the Vestals should take care of the four elements; so that the word Vesta is sometimes used for fire, and sometimes for the earth. The Vestals were also obliged to look after the fountain of the Muses near their Temple. The Persians abominate all noxious animals, and on the contrary have a prodigious esteem for a dog and a cock. Zoroaster expressly commands them to maintain dogs; and they are so fond of cocks, because they are a kind of living clocks, that they would expose themselves to the severest pains rather than cut off the head of one of these animals. Hence it is, that Aristophanes calls a cock the bird of Persia or Media; and there are such a vast number of them in those countries that our travellers scarce eat any thing else; and from hence that useful bird has been propagated over the whole world. In the second chapter our author mentions how the Persians boast of having received their religion from Abraham, which gives him occasion to represent the history of the life of that Patriarch, to examine into his true sentiments with regard to religion, and to compare them with those of the Persians. He explains in a quite new manner divers Chaldee words, the true signification of which was before unknown. He shews, that Abraham became famous over the whole world, and that God's command to him to offer up his son, which the Pagans imagined to have been executed, led them to think, that in order to obtain some signal favour from heaven, the surest way was to offer up one of their children to God. The Indian idolaters stiled their chief priest Brahma or Brahama, which is nothing else but the name of Abraham. This Patriarch, according to the Jews and Eastern people, whose opinion our author does not disapprove of, lived in the time of Nimrod, who was the Ninus of the Pagans, and was the son of Cush. The latter lived in the territory of Babylon; but Chaldea being too small for his descendants, they removed into the neighbouring country, and settled there. This country was called at first from their father's name the land of Cush, and afterwards the land of Havilah, and it had the name of Arabia from Yaarab, the son of Joktan; who dwelt in that country, and possessed it. From this remark and some others Dr. Hyde concludes, that it is a mistake to understand Ethiopia to be the land of Cush mentioned in scripture; since the word is not taken in that sense in any part of the Bible, but always signifies the territory of Babylon, or Arabia. There are several other curious observations in this chapter. Some authors are of opinion, that Abraham was educated from his birth in the true religion, which was that of Eber, one of his ancestors; but Dr. Hyde thinks the common notion more probable, viz. that Abraham was at first an idolater, but afterwards converted to the knowledge of the true God, by the particular interposition of heaven. It is impossible to say at what age he was converted. The opinion of the Persians, who assert, that he was then fifteen years of age, or that of Cedrenus, who tells us that he was twenty four years old, is not disapproved by our author; who makes a great many other curious remarks upon Abraham, and upon his father Terah, his country, actions, &c. In the third chapter Dr. Hyde examines more particularly into the religion of the Persians, and shews in what it agreed and what it still agrees in with that of Abraham. He treats also of the Sabaites and their religion. The Persians knew the history of the creation of the world, having learned it from the Jews, or from Zoroaster; and they kept it more pure than any other nation. As Moses has said nothing of the creation of good or bad angels, the Persians have likewise omitted it. Our author is of opinion, that though angels are created beings, and consequently not so antient as their Creator, yet it is not to be doubted, but that they existed an infinite time before the creation of the world, and are so antient, that it is impossible for the mind of man to form a just idea of their duration; "for it is not, says he, pious or fit to imagine, that God was at any time without ministers; and we ought to believe, that he had always angels ready to serve, and disposed at all times to execute

" his HYPERIUS (ANDREW (GERARD) a celebrated Minister and Professor of Divinity, was born at Ypres in Flanders May the 16th 1511. It is from his native place he

"his commands." Quamvis Angeli sint Creatura, adeoque non antiquitate æquales sint cum suo Creatore; nullam tamen est dubium quin existerint infinito tempore ante Creationem mundi, & sint tantæ antiquitatis, quæ sit ultra humanæ mentis vires conceptionemque rite considerare aut perpendere; quod piè credendum est, cum non sit pium aut decorum imaginari Deum ullo unquam tempore fuisse Ministris destitutum, sed semper habuisse Angelos ministrantes, qui ad nutum ipsius divinum jussa præstare constanter omni tempore parati fuerint (2). Our author supposes likewise, that the apostate angels transgressed before the creation of the world, though not long before it. He thinks, that as the Persians were descended from Shem, they received also from him the knowledge of the true God, though they fell afterwards into a kind of Sabæism, like the rest of the world. They were recovered from their errors by Abraham; upon which account they gave the name of that Patriarch to their religion, calling it the Religion of Abraham. He conquered Cbedorlaomèr, King of Persia; and it is probable, that this Prince and his allies, embraced the religion of the conqueror; and that this example was followed by the subjects of these Princes, as the people generally follow the religion of their governors. With regard to the Sabæites, the Doctor informs us, that this is not the name of a particular nation, as that of the Sabæans, who were called so from Saba, a city in Arabia Felix. It is the name of a sect dispersed over several nations, who worshipped stars and idols. The Arabians have not succeeded in the origin of this name, since they imagined, that the word Sabaa signified to change one's religion. The word Sabæite comes from the Hebrew סבא, Saba, which signifies troops or an army or host; and the name of Sabæites was given to those, who worshipped the host of heaven, that is, the stars. There were two kinds of Sabæites, one of whom worshipped the stars, and the other idols. The former were of two kinds; viz. the Greek Sabæites, who chiefly addressed their devotion to the planets; and the Indian Sabæites, who addressed it to the fixed stars. The Doctor corrects here several profane writers, who have spoken very differently and confusedly of the religion of the Persians, and rectifies their accounts by distinguishing the times. He agrees with Herodotus and Strabo, that there was a time, when the Persians had neither temples nor altars. It was when they addressed their prayers only to the planets or to God, to procure their propitious influences. But when they began to build certain places, in which to keep the sacred fire, and which the Doctor calls Pyrea, they began likewise to have altars, upon which they sometimes offered sacrifices. It is not absolutely true, what those Authors have written, that the Persians had no Images, since Giemsbid, one of their Kings, is accused of idolatry, and since towards the end of their Empire they worshipped Venus in Temples appointed for that purpose, where that Goddess had her Priests and Priestesses. Herodotus relates, that there was a law at Babylon, which ordered, that the women should come once in their lives to the Temple of Venus, and prostitute themselves to the first passenger who would have any commerce with them; and that they could not refuse this. The richer sort went in a chariot with a magnificent equipage. When they were once come to the Temple, they were obliged not to return, till some passenger had pity on them. Those who were handsome, continues Herodotus, returned soon, but some ordinary women stay'd several years before they received their passport. Dr. Hyde observes, that he had not read any where, that the Persians had any other statues but that of Venus. The fourth chapter is designed to prove against the Greek and Latin Writers, that the service paid to Mitbra, or the Sun, was not a divine adoration, properly so called. The fifth chapter contains a kind of digression upon the modern Sabæism, and the idolatry of the Nations, who made Idols under the influences of the Planets. In the sixth chapter we see the care which the antient Persians took of the water and fire; for though they endeavoured to preserve the purity of all the four elements, yet they took a more particular care of the water and fire, since these two elements were most obnoxious to pollution. They believed, that there was an Angel especially appointed to guard the water, and called him Ardisûr, or Arduisûr. They celebrated his praises, and desired him to continue in his office. The seventh chapter treats of the Goddess Vesta, adored by the Greeks and Romans. The eighth chapter treats of the Goddess Vesta of the Persians, and the care which the Magi, their Priests, took to preserve the fire. These Priests were obliged to be married, because among those people it was meritorious with regard both to this world and that which is to come, to increase the number of the faithful by propagating the species. The Doctor is of opinion, that the Persians used to maintain the sacred fire long before the reformation of their religion by Zoroaster. Hence it follows, that before his time they had likewise covered places in the form of Temples, since they could not otherwise have preserved the fire. Zoroaster only augmented the number, as our Author proves. There is still extant a Persian book, intitled, Gjâvidân Chrad, i. e. The Eternal Wisdom, which is older than all the writings of Zoroaster, and ascribed to one of their Kings named Hûthang. This book proves evidently, that the people of those times worshiped the only true God. The same appears from some other books cited by the Doctor. The ninth chapter treats of the two principles of all things, according to the notions of the Persians; of the names given to them; and of their opinions with regard to the Deity and the creation of all things. They established two principles; the first of these which is single and eternal, the Author and Principle of all good, is God, whom they called Yezad, Izad, or Ixid, that is, He who ought to be pray'd to. They called him likewise Ormuzd, or Hormuz, or Hormizda, and by joining a more modern name, Hormizda Choda, that is, O great God, or, O supreme God. It is from this word, that the Greeks formed that of Oromasdes. Besides this Principle they laid down another created one, which they supposed to be the Principle of Evil, and called it Abâriman, Abreman, Abriman, and sometimes in poetry Abrimanân; whence the Greeks, who wrote the History of Persia, took their Ἀβρῖμάνης. This word is compounded of two others, which are synonymous, and signify impure, polluted; so that these two words being joined signify very impure, and very much polluted. In their antient books, to shew the abhorrence which they had to the Demon, whom they called by this name, they wrote it in an inverted manner, thus: ουσιρρυπ. With respect to the Creation, the Persians taught with the scriptures, that it was performed in six spaces of time. But they pretend, that they are not simple days, and that by a day we are to understand the space of several days. Here is the manner in which they divide these six periods of time, and the names which they give to them. They called the first Mid-yûzeram, containing the space of forty five days, in which God created the Heavens. The second was called Mid-yûsham, containing sixty days, employed in creating the waters. The third was called Pitishabim, and comprehends seventy five days, in which the earth was created. The fourth was called Jyaseram, and contains thirty days, in which the trees were produced. The fifth was called Midiyârim, and comprehends eighty days, during which all the creatures were made. An Author cited by the Doctor tells us, that in this fifth period God created the beasts and Birds, namely an hundred and seventy two kinds of beasts, and an hundred and ten kinds of birds. The sixth period was called Hamspitâmidim, and contains seventy five days, in which Man was created. All these periods together make three hundred and sixty five days, which form one year. According to the Persians, the creation began about May, and ended in the same Month; so that Adam, when he rose from the hands of God, saw the whole earth covered with fruits. Zoroaster appointed, that for each of these six periods employed in the Creation, there should be observed five festal days. In the ninth chapter our Author treats of the origin of mankind, of the deluge, of divers imaginary terrestrial Paradises, of Moses he took the name under which he is known (a). His father, who was a Civilian, and had already sent him to study in several places, finding his end drawing near in the year 1528 and Solomon; and shews, that the religion of the ancient Persians agrees in many points with that of the Jews, and was derived from it. Those people believed, that Adam and Eve were the stock, from whence mankind descended, though some among them gave our first parents different names. They believed an universal deluge, which covered the whole earth. But all were not of this opinion; some denied the deluge; others said, that it was not universal, and that it did not rise above the top of a mountain near Hulvan, a City upon the frontiers of Assyria and Persia. The Persians have spoken of divers terrestrial Paradises, and sometimes given different names to the same place. This was occasioned because the true situation of the Garden of Eden was uncertain. Some fixed it at Jerusalem, others at other places. The Persians had some knowledge of Moses, whom they stiled the ruddy Shepherd, who holds a staff; because he was a shepherd when he lived with Jethro his father-in-law; and because he performed all his miracles in Egypt and the Wilderness by means of his rod. They had knowledge also of Solomon, whom they called Gjem, which is likewise the name of one of their Kings. The eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth chapters contain the names and attributes, which they gave to God, to Angels, and to the Devil. In the seven following chapters the Doctor treats of the year, and the different epochs of the ancient Persians and other Nations, and of the names of the Angels, whom they imagined to preside over every month of the year. The ancient Persian year was Solar, and not Lunar; but as it consisted only of twelve months of thirty days each, it did not answer exactly to the time in which the sun passes through the ecliptic; by which means the beginning of their year answered successively to all the degrees of the signs of the zodiac, and ran through all the seasons, till after a revolution of 1460 years it returned to the same point, where it had begun. King Gjemshid leaving this manner of estimating time for civil purposes, established another for religion, in order that in a certain period of time the same festivals might come together at the same season of the year. For this purpose he ordered, that at the end of 120 years there should be an intercalation of a whole Month, which should receive its name from the month after which it was intercalated. Yesdegerd established another epocha; and ordered the years to be computed from the beginning of his reign, and fixed the beginning of the year at March, from which it was very different when that Prince began his reign. He abolished the names of the Angels, which the months bore, and gave them natural names, taken from the season prevailing in each month. He altered also the names of the days, and gave them such as were taken from some remarkable event; calling one, for instance, abundance of riches, another by a name which expressed some great rejoicing upon it, another from the revenge which he had taken of some of his enemies, from some battle, or other singular event. He abolished in consequence of this all the feasts and divine service observed on certain days; so that in his Calendar there was no festival but that of the new year. But Yesdegerd reigning but twenty years, the Persians, who had not forgotten their ceremonies, returned after his death to their old method of computation, restoring to the months and days the names which they had before the reign of that Prince. It is a mistake therefore of several Eastern and European Writers to call this ancient epocha the epocha of Yesdegerd, since on the contrary that epocha was abolished by that Prince, who established another, which continued no longer than his reign. It appears, that the ancient Persians did not know the distinction of the year into weeks, but that they divided it only into twelve equal parts; and all the days of the months had their particular names, as those of the weeks have with us. Dr. Hyde gives us also an explanation of the epocha's of the Tartars and Chinese; and in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters he mentions the different offices ascribed to the Angels by the Persians; and observes, that the ancient and modern Persians, as well as the Mahometans, imagined, that every man has two Angels attending him, one good, the other bad. In the twenty first and twenty second chapters he treats of the Legislators of the ancient Persians, of the state of their primitive and orthodox Church, of the heresies, sects, and heretics among them, and particularly of Manes, Mazdek, and some others. After Abraham, their oldest Legislator was Zoroaster, who lived in the time of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, and assuming the character of a Prophet, after some difficulty procured the King to approve his religion, who established it in his dominions. It was the ancient religion purged from Sabaism, with the addition of some particular rites and ceremonies. This religion is retained by many of the Persians to this day. The works of Zoroaster, which contain divers precepts relating to doctrine and manners, are in the same esteem with them, as the Bible with Christians. However if we judge by the Book, a translation of which is subjoined to our Author's work, among several good rules of morality there are a great number of superstitious and trifling things. The religion of Zoroaster did not always continue in the same state; it suffered several changes, as particularly under the reign of Alexander the Great, who conquered Persia, and under some other Princes. King Ardesbir Babecan, who reigned two hundred years after Christ, called together a kind of Council, in order to consult the Priests of his dominions upon several important points of religion, and by this means cleared it from several errors, with which it had been before in a manner disfigured. This reformation was brought about by the assistance of a certain Legislator named Erdavirâph. But it did not long continue; for Manes propagated his monstrous notions over Persia, where he was born. In the twenty third chapter Dr. Hyde gives us an account of the life of Darius Hystaspes; and in the twenty fourth that of Zoroaster. He observes, that his true name is Zerdusht, that of Zoroaster being invented by the Greeks, who, in order to accommodate foreign names to their own language, have generally disfigured them in such a manner, that it is almost impossible to guess at the true name. They have likewise often given the same name to different persons, on account of some resemblance; and this has happened upon the present occasion; so that there are almost as many Zoroasters as there were Hercules's. But the Persians speak only of one, and agree about the age in which he lived, though they differ about his country. Some relate, that he came from China, and others from Europe, by which perhaps they mean Palestine, which is not far distant from it. The most certain opinion is, that he was born in Persia, but that his father being poor, he became servant to the Prophet Esdra, and seeing his master working divers miracles, he was induced to attempt the same, or, at least, to pretend it, in order to establish a new religion, or to reform that, which was already established. Monsieur Bernard (3) remarks (3) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Mars 1701, pag. 252. in his account of our Author's Book, that he does not find that Esdra ever worked any miracles; but that if Zoroaster really was a servant of his, we may assert with greater probability, that he learned of that Prophet all the miracles which Moses and the other Prophets performed. Dr. Hyde gives a long account of the artifices made use of by Zoroaster to attain his end. He spent but four or five years in digesting and propagating his doctrines; and then was killed together with eighty other Priests. But it is probable, that before he undertook his reformation, he wrote and prepared a considerable number of books, which he published afterwards. Our Author rejects what the Greeks have written concerning his Death. He employs his twenty fifth chapter in explaining the general name of Zend or Zendavestâ, which Zoroaster gave to his work. The word Zend in Arabic, and that of Eshia Hebræo-

(a) The City of Tyres has been called Hyperæ by several authors. Beza calls it thus in Iconibus, and says, Andreas Gerardus e Patria Hyperius fuit cognominatus.

1528 ordered his wife to send him to Paris, that he might continue his studies there. This was done accordingly. Hyperius studied Philosophy three years following in the College

Hebræo-Chaldaic, and signifies Fire; so that we may translate the word Zendavestâ, an Instrument to strike fire with; Zoroaster intimating by this, that the design of his works was to kindle the fire of zeal and piety in the hearts of men. In the twenty sixth chapter the Doctor treats particularly of Zoroaster's books, and of the language and character in which they are written. The original of Zendavesta was written upon twelve skins in the Persian language, but in ancient characters, not understood by all the modern Persians. All his works are in prose; so that whatever is in verse, and ascribed to him, is absolutely spurious. It is true, that some Persian Priests have translated into verse a small part of their Legislator's writings, because the people did not understand the language of the original; but they did not begin to do it till two hundred years ago, and the ancient Persians never undertook any thing of that kind. In the twenty seventh chapter our Author treats of the nature of fire, the manner of keeping it among the Persians, the signal used to call them to the public assemblies, their manner of behaving in their Temples, their use of rods in divine service, their daily repeating of their prayers in a low voice, and their silence. In the city of Nussari in India, the followers of Zoroaster assemble at the sound of a little bell; but at Ispahan, the capital of Persia, they know the proper times of assembling without any signal, or by only making use of a large piece of wood, which they strike; and this they do to avoid offending the Mahometans, who will not permit the use of bells, because they were invented by the Christians. When the Persians pray, they place themselves at a small distance from the fire, which burns in their great Temples, for fear of polluting it with their breath; but in small Temples there is only a lamp. For the greater precaution, they cover their mouth with a square piece of linnen called Panâm. They pray with a low voice, and only murmur between their teeth. The Priest advances nearer to the fire; he has also his mouth covered, and a cap with ears on his head, and is covered with an Albe, holding in one hand a book, and in the other several white rods. He chants likewise the prayers, and recites the office taken from the book Zend. Sometimes in the warmth of devotion he stands upon one foot, in imitation of their great Prophet. After prayers follow the offerings. Every person who is able casts into the fire precious ointments, spices, pearls, or at least corn or flesh. In the twenty eighth chapter our Author treats of the Priesthood and Hierarchy of the Magi, at the time when their church was in its flourishing state, and even at present. He tells us, that this Hierarchy was not much different from that, which subsists now in those Christian Churches, in which the several sacred orders are distinguished. The Clergy were formerly very rich, but they are in very different circumstances now under the oppression of the Mahometans. The revenue of the Priests consists chiefly of this, that upon the 24th of April all the inhabitants of a Parish extinguish the fire in their houses, and go to light it again by the fire of their Priest, paying him each of them for this purpose about six shillings and three pence. They likewise pay tythes. In the twenty ninth and thirtieth chapters the Author treats further of the fire; mentions the names given it by the Persians; and speaks of the Temples built to preserve it in, of the manner in which the Magi behave in them, of the reproachful names given by the Mahometans to the followers of Zoroaster, of those given to each other; of their Priesthood, their several sacred orders, and the particular names given them, and of the habits of the Priests. In the thirty first chapter he discourses of the Persian Magi in general, and particularly of those who came to worship Christ immediately after his birth. The Persians by the word Mogb mean their Wise Men and Priests. The Chaldeans have taken from this their word Mag, and the Greeks adding their termination have changed it into Máγος, which signifies, not a Magician, but a Philosopher, or Wise Man. Such were those who came to Bethlehem, and not Kings, as is commonly said without any foundation. Dr. Hyde thinks after Petavius, that they came from Persia, and not from Arabia, which they only passed through, or, to speak more exactly, from the Country of the Parthians, where there was the same religion and Magi as in Persia, and where the seat of the Empire was at the birth of Christ. The Prince, who sent these Magi, permitted them to come, was the same Pbraates, the son of Orodes, who sent his four sons to Rome to be educated there, who did homage to Augustus, and restored to the Romans the ensigns, which his father Orodes had taken from Crassus. The Gospel, according to Dr. Hyde, and divers learned Writers, informs us, that the birth of Christ was revealed to the Persians. They had this advantage over many other Nations, as well that the Christian Revelation might be immediately known in the most distant places, as because the Persians were the only people, except the Jews, who had preserved the knowledge and worship of the true God, though mixed with some superstitions. What the Prophet Isaiah foretold concerning Cyrus two hundred years before the birth of that Prince, is a sufficient proof of the particular regard which God had for the Persians. But whence could these Magi learn, that a Messiah was to be born among the Jews? Daniel and some other Prophets had been in their Country. Besides we find some Predictions in the writings of their pretended Prophet Zoroaster, who was sometimes inspired by God, as Balaam had been before. Add to this, that the prophecies of the Old Testament were not unknown to them. In the thirty second chapter our Author shews the original of all the fabulous stories relating to the Sibyls and the books ascribed to them; and in the thirty third chapter he gives a short account of the religion of the ancient Persians. He shews, that they constantly believed one God, almighty and eternal, possessed of all perfections which Christians ascribe to him. They believe an universal resurrection both of the good and bad, and a last judgment, in which every one will receive according to his works; the good a life of eternal Happiness, and the vicious an eternity of misery; God having prepared for the former a Paradise of Chrystal, and for the latter an Abyss to plunge them into. They believe, that they offend God every day, but they protest, that they repent of all their sins, both of mind and body, by their thoughts, words, and actions. They believe, that God has given the government of cities and provinces to Planets and Angels. That they are sent for the good or punishment of mankind, when he thinks proper. That every man has his good and evil Angel, the former of whom inclines him to virtue, and the latter to evil. That the Devil is an irreconcilable enemy to Mankind. That God favours certain persons with an infused Light, which qualifies them to govern other men, and to become skilful in arts and sciences. The good likewise receive such a light. But Dr. Hyde is of opinion, that this signifies only natural light or reason. The Persians believe, that in the life to come the vicious will be tormented with different kinds of punishment; but instead of fire they speak of darkness, and a black stinking river, the waters of which are cold as snow; and suppose them to be formed of tears shed for the dead, and which serve only to enhance their punishment. They have not all the same notions concerning the place of happiness; some have fixed it in the sun, with the Manicheans and other heretics; others have imagined, that after the resurrection the blessed will live upon the earth, which shall be renewed, after having passed through a conflagration. They speak likewise of a bridge built upon the abyss, over which the souls separated from the bodies are to pass into the seat of immortality; and they mention several other strange things related by our author. In the thirty fourth chapter he treats of the marriage of the Persians; of their baptisms and ablutions; and of their funeral rites. In the last chapter he treats of the names of Persia and the Persians; and of their ancient and modern language, and its different dialects, that is, of the language of the Persians, Medes, and other people of Asia. To these thirty five chapters is subjoined a Latin translation of a book used

College of Calvi ; and after he had taken a little journey to Ypres, he returned to Paris in the year 1532, and studied Divinity there till the year 1535. He went afterwards to Louvain, and then he travelled through several Provinces of the Low-Countries and of Germany ; which rendered ineffectual the pains his friends had taken to procure him a living without his knowledge ; for as soon as it was represented to Carondilet Archbishop of Palermo and Chancellor to the Emperor, that he had travelled in Germany, this rendered him so much suspected of heresy, that he was obliged to think of a sanctuary. He went into England, and lived above four years with an English Nobleman, who was a lover of learning [A]. He crossed the sea again in 1541, and designed to visit the University of Strasburg, and particularly to see Bucer, who made that University very famous. But as he passed through the country of Hesse, he met at Marburg with a Professor of Divinity, named Geldenhaur, who was one of his friends, and who in order to keep him there, gave him hopes of some employment in the University of that city. He settled there, and soon after succeeded his friend, who died in January 1542. He continued two years in that employment without marrying. But thinking that he could not live any longer comfortably without a wife, especially because he was not very well in health (a reason which would have hindered a great many other persons from entering into the marriage state) in the year 1544 he married (b) a widow, by whom he got six sons and four daughters. He died at Marburg February the 1st 1564, having acquitted himself

(b) Animum ad matrimonium adiecit, quod non putaret se commode sine uxore, maxime cum non ita firma valetudine esset, vitam transigere posse. Melchior Adam in Vitis Theolog. pag. 393.

by the Magi, intitled Sad-der, containing the laws and precepts of Zoroaster. It was written above two hundred years ago in verse in the modern Persian language by one of their Priests, the son of Melichsáb, a man of great learning and skill in the old Persian, and in the ancient books written in that language. In the fourth Porta or chapter the author exhorts sinners not to despair of the mercy of God, since he is ready to give much, and to receive but little. He mentions upon this occasion, that while Zoroaster was conversing familiarly with God, that Prophet saw a man, whose whole body was in hell, except his right foot. He asked who he was, and God answered, that it was a Prince who had reigned over thirty three cities, and done no good during his life, having given up himself to oppression, injustice, and violence, and made his people suffer a thousand evils. But that having one day met with a sheep bound, at such a distance from his food that it could not reach it, he thrust it towards the sheep with his foot ; which for this reason was exempted from the torments of hell, to which the rest of his body was exposed. In the twenty fifth Porta the author dissuades from fasting ; and teaches, that the true fast consists in abstinence from sin. In the sixty seventh he places lying among the worst of sins. The Appendix of Dr. Hyde contains several curious observations. Mr. Wood tells us (4) that 1694 Dr. Hyde designed to publish the following books, if he should live to finish them, having already done something towards all of them, viz. I. Grammatica pro Lingua Persica ; in 4to. II. Lexicon Persico-Latinum ; in a thick 4to. III. Lexicon Turcico-Latinum ; in a thick 4to. IV. Nomenclator Mogolo-Tataricum, cum Grammatica ejusdem Linguae. V. Dissertatio de Tartaria. Item Historia Chartiludii ; & Dissertatio de Numerorum Notis, earundemque origine & combinandi ratione, doctrina nova ; in 8vo. VI. Curiosa Chinenfis & Selanensis ; in 8vo. VII. Historia Gemmarum Arabicæ & Latine, cum Notis ; in 8vo. VIII. Historia Tamerlanis Arabicæ & Latine cum Notis ; in 4to. IX. Liber Bustân Persicæ & Latine cum Notis ; autore Scheia Shadi ; in 4to. X. Divini Poetæ Hâphix Opus Persicæ & Latine, cum Notis ; in 4to. XI. Abulfedæ Geographia Arabicæ & Latine, cum Notis ; in 4to. XII. Liber Baharistân eloquentissimo Stylo conscriptus, meri ingenii Specimina continens, Librum Gulistân æquans, si non superans, Persicæ & Latine, cum Notis ; in 4to. XIII. Maimonidis Liber More Nevochim transcriptus ex characteribus Hebraicis quibus a Maimonide scriptum est, in propriis Arabicis, cum novâ versione & Notis, Arabicæ & Latine ; in a thick 4to. XIV. Historia Regum Persicæ ex ipsorum monumentis & autoribus extracta ; in 4to. XV. Annotationes in difficiliora Loca Biblica ex Literaturâ Orientali ; in a thick 4to. XVI. Periplus Marium Mediterranei & Archipelagi Turcicæ & Latine cum circulo ventorum in variis Linguis, Arabicâ, Persicâ, Chinenfi, &c. in 8vo. XVII. Zoroastris Perso-Medi Opera omnia Mathematico-medico-physico-Theologica Persicæ & Latine ; in folio. XVIII. Liber Erda-viraph-name Persicæ & Latine ; in 4to. XIX. Lexicon Hebraicum emendatum ex MSS. Lexicis Rabbi Pinchon, R. Jonæ, & R. Jesaiæ, atque ex col- latione sum Linguis Arabicâ & Persicâ & aliis Linguis Orientalibus ; in 4to. XX. Cælum Orientale Arabico-Persicum, atq; Occidentale Græco-Latinum, una cum Sappii Figurationibus Stellarum duplici situ, prout in Cælo, & prout in Globo apparent, cum earum nominibus secundum harum gentium doctrinam ; in 4to. XXI. Commentarius in Pentateuchum Arabicè, auctor Mansûr Syro-Arabe ex Scripturâ Gersumi in Arabicam transcriptus & Latinitate donatus ; in 4to. XXII. Urbium Armeniæ Nomenclaturæ ex eorum Geographia excerptæ, &c. XXIII. Varia Chinenfis, scil. eorum Idololatria, Opiniones de Deo & de Paradiso atque de Gebennâ, & de Gradibus & modis supplicii ; de eorum Literaturâ & Libris & Chartâ, & de imprimendi modo atque antiquitate &c. omnia excerpta ex ore & scriptis nativi Chinenfis Shin Fo-burg ; in 8vo. XXIV. Varia Selanensia, ubi insulæ Selan (vulgo Batarvis Ceylon) Historica quædam & vocabularium genuinis eorum Characteribus exaratum cum eorum Alphabeto & aliis rebus ; in 8vo. XXV. Bantamenfè Alphabetum à Legato scriptum cum Literarum potestate & numerorum notis ; in 8vo. XXVI. Notæ Arithmeticæ variarum Gentium, ubi italicum Notarum Origo & combinandi ratio docetur ; in 8vo. XXVII. Dialogi Arabico-Persico-Turcici, Latine versi ; in 8vo. XXVIII. Liber de Turcarum opinionibus in rebus religiosis, Turcicè & Latine ; in 8vo. XXIX. Utilia, mensalia, scil. quid in Conversatione Conviviali decorum est, Arabicè & Latine ; in 8vo. XXX. Rivole Lexicon Armeniacum cum Linguis Orientalibus (scil. Arabicâ, Persicâ, & Turcicâ) collatum & in margine notatum ; in 4to. XXXI. Evangelium Lucæ & Acta Apostolorum Lingua & Characterè Malaico ; in 4to. He also translated into English the letters of several Eastern Kings and Princes sent to King Charles II, King James II, and King William III. T.

[A] He lived with an English Nobleman, who was a lover of learning.] It was the son of the Lord William Montjoy, whom Erasmus, who was infinitely beholden to him, has so much commended. In Carolus Montjoium, Guillelmi filium, Baronem incidit (Hyperius) quem Erasmus Roterodamus amplissime in scriptis suis ac sæpè commendat. Is amicè cum Hyperio multis ac variis de rebus collocutus cum ingenium ejus perspexisset, oblato liberali stipendio, domum suam cum invitavit, ubi annos quatuor amplius suavissime Hyperius cum Montjoio vixit in otio literario (1). i. e. "He met with my Lord Charles Baron Montjoy the son of William, on whom Erasmus has often bestowed great praises in his writings. This Lord having conversed with Hyperius in a friendly manner upon several subjects, and observing his great genius, invited him to his own house, and offered him a handsome salary ; so that Hyperius lived above four years with him, and was at leisure to apply himself to literature." Observe, that they have put Monticius instead of Montjoius in Paul Freher's Theatre (2) ; and that though Erasmus dedicated his Livy to Montjoy the son, and also commended him in some other places, yet what is here asserted of the great and numerous commendations can properly relate only to the father. The son was still very young when Erasmus died (3).

(4) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 975. 976.

(1) Melch. Adam, in Vita Hyperii, pag. 392. Vitar. Theolog.

(2) Pag. 198.

(3) Vide Erasmi, Epist. 16. lib. 26. & Epist. 25. lib. 28.

himself with great application of the functions of a Divinity Professor above twenty two years. He wrote a great many books [B], some of which have been copied by a Doctor of Louvain [C]. He laboured chiefly to teach the Students in Divinity a method to preach well. He had a very clear head; and besides his knowledge in the Languages, in History, in Philosophy, and in Divinity, he had also a particular talent of teaching well. He had begun very soon to exercise himself that way; for whilst he studied at Paris, he used to teach the other scholars in private. He was very modest at entertainments; meek and civil in conversation; and he loved to be sometimes at a well regulated entertainment, and was delighted with an agreeable conversation, as much as he hated those enormous bumpers, which guests are sometimes obliged to drink [D], and those silly jokes, which do but too much prevail in our conversations. In a word, he was a man who had a true wit and good sense, and who added that good quality to his virtue and zeal. They who desire to see a more particular account of him may read the authors to whom I refer (c). Verheiden's account of him differs a little from Melchior Adam's [E]. I can hardly believe that Hyperius had been a Monk [F]. Some of the books he wrote were published after

(c) Wigandus Orthius, in Oratione funebri Hyperii. Melch. Adam, in Vita Hyperii, which is only an Extract of the Funeral Oration. Verheiden, Præfatio. aliquot Theolog. Effig. pag. 95.

[B] He wrote a great many books.] If we may credit Verheiden, the works of Hyperius which have been published, would make up seven volumes in folio. There are some written upon the human sciences, as Rhetoric, Logic, Arithmetic, Geometry, Cosmography, Astronomy, Optics, Natural Philosophy, &c. The others are either Commentaries upon some parts of the holy Scripture, or Theological tracts. That intitled De recte formando Theologiae studio. i. e. "Of the true Method of studying Divinity;" and that De formandis Concionibus sacris; i. e. "Of making Sermons?" have been so much liked by a Doctor of Louvain, that he has inserted them almost word for word in the books he published upon the same subjects at Antwerp in the year 1565. Hyperius was still but a young student when he delivered an oration at Paris (4), which has since been printed, and which contains the eulogy of his friends (5).

[C] Some of which have been copied by a Doctor of Louvain.] Valerius Andreas confesses it. Quicquid boni habent ejusdem (Hyperii) de formandis sacris concionibus Libri duo, deque recte formando studio Theologico Libri IV, id in suos similis argumenti libros transtulit Laurentius à Villavicentio ex Ord. Augustiano Doctor Theol. Lovaniensis (6). i. e. "All that is good for any thing in Hyperius's two books of the manner of making sermons, and in his four books of the best method of studying Divinity, has been transcribed by Laurence a Villavicentio, a Monk of the order of St. Austin, and a Doctor of Divinity of the University of Louvain in the books he wrote upon the same subjects." This Doctor was a Spanish Monk of the order of St. Augustin. His name was Laurence de Villavicenza. He is often quoted as a notorious plagiarist. I have not met with any author that observed this plagiarism before the learned Raynolds. He mentions it in the fourth chapter of the first book of his treatise De Idololatria Romana, printed at Oxford in the year 1596, and he observes that this Monk altered in Hyperius's book all that was inconsistent with the doctrines of the Church of Rome. Some time after Keckerman (7) mentioned the same plagiarism, acknowledging that Raynolds had already observed it. Voetius (8) spoke of it quoting Keckerman, in a dissertation which was held in the year 1655; but he pretends that the work which the Spanish Monk pirated, was the manner of teaching Divinity. Now this treatise contains but three books, whereas the work which Raynold Keckerman and the Bibliographer of the Low Countries pretend was transcribed by the Spanish Monk, contains four books, and is usually quoted under this title: De Ratione Studii Theologici. i. e. "The Method of studying Divinity." It is certain that this last work is not the same with the Methodus Theologiae, i. e. "The Manner of teaching Divinity," which Hyperius also wrote. Voetius has not been accurate enough. Monsieur Colomies (9) does also mention this plagiarism, and quotes Raynolds. Placcius (10) who speaks of it, does it only on the credit of one of his friends, who wrote to him, that Simon Oomius mentioned it in the second preface prefixed to a Dutch book: and he pretends as well as Konig (11) that this plunder relates to the book intitled Methodus Theologiae. A modern author (12) quotes not only Keckerman and Colomies upon this plagiarism of Villavicenza, but also John Heilfeld cap. 25. Sphingis Theologico-Philosophicæ.

It is to be observed that none of these authors, except Valerius Andreas, mention the double plagiarism of the Spanish Monk, they speak only of that which relates to the book intitled, De Studio Theologico. But on the other hand Nicholas Antonio does not only assert that Villavicenza transcribed all that was good in two of Hyperius's books, but he ascribes to him the same conduct with regard to two other books published by Protestant writers; the one is De Phrasibus sacrae Scripturae; i. e. "Of the Phrases used in the holy Scripture;" the other is Tabula compendiosa in Evangelia & Epistolas. i. e. "Short Indexes to the Gospels and Epistles." Observe that he has added to his own mistakes those of Valerius Andreas. He pretends (13), like him, that Hyperius had been a Dominican; and he commits himself the following blunders; 1. He gives Hyperius the name of Hesperius; 2. he supposes that the treatise De formando Studio Theologico contains but three books; 3. He asserts that the treatise De formandis sacris Concionibus contains three books, whereas it contains but two.

[D] He hated those enormous bumpers, which guests are sometimes obliged to drink.] Here follows what is observed in his funeral oration (14). In colloquiis & conversationibus humanis & æquus, & quemadmodum immania illa in conviviiis hominum potaba, & fœuriles in colloquiis nugæ ex animo fuit averfatus, ita moderatè conviviiis, jucundisque amicorum confabulationibus nonnunquam interfuit.

[E] Verheiden's account of him differs a little from Melchior Adam's.] Verheiden has given us but a short eulogium of him; but we meet in Melchior Adam with a much fuller account in a chronological order. The latter does not make Hyperius travel into Spain; he supposes that he only visited those provinces of Italy, which are between the Alps and Bologna; and that he travelled thither whilst he was upon his studies at Paris, and before he took a journey to Louvain. Verheiden on the contrary pretends that Hyperius travelled into Spain and Italy, after he had studied at Paris and at Louvain. He supposes that he first taught Philosophy at Marburg, and then Divinity. Melchior Adam does not mention the Professorship of Philosophy.

[F] I can hardly believe that Hyperius had been a Monk.] There is not a word of it in the extract from Wigandus Orthius did not say it; for this is a particular, which honest Melchior Adam would not have omitted, though he had given us but a very short extract, and not a long account containing a thousand trifling circumstances. Yet I would not depend upon this argument only; I have enquired for Wigandus Orthius's oration, and have found it at last; but I could not meet in it with the least hint that could make me suspect, that Hyperius was ever a Monk; whence I infer that he never was one. Let it not be objected that I argue here by a negative argument. I do not pretend to vindicate that way of arguing (15); but I dare to assert that it is very good on this occasion, both because the person who delivered the funeral oration on Hyperius's death could not but know whether or not he had been a Monk, and because if he had known he had been one, he would certainly have told it, and was obliged to do it. Such particulars were not omitted with regard to Musculus, Marlorat, Peter Martyr, Zanchius, and several other supporters of the new reformation, who

(13) Nic. Anton. Bibliob. Hispan. tom. 2. pag. 9.

(14) Apud Melchior Adam in Vitis Theolog. pag. 397.

(15) The blunders of Moreri and Valerius Andreas.

(15) Mr. de Launoi wrote some books to prove that a negative argument is good. Monsieur Thiers, amongst others, refuted his opinion.

(d) Verheiden, Præstant. aliquot Theolog. Effig. pag. 95.

after his death [G], by the care of his son Laurence Hyperius, or of John Mylius (d).

who had left their convents; and there was perhaps never a man less capable to omit such a particular, than Orthius, who thought it his duty to observe in a funeral oration, that Hyperius went to wait for his clothes at Marburg, because he knew, that he would live cheaper there, than in any place on the banks of the Rhine. Sciebat enim minoris se apud Catos interea posse vivere, quam uspiam ad Rheni ripas. He relates a thousand particulars as important as that is, which have all been faithfully transcribed by Melchior Adam. I cannot therefore but think, that Moreri was in the wrong to assert, that Hyperius became a Monk of the order of St. Dominick, and distinguished himself by his learning; but that he basely apostatised afterwards. He transcribed this from Valerius Andreas, who had already published that falsity. This Bibliographer of the Low-Countries, who was also mistaken in placing Hyperius's death under the year 1560, is inexcusable for omitting to observe that Hyperius had been a Minister. Moreri, who has observed it (16), is to be blamed for omitting to mention his Professors of Divinity. His inaccuracy appears also in this expression, he fell into Luther's errors, which he taught. To what purpose is this last remark express'd thus in a loose manner? Was it not enough to have filed Hyperius a Protestant Minister in the first line of his article? Was not this hinting sufficiently that he had taught the doctrines of the Protestants? But further, it is not true that Hyperius followed Luther's reformation. The Index of prohibited books (17) might have set Moreri right in this particular.

[G] Some of his books... were published after his death. Consult Gesner's epitome, you will see there, that several of Hyperius's works were printed in his life-time. I do not think therefore that he can be quoted as an instance of that singular modesty, which makes an author put off till after his death the publishing of his writings, that he may not hear his own praises. Let them take some notice of this, who read in Saldenus (19) the passage which I shall now transcribe. Cujus (contemptus famæ vel gloriæ propriæ) illustre exemplum antebac præbuit Theologus sua ætate celeberrimus Andreas Hyperius, de quo testis est Justus Vultejus (20), quod ideo post mortem demum in lucem prodire sua voluerit, quia gloriam sibi nullam, nec vulgi applausus iis captabat. Hos enim (inquit) si tanti faciendos esse putasset, utique vivo ei frui illis licuisset. i. e. "Andrew Hyperius, one of the most eminent Divines of his time, gave a noble instance of this contempt of fame and glory; for Justus Vultejus testifies, that he would not have his books published till after his death, because he aimed at no glory by them, and endeavoured to gain the public applause. For, adds he, if he had had any value for it he might have enjoyed it in his life-time."

(17) We read there in pag. 16. of the edition in folio 1667. Andreas Hyperius, seu Hyperius, Theologus Calviniano Zwillingianus, Professor Marpurgenfis. Konig, pag. 420. of his Bibliotheca calls him a Reformed Divine, which in the style of the Protestants of Germany is the same as a Calvinist Divine.

(19) De Libris & eorum Laetione, pag. 47.

(20) Vultej. in Dedic. Oper. Hyperii præfix.

(16) He did not spell the name of the city right, calling it Marburg.

(a) Apollodorus, lib. 1.

(b) His mihi pro meritis (ut falsi criminis obæ) Parta fides) regno & solio confidere patris Supplicium datur. Hypsipyle apud Statium, Theb. lib. 5. ver. 320.

HYPPIPYLE the daughter of Thoas King of the Isle of Lemnos, saved her father's life when the women of that island made a general slaughter of all the men that were there (a). She did not save him openly, but was obliged to make the other women believe that she had killed him, and upon this supposition they chose her for their Queen (b). The Argonauts landed some time after in the island of Lemnos, and were received with all the marks of the most intimate friendship, for the women of that island had not slain the men out of any hatred for the male sex [A], but rather out of such a revenge as shews, that they were very fond of the sweet pleasures of love. The Argonauts, after the fatigues they had suffered at sea, refreshed themselves as much as they pleased in the arms of these widows: nor did Hypsipyle forget to take care of her self; she chose their chief for her partner, and was soon pregnant of twins. If her fate differed from Dido's in this particular [B], it was like her's in another, for Jason did not prove less inconstant than [A] The women of the island of Lemnos had not slain the men out of any hatred for the male sex. They were determined to that slaughter because the men did not lie any more with them, and diverted themselves only with the slaves they had taken in Thrace (1). They did this because their wives stunk so much that they could not come near them without the utmost disgust (2). This stink was an effect of Venus's anger; either because this Goddess was exasperated against them for neglecting to sacrifice to her during several years (3), or because she had taken an aversion to the isle of Lemnos, having been surprized there with Mars (4), for it was in that island the Gods saw her lying with him. Others (5) assert, that Medea being jealous of Hypsipyle had cast certain drugs into the isle of Lemnos, which caused the women to stink thus. It is added that during several ages they used to stink so much on a certain day every year, that their husbands, and even their very children could not endure to be near them. The authors are not agreed whether it was their mouth or their armpits that stunk so. Eustathius (6) asserts the first opinion, and Dion Chrysostomus (7) the second. Here follows some verses of Statius in which Hypsipyle represents the dismal condition of that island during the interregnum of love.

"affords now nothing but bitter hatred, anger, and quarrels."

This interregnum was so insufferable, that the women resolved upon the slaughter I have mentioned.

[B] Her fate differed from Dido's in this particular. For poor Dido's amours with Æneas proved fruitless, which grieved her very much. I have observed in another place (9) the difference there is between her taste and that of the women of this time. The latter being forsaken by their lovers at the beginning of the campaign, are overjoyed when the pleasures they tasted during the winter, are not attended with generation. I quote this instance, without pretending to exclude those that relate to persons of another profession. I quote it, I say, because in my opinion the stay of the Argonauts in the isle of Lemnos, may very well be compared to the soldiers continuing a long while in winter quarters.

Let us observe that Hypsipyle solemnly declares in the work of a Latin Poet, that it was very much against her will she married the lovely Jason.

*Cinerem furiasque meorum
Testor, ut externas non sponte aut crimine tædas
Attigerim, (scit cura Deum) est blandus Jason Virginibus dare vincula novis (10).*

(9) In the article GARNACHE, remark [B].

(10) Statius, lib. 5. ver. 454.

(1) Apollodorus, lib. 1.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) In insula Lemno mulieres Veneri sacra aliquot annos non fecerant. Hygin. cap. 15. See also Apollodorus, lib. 1. Stat. Theb. lib. 5. and the Scholiast in Euripidem in Hecubæ.

(4) Lactantius in Statium, lib. 5. Thebaid.

(5) Myrtius Lesbios, lib. 1. Lebracorum. apud Scholiast. Apollon. in lib. 1. Argonaut.

(6) In Iliad. lib. 3.

(7) Orations 32.

(8) Statius, Thebaid. lib. 5. ver. 70.

*Protinus a Lemno teneri fugistis amores,
Motus Hymen, versæque faces, & frigida justæ
Cura Tori: nullæ redeunt in gaudia noctes,
Nullus in amplexu sopor est; odia aspera ubique
Et furor, & medio recubat discordia læto (8).*

i. e. "Tender Cupids you are fled immediately from Lemnos: Hymen is removed, his torches are extinguished, the marriage bed is forsaken; no longer do the nights afford us joyful pleasures; no longer do we sleep in the arms of our husbands; the bed

i. e. "I call to witness the ashes and furies of my ancestors, that it is not of my own accord nor by any crime, that I consent to marry a foreigner; (the Gods know it). Though lovely Jason knows how to captivate young virgins."

But a Greek Poet represents her so much in love with him, that the moment she saw him, she offered him her Kingdom.

than Æneas [C]. See in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary what became of Hypsipyle, when her subjects found out that she had not killed her father.

Ἐς δὲ καὶ αὐτῆς
 Πατρῶν ἰδέσθαι, καὶ τοὶ ἄδοι, ἢτ' ἂν ἰκίτα
 Πατρὸς ἡμῶν Θέωνος ἔχουσι γέρας (11).

(11) Apollonius,
 lib. 5. ver. 827.

i. e. "Stay here, let it be acceptable to you; and for your reward, you shall have my father's Kingdom," Valerius Flaccus, also represents her deeply smitten with this Hero's charms, and ready to marry him the first time she sees him.

Unius haret

Alloquio, & blandos paulatim colligit ignes,
 Jam non dura sibi, Veneri nec iniqua reverse (12).

(12) Val. Flaccus,
 lib. 2. ver. 353.

i. e. "She speaks with one only; and insensibly suffers the fire of love to kindle in her bosom; she is no longer averse to the marriage-bed, nor does she decline the pleasures that return to her."

[C] Jason did not prove less inconstant than Æneas.] He forsook her and her two children and continued his voyage; so that she is one of those Heroines, whose sad complaints and tender sighs upon their being forsaken by the lovers to whom they refused nothing, are related by Ovid, Ariadne, Hypsipyle's grandmother (13), had met with the same fate. See in Ovid her complaint against Theseus. I make a reflexion upon this subject. The Mythological authors and the writers of modern romances followed very different roads. The former keep too much to the History, the latter recede too much from it. I say this only with regard to the description: they give us of men's morals as to their characters of heroes. In Mythology the Heroines are not only too amorous, but also too free of their favours: the Heroes are not constant; they get their Heroines with child, or they do their best endeavours for it, and then they forsake them. This favours too much of History, and is of a bad example for either sex (14); it is better to choose the opposite extreme, as is done in our romances: it is better, I say, to suppose, even against all probability, that such Heroes and Heroines as never commit the least fault.

(13) Theseus, Hypsipyle's father, was the son of Barchus and Ariadne.
 (14) We may apply to these accounts this sentence of Horace, Ode 7. lib. 3. Historias peccare docentes. i. e. Tales that are hawks to vice. Crash.

JACCETIUS

I.

JACCETIUS (FRANCIS CATANEUS) was born in Florence the 16th of November 1466. He was the disciple of Marfilus Ficinus; and improved so happily by the instructions of this great master, that he became one of the ablest Platonists of his time, and an exceeding good Orator. He succeeded the abovementioned Ficinus in his Professorship of Philosophy; he looking upon Jaccetius as perfectly well qualified for it, and even concluding that nature had brought him into the world for that purpose. He published a great many books [A]; died in Florence in the year 1522; was buried in the church of Santa Croce or Holy Cross in the sepulchre of his ancestors, and left thirteen sons [B]. Benedetto Varchi made his funeral Oration, and his life was written very elegantly by Euphrosynus Lapinus (a). Diaceto, which is his true Italian name, has been changed a numberless multitude of ways by those writers who speak of him or his posterity [C]. We have another FRANCIS CATANEUS JACCETIUS who wrote books [D]; but I am of opinion that he is known only under the name of DIACETTIUS, or DIACETIUS. I fancy that Count de Chateaufvillain, who married one of the maids of honour to Catherine de Medicis, descended from our Francis Jaccetius [E]. This young Lady was called Mademoiselle d'Atri, and has been very well and very ill spoken of (b).

(a) Ex Michaele Pocciantio, de Scriptor. Florentinis, pag. 67, 68.

(b) See the Notes on the Confession Catalique de Sancy, pag. 459, & seq. edit. of 1699.

[A] He published a great many books.] Here follow the titles of some of them; De Pulchro libri tres. De Amore libri tres. Paraphrasis in Politicum & Theagenem Platonis, & in Aristotelem de Caelo & Meteoris. Enarratio in Platonis Symposium. Oratio in funere Laurentii Medices. Epistole variae, &c. An edition was made, at Basil, of his works, in the year 1563, in folio. It is mentioned in the epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca, under Franciscus Cataneus Jaccetius. The Bodleian Catalogue, and Konig speak of it only under the word Cataneus. Ghilini calls this author only Francisco Catanio (1). He has admirably well paraphrased what Pocciantius says of him, and has not added any other incident.

(1) Ghilini, Teaturo, tom. 2. pag. 88.

[B] He left thirteen sons.] I doubt not but one of them is the person whom I mention in the article MACHIAVEL (2), and whose fatal end is thus described by Pierius Valerianus: Jacobus Jaccetus juvenis & Græce, & Latine egregie peritus, pangendi carminis auditor non illepidus, Florentinam cathedram obtinebat; sed infelici suo fidei conjurationis in Julii Cardinalis Medices eadem certo die patrandam conscius fuit; qua patefacta, captus ipse, & tam nefandi sceleris convictus Senatus Florentini judicio securi percussus est (3). i. e. "James Jaccetus, a young man exceedingly well versed in the Greek and Latin tongues, and a good Poet, obtained a Professor's chair in Florence; but through his ill fate, he joined in a plot in order to murder Cardinal Julius of Medicis, on a certain day. The conspiracy being discovered, Jaccetus was seized, and being found guilty of so horrid a crime, was beheaded, pursuant to the sentence of the Senate of Florence." Paul Jovius, who bestows no other title upon him than that of Poet (4), deserves censure. I am of opinion that brother Angelus de Cataneis Diacetus (5), who after having gone thro' the several dignities of the order of Dominicans, was made Bishop of Fiesoli in 1566, was one of the thirteen sons of our Jaccetius. He died the 5th of May 1574, at fourscore and one years of age (6). He is called in his epitaph (7) Angelus Cataneus Diacetus.

(2) At the remark [C].

(3) Pierius Valerian. de Litterator. Infelicit. lib. 2. pag. 77.

(4) See remark [C] of the article MACHIAVEL.

(5) He is thus named in tom. 3. pag. 340. of Ughelli's Italia Sacra.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Ughelli gives it, ibid.

[C] Diaceto, which is his true Italian name, has been changed a numberless multitude of ways by those writers who spoke of him or his posterity.] See the remark [C] of the article MACHIAVEL, and observe that the reason why I make Diaceto his true name, is because I met with this word in the subscription of a letter (8), which the grand-son of our Jaccetius wrote to the Varchi the 9th of September 1561, upon sending him two copies of a work of his grandfather's (9). He had received four of them from Venice. The edition pleased him as to the types, but he found it incorrect. Michael Pocciantius is not altogether accurate, he spelling our author's name thus; (9) That intitled, Franciscus Catbanus Diacetus (10). I am to observe that the author of the notes of the Confession of Sancy informs me (11), that Carolus Zenobii de Ghiaceto unus ex Decemviris Baliae Florentinae civitatis, signed in the quality of J. . . son of Cosmo de Medicis, in a contract made at Florence in 1453, which he saw among the Archives of Lorrain. This shews that this family was not antiently called Diaceto. It is very probable that Diaceto was made by joining the name and the article together. I have spoke elsewhere (12) of the life of one Paul Ghiacetti.

(8) Bulifone has inserted it in pag. 199. of his Litterae Storice, Politice, & Erudite, printed at Pozzoli in 1685.

[D] We have another FRANCIS CATANEUS JACCETIUS who wrote books.] Michael Pocciantius calls him Franciscus Catbanus Diacettius, and says that he was a Canon in the cathedral of Florence, Apostolical Prothonotary, Doctor of the Civil Law, and Bishop of Fiesoli; and that he wrote in Italian, among other works, the life of Christ, of the blessed Virgin, of St. Dominick, and of some Bishops of Fiesoli; several sermons, and the Epistles and Gospels for all the year (13). Ughelli calls him Franciscus Cataneus Diacetus; and says that he succeeded Angelus de Cataneis Diacetus his uncle, in the Bishoprick of Fiesoli, in the year 1570; had a seat among the Fathers of the Council of Trent; wrote some tracts entitled De Auctoritate Papæ & Consilii, de Superstitione Artis Magicae, &c. that he discharged all the duties of a worthy prelate, and died the 4th of November 1595 (14).

(10) Mich. Pocciant. de Script. Florent. pag. 67.

(11) Pag. 461. of the edit. of 1699.

(12) In the remark of the article FONTIUS.

[E] Count de Chateaufvillain . . . descended from our Francis Jaccetius.] Mezerai speaking of the exploits of the King's troops against the League, observes, that Sancy made himself master of Chateaufvillain in Champagne in the year 1589, at the solicitation of the Lord of the place. It was, adds he (15), a Florentine named Louis Dijacetti, who, like many of his countrymen, had acquired great riches by farming the imposts of the King.

(13) Pocciant. de Script. Florent. pag. 71.

(14) Ughelli, Italia Sacra, tom. 3. pag. 340.

(15) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 784. edit. of 1685.

☞ JACOB (HENRY), a very learned English writer in the seventeenth Century, was son of Mr. Henry Jacob [A] a Minister in Kent, by Sarah sister of John Duma-relique of the Isle of Jersey Gentleman. He was born in the Diocese of London about the

[A] Mr. Henry Jacob.] This Mr. Jacob was a native of Kent, and entered a Commoner or Butler in St. Mary's-Hall, in the University of Oxford, in 1579, at sixteen years of age (1), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, December 16, 1583 (2), and that of Master of Arts July 8, 1586 (3). Entering into holy orders he became Præcentor of Corpus Christi College, and was afterwards beneficed in Kent, particularly

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 404.

(2) Idem. Fassi; Oxon. vol. 1. col. 124.
(3) Idem, ibid. col. 132.

the year 1609, and in his younger years sent by his relations to be educated abroad, and studied at Leyden under Thomas Erpenius, and made a prodigious progress in Philological and Oriental learning. At about the age of two and twenty years he returned to England, and by Mr. William Bedwell, who was eminent for his skill in the Arabic Language, he was recommended in the strongest terms to William Earl of Pembroke, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, who wrote letters to that University in his behalf [B], that he might be created Bachelor of Arts (a), as he was on the 20th of January 1628⁸ (b). The year following, by the interest of Mr. Selden, Mr. Henry Briggs, and Mr. Peter Turner he was elected Probationer Fellow of Merton College in Oxford (c).

(a) Wood, Atb.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
158, 159. 2d edit.
London 1721.

(b) Idem, Fasti
Oxon. vol. 1. col.
246.

(c) Idem, Atb.
Oxon. ubi supra.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

“ But then, says Mr. Wood (d), he not having so much Logic and Philosophy to carry him through the severe exercises of that Society, the Warden and Fellows tacitly assigned him Philological Lecturer. This being done, he was called away to follow law-suits concerning his patrimony; which being concluded he fell into a dangerous sickness, and by the sudden loss of his Patron of Pembroke, his life was in jeopardy.” Bishop Laud being soon after chosen Chancellor of the University, a way was found out from the statutes of Merton College to make Mr. Jacob Socius Grammaticalis, that is, Reader of Philology to the Juniors, a place which had been disused for about an hundred years. So that being made compleat Fellow, he spent some time in 1636 with Mr. Selden (e) [C]; and August the 13th the same year he was created Master of Arts (f). June the 14th 1641 he was elected Superior Bedell of Divinity (g). The same year Sir Nath. Brent, Warden of the College, being his enemy, endeavours were used to eject him out of his Fellowship, as appears from a letter of Mr. Peter Turner to Mr. Selden [D]. November the 1st 1642 he was created Bachelor of Physic (b). “ But his head, says Mr. Wood (i), being always overbusy about critical notions, (which

(f) Idem, Fasti
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
268, 269.

(g) Idem, Atb.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
159.

(b) Idem, Fasti
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
20.

(i) Atb. Oxon.
vol. 2. col. 159.

particularly at Cheriton, as Mr. Wood was informed; though upon search into that Parish Register, wherein are the names of all the Rectors of that church set down since 1591, that of Henry Jacob occurs not, he having been perhaps Rector before that time. He was a person exceedingly well read in theological authors, but a most zealous Puritan, or, as his son Henry used to say, the first Independent in England (4). He wrote the following works. A Treatise of the Sufferings and Victory of Christ in the work of our Redemption, &c. written against certain errors in those points publicly preached in London, 1597. London, 1598, in 8vo. The points, which he endeavours to confute, were, 1. That Christ suffered for us the wrath of God, which we may well term the pains of Hell. 2. That Christ after his death on the cross went not into Hell in his soul. Of the Church and Ministry of England, written in two Treatises against the Reasons and Objections of Mr. Francis Johnson. Middleburg, 1599, in 4to. Our author and Mr. Johnson, who was a Brownist, and lived in Holland, had several disputes at Amsterdam about the Church of England's being a true church. Defence of a Treatise touching the Sufferings and Victory of Christ in the work of our Redemption. 1600 in 4to. Reasons taken out of God's word and the best human Testimonies, proving a necessity of reforming our Churches of England, &c. 1604, in 4to. A Position against vain-glorious, and that which is falsely called learned preaching. 1604, in 8vo. The divine Beginning and Institution of Christ's true, visible, and material Church. Leyden, 1610, in 8vo. Plain and clear Exposition of the second Commandment, 1610, in 8vo. Declaration and opening of certain points, with a sound Confirmation of some others, in a Treatise, intitled, The Divine Beginning, &c. Middleburg, 1611. He wrote and published likewise several pieces, as the Counter-Poison, &c. which being printed privately, or beyond the seas, are rarely to be met with. He began to gather a congregation in the city of London in 1616, and died in 1621 (5).

(4) Idem, Oxon.
vol. 1. col. 465.

(5) Idem, ibid.

[B] Who wrote letters to that University in his behalf. These letters are dated November 24, 1628; in which the Chancellor says, that “ Henry Jacob, a young scholar, had bestowed divers years in the Low-Countries in the study of good literature, and had his education principally under one Erpenius, a famous scholar, especially in the Oriental languages; in which learning he profited under him beyond the ordinary measures of his age, &c.”

[C] He spent some time in 1636 with Mr. Selden. He was Amanuensis to that great man, as appears from these words of Mr. Selden: Ubi Amanuensis mihi in Caedice Regio tunc porrigendo operam praestitit mihi vir doctissimus Henricus Jacobus, &c. (6). “ At this time, it is said, he taught, or at least improved Selden

(6) Vindiciae Maritimi
clausi, pag. 53.
edit. Londini
1653.

“ in the Hebrew language, and added several things which Selden finding to be very excellent, let them stand (7).”

[D] As appears from a letter of Mr. Peter Turner to Mr. Selden. This Letter, which we copied from the original, is addressed to his worthy honoured friend Mr. Selden, and is as follows.

(7) Wood, Atb.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
159.

“ Sir,
“ Out of that affection, which naturally inclines men to preserve their own benefactors, I presume upon your ready assistance for the preserving Mr. Jacob in that fellowship, which by your procurement my Lord of Canterbury conferred upon him. If some means for prevention be not timely used, he is likely the 10th of January to be pronounced non Socius. The main quarrel to him, (and that not disguised neither) is, that he was brought in by my Lord's Grace, irregularly and unstatutably, say they, though I know the contrary, and am able to demonstrate it before indifferent judges, such as he is not likely to find our Warden or any of his creatures. Another exception is, that the Squire Bedell's office is not compatible with his fellowship; which will easily be answered by the practice both of our owne College and of other Colleges in both Universityes. So will also some other exceptions, which they have against him upon the by, be easily blowne away, if they were to be scanned before indifferent judges. At another time there were some remedies to be found against these proceedings, by appealing to the Visitors. But our Visitor now being under hatches, and his jurisdiction suspended, we know not where to seek for remedie. If the suspension were intended by the Lords to extend onely to that jurisdiction, which essentially is inherent in the Archbishoprick (as this power of Visitor is not) then there is still a power in my Lord's Grace, though a frustraneous one, since he does not make use of it. If it were intended that this jurisdiction likewise should be involved in the general suspension, another quere will rise where it is lodged all this while, whether in the same persons, &c. whence they have committed the execution of the ordinary jurisdiction; or in nubibus, to be extracted thence upon occasion, and placed where the Parliament pleaseth. If in the same persons, then Mr. Warden by this means is his own Visitor, and a man that should appeal from him to himself, were like to find much remedie. If in nubibus, and yet to be disposed of by Parliament, I doubt whether they will have leisure at such a time to take so petty a business into their consideration. Then againe, it is to be feared, lest the same consideration, which made them take the Archbishop's jurisdiction

“(which made him sometimes a little better than crazed) he neglected his duty so much, that he was suspended once, if not twice, from his place, and had his Bedell’s staff taken from him.” At last, when the Parliament Visitors came in 1648 he lost it altogether, and was ejected from his Fellowship; so that being destitute of a maintenance, he retired to London, where Mr. Selden contributed to his support. But the benefactions of his friends not being sufficient, he sold that little land which he had at Godmersham in Kent, and died before it was spent. He wrote many things, but published nothing himself [E]. Having broken his health by his intense application to his studies, he retired, by the advice of his friends, some weeks before his death to Canterbury in September 1652, where he was entertained by Dr. William Jacob, an eminent Physician of that city, though not related to him. But soon after a tumour breaking out in one of his legs, he died there November the 5th 1652, about the year of his age forty four, and was interred the next day in the parish church of All-Saints in that city (k). “ Soon after

(k) Ibid. col. 159, 161.

“ jurisdiction out of his hands, will sway them to place it in such hands, as are most likely to make use of it against my Lord, to overthrow all his acts. If they should think of a Clergie-man, the Archbishop of Yorke is as likely a man as another; and our Warden hath already (though very ignorantly) intitled him to the Visitorship of our College; with which opinion it is likely he hath possessed his friends in the Lords House (as my Lords of Northumberland and Essex) and they probably may cause it to be suggested to the House. If they should think of a Lay-Lord, our Chancellor having the nearest relation to the University, may in likelihood be thought of before any other; whose affection though for my own particular I have no reason to distrust, yet I cannot be confident upon his judgment. Besides that our Warden presumes upon a great interest in him; which (whatever it be) he is likely to improve to the best advantage, through the opportunity of his friends assiduous about my Lord, Sir B. Rudyard and Mr. Oldsworth. These considerations and doubts drive me to wish, that this same jurisdiction might prove a waft or stray, and so fall into the King’s hands. I should hope it might without much difficulty be obtained of him to interest himself in the business so farre, as to lay his injunction upon our College, that in the interim, untill the Parliament have leysure to examine my Lord’s acts, orders, and injunctions made in our College, they shall all stand good, and all acts done or suffered in the College, contrary to them, should be void. Thus as briefly as I could I have represented to you my feares, my doubts, my wishes. Out of them, (which I cannot do) your judgment will raise some settled resolution, what is to be done in this business; unto which I shall as readily subscribe, as I doe sincerely

“ Your friend, devoted “ Merte. Coll. “ to serve and honour you,
 “ 30. X^{bris} 1641. “ Pet. Turner.

[E] He wrote many things, but published nothing himself. They are as follow. I. Oratio inauguralis sub Aditu Prælectionis Philologicae publicè habita apud Collegium Oxonio-Merton. 4 Aug. 1635. II. Græca & Latina Poemata. III. Description of Oakley-Hole near Wells, ann. 1632. Written in English verse. IV. Annotationes in eam partem Orationis inauguralis, in quâ dicitur, “ Oratione solutâ scripsit Aristæus Proconne-“ sius.” These four pieces were published at Oxford during the author’s life, in 1652 in 4to, by his intimate friend Mr. Henry Birkhead, Fellow of All-Souls College. V. Etymotechnia Catholica, containing four Diatriba’s concerning the original of letters. The first de Ordine Alphabeti; the second de transitu Alphabeti; the third de numero, figurâ, potestate & divisione Literarum; and the fourth intitled Geographistor Etymotechnus. VI. Grammatica Ebræa. This Grammar is drawn up in a new method. VII. ΣΒΩ vel Osi-“ ris inventus; de Coptiacis Originibus Commentatio. VIII. Geographumena: in which are many Assyrian and Egyptian Antiquities discovered. IX. Pancarpia, opus ex Artibus & Linguis miscell. This piece is imperfect. X. Excogitata Philosophica; nempe de novâ ratione circæ Monopsyllogismum dialecticum, pridem semi circulariter figuratum, natalia ventorum conceptacula, &c. XI. Magnetologia, in Lib. 3. agentibus de tripli-“ ci motu magnetico Lapidali, Cœlesti, & Animali, &c.

VOL. VI.

XII. Libri Ebræo-Rabbinici in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ recensiti, ann. 1629. Mr. Wood had a copy of this written by the hand of Dr. Gerard Langbaine. It was the first work, which Mr. Jacob performed after he was settled at Oxford, at the desire of his Patron William Earl of Pembroke, the Hebrew books abovementioned being the same which the Earl had obtained out of Italy from the Baroccian Library. XIII. Besides the manuscripts, which we have given an account of, Mr. Jacob left a great many others, several of which he lent to Dr. Peter Turner, who after his ejection from the University of Oxford in 1648, retiring to the house of his sister, the widow of Mr. Watts, a Brewer in Southwark, and dying there in January 165½, his papers came into the hands of his nephew William Watts, afterwards Residentiary of Hereford, who having a son of Brazen-Nose College in Oxford, into whose possession they came, he communicated several of them to Moses Pengry, Fellow of that College, one of which was intitled, De Mari Rubro; and another De Historiâ Beli & Draconis. Copies of these tracts were communicated by Mr. Pengry to Mr. Richard Reeve, then Master of the School adjoining to Magdalen College. Mr. Wood informs us likewise (8), that “ our Author being ejected in 1648 (8) Ibid. col. 160
 “ from Merton College, and so consequently from his chamber, wherein he had left a trunk full of books, as well written as printed, left Oxon; and taking no care, nor appointing any friend for its security, his chamber-door, before a year was expired, was broke open for a new comer, who finding the trunk there, did let it remain in its place for a time. At length, when no man inquired after it, as the then possessor thereof pretended, he secured it for his own use, broke it open, and therein discovered a choice treasure of books. One of them being a manuscript, and fit for the press, he disguised and altered it with another style, and at length, after he had learned Hebrew and the oriental languages to blind the world, and had conversed openly with those most excellent in them, as Pocock and Bogan of Corpus Christi College, or any Grecian or Jew, that came accidentally to the University, he published it under this title: Delpbi Phœnicizantes, sive Tractatus, in quo Græcos, quicquid Delpbis celebræ erat (scu Pythonis & Apollinis Historiam, seu Pœanica Certamina, & Præmia, &c.) e Josuæ Historiâ scripti; sacris effluxisse rationibus haud inconcinnis ostenditur, &c. Oxford 1655, in 8vo. To which is added, Diatriba de Noe in Italiam adventu, ejusq; Nominibus Ethnicis, and a little tract De origine Druidum: which three things are much commended by foreign Authors, particularly by Spizelius in his book De doctrinâ Sinesium. The person, whom Mr. Wood means in this passage, and who published the Delpbi Phœnicizantes in his own name, was Dr. Edmund Dickenson, afterwards an eminent Physician at London. Mr. Jacob put notes to most of the printed books in his study, and particularly to Salmasius’s Exercitationes Plinianæ in Solinum; which book coming into the hands of Mr. Henry Birkhead, Fellow of All Souls College, “ he transcrib’d the said notes, and entering them into another copy of his own, deleted those of Jacob with aqua fortis, and sold the copy itself to an Oxford Bookseller; such, says Mr. Wood (9), was his for- (9) Ibid.
 “ did avarice.” T.

U u u u

(1) Ibid. col. 161.

“ after, says Mr. Wood (1), in a bright moon-shining night, the resemblance of Henry “ Jacob came into the bed-chamber of the Doctor, who being asleep, the resem“ blance laid his cold hand upon his face. Whereupon the Doctor awaking, looked up
 “ and saw Henry Jacob staring upon him, with his beard turned up, as he used to wear
 “ it living: whereat being strangely surpris'd, he stirr'd himself, thinking that it might “ be a dream; but still the resemblance stood still; so that the Doctor having not cou“ rage to speak to it, turned on the other side, and lay in a cold sweat. After some “ time he looked again, and saw him sitting on a little table near to his bed; but before “ morning he vanished. Another night the maid going out of the house, saw the said “ resemblance standing on a wood-pile, and was thereupon much affrighted. These “ stories the Doctor did confidently aver to be true, not only to Dr. Peter Moulin Pre“ bendary of Canterbury, but to others of note, among whom, if I am not mistaken,
 “ Dr. Meric Casaubon was one.”

(a) The Life and Death of the venerable Dr. Jackson, Dean of Peterborough, and President of Corpus Christi in Oxford, prefixed to A Collection of his Works, London 1653 in fol. This Life was written by Mr. Edmund Vaughan Fellow of Corpus Christi College.

(b) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 633. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Life, ubi supra.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

(e) Idem, Fassi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 156.

(f) Idem, ibid. col. 165.

JACKSON (THOMAS), a very learned English Divine in the seventeenth Century, was descended of a very worthy family in the Bishopric of Durham (a), and was born at Witton on the river Weer in Durham, December the 21st 1579 (b). He was at first designed by his parents to be a Merchant in Newcastle, where many of his relations and friends lived in great wealth and prosperity; but that temptation could not divert him from his inclination to learning (c). At the instance therefore of Ralph Lord Evre, Baron of Malton and Wilton he was sent to the University of Oxford [A], and became a student of Queen's College under the tuition of Mr. Richard Crakanthorp in Midsummer Term 1595, and was admitted scholar of Corpus Christi College March the 24th 1596 (d) [B]. July the 23d 1599 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e); and July the 9th 1603 that of Master (f). May the 10th 1606 he was chosen Probationer Fellow of his College (g). June the 26th 1622 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (h). He read a Lecture of Divinity in his College every Sunday morning, and another day of the week at Pembroke College, then newly erected, at the desire of the Master and Fellows there. He was chosen Vice-President of his College for many years together, who by his place was to moderate the disputations in Divinity (i). In 1624 he left the College for a Living in the Bishopric of Durham, to which he was presented by the President and Fellows of his College; and from thence soon after he removed to the Vicarage of Newcastle upon Tyne (k), where he discharged his duty in a most exemplary manner [C], and was much followed and admired, says Mr. Wood (l), for his excellent way of preaching, which was then puritanical. In 1630 (m) he was elected President of Corpus Christi College [D], partly by the interest of Dr. Neile Bishop of Durham, who had before

(g) Wood, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(h) Idem, Fassi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 223.

(i) Life, ubi supra.

(k) Ibid. and Wood, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(l) Ibid.

(m) Idem, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 232.

taken

[A] At the instance of Ralph Lord Evre, Baron of Malton and Wilton, he was sent to the University of Oxford. Our Author in the dedication to that Nobleman of his treatise, intitled, The eternal Truth of Scriptures, and Christian Belief thereon wholly depending, manifested by its own Light, printed at London 1613 in 4to. has these words: “ That love and duty, which I owe unto your honourable family and person, as in many other respects, so chiefly in this, that being engaged unto a more gainful, but not so good a course of life, and well nigh rooted in another soil, I was by your Lordship's favourable advice and countenance transplanted to this famous nursery of good learning.”

[B] Was admitted scholar of Corpus Christi College March 24th 1596. The Author of his Life (1) tells us, that although he had no notice of the vacancy of the place, till the day before the election, yet he answer'd with so much readiness and applause, that he gained the admiration, as well as the suffrages of the Electors, and was chosen with full consent, though they had received letters of favour from great men for another scholar. He had not been long admitted into this place, before he had like to have lost his life by an accident. For walking out with others of the younger company to wash himself, he was in imminent danger of being drowned. It was a long and almost incredible space of time, wherein he lay under water, before a boat could be procured, which was sent for, rather to take out his body, before it floated, for a decent funeral, than out of hopes of recovery of life. The Boatman discerning where he was by the bubbling of the water (the last sign of a Man expiring) thrust down his hook at that very moment, which at the first trial lighted under his arm, and brought him up into the boat. All the parts of his body were swollen to a vast proportion; and though by holding his head downward they let forth the water, yet no hopes of life appeared. They brought him therefore to the land, and lapped him up in the gowns of his fellow-students. After some warmth and former means renewed, they perceived that life was yet in him, convey'd him to the College, and commended him to the skill of Dr. Channel, an eminent Physician of the same house; where with much care, time, and difficulty he recovered to the equal joy and wonder of the whole society. His grateful acknowledgments to the Fisherman and his servant, who took him up, knew no limits, being a constant revenue to them while he lived.

[C] Removed to the Vicarage of Newcastle upon Tyne, where he discharged his duty in a most exemplary manner. He shewed himself to be very studious, humble, courteous, and charitable. When he went out, what money he had, he usually gave to the poor, who at length flock'd so to him, that his servant took care, that he had not too much in his pocket. At a certain time Dr. Henderson, the Physician of that town, his neighbour and intimate friend, having made a purchase, sitting melancholy by him, and fetching a sigh, Dr. Jackson asked the reason. He said, that he had a payment to make, and wanted money. Dr. Jackson told him, that he would furnish him; and calling for his servant, informed him of the Physician's need, and asked what money he had. The man stepping back silent, the Doctor bade him speak. The man said, forty shillings. The Doctor ordered him to fetch it, for Dr. Henderson should have it all. Upon this the Physician turned his sadness into laughter; and Dr. Jackson demanding the reason, he answer'd, that he had occasion for four or five hundred pounds. Dr. Jackson replied, that he thought forty shillings a great sum, and that he should have it, and more also, if he had it (2).

[D] Elected President of Corpus Christi College. The Author of his life tells us, that he was chosen in his absence, at so great a distance, so unexpectedly, without any suit or petition upon his part, that he knew nothing of the vacancy of the place, but by the same letters, that informed him, that it was convey'd upon himself. A preferment of so good account, that it had been much desired and eagerly sought after by many eminent men, but never before went so far to be accepted of. But Mr.

(2) Life, ubi supra.

(1) Prefixed to his Works.

taken him off, says Mr. Wood, from his precise way, and made him his Chaplain; but more by the endeavours of Bishop Laud. Upon this he left his Vicarage, was appointed Chaplain in ordinary to his Majesty (n), and June 18, 1635, Prebendary of Winchester (o), and was presented to the Vicarage of Witney in Oxfordshire, which, after he had been at much pains and expence to clear the title of the Rectory to all succeeding Ministers, he freely bestowed on Mr. Thomas White, then Proctor of the University, and Chaplain of Corpus Christi College (p). In 1638 he was promoted to the Deanery of Peterborough in the room of Dr. John Towers, advanced to the Episcopal See (q). He published a great many works [E]. He died September the 21st 1640, and was interred in the Inner Chapel of Corpus Christi College. Mr. Wood tells us (r), that he was furnished with all learned Languages, Arts, and Sciences, especially Metaphysics, which he considered as a necessary handmaid to Divinity; and that he was also profoundly read in the Fathers. He had a strong judgment. He wrote excellently concerning the divine attributes, and with vigour against the Church of Rome. Mr. Barnabas Oley (s) declares, that

(n) Idem, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(o) Le Neve, Fasti Ecclis. Anglic. pag. 529.

(p) Life, ubi supra.

(q) Le Neve, ubi supra, pag. 241.

(r) Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(s) Life of Mr. George Herbert, edit. London 1652. It is not pag. d.

Mr. Wood, as we have observed in the text of this article, asserts, that Bishop Neile and Bishop Laud made use of their interest to procure this place for him. He governed in a most obliging manner the fellows, scholars, servants, and tenants. No man departed from him melancholy, except in this particular, that by some misdemeanor or wilful error they had created trouble, or given offence to him. He used the friends as well as the memory of his predecessors fairly. He was a lover and maker of peace. He silenced and composed all differences, displeasure, and animosities by a prudent impartiality, and the example of his own sweet disposition. It was a new and peculiar art of discipline, but successfully practised by him, that those under his authority were kept within bounds and order, not so much out of fear of the penalty, as out of love to the Governor. He took notice of that which was good in the worst men, and made that an occasion to commend them for the good's sake; and living himself, tanquam nemini ignosceret, as if he were so severe, that he could forgive no man, yet he reserved large pardons for the imperfections of others. He willingly admitted, and was much delighted in, the acquaintance and familiarity of hopeful young Divines, advising them what books to read. This was one of the special advices and directions which he commended to young men; Hear the dictates of your own conscience. Quod dubitas, ne feceris; making this comment upon that of the son of Sirach, In all thy matters trust (or believe) thy own soul, and bear it not down by impetuous and contradictory lusts (3).

(3) Ibid.

[E] He publish'd a great many works.] They are as follow: I. The eternal Truth of Scriptures, and Christian Belief, thereon wholly depending, manifested by its own Light. London 1613 in 4to. This is the first Book of his Comments on the Creed. II. How far the Ministry of Men is necessary for planting true Christian Faith, and retaining the unity of it planted, London 1614, in 4to. This is the second Book of his Comments on the Creed. III. Blasphemous Positions of Jesuits and other later Romanists concerning the authority of their Church. London 1614, in 4to. This is the third Book of his Comments on the Creed. The Dedication to William Lord Bishop of Durham is dated at Corpus Christi College March 25th 1614. IV. Justifying Faith: Or, the Faith, by which the Just do live. A Treatise containing a Description of the Nature, Properties, and Conditions of Christian Faith. London 1615 and 1631, in 4to. This is the fourth book of his Comments on the Creed. V. A Discovery of Misperceptions, breeding Presumption and Hypocrisy, and Means how Faith may be planted in Unbelievers. Printed with the preceding Treatise. VI. A Treatise concerning the Original of Unbelief, Misbelief, and Misperceptions concerning the Verity, Unity, and Attributes of the Deity, &c. London 1625, in 4to. This is the fifth Book of his Comments on the Creed. VII. A Treatise of the Divine Essence and Attributes. London 1628, in 4to the first Part. The second Part was printed there in 1629 in 4to. These two parts make the sixth Book of his Comments on the Creed. The first part is dedicated to William Earl of Pembroke in an Epistle, wherein, as Mr. Prynne says (4), "the Author professeth himself an Arminian, and Patron of their Tenets. And from chap. 8. to the 20th he professedly maintains a mutability in God's eternal Decrees of Election, and Reprobation, depending upon the Actions and Wills of Men, Universal Grace and Redemption, with other Arminian Errors. This Book, though publicly complained of, was never called in by the Bishop [Laud.] but the second Part thereof was printed with License Ann. 1629, and the Author of it advanced to the Presidentship of Corpus Christi College in Oxford by this Bishop, yea by him designed to be Doctor of the Chair (though he missed that preferment) to poison the University of Oxford with "his Arminian dregs." VIII. The Knowledge of Jesus Christ. This is the seventh Book of his Comments on the Creed. A larger title of it runs thus: Christ exercising his everlasting Priesthood, &c. Or, a Treatise of the Knowledge of Christ, which consists in the true Estimate or experimental Valuation of his Death, Resurrection, and Exercise of his everlasting sacerdotal function, &c. London 1624, in 4to. IX. Humiliation of the Son of God by his becoming the Son of Man, &c. London 1626 and 1636 in 4to. This is the eighth Book of his Comments on the Creed. X. Treatise of the Consecration of the Son of God to the everlasting Priesthood, &c. London 1628 and 1633, in 4to, Oxford 1638 in 4to. This is the ninth Book of his Comment on the Creed. XI. A Treatise of that Knowledge of Christ, which consists in the true Estimate or experimental Valuation of his Death, Resurrection, and Exercise of his everlasting Sacerdotal Function in the Heavenly Sanctuary, where he now sitteth at the Right Hand of God the Father. London 1654, in folio. This is the tenth Book of his Comments on the Creed. XII. MARAN AΘA. Dominus veniet. Of Christ's Session at the Right Hand of God, and Exaltation thereby. Of his being made Lord and Christ. Of his coming to judge the Quick and the Dead. Of the Resurrection of the Body; and Life everlasting both in Joy and Torments. London 1657, in folio. This is the eleventh Book of his Comments on the Creed. This with the tenth Book, and a preface concerning them and their Author, were published by Barnabas Oley, M. A. of Cambridge, who had before published the second edition of the three first Books at London 1653, in folio, with a large Preface written by the Editor, and a Life of our author written by Mr. Edmund Vaughan, Fellow of Corpus Christi College. To this eleventh Book are subjoin'd divers Sermons, proper Attendants upon the precedent Treatise. XIII. Treatise of the Holy Catholic Faith and Church, in three Books. London 1627, in 4to. This is the twelfth Book of his Comments on the Creed. XIV. A Treatise of Christian Obedience. XV. A Treatise of the primordial State of the first Man. Of the manner how Sin found entrance into, and is propagated in the world. Of the Nature of Sin. Of our first servitude to it. Of that poor Remnant of Free-Will left in the Sons of Adam, with directions to use it aright, and how we are to be set free by the Son of God. Of Mortification. Of the right Use of Reason, or Rules of Art for determining Doubts in Divinity, &c. London 1654, in folio. XVI. A Discourse of the Limitation of the two Propositions in the thirteenth Verse of the eighth Chapter to the Romans. XVII. A Vindication of himself, or a serious Answer to Mr. Henry Burton's Exceptions taken against a passage in his Treatise of the Divine Essence and Attributes. XVIII. A Paraphrase on the eleven first Chapters of Exodus, with useful Annotations, Observations, and Parallels. XIX. Salvation only from God's Grace, or an Exposition of Rom. ix. 16. XX. God's just hardening of Pharaoh, when he had filled up that he "had not read so hearty and vigorous a champion against Rome, so convincing and demonstrative as Dr. Jackson." He was a man of a blameless life, studious, humble, courteous, charitable, and pious; and was extremely beloved by all, except the rigid Calvinists, who considered him in an odious light as an Arminian [F]. There was another Divine of both his names, who was educated in the University of Cambridge, afterwards Minister of Wye in Kent, and at length Prebendary of Canterbury, and Doctor of Divinity. He published several Sermons, and was a severe enemy to the Arminians, and was a witness against Archbishop Laud upon his trial (t).

(4) Camberbury's Doom, pag. 166, 167.

(t) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 636.

the Measure of his Iniquity. Or, an Exposition of Rom. ix. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24. These five last Treatises were printed in his Second Part of the Knowledge of Jesus Christ, abovementioned, at London 1654, in folio. XXI. Several Sermons. These works of his, with some others not before printed, were published together at London 1672, in three volumes in folio. He wrote likewise An Historical Narrative licensed by Dr. Edward Martin, domestic Chaplain to Bishop Laud, without that Prelate's Privy; for which he was dismissed the Bishop's service (2), and the book called in, and suppressed. But Mr. Prynne, an implacable enemy to Bishop Laud, says (3), "that the said Historical Narrative, which was the vilest Imposture that ever was thrust upon our Church, was licensed by the said Martin with Laud's privy; and that the calling of it in was the act of Archbishop Abbot upon Prynne's complaint, and the public scandal it gave, much against Laud's Will, who ever since connived at the sale of them."

(2) See Prynne's Canterbury's Doom, pag. 508.

(3) Ibid. pag. 510.

(F) Extremely beloved by all except the rigid Puritans, who considered him in an odious light as an Arminian. Mr. Prynne speaks thus of him (4): Dr. Jackson of Oxon is a man of great abilities, and of a plausible, affable, courteous deportment, till of late he hath been transported beyond himself with metaphysical contemplations, to his own infamy and his renowned Mother's shame; I mean, the University of Oxford, who grieves for his defection, from whose Dugs he never suck'd his poisonous doctrines. In another place (5), that "he was convicted in the last Parliament (6), yea openly accused in the last Convocation for his heretical Arminian books, which have been censured by Mr. Henry Burton in his Seven Viols, and particularly answered by the acute and learned Dr. Twisse." Mr. Burton took offence at our Author's Treatise of the Divine Essence and Attributes, and in the Epistle before his book intitled Israel's Fast, printed in 1628, has the following passage: These Neutralizers, or Popish Arminians, or Arminian Papists, or what you will, under the name of the Church of England, dare vent any Arminian Heresy: As in a book lately printed, and by authority too, there is this most blasphemous Arminian Heresy; That there is a goodness objective in the creature, which in order of nature is precedent to the act or exercise of God's will: Thus by necessary consequence mak-

(4) In his Anti-Arminianism: or the Church of England's old Antitibetis &c. pag. 270. edit. 1630.

(5) Appendix to Anti-Arminianism.

(6) In 1628.

ing the Creature a God, having a self-being, independent, but only upon God's bare Prescience, upon which, and not upon that supreme Cause of Causes, God's will, he hangs the being and well-being of all the creatures. Dr. Jackson wrote a Vindication of himself, printed in the Appendix to the tenth Book of his Comments on the Creed, wherein he denies that he ever wrote the proposition abovementioned, but owns the following one contained in his Treatise of the Divine Essence and Attributes, chap. 13. part 3. p. 149. in 4to. "As there is a logical possibility presupposed to be the working of the Almighty Power; so there is a goodness objective precedent in order of nature to the act or exercise of his will." He asserts in his Vindication, that "all things are not good only because God willeth, but God willeth some things because they are good;" and that "if the acts and injunctions of God's will were the only rule of Goodness, and had not eternal Goodness rather for their rule, it would be hard to avoid the Stoical error, that all sins are equal, besides a kind of fatality in human affairs worse than Stoical. The Turks acknowledge God's will to be a rule of goodness, as sovereign, as the Author of the forementioned Epistle doth; to be such a Cause of Causes, as he would have it: But being ignorant, or not considering, that there is an immutable goodness precedent to the act or exercise of God's will; a goodness whereof his will, however considered, is no cause, for it is co-eternal to his will, to his wisdom, and essence; they fall into grossly absurd errors. And consequently unto this their ignorance, or to the common error, that all things are good only because God willeth them, they sometimes highly commend, and sometimes deeply discommend the self same practices for quality and circumstances with as great vehemency of zeal and spirit, and with as fair protestations of obedience in all things to God's will, as any other men do. . . . Whosoever he be, whether Jew, Turk, or Christian, which thinks, that all events are so irresistibly decreed by God, that none can fall out otherwise than they do, must of necessity grant, either that there is no moral evil under the sun, or that God's will, which is the Cause of Causes, is the only cause of such evil."

T.

✠ JAMES (Dr. THOMAS), a very learned English Divine in the seventeenth Century, was born in the Isle of Wight (a) at Newport (b) about the year 1571 [A]. He was educated in Grammar learning at Wickham school near Winchester, from whence he went to New College in Oxford, of which he became perpetual Fellow in 1593 (c). May the 3d 1595 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d); and February the 3d 1595 that of Master of Arts (e). About the year 1599 or 1600, being recommended to Mr. (afterwards Sir) Thomas Bodley by his great learning and knowledge of books, he was designed by him the first Keeper of the public Library at Oxford then founding; and this office was confirmed to him by the University in 1602 (f). May the 16th 1614 he accumulated the degrees in Divinity (g); and having about that time the Subdeanery of Wells conferred upon him freely without his seeking by the Bishop of that See, and the Rectory of Mongeham in Kent, with other spiritual preferments by the Archbishop of Canterbury without asking (h), he resigned in 1620 the place of Library Keeper (i), being about that time a Justice of Peace (k), and betook himself more intensely to his studies, the fruits of which are several valuable works [B]. He was a Member of the Convocation

(a) Fuller's Worthies in Hampshire.

(b) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 144.

(c) Ibid. ibid.

(d) Ibid. Fusti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 149. 2d edit. London 1721.

(e) Ibid. ibid. col. 154.

(f) Ibid. Atb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 537.

(g) Ibid. Fusti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 197.

(h) Ibid. Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(i) Ibid. Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 53.

(k) Ibid. pag. 144.

[A] Born about the year 1571.] Mr. Woods tells us (1), that he was about sixty eight years of age, when he died, which was in August 1629.

(1) Atben. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 540.

[B] Several valuable works. His writings are as follow. I. Philobiblium Richardi Dunelmensis, published by our author, who collated several manuscripts of it, at Oxford 1599 in 4to, with a dedication to Sir Thomas Bodley. To this is subjoined an Appendix de Manuscriptis Oxoniensibus. II. Ecloge Oxonio-Cantabrigiensis. London 1600 in 4to. This contains a catalogue of all the manuscripts in each College-Library in the University of Oxford, but not those in the public Library; and in each College Library in Cambridge, and in the public one there. Mr. Wood observes (2), that

(2) Ibid. col. 538.

Convocation held with the Parliament at Oxford in the first year of King Charles I's reign, wherein he made a motion, that some persons might be commissioned to peruse the manuscripts of the writings of the antient Fathers in all public and private Libraries in England, in order to detect the forgeries of foreign Popish editions (l). He was prodigiously well versed in the Fathers and Schoolmen, and so universal a scholar, that he was esteemed by some a living Library. His designs were always for the public benefit of Learning and the English Church; which being known to Camden, he saith of him (m), he is a learned man, and a true lover of books, wholly dedicated to learning, who is now laboriously searching the Libraries of England, and purposeth that for the public good, which will be to the great benefit of Students. In a letter to Mr. Calendrine dated at Oxford May the 23d 1624 (n) he observes, that if the University of Cambridge would set up and forward a project like Dr. Goad's, "he dared undertake more good to be done in making of this catalogue " he had liberty given to " him by each College in Oxford to peruse their manuscripts, and from that society, which he perceived " was careless of them, he borrowed and took away " what he pleased, and put them forth into the " public Library. Several such manuscripts were taken " from Baliol College, and some from Merton, and do " yet bear in their respective fronts the names of the " donors of them to those houses." Joseph Scaliger in a letter to Richard Thomfon dated Decemb. 16, 1600, highly commends this catalogue. His words are as follow. Catalogus ille scriptorum Oxoniensium & Cantabrigiensium Librorum mirificè me affectit; præsertim Gallicæ & regni Francorum illustrari possint; & præterea non minorem numerum eorum, quibus Tyrannis Pontificia manifesto depræbendi possit; tum quæ docent, quando clacæ illæ & colluvies monachorum sese in Europam effuderint, ut Lololita hodie & Capuccini. Habetis quoque Originem in Celsum, alioque eximios Græcos nondum editos, quos parum vexari ab iis puto; qui in Collegiis degunt. A me certè non raro reviserentur, si ibi adessent. III. Cyprianus redivivus, hoc est, electus eorum, quæ in opusculo Cypriani de Unitate Ecclesiæ sunt vel addita, vel detracta, vel lapsu Typographi, vel alio quovis modo supposita, &c. Printed with the Ecloga. IV. Spicilegium D. Augustini, hoc est, Libri de fide ad Petr. Diaconum, cum antiquissimis duobus Manuscriptis & postremis ac ultimis Editionibus excusis, tam Basilienfis quam Parisiensis diligens Collatio, ac Castigatio, &c. Printed with the Ecloga. V. Bellum Papale, seu Concordia discors Sixti V & Clementis VIII. circa Hieronymianam Editionem. London 1600 in 4to and 1678 in 8vo. VI. Catalogus Librorum in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ. Oxford 1605 in a large octavo, or rather a small quarto. Reprinted with many additions in a thick 4to, 1620. To which was added an Appendix in 1636. In this catalogue is inserted a catalogue of all the manuscripts which were then in the Bodleian Library. VII. Concordantia sanctorum Patrum, i. e. vera & pia Libri Cantuorum per Patres universos, tam Græcos, quam Latinos Expeditio, &c. Oxford 1607 in 4to. VIII. Apology for John Wicliffe, shewing his Conformity with the now Church of England, &c. Oxford 1608 in 4to. To this is added The Life of John Wicliffe. IX. A Treatise of the Corruption of Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers, by the Prelats, Pastors, and Pillars of the Church of Rome, for maintenance of Popery and Irreligion. By Thomas James, Student in Divinitie and chief Keeper of the Publicke Librarie in the Universitie of Oxford, of the honorable foundation of Sir Thomas Bodley Knt. Together with a sufficient Answer unto James Gretser & Antonie Possiveine Jesuites, and the unknown author of the Grounds of the Old Religion, and the New. Divided into five Parts. London 1611 in 4to, and 1688 in 8vo. It is dedicated to Dr. George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury. The first Part shews the Bastardie of the false Fathers; the second, the Corruption of the true Fathers; the third, the Varietie and Contrarietie of the Popish Bibles, commonly called the Vulgar Bibles in Latine; the fourth, the open and secret wrongs done unto Fathers, antient, middle-aged, or modern Writers, by the Papists, chiefly in their Indices Expurgatorii; the fifth, particular Remedies against these several Diseases, when and how to be applied, together with the use, profit, and commoditie of the antient Manuscripts. In the Advertisement to the Christian Reader he observes, that there are 187 different Treatises, which are shrewdly suspected, if not plainly convicted of forgery by the Papists themselves. " I follow herein, says he, the " judgment of their best learned writers, most esteemed " in their times, such as Bellarmine and Baronius Cardinals, Possivein and Gretser Jesuites, Sixtus Senensis of the order of the Preachers, Angelus Roccha an Eremita, Pamelius a Monk, and sundry others." He remarks, that the special motives of publishing of this treatise were three. " The first, says he, because " it is a matter of faith, to appoint what is Scripture, " and what is not; which Pope Sixtus taking upon " him to determine, sitting in Chayre, hath soulely " erred; so that it appears by this, that their conclusion is false, that the Pope cannot erre in matter of faith. The second, because the Papists are ready " to oppose and object still unto us our different translations of the Bibles, when there may be very good reason given out of the Originals for both readings, " little considering their own grosse errors and palpable absurdities in the setting forth of their two Bibles, authorized by two Popes within two yeares; " which to reconcile is a matter altogether unpossible, " and to indure, likewise intolerable. I undertand " by our Divines of Down, that they meane to have " a bout with us, for the Corrections of the Bishop's Bible. I would they would be pleased, first to answer for themselves and their two Popes, and then " let them object what they can against us for changing " and altering some fewe words in the Bible, and they " shall be answered with reason. Another motive that " hath provoked me to the writing of this argument " hath been a pretended Answer of James Gretser unto my Bellum Papale. It was fitte his reasons should " be answered, tho' his scurrilous jests and reproachful " speeches deserve no better answer than that of Salomon's fool." In the Appendix to the Reader he tells us, that since the printing of this book he had been informed of a dangerous practice in Rome. " In the " Vatican Library, says he, there are certaine men " maintained only to transcribe Acts of the Councils, " or Copies of the Father's workes. These men, " pointed for this business, doe, as I am credibly informed, in transcribing bookes imitate the letter of " the antient copies, as neere as can be expressed. " And it is to be feared, that in copying out of bookes " they doe adde and take away, alter and change the " words, according to the pleasure of their Lord the " Pope. And so these transcripts may within a few " yeares, by reason of their counterfaising the antient hands, be avouched for very old manuscripts, " deluding the world with a shewe of antiquitie: the " danger is the greater, because there may be an " Index Expurgatorius (for ought we know) for purging the manuscripts as well as the printed bookes. " This practise of theres I heard of some two or three " years agoe; but I had forgotten of whom, and " therefore did forbear to mention it, till such time " as by God's will I lighted upon the Gentleman " againe, who was at Rome in the Vatican, and saw " it with his eyes, and will testifie it upon his oath, if " need be." X. The Jesuits Downfall threatened against them by the Secular Priests for their wicked Lives, accursed Manners, heretical Doctrine, and more than Machiavillian Policy. Oxford 1612 in 4to. To this is added The Life of Father Parsons an English Jesuit. XI. Filius Papæ Papalis, &c. London 1621, translated from Latin into English by William Crashaw. Our author's name is not put to it. XII. Index generalis sanctorum

" for

(l) Ibidem, Ibid. & Arb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 537.

(m) Britannia, in Comit. Monmouth. edit. 1607.

(n) Collection of Letters, at the end of Archbishop Usher's Life by Dr. Rich. Farr, Num. 66. pag. 307.

“ for the profit of Learning and true Religion, than by building ten Colleges. I have
 “ of late, continues he, given myself to the reading only of manuscripts; and in them
 “ I find so many and so pregnant testimonies, either fully for our Religion, or against “ the Papists, that it is to be wondered at.” And in another letter to Bishop Usher dated at Oxford February the 15th 1624 (o) he writes thus: “ Not only the Rabbins, “ but the Thalmud in six volumes at Rome hath felt the smart of the Popish Indices.
 “ Would God, we were but half as diligent to restore, as they to abolish and put out
 “ the truth. I have restored 300 citations, and rescued them from corruption in thirty “ quires of paper. Mr. Briggs will satisfy you in this point, and sundry other projects
 “ of mine, if they miscarry not for want of maintenance: it would deserve a Prince’s “ purse. If I was in Germany, the Estates would defray all charges. Cannot our “ Estates supply what is wanting? If every Churchman, that hath an 100 l. per ann. and “ upward, will lay down but a shilling for every hundred toward these public works, I “ will undertake the reprinting of the Fathers, and setting forth of five or six orthodox “ writers, comparing of books printed with printed or written; collating of Popish “ translations in Greek; and generally whatsoever shall concern books, or the purity of “ them. I will take upon me to be a Magister S. Palatii in England, if I shall be “ thereunto lawfully required.” He died at his house in Hollywell in the North Suburb of Oxford in August 1629, aged about fifty eight years, and was interred in New College Chapel (p).

(o) Ibid. Num.
77. pag. 320.

(p) Wood, Hist.
& Antiq. pag.
145. and Atben.
Oxon. col. 540.

sanctorum patrum, ad singulos versus cap. 5. secundum Matthæum, &c. London 1624 in 8vo. XIII. Notæ ad Georgium Wicelium de Metodo Concordiæ Ecclesiasticæ, cum Catalogo authorum qui scripserunt contra squalores Ecclesiæ Romanæ. London 1625 in 8vo. XIV. Vindicicæ Gregorianæ, seu restitutio innumeris pene locis Gre-gorius Magnus, ex variis manuscriptis, ut magno labore, ita singulari fide collatis. Geneva 1625. XV. Manu-ductio or Introduction unto Divinity, containing a Confutation of Papists by Papists throughout the important Articles of our Religion, &c. Oxford 1625 in 4to. XVI. Humble and earnest request to the Church of England for and in the behalf of Books touching Religion. Printed in one sheet in 8vo. 1625. XVII. Explanation, or enlarging of the Ten Articles in his Supplication lately exhibited to the Clergy of England, for the restoring to integrity Authors corrupted by Papists Oxford 1625 in 4to.
 XVIII. *Specimen corruptelarum Pontificiorum in Cypriano,
 Ambrosio, Gregorio Magno & autore Operis imperfecti,
 & in jure Canonico.* London 1626 in 4to. XIX. Index librorum prohibitorum a Pontificiis. Oxford 1627 in 8vo. XX. *Admonitio ad Theologos Protestantés de Libris
 Pontificiorum cautè legendis.* MS. XXI. *Enchiridion
 Theologicum.* MS. XXII. Liber de susceptionibus & conjecturis. MS. “ These three manuscripts, says Mr.
 “ Wood (*), I saw formerly in the Lambeth Library
 “ under D. 1, 2, 3; but whether printed I know “ not: perhaps the Enchiridion is.” Dr. James likewise translated from French into English, The Moral Philosophy of the Stoics. London 1598 in 8vo, and published Two short Treatises against the Order of the begging Friars, written by John Wicliff; and a book intitled, *Fiscus Papalis: sive Catalogus indulgentiarum & reliquiarum septem principalium Ecclesiarum urbis
 Romæ, ex vetere MS. descriptus.* London 1617 in 4to.
 The Latin out of the Manuscript is set down in one column, and the English in another. Some were of opinion, that this book was not published by Dr. James but by William Crashaw of Cambridge. There are several letters of our author published in the Collection of three hundred Letters written between Archbishop Usher and most of the eminentest Persons for Piety and Learning in his time, subjoined to Dr. Richard Parr’s Life of that Prelate. In his letter to him dated at Oxford January 28, 1623, he writes thus: “ I have traced the “ steps afar off about the Succession and Visibilty of the “ Church, wherein your Lordship hath gone a far “ journey. I do but glean where you have reaped a “ plentiful harvest. Nevertheless, if my poor and “ weak labours may any ways stead your Lordship,
 “ I would be glad to contribute my pains... I am “ not so far gone in years as in sicknesses; yet my body “ is not so weak, but my mind is as strong; and my “ zeal great to see somewhat acted against the Papists “ in matters of forgery and corruption, which are “ matters of fact, whereto my studies have always “ aimed, and shall during life, if God will. I find “ infinite corruption in the Fathers works, especially “ of the Roman print. In the Canon Law and De-cretals I can convince them of shameless forgeries by “ the Parchments. But that which hath amazed or “ amused the world, and made it turn or continue “ Popish, hath been the want of Censurers of the Fa“ thers works, which made our Magdeburgians and “ some of our best learned, to lance the Fathers, and “ not to spare them, whereas they are but Pseudo-“ Fathers indeed. But the notedest cozenage, which “ is rise and most beguiling in these days, is a secret “ Index Expurgatorius, and therefore the more dange“ rous; that is, the reprinting of books, not making “ mention of any castigation or purgation of them,

 “ and yet both leaving and adding, and otherwise in“ finitely depraving them, as is to be seen in hundreds “ of books of the middle-age and later writers. I in“ stance in Sixtus Senensis, and Alphonsus de Castro,
 “ and Antoninus’s Summi. There are about five hundred “ bastard treatises, and about a thousand places in the “ true authors, which are corrupted, that I have dili“ gently noted; and will shortly vindicate them out “ of the manuscripts; for hitherto they be but con-“ jectures of the learned. For this purpose I have “ gotten together the flower of our young Divines,
 “ who voluntarily will join with me in the search.
 “ Some fruits of their labours, if your Lordship de-“ fires, I will send up. And might I be but so “ happy as to have other twelve thus bestowed, four “ in transcribing orthodox writers, whereof we have “ plenty, that for the substantial points have maintained
 “ our religion, (40 or 50 pounds would serve) four to “ compare old prints with the new; four other to “ compare the Greek translations by the Papists, as “ Vedelius hath done with Ignatius, wherein he has “ been somewhat helped by my pains; I would not “ doubt but to drive the Papists out of all their start“ ing holes. But alas! my Lord, I have not en“ couragement from our Bishops. Preferment I seek “ none at their hands; only 40 or 60 pounds per annum for others, and their Lordships letters to en“ courage others, is that I seek, which being gained,
 “ the cause is gained, notwithstanding their brags in “ their late books. H.

(*) Atben. Oxon.
vol. 1. col. 539.

(a) Wood, Hist.
& Antiq. Univ.
Oxon. lib. 2. pag.
240.
(b) Iidem, Atb.
Oxon. vol. 1. col.
615. 2d edit.
London 1721.
(c) Iidem, Fasti
Oxon. vol. 1.
col. 118.

JAMES (RICHARD), nephew of the preceding, was born at Newport in the Isle of Wight (a), and admitted a scholar of Corpus Christi College in Oxford from that of Exeter September the 23d 1608, aged about sixteen years (b). October the 12th 1611 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c), and January the 24th 1615 that of Master (d). September the 13th 1615 he became Probationer Fellow of Corpus Christi College (e). About that time he entered into holy Orders (f). January the 28th 1623, his uncle Dr. Thomas James wrote thus of him in a letter from Oxford to Bishop Usher:

(d) Iidem, col.
197.

(e) Iidem, Atb.
Oxon. ubi supra.

(f) Iidem, ibid.

(g) Collection of Letters, printed at the end of Dr. Richard Parr's Life of Archbishop Usher, Lett. 62. pag. 303. edit. London 1686, in fol.

Usher (g): "A kinsman of mine is at this present, by my direction, writing Becket's Life, wherein it shall be plainly shewed, both out of his own writings and those of his time, that he was not, as he is esteemed, an Arch-Saint, but an Arch-Rebel, and that the Papists have not been a little deceived in him. This kinsman of mine, as well as my self, shall be right glad to do any service to your Lordship in this kind. He is of strength, and well both able and learned to effectuate somewhat in this kind; critically seen both in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; knowing well the languages both French, Spanish, and Italian, immense and beyond all other men, especially in reading of the manuscripts; of an extraordinary style in penning; such a one as I dare balance with any Priest or Jesuit in the world of his age, and such a one as I could wish your Lordship had about you. But Paupertas inimica bonis est moribus, and both fatherless and motherless, and almost (but for my self) I may say (the more is the pity) friendless." July the 7th 1624 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (b). He published some pieces, and left a great number of curious manuscripts behind him [A]. Mr. Wood observes (i), "that though humorous, he was of a far better judgment than his uncle Dr. Thomas James; and had he lived to his age, would have surpassed him in published books. He was esteemed to be a person well versed in most parts of learning. He was noted by all those that knew him to be a very good Grecian, Poet, an excellent Critic, Antiquary, Divine, and admirably well skilled in the Saxon and Gothic Languages. But as for his skill in preaching, it was not, except by the graver sort, approved by any in the University. For of three Sermons delivered to the Academians, one concerning the Observation of Lent, was without a Text, according to the most ancient manner; another against a Text; and a third beside it; shewing himself thereby a humorous person." He had travelled very much abroad, and was in Russia in 1619. He assisted Mr. Selden in the edition of the Marmora Arundeliana, that great man styling him in the preface to his book, Vir multijugæ Lectiōnis studique indefatigabilis. He was very serviceable likewise to Sir Robert Cotton, and Sir Thomas Cotton, in disposing and settling of their noble Library. His intimacy with the former of those Gentlemen, who was no friend to the Prerogative, occasioned him to be closely confined by order of the House of Lords in the year 1629, when Sir Robert was imprisoned for some matters uttered in the Parliament. Mr. Wood

(b) Iidem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 228.

(i) Atten. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 615.

remarks,

[A] He published some pieces, and left a great number of curious manuscripts behind him.] He published several Latin sermons, as, 1. Anti-Possessivus, sive Consequo habita ad Clerum in Acad. Oxon. an. 1625. in a Tim. iv. 13. Oxford 1625 in 4to. 2. Consequo habita ad Clerum Oxon. de Ecclesiâ, in Matth. xvi. 18. Oxford 1633 in 4to. And several English sermons, as, 1. Sermon concerning the Eucharist, delivered on Easter-Day in Oxford, on Matth. xxvi. ver. 26, 27, 28. London 1629 in 4to. 2. History of Preaching, or concerning the Apostles preaching and ours, on 1 Cor ix. 16. London 1630 in 4to. 3. Sermon concerning the observation of Lent-fast. London 1630 in 4to. There is no text prefixed to this sermon, but it is grounded on Luke iv. 2. 4. Sermon concerning the times of receiving the Sacrament, and of mutual Forgiveness, delivered in Corpus Christi College at the election of a President on 1 Cor. xi. 25. London 1632 in 4to. 5. Apologetical Essay for the Rightness of a miserable unhappy People, preached at St. Mary's in Oxford on Psalm 37. 25. London 1632 in 4to. He published also Pœmata quædam in mortem clarissimi Viri Roberti Cottoni & Thomæ Allen. Oxford 1633 in 4to. With these Poems he published Sir Thomas More's Epistle written from Abingdon in Berkshire in 1519 to the University of Oxford for the cultivation of the Greek tongue, which had been for many years neglected among the members thereof. He likewise translated into English Minutius Felix's Octavius, Oxford 1636 in 12mo. All the above-mentioned pieces, except the translation of the Octavius, he gave bound up in one volume to the Bodleian Library, with a copy of verses of his composition written in a spare leaf before the first of them, beginning thus:

"Dear God, by whom in dark womb's shade
I am to fear and wonder made, &c."

He wrote these verses, when he was closely confined by order of the House of Lords. He left behind him about 45 manuscripts either of his own composition, or collected by him from various authors, all written by his own hand, which came first into the hands of his friend Dr. Thomas Greaves, and afterwards into the Bodleian Library. Those of his own composition are, I. Decanonisatio Thomæ Cantuariensis & suorum, in folio. This book, containing 760 pages, begins thus: Viam regiam mihi patefacit ad decanonizationem fidei & fucati Martyris, &c. and the beginning of the Epistle to the Reader is this, Amice Lector, rogatus sum sepius, &c. II. Comment in Evangelia S. Jobannis, in two parts in 4to. The beginning is, Postmodo ad textum sacre historie deveniam, ubi prius, &c. Both parts contain about twelve sheets. III. Notæ in aliquot loca Bibliae, in three sheets in 4to. The beginning is, Videte sub ficu, Paraphrases sub umbrosâ ficu, &c. IV. Antiquitates Insulæ Viçæ, in seventeen pages in 4to. The beginning is Angli Saxones Marciarum, &c. and of the epistle to the reader, Utrum moriar priusquam hoc opus perficiam, Deus novit, &c. It is only a specimen or a foundation for a greater work to be built upon. V. Epistola ad amicos suos doctos. The beginning of the first epistle, which was written to Dr. Sebast. Benefield of Corpus Christi College, is, Sante Deus, &c. This manuscript is a thick 4to, and contains epistles chiefly written to those of his own College, epitaphs, and some English copies of verses. VI. Epigrams in Latin and English, with other Poems. VII. Reasons concerning the attempts on the Lives of great Personages, &c. These reasons which are six or more, have this beginning, Sir, if you please to learn my mind concerning the Attempts on the Lives of great Personages, &c. written in two sheets in folio. VIII. Two Sermons: the first on James v. 14, the second on John xii. 32. Both written in folio. IX. Iter Lancastrense. It is in English verse, and was written in 1636, and hath this beginning, High Holt of Wood, &c. It contains two sheets and an half. X. Glossarium Saxonum-Anglicum. It is a long pocket-book. XI. Glossarium Sax. Angl. another part in 8vo. XII. A Russian Dictionary, with the English to it. XIII. Observations made in his Travels through some parts of Wales, Scotland, on Sberland, Greenland, &c. In four sheets in 4to. XIV. Observations made on the Countrey, with the Manners and Customs of Russia or Rusland, ann. 1619. In 8vo. It was intended to be transcribed, and to have other things added to it. Besides these fourteen books Mr. Wood had another of Epigrams, chiefly in Latin, and some in Greek, in 8vo, dedicated to his Tutor Dr. Sebast. Benefield. His collections are in twenty four volumes in 4to and seven in folio, and contain for the most part notes from ancient manuscripts, and sometimes from printed authors, relating to history and antiquity. H

(k) Ibid. col. 616. and Hist. & Aniq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 240.

remarks (k), "that nothing was wanting to our author and his studies but a Sine-Cure or Prebendship, either of which, if conferred upon him, Hercules's labours would have seemed a trifle." He died of a quartan fever in the house of Sir Thomas Cotton in Westminster in the beginning of December 1638, and was interred on the seventh day of that month in St. Margaret's Church.

(a) Valer. And. Desselius, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 154.

(b) He who made himself so famous, under the name of the Abbot of St. Cyran.

(c) Leydecker, ubi infra, citatio (g) pag. 8.

(d) Ibid. citatio (g) pag. 10.

(e) Ibid. pag. 12.

(f) Valer. And. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 154.

JANSENIUS (CORNELIUS) Bishop of Ipres, was one of the most learned Divines of the seventeenth Century. He was born near Leerdam [A] in Holland in the year 1585. It has often been objected to him that his family was Protestant, and that himself had professed that Religion for some time [B], but this is a falsity. He went and studied at Louvain in 1602, and applied himself so closely to his books that he fell sick (a), and therefore was advised to remove to another place for the benefit of the air. Accordingly Jansenius went to Paris, where he met with John du Verger de Hauranne (b), with whom he had contracted a very strict friendship in Louvain. By the recommendation of this worthy friend he got to be Preceptor in a good family (c), and being a man of erudition, he soon got acquainted with some persons of figure. Some time after he went to Bayonne, to meet his good friend who had retired thither. In this place they applied themselves with so extraordinary a vigour to their studies [C], and ingratiated themselves so far into the esteem of the Bishop of Bayonne, that he procured Du Verger a Canonry in his Cathedral, and Jansenius the Headship of a College (d). The Prelate just mentioned having been raised to the Archiepiscopal See of Tours [D], prevailed with Du Verger to go to Paris; when Jansenius being thus separated from his friend, and being not sure of the protection of the new Bishop, left Bayonne and returned to Louvain, where he was appointed Principal of St. Pulcheria's College, which employment he disliked, because it did not give him leisure to pursue his studies according to his wishes; this likewise was the reason why he refused to teach Philosophy (e). He took his Doctor's degree in Divinity with great reputation in the year 1617 (f), and was admitted as one of the ordinary Professors; and he acquired so much esteem, that the University sent him twice into Spain [E], on affairs of consequence. He was appointed by the

(1) Leydecker, de Vita & Moribus Jansenii, pag. 2.

(2) Jansenius patria fuit Batavus, atque ut ipse scribit, quasi in honore id poneret, Leerdamensis. . . Unde verè iste error? an quod, &c. Idem, ibid. and pag. 3.

(3) See the remark [A] of the article CASSELLAN.

(4) Intituled, Histoire du Jansenisme, contenant sa Conception, sa Naissance, son Accroissement, & son Abaissement.

(5) See the Factum or Cases of Jansenius's Relations, in tom. 8. pag. 317. of the Morale Pratique.

(6) In Præ-tione Triumphus Catholicae Veritatis, printed at Paris in the year 1651.

(7) See the Factum of Jansenius's Relations, pag. 307.

[A] He was born at Leerdam. In a village called Accoy, as Mr. Leydecker observes. *Fallunt, says he (1), operis postumi editores quando referunt eum natum esse Leerdami modico Bataviæ oppidulo, sed tanti viri natalibus jam magno. Etenim sciunt ejus Affecle eum in Comitatu quidem Leerdamensi natum, non tamen in oppido LEERDAMO (Lingerdame aliâ, quod ad Lingam suum sit situm) sed in quodam Pago, quod Urbe-cula subist, & Accoy appellatur: sic Nepotis & Consanguinei, qui ibi adhibe degunt, testantur, superstitie humili Domuncula, in qua primum lucem adspexit. i. e. "The editors of his posthumous works are mistaken, " in saying that he was born at Leerdam, a little " town of Holland, but now great for having given " birth to so renowned a man. For let his followers " know, that the country of Leerdam indeed gave " birth to him, but not the town of Leerdam (or Lin- " gerdam because it stands on the river Linga) but a " certain village, called Accoy, lying under the " little town. This is what we are assured by his " posterity and relations who still live there; the " little house in which he was born is still existing." We must not think there is any thing peculiar in Jansenius's calling himself Leerdamensis (2); he giving himself that name, from the custom which people have of assuming the name of the town in the territory whereof they were born. This may be proved by a numberless multitude of examples (3).*

[B] It has been often objected to him, that he himself had professed the Protestant religion for some time. One Moles du Bourg, a Jesuit of Bourdeaux, published a little book (4) in 1658, wherein he asserts (5) that Cornelius Jansenius's father professed the Calvinistical Heresy; but that his son, when come to maturity, declared himself a Roman Catholic. Father Labbe had published the same particular before (6); *Princeps eorum extitit CORNELIUS JANSENIUS, qui gente Hollandus, patria Leerdamensis, inter hæreticos educatus à puero, tum Lovanii, &c. i. e. "The principal of these " was CORNELIUS JANSENIUS, who being a Hol- " lander, born in Leerdam, was brought up among " the Heretics from a child; afterwards at Louvain, " &c." Father Hazart renewed the same calumny in a Flemish work intituled The Triumphs of the Popes of Rome, published by him at Antwerp in 1681. His father, says he, was a Calvinist; and as to Jansenius himself, when grown up, he made an outward show of being a Catholic (7). But being sued for scandal, he alleged, among other reasons, that he was not the inventor of that reproach, since he had published it* after Moles du Bourg (8). It has been proved indisputably in the cases I cite, that this reproach is absolutely false. Here follows a passage of Mr. Leydecker, wherein are some particulars that are not in the factum or cases. Parentes habuit bonos, Pontificia Religioni addictos, licet Evangelica lux Belgio affunderetur, quibusque modicae oper. Ut male Hazardus Jesuita in Historiis cum Patre Calviniano natum retulerit, illum falsi postulantis, qui id non ferrent, Nepotibus. Pater appellatus fuit vernaculo nomine JAN OTTIE (9), factus (9) It is observed in the very beginning of the first case, that his name was John Otto Acqoy. brili opere vitam queritans, Mater autem LYNTJE GYSBERTS, cum referunt superstites, unde hic Filius CORNELIS JANSEN dictus est, antiquo vulgi in Belgio more, at Latina vel erudita terminations, CORNELIUS JANSENIUS (10). i. e. "He sprung from honest parents devoted to the Romish religion, notwithstanding " the Gospel had diffused its light over Holland, and " who possessed a small estate. Therefore Hazard the " Jesuit asserted a falsity, in declaring him to be a " Calvinist; and accordingly was sued for it in an " action of scandal by his relations, who highly re- " sented that outrage. Jansenius's father was called " JAN OTTIE, in the language of the country, and " was by trade a Carpenter; his mother was named " LYNTJE GYSBERTS, as persons now living declare; whence this son, had the name of CORNELIUS LIUS JANSEN, after the ancient custom of the vulgar " in Holland, but was called CORNELIUS JANSENIUS " in the Latin or learned termination."

[C] They applied themselves with extraordinary vigour to their studies. "It was at Mr. d'Hauranne's, who was afterwards bishop of St. Cyran, that Jansenius spent the five or six years he staid in Bayonne; applying himself so intensely to the study of the Fathers, and of St. Austin, that he not appearing to be of a strong constitution, Hauranne's mother used sometimes to tell her son, that he would prove the death of that worthy young Fleming, by making him over-study himself (11).

[D] This prelate having been raised to the Archiepiscopal See of Tours. This Archbishopric, according to Leydecker (12), was become vacant by the voluntary resignation of Sebastian Galigai, the Marquis d'Ancre's brother-in-law (13); Vacante Cathedra per spontaneam Sebastiani Galigaji Florentini, infelicis Marchionis Ancrei fratris, cessionem.

[E] The University sent him twice into Spain. His enemies have published a great many falsities on this occasion. They have asserted, that he fled into Spain to escape the Inquisition, who was going to seize him, for venting

(8) Ibid. pag. 317.

(9) It is observed in the very beginning of the first case, that his name was John Otto Acqoy.

(10) Leydecker, de Vita Jansenii, pag. 3.

(11) Factum pour les Parents de Jansenius, pag. 410.

(12) De Vita Jansenii, pag. 100.

(13) Or rather brother-in-law; for Marquis d'Ancre's name was Concini, and his wife Galigai.

the King his Sovereign, Professor of the holy Scriptures in the year 1630 in the University of Louvain; and five years after created by him Bishop of Ypres. A book which Janfenius published against France [F], greatly contributed to his promotion to that See, (14) Factum, pag. 450.

(15) Pag. 451.

(16) That is of Mofes du Bourg.

(17) Val. And. in Fastis Academiis, pag. 393.

(18) Fasti Acad. pag. 138.

(19) Dated the 31st of December 1627.

(20) Factum, pag. 462, 463.

(21) Bibliob. Belg. pag. 154.

venting his new doctrine in that country (14). This Father Hazart has advanced, after Mofes du Bourg, whom he copied. Here follows what is answered in the Factum (15).

"This ignorance (16) with regard to the affairs of Janfenius, shews sufficiently that this is mere calumny and fiction. He speaks of his journey to Spain, as though he had made but one; whereas he undertook two (†), the one in 1624, and the other in 1625. This circumstance would have puzzled this Jesuit of Bourdeaux; for had he fixed his tale to Janfenius's first journey, the falsity would have been visible; because Janfenius would have taken care not to have gone thither a second time: And had he fixed it to the second journey, it would have been visible another way; it being infallibly certain, that so unlucky an accident would have defeated all his negotiation, and he would have returned in disgrace to Louvain; instead of this it is very certain that he returned with glory to it, having obtained all that the University of Louvain had requested of his Catholic Majesty, to put a stop to the enterprizes of the Jesuits. In fine an author, who deserves so little credit on other accounts, is altogether unworthy of credit with regard to a particular that deserves so little belief itself, when he, in the same place, advances three other palpable falsities against the same person; and this the Jesuit of Bourdeaux has done. The first falsity is, that Janfenius's father was a Calvinist, &c. The falsity of this calumny is very evidently proved in the first and third Factum. The second falsity is, that Janfenius at his return to Louvain, after the long excursion he had made in France, managed his intrigues so well, that, under the notion of his being a poor Dutch Catholic, he got a pensioner's place in a College, where certain monies were bestowed for the maintenance of such poor scholars. An impudent falsehood which has been refuted by the public records (†), since Janfenius, immediately at his return to Louvain in 1617, took his Doctor's degree in Divinity, and was appointed President of St. Pulcheria's College: Louvanium revocatus novo Collegio D. Pulcheriaë præficitur. The third is an infamous calumny, viz. that this honest pensioner used to steal the College-money, to pay the boarding of two nephews of the Abbot of St. Cyran. Now all these are false assertions. 1. The Abbot had but one nephew, not two, in Louvain. 2. Had Janfenius been only a Pensioner, how could he have had the disposal of the College monies? 3. This pretended theft is a horrid calumny, that is vented in many of the Jesuits libels, whereof they have been convicted in the sixteenth Provincial Letter, beginning thus, I will tell you, &c."

It had been asserted a numberless multitude of times, that there is no fiction but what is grounded on some true incident. This may be said with regard to that of Mofes du Bourg; for it appears by a Letter of Janfenius, that the Spanish Inquisition lodged some informations against him after he was gone. Here follow the words of his Letter (17). "They write to me from the other side the Pyrenees (Spain), that the Inquisition has been raised against a Doctor of Louvain who has been in Spain, and that they applied themselves to a Doctor of Salamanca, (the principal Doctor of that University) at whose house he lodged, and who is called Basil de Leon, to lodge an information against him, as being a Dutchman, and consequently a Heretic; but he answered them so much to the advantage of this Doctor, that they were quite put out of countenance (18)." I shall conclude this remark with the following words of Valerius Andreas (19). Brevi quoque tempore eam de se opinionem apud Academicos omnes excitavit, ut præ Janfenio alius magis idoneus non fuerit judicatus, qui nomine ejusdem Academiæ bis Legatus in Hispanias mitteretur. Ubi quâ prudentiâ ac dexteritate sese gesserit, tum apud Regem Catholicum, tum in Academia Salmanticensi ac Vallisoletana, felicif- simus utriusque Legationis eventus docuit. i. e. "He likewise, in a short space of time, gained so much esteem among all the members of the University, that no person was thought so well qualified as Janfenius, to be sent into Spain as Embassador from the said University; where, the happy success of both embassies proves with how great wisdom and dexterity he acted, as well with regard to the Catholic King, as to the Universities of Salamanca and Valladolid." Consult Leydecker (20) concerning the subject and success of these two journeys into Spain.

[F] Janfenius published (21) a book against France. (21) Anno 1635;

The arguments in it are exceedingly strong; and it is intitled Alexandri Patricii Armacani, Theologi, Mars Gallicus, seu de Justitia armorum & fœderum Regis Galliaë libri duo. It contains the most malicious and the most odious exclamations against the services which France continually did the Protestants of Holland and Germany, to the great prejudice of the Romish religion. The Dutch are there treated as rebels, who owe the republican liberty they enjoy to an infamous usurpation. They have answered that reproach an hundred times; and Leydecker did not forget to make a solid answer to it not long since (22). He informs us (23) that a report was spread, viz. that Janfenius being consulted by the Duke d'Arfehote and the Archbishop of Malines, after the taking of Boisleduc and Maestricht, advised them to shake off the Spanish yoke, and to form themselves into Cantons after the manner of the Swiss. It was discovered that he had given that counsel, and he was very uneasy about it. Upon this President Rose suggested an expedient by which he might extricate himself, which was, that he should write against France, and gave him the plan of the Mars Gallicus. Opportunè suam operam offerebat P. Rosæus, vir eruditissimus, Sanctioris Consilii Præses, cujus ante meminimus, suppeditato voluminis argumento, quo vel penitentiam ageret, vel famam falsi accusaret. Istud autem erat Mars Gallicus, stylo quidem Janfenii ornandus, cujus tamen materia ipsius opus, eruditionem & ingenium excedebat (24). Leydecker alledges a Letter of Fabio Chigi the Nuncio. Et ne mentiri viderentur, Literas produxerit Fabii Gigibii, Nuntii Apostolici (qui deinde Alexander VII fuit) ad F. Barberinum, Cardinalem, datas Colonia 25 Martii, 1641, ubi hæc scripta, Cardinalis Richelieu admodum stomachatur in Janfenium, quod cum Rosæo Martem Gallicum conscripserit. Nimirum hæc Litera adhuc in Collegio S. Officii Romæ asservantur (25). i. e. "And that they might not seem to tell an untruth, they shewed the Letters of Fabio Chigi the Apostolical Nuncio (who was afterwards Alexander VII) to Cardinal F. Barberini, dated at Colen the 25th of March 1625, wherein was the following words; Cardinal Richelieu is greatly offended at Janfenius for his writing the Mars Gallicus in concert with Rose. These letters are still preserved in the College of the Holy Office at Rome." The Jesuits did not fail to exasperate the Court of France against Janfenius's followers, as being a man who had defamed the Nation and his Monarchs, from the first almost to the last. Leydecker cites a long passage which he supposes to be of Father Annat (26), but which, in all probability, is of Father Vavasseur (27). I will transcribe no more of that long passage than the circumstance which relates to the ingratitude with which Janfenius was reproached. Ante omnia Janfenio exprobrat ingratum in Galliam animum, quæ ipsi valetudinem, quam recipere non possit in patria, concreto & pingui caelo, restituerat puro & salubri; quæ vitium, cum egeret, præbuerat, tum domestico Præceptori Lutetiæ Parisiorum, tum ludi publici Magistro Bajonæ, quæ notitiâ Virorum illustrium atque doctorum animum fecerat ad majora, aditumque & viam muniverat. Quin in Galliis, quod beneficium loco sine dubio numeravit, magnam adeptus erat librorum Calvinianorum copiam, quorum de fontibus haussit Augustini interpretationem, & invenerat homines à Calvini disciplina non alienos, quibuscum liberiores de Gratia sermones contulerit (28). i. e. "He particularly

ly

(22) Leydecker, de Vita Janfenii, pag. 94, & seq.

(23) Pag. 92.

(24) Pag. 93.

(25) Ibid.

(26) Ibid. pag. 89.

(27) It is ascribed to him pag. 31. of Sebastian Mabre-Cramoisy's Catalogue, printed in the year 1678. The Janfenius was printed in the year 1650, by Sebastian and Gabriel Cramoisy.

(28) Autor Libri cui titulus Janfenius Suspectus, opud Leydeckerum, pag. 89.

See, but he did not enjoy it long, he dying the 6th of May 1638. He had spent above twenty years on a work in which he explained St. Austin's system concerning the doctrine of Grace; and this book being published after his death, occasioned great disturbances in the Romish Church [G], and cut out a great deal of work for the Popes. Those persons who have asserted the same doctrine as Jansenius have been called Jansenists, and the Jesuits have been their chief adversaries. Perhaps the insincerity and foul play that attends such sort of controversies, was never so glaring as on this occasion [H]. This Doctor had engaged in controversy with the Protestants [I], and left them the field of battle.

“ly reproaches Jansenius with being ungrateful to France, which by its pure and salubrious air had restored him to the health he could not obtain from the gross and thick air of his native country; which gave him a subsistence when he was in want, both when he was a domestic-tutor in Paris, and master of a public school in Bayonne; which, by an acquaintance with learned and illustrious men, had formed his mind to greater things, and strengthened his interest. Nay, in France (which he doubtless thought a benefit) he got a great number of Calvinistical books, from which fountain he drew his interpretation of St. Austin; and met with persons that were not averse to Calvin's doctrine, and with whom he conversed more freely concerning Grace.”

Let us admire in this place the vicissitude of human things. Jansenius was rewarded with a mitre, for having confounded France upon her forming alliances with Protestant States; and at this time (29) the Court of Spain would no doubt bestow a good Bishopric on a Doctor of Louvain, who should write a book in as strong terms in justification of such an alliance or league, as that book was which Jansenius wrote against France; so true it is, that men may arrive at the same ends by quite contrary ways; and that what is good at one time is very bad at another (30). The refutation of a book may deserve the same recompense which the book itself had deserved. What a pleasant scene would it be for unexperienced people, to see a Professor of Louvain raised to a Bishopric, for solidly refuting our Jansenius's Mars Gallicus?

Naudé (31) makes him author of the Admonitio (32) and Mysteria Politica, two pieces, says he, which produced wonderful effects in opposition to the designs of Lewis XIII; but I fancy he is mistaken.

[G] This book . . . occasioned great disturbances in the Romish church. It has given birth to a numberless multitude of other books, some of which contain all that could be said on both sides upon the subject, by men of great acuteness, subtlety, and learning; but after all, a man is not a whit the wiser than he was before, and this will ever be the fate of such disputes; the more they are handled, the more they will be perplexed; and the more they will give the reader occasion to say, Fecistis probe, incertior sum multo quam dudum (33). i. e. “Admirably well, indeed, I now am “much more in doubt than I was before.” Some author has said, that the doctrine of Grace is an ocean which has neither shore nor bottom. He perhaps could have compared it more justly to the Faro of Messina, where people are always in danger of splitting upon one rock, by their endeavouring to shun another; Incidit in Syllam cupiens vitare Charybdim. The whole, in fine, is reducible to this. Did Adam sin freely? If you answer, yes; then his fall, will it be replied, was not foreseen: But if you answer no; then, will it be said, he is not guilty. You may write a hundred books against either of these consequences, and at last you must be forced to own, either that the infallible foreseeing of a contingent event is a mystery which it is impossible to conceive; or that the manner how a creature, who acts without liberty or necessity, sins nevertheless, is quite incomprehensible. I desire no more: for to what purpose is it to write so many books, since you must be forced at last to own one of these two incomprehensible mysteries?

[H] The insincerity and foul play that attends such sort of controversies, was never so glaring as on this occasion. Those persons who have a little penetration see manifestly, that, in the dispute with regard to liberty, these two sides only can be taken; the one is to assert, that all causes distinct from the soul, which concur with it, endue it with the power of acting or not acting; the other is to assert, that they determine the soul in such a manner, to act, that it cannot do otherwise. The first opinion is that of the Molinists; and the second that of the Thomists, the Jansenists and Protestants of the Geneva confession. There we have three kinds of people who oppose Molinism; and who, in the main, must be of the same opinion on that head. Nevertheless the Thomists have asserted with all their might, that they were not Jansenists; and the last mentioned have asserted with the same heat, that they were not Calvinists, on the article of liberty. There are no artifices or ill-grounded distinctions but what have been made use of, to colour over this pretence; and all this in order to avoid the ill consequences which they foresaw would follow, in case any conformity should be allowed either with the Jansenists or Calvinists. On the other side, the Molinists have not omitted any kind of sophistry, to shew that St. Austin did not teach Jansenism; as being unwilling to own that their tenets are contrary to those of this great saint. In this manner the Thomists refusing to own that there was any conformity between them and a set of people who were considered as Hereticks: and the Molinists too own their doctrine different from that of a Doctor whose opinions have been always looked upon as orthodox; both have play'd an hundred tricks, and conducted themselves with the utmost insincerity on those occasions.

[I] This Doctor had engag'd in controversy with the Protestants. The substance of this dispute is said to be as follows (34). The States-General published an edict in 1629, forbidding the publick exercise of the Romish Religion in Boisleduc; and appropriated the ecclesiastical revenues of the mayoralty of that city to the service of the Protestant Religion, which they appointed four ministers to preach there. The last mentioned hearing that many horrid slanders, concerning their doctrine, were secretly spread, published a manifesto, declaring that they taught nothing but the pure Gospel; and intreating their adversaries to propose whatever objections they might have to make in a publick manner. This was answered only by a piece (35) writ by Jansenius. Gilbert Voetius, one of the four ministers who preached in Boisleduc, wrote remarks on this work (36), which Jansenius refuted by a new work (37). The author of the remarks replied, he again refuting his adversary in a large book he published anno 1635, and entitled Desperata Causa Papalis. Jansenius did not make any reply, but Libertus Fromondus, one of his friends, answered for him. This work (38) was printed at Antwerp anno 1636, and refuted by Martin Schoockius, Professor in history and eloquence at Deventer, who entitled his answer, Desperatissima Causa Papalis. It was printed anno 1638. There the dispute ended, if we may believe Leydecker (39). I nevertheless find in Valerius Andreas's Bibliotheca, among Fromondus's works, a piece entitled Sycophanta: Epistola ad Gilbertum Voetium, printed in 1640. And since the first impression of this article, I have seen a letter, in which this Utrecht Professor is reproached with being mistaken. Falleris, Jansenii, pag. 64.

O Præclare, secus res habet . . . Fromondus . . . ultimo icu prostravit adversarium, nunquam quod sciam refutatus (40). i. e. “Illustrious man, thou art “mistaken; the affair is otherwise—Fromondus—“fell'd his adversary with the last blow, and has never been refuted that I know of.”

Jansenius had another war to maintain which may be called a Protestant one: for Theodore Simonis (41), a wavering Roman Catholick, who wanted a matter, waited upon him at Louvain, to desire him to clear up some doubts with respect to the Pope's infallibility, the worship of the Eucharist, and some other points. Jansenius being puzzled with this man's objections, told him one day, that he would not dispute any longer with him by word of mouth, but in writing; and that he saw plainly he had to do with a Roman Catholick who would soon go to Holland, and there boast that he had overcome him. Simonis, (29) I write this in 1695.

(30) See the remark [I] of the article HOT-MAN.

(31) Naudé, Cours d'Etat, chap. 4. pag. m. 610.

(32) See the remark [F] of the article BOUCHER (John).

(33) Terent. Pbernio, Act. 2. Scene 3.

(34) Leydecker, de Vita Jansenii, pag. 57. & seq.

(35) Intituled, Alexipharmacum, printed in the year 1630.

(36) Intituled, Pbilinius Romanus correctus.

(37) Intituled, Notarum Spongia, printed in the year 1631.

(38) Intituled, Causa desperata. Glib. Voetii adversus Spongiam. . . . Cornelii Jansenii Crisis operis.

(39) De Vita Jansenii, pag. 64.

(40) Epistola Christiani Pbilierii ad Janum Paleologum, p. 50.

(41) He was born in Holstein.

battle. He wrote some other books [K]. I did not assert that the Court of Rome issued out informations against this Bishop's epitaph [L]. Consult the work which Leydecker has lately published. It is an excellent work (g).

(g) It is intitled, De Historia Jansenismi Libri VI, quibus de Cornelii Jansenii Vita & Morte, nec non de ipsius & sequacium Dogmatibus differtur. Utrecht, 1695, 8vo.

nis, who could scarce prevail with himself to dispute in writing, resolved however at last to do it. But after both had wrote twice on the subject in question, his lodgings were surrounded with soldiers, and himself threatened with the punishment due to Hereticks. Duke d'Arfchor's Secretary exclaimed aloud against him; and said that there was wood enough in his master's forests to burn that Heretic. But as the person who examined Simonis, in the name of the Archbishop of Malines, declared that he had found him a good Catholic, and fully resolved to persevere in the Romish Communion, the prisoner was set at liberty, and Janfenius was forced to pay the expences of the soldiers, &c. Two years after Simonis turned Protestant, and published a book (42) intitled De Statu & Religione propria Papatus adversus Jansenium (43). I have lately read, that this man having quitted the Lutheran Communion to go over to that of Rome, turned Lutheran again, and at last Socinian: He was Principal of the Socinian college of Kiffelin in Lithuania (44); and was well versed in the Greek tongue; and was he who translated Comenius's Jamae Linguarum into that language.

[K] He wrote some other books.] An Oration de interioris hominis reformatione. Tetrateuchus sive Commentarius in IV. Evangelia. Pentateuchus sive Commentarius in V. libros Moysis. The answer of the Divines of Louvain, de vi obligandi conscientias quam habent edicta regia super re monetaria, and that of the Divines and Civilians, de Juramento quod publica auctoritate Magistratus designato imponi solet, were all written by Janfenius (45). Leydecker complains (46) that the harmony of the Gospels, in Moreri's Dictionary, is ascribed to our Janfenius, and says it was wrote by another Janfenius, bishop of Ghent. I have not found this in Moreri. The mistake which Arnauld (47) ascribed to George Hornius, viz. of his supposing that our Janfenius was bishop of Ypres, and afterwards of Ghent, is corrected in Leydecker's edition (48).

[L] The court of Rome issued out informations against Janfenius.] The 10th of December 1655. "The

" Bishop of Ypres, Francis de Robes (49), of the family (49) Leydecker, of the Counts of Annap, caused the monument of Cor-^{pag. 133.} nelius Janfenius, his predecessor, to be taken away ^{him} privately in the night; on which monument was ^{Roblesius.} engraved an elogium of his virtue and erudition, and particularly of his book intitled, Augustinus, declaring, that this faithful interpreter of the most secret thoughts of St. Austin had employ'd on that work a divine Genius, an indefatigable labour, and his whole life-time; and that the Church would receive the benefit of it upon earth, as he did the reward of it in Heaven: Words that were highly injurious to the bulls of Pope Urban VIII. and Innocent X. who had censur'd that work. The Bishop destroy'd this monument by the express orders of Pope Alexander VII. and with consent of Archduke Leopold, Governour of the Netherlands, in spite of the resistance of the Chapter, which went such lengths, that one of the principal Canons had the courage to say, that it was not in the Pope nor the King's power to suppress that epitaph; so dear was Janfenius to this canon and his colleagues (50)." Consult Leydecker (51), who relates all this more at large. I can scarce believe what he says (52), that father la Chaise the Jesuit advised the breaking to pieces the Chaise on which Janfenius's epitaph was engraved, but that the Bishop of Ypres only had it thrown by. I am of opinion, that Father la Chaise, in 1655, was not in a condition to have a concern in any such counsels. I will add the following curious particular. "The last time that the Most Christian King was at Ypres, an hospital nun who had assisted him (53) in his last sickness, and spoke of him as a saint, declared with a flood of tears to some Lords of the Court, that she held Janfenius by the arm when he wrote his last will; and she conjured them at the same time to intreat the King to cause a reparation to be made, for the injury which had been done to so holy a man, in taking away his tomb-stone (54)."

(42) Printed at Leyden in 1636.

(43) See a very ample relation of all this affair in Leydecker, pag. 68, & seq.

(44) See Molletus, Historiam Ciberonensium Cimbrica, Part 3, pag. 103.

(45) Extracted from Valer. Andreas, pag. 155.

(46) Pag. 2.

(47) Morale Pratique, tom. 3, pag. 130.

(48) In Notis ad Hist. Ecclesiast. Hornii, pag. 517.

(50) St. Romuald, Journal Chronologique & Historique, tom. 2, pag. 612.

(51) De Vita Jansenii, pag. 132, & seq.

(52) Pag. 135.

(53) Jansenius.

(54) Morale Pratique, tom. 2, pag. 452.

JAPAN. This is the name of a wide-extended country situated to the East of China, and divided into several islands. Such ample mention is made of it in Moreri's Dictionary (a), that I have but few particulars to observe. I will not even enumerate all his omissions, but only take notice of some of the articles of the Theology of those Islanders. "The monarchy of Japan is divided into two Estates, the Ecclesiastical and the Secular. The former is composed of the Bonzes, and the latter of the Nobility and People. The name of Bonzes is common to all the Ministers devoted to the service of the Gods whom the Japonese adore. They profess celibacy [A], and... they have a Sovereign Pontiff called Iaco or Xaco, who is vested with authority over all the rest; judges of matters relating to Religion; determines what is to be observed concerning the worship of the Gods, and believed with respect to their nature. He elects the Tundes who dispose of matters of less importance, and are in some measure like our Bishops... (b). The Japonese have two sorts of Deities. The first are the Demons or Devils whom they worship under several shapes; not from the hopes of receiving good from them, but out of fear of being hurt by them. The second are the Kings,

[A] The Bonzes profess celibacy.] But then "they do not always observe it very exactly. They abstain from fish and flesh, shave their beard and hair, and conceal their debaucheries under the appearance of an austere life (1)." The greatest profit they make is, the burying of the dead. The people, persuaded that the souls of their relations may, in the life to come, fall into some necessity, spare no expence in order to procure them the comfort which the Bonzes promise they shall meet with, upon condition that large alms are bestowed. They also employ another artifice to enrich themselves, viz. they borrow money from weak and credulous people, promising to repay them in the next world with large interest; and borrowing in this manner, they say among themselves, that the term of years is worth the money (2). Those who would be desirous of drawing a parallel between the east and west, would find it defective with respect to the article of those debts payable in the other world; but then a celibacy not well observed, frauds concealed under the appearance of a rigid morality, the profit accruing from burials, succours sent to souls separated from the body: all these things would furnish a great number of Parallels. I am persuaded that many people could not forbear, as they read the extracts of Cousin (3), to say inwardly to themselves, 'Tis thus with us. It would be curious enough to see a relation of the western parts of the world written by a Japonese or Chineze, who had lived several years in the capital cities of Europe: They would pay us in our own coin. The Missionaries who go into the Indies publish accounts of these countries, wherein they exhibit the fallacies and frauds they have observed in the worship of those idolatrous nations. They ridicule it, but whilst they do

(a) Particularly in the edit. of 1699.

(b) Journal des Savans of July 18, 1689, pag. m. 492. in the Extract of Hist. de l'Eglise de Japon. by Mr. l'Abbe de T.

(1) Journ. des Savans of July 18, 1689, pag. 492. Dutch edit.

(2) Ibid. pag. 492.

(3) Author of the Journal des Savans, cited above and below.

“ Kings, Conquerors, and learned Men, whom they have ranked in the number of “ the Gods, the chief whereof are Amida and Xaca [B]. . . There are said to be ten or “ twelve sects or religions in Japan, and each is indulged the liberty of following that “ which he pleases; which does not occasion feuds or divisions; and for this reason, say
 “ they, because minds or understandings are not united by way of relation or kindred “ like bodies. Among these sects there are three principal ones. The first does not “ hope or expect a life after this; and acknowledge or know no other substance but “ what strikes the senses. . . The second, who believe the immortality of the soul and a “ life to come, is followed by the worthiest sort of people, and is called the Sect of the “ Men of the most high God. The third is that of the worshippers of Xaca (c).” The “ Bonzes may be compared to our Monks (d). According to some authors (e), the most “ general division that can be made of the sects of the Japonese, is to divide them into “ such as professedly go no farther than bare appearances; and such as search for reality “ which does not strike the senses, and is by them called truth. Those who adhere only
 “ to appearances, believe another life after this [C], for the eternal reward of good men,
 “ and the everlasting punishment of the wicked. But such as seek for the internal and insen“ sible reality, reject the notion of heaven and hell, and teach doctrines which bear a great “ affinity to Spinoza’s opinion [D]. They agree with the Epicureans in this particular, viz.
 “ that

(c) Ibid. pag.
494.

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) See Possevinus Bibliob. Select.
lib. 10. cap. 2.
pag. m. 410.
tom. 1.

do this, ought they not to fear that it will be retorted upon them?

Quid rides? mutato nomine de te

Fabula narratur (4).

(4) Horat. Sat.
1. lib. 1. ver. 69,
70.

That is,
 “ What, dost thou laugh? and think that thou art free?
 “ Fool, change the name, the story’s told of thee?
 CREECH.

Or that they should meet with the just reproaches which all such deserve who wink at their own faults, but are eagle-ey’d at discovering those of other people?

*Cum tua pervideas oculis mala lippus inunctis,
 Cur in amicorum vitis tam cernis acutum,
 Quam aut aquila, aut serpens Epidaurius? at tibi contra Evenit, inquirant vitia ut tua rursus & illi* (5).

(5) Idem, Satyr.
3. lib. 1. ver. 25.

That is,
 “ When thou art blind and senseless to thine own,
 “ How dost thou see thy friend’s disease so soon?
 “ That scarce a serpent can so quickly spy,
 “ Nor any eagle hath so good an eye?
 “ Well then, go on, pursue thy mean design,
 “ As thou dost find their faults, so they will thine.
 CREECH.

[B] The chiefs are . . . Amida and Xaca. “ The “ former is represented under various monstrous shapes.
 “ In one of his Temples, at Iedo, he is carried on a “ seven-headed horse. The finest of his Temples is “ near Meaco, and is five hundred foot long, and a “ thousand Idols of massy gold are in it. With re“ gard to Saca or Xaca, the Bonzes tell a thousand “ impertinent stories of him. They say that he was “ born eight hundred times in different species, before “ he was born of a woman; and that when he “ was born of her, he issued through his mother’s “ sides, through which he had gnawed with his teeth.
 “ The truth is, Xaca was a Sophister, who persuaded “ people any thing he pleased. His mother, being “ big of him, dreamt that a white elephant issued “ through her mouth. Hence it is that white ele“ phants are held in veneration in India, China, Tun-“ quin, Siam and Pegu. They are served in gold “ plate; and Noblemen of great distinction visit them
 “ in crowds, and pay them the same honour as to “ Kings (6).” One of the three principal Sects of the “ Japonese is that of Xaca’s worshippers. “ They form
 “ a community, rise at midnight to sing hymns, “ meet every evening to hear the discourse which “ their Superiour makes to them on some moral sub“ ject, and then gives them some points to meditate “ upon. He sometimes represents to them a dying “ man; and repeats the reproaches which the soul
 “ and body make to one another in the expiring “ moments. The meditation lasts an hour: and when “ it is ended, every person gives the Superiour an ac“ count of the thoughts which came into his mind,
 “ and the resolutions he has formed (7).”

(6) *Journal des
Savans*, of July
1689, pag. 495.

(7) Ibid. pag.
4:6.

[C] Those who adhere only to appearances, believe another life after this. Their opinion seems to be that of Amida, of Xaca and Fotoke. They say that at the four cardinal points of the world there are certain Countries, the inhabitants whereof are in a fulness of satisfaction, whereby they enjoy a supreme felicity; that all the laws of Japan were made by Fotoke;

and that those who observe them shall no sooner leave this life, but they will go up into those places; that they will be born again there; and that Fotoke will transform them, and give them thirty two forms or shapes, and fourscore qualities, with which they shall live in perfect beatitude to all eternity, happy and contented with their condition. In omnem eternitatem vivent læti admodum, felices & sua sorte contenti (8). Women will not be admitted in those Countries; but those who shall be saved for having observed Fotoke’s laws, will be transformed into men; for otherwise they would not receive the reward for the good life they led, because (say these) they are in their own nature unclean, detestable, and execrable.
Eo quod feminae sint natura detestabiles, execrandæ & immundæ (9). With regard to the transgressors of Fotoke’s laws, they shall go from this life, into certain infernal places, and there suffer six sorts of never-ending punishments. Such is the general doctrine of those who follow appearances. As to the other Sects, they argue as they please on this subject; but these agree in this center of unity, and their opinion is that of the ignorant and vulgar: Et quamvis de hisce rebus unaquæque Japoniorum secta loquatur, ut vult, communi tamen consensu quicunque extrinsecam rerum faciem sectantur, in hoc, quod diximus, conveniunt, & banc opinionem rudes & vulgares homines amplectuntur (10). I borrow all this from Possevinus the Jesuit (11), who did not think himself obliged to refute the doctrines of this Sect; for since, says he, they profess to adhere only to appearances, what they say has in reality no solidity nor truth; ’tis at most but a phantom, or exterior of truth. The Bonzes themselves confess manifestly, that this whole system of Camus and Fotoke was built, or rather invented for the sake of the ignorant and weak minds: Nam (ut ipsimet Bonzii, qui suæ sententiæ Magistri & Doctores sunt, aperte fatentur) totam de CAMI & FOTOQUE disciplinam propter rudes & inscios rerum homines, capti, & ingenio imbecillos, esse compositam, vel potius confictam, non quod aliquid eorum, quæ in ipsa docentur, verum sit (12). However Possevin refutes the doctrine of this Sect in his 5th chapter (13).

(8) Possevin. ubi infra.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Idem, ibid.
(11) *Extracted
from Possevin, Bibliob. Select.
tom. 1. lib. 10.
cap. 2. pag. m.
410, 411.*

(12) Idem, ibid.
pag. 411.

(13) Ibid. pag.
429, & seq.

[D] Such as seek for the internal and insensible reality, reject the notion of heaven and hell, and teach doctrines which bear a great affinity to Spinoza’s opinion. They neglect externals, they devote themselves wholly to meditation, they reject all discipline that consists in words, and adhere only to the exercise called by them SOKU-ZIN SOKUBUT, that is, the heart. They maintain that there is but one principle of all things, and that this principle is found every where; and that the heart of man, and the interior of other beings differ not from this common principle; and that all other beings return to this common principle when they are destroyed.
 It exists, adds they, to all eternity; it is one only principle, clear and luminous; it is incapable of increasing or decreasing, it has no shape; it does not reason, but lives

that they divest God of the government of the world ; as a circumstance that would interfere with the supreme tranquillity, which, according to them, forms all his felicity. They even go farther than Epicurus, for they deprive God of reason and understanding. They doubtless are afraid that these qualities would disturb his repose, since they find by experience that reasoning is attended with some fatigue (f). The Christian Religion which Francis Xavier, and several other Missionaries after him, preached to the Japonese, did not find any greater obstacles than what the Bonzes raised against it; not so much by disputes and arguments, as by the methods commonly employed by Ecclesiastics ; I mean by having recourse to the secular arm, and by force, exhorting the Kings and the People to maintain the old Religion, and persecute the followers of the new (g). It must be confessed however, that these Japonese Priests had conferences with the Christian Priests ; and made such objections to them as shewed they did not want sense (b). They could not prevent the Christian Religion from making a very great progress in a short time ; but they at last excited the Emperor to have recourse to such violent proceedings, as quite extirpated it in Japan, and very much swelled the martyrology [E].

(f) Ibid. lib. 10. cap. 3. pag. 415.

(g) See Journal des Savans of July 1689, pag. 499.

(b) See Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, Sept. 1691, pag. 8, & seq. in the extract of Histoire des Eglise du Japon. Father lives in idleness and a perfect repose. Figura carens, ratiocinationis expert, vitam agens otii, quietis, & tranquillitatis plenissimam (14). They teach that those who, in this life, have known this principle extremely well, attain to the perfect glory of Fotoke and his successors ; and that such as never arrive at this exalted pitch of knowledge, are born again several times, and migrate from place to place ; but that they, in the other world shall be all absorbed in this common principle of all things. They likewise assert that knowledge does not differ from ignorance ; that good and evil are not two beings, and that the one is not distinct or separate from the other (15). Possévin reduces this system to these four points : I. That there is but one principle of all things ; that this principle is supremely perfect ; that it is wise, but understands nothing, and does not concern itself with the affairs of this world, inasmuch as it lives in a perfect repose ; and, like a man, who is strongly attentive to one thing, and leaves or neglects all the rest. II. That this principle is in all particular beings, and communicates its essence to them ; so that they are the same thing with it, and return to it when they themselves end. III. That the heart of man does not differ from this common principle of all beings ; and that when men die, their hearts perish and are consumed ; but that the first principle which before endued them with life, subsists still in them ; whence it follows that there is neither paradise nor hell, neither rewards nor punishments after this life. IV. That it is possible for man, in this world, to raise himself to the condition and supreme majesty of the first principle, so far as by strength of meditation he may know it perfectly, and so arrive to the supreme tranquillity which this principle enjoys in itself ; that this is all the good which man can attain to ; and that till he has attained it by a perfect meditation and knowledge, he is tormented with perpetual disquiet ; he often is torn from one hell to another, and does not find rest in any place. It is very certain that we here have a great number of particulars which Spinoza did not teach ; but, on the other side, it is very certain, that he, like those Japonese Priests, has taught that the first principle of all things, and all the beings of which the universe is formed, are but one and the same substance ; that all things are God, and that God is all things ; in such a manner that God and all things that exist make but one and the same being. One cannot enough admire that so extravagant a notion, so full of absurd contradictions, should have got into the heads of so many people so distant one from the other, and so different in temper, education, custom, and genius. Possévin (16) brings many arguments against the hypothesis of these Bonzes, and refutes it chiefly by the contradictions it contains ; and first he observes, that they have but very few doctrines concerning the nature of the first principle, that they do not say any thing upon it with perspicuity, that they are not able to answer the questions or objections proposed to them, nor confirm their opinions ; and that their only refuge is to say, that it is to no purpose for men to enquire into the nature and power of the first principle (17). Omnia unico verbo putant se dissolvere, dicentes hominum non interesse hujus principii vim, & naturam pericrutari inquirendo aut disputando: quod totum manifeste constat, ex ignoracione profectum & na- sum (18). It is to be observed that part of his objections (19) combat also part of Spinoza's system.

[E] The violent proceedings of the Japonese very much swelled the martyrology. Read the Ecclesiastical History of Japan, written by Francis Solier the Jesuit, and the History of the Church of Japan, by Abbé de T (20). "This Abbé admires the depth of God's judgments; and wonders, he should have permitted the blood of so many martyrs to be shed, without its having served, as in the first ages of the Church, as a fruitful seed for the forming or producing of new Christians (21)." Without presuming to enquire into the reasons the divine wisdom may have, for permitting at one time what it does not permit at another; it may be said that the Christianity of the sixteenth century had no right to hope for the same favour, and the same protection from God as the Christianity of the three first centuries. The latter was a benign, gentle and patient religion, which recommended to subjects submission to their sovereigns, and did not endeavour to raise itself to the throne by rebellions; but the Christianity which was preached to the infidels of the sixteenth century was far different; it was a bloody, murderous religion, that had been used to slaughter for five or six hundred years. It had contracted a very long habit of maintaining and aggrandizing itself, by putting to the sword, all that resisted it. Fires, executions, the dreadful tribunal of the inquisition, cruades, bulls exciting subjects to rebellion, seditious Preachers, conspiracies, assassinations of Princes, were the ordinary methods employed against those who refused submission to its orders. Could these Christians promise themselves the blessing which Heaven had granted the primitive Church, to the Gospel of peace, of patience and gentleness? The best choice the Japonese had to make was, to become converts to the true God; but not having knowledge sufficient to renounce their false religion, they then had no other choice to make but an active or passive persecution. They could not refuse their ancient government nor their ancient worship but by getting rid of the Christians. These, one time or other, would have destroyed both; they would have armed all their new converts; would have introduced into Japan the soldiers and cruel maxims of the Spaniards; and, by hanging and slaughtering in America, would have enslaved all Japan. Thus, to consider things only in a political view, it must be confessed, that the persecution which the Christians suffered in that country was a prudent means to prevent the overthrow of the monarchy and plundering of a state. The ingenuous confession of a Spaniard justifies the precautions which these infidels took. "It furnished the Bonzes with a specious pretence for exercising their hatred, and soliciting the extirpation of the Christians. Being asked by the King of Tossa, how the King of Spain got possession of so great an extent of country in both hemispheres, he answered too frankly, that he used to send Friars to preach the Gospel to foreign nations; and that after having converted a considerable number of Heathens, he used to send his forces, which, joining with the new converts to Christianity, by that means conquered the country. The Christians paid dear for this indiscreet confession (22)."

(18) Possévin-Biblioth. tom. 3. pag. 412.

(19) Ibid. pag. 419, 420.

(20) It was printed at Paris in 2 vol. 4to, in the year 1689.

(21) Journal des Savans of July 25, 1689, pag. 507.

(22) Hist. des Ouvrages des Savans, Sept. 1691, pag. 13, 14.

(14) Possévin-Biblioth. Select. tom. 1. lib. 10. cap. 2. pag. 415.

(15) Extracted from Possévin. ibid.

(16) Possévin-Biblioth. tom. 1. pag. 412, 413.

(17) This is a gross contradiction, which Possévin should have objected to them; for since they say that the greatest happiness of man proceeds from the perfect knowledge he can acquire of the first principle, it concerns him to enquire into the nature of that first principle.

Father Possévin has censured very severely the Laws established by the Japonese Legislator [F].

[F] Father Possévin has censured . . . the laws established by the Japonese legislator. The first fault he finds with them is, that they enjoin idolatry, and particularly the worship and adoration of Camus and Fotoke. He gives a very just description of the enormity of idolatry, and places it in the highest rank of injuries that can be done to God. This he proves from the example of rebellion; for he says that the greatest crime which can be committed against a sovereign is, to divest him of his power, and bestow it on another. Sicut nullum crimen in Regem ac Principem potest gravius admitti, quum eum à suo regno pellere, è regis dignitatis gradu dejicere, & alium in summum regis amplitudinis fastigium evehere; ita summa est in Deum injuria, summum in eum scelus admittitur, cum divinus honor, & cultus, qui ipsi soli debetur, in alium transfertur, ipsi detrabitur, alii tribuitur (23).

(23) Possévin. Biblioth. Select. tom. 1. lib. 10. cap. 6. pag. 435. See, on this subject, Pensées diverses sur les Comètes, pag. 340, 390.

“ As there cannot be a greater crime committed against a King or Prince than to drive him from his Kingdom, to divest him of the regal dignity, and to raise another person to his throne; so it is doing the highest injury to God, and acting the most horrid wickedness against him, when the divine honour and worship that are due to him only, are taken from him and transferred to another.” The second fault in those laws is, that whilst they very severely prohibit to the Bonzes the use of women, they allow them that of their own sex. They prohibit them the former as a nasty and abominable thing, and approve the latter as a honest and holy. In Bonziis omnem cum fœminis concubitum, ut rem fœdam, turpem, & detestabilem damnant: at usum puerorum permittunt, imo in eisdem Bonziis coitum cum pueris approbant, ut rem honestam & sanctam (24). Possévin shews, on many accounts, the atrocious nature of Sodomy. The third fault is, that forbidding the killing of certain beasts sacred to Camus and Fotoke, they permit men to kill one another, and even to be their own murderers. They suppose, not only that it is an action agreeable to those Deities, but also the true way to Deification, and hence it is that very great numbers of the Japonese kill themselves, either by plunging into the water, burning or burying themselves alive, or leaping from the top of a rock. Many also rip up their bellies for very slight reasons; and several mothers kill their own children. Possévin shews the wickedness of all such proceedings (25). The last fault he censures is, that the laws of Japan declare, that by the bare invocation of NAMUAMIDABUT, or by crying FORENGUELIO, all kinds of sins are expiated without there being any need of repentance. The Japonese, continues he, do not speak either of satisfactory punishments or good works; they pretend that those things are injurious to the merit of XACA and AMIDA, who have been afflicted enough

(24) Possévin. ibid.

(25) Possévin. ibid. pag. 436.

JARCHI or JARHI (SOLOMON) a famous Rabbi, lived in the twelfth Century [A]. His true name is Ijaaki (a). “ And yet that pretended name of Jarhi made some persons imagine that he was of Lunel in Languedoc, but he was of Troyes in Champagne, as R. Ghedalia, and most of the Jewish Chronologers assert . . . His books are very much esteemed amongst the Jews [B], and we may say that he is their “ grand

(a) Simon, Hist. Crit. du Vieux Testament, pag. m. 545.

(1) Simon, Hist. Crit. de Vieux Testament, pag. 545.

(2) See König, Biblioth. p. 423.

(3) Ibid. But observe that König,

ibid. pag. 496.

who after Hottinger places

Maimonides in the 13th century, does not follow the common opinion, according to which he lived in the 12th.

(4) Hoornbeek, contra Judæos,

pag. 7.

(5) Mezeray, Abregé Chron.

tom. 2. p. m. 799.

(6) Hoornbeek, contra Judæos,

pag. 7.

[A] He lived in the twelfth century. This is what Father Simon (1) supposes. Others place his death in the year 1105 (2). Some make him live in the thirteenth century, and pretend that he was contemporary with Maimonides (3). Others again suppose that he lived in the fourteenth century (4); for they assert that he was banished from France with all the other Jews by King Philip surnamed le Bel: now this Monarch's edict against the Jews is dated July the 22d 1307 (5). Hoornbeek supposes that this Rabbi was banished from France at that time; he makes him a native of Lunel in Languedoc; and he observes that there were always a great many Jews in that city; which he proves thus. Unde in epistolis Gregorii, libr. 3. epistol. 21. Venantio Episcopo Lunensi inscripta ita incipit: multorum ad nos relatione pervenit, à Judæis in Lunensi civitate de gentibus ad servitium Christiana detineri mancipia (6). i. e. “ Whence the twenty first letter of the third book of Gregory's Letters, for the crimes which men have committed, and have sufficiently expiated them by their sufferings. This doctrine opens the door to sin; for as nothing can be easier than to throw out an invocation or a cry, men are sure to avoid easily all the punishments they have reason to fear, after having abandoned themselves to the greatest crimes. Possévin (26) shews very evidently the enormity and horreur of this doctrine, and the pernicious effects which result from it.

(26) Possévin. Biblioth. Select. tom. 1. lib. 10. cap. 6. pag. 437.

No reader need fear he would be guilty of a mistake, in condemning such a doctrine; but should he venture to pronounce, that Possévin has faithfully represented the doctrine of the Bonzes, he very possibly may form a rash judgment; for, in short, people must never be condemned on the testimony of their enemies; and enquiry ought to be made, whether their doctrine has been faithfully represented. Now it would not be a faithful representation of it, to insist on the letter of some law, without regarding the interpretations of the Doctors; for, by such a method of proceeding, one might ascribe a great number of absurdities to the most rational religions. There are some harsh things in scripture, which it would be wrong to consider as laws enacted by the Christians; for these do not take them in the literal sense, but explain and soften them by other passages, and agreeably to the analogy of the faith. It would be proper for us to be informed whether the Bonzes do not the same, with respect to some of the ordinances of the legislators. I could easily believe those particulars that are related concerning the knavish tricks and hypocrisy of those idolatrous Priests; but I think it probable, that they cover, with some exterior of severity, their doctrine as well as their behaviour; and perhaps we ought to ascribe only to some of them, what Possévin charges the whole body of their sects with. Some Friars have declared, that very great villains have been saved by the bare invocation of the Blessed Virgin. The extravagance of those who speak of the treasure of indulgences, and who say that the merits of Saints, and their works of supererogation supply the want of repentance in many persons, would furnish a Japonese traveller with very good chapters. Would it not be unjust, should he relate all these particulars as articles of the Christian faith? Once again, I should be curious to know what answer the Bonzes would make to the following question. Do you teach those things which Possévin ascribes to you? I also should be glad to see a history written by them, concerning the settling of Christianity in their island, and its extirpation. And in case such Japonese had writ it after having perused the history composed by Francis Solier and Abbé de T, it would still be more curious to compare them.

“ which is written to Venantius Bishop of Lunel, begins thus: We have been told by a great many persons, that the Jews who live in the city of Lunel keep several Christians as slaves.” This is a very gross blunder; for Lunel in Languedoc never was an Episcopal city. Pope Gregory means in this passage Luna a city of Tuscany in Italy, the ruins of which are still to be seen near the mouth of the river Magra. The Episcopal See of that city was removed to Sarzana by Pope Nicholas V (7).

(7) See Miræus, Geog. Eccles. pag. 236.

[B] His books are very much esteemed among the Jews. His commentaries on the Bibles of Venice and Basil are extant. They have also printed with the text of the Talmud his glosses or commentaries upon that great work (8). Monsieur Brun (9) relates, that he has seen several Jews “ at Bourdeaux, who had still so great a respect for the memory of Solomon Jarhi, the most illustrious of their Rabbies, by the learned commentaries he wrote both upon the holy

(8) Simon, Hist. Crit. du Vieux Testament, pag. m. 545.

(9) Brun. Véritable Religion des Hollandais, pag. 224.

(b) Ibid. pag. 514. col. 2.
(c) I give the article of this same Rabbi under the word ISAACITES.

“ grand author.” They add sometimes to the books they call the five volumes, the Commentaries of Raschi, who is their chief author upon the Bible, because he is very well skilled in their systems of Divinity, and in their Translations (b). Father Simon, who says all this, ought to have observed, that Rabbi Raschi is the same with Rabbi Jarchi or Isaaki. He is also called Isaacites. See the margin (c).

(10) He should have said Lunel.
“ Scripture, and upon the Talmud, that they assured me, says he, they were determined to take very soon a journey to Lunelle (10) near Nîmes, to see the place where this great man was born, and

“ whence he took his name (*), and that they would endeavour to settle there, which they hoped would be granted them.”

(*) Jarchi signifies the Moon in Hebrew (and the Moon in French is la Lune) so that he was called Jarchi of Lunelle.

JARDINS (MARY CATHERINE DES) famous for her Romances [A], flourished in the seventeenth Century. She was “ born at Alençon, a little city of which her father was Provost. As soon as she was nineteen years of age she began to consider how small her estate was; and finding her self poor, and having as much wit as ambition, she went to Paris with a design to mend her fortune. She was not entirely disappointed in her hopes; for she soon gained a reputation by her genius; and the men of wit were proud of her acquaintance. Monsieur de Ville-Dieu, a handsome Gentleman, and in pretty good circumstances, was one of the first that became acquainted with Mistress de Jardins; he esteemed her, loved her, and married her, though she wanted beauty: but he died unfortunately soon after. The poor woman retired for grief into a Convent; but when she had eased her grief a little there, she left the place, and entered into the world again, and married to her second husband Monsieur de la Châte, whom she also buried. Being deeply afflicted at this new misfortune she resolved never to marry again, but to pass the remainder of her days in love-intrigues. She began therefore to hearken to the flattering addresses of her lovers, and to answer them in little Poems and Letters, which are very ingenious and witty (a).” The author, from whom I borrow this account, has omitted a great many particulars [B], and has not been accurate with regard to chronology; for he pretends that she did not begin to hearken to the flatteries of her lovers, till after the death of her two husbands; whereas several persons have told me positively, that this epoch is very ill-placed, and that this woman’s galantry was infinitely less than ever at the time he mentions. There has been in the Low-Countries one Mistress DES JARDINS, whose name and picture have for some years following been prefixed to the Almanack; she was contemporary with the person who is the subject of this article, and who died in the year 1683 (b).

(a) Richelet, Vie des Auteurs François, p. lviii. of the Hague edition, 1699.

(b) See the Mercur Galant, for November 1683, pag. 267.

JARRIGE

(1) It was, I think, intitled, Alcidamis, or Alcidamis, I do not remember it well.

[A] She is famous for her romances.] The first, or one of the first she wrote (1) was to contain several volumes in 8vo, according to the custom of those times. But she did not carry it on so far as she designed at first; and I have been told that she drop: it, because it was found out that she designed to represent under fictitious names and with some alterations, the adventures of a great Lady, who married below her dignity. She was threatened with the resentment of the persons concerned, if she dared to carry on the intrigue to the end of the romance; she broke off therefore in the middle of her story. However she did not bury her talents; on the contrary, she invented a new kind of romantick stories, of which she published a great many, and she succeeded very well that way; she brought those little stories of amorous adventures into fashion, in which stories the good or bad success of love appears very soon, and thus she sunk the reputation of those long and tedious accounts of heroick adventures, which made the Printers of Cassandra, Cleopatra, Cyrus, Clelia, &c. get so much money. The new taste she raised does still subsist; and though that sort of works please only when they are new, and soon become obsolete, yet the first romances she wrote according to her new fancy, are still read with pleasure; as her Journal Amoureux, her Annales Galantes, her Galanteries Grenadines, and several others. She published in the year 1672 Les Exiles de la Cour d’Auguste: i. e. “ The persons banished from Augustus’s Court.” An illustrious Lady (2) thought this romance very pretty. That intitled Les Desordres de l’Amour (3). i. e. “ The bad consequences of Love,” and that other the title of which is Portrait des Foibleffes humaines (4). i. e. “ A Description of the Weaknesses of Men,” are not inferior to any of the former. The misfortune is that Mistress des Jardins gave occasion to an abuse, which grows worse and worse every day. I mean that of ascribing stories and amorous intrigues of one’s own invention to the greatest men of former ages, and of interspersing them with some particulars, that have some foundation in history. This mixture of truths with fables creeps into a great many new books, spoils the taste of young people, and is the reason why one dares not to believe even what is really true. See the remark [C] of the article NIDHARD.

[B] Monsieur Richelet . . . has omitted a great many particulars.] Since I observe this, it would be reasonable for me to supply his defects. But it is not in my power to consult the persons who might acquaint me with those particulars; it is therefore just to excuse an omission in me, for which Monsieur Richelet may justly be blamed; for as he lived at Paris, where he did not lead a sedentary life, it was easy for him to enquire about the time when Mistress Des Jardins left the country, and settled in the capital city of the Kingdom. It would not have cost him more trouble to learn with whom she was first acquainted there, what patrons she got, what book she published first, and when she published it; in what year she was married to her first husband, when he died, at what time she married again, when she lost her second husband; the chronological order in which her Romances were printed; the time of her death, and several other particulars of that kind, which he does not mention in the least; and yet we read on the top of his pages, Vie des Auteurs François. i. e. “ The Lives of the French Authors.” Is not this imposing most shamefully upon the readers by a sham title? Ought an account to be called thus, when it wants the most material particulars? You will say, no doubt, that there are a great many readers, who do not mind those omissions; but this is not clearing the writer. These readers would not have been displeas’d had they met in his work with the particulars he has omitted; and a great many other readers would have been very glad to find them there. He did not therefore follow the best method; for it is much better to do what pleases a great many persons, and displeases none, than to do that which some dislike, though others do not dislike it.

(2) Madam de Sevigné. See the Lettres du Comte de Buffi-Rabutin, Part 3. Let. CC. pag. m. 362.

(3) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Sept. 1686. in the Catalogue des Livres Nouveaux, num. 1.

(4) See the same Nouvelles, for November 1685 Art. 1. and the Journal des Sçavans, for Nov. 19, 1685, pag. m. 494.

(5) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for Oct. 1684, in the Catalogue, num. 5.

JARRIGE (PETER), born at Tulle in Limoufin, was one of the most famous Preachers amongst the Jesuits, but otherwise a dishonest man [A]: he was so exasperated against his whole Order, because he was not promoted in it to the employments which he imagined he deserved, that he resolved to turn Protestant. He imparted his mind to a Minister (a), who procured him an opportunity to retire into Holland (b), He abjured the Roman Catholic Religion in the Consistory of Rochelle on Christmas-day in the year 1647. When he was arrived at Leyden, he preached to a very numerous congregation upon the motives of his conversion, and endeavoured afterwards to persuade the world, that he had no longer the least inclination for Popery. The States of Holland granted him a pension (c). But "the Jesuits caused information to be made against him with the utmost severity, and endeavoured as much as lay in their power to defame him. They obliged the Judge of Rochelle to condemn him to be hanged, and afterwards burnt. But all that noise served only to make the public know how much they were vexed at this loss, and to afford Jarrige, who was very passionate and revengeful, a pretence to revenge himself upon them. He did it with a witness in a book, which he intitled Les Jesuites mis sur l'Echafant; i. e. The Jesuites exposed upon a Scaffold at the place of execution; he abused them so severely in that book, that their society never met with any thing that vexed them so much (d). He also published a particular answer to Father Beaufés, who had defamed him very much (e). His treating the Jesuits thus, might have made the world imagine, that they would be for ever irreconcilable; and yet the Jesuit Ponthelier (f), who was then at the Hague amongst the attendants of an Embassador, had some hopes to reclaim that haughty spirit; he practised upon him so, that he persuaded him to return into the Pale of the Church of Rome; which he did accordingly in the year 1650. Jarrige left Leyden, and went amongst the Jesuits of Antwerp, where he published his recantation immediately [B]; but

(a) To Monsieur Vincent Minister of Rochelle.

(b) Histoire de l'edit de Nantes, tom. 3. pag. 93.

(c) Jarrige, Recantation, pag. 101.

(d) Hist. de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 3. pag. 93.

(e) In a book intitled, Les Impietez & Sacrileges de Pierre Jarrige, Recantat. de Jarrige, pag. 70.

(f) See the remark [C].

[A] He was a dishonest man.] This appears most evidently by what he confesses himself in his recantation. I need not therefore to insist upon an argument, which a very honest man urged one day before several persons of the Reformed religion. He observed that a studious man, like Jarrige, who was continually composing of Sermons, could not have remembered at Leyden that vast number of little stories, which he has related in his Jesuites mis sur l'Echafant, and in his answer to James Beaufés; he could not, I say, have remembered them, had he not wrote them down, at the time he heard them, with the names and surnames of the persons concerned, and with all the minute particulars of times and places. Now this betrays a wicked heart; this shews that he was a dishonest man; for he would not have taken the trouble to keep such a register, had he not designed to prepare weapons to use them on occasion against the Jesuits, if he should happen to fall out with them. This was therefore thinking of revenge, and providing means to make himself formidable, even before he knew whether he would ever have occasion for them. There are some persons, who keep all, even the most inconsiderable letters of their friends, and who are most careful to keep particularly those letters of which they may take an advantage, in case they should happen to fall out with their friends. They consider the inconstancy of our passions, and they love as tho' they were to hate one day (1), and take their measures accordingly. It is certain, that they who keep their friends letters, and remember their most free conversations, and greatest secrets, with such a design, are very wicked men. The person, whom I have mentioned in the beginning of this remark, made use of that comparison. I do not pretend to vindicate his reflection: I relate it only as a matter of fact; the reader will judge of it as he pleases. I have, besides this, wherewithall to support the assertion in my text, as you will see in the following remark.

[B] He published his recantation immediately.] He confessed (2), that a most bitter and violent passion made him retire from the Jesuits; and that there was (3) not a word in the cursed and scandalous Sermon which he preached at Leyden, but what was, properly speaking, a blasphemy, which deserved so much the more to be punished on the day of God's judgment, as his heart disowned his words. He acknowledged (4), that he had added to his first and impudent lye such circumstances as were both false and criminal, namely, that it was sixteen years since God had laid in his mind the first foundations of that work, which he had begun to perform some months before in his own country, and which he happily finished to his satisfaction in the territories of Holland. He confessed (5), that to compleat his wickedness he had slandered several innocent persons, to revenge himself of two whom he thought guilty; that upon reading the sentence by which he was condemned to death (6) for a religion which he abhorred in his heart . . . his anger deprived him of his judgment, and without minding what he did, acted like mad dogs, who bite their own masters without knowing them. Being therefore deprived of my right senses, says he (7), I wrote a virulent and bitter libel against the Province of Guienne which I had left. . . . I made use of all the artifices I was capable of to asperse their reputation. Rhetoric has the properties of those multiplying glasses, which make the smallest objects appear very large, and represent a frog as big as an ox. It was an easy matter for me to find some slight foundations upon which I might build the most heinous crimes. I did not mind to tell the truth, if I could but find some probable arguments to support the falsities I asserted. I had but a small ground to work upon, but by the particulars which I industriously raised upon it, I made a mountain of a mole-hill. They who knew the trifling and inconsiderable stories that happened in that holy Province, will understand, much easier than any other readers, that a revengeful spirit rendered me very industrious in exaggerating the smallest things, and exceedingly artful to make them appear probable. The reverend father Ponthelier has censured me severely, but yet with kindness, for these artifices, whilst my passion was still in its height; and he received no other answer from me but this; namely, that, since Father Rousseau and Father Beaufais had made use of a thousand artifices and falsities to get me condemned to be burnt, it was but reasonable that I should also find some means to be revenged, and that upon a small foundation I should ground the most heinous charges, as they had raised theirs upon mere appearances. I added, that they had not barely wrote, as I did, but that they had really caused me to be hanged and afterwards burnt in effigy . . . (8). As a revengful man I chose the blind side of my enemies, that I might more effectually disperse my slanders . . . Whenever I met with the least opportunity to censure them, I never failed to make my own conjectures pass for proofs; and if it happened that any of them were suspected, either with or without reasons, by persons of their own society or by strangers, I took those bare suspicions for real truths, and I generally endeavoured to make honest men pass for very great criminals, who after a very strict examination would have been found guilty only of some imprudent actions, or at most of some very slight faults. Whoever will examine my discourse seriously and with an unbiassed mind, will find, that in order to render my forgeries more acceptable to the reader and more probable, I generally prefix to them some reflections that are both plausible and artful. I have said too much to deserve

A REFLECTION on the conduct of those who keep all their friends letters.

(1) Ita amicis habere, posse ut fieri inimicis putet; i. e. "Act with your friend, as tho' he might once become your enemy." Publius Syrus, apud M. cr. b. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7.

(2) Page 8.

(3) Page 11.

(4) Page 22.

(5) Page 69.

(6) The Provincial of the Jesuits obtained from the Presidial Court of la Rochelle a sentence by which Jarrige was condemned to be hanged, and afterwards burnt. He carried me to the gallows, says Jarrige, pag. 72 of his Recantation, and from the gallows to the wood-pile. He caused the sentence of the Presidial Court to be printed; he had it explained, and laid open the grounds of the sentence pronounced against me, and dispersed it through all the Provinces; and he would have had my body treated after the same manner as he did my picture, had not God protected me in a country, where I was then only sinning against him.

(7) Page 73.

(8) Page 77.

but it is not known what became of him since that time (a). A great many persons believe that the Jesuits imprisoned him for the remainder of his life [C]. This might be ; but other reasons may be given why such a man should have entirely disappeared [D]. The Historian whom I have quoted will not, I am sure, take it amiss, if any credit, and even the Heretics themselves, though they may perhaps urge my slanders hereafter as good arguments, disproved them in the Synod of Middelburg ; and indeed a man cannot believe those slanders, unless he be as blind and passionate as I was when I wrote that book. And if there has been any evil committed, the guilty have been banished from the society (of the Jesuits), which as it has the proprieties of the great ocean, so it cannot keep any dead corps in its bosom. I was therefore unjust, to make an illustrious and religious society answerable for the faults of those, whom she has cast out as men unworthy to live with saints, and to cherish a spirit of devils amongst saints. My anger and passion made me relate the evil, and conceal the remedies that were used against it. I have said indeed what some had committed, but I have not added, that they were expelled immediately and without delay as so many infected men. I was writing a satire to revenge myself, and not a panegyric to commend them. They who know the Jesuits, will be persuaded, that the crimes of regicides, of murdering children, of Sodomy, and such other abominable actions, which I charged them with, are mere forgeries (9). How often have I made use of captious reflections, against all the rules of sound reasoning, in order to draw general inferences from particular facts, and to charge the whole society with such crimes, as I could not have proved upon one single person, had I been called upon to do it in a legal manner ? What stories have I not forged, altered and falsified a thousand ways, in order to sting more cruelly, and to make deeper and more dangerous wounds ? If I were to give in this place a particular account of all that I have said, and refute every thing, and to mention the grounds of my accusation, I should tire you, dear reader, with a thousand circumstances, which would make my recantation abound with difficulties, and little edifying. Let it therefore be sufficient for me to declare, that I retract all that I have said in that pernicious book, both in the whole and in every part of it, except however what I have asserted of Father Roussieu, and of Father Beauvais, in my own vindication and defence. I desire the equitable reader to place that book in the same rank with my declaration, and I intreat him by the tender mercies of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, not to read that declaration any more, because it is heretical ; and never to cast his eyes upon that book, because it is an abortive child, which an evil conscience conceived, melancholy formed, and revenge brought forth.

I leave my readers to judge, whether the Gentlemen of Port-Royal were in the right to assert, that Peter Jarrige did not publish a sufficient recantation ; and that he accuses indeed himself of too much passion in his book against the Jesuits, but that he does not retract positively any of the scandalous stories he had related. They who answered Father Maimbourg's History of Calvinism were sure to make an advantage of this observation of the Gentlemen of Port-Royal (10).

§ (a) It is not known what became of him.] Jarrige being reconciled to the church of Rome retired to Tulle in the Limousin, where he lived as a secular priest, the Pope having given him leave to do it. He died there September the 26th, 1670 (*).] ADD. REM.

[C] A great many persons believe, that the Jesuits imprisoned him for the remainder of his life.] As he knew beforehand that people would say this, or even something worse of him, he took care to let the world know, that the Jesuits received him very kindly ; adding, that they who would not believe it, might come and see him. " I know very well, said he, that the Ministers and the Gentlemen whom I have left, will publish that I am dead, or in prison ; but do me the favour to tell all those that come to Antwerp, that they may visit me in the College, and I promise you, that I shall not only speak with them freely and with a perfect liberty, but, if they please, I shall also accompany them through the whole city, and take a journey with them into the Roman Catholic territories (11). Add to this the following passage from his recantation (12). " I know very well that the Heretics, who judge of other people's actions by their own, will spread a false report, as, for instance, that I was poisoned ; or that I am shut up in a dungeon, where I see the light only thro' a little hole ; that the reverend Father John Pontelier, who was the chief instrument God made use of to help me out of the abyss, has seduced me, and drew me artfully from the United Provinces, and from a safe sanctuary, to deliver me up into the hands of my enemies, or to a certain death. But it is necessary for the conversion of all the apostates of several orders, who are still in the mire of error, where they are detained only through the fear of being punished, that they should know, all these reports are false, and that I escaped the wolf's clutches, to enter into the bosom of a merciful shepherd, who takes a pride in carrying the lost sheep on his shoulders. Indeed if I should receive such a treatment as my crimes deserve, an imprisonment of ten years would not be long enough to atone for them. But since I returned freely into my Father's bosom, without being forced to it, where sin abounded during two years, grace abounds much more at present." He affected to let the public know all the securities that had been given him. " I have received from his Majesty, says he (13), the fullest pardon and absolution that was ever granted, so that I do no longer fear either Bourdeaux on account of my book, or Rochelle on account of the sentence of death passed upon me. I have received, in the second place, letters of security, or letters of assurance from our Holy Father the Pope, with full liberty to retire into such Catholic city as I shall choose, and by these letters all Civil and Ecclesiastical Magistrates are commanded to protect me, his Holiness being satisfied, if I do but wear a Priest's garment. Thirdly, I have received from the Archduke Leopold a pass to travel freely over all his territories. Fourthly, Francis Piccolomini, General of the Society of Jesus, has sent me Letters-Patent to enter again amongst the Jesuits, with whom I am now, they having fully pardoned me my fault, without enjoining me any penance, or requiring any satisfaction from me, but what I may make privately of my own accord. The same has given me other Letters-Patent to go into such Kingdom or Province of the world as I shall think fit ; so that I have had the liberty to choose any of the Society's Colleges : All this is sealed with the Great Seal of the General's Office, so that nothing can be more authentic. And to compleat my happiness, Father Pontelier, who has been the chief author and promoter of all these favours and wonders, has got leave to live with me as long as he pleases ; and I assure you, that he will not forsake me, till I be entirely satisfied. And besides all this, I have the liberty to be either a secular Priest, or to continue in the Society of the Jesuits (which is a thing that is never granted to any person) and I expect definitive answers from Rome."

[D] Other reasons may be given why such a man should have entirely disappeared.] By his own recantation he was convicted of being the greatest villain upon earth. For he acknowledged there, that in order to revenge himself of two Jesuits, he had defamed the whole Society by the charges of regicide, murdering of infants, Sodomy, and such other abominable crimes (14). (14) Retraç. When a man publickly confesses himself guilty of calumny with regard to such crimes, he has no other course to take, but to hide himself for the remainder of his days. If he has any principles of conscience left, he ought to confine himself to some secret place, to do penance all his life-time. If he has no conscience, yet is not past all shame, he ought to avoid all company, and after the example of Bellerophon, the very prints of mens feet.

Ἄλλ' ὅτι δὴ κακίῳ ἀπήχθετο αἰῶσι θιῶν,

H'as

(9) Pag. 79.

(10) See the Apologie pour les Reformateurs. liv. c. 9. p. 154. and the Crit. General. Lettre 9. p. 137. 2d edit. (*) From the remarks printed at the end of the Paris edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary.

(11) Lettre de Jarrige au Sieur G. M. Marcband, à Leide, dated from Antwerp, May 8, 1650. It was printed at Leyden the same year, with an answer to it, of which I shall speak in the remark [F].

(12) Pag. 4.

(13) Lettre au Marcband de Leide.

pag. 79.

for the Reader's instruction I should correct his account a little [E]. In the Answers that were published to Jarrige's Recantation, it was asserted that his conduct had not been

(15) Homer. Iliad. lib. 6. ver. 300.

Ἥλος δὲ κακιστὸν τὸ Ἄλφειον εἶπε ἀλλ' ἄλλο, Ὅς θυμὸν καλῶν, πᾶσι τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ἀλείων (15).

That is,

" Being now odious to all the Gods, he wandered alone through the plains of Aleii (in Cilicia) devouring his own heart, and avoiding the very foot-steps of men."

(16) Lettre 34. to Chapelain, lib. 5. See Cicero, Tuscul. Quæst. lib. 3. folio 263. D.

It is then a man must practise, what Balsac said he would do for a much less considerable reason : I would go, said he (16), and eat my very heart in the deserts of Thebais ; Ipse cor meum edens, hominum vestigia vitans.

[E] The Historian, whom I have quoted, will not take it amiss . . . that I should correct his account a little.] Jarrige " was a turbulent and ambitious man, and his conversion was owing perhaps to the anger he conceived when he was disappointed in his hopes of being raised to the highest dignities in the Society, rather than to any real zeal for the truth. He abjured the Roman Catholic religion in the Consistory of Rochelle, on Christmas-day, after which he retired into Holland. This was the first wound of that kind the Society of the Jesuits received, not one person amongst them having forsaken the Roman Catholic religion before him. Or at least, if others had forsaken it, it did not make any noise abroad, either because the Jesuits out of prudence thought it not fit to blaze it out, or because the persons were too insignificant to complain of their forsaking the Society . . . (17). Jarrige disappeared soon after his book had been published, and the Jesuits boasted, that as he had left their Society only out of spite, he returned to it through repentance, and had confined himself to one of their Convents, in order to renounce the world, and to make penance all his life-time. But as he never appeared any where since, it was thought on the contrary, that the Jesuits found means to have him carried away, and that they revenged themselves secretly upon him for the vexation he gave them by changing his religion. And indeed, it is not to be imagined, that after they had made such an outcry upon his forsaking them, they would make no advantage of his return, nor carry him at least sometimes through those Provinces, in which his apostasy was known, in order to check the joy, which his conversion gave to the Reformed. And besides, we have had since that time other instances of what they are capable of doing against those, that forsake them ; it is well known, that they find means to carry them off out of their safest retreats, and that they make them atone, by long and heavy punishments, for the crime they committed by breaking their vows (18)." I shall make but three remarks upon this account.

(17) Hist. de l'Etat de Nantes, tom. 3. pag. 93.

(18) Ibid. pag. 94.

The Ist will be very short ; that author should not have made use of the word perhaps, with regard to the motives of Jarrige's conversion. It is plain that it was owing only to spite. Monsieur Spaenheim was fully persuaded of it from the very first conversation he had with him (19) ; and Jarrige's whole recantation favours of nothing else.

(19) Jarrige, Recantation, pag. 7.

CONCERNING Hafn-mullerus, an Ex-Jesuit, and his Historia Ordinis Jesuitici. (20) Taken from the preface which Polycarpus Likerus prefixed to Hafn-mullerus's work. (21) At Franckfort, in the year 1593, in 4to (22) Hafn-mullerus, qui fuit Jesuita, & scripsit Triumphum Pa-palem, habet multa bona Scaliger, in Scaligeranis posterioribus, pag. m. 105. It is not true that he is the author of the Triumphus

My Ild observation is, that this was not the first wound of that kind which the Society received, and the consequences of which made a great noise. A Jesuit named Elias Hafn-mullerus left his Order in the XVth Century, and turned Lutheran. He was a man who had very exactly observed all that could be said for or against that Society ; so that the Jesuits did all that lay in their power to seize him, lest he should publish an history of them. He was so happy as to avoid the snares they had laid for him, by hiding himself now in one place and then in another. But at last, the better to secure himself against all their attempts, he retired to Wittemberg in the year 1587 (20), where he employed his time in putting the finishing-hand to an History of the Jesuits, which he designed to publish ; but he died before he could send it to the press. His manuscript was published sometime after by Polycarpus Lyierus (21). It is a very smart piece against the Jesuits (22), and upon the whole more

Papalis, which is prefixed to his Historia Ordinis Jesuitici. Maximilian Philo is the author of it. This blunder of Scaliger is also offensive, than Jarrige's books, though perhaps it does not contain so many stories relating to particular persons. This work was received with great applause ; the Jesuits obliged James Gretserus to refute it, which gave rise to several works pro and con.

I have observed that Hafn-mullerus does not relate so many stories as Jarrige does ; but it is certain that in the chapter concerning the Vow of Chastity, he relates some that are very scandalous ; and, with a design, no doubt, to make the public more strongly condemn the lewd actions, which he accuses the Jesuits of, he expatiates upon several precautions, which he says the Jesuits take in order to strengthen themselves against those crimes. He asserts, that they take such food as mortifies and enervates the flesh ; that they recommend watching, fasting, lashing, and the wearing of an hair-cloth, to those that confess their temptations to them. In cibis & potu variis utuntur herbis & pharmacis, quibus nature vim enervant, & sobolem, ut ita dicam, intra viscera propria occidunt masculinam, & à Deo ordinate humane propagationis hostes. Si qui fratres in confessionibus conquiruntur de carnis infirmitate, flammis atque ustione, eam ut extinguant, ordinant illis vigiliis, jejuniis, cilicia, & flagella quibus carnem suam doment, confitent, & in servitutem, ut loquuntur, spiritus redigant (23). i. e. " For their meat and drink they use herbs and drugs, by which they enervate the strength of nature, and these man-haters, these enemies to the propagation of mankind established by God himself, do, if I may say so, kill their offspring in their own bowels. If any of the brethren complain in their confessions of the weakness of the flesh, of their flames, and burning, they command them, in order to extinguish that fire of lust, to watch, to fast, to wear an hair-cloth, and to lash themselves, that they may thereby subdue the flesh, and bring it into subjection to the spirit, as they use to speak." He adds, that there are some who labour to kindle and cherish in their soul a great hatred for the female sex. Nonnullos vidi qui nihil voluerunt edere, quod à muliere coctum sciebant. Alios dicentes audivi, quoties de femina cogito, toties stomachus meus & bilis commoventur & conturbantur. Alius dicebat, tædet pudetque me quod à muliere sum in banc lucem editus ; dignus certe cui vacca fuisset genitrix. Alii nihil prorsus boni in tota mulieris substantia esse dicunt, sique ex illis quidam cæteros in barum calumniarum palestra vincere conantur, illi ad mentionem mulieris expuunt, & in tabula maledicos, & in sexum sæmininum contumeliosos Mantuani versus (quos tamen is non nisi de malis cecinit) descriptos ob oculos ponunt, ut sic in scipissimajus in mulieres odium excitent (24). i. e. " I have seen some, who would not eat of any thing which they knew was dressed by a woman. I have heard others say, whenever I think of a woman, my stomach rises, and my blood is up : another said, it grieves me, and I am ashamed that a woman brought me into the world : he deserved indeed to have had a cow for his dam. Others again assert, that there is no good at all in the whole substance of a woman, and if there be some amongst them who pretend to excell above the rest in these calumnies against the fair sex, they spit at the bare mentioning of a woman, and they keep some slanderous verses, injurious to the female sex, composed by Baptist Mantuanus (which yet he intended only against the bad women) engraved on a plate, continually before their eyes, that they may thus perpetually stir up in themselves an hatred for the women." It appears from this passage, that all sorts of silly and extravagant notions can make their way to people's mind, under the auspices of a mistaken devotion. For can there be any thing more absurd, and more worthy of a mad-man, than the discourses of these people, My stomach turns, say they, my blood is up whenever I think of a woman. It grieves me, and I am ashamed that I owe my birth to a woman. I spit when I hear a woman mentioned. I have not met in Hafn-mullerus's work with a passage, which a modern author has quoted from it (25) ; he asserts that he read there, that a certain labourer, who worked in a Convent of the Jesuits, could never care for his wife, (23) Hafn-mullerus, Historia Ordinis Jesuitici, pag. 127. edit. Francof. 1605.

(24) Ibid. pag. 131.

(25) The author of the Polygamia triumphatrix. Here follows what we find there, pag. 130. Hafn-m. Historia Jes. c. 6. p. 99. ubi jocosam sed tamen veram historiam narrat de officio quodam, qui apud Jesuitas laborans, comedens, & bibens, uxori benevolentiam debitam non potuit reddere, sed apud alios vel aquam bibens vitrum se valuit præstare, eamque ob causam non voluit, ut amplius Jesuitis inferiret, nisi & postea Landsburgerse prohiberent in Bavaria, ne amplius cervicem apud Jesuitas emarent.

(17) Biblioth. Vetus & Nova, pag. 421. (b) J. Justum... serali peccate constitutum. It should have been Jesuitas.

been very edifying, whilst he acted the Protestant [F]. Konig (g) calls him Jarrichius, and pretends that he published The Jesuit upon the Scaffold in the year 1665 (b). There are three blunders here (*).

In the Oxford Catalogue they have mistaken him for another Jesuit, a work of whom is ascribed to him, and whose name was Peter Jarric.

(*) I. Jarrighius for Jarricus; II. The Jesuit, instead of the Jesuits; III. The year 1665, instead of 1650.

(26) A city in Bavaria.

though they gave him abundantly to eat and drink; and yet when he worked at other peoples houses, he could very well perform his nocturnal duty, though he drank nothing but water: wherefore his wife would not have him work any more in the Convent of the Jesuits, and afterwards the Magistrates of Landesberg (26) would not suffer any beer to be bought of them. If this beer had really that bad quality, the Magistrates did very well to prohibit it amongst the lay-men, for the conjugal duty is so much a privileged case, that several Casuists submit even the Canon-Law to it; they pretend that when fasting renders a man incapable to pay his wife what he owes her, he is ipso facto excused from fasting. See the margin (27).

(27) They are not obliged to fast, who when they fast cannot perform the conjugal duty. Emmanuel Sa. Aphorism. verbo Jejunium, num 9. Tolet. Instruct. Sacerdot. lib. 6. cap. 4. Thomas, 2 secunda Quest. 147. Art. 4. Du Moulin in the book of Traditiones, pag. m 343.

If the Jesuit Halenmullerus's conversion made a great noise, that of the Jesuit Reihing made still more noise (38). He is generally thought to have contributed to make the Duke of Newburg enter into the pale of the church of Rome. See the article REIHING. We have here then two remarkable conversions of Jesuits, which happened before that of Peter Jarrige. I say nothing of Daniel Peirol, Pastor of the church at Montauban, and Professor in the University of that city. He had been a Jesuit, and wrote something against Father Coton. I met with this particular in page 21 of Gilbert Voetius's Confraternitas Mariana.

(28) He turned Lutheran about the year 1621.

My III^d observation is, that Jarrige was not carried away by force; he retired of his own accord, being persuaded to it at the Jesuit Ponthelier's intigitation. This appears by the authentic pieces which have been printed; such is the letter he wrote to a Merchant at Leyden, and more still, his own recantation (29).

(29) See the remark [C] quotations (11), (12), and (13).

[F] His conduct was not very edifying, whilst he acted the Protestant. I have seen two answers to his recantation, the one was written by Ezekiel Dannois, of Compiègne, Minister of the Gospel; the other by John Nicolai, of Luxemburg, a Member of the French church at Amsterdam. In the Preface to this second answer, I read, that Peter Jarrige laboured in vain to be admitted a Minister before the four years tryal, which the Synod require of those, who forsake Idolatry, was expired. This tryal, says the author to him, "made you burst with anger, after the last denial you met with at the Synod of Haerlem, in which you were also accused (you know best in your own conscience, whether it was justly or not) of an action as shameful as those wickednesses, with which you charge the Jesuits of your Province, in order to expose them on a scaffold. And though that affair was not thoroughly examined at that time, because the witnesses were absent, yet the suspicions that were conceived against you have not been removed, considering the great knowledge and experience you seem to have in those things in your book against the Jesuits." The letter which the Merchant of Leiden wrote to him will explain all this; we meet in it with the following words. "You may remember with what spirit you was acted upon, when you returned from the Synod of Middelburg, in which you had so earnestly endeavoured to be dispensed from the order which is made, that no converted Roman Catholic be admitted to the holy Ministry (which you designed to invade, that you might give greater offence) till after a tryal of four years your petition being rejected, you shewed your presumption, pride, and vanity; and returning home, you happened to be in the night-time in the cabin of the boat with several women; and as you could not speak to them but by signs, you exposed your obscene parts before them by the light of the candle, which made them cry out so loudly against the wicked and abominable Priest, as they called you, that they awaked not only a faithful servant of God, who was there, but also all the passengers that were in the boat, who being alarmed by the womens outcry, run to their assistance, and having heard the whole story, would needs throw you into the water, which they had certainly done, had not that honest man appeased them: however the skipper promised solemnly that he would give an account of the whole story at the place whence you came."

(a) Sorel, Biblioth. Française, pag. 132. edit. 1667. Observe that the city mentioned by Sorel is Cognac.

JAVERSAC (N) was one of the authors that entered the list during the great controversy between Balzac and Father Goulu. He was born in a city pretty near Angoulême (a); he went to Paris with a Book against both Phyllarchus (b) and Narcissus (c), and intitled it Aristarque à Nicandre (Aristarchus to Nicander). His criticisms were very wrong in some particulars; as for instance, he asserted that one must say (in French) une Ruelle (a narrow lane, and also the bed-side) and not une Ruelle; un Livraire (a Bookfeller) and not un Libraire, because we say un Livre (a Book) and not un Libre. This new author was assaulted with sword and pistol at his Inn, and even whilst he was in bed. But as he was young and valiant, he took his sword, and pursued his enemy into the street, so that he had all the honour of that stout defence. Notwithstanding this, some persons took care to have this story cried the next day about the streets, quite otherwise than it really happened [A]. They published a libel intitled Le Defaite du Paladin Javersac par les allies & confederes du Prince des feuilles (d). i. e. "The Overthrow of the Knight

(b) It is the name which F. Goulu took.

(c) Thus F. Goulu called Balzac.

(*) This is what Phyllarchus signifies in Greek.

Errant Javersac by the Allies and Confederates of the Prince of the Leaves (*). I have been told by a man, who has a great deal of wit, that Balzac was the author of that piece, and that it is the best that was published about this controversy. The public found that there was a sacrilegious calumny in the title of that libel (e); for Father Goulu was charged there with the attempt committed notwithstanding the boldness of his profession.

(d) Sorel, Biblioth. Française, pag. 132.

(e) Iidem, ibid.

(1) It is a very small pamphlet containing but 16 pages in 8vo. It has been reprinted in the folio edition of Balzac's works, with other pieces written in his defence.

[A] This story was published quite otherwise than it happened] Never did two things differ more, than the account of this story as it is related by Sorel, differs from the account we read in the Defaite du Paladin Javersac (1). It is asserted in this pamphlet, that the Knight errant was of Cognac, where he had pleaded at the bar; that when his book was published, there was a wicked plot formed to assault him in the open street, but they were obliged to attack him in his own chamber, because he kept himself locked in all day long; that they surprized him in bed sleeping in the arms of his landlord's wife, on a thursday, August 11, 1628; that they waked him out of his sleep by a volley of battinadoes, which did not cease till the aggressor thought fit, for the Knight-errant did nothing but submit entirely to providence. The conclusion of the libel is, that Phyllarchus's friends, "being united in this with those of the other side, have sworn to exterminate all the Javersacs they shall meet with, and to let the bad Poets know, that besides the golden age, the brazen age, and the iron age, so often mentioned, there is still a wooden age to come, of which the antient Poets do not speak a word, and in the misfortunes and calamities of which the bad Poets will have a greater share than other men." I make use of the edition published in 1665 (2). See the following remark.

(2) That is the folio edition of Balzac's Works.

(f) See the last remark, quotation (14).

(g) Sorcel, Biblioth. Française, pag. 132.

cession. Javerfac cleared him of the charge, and laid it only upon Balzac (f), but considerate persons could neither accuse Phyllarchus nor Narcissus of it (g). However we know certainly, that it has been published (b), that Balzac being on his death-bed called to mind that in his younger days there happened something between him and Monsieur de Javerzac, upon which he sent one of his friends to that Gentleman's house, seven or eight leagues distant from Angoulême, desiring him to come to see him that he might have the pleasure of embracing him before he died. That he actually embraced him with an incredible transport of joy, and shewed him such a sincere love as agreeably banished from their mind the remembrance of their former quarrel. That Monsieur de Javerzac was so deeply affected with it, that he immediately, with tears in his eyes, composed a Sonnet, to lament for ever the loss of his friend.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary I have learnt some particulars, which I shall acquaint the reader with [B].

[B] I have learnt some particulars, which I shall acquaint the reader with.] The Sieur de Javerfac's book was printed and reprinted in the year 1628, with this title, Discours d'Aristarque à Nicandre, sur le jugement des esprits de ce temps, & sur les fautes de Phyllarque. i. e. "A discourse from Aristarchus to Nicander, concerning the judgment of the wits of this age, and concerning Phyllarchus's mistakes." The first thing we meet with in it is an advertisement from the printer. It contains nothing but falsities; for it is asserted there, that they were obliged to make use of a thousand artifices, in order to render the care, with which the author endeavoured to prevent the publication of his work, ineffectual. He was not so very fond of it, as willingly to expose it to the rage of envy. We meet next with an abusive letter, which he had written to Monsieur Bergeron, the King's Counsellor, and Referendary in Chancery. He shews a very great passion in that letter, because he supposed this Monsieur Bergeron had made objections against granting him a license for his book, that he might not have the advantage of being the first that published any thing concerning this controversy between Balsac and Father Goulu, and that la Motte Aignon might have time to be before-hand with him. We meet thirdly with his preface, in which he gives us an account of the great pains which his enemies took to stop the printing of this work. After all these pieces follows the book itself. This is not the only work which the Sieur de Javerfac published. The same year 1628, he presented the world with a Discours d'Aristarque à Calidoxe sur ce qui s'est passé entre lui & Balsac. i. e. "A discourse of Aristarchus to Calidoxus, concerning what passed between him and Balsac." The printing of it cost him an hundred crowns (3); nor could he find means to have it printed at Paris, neither with a license, nor otherwise. He asserts (4), that his father had been in several honourable deputations, and was raised to the most considerable employments in the assemblies of the reformed before the civil wars. . . . and (5) that he can prove by authentic records, that his ancestors acquired him a title to nobility, by their possessing a long while several considerable employments at the court of Navarre. He asserts also (6), that he had offered Balsac to give him satisfaction either as a gentleman or as a philosopher. He relates at length the misfortune that happened to him when he was assaulted in his bed (7). He avoided a little the blow which one of the three fellows, that entered the chamber, struck at him; but it is too glorious for me, says he (8), not to confess that he hit me on the arm, telling me, you was forbidden to write against Balsac. He adds (9), that his landlady was wounded in her little finger, and that he pursued them sword in hand into the street, and that two hundred witnesses, who saw him in his shirt on the threshold, had published it every where before-hand; that with his sword he thrust the man, who had struck him, in the breast, and that fifty persons, who saw his sword bend quite double, judge from it that the villain had a coat of mail on (10). He observes (11), that he had the honour, two or three days before, to be a second to a Marquis in a duel. And indeed I think that he was more proper to fight than to write books, and that he would soon have got the better of Balsac, in a dispute that must have been determined sword in hand. He lets fall from his pen very silly bravadoes against him (12), but he seems to be afraid lest his adversary should charge him with some amorous intrigues, in which he was engaged in his youth (13). Let us remember that he never suspected Father Goulu to be the author of the affront that was offered him. I do not know, says he (14), why Balsac should stand in fear of me, if he be not guilty, and if he think he can clear himself perfectly of that crime, by charging Phyllarchus with it, who has acted a much more generous part, and who has too good an opinion of his own wit to vindicate himself. I had such strong proofs against Balsac, and judged so well of Phyllarchus's honesty, that I never could suspect him in the least. He was, I think, much more angry with my book, than with my person.

Let us conclude with observing, that it is easy to know he was born an Huguenot, but not, whether or no he was one still; for the passage which I shall now quote is equivocal. After they had enquired where I lodged, and heard from my landlady that I lodged at her house, they asked her of what religion I was. She answered, that she did not know it, but that, however, I went often to church. It might very well have been declared upon oath, that there is not one Catholic, whose faith is more orthodox than mine is (15). The Sieur de Bergeron printed a letter against the imperinencies and falsities written by the Sieur de Javerfac, in a letter which he prefixed to a book, &c. (16). There was also published (17) a piece with this title, Le non passionné sur le Livre intitulé la Defaite du Palladin Javerfac. i. e. "The impartial judge concerning a book intitled 'the defeat of the knight-errant.'" This piece is infinitely more favourable to the knight than to his adversary. But as for the book intitled, Achates à Polemon pour la Defense de Phyllarque (18). i. e. "Achates to Polemon, in defence of Phyllarchus;" it cuts Javerfac in pieces. I have quoted a passage from it in the remark of the article ARTABANUS IV (19).

JENISCHIUS (PAUL) was born at Antwerp June the 17th 1558, and died at Stugart December the 18th 1647. He was a learned man, and understood several languages. His book intitled Theaurus Animarum, (The Treasure of Souls) drew a heavy persecution upon him; he was banished, and his banishment continued above fifty years. He suffered it very patiently, and enjoyed a very good health till the last year of his life; eating and sleeping well (a), and applying himself to Music, which he understood in perfection, and to the study of the holy Scriptures, and to Mechanics. He had nineteen children, of whom there were but four alive when he died. The last year of his life his health was very much impaired, and he expired in very violent pains (b). The Bibliographers of the Low-Countries knew nothing of him.

JENKIN (ROBERT), a learned English Divine, in the beginning of the eighteenth Century, was son of Mr Thomas Jenkin of Minster in the Isle of Thanet in Kent, and born there, and baptized January the 31st 1656. He was educated at King's

(a) Perpetua animi tranquillitate & corporis valetudine firma cum orexi & suavi somno usq. Joh. Valentinus Andreas, Epist. 190.

(b) Morisier, in his Account of Balzac's death. It is printed in the folio edition of Balzac's works.

(10) Ibid. pag. 185.

(11) Ibid. pag. 198.

(12) See especially pag. 198.

(13) Ibid. pag. 201.

(14) Ibid. pag. 199.

(15) Ibid. pag. 176.

(16) It was written to Monsieur Balzac, and printed in the year 1628.

(17) In the year 1628.

(18) Printed that same year.

(19) See also the article MUSAC.

(b) Taken from the 190th Letter of John Valentinus Andreas.

King's School at Canterbury; and from thence sent to St. John's College in the University of Cambridge, of which he was afterwards chosen Fellow. He was made Chaplain to Dr. John Lake, who was translated from the See of Bristol to that of Chichester in 1685; and in 1688 promoted by him to the Præcentorship of that Church, which he soon vacated by refusing to take the Oaths to King William and Queen Mary. In 1711, upon the death of Dr. Humphrey Gower, Master of St. John's College, he was elected Master in his room, and likewise Lady Margaret's Professor of Divinity; which places he held to the time of his death, which happened April the 7th 1727 (a). He wrote several works [A].

(a) History and Antiquities as well Ecclesiastical as Civil of the Isle of Tenth in Kent. By John Lewis, M. A. pag. 40. 2d edit. London 1736 in 4to.

[A] He wrote several works.] I. An historical Examination of the Authority of General Councils; showing the false dealing, which hath been used in the publishing of them; and the difference among the Papists themselves about their Number. 1688, in 4to. II. The Reasonableness and Certainty of the Christian Religion, two Volumes in 8vo. 3d Edit. 1708. III. Defensio S. Augustini adversus Joannis Pbereponi in ejus opera Animadversiones, Cambridge 1707, in 8vo. There was a second Edition printed at London 1728, in 8vo. This book is written against Monsieur Le Clerc, whom our author complains of for having treated the fathers, and especially St. Austin, with severity, tho' he allows Monsieur Le Clerc to be a man of no small or contemptible abilities: Mibi profecto est nec amore nec odio, sed scriptis solis cognitus: in ipso autem non exiguas nec contemnendas dotes agnosco. IV. Remarks on some Books lately published, viz. Mr. Bafnage's History of the Jews: Mr. Whitton's Eight Sermons: Mr. Lock's Paraphrase and Notes on St. Paul's Epistles: Mr. Le Clerc's Bibliothéque Choise, London 1709, in 8vo. V. He translated the Life of Apollonius Tyanæus, written in French by Monsieur Tillemont. H:

JEWEL (JOHN) a learned English Writer and Bishop in the sixteenth Century, was son of John Jewel Gent. and was born at Bowden or Buden in the Parish of Berrierber in Devonshire May the 24th 1522 (a). In July 1535 he was sent to the University of Oxford, and entered into Merton College (b) under the tuition of Mr. John Parkhurst, afterwards Bishop of Norwich. August the 19th 1539 he was admitted Scholar of Corpus Christi College; and on the 20th of October 1540 took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (c). Being now in the capacity of taking Pupils, many resorted to him, whom he mostly instructed privately in Protestant principles, and publicly in Humanity Studies, being chosen Rhetoric Reader in his College (d). January the 28th 1544 he took the degree of Master of Arts (e). His life during his residence in the College was so exemplary, that Mr. Moren, Dean of the College, used to say to him: I should love thee, Jewel, if thou wert not a Zuinglian; in thy Faith I hold thee a Heretic; but surely in thy life thou art an Angel. Thou art very good and honest, but a Lutheran (f). Upon the death of King Henry VIII he openly declared himself a Protestant, and upon Peter Martyr's coming to Oxford, he frequented his lectures and sermons, and was Notary to that Divine, when he disputed in the Divinity-Schools with Chedsey, Tresham, Morgan, and others, about the Real Presence (g). In 1550 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (h); and became a zealous promoter of the Reformation, and a Preacher and Catechiser at Sunningwel near Abingdon in Berkshire (i). Upon the accession of Queen Mary to the Crown in July 1553, he was one of the first who felt the rage of the storm then raised against the Reformation; for before any law was made, or order given by the Queen, he was expelled the College by the Fellows, by their own private authority (k) [A]: upon this he retired to Broad-gate's Hall, (now Pembroke College) where he continued some time, and the fame of his learning drew many scholars to him. He was likewise chosen Orator to the University [B]. He

(a) See his Life prefixed to his Works, and to his Apology; and Prince's Worthies of Devon, pag. 418.

(b) Prince, ubi supra.

(c) Wood, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 63. 2d edit.

(d) Idem, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 169.

(e) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(f) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(g) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(h) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(i) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(j) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(k) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(f) Prince, pag. 419.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) Wood, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 75.

(i) Prince, ubi supra, and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 169.

(k) Fuller's Church History of Britain, B. 8. pag. 8. and Prince, ubi supra, pag. 419.

continued

[A] Expell'd the college by the fellows, by their own private authority.] They had nothing to object against him, but, 1. His following of Peter Martyr. 2. His preaching some doctrines contrary to Popery. 3. His taking orders according to the laws then in force (1). 4. His refusal to be present at mass, and other Popish solemnities (2). At his departure he took leave of the college in a Latin speech, full of pathetic eloquence: "I have often, says he, heretofore upon divers occasions, if not with so good success as I wished, yet with most ardent affection and desire of good, spoken unto you out of this place. But now, thro' the iniquity of the times, things are brought to this pass, that I am to speak only this at the last, that I must speak no more unto you. I have incurred, I see, some mens implacable hatred; but how deservedly, God knows, and let them look to it. This I am sure of, that they who would not have me stay here, would suffer me to live no where. I yield to the time; and if they take any delight in my misery, I hinder them not. What Aritides prayed before he went into banishment, that I pray of Almighty God, that no man may think of me when I am gone; and can they desire more?" Here his tears could no longer be restrained; at last he proceeded thus: "Pardon me, if it do grieve me to leave the place,

"where I have been brought up, where I have lived hitherto, where I have been in some place of reckoning. But why do I stick to kill my heart with one word? Alas! that I must speak it, as with grief I must. Valeant studia, valeant hæc te&ta, valeat sedes cultissima literarum, valeat jucundissimus conspectus vestri; valete juvenes, valete socii, valete fratres, valete oculi mei, valete omnes mei."

[B] He was likewise chosen Orator to the university.] This we are informed of by Mr. Prince (3). And we find that in the beginning of Queen Mary's reign he was employed to write in the name of the university, the first congratulatory letter to her Majesty. Wood informs us (4), that this task was evidently imposed upon Mr. Jewel by those who meant him no kindness; for it was taken for granted, that he must either provoke the Roman Catholics, or lose the good opinion of his party. But he was so dexterous in his composition, as to escape the snare. The address being both respectful and guarded, passed the approbation of Tresham the Commissary (5), and some other Doctors, and was well received by the Queen. Epistolam quandam gratulatoriam transmittendam decrevere seduliorum prepositi, Magistro Johanni Jewel, Collegii Corporis Christi Socio, id negotii demandantes. Hoc hostili in virum animo factum liquet, quem utique munere illo fungi non aliter posse sponderent, quam ut vel Pontificiorum exacerbarer,

(1) Prince's Worthies of Devon, pag. 419.

(2) Fuller, Church History of Britain, B. 8. pag. 8.

(3) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(4) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(5) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 69.

(3) Ubi supra, pag. 420.

(4) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 274, 275. See likewise Fuller, Church History, B. 8. pag. 6.

(5) Commissario. Mr. Collier in his Ecclesiast. II. cry. Part 2. B. 5. pag. 240. has erroneously rendered this word Vice Cancellor.

continued so long at Oxford, till he was called upon to subscribe to some of the Popish doctrines under the severest penalties; which he submitted to. However this did not procure his safety; for Dr. Martial, Dean of Christ Church, who had changed his Religion twice already, as he afterwards did twice or thrice more in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (l), had certainly caught him in a snare laid for him, had he not gone that very night he was sent for, a wrong way to London. In this journey, one Augustin Berner, a Swiss, first a servant of Bishop Latimer, and afterwards a Minister, found him lying upon the ground, almost dead with weariness and cold; and setting him upon an horse, (for Mr. Jewel, though lame, made his escape on foot) conveyed him to the Lady Anne Warcup's a widow, who entertained him for some time, and then sent him up to London. Having twice or thrice changed his lodgings in London, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, a man of great distinction and in considerable offices at that time, furnished him with money for his journey, and procured him a ship to convey him beyond sea. He arrived at Francfort in the beginning of the second year of Queen Mary's reign, where he made a public recantation of his subscription to the Popish doctrines. Thence he went to Straßburg, and afterwards to Zurich, whither he attended Peter Martyr, in whose house he resided. During this time it is probable, that he made an excursion to Padua, where he contracted a friendship with Signior Scipio, a Venetian Gentleman, to whom he afterwards addressed his Epistle concerning the Council of Trent (m). After Queen Mary's death he returned to England in 1558, and was soon after employed with some others in a disputation at Westminster against the Papists; and deputed by the Queen to visit the western parts of England in order to root out Popery there (n). About this time he wrote a letter to Henry Bullinger concerning the state of Religion in England [C]. January the 21st 1559 he was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury (o). His writings have rendered his name famous over all Europe [D]. He was created Doctor of Divinity May the 26th 1565 (p). He died at Monketon-Farley September the 23d 1571

(l) Life of Bishop Jewel, prefixed to his Apology, printed in 1585, pag. 11.

(m) Ibid. and Prince, pag. 420, 421.

(n) Prince, pag. 422.

(o) Godwin, de Praesulibus Angliae, in Episcopis Sarisburienfis.

(p) Wood, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 96.

cerbarct, vel suorum à se mentes alienaret. Verum spes eos egregie fefellit, utriusque enim dubio quodam & obscuro scribendi genere sustulit Jewellus, & epistolam à Tresbamo Commissario ac Doctoribus nonnullis prius approbatam, grate admodum accepit Maria.

[C] About this time he wrote a letter to Henry Bullinger at Zurich, concerning the state of religion in England. In this letter, dated May 22, 1559, he returns Bullinger thanks for his favours in Germany, and for the letters which he had lately written to encourage the English Divines to stand firm for the truth. He observes, "That arguments for resolution were very necessary at the present juncture. That the reformed in England had not only their old antagonists, but their late friends to encounter. That these latter had deserted the cause, joined the enemy. and made a more vigorous and obstinate resistance than any of the rest. And what gives us, says he, most trouble, we have the remainder of the Spanish vices, luxury, pride, and libertinism to contend with. As yet our fortunes are unrestored, and we are little better for returning to our country. But we hope our affairs will mend shortly; for the Queen is a prudent and religious Princess, and inclined to favour us. Religion is recovered to the same foot, in which it stood in the reign of King Edward VI. And I am satisfied the letters sent hither by yourself and your republic, had a considerable weight in this matter. The Queen will not endure the style of head of the Church. She is altogether of opinion, that this title is too great for any mortal, and ought to be given to none but Christ. And besides, it has been so horribly abused by the Pope, that it is scarcely consistent with a good conscience for any person to make use of it. The Scottish Presbyterians called this distinction a blasphemous Title, when used either by Popes or Princes. Their argument is this: The Church, say they, is the Spouse of Christ. No Spouse can be said to have any other head, but him whose Spouse she is. Now if the Church should acknowledge herself to be the Spouse of any other but Christ, she would be a professed Adulteress. To return, our universities are in a lamentable Condition, and almost quite lost to all sense of orthodoxy. There are not now above two in Oxford of our sentiment, and those so far dispirited as to be of no use. Thus Friar Soto, and another Spanish Monk, have entirely destroyed Peter Martyr's plantation, and made a mere wilderness of the Lord's vineyard. You can scarcely imagine that so great a ravage and desolation of principles could have happened in so short a time. And

"tho' I should be glad to see any thing from Zurich in England, yet I would not advise you to send any young travellers hither at present, unless you would have them come home with less learning, and a worse belief." The rest of the letter relates either to private persons, or business of the state.

[D] His learned writings have rendered his name famous over all Europe. They are as follow, I. Exhortatio ad Oxonienses (7). II. Exhortatio in Collegio Corporis Christi, sive Concio in Fundatoris Foxi Commemorationem (8). III. Concio in Templo B. Mariae Virg. Oxon. Ann. 1550, in Pet. 4. 11. This sermon was preached for his Degree of Bachelor of Divinity. It is reprinted in Dr. Laurence Humphrey's Life of him, p. 49. and it was translated into English by R. V. and printed at London 1586, in 8vo. IV. Oratio in Aula Collegii Corporis Christi (9). This speech was made to this society, when he was obliged to leave them in 1554. V. Epistola ad Scipionem Patritium Venetum de Causis cur Episcopi Angliae ad Concilium Tridentinum non convenirent, Ann. 1559. It is reprinted in an Appendix to the second edition of Sir Nathaniel Brent's translation of the History of the Council of Trent, London 1629, in folio. Signior Scipio, a noble Venetian, with whom our author had contracted an acquaintance at Padua, had written a letter to him, in which he observed, that himself, and many others, were extremely surpris'd, that the English took no notice of the Council of Trent, nor sent any representatives, nor excus'd their absence by letters. "That they had made a sudden alteration in religion, and taken leave in a manner of every thing, which had been for so many years established. That as far as he could judge, this looked like pride in the management, and schism in the issue. That it was a most unwarrantable neglect to set aside the Pope's authority, and not appear at the Council upon his summons. That it was not lawful to discuss matters of religion elsewhere. That at such general assemblies the Patriarchs and Bishops might be consulted. Here the learning of Christendom and the flower of the Church was to be met with. This was the place where people might expect the Oracles of truth, and the resolutions of the Holy Ghost. That when any controversy happened about the worship of God, it had been the custom of pious Princes to refer the matter to a public assembly of the Bishops. That the Apostles and Primitive Fathers esteem'd councils as the best expedient for discovering truth, and settling controversies. By this means the heresies of Arius and Eunomius, of Eutyches, of Macedonius, and Pelagius, were suppressed. And thus the modern differences

(6) Bibliotheca Tigurina, pag. 134. and Collier, ubi supra, Part 2. B. 6. pag. 432.

(7) Vide Laurent. Humfredum in Vita Johanna Juelli, pag. 35. edit. 1573, in 4to.

(8) Ibid. pag. 45, 46, &c.

1571 in the fiftieth year of his age, and was interred almost in the middle of the choir of his Cathedral at Salisbury (q). With regard to his person, he was of a thin habit of body, which he exhausted by his intense application to his studies, which occasioned a cold

(q) Godwin, supra.

“ferences might be agreed, and the breaches in the Church made up, if the parties would lay down animosities, and apply to this remedy. But that to go about adjusting of these matters without the decision of a Council, is an irreligious attempt.” To this letter our author returned a large and solemn answer, wherein he takes notice, “That the English were not the only nation which declined coming to Trent; since the Patriarchs of Constantinople, Antioch, and Alexandria, stood off; and the Church of the Abyssines, the Greeks, and Armenians, the Christians in Egypt and Barbary, in Persia and India, sent no body to appear at the Council. And for instance in Europe; did the Crowns of Sweden and Denmark, says he, the Princes of Germany, the Republics of Swisserland, the Kingdom of Scotland, to mention no more, comply with the summons? And since so many other countries are not represented at Trent, it is somewhat odd to wonder at the English. And besides, the Pope himself does not appear at a Synod of his own convening. This ought to be esteemed a strange omission.” Our author goes on with his objections and remonstrances against the Council, because it was convened by the Pope, and not by the Emperor. He supposes, that Trent was not large enough to accommodate such numbers as were necessary. He observes, that the English Bishops were employed in instructing and governing their charge, and could not be absent from their dioceses without deserting their function in some measure. That the present Pope Pius IV. made his way to the chair by Simony, and bribing the Cardinals. That instead of paying his debts to Cardinal Caraffa, who procured him a majority, he confined that Prelate, and dispatched him in prison. That the ancient Fathers declined coming to Councils, when they had reason to believe them to be packed and prejudiced against them. Thus St. Athanasius refused to come to the Council of Sirmium; and St. Chrysostom took no notice of the Synod sub quercu; neither could Paulinus, Bishop of Triers, appear at the Council of Milan, where he foresaw that every thing would be carried in favour of the Arrians. That the Fathers of Trent had pre-engaged themselves to the Pope, and sworn away their freedom in voting. Lastly he wonders, “That the Pope should summon the English to the Council, who had been already pronounced heretics by his predecessors. What character should they appear under? It was not probable, that the Council would allow them the common privilege, considering the censure passed on their doctrine. What then must they take so long a journey to be set at the bar, and plead as criminals? By this method they could expect nothing more, but either to recant, or have the censure repeated upon them. But to stand to the Pope’s justice, when they had such weighty exceptions to his authority, was more than they could submit to.” VI. Letters between him and Dr. Henry Cole, upon occasion of a Sermon that Mr. Jewel preached before the Queen’s Majesty, and her Honourable Council, London 1560, in 8vo. This letter-combat began March 18, 1559, and continued till May 18, 1560. VII. A Sermon preached at St. Paul’s Cross the second Sunday before Easter, Ann. 1560. on 1 Cor. xi. 23. London 1560, in 8vo. From this text he took occasion to make a remarkable challenge in defence of the Reformation. The Church of England was reproached with novelty by the Papists, and charged with departing from the primitive doctrine. In answer to this charge, the Bishop defended the Protestant cause from the Scriptures and Fathers, adding this solemn protestation; “That if any learned man of all our adversaries, or if all the learned men that be alive, are able to shew any one sufficient sentence out of any old Catholic Doctor or Father, or out of any old General Council, or out of the Holy Scriptures of God, or any one example of the Primitive Church, whereby it may be clearly and plainly proved, that there was any private mass in the world for the space of six hundred years after Christ, or that the Sacrament of the Lord’s Supper

“was ever administered to the people under one kind, or that the people then had their Common Prayers in a strange tongue, that they understood not, or that the Bishop of Rome was then called an universal Bishop, or the head of the universal Church, or that the people were taught to believe that Christ’s body is really, substantially, corporeally, carnally, or naturally in the Sacrament; or that his body is or may be in above a thousand places at one time, or that the Priest did then hold up the Sacrament over his head, or that the people did then fall down and worship it with Divine honour, or that then the Sacrament was hanged up under a canopy, or that in the Sacrament, after words of consecration, there remained only the accidents or shew, without the substance of bread and wine, or that the Priest then divided the Sacrament in three parts, and after received all alone himself, or that whosoever had then said, that the then Sacrament is a pledge, token, or remembrance of Christ’s body, had therefore been judged for an heretic, or that it was then lawful to have thirty, twenty, fifteen, or five masses said in one day, or that images were then set up in churches, that the people might worship them, or that the lay-people were then forbidden to read the word of God in their own language; if any man alive can prove any one of these articles, by any one clear or plain clause or sentence of Scripture, antient Fathers, or any one General Council, or any example of the Primitive Church, I here promise, that I will give over my opinion, and subscribe to him. Yea, I further promise, that if any of all our adversaries be able clearly and plainly to prove, in manner aforesaid, that it was then lawful for a Priest to pronounce the words of Consecration closely and in silence to himself, or that the Priest had then authority to offer up Christ unto his Father, or to receive the Sacrament for another, as they now do, or apply the virtue of Christ’s Death and Passion to any man by means of the mass, or that then it was thought a sound doctrine to teach the people, that the mass ex opere operato is able to remove our sins, or that any Christian man called the Sacrament his Lord and God, or that the people were then taught to believe, that the body of Christ remaineth in the Sacrament so long as that bread remaineth without corruption, or that a mouse, worm, or other creature may eat the body of Christ, or that ignorance is the mother of devotion: as I said before, so say I now again, if any of them can clearly prove any of these things in the manner aforesaid, I promise to yield and subscribe unto him. Indeed they have long boasted of antiquity, &c. but when they are put to their proofs, they can produce nothing. I speak not this out of arrogancy, (thou Lord knowest it; that knowest all things) but because it is in the cause of God, and for asserting his truth, I should do God great injury, if I should conceal it.” This challenge made a great noise, and the Papists thought themselves obliged to answer it. Dr. Henry Cole wrote several letters to him upon this subject (9). John Rastell, a Jesuit, published likewise, A Confutation of a Sermon pronounced by Mr. Jewel at Paul’s Cross, Antwerp 1564. The Bishop was likewise attacked by Dorman, in his Proof of certain Articles of Religion denied by Mr. Jewel, Antwerp 1564, in 4to, and his Request to Mr. Jewel, that he keep his Promise made by a solemn Protestation in his late Sermon at St. Paul’s Cross, 15 June 1567, London 1567, in 8vo. And by Martial. But the former of these was answered by Dr. Alexander Nowel, in his Reproof of a Book intituled, A Proof of certain Articles in Religion denied by Mr. Jewel, set forth by Tho. Dorman, London 1565, in 4to; and his Reproof of Mr. Dorman’s Proof continued, &c. London 1566, in 4to. The latter was answered by his Answer to John Martial’s Treatise of the Cross, London 1565, in 4to. But the Bishop’s most considerable antagonist was Mr. Thomas (10) Hardyng, who published, An Answer to Mr. Jewel’s Challenge, Louvain 1564, in 4to. Upon this Bishop Jewel published, VIII. A Reply to Mr. Hardyng’s Answer; by perusing whereof the discreet and

(9) Wood, Art. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 197.

(10) Mr. Collier in his Eccles. History, Part 2. B. 6. pag. 462. erroneously calls him John.

cold that was the cause of his lameness, which affected him to his death. Notwithstanding this, most of his journies in Germany as well as in England were undertaken on foot, till he became a Bishop. He was of a pleasant and affable temper. He had naturally a very strong memory, which he greatly improved by art; so that he could exactly repeat whatever he had written after once reading; and therefore generally at the ringing of the bell he began to commit his sermons to his memory; which was so firm, that he used to say, that if he were to deliver a premeditated speech before a thousand auditors, shouting or fighting all the while, yet he could say all that he had provided to speak. And so quick was it in receiving, that when the Bishop of Norwich proposed to him many barbarous words out of a Kalendar, and Hooper Bishop of Gloucester forty strange words, Welsh, Irish, and foreign terms, he after once or twice reading at the most, and a little recollection repeated them all by heart backward and forward. Another time when Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal read to him only the last clauses of ten lines in Erasmus's Paraphrase confused and dismembered on purpose, he sitting silent a while, and covering his face with his hand, on the sudden rehearsed all those broken parcels of sentences the right way, and the contrary, without any hesitation. He professed to teach others this art, and taught it his tutor Parkhurst beyond the seas; and in a short time learned all the Gospel forward and backward. He was a great master of the antient languages, and skilled in the German and Italian. He was a constant Preacher, greatly charitable, an encourager of learning, and a regular Conformist [E].

IGNATIUS

and diligent Reader may easily see the weak and unstable Grounds of the Romish Religion in 27 Articles, London 1566, in fol. This was translated into Latin by William Whitaker, Fellow of Trinity College in Cambridge, and printed at Geneva 1585, in fol. with our author's Apologia Ecclesie Anglicanae. Mr. Hardyng wrote, in answer to this Reply, A Rejoinder to Mr. Jewel's Reply; by perusing whereof the discreet and diligent Reader may easily see the Answer to his insolent Challenge justified, and his Objections against the Mass, &c. Antwerp 1566, in a thick quarto. And, Another Rejoinder to Mr. Jewel's Reply against the Sacrifice of the Mass, Louvain 1567, in 4to. IX. Apologia Ecclesie Anglicanae, London 1562, in 8vo. It was several times printed in England and abroad, and translated into Greek, and printed at Oxford 1614, in 8vo. It was also translated into English, by the Lady Bacon, wife to Sir Nicholas Bacon, soon after the publication of it, and printed under this title, An Apology, or Answer in Defence of this Church of England, concerning the State of Religion used in the same, London 1562, in 4to. This Apology was approved by the Queen, and set forth with the consent of the Bishops. It is a defence of the English Reformation, with a brief declaration of the religion professed in the Church of England. It is written with great learning, clearness, and strength, and with a peculiar elegance of style. It was well received by the Protestants abroad, as appears from a letter of Peter Martyr to our Bishop, in which he informs him, that himself, Bullinger, and other Divines had read it with prodigious satisfaction. Mr. Wood observes (11), "That the Council of Trent, held at that time, saw and censured it, and appointed a Frenchman and an Italian to answer it; but they hung back, and would, or rather could, not answer it." Mr. Thomas Hardyng published A Confutation of it, printed at Antwerp 1563, in 4to. Upon this the Bishop wrote, X. A Defence of the Apology of the Church of England, containing an Answer to a certain Book lately set forth by Mr. Hardyng, and intitled, A Confutation, &c. in six Parts, London 1564, 1567, in folio. Translated into Latin by Thomas Braddock, B. D. and Fellow of Christ's College in Cambridge, and printed abroad in 1600, in folio. In answer to the Bishop's Defence, Mr. Hardyng published A Detection of several foul Errors, Lyes, Slanders, &c. uttered and practised by Mr. Jewel, in a Book by him set forth, intitled, A Defence of the Apology, &c. Louvain 1564, in 4to. Upon this the Bishop wrote, XI. An Answer to Mr. Hardyng's Book, intitled, A Detection of certain Errors, &c. London 1565. XII. A View of a seditious Bull sent into England from Pius the Fifth, Bishop of Rome, ann. 1569. Delivered in certain Sermons in the Cathedral Church of Sarum, 1570. London 1582, in 8vo. XIII. A Treatise of the Holy Scriptures, gathered out of the Sermons preached at Salisbury, 1570. London 1582, in 8vo. XIV. Exposition on the two Epistles of the Apostle St. Paul to the Thessalonians, London 1594, in 8vo. XV. A Treatise of the Sacraments, gathered out of his Sermons, London 1583, in

8vo. XVI. Certain Sermons preached before the Queen's Majesty at Paul's Cross, and elsewhere. There are 13 in number. All these books, (except the first five abovementioned) with the Sermons and Apology, were printed in one volume in folio at London 1609, with an Abstract of his Life, but full of faults, (says Mr. Wood) written by Daniel Featly. Besides these writings, he left in manuscript, A Paraphratical Exposition of the Epistles and Gospels throughout the whole Year: A continue Exposition of the Creed, Lord's Prayer, and Ten Commandments: A Commentary upon the Epistle of the Galatians, and on the Epistle of St. Peter. In 1641 there was printed in his name at London, in one sheet in quarto, An Answer to certain frivolous Objections against the Government of the Church of England. He wrote likewise a Dialogue, in which he comprehended the sum of the Art of Rhetoric (12).

[E] A regular conformist. Dr. Laurence Humfrey, in the Life of our Bishop, has endeavoured to represent him a favourer of the Non-conformists. But it is certain, that he opposed them in his exile, when they began their disputes at Franckfort; and in a sermon of his preached at Paul's Cross, not long before his death, and printed among his Works in 1609, he defended the rites and ceremonies of the Church against them. He had likewise a conference with some of them concerning the ceremonies of the present state of the Church, which he mentioned with such vigour, that tho' upon his death-bed he professed, that neither his sermon nor conference were undertaken to please any mortal man, or to trouble those who thought differently from him; yet the Puritans could not forbear shewing their resentments against him (13). It was strange to me, says Dr. Whitgift (14), to hear so notable a Bishop, so learned a man, so stout a champion of true religion, so painful a Prelate, as Bishop Jewel, so ungratefully and spitefully used by a sort of wicked tongues. He is supposed likewise to have been the author of a paper, intitled, A brief and lamentable Consideration of the Apparel now used by the Clergy of England, written in the year 1566. His address to the Non-conformists in the cloise is very remarkable; "Do not suffer Satan, says he, to perplex your consciences. Throw up your contest, and make for unity. Be not ashamed to repent, nor afraid of losing your credit with the people. We are commanded to go to Nineveh, and denounce the judgment of God. Instead of this, we desert our business, and lie idle in the hold. This misbehaviour draws the storm upon us; and unless Jonas repents, the ship is in danger of being lost. You have churches; why do ye quit them, and run to field-conventicles? You have public places to officiate in; what makes you affect private meetings? You have the Christian Religion preached to you in its original purity; what reason then can ye have to be disgusted? Are not the Holy Scriptures read to you? Have ye not the liberty of perusing them at pleasure? And is not Popery discharged? As for those, who conform to the habit, were they not banished

(12) Prince's Works, pag. 424.

(13) Prince, ubi supra, pag. 426.
(14) Answer to the Admonition, pag. 423.

(11) Ant. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 171.

IGNATIUS, the Founder of the Jesuits. See LOYOLA.

“ for their orthodoxy? And did they not give up “ their fortune with all the resignation imaginable?
 “ Who takes more pains in preaching? Who writes
 “ to better purpose? Who manages with more vigi“ lance and vigour in their respective stations than

“ these men? You talk of reformation, but they “ practise it. If you love Christ, feed his sheep, and “ do not quarrel in his vineyard. Let us help to bear
 “ one another's burthens, love our brethren, and not “ disturb the public repose.” T.

ILLYRICUS (MATTHIAS FLACIUS) one of the most learned Divines of the Augsbuurg Confession, was born at Albona in Istria (a) March the 3d 1520. He studied the Belles Lettres at Venice under Egnatius, and having from his seventeenth year a strong inclination to study Divinity, he resolved to be a Monk, because he wanted money to maintain himself in the Universities, and therefore the only means he had to satisfy his inclination was by studying in a monastery. He acquainted a Provincial of the Cordeliers, who was his mother's relation, with his design. This Provincial, who began already to have a taste for the Reformation [A], advised him to go into Germany, and not to shut himself up in a convent. Flacius followed that advice, and arrived at Basil in the year 1539 [B]. Having continued there a few months he went to Tubingen, whence he removed to Wittemberg in the year 1541, and studied there under Luther and Melanchthon. He got a livelihood by teaching Greek and Hebrew. Having acquainted Pomeranius, and afterwards Luther with the temptations that disturbed his mind concerning sin, God's wrath, and predestination, he was publicly prayed for at church, and they afforded him all the comfort which the holy Scriptures furnish us with, so that his mind was soon easy. Melanchthon gave him a thousand proofs of his good nature and generosity: they found a wife for him, and gave him some employment in the University in the year 1544 (b). All the schools in Saxony having been dispersed by the war, Flacius went to Brunswick, where he gained a great reputation by his Lectures. He returned to his former employment at Wittemberg in the year 1547, and soon after he strongly opposed the Interim, and all the prudent and discreet methods, which Melanchthon hinted were proper to be followed; and that he might be more at liberty to exclaim against Popery, without regard for any body, he retired (c) to Magdeburg, which town was at that time proscribed by the Emperor. He published there several works, but the most considerable of them is certainly that Ecclesiastical History, which was called the Centuries of Magdeburg, and of which he had the chief direction. He accepted the post that was offered him in the new University of Iena in the year 1557, and taught there five years; after which, as he could not agree with his collegue Victorinus Strigelius [C], he

(a) A part of the Country, which was anciently called Illyrium or Illyria; hence it is, that Matthias Flacius was surnamed Illyricus. It is not true, as Melchior Adam, and several others assert, that he was born in Sclavonia.

(b) Micrælius therefore is mistaken who makes him Professor at Wittemberg as soon as the year 1540. Synagm. Hist. Eccl. pag. m. 751.

(1) Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 478. See also Verheiden, in Effigies, pag. 157.

(2) In Effigies, pag. 157.

(3) Addit. aux Elog. tom. 1. pag. 471.

(4) In the year 1560 according to Micrælius, Synagm. Hist. Eccl. pag. m. 827, 828. But according to Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theolog. Germ. pag. 420. it was in 1557.

(5) Spondanus, ad ann. 1560, num. 32.

(6) See Micrælius, Synagm. Hist. Eccl. pag. m. 827, 828.

REFLECTIONS ON FLACIUS'S opinion concerning the nature of sin.

[A] This Provincial, who began already to have a taste for the Reformation. He deserves a place in the Martyrology of the Protestants, since after he had suffered during twenty years great hardships in goal, because he was suspected of heresy, he was thrown into the sea. His name was Baldus Lupatinus. Baldus autem iste, ut hoc in exordio addamus, paulo post in suspicionem hæreses venit: ac Venetiis viginti ipsos annos situm squaloremque carceris, tandem in mari summersus supplicium fortiter portavit (1). i. e. “ This Baldus, to add this by the by, was soon after suspected of heresy; and having suffered great hardship in goal at Venice during twenty years, he was at last cast into the sea, and underwent his punishment with a great courage.”

[B] He arrived at Basil in the year 1539. He was therefore nineteen years old at that time. Whence it follows that Verheiden (2) is mistaken, when he asserts that Illyricus was seventeen years old when he went to Basil. Monsieur Teissier (3) has followed Verheiden's account.

[C] He could not agree with his Collegue Victorinus Strigelius. They were of different opinions concerning the conversion of man, and concerning the power of free-will. They disputed upon these subjects at Weimar before the Duke of Saxony (4). They ran upon the contrary extremes; Strigelius favoured those that are called Adiaphorites and Synergists, who ascribed a great deal to free-will, and pretended that original sin did but slightly wound the soul (5). Flacius on the contrary asserted, that that sin was the very substance of the soul. The controversy was carried on in thirteen meetings, the acts of which were published with a preface to them by Musæus, who was one of Flacius's followers (6). We see here plainly what a desire to contradict others may produce. It is a passion which carries persons of a brisk and lively genius beyond bounds. Flacius, who could not be satisfied with differing moderately from his rival, receded from his opinion as far as he could, and seeing him assert that original sin wounded the soul only with regard to her accidental properties, he resolved to maintain that the very substance of the soul was corrupted, whence it followed that sin was the very substance of the soul. Flacius would never have dreamed of that doctrine, had not his Collegue taught the contrary doctrine. But if the controversy which arose between these two Professors, shews us what may be the consequences of a spirit of contradiction, and of the ἀμετρία τῆς ἀποβολῆς, or the keeping no medium in going to contrary extremes, it shews us also how proper the Peripatetic Philosophy is to foment divisions amongst the Divines: For Illyricus's doctrine would have given no offence, had men believed with the new Philosophers, that there are no accidents distinct from the substances; that pain for instance is nothing else but the soul itself as it is modified after a certain manner: this being granted, it is plain that Illyricus's doctrine is very true; sin is not a being distinct from the soul that sins, nor is virtue a being distinct from the virtuous soul. I cannot conceive how those Divines, who suppose, that there is a real distinction between the soul and the modifications of the soul, dare to assert that there happens an alteration in a man, when he passes from a state of innocence to a state of sin, or from a state of sin to a state of grace. According to these Divines, when a man sins, there is an entity produced distinct from the soul, which entity unites with the soul, and makes up with it an whole, which contains two beings really distinct from each other, the one of which is called substance, and the other accident. I maintain that this union does not produce any alteration in the soul, and that the soul continues to be exactly the same as it was before that union. You may mix grains of wheat with grains of barley as much as you please, you will never make them cease to be wheat; and in all the natural and artificial mixtures, the compound bodies become indeed capable of a new kind of actions; but yet each part of these compounds, as much as it is distinct from all the other parts, keeps distinctly the same

(c) In April 1549. Buchholz, pag. m. 564.

he retired to Ratibon, where he continued to publish a great many books. In the year 1567 he was called into Brabant to establish churches there according to the Augsburg Confession; but the persecution soon dispersed these new congregations; so that he went to Strasburg, and thence to Francfort, where his reputation suffered a great loss; for he was forsaken by most of his followers, because he was charged with holding the opinions of the Manichees; the ground of this charge was, his teaching that sin is not an accident, but the very essence of our souls (d). He died at Francfort March the 11th 1575 (e). He was a man of excellent parts, of a vast genius, extensive learning, and great zeal against Popery, but his restless, passionate, and quarrelsome temper spoiled all his good qualities, and occasioned a thousand disturbances in the Protestant Church. He did not scruple to assert that Princes ought to be kept in awe by the fear of seditions (f). There was no reason to lament his death; for divisions, which are always justly scandalous, were at that time more pernicious than war, because they gave the Church of Rome a fair opportunity to reproach the growing Reformation. Some have said that the only good action he did was to die (g): this is running upon extremes. He published a great many books (b), and none of his contemporaries knew how to search old Libraries with more advantage than he did. He got from one of them an antient Mafs-book [D],

(d) See the remark [C].

(e) Taken from Melchior Adam in Vitis Germanorum Theologorum, pag. 472, & seq.

(f) Metu seditionum terrendos esse Principes. Melancthi Epist. cvii. pag. 134.

(g) Nequidquam recti fecisse nisi cum moreretur. Guil. Budæus, Cent. 16. Savantologiae, ad ann. 1575. apud Quenest. de Patriis Eruditor. pag. 263.

(b) Simlerus, in his Epistolis of Gesner, and Teiffier, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 1. pag. 422. gives a catalogue of them.

which

same nature it had before. And thus we may say, that if the soul were really distinct from its sin, that is to say, from the sin, with which it would be united, in that case the soul would never pass to another state. A soul once innocent would for ever be so. See what the Nominals say (7) against those who assert that Accidents are really distinct from Substances.

[D] He got from a Library an antient Mafs-Book. Here follows the title of that work, which was printed at Strasburg for Christopher Mylius in the year 1557. Missa Latina, quæ olim ante Romanam circa septingentesimum Domini annum in usu fuit bona fide ex vetusto authenticoque Codice descripta à Matthia Flacio Illyrico. i. e. "The Latin Mafs-Book, which was formerly in use before the Roman, about the year 700, faithfully transcribed from an antient and authentic Manuscript, by Matthias Flacius Illyricus." Thus Monsieur Colomiés gives us that title (8), and he had perhaps transcribed it from the Sieur du Peyrat's work (9). He has added several curious particulars concerning that Mafs-Book. He observes that the Lutherans thinking it "inconsistent with the belief and practice of the Roman Catholics, boasted of it on every occasion; that the Catholics, for their part, without examining that Mafs-Book very exactly, prohibited it in their Indexes (10); . . . that the Lutherans coming to examine that Mafs-Book more carefully, and finding that it did not favour their opinions, suppressed all the copies of it they could meet with, so that it became very scarce: and that the Roman Catholics making an advantage of this kind of a retraction, have since caused that Mafs-Book (11) to be reprinted, notwithstanding the prohibition of the Pope and of the King of Spain." I do not doubt but he owes to the Sieur du Peyrat all that he asserts of the Lutherans concerning the suppressing of the copies: but I would not answer for him, that he was not a little too credulous in this respect; for du Peyrat does not give us any other reason for what he charges the Lutherans with, but the scarcity of the copies of that Mafs-Book. I own that he quotes a passage from Wicelius, in which Illyricus is censured for imprudently furnishing the Roman Catholics with arms against his own sect by the printing of that Mafs-Book. But this makes rather against than for du Peyrat's assertion. For Wicelius does not charge the Lutherans with making amends for their blunder by suppressing the copies; and yet if du Peyrat were in the right, they had already suppressed them when Wicelius published his book. He published it in the year 1564. Now du Peyrat's argument is grounded upon this, namely, that Cassander and Pamelius his Contemporary, did not in the least mention Illyricus's Mafs-Book in their works concerning Liturgies. And yet, says he (12), they have very carefully enquired for all that relates to this subject, and they had great credit in Germany . . . by which they could easily get all the books that were of any use to them. He argued therefore after this manner: If the Lutherans had not destroyed all the copies of the Mafs-Book, which Illyricus had published, Cassander would have mentioned that Mafs-Book, for he would certainly have seen a copy of it. But he has not mentioned it in the least;

(7) Casimirus Tholofus, in Atomis Peripateticis, tom. 3. pag. 249, & seq.

(8) Colomiés, Biblioth. Coisite, pag. 12.

(9) Du Peyrat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle du Roi, pag. 561.

(10) Philip II by the Duke of Alva's advice and at his request, and afterwards Sixtus V. Colomiés, Biblioth. Coisite, pag. 12.

(11) Father Le Cointe has inserted it in his Ecclesiastical Annals of France; and Cardinal Bona at the end of his Liturgica. Ibid. pag. 12.

(12) Du Peyrat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle du Roi, pag. 618.

it is therefore certain that the Lutherans had destroyed all the copies of it. Observe that Cassander's book upon the Liturgies was printed (13) some years before Wicelius's. We shall shew hereunder, that Cassander's not mentioning Illyricus's Mafs-Book is no proof of the scarcity of it, and that it does not follow from thence that he knew nothing of it. I shall only observe at present, that Wicelius's censure is an argument against the Sieur du Peyrat. But let us see what he relates (14).

Flavius (15) Illyricus having inconsiderately published it at Strasburg in the year 1557, not minding what he was doing, and the Lutherans and other Heretics in Germany observing the great prejudice their new opinions received from that antient Mafs-Book, gathered up all the copies of it they could meet with, and suppressed them, that the Roman Catholics might not have any knowledge of it, nor urge it against them, as clashing entirely with Luther and Calvin's sect. George Wicelius (*), an antient disciple of Luther, who left him at last, and threw himself into the pale of the church, mentioning Flavius Illyricus in his defence of the Church-Liturgy, printed in the year 1564, seven years after this Gallican Mafs-Book was published, severely censures Flavius Illyricus on account of that Latin Mafs-Book's (†), saying, even the blind might see very plainly, that by printing it, he had ignorantly and imprudently hurt the cause of Luther and Calvin's parties, and very much obliged the Catholics. Wicelius's words are as follow. Matthias Flavius Illyricus edidit repertam Missam Latinam, non triumphans tamen de Thesauri tanto adversus Catholicos, quum vel cæcipienti homini apparet totum illud quod edidit, contra Lutheri, Calvinique sectas edidisse, sed & Catholicis nobis rem longe gratissimam fecisse; quid enim ibi nisi Missam Latinam, quæ hodie in usu generali est, inscienti, imprudensque defendit? Tantum abest, ut suo, seclæque more oppugnet; locupletior est illa quidem, plusque precum continet, sed omnino tamen eadem cum usitatâ, cujus etiam dicta, factaque omnia passim sequitur, ut diversam esse confirmare nemo audeat. i. e. "Matthias Flavius Illyricus published a Latin Mafs-book which he met with: but yet he could not make any advantage of that treasure against the Catholics; for even the blind may plainly see that the whole book he published is against Luther and Calvin's sect, and that by printing it he obliged us Catholics very much. For what else has been done besides vindicating the Latin Mafs, which is generally in use? That which he published is indeed larger, and contains more prayers, but yet it contains the very same things with that which is in use, the words and actions of which it follows through the whole, so that no one will dare to assert that it is different from it." This was undoubtedly the reason, why Flavius Illyricus and his followers in Germany, being sensible of the imprudence they had been guilty of, burnt or otherwise suppressed that Gallican or Latin Mafs-Book, fearing lest they should be a laughing-stock to all the world. I am confirmed in this opinion, when I consider, that though that Mafs-Book was printed at Strasburg in the year 1557.

(13) In the year 1558. See Val. Anr. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 261.

(14) Du Peyrat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle du Roi, pag. 617.

(15) He calls him always thus.

(*) Vide Georgium Wicelium in Defensione Liturgicæ Ecclesiasticæ.

(†) It was called the Gallic or Latin Mafs-Book.

which he published in the year 1557. This will give us an opportunity to examine several particulars. He got also from those Libraries an infinite number of collections, which have been very useful to several persons. I mean the Memoirs he collected to compile his Catalogus Testium Veritatis [E]; i. e. "A List of the Witnesses to the Truth."

"yet neither George Cassander, who died but in February 1566 (4), nor Pamelius his Contemporary . . . mention it in the least." Du Peyrat reports the same thing in page 623. "I maintain, says he, that since neither Cassander nor Pamelius, who carefully enquired for all kinds of Liturgies, never saw this, which yet was printed in their life-time, eight or nine years before the death of either (16), and since even at present it is very scarce both in France and in Germany, the Lutherans and the Calvinists have made a sacrifice of it to Vulcan, as soon as it was published, to prevent the Catholics from having any knowledge of it, and from urging it against them, as a very sharp knife, come from their own shop and out of their own hands, to cut their throat with, and prove their blind obstinacy against the ancient and true doctrine of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Church." Let us see now whether Cassander's silence proves any thing.

Mr. Colomiés, who refutes Cardinal Bona, ought to have known, that du Peyrat misled that Cardinal: The censure must therefore have been levelled first against du Peyrat. However it be, here follow Colomiés's words (67). "Cardinal Bona was mistaken, when he imagined that Cassander never saw the Mafs-Book published by Illyricus. For besides that in Cassander's collection of ancient prayers, there are some which are also to be met with in Illyricus's Mafs-Book, here follow the words of Fr. Baudouin, a famous Civilian, in a letter to Cassander, dated from Francfort in the year 1557, that is to say, the same year that Mafs-Book was printed. Francfordiam reversus, reperi Illyrici ad me literas cum libello de Missa ad Palatinum nostrum. (He means Otho Elector Palatine, to whom the book is dedicated.) Rogat ille meum judicium de suis Missæ antiquitatibus. Ego id ad te nunc refero, & libellum ipsum mitto, de quo quid sentire debeamus familiariter nos moneas, ut de qua re tam multi multa confusè balbutiunt, rectè & distinctè respondere aliquando possimus. i. e. "Being returned to Frankfort, I found there a letter from Illyricus to me, with his Mafs-Book dedicated to Otho Elector Palatine. He desires me to give him my opinion concerning the antiquity of that Mafs-Book. I refer it now to you, and send you the book, praying you would let me know in a friendly manner, what we ought to think of it; that as several persons say now a great many things of it at random, we may know at last how to answer them rightly and positively." I have another argument stronger than that to prove, that Cassander had perused Illyricus's Mafs-Book; and, what is very remarkable, du Peyrat himself affords me that argument. I find in a marginal note (18), which he has put in page 622, that this Mafs-Book is mentioned at the end of a book printed in the year 1561, intitled, De officio pii ac publicæ tranquillitatis vere amantis viri, &c. i. e. "Concerning the duty of a pious man, and a true lover of the public tranquillity, &c." Now it is certain that Cassander wrote a book with this title. If du Peyrat had known this, he would not have asserted that Cassander never saw Flacius's Mafs-Book. It appears from thence that he urged a very bad argument, as to what relates to Cassander, in order to prove that the copies of that Mafs-Book were become very scarce. But after all, will some say, it is certain that they became scarce, and that Cassander did not mention that Mafs-Book in his Book of Liturgies. With regard to this last particular I answer, that this work of Cassander was perhaps already printed off, when the author received Illyricus's book. Valerius Andreas observes in his Bibliothecque, that Cassander's book was printed in the year 1558. Though this be put in the title-page, yet the book might have been exposed to sale in Autumn 1557; at which time Cassander might not yet have received the book, which Illyricus had published in the year 1557. As to the other particular, I shall only observe that there are several works of Illyricus which are as scarce as his Gallican Mafs-Book.

There are a great many other reasons of the scarcity of a book, besides the care that is taken to burn all the copies of it, that can be met with.

[E] I mean the Memoirs he collected to compile his Catalogus Testium Veritatis.] The misfortune is, that he is charged with having stolen manuscripts. Let us see what Melchior Adam relates. Tertium locum facile obtinet Martyrologium illud, quod hac occasione compilatum ferunt. Contexit abbas Johannes Trithemius catalogum auctorum. Hunc cum vidisset Flacius, temperare sibi non potuit, quin dissimulatâ personâ & habitu, aliquot in Germaniâ monasteriorum bibliothecas perlustraret: quos commode posset historicos clam auferret: atque isto adminiculo librum, qui Catalogus Testium Veritatis indigitatur, conscriberet (19). i. e. "We may justly place in the third rank that Martyrology, which was composed on this occasion. The Abbot John Trithemius drew up a catalogue of authors. When Flacius had seen it, he had no rest till under a false name and in disguise he visited some libraries of the Convents in Germany; whence he stole clandestinely all the historical books he could conveniently take, and by that help he wrote the work, which is intitled, A List or Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth." The Roman Catholic writers did not fail to make an advantage of this observation. Egregium scilicet opus, says Spondanus (20), after he had transcribed that remark, and quoted Melchior Adam, quod ex furto & sacrilegio impii transfugæ confectum est, ut mirum videri non debeat si tot mendaciis & falsiloquiis scateat à patre omnis nequitie & immunditiæ eructatis. i. e. "An egregious work indeed, which an impious deserter compiled from what he sacrilegiously stole: nor ought we to wonder that it should abound with so many lies and falsities, belched out by the fother of all wickedness and villainy." See in page 120 of Colomiés's Opuscula, what is said there of Lindenbroch. But after all, it is going too far, to infer from a man's stealing of manuscripts, that he also falsifies them afterwards, and publishes them with a thousand alterations. Spondanus is not well warranted in drawing such a reference. And besides he is mistaken in supposing that Illyricus published his Catalogus Testium Veritatis, only with a design to oppose it to William Eifengreinius's work. For on the contrary, Eifengreinius published his Catalogus Testium Veritatis, only to oppose that of Illyricus. This appears from the date of the impressions. Illyricus's Catalogue, first printed at Basil in the year 1556, was reprinted at Strasburg in the year 1562. Whereas Eifengreinius's was printed at Dillingen in the year 1565. This is sufficient to refute the passage which I shall now transcribe (21). Nec vero tam illud æmulatione Trithemii, cujus opus omnino diversum est, suum concinnasse putamus; quàm turpiori flagitio ad obscurandum illud, quod Gulielmus Eifengreinius itidem Germanus Catholicus ediderat eodem titulo Catalogi Testium Veritatis, quo Patrum & Ecclesiasticorum omnium qui ad eum usque diem hæreses expugnaverant, non parvo labore testimonia pro veritate fidei Catholice protulerat. In cujus invidiam, simul & ut facum faceret imperitis, Flacius commentarium suum eodem titulo edidit, sed absque nomine auctoris (22), falsulis & mendaciis refertum. i. e. "Nor do I think that he (Illyricus) wrote his book, with a design to imitate Trithemius, whose work is quite different; but with a more base and wicked intention, to destroy the reputation of that, which William Eifengreinius, who was also a German, but a Roman Catholic, had published with the same title, of A Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth, in which he had with great pains collected the passages from the Fathers and from all the ecclesiastical writers to his time, in favour of the Catholic faith. Flacius therefore quit of envy against him, and with a design to mislead the ignorant, published his book with the same title, but without his name (22): it abounds with idle stories and falsities."

Observe that Simon Goulart of Senlis had made a great many additions to that work of Illyricus in the editions published in 1597, and 1608. But the public

(4) This is plain from Cassander's Epitaph, made by Cornelius Galterus of the City of Ghent, and put up in the church of St. Francis of Poland. It is prefixed to Cassander's Liturgies.

(16) This is false with regard to Pamelius, who died in Sept. 1587, in the 52d year of his age. His book of Liturgies, was printed in the year 1571. See Val. Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 425.

(17) Colomiés, Biblioth. Cboisic, pag. 14.

(18) Here it follows, but I have corrected some errors of the press in it. Ad calcem libelli de officio pii ac publicæ tranquillitatis vere amantis viri in hoc Religiois dissidio typis excusis, anno 1561 referuntur doctorum aliquot ac piorum virorum libri, ex quibus videri potest quam non sit difficultis controversiarum in Religione conciliatio, si controversandi studium vitetur, inter quos fit mentio ejusmodi Missæ bis verbis, Missa Latina vetus, quæ ante 700 annos in usu fuit in Ecclesia Gallicana, & Germanica, Argentorati apud Cbrist. Mylium 1557.

(19) Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theol. pag. 475. He quotes Keckerman in Meibod. Hist.

(20) Spondanus, ann. 1560. num. 32. He is mistaken when he styles Melchior Adam a Lutheran.

(21) Spond. ad ann. 1560, pag. m. 602. Possivina. Appar. Sacr. tom. 1. and several other authors, as Baillet observes in his quotation, assert the same. He asserts it also himself, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. pag. 537, 538.

(22) This is false; see below quotation (59).

It is pretended that he concealed sometimes his own name under a fictitious one [F]. Moreri was very much in the wrong to refer his article to the letter T, under the name of Trancowitz [G].

Spondanus committed a very gross blunder when he mentioned the Centuries of Magdeburg [H]. You will find it in the remark (i), in which I relate some particulars concerning

(i) It is the remark [H].

(23) See John Albertus Faber, in Decade Decadem, num. 96. public had reasons to complain (23), that since he took the liberty to alter the whole disposition of that work, and to add or suppress what he thought fit, he did not distinguish by some particular marks, what was his, and what belonged to Illyricus. It was this perhaps, that engaged a Lutheran to publish a new edition of the Catalogus testium veritatis, in every respect like that of Illyricus himself, except only that he prefixed to it the testimonies of the learned both for and against it. This new edition was printed at Francfort in the year 1666 in 4^o, without John Conrad Dietericus's name, who published it, but his name was prefixed to it in the edition which was published in the year 1672 (24). Let us observe that Melchior Adam does not well abridge the author he quotes. I have consulted the original since the first edition of this Dictionary, and I have met with a particular in Keckerman which ought not to have been omitted. It is, that our Illyricus having learnt from John Trithemius's work, that several authors, who lived in the darkest ages of Popery, and yet shewed the corruptions of it, resolved to render ineffectual the care that was taken to conceal the books of those authors. Let us transcribe the whole passage from Keckerman.

(24) Joh. Albertus Faber, in Decade Decadem, num. 96.

Ceterum quod attinet ad insidiosos occultatores Historiarum, certum est in Bibliotheca Vaticana, & aliis Bibliothecis Italiae, imprimis autem in Bibliothecis Monasteriorum, clam servari multos Historicorum superiorum seculorum, qui de fraudibus Pontificum, deque abusu Ecclesiae Romanae, & contra de conservatione verae doctrinae, etiam sub mediis tenebris Papatus scripserunt, id quod manifestè patet ex Catalogo autorum, edito ab Abbate Johanne Trithemio qui istos autores ex Bibliothecis ante annos paulo plus centum collegit; quem Catalogum cum vidisset Matthias Flacius, temperare sibi non potuit, quin dissimulatâ personâ, & habitu aliquot in Germania Monasteriorum Bibliothecas perlustraret, artemque arte eluserit, quos commodè posset Historicis clam auferret, atque adeo eximium istum librum, qui dicitur Catalogus testium veritatis, isto adminiculo conscriberet (25). i. e. "As to the crafty concealers of Historians, it is certain that in the library of the Vatican, and in several other libraries of Italy, particularly in those of the Monasteries, they keep secretly a great many Historians of the former ages, who wrote of the impostures of the Popes, and of the abuses of the Church of Rome, and of the preservation of the true doctrine, even in the greatest darkness of Popery; as appears plainly from the catalogue of authors published by the Abbot John Trithemius, who a little above an hundred years ago made a collection of those authors from the libraries. Matthias Flacius having seen that catalogue had no rest, till under a false name and in disguise he visited some libraries of the Convents in Germany, and eluding artifice by artifice, stole clandestinely all the historical books he could conveniently take, and by that help he wrote that egregious book, which is intitled, A Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth."

(25) Keckerm. de Natura & Proprietat. Histor. in Auctoris, cap. 1. p. m. 151.

(26) He lived in the 9th Century.

(27) See the Acta Erudit. Lips. for 1697, pag. 295, in the account of Archbishop Usher's book intitled, Historia Dogmatica Controversiarum de Scripturis sacris Vernaculis.

(28) Apud Acta Erud. Lipsiens. ibid.

(29) His Epitome Chroniconum mundani was printed at B. 61 in the year 1532. See Gesner's Bibliotheca.

[F] It is pretended that he concealed sometimes his own name under a fictitious one.] It is asserted that the Achilles Gassarus, who published a work of Otrifidus a Monk of Weissenburg (26), is no other but Flacius Illyricus. That Monk's work is an harmony of the four Gospel's in German verse; it was dedicated to Solomon and Luitbert, Archbishops of Mentz, and to Lewis King of Eastern France (27). Wharton, who pretends (28) that Illyricus published it under the name of Achilles Gassarus, must give me leave to observe to my readers, that there was in the sixteenth century a German Physician named Achilles Gassarus, who had published some books (29), when Illyricus was still a school-boy.

[G] Moreri was very much in the wrong to refer him to the letter T under the name of Trancowitz.] Monsieur Teiffier has been the occasion of that blunder by these words in page 471 of his first volume. The name of MATTHIAS FLACIUS was Trancowitz.

He quotes Verbeiden's effigies. But Verbeiden does not say this. Let us see what the curious Colomies has discovered upon this subject (30). "To conclude, let us here give the true name of Illyricus, which was Francowitz, as Bucholcer the son tells us in page 83 of his Chronology, or rather of the Continuation of his Fathers, printed at Gorlitz in the year 1599. Vernum & integrum, says he, Flacii nomen ego ex certis autoribus cognovi esse tale; Matthias Francowitzius, cognomento Flacius, gente Illyricus, patriâ Albonensis." i. e. "I have found in authors of an unquestionable authority, that the true and whole name of Flacius was, Matthew Francowitz, an Illyrian by nation, and a native of Albona." König (31) calls him also Francowitzius; but Quenstedt (32) calls him Trancowitzium.

(30) Bibliotheca Cbojse, pag. 15.

(31) Biblioth. v. & m. v., pag. 306.

(32) De Patria Illust. pag. 262.

(33) Spondanus, ad ann. 1560, num. 31. p. 601.

(34) See Caspar Sagittarius, Introduct. in Hist. Ecclesiast. p. 279.

(35) Ibid.

[H] Spondanus committed a very gross blunder, when he mentioned the centuries of Magdeburg.] He asserts that they began to publish them in the year 1560, and that the fourth volume was the first that was published (33). This is what is absolutely false. The three first centuries were printed before the fourth. In the catalogue of the library of Francfort, published in the year 1604 by Becman (34), the three first centuries are said to have been printed in the year 1559, and the fourth in the year 1560. Draudius (35) also places the edition of the three first under the year 1559. Monsieur Sagittarius tells us, that in his copy the year 1562 was set down for the three first centuries, the year 1560 for the fourth, 1562 for the fifth and sixth, 1564 for the seventh and eighth, 1565 for the ninth, 1567 for the tenth and eleventh, 1569 for the twelfth, and 1574 for the thirteenth, which is also the last. It is very probable, that Spondanus's edition was like that of Monsieur Sagittarius; that is to say, that neither of them had the first edition of the three first centuries. But this does not clear Spondanus; for if he had read the preface to the first century, he would have seen that the centuriators complain there of a libel in which their work was cried down, before the public had seen any thing of what they had composed. De sumptibus vero profitemur, say they, nos paucissimos habere, qui annuatim aliquid conferunt: nec pro laborum conditione operarii satis sustentantur, sicut ipsmet optimi testes sunt: imo nisi Deus nobis quosdam Meccenates adhiberent (quod tamen ne fiat, multis invidi strenue laborant) neque progredi satis expedite poterimus: neque forte totum Opus, ut est institutum, absolvere. Impudens igitur, planeque diabolicum est mendacium, & criminatio istius scurræ, qui nuper in maledico & famose scripto, sine nomine edito (ubi tamen aliam saltat fabulam) Sardonio risu, & virulento sarcasmo nostrum opus historicum Aureum appellat: eo quod ex multo auro Germanico sit constat. Non vidit sceleratus iste scurræ Opus, & tamen non veretur canino, aut viperino potius dente arrodere. Deinde non habet cognitâ rationes nostras iste conviciator ac criminator: & tamen ut Semei, nos false irridet, ac mentitur splendide. Nam quam pauci, & quam parce dent, quam frugaliter alantur hujus instituti operarii, poterat iste irrisor explorare, non a profugis, sceleratis, pollutis, mendacibus, quibus gubernationis nostræ ratio ne nota quidem est, sed a nobis ipsis. i. e. "As to the charges of this work we can truly declare, that there are but few persons who contribute any thing yearly towards them; nor are the undertakers sufficiently supported in proportion to their labour, as they can all witness; nay, if God does not raise us some more friends (which invidious persons endeavour to prevent as much as lies in their power) we shall not be able to carry on this work with speed, nor even perhaps, to compleat it according to our design. It is therefore an impudent and devilish lie, and an horrible slander, which a certain buffoon lately published in an anonymous and slanderous libel (in which he would however seem to have another design) calling our work ironically and with a very bitter joke, a golden work, because, says he, it is made with a great deal of German concerning the History of those Centuries. Monsieur Varillas, who has faithfully transcribed that blunder of Spondanus, has added so many others of his own to it [I], that one

" German gold. The wicked wretch has not seen all the work, and yet he dares to asperse, it in the most cruel manner. And besides, this slanderer and accuser does not know our circumstances, and yet, like Shimei, he pretends to be smart against us, and lies impudently. For this scoffer might have enquired, not indeed from renegado's, villains, wicked men, and lyars, who have not the least knowledge of our affairs, but from ourselves, how few persons there are, that give us any thing, how sparingly they give, and how frugally the undertakers of this work are supported." This long passage may serve us for two purposes. For besides that it is an argument against the false æra of the centuries, it does also hint to us, what we ought to think of these words of Spondanus. Quod opus vocatum est ab aliis Evangelicis Aureum; non quidem in laudem, sed ironice, propterea quod multo principum quorundam Germaniæ & civitatum auro, ostiatim emendicato, fit editum. i. e. "The other Evangelicks (or Protestants) called it a golden work; not to commend it, but ironically, because it was made by dint of gold, begged from door to door, of some Princes and cities in Germany." This is asserting that the other Evangelicks called that work of the centuriators a golden work, to ridicule it, and to give the public to understand that it was compiled at the expence of the Princes of Germany. But all these pretended Evangelicks are no more than anonymous writers, who published a libel under the false name of the students of Wittemberg (36). See in Monsieur Sagittarius (37) several extracts from the dedications of the centuries, which are designed to shew, that Illyricus, Wigandus, Judex, Faber, and the other undertakers of that work, had but too much reason to desire the public's assistance. Observe that there were additions made to the third century, when it was reprinted at Basil (38). Accesserunt castigaciones & additiones locorum aliquot in prima editione depravatorum vel omisforum (39). i. e. "With corrections and additions of some passages, which were either erroneously printed or omitted in the first edition." Observe also that the first four centuries and part of the fifth were composed at Magdeburg; that the fifth was finished at Iena; that the sixth was written in the place to which Illyricus, Wigandus, and Judex retired, on account of the persecution; that the seventh was composed in the country of Mecklenburg, and the rest in the city of Wisnar in the same country (40).

I had composed all this before I could meet with a copy of the first editions of these centuries; for as the edition of Basil 1624, in three volumes in folio, published by the care of Lewis Lucius, is more esteemed than any of the others, every one endeavours to get it, and it is a difficult matter to meet with the others in the libraries of private persons. I have at last been able to consult leisurely the edition which the centuriators caused to be printed at Basil by Oporinus; but the copy of the three first centuries, which was lent me, having been bound more than once, I could not meet in it with the date of the impression. I believe that the last leaf had been torn off before it was bound the last time, and it was probably on that last leaf, that Oporinus placed the date 1559 (41). However it be, this copy of the three first centuries is printed in an Italic letter, and contains neither corrections nor additions. Now we have seen that the edition which Monsieur Sagittarius made use of, which is of the year 1562, contains additions and corrections. It is therefore neither the first, nor that which I have now before me. Observe that the copy of the fourth century, printed by Oporinus in the year 1560, is in a Roman letter.

[I] Monsieur Varillas . . . has added many blunders of his own to that of Spondanus.] Melanchthon, says he (42), was hardly dead, when the centuriators of Magdeburg began to publish their work upon Church History, with the fourth volume. This is his first blunder. That volume, continues he, is indeed the best of the thirteen in the opinion of the Lutherans, or the last bad according to the Catholics. We defy him to prove this. There were (43) at first but four of the Ministers of Magdeburg that were engaged in it, namely Matthias Flacius, John Vigand, Matthew Judex, and Basil Faber. But afterwards the most learned of the Lutherans had an hand in it, though we know the names of but four more, who were Nicholas Gal, Celestinus Hutten, Jaspas Nidpruc Counsellor of State to the Emperor, and Baptist Hoincel (44). Consult Mons. Sagittarius, he will tell you, that Andrew Corvinus, Thomas Holtuter, Pancratius Veltbeck, Nicholas Amstdorf, Nicholas Galus, Martin Copus, Ebeling Almannus, Ambrose Hidfild, David Cicelerus, Jasper Leunculus, William Radentis, Nicholas Beumuller, Bernard Niger, Peter Schrader, and Conrad Agrius have also had a share in that work. So that Monsieur Varillas names three persons who are not in that list of Monsieur Sagittarius, and he supposes falsely that we know the names of only eight centuriators. I have seen indeed in Monsieur Sagittarius the name of John Baptist Heinzelius, and that of Jaspas Nidpruck, Counsellor to the Emperor; but he does not say that these persons were concerned in the centuries, he observes only that they encouraged Marc Wagner, who went from one library to another in order to collect materials (46). This Wagner was very serviceable to the centuriators; he visited the libraries in Germany and Denmark, that of Edinburgh in Scotland, &c. He had a particular talent for that kind of inquiries, and they gave him a very glorious certificate, in which they acknowledged his fidelity, diligence and accuracy (47). That certificate is dated September the 30th 1557; it is declared therein amongst other things, that he had taken several journeys with Illyricus to collect materials (48), and that having given several proofs of his capacity that way, it was thought that he could alone continue his travels; that they had therefore committed it to his care, giving him recommendatory letters, by which all learned and devout persons were desired to communicate to him the manuscripts and ancient records, which could be of any use. Illyricus was one of those that signed this certificate. Monsieur Varillas asserts, that the authors of the other sects, which separated from that of Luther, censured the centuries several ways, and published divers extracts of the errors, which they pretended crept into them. Not one person, that I know of, ever mentioned those extracts; Monsieur Varillas would have been very much puzzled, had he been obliged to prove his assertion. Conrad Brunus, whose invective against the work of the centuriators has been refuted by Illyricus in the year 1556, was a Roman Catholic. Eisengreinius, who also wrote against them, was of the same religion. Let us take notice of some other blunders of Monsieur Varillas. Illyricus, says he (49), engaged the next year 1561 at Weimar in Thuringia, in a public disputation with the famous Victorinus Spingel. He is mistaken both with regard to the time when this disputation was held (50), and with regard to the name of Illyricus's antagonist (51). The Catholics observed that in less than fifty years there sprang up more heresies from that of Luther, than there had been since Jesus Christ even to Luther (52). This hyperbole, which he transcribed from Spondanus, but not without making it something less, is the most silly thing in the world. Et videas hinc etiam quam secundus fuerit Lutherus qui plures protulerit pestiferarum hæresum auctores, quam ab orbis ortu fuerint ante in universo mundo (53). i. e. It appears also from thence how fruitful Luther was, who has produced more authors of pestiferous heresies, than there had been before in the whole world since the creation." You will find in Moreri, that the number of the chief heretics, who appeared in the world, from the first century of Christianity, to the time of Luther, amounts to 183: and it is hardly possible to find above ten or twelve schisms during the first fifty years of Lutheranism. Let us continue to hear Mr. Varillas (54). "It was probable with a design to escape for a time the persecution which Flacius expected from his friends, on account of the passion he had shewed at Weymar, that he disguised himself, and went incognito to visit all the libraries of the Monasteries in Germany. He made bold to steal all the scarce books he could conveniently (36) See Sagittarius, Introd. ad Hist. Eccl. pag. 256 and 266.

(37) Ibid. pag. 260, &c.

(38) In the year 1562, if I am not mistaken.

(39) Sagittarius, Introd. ad Hist. Eccl. pag. 269.

(40) Ibid. pag. 245.

(41) Mr. Hill, Minister of the English Church at Rotterdam, who has a fine Library, and an admirable knowledge of books, has assured me that the first Centuries were printed that year.

(42) Varillas, Hist. de l'Herésie, liv. 24. pag. m. 229. under the year 1561.

(43) Ibid.

(44) Spondanus, ad ann. 1560, num. 52. p. 602. calls him Jean-nem Baptissem Henclium.

(45) Sagit. Introd. ad Hist. Eccl. pag. 247, 248, 249.

(46) Ibid. pag. 252, 253. Observe that Melchior Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 474. asserts, that Jaspas Nidpruck and John Baptist Heinzelius assisted Flacius and his fellow-labourers.

(47) Ibid. pag. 253, 254.

(48) Cum D. Illyrico aliquot monasteria perlustrasse, & cum ipso nulla alia de causa peregrinatum fuisset, quam ut pium hunc comatum pro sua tenuitate juvaret. Ibid. pag. 254.

(49) Varillas, Hist. de l'Herésie, lib. 24. pag. 231, 232.

(50) See the remarks [C].

(51) His name was Strigelius, and not Spingel.

(52) Varillas, Hist. de l'Herésie, lib. 24. pag. 232, 233.

(53) Spondanus, ad ann. 1560, num. 32. pag. 602.

(54) Varillas, Hist. de l'Herésie, liv. 24. pag. 233.

one cannot conceive how a man of wit can be guilty of so many mistakes. Let us not forget to observe, that Illyricus's Clavis Sacrae Scripturae, i. e. "A Key to the holy Scripture," is one of his best works. See what Monsieur Simon says of it in his

Critical

(*) In the Life of Flacius, take (*), and made extracts of the others. The author of his life relates that he did it out of emulation, and to compose, after Trithemius's example, a collection of all those that had wrote books: but this will not seem probable to those who will compare these two books together, since they are quite different. Trithemius's work is, properly speaking, a catalogue of the Ecclesiastical writers, and of the books they have composed; and Flacius's is a collection of passages which seem to be contrary to the Roman Catholic Religion, and favourable to rigid Lutheranism. There are a great many errors in these words. For in the first place, Illyricus visited the libraries before the year 1560; he did it with a design to collect materials for his Catalogus testium veritatis. Melchior Adam, the only voucher quoted by Spondanus and by Monsieur Varillas, declares it positively. Now that Catalogue was printed in the year 1556 (55); therefore, &c. In the second place, it is false that Melchior Adam asserts that Illyricus undertook such a work out of emulation, and to compose after Trithemius's example a collection of those that had wrote books. If Melchior Adam had said this, he would have been very much mistaken; and consequently Spondanus (56) would assert a thing, which upon the whole is false. See in the remark [E] how the reading of Trithemius's work gave rise to Illyricus's design. In the third place, what Varillas says of Trithemius's work, and of that of Illyricus shews plainly that he knew nothing of either: for Trithemius does not confine himself to the Ecclesiastical writers, nor does the other confine himself to those passages, which seem to be favourable to the strictest Lutheranism. Monsieur Varillas supposes, that the envy which Illyricus had conceived against the book of William Eisen-grem (†) a Roman Catholic Divine, intituled The Catalogue of those, who bore witness to the Truth, determined him to undertake a work of the same kind in favour of his sect (57); the contrary of this is true, as you have seen above (58). Lastly, Monsieur Varillas charges him with having published his book without putting his name to it, either because he would not expose himself again to the resentment of the other sects, which he foresaw would not like his work, or because he supposed that the world would know well enough that he was the author of it, though his name was not prefixed to it (59).

(55) See Joh. Albertus Faber, in Decade Decadum, num. 96.

(56) Nec vero tam illud emulatione Trithemii suum concinnasse putamus, quam &c. Spondan. ad ann. 1560, pag. 602.

(†) Thus he writes that name.

(57) Varillas, Hist. de l'Heresie, liv. 24. pag. 233.

(58) In the remark [E].

(59) Varillas, Hist. de l'Heresie, liv. 24. pag. 234.

(60) Ibid. pag. 230.

I have omitted a particular, for which Monsieur Varillas deserves to be censured. Let us consider it here. It relates to the dedication to Queen Elizabeth. Monsieur Varillas asserts (60), that it vexed that Princess more than it did her honour; and that there are but few instances of such strange and unseasonable actions in the history of men of letters, though they be charged with not being always very polite. The centuriators could not but know this notorious fact, namely that Queen Elizabeth was a Calvinist with regard to doctrine, though she were a Lutheran with regard to Church discipline. And yet in that same dedication, by which they endeavoured to obtain that Queen's protection, they inserted a satire against the Calvinists. They charged them with rendering Christ's testament ineffectual, as much as lay in their power, by arguments borrowed from Philosophy; with rejecting the Real Presence, and the Communion of our blessed Saviour's Body and Blood, against his own expressions, which are very plain; with endeavouring to mislead those who read the Gospel, by perplexing with subtle and far-fetched interpretations the natural sense of a great many passages, which are so plain that they need no explication. They proved afterwards unanswerably in the body of that volume, and in the twelve following, that the Church had always believed that Presence; and whoever will take the pains to read them, will observe immediately, that though they who paid them wished that they would write with less accuracy and with more temper upon that subject, that they might not prevent the union between the Lutherans and the Zwinglians, which was then again negotiating; yet they had so little condescension for their benefactors, that they handled this subject with more accuracy and passion than they did any other. These are all glosses forged in the historian's own brains. He added these flourishes of his own invention to an observation which Spondanus made incidentally; and we may be sure he spoke without any voucher, and without having read the dedication he was censuring. There was not the least unpoliteness or imprudence in the conduct of the centuriators. They did not know yet what final resolution the Queen of England would take: they knew only that she laboured to establish a good form of religion. They commended her for it; they congratulated her upon it, and they encouraged her very earnestly to apply herself effectually to root out all the evils which the followers of Antichrist had occasioned. Ad te igitur nunc, Regina potentissima & serenissima, convertimur. Audimus enim, te post accepta Regia sceptrā, etiam de præcipuo sine ac munere tui officii, societatis ac vitæ totius omnium subditorum tuorum cogitare. Itaque non tantum lætis acclamationibus Regiæ tuæ dignitati gratulamur: sed toto etiam pectore patrem Domini nostri JESU CHRISTI invocamus, ac rogamus, ut... Sed quia non satis est bene cœpisse, hortamur etiam te, illustrissima & potentissima Regina, ut totis viribus in id opus incumbas, ut Religio pura, integra, inviolata in toto regno tuo instauretur, omnibus Antichristi crudelitibus, vulneribus, pestibus ac carcinomatibus recedat, curatis, atque sublatis. Debes enim hunc honorem Deo conditori ac redemptori tuo, debes tibi ipsi, debes subditis tuis (61). i. e. "We address ourselves therefore unto you, most powerful and serene Queen: for we hear that after your accession to the Crown, you began immediately to think of the chief end and duty of your station, on which the union and life of all your subjects depends. And therefore we do not only congratulate you with joyful acclamations upon your royal dignity, but we also from our hearts pray and beseech the Father of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, that... But as it is not enough to begin well, we also intreat you, most illustrious and powerful Princess, to apply yourself earnestly, and as much as lies in your power, to establish a sound, pure and uncorrupted religion throughout your whole Kingdom, and to root out all the cruelties, wounds, dangerous evils, and cankers of Antichrist. This you are bound to do in honour to God your Creator and Redeemer; this you owe to yourself, this you owe to your subjects." It was but fit that Divines of the Augsburg Confession should add to this a word of advice concerning the Corporal Presence. They did it after the following manner (62). Illud verò etiam non prætereundum est, cum jam variae passim grassentur quasi sæditiones opinionum, inter quas aliqui etiam testamentum Domini planè philosophicis rationibus ita evacuant, ut corpus & sanguinem Christi, quod ad præsentiam & communicationem, juxta clarissima, evidentissima, veracissima & potentissima verba ipsius CHRISTI, profus removeant, miraque verborum perplexitate fucum faciant: in primis videndum tibi est, ut & articuli fidei sine pharisaico fermento, & Sacramenta à Christo instituta citra omnem adulterationem instaurentur: id quod te facturam esse, omnes pii sperant, summisque votis à te contendunt. i. e. "We must not omit to observe, that there are several factions, if we may say so, with regard to opinions, and amongst them some who by arguments that are only Philosophical, do so enervate the Testament of our Lord, that they entirely exclude the Body and Blood of Christ, as to their Presence and Communication from the Sacrament, against the most plain, most clear, most evident and strong expressions of CHRIST himself; and by the wonderful ambiguity of their words they impose upon the readers. You ought therefore to take a particular care that the articles of the Christian Faith be established without any Pharisaical Leaven, and the Sacraments instituted by Christ himself be restored without any corruption. This is what all good men hope you will do, and what they most earnestly entreat you to do."

When Monsieur Varillas supposes that the centuriators could not but know this notorious fact, namely that Queen Elizabeth was a Calvinist with regard to doctrine, (61) Epist. Dedicat. Centuriæ quarta Magdab. pag. 8.

(62) Ibid. pag. 9.

(k) Hist. Critique du Vieux Testament, chap. 13, pag. 428, &c. of the edition printed at Rotterdam 1685. Critical History of the Old Testament (k). See also John Albert Faber in the 96th article of his Decas Decadum.

trine, he only shews his own ignorance: he does not consider that they wrote their dedication at a time when they did not yet know upon what footing the reformation would be established in England. Their volume is indeed dated 1560, and Elizabeth's reformation was established in the year 1559. But who is there that does not know it is the Bookseller's custom to put the date of the next year to the books that are printed off towards the end of August? I believe therefore, that this dedication, which has no date to it, was sent to Oporinus, Bookseller at Basl, in the year 1559, before they knew in Germany the Ecclesiastical regulations made in England by Queen Elizabeth; and after all it could not appear at that time that this Princess had declared for Calvin's opinion with regard to the Corporal Presence. Read the following page from Bishop Burnet. "Some of the reformed Divines were appointed to review King Edward's liturgy, and to see if in any particular it was

"fit to change it. The only considerable variation was made about the Lord's Supper... It was proposed to have the Communion Book so contrived, that it might not exclude the belief of the Corporal Presence. For the chief design of the Queen's Council was to unite the nation in one faith, and the greatest part of the nation continued to believe such a presence. Therefore it was recommended to the Divines to see that there should be no express definition made against it, that so it might be as a speculative opinion, not determined, in which every man was left to the freedom of his own mind. Hereupon the rubric that explained the reason for kneeling at the Sacrament, that thereby no adoration is intended to any Corporal Presence of Christ's natural Flesh and Blood, because that is only in Heaven, which had been in King Edward's liturgy, was now left out, &c. (63)." (63) Burnet, Hist. of the Reformation of England, vol. 2. B. 3. under the year 1559, pag. 393. See also pag. 405.

INCHOFER (MELCHIOR) a German Jesuit, born at Vienna in the year 1584, entered into the Society of the Jesuits at Rome in the year 1607. He had already distinguished himself by his knowledge of the Law. He taught a great while Philosophy, Mathematics and Divinity at Messina, and in the year 1630 he published there a book, which brought him into some trouble [A]. He was obliged to go to Rome to answer the complaints that had been made against him before the Congregation of the Index. The Judges were very well satisfied with the reasons he pleaded in his defence, and ordered him only to alter the title of his book, and to explain some things in it more at large, which he did accordingly in a second edition. He continued several years at Rome, and died at last at Milan, September the 28th 1648 (a). Besides the works of his that are extant [B], and by which it appears that he was very learned, he was preparing others for the press (b), which would have shewed how extensive his learning was, had not death prevented him from compleating them. He is thought to be the author

(a) Taken from Nath. Southwell, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 608.

(b) See the titles of them, in Nathaniel Southwell, ibid.

[A] He published a book, which brought him into some trouble.] Here follows the title of it. Epistola B. Mariae Virginis ad Messanenses Veritas vindicata, i. e. "The Blessed Virgin Mary's Letter to the people of Messina, proved to be genuine," in Folio. The Congregation of the Index having heard Father Inchofer's arguments, gave him leave to reprint that work with this title, Conjectatio ad Epistolam beatissimae Mariae Virginis ad Messanenses. i. e. "A Conjecture concerning the Blessed Virgin Mary's Letter to the people of Messina." This second edition was published at Viterbo in the year 1633. He got leave to strike out and add to it what he pleased. S. Congregatio non solum permisit eidem dictum opus de novo edere, mutato tamen iustis de causis titulo in hunc modum, Conjectatio, &c. & quibusdam magis explicatis sed etiam demendi & addendi si quae viderentur, liberam & amplam facultatem permisit (1). This gives us to understand, that provided one does not affirm too positively, that the Virgin Mary wrote to the inhabitants of Messina the letter which passes under her name, it is not unlawful to believe it, and to make others believe it also. A German writer (2) observes, that Baronius and Theophilus Raynaud are not of Inchofer's opinion with regard to that letter. I will not contradict what he asserts of Baronius; for though this Annalist does not mention particularly the pretended letter to the Messinians, yet he declares in the general, that all the letters, which it is pretended the Blessed Virgin wrote to some cities, must be looked upon as apocryphal. Traduntur & aliae ab ipsa ad alias scriptae civitates, quas cunctas, cum careant Ecclesiae auctoritate, non nisi in apocryphorum classem rejiciendas esse omnes facile judicabunt (3). i. e. "There are some other letters handed about written by her to other cities; but as they are not supported by the authority of the church, every one will easily judge, that they must be placed amongst the apocryphal pieces." But as for Theophilus Raynaud, he ought not to be quoted on this occasion, since he only mentions the letter, which it is pretended the Blessed Virgin wrote to St. Ignatius, and that Saint's pretended answer (4). The German author is not more happy, when he quotes Rivetus (5), who without mentioning in the least the letter to the Messinians, does only explode what has been reported concerning the epistolary correspondence between the Blessed Virgin and St. Ignatius.

[B] The works of his that are extant.] I shall not repeat here what relates to his volume concerning the Virgin Mary's pretended letter to the Messinians. His other works are, Traclatus Syllepticus, in quo quid de terra solisque motu vel statione secundum sacram Scripturam & SS. Patres sentiendum, quae certitudine alterutra sententia tenenda sit, ostenditur. i. e. "A Treatise, in which is shewed what we ought to believe concerning the motion or rest of the Earth and the Sun, according to the holy Scriptures, and the Fathers, and with that certainty we must hold either opinion." Printed at Rome in the year 1633, in 4to. De sacra Latinitate, hoc est, de variis Linguae Latinae mysteriis, ex origine, progressu, fine, caeteraque instituti sui ratione ad Evangelii praedicationem, Latinae Ecclesiae exaltationem, Romanae Imperii majestatem spectantibus. i. e. "Of the sacred Latin tongue; that is to say, of the several mysteries of the Latin tongue, from its rise, progress, design, and other reasons of its being used, relating to the preaching of the Gospel, to the exaltation of the Latin Church, and to the Majesty of the Roman Empire." Printed at Messina, in the year 1635, in 4to; and at Munich in the year 1638, in 8vo. Historia trium Magorum. i. e. "The History of the three Wise Men." Printed at Rome in the year 1639. Annalium Ecclesiasticorum Regni Hungariae Tomus I. i. e. "The first Volume of the Annals of the Church of the Kingdom of Hungary;" at Rome in 1644, folio. The Funeral Oration on the death of Nicholas Ricardi, a Dominican, and Master of the Sacred Palace. He published some other books, to which he did not put his name. Alia quaedam ipsius prodierunt sub alienis nominibus R. P. E. L. &c. & sub nomine Academici Vertumnii, adjectum praedictionibus Joannis Baptistae Cortesii Poema in laudem Medicinae & contra malos Medicos. i. e. "He had published some other works under fictitious names, and there is a Poem of his in praise of Physic, and against bad Physicians, under the name of Vertumnus Academicus: it is added to John Baptist Cortesius's Lectures."

(1) Nath. Sotuel, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 608.

(2) Placidus, de Pseudonymis Jo. Rhodii, num. 59. pag. 44.

(3) Baron, ad ann. 48. num. 25.

(4) Theophil. Raynaudus, de malis & bonis Libris, num. 235. pag. m. 148.

(5) In Critico Sacro, lib. 2. cap. 1.

(6) Sotuel, Biblioth. Societ. Jesu, pag. 608.

thor of a Libel against the Jesuits, intitled, Monarchia Solipforum [C]. He was not well pleased with them (c).

(c) This appears from the following words of the Preface. Illud constat, nisi inter Solipfos rubiginasset, & copia & splendore inter summates literarum viros fuisse radiaturum. i. e. "It is certain that he would have gained a very great reputation amongst the most eminent men of Letters, had he not been forced to rust away amongst the Solipfi, that is to say, those men who live only for themselves."

[C] He is thought to be the author of a libel against the Jesuits, intitled Monarchia Solipforum.] The author of that libel (†) calls himself Lucius Cornelius Europæus. It was printed in Holland in the year 1648, juxta exemplar Venetum, according to the copy printed at Venice, as it is said in the title-page; they added to it a key to explain the fictitious names mentioned therein. This work is ascribed to Melchior Inchofer in the edition published at Venice in the year 1652 (7). Christopher Pellerus, who relates this conjecture, adds also, that this German Jesuit went to Rome after he had wrote that book, and never returned from thence. Monarchia Solipforum quam perhibent scripsisse quempiam patrem ex Societate N. Inchoferum Germanum, postea Romam profectum nunquam reversum (8). i. e. "The Monarchy of the Solipfi,

"which is said to be written by a Father Jesuit, "named N. Inchofer, a German, who went aserwards to Rome, whence he never returned." He is mistaken with regard to this journey to Rome; for it was a great while after Inchofer had left Germany, that he wrote that satyr: he wrote it only after he had bore great discontents in the order, the habit of which he took at Rome at the age of twenty three years. The passage I have quoted from Pellerus made

Konig (9) give us two authors out of one. He mentions Melchior Inchofer, and Nicholas Inchofer: To the former he ascribes part of what Alegambe relates, and to the latter the Monarchy of the Solipfi. He quotes Christopher Pellerus, but he makes him say more than he should, namely, that this piece was composed in the year 1648. Pellerus does not say this. If Konig had remembered, that when we do not know a person's Christian name, we use to put an N. instead of it, he would not have invented, on Pellerus's authority, a pretended Nicholas Inchofer. He observes that others ascribe that work to Scioppius. It is certain that Otto Tabor, a German Civilian, imagined that Scioppius might be the author of it; but he did not assert it positively. Lucius Cornelius Europæus, says he (10), sive is sit Gaspar Scioppius, sive quis alius ex genere Scriptorum satyricorum, in Monarchia quam dicit Solipforum Leoni Allatio dedicata, &c. i. e. "Lucius Cornelius Europæus, whether he be Jasper Scioppius, "or any other of the satyrical writers, in the Monarchy of the Solipfi, as he calls it, dedicated to "Leo Allatius, &c." Decker (11), without exploding Pellerus's conjecture (12), or that of Tabor, offers us another, which is intirely groundless. He imagines that one Gabriel Bariacus Lermæus, a Gentleman of Languedoc, might be the author of that Monarchy of the Solipfi. We shall now quote two passages from Monsieur Arnauld, one of which will remove our doubts, and the other will acquaint us with Inchofer's design, and with the true meaning of the word Solipfi. One would think, says Monsieur Arnauld (13), that the Monarchia Solipforum was written by Scioppius, because we find it printed in Germany with some books, which were undoubtedly composed by that author. And yet it is certain that this Monarchy of the Solipfi is the work of a German Jesuit, named Melchior Inchofer. We know where the original of a letter, written by a Spanish Jesuit, who acknowledges this, and complains bitterly of it, is lodged. The other passage is as follows (14). It is well known, says Monsieur Arnauld to the Jesuits, that it is your character to be eager in doing good, provided you do it ALONE, and no man has a share in the glory of it but yourselves. And if you will be sincere, you must confess, that one of your Fathers, who wrote a book intitled Monarchia Solipforum, was very well acquainted with your character. See Gisbert Voetius's Theses (15).

There was a pretended Letter from Pope Innocent the XIIIth to the Emperor, dispersed abroad in the year 1696; the Pope in that letter calls the Society of the Jesuits Monarchiam Monopantorum: upon which Father Papebroch made the following reflection. Forstian quasi ueros uerba soli omnia velint esse & estimari Jesuitæ, scilicet alludendo ad uetus scomma satyrici cuiusdam commenti quo scripsit anonymus aliquis Monarchiam Solipforum, ueluti innuere uolens quod Societas soli sibi arrogare nitatur omnia (16). i. e. "Perhaps from the Greek words ueros uerba (alone all), as though "the Jesuits pretended that they alone were sufficient "for every thing, and must be esteemed such; for "this is an allusion to a satyrical invention of an "anonymous writer, who published the Monarchy of "the Solipfi, as though he would hint thereby, that "the Society of the Jesuits endeavoured to arrogate "every thing to themselves alone."

INNOCENT VIII, elected Pope in the year 1484, was of Genoa, and his name was John Baptist Cibo. Authors differ with regard to the nobility or meanness of this extraction [A]. But it is agreed that he was sent to the Court of Naples in his youth, and that he waited on King Alphonsus. He went afterwards to Rome, and was one of the Cardinal of Bologna's servants; and this, I think, was the occasion of his being promoted to the Bishopric of Savona (a). Pope Sixtus IV, who had a great friendship for him, gave him the Bishopric of Melfi, and afterwards a Cardinal's Cap. One of the first actions, which Innocent VIII did after he was raised to the Papal dignity, was his entering into a conspiracy against Ferdinand King of Naples with the Barons of that Kingdom. He sent for Robert Sanseverini to Rome, and conferred upon him the command of the army in the expedition against that Prince; but as he had no reasons to be well

[A] Authors differ with regard to the nobility or meanness of his extraction.] We shall see hereunder (1), that he had been a poor boy according to Volaterranus. Onuphrius Panvini asserts the same in one of his books (2), and supposes that he was born of a mean family, and that his father was a Physician. But he speaks quite otherwise in another work (3); for he expatiates there upon the ancientness and nobility of the house of Cibo, he makes Innocent VIII to be the son of Aaron Cibo, a Nobleman of Geneva, illustrious for his military actions, Governor of Naples under the Kings Rhenus, and Alfonso, and famous for the office of a Roman Senator, the functions of which he had gloriously performed (4). It is supposed (5), that Panvini corrected his former account upon reading the Funeral Oration on the death of Pope Innocent VIII, delivered by Leonelli, Bishop of Concordia, who was sure to speak of Aaron Cibo's noble extraction and employments. It is a little surprizing, that so learned an Historian as Panvini was, who was also a Monk, and lived soon after this Pope, should have been unacquainted with the merit and great employments of Innocent VIII's father, and should have known him rather as a Physician and Commoner, than in the glorious character of a Nobleman of Genoa, a Governor of Naples, and a Roman Senator. Several persons will imagine, that when Panvini retracted his former assertions, he conformed not so much to the exact truth, as to the notions of the Preacher who made Innocent's Funeral Oration, a kind of discourse which admits of flattery without measure. Let the reader judge of this what he pleases; but I would advise him to remember, that exaggerations are often made use of to disgrace the former condition of those, who rise to the highest posts (6).

(†) It was translated into French and printed at Amsterdam in 12mo. The Translator added some remarks, and several other pieces to it. The Preface contains a great many particulars concerning that work and its author. Addit. to the Amst. edit.

(7) Vide Placcium, in Rhodianis, num. 59. pag. 43.

(8) Christoph. Pellerus, in Politico scelerato impugnatione, pag. 9. edit. 1665.

(9) Biblioth. vet. & nova, p. 417.

(10) Otto Tabor, in Prefat. ad Disputationes de confrontatione, apud Placcium in Rhodianis, pag. 43.

(a) You will find in Moreri, that Paul II gave him that Bishopric.

(1) In the remark [E].

(2) In Commentario de Pontificibus & Cardinalibus.

(3) In Vita Innocentii VIII.

(4) See Spondanus, Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 1484, num. 5. pag. m. 180.

(5) Ibid.

(11) De Scriptis Adsporis, pag. 93. edit. 1686.

(12) There is Pecker, in the edition of Decker printed in 1686.

(13) Morale Pratique, tom. 3. pag. 686.

(14) Ibid. pag. 86.

(15) Vol. 3. pag. 685, 686.

(16) Papebroch. Elucid. Hist. Act. in Controversia Carmelitica, cap. 10. pag. 138.

(6) See the remark [A] of the article TOUCHET.

well pleased with this General's conduct, he turned him out of his place, and made a treaty of peace with Ferdinand. The terms of this treaty were, that the King of Naples would pardon the rebels, and pay to the holy See the tribute which he owed; but he performed neither of these conditions, and rendered ineffectual all the measures which the Pope took, to get satisfaction for this infringement [B]. After this Innocent VIII would not engage any more in a war, and applied himself intirely to make the city of Rome reap the benefits of peace [C]. He took care to have provisions plentiful and cheap in that city, and caused all robbers to be punished severely. He created new offices, the sale of which brought him in large sums of money; he was the first Pope who ever boasted of his bastards, and who loaded them with riches [D]. He was a handsome man,

[B] Ferdinand . . . rendered ineffectual all the measures which the Pope took to get satisfaction for this infringement.] The author from whom I borrow this article, does not tell us, that Innocent VIII excommunicated King Ferdinand; he observes only the Pope's Deputies returned home without succeeding in their commission. Quorum neutrum Ferdinandus quum postea minimè præstaret, missus Petrus Vincentinus camera auditor audacissimus, una simul cum Jacobo Volaterrano Secretario Apostolico ac cubiculario viro prudente ad res re- (7) Volaterranus, petendas re infecta revertit (7). i. e. "As Ferdinand lib. 22. pag. 821. performed neither of the conditions, Peter Vincentius, Auditor of the chamber, a very haughty man, being sent with James Volaterranus, Apoitto- lical Secretary, and Chamberlain to the Pope, a prudent man, to demand satisfaction, returned home without obtaining any thing." To supply Volaterranus's omissions, I shall transcribe here Coeffeteau's words. "As Ferdinand had not performed the conditions of the treaty he had made with him (the Pope) he sent to ask him the tribute which he owed to the church; but Ferdinand did not give his Embassadors much satisfaction, upon which the Pope thundered out a sentence of excommunication against him, deprived him of his Kingdom, and declared Charles King of France lawful heir of it, in right of King Renuus of Sicily, and of his brother the Count of Maine (8)."

[C] He would not engage any more in war, and applied himself intirely to make the city of Rome reap the benefits of the peace.] You will see here how difficult it is for a Pope to acquit himself of his functions to the satisfaction of mankind. For if the Popes are blamed, when they pretend to meddle with the political affairs of Europe, they are also blamed when they do not meddle with them, in which case it is asserted, that they are of no use to the public good. Guicciardini has given us this notion of Innocent VIII. He adds indeed an observation to it, which softens his censure; for he observes, that the idleness, in which the Pope indulged himself, was attended with this good effect; namely, that nothing was apprehended from him that could disturb the tranquillity of Italy. You will see this fact related with a parenthesis of a Protestant Divine. "Guicciardini gives us the following character of Innocent VIII. His life, which otherwise was of no use to the public (a noble qualification in a Pope), was however attended with this advantage, that having on a sudden laid down his arms, which he had unluckily taken up in the beginning of his Pontificate, against Ferdinand, at the instigation of several Barons of the Kingdom of Naples, he indulged himself afterwards only in IDLE PLEASURES; so that he had not the least thought nor design, neither for his own, nor for his relation's advantage, that could in the least disturb the tranquillity of Italy (9)." They, who will take notice of the parenthesis, will easily understand, that if I choose rather to quote Rivet's words, than Guicciardini's original, it is because they are a proof of my assertion. Would to God that men committed no other faults but such as promote the public tranquillity!

[D] He was the first Pope that boasted of his bastards, and who loaded them with riches.] Volaterranus speaks of it thus: Pontificum etiam primus qui novum & ipse exemplum introduceret palam liberos nobis jactandi, ac soluta omni antiqua disciplina divitiis eos omnibus cumulandi (10). i. e. "He was also the first Pope who gave a new example of boasting publickly of his bastard children, and loading them with all sorts of riches, having entirely relaxed the ancient discipline." He mentions only one son and one daughter of this Pope; and he observes, that the former obtained from his father some cities in the neighbourhood of Rome, with the advantage of being son-in-law to Laurence of Medicis; and that he married his daughter (11) to a Genoese, and gave her a very great portion (12). Moreri has blundered here: he asserts, that Innocent VIII left two sons behind him very rich, whom he had got before he was raised to the Papal See. This is a mistake both with regard to the sex and to the number of these bastards; there were sixteen of them, eight sons and eight daughters, upon which this epigram was made:

*Quid queris testes, sit mas an femina Cibo,
Respice natorum, pignora certa, gregem;
Octo nocens pueros genuit, totidemque puellas.
Hunc merito poterit dicere Roma patrem.*

"Why would you inquire for witnesses, to know whether Cibo is a man, or a woman? Do but look upon the number of his children; they are a certain proof of what he is: he has wickedly begotten eight boys, and as many girls; so that Rome may justly call him father."

According to Monsieur du Pleffis (13), these four verses are an epitaph, which Marcellus composed for Innocent VIII; but I do not meet with them in my edition (14) of that Poet's works; nor do I think that they were omitted out of regard to the Court of Rome; for they have left the following verses in it.

*Epitaph. Innocentii Octavi.
Spurcities, gula, avaritia, atque ignavia deses
Hoc Octave jacent quo tegeris tumulo* (15).

"The Epitaph of Innocent the Eighth. Villainy, gluttony, covetousness, and slothful laziness lie here in this tomb, Innocent, in which you are buried."

We also meet there with the following epigram.

*De Xysto & hæred.
Exhausti Xystus bellis & cædibus urbem;
Tercentena hæres restituit sobole* (16).

"On Pope Sixtus and his successor. Sixtus has drained the City of men by wars and murders: his successor has peopled it again with three hundred children of his own."

Mr. du Pleffis asserts, that the former of these two distichs is the conclusion of the epitaph, or four lines, which I have transcribed in the first place. I do not know whether or not he made use of an edition different from mine, or whether he followed some inaccurate transcriber; but I am certain that the author of the Well-grounded prepossessions against Popery asserted without any examination (17), that the character of Pope Innocent VIII was expressed after his death in six Latin verses, which he transcribes. They are an epigram, the last distich of which is the epitaph, which is really to be met with amongst Marullus's Poems. The two first distichs are those four lines which are not in my edition, neither before the epitaph nor in any other place. Mr. Zuinger (18) Professor at Basil, supposes that these six lines are two of Marullus's Epigrams; however he has shewed more good sense than the author of the Prepossessions; he has not joined

(7) Volaterranus, lib. 22. pag. 821.

(8) Coeffeteau, Réponse au Mistré d'Iniquité, pag. 1209.

(9) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mistré d'Iniquité, Part 2. pag. 626, 627. What he quotes from Guicciardini is towards the beginning of the 1st book.

(10) Volaterranus, lib. 22. pag. 822.

(11) Her name was Theodorina.
(12) Gerardo whom he had got before he was raised to the Papal See. Usumari Genensium nuptiam opibus pet quam magnis ornavit. Volaterranus, lib. 22. pag. 821.

(13) Du Pleffis Mornai Mythes d'Iniquité, pag. 559.

(14) Printed at Spire in the year 1595.

(15) Marcell. Epigram. lib. 4. pag. m. 84.

(16) Idem, lib. 3. pag. 60.

(17) Jurieu, Pré-jugem Legitimes, Part 1. pag. 247.

(18) Jo. Zuinger, de Fæsto Corporis Christi, pag. 135.

man, polite to an excess, but covetous, ignorant, and of an indifferent genius [E]. He died in July 1492, at the age of sixty. He had received a considerable present from the Sultan, namely the head of the spear, with which our Lord's side had been pierced [F]. It together what ought to be separated. As for the following epigram of Sannazar,

Innocuo prius æquum est debere Quirites, Progenie exhaustam restituit patriam,

"The antient Romans are justly obligated to Innocent, since he has peopled again with his own children their country, which was drained of men."

Mr. Zuinger, I say, is in the right to quote this epigram as Sannazar's, for it is really to be met amongst his Poems (19). Coeffeteau was in a great perplexity when he came to answer that part of Monsieur du Pleffis's book, which relates to Pope Innocent's bastards. Let us transcribe Coeffeteau's words. "Du Pleffis, not being able to asperse Innocent with regard to his lawful marriage (for he had been married before he was chosen Pope) quotes an obscure writer, who asserts that this Pope was the first that took a pride in having bastards. And to confirm this assertion, he transcribes an epitaph written by Marullus, who yet speaks there only of the children which Innocent had got in lawful marriage. Now none of these authors are worthy to be credited, and they all deserve to be severely punished for the licentiousness with which they wrote, having taken liberty thus to asperse with their calumnies the supreme head of the church. And indeed the good Historians do not accuse Innocent VIII of any of those wickednesses, which the obscene Poet Marullus charges him with. However we are willing to let him enjoy the privileges of his profession (20)."

The absurdity of this answer of Coeffeteau, will plainly appear by Rivet's reply. "This Pope's pleasures, says he, had not always been idle, for he got a great many children. If it had been in lawful marriage, before he was a Priest, he could not have been blamed for it. And if Coeffeteau had quoted credible authors to prove this assertion, he would have vindicated the Pope's memory to some purpose. But I do not meet with any author who asserted that this Pope had been married. And as for the writer who observes, that he was the first Pope who gave a new example of boasting publicly of his bastard children, he is no obscure writer, as my adversary would make us believe, but that Volaterranus, whom not long ago he called a great man, and an orthodox writer . . . Coeffeteau could not but know this author, but he dissembled it, and fell only upon the poor Poet Marullus, as though he had been the inventor of that story, and he calls him an obscene Poet. But let him consult his Possévinus, who will tell him that this Marullus (*) lived in the Church of Rome with the reputation of a pious man, and his works have often been printed at Antwerp, at Cologne, and elsewhere (21)." I observe that there is a sin of commission, and not of omission, in these words of Rivet. The latter is his not censuring Coeffeteau's audaciousness, with regard to Marullus's verses (22): He asserts that this Poet speaks only of the children which Innocent had got in a lawful marriage. But in this case, what can be the sense of the word nocens (criminal), which we read in the third line? Does it not signify that he became a father in a criminal manner? The sin of commission consists in his pretending that Marullus of Spalato, whom Possévinus commended, is the same Marullus, whose poems are so well known. They are two different persons.

[E] He was a handsome man, polite to an excess; but covetous, ignorant, of an indifferent genius.] Let us quote a Roman Catholic author, for a Protestant might be excepted against. Fuit Innocentius corpore excelso, ac candido, decoroque: ingenio tardo, ac literis procal (23). i. e. "Innocent was tall, fair and handsome, but of a slow genius, and had no inclination for literature." He had said a little before (24): Pauper olim puer, forma tamen præstanti inter Alfonso regis Siciliae ministros (25) inde Romam veniens in contubernio Philippi Cardinalis Bononiensis fuit . . . Quum Xysto plurimum dilectus esset ob dulces mores & humanitatem qua omnes usque ad vitium superavit. Nam & infirmæ conditionis homines sæpe exosculabatur, amplectebaturque. Verum quum omnibus blandus esset, nemini tamen benignus, innatamque avaritiam jocos atque disteriis transigebat. i. e. "Formerly when he was a poor boy but very handsome, he was one of the under-servants of Alfonso King of Sicily. He went afterwards to Rome, and lived in the family of Philip Cardinal of Bologna . . . Pope Sixtus had a great friendship for him on account of his sweet temper, and politeness, in which he excelled all others, even to an excess. For he would often kiss and embrace even persons of the meanest condition. But though he was civil to all, yet he was kind to none, and his jokes and jests he disguised that covetousness, which was born with him." Monsieur du Pleffis Mornai imagined, that Volaterranus hinted there by modest expressions the infamy of Innocent VIII's private life (26). Upon which Coeffeteau fell into a passion. "It is a strange thing, says he (27), that he would reckon his natural beauty as a crime, and suspect him from thence of that sin, which was punished with fire from heaven; which against all the rules of charity, and even against all the rules of that civil behaviour we owe to each other, he would confirm by this Prelate's great affability, which made him embrace even persons of the meanest condition. Reader, must not a man's mind be extremely corrupted by heresy, to pass so odious a judgment on a Pope, who was commendable for his singular innocence?"

[F] He had received from the Sultan . . . the head of the spear, with which our Lord's side had been pierced.] Bajazet II dreading his brother, even after he had obliged him to retire to Rhodes, tried all possible means to persuade the Grand Master, Peter d'Aubusson, to deliver him up to him, or at least to prevent him from having any correspondence with the Turks. The Grand-Master engaged himself upon very advantageous terms to have him well guarded. The articles of this agreement were signed December 8, 1482 (28). He suffered him to go into France some time after, and consented at last that Innocent VIII should have him in his power, and receive the money which Bajazet paid (29). He obtained a Cardinal's cap as a reward for it, and took the precaution to shelter himself under the authority of the King of France; for it was the French Court that delivered the Turkish Prince into the hands of the Pope's Embassadors in the year 1488 (30). Bajazet had made the King of France very considerable offers, "only to prevail upon him to keep the young Prince in his own Kingdom in safe custody, so that it might not be in his power to make his escape, to return into his own country, and begin a new war there. These offers were, that he would give him all the relics of God our Creator, of the Apostles, of the male and female Saints, which his late father Mahomet had met with at Constantinople, when he took that city, and in all the other cities which he had conquered from the Christians; he repeated the same offers, which he had already made to the Grand-Master of Rhodes, namely, that he would do his best endeavours to conquer the Holy Land, and to deliver it up to the King; he offered him also a very considerable pension for his maintenance (31)." Bajazet's Letter came too late: it had already been promised to commit his brother to the care and keeping of Innocent VIII. As soon as he was acquainted with this, he wrote to the Pope, and endeavoured to prevail upon him by presents, and particularly by offering him the head of the spear, which had pierced the side of our Lord, which he had already offered to the Grand-Master, and he assured him, that he would punctually pay him 40000 ducats yearly, on condition that he would not let him go away for whatsoever pretence it might be (32). Volaterranus mentions this; it is proper to transcribe the whole passage: the reader will meet with other particulars in it, he will see, that Innocent VIII was buried near the shrine in which was contained the head of the spear found at Antioch at the time of the crusades (33).

Sepultus

(19) It is the 38th of the 1st book, pag. 124. of the edition published at Amsterdam in the year 1689.

(20) Coeffeteau, Reponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1209.

(*) Marcus Marullus Spalatinus.

(21) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 627.

(22) That is to say the verses which he confessed were written by Marullus.

(23) Volaterranus, lib. 22. pag. 821.

(24) Ibidem, ibid. pag. 820.

(25) The Sieur de Roccolles, in pag. 123. of his Vie du Sultan Gemes, says that he waited on an Officer of Alfonso's Court; and in the next page that he had been a footman in his youth.

(26) Du Pleffis Mornai, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 558.

(27) Coeffeteau, Reponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1208.

(28) See Roccolles, Vie du Sultan Gemes, p. 91.

(29) Bajazet paid 40000 ducats yearly, besides 35000 for his brother's maintenance. Ibid. pag. 92.

(30) Ibid. pag. 126.

(31) Roccolles, Vie du Sultan Gemes, pag. 127 & 128.

(32) Ibid. pag. 142.

(33) See the Histoire des Croisades, written by the Jesuit Maimbourg, lib. 2. page 178, &c. of the Dutch edition, under the year 1089.

(b) Taken from Volaterran. lib. 22. pag. m. 820, & seq.

It is reported, that the title which had been put on the cross was found at Rome under his reign (b). See in Father Gretser how the Roman Catholics endeavour to answer the objections that are urged to prove that this title is spurious (c).

(c) Gretser, Exam. Mysterii Plezzani, pag. 549, & ult.

Sepultus in Basilica Petri arco monumento juxta arcam ab eo designatam, in qua ferrum bastæ conditur quod latus dominicum perdidit. Hoc siquidem olim apud eadem sancti Andreae Antiochia repertum, capta jam civitate, Boemundus in prælio corripens, arcem quæ expugnari non poterat illico cepit, simul & hostium x. milia prodigiöse trucidavit. Inde Constantinopolim domo imperatori aduersum. Postremo Turca illi succedens, Innocentio ut eum

“ in St. Andrew’s church at Antioch, and that city “ being taken, Boemundus seized upon this relic during the battle, upon which the fort, which till then “ could not be mastered, was immediately taken, and “ 50000 men were slain by Boemundus. This relic “ was carried thence to Constantinople, the Emperor “ having made a present of it to that city. The Turk “ succeeding him afterwards, sent it as a present to “ Innocent, with a design to draw him over to his “ interest, on account of his brother who was Innocent’s prisoner.” See the article VIGERUS (35).

(94) Volaterran. fratris captivi causa leniret, pro munere miserat (34). lib. 22. pag. 821, i. e. “ He is buried in St. Peter’s church, under a braft “ tomb, near the shrine which he had appointed, and “ in which is contained the head of the spear, which “ pierced our Lord’s side. It had been formerly found

(35) Remark [A].

INNOCENT XI, created Pope September the 21st 1676, was of Como in Lombardy; his name was Benedict Odeschalchi, as you may see in Moreri’s Dictionary, where you will also meet with several other particulars, which for that reason I shall omit here. He bore arms in his youth [A]; and left them afterwards to enter into the Ecclesiastical State. He went to study at Naples, where he commenced Doctor; after which he retired to Rome, under Pope Urban VIII, who appointed him first Apostolic Secretary. He acquitted himself so well of that employment, that he was promoted to that of President of the Apostolic Chamber, and then to that of Apostolic Commissary, and Governor of the Marca di Roma. He was made a Cardinal March the 6th 1645, and soon after he was sent Legate to Ferrara, and then promoted to the Bishopric of Novara (a). The French reported that his liberality and court artifices procured him the Cardinal’s Cap, by Donna Olympia’s credit [B]; but they must confess that he appeared to have a great aversion for a voluptuous life. He was a man of strict morals, and had the reputation of a religious man. He favoured the Jansenists much more than his predecessors had done; which made the Jansenists adhere to the cause of the Pope with more zeal than they had done before [C]. He gave offence to an infinite number of persons,

(a) Taken from a piece containing but 16 pages in 4to, and intitled, La Vie d’Innocent XI, Pape de Rome, écrite par D. G. B. P. à l’Illustre Seigneur le Baron Giovannelli, Coufin de sa Sainteté.

[A] He bore arms in his youth. Here follows what we read in the pamphlet of sixteen pages (1). “ Benedict therefore had a mind in his younger days “ to exert himself in the profession of a soldier, for he “ had a great deal of courage and bravery, though he “ was not very tall; and as if he had foreseen the “ wars in which he was to be engaged in his old age, “ he desired chiefly to improve himself in the knowledge of the art of war, that he might afterwards “ carry it on to an advantage in the church militant.” The reasoning in these words is not much better than the style; but this is out of the question here. Let us only observe, that this author gives us to understand that his Benedict bore arms only in Poland. And yet other writers assert (2), that he also bore arms in Flanders under the Spaniards against the French, and that he was wounded there with a musket shot in his right shoulder, of which he continued indisposed all his life-time. I have read in I know not what news-writer, that Innocent XI’s indignation against France was owing to an affront he received from a certain Frenchman in the army, and which Benedict Odeschalchi suffered to go unpunished, but of which he revenged himself on the whole French nation, when he came to be Pope.

“ given her several entertainments, she began to make “ interest for him very zealously, particularly for an “ action which this prelate did, and which deserves to “ be related. As he was gone to pay her a visit, in “ the beginning of the reign of her uncle (6) Pope “ Innocent X, it happened that a Silver-smith came to “ her house to shew her a very rich and beautiful silver “ chest which he had to sell. After she had examined “ it some time she said, in the presence of Odeschalchi and of several Lords, who heard her answer, “ that it was a beautiful piece of plate, but as she “ was a poor widow, she could not go to the price of “ it: having said this she retired into her chamber. “ Odeschalchi called the Silver-smith immediately, “ asked him the price of that piece of plate, and “ agreed with him to buy it for eight thousand crowns, “ after which, without more words, he sent it with a “ compliment to Donna Olympia, who seeing so fine a “ present, wondered at this extraordinary action, and “ went immediately to meet the Pope, and asked him “ the post of Clerk to the Chamber as a present for the “ prelate, and afterwards a Cardinal’s cap, which he “ obtained also by Cardinal Palotta’s intercession.” I transcribe these words according to the copy which has been communicated to me (7). I have the same “ book in Italian; it is intitled La giusta Statera de’ Porporati, and was printed at Geneva in the year 1650. I have examined it, and met in it not only with the “ passage you have just now read, but also with some “ other particulars, namely, that our Benedict Odeschalchi had paid his attendance to Don Barberini, in order to be promoted to the post of Clerk of the Chamber, that he had paid him the money that is required, and that nevertheless he could not compass his design; that he was a man of an indifferent understanding (8), and that though he had spent large “ sums of money, yet he was a rich and liberal Cardinal; that when he was but a Bishop, he loved to “ make parties of pleasure, and was very fond of plays, and entertainments, but that he led a very retired life after he was a Cardinal.

(6) It should be her brother-in-law.

(7) By Monsieur Pillardy, whom I have mentioned above, quotation (e) of the article GLEICHEN.

(8) E soggetto di mediocre intelligenza.

[B] His liberality and court-artifices procured him the Cardinal’s cap, by Donna Olympia’s credit. See the Mercurio Galant (3); you will find there, that our Benedict Odeschalchi, who was the son of a rich Banker of Como, used to game with Donna Olympia, and lost his money designedly out of complaisance to that woman. The mentioning of a Banker calls to my mind the following passage in the Menagiana (4). “ Pope “ Innocent XI was a Banker’s son: he was elected “ Pope on St. Matthew’s-day; and that very day “ Palquin said, Invenerunt hominem sedentem in telonio. i. e. “ They have met with a man sitting at “ the receipt of custom.”

We meet with the following passage in a small pamphlet printed at Avignon for John Bramereau in the year 1652, which is intitled, La juste Balance des Cardinaux vivans. i. e. “ A true Balance of the Cardinals now living.” “ After the death of Urban VIII, “ Odeschalchi began to make his court to Donna Olympia, Innocent X’s niece (5), and after he had

[C] The Jansenists adhered to the cause of the Popes with more zeal, than they had done before. This is what Monsieur Talon censures them for in the famous plea he made against Innocent XI, January 23, 1688.

(1) See the title of it in the margin of the text of this article, quotation (a).

(2) Mercurio Galant, sur August 1689.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Page 185. of the 1st edition printed in Holland.

(5) It should have been sister-in-law, for this is the sense of the word cognata, which is in the Italian original.

by suppressing an office of the Immaculate Conception, and several Indulgences. None but the Janfenists were pleased with this in France. They dispersed his two decrees, and added some remarks to them [D]. I do not believe that his prohibiting severely to pay any honour to the name and bones of Anthony Cala [E] was generally approved. He shewed an inflexible obstinacy in his contests with France, by which he convinced all the world, that persons who pretend to a strict morality, exceed all others when they design to revenge themselves [F]. It is pretended that a voluptuous Pope, but who at the

(9) Talon, Play-doyer, pag. 42. of the Dutch edition.

It is a strange thing, says he (9), that the Pope, whose chief care ought to be to keep our faith uncorrupted, and to prevent the spreading of new opinions, should not have ceased, since he is raised to St. Peter's See, to keep a correspondence with those, who publicly profess themselves to be the followers of Janfenius, whose doctrine all his predecessors have condemned. He has loaded them with favours, he has made their elogies, he has declared himself their protector; and this dangerous faction, which during the space of thirty years has omitted nothing that could lessen the authority of all the spiritual and temporal superiors, who would not favour it, does now raise altars to the Pope, because he supports and encourages its cabal, which would again have disturbed the peace of the church, had not its progress been stopped by the prudence and indefatigable labours of a Prince, sent by Heaven to be the protector and defender of the faith. I do not think that any Janfenist ever undertook to write a vindication of the four propositions agreed upon by the French Clergy in the year 1682, against which the supporters of the Italian doctrines have exclaimed so loudly, and published so many books. If the same thing had happened under Pope Innocent X, or Alexander VII, it is certain that the Janfenists would have composed a thousand volumes to vindicate the decisions of the clergy, and to refute the writings of the Italians. The weakness of man appears in every thing; the rules of our conduct differ according to the times we live in, and as we happen to be well or ill disposed towards some persons. The same doctrines, which we spare out of gratitude towards a benefactor, are censured and exploded out of resentment against an oppressor.

[D]. . . They dispersed two of his decrees, and added some remarks to them.] The one was given at Rome February the 17th 1678, and condemns the book intitled Officio dell' immacolata concezione della Santissima Vergine nostra Signora, approvato dal sommo Pontefice Paolo V, il quale à chi devotamente lo recitarà concede indulgenza di cento giorni, come apparisce nel suo breve dato in Roma li x. Luglio M DC XV. in Milano per Francesco Vigone. i. e. "The Office of the Immaculate Conception of the most blessed Virgin our Lady, approved by Pope Paul V, who grants an Indulgence for an hundred days, to those who repeat it with devotion, as appears by his Brief dated from Rome July the 10th, 1615. Printed at Milan, for Francis Vigone." The other decree was given at Rome March the 17th 1678, and abrogates a great many indulgences. The Janfenists took care to have these two decrees secretly printed in France, and added some rules to it, by which the readers might know how useful they were; they are made up of a collection of passages. It will be of some use to transcribe here the reflection of a Jesuit concerning the eager zeal of the Janfenists with regard to these decrees, and concerning the little account they make of the Pope's constitutions against Janfenius. "Some years ago they put into the Index at Rome an Italian book printed at Milan, which contains the office of the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God. The prohibition did not relate to the office of the Conception, which has been a long while known and admitted in the Church, and which has been again approved since by Innocent XI. But this decree related to some other matters which are either false or rash, and which happened to be printed with the same book: and besides the decree was made for Italy only, and not for the rest of the world, where this little book could not certainly be published. And yet this decree was immediately printed and published both in Latin and in French by some persons of that party (the Janfenists) with a rhapsody of passages which were nothing to the purpose, and designed only to make it swell to the bulk of a considerable pamphlet. It was dispersed, I say, through all France and the Low-Countries with as much care and diligence as though it had been a Canon of some General Council upon a most important doctrine of religion; and it is well known to what an excess some of their Ghostly Fathers carried their inconsiderate zeal. Thus you see how far these Gentlemen know how to submit to the orders of the Church, when they please. Would not this make us think, that as soon as the Pope (10) should prohibit the translation of the New Testament published at Mons, they would no longer dispute it nor recommend it to the world? And had we not reason to expect, that they would do no less with regard to his new decree in favour of the office of the Conception, than they had done for the first, which I have mentioned? But we should have been very much disappointed in our expectations. They act upon other principles with regard to those things, in which they are themselves concerned (11).

[F] He prohibited the paying any honour to the name and bones of Anthony Cala.] This man had been a long time venerated as an holy Hermit in the Kingdom of Naples; but Innocent XI in the year 1680 commanded to suppress all that worship, and ordered to carry Anthony Cala's bones into a common Church-yard, to be there mixed with the other bones, and never to be carried off again. He also ordered to remove his images, clothes and other relics from all consecrated places (12). Father Papebroch quotes this instance to justify the liberty he took to suppress some saints.

[F] When they design to revenge themselves.] The Court of France under Lewis XIV and the Court of Rome under Innocent XI were acted upon by the same spirit of haughtiness and inflexibility, and have thus presented all Europe with a long scene in which they tried which of the two would gain the greatest reputation with regard to such a spirit. They vied with each other who would be most openly revenged. But at least the civil world was obliged to yield to the Church. The Pope shewed that it is not without reason he styles himself the Vicegerent of God upon Earth; of God, I say, who keeps to himself the right of revenge (13), and declares that to him belongeth vengeance, and that he will take it. The Pope as Lieutenant of the God of Vengeance, has admirably well asserted the rights and privileges of that noble Lieutenantcy. I do not admit of the thoughts of those satyrical wits, who pretend that in matters of revenge laymen are but unskillful beginners, if compared with Clergymen; but there have been few controversies between the civil world and the Church, in which the Popes have not at last gained the upperhand, and been much beyond the laymen in point of revenge. They are the Vicars and Proxies of God, who has kept vengeance to himself; which is saying all that can be said. If my memory does not fail me, the first step, which exasperated the Court of France, was the protestion which Innocent XI granted to some French Bishops (14) who were persecuted because they would not consent to the extension of the Regale. The reason why the Court of France was so angry, was that the briefs of Pope Innocent XI (15) in behalf of these Bishops contained very strong and smart expressions. When they had observed this haughtiness, they resolved to make use of the most effectual means to vex him. The French Clergy delivered (16) their opinions concerning the power of the Church, and drew up four propositions upon this subject, by which the Pope's power is confined within such narrow bounds, as are very odious to the Court of Rome. But after all this was no new doctrine; the Clergy determined nothing but what was agreeable to the maxims of the Church of France, and what the Sorbonne had taught an hundred times over. Men might therefore have imagined that any other Pope would not have taken offence at it, and that

(10) He means Innocent XI, who had condemned the Translation printed at Mons.

(11) Father Le Tellier, Observations sur la nouvelle Defense de la Version de Mons, pag. 422.

(12) See Father Papebroch, in Respons. ad Exhibitionem Errorum pag. 18, 19.

(13) Deut. xxxii 35.

(14) See a Catalogue of several other reasons of discontent which the Court of France had, and which were posterior to this, in the Answer to the Marquis of Lo-wardin's Protest, pag. m. 97, &c.

(15) Directed to the King of France in the year 1678, and in the year 1679.

(16) In the year 1681.

Innocent

the same time had known how to make his own private passions a sacrifice to political views, had been much more useful to the Roman Catholic party [G]. The French are very Innocent XI would perhaps conceal his grief; but in order to put him under a necessity to confess, that he had received a very great affront, the determinations of the Clergy were proposed, by the King's authority, as a doctrine, which no person whatsoever would be suffered to contradict, and which all they, who designed to take their degrees in Divinity or in the Canon Law, and commence Doctors, would be obliged to hold and maintain. Those propositions were asserted by the Rector of the University of Paris in a public disputation, at which the Archbishop of Paris presided, and in which the disputant was in all his formalities as Rector, that it might appear it was the whole body of the University, represented by the head of it, that asserted these propositions. The Thesis was posted up at the door of the Nuncio's house, in spite of all the opposition he pretended to make against it. The Pope shewed his resentment openly against the Clergy; he made a severe answer to a letter he received from them, and would never grant bulls to those who had been present at the Assembly held in the year 1682. He abrogated all the immunities of the French Ambassador, as well as those of the others, and he would never receive the Marquess de Lavardin who was sent Ambassador to him (27). Hereupon France did a bold action: that Ambassador entered Rome in a manner sword in hand, and having taken possession of his privileged quarters, he caused it to be guarded as though it had been a strong hold (18). The Pope, without shewing any concern, revenged himself in a surprising manner; he shut up St. Lewis's Church, because the Marquiss of Lavardin had been suffered to come into it; he excommunicated that Ambassador, and persisted in his resolution not to acknowledge him as such.

Things were in that pass, when his most Christian Majesty, observing that the continuing of these disputes would be detrimental to him, sent secretly to Rome a person whom he could trust, and to whom he gave a credential letter written in his own hand for his Holiness (19). This person was to acquaint the Pope with the King's most secret intentions. But the Pope would neither receive his letter, nor give him audience. Whereupon the King wrote another letter to Cardinal d'Etrée, which was communicated to the other Cardinals. His Majesty complained therein of the Pope's behaviour, and shewed particularly what prejudice all Europe and the Church might receive from what the Pope had already done against the Cardinal of Furstenberg. To this partiality he ascribed the measures that were taking against King James in favour of the Protestant Religion, &c. This letter being dispersed through the city of Rome was perhaps a new reason, which determined the Pope to support more and more the cause of Prince Clement of Bavaria against the Cardinal of Furstenberg. Now by giving this Cardinal the exclusion he revenged himself fully of all the affronts he might have received: he robbed the French King of the advantage of being the sole arbiter of peace and war, and forced him, whether he would or not, to engage in a war against all Europe. He perceived very soon what were the consequences of this conduct; and though he did not live long after so dreadful a revenge, yet he lived long enough to have the satisfaction of seeing France attacked by so many enemies, that it was a general opinion she must absolutely sink and be undone at the very first campaign. Who will say then that the Church did not get the victory over the civil world in a long trial who should better be revenged? If Alexander the Great had been a Roman Catholic, he had found it a very difficult matter in a struggle with the Pope to make him say the words which he forced from the Priestests of Delphos; My Son, thou art invincible. Delphos invisit, Apollinem de eventu belli, quod moliebatur, consulturus. Sed Virgo fatidica negabat, *per eos dies adiri deum fas esse; donec ipse eo profectus, vi conripuit virginem, & ad templum traxit. Sed quum inter eundem illa patrium morem pertinacia regis victum reputans, exclamasset, invidus es, fili; accipere omen dixit: nec alio oraculo sibi opus esse (20). "Alexander went to Delphos to consult Apollo about the war which he designed to undertake. But the* Virgin Prophetess told him it was not lawful to consult the God in those days. Wherefore he went thither himself, took her by force, and dragged her to the temple. As they went along she considered that that King's obstinacy made her break through the custom of their ancestors, and she cried out, My son, thou art invincible. I accept the omen, said he, nor have I occasion for any other oracle."

[G] It is pretended that a voluptuous Pope... had been much more useful to the Roman Catholic Party.] They who do not love this Pope assert that he was sufficiently acquainted with the general condition of Europe to know, that considering the situation affairs were in, when the Cardinal of Furstenberg claimed the Electorate of Cologne, it was in his power to save the King of England, and to furnish France with the necessary means to execute whatever she would think fit to undertake; for with the assistance of such a Cardinal, who would have inherited the whole estate of his predecessor, the French King would have tied up the hands of all the German Princes, who were ill-affected to him. They had experienced this in the year 1684, when France desired a truce. Now it is certain that the victories which France might have gained would have extended the Roman Catholic Religion farther, and strangely weakened the Protestant interest. Why then was the Pope so much against that Cardinal? It is, say some, because he hated the King of France, and chose to sacrifice the interest of the Roman Religion rather than deprive himself of the pleasure he took in vexing his enemy, and renounce the sweets of revenge. The same persons say that he knew very well there was an alliance upon the carpet, of which the Protestants were to have the chief direction, and which might become capable of oppressing the Roman Catholic Religion throughout all Europe: and that the most effectual method that could be imagined to prevent that alliance, was to confer the whole estate of the late Elector of Cologne on a Cardinal, who would never enter into a confederacy with heretical Princes. Why then did Innocent XI oppose this Cardinal's interest so strongly? It is, say they, because he was overjoyed to have an opportunity to expose the French Monarchy to the greatest dangers; and if he could but revenge himself of the Court of France, he was very little concerned for the detriment which Popery might receive. This is what his enemies said; we ought not to lay too much stress upon it; their anger must make us mistrust their conjectures. It is perhaps much more reasonable to think that Innocent XI, applying himself very much to the reformation of manners, and to religious exercises, was not capable either of knowing what was really advantageous to his religion, or of preferring what is profitable to what is honest. Now he imagined it was but just to prefer the Elector of Bavaria's brother before the Cardinal who claimed the Electorate. Some apply to Innocent XI what was said of Hadrian VI. He was an honest man, but unacquainted with the intrigues of politicians (21). It was a great happiness for the Protestants, that the See of Rome in the year 1688 happened to be filled by a Pope, who was either unacquainted with his own true interest, or too obstinate to improve the opportunities he met with, when they chanced to clash with his own private passions.

But after all, who could prove that Innocent XI did not in some respects follow the rules of a wise policy? Has the Court of Rome nothing to dread from the excessive power even of those Princes, who are most bitterly exasperated against the sects that are separated from the Catholic Church? Did not Sixtus V, whose knowledge and skill in politics were so great, choose rather to support Henry IV, and Queen Elizabeth, than to suffer the King of Spain to enlarge his dominions too much (22)? Who can assure us that Innocent XI did not act from the same principles, when he took measures that were so much against the true interest of France, and so profitable to the Protestants? One thing however seems to be very certain; namely, that the anonymous author of a pamphlet (23) intitled, Le Reproche extravagant, où l'on fait voir qu'on ne peut sans

(17) In the year 1687.

(18) See Mr. Leti, Monarchie Universelle, Part 2. pag. 346, &c.

(19) Lettre du Roy de France au Cardinal de Etrée, dated Sept. 6, 1688. It is inserted in Mr. Leti's Monarchie Universelle, Part 2. pag. 447, &c.

(20) Freinshem. Suppl. in 2. Curium, lib. 1. cap. 11. num. 16. ex Plutarcho.

(21) See the remark [2.] of the article of HADRIAN VI.

(22) See the remark [F] of the article ELIZABETH.

(23) Printed at Cologne for Peter Matteau in the year 1689.

very angry with him, and it is said, that this will be a great help to promote his canonization [H]. He had no learning [I]. He died August the 12th 1689. The French King's letter to the Conclave, though in a few words, signifies much against the deceased Pope's memory [K].

I have met with a passage in the Valesiana, which I think deserves to be transcribed here at length [L]. I shall also quote some of Monsieur La Fontaine's verses, which shew fans folie reprocher au Pape la ruine de la Religion Catholique en Angleterre; i. e. "The Impertinent Charge, "in which it is proved that it is a folly to charge the "Pope with the ruin of the Catholic Religion in "England;" it is certain, I say, that this author is in the wrong to assert that such a charge is impertinent.

[H] The anger of the French against him . . . will be a great help to promote his canonization. It is not long since (24) the news-writers in Holland have asserted in the pamphlets, which they publish monthly, that there are a great many miracles performed at this Pope's tomb, which is a great mortification to the court of France; and that the enemies of that Court on purpose to vex it, will probably endeavour to have this Pope canonized. Here then we shall have a Saint made so out of spite. Prudence requires, generally speaking, that we should adhere to the strongest party; but this maxim proves sometimes false. There are some Princes who owe their rise only to the crafty policy with which they declared themselves very early irreconcilable enemies to a powerful state, which had made itself dreadful to all its neighbours; for all those, who dread such a state, willingly promote the interest of this open enemy, and furnish him, as much as lies in their power, with all that he desires. It is not necessary to go back as far as the time of the antient heathens, in order to meet with instances of Princes, who ruined themselves to all intents and purposes, by choosing to enter into an alliance with their most powerful neighbour, rather than with any other state (25). A private man, who from a prosperous condition comes to misfortunes, will no longer see about him that croud of friends which surrounded him before; they all forsake him and leave him alone.

*Donec eris felix multos numerabis amicos;
Tempora si fuerint nubila, solus eris.* (26).

"In happy days a thousand friends you'll find:
"If fortune turns, they'll turn all with the wind."

Sovereign Princes meet with a quite contrary fate; for if they become too powerful, all their neighbours forsake them, and confederate against them. It is certain that Innocent XI got an infinite number of friends and admirers, only because he endeavoured to disappoint the designs of France as much as lay in his power. This will raise his reputation, and make people believe his pretended miracles the easier.

[I] He had no learning. It is said, that his Secretaries were obliged to explain to him in Italian what they wrote for him in Latin. See hereupon the Ménagiana, where you will meet with this passage (27). "Favoriti, the late Pope's Secretary, used to read to "him the briefs which he had drawn up, and to explain them to him in Italian, upon which the Pope "used to weep for joy, and to say, cosa diranno di noi " nella posterita, quando vederanno costi bella latinita " nostra. i. e. What will posterity say of us, when "they shall see our fine Latin stile?"

[K] The French King's letter to the Conclave, though in a few words, signifies much against the deceased Pope's memory. It begins thus (28): Your letter dated the 13th Instant has acquainted us with the death of our holy Father Innocent XI, and we have good reasons to believe that it pleased God Almighty to take him at a time when all the forces of heresy united together seem to contrive the ruin of our religion, to which the division of the Catholic Princes does not contribute a little. This is saying in a few words, which seem to favour of nothing but moderation, that the present circumstances the Church was in requiring a Pope heartily concerned for her interest, God took Innocent XI out of this world, because he was either ill-affected to the Church, or incapable to promote her interest.

[L] I have met with a passage in the Valesiana, which I think deserves to be transcribed here at length. "It is pity, said the learned Hadrian Valesius (29), "that Innocent XI suffered himself to be continually "beset by the enemies of France. How many advantages would he not have procured to the Christian "Religion, had he been supported by persons as well "affected as himself? What would he not have "restored? What would he not have reformed? What "great expectations did he not raise in us, when he "suppressed the Office of the Conception, as Clement IX had done that of Slavery? What would he "not have done, had he been told of the impertinent "devotion of that Monk, whom M. . . mentioned "to us the other day? Would he not have severely "censured and condemned those superiors, who suffer "one of their Fanatics to publish Collects or Prayers "directed separately to every part of the Holy Virgin's body (30)? Is not such an impertinence shocking, and repugnant to religion, modesty, and good "sense. Innocent XI would not have stooped there; "he would have restrained the luxury and extravagance of the women. What obligations would he "not have laid upon a great many husbands, had his "design succeeded? I have it also from very good "hands, that he would have suppressed the privileged "altars, which are a very great abuse. And indeed, "can some indulgences granted to an altar make the mass that is said at it more effectual? And does "Christ's blood, which is of an invaluable price, "want some additional merit, to be more acceptable "to God, and more prevailing with him in favour of "those, who are prayed for? They are only Mendicant Friars that invented those things, to entice "more customers to their Churches."

What Valesius observes here, concerning the design of restraining the luxury and extravagancies of the women, puts me in mind of the great zeal which Innocent XI expressed against the women who used to shew their breasts. "This Pope not being able to persuade the fair sex not to shew their breasts and arms, notwithstanding several powerful motives he urged for that purpose; and being even told that the great consternation under which all Italy laboured, when the "Turks were besieging Vienna, could not put a stop to this excess, resolved finally to try the last remedy, namely excommunication. He published a decree November the 30th 1683, by which all maidens "and women were commanded to cover their shoulders "and breast to their neck, and their arms to the wrist, "with some thick and untransparent stuff; they that "did not obey this order within six days after its publication, were to be excommunicated ipso facto, so "as that the Pope alone had power to absolve them, "unless they were at the point of death; for it was "therein declared, that those Father Confessors, who "would pretend to absolve them from this excommunication, would fall under it themselves, and suffer all "such spiritual and temporal punishments as his Holiness would think fit: the same spiritual punishments "were to be inflicted on the fathers, husbands, masters, "and other heads of families, by whose leave or connivance the daughters and wives should offend against "this decree (31)." I do not know what success these terrible threatenings had; but I imagine, that as they had been revived from time to time, under Innocent XI's predecessors (32), there was occasion to revive them also some time after. This is the fate of all sumptuary laws; luxury, with a desire of letting off one's beauty, will soon break through the most wise regulations. This is a disorder to which we may apply what a grave historian observed with regard to Aitologers: they were continually commanded to leave Rome, and they never left it (33). King Lewis XIV has lately (34) published very good edicts against luxury. If he can force his subjects to obey him in this respect, it will be a more wonderful thing than the

(29) Valesiana, pag. 45, & seq. edit. de Hollande.

(30) Monsieur Baudelet asserts in page 183 of his Ptolemée Auteurs, that he has seen the printed book which contains those Collects or Prayers.

A DIGRESSION concerning the reformation of luxury.

(31) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for May 1686, article 2. pag. 495.

(32) Ibid. pag. 497.

(33) Genus humanum . . . quod in Civitate nostra & habitabit imper & retinebitur. Tacit. Hist. lib. 1. cap. 22.

(34) I wrote this power in May 1700.

(24) I wrote this in the beginning of Sept. 1695.

(25) Compare this with what is observed in the remark [X] of the article BEL-LARMIN.

(26) Ovid. Trist. lib. 1. Eleg. ix. 5.

(27) In pag. 52. of the first Dutch edition. It seems as though the Printers had omitted a word or two in the Italian passage.

(28) The Letter is dated from Versailles August 24, 1689. It is inserted entire in the Mercure Historique & Politique, for October 1689, pag. 1026.

(b) Concerning the Orations of this Orator, see Æt. Erud. Lifon in the 3d vol. of the Supplements, pag. 43, &c.

shew that people wrote very freely at Paris against Innocent XI [M]. You will meet with a beautiful elogium of this Pope in Signor Malagonelli's seventh Oration (b). It is written in an admirable Latin style, and worthy of ancient Rome.

(35) See the Lettres Historiques, for May 1700, pag. 574.

(36) That is to say the Lawyers wives.

(37) Lettres Historiques, for May 1700, pag. 575.

(38) Messieurs Isalin and Cbarodon.

power he had to lessen considerably the madness of fighting duels throughout his whole Kingdom. The news-writers have told us lately, that the Lawyers belonging to the Parliament of Paris have promised they would take care to have luxury suppressed in their families. We shall know in time whether these two united powers, that of the sovereign, and that of the husband, will be able to complete a lasting reformation. It was notified to these Gentlemen (the Lawyers) that as some (25) of those women (36) who chiefly set up for Ladies of Quality, would perhaps be unwilling to retrench something both of their rich garments, furniture, coaches, &c. and of the useless number of their chamber-maids, embroiderers, tapestry-makers, and footmen, that wait upon them; it had been resolved to put a stop to this licentiousness, which does so little become the condition and quality of those Ladies . . . (37); it being the King's intention that they obey and reform immediately, without any distinction of descent or quality, and first of all cease to have the trains of their gowns carried behind them. It is added that two celebrated Lawyers (38) were commanded to acquaint their brethren with this resolution; who being overjoyed at it expressed their gratitude, and resolved unanimously to give thanks to the first President for procuring them an order which was so just, so necessary, and so worthy of the King's wisdom; and to assure him at the same time, that they would take care to have it obeyed, each of them in their own families, with the utmost exactness; for they looked upon it as the most effectual method to spare him a thousand vexations, and to prevent the fruits they might reap from their painful labours, from being made a sacrifice to the boundless ambition of their wives. It is very probable that they spoke sincerely; for after all their weighty, noble, and profitable employments are attended with a great deal of trouble. They envy sometimes the happiness of a country-man, who is at liberty to sleep all the night long.

(39) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 1. ver. 9.

*Agricolam laudat juris legumque peritus,
Sub galli cantum consultor ubi officia pulsat* (32).

"The Lawyer waked, and rising with the sun,
"Cries, happy Farmers that can sleep till noon."
Creech.

Are they not in the right to wish, that a profit, which cost them so much pains, should not be squandered away in superfluous expences, and that the sovereign power should afford them a method to prevent it, since they have not the courage to do it themselves without such an authority?

[M] I shall quote some verses of Monsieur de la Fontaine, which shew that people wrote very freely at Paris against Innocent XI.] There is amongst his posthumous works a Letter, some part of which I shall here transcribe.

(40) He speaks to the Prince of Conti.

*Pour nouvelles de l'Italie,
Le Pape empire tous les jours,
Expliquez, Seigneur (40), ce discours
Du costé de la maladie.
Car aucun Saint-Pere autrement
Ne doit empirer nullement.*

JOACHIM, St. Ann's husband [A], and father of the Virgin Mary. He continued a long while with his spouse without having any children, and for that reason his oblations were rejected by the High-Priest Isachar, who also reproached him severely with his infecundity. Joachim was so ashamed to be treated after this manner by the High-Priest, that he had not the courage to return home. He went and hid himself in the country amongst the shepherds. He was comforted there by an Angel, who told him that he would have a daughter named Mary by his wife Ann. This Angel went immediately to acquaint Ann with the same news, who was crying bitterly, not knowing what was become of her husband. This piece of news, which the Angel told her, was doubtless

(1) Joan. Damasc. de Fide Orisod. l. 4. cap. 15. apud Baron. in Apparatu, num. 42.

[A] Joachim St. Ann's husband.] His genealogy was as follows. Levi of the tribe of David was Panther's father, who was Barpanther's father, and Joachim was the son of this last (1). Some have asserted that he was not descended from David, but from the tribe of Levi, and that he was a Priest; upon which the Manichees grounded an objection, which St. Augustin has examined (2).

(2) Contra Faustum Manich. lib. 23. cap. 9. See the remark [D] quotation (1).

*Celui-cy veritablement
N'est envers nous ni Saint ni Pere.
Nos soins de l'erreur triomphans
Ne font qu'augmenter sa colere
Contre l'Ainé de ses Enfans.
Sa santé toujours diminuë,
L'avenir m'est chose inconnuë,
Et je n'en parle qu'à tâtons;
Mais les gens de delà les Monts
Auront bien-tôt pleuré cet homme;
Car il deffend les Jannetons,
Chose très-necessaire à Rome* (41).

(41) See Fontaine, Oeuvres Postumes, p. 182. of the edition printed in Holland.

"If you desire to hear some news from Italy, I shall tell you that the Pope grows worse and worse every day: Your Highness must understand this of his health; for otherwise an holy Father ought never to grow worse. Indeed this Pope is neither holy nor a father with respect to us: the care we take to triumph over Heresy, does only exasperate him more against the eldest of his children (*). He decays daily in his health. I am perfectly ignorant of future events, and speak of them only by guesses: but I dare say, that the people beyond the Alps will soon have done lamenting this man, for he will not suffer them to keep company with Ladies of pleasure, which yet is a very necessary thing at Rome."

(*) The King of France, who is styled the eldest son of the Church.

Here follow some lines which are more free still, they are transcribed from the same work.

*Je vois ces Heros retourner
Chez eux avec un pied de nez.*

*Et tout le parti Protestant
Du Saint Pere en vain très-content.
J'ay là dessus un conte à faire.
L'autre jour touchant cette affaire
Le Chevalier de Sillery,
En parlant de ce Pape-cy,
Souhaitoit pour la paix publique,
Qu'il se fust rendu Catholique,
Et le Roy JAQUES Huguenot.
Je trouve assez bon ce bon mot* (42).

(42) Ibid. pag. 171.

"I see these heroes now returned home very much disappointed . . . and the whole Protestant party very well pleased with the Holy Father, though to no purpose: whereupon I have a little story to tell you. The Knight de Sillery speaking of this affair the other day, and mentioning this Pope, said he wished, for the sake of the public tranquillity, that the Pope had turned Catholic, and King James Protestant. I think this a pretty good jest."

Monsieur Racine (43) took off the edge of this jest, (45) See the Prologue and wrapped it up much better. But still it was a smart jest.

Monsieur de Vizé says a great many things to the disgrace of Innocent XI, both in his Mercurie Galant aux Refugiez, and in his volumes upon the transactions of those times. pag. 343.

doubtless very acceptable to her, for she was very sorry that she had no children [B]. Several persons imagine, that only a kiss from her husband made her pregnant ; but others assert it was necessary to go the common way to work [C] ; otherwise, say they, the birth of Jesus Christ would not be so wonderful as we hold it to be. But what is really surprising is, that though we know nothing with certainty either of the names, or of the qualities, or of the history of the Virgin Mary's father and mother [D], yet all that

[B] She was very sorry that she had no children. She was upon that account deprived of a certain honour, which, according to the laws, was paid to mothers. She had therefore her recourse to God, and applied to him in extraordinary prayers, that she might enjoy that honour. She entered into the most holy place, and made fervent application to God, representing to him that she had committed nothing against the law, and that therefore she ought not to be deprived of the privileges which the law allowed to the women who had had children. Her prayer was heard. God gave her to understand that she should have children (3). St. Gregory of Nyssa relates this story, which he had read in an apocryphal work. They who know that none but the high-priest could enter into the most holy place, and that he was not to enter it but once a year, want no other proofs of the falsity of this story. If St. Ann was taking measures on her side, her husband was not behind hand with her : for he fasted forty days upon a mountain, in order to obtain from God the posterity he wished for (4). See St. Epiphanius's words in the following remark.

[C] Others assert it was necessary to go the common way to work. St. Bernard asserts that this is the opinion of the church. Si licet, says he (5), loqui quod Ecclesia sentit, (Et verum ipsa sentit) dico gloriosam de Spiritu Sancto conceptisse, non autem conceptam fuisse: dico peperisse virginem, non tamen partam à virgine. Alioquin ubi erit prerogativa matris Domini qua singulariter dicitur exulare Et munere proles Et integritate carnis, si tantundem dederis Et matri ipsius? non est hoc Virginitatem honorare, sed bonori detrabere. i. e. " If I may speak the opinion of the church (and the church believes nothing but what is true) I maintain, that the blessed Virgin conceived indeed from the Holy Ghost, but was not begotten by him : I maintain that she was delivered being a virgin, but not brought into the world by a virgin. Otherwise what would be the prerogative of the Lord's Mother, who is said to rejoice in a most particular manner, both on account of the favour she received of bringing a child into the world, and on account of her keeping her body undefiled, if you ascribe the same privileges to her mother? This is lessening the Virgin's glory, instead of doing her honour." Pelbart of Temelwaer, though he was superstitiously credulous, admitted however St. Bernard's opinion. Simplicibus quibusdam tribuit hanc opinionem quod Anna conceperit per solum osculum Joacim. Agnoscit tamen eam de viro concepisse concubitu matrimoniali (6). i. e. " He ascribes to some foolish persons this opinion, that St. Ann conceived only by a kiss from Joachim. But he acknowledges that she conceived from her husband in the common way." The error of St. Ann's pretended virginity is very antient ; for St. Epiphanius was obliged to refute it. Ἐπιφάνιος ἀποκρινόμενος εἰς διόλου, πῶς ἂν μᾶλλον τὴν ἀπὸ Ἰωακὴμ γέννησιν, τὴν ἐκ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος ἢ τὴν ἀπὸ Ἰωακὴμ ἢ τὴν ἀπὸ ἀνδρός, καὶ πᾶσι τῶν ἐπισημοῦν κατὰ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν παρῆναι, καὶ μηδὲν δοξάζειν, εἰ μὴν τὴν ἀπὸ ἁγίου πνεύματος παρὰ τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων φύσιν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὸν νόμον ἐκ σπέρματος ἀνδρός, καὶ μήτρας γυναικὸς ; οὐ γὰρ καὶ ἡ τῆς Μαρίας ἱστορία, καὶ παραδόσις ἔχουσι, ὅτι ἱερῆθαι τῷ πατρὶ αὐτῆς Ἰωακὴμ ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, ὅτι ἡ γυνὴ σου συνεληφθῆσα, ἐχ' ὅτι ἀνευ συζυγίας εὗρετο ἰγνήσει, εἰδὲ ὅτι ἀνευ σπέρματος ἀνδρός. i. e. " If God does not suffer us

" of a man." The Cavalier Borri had a strange notion about the Virgin's conception. He imagined that St. Joachim was impotent, and that the Holy Ghost took flesh in the womb of the Virgin Mary's mother, so that by this means St. Ann continued a virgin after she was delivered. Cadde in proposizioni più ridicole, insegnando che la Vergine non era stata concetta con seme umano, mà per opera divina, avendo lo Spirito Santo pigliato carne nel ventre di S. Anna, e partorita dalla medesima, che asseriva che nel parto era rimasta Vergine, e tale essere stata avanti il parto, e assicurando che S. Gioachino fosse stato impotente alla consumazione del matrimonio (8). i. e. " He had a more ridiculous opinion still ; for he pretended that the Holy Virgin was not conceived by the seed of a man, but by a divine generation, the Holy Ghost having taken flesh in St. Ann's womb, and thus brought her into the world, whence it happened that St. Ann continued a virgin after her delivery, as she had been before : for he maintained that St. Joachim was impotent and could not consummate his marriage."

[D] Though we know nothing with certainty, neither of the names, nor of the qualities, nor of the history of the Virgin Mary's father and mother. . . . St. Epiphanius, who flourished in the year 370, is the most antient author that mentions the names of the Holy Virgin's father and mother. He pretends indeed, that what he relates concerning Joachim and Mary's prayers, and concerning the angel's revelation (9), is borrowed from tradition and from the history of the Virgin Mary. But does he not confess himself that there were very absurd traditions spread abroad concerning Mary's birth? Does he not quote a book upon this subject, which contained abominable things (10)? Does he not observe, it was reported that Zacharias was struck dumb in the temple, because he had seen there a man in the shape of an ass? He was going to leave the place, and to cry out, Wo to you, what Deity do you worship? But this Deity prevented him by striking him dumb. When he had recovered his speech again, he declared what he had seen, upon which they killed him. St. Epiphanius adds, that it was related in the same book, that the reason why the law-giver had ordered the High-Priest to wear little bells, was to give this Deity time to hide himself, that its ass-like figure might not be seen : and that it might not be surprized unawares, it was ordered that the sound of the little bells should give it notice of the High-Priest's arrival. I know very well that all sorts of traditions ought not to be exploded like these : but after all, there is not one good reason to persuade us, that those, which St. Epiphanius admitted, were well grounded. This is so true, that St. Augustin makes no scruple to take for an uncertain and apocryphal tradition, the opinion that was spread abroad concerning the Virgin Mary's father, that he was called Joachim, and that he was a Priest. Quod de generatione Mariæ Faustus posuit quod patrem habuerit ex tribu Levi sacerdotem quendam nomine Joachim, quia Canonium non est, non me constringit (11). i. e. " What Faustus has asserted concerning Mary's birth, namely, that her father was a Priest, of the tribe of Levi, and named Joachim, is no argument against me, because it is not canonical." He adds that it is impossible for the same person to be descended from two tribes, and concludes, that he would thus solve the objection of the Manichean, if he were obliged to have any regard for apocryphal writings. Hoc ego potius vel tale aliquid crederem, si illius apocryphæ scripturæ, ubi Joachim pater Mariæ legitur, auctoritate detinerer, quam mentiri Evangelium in quo scriptum est, &c. i. e. " I would rather believe this, or something like it, if I was to lay any stress on these apocryphal books, which mention Joachim as Mary's father, than that there is a lye in the Gospel, where it is written, &c."

(3) Gregorius Nyssenus, Orat. in Natal. Domini, apud Baron. Ap. parat. num. 44.

(4) Sophron. apud Rivet. Apolog. pro sanctiss. Maria, cap. 3. Oper. tom. 3. pag. 606. col. 2.

(5) Bernard. Epist. 174. ad Can. Lugdun. apud Rivetum, ibid. pag. 608.

(6) Stellarii Corona, lib. 4. Part. 2. Artic. 1. apud Rivetum, ibid.

(7) Epiph. adversus Collyridianos, pag. m. 1062.

(8) Relazione della Vita del Cavagl. Borri, pag. 351.

(9) See his words in the preceding remark.

(10) Γίναν μὲν γὰρ Μαρίας εἰβ- λιοὶ τὶ βασὶν ἰσχυρῶν ἐν αὐτῇ, καὶ οὐκ ἔδειξεν ἑαυτὴν ἀποκρίσασθαι τῶν λόγων, ἀλλὰ ἐκείνην ἀποκρίσασθαι τῶν λόγων. Epiph. adv. Hæres. pag. 94. i. e. " There is a book which treats of Mary's birth, and which contains horrible and abominable sayings of them."

(11) Augustin. contra Faustum Manich. lib. 25. cap. 9. apud Rivetum, Operum tom. 3. pag. 604. 605.

that I have been observing, has been asserted, and festivals have been appointed to St. Joachim, and to his wife [E]. Some (a) have imagined that he had three daughters by her; but others think that St. Ann was married three times, and had one daughter by each of her husbands.

(a) See Baronius, in Apparatu, num. 41.

If you want other proofs of the uncertainty of these traditions, do but consider Baronius's conduct. He has exploded part of these things which are reported concerning the blessed Virgin's father and mother: he has expressly observed that the book ascribed to St. Jerom, is the work of some unknown and ignorant author, who was not capable to avoid the most palpable falsities. Non tantum eam Hieronymi non esse dixerimus, sed auctoris plane ut ignoti, sic prorsus imperiti, qui in ea condenda & conscribenda non novit aperta vitare mendacia, dum ait illis temporibus quibus ea acciderunt fuisse Isachar summum pontificem (12). He has declared that though this book contains several true facts, yet he will not lay any stress upon it. Nec innitimur scriptioni illi, quæ hæcenus Hieronymi nomine ad Cromatium & Heliodorum scripta vulgata est, nam licet in ea complura veritate constantia conscripta reperiantur, quæ à dictis auctoribus sibi vindicent auctoritatem & fidem, tamen, &c. (13). i. e. "Nor do we lay any stress upon that writing, which has hitherto been published under St. Jerom's name, addressed to Cromatius and Heliodorus; for though it contains several true particulars, grounded on the testimony of the said authors, yet, &c." Thus he ruins one part of the foundation. You will see now how Casaubon overthrows the other. He shews that the book De Nativitate S. Mariæ (Of Mary's Birth) falsely ascribed to St. Jerom, is the work of a Manichee, and abounds with impertinences, and blasphemies. A pestilentissimo hæretico profectum, postremo nugarum & impietatum esse plenum (14). He wonders that the Jesuit Christopher de Castro should have dared to maintain that such a book was genuine, the supposition of which appeared so plainly to Erasmus, to Melchior Canus, to Sixtus Senensis, and to Baronius. Casaubon quotes a passage from it, which affords me a strong proof. Illud libere dico quod fidelium neminem negaturum puto; si hæc vera sunt, si hæc ab aliquo conficta sacro-sancta S. Mariæ miracula præcessisse; maxima consecuta fuisse; & idcirco salva fide, ab iis, qui Deum facere ista posse credunt, sine periculo animæ suæ credi & legi posse (15). i. e. "This I can say freely, which I imagine none of the faithful will deny; whether these things be true, or invented by some person, there were holy miracles performed before the blessed Virgin's birth, and greater still after it; so that they, who believe that God can do such things, may safely believe and read them without any danger to their soul." These are not the words of the Manichee Seleucus (16) the author of the work, but of the person who translated it into Latin; and it is proper to observe that this translator owns, there are a great many falsities in the book he translates. Impietas istius Pseudohieronymi, excusari salvo pudore non potest: nam quum fateatur, Seleucum, si hæc Lucium de doctrina Apostolorum multa esse mentium; ea tamen defendit, quæ sunt ab eodem hæretico scripta de virtutibus & miraculis eorum. Poterat-ne hic planius apertius ostendere, nullam sibi esse curam veritatis, neque ullum se inter falsum & verum statuere discrimen? Adit de eo ipso libro quem vertebat: ita & his multa non vera de corde suo confingit (17). i. e. "This false Jerom's impiety cannot without shame be excused: for though he confesses himself that Seleu-

(12) Baronius, in Apparatu, num. 44.

(13) Idem, ibid.

(14) Casaub. Exercit. ad Baron. I. num. 15. pag. m. 90.

(15) Casaub. ibid. pag. 91.

(16) Others call him Leucius, or Leontius. Casaub. Exercit. ad Baron. I. num. 15. pag. 91.

(17) Idem, ibid.

cus or Leucius told a great many falsities concerning the doctrine of the Apostles, yet he vindicates what the same Heretic wrote concerning their power and miracles. Could this impostor shew more plainly that he had no regard for the truth, and made no distinction between truth and falsehood? He said of the very book he was translating, that the author of it invented a great number of falsities from his own head." Is not this sufficient to satisfy any reasonable person of the uncertainty of all these traditions? That which St. Gregory of Nyssa relates is evidently false (18). As for Nicephorus Callistus, Germanus Patriarch of Constantinople, John of Damascus, &c. they do not deserve the least credit, because they lived so long after the time when these things happened, that the traditions concerning them could not be handed down to these authors, but with a great many alterations. And besides it is well known that Nicephorus is a fabulous and injudicious writer (19). So that we have no reason to believe that he quoted Hippolytus, Bishop of Porto, accurately; and after all, what he quotes from him contains some falsities, as Casaubon shews. See the Bibliothèque Universelle (20). Rivetus was in the right to think it strange that Richard Montague should have believed most of the stories, which such people as Bernardine of Busti, Pelbart of Temelwar, Coserus, and other writers of the same rank admit concerning our Joachim (21).

(18) See above, the remark [E].

(19) Nicephorum hunc fabulosissimum esse scriptorem & judicium in literis nullius, satis notum est eruditiss. Casaub. Exercit. ad Baron. num. 15. pag. 91.

(20) Pag. 143, &c. of the 11th volume.

(21) Rivet. Apolog. pro SS. Virg. Mariæ, cap. 3. Oper. tom. 3. pag. 607.

I wonder that the Abbot de Marolles had so much regard for the traditions I have mentioned. See page 235 of his Memoirs.

[E] Yet festivals have been appointed to St. Joachim, and to his wife.] The husband obtained that honour much later than the wife, for he enjoys it only since the 2d day of December 1622. The day appointed for his festival is March the 20th (22). But St. Ann's festival was instituted in the year 1584. It was not at first absolutely necessary to keep that holy-day upon pain of Damnation; it is but since the year 1622 that St. Ann was promoted to that honour (23). In every other respect the worship that is paid to St. Joachim is much inferior to that which is paid to his wife. She is the Patroness of an order of Nuns, called the Maidens of St. Joseph (24), and her miracles are very much celebrated. The village of Ker-Ann in the diocese of Vannes in Britany is wonderfully famous on that account, and particularly since they have dug up there an old image of this Saint, which had been buried very deep under ground. In the year 1625 it was revealed from heaven to a ploughman where this image was to be found. The moment it was dug out of the ground it performed several great miracles. The alms of a vast number of devout persons, who flocked there from all parts, amounted soon to a sum of money large enough to build a beautiful church to that image. The Bishop of Vannes obtained from Rome the necessary indulgences for those who out of devotion would visit it: he charged the reformed Carmelites with the doctrine of this new church, and gave brother Hugo of St. Francis leave to publish an account of the miracles, which had been lately performed in those parts (25).

(22) Spond. Annot. ad ann. 1622, num. 1.

(23) Idem, ibid.

(24) See the book intitled, Les Grandeurs de Saints Anns. It is mentioned in the Bibliothèque Universelle, tom. 11. pag. 141.

(25) Taken from Spondanus, ad ann. 1625, num. 3.

JOAN Queen of Naples. See NAPLES.

JOB, whose patience has been described in one of the Canonical Books of the Old Testament. That I may not repeat here what the reader may find in Moreri, I shall only take notice of some errors. They are mistaken who assert that the Turks have a great veneration for this holy man's tomb [A], the chief Judge at Solomon's Court.

[A] They are mistaken who assert that the Turks have a great veneration for this holy man's tomb.] Let us quote a passage from Sir Paul Ricaut (1). "Whenever there is a new Emperor of the Turks, it is their custom to conduct him with all the pomp imaginable to a certain place in the suburbs of Constantinople, which is called Job. There is to be seen at that place an ancient tomb of a certain Prophet or holy man,

(1) Ricaut, Etat present de l'Empire Ottoman, translated into French by Bessier, B. 1. p. 16.

whom the Turks, who are not in the least acquainted with Antiquity, nor with History, pretend to be Job, who for so many ages past has been a pattern of patience and constancy." Sir Paul Ricaut's translator makes an observation upon these words, which deserves to be transcribed. "I believe indeed, says marquis Curieus he (2), that some ignorant Turks, unacquainted with History and Chronology, may take the tomb

(2) Bessier. Recherches sur l'Etat present de l'Empire Ottoman, pag. 4.

Court [B]. It is a scandalous piece of impudence to assert, that Job's distemper was the foul disease [C]. I confess that in the Church of Rome he is the Patron of them that labour under that disease [D]; but nothing can be inferred from thence to support the other assertion. He was worshipped in that Church before the pox was known in Europe [E]. Tertullian was in the wrong to assert that Job left no children behind him. Upon which see Spanhemius's (a) History of Job, which is a very good work.

(a) Frederic. Spanheim. F. Hist. Job, cap. 25. pag. 481.

" of Job, which is at Constantinople, at the foot of the walls of the city, for the tomb of that holy man, whose history is related in the Old Testament. But the Turkish Historians tell us themselves, that this tomb was built for another Job, who was a Mahometan, and had been one of Mahomet's followers. He was killed at the siege of Constantinople, which was attacked by Jezid, the son of the Kaliff Moawias, in the 52d year of the Hegira, or 672 since the birth of Christ. This is what Elmacin observes in his History of the Sarracens, Book 1, Chap. 7. and though Elmacin was a Christian, yet he relates what he met with in the Mahometan Historians, whose accounts he only abridges, as he confesses himself." One of the most learned Rabbies in the XVIIth Century held the same error with those ignorant Turks; for he asserted (3) " that the Mahometans have still at this time a great veneration for Job's tomb which is at Constantinople (4). He did not know, to be sure, that this is the tomb of another Job, different from the person mentioned in the Old Testament, and he imagined erroneously, that all the Mahometans take it to be the tomb of that holy man."

(3) Menassch-Ben Israel, de Resurrect. mortuor. lib. 1. cap. 16. quoted by Bepier, ibid. pag. 5.

(4) Bepier, Remarques Curieuses sur l'Etat de l'Emp. Ottoman, pag. 5.

(5) Ricaut, Etat present de l'Empire Ottoman, pag. 26.

(6) Bepier, Remarques sur l'Etat de l'Emp. Ottoman, pag. 6.

(7) Borremannus has transcribed it in his Varia Lectiones, pag. 260.

(8) Patin, Lettre 388. pag. 102. of the 3d volume.

[B] . . . the chief Judge of Solomon's Court.] Let us again quote Sir Paul Ricaut. " The Turks, says be (5), do so much blend together all Histories, for want of knowing Chronology, that they assert Job was the chief Judge at Solomon's Court, and Alexander the Great was General of his armies." Here follows a pretty good critical observation upon these words (6). " The English author borrowed this from Buſbequius, but he mistook his meaning. For Buſbequius does not say, the Turks believe that Job was the chief Judge at Solomon's Court, nor that Alexander was General of his armies. He only observes, that the Turks are so unacquainted with Chronology and History, that if they took it into their heads, they would not in the least scruple to assert, that that Job was the chief Judge at Solomon's Court, and Alexander General of his armies. These two assertions differ widely. See Buſbequius, Epist. 1." Sir Paul Ricaut's mistake has already been transcribed in some books (7).

[C] It is . . . impudence to assert that Job's distemper was the foul disease.] Guy Patin quotes two celebrated authors, who have asserted it. His words are as follow (8). " In answer to what you wrote to me, I must tell you that Bolduc, a Capuchin, and Pineda, a Spanish Jesuit, have both written that Job had the Pox. I am inclined to believe that David and Solomon laboured also under that distemper." Observe that it can by no means be pretended that Job got that foul disease by an impure action.

[D] He is the patron of them that labour under that disease.] Consult Molanus's Diarium Medicorum Ecclesiasticum; you will meet there, upon the 10th of May, which is Job's festival, with these words. Volunt nonnulli Sanctum Job peculiarem patronum esse eorum qui lue venerea laborant aut eam curant (9). i. e. " Some pretend that Job is in a particular manner the patron of those who have the foul disease, or who make it their business to cure it."

(9) Molan. in Diario Medicor. pag. 68.

[E] He was worshipped before the pox was known in Europe.] The same Molanus warns us not to admit Agrippa's error, who dares to assert that the pox was the occasion of Job's canonization. Before that time, says Molanus, there was a church and a festival appointed at Venice to this holy man; who was also interred into the Martyrology as early as the reign of Charles the Great. Cavendus est H. Cornelius Agrippa, qui vane scripsit lue veneream Job in divos retulisse. Quasi non multo ante Veneti memoriam ejus & templo & festo die celebrarint, constet quoque Usuardum Caroli Magni etate, & Wandelbertum non multo post, Martyrologiis suis eum inseruisse. Et à Græcis ad sextum diem Maii notatur sanctus & justus Job qui multa contra Satanam certamina sustinuit (10). i. e. " Beware of H. Cornelius Agrippa, who wrote without reason, that the venereal disease placed Job amongst the saints; as though his memory had not been celebrated at Venice a long while before, a church and a festival being appointed there to him: it is also certain that Usward in Charles the Great's time, and Wandelbert soon after, have inserted his name in their Martyrology. And the Greek Martyrologies, under the sixth of May, mention the holy and just Job, who struggled a long while with Satan." A celebrated Protestant Divine, who in some measure took Agrippa's part on this occasion, observes that there is at Utrecht an Hospital, in which those that have the foul disease are taken care of, and which is called Job's Hospital. Dicit potest ad defensionem Agrippæ, Jobum inter divos tutelares & quidem sædi istius morbi, post ejusdem morbi exortum, demum fuisse relatum. Quidquid sit, tanquam divus alexicacus ab hujus morbi mystis, annuente Romana Ecclesia, salutatur. Hinc in hac urbe Xenodochium S. Jobi olim dominante papatu constitutum, ubi illo morbo laborantes curari solent (11). i. e. " It may be observed, in Agrippa's defence, that Job was chosen amongst all the Saints, for the particular patron of those that have the foul disease, after it had began to rage. However it be, he is worshipped by them, with the church of Rome's consent, as a Saint that is particularly proper to cure them. Hence it is that we have in this city (of Utrecht) an Hospital of St. Job, which was built formerly in the time of Popery, and in which those that have the venereal disease are taken care of." It is not long since they examined at Rome this question, whether Job, and the other Saints of the Old Testament, deserve the same worship which is paid to those that are canonized, and whether it be proper to build altars to them. Upon which see the Acta Sanctorum Maii (12). Baillet.

(10) Ibid. pag. 69.

(11) Giff. Voc. Disputat.

(12) There is in the Appendix to the 6th and 7th volumes a Dissertation upon this subject. See also the Journal des Savans for March 5, 1703, in the account of a book written by Moan. Baillet.

JODELLE (STEPHEN) a French and Latin Poet in the sixteenth Century, was born at Paris (a). He was one of the Pleiades invented by Ronfard (b). Some ascribe to him the invention of those French verses composed after the manner of the Latin verses, that is to say according to the quantity of the syllables; but others pretend that Baif was the first who published that kind of verses in French (c). It does but little concern their reputation, whether or not the truth of this fact be clearly stated, for this invention fell soon into contempt. Men have much more reasons to pretend, that Jodelle was the first of all the French who published Comedies and Tragedies in his own tongue in the ancient form (d). He wrote verses with an incredible readiness [A]; and he had also several other

(a) La Croix du Maine, and Du Verdier, Biblioth. Française.

(b) Baillet, Jugemens sur les Poetes, Art. 1342, Menage, chap. 10. of the Anti-Baillet.

(c) See the Anti-Baillet, ch. 111.

(d) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Française, p. 285. See also Pasquier, Recherch. liv. 7. chap. 7.

[A] He wrote verses with an incredible readiness.] Du Verdier Vau-Privas (1) acquaints us with this in the following words. " He was admirable in one thing, which is almost incredible; it is, that all that Jodelle ever composed was done readily, with-

(1) Biblioth. Française, pag. 286.

out any study, and without any labour: and we can witness, with several persons of this time, that he never spent above ten mornings in composing and writing his longest and most difficult Comedy or Tragedy; and even his Comedy of Eugene was completed other accomplishments. He was an Orator; he was skilled in Architecture, in Sculpture, in the art of Painting, and he could fence very well (e). He used to wear a sword (f), and by his birth he had a right to it [B]. He died in July 1573, at the age of forty one. See the margin (g). The next year his friends published a Collection of his Works (h). They are in the wrong, who assert that he died for want, and that it was a judgment of God upon him for his prophaneness [C], and who cry out, Heathenism! on account of a certain carnival-entertainment, in which his friends consecrated a goat to him [D] (a).

I dare

(g) Mr. Varilles is mistaken, who supposes in his Histoire de Henry III. B. 12. pag. m. 267. that Jodelle was still living under the reign of Henry III. He asserts that the seven French Poets, who were called Pleiades having been entertained a whole month at that Prince's expence in a Tavern near the gate of Nesle, went out singing, Long live Tyranny, we have just now spent thirty six thousand livres. (b) Du Verdier, Bibliob. Française, pag. 284, 285.

“ completed in four mornings. When he was but a youth he has been seen to compose and write down for a wager in one night only, five hundred good Latin verses, upon a subject that was proposed to him ex tempore. All his Sonnets, even those that were made upon given rhymes, were composed by him in his walks, whilst now and then his thoughts run upon other things, and he finished them so quickly, that when he recited them, it was thought he could hardly have begun them.” We ought not therefore to wonder that he composed such a vast number of them. It is reported that he wrote about ten thousand verses on Cæsar's passing the Rubicon (2). If his friends had published all his works, to how many thousand of verses would they not have amounted? He attempted all sorts of Poems, as Elegies, Odes, Sonnets, Songs, Inscriptions, Canticles (3). He wrote a Poem against preposterous Venery, or the sin of Sodomy (4).

[B] By his birth he had a right to it.] He was a Gentleman possessed of a Lordship; for he used to take the title of Lord of Limodin (5). I believe it was a patrimonial estate.

[C] They are in the wrong, who assert that he died for want, and that it was a judgment of God upon him for his prophaneness.] Voëtius relates (6), that having read in Honfdorf's Theatre, that Stephen Jodelle, a French Poet, an Epicurean, and an Atheist, spent his whole estate and died for want (7), he made diligent enquiries to know whether the fact was true or not. But as his library did not afford him sufficient means to clear up this matter, he resolved to consult Rivetus, who told him, that one could not meet with the least sign of Atheism in Jodelle's works, and that on the contrary they contained several proofs of his orthodoxy; and that the charge of prophaneness, laid to Jodelle, had perhaps no other foundation than the sacrifice of a goat (8), which was offered to him as to the chief amongst the Tragic Poets; which was done only out of a frolick, if we may believe the author of Ronsard's Life. And yet Rivetus did not dare to determine whether for this single action Jodelle deserved to pass for an Atheist or not. Voëtius submits to his opinion. Like his friend, he would nor have us declare Jodelle guilty of Atheism, if we have no stronger proofs of it; but at the same time he is far from acquitting him, and suffers the question to continue problematical. In medio relinquit (Rivetus) an ob idem factum Atheus sit dicendus, nisi aliunde alia authentica testimonia suppetant. In cujus sententia & nos acquiescimus (9). It is not at all probable that the compiler Honfdorf grounded his assertion on the pretended sacrifice. He gives Jodelle the character of a dissolute man, who squandered away his whole estate; and therefore he argues from a continual course of sin, and not from the farce of a pretended sacrifice, an action which was committed but once, and in which several other wits, of whom Honfdorf does not say a word, were concerned as well as Jodelle. Let us say therefore that that honest compiler of instances of God's judgment has been grossly mistaken; and yet here we have two famous Divines, who do him the honour to lay as much stress upon his accusation void of all kind of proofs, as upon the testimonies of orthodoxy which the very books of the accused afford. They imagine, they are sufficiently equitable and just, if they do but determine nothing either for or against the accused. Is this acting according to these maxims, Qui libet præsumitur bonus, donec probetur malus; i. e. “ All men must be esteemed to be good, till it be proved they are bad.” Actore non probante absolvitur reus: i. e. “ When the prosecutor does not prove his charge,

“ the accused is acquitted.” It must be observed, that those who transcribed from Honfdorf, or those from whom he transcribed himself, do not come up altogether to the authority of one single witness, whilst they quote no vouchers, or whilst they only quote each other (10). Upon the whole, I do not pretend to deny that Jodelle died poor (11). I do not know whether Gentillet was not the original author, that was followed by all the compilers, who mention Jodelle as a particular instance of God's judgments on the prophane. “ One might quote, says he (12), an infinite number of instances of God's judgments and punishments on the Atheists, despisers of God and of religion, even in our days; as that of the tragic Poet Jodelle, whose end was really tragical: for having spent and squandered away his whole estate, like an Epicurean, he died miserably for want.” I have met with part of these words in a book printed at Morges in the year 1581, and intitled Punitions & Jugemens de Dieu, &c. i. e. “ God's judgments and punishments, &c.” and in a book printed in the year 1586, and written by John Chastanion of Monistrol, in the country of Vellay, with this title, Histoires memorables des grands & merveilleux Jugemens & Punitions de Dieu, &c. (13). i. e. “ Remarkable Histories of the great and wonderful judgments and Punishments, inflicted by God, &c.”

[D] His friends consecrated a goat to him.] Claudius Binet (14) will tell you how this farce was acted. “ They (15) blame him amongst other things for having sacrificed a goat to Jodelle in the village of Hercueil (16); but he answers this charge sufficiently himself, and the matter of fact was thus: Jodelle had caused his tragedy of Cleopatra to be acted before the King; it met with so general an applause, that some days after the whole band of Poets meeting in that village, to divert themselves and be merry during the holy-days of Shrove-tide, there was none of them but made some verses in imitation of the antient Bacchanals: they chanced to meet with a goat in the streets, which gave them an opportunity to make a frolick on this occasion, because this animal used to be offered to Bacchus; for they made a shew of presenting it to Jodelle as a reward for his tragedy, according to the custom of the antients, which even the Christians, and especially the Poets imitate sometimes, not that they believe any of the Heathen stories, but by an allusion, which in itself is by no means unlawful: what made people believe, there was something more in this, were the verses and jokes of these Poets, which were published, and especially the Dithyrambi of Bertrand Berger, a Dithyrambic Poet, amongst which we read these lines . . . All this was only a shew, and a mere farce.” The reader will not, perhaps, be displeased to meet here with the answer, which Ronsard himself made, and which Binet hints at, without transcribing it: it is as follows.

*Tu dis en vomissant dessus moy ta malice,
Que j'ay fait d'un grand Bouc à Bacchus sacrifice:
Tu mens impudemment: cinquante gens de bien
Qui estoient au banquet diront qu'il n'en est rien.
Muses, qui habitez de Parnasse la croupe,
Filles de Jupiter, qui allez neuf en trope,
Venez & repoussez par vos belles chançons,
L'injure faite à vous & à vos nourrissons.
Jodelle ayant gagné par une voix hardie
L'honneur que l'homme Grec donne à la Tragedie,
Pour avoir en haussant le bas stile François,
Contenté docilement les oreilles des Rois:*

1

La

(e) Du Verdier, ibid.

(f) ibid.

(2) La Croix du Maine, Bibliob. pag. 78.

(3) Du Verdier, Bibliob. p. 286.

(4) La Croix du Maine, Bibliob. pag. 78.

(5) Du Verdier, Bibliob. p. 285. See also La Croix du Maine, Bibliob. pag. 78.

(6) Voet. Disputat. tom. 1. pag. 137.

(7) Meminit. Honfdorf. dicitur libro exemplorum ad Decalogum, Lipsiæ in fol. ann. 1570. edit. . . Stephani Jodelli Gallici Poetæ, quem Epicureum & Atheum dilapidatis bonis inedia confectum dicit. Voëtius, ibid.

(8) See the following remark.

(9) Voëtius, Disputat. tom. 1. pag. 137.

(10) You will meet in Konig's Bibliothéque, under the word Jodellius, with this passage, Geo. Richterius Gorlicensis in Axiom. Ecclesi. numero 108. Ecq. habet: Memoria nostra Jodellius, tragicæ dramæ scriptor, tragicum exitum invenit: nam luxu, gæna, superbia, ex Epicureorum disciplina, patrimonium cum consumpsisset, miserrimo genere mortis fame perit.

(11) See the article FINE, remark [D], towards the end.

(12) Gentillet, Discours sur les moeurs de bien gouverner contre Nicolas Machiavel, Part 2. pag. 179. edit. 1576.

(13) In book 2. chap. 24. pag. 170.

(14) In the Vie de Ronsard, pag. m. 139.

(15) He means two Ministers, who wrote against Ronsard.

(16) I think it should be Arcueil.

*La brigade qui lors au ciel levoit la teste
(Quand le temps permettoit une licence bonnesté)
Honorant son esprit gaillard & bien appris,
Luy fit present d'un Bouc, des Tragiques le prix.
Fà la nappe estoit mise, & la table garnie
Se bordoit d'une sainte & docte compagnie ;
Quand deux ou trois ensemble en riant ont pousté
Le pere du troupeau à long poil herissé :
Il venoit à grands pas ayant la barbe peinte,
D'un chapelet de fleurs la teste il avoit ceinte,
Le bouquet sur le oreille, & bien sur se sentoit
Dequoy telle jeunesse ainsi le presentoit :
Puis il fut rejezté pour chose mesprisée
Après qu'il eut seruy d'une longue risée,
Et non sacrifié, comme tu dis menteur,
De telle faulxse bourde impudent inventeur (17).*

(17) Ronfard, in his Réponse à quelque Ministre, pag. 92. of the 9th vol. of his Works, of the Paris edition, 1604, in 12mo.

i. e. " You belch out your wicked reproaches against me, and say that I have sacrificed a large goat to Bacchus! You lie impudently: fifty honest men, who were at the entertainment will declare, that there was no such thing as a sacrifice. Muses, who dwell on the top of Parnassus, daughters of Jupiter, ye that walk nine in company, come, and by your beautiful sons repel the injury that is offered to you, and to your Bards. Jodelle by his noble poem deserved the honour which the Greeks used to confer on Tragic Poets; for he exalted and raised the low stile of the French, and pleased thus the ears of Kings; whereupon the band of the Poets, who then lifted up their heads to the sky, at a time when they could lawfully indulge themselves in some honest freedom, to do honour to his lively genius, and to his learning, presented him with a goat, the usual prize of Tragedy. The cloth was already laid, dinner was upon the table, a sacred and learned company surrounded it ready to sit down, when two or three of the band, out of a frolick, drove in the fire of the rough-bearded flock. It walked in gravely, with its beard painted, a garland on its head, and a nosegay on its ear; it was very proud that such a company of young men should thus present it. It was afterwards rejected as a pitiful thing, when it had afforded the company a great deal of mirth for some time; but it was not sacrificed, as you a liar say, who have impudently invented this scandalous slander."

Of whatever party men be, they run upon extremes, and are but too often imposed upon by popular rumours. The Ministers did too rashly and easily believe the report that was spread concerning Jodelle's goat: and as Ronfard had set up for a persecutor both by his pen and by his sword, for he wrote against the Protestants, and fell upon them at the head of the militia, the Ministers reproached him with the ceremony of this goat, according to the worst construction that had been put upon it. They objected it to him as if it had been a heathenish sacrifice, and asserted that the goat was offered up to a false Deity. This was a calumny, but they were not the authors of it. We shall now quote Scaliger, who charges a Priest with giving rise to this imposture; and observe particularly that he explodes this pretended sacrifice as a mere fable. I do not know whether or not he remembered that some Ministers had accused Ronfard of it. But I know very well, that he imagined Scioppius, his adversary, pretended to involve him (Scaliger) in that affair. Here follow his own words.

" Ast illud, quod adjiciemus, omnia portenta amphitheatrica superat. Parisenses illos amicos tuos imitatis, quos Dionysia agitasse, & hircum immolasse fama est. Dionysia agitare, dicit esse hircum immolare. Hujus enim insimulati sunt illi, de quibus nunc agitur. Vespillonis filius, qui nunquam Lutetiae fuit, in media Suburra habitans Romae, unde hoc mendacium explicari potuit, nisi à quibus reliqua portenta didicit? Quos putat Dionysia agitasse, vel hircum immolasse, ut illi persuaserunt qui verum dicere, etiam si velint, non possunt, ii sunt, Petrus Ronfardus, M. Anton. Muretus, Janus Baifus, Remigius Bellaqueus, Stephanus Jodellus, Nicol. Denisotus, Joan. Auratus, alii, omnes Poetae, praeter Patoleum, qui in historiis conscribendis omne studium suum collocarat. Quos tam falsum est adeo execrandum, nefandum, impium facinus fecisse, quam certum est, impune illis futurum non fuisse,

" liquidem tam Christianae pietatis, quam existimationis suae obliti, tam detestabile scelus in se admiserunt. Si illi docti viri viverent, fur non inultum tulisset. Porro tam impudentis calumniae auctor fuit sacrificulus Gentiliaci vici, in quo illi doctissimi viri de constituto coierant, ut de symbolis essent. Totum drama exponerem, si opus esset, ut Josephus me docuit, qui illud ad unguem tenet (18)." i. e. " But what I have now to add, is more monstrous than any thing that can be imagined. You follow the example, says Scioppius to Scaliger, of your friends at Paris, who celebrated, they say, the Bacchanals, and sacrificed a goat. To celebrate the Bacchanals is, he says, to sacrifice a goat. For the persons here meant were suspected of this. This villain, who was never at Paris, and lives at Rome, from whom could he get that lie, but from those who told him the other monstrous stories? The persons, whom he imagines to have celebrated the Bacchanals, or to have sacrificed a goat, as they made him believe, who could not say the truth, even if they had a mind to it, these persons, I say, were Peter Ronfard, M. Anthony Muret, T. Baif, Remi Belleau, Stephen Jodelle, Nichol. Denisot, John d'Aurat, and others, all Poets, except Patolet, who applied himself entirely to the writing of history. It is as false that they committed such execrable, abominable and wicked actions, as it is certain that they would not have continued long unpunished, had they been so destitute of all Christian piety, and so little concerned for their own reputation, as to commit this horrid crime. Had these learned men been alive, the villain would not have escaped unpunished. Such a shameful slander was invented by a certain Priest of the village of Gentilli, where these most learned men had agreed to meet and be merry together. I would explain the whole farce to you, if it were necessary, as Joseph told it me, who was perfectly well acquainted with it." All this is very right; I wish that what follows was as reasonable as this. Sed ponamus verum esse. Quid haec ad Josephum, qui tunc puer Burdigalae primis rudimentis Latini sermonis initiabatur? An quia sexto post, septimo, & octavo anno omnes, praeter Jodellum, illos vidit, & familiariter novit, ideo ejusdem criminis postulandus erit? Hoc modo oporteret omnes, qui Muretum norunt, Dionysia agitasse, hoc est majorem partem eorum, qui hodie Romae agunt. Quanta invidia Josephum premerent, si verum crimen haberent, quod illi objicerent, quum aliorum facta, eaque falsa illi exprobrarentur (19). i. e. " But suppose it be true; what was this to Joseph Scaliger who was then but a boy, studying the first elements of the Latin tongue at Bourdeaux? Must he be charged with that crime, because he saw them all, except Jodelle, and was familiarly acquainted with them, six, seven, or eight years after the fact was committed? At this rate, all they that have known Muretus, that is to say, most part of those, who are now living at Rome, must also have celebrated the Bacchanals. How odious would they not render Scaliger, had they some true crime to charge him with, since they even reproach him with other men's actions, and such actions as are absolutely false?" The heat of the controversy did a little disturb Scaliger's mind: he clears himself of a crime with which he is not charged. He complains of being calumniated, when he is not, and thus he becomes a slanderer himself (20). To say that a man imitates the faults of his good friends, is not pretending to assert, that he was with them at such or such a place where they committed some crime: on the contrary, it is supposing that he was not there: for if he had been with them, one would stile him an accomplice, and not an imitator. It is not true therefore that Scioppius involved Scaliger in Jodelle's affair (21). Scaliger therefore ought not to have complained of it, nor had he any occasion to prove that he was at another place, when the fact was committed.

* (u) Consecrated a goat to him.] It was, say they, because Jodelle had carried the prize of Tragedy by his Cleopatra. But how does this agree with what we read in the Perroniana, under the word Belleau, where we find, that Cardinal du Perron placed none beneath Jodelle, in matters of Poetry, except because Remi Belleau, who in that Cardinal's opinion, was a very wretched Poet? CRIT. REM.]

(18) Scaliger, in Confutat. Fabulae Burdonum, pag. 338, & seq.

(19) Scaliger, ubi supra, pag. 340.

(20) See the 4th vol. of the Morale Pratique des Jesuites, chap. xviii.

(21) Parisenses illos amicos tuos imitatis. i. e. " You follow the example of your friends at Paris."

I dare not give any credit to what I read in Beza's Life [E]. You will meet with a great many particulars concerning this Poet, in the passage which I have quoted from Stephen Pasquier.

[E] I dare not give any credit to what I read in Beza's life. I have read there that Stephen Jodelle, one of the Poets of the French Pleiades, wrote a stanza of four lines upon Beza's (S) falling sick of the plague, whilst he was translating the Psalms into French verse. The stanza is as follows.

*Beza fut lors de la peste accueilli,
Qu'il retouchoit cette harpe immortelle.
Mais pourquoi fut Beza d'elle assailli?
Beza assaillit la peste à tous mortelle.*

i. e. "Whilst Beza was touching again the immortal harp, he was affected with the plague. But why did the plague assault Beza then? Why, Beza was assaulting that plague which proves mortal to all."

(22) Melchior Adam has inserted it almost entirely in the volume of the Diwines, who were not Germans.

Anthony la Faie, who wrote that Minister's life (22), gave Jodelle the surname of Modilin. Stephanus Jodellus Modilinus, says he, non postremus inter poetas Pleiadis Gallicæ, &c. i. e. "Stephen Jodelle Modilin, who was none of the least amongst the Poets of the French Pleiades, &c." One may easily think, that Modilinus was put instead of Limodinus, which title became Jodelle very well on account of his Lordship (23). But as this stanza is ascribed to one Stephin de Modelin in several editions of the Psalms, in which it is printed with Clement Marot's epitaph, composed by the same Modelin, I question whether it be Jodelle's. It is not on such an occasion that an author is called only by an anagrammatical name. I have another reason to question it, which is stronger still. Beza was at Lausanne when he fell sick of the plague. He was therefore looked upon in France as an apostate. The persecution raged terribly against the Protestants at that time. And can we imagine, that a Poet, who professed the Catholic Religion publicly, would have written an obliging stanza to Beza's

(23) He was Lord of Lymodin.

(24) Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire Ecclésiastique, tom. 7. pag. 910. Sec. of the Brussels edition in 12mo.

ST. JOHN the Evangelist. That I may not transcribe what may be found in Moreri or in Monsieur de Tillemont (a), I shall only make the following observations, I. There was in St. Augustin's time a ridiculous tradition concerning the state St. John was in [A]. II. Nothing is more absurd than the objection that was made against the author of the translation printed at Mons [B], with this false pretence; that it was not decent

(25) Augustin. Comment. in Jo. an. in hac verba, Discipulus hic non mortuus.

[A] There was in St. Augustin's time a ridiculous tradition concerning the state St. John was in. "There never were any nations more credulous with regard to traditions than those of Asia; and particularly the Ephesians. St. Augustin relates, concerning the subject we speak of, a very remarkable story, which shews very plainly the excessive credulity of that people, and the silliness of their traditions. He observes that the Ephesians (25), or persons who came to Ephesus, and who had a great deal of wit and merit, and who were not easy of belief, non leuibus hominibus, had assured him that St. John was not dead: that he was indeed buried at Ephesus, but that he lay in his grave like a man who is asleep in his bed; and that as one may observe the sheet and coverlets move up and down, as a man that sleeps in breathing; so one might perceive the earth of the grave, in which St. John was buried, moves up and down by intervals. Can there be any thing more impertinent than such a tale (1)?" I have just now read (2), that Monsieur de Tillemont's critic blames him for relating this story and several others of the same kind. He would deserve to be blamed if he related it as a matter of fact; but he does not give it for such (3); and therefore he is unjustly censured; for the compilation of errors is a very useful part of history. I confess that he seems to believe what is related concerning the Manna of our Apostle's tomb (4).

(26) The Abbé Faidit, Extrait d'un Sermon prêché le jour de St. Polycarpe, p. 30.

(27) Hist. des Ouvrages des Savans, for May 1695, pag. 427.

(28) See Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'Hist. Eccles. tom. 1. pag. 947.

(29) Ibid. p. 945.

(30) St. John's Gospel, ch. xix. vers. 27.

honour, which is so agreeable to the taste and style of the reformers? However it is certain that Anthony la Faie's opinion has been followed by Andrew Rivetus (24), and by Jeremy de Pours (25).

§ (B) A stanza... upon Beza. This stanza may very well have been composed by Jodelle in his younger days. He was then of the reformed religion, and at Geneva. And as to the wonderful readiness, even in verses extempore, which is ascribed to him in the remark [A] by Du Verdier, we may observe that one night he wrote at Geneva ex tempore an hundred Latin verses, in which he described the Mass with proper Sarcasms, as an Huguenot writer of those times relates. In all likelihood Jodelle was but indifferently paid for his Poems at Geneva; for all on a sudden he returned to Paris, and to that Mass, which he had so much cried down in his Latin verses (26). As the Roman Religion was not in the least become better, since Jodelle had thought fit to return to it, this may be the reason why the Huguenots called him an impious man, and even an atheist: which may also be owing in a great measure to thirty sonnets, which he made immediately after the massacre committed on St. Bartholomew's day, in order to charge the Ministers with being the cause of the executions, murders and wars, which had raged in France since the beginning of the reformation, and were occasioned by it. It is reported, continues the same author, that for these sonnets Jodelle received a large sum of money, which he mult then have spent in less than a year, if it be true, as it is pretended, that in July following he died for want. As for the name of Modelin or Modilin, Jodelle himself did perhaps turn thus, by way of Anagram, the name of his Lordship, that he might not plainly appear to be the author of a stanza, in which the Roman Catholic Religion was aspersed, and Beza commended. CRIT. REM.]

(24) He wrote to Voetius, that Stephen Jodelle had commended his version of the Psalms, and had even communicated to him the stanza.

(25) In Book 2. of the Diwines Melodie, p. 586. he cites the stanza, and ascribes it to Stephen Jodelle Modilin.

(26) Mémoires de l'Etat de France, tom. 1. fol. 178 verso.

Disciple took her into his house. This translation was criticized upon after the following manner. "It is certain that St. John, who lived in a state of poverty recommended in the Gospel, had no house of his own, where he could receive the mother of God; and tho' he had had one, yet there are several reasons of decency and modesty, which easily persuade us, that the Virgin would not have thought it proper to retire thither. Such a conduct might even have been attended with dangerous consequences with regard to future ages. For Ministers, who lead a scandalous life, would be very glad if they could justify their own conduct by so illustrious an instance of the youngest and chastest of all the Apostles dwelling under the same roof with the most prudent and most innocent of all the Virgins. Such a fear is not groundless; for St. Epiphanius, who seems to approve the opinion of the translators of Mons, had the same apprehension; and he tells us, that some dissolute persons had already attempted to justify their scandalous way of living, by the example of the holy Virgin's living at St. John's house. Veror, says he under the seventy eighth heresy, where he mentions the holy Virgin's dwelling with St. John, ne hoc ipsum, quod dicimus, fraudi sit aliquibus, ut ad contubernales & dilectas, quas vocant feminas, retinendas, quod genus pessimo sibi errore animi, machinasti sunt, sicut in dicitur aliquem, & colorem arcessisse viduantur (6)." i. e. "I fear lest what I observe here, be dangerous for some, who will take from thence some handle and excuse, to keep their companions and elect women, as they call them, which is a sort of cohabitation they have invented by a most dangerous error."

(6) Mallet, Examen de quelques Passages, p. 221. of the 3d edition.

decent this holy Apostle and the Virgin Mary should live together. III. The answer that has been made to Mr. Mallet upon this subject deserves to be transcribed [C], IV. There is a great deal of ingenuity in the answer, which St. John is said to have made, to justify his stroaking a Partridge [D]. V. Some persons pretend that the marriage in Cana, at which the water was turned to wine, was his marriage [E], and that the sight

of

(7) Nouvelle Défense de la Trinité, pag. 430

(8) It is in the 5th verse of the 9th chapter of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, and not of the 15th chapter, as Mr. Arnauld quotes it.

(9) See the Abbé Faidit, Extrait d'un Sermon prêché le jour de S. Polycarpe, p. 37. that the blessed Virgin did not go to Ephesus with St. John; he proves it, I say, by observing, that Celsus who has slandered her very much, would certainly have bantered her on account of that journey, upon which however he does not pass one joke.

[C] ... The answer that has been made ... deserves to be transcribed.] For it contains some generous principles, very instructive to those who have a mind to judge of things according to their true differences. I shall not dwell upon the answer which relates to St. John's state of poverty; I shall only transcribe the refutation of the other part of the objection. It is very strange, says Monsieur Arnauld (7), that Monsieur Mallet should not have read what the commentators on the holy Scripture have observed upon a subject which ought to have appeared much more scandalous still. It is, that the Apostles always carried a Christian woman with them to take care of their maintenance. And yet St. Paul says, 1 Cor. xv. 5. (8) they had a power to do it, and that they did it. Upon which Estius makes this very judicious reflection, which shows us the true principles, according to which we ought to judge of such things, and which Monsieur Mallet should have been acquainted with before he undertook to subject the Virgin to his false tales of decency. "If you ask, says that learned Divine, how the Apostles could without giving offence, lead about women, who were not their wives, I answer, that this was a custom so common among the Jews, that our Saviour himself did not take it ill that it should be praised even with regard to him. Nor was it practised but by such women, whose chastity and piety were so well known, and tried, that there was no room to suspect them in the least. To which may be added, that the Apostles led such an easy life, and had gained such a reputation of holiness, that though these women followed them, no man would have dared to judge ill of them, as the Jews never suspected any thing of that kind with regard to Jesus Christ, how inclined soever they were to speak ill of him, and to slander him." Nothing is more reasonable than this; and it is indeed by such principles we ought to judge, that an action, which otherwise might give offence, if it were not attended with such favourable circumstances as leave not the least room for bad suspicions, has nothing in it but what is really edifying, when it is attended with such circumstances. Now when shall the consideration of a tried holiness be capable to silence calumny, and to prevent all suspicions, even in the most inconsiderate persons, who suffer themselves to be easily swayed to the most trifling appearances, if the veneration which the faithful always had for the mother of Jesus Christ, and for his most beloved disciple was not sufficient to make them judge that these two persons behaved in the most holy and innocent manner, when they lived together, according to the express command they had received from the Saviour dying on the cross. ... Monsieur Mallet (9) is the first and only person, who entertained such a mean notion of the Virgin's holiness, and of the esteem the Church had for her, as to imagine that at the age of above fifty years she could not live with an Apostle without exposing her reputation, and that it was an instance attended with dangerous consequences, because it was proper to justify the suspicious cohabitation of Ministers with women, which was prohibited by the Canons. For thus far he carries his hyperbolic fancies against the reputation of the Virgin. But if the authors of those Canons had carried their suspicions as far as this man does, who pretends to blame the blessed Virgin and St. John, why did they except some persons in their prohibitions, as for instance, a mother, sisters, and nieces? Did they imagine that incests were absolutely impossible? By no means, but being directed by the Holy Ghost, and knowing that with regard to general laws, we ought to avoid all extremes, and keep within the bounds of a prudent moderation, which makes us have no regard for such cases as will hardly ever happen, they judged on the one hand, that the least virtue in the world was sufficient to prevent a man from being tempted at the sight of such persons, because natural modesty is generally strong enough to suppress all the motions of lust with regard to these persons. And on the other hand they considered, that men's disposition to judge ill of their neighbours, does seldom make them charge others with such odious crimes without very strong proofs: so that the authors of the Canons did not think on these occasions there was any room either to dread some real evils from them, or to apprehend ill suspicions.

[D] There is a great deal of ingenuity in the answer St. John ... made to justify his stroaking a partridge.] A certain hunter seemed surprized to see, that this great Apostle, who was so venerable by his age and virtue, should stoop to so mean an amusement. The Apostle asked him, whether he always kept his bow bent. The hunter replied, that this would soon render the bow absolutely useless. If to avoid this you unbend it, said St. John, I do the same with regard to my mind, and for the like reason. I do not believe that this story is very certain, but I imagine, that they who never heard it mentioned, will not be displeas'd to know that it is reported. The author of the treatise De ludicra Dictione, i. e. "Of writing in a burlesque style," has inserted it in his work. His expressions being very strong will not be disagreeable to the learned; I shall therefore present them with the whole passage. Nec malus, ut opinor, interpret Christi confessorum & voluntatum Joannes discipulus, qui ad leves lusus atque oblectamenta puerorum descendit ipse jam senior, atque exemplo prævit, quatenus interjungere, & ex quotidianis occupationibus reficere ac recreare mentem liceret. Hunc, mansuetæ pernici blande & suaviter alludentem, quidam cum arcu & sagittis venator offendit. Quod eum facere cum vehementer miraretur, hominem id atatis, spectatum & cognitum diuturna virtute; sensit Joannes, & interrogavit, an illum ipsum, quem gereret, arcum haberet semper intentum. Cui ille, nequaquam vero, inquit: staciescat & enim arcus, & molliatur intentione perpetua, inutilisq; fiat. Tum Joannes, Tu, mi homo, arcum remittis ac relaxas, ne inutilis sit: ego animum, ne fit inutilis (10). i. e. "St. John, I think, was not a bad interpreter of Christ's advices and commands: who, when he was very old did not scruple to divert himself with the little plays and amusements of children, and shewed us by his own example, how we may intermix some diversions with our daily occupations, in order to unbend and refresh the mind. A hunter meeting St. John one day, whilst he was playing gently with a tame partridge, and coaxing of it, &c.

[E] Some persons pretend that the marriage in Cana ... was his marriage.] The curious and learned Thomasius will afford me all the materials of this remark. I wish I had the thesis which he caused to be maintained publicly (11) concerning St. John's glass: but I have only the preface of it (12), which acquaints me with a custom, that was unknown to me; namely, that in great entertainments the guests are obliged to drink a glass, which is called St. John's glass, or cup. This is not done without some mixture of superstition, which came originally from a legend, in which we find that St. John having swallowed poison, received not the least hurt from it. This is undoubtedly the reason why the painters drew him with a cup in his hand. But let us come to the marriage in Cana. The authors of the legends suppose, I. That St. John the Evangelist was the bridegroom, and Mary Magdalen the bride (13). II. That they both agreed not to consummate their marriage, but to oblige themselves to live in a perpetual virginity. III. That as soon as St. John had seen the miracle of the water turned into wine, he devoted himself entirely to Jesus Christ's service, and left his bride (14). IV. That Jesus Christ went on purpose to that wedding with a design to prevent the consummation of the marriage (15) One thing perplexes them, which is that St. John's virginity did not come up to the highest degree of perfection, if he once designed to marry. For it is requisite to a perfect virginity that a person should always have been determined to live in a state of continency. Videbatur ejus (virginitatis) laudem hæc fabula non tollere quidem, labefactare tamen, aut in gradum inferiorem detruere, cum ea demum numeris omnibus absoluta perhibetur virginitatis, quam perpetua incorruptionis nunquam corrupta meditatio pareat (16). To solve this objection, they

(10) Vavassor, de Ludicra Dictione, pag. 285.

(11) Printed with several others at Leipzig in the year 1681.

(12) See the Acta Eruditor. Lipsiæ, in which we find that St. John having swallowed poison, received not the least hurt from it. This is undoubtedly the reason why the painters drew him with a cup in his hand. But let us come to the marriage in Cana. The authors of the legends suppose, I. That St. John the Evangelist was the bridegroom, and Mary Magdalen the bride (13). II. That they both agreed not to consummate their marriage, but to oblige themselves to live in a perpetual virginity. III. That as soon as St. John had seen the miracle of the water turned into wine, he devoted himself entirely to Jesus Christ's service, and left his bride (14). IV. That Jesus Christ went on purpose to that wedding with a design to prevent the consummation of the marriage (15) One thing perplexes them, which is that St. John's virginity did not come up to the highest degree of perfection, if he once designed to marry. For it is requisite to a perfect virginity that a person should always have been determined to live in a state of continency. Videbatur ejus (virginitatis) laudem hæc fabula non tollere quidem, labefactare tamen, aut in gradum inferiorem detruere, cum ea demum numeris omnibus absoluta perhibetur virginitatis, quam perpetua incorruptionis nunquam corrupta meditatio pareat (16). To solve this objection, they

(13) Molanus, lib. 4. de Hist. Imaginum, cap. 20. pag. 228. apud Thomasius, Pref. LXXVIII pag. 511.

(14) Haymo, Part. biomal. Homel. pag. 207. Baronius, tom. 1. Annal. ad ann. 31. num. 30. apud Thomasius, ibid. pag. 512.

(15) Messret, de Sanctis, Serm. 30. folio 53. apud Thomasius, ibid.

(16) Thomasius, ibid. he quotes Pelbertus de Temeswar, de Sanctis, Serm. 30.

of this miracle made him renounce the use of marriage, and live in celibacy all his life time.

they observe amongst other things, that Divine Providence ordered things thus, with an intention to extol the merit of St. John's virginity, since by that means it is become entirely like that of the blessed Virgin, and has been consecrated, having been united with marriage, which is one of the seven sacraments. Quin ergo potius ita cogitemus, deuisse, ut eodem virginitatis gradu collocaretur Apostolus, quo Virgo mater, que ipsi erat à Christo monituro commendanda? Quid, quod ita demum consecrari virginitas censenda est; si cum ceremoniâ matrimoniali conjugatur? Neque enim virginitas, sed conjugium est in numero sacramentorum (17). i. e. "Why then should we think, that this was intended to place the Apostle's virginity in the same rank with that of the Mother Virgin, whom Christ dying recommended to him? Why, is not virginity then only to be esteemed sacred, when it is united with the matrimonial ceremony? For virginity is not of the number of sacraments, but matrimony." Let us not forget to observe that Baronius and Molanus explode these traditions of the writers of legends. Thomasius quotes their words (18), and he observes with some probability, that Abdias's book was the first spring of all these fine stories. This fictitious Abdias asserts, that Jesus Christ dissuaded St. John three times from marrying. The authors of two prefaces prefixed to St. John's Gospel, do only assert in general that Jesus Christ made him alter the resolution he had taken to marry. These two prefaces (19) are falsely ascribed, the one to St. Jerom, and the other to St. Augustin. As there never were any authors more bold than they who compiled the lives of the saints, they would be more positive than the authors of those prefaces; and for that purpose they have supposed a time and place, that is to say, the marriage in Cana, wherein Jesus Christ freed his disciple from the marriage engagement. Thomafius does not in the least question this Apostle's virginity; it is grounded on a pretty good tradition; supported by the authority of St. Jerome, St. Augustin, St. Epiphanius, &c. But Baronius is in the wrong to quote also St. Ignatius, who speaks only of St. John the Baptist (21).

(18) Transcribed from the places quoted above.

(19) Quas conjugatas exhibet quarta pars Glossæ in Bibliâ ordinaria. Thomaf. ibid. pag. 516.

(20) See the proof of this in Thomafius, ibid. pag. 518.

(17) Thomafius, ibid. pag. 515. He quotes Pelbart. ibid. and Franc. Maro, Serm. de Sanctis, pag. 30.

(*) Thus he writes his name.

(a) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 608. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Ibid. and Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 273. and Fuller's Worthies, in Westminster.

(c) Sir Thomas Pope Blount's Characters and Confutes of the most considerable Poets, whether antient or modern, pag. 105. edit. London 1694 in 4to.

JOHNSON or JONSON (*) BENJAMIN) one of the greatest English Dramatic Poets in the 17th Century, was son of a Clergyman (a), and born at Westminster (b) about the year 1575 [A]. He was first educated in a private school in the Church of St. Martin's in the Fields (c); and then removed to Westminster-school, where Camden was his master [B]. Thence his mother, who had married to her second husband a Bricklayer, took him home, and obliged him to work at his father's trade. At last being pitied by some generous Gentlemen, he received assistance from them; and by Camden's interest was recommended to Sir Walter Raleigh, whose son he attended in his adventures [C]; by which means gaining a knowledge of the world, his conversation was greatly desired. Upon their return home, Mr. Johnson and his pupil parted, not in cold blood; and thereupon our author went to the University of Cambridge, where he was statutely elected into St. John's College; but what continuance he made there, is uncertain [D]. This is Mr. Wood's account. But Fuller tells us (d), that he staid there but a few weeks for want of farther maintenance, being forced to return to the trade of his father-in-law; and worked at the new structure of Lincoln's-Inn, with a trowel in his hand, and a book in his pocket. Here he was taken notice of by some Gentlemen, who enabled him to prosecute his studies, which he did with such vigour and success, that he soon became eminent for his admirable dramatic writings. Wood affirms (e), that upon his leaving Cambridge, he entered himself in an obscure Play-house, called, The Green Curtain, about Shoreditch or Clerkenwell, but that his first action and writing there were both ill. Shakespear is said

(d) Worthies, in London.

(e) Atb. Oxon. col. 608.

(1) Atb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 609.

(2) Characters and Confutes of the most considerable Poets; whether antient or modern, pag. 105.

(3) Account of the English Dramatic Poets, pag. 305. edit. Oxford 1691.

[A] Born in the year 1575.] Mr. Wood (1), Sir Thomas Pope Blount (2), and Mr. Gerard Langbaine (3) assert, that he was in his sixty third year, when he died August the 16th 1637. [B] Removed to Westminster School, where Camden was his Master.] He dedicated his Comedy, intitled Every man in his Humour, acted in 1598, to Mr. Camden; and in the dedication he writes thus. "There are no doubt a supercilious race in the world, who will esteem all offices done you in this kind, an injurie, so solemn a vice it is with them to use the authoritie of their ignorance to the crying downe of poetry, or the professors. But my gratitude must not leave to correct their error, since I am none of those, that can suffer the benefits conferred upon my youth, to perish with my age... I pray you, accept this, such wherein neither the confession of my manners shall make you blush, nor of my studies repent you to have been the instructor." And our author's fourteenth epigram begins thus;

"Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe
"All that I am in arts, all that I know;
"(How nothing's that!) to whom my country owes
"The great renowne and name wherewith she "goes."

[C] By Camden's interest was recommended to Sir Walter Raleigh, whose son he attended in his Adventures.] This is the account of Mr. Wood (4); but there is some difficulty in it. For if this happened before Ben. Johnson applied himself to acting or writing of plays, as Mr. Wood asserts, then Sir Walter's eldest son, Walter, who was born in 1594, was scarce old enough to go to school, much less upon adventures.

(4) Ubi supra, col. 608.

Besides this son never made, that we can hear of, more than one adventure abroad, which was with his father to Guiana in 1617, in which he was killed; and therefore he could not part with his attendant or companion Ben. Johnson, in the manner Mr. Wood intimates he did after his return. If we suppose it the other brother, Carew, who was born in 1604, he never made any adventures at all, nor went out of England till six years after his father's death, and then only upon a short tour for about a twelvemonth; which was near thirty years after Ben. Johnson became a Dramatic Poet, and when he had written himself into a pension from the crown, or otherwise into easy circumstances, as render it unlikely, that he should attend even on Carew Raleigh in those sorrows and difficulties he was then under (5).

[D] Statutely elected into St. John's College.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (6). The reverend and learned Mr. Thomas Baker, author of the Reflections on Learning, has consulted the Register of the University of Cambridge, to see whether our Ben. Johnson's name appears in the list of those, who have been matriculated; but finds a neglect in the book for about ten or twelve years together, in which time he supposes him to have been admitted. In the books of St. John's College no account was kept for a long time of those who were admitted, but only of those who took scholarships; so that Ben. Johnson is not to be met with either in the public or private registers. Mr. Baker says, that there has been always a tradition handed down, that he was of St. John's College; that he was probably entered a Sizar; and that he made but a short stay. There are several books in the Library of that College with his name in them, and given by him to the College.

(5) See Mr. Oldys's Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, pag. 172.

(6) Atb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 608.

said to have first introduced him into the world; for Mr. Johnson, who was at that time altogether unknown to the public, having offered one of his plays to the Players, in order to have it acted, the persons, into whose hands it was put, after having turned it carelessly and superciliously over, were just upon returning it to him with an ill-natured answer, that it would be of no service to their company; when Shakespear luckily cast his eye upon it, and found something so well in it as to engage him first to read it through, and afterwards to recommend Mr. Johnson and his writings to the public (f). His first printed dramatic performance was a Comedy, intitled, Every Man in his Humour, acted in 1598 by the Lord Chamberlain's servants. The year following his Every Man out of his Humour was acted [E]; as were his Cynthia's Revels, or, The Fountain of Self-Love [F], in 1600; his Poetaster [G] in 1601; his Sejanus's Fall [H] in 1602; his Volpone, or the Fox in 1605; his Silent Woman [K] in 1609 and his

(f) Mr. Rowe's Account of the Life of Mr. William Shakespear, prefixed to Shakespear's Works in 8vo.

[E] The year following his Every Man out of his Humour was acted.] It was acted by the Lord-Chamberlain's servants, with allowance of the Master of the Revels; and dedicated to the noblest Nurseries of Humanity and Liberty in the Kingdom, The Inns of Court.

[F] Cynthia's Revels: or the Fountain of Self-Love.] He styles it a Comical Satyre. It was acted by the children of Queen Elizabeth's Chapel with the allowance of the Master of the Revels, and dedicated to The special Fountain of Manners, the Court.

[G] His Poetaster.] This Comical Satyr was acted by the children of her Majesty's Chapel, and dedicated to The virtuous and his worthy friend Mr. Richard Martin. Our author having under the character of Crispinus satyrized Mr. Thomas Decker, the latter wrote his Satyrmafrix: or the untruffing the humorous Poet, a Comical Satyr, presented publicly by the Right Honourable the Lord-Chamberlain's Servants, and privately by the Children of St. Paul's: printed at London, 1602 in 4to, and dedicated to the world. Mr. Johnson is represented in it under the character of Horace Junior. In the Epistle Dedicatory Mr. Decker says: "Horace trailed his Poetasters to the bar; the Poetasters untruffed Horace; how worthily either, or wrongfully leave it to the jury. Horace questionless made himself believe, that his Burgonian wit might desperately challenge all comers, and that none durst take up the foils against him. It is likely, if he had not so believed, he had not been so deceived, for he was answered at his own weapons; and if before Apollo himself, who is Coronator Poetarum, an inquisition should be taken touching this lamentable merry murdering of innocent Poetry, all mount Helicon to Bun-hill, would find it on the Poetaster's side, se defendendo."

[H] His Sejanus's Fall.] It was acted by the King's servants, with the allowance of the Master of the Revels, and printed at London in 1605 in 4to, under this title, Sejanus his Fall. Written by Ben. Jonson. In this edition there is a Preface to the Readers, omitted in the other editions, in which he writes thus. "If it be objected, that what I publish is no true Poem, in the strict laws of time, I confess it; as also in the want of a proper chorus, whose habits and moods are such and so difficult, as not any, whom I have scene since the aunts, no not they who have most presently affected laws, have yet come in the way of. Nor is it needful or almost possible in these our times, and to such auditors, as commonly things are presented, to observe the ould state and splendour of Dramatich Poemes, with preservation of any popular delight. But of this I shall take more seasonable cause to speak in my observations upon Horace his Art of Poetry, which, with the text translated, I intend shortly to publish. In the meane time, if in truth of argument, dignity of persons, gravity and height of elocution, fulness and frequencie of sentence, I have discharged the other offices of a tragic writer; let not the absence of these formes be imputed to me, wherein I shall give you occasion hereafter (and without my boast) to thinke I could better prescribe than omit the due use, for want of a convenient knowledge. The next is, least in some nice nostril the quotations (7) might favour affected, I doe let you know, that I abhor nothing more, and have only done it to shew my integrity in the story, and save my selfe in these common torturers, that bring all wit to the

(7) These are omitted in the subsequent editions.

"rack, whose noses are ever like swine, spoyling and rooting up the Muses gardens, and their whole bodies, like moles, as blindly working under earth to cast any the least hills upon vertue . . . Lastly I would informe you, that this booke in all numbers is not the same with that which was acted on the publike stage, wherein a second pen had a good share, in place of which I have rather chosen to put weaker (and no doubt lesse pleasing) of mine own, then to defraud so happy a genius of his right by my lothed usurpation. Fare you well: and if you read farder of me, and like, I shall not be afraid of it, though you praite me out:

— Neque enim mihi cornea Fibra est.

"But that I should plant my felicity in your generall saying good or well, &c. were a weaknesse, which the better sort of you might worthily contemn, if not absolutely hate me for.

"BEN. JOHNSON, and no such,

"Quem Palma negata macrum; donata reducit opimum."

To this edition are prefixed commendatory poems by George Chapman, Hugh Holland, Th. R. (8), John Marston, William Strachey, ΦΙΛΟΞ, Ev. B. [1] His Volpone, or the Fox.] It was acted by the King's servants, and dedicated to the two Universities in this form: To the most noble and most equal Sisters, the two famous Universities, for their love and acceptance shown to his Poem in the presentation, Ben. Jonson, the grateful acknowledger, dedicates both it and himself. It is written in imitation of the Comedy of the antients, and the argument is formed into an acrostich, like those of Plautus, which are said to be made by Priscian, or some other antient Grammarian.

[K] His Silent woman.] It was acted by the children of her Majesty's Revels, with the allowance of the Master of the Revels, and dedicated to The truly noble by all titles, Sir Francis Stuart. Mr. Dryden (9) has given us an examen of this Play, which he styles the Pattern of a perfect Play (10). He observes with regard to the length of the action, that it is far from exceeding the compass of a natural day, that it takes not up an artificial one. "It is all included in the limits of three hours and an half, which is no more than is required for the presentment on the stage. A beauty perhaps not much observed; if it had, we should not have looked on the Spanish translation of five hours with so much wonder. The scene of it is laid in London; the latitude of place is almost as little as you can imagine; for it lies all within the compass of two houses, and after the first act, in one. The continuity of scenes is observed more than in any of our Plays, except his own Fox and Alchymist. They are not broken above twice or thrice at most, in the whole Comedy; and in the two best of Corneille's Plays, the Cid and Cinna, they are interrupted once. The action of the Play is intirely one, the end or aim of which is the settling Morose's estate on Dauphine. The intrigue of it is the greatest and most noble of any pure unmixed Comedy in any language: you see in it many persons of various characters and humours, and all delightful. As first Morose, or an old man, to whom all noise but his own talking is offensive. Some, who would be thought Critics, say this hu-

(8) Probably See Thomas Roe.

(9) Essays of Dramatich Poety, pag. 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

(10) Ibid. p. 31.

“mour of his is forced : but to remove that objection, we may consider him, first, to be naturally of a delicate hearing, as many are to whom all sharp sounds are unpleasant ; and secondly, we may attribute much of it to the peevishness of his age, or the wayward authority of an old man in his own house, where he may make himself obeyed ; and to this the Poet seems to allude in his name Morose. Besides this, I am assured from divers persons, that Ben. Johnson was actually acquainted with such a man, one altogether as ridiculous as he is here represented. Others say it is not enough to find one man of such an humour ; it must be common to more ; and the more common the more natural. To prove this, they instance in the best of comical characters, Falstaff. There are many men resembling him ; old, fat, merry, cowardly, drunken, amorous, vain, and lying. But to convince these people, I need but tell them, that humour is the ridiculous extravagance of conversation, wherein one man differs from all others. If then it be common, or communicated to many, how differs it from other men’s ? Or what indeed causes it to be ridiculous so much as the singularity of it ? As for Falstaff, he is not properly one humour, but a miscellany of humours, images drawn from so many several men ; that wherein he is singular is his wit, or those things he says præter expectatum, unexpected by the audience ; his quick evasions, when you imagine him surprized, which as they are extremely diverting of themselves, so receive a great addition from his person ; for the very sight of such an unweirdy, old, debauched fellow is a Comedy alone.”

Mr. Dryden observes (11), that besides Morose, “there are at least nine or ten different characters and humours in the Silent Woman, all which persons have several concerns of their own, yet all used by the Poet to the conducting of the main design to perfection. I will not waste time in commending the writing of this Play, but I will give my opinion, that there is more wit and acuteness of fancy in it, than in any of Ben. Johnson’s. Besides, that he has here described the conversation of Gentlemen in the Persons of True-Wit and his friends, with more gaiety, air, and freedom, than in the rest of his Comedies. For the contrivance of the plot, it is extreme elaborate, and yet withall easy ; for the novus or untying of it, it is so admirable, that when it is done, no one of the audience would think the Poet could have missed it ; and yet it was concealed so much before the last scene, that any other way would sooner have entered into your thoughts. But I dare not take upon me to commend the fabric of it, because it is altogether so full of art, that I must unravel every scene in it to commend it as I ought. And this excellent contrivance is still the more to be admired, because it is Comedy, where the persons are only of common rank, and their business private, not elevated by passions or high concerns, as in serious plays. Here every one is a proper judge of all he sees ; nothing is represented but that with which he daily converses : so that by consequence all faults lie open to discovery, and few are pardonable. It is this which Horace has judiciously observed :

“Creditur ex medio quia res arcessit habere “Sudoris minimum, sed habet Comœdia tanto
 “Plus oneris, quanto veniæ minus.”

“But our Poet, who was not ignorant of these difficulties, has made use of all advantages ; as he who designs a large leap, takes his rise from the highest ground. One of those advantages is that, which Corneille has laid down as the greatest, which can arrive to any Poem, and which he himself could never compass above thrice in all his plays, viz. the making choice of some signal and long-expected day, whereon the action of the Play is to depend. This day was that designed by the Dauphine for the settling of his uncle’s estate upon him, which to compass he contrives to marry him. That the marriage had been plotted by him long beforehand, is made evident by what he tells True-Wit in the second act, that in one moment he had destroyed what he had been raising many months. There is “another artifice of the Poet, which I cannot here omit, because by the frequent practice of it in his Comedies, he has left it to us almost as a rule ; that is, when he has any character or humour, wherein he would shew a Coup de Maître, or his highest skill, he recommends it to your observation by a pleasant description of it before the person first appears. Thus in Bartholomew-Fair he gives you the pictures of Numps and Cokes, and in this those of Darw, Lafoole, Morose, and the Collegiate Ladies ; all which you hear described before you see them, so that before they come upon the stage you have a longing expectation of them, which prepares you to receive them favourably ; and when they are there, even from their first appearance, you are so far acquainted with them, that nothing of their humour is lost to you. I will observe yet one thing further of this admirable plot ; the business of it rises in every act : the second is greater than the first ; the third than the second, and so forward to the fifth. There too you see, till the very last scene, new difficulties arising to obstruct the action of the play ; and when the audience is brought into despair, that the business can naturally be effected, then, and not before, the discovery is made. But that the Poet might entertain you with more variety all this while, he reserves some new characters to shew you, which he opens not till the second and third act ; in the second, Morose, Darw, the Barber, and Otter ; in the third the Collegiate Ladies ; all which he moves afterwards in by-walks or under plots, as diversions to the main design, lest it should grow tedious, though they are still naturally joined with it, and somewhere or other subservient to it. Thus, like a skillful Chess-player, by little and little he draws out his men, and makes his pawns of use to his greater persons. If this Comedy, and some others of his were translated into French prose, (which would now be no wonder to them, since Moliere has lately given them plays out of verse, which have not displeased them) I believe, the controversy would soon be decided between the two nations, even making them the judges.”

Mr. Gildon having observed (12), that “a comic character can never be valuable, that is not general, and that those that are only particular yield no instruction ; tells us, that it was a very odd defence, that he heard a great Poet once give for the Morose of Ben. Johnson, which was that Ben. knew a certain person of that extravagant humour. But Ben. was too judicious a Poet to take the single extravagance of any one person to be a just character for comic representation.”

Mr. Congreve in his Letter to Mr. Dennis about humour gives a much better defence of our author upon this head, and shews, that Morose is not a particular, but general character. “The character of Morose, says he, in the Silent Woman, I take to be a character of humour, and I chose to instance this character to you from many others of the same author, because I know it has been condemned by many as unnatural and farce ; and you have yourself hinted some dislike of it for the same reason, in a letter to me concerning some of Johnson’s Plays. Let us suppose Morose to be a man naturally splenetic and melancholy ; is there any thing more offensive to one of such a disposition than noise and clamour ? Let any man that has the spleen (and there are enough in England) be judge. We see common examples of this humour in little every day. It is ten to one but three parts in four of the company that you dine with, are discomposed and startled at the cutting of a cork, or scratching a plate with a knife. It is a proportion of the same humour that makes such or any other noise offensive to the persons that hear it ; for there are others, who will not be disturbed at all by it. Well ! but Morose, you will say, is so extravagant, he cannot bear any discourse or conversation above a whisper. Why, it is his excess of this humour, that makes him become ridiculous, and qualifies his character, for Comedy. If the Poet had given him but a moderate proportion of that humour, it is odds but half the audience would have sided with the character and condemned the author for exposing a humour, which was neither remarkable nor ridiculous. Besides the distance of the stage requires the (12) Letter of Poetry explained and illustrated, pag. 246. edit. London 1721, in 8vo.

(11) Pag. 35.

his Alchymist [L] in 1610; and his Catiline's Conspiracy [M] in 1611. The rest of his writings we shall give an account of in the note [N]. By the invitation of Dr. Richard Corbet, afterwards Dean of Christ-Church in Oxford, and Bishop of that See, and others of his friends, he resided for some time in that College, where he wrote several of his Plays (g); and on the 19th of July 1619 was created Master of Arts (*). Upon the death of Mr. Samuel Daniel in October that year, he succeeded him in the place of

(g) Wood, Art. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 629.

(*) Idem. Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 215.

Poet

“ figure represented to be something larger than the life; and sure a picture may have features larger in proportion, and yet be very like the original. If this exactness of quantity were to be observed in wit, as some would have it in humour, what would become of those characters, that are designed for men of wit? I believe, if a Poet should steal a dialogue of any length from the Ex tempore discourse of the two wittiest men upon earth, he would find the scene but coldly received by the town.

[L] His Alchymist.] It was acted by the King's servants, and dedicated to The Lady most deserving her Name and Blood, the Lady Mary Wroth. It is an excellent Comedy. Mr. Dryden supposes, that this Play was copied from the Comedy of Albumazer, as far as concerns the character of the Alchymist, as appears from his Prologue to Albumazer reviv'd at the King's House, where he says,

Subtle was got by our Albumazer,
That Alchymist by this Astrologer:
Here he was fashion'd, and we may suppose
He lik'd the fashion well, who wore the cloaths.

[M] His Catiline's Conspiracy.] It was acted by the King's servants, and dedicated to The great Example of Honour and Virtue, the most noble William Earl of Pembroke. He has borrowed very much from the antients in this Tragedy; as for instance, the part of Sylla's Ghost, in the very entrance of the Play, is copied from the Ghost of Tantalus in the beginning of Seneca's Thyestes. And he has translated a great deal of Salust's History, and inserted it into his Play.

[N] The rest of his dramatic writings we shall give an account of in the note.] I. Case is alter'd; a pleasant Comedy, sundry times acted by the Children of Black-Fryars. London, 1609, in 4to. II. Bartholomew Fair, a Comedy acted at the Hope on the Bank side, October 31, in the year 1614, by the Lady Elizabeth's servants. Dedicated to King James I. III. Devil is an Ass, a Comedy acted in the year 1616, by his Majesty's servants. IV. Staple of News, a Comedy acted in the year 1625, by his Majesty's servants. V. The Magnetick Lady, or Humours reconciled, a Comedy, acted at Black-Fryars. Dr. Alexander Gill, who succeeded his father, in 1635, in the Mastership of St. Paul's School, wrote a Satyr against this Play, in which are the following lines.

“ But to advise thee, Ben, in this strict age
“ A Brick-kiln's better for thee than a stage:
“ Thou better know'st a groundfil for to lay,
“ Than lay the plot or ground-work of a Play;
“ And better canst direct to cap a chimney,
“ Than to converse with Clio or Polyphymny.
“ Fall then to work in thy old age again;
“ Take up thy trug and trowell, gentle Ben;
“ Let Plays alone; or if thou needs wilt write,
“ And thrust thy feeble Muse into the light;
“ Let Lowen cease, and Taylor scorn to touch
“ The loathed stage, for thou hast made it such.”

Our author answered him thus:

“ Shall the prosperity of a pardon still “ Secure thy railing rhymes, infamous Gill,
“ At libeling? shall no Star-Chamber Peers,
“ Pillory, nor whip, nor want of ears,
“ All which thou hast incur'd deservedly;
“ Nor derogation from the Ministry,
“ To be the Denis of thy father's school,
“ Keep in thy bawling wit, thou bawling fool?
“ Thinking to stir me, thou hast lost thy end;
“ I'll laugh at thee, poor wretched tike; go, send “ Thy blotant Muse abroad, and teach it rather “ A tune to drown the balads of thy father.

“ For thou hast nought to cure his fame,
“ But tune and noise, the eccho of his shame:
“ A rogue by statute, censur'd to be whipt, “ Cropt, branded, slit, neck-stock'd; go, you are “ stript.”

VI. A Tale of a Tub, a Comedy. VII. The Widow, a Comedy, acted at the Private House in Black-Fryars with great applause, by his late Majesty's servants. This was written by our author, in conjunction with Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Middleton, and first published by Mr. Alexander Gough at London, 1652, in 4to. VIII. Mortimer's Fall, a fragment of a Tragedy, left imperfect at his death. IX. The New Inn, or the Light Heart; a Comedy, as it was never acted, but most negligently played by some, the King's servants, and more squamishly beheld and censured by others, the King's subjects, 1629. Now at last set at liberty to the Readers, his Majesty's servants and subjects, to be judged of. London, 1631, in 8vo. To the edition of this Play he subjoined the following Ode.

The just indignation the author took at the vulgar censure of his play by some malicious spectators, begat the following Ode to himself.

Come, leave the loathed stage,
And the more loathsome age;
Where pride and impudence, in fashion knit,
Usurp the chair of wit:
Inditing and arraigning every day
Something they call a Play.
Let their fastidious, vain
Commission of the brain
Run on, and rage, sweat, censure, and condemn:
They were not made for thee, lest thou for them.

Say that thou pour'st them wheat,
And they will acorns eat:
'Twere simple fury still thy self to waste
On such as have no taste.
To offer them a surfeit of pure bread,
Whose appetites are dead!
No, give them grains their fill,
Husks, drass, to drink and swill.
If they love lees, and leave the lusty wine,
Envy them not their palates with the swine.

No doubt some musty tale
Like Pericles (13), and stale
As the Shrieve's crust, and nasty as his fish-Scraps out of every dish,
Thrown forth, and rack'd into the common tub,
May keep up the Play-Club.
There sweepings do as well
As the best order'd meal.
For who the relish of these guests will fit,
Needs set them but the alms-basket of wit.

And much good do't you then;
Brave plush and velvet men
Can feed on orts; and safe in your stage cloths Dare quit upon your oaths
The stagers and the stage-wrights too (your Peers)
Of larding your large ears
With their foul comic stocks,
Wrought upon twenty blocks;
Which if they're torn, and turn'd, and patch'd enough,
The gamesters share your guilt, and you their stuff.

Leave things so prostitute,
And take the Alcaic lute;
Or shine own Horace, or Anacreon's lyre:
Warm thee by Pindar's fire;
And tho' thy nerves be struck, and blood be cold,
E'er years have made thee old,
Strike that disdainful beat
Throughout, to their defeat,

(13) A Play published under Shakespeare's name, tho' unworthy of it.

As

(b) Idem, Alb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 447.

(i) Ubi supra, pag. 106.

Poet Laureat to his Majesty (b). Sir Thomas Pope Blount tells us (i), that “ he was generally esteemed a man of a very free temper, and withall blunt, and somewhat haughty to those, that were either rivals in fame, or enemies to his writings; otherwise of a good sociable humour, when amongst his friends in the Apollo (k) [O].” We shall give the rest of his character from several authors in the note [P]. He assisted

(k) A room in the old Devil Tavern near Temple Bar.

*As curious fools, and envious of thy strain
May blushing swear no falsity in thy brain.*

*But when they hear thee sing
The glories of thy King
His zeal to God, and his just awe o'er men;
They may blood-shaken then,
Feel such a self-quake to possess their powers,
As they shall cry like ours,
In sounds of peace and wars
No harp e'er hit the stars,
In tuning forth the acts of his sweet reign,
And raising Charles's Chariot 'bove his wain.*

Mr. Feltham wrote a severe reply to this Ode; the second stanza of which is as follows:

“ 'Tis known you can do well,
“ And that you do excell
“ As a translator. But when things require
“ A genius and a fire,
“ Not kindled heretofore by others pains;
“ As oft y'ave wanted brains
“ And art to strike the white,
“ As you have levell'd right.
“ Yet if men vouch not things apocryphal,
“ You bellow, rave, and spatter round your gall.”

Mr. Thomas Randolph wrote an answer to Mr. Johnson's Ode to persuade him not to leave the stage; and Mr. Carew has another copy of verses to him on the same occasion. X. Entertainment of King James in passing to his Coronation; in prose and verse. XI. Entertainment of the Queen and Prince at Alibrope at the Lord Spencer's on Saturday being the twenty fifth of June 1603 as they came first into the Kingdom. XII. Entertainment in private of the King and Queen on May Day in the Morning at Sir William Cornwallis's House at Highgate, 1604: in prose and verse. XIII. Entertainment of the two Kings of Great Britain and Denmark at Theobalds, July the 24th 1606: in Latin and English verse. XIV. Entertainment of King James and Queen at Theobalds, when the house was delivered up with the possession to the Queen by the Earl of Salisbury, May the 22d 1607. XV. Entertainment of the King at Welbeck in Nottinghamshire, a House of the Right Honourable William Earl of Newcastle at his going into Scotland 1633. Besides these he wrote several Masques; and a Pastoral intitled, The sad Shepberd, or A Tale of Robin Hood, which he left imperfect, there being but two Acts, and part of the third finished; and he assisted Mr. George Chapman, and Mr. John Marston in a Play called Eastward-Hoe. His other writings are, Epigrams, Under-Woods; a Translation of Horace's Art of Poetry into English Verse; an English Grammar made for the Benefit of Strangers out of his observation of the English Language now spoken and in use; and Timber, or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter, as they have flowed out of his daily Readings, or had their Reflux to his peculiar notion of the times. After his death there was printed Ben Jonson's execration against Vulcan: with divers Epigrams by the same Author to severall noble Personages in this Kingdome. Never published before. London 1640 in 4to. The Imprimatur is dated December the 14th 1639. The Execration against Vulcan appears to have been written upon the occasion of some of his writings having been accidentally burnt. It begins thus.

“ And why to me this, thou lame God of fire?
“ What have I done, that might call on thine ire?
“ Or urge thy greedy flames, thus to devour
“ So many my years labours in one hour!”

He afterwards writes thus.

“ But in my desk what was there to excite
“ So ravenous and vast an appetite?”

“ I dare not say a body, but some parts
“ There were of search and mystery in the arts:
“ And the old Venusine in Poetry,
“ And lighted by the Stagyrite could spy,
“ Was there made English, with a Grammar too,
“ To teach some that their nurses could not do,
“ The purity of language; and, among
“ The rest, my journey into Scotland sung,
“ With all the adventures: three books not afraid
“ To speak the fate of the Sicilian maid
“ For our own Ladies; and in story there
“ Of our fifth Henry, eight of his ninth year.
“ In which was oil, besides the succours spent,
“ Which noble Cotton, Carew, Selden sent:
“ And humble gleanings in Divinity
“ After the Fathers, and those wiser guides,
“ Whom faction had not drawn to study sides.”

He published an edition of his works at London 1616 in folio, reprinted there in 1640 in folio, with the addition of another volume in folio. His works were likewise reprinted at London 1716 in six volumes in 8vo. But in all these additions his Comedy intitled, The Case is altered, is omitted.

[O] Of a good sociable humour, when amongst his friends in the Apollo. In the marble over the chimney in that room, where he kept his club, there are the following laws engraven.

Leges Convivales.

Quod felix faustumque Convivis in Apolline fit.

- I. Nemo asymbolus, nisi umbra, huc venito.
- II. Idiota, insulsus, tristis, turpis abesto.
- III. Eruditi, urbani, bilares, honesti, adfiscuntur.
- IV. Nec lætæ sœminæ repudiantur.
- V. In apparatu quod convivis corruget naves, nil esto.
- VI. Epulæ delectu potius quam sumptu parentur.
- VII. Obsonator & Coquus conviviarum gulæ periti sunt.
- VIII. De discubitu non contenditur.
- IX. Ministri à dapibus oculati & muti, à poculis auriti & celeres sunt.
- X. Vina puris fontibus ministrantur, aut vapulet hospes.
- XI. Moderatis poculis provocare sodales fas esto.
- XII. At Fabulis magis quam vino velitatio fiat.
- XIII. Convivæ nec muti nec loquaces sunt.
- XIV. De feriis ac sacris poti & saturi ne differunt.
- XV. Fidicen, nisi accersitus, non venito.
- XVI. Admisso risu, tripudiis, eboreis, cantu, salibus, omni gratiarum festivitate sacra celebrentur.
- XVII. Joci sine felle sunt.
- XVIII. Inspida poemata nulla recitantur.
- XIX. Versus scribere nullus cogitor.
- XX. Argumentationis totus strepitus abesto.
- XXI. Amatoriis querelis ac suspiriis liber angulus esto.
- XXII. Lapidibus more Scyphis pugnare, Vitrea collidere, fenestras excutere supellectilem dilacerare, nefas esto.
- XXIII. Qui foras vel dicta vel facta eliminat, eliminatur.
- XXIV. Neminem reum pocula faciunt.

Focus perennis esto.

[P] We shall give the rest of his character in the note. Sir John Suckling in his Sessions of the Poets (14) writes thus.

“ The first, that broke silence was good old Ben, “ Prepared before with Canary Wine;
“ And he told them plainly he detierved the bays,
“ For his were call'd Works, where others were but “ Plays,

(14) Fragmenta aurea. A Collection of the incomparable pieces written by Sir John Suckling, pag. 7. edit. 1648 in 8vo.

“ And
“ Bid them remember how he had purg'd the stage
“ Of errors, that had laited many an age;
“ And he hop'd, they did not think the Silent Woman,
“ The Fox, and the Alchymist outdone by no man.

4

“ Apollo

Dr. John Hackett, afterwards Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in translating the Lord Bacon's Essays into Latin. He died on the 16th of August 1637 in the sixty third year of his age, and was interred three days after in Westminster-Abbey, at the west-end near the Bellfrey, under the Escutcheon of Robert de Ros or Roos, with these words, O rare Ben Johnson, engraven on a common pavement stone over his grave, at the expence of Mr. John Young of Great Milton in Oxfordshire, afterwards knighted by King Charles II. There was a considerable sum of money collected among the men of wit and learning for the " Apollo stopp'd him there, and bade him not go on ;

 " 'Twas merit, he said, and not presumption
 " Must carry't. At which Ben turn'd about,
 " And in great choler offer'd to go out.

" But

" Those that were there thought it not fit
 " To discontent so antient a wit ;
 " And therefore Apollo call'd him back again,
 " And made him mine Host of his own New Inn."

(15) Lives of the most famous English Poets, pag. 125. edit. 1687.

Mr. Winstanley (15) says, " that he was paramount in the Dramatic Poetry, and taught the stage an exact conformity to the laws of the Comedians, being accounted the most learned, judicious, and correct of them all, and the more to be admired for being so, for that neither the height of natural parts, (for he was no Shakespeare) nor the cost of extraordinary education, but his own proper industry and addition to books advanced him to this perfection." He observes afterwards (16), " that his Plays were above the vulgar capacity, (which are only tickled with downright obscenity,) and took not so well at the first stroke as at the rebound, when beheld the second time; yea, they will endure reading, and that with due commendation, so long as either ingenuity or learning are fashionable in our nation. And altho' all his Plays may endure the test, yet in three of his Comedies, namely, the Fox, Alcbymist, and Silent Woman, he may be compared, in the judgment of the learned men, for decorum, language, and well humouring parts, as well with the chief of the antient Greek and Latin Comedians, as the prime of modern Italians, who have been judged the best of Europe for a happy vein in Comedies; nor is his Baribolomew-Fair much short of them. As for his other Comedies, Staple of News, Devil's an Ass, and the rest, if they be not so sprightly and vigorous as his first pieces, all that are old will, and all that desire to be old, should excuse him therein, and therefore let the name of Ben Johnson shield them against whoever shall think fit to be severe in censure against them. Truth is, his Tragedies, Sejanus and Catiline, seem to have in them more of artificial and inflate, than of a pathetical and naturally tragic height; yet do they each of them far excel any of the English ones that were writ before him; so that he may be truly said to be the first reformer of the English stage, as he himself more truly and modestly writes in his commendatory verses of his servant Richard Broome's Comedy of the Northern Lass;

" Which you have justly gained from the stage,
 " By observation of those Comic Lawes,
 " Which I, your master, first did teach the age.

" In the rest of his Poetry, (for he is not wholly Dramatic) as his Underwoods, Epigrams, &c he is sometimes bold and strenuous, sometimes magisterial, sometimes lepid and full enough of conceit, and sometimes a man as other men are." Mr. Dryden (17) styles him the greatest man of the last age; and tells us, " that he was not only a professed imitator of Horace, but a learned plagiary of all the others: you track him every where in their snow. If Horace, Lucan, Petronius Arbitor, Seneca, and Juvenal, had their own from him, there are few serious thoughts which are new in him." He afterwards thinks (18), " that if we look upon him, while he was himself, (for his last Plays were but his dotages) he was the most learned and judicious writer, which any theatre ever had. He was a most severe judge of himself as well as others. One cannot say he wanted wit, but rather that he was frugal of it. In his works you find little to retrench or alter. Wit, and language, and humour also in some measure we had before him; but something of art was wanting to the Drama till he came. He managed his strength to more advantage than any who preceded him. You seldom find him making love in any of his scenes, or endeavouring to move the passions: his genius was too sullen and saturnine to do it gracefully, especially when he knew he came after those, who had performed both to such an height. Humour was his proper sphere, and in that he delighted most to represent mechanic people. He was deeply conversant in the antients both Greek and Latin, and he borrowed boldly from them. There is scarce a Poet or Historian among the Roman authors of those times, whom he has not translated in Sejanus and Catiline. But he has done his robberies so openly that one may see, he fears not to be taxed by any law. He invades authors like a monarch, and what would be theft in other Poets, is only victory in him. With the spoils of these writers he represents old Rome to us in its rites, ceremonies, and customs, that if one of their Poets had written either of his Tragedies, we had seen less of it than in him. If there was any fault in his language, it was, that he weaved it too closely and laboriously, in his Comedies especially; perhaps too he did a little too much Romanize our tongue, leaving the words translated almost as much Latin as he found them; wherein tho' he learnedly followed their language, he did not enough comply with the Idiom of ours. If I would compare him with Shakespeare, I must acknowledge him the more correct Poet, but Shakespeare the greater Wit. Shakespeare was the Homer or Father of our Dramatic Poets; Johnson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing; I admire him, but I love Shakespeare. To conclude of him, as he has given us the most correct Plays, so in the precepts, which he has laid down in his Discoveries, we have as many and profitable rules for perfecting the stage, as any wherewith the French can furnish us." The same author in another place (19) tells us, that " Ben Johnson is a most judicious writer, and that he always wrote properly, and as the character required; and I will not, says he, contest farther with my friends, who call that wit; it being very certain, that even folly itself well represented is wit in a larger signification, and that there is fancy as well as judgment in it, though not so much or noble; because Poetry being imitation, that of folly is a lower exercise of fancy, though perhaps as difficult as the other: for it is a kind of looking downward in the Poet, and representing that part of mankind, which is below him. In these low characters of vice and folly lay the excellency of that inimitable writer, who when at any time he aimed at wit in the stricter sense, that is, sharpness of conceit, was forced either to borrow from the antients, as to my knowledge he did very much from Plautus; or when he trusted himself alone, often fell into meannefs of expression. Nay he was not free from the lowest and most groveling kind of wit, which we call Clenches, of which Every man in his humour is infinitely full, and which is worse, the wittiest persons in the Drama speak them." Mr. Dryden in another place (20) writes thus: " Ben Johnson is to be admired for many excellencies, and can be taxed with fewer failings than any English Poet. I know, I have been accused as an enemy of his writings; but without any other reason than that I do not admire him blindly, and without looking into his imperfections. For why should he only be excepted from those frailties from which Homer and Virgil are not free? Or why should there be any ipse dixit in our Poetry, any more than there is in our Philosophy? ... To make men appear pleasantly ridiculous

(16) Ibid. pag. 126.

(17) Essay of Dramatic Poesy, pag. 9.

(18) Ibid. pag. 32.

(19) Postscript to the Conquest of Granada.

(20) Preface to the Mock Astrologer.

(1) Wood, Art.
Dixon, vol. 1, col.
610.

(m) Ibid., ibid.

the erection of a statue and monument to him; but this design was broken off by the civil wars, and the money was refunded (l). Mr. Wood was informed by Dr. George Morley, Bishop of Winchester, that our Poet had a pension of a hundred pounds per ann. from the King, a pension from the City of London, and the like from several of the Nobility and Gentry, and particularly Mr. Sutton, the Founder of the Chârtreux Hospital in London. Among his Underwoods there is a piece intitled, The humble Petition of poore Ben, To the best of Monarchs, Masters, Men, King Charles; in which he requests his Majesty, that as his Royal Father had allowed him an annual pension of an hundred Marks, he would make them Pounds. In 1629 he wrote an epigram to the King upon his sending him a hundred pounds in his sickness; and 1631 he wrote an Epistle Mendicant to the Lord Treasurer to sollicit him for some money, complaining, that he had laboured under sickness, and want for five years. When he was in his last sickness the Prelate abovementioned, who was then Master of Arts, frequently visited him among others of his acquaintance, and as often heard him repent of his profaning the Scripture in his Plays (m). It appears from a letter of Mr. James Howell (n) to Dr. Brian Duppa Bishop of Chichester, and tutor to King Charles II, then Prince of Wales, that the Bishop was preparing to publish a piece intitled, Jonsonus Virbius; to which Mr. Howell contributed a Decastich. This piece was published in 1638 under the title of Jonsonus Virbius; or the Memorie of Ben Johnson revived by the Friends of the Muses [2], London in 4to.

(n) Howell's Familiar Letters, vol. 1, Sect. 6. Let. 31. There is some mistake in the date of that Letter, for it is dated May 1, 1636, whereas Ben. Johnson did not die till Aug. 16, 1637.

He

“culous on the stage, was, as I have said, his talent, and in this he needed not the acumen of wit, but that of judgment. For the characters and representations of folly are only the effects of observation, and observation is an effect of judgment. Some ingenious men, for whom I have a particular esteem, have thought I have much injured Ben Johnson, when I have not allowed his wit to be extraordinary. But they confound the notion of what is witty with what is pleasant. That Ben Johnson's Plays were pleasant, he must want reason who denies. But that pleasantness was not properly wit, or the sharpness of conceit, but the natural imitation of folly; which I confess to be excellent in its kind, but not to be of that kind, which they pretend. Yet if we will believe Quintilian in his chapter de movendo risu, he gives his opinion of both in these following words: Stulta reprehendere facillimum est, nam per se sunt ridicula; & à derisu non procul abest risus. Sed rem urbanam facit aliqua ex nobis adjectio. And some perhaps would be apt to say of Johnson, as it was said of Demosthenes, non displicuisse illi jocos sed non contigisse.” Mr. Shadwell says (21) that our author was incomparably the best Dramatic Poet that ever was, or he believes, ever will be; and that he had rather be the author of one scene in his best Comedies, than of any Play the age had produced. Mr. Thomas Rytner (22) having observed, that in a Play one should speak like a man of business, his speech must be πολιτικόν, which the French render agissante, the Italians negotiosa and operativa; tells us, that it was then a strange imagination in Ben Johnson to go stuff out a Play with Tully's Orations. He afterwards observes (23); that our author knew how to distinguish men and manners; and that in his Catiline, the scene is Rome, and first on the stage appears Sylla's Ghost.

(21) Dedication to his Virtuoso.

(22) A Short View of Tragedy, cap. 1, pag. 5, 6. edit. London 1693.

(23) Ibid. cap. 8, pag. 159.

Dost thou not feel me, Rome? Not yet?

One would in reason imagine the Ghost is in some public open place, upon some eminence, where Rome is all within his view. But it is a surprizing thing to find, that this rattling rodomontado speech is a dark, close, private sleeping-hole of Catiline's. Yet the Chorus is of all wonders the strangest. The Chorus is always present on the stage, privy to, and interested in all that passes, and thereupon make their reflections to conclude the several Acts. Sylla's Ghost, though never so big, might slide in at the key-hole; but how comes the Chorus into Catiline's chamber? Aurelia is soon after with him too; but the Poet had perhaps provided her some truckle-bed in a dark closet by him. In short, it is strange that Ben who understood the turn of Comedy so well, and had found the success, should thus grope in the dark, and jumble things together without head or tail, without any rule or proportion, without any reason or design. Might not the Acts of the Apostles, or a Life in Plutarch, be as well acted, and as properly called a Tragedy, as any History of a Conspiracy? ... What is there material in this Catiline, either in the manners, in the thoughts, or in the expression, (three parts of Tragedy) which is not word for word translated? Mr. Lewis Theobald (24) observes, that Shakespeare and our author “are professedly the greatest writers our nation could ever boast of in the Drama. The first, we say, owed all to his prodigious natural genius; and the other a great deal to his art and learning. This, if attended to, will explain a very remarkable appearance in their writings. Besides those wonderful masterpieces of art and genius, which each has given us, they are the authors of other works very unworthy of them; but with this difference, that in Johnson's bad pieces we do not discover one single trace of the author of the Fox and Alchymist; but in the wild extravagant notes of Shakespeare, you every now and then encounter strains, that recognize the divine composer. This difference may be thus accounted for. Johnson, as we have said before, owing all his excellence to his art, by which he sometimes strained himself to an uncommon pitch, when at other times he unbent and played with his subject; having nothing then to support him, it is no wonder he wrote so far beneath himself. But Shakespeare indebted more largely to nature, than the other to acquired talents, in his most negligent hours could never so totally divest himself of his genius, but that it would frequently break out with astonishing force and splendor.”

(24) Preface to the Works of Shakespeare, pag. 33, 34. ed. London 1733, in 8vo.

[2] Published under the title of Jonsonus Verbius; or the Memorie of Ben Johnson revived by the Friends of the Muses.] The Imprimatur is dated January the 23d 1637. It contains 74 pages. The Printer in his advertisement to the reader writes thus. “It is now about six months since the most learned and judicious Poet Ben Johnson became a subject for these Elegies. The time interjected between his death and the publishing of these, shews that so great an argument ought to be considered before handled; not that the Gentlemen's affections were less ready to grieve, but their judgments to write. At length the loose papers were consigned to the hands of a Gentleman, who truly honoured him (for he knew why he did so). To his care you are beholden that they are now made yours. And he was willing to let you know the value of what you have lost, that you might the better recommend what you have left of him to your posterity.” It contains a collection of Poems written upon our author's death by the Lord Falkland, Lord Buckhurst, Sir John Beaumont Bart. Sir Thomas Hawkins, Mr. Henry King, Mr. Henry Coventry, Mr. Thomas May, Mr. Dudley Diggs, Mr. George Fortescue, Mr. William Abington or Habington, Mr. Edmund Waller, Mr. James Howel, Mr. John Vernon, Mr. J. Cl. (25), Mr. Jaspas Mayne, Mr. William Cartwright, Mr. Jo. Rutter, Mr. Owen Feltham, Mr. George Donne, Mr. Shakerly Marmion, M. A. Mr. John Ford, Mr. R. Brideoak, M. A. Mr. Richard West, Mr. R. Meade, Mr. H. Ramsay, Sir Francis Wortley, Bart. Mr. T. Terrent, Mr. Rob. Waring, Mr. William Bew, and Mr.

(25) Probably John Cleveland.

(o) Winstanley, Lives of the most famous English Poets, pag. 127. edit. London 1687.

(p) Ubi supra.

(q) Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning, cap. 5. pag. 58. edit. London 1694.

He had several children, but none survived him (o) [R]. He had a very strong memory [S]. His constant humour was to sit silent in learned company, and “suck in, says Fuller (p), their several humours into his observation. What was Ore in others, he was able to refine unto himself.” In his Discoveries he observes, that his innocence had often rescued him from the dangers, to which the malice of his enemies had exposed him [T]. Mr. Wotton (q) remarks, that our Author was the first, that he knew of, who did any thing considerable with regard to the grammar of the English language; but that “Lilly’s grammar was his pattern, and for want of reflecting upon the grounds of a language, which he understood as well as any man of his age, he drew it by violence to a dead language that was of a quite different make, and so left his work imperfect.” Our author had a very intimate friendship with Mr. Selden, who wrote a Latin Poem in praise of him, intitled, Ad Virum Cl. Ben Johnsonum Car-men Protrepticon, and wrote a letter to him, dated from the Inner-Temple, February the 28th 1615 (r), concerning “the literal sense and historical of the holy text usually brought (r) It is published in Dr David Wilkins’s edition of Mr. Selden’s Works, vol. 2. pag. 1691, edit. London 1726 in fol.

Mr. Samuel Evans L. L. B. The Lord Falkland in his Eclogue upon Johnson’s death hath these lines.

“His learning such, no author old nor new “Escap’d his reading that deserv’d his view;
“And such his judgment, so exact his test,
“Of what was best in books, as what books best,
“That had he join’d those notes his labours took,
“From each most prais’d and praise-deserving book,
“And could the world of that choice treasure boast,
“It need not care, though all the rest were lost;
“And such his wit, he wrote past what he quotes,
“And his productions far exceed his notes.
“So in his works where ought inserted grows.
“The noblest of the plants engrafted shews,
“That his adopted children equal not
“The generous issue his own brain begot.
“So great his art, that much which he did write “Gave the wise wonder, and the crowd delight.
“How in an ignorant and learn’d age he sway’d
“(Of which the first he found, the second made)
“How he, when he could know it, reap’d his fame,
“And long outliv’d the envy of his name:
“To him how daily flock’d, what reverence gave
“All that had wit, or would be thought to have,
“Or hope to gain, and in so large a store,
“That to his ashes they can pay no more,
“Except those few, who censuring thought not so,
“But aim’d at glory from so great a foe.”

Mr. Jasper Mayne in his Poem writes thus.

*Scorn then their censures, who gav’t out, thy wit
As long upon a Comedy did sit,
As elephants bring forth; and that thy blots
And mendings took more time than fortune plots;
That such thy drougt was, and so great thy thirst,
That all thy Plays were drawn at th’ Mermaid * first:
That the King’s yearly Butt wrote, and his wine
Hath more right than thou to thy Catiline.
Let such men keep a diet, let their wit
Be rack’d, and while they write, suffer a fit;
When th’ have felt tortures, which out-pain the gout;
Such as wish less the state draws treason out;
Though they should the length of consumptions lie
Sick of their verse, and of their Poem die,
’T would not be thy worst scene.*

[R] He had several children, but none survived him.] His 22d Epigram is upon his first daughter, Mary, who died at six months; and his 45th on his first son, who died at seven years of age.

[S] He had a very strong memory.] “I myself, says he (24), could in my youth have repeated all that ever I had made, and so continued till I was past forty. Since it is much decayed in me. Yet I can repeat whole books that I have read, and poems of some selected friends, which I have liked to charge my memory with. It was wont to be faithful to me; but shaken with age now and sloth (which weakens the strongest abilities) it may perform somewhat, but cannot promise much. By exercise it is made to be better and serviceable. Whatsoever I pawned with it, while I was young and a boy, it offers me readily, and without stops: but what I trust to it now, or have done of later years, it lays up more negligently, and oftentimes loses;

“so that I receive mine own (though frequently called for) as if it were new and borrowed. Nor do I always find presently from it what I do seek; but while I am doing another thing, that I laboured for will come, and what I sought with trouble, will offer itself when I am quiet. Now in some men I have found it as happy as nature, who, whatsoever they read or pen, they can say without book presently, as if they did then write in their mind. And it is more a wonder in such as have a swift stile, for their memories are commonly slowest. Such as torture their writings, and go in to council for every word, must needs fix somewhat, and make it their own at last, though but through their own vexation.”

[T] In his Discoveries he observes, that his innocence often rescued him from those dangers, to which the malice of his enemies had exposed him.] “An innocent, man, says he (25), needs no eloquence: his innocence is instead of it. Else I had never come off so many times from those precipices, whither men’s malice hath pursued me. It is true, I have been accused to the Lords, to the King, and by great ones. But it happened my accusers had not thought of the accusation with themselves, and so were driven for want of crimes to use invention, which was found slander; or too late, (being entered so far) to seek starting holes for their rashness, which were not given them. And then they may think, what accusation that was like to prove, when they that were the engineers feared to be the authors. Nor were they content to feign things against me, but to urge things feigned by the ignorant against my profession; which though from their hired and mercenary impudence I might have passed by, as granted to a nation of barkers, that let out their tongues to lick others’ sores, yet I durst not leave myself undefended, having a pair of ears unskillful to hear lies, or have those things said of me, which I could truly prove of them. They objected making of verses to me, when I could object to most of them their not being able to read them, but as worthy of scorn. Nay, they would offer to urge my own writings against me, but by pieces, (which was an excellent way of malice, as if any man’s context might not seem dangerous and offensive, if that, which was knit to what went before, were defrauded of his beginning, or that things by themselves uttered might not seem subject to calumny, which read entire would appear most free. At last they upbraided my poverty: I confess, she is my domestic; sober of diet, simple of habit, frugal, painful, a good counsellor to me, that keeps me from cruelty, pride, or other more delicate impertinences, which are the nurse-children of riches. But let them look over all the great and monstrous wickednesses, they shall never find those in poor families. They are the issue of the wealthy giants, and the mighty hunters; whereas no great work, or worthy of praise or memory, but comes out of poor cradles. It was the ancient poverty that founded commonweals, built cities, invented arts, made wholesome laws, armed men against vices, rewarded them with their own virtues, and preserved the honour and state of nations, till they betrayed themselves to riches.”

(25) In his Discoveries.

* A famous Tavern in Bread-Street.

(24) In his Discoveries.

(s) Preface to the first edition of his Titles of Honour, London 1614, in 4to.

(t) Titles of Honour, Part 2. See his Works, vol. 3, pag. 466.

(u) Dated at the Great Mogol's Court, Wednesday Nov. the 8th 1615, printed in Purchas's Pilgrims, Part 1, pag. 597. edit. London 1625, in fol.

(a) Some Memorials of the Reverend Mr. Samuel Johnson, communicated in a Letter to a Friend by one of his intimate Acquaintance, pag. 3, prefixed to The Works of the late Reverend Mr. Samuel Johnson, 2d edit. London 1713 in fol.

"brought against the counterfeiting of sexes by apparel." He styles Mr. Johnson likewise (s) his beloved friend, and singular Poet, whose special worth, says he, in Literature, accurate judgment, and performance, known only to that few, which are truly able to know him, hath had from me, ever since I begun to learn, an increasing admiration. And in another place (t) he calls him his beloved Ben Johnson, and speaks of his curious learning and judgment. About the year 1615 our author lived in Black Fryars, as appears from a letter of Tom. Coryat (u); tho' it is said, that he had afterwards an house in Aldersgate Street at the corner of Jewin Street, where it is reported he died. Mr. Pope observes (x), "that he getting possession of the stage, brought critical learning into vogue; and that this was not done without difficulty, may appear from those frequent lessons (and indeed almost declamations) which he was forced to prefix to his first plays, and put into the mouth of his actors; the Grege, Chorus, &c. to remove the prejudices, and inform the judgment of his hearers. Till then our authors had no thoughts of writing on the model of the ancients; their Tragedies were only histories in dialogue; and their Comedies followed the thread of any novel as they found it, no less implicitly than if it had been true history."

(x) Preface to his edition of Shakespeare's Works, pag. 6. 2d edit. London 1728.

JOHNSON (SAMUEL) was born in the year 1649 in Warwickshire, and educated at St. Paul's School in London, where he made such an extraordinary proficiency, that when he was fitted for the University, he was made Library-Keeper of that school; during which time he studied the Oriental Languages with such success, that they were afterwards of great use to him in his study of Divinity. He had his University education at Cambridge; and having entered into holy Orders (a), he was presented March the 1st 1669 (b) by Mr. Bidolph to the Living of Curingham in the hundreds of Essex, worth eighty pounds a year; which was the only Church-preferment he ever had (c). But the air of that place not agreeing with him, he was obliged to leave it for his health, and placed a Curate there, to whom he gave forty pounds a year; but visited his parishioners himself as often as his health would allow. His patron observing his inclination to the study of politics, advised him to read Braetton and Fortescue de Laudibus Legum Angliæ, &c. that he might be acquainted with the old English Constitution; but by no means to make politics the subject of his sermons. Mr. Johnson religiously observed this advice. He soon became acquainted with those persons who opposed the measures of the Court in the reign of Charles II, and particularly the Lord Russel, who made him his domestic Chaplain; and when that Lord, in conjunction with others, carried on the Bill of Exclusion against the Duke of York, Mr. Johnson, to promote that design; wrote a book, intitled, Julian the Apostate [A]; against which Dr. Hickes having published by way of answer a book called Jovian, Mr. Johnson replied to him in a treatise intitled, Julian's Arts to undermine and extirpate Christianity, together with Answers to Constantius the Apostate and Jovian; which was printed in 1683, and entered at Stationers Hall; but before he published it, the Lord Russel being imprisoned, and Mr. Johnson being told by some of his friends that it would not be safe for him at that time to publish his book;

(b) Newcourt, Repertorium, vol. 2, pag. 194.

(c) Some Memorials, ubi supra.

[A] Wrote a book, intitled, Julian the Apostate. It was printed in 1682 under the following title: Julian the Apostate: being a short Account of his Life; the sense of the Primitive Christians about his Succession; and their Behaviour towards him. Together with a Comparison of Popery and Paganism. In this book our author endeavours to shew, that there was a remarkable difference betwixt the case of the primitive Christians, who had the laws against them, and ours, who had laws on our side. That when Christianity came to be established in the Empire, and Julian the Apostate's defection suspected, the Christians in those days did all they could to hinder his succession; and were so far from paying him a blind submission, when he came to the throne, that they opposed his proceedings to overturn their religion, upbraided him with his apostacy, and carried it towards him in such a manner, as discovered that they knew nothing of the doctrine of Non-Resistance. This book of our author was answer'd by several writers, viz. I. Mr. John Bennet of Christ Church Oxford, in his treatise intitled, Constantius the Apostate; being a short Account of his Life, and the Sense of the Primitive Christians about Succession. Wherein is shewn the Unlawfulness of excluding the next Heir upon the account of Religion, and the Necessity of Passive Obedience, as well to the unlawful Oppressor as legal Persecutor. Being a full Answer to a late Pamphlet intitled Julian the Apostate, &c. London, 1683, in 8vo. Dr. Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, wrote the following note upon this book: "Many mistakes are in this book, but no medium or material argument at all to prove it unlawful for the King and Parliament to seclude a Popish successor." II. Mr. Thomas Long, B. D. Prebendary of Exeter, in his Vindication of the Primitive Christians in point of Obedience to their Princes, against the Calumnies of a Book entitled, The Life of Julian the Apostate, written by Ecebolius the Sophist. London, 1683, in 8vo. III. An anonymous author, by some supposed to be Mr. Edward Meredith, who turned Papist, in Some Remarks upon a late popular piece of Nonsense, called Julian the Apostate, &c. Together with a Vindication of his Royal Highness the Duke of York against many impudent Calumnies, foolish Arguments, false Reasoning, and Suppositions imposed upon the Public from several scandalous and seditious Pamphlets, especially from one more notorious and generally virulent than the rest, entitled, A Tory Plot, &c. London, 1682, in a thin folio. IV. The author of The Triumph of Christianity: or, the Life of Cl. F. Julian the Apostate: With Remarks contained in the Resolution of several Queries. To which are added Reflections upon a Pamphlet called, Seasonable Remarks on the Fall of the Emperor Julian; and on part of a late pernicious Book, entitled, A short Account of the Life of Julian, &c. London, 1683, in 8vo. This is said to have been written by Mr. John Dowell, M. A. of Christ's College in Cambridge. V. Dr. George Hickes, in his Jovian: or an Answer to Julian the Apostate. London, 1683, in 8vo. The author is highly applauded for this book by Mr. John Dryden, the Poet, in his Vindication: or, the Parallel of the French League and English, &c. p. 39. Edit. London, 1683, in 4to. But there was published against it a pamphlet entitled, A Letter of Remarks upon Jovian: By a Person of Quality, London, 1683, in 4to. pagg. 15. in which the author undertakes to prove, that Dr. Hickes in his Jovian hath shewn himself neither a Logician, nor good Historian, nor a fair and equal Writer; but that he undermines the force of all that he would seem to say, by his concessions and contradictions.

book, he complied with their advice. However about two months after that Lord was beheaded, our author was summoned to appear before the King and Council, where he was examined by the Lord Keeper North [B], and on the 3d of August 1683 committed prisoner to the Gatehouse; whence he was bailed out by two of his friends. The Court having used all possible endeavours to discover and seize the copies of his book, but in vain [C]; they were obliged to drop the prosecution upon it, and lodged an information against him in the King's-Bench for writing Julian the Apostate [D], for which he was fined five hundred marks, and to be committed prisoner to the King's-Bench till he should pay it, which the Court knew was the same with perpetual imprisonment, since he was not able to raise that sum. Here he lay in very necessitous circumstances [E], and during his confinement published several pieces, which after the Revolution he collected into a volume, and intitled, A Second Five Years Struggle against Popery and Tyranny [F]. Among these one of the most remarkable was, An humble and hearty Address to all the Protestants in King James's Army, at that time encamped on Hounslow-Heath. The Court was so much incensed at this, that he was condemned at the King's-Bench to stand three times in the pillory, and to be whipt from Newgate to Tyburn, and ordered to be degraded from the Priesthood [G]. December the 1st 1686 his sentence was put in execution, [B] Summons to appear before the King and Council, where he was examined by the Lord-Keeper North.] His examination turned upon these two points: 1. Whether he was the author of a book called, Julian's Arts to undermine and extirpate Christianity? To which he answered in the affirmative. 2. Why after that book had been so long entered at Stationers-Hall, it was not published? To which he replied, That the nation was in too great a ferment to have the matter further debated at that time. Upon this he was commanded to produce one of those books to the Council, and was told, that if they approved it, it should be published; but he answered, that he had suppressed them himself, so that they were now his own private thoughts, for which he was not accountable to any Power upon Earth. The Council dismissed him at that time, but sent for him twice afterwards, pressed the same thing upon him, and received the same answers, for which they sent him prisoner to the Gate-house (1).

(1) Some Memorials of the Reverend Mr. Samuel
Johnson, pag. 5.

[C] The court having used all possible endeavours to discover and seize the copies of his book, but in vain.] Mr. Johnson had committed them to the care of a friend. A Messenger was sent to search the house, where the Court had information they were, but missed them; which was the more remarkable, because after the first search, his friends apprehending a further inquiry, and not thinking them secure enough, removed them; and when the messenger searched again, he found the first place, but missed the second; after which they were removed to a third place in the same house, and upon a fresh search, the Messenger found the second place, but missed the third (2).

(2) Ibid. pag. 6.

[D] Lodged an information against him in the King's Bench for writing Julian the Apostate.] The prosecution was begun and carried on by the interest of the Duke of York. "The Papists about that Prince knowing there was no such effectual way to ruin Protestants, as to sow divisions among them, resolved to split them with a wedge of their own timber. To this end they run down the old Queen Elizabeth-Protestants, who began to grow out of fashion, and those of the Laudean stamp were the only men in vogue. One of that sort, who wore the Church's livery, was pitched upon to cull those passages out of Mr. Johnson's book, upon which the information against him was founded, and that Gentleman then made his boasts of it (3)." When Mr. Johnson was brought to trial, he employed Mr. Wallop as his Council, who urged for his client, that he had offended against no law of the land. That the book taken together was innocent; but any treatise might be made criminal, if dealt with as those, who drew up the information, had dealt with this. The Judges had orders to proceed in the cause; and the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffries upbraided Mr. Johnson for meddling with what did not belong to him, and scoffingly told him, that he would give him a text, which was, Let every man study to be quiet, and mind his own business; to which Mr. Johnson replied, that he did mind his business as an Englishman, when he wrote that book (4).

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid. pag. 7.

[E] Here he lay in very necessitous circumstances.] When the Duke of Monmouth landed in England, all the halls in London, as well as jails in the country were filled with persons, whom the court suspected to be averie to their measures. This proved some relief to Mr. Johnson, by affording him good company; for in those days it was reckoned criminal to visit or shew him any kindness, so that few had courage to come near him, or give him any relief; by which means he was reduced very low. About this time his mother, whom he had maintained for many years, sent to him for subsistence; and such was his filial affection, that though he knew not how to supply his own wants, and those of his wife and children, and was told on this occasion, that charity begins at home, he sent her forty shillings, though he had but fifty in the world; saying, that he would do his duty, and trust providence for his own supply. The event shewed that his hopes were not in vain; for the next morning he had ten pounds sent by an unknown hand, which he afterwards knew to have come from the reverend Dr. Edward Fowler, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester (5).

(5) Ibid. pag. 7;

[F] Collected into a volume, and intitled, (5) A Second Five Years Struggle against Popery and Tyranny.] This collection contains, I. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen at Guildhall-Chapel, on Palm-Sunday, 1679, on Matth. xv. latter part of the 14th verse. II. The Church of England as by Law established: Being the very Doctrine and express Words of the Homilies against Popery. III. A short Dissuasive from Popery, and from countenancing and encouraging of Papists: Published immediately after the defeat of the Duke of Monmouth. IV. A Parcel of wry Reasons and wrong Inferences, but right Observator. V. An Oration of John Hales to the Queen's Majesty, and delivered to her by a certain Nobleman at her first entrance to her Reign. VI. Several Reasons for the Establishment of a Standing Army, and the dissolving the Militia. VII. A piece containing the following Chapters. Chap. 1. Of Magistracy. 2. Of Prerogatives by Divine Right. 3. Of Obedience. 4. Of Law. VIII. The Grounds and Reasons of the Law against Popery. IX. An humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in this present Army. X. That Resistance may be used, in case our Religion and Rights should be invaded. XI. The Trial and Examination of a late Libel, intitled, A new Test of the Church of England's Loyalty. With some Reflections upon the Additional Libel intitled, An Instance of the Church of England's Loyalty. XII. The absolute Impossibility of Transubstantiation demonstrated. XIII. The Way to Peace amongst all Protestants: Being a Letter of Reconciliation sent by Bishop Ridley to Bishop Hooper. With some Observations upon it. Published in April 1688; and licensed in July following; but seized soon after by order from the Lord Sunderland. XIV. A Letter from a Freeholder to the rest of the Freeholders of England and all others, who have Votes in the Choice of Parliament-Men. Published in September 1688. XV. Religion founded upon a Rock: Or, the Eternal Obligations of being Religious. In a Discourse on 1 Tim. i. 17. XVI. The true Mother-Church: Or, a short Practical Discourse upon Acts ii. concerning the first Church at Jerusalem.

[G] Ordered to be degraded from the Priesthood.] This ought cution, which he bore with great firmness [H]; and the King immediately gave away his Living [I]. He continued in prison till a quarter of a year after the Revolution; for though he might have been discharged upon the Prince of Orange's arrival, he was so just to his security, that he would not go out till he could get up a bond of a thousand pounds, signed by two of his friends for his true imprisonment, upon his being allowed the benefit of the rules. The Parliament taking his case into consideration [K] resolved, June the 11th 1689, "that the judgment against him in the King's-Bench, upon an information for a misdemeanor, was cruel and illegal." And a Committee was at the same time appointed to bring in a bill for reversing that judgment [L]. The House presented ought to have been done, according to the Canons, by his own Diocesan the Bishop of London; but that Prelate was then under suspension himself, because he would not obey the King's orders to suspend Dr. Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of York, for preaching against Popery in his own parish church of St. Giles in the Fields. Dr. Crew, Bishop of Durham, Dr. Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, and Dr. White, Bishop of Peterborough, being then Commissioners for the Diocese of London, in the place of the suspended Bishop, were appointed to degrade Mr. Johnson; which they performed in the Chapter-House of St. Paul's, where Dr. Sherlock, and other Clergymen attended; but Dr. Stillingfleet, then Dean of St. Paul's, refused to have any hand in it. Mr. Johnson's behaviour on this occasion was observed to be so becoming that very character, which his enemies would have him deprived of, that it melted some of their hearts, and forced them to acknowledge, that there was something very valuable in him. Among other things, which he said to the Divines then present, he told them in the most pathetic manner, It could not but grieve him to think, that since all he had wrote was designed to keep their gowns on their backs, they should be made the unhappy instruments to pull off his. And he begged them to consider, whether they were not making roads for themselves. When they came to the formality of putting a Bible in his hand, and taking it from him again, he was much affected, and parted with it with difficulty, kissing it, and saying with tears, that they could not however deprive him of the use and benefit of that sacred Depositum. It happened, that they were guilty of an omission in not stripping him of his cassock; which, as slight a particular as it may seem, rendered his degradation imperfect, and afterwards

(6) Ibid. pag. 8, saved him his benefice (6).

[H] December 1, 1686, his sentence was put in execution, which he bore with great firmness.] A Popish priest had made an offer for 200 l. to get the whipping part of the sentence remitted. The money was lodged by one of Mr. Johnson's friends in a third hand for the Priest, if he performed what he undertook. The man used his endeavours, but to no purpose; for the King was deaf to all intreaties. The answer was, That since Mr. Johnson had the Spirit of Martyrdom, it was fit he should suffer. He observed afterwards to one of his most intimate friends, that this text of Scripture which came suddenly into his mind, He endured the cross, and despised the shame, so much animated and supported him in his bitter journey, that had he not thought it would have looked like vain-glory, he could have sung a psalm, while the Executioner was doing his office, with as much composure and cheerfulness, as ever he had done in the church; though at the same time he had a quick sense of every stripe, which was given him, with a whip of nine cords knotted, to the number of 317. This was the more remarkable in him, because he had not the least tincture of Enthusiasm (7).

(7) Ibid. pag. 9.

(8) Tho. Berrow, M. A. who was presented to the Living, Feb. 4, 1686. See Newcourt's Repertorium, vol. 2. pag. 194.

[I] The King immediately gave away his living.] The Clergyman (*), who had the grant of it, made application to the three Bishops abovementioned for institution; but they being sensible of the omission in his degradation, told him, that he should have it, if he could get two common Lawyers and two Civilians to give it under their hands that Mr. Johnson was legally degraded, and thereby deprived. The Clergyman brought them the hand of one inconsiderable common Lawyer, that the degradation and deprivation were both good; but the Civilian, to whom he applied, was more modest, and only signed a paper with his opinion, that if Mr. Johnson was legally degraded, he was ipso facto deprived. But this not proving satisfactory to the three Bishops, the Clergyman was obliged to give them a bond of five hundred pounds to indemnify them, before they would grant him institution. Having received it, he went to Curingham for induction; but Mr. Johnson's parishioners opposed him; so that he could never get entrance, but was obliged to return re infesta. This was extraordinary in his parishioners, at a time when the court carried all by violence; but it proceeded from their great respect to him, and experience of his goodness; for no Minister was more obliging to his people than he, who was so far from exacting upon them, that he would rather quit his own right than be any ways troublesome to them; of which there is one remarkable instance among many others. One of his neighbours owing him twenty pounds upon bond, and falling afterwards into low circumstances, Mr. Johnson was advised to put the bond in execution, while something was to be had; but he absolutely refused it, and chose rather to lose the money, saying, that no man's ruin should lie at his door (8).

(8) Ibid. pag. 9.

[K] The Parliament taking his case into consideration.] In the first Parliament after the Revolution, when the House of Commons was preparing an Act of Indemnity, Mr. Johnson was advised by his friends to get a clause put into it, that he might have his remedy at law against such as had been his illegal oppressors. They seemed to be sensible, that they were obnoxious, and could not justify what they had done. About that time the Bishop of Durham gave Mr. Johnson and his Lawyer a meeting, and made his peace with him to their mutual satisfaction. Sir Francis Withens, who pronounced the sentence against him, sent a relation of Mrs. Johnson's to tell him a feigned story, that Sir Francis lay dangerously ill, and could not die in peace, unless Mr. Johnson would forgive him. To which he replied, that he heartily forgave him what injury he had done to him. Some few days after the same person brought Sir Francis to Mr. Johnson as he was walking in Westminster-Hall, where Sir Francis saluted him, and told him, that his Christian and kind answer had proved a reviving cordial to him. To which Mr. Johnson replied, that he heartily forgave the injury done to himself; but as he had been an enemy to his country, he hoped he would be made accountable for it; it being a common saying with him, That he was obliged to forgive his own enemies, but not the enemies of his country (9).

(9) Ibid. pag. 10.

[L] A Committee was at the same time appointed to bring in a Bill for reversing that judgment.] The Committee was likewise ordered to enquire how Mr. Johnson came to be degraded, and by what authority it was done. Mr. Christy, the chairman, some days after, reported his case to this purpose: "That in Trinity-Term 1686, an information was exhibited against Mr. Johnson in the name of Sir Robert Sawyer, Attorney General, for writing and publishing a scandalous and seditious libel, intitled, An humble and hearty Address, &c. That the same Term they forced him to plead, got a jury to find him guilty, and Sir Francis Withens pronounced the following sentence upon him: To pay five hundred marks to the King, and to lie in prison till it was paid. To stand twice in the Pillory, in the Palace-Yard, at Charing-Cross, and at the Old Exchange: and to be whipped by the common Hangman from Newgate to Tyburn. That the Judges then in court were the Lord Chief Justice Herbert, Sir Francis Withens, Sir Robert Wright, and Sir Richard Holway. That apprehending it would be a scandal to the Clergy to have so infamous a punishment inflicted sent two addressees to the King in behalf of Mr. Johnson. But though his Majesty was inclinable enough to have complied with their request, our author could never obtain any Church preferment [M]. However he did not pass altogether without a reward; for the King gave him three hundred pounds a year out of the Post-Office for his and his son's life, besides a thousand pounds in money; and likewise bestowed a place of about an hundred pounds a year on his son. On Sunday November the 27th 1692, there was an attempt to murder him. To this end seven assassins broke into his house in Bond-street very early in the morning, and five of them with a lanthorn got into his chamber, where he with his wife and young son was in bed. He was fast asleep; but his wife being awaked by their opening the door, cried out Thieves, and endeavoured to wake her husband. The ruffians in the mean time threw open the curtains; three of them placed themselves on that side of the bed, where he lay, with drawn swords and clubs, and two stood at the bed's-foot with pistols. Mr. Johnson started up, and endeavouring to defend himself from their assaults received a blow on the head, which made him fall backward. His wife cried out with great earnestness, and begged them not to treat a sick man with such barbarity; upon which they paused a little, and one of them called to Mr. Johnson to hold up his face; which his wife begged him to do, thinking they only designed to gag him, and that they would rifle the house, and be gone. Upon this he sat upright; when one of the assassins cried, Pistol him for the book he wrote; which discovered their design, for it was just after the publishing of his book concerning the Abrogation of King James II. Whilst he sat upright in his bed, one of them

"sifted on a Minister, they desired Mr. Johnson "might be first degraded; in order to which, being "a prisoner in the King's Bench, in the Diocese of "the Bishop of Winchester, he was summoned to ap"pear the 20th of November in the Convocation-"House of St. Paul's in the Diocese of London, his "living being within that Diocese, and brought thither
"by Habeas Corpus; where he found the Bishops of "Durham, Rochester, and Peterborough, Commis"sioners to exercise the jurisdiction of the Bishop of "London during his suspension, with some Clergy"men and many spectators. A libel was exhibited
"against him, charging him with great misbehaviours,
"though none were specified nor proved. That Mr.
"Johnson demanded a copy of the Libel, and an Ad"vocate; both which the Bishops denied, and imme"diately proceeded to sentence; *That he should be de"clared an infamous person: That he should be deprived "of his Rectory: That he should be a mere Layman,
"and no Clerk; and be deprived of all right and pri"vilege of Priesthood: That he should be degraded there-
"of, and of all Vestments and Habits of Priesthood.*
"Against which proceedings Mr. Johnson protested,
"as being against Law, and the 132d Canon, not "being done by his own Diocesan; but his protesta-
"tion was refused, as was also his appeal to the King
"in Chancery. After which they proceeded to de"grade him, by putting a square cap on his head,
"and then taking it off; by pulling off his gown and
"girdle, which he demanded as his proper goods
"bought with his money; which they promised to "send him, but he could not get them till he paid
"twenty shillings. Then they put a bible into his "hands, which he not parting with readily, they "took it from him by force. That on the 22d of "November the judgment in the King's-Bench be"gan to be executed with great rigour and cruelty;
"that Mr. Roufe, the Under-Sheriff, tore off his "caffock on the pillory, and put a frize-coat upon "him. That he was whipped with a whip of nine
"cords knotted, which was shewed to the Committee:
"That Mrs. Johnson had also an information exhibit"ed against her for the like matter as that against "her husband. On all which the Committee came "to the following resolutions, which, on the report
"were all agreed to by the House: *That the judgment "against Mr. Johnson was illegal and cruel: That "the Ecclesiastical Commission was illegal, and conse"quently the suspension of the Bishop of London, and the "authority committed to the three Bishops, null and ille"gal: That Mr. Johnson's not being degraded by his "own Diocesan, if he had deserved it, was illegal.
"That a bill be brought in to reverse the judgment,
"and to declare all the proceedings before the three Bi"shops null and illegal: And that an address be made "to his Majesty to recommend Mr. Johnson to some Ec"clesiastical Preferment suitable to his services and suf"ferings." The House likewise ordered, that in the "said bill the proceedings upon the Ecclesiastical Com"mission should be declared void (10).*

[M] Our author could never obtain any Church preferment.] This may appear strange, when it is considered how well he deserved it; but Mr. Hamden, who was his Fellow-Prisoner, and great friend, may help to furnish us with some reasons for it in the account, which he gave of Mr. Johnson's book about the Abrogation of King James, to the Dukes of Mazarine. "The "Bishops, says he, and Clergy of the Church of "England, having abandoned King James, and owned "King William and Queen Mary; such of them as "had formerly maintained the doctrine of Passive Obe"dience and Non-Resistance in an unlimited sense,
"were upbraided with it, as having acted contrary to
"those principles, which they had imposed upon "others to believe on pain of damnation. The mat"ter of fact being undeniable, several of them, rather "than own their mistake, had recourse to subtleties
"to justify their practice, and at the same time to "maintain their doctrine. To this end they published
"several books, one of which advanced, that King
"William had conquered the nation by his army and "fleet, and therefore they were obliged to submit to "him as a conqueror, but not as to a King set up by "Parliamentary authority, it not being in the power "of the nation to change or dethrone their Kings.
"Others not liking this way of arguing had recourse to "another topic, viz. that God, for the fulfilling of Pro"phesies, and of his own Eternal Decrees, had, by an "extraordinary Providence, and by virtue of his absolute
"power to dispose of Princes and people as he pleased,
"set up King William upon the throne by his own "hand: Therefore they were obliged to submit to his "will. Some again liking neither of these arguments,
"but still being willing to save their doctrine of "Passive Obedience, said, that it was not the nation,
"either by themselves, or representatives, who had
"dethroned King James, but that he deposed himself,
"by deserting and abdicating the Kingdom. There"fore they were obliged to set up another in "his place, lest the nation should fall into a republic,
"which would have been the greatest of all calamities.
"Others again endeavoured to justify themselves "from the authority of St. Paul, who commands all "Christians to submit to the powers that be; from "whence they inferred, that it did not belong to "subjects to enquire into the rights of Princes, but to "submit to those who are in possession, without "troubling themselves to examine whether their titles
"were good or not." *These several propositions, says
"the writer of Some memorials of our author (11), being (11) Ibid. pag.
"maintained by Divines of note, it is the less to be won"dered that Mr. Johnson, who opposed those principles, "and particularly in his book about the Abrogation of "King James, could get no Church Preferment, since he "had such numerous and powerful enemies among the "Clergy, who represented him as a republican, for main"taining that King William and Queen Mary were set up
"in his stead by authority of Parliament.*

(10) Ibid. pag.
10, 11.

them cut him with a sword over the eye-brow, and those at the bed's-foot presented their pistols at him; but upon Mr. Johnson's passionate entreaties they went off, without doing him further mischief, or rifling the house. A Surgeon was immediately sent for, who found two wounds on his head, and his body much bruised. However with due care he recovered, and afterwards died in peace, though in what year we have no certain account. His works were reprinted together at London in one volume in fol. (*) [N].

(*) The second edition was printed in 1713.

[N] His works were reprinted together at London in one volume in folio.] Besides his writings already mentioned, this collection contains the following tracts. I. Remarks upon Dr. Sherlock's Book intitled, The Case of Resistance of the supreme powers stated and resolved, according to the doctrine of the Holy Scripture. This book of Mr. Johnson's was written in the year 1683, and published in 1689. II. Reflections on the History of Passive Obedience; first printed in the year 1689. III. An Argument proving, that the Abrogation of King James by the People of England from the regal throne, and the promotion of the Prince of Orange, one of the royal family, to the throne of the Kingdom in his stead, was according to the constitution of the English Government, and prescribed by it. In opposition to all the false and treacherous Hypotheses of Usurpation, Conquest, Desertion, and of taking the Powers that are upon Consent. First printed at London 1692 in 4to. Dedicated to the Commons of England in Parliament assembled. This book occasioned A Letter from Oxford concerning Mr. Samuel Johnson's late book, Oxford 1693 in 4to, page 31. The author of this Pamphlet observes (12), that it was reported at Oxford, "that Mr. Johnson's book is not well received at Court, where, of all other places, in our poor opinions, it ought to meet with the kindest entertainment, because it justifies his Majesty's proceedings, which were previous to the Revolution; and represents him, as the truth is, to be a King, who has a just and a legal right to the Crown by the laws of the land. By what logic it can be made ill doctrine to assert the lawfulness of removing bad Princes under the government of good ones, and those such, as upon a supposition of the unlawfulness of removing bad ones, can have no good title to the Crown themselves, is what we cannot easily comprehend. But I have ever thought, that Courtiers see farther into a mill-stone than other men, and that their way of reasoning differs from that of the rest of mankind, since I saw King Charles II heal. I took notice, that when the King put the gold about their necks that came to be touched, the Bishop repeated over and over these words out of St. John's Gospel, viz. This is the true light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world. I asked a Courtier what relation the meaning of those words could have to such an occasion? And he told me, that I interpreted Scripture like a Peasant, and that I did not understand the Court-Interpretation of Scripture." He concludes with these words (13).

(12) Pag. 19.

(13) Pag. 30, 31.

"We could wish that Mr. Johnson had enlarged his book with what he does but hint at and barely mention: I mean the doctrine of the Mirror, the Confessor's Law, the Curtana sword, and the power of the Lord High Steward, and other great officers of the Kingdom; but particularly that he had given us an account of the authority of the Lord High Steward, concerning which great officer, we find but some few scraps here and there in any printed book; but they are such as give us good cause to believe that he was farther intrusted and impowered to redress misgovernment in the state, than our Clergy are generally aware of. And tho' there be no such standing officer at this day; yet there having been such an one, it would do well, if we were informed both wherein his office did particularly consist, and how it came to be difused." IV. An Essay concerning Parliaments at a certainty; or, the Kalends of May. V. Notes upon the Phoenix Edition of the Pastoral Letter. First printed in 1694 in 4to. VI. A Confutation of a late Pamphlet, intitled, A Letter ballancing the Necessity of keeping a Land-Force in time of Peace, with the dangers that may follow on it. First printed in 1697. VII. The second Part of the Confutation of the Ballancing Letter; being an occasional Discourse in Vindication of Magna Charta. In this tract he endeavours to shew, "first that Magna Charta is much older than King John's time, and consequently that its birth cannot be blemished with any thing that was done in his time, though his confirmation of it had been really extorted by rebellion. Secondly, that the confirmations, which were had and procured to it in King John's and Henry III's time, were far from being gained by rebellion." He concludes with observing, "that the plain notion of Magna Charta is this. It is a summary of the native and inherent rights of Englishmen, which the Norman Kings by granting afterwards by Charter, bound themselves not to break in upon and invade; so that it was only a Norman-fashioned security, that these rights should not be violated. But we do not hold these rights by Charter, no, not by the old dear-bought Parchment and Wax, for they are the birthright of Englishmen, which no Kings could ever give or take away. They are, as they are called 25 Edward III. the Franchises of the Land; and every Englishman by being born in the land is born to them." VIII. Several Discourses upon Practical Subjects; containing eleven Sermons. T.

JOHNSON (JOHN) was the only son of the Reverend Mr. Thomas Johnson Vicar of Frindsbury near Rochester in the county of Kent, and of Mary his wife, the daughter of the Reverend Mr. Francis Drayton Rector of Little Chart in the same county, but within the Diocese of Canterbury [A]. He was born December the 30th in the year of our Lord 1662, and was educated in the King's School at Canterbury, where he made such a progress in the three learned languages, Latin, Greek and Hebrew under Mr. Lovejoy then master of that school, that when he was very little more than fifteen years of age he was sent to the University of Cambridge, where he was admitted in the College of St. Mary Magdalen, under the tuition of Mr. Turner Fellow of that House March the 4th 1677. And in Lent Term 1682 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts as a Member of that College. Soon after he was nominated by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury to a Scholarship in Corpus Christi (commonly called Bennet) College in that University, being of the Foundation of Matthew Parker, the first Archbishop of Canterbury after the Reformation was settled under Queen Elizabeth, to which he was admitted April the 29th 1682 under the tuition of Mr. Beck Fellow of that House. He took the degree of Master of Arts as a Member of Bennet College at the commencement

[A] Within the Diocese of Canterbury.] His father, having been married about four years, died, leaving his son and one daughter to the care of his wife, with a small estate; which lying at Barham near Canterbury, she settled in that city for the convenience of her children's education; where she continued near sixty years, dying about the ninetieth year of her age, about two years after the death of her son, which was prudently concealed from her by her daughter, that she might not in her very old age be disquieted with the knowledge of such a loss, and thereby the little remainder of her life be made more uneasy to her.

commencement 1685. Soon after he entered into Deacons Orders, and became Curate to the Reverend Mr. Thomas Hardres Rector of both Upper and Lower Hardres near Canterbury. He was ordained Priest in King Henry the Seventh's Chapel, by the Right Reverend Dr. Thomas Sprat Lord Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster, December the 19th 1686. And July the 9th 1687, he was collated to the Vicarage of Boughton under the Blean, by the most Reverend Father in God Dr. William Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, and at the same time he was allowed by the same Archbishop to hold the adjoining Vicarage of Hern-Hill by sequestration: both which Churches he supplied himself, officiating one part of the day at one Church and the other at the other Church [B]. In the year 1689 October the 24th, he married Margaret the daughter of Thomas Jenkin of the Isle of Thanet Gent. sister to the Reverend Mr. Robert Jenkin late Master of St. John's College in Cambridge, and to the Reverend Mr. Henry Jenkin Rector of Tilney in Norfolk. About the same time there was one Sale, a vile fellow (who had counterfeited holy Orders, having forged Letters of Ordination both for himself and his father) that came into this Diocese, and taking occasion from the confusion occasioned by the Revolution, during the time Archbishop Sancroft was under suspension, and before Dr. Tillotson was consecrated to the Archbishopric, he made it his business to find out what Livings were held by sequestration only, and procured the Broad Seal for one of these for himself, and another for his father [C]. Mr. Johnson hereupon thought it necessary to secure his Vicarage of Hern-Hill, that he might prevent Sale, or any such like fellow, from depriving him of that benefice: and Archbishop Sancroft being then deprived ab Officio only, but not a Beneficio, presented him to Hern-Hill, to which he was instituted October the 16th 1689, by Dr. George Oxenden Vicar General to the Archbishop, but at that time to the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, Guardians of the Spiritualities during the suspension of the Archbishop. But as the Living had been so long held by sequestration, that it was lapsed to the Crown, he found it necessary to corroborate his title with the Broad Seal, which was given him April the 12th 1690. In the year 1697 the Vicarage of St. John in the Isle of Thanet, to which the town of Margate belongs, becoming void, Archbishop Tenison the Patron considering the largeness of the Cure, was desirous to place there a person better qualified than ordinary to supply it, and could think of no man in his Diocese so well qualified for such a town as Mr. Johnson, and therefore entreated him to undertake the pastoral care of that large and populous parish. And because the Benefice was but small and the Cure very great, the Archbishop, to induce him to accept of it, collated him to the Vicarage of Appledore (a good benefice) on the borders of Romney Marsh, on the first day of May 1697; but Mr. Johnson chose to hold Margate by sequestration only. And having now two sons ready to be instructed in learning, he would not send them abroad to school, but taught them himself; saying that he thought it as much the duty of a father to teach his own children, if he was capable of doing it, as it was of the mother to suckle and nurse them in their infancy, if she was able; and because he believed they would learn better in company than alone, he took two or three boarders to teach with them, being the sons of some particular friends. He was much importuned by several others of his acquaintance to take their sons, but he refused: for he was well known throughout the Diocese to which he belonged, and his ability in all parts of learning so much esteemed, that though he lived in the remotest corner of the country, he might have had a large house full of boarders if he had pleased. But finding he could not attend his little school, his great Cure, and his studies in such manner as he was desirous to do, he humbly entreated his Patron, the Archbishop, to give him leave entirely to quit Margate, and to retire to his Cure of Appledore, which, with some difficulty was at last granted him; but not till his Grace had made enquiry throughout his Diocese and the University of Cambridge for one

[B] And the other at the other Church. Although he entered so young on the cure of souls, yet by his first sermon he convinced his parishioners and all others who heard him (which were not a few) that he was well qualified for that charge. His text was Heb. xiii. 17. Obey them that have the rule over you and submit your selves, for they watch for your souls, as they that must give an account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief, for that is unprofitable for you. From which words he took occasion to inform them what was his own duty to them, and that he purposed faithfully to discharge it: and likewise what he might reasonably expect from them, that his labour and care might not be vain. This he did in such a manner, as to convince all that heard him, that young as he was, he very well understood his office, and how he ought to execute it, and that he was a person whose youth they might not despise. And he proceeded answerable to this beginning: so that he was very much beloved and respected in both his parishes; and was also soon taken notice of by the neighbouring Clergy of the city of Canterbury, and the adjacent parts, as one no ways inferior, except in age, to any Parish-Priest in the Diocese.

[C] One for himself and another for his father. Dr. Tillotson, during the three years he held the Archbishopric, never visited the Diocese: but Dr. Tenison in the first year of his translation to it, in the year 1695, made his visitation, at which time all persons that had cures were required to shew their letters of ordination. These letters of ordination being put into the hands of Dr. John Bateley, then Archdeacon of Canterbury, upon the perusal of those exhibited by the two Sales, he soon discovered them to be forged; and charged them with it. The son obstinately maintained that the letters were not forged, but the father soon confessed that he was never ordained; only that his son had brought him these two pieces of parchment, and told him that one of these made him a Deacon and the other a Priest. However they staid not to be prosecuted, but both fled immediately. What became of them afterwards I know not; only have heard that the son set up somewhere for a Preacher among the Dissenters.

one might be thought qualified to succeed him [D]. He settled at Appledore in the year 1703, and as soon as his eldest son was fit for the University (which he was, before he attained to be full fifteen years of age, in the year 1705) he sent him to Cambridge, and his other son to school till he was of age to be put out apprentice, and dismissed all the rest of his scholars. He seemed much pleased with Appledore at his first retirement thither, as a place where he could follow his studies without interruption. But this satisfaction was not of long continuance; for that marshy air, in a year or two, brought a severe sickness on himself and all his family, so that they were every one like to die; but it pleased God they all escaped at that time. Nevertheless, his constitution (which till then had been very good) was so broken, that he never afterwards recovered it in a degree like what he had before enjoyed. This made him desirous to remove from thence as soon as he could; and the Vicarage of Cranbrook becoming void, he asked the Archbishop to bestow it on him, which his Grace readily did, and accordingly collated him to it April the 13th 1707, where he continued till his death, holding Appledore with it [E]. In the year 1710, and again in the year 1713, he was chosen by the Clergy of the Diocese of Canterbury to be one of their Proctors for the Convocation summoned to meet with the Parliament in those years. And as the first of these Convocations was permitted to sit and act, and to treat of matters of Religion (though they brought no business to any perfection, by reason of the difference had been raised between the two Houses) he constantly attended the House of which he was a member whilst any matter was there under debate; whereby his parts and learning came to be known and esteemed by the most eminent Clergy of the Province, as they had been before by those of the Diocese where he lived; so that from this time he was frequently sought to for his opinion in particular cases, and had letters sent to him from the remotest parts of the Province of Canterbury, and sometimes from the other Province also, to consult him for his opinion in matters of learning, especially as to what concerned our Religion and our Ecclesiastical Laws. He continued at Cranbrook about eighteen years; and as he had been highly valued, esteemed and beloved at all other places where he had resided, so was he here also by all that were true friends to the pure Catholic Religion of JESUS CHRIST, as professed and established in the Church of England. But as there were many Dissenters of all denominations in that place, and some others, who (though they frequented the Church yet) seemed to like the Dissenters better, and to side with them upon all occasions, except going to their meetings for religious worship, I cannot say how they loved and esteemed him. However, he was so remarkably upright in his life and conversation, that even they could accuse him of no other fault, except his known hearty zeal for the Church of England, which all impartial persons would have judged a virtue. For certainly those that have not an hearty affection for a Church ought not to be made Priests of it. Some of those favourers of the Dissenters studied to make him uneasy, by endeavouring to raise a party in his parish against them, merely because they could not make him like themselves, a Latitudinarian in matters of Religion; but they failed in their design, and his friends were too many for them [F]. A little before he left Appledore, he began to discover that learning to the world, which till this time was little known beyond the Diocese where he lived, except to some particular acquaintance, by printing several Tracts; though his modesty was such, that he would not put his name to them, till they had, at least, a second edition. The first of these was a Paraphrase with Notes on the Book of Psalms according to the Translation retained in our Common-Prayer Book [G]. This he published in the year 1706. The next book he wrote and [D] One might be thought qualified to succeed him.] Mr. John Warren, then Fellow of Queen's College in Cambridge, was with some intreaty prevailed with to accept the cure, and gave very good satisfaction to the parishioners, being a very good Preacher, and of a friendly disposition: but not voting for Parliament and Convocation men so as to please the Archbishop, and holding this living by sequestration only, his Grace required him to quit it after he had held it two years. But he soon after became Chaplain to Dr. Blackhall Bishop of Exon, by whom he was preferred to a living and a Prebend in that Church. He died in the year 1736.

[E] Holding Appledore with it.] He maintained a constant Resident-Curate at Appledore: and as Cranbrook was a very large cure, though but a small benefice, he for many years kept a Curate there also to assist him. Neither did he leave Appledore so intirely to his Curate, as not to make his parishioners there frequent visits, and to preach and administer the Holy Eucharist to them.

[F] His friends were too many for them.] Cranbrook and other parishes in the Weald of Kent have a great number of Dissenters of all sorts, Presbyterians, Anabaptists, Quakers, &c. A certain Squire in the parish, being a Justice of the Peace, and a professed admirer of Dr. Tindal's book falsely intitled The Rights of the Christian Church, endeavoured to make himself Church-Warden, that he might be as troublesome to Mr. Johnson as he could. But notwithstanding he brought in all the Dissenters, and likewise the poor, blind and lame to vote for him, he could not carry his point. However he commenced a suit in the spiritual court on that occasion, wherein he was cast; and not paying his fees, and standing in contempt of the court, he was excommunicated. Upon which he first turned Presbyterian, then Anabaptist and Sabbatarian, amongst whom he is now a Preacher. This Gentleman was the only one, who endeavoured to give Mr. Johnson any disturbance in his parish, but according to the proverb, Though he often shewed his teeth he could never bite.

[G] Translation retained in our Common-Prayer-Book.] The book bears this title. Holy David and his Old English Translators cleared and vindicated. Containing 1. Directions for the more devout using the Psalms, and a Short Historical Account of the Translation and Translators. 2. The Psalter or Psalms of David after the Translation of the great Bible, printed as they are to be sung or said in Churches. With large Explanatory Notes.

3. A and published was the Clergyman's Vade Mecum in the year 1708 [H]. And in the year 1709 the Clergyman's Vade Mecum, Part 2. [I]. In the year 1710 the Propitiatory Oblation in the Eucharist [K]. In the year 1714 The Unbloody Sacrifice [L]. In the year 1717

3. A general Defence of this Old Translation in Answer to all the Objections and Cavils that have been raised against it. He chose to vindicate this translation, because the Clergy are obliged to give their assent and consent to it, as well as to the other parts of the book of Common-Prayer. And in this work he shewed himself a great master both of the Greek and Hebrew languages, especially with regard to the Holy Scriptures, and an excellent critic to judge when it might be more proper to follow the translation of the Septuagint than our present Hebrew copies as pointed by the Masorites.

[H] Clergyman's Vade Mecum in the year 1708. This book (as we learn from the title-page) contains An Account of the Antient and Present Church of England, the Duties and Rights of the Clergy, and of their Privileges and Hardships. Containing full Directions relating to Ordination, Institution, and Induction, and most of the Difficulties which they commonly meet with in the Discharge of their Office. Here he shews himself to be well skilled in all the laws of this Church civil or ecclesiastical. And this book was so well received by the public, especially by the Clergy, that about every third year there was a call for a new impression: for in about fifteen years there were no fewer than five editions of it; the first edition being in the year 1708, and the fifth in the year 1723.

[I] Clergyman's Vade Mecum, Part 2. This Part contains the Canonical Codes of the Primitive, Universal, Eastern and Western Church down to the year of our Lord 787. done from the Original Greek and Latin, omitting no canon, decree, or any part of them that is curious or instructive. With explanatory Notes, a large Index, or a Preface shewing the usefulness of the work, with some reflections on two books called Moderate Conformity, and the Rights of the Church. In this second Part he shewed himself to be no less skilled in the ecclesiastical laws and discipline of the antient Catholic Church, than in the former he had shewed it in the laws and discipline of his own particular Church. And of this book he lived to see three editions.

[K] The propitiatory oblation in the Holy Eucharist. This little piece, as likewise all that he had hitherto published, came out without a name. This, as to the former books proceeded from his modesty, he being willing to continue in the same obscurity he had done unto this time. But the books, when they had been read, gave so general a satisfaction, that people could not help enquiring who was the author of them: neither could his particular friends, to whom he had been so kind as to give them, forbear to let the world know to whom they were obliged for those valuable and useful treatises. But as to this Propitiatory Oblation, he has himself given us the reason, why he conceals his name, at the very beginning of that book: where he says, "The impartial reader will not entertain any prejudice against this treatise for coming abroad without a name, if he do but consider how dangerous it is for a man openly to plead on that side of the cause, for which I have declared in my title-page. A very learned Divine has been sometimes, in words at length, reproached for being inclined to Popery, because he had freely declared his mind to this purpose. His adversary is not content to hint his suspicion once or twice, but repeats it almost twenty times in a book consisting of little more than two hundred pages: and I do not think it necessary to give opportunity to such men to mark me out for destruction by loading me with that infamous character." And the then Bishop of Norwich (afterwards of Winchester) Dr. Charles Trimmel, having in a Charge to his Clergy (printed a little before the publication of this tract) made some reflections on a passage or two in the second Part of the Vade Mecum relating to this subject, Mr. Johnson added a Postscript to vindicate that passage from his Lordship's objections. But notwithstanding his endeavours to conceal himself, he was quickly known to be the author of this book, and he was soon after reflected on upon that account, and his book answered (I mean pretended to be answered) by Dr. Thomas Wise, a Clergyman then beneficed at Canterbury, and some others, who thereby endeavoured to please the then Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Thomas Tenison, who did not approve the doctrine of the EUCHARISTICK SACRIFICE; and this put Mr. Johnson quite out of favour at Lambeth during the remaining part of that Archbishop's life, who till this time seemed at least to have a particular esteem for him. However this did not discourage him from going on to maintain what he believed to be the truth; which he judged he was obliged to adhere to, whomsoever he might displease by it, especially if it was what he believed this to be, an Important Truth. Therefore he resolved to examine and to handle the argument more thoroughly, and to set the Christian Sacrifice in its full light, and to prove the Holy Eucharist to be a Sacrifice truly and properly so called from the authority of the Holy Scriptures, and the testimony of the Antient Fathers and Liturgies of the first four or five centuries after Christ. This was a work, which required time and labour to collect materials, and judgment to make a proper use of them. However in about three years he finished the first and most laborious part of this very useful work.

[L] The Unbloody Sacrifice. The whole title is, *The Unbloody Sacrifice and Altar unveiled and supported. In which the Nature of the Eucharist is explained according to the Sentiments of the Christian Church in the four first Centuries. Proving that the Eucharist is a proper material Sacrifice. That it is both Eucharistick and Propitiatory. That it is to be offered by proper Officers. That the Oblation is to be made on a proper Altar. That it is to be consumed by Manducation. To which is added a Proof that what our Saviour speaks concerning eating his Flesh and drinking his Blood in the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel is principally meant of the Eucharist. With a Prefatory Epistle to the Lord Bishop of Norwich. Animadversions on the Reverend Dr. Wise's Book, which he calls the Christian Eucharist stated. And some Reflections on a stitched Book intituled, An Answer to the Exceptions made against the Lord Bishop of Oxford's (Dr. William Talbot's, afterwards Lord Bishop of Durham's) Charge. At the end is a collection of the Testimonies of the Antient Fathers, Councils and Liturgies in the Original Greek or Latin, wherein they were written, which are referred to in several parts of the book, beginning with St. Clement of Rome, who was contemporary with the Apostles, and ending with Theodoret who flourished A. D. 423. With the Council of Toledo A. D. 400. The Sacramentary of St. Gregory A. D. 590. In the Prefatory Epistle to this book, addressed to the Right Reverend the then Bishop of Norwich, he uses a true English freedom with that Prelate, yet is in no wise wanting in the respect due to his character. At the beginning of this address he says, "My Lord, you are one of that Reverend Order, which has always been esteemed, till now, of very late, to have had the guardianship of the Altar in an especial manner committed to it by Christ himself. One Bishop and one Altar, has been the distinguishing motto of the Apostolical Church ever since the time of St. Ignatius, and to contend pro Aris (for the Altars) has ever been thought honourable in all men, but especially in those whose business is continually to attend them." And p. 10. he says, "I have reason to expect that all impartial men should believe what I now say, till our opponents can produce a proof of a Bishop without an Altar, or a Liturgy without a proper Sacrifice from the remains of genuine antiquity." And pag. 25. he says, "I doubt not but in the primitive Church, whatever Bishop had opposed or depraved the Sacrifice, he would have been immediately obliged to give place to an Orthodox Successor. For I have reason to believe, that the antient Bishops, Clergy and people were not more uniform in any point of doctrine or worship, than in the notions and practice concerning the Eucharistical Oblation." And at the conclusion of this Prefatory Epistle, pag. 59. he says, "I shall think it much more honourable in* 1717 The Unbloody Sacrifice, Part 2. [M].

In the year 1720 A Collection of Ecclesiastical

“ the fight of God and my ever blessed Redeemer, “ and of all truly judicious Christians, to be con- “ sidered as the last Priest of this Church that ever “ wrote in defence of the Sacrifice, than to have been “ the first Bishop that ever opposed it.” In the same Prefatory Epistle he also takes notice of the then Bishop of Oxford, Dr. William Talbot, and one or two more who had written against the sacrifice, and exposes the weakness of their arguments both with judgment and smartness. And the book itself gives full and satisfactory proofs of what is promised in the title page; in which he shewed himself so much an overmatch for all his adversaries in learning as well as reasoning, that none of them afterwards attacked him openly in a manner worthy of his notice. Indeed he had one great advantage over them, for he contended for the truth: and as he shews in his Prefatory Epistle, pag. 22, GREAT IS THE TRUTH, AND WILL PREVAIL AGAINST THE MOST POWERFUL OPPONENTS. In a word, he shewed himself a compleat master of his subject, while his adversaries appeared to have but a very superficial knowledge of it. However one Mr. Pfaff a German Divine of the Lutheran persuasion, and tutor to the young Prince of Wirtenburg, took upon him to be a kind of moderator in this controversy, and was pleased to express his dislike of some things in this first part of the Unbloody Sacrifice; and Dr. John Turner at that time Vicar of Greenwich, and afterwards Prebendary of Canterbury, made some reflections upon it in a pamphlet which he called The Christian Eucharist no proper Sacrifice, wherein he charges Mr. Johnson with assertions, that are not to be found in his book or any thing like them. The same was also done by another, who although he had been much obliged to Mr. Johnson, and had pretended great friendship, yet when he found he was out of favour at Lambeth, thought it proper to publish to the world that he was no longer his friend; for although we ought not to join with a friend in what we believe to be erroneous, yet common honesty will not allow us to charge even an enemy with what he has not asserted. Also his old antagonist Dr. Wise, in a Letter of Advice to Dr. Brett (as he called it, though he never sent it to him) under the borrowed name of Exekiel Standfast, made some scurrilous reflections on Mr. Johnson and this book of his. But not one of these said any thing that deserved a reply, since they did not invalidate one argument or authority in the whole book.

[M] The Unbloody Sacrifice, Part II.] The Printer by mistake has dated it 1718, but it was really printed and published in February 1717, the whole title is, The Unbloody Sacrifice and Altar unveiled and supported. In which the nature of the Eucharist is explained according to the Sentiments of the Christian Church in the four first Centuries. Part the Second: Showing the Agreement and Disagreement of the Eucharist with the Sacrifices of the Antients, and the Excellency of the former. The great moment of the Eucharist, both as a Feast and Sacrifice. The Necessity of frequent Communion. The Unity of the Eucharist. The Nature of Excommunication. And the primitive Method of Preparation. With Devotions for the Altar. In the Preface to this book he takes notice of the forementioned persons who had written against his former book. Mr. Pfaff he treats like a Gentleman and a Scholar, because he had shewed himself to be so, though his objections were easily answered, especially by one who was so great a master of the subject as Mr. Johnson. The other he just mentions, and treats them with contempt, as they deserved. These two books of the Unbloody Sacrifice deserve to be well read and considered by every Divine, and to have a place in every Clergyman's study: and the second part is very proper to be in the hands of every pious Christian. This was his design in writing these two books, as he informs us in his Preface to his Second Part, where he says, “ The first part of this work was composed for “ the use of them who had leisure and inclination to “ enter into the more abstruse parts of this controversy. “ Since my publication of it, I have been desired by “ persons of great worth and judgment to draw up “ a scheme of this doctrine, and in as narrow a compass and as plain a style as possible; for the information of such readers as do not care to concern

“ themselves with books which require long and “ earnest application. I have accordingly so contrived this second part, that though it be much less than the former, and be chiefly intended to compleat my whole design on this subject, yet the first view of the Sacrament of the Eucharist may be taken from this volume. To this end I have been obliged to repeat some things in the Introduction, which have been said in the first part; and yet I may call them improvements rather than repetitions: And that a middling reader might be capable of understanding the book, I have always endeavoured to express myself in the most known common words our language affords, or at least that I could find. The subject is seemingly new: For whatever is so old as to be out of use has no appearance of novelty in the eyes of the present generation. But in truth, the Sacrifice of the EUCHARIST is as old as Christianity itself, and sacrifice in general as old as mankind. Now to receive notions which have been long since out of date, and to express the opinions and practice of the antients in the language of the present age, and to do it in such a manner as to render their thoughts agreeable to the relish of common English readers, is no easy matter. However my end was to be understood by all. If I miss of my aim, the reader is to impute it to my want of words.” After the publication of this second part, Mr. Johnson had the satisfaction to find, that though this truly primitive doctrine of the Christian Church, which he endeavoured to revive in these two books, was not so heartily and generally embraced as he could have wished, yet it was less spoken against. His adversaries were so far silenced as to suppress their railing accusations of Popery, and durst no longer directly deny the doctrine to be true, though they would not acknowledge it to be so, only intimating as if they thought it a doctrine, which, though it might be true, yet was not necessary to be taught or known. This appears from the Preface of the next book of which I am to give an account; wherein, at pag. liii. he says, “ Our Right Reverend Fathers do, upon all occasions, “ hint to us their opinion of the necessity of reviewing “ the Liturgy of the Church of England. And I cannot but declare my opinion that there is no office in that book more needs a review, than the “ Communion Service. And I cannot but conceive “ some hopes this will be done, whenever our Convocation shall be permitted to enter on that great “ work. For I cannot but with satisfaction observe “ that Divines, of greatest note in our Church, do “ not speak such abhorrence, or express so zealous an indignation against the sacrifice, as they have formerly done. One of the most eminent of them, whom I “ should least of all hope to favour my sentiments, in “ a Sermon preached at the anniversary meeting of “ the Charity Schools, 1716, is content to say, whether the Lord's Supper be a real Sacrifice, or only a “ commemoration of a real Sacrifice, Divines are agreed “ that the real effects are the very same. And it is “ true, that Divines, who do not believe the Eucharist “ to be a Sacrifice, may, and probably do, propose to “ themselves the same ends in administering and receiving this Sacrament, with those who believe it “ to be a Sacrifice; but the true state of the question “ is, whether they, who do not believe it to be a “ sacrifice, nor administer it as such, do really obtain “ these ends? Or whether it can be that Sacrament “ which was instituted by Christ, if it be not consecrated in the manner Christ directed? Or whether “ it can be truly consecrated without being offered to “ God? Further, this great man thinks it much to “ be lamented, That Divines should raise a dispute “ concerning that point (the Sacrifice of the Eucharist) “ at a time when it is openly denied that the Sacrifice of “ Christ was real and propitiatory. Now, with submission, I know no time more seasonable for the confutation of this false doctrine, than that in which “ it was published and advanced. And by proving “ the Eucharist to be a Sacrifice, we do, by necessary “ consequence, prove Christ's natural body and blood “ to have been a Sacrifice. And if it was a Sacrifice, “ it must unavoidably have been propitiatory, because “ there fastical Laws &c. [N]. In the year 1728, Mary his daughter, and only surviving child being his Executrix, published some posthumous Discourses of his which he had designed for the press, if it had pleased God to have continued him longer here [O]. And as no Priest was more careful and diligent to instruct those committed to his care in the knowledge of their duty by his Sermons and Discourses, so was he no less careful to instruct them by his example in a regular Christian life: and therefore none was better beloved

“ there never was a sacrifice offered to God in a due “ manner, but what was propitiatory. Propitiation “ is essential to Sacrifice duly offered. And I must “ humbly declare my opinion, that it is impossible
 “ to establish the doctrine of Christ’s body and blood “ being a real Sacrifice, by any other arguments but “ those by which we prove the Eucharist to have “ been instituted as a Sacrifice by our blessed Saviour.
 “ It would be a very great hardship upon the assertors
 “ of the Sacrifice, if they must be restrained from “ publishing their notions till after the Socinians are “ dead. And it would much better have become this “ Great Man, to have enjoined silence to the Socipi“ ans, than to the defenders of the Apostolical Faith.
 “ And if we must be silenced till we have proved the “ reality of the Sacrifice of Christ, without proving at “ the same time the Sacrifice of the Eucharist, I am “ pretty sure we may stay till dooms-day, and yet neither “ be able to do it ourselves, nor to see it done by “ others.”

[N] A Collection of Ecclesiastical Laws. This book, as we are told in the title-page, contains, “ A collection of all Ecclesiastical Laws, Canons, Answers, Rescripts, with other memorials concerning the government, discipline, and worship, of the Church of England, from its first foundation to the Conquest, that have been published in the Latin or Saxon-tongues. And all the canons and constitutions ecclesiastical made since the Conquest and before the Reformation, in any National Council, or in the Provincial Synods of Canterbury and York, that have hitherto been published in the Latin tongue. Now first translated into English with explanatory notes, and such glosses from Lyndwood and Athon as were thought most useful.” But I must observe that he was mistaken in saying now first published in English, because Mr. Collier had some years before published the most of them in that language in his Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain. But this was more than Mr. Johnson knew. Besides Mr. Collier did not publish them entire as Mr. Johnson has done, but omitted many, and abridged some others. There are two volumes of this in 8vo. The first contains the Ecclesiastical Laws to the Conquest: The second from the Conquest to the Reformation. And if it had pleased God to have spared his life a little longer, he would have published a like collection from the Reformation to this time, much more full and complete than what we have in Bishop Sparrow’s Collection. But he had scarce begun the rough sketches of this work, when it pleased God to deprive us of him, and to take him unto himself. To the books, which he printed after his Propitiatory Oblation, he prefixed his name, and likewise to that later edition of his Vade Mecum. But some other little things he published without his name; as Pastoral Advices to a person that intends to be confirmed by the Bishop: and Pastoral Advice to a person lately confirmed by the Bishop: and some other little stitched books, which he printed at his own charge for the use of his parishioners, and distributed amongst them gratis.

[O] Some posthumous Discourses of his &c. The first of those treatises he had designed for the press is intitled, The Primitive Communicant, which consists of three Sermons or Discourses, together with Devotions for the Altar. The first Discourse is on Heb. x. 8, 9. Above, when he said, sacrifice, and offering, and offering for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein, (which are offered by the law). Then said he, lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. The second Discourse is on Luke xxii. 19, 20. And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you; this do in remembrance of me. Likewise the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my Blood, which is shed for you. The third Discourse is on John vi. 27.

Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat which endureth to everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give you. These we may call an Appendix to the Unbloody Sacrifice.

The next treatise he designed for the press, is An Explanation of that Prophecy of Seventy Weeks, as related in the ninth Chapter of Daniel. This prophecy has very much puzzled interpreters to make it agree with the Chronology of that time, from the beginning of it unto the coming of Christ: and different expositors have assigned different beginnings to these Seventy Weeks, although the express words of the prophecy appear, one would think, to fix the beginning of these weeks to the very time that it was delivered to Daniel, and so Mr. Johnson, as well as others, conceive they do. Now seventy weeks of years, that is seven times seventy years make but 490 years, and it is very certain that there were more than that number of years from the first year of Darius or Cyrus to the coming of Christ and completion of the prophecy, which has given the occasion for so many distinct methods taken to fix the time when to begin the computation of these weeks. Mr. Johnson therefore shews, that all these difficulties and various expositions arise only from following the Hebrew Text, as pointed by the Masorites: whereas it has been proved, and all the learned, or at least the greatest part, are agreed that the points are modern, and therefore not to be regarded. Mr. Johnson therefore rejecting these points, and reading the text according to the unpointed Hebrew letters, and comparing it with the old Italian version, as preserved in this place by Tertullian, and with the translators of Aquila and Theodotion, proves that the first seven weeks, (which the prophecy very plainly distinguishes from the 62 weeks following) are to be repeated; consequently those seven weeks being counted twice, make not 49 but 98 years: which being added to that 62 weeks or 434 years, make 532 years. Then he proves by Ptolemy’s canon (which contains the most certain indisputable Chronology of those times) that from the first year of Darius, (which was also the first of Cyrus) at which time Daniel expressly teaches that the decree went forth to build Jerusalem, to the birth of Christ, was just that number of 532 years. Then he shews that the last week was not, like the rest, to consist of 49 years only, but the length was to be discovered by the events, and that it continued from the birth of Christ to the destruction of Jerusalem, which, according to his account, contains 77 years. And the reason he gives why this week should be different from the rest as to its time of continuance, is because it is stiled the one single or eminent week.

The next Discourse contains two Dissertations or Sermons on the Nature of God and his true Worship. The text is John iv. 24. God is a Spirit, and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth. In the first of these Sermons he shews what a spirit is, and then that God is such a spirit. “ A spirit, says he, signifies such a being as has the power of thinking, and God, angels, and the souls of men, are such beings. Therefore the only way to come at the knowledge of God as a spirit is, to contemplate our own souls, and observe what are the principal qualities belonging to them.” 1. Our souls, that being or substance within us, by which we think, that is apprehend, conceive, deliberate, judge, agree, conclude, remember, is what we call a spirit. 2. Another property of the soul is, that it feels whatever affects the body; for the body, without the soul can feel nothing. 3. Another property of the soul is, that it can move the body. There is nothing, perhaps, in nature more strange, than that bodies of such a bulk as ours should be moved by a thought. We need but will or resolve, and our hands will work, our feet walk, and our whole body be put into motion, and it bends and turns itself into as many postures as the beloved by his parishioners in general in the several Cures he was placed in, and by all who had the happiness of his acquaintance; and what enemies he had were only such as were enemies to those Christian Doctrines which he taught and practised. And indeed, when we consider his Learning, and his Critical Skill in the Languages proper, not to say necessary for a Divine, his great and extensive Knowledge in the Canons, Constitutions, and Customs of the Catholic Church of Christ, as well as those of this particular Church of England, its Usages and Discipline in the several ages from the first planting of the Gospel downward, even to the present times, joined to his clear understanding in all Christian Doctrines, and his capacity to teach them, and likewise his exemplary life and conversation, the business requires, except when the limbs are impeded by sickness, lameness, and the like, 4. It acts freely, has the power of choosing or refusing: and in this it differs from all things that consist of body or matter only. This property of souls makes us capable of virtuous actions, and of being rewarded for them. Then he shews that God is such a spirit as he has described our souls to be; but then he possesses all these properties in an infinite manner. 1. He thinks not in that defective manner we do, who can consider but one little object at once; for he, at one single view, discerns all things that are, were, or shall be. We are certainly ignorant of the inward essence of all things; and there is reason to believe there are more things hid from us entirely, than there are of those which come under our notice in any measure: But nothing is or can be hid from the knowledge of God. And whereas our memories contain only the imperfect footsteps of some few things done some years or some ages past, God's knowledge extends to all the greatest and most minute particulars; nothing is or can be hid from him. 2. God is a perceiving spirit. Our souls have a sense or perception of what is done to the body, and we can see and hear what is done at some distance from us. But the perception we have is liable to be taken from us, and often is by diseases. And while we enjoy it in the most perfect manner our natures will allow, it often gives us pain and disquiet. But God is an infinite spirit, conscious, and equally conscious to any thing done in any part of the universe. He feels without pain, he perceives without uneasiness; and this most perfect perception is not liable to be impaired by any infirmities. 3. God is a spirit that can move matter or body. We can, after a sort, move our bodies to do such things as are necessary for our subsistence. Our souls can at pleasure move our limbs, or command them to rest, while the body is in health and vigour; diseases or age, sooner or later disable our limbs from obeying the command of our souls. And while we are in our best state of health, youth and strength, our souls have no power over our stomach or other vitals. But God is that most perfect spirit, who is the first mover of all things, and in whom we ourselves live, move, and have our being. By his power of moving matter, and impressing what laws of motion he pleases upon it, he made this beautiful frame of things, which we now behold: and by continuing such laws of motion as are proper for every part of the world, he is its preserver; and by his power of suspending, varying, and revoking those laws at his pleasure, he is its governor: for every part of nature cannot but obey his almighty will, and move or stop at his irresistible sovereign command. 4. God is a spirit that acts with most perfect freedom. The soul of man is so far free that it cannot be forced to sin without its own consent; and the body cannot do any thing good or bad without its direction. And the soul, by using this freedom with discretion, is capable, by God's grace, of rendering itself eternally happy. But thro' our perverseness this freedom of will often becomes a snare to us. But the freedom of God's will, which is directed by the most perfect wisdom and purity, is indeed the perfection of the divine nature; because by this he is always determined to choose the best. And thus we see God to be an infinite, perfect spirit, who thinks most clearly, who perceives all things, who is the creator and first mover of matter, who acts freely, and always for the best. It must however be confessed that our idea of God is imperfect, and so is our knowledge of any thing else.

The second dissertation on the same text consists of the following heads: 1. To shew what is meant by worshipping God in spirit and in truth. 2. To set aside a wrong meaning given by some to the phrase of worshipping God in spirit, as if it meant uttering of prayers or praises without premeditation. 3. To shew, how far spiritual worship excludes outward expressions of it, and the use of bodily things in the worship and service of God. 4. That in order to worship God in spirit, one very proper means is to worship him by stated forms of prayer. 5. The great excellency and acceptableness of spiritual worship.

The next discourse, which is the first in the second volume of Mr. Johnson's posthumous works, is his Sermon preached at Canterbury-School Feast: to which is prefixed a Preface to prove there were no alphabetical letters before Moses. The writing with hieroglyphical figures, as the ancient Egyptians did, or in such characters as are still used by the Chinese, where every character marks a word, he grants may be older than Moses, only maintains that to find out a means to express all words that may be spoken by little more than twenty characters is beyond the reach of human invention: And therefore he says Moses was taught this art by God, and that the first writing in alphabetical letters was the Ten Commandments written by God himself on two tables of stone. Neither was Mr. Johnson singular in this opinion. For Gale in his Court of the Gentiles, Part 1, Book 1, Chap. 10, §. 4 observes that St. Augustin (Lib. 18, cap. 39, de Civitate Dei) says, "that the Hebrew letters (which he supposes to be the most ancient) began from Moses." And Ludovicus Vives, in his notes on those words of St. Augustin, says, "The vulgar opinion both of Christians and Hebrews is, that Hebrew letters had Moses for their author, which Eupolemus and other prophane writers do assert, who delivered that Moses was the most wise of men, and the inventor of letters." Gale also brings several other testimonies both from Christian and Heathen writers, to prove Moses to have been the inventor of letters.

The Sermon, which follows this Preface, has for its text, Numb. xi. 29. Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets. Here he shews the meaning of this wish of Moses, which depends upon the signification of the word prophets. All will agree, that whatsoever that exercise was, wherein the seventy, together with Eldad and Medad, were employed, it was prophesying. Then he shews there were Prophets in the highest sense, who received revelations immediately from God, and Prophets in a secondary sense, who received revelation from superior Prophets, in order to teach and instruct others; and such was the employ of these seventy Elders. But if this was their only business, what occasion for the particular effusion of God's spirit on them? For Moses expressly says, when the spirit rested upon them they prophesied. And indeed, if these Elders had before known to read, there had been no occasion for an extraordinary assistance of the divine spirit. But as Moses had but newly learned this excellent art, these Elders were ignorant of it as well as others. Therefore it is said, God took of the spirit that was upon Moses, and communicated to the seventy Elders. Thus this knowledge of letters, which by the spirit was conferred on Moses, was communicated to several others, that so they might read and write with uniform harmony: And it is not conceivable how this should be done by men wholly illiterate by mere human means in so short a time as the occasion required. And it most deserves our notice, that by taking prophecy in this sense, that is for reading exactly ex scriptis, what had been first written by a superior Prophet, there will be no occasion to disguise the last words of the 25th verse (as our English translation does) we may translate conversation, we may justly say of him, what was said of the late learned Mr. Bingham, viz. Qui Patriarchatum in Ecclesiâ meruit, obiit Parochus. But I need say no more of his learning, the extensiveness of which is so visible in his works. His conversation was easy, and chearful, and very improving. If any one departed out of his company without learning something useful from him, it was his own fault. He was very diligent in the performance of all parochial duties. He read prayers every morning in his Parish Church, when he was at home. He preached twice every Sunday till within a few years before he died, that he kept a Curate to assist him, and then he seldom failed to preach once himself. He frequently instructed children in the Catechism, and administered the Holy Eucharist once a month. He was diligent in visiting the sick, or any other that needed his ghostly advice or prayers; and, in a word, used all that faithful diligence which he promised when he was admitted into the Order of Priesthood: so that considering how diligently and faithfully he discharged the parochial duties of a large and populous parish, for both Margate and Cranbrook were such, it is wonderful to think how he found time to write such learned and elaborate treatises as he has done. He was a very dutiful son, a loving husband, a careful and tender father, and obliging kind friend, who studied to do good to every one as he was able, and had opportunity, and to do injury to no man, always endeavouring conscientiously to discharge his duty in every relation. He had five children, of which only two were sons; but they all died in his lifetime, except his daughter Mary. The death of his eldest son was the most sensible affliction he met with in the whole course of his life. He outlived that son but two years, and died December the 15th 1725, having nearly completed the sixty third year of his age [P].

translate them as the Greeks do, and as the Hebrew clearly signifies, viz. They prophesied and added not. They read such lessons as Moses had assigned them without making any addition of their own. And Moses's wish is, that all the Lord's people were such Prophets, that is, able to read the Divine Law.

The next discourse is of the Nature and Office of Angels, for Psal. ciii. 20. O praise the Lord, ye Angels, ye that excell in strength, and bearken to the voice of his word. In this Sermon he proves that angels were before the Mosaic creation, from Job xxxviii. 6, 7. When the foundations of the earth were fastned, and the corner-stone thereof laid, the morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. By the sons of God we can understand no other than his holy angels, and they who expressed their joy at the creation of the earth, must have been created before that time. And that angels are not naked spirits, but are clothed with bodies or vehicles, he proves from Luke xx. 35, 36. when he tells us that they who shall obtain the resurrection, that is clearly a happy resurrection, shall be equal to the angels. If angels were naked spirits, good men would be more like them, or equal to them, during their state of separation, while they are absent from the body, than they shall be after the body and soul are again united. It seems therefore that good Christians shall be made more like the angels at the resurrection than before, by being reunited to their bodies. The spiritual substance of angels can no more be seen by bodily eyes, or be felt by hands, than our souls can be so; yet angels have appeared evidently to the sight of men, as we learn from many places of scripture. But though angels have bodies, yet it is not necessary to suppose they are of any determinate bulk or dimension, as ours are now, but that they can enlarge or contract, extend or draw close, as is most for their present convenience. And that their bodies are such as they can render themselves visible or invisible at discretion.

The last discourses among his posthumous works are four Sermons. 1. On the death and resurrection of Christ, from Act. ii. 31, 32. 2. Of God's extraordinary grace to St. Paul, on 1 Tim. i. 14. 3. Of the necessity, hardship, and mission of Christian Pastors, on Matth. ix. 35. And 4. the holiness of times and places, on Lev. xix. 30. We have been the more particular in the account of his posthumous works, because no more were printed than were subscribed for, they are not easy to be met with.

[P] He . . . died December the 15th 1725, having nearly completed the sixty third year of his age] He was buried in the Church-yard of the parish of Cranbrook, close to the wall of the Vestry. Over his grave is erected a handsome Altar-monument of grey Marble, with only this inscription, John Johnson, Vicar. But on the other side of the wall, within the Vestry, there is erected a Monument of white Marble affixed to the wall, with the following inscription.

Extra hunc parietem sub tumulo lapideo requiescit Joannes Johnson, A. M. per Annos octodecim hujus Ecclesie pastor; Morum Castitate, Ingenii Acumine, interioribus et reconditis Literis ornatissimus. Filius Reverendi Thomae Johnson de Frindsbury in Diocesi Rosensis Vicarii, et Mariæ Filiae Reverendi Francisci Drayton Chari parvæ hujus Dioceseos Rectoris. Uxorẽ habuit Margaretam Filiam Thomæ Jenkin in Insulâ de Tbanet Generosi. De qua quinq; suscepit liberos, quorum quatuor supervivunt; Vixit Margareta in Cunabulis mortuæ, Thomæ Loudini sepulto, alteri Margareta sinistra patris dormienti: Joanni S. T. B. de Standish in Comitatu Lancastriensi Rectori, Paternæ Virtutis, Ingenii et Eruditionis exemplari. Cujus post Mortem, cum ferè per Biennium ægre suspiria duxisset, Animam Spei beatæ Immortalitatis plenam Deo restituit 15^o die Decembris, A. D. 1725. Ætatis 63^o. Ecclesie Anglicanæ Pugil, Schismatis debellator occidit. Si plura quæris, scripta Mortui versato. Pientissima Filia Maria Johnson posuit.

JOLY (CLAUDIUS) Chanter and Canon of the Church of our Lady at Paris, and Official to the Archbishop, was a man of great merit and learning. He obtained a Canonship in the year 1631, on the resignation of Monsieur Loisel, his uncle by the mother's side, and Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris. The Duke of Longueville, Plenipotentiary from the French King for negotiating a general peace through all Europe, took him with him to Munster, and Joly assisted the Duke faithfully with his advices and counsels. He took a journey to Rome during the commotions at Paris. He was appointed Official, first by Cardinal de Retz after the death of John Francis de Gondi Archbishop of Paris; secondly by the Chapter whilst the See was vacant; and thirdly by the present (a) Archbishop. He died at Paris January the 15th 1700, at the age of fourscore and thirteen (b). He enjoyed a very good health in his old age, and had the use of all the faculties of his mind.

(a) I write this in the year 1700.

(b) Taken from the Mercurius Hist. for Feb. 1700, pag. 205.

(a) That of Moreri, and the Dictionary of the Bible written by Monsieur Simon a Priest.

(b) Solomon Jarchi, apud Martinum Lipenium, in Jonae Periplo tbalaffio, folio B verso edit. 1678, in 4to.

(c) Idem, ibid.

JONAH one of the Prophets of the Jewish Nation. As there are two Dictionaries (a) which may acquaint the reader with most of the particulars relating to him, I shall confine myself only to a few. There are some Rabbies (b) who are silly enough to assert, that Jonah being first swallowed up by a male fish, was afterwards vomited into the body of a female fish. As he did not find himself much strained in his first prison, say they, he did not think of praying to God; who therefore ordered the male fish to cast him up into the stomach of a female fish, which was with young. Ut ex impregnatione & alvi tumore in angustias virum Dei redigeret (c). i. e. "That the Man of God might be straitened by the swelling of the animal's womb, occasioned by its being big with young." There he found himself very much straitened, whereupon he pronounced that beautiful Canticle, which is still extant (d), and by which he appeased God's wrath. They who pretend to refute this story by observing that Jonah would not have been squeezed in a whale big with young, unless he had been placed in its womb, do not make a good objection [A]. We have seen in another place (e) that the heathen Poets related a particular concerning their Hercules, which is somewhat like this. They had borrowed it from the Sacred History, and had falsified and dressed it up after their own fancy. This at least is the common opinion of our authors (f). The antient Fathers thought it strange, that the Heathens should explode this history of Jonah [B], though they

(d) It is in the 2d chap. of the book of Jonah.

(e) In the remark [O] of the article HERCULES.

(f) See Vossius, de Origin. le Progreff. Idolatriæ, lib. 2. cap. 15. pag. 381, 382. edit. Francof. 1675, in 4to.

(x) Martinus Lipenius, in Jonae Periplo tbalaffio, folio B 2.

[A] They who... observe that Jonah would not have been squeezed in a whale big with young, unless he had been placed in its womb, do not make a good objection.] We shall here quote a man, who imagines he holds the Rabbi Jarchi very fast, by asking him, Namquid arbitraris in uterum quoque impregnatae Balænae immissum esse Propbetam, ut ex fetus piscini multitudine coangustaretur? In stomachum cæci credo descendisse Jonam, non in matricem ejusdem. Quomodo itaque Jonæ in ventriculo latentis plus angustiarum ex utero intumescencia poterat surgere (1)? i. e. "Do you think then, that the Prophet was taken into the womb of a whale big with young, so that the number of the young ones straitened him? For my part, I think that Jonah descended into the stomach and not into the womb of the whale. How then could Jonah, who was hid in the stomach, be more pressed by the swelling of the womb?" These questions spoil the good cause which Lipenius had to maintain, and give the Rabbies an opportunity to recover themselves from the ridicule which he designed to cast on them: they might in their turn ridicule him, if they should ask him how he came to be ignorant of a thing, which all the world knows: namely that the uterus by its dilatation presses upon the bowels and ventricle, and often considerably hinders the respiration.

[B] The antient Fathers thought it strange, that the Heathens should explode this History of Jonah; though they admitted the Fable of Hercules.] Here follows a noble passage from Theophylact. Devoratur ergo a cæto Jonas, tresque dies ac totidem noctes in eo permanet wates: quæ res omnem excedere fidem audientibus videtur, maxime iis qui ex Græcorum scholis sapienterque Strina, ad hanc historiam accedunt. Quos equidem non satis demirari possum, qui fiat quod hæc non intelligant, cum suis ipsorum alii capiantur. Apud ipsos enim nonnihil tale de Hercule narratur: nempe quod & ipse a balæna devoratus, incolumis remanserit, nisi quod tantummodo depilatus redierit, idque ob ingenitum & internum bellum calorem. Aut igitur nostra suscipiant, aut sua rejiciant (2). i. e. "Jonah then was swallowed up by a whale, and continued three days and three nights in its belly: a story, which seems incredible to them that hear it, particularly to them that come from the schools of the Greeks, and have studied their Philosophy. But I wonder, why they should pretend that they cannot comprehend this, since they very well understand other stories of their own, which are of the same kind. For they relate something like this of their Hercules, namely that he was also swallowed up by a whale, from which he received no hurt, having only lost a little hair, which was occasioned by the natural heat of the animal's bowels. Let them therefore admit our Histories or explode their own." I do not doubt but Theophylact might have met with several persons amongst the Greeks, who would have taken him at his word. We accept the conditions, would the Philosophers and learned men of Greece have answered; you will have us either explode the story of Hercules, or admit that of Jonah: well, we explode them both. But as an infinite number of persons amongst the Heathens would have condemned these conditions; and maintained that though they continued to believe what the Poets had related concerning Hercules, yet they had a right to ridicule the Jewish story about Jonah, it is certain that Theophylact's reflection is very well grounded, and shows admirably well how ridiculously the Heathens were prepossessed. Let us come now to St. Augustin. He had a great friendship for a certain Heathen (3), and had wrote several letters to him, some of which remained unanswered. He inferred from his friend's silence that he would not continue that correspondence any longer. Non inconvenienter arbitror eum quem video mihi rescribere noluisse, nihil sibi a me scribi voluisse (4). i. e. "I had reason to think, that since he did not answer me, it was a sign he did not care that I should write any more to him." As he designed therefore to answer some objections, which that Heathen had made to the Priest Deogratias, he directed his answer to that Priest. It appears by his answer, that the Heathens very much ridiculed the History of Jonah. Postrema quaestio proposita est de Jona, nec ipsa quæstio ex Porphyrio (5), sed tanquam ex irrisione Paganorum (6). i. e. "The last question, which is proposed relates to Jonah; nor is it as it urged as though it were from Porphyry, but it is a banter of the Heathens." The method St. Augustin pitched upon to answer this objection of his friend is very judicious. We ought, said he, either to explode all God's miracles, or to acknowledge that there are no reasons to explode this. Should we believe the resurrection of Christ, if we were awed by the raileries of the Infidels? Si fides Christianorum cæcinnam menter paganorum (7). And since our friend made no objections against our believing the resurrection of Lazarus and that of Jesus Christ, I wonder very much that he should think the story of Jonah to be incredible. It is more difficult to raise a dead man from his grave, than to keep a man alive in the belly of such a large fish (8)? Will they assert, that the digestive faculty of the stomach cannot be suspended for a while? But they would make a more considerable objection, if they were to urge against us the instance of the three men, who received no hurt in the furnace at Babylon. If they will also reject that suspension of the activity of the fire, and all the other miracles recorded in the Scripture, we shall be obliged to make use of another method to refute them: for the Infidels ought not to raise difficulties against one particular fact only; they must either wave such difficulties, or reject absolutely all other facts of the same kind, and which are even more incredible still. They would not be so scrupulous with regard to such men as Apuleius, or Apollonius of Tyana. They would not banter; they would on the contrary insolently boast of their triumphs, if what we relate of Jonah were ascribed to the power of one of these two Heathens. I have not translated here St. Augustin's words exactly, I have only given a general notion of his argument. But that they, who understand Latin, may not be deprived of any part of his reasoning, I shall transcribe here the most considerable passage of the original. Sed habent verba, quod non credant in divino miraculo, vaporem ventris quo cibi madescunt, potuisse ita temperari, ut vitam hominis

(3) See St. Augustin's 49th Letter, towards the beginning.

(4) Aug. Epist. 49. pag. m. 195.

(5) Lipenius is then mistaken, when he asserts (in Periplo tbalaffio Jona, folio A 3 verso) that St. Augustin argues there strongly against Porphyry.

(6) August. Epist. 49. pag. 207.

(7) August. ibid. pag. 207, 208.

(8) Nisi forte facilius putat mortuum de Sepulchro resuscitari, quam vivum in tam vasto ventre belluæ potuisse servari. Idem, ibid. pag. 208.

(2) Theophylact. in Jonam, cap. 11.

they admitted the fable of Hercules. They who have asserted that this Prophet was cast up by the fish at the Port of Niniveh [C], had but little skill in Geography; and it is not at all probable that he came out of the fish's belly on the coast of the Euxin or Black Sea [D], or on that of the Red Sea [E]. It is much more probable that he was cast on shore near the city of Joppa, where he had embarked. Some confirm this conjecture by hominis conservaret! Quanto incredibilis ergo proponerent tres illos viros, ab impio Rege in caminum missos, deambulasse in medio ignis illasos? Quapropter si nulla isti divina miracula volunt credere, alia disputatione refellendi sunt. Neque enim debent unum aliquid tanquam incredibile proponere, & in questionem vocare; sed omnia, quae vel talia, vel etiam mirabiliora narrantur. Et tamen si hoc quod de Jona scriptum est, Apuleius Madaurensis, vel Apollonius Tyaneus fuisse diceretur, quorum multa mira, nullo fideli auctore jactitant; [quamvis & Demones nonnulla faciunt Angelis sanctis familia, non veritate, sed specie, non sapientia, sed plane fallacia]: tamen si de istis, ut dixi, quos Magos vel Philosophos laudabiliter nominant, tale aliquid narratur, non jam in buccis creparet risus; sed typhus (9). Several persons will judge, that this method of refuting the Heathens is much more reasonable than that which St. Augustin followed in another book, where after he had observed that the very same men who laughed at the history of Jonah, did not in the least question the story of Arion, he proposes this objection to himself, namely, that the story of Jonah is more incredible. Certainly, replies he, but it is because it is more miraculous; and it is more miraculous because it shews a greater power. Verum illud nostrum de Jona incredibilis est; plane incredibilis, quia mirabilis, & mirabilis, quia potentius (10). These are witty conceits, some will say, and pretty fancies, but not good arguments: for it would follow from thence, that the more a thing seems to be impossible, the more it deserves to be credited: The fable of Arion was this, it was reported that in order to save his life he had been obliged to throw himself over board out of the ship in which he was sailing from Italy into Greece, and that he leapt on the back of a dolphin, which carried him to land. I do not observe this for the sake of those who never heard it mentioned, for there are but few such persons, but for the sake of thousands and thousands of persons, who do not remember it, and who would be sorry if they could not see immediately the difference there is between the story of Arion, and that of the Prophet Jonah.

(9) Aug. Epist. 49. pag. 208.

(10) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. 2. cap. 14.

A REFLECTION upon one of the effects of prepossession.

Let us reflect a little on the inconsistent conduct with which St. Augustin charges the Heathens. One cannot but observe here one of the most ridiculous effects of prepossession. The managers of the Heathen Religion had sed the people's mind with a thousand fables for several ages; they would not have suffered any person to examine whether they were possible or not, nor to stile them incredible. But when the miracles of the Christians were proposed to them, they set up for Philosophers, they urged the impossibility of those miracles, they alledged all the arguments that can be urged to prevent a foolish credulity, and pretended scornfully to ridicule those that believed. What an impertinency is this! What an odd way of acting! What an inconsistency! What a fantastical humour! The several Christian societies shew almost the same disposition against each other. If the Greek Church boasts of some miracles, proper to shew that God is displeas'd with the schism of Nestorius, the Nestorians will make a thousand shifts, and invent all possible arguments to evade that objection. But as for such miracles as are proper to convict the Greek Church of injustice, they believe them blindly, without any examination, and think it strange that their adversaries should scruple to admit them. All the world knows how easily the Roman Catholics suffer themselves to be led into a persuasion of an infinite number of miracles. They make it a matter of conscience to believe innumerable stories, that are daily spread abroad, and they look upon the most plausible argument of those who pretend to call them into question, as mere cavils of obdinate Heretics. But if they happen to hear that some miracle or another is pretended to be performed amongst the Protestant Party, then they argue from quite different principles: they have recourse to all the common topics which the unbelievers urge in their own defence. They deny the fact, they raise objections against the witnesses, and charge them either with imposture, or with being crack-brained: If the fact be such as it cannot be denied, they explain it away by natural causes; they compile from the writings of the natural Philosophers and from the accounts of travellers, a thousand instances of the same kind. In a word, what they used to stile obstinacy, cavilling, contradicting reason and good sense, becomes a very solid and reasonable refutation of a falsity; for they insist upon the very same common topics, which the Protestants had urged against the Monks. There are every where persons who believe very easily what pleases them, but who are the most difficult in the world to be persuaded when they do not like a thing. When they alledge arguments to justify their unbelief, they cannot bear that you should take them for bad arguments; but if at another time the same arguments are urged against them, they are angry, if you will not give them leave to slight and ridicule them. Thus men pass away their life; this is an effect of prepossession, which is almost unavoidable; divers weights and divers measures: if men could not avoid this but by divesting themselves of all prejudices, the remedy would perhaps prove worse than the distemper.

[C] It has been asserted that he was cast up at the port of Niniveh.] Sulpicius Severus fell into this geographical error. Exceptus a ceto, marino monstro, ac devoratus post triduum fere Ninivitarum littoribus ejectus, jussa predicat (11). i. e. "Being swallowed up by a whale, a sea-monster, he was about three days after cast up on the coast of Niniveh, where he preached as he was commanded to do." The learned Druſius did not observe any blunder in these words, when he was commenting upon them; he only tells us, that it is not mentioned in the Holy Scripture on what coast the ship cast Jonah up (12). The other commentators on Sulpicius, and amongst them Hornius, have been very well apprized of this blunder. Lipenius did also observe it; but he has been strangely mistaken with regard to Chronology, for he imagined that Sulpicius Severus borrowed this from St. Gregory's Ethicks (13), who yet was a Pope that flourished 150 years after Sulpicius. The blunder of this last writer has been transcribed by Monsieur Simon. A whale, says he (14), received Jonah in its bowels . . . and served him instead of a ship much safer than that on board of which he had been, and put him ashore, or rather cast him up the third day at the port of Niniveh. Observe that Niniveh was built on the river Tigris, which has no immediate communication with the Mediterranean Sea. And besides, that river is not deep enough to carry such a large fish to the port of Niniveh. This reason, together with the surprising miracle, which we must suppose, if we assert that the whale went into the ocean, doubled the Cape of Good-hope, and entered the mouth of the Tigris, and performed that immense voyage in three days, all this, I say, cuts off all evasions to those, who would attempt to justify Sulpicius Severus. Never did such a fancy come into his head: he imagined innocently that Niniveh was situated on the Mediterranean Sea. His blunder was owing to his ignorance in Geography.

(11) Sulpicius Severus, Hist. Sacrae, lib. 1. pag. m. 79. cap. 48.

(12) Druſius in Sulpic. Severum, pag. 279.

(13) Sulpicius Severus . . . ex S. Gregorio I. vi. Moral. cap. xii. arbitratu Jonam esse expositum in littoribus Ninivitarum. Lipen. in Jona Periplothalasso. cap. 3.

(14) Simon, Dict. de la Bible, pag. 432, 433.

[D] . . . it is not at all probable that he came out of the fish's belly on the coast of the Euxine sea.] Josephus (15) relates this tradition, which several modern authors (16) have followed, though it be against all probability, and supposes a multiplication of miracles: for such a large fish could not, according to the laws of nature, pass in so short a time from the Phœnician Sea into the Black Sea. And besides, Jonah would have had too long and too difficult a journey before him, either to return into Judea before he went to Niniveh, or to go directly to that city.

(15) Joseph. Antiquit. Judaic. lib. 9. cap. 18. folio m. 355 verso.

(16) See Lipenius, in Jona Periplothalasso, cap. 3.

[E] . . . or on that of the Red Sea.] Lipenius (17) ascribes this opinion to Eineda, and to the Rabbies; and it is not a difficult task for him to refute it. The whale must have entered into the ocean, and swam round Africa. See above, the remark [C], towards the end.

(17) Lipen. ibid. fol. C verso. He quotes Eineda, lib. 4. de Rebus Salomonis, cap. 12.

(g) See Lipenius, in Jona Periplo tbalaffio, folio A 3. (h) Apud Lipenium, in Jona Periplo tbalaffio, folio C 1 verso. (i) That is to say at Gbatb-Cbe- pber, near Mount Tabor. Lipenius, in Jona Periplo tbalaffio, folio preced. He quotes S. Jerom. Proem. in Jonam. (k) Apud Lipenium, in Jona Periplo tbalaffio, folio C 1 verso. (l) That is to say at Gbatb-Cbe- pber, near Mount Tabor. Lipenius, in Jona Periplo tbalaffio, folio preced. He quotes S. Jerom. Proem. in Jonam. (m) Simon. Dic- tion. de la Bible, pag. 433. (n) In the Tribe of Zebulun. (o) D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. pag. 495.

by the fable of Andromeda; for they pretend (g) that the story of Jonah was the ground- work of the poetical narrations concerning Andromeda's being exposed to the rage of a sea-monster, and she was exposed to it near Joppa (b). See the margin (i). Here fol- lows another fancy of the Rabbies, which is very whimsical. They assert (k), that the fish, which swallowed Jonah, had seven eyes, which were as so many windows, through which the Prophet could behold all that was in the Sea, and amongst other things the road which the Israelites followed when they crossed the Red-Sea. They who take him for the same young man, who was sent by Elisha to Jehu [F] to anoint him, do not deserve any credit. Jonah's tomb was still shewed at his native place in St. Jerom's time (l). Monsieur Simon (m) asserts, that the Turks have built a very noble Mosque to the honour of Jonah, in which there is a miraculous lamp, which burns continually, though neither oil nor any other liquor be ever poured into it, if we may lay any stress upon their idle fancies. He observes, that this Mosque is in a little village (n) built to this Prophet's honour, and under his name. Monsieur d'Herbelot (o) does not say a word of all this, though he tells us several things which the Mahometans relate concerning Jonah. I shall name the modern author, who, according to Moreri, has made a very ingenious Poem on this Prophet's history [G].

(18) 2 Kings ix. 1. (19) Hebraei in Sedar Olam, & ex iis Jo. Mariana in Scholiis Bibl. & D. Job. Tarnovius, Comm. Jon. p. 2. Lipen. in Jona Periplo tbalaffio, folio B.

[F] They who take him for the same young man who was sent by Elisha to Jehu (18).] This is what the Rab- bies do, and after them Mariana and Tarnovius (19). But if this were true, he must have been then above an hundred years old. These are Monsieur Simon's words in his Dictionary of the Bible; but they are very dark, for we do not know to what the word then must be referred. Is it to the time when Jehu was anointed? The Grammar requires it; but this sense would be absurd. Is it to the time of Jonah's journey to Nini- veh? Is it to the time of Jeroboam the second of that name? guess it if you can.

(20) One upon Jonah, one upon David, one upon Joshua, and one upon Samson.

[G] I shall name the modern author, who, according to Moreri, has made a very ingenious Poem on this Prophet's History.] He was a Gascon Minister, nam- ed Coras. He had been Chaplain to M. de Tu- renne in some campaigns; he was afterwards appointed Pastor to a congregation in Lower Gascony; but he soon turned Papist, and obtained a considerable em- ployment in the Presidial Court at Montauban. Be- fore he forsook his religion he published a book, in which, if I remember it well, he asserted that the Protestants could not unite themselves with the church of Rome. After his abjuration he wrote another book to refute this. His four Poems (20) on some Histories taken from the Bible, sold pretty well, notwithstand- ing what Monsieur Boileau Despreaux asserts in his IXth satire,

*Le Jonas inconnu seche dans la poussiere,
Le David imprimé n'a point veu la lumiere.*

"Jonas, unknown, lies buried in the dust;
"David, though printed, never saw the light.

Coras's enemies sent him by the post to Montauban a letter supposed to come from his Bookseller at Paris, who desired him to defend himself against Boileau, because none would buy his Poems, since that IXth sa- tire had been published. This affront exasperated him very much, and he published a very abusive pamphlet against his Critic. In the year 1675 he wrote some verses against Monsieur Racine. You will find in the Menagiana (21) a very pretty epigram written by Monsieur Racine against him. Observe that he was descended from the celebrated Civilian John Coras, Counsellor in the Parliament of Toulouse, and one of the Protestant Martyrs: for he was hanged for his religion at Toulouse, dressed in his Counsellor's robes, in the year 1572 (22).

JONAS (ARNGRIMUS), an Iselander by nation, gained a reputation in the 16th and 17th Centuries, by the works which he published. He was still living in the year 1644, and was then above fourscore and ten years old (a). Four years before, he had married a young girl to his second wife. He was a learned and honest man, and very much esteemed by all the learned. He had been Coadjutor to Gundebbrand of Torlac Bishop of Hola in Iseland (b). This Gundebbrand was an Iselander, and a man of great learning and probity (c). He had been a disciple of Tycho-Brahe, and under- stood Astrology (*) very well. After the death of this man Arngrimus refused the Bi- shopric of Hola, to which the King of Denmark designed to promote him (d). He de- sired that Prince to excuse him, both that he might not expose himself to envy, and that he might apply himself more quietly to his studies. Most part of the books which he published [A] are either Histories and Descriptions of Iseland, or Apologies for his own

(a) La Peyrere, Relation de l'Is- lande, pag. 55, 56. (b) Ibid. pag. 55. (c) Ibid. pag. 5, and 15.

[A] The books which he published.] Here follow the titles of all that I met with in Albertus Bartho- linus's Catalogues. Idea veri Magistratus, i. e. "The Character of a true Magistrate," printed at Copen- hagen in the year 1589, in 8vo. Brevis Commenta- rius de Islandia; i. e. "A short History of Iseland," printed in the same city in the year 1593, in 8vo. Anatome Blefkeniana, i. e. "The Anatomy or Dif- section of Blefkenius;" at Hola in Iseland, in the year 1612, in 8vo, and at Hamburg in the year 1618, in 4to. Epistola pro patria defensoria; i. e. "A Letter in Defence of his Native Country," printed also there in the year 1618. Apologia Calumniae; i. e. "A refutation of Slander," printed at the same place in the year 1622, in 4to. Chrymogæa (1) seu Kerum Islandicarum libri tres; i. e. "Three Books of the History of Iseland," printed also there, in the year 1630, in 4to. Vita Gudbrandi Thorlacii; i. e. "The Life of Gundebbrand Torlac," at the same place in the year 1630, in 4to. Specimen Islandiæ Historicum,

& magna ex parte Chorographicum; i. e. "An His- torical and chiefly Geographical Essay relating to "Iseland," printed at Amsterdam in the year 1643, in 4to (2). A learned man, who has published Albertus Bartho- linus's treatise with historical and critical additions, tells us, that the Anatome Blefkeniana is a refutation of a book printed at Leyden in the year 1607, and intitled Islandia seu Descriptio populorum & memorabilium hujus Insulae; i. e. "Iseland, or an Account of the People and remarkable things of that Island;" and that the Crymogæa was written in the year 1603, and printed at Hamburg in the year 1609, with a map of Den- mark, and in the year 1610 without that map; that the Specimen Islandiæ Historicum is a vindication of the author's opinion against the arguments of John Isaacus Pontanus. Our Arngrimus Jonas maintained that Iseland was not peopled till about the year 874, so Mollerus, Hy- pomn. ad Bartol. de Scriptis Danorum, pag. 12. (3) Taken from Mollerus, Hy- pomn. ad Bartol. de Scriptis Danorum, pag. 12. that it cannot be the antient Tbule (3). Pontanus thought it somewhat strange, that Arngrimus Jonas should un- dertake

(2) It should be Crymogæa.

(e) See Mollerus, own Nation. Blefkenius had published several dishonourable particulars of it, both with regard to witchcraft [B], and with regard to dissoluteness [C]. Arngrimus refuted him.

(f) Idem, ibid. He died in the year 1649 (e). He had been Pastor of the Church of Melstad, and Intendant of the neighbouring Churches of the Diocess of Høla (f).

undertake to vindicate an opinion which was less glorious to Iceland than the contrary opinion; yet he spoke very civilly of this learned Islander, and with a great deal of regard. See the letter which he wrote to Stephanus July 1, 1638 (4). You will meet in Mollerus (5) with the titles of some other works of our Jonas, which had been omitted by Albertus Bartholinus, and some of which have been printed, and the other are only manuscripts.

(4) It is the 122d of those which Mathæus published at Leyden in the year 1695. See page 325. of that Collection of Letters, as also pag. 210.

(5) Moller. Hypomn. ad Barthol. de Scriptis Danorum, pag. 166.

(6) La Peyrere, Relat. de l'Islande, pag. 28.

(7) See the story which Charles Ogier relates in pag. 433 of his Iter Polonicum.

(8) La Peyrere, Relat. d'Islande, pag. 31.

(9) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for Feb. 1685, pag. 135.

[B] Blefkenius had published several dishonourable particulars of Iceland, both with regard to witchcraft . . . Blefkenius asserts, that the Icelanders sell the wind, and that he knew it by his own experience (6). Arngrimus laughs at this; for says he, "a seaman of Iceland knew in the evening by the disposition of the air, how the weather would be the next day, and from what corner the wind would blow: and when he supposes that the wind would be such as a stranger waits for to sail away, he goes and meets him, and engages to sell him the wind he wants; which he does after this manner. He asks the stranger for his handkerchief, and makes a shew to mutter a few words in it, and immediately ties up the handkerchief (7), as though he feared lest the words he had pronounced should fly away; he then returns it thus tied up to the stranger, and charges him to keep it very carefully just as he receives it, assuring him that he shall have a fair wind as long as he shall be on board. Now it happens sometimes that the wind blows really from that corner the next day; but it changes generally after the stranger is sailed, and has reached the main sea. . . . If it happened once in an hundred times, that the wind continued fair till the stranger arrived at the place he intended to sail to, this one success alone will give credit to the common error more than a thousand contrary experiences will invalidate it. It is dispersed by the person, who publickly declares, that he bought the wind in Iceland, because he imagines it, and that with that wind he sailed safe home." The same Blefkenius relates (8), "that there are Conjurers in Iceland, who have it in their power to stop ships that are under sail in the main sea: he also asserts, that they who are thus stopt make use, for a countercharm, of certain stinking suffumigations (9), of which he gives us a description; with these, says he, they who are stopped drive away the devils that stopped them, and the ships thus disincharmed continue again to sail."

[C] . . . and with regard to dissoluteness.] "Blefkenius asserts, that the Germans who trade in Iceland, set up tents near the Ports at which they land, and there they expose their wares to sale, which consist of cloaks, shoes, looking-glasses, and a great many trifles, which they change for what the Icelanders bring them. Some girls, who are very handsome in that island, but very indifferently dressed, go and visit these Germans, and offer to those who have no wife, to lie with them for some bread or biscuit, or for some other trifling reward. Even the fathers present their own daughters to the strangers, and if their daughters become pregnant, it is a great honour to them, they being more esteemed and more courted by the Icelanders on that account, than the other maidens, and they have a great many suitors. When the Icelanders have bought (that is to say exchanged something for) wine or beer of the foreign Merchants, they invite their relations, their friends and their neighbours to come and drink it with them, nor do they part as long as there is one drop left. Whilst they are drinking together, they sing the heroic deeds of their Captains

"It is a piece of rudeness amongst them to rise from the table in order to make water, whilst they are drinking. The girls, who are not unhandsome in that country, as I have already observed, present them with chamber-pots, which they convey to them under the table. Arngrimus Jonas calls this raillery an imposture, and is in a very great passion against Blefkenius, for the injury which that author, says he, did to the reputation of the girls of Iceland. This good man cannot bear to see his countrymen treated with contempt, and stiled barbarians (10)." If it was ever lawful for an apologist to fly into a passion, Arngrimus's anger cannot be blamed; for it is not at all probable, that the Gospel, which has been known in Iceland for so many ages, would have left that nation in a state of such a wicked brutality; nor is it likely that if the Christian religion had been so ineffectual with regard to the reformation of their manners, the King of Denmark would suffer them to have so little regard for public decency. The custom that prevails in their entertainments, is not, I think, faithfully related: the fact has been exaggerated to entertain the reader. Was there ever such an office as that of these girls mentioned, or did any one ever hear of such a ridiculous laziness? Here you have men, who not only will not take the trouble to rise from table in order to make water, but who even will not be at the pains to make the least motion with their hand: for this is the notion which this story gives us: otherwise, why should we be told, that the girls convey the chamber-pots under the table? They might give them to the guests after another manner, if the design were only to spare them the trouble of getting up. If all that Blefkenius has told us here were true, we should be obliged to confess, that jealousy is not useless in this world (11).

(10) La Peyrere, Relat. d'Islande, pag. 23, 24.

(11) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calvinisme de Maimbourg, pag. 542, &c.

If it were lawful to tell lies for the sake of religion, we should deny all that is related concerning the imprudence of some nations. For it is said, that the Free-thinkers pretend to draw an inference, which is very much in their favour, from the practice of some nations, amongst whom, as it is reported, the prostitution of women is not attended with any infamy. This would be the case of the Icelanders, if we were to credit Blefkenius's account; nay they would go farther still, for they would look upon it as a great honour for a girl to be got with child by a stranger, to whom she had prostituted herself; and the fathers would think themselves happy, if the offer they made of their daughter's maidenhead were accepted by strangers. Where then, would the Free-thinkers ask, is that impression of nature, which makes all men distinguish between good and evil? Here are Christian nations, who not only have not the least regard for chastity in their practice, but who have even lost the theory of it: whence it follows that in this respect their conscience is intirely void of all sense of the law of nature. And does not this prove, that the notions of virtue depend on education and custom, and not on an impression of nature? How can these people be reclaimed, since their conscience is entirely seared in this respect? For if it be possible for a man to live in a wretched security, though he has a notion of good and evil, this must infallibly happen when these notions are absolutely rooted out. There is no occasion to answer this objection, since Arngrimus Jonas denies the fact on which it is grounded. We must refer to him all those, who pretend to make an advantage of his adversary's account. And if they should quote unquestionable facts, in such a case, we should not be at a loss for an answer.

An objection concerning the imprudence of some Nations.

☞ JONES (INIGO), an eminent English Architect in the seventeenth Century, was son of Ignatius Jones [A], a Citizen and Cloth-worker of London. He was born about the

[A] Inigo Jones . . . son of Ignatius Jones. It is observable, that the son's name is in Spanish, and the father's in Latin; for which some have assigned this reason, that as his father was a considerable dealer in the Woolen Manufacture, some Spanish Merchant might probably have assisted at his Baptism (1).

(1) Life of Inigo Jones, prefixed to the edition of his Most notable Antiquity of Great Britain, vulgarly called Stone-Flange, restored, printed at London 1735 in fol.

(a) Life of Inigo Jones, prefixed to the edition of his Most notable Antiquity of Great Britain, vulgarly called Stone-henge, re-stured, &c. London 1725, in fol.

(b) This was frequently related by Sir Christopher Wren.

(c) Life of Inigo Jones, ubi supra.

the year 1572 in the neighbourhood of St. Paul's in London (a). It is said, that he was at first put apprentice to a Joiner (b); but he was early distinguished by his inclination to drawing or designing, and was particularly taken notice of for his skill in the practice of Landskip-painting. This afterwards recommended him to the favour of William Earl of Pembroke, at whose expence he travelled over Italy and the politer parts of Europe, and saw whatever was remarkable for its antiquity or merit; and from those plans formed his own observations, which he perfected by study and application (c). He resided many years in Italy, especially at Venice; from whence he was sent for to be Architect-General to Christian IV King of Denmark, upon whose first coming into England, Mr. Jones attended him, and being desirous that his own native country, rather than a foreign, should enjoy the fruits of his studies, Queen Anne, wife to King James I, appointed him her Architect, and soon after he was honoured with the same place by Prince Henry, under whom he discharged his trust with such fidelity and judgment, that King James made him Surveyor General in reversion. Upon the Prince's death he travelled into Italy again, and returned to England when his place of Surveyor fell [B], which he enjoyed under King James I, Charles I, (unto whose confort he was also Architect General) and King Charles II (*); "though death, says Mr. Webb (+), through grief, as is well known, for the fatal calamity of his dread master, prevented him of doing his now sacred Majesty [Charles II] any actual service." By these degrees he rose to such eminence, that he was esteemed the Vitruvius of his age and country. We have a fine intermixture of fancy and judgment in his Decorations of Dramatic Entertainments, and the pompous Machinery of Masques and Interludes. Several representations of this nature are still extant by Ben. Johnson, George Chapman, Sir Will. Davenant, and the most eminent Poets of the age. The subject was set down by the Poet, but the invention, ornaments, scenes, &c. were the contrivance of Mr. Jones; and for these he received very considerable encouragement from the Court. In 1620, at the command of King James I, he drew up a Discourse concerning Stone-Henge on Salisbury-Plain, which was not published till after his death [C]. He formed the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, which was at first designed for the reception of foreign Embassadors. The ceiling was some years after adorned by the pencil of Sir Peter Paul Rubens; and draughts of these have been since published by Mr. Sim. Gribelin the Engraver. To Mr. Jones we owe the Church and Piazza of Covent-Garden. In this last performance he had in view the Piazza of Leghorn, but has vastly surpassed the original by the beauty and largeness of his pillars. In repairing of the Cathedral of St. Paul's [D], he having demolished part of the Church of St. Gregory adjoining to it, was brought into trouble about it at the opening of the Long-Parliament. For December the 10th 1641, he was obliged to appear before the House of Lords, according to their Order, to hear a Declaration read, which was brought up against him from the House of Commons, upon the complaint and in behalf of the Parishioners (*) Webb's Vindication of Stone-henge Restored, pag. 119. 2d edit. London 1725 in fol.

(+) Ibid

(2) Vindication of Stone-Henge Restored, pag. 119 2d edit. London 1725 in fol.

[B] When his place of Surveyor fell. Mr. Webb tells us (2), that "the office of his Majesty's works, having through extraordinary occasions in the time of Mr. Jones's predecessor contracted a great debt, amounting to several thousands of pounds, he was sent for to the Lords of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council, to give them his opinion, what course might be taken to ease his Majesty of it, the Exchequer being empty, and the workmen clamorous: when he of his own accord voluntarily offered not to receive one penny of his own entertainment in what kind soever due, until the debt was fully discharged. And this was not only performed by him himself, but upon his persuasion, his fellow-officers, the then Comptroller and Pay-master, condescended to do the like also, whereby the whole arrears were absolutely cleared."

(3) Wood, Art. Usen. vol. 1. col. 1113.

(4) Vindication, pag. 118.

[C] Drew up a Discourse concerning Stone-Henge on Salisbury-Plain, which was not published till after his death. It being left imperfect by him at his death came into the hands of Mr. John Webb of Burleigh in Somersetshire, who married the daughter of our author's cousin-german (3), at the desire of Dr. William Harvey, Mr. Selden, and other learned men (*), perfected and published that Discourse at London 1655 in folio under the following title, The most notable Antiquity of Great Britain, vulgarly called Stone-henge on Salisbury-Plain, restored; and prefixed to it the author's picture, etched by Hollar from a painting of Van Dyke. In this Discourse Mr. Jones endeavours to shew, that Stone-henge was a temple built by the Romans, while they were in Britain, and dedicated by them to Cælus or Cætrum, from whom the Ancients imagined, that all things took their beginning. This book, of which but a few copies were printed, was generally approved of by the Antiquaries; but Dr. Walter Charlton being dissatisfied with it, sent it to Olaus Wormius, a learned man in Denmark, who returning his sentiments in several letters to Dr. Charlton, the Doctor drew up a Discourse, intitled, Cborea Gigantum: or, the most famous Antiquity of Great Britain, vulgarly called Stone-henge, standing on Salisbury Plain, restored to the Danes. London 1663 in 4to. "This book, says Mr. Wood (4), though exploded by most persons, when it was published, yet some of the most noted Antiquaries of this nation, particularly Sir William Dugdale, did applaud it, and hath said in my hearing more than once, that he verily thought, that Dr. Charlton was in the right in what he delivered in the said Cborea Gigantum." But Mr. Webb abovementioned published in answer to the Doctor, A Vindication of Stone-henge restored, in which the Orders and Rules of Architecture observed by the ancient Romans are discussed, together with the Customs and Manners of several Nations of the World in matters of Building of the greatest Antiquity; as also an Historical Narration of the most memorable Actions of the Danes in England. London 1665 in folio. The three Discourses of Mr. Jones, Dr. Charlton, and Mr. Webb, were reprinted together at London 1725 in folio.

(4) Ubi supra

[D] In repairing of the Cathedral of St. Paul's. In a royal commission under the great seal of England dated November the 16th 1720 he was appointed with several others a Commissioner for repairing that cathedral (5); and in 1633 he, as Surveyor of that work, laid the fourth stone at the east end (6). Mr. Webb tells us (7), that "for the magnificence of St. Paul's all posterity will be grateful to Mr. Jones, who was sole Architect, and solely; by that ever glorious Monarch K. Charles the Martyr, entrusted with the repair thereof; and who in faithful discharge of that trust, reduced the body of it from the steeple to the west end into that order and uniformity we now behold; and by adding that magnificent portico there, hath contracted the envy of all Christendom upon our nation for a piece of Architecture not to be paralleled in these last ages of the world."

(5) Dugdale's History of St. Paul's Cathedral London, pag. 135, 136. edit. London 1658 in fol.

(6) Ibid. pag. 159.

(7) Vindication, &c. pag. 274

(e) Nelson's Impartial Collection,
vol. 2. pag. 728.

(f) Ibid. pag.
729.

(g) Ibid. pag.
771.

(h) Memoires,
pag. 577. edit.
London 1668, in fol.

Parishioners of St. Gregory's in London (e) [E]. The Declaration being read, he desired, that he might have some time to answer by his Council (f); and December the 21st he appeared before the Lords in Parliament and answered, "that he was not guilty of the offence charged in the said Declaration in such manner and form as therein was expressed;" upon which Friday fortnight was ordered for the day of hearing the cause (g). But what was the issue of this affair, we do not find. His adherence to the King's interest during the civil wars exposed him to considerable losses; and Mr. David Lloyd tells us (h), that he paid four hundred pounds by way of composition. He died about Midsummer Day 1652 (i), and was interred in the Chancel of the Church of Bennet near Paul's Wharf in London June the 26th, and his monument set on the North wall at some distance from his grave, was very much defaced by the Fire of London in September 1666 (k). Several of his designs have been published by Mr. Kent, Mr. Colin Campbell, and Mr. Isaac Ware. A Copy of Verses by him are published in the Odombian Banquet prefixed to Tom. Coryat's Crudities, printed at London in 1611 in 4to. Ben. Johnson, upon some quarrel with him, wrote a severe Satyr against him, in which he styles him Sir Lantern Leatherhead; but this Satyr was forbid by the King to be printed at that time, and is still extant in manuscript. Mr. Webb tells us (l), that the Art of Design was scarcely known in England, till Mr. Jones, under the protection of King Charles I, and Thomas Earl of Arundel and Surrey, brought it into use and esteem among us here. Mr. Webb had in his possession the chiefest Antiquities of all Christendom designed by our author's own hand (m).

(i) Wood, Atb.
C. 207. vol. 2. col.
1113. But the same writer, vol.
1. col. 423. tells us, that he had been informed by letters of Mr.
James Webb, son of Mr. John Webb, who married the daughter of the cousin-german of our author, that he died July 21st
1651, aged about
79 years.

(k) Iidem, vol. 1.
col. 1113.

(l) U: supra,
pag. 19.

(m) Ibid. pag.
119, 120.

[E] Obliged to appear before the House of Lords, according to their order, to bear a declaration read, which was brought up against him from the House of Commons, upon the complaint and in behalf of the parishioners of St. Gregory's in London. The declaration was as follows.

"The Declaration of the Commons upon the complaint, and in the behalf of the Parishioners of St. Gregory's, London, against Inigo Jones Esq;

"The Parish Church of St. Gregory's adjoining to the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's in London aforesaid, is, and, from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, hath been the Parish Church for the Inhabitants of that Parish, lately computed to be 3000 persons, for the administration of Divine Service and Sacraments. The said Inigo Jones being Surveyor of his Majesty's Works, and particularly those to be designed for the re-edifying of the said Church of St. Paul's, would not undertake the work, unless he might be, as he termed it, the sole Monarch, or might have the principality thereof, conceiving the work would not well be done without pulling down the said Church of St. Gregory's, presented a plot to his Majesty accordingly. The said Inigo Jones having presented the said plot, his Majesty hereupon signified his pleasure, and in pursuance thereof, several orders were also made at the Council-Board, that the said Church should be taken down by the Parishioners for the more convenient repairing of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's; which the Parishioners refusing to obey, as was lawful for them to do, the said Inigo Jones, in execution of the plot and design by him presented as "aforesaid, and of his Majesty's signification, and the orders at the Council-Board thereupon had, in or about March 1639, did pull down and caused to be pulled down part of the said Church, and did also threaten, That if the said Parishioners would not take down the rest of it, then the galleries should be sawed down, and with screws the materials of the said Church should be thrown down into the street. And the said Inigo Jones did further threaten the said Parishioners, That if they did not take down the said Church, they should be laid by the heels. Whereby the Parishioners being thus affrighted, and to save the materials, which not long before had cost them 1500 l. were enforced to take down some part of the said Church, inasmuch as it thereby was made altogether useless, and the said Parishioners to that great number have been wholly destitute of any place within their own Parish for the public exercising of Religion. The damages the Parishioners have hereby sustained is very great, and the charge of re-edifying the said Church and restoring it to as good plight as it was in, before it was so wrongfully taken down, will amount at least to 3000 l. all which the said Parishioners are ready to prove and maintain. For remedy therefore and redress herein, and chiefly to the end, that the said Church of St. Gregory's may be fully repaired and restored to the plight and condition, wherein it formerly was, by and at the charge of him and them, by whose undue means it was in part taken down, or caused to be taken down as aforesaid, it is desired, that such proceedings may be used and had against the said offenders herein, as to right and justice doth appertain"

T.

JORNANDES, a Goth by extraction, was Bishop of Ravenna towards the middle of the sixth Century.

His History of the Goths, translated into French, was printed at Paris in the year 1703, and dedicated to the King of Sweden (a).

JOUBERT (LAURENCE) Counsellor and Physician in Ordinary to the King of France and to the King of Navarre, first Doctor Regent, and Chancellor and Judge of the University of Montpellier, was born at Valence in Dauphiné December the 6th 1529 (a). He studied under Silvius at Paris, and under L'Argentier beyond the Alps (b). He gained a great reputation by the Lectures he read at Montpellier as a Professor, and more still by the books he published. People had so great an opinion of his knowledge, that Henry III, who passionately wished to have children, sent for him to Paris, being in hopes that this Physician's skill would remove the obstacles which rendered his marriage fruitless (c); but he was disappointed in his expectations. Joubert died at Lombez [A] October

(a) See the *Mé-
moires de Trevesaux*,
for Jan. 1704,
Art. 6. of the edition printed in France.

(b) La Croix du
Maine, pag. 285.

(c) Sammarthanus,
Elog. pag. m.
75.

(c) *Eum in Aula
vidimus à Rege
Henrico III con-
sultum, cum principle Princeps prolis in publ. am utilitatem suscipi-endæ cupidus, maximam voti sui specem in ejus industria nequicquam collocasset.*
Sammarth. Elog.
pag. 76.

[A] He died at Lombez] La Croix Du Maine acquaints me with this particular. He adds that Lombez is seven leagues distant from Toulouse; and it is towards Languedoc and not towards Guienne, it follows certainly from this, that Sammarthanus is mistaken (1), who asserts that Joubert died on his return (1) In Elog. pag. m. 76. from Toulouse to Montpellier. The city of Lombez is very far from that road. Moreri is still more to blame than Sammarthanus, for the following reason: he asserts, as he read it in La Croix du Maine, that this October the 29th 1582. He published a great many books [B], both in Latin and in French. That which he intitled Vulgar Errors raised great clamours against him, because he speaks in it too freely on several ticklish subjects [C]. It was particularly thought strange that he should have dedicated such a book to the Queen of Navarre, consort to Henry IV. But all these clamours were so far from preventing the sale of his book, that on the contrary, they contributed considerably to make it sell the more [D].

This

this Physician died at Lombez; and he adds to this what he had found in Sammarthanus, that Joubert died on his return from Toulouse to Montpellier. The blending together these two particulars, betrays in him an ignorance of Geography, with which Sammarthanus cannot be charged, since he did not mention Lombez. A writer is liable to commit a great many blunders, when he blends together the accounts of different authors, without altering and correcting such particulars as render those accounts inconsistent together. I do not mention the chronological blunder we meet with in Moreri. It is plainly an error of the press, or only an oversight. You will find in Moreri, that Joubert was born in the year 1629, that he became famous in the sixteenth century, that he died in the year 1682, and that Du Verdier Vau-Privas and La Croix du Maine mention him in their works (2) which they published in the year 1584, and which have never been reprinted.

[B] He published a great many books.] His Latin treatises make up two volumes in folio in the editions printed at Francfort in the years 1582, 1599, and 1645. One of the most considerable of these treatises is a collection of paradoxes, against which several Physicians (3) wrote, and to whom he replied.

I observe that his treatise of the Paucreas was composed French, tho' when he published it, he put in the title-page that John Paul Zangmaister a native of Augsburg, and a pupil of Monsieur Laurence Joubert had translated it into French from the Latin of the said Joubert. (4).

[C] He spoke too freely on several ticklish subjects in his Vulgar Errors.] The subject relating to virginity, and to generation had perhaps never been handled in French in such plain terms. He was even so free, that he produced three affidavits or certificates drawn up by sworn matrons, who at the Magistrate's command had examined whether some maidens, who complained that they had been ravished, had reasons to complain. The first of these affidavits was made in Bearn, the second at Paris, and the third at Carcassonne. It is declared in the first that the maiden, who complained, was still a virgin; in the two others it is asserted that the plaintiffs had been deflowered. Joubert compares together very exactly the expressions which these matrons made use of. In the year 1686 they printed in Holland a book intitled Tableau de l'Amour considéré dans l'état du Mariage (5). i. e. "A Description of Love considered in the Marriage-State." The author takes there the name of Salocini a Venetian Physician; but it is well known that his true name is Nicholas Venette, and that he is a Physician of Rochelle (6). He quotes also affidavits, and it is from him that Furetiere borrowed what he says upon that subject in his Dictionary, under the word Pucelage. But to return to Joubert, he was charged with having forged himself those affidavits. "He refutes this very well in his epistle to his friends and well-wishers, naming the person who communicated to him the affidavits from Paris and from Bearn. As for that from Carcassonne, I know very well that he had it from a person, who was principal Secretary to the Marshal Dampville, who used to repeat it often for his diversion. And Monsieur Joubert can hardly understand the words, which these midwives made use of, so as to apply them properly to every part of that member which distinguishes the sex. Not but that he can very well observe in it as many parts as these matrons reckon up; for in our public lectures on Anatomy we demonstrate sixteen or seventeen of them, which I shall rehearse here in their proper order, &c. (7)." La Croix du Maine observes, that some persons objected to Joubert, that he spoke too freely, and quoted too obscene passages in some of his works, and particularly in his learned books concerning Vulgar Errors. But, continues he, if he made use of some smutty expressions which give offence to scrupulous persons, he was obliged to express himself thus, if he designed to be understood, and for the sake of those readers who desire to be improved by his books. Seevola Sammarthanus is in the right to observe, that the author wronged his reputation by this work. Futurus tamen cautior, si contentus iis, quæ in usum eruditorum sermone Latino componebat, à scriptiõibus Gallicis abstinere maluisset. Naturam enim pro concessa Medicis facultate liberius evolvens, temere se in plebis imperitiæ censuram atque risum objecit (8). i. e. "He had been more prudent, if forbearing to write in French, he had been content to write in Latin for the use of the learned. For as he explained nature freely, according to the liberty which Physicians are allowed to take, he exposed himself to the censure and ridicule of the unlearned multitude." Joubert himself was sensible of it, for he did not continue his work; and as to what had already been published, he endeavoured to answer some complaints against it. He was blamed for dedicating his book to the Queen of Navarre, a very virtuous (9) and generous Princess, a true mirror and pattern of honour, since in the beginning of his work he was to treat of smutty subjects, as they call them, and of the privy parts, for he was writing of generation, conception, pregnancy, and delivery (10). He answered this objection in the second edition of his book; for besides the excuses, which he and Louis Bertravan alledged, he altered the dedication, and presented the whole work to Monseigneur de Pi-brac that Princess's Chancellor, that he might choose and point out such passages, as were proper to be presented to her Majesty, and of which she might judge with a safe conscience: the said Lord keeping the rest for himself as being more suitable to her condition (11). There was another complaint against him, All this, it was said (12), would have been much better in Latin than in French; since such discourses do not sound so ill in a foreign language as they do in a vulgar tongue; nor would the women and maidens, who are more modest and bashful, have had any knowledge of them. To which Cabrol makes the following reply (13). "Joubert has already given a full answer to this in his epistle to his friends and well-wishers, in which he observes very judiciously that the most chaste women in the world may very well read his work, in which they will meet with nothing but what leads to virtue, and which will acquaint them, and their husbands also, with their duty in the marriage-state. As to the maidens, they will not understand any thing in it relating to the works of the flesh, if they be true virgins both in body and soul, if I may say so. But further, to satisfy every one in this as in all the rest, he has since suppressed all that could give any offence to the most scrupulous persons, knowing very well that we ought to abstain not only from evil, but also from all appearance of evil." All these reasons are not solid, and some of them are wretched arguments.

[D] The clamours . . . that were raised against this book . . . contributed considerably to make it sell the more.] Let us transcribe the words of Joubert's Apologist. The Treatise of Vulgar Errors, says he (14), "has been printed at four different places within six months; namely at Bourdeaux, at Paris, at Lyons, and at Avignon: and they have not printed less than sixteen hundred copies in every one of these cities." This book has been so highly esteemed, that whereas it was sold at first only for ten pence or twelve pence, it was afterwards sold for a crown, and even for four livres, just as in a time of scarcity (which is a kind of famine) the price of wheat rises daily. And besides, the Booksellers and Printers are continually asked for the continuation of that work; and even the author is daily pressed to publish the remainder of it, or at least five books of it from time to time (if he does not care to print it all at once) according to the division he made of it; besides what he promised over and above it. But as he is a man

of

(2) Intitled, Bibliothèque Française.

(3) Thomas Jourdain, Francis Valleriola, Bruno Stedelinus.

(4) See La Croix du Maine, p. 255.

(5) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for Oct. 1686, pag. 1221. It has been translated into Dutch. See the Boekzaal, for Aug. 1695. It has also been translated into English.

(6) He is mentioned in the Journal des Savans, for May 13, 1686, pag. m. 188.

(7) B. Cabrol, Épître Apologétique, prefixed to the 2d Part of Laurence Joubert's Erreurs Populaires.

(8) Sammarth. in Elogiis, p. 76.

(9) She was very well skilled in these matters, if we may depend on d'Aubignés Satyrs.

(10) Cabrol, Épître Apologétique, prefixed to the 2d Part of the Erreurs Populaires, &c.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Ibid.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Cabrol, Épître Apologétique, prefixed to the 2d Part of the Erreurs Populaires, &c.

This work was to have contained six parts [E], each of them divided into five books; but the public never saw but the first, and part of the second. I shall relate a particular which shews that Joubert was a modest man [F], and knew very well within what limits human learning is confined.

I have observed, from La Croix du Maine, that he was born December the 6th 1520; but I must add here, that we read in an inscription which is round his picture, that in the year 1570 he was in his fiftieth year; whence it follows that he was born in the year 1530. Rondelet, whose favourite pupil he was, and whom he succeeded in the year 1567 in the post of Regius Professor of Physic at Montpellier, trusted him, when he died, with his manuscripts, and desired him to revise, correct, and publish them (d). Joubert gained that post of Regius Professor after he had held a public disputation for four days upon several theses, which have been printed, with divers other treatises, at Lyons, in the year 1571. There are amongst these treatises some observations, which serve to clear up certain passages in his Paradoxes [G]. He was an

“ of an high spirit, and very jealous of his reputation, “ he has been so much vexed and exasperated by all “ those complaints, that he had often a mind (I know “ it very well) to burn all that he had written upon “ those subjects. Oh, what a pity it would have been (a)!”

§ (a) There is a Latin translation of this book of the Vulgar Errors printed by Chr. Plantin with this title: Laur. Jouberti de Vulgi erroribus Medicinæ & Medicorum dignitatem deformantibus, cum Notis Joan. Bourgesii. i. e. “ Laurence Joubert’s work of the Vulgar Errors which “ tend to depreciate the dignity of Physic and of the “ Physicians, with John Bourgesius’s notes.” In 8vo, 1600*. Let us observe here that Mr. Bayle should have said a word of the orthography, which Joubert affected to follow in this work. It is almost the same with that, which Lewis Maigret, and James Pelletier attempted to introduce; but it was so little approved of, that it was absolutely altered in the edition printed at Roan, in the year 1601. CRIT. REM.]

[E] This work was to have contained six parts.] When he published the first part he added to it a table exhibiting the division of the whole work, and the titles of the chapters which every book was to contain. But as it was not he himself that sent the second part to the press, it did not answer the scheme which he had published. It was not divided into five books, and the twenty five which it contains do not answer those of his scheme, neither with regard to the number, nor to the subjects of these chapters. The following passage from Cabrol will acquaint you with the reasons of this. “ He could not yet be prevailed upon “ to consent that the other parts might be published. He “ keeps them so secret and hidden, that there is no “ possibility of having a sight nor the least communication of them. Finding therefore that such was his “ resolution (not to say obstinacy) I was determined to “ publish some chapters, which I received formerly “ from him; for he had done me the favour to explain some propositions to me, which I desired to understand from him, and of which I asked him his opinion. There is not a great number of them, “ but most of the chapters are very long, and contain “ several heads. So that whoever would take the “ pains to subdivide them, would find about thirty of “ them. Monsieur JOUBERT had composed them “ long before he published the first part of his Vulgar “ Errors: they treat of certain subjects, which have “ since been reduced to several heads in the general and “ particular division of the whole work, to be inserted “ some in the seventh book, others in the eleventh, “ the seventeenth, the twentieth, the twenty third, “ the twenty fifth, the twenty sixth, and in the following books to the thirtieth. I have not much minded in what order I placed them, since this is all we “ can have at present from the author, notwithstanding his promise (15).” The same Cabrol asserts (16), that whilst he was taking care to have this printed as it were by stealth, he was surpris’d at his Printer’s by Monf. JOUBERT, “ who was very angry with me, “ says he, because of my undertaking. However when “ he heard that I designed to make you a present of “ it, . . . he suffered . . . the Printer to go on, and even “ gave him two beautiful discourses extracted from his “ Latin paradoxes, and translated by his eldest son Isaac “ Joubert.” Let us observe here, that Gaspar Bachot Counsellor and Physician to the King, published in the year 1626 a book which he had composed a great while before in order to compleat Laurence Joubert’s design with regard to the third part of the Vulgar Errors (17). He followed the chapters of the books, according to the scheme of them, which he met with in the table annexed to the first part. But he drew up the whole after his own manner, and according to his particular opinions, without obliging himself to follow his master’s (18). This book of Gaspar Bachot is entitled, Erreurs populaires touchant la Médecine & Régime de Santé. i. e. “ Vulgar Errors concerning Physic, and the Diet necessary to keep us in health.” This author is not mentioned in Lindenius renovatus.

[F] I shall relate a particular, which shews that Joubert was a modest man.] Gaspar Bachot, whom I have mentioned in the preceding remark, was admitted Doctor of Physic in the year 1592 (19). He boasted that he had maintained his thesis against all opponents, and he looked upon his Doctorate as the trophy of his victory. But as soon as I had read your Answer, says he in his letter to Monsieur de Lorme Physician in Ordinary to Lewis XIII, and first Physician to the Queen-Dowager (20), “ in which you “ write to me, that the late Monsieur Joubert, your “ colleague and your friend, used to say of himself, “ Ter Doctor nunquam futurus doctus. i. e. *I have been “ three times admitted a Doctor, and shall never be a “ learned man; that he being a Doctor, and having “ taken that degree in three different universities, could “ not be satisfied with himself, though he was admired “ by all the world; I began then to mistrust myself “ so, that I looked upon all my former studies as “ useless, without any hopes of ever becoming learned, “ since such a man, like another Socrates, confessed “ his own incapacity, or the fear he was in never to “ enjoy the desire of his heart.” Take notice, that he observes, that “ Joubert had learnt his profession at “ Montbrison (21) and in the neighbouring houses, “ and that he lived there, when his Decades were dedicated to that celebrated Civilian, Papon, the ornament of that city (22).”*

[G] . . . Some observations which serve to clear up certain passages in his paradoxes.] He had asserted in his second paradox, that it is possible for a man to live a long while without eating and drinking. This proposition was exclaimed against, as though the author designed to hint thereby that Moses, Elijah and Jesus Christ fasted forty days without any miracle. He made a very good answer to this objection, for his answer was approved by John de la Place, Minister of Montpellier. This Minister’s approbation is not printed in the French translation of this work of Joubert, but it is to be met with in the Latin edition of his Opuscula printed at Lyons in the year 1570 (23). This confirms what we have observed in another place (24), namely, that Joubert was of the reformed religion. It must be observed, that when he undertook to explain those passages which were exclaimed against, it was only for the sake of those pious persons, who either because they have a tender conscience, or because they are not sufficiently acquainted with Philosophy, are easily offended. But as for those, who out of malice pretended to find dangerous assertions in his works, he left them to the hardness of their heart. Hujus enarrationis, vel solo argumento vel demonstrationibus commoveri posse hominum duo genera, facile præsentio. Unum est naturalis Philosophiæ & Medicinæ imperitum, simplicitatis & impietatis nomine venerandum: qualis

* Biblioth. Dreu-dii, tom. 1. pag. 939.

(15) Cabrol, Épître Apologetique, prefixed to the 2d Part of the Erreurs Populaires.

(16) Ibid. in the Dedication to Monf. de Villeroi.

(17) At Lyons, for Bartholomew Vincent, in 8vo.

(18) See Bachot’s Preface.

(19) See his Letter to Mr. de Lorme, prefixed to his book of Vulgar Errors.

(20) Ibid.

(21) A City in the County of Forez.

(22) That is to say of Montbrison.

(23) In page 139 of the 2d Part.

(24) In the article VIRET.

(25) Joubert, Opuscul. Part 2. pag. 136.

an innovator with regard to the orthography of the French tongue [H].

qualis plebecula, & quicunque in æstimandis rerum causis studium non adhibent. Alterum διαβολικόν, quod etiam quæ bene dicta esse novit, impudentissimis calumniis infectatur. Hoc, quia explicationem non expectat, & quæcunque impura sua mente excipiuntur depravat, suoque veneno inficit, me nihil moratur. Alteri verò benignè satisfaciendum puto. i. e. "I am sensible that either the very subject of this treatise, or the arguments urged in it may give offence to two sorts of persons. "The one is of those, who are unacquainted with Natural Philosophy and with Physic, and who for their honesty and piety deserve to be regarded: such are in general the common people, and all they who do not apply themselves to study the causes of things. "The others are a devilish sort of men, who by their impudent slanders exclaim even against what they know to be well grounded. As they do not expect an explication from me, and are used to corrupt and infect with their venom whatever they conceive in their wicked mind, I shall have no regard for them. But I am of opinion that I ought to answer the others with kindness, and in a friendly manner." He must have been highly provoked by those men's imputations, since he wishes that God would give him that patience and meekness, which are necessary when a man is exposed to the rage of slanderers. His words, which shew that his heart was full of resentment, are at the same time a terrible invective against his adversaries. He concludes after this manner. Hæc διαβολικὸς κακοδελιμονος ab istius enarrationis prophanatione avertant, quibus est peculiare etiam sacram paginam corrumpere, & in alienum pessimumque sensum detorquere, im- prudenter mentiri, & maledicere, animorum concordiam dissolvere, inimicitias colere, invidiam crepare, & nunquam non quibus nocere queant modos excogitare, piisque omnibus esse infestissimos. DEUS misericors parcat hominibus quicunque ab ejusmodi furis agitati, earumque veneno afflati & infecti, similem naturam induunt & referunt: quosque ab istis nequissime tractari patitur, patientia (quæ omnia vincit) & mansuetudine bene muniat. Amen (26). i. e. "Let this keep those devilish slanderers from prophaning this work, whose particular character is to falsify even the Holy Scripture, and to wrest the words of it to a wrong and most dangerous sense; to lye and slander most impudently, to sow dissentions and to keep up divisions amongst friends; to burst with envy, to be continually inventing some mischief, and to be most bitterly exasperated against all good men. I pray the most merciful God to pardon all those who, being persecuted by those furies, and acted upon and infected by their venom, happen to assume the same character; and if he suffers any to be injured by them, may he grant them the necessary patience (which overcomes all things) and that meekness they want; Amen."

[H] He was an innovator with regard to the Orthography of the French Tongue. For he used to write jeantil, accian, parfes, amer, instead of gentil (gentile), action (action), parfait (perfect), aimer (to love). He also made a distinction between the v consonant and the u which is a vowel; and he would have the consonant (27) written otherwise than the vowel (28).

(26) Joubert, Opuſcula, pag. 156, 157.

(27) Compare this with the Novelles de la Republique des Lettres, for July 1704, Art. 3.

(28) Taken from Sorel, pag. 114. of his Perfection de l'homme.

JOVIAN, a Roman Emperor, obtained that dignity by the election of the army in the year 363, after the death of Julian the Apostate. He was more considered by the merit of his Father Count Varronian, than by his own (a), for he was still very young, and served in the troops of the Life-guards [A]. Most of the particulars that relate to him being set down in Moreri's Dictionary, I shall confine my self to two facts only, which are not to be met with there. The first is, that Jovian concluded a peace, which was so dishonourable and so prejudicial to the Roman Empire, that he exposed himself to the complaints and raileries of the public [B]. The other is, that he

(a) Suidas in Ιοβιανῷ. See also the words of Eutropius in the remark [A].

[A] He served in the troops of the Life-Guards. When I say this, it is chiefly with regard to these words of Eutropius. Post hunc (Julianum) Jovianus, qui tunc DOMESTICUS MILITABAT, ad obtinendum imperium consensu exercitus electus commendatione patris quam sua militibus notior (1). i. e. "After Julian's death, Jovian, who served then in the troops of the Life-Guards, was chosen Emperor by the army, though he was known to the soldiers by his father's merit rather than by his own." But I must also observe that this author's expressions are not sufficiently exact, and that we ought to correct them by those of another Historian, who does more distinctly tell us to what post Jovian had been raised. Jovianus eligitur Imperator Domesticorum Ordinis primus, paternis meritis mediocriter commendabilis (2). i. e. "Jovian being Captain in the Life-guards was chosen Emperor; his father's merit was the only recommendation he had." As the military posts are not at present in the same order or disposition as they were at that time, it is very difficult to find a word in the modern languages, that answers exactly to the meaning of these expressions, Domesticorum ordinis primus, or Prinicerius Domesticorum (3). But we may with reason assert, that they do not signify that Jovian was the Chief or the Leader of those guards, which were called Domestici: for the true name of their Leader or Colonel, was Comes Domesticorum (4). It has been asserted in Moreri's Dictionary, that Jovian was Captain of the Prætorian Guard, when he refused to renounce the Christian Religion under Julian the Apostate. This is borrowed from Socrates the Historian, who though he made use of the word χιλιάρχος (5), a Captain of a thousand men, does not however justify Moreri's expression. Let us observe that Theodoret asserts (6), that Jovian had no employment in the army when he was made Emperor. Ammianus Marcellinus, who says the contrary, is more credited, since he was on the spot.

(1) Eutrop. lib. 10. pag. m. 123.

(2) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 25. cap. 5. p. m. 430.

(3) Hieron. in Cbron. makes use of this expression.

(4) See Valeſius, in Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 14. cap. 10.

(5) Socrat. Hist. lib. 3. cap. 22.

(6) Theodor. Hist. lib. 4. cap. 3.

[B] Jovian concluded a peace which was so dishonourable and so prejudicial . . . that he exposed himself to the . . . raileries of the public. He yielded five Provinces to the Persians, with some places, which served as strong barriers to the Roman Empire. Amongst other places he gave up to them the important City of Nisibis, and that of Singara (7), and it was with difficulty he obtained leave for the inhabitants to retire to the territories of the Romans (8). He promised that he would no longer send any assistance to the King of Armenia, who had been constantly a true and faithful friend to the Emperors. This was, say the Historians, a kind of impiety, and proved the ruin of that faithful friend, and ended in the loss of Armenia. Quibus exitiale aliud accessit & impium, ne post hæc ita composita, Arsaci poscenti contra Persas ferretur auxilium, amico nobis semper & fido . . . Unde postea contigit, ut vivus caperetur idem Arsaces, & Armeniæ maximum latus Medis conterminans, & Artaxata inter dissensiones & turbamenta raperent Parthi (9). i. e. "To which was added this pernicious and impious circumstance, that after the conclusion of this treaty of peace, no assistance should be given to Arsaces against the Persians, though he should ask for it; to Arsaces, I say, who always was our faithful and constant friend. Whence it happened afterwards that the same Arsaces was taken prisoner, and during the broils and troubles, the Parthians seized upon the greatest part of Armenia, which borders upon Media, and made themselves masters of Artaxata." It is impossible to read any thing more moving than the description of the condition, to which the inhabitants of Nisibis were reduced, when they were forced to remove to another place (10). Their humble supplications to Jovian, to desire him not to oblige them to leave their native country, are enough to make our hearts bleed; and yet the Emperor had no regard for them: he insisted upon his having given his word, and upon his fearing to forswear himself: but it was imagined, that he

(7) Vide Valeſium, in Ammian. Marcell. lib. 25. cap. 9. pag. 439.

(8) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 25. cap.

(9) Idem, ibid. pag. 434.

(10) See Marcellinus, ibid. cap. 9.

he did not approve of that violent means be made use of in order to suppress the Sects, he did not mention the true cause of his fears. Et hæc quidem suppliciter ordo & populus precabatur: sed verbis loquebantur incassum, Imperatore, ut fingebat, alia metuens, perjurii piacula declinante (11). i. e. "The magistrates and the people did humbly entreat him; but to no purpose, the Emperor fearing, as he said, "to be guilty of perjury; though what he feared was quite another thing." It was imagined that he kept his word only because he feared lest he should meet with a competitor to the crown, if he should continue longer in those parts, and engage in a new quarrel with the Persians. They who imagined this were perhaps in the right; but after all, the Roman Historians are very much to blame for finding fault with his performing punctually the conditions of the treaty of peace. Let us quote a passage from Eutropius, in which he is censured for this, and in which his whole fault is made to consist in his observing that treaty; for it is acknowledged on the other hand, that he was under a kind of necessity to accept dishonourable terms, which were such as the Romans had never submitted to before. Jam turbatis rebus, exercitu quoque inopia laborante uno à Persis atque altero prælio victus (Jovianus) pacem cum Sapore necessariam quidem, sed ignobilem fecit, multatus finibus, ac nonnulla Imperii Romani parte tradita: quod ante eum annis mille centum & duobus-de-viginti fere, ex quo Romanum imperium conditum erat, nunquam accidit. Quinetiam legiones nostræ ita & apud Caudium per Pontium Telesinum, ita & in Hispania apud Numantiam, & in Numidia sub jugum missæ sunt, ut nihil tamen finium traderetur. Ea pacis conditio non penitus reprehendenda foret, si fœderis necessitatem, cum integrum fuit, mutare voluisset: fecit à Romanis omnibus his bellis, quæ commemorarunt, factum est. Nam & Samnitibus, & Numantinis, & Numidis confestim bella illa sunt: neque pax rata fuit (12). i. e. "The affairs being reduced almost to a desperate condition, and the army wanting provisions, Jovian, who had already been more than once vanquished by the Persians, made a treaty of peace with Sapor, which was indeed necessary, but very dishonourable; for the Emperor was obliged to give up the frontiers of the Empire, with part of its territories. This never happened before, since the first foundation of the Roman Empire, about eleven hundred and eighteen years ago. Nay, even when our legions were forced to undergo the yoke at Caudium by Pontius Telesinus, and in Spain near Numantia, and in Numidia, they never yielded one inch of ground. The peace, though made upon such terms, would not be altogether to blame, if, when it was in his power, he had endeavoured to mend what the necessity he was under forced him to accept, as the Romans did in those wars, which I have mentioned. For the Romans attacked immediately the Samnites, the Numantines, and the Numidians, nor would they keep to the treaty of peace."

You see here, that Jovian is blamed for not following the example of the ancient Romans, who without any delay fell upon those nations, which obliged them to submit to a disgraceful capitulation, but which had not made them lose one inch of ground. And since he had been censured for not resenting the shame and retrieving the loss of this treaty of peace, though he reigned but seven or eight months, it is plain that they wished he had broke through the articles of the treaty, a few days after they had been agreed upon, and as soon as his army was furnished with provision and in a secure place. But is not this policy too visibly unjust? Suppose it be lawful to retrieve the losses sustained by a disadvantageous peace made by an unavoidable necessity, does it follow from thence, that one must not let some time pass, and wait for those pretences and opportunities which seldom fail to offer in the course of a few years? Thus you see, that even according to the most loose maxims of politics, Jovian would have been guilty of a most horrid perfidiousness, had he done that which the Historians blame him for not doing. The three instances of the ancient Romans, which Eutropius quotes, are of a quite different nature. The Senate and the people might lawfully make void all the treaties which their Generals made. But Jovian, who had concluded the peace had no superior: he was the sovereign master, all the power being lodged with him. Observe that what vexed the true Romans most, was the giving up of a country, which had been a part of their Empire; for they pretended, that this had never been done; and it was so much against their maxims to suffer the least diminution of their dominions, that they granted the honours of a triumph only to those, who had removed the borders farther back; and refused them to great Generals, who had done very noble actions, but without any other advantage to the State, but that of recovering what had been lost. Read the description of this grandeur of the Romans in the following words from Marcellinus. Illud tamen ad medullas usque bonorum pervenit: quod dum extimescit amulum præstatis, dumque in animo per Gallias & Illyricum versat, quædam sæpe sublimiora ceptasse, famam adventus sui prævenire festinans, indignum imperio facinus amicum perjurii fugiendi commisit, Nisibi prodita: quæ jam inde à Mithridatici regni temporibus, ne Oriens à Persis occuparetur, viribus resistit maximis. Numquam enim ab Urbis ortu inveniri potest annalibus replicatis, ut arbitror, terrarum pars ulla nostrarum ab Imperatore vel Consule hosti concessa: sed ne ob recepta quidem quæ directæ sunt, verum ob amplificata regna triumphalis gloria fuisse delata. Unde P. Scipioni ob recuperatas Hispanias, Fulvio Capuâ post diuturna certamina superatâ, & Opimio post adversos exitus præliorum, Fregellanis tunc internecivis hostibus ad deditionem compulsis, triumphus denegati. Id etiam memoriæ nos veteres docent, in extremis casibus ista cum dedecore fœdera, postquam partes verbis juravere conceptis, repetitione bellorum illico dissoluta: ut temporibus præcis apud Furcas Caudinas sub jugum legionibus missis in Samnis, & per Albinum in Numidia scelestâ pace cogitata, & auctore turpiter pacis fœderis Mancino dedito Numantinis (13). (13) Ann. Marcellin. cap. 90. i. e. "But what grieved all good Romans to the very heart was, that whilst Jovian was fearing a competitor, and calling to his mind; that in Gaul and in Illyricum several persons had often usurped the sovereign power, and designing to prevent the very report of his coming, he committed the most unworthy action under a pretence not forswearing himself; he gave up Nisibis to the enemy, the inhabitants of which had from the time of Mithridates bravely resisted the Persians, that they might not make themselves masters of the East. I believe it would be impossible to find in the whole series of our Annals and Records, that since the building of Rome any General or Consul ever yielded one inch of ground to the enemy: nay, the honour of a triumph was not granted to those, who had only retaken what had been lost, but only to those who had enlarged the dominions of the Commonwealth. And for this reason the triumph was refused to Scipio who had recovered Spain, to Fulvius, who after a long war had taken Capua, to Opimius, who after several battles forced the Fregellani to surrender, who were at that time our most bitter enemies. We also find in ancient Records, that when, even in the utmost necessity, a dishonourable treaty had been concluded, which both parties had sworn in form to keep, yet such treaties have been annulled, and the war was begun again; as when in former days our legions were forced to pass under the yoke at Caudium in the country of the Samnites, and when Albinus had wickedly formed the design of making a peace in Numidia, and Mancinus, who made too much haste to conclude it, was delivered up to the Numantines." Observe that the remark [D] must be considered as a part of this: for I examine there whether Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus were well grounded in their assertions or not.

If we do but ever so little consider the natural temper of the people in general, and the circumstances, which the Christians and the Heathens were in at that time, we shall easily believe, that Jovian became odious and contemptible, and was the subject of several satires. The people dread and hate war, and love and long for peace; and not without good reasons; for it is the people that suffer the greatest inconveniences of war: but yet that some people will grieve and be vexed at a treaty which disgraces the nation, and deprives her

(11) Marcellinus, ibid. See also the Chronicle of Alexandria.

(12) Eutropius, lib. 10. pag. 123.

(13) Ann. Marcellin. cap. 90. pag. 439, 440.

Sects [C], that differ from the established Religion. Some authors assert that before his time the Romans had never yielded one inch of ground by a treaty of peace [D]. Others main- tain, of a barrier, which was her security, and made her formidable to her neighbours. Victories and conquests fill the hearts of the very countrymen with joy and content, and makes them bear patiently the weight of the war. Men will much easier forget the heavy duties and numerous taxes they pay, when they behold the happy success of the armies, and the advantageous terms of a treaty of peace : every one takes his share in the glory the nation has acquired ; but to think, that the enemies will become proud, scornful, and insulting, when they have put an end to the war by such a treaty of peace as they could wish, fills the heart even of the meanest amongst the people, with grief and vexation. Must so many expences, say they, and such heavy taxes be all to no purpose, &c. ?

See above (14) the complaints and murmurs of the French against the peace of Cateau. Never was the people more capable to shew such a resentment than under the Emperor Jovian. There was a great emulation between the Christians and the Heathens. The latter had just lost an Emperor whom they loved, and from whom they had great expectations ; they had flattered themselves with the hopes that his expedition against the Persians would be attended with considerable advantages, and with great glory ; and they found that when death had snatched from him those noble triumphs, he had a successor, under whom the affairs of the Empire were reduced to a miserable condition. To murmur against such an Emperor, to blame him, to ridicule him, was gratifying at once several passions ; it was raising Julian's glory, it was leading the Christians with confusion, it was making a sacrifice to the idol of political vanity, and to zeal for religion. Men were sure to act from all these different principles : they made verses and parodies to banter and ridicule Jovian (15). The wits at Antioch signalized themselves particularly on this occasion, they dispersed libels against him about the streets ; they posted others up ; they turned him into ridicule by applying to him some passages in the Iliad, and amongst others that in the third book (16), where Paris is so severely reproved by his brother Hector, and that in the second book (17), where Ulysses threatens Therites that he will strip him to the very skin, and drive him away with shame.

Ἐι μὴ ἰγὼ σε λαβὼν, ἀπὸ μὲν φίλα εἴματα δύσω
Χλαίωσάν, ἰδὲ χιτῶνα, τὰ τ' αἰδῶ ἀμφικάλυτον
Αὐτὸν δὲ κλαίοντα θεῶς ἐπὶ σφύρας ἀφῆσεν (18).

" If I do not take you, and strip you of all your cloaths, even of those that cover your secret parts, and send you thus crying immediately to the Persians."

An old woman seeing him tall and handsome, and hearing that he had neither genius nor good sense (19), cried out, his madness is as great as his person is tall (20). Suidas, who acquaints us with all these particulars, had already observed, that this Emperor knew nothing, that he had had no education, and that by his base laziness he lost those talents which nature had bestowed upon him. Ἀμαλύνει δὲ αὐτὸν, καὶ ἀγνοεῖται σπουδασίας, καὶ ἂν εἴχῃ φύσιν διὰ βιβλιομανίαν ἡμῶν καὶ ἰφάνειαν (21). i. e. " He had no education, and not so much as the first principles of learning : and even the natural genius he had, he defaced and spoiled by his negligence." Neither Eutropius, nor Ammianus Marcellinus give him that character. Vir alias neque iners neque imprudens (22). i. e. " A man who otherwise wanted neither diligence nor wisdom." You will meet with Ammianus Marcellinus's words in the beginning of the remark [E].

[C] He did not approve that violent means should be made use of, in order to suppress the sects.] The Philosopher Themistius commends him after such a manner, as does not agree with the particulars we meet with in Church-History : he extols him for giving to all men the liberty of worshipping God according to their own fancy, by which means he had put a stop to the waverings of those flatterers, who had changed their religion as the Imperial crown passed from one head to another ; he compares such men to the Euripus (23). (23) See Penfées deverses sur les Comètes, p. 244.

Θαυμάζω τὸν βασιλῆα, ὅς το ἰφῆνας ἑθνητικῶν ὡς ἰακῶτος βίβλους, κηρύσσοντα τὸν καλῶσαν τὴν τρέψαν. ἔς τὴν διασῶσαι πάντων γαλιῶν ἴφην, ἐλέγχουσαι αὐτὸς ἀλαργίαν, ἢ Θεῶν ἑθνητικῶν : μὴδὲ τε διαφῆσαι αὐτὸς Εὐρίπῳ, ὅν μὲν ἐπὶ τὰδ' οὐκ εἰς τῆσδε τῶν βύβλων μεταβάλλω. i. e. " He commends the Emperor very much, because he had granted to every one the liberty of worshipping as he pleased, by which he put a stop to the custom of those flatterers, of whom he says wittily, that they did not worship God, but the people ; and he adds that they are like the Euripus, which sometimes runs this side, and then quite the contrary way (24)." Themistius spoke thus in an oration which he delivered on Jovian's Consulship. The sense of his words is, that Jovian did not forbid the Heathens to worship their Gods, according to the ancient custom : and yet Socrates the Historian tells us (25), that all the temples of the Heathens were shut up, and that these idolaters hid themselves some in one place, some in another. That the Philosophers left off wearing the habit of their sects, and that the sacrifices, which used to be so frequently offered under Julian, ceased entirely. We must say therefore that Themistius spoke in an hyperbolical stile, which was grounded only on Jovian's moderation towards the Heretics, and which was perhaps an artful exhortation to use the same toleration with regard to all sorts of religions. However it is certain, that this Emperor finding himself courted by all the Christian sects, for every one of them would gain him on their side, he declared himself for the orthodox party as to the consubstantiality of the word (26), but he would not consent to drive from their churches those that were of a contrary opinion (27), and he answered that he hated controversies, and would love and esteem the promoters of peace and concord. He designed to suppress by his meekness and indulgence all the schisms that were in the church. He therefore gave the world to understand, that he would persecute no man, but that he would chiefly love and honour those, who should be very zealous for restoring the public peace and tranquillity. Ὁ μόνος βασιλεὺς πρόβουσι εἴχει, κολακίαν καὶ παῖδα τῶν διασῶσαν τὴν φιλοσοφίαν ἐκκόψει, φήσας μὴδὲ ὀχλοῦς τῶν ἰακῶτων αἰσῶντων ἵστασθαι ἀπαίτησιν δὲ καὶ ὑπερήμωσιν τὰς ἀρχὰς τῆ ἰσότητος τῆς ἐκκλησίας παραβῆναι (28). i. e. " The Emperor was determined, to suppress by his meekness and persuasions the quarrels of those who differed in their opinions, and he said, that he would molest none, of what persuasion soever they might be ; but that he would love and distinguish those, who made it their business to restore the peace of the church." Let us observe that he made severe laws against those who should court Nuns with a design to marry them, or who looked lasciviously upon them : for he would have them be capitally punished (29). He resolved upon this severity, to refrain the audaciousness men had used under the Emperor Julian, in marrying Nuns, and debauching them either by main force, or by persuasions (30).

[D] Some authors assert, that before his time the Romans had never yielded one inch of ground by a treaty of peace.] The passages, which I have already quoted above (31) from Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus, are a plain argument that this was reported. Caesaron (32) pretends, that they who spoke thus, asserted a falsity : the ground of his opinion is that Hadrian gave up three Provinces (33), and that Dioclesian reduced his empire within more narrow bounds. Dioclesianus . . . Augusti praeceptum, Hadriani exemplum secutus, imperii fines à meridie supra Aegyptum arctavit : auctor Procopius in Persici. Idem Imperator reliquit Daciam à Trajano constitutam, sublato exercitu Ἐθ provincialibus : desperans eam posse retineri, Vopiscus ait. i. e. " Dioclesian . . . according to Augustus's advice, vice, and after the example of Hadrian, reduced the Empire within narrow bounds towards the south above Egypt, as Procopius tells us in his account of the affairs of Persia. The same Emperor abandoned also Dacia, of which Trajan had made a Province ;

having

(14) In the remarks [C], [G], [H] of the article HENRY II. See also the remark [P] of the article HENRY IV.

(15) Suidas, in Ἰφίαντιον.

(16) Versu 39.

(17) Versu 261.

(18) Idem, ibid.

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Ὅσον μῆκος, καὶ βύθος ἢ μωρία. Quanta longitudo ἔ profunditas est hominis corporis, tanta etiam est eius stultitia. Idem, ibid.

(21) Suidas, ubi supra.

(22) Eutrop. lib. 20. sub finem.

(23) See Penfées deverses sur les Comètes, p. 244.

(24) Socrates, Hist. Ecclesiast. lib. 3. cap. 15. pag. m. 205.

(25) Idem, ibid. cap. 24.

(26) Idem, ibid. & cap. 25.

(27) Idem, ibid. cap. 25.

(28) Idem, ibid. pag. 204, 205.

(29) Sozomen. Hist. Eccles. lib. 6. cap. 3.

(30) Idem, ibid.

(31) In the remark [B].

(32) Caesaron. Not. ad Spartian. Vit. Adriani, cap. 5. pag. m. 47.

(33) See above, the remark [G] of the article HADRIANUS (Publius Aelius).

tain, that they who speak thus are mistaken. I shall examine this in a note, and I shall also quote what the Fathers of the Church have said of this peace concluded by Jovian (b). Let us add, that he was a very tall man; zealous for the Orthodox Doctrine, but very much given to drinking and to lewdness [E]. We ought rather to believe those who

(b) See the remark [F].

- “having removed his army out of it, and all the Governors that were there, not thinking that he could keep that country, says Vopiscus.” But Valefius (34) shews, that there is a great difference between what these two Emperors did, and what Jovian consented to. The latter gave up provinces by a treaty of peace, and as a kind of ransom: whereas the other abandoned freely a country, the keeping of which cost too much money: this was acting according to the rules of prudence, and not receiving the law from the conqueror, as Jovian did. There was not therefore any reason to blame Marcellinus for his assertion, as Casaubon, Lindenbrog (35) and Le Cocq (36) have done; and it is certain that Jovian’s action was unheard of. It is a general opinion that this action was disgraceful (37). There was no dispute upon this between the Christians and the Heathens, they differed only with regard to this Emperor’s justification: the Christians endeavoured to clear him from the reproach of it, and the Heathens to load him with it. We have seen above (38) that an Heathen Historian blames him, not indeed for consenting to the treaty of peace, but for keeping to the terms of it. This censure is ill-grounded, and even horrid. If necessity forced him to conclude a peace, as these authors confess, he must be excused, for necessity has no law.
- Necessitas, cujus cursus transverso impetum Voluerunt multi effugere, pauci potuerant* (39).
- “Many have endeavoured to avoid the force of necessity, but few have been able to do it.”
- When Jovian is once cleared in this respect, all the rest goes of course. The next observation of a treaty of peace confirmed by a solemn oath, does not deserve to be condemned, Ammianus Marcellinus is a much more dreadful Critic than Eutropius; he was an eyewitness, and he gives us such an account of those events, as to hint to us (40) that Jovian put himself in that dangerous situation, without any necessity, and that the perplexity to which the Persians had reduced him was not so great, but it had been much better for him to try the fortune of the war, rather than to submit to the disgraceful terms, which he accepted. He charges him positively with timorousness, and with hearkening to the flatterers, who dispirited him. Et cum pugnari decies expediret, ne horum quidquam dederetur: adulatorum globus instabat timido Principi, Procopii metuendum subserens nomen, eumque adfirmans, nisi rediret, cognito Juliani interitu, cum intacto milite quem vegebat, novas res nullo renitente facile moliturum. Hac perniciose verborum ille adfuitate nimia succensus, sine cunctatione tradidit omnia quæ petebantur (41). i. e. “And though it was ten times better to engage in battle, rather than to give all that up, yet the timorous Prince was surrounded with a croud of flatterers, who repeated to him continually the dreadful name of Procopius, and asserted, that unless Jovian returned very soon, Procopius hearing that Julian was dead, and being at the head of a fresh army, would be in a condition to revolt, and to seize the crown, having no man to resist them. Jovian being too much affected by these pernicious discourses, yielded up without delay, all that was demanded of him.” Agathias (42) charges him plainly enough with the same weakness. The Christians, in order to clear Jovian take care to observe that Julian the Apostate was the chief cause of all this misfortune, since he had been so rash and inconsiderate, as to order all the boats to be burnt, which might have carried provisions; for this occasioned that terrible scarcity, which forced Jovian to accept a shameful capitulation (43). Cujus vanis deditus oraculis erat (Julianus), quando fretus securitate victoriae naves quibus vitæ necessarius portabatur, incendit. Deinde fervide instans immodicis ausibus, & mox merito temeritatis occisus, in locis hostilibus egenum reliquit exercitum, ut aliter inde non posset evadere, nisi contra illud auspiciam Dei Termini, de quo superiore libro diximus, Romani imperii termini moverentur. Cessit enim Terminus Deus necessitati, qui non cesserat Jovi (44). i. e. “Julian was addicted to their idle oracles, when depending upon a sure victory, he burnt the ships which carried the necessary provisions; and prosecuting earnestly his bold undertaking, he met soon after with death as a reward for his temerity, leaving his army in the enemies territories, whence it could not retire otherwise, than by removing the boundaries of the Roman Empire, against the auspices of the God Terminus, which we have mentioned in the foregoing book. For the God Terminus, who would not give way to Jupiter, was found to submit to necessity.” You see that in these words St. Augustin lays all the blame on Julian, and ridicules also the Heathen Religion on the immobility of the God Terminus, who on this occasion had been obliged to contradict his former conduct (45). The Heathen might have answered, that it was no wonder this Deity would not exert himself in Jovian’s favour, who had revolted from the Gods. But this evasion might easily be refuted, since after all it had been true, that the promise, which the Romans pretended the God Terminus had made them, proved deceitful, namely, that the boundaries of their empire would never move back. Now this is what St. Augustin designed to prove against the Heathens.
- Let us observe by the by, how prudently ancient Rome acted. She designed to conquer: and to compass such a design, there is nothing more necessary than never to yield up by a treaty of peace, what has been taken during the war, for take as many cities and provinces as you please, this will never enlarge your dominions, if by the articles of a treaty you are obliged to restore them. The Romans in order to succeed in their design of forming a very large empire, made it a point of honour and a matter of conscience for their Generals to conquer new countries, and never to suffer those conquests to be lost, that had been once made. They did not grant a triumph to those, who only recovered what the enemy had taken (46), and they gave out that it would be a sin against the God Terminus, and against his sacred Auspices (47), to move the limits of the empire backwards. The Turks, designing to make great conquests, and to lay the foundations of a very large empire, have made a more direct and immediate use of religion, for they asserted, that it was inconsistent with religion to restore to its former possessors a city, in which there had been a Mosque; and therefore they make haste to build one in all their new conquests. This they did, that they might be under an obligation to keep them, when they come to conclude a peace, and to make the Governors of cities defend themselves from a principle of conscience with a wonderful obstinacy (48). But they have found lately by experience, how ineffectual this artful policy proves. The treaty of Carlowitz, made in the year 1698, has exposed them to the same railleries, which St. Augustin levelled at the God Terminus, who gave place to necessity under the Emperor Jovian. The Sultan has been forced to yield to the Christian Princes, several places, in which there had been Mosques. It was to no purpose that they represented to him, that he sinned against the principles of his religion: he was obliged to stoop to this, and of two evils to choose the least.
- [E] He was a very tall man, zealous for the orthodox doctrine, but very much given to drinking and to lewdness. Here follows his character drawn up by an Heathen Historian (49). Incedebat motu corporis gravi, vultu latissimo, oculis castis, vasta proceritate, & ardua, adeo ut diu nullum indumentum regium ad mensuram ejus aptum inveniretur. Et æmulari malebat Constantium, agens seriva quædam aliquoties post meridiem: jocularique palam cum proximis adjectus. Christianæ legis idem studiosus, & nonnunquam honorificus, mediocriter eruditus, magisque benevolus, & perpensius, ut apparebat ex paucis quos promoverat, judices electurus: edax tamen, & vino Venerique indulgens: quæ vitia imperiali verecundia forsitan correxisset. i. e. “He had a grave gait, but a cheerful countenance: he had grey eyes; he

(34) Valef. in Amm. Marcell. lib. 25. cap. 9. pag. m. 439. 440.

(35) Lindenbr. in Amm. Marcell. ibid.

(36) Leonardus Coquus, in Augusti. de Civitate Dei, lib. 4. cap. 29.

(37) Post... pudentia pacis ista fœdera. Amm. Marcell. lib. 27. cap. 12. See also Agathias, lib. 4. Socrates, lib. 3. cap. 22. Zonaras, &c.

(38) In the remark [B], citation (12).

(39) Laberius, apud Macrobius Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7. See also Horace’s words quoted above, citation (11), of the article of the 3d Duke of GUISE.

(40) Amm. Marcell. lib. 25. cap. 7. pag. 433.

(41) Idem, ibid. pag. 434.

(42) Agathias, lib. 4.

(43) See Gregorius Nazianzenus’s 2d Oration against Julian the Apostate. See also Socrates, lib. 3. cap. 22. pag. 196.

(44) August. de Civitate Dei, lib. 5. cap. 21. pag. m. 554. See also lib. 4. cap. 29.

(45) See Dionysius Halicarn. lib. 3. cap. 92.

(46) See the remark [B] quotation (13).

(47) See St. August. de Civitate Dei, lib. 4. cap. 29.

(48) Sir Paul Ricaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, B. 2. chap. 3. pag. m. 320.

(49) Amm. Marcell. lib. 25. sub fin. pag. m. 443.

(c) See the remark [B] towards the end.

(d) See Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 25. cap. 8.

(e) Amm. Marcell. lib. 25. cap. 5.

(f) See Valerius in Marcell. lib. 25. cap. ult.

who assert that he wanted neither activity, nor prudence, nor learning, than those who charge him with great faint-heartedness, great ignorance, and great stupidity (c); for he acted with a great deal of care and vigilance, in order to prevent the tumults and compositions, which he apprehended the news of his election would raise in the western Provinces of the Empire (d). The measures he took for that purpose proved very effectual; though he could not hinder the true news concerning the bad condition of the east from out-running the false news which he had ordered to be dispersed every where, with a design to conceal the advantages which the Persians had gained [F]. His father who had quitted the service that he might lead a quiet life in his own house (e), had not time to rise to that dignity which was designed him. He died before Jovian had executed the resolution he had taken to make him his colleague in the Consulship (f). This dignity was conferred on a child (g), namely on Varronianus, the son of Jovian and of Charis, Lucilian's daughter (b). Jovian's reign was very short, for it did not last full eight months.

(g) Amm. Marcell. ibid. cap. 10.

(b) Idem, ibid. cap. 8. pag. m. 436.

JOVIUS

“ he was very strait, and so tall, that it was long before they could find amongst the Imperial garments, one that was long enough for him. He chose to imitate Constantius, applying himself to something of importance in the afternoon: he also used to be sometimes merry with his near relations; he was zealous for the Christian Religion, and also sometimes an ornament to it: he was not very learned, but good-natured, and would have chosen Judges with deliberation, as appeared by a few he had appointed. But he was a great eater, and given to drinking, and the pleasures of love. However, the Imperial dignity would perhaps have made him forsake those vices as being a disgrace to it.” Zonaras, who was a Christian and a Monk, has copied the chief strokes in this picture in the character he gives us of this Emperor. Ο μόνος Ἰουλιανός, says he, εὐσεβὴς ἦν καὶ τὸ δόγμα καὶ ἀγαθοδιδάχτης. οὐκ εὐήγητος καὶ ἀφροδισίων. καὶ τῆν τε σώματος ἀισθησὶν ἡμιμικρῆς, καὶ γραμμώτατος ἐκ κριτικῆ. i. e. “ Jovian was a religious man with regard to the Christian doctrine, and good-natured, but given to drinking and to love-pleasures: he was very tall, and unacquainted with learning.” Here then we have an Emperor who was very religious as to the doctrines of religion, but a great drunkard, and a great whore-master. He gave too strong proofs of his zeal for the Gospel before he was raised to the Imperial throne: for in the first place, he shewed that he was ready to resign his place rather than forsake his religion (50), when Julian commanded all the Officers of the army to embrace the Heathen religion, or to lay down their employments. Secondly, he would not accept the empire, till upon his declaring that he was a Christian, and that he would not command over Heathens, the soldiers had also declared that they were Christians (51). He had then courage enough to quit, for the love of God, not only an inconsiderable employment, but even the most eminent dignity, that was then upon earth: he was capable to prefer his religion before the whole Roman empire. But that conscience which filled his heart with courage, and which was so tender and so scrupulous in that respect, had no power to make him forsake drinking and whoring. He could make a sacrifice to religion of every other thing but these two. What an odd thing is this! What a mixture of good and evil in the same heart. All ages furnish us with numberless instances of persons, who go into banishment for the sake of their Religion, who leave their estate, their employments, friends and relations, and who cannot forsake Bacchus and Venus. Do not imagine, that Jovian's Orthodoxy was imperfect; you may be sure that he knew perfectly well that drunkenness and impudicity are forbidden of God, and that the same Religion which condemned the heathen idolatry, also condemned the inclination to drinking and to sensual pleasures. Observe, that he was as great an eater as he was a drinker; it has even been asserted that he died of excessive eating. Multi examinatum opinantur nimia cruditate, inter cœnandum enim epulis indulserat (52). i. e. “ Several persons are of opinion that he died of an indigestion, having too much indulged his appetite at supper.” There were other reasons given of his death (53); as for instance, the steam in a room too hot and too close, poison (54), &c. But the first reason was given even by the Christians. Ἐτελεύτησεν, ἡ ἀφιδεστρον, ὡς τῶν λέγουσι, διαπληθῆς, ἡ ὑπὸ τῆς ὀσμῆς τῆ ἀκρίματος. i. e. “ He died, either because he had eat too much at supper, as some say, or being smothered by the steam that was in his chamber (55). Have you taken notice of the Historian Marcellinus's conjecture? He observes that Jovian, out of regard for his Imperial dignity, would perhaps have forsaken his intemperance and his incontinency. This is speaking very sensibly: tho' if we consider things only in a general view, and according to some trials we have, the sovereign power does not seem to be a proper school of sobriety and continence with regard to those who are naturally fond of gross and sensual pleasure; it seems rather much more proper to encrease the evil than to suppress it, since the means of gratifying one's passions are both more numerous and more effectual. But if it be true that Jovian died of an excess in eating, and if what we read in Suidas be not a mere fable, Marcellinus's conjecture is very doubtful. Suidas relates (56), that Jovian, at his wife's instigation, caused a beautiful temple, which Hadrian had consecrated to Trajan, to be set on fire, together with the library, which Julian had lodged in that temple. He adds, that Jovian's concubines set fire to it themselves, and laughed heartily at it. Such an action is much like the debauchery of Alexander (57), and of the courtizan Thais.

(55) Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. lib. 6. cap. 6.

(56) Suidas in Ἰουλιανῶ.

(57) When he set the city of Persepolis on fire. See Quintus Curtius, lib. 5. cap. 7.

[F] He could not hinder the true news . . . from out-running the false news, which he had ordered to be dispersed every where, with a design to conceal the advantages which the Persians had gained.] It is one of the most useful and necessary artifices of politics, to impose upon the people by false accounts, when there are no good news to tell them (58). It is indeed a difficult task to stop the progress of bad news, when it is but too true; but one does all that one can. Jovian was sure to make use of this stratagem. *Fustum est autem ad implenda hæc perreçuris, extollere seriem gestorum in melius, & rumores quaquâ irent verbis diffundere, continentibus procinçium Parthicum exitu prospero terminatum. . . . (59). Hos tabellarios fama prægrediens, index tristiorum casuum velocissima, per provincias volitabat & gentes; maximoque omnium Nisibenis acerbo dolore percussit, cùm urbem Saporì deditam comperissent (60): i. e. “ They who were to perform these commands, and were going to set out, had orders to put the best construction upon what was past, that lay in their power, to disperse reports in all the places they passed through, to this purpose, that the expedition against the Parthians had had good success. But fame outran the messengers, and with the utmost dispatch spread the news of these unfortunate events through all the Provinces and amongst all Nations; but none were so much afflicted at these misfortunes, as the inhabitants of Nisibis, when they heard that their city was to be surrendered to Sapor.” These words of Marcellinus, Fama index tristiorum casuum velocissima, are very remarkable; they hint to us, that fame never runs swifter than when it has some bad news to report. If it be so, it deserves still better the character that is given it.*

(58) See at the end of this Dictionary, the Dissertation upon Liable, remark [B].

(59) Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 25. cap. 8. pag. m. 436.

(60) Idem, ibid. pag. 437.

Fama, malum quo non aliud velocius altum, Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit tundo (61).

(61) Virgil. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 174.

“ Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows, “ Swift from the first; and every moment brings “ New vigour to her flights, new pinions to her “ wings.” Dryden:

(50) Socrat. lib. 3. cap. 22.

(51) Idem, ibid.

(52) Eutropius, lib. 10. sub fin. See also Amm. Marcell. lib. 25. pag. 443.

(53) Alii odore cubiculi, quod ex recenti textorio calcis, grave quiescentibus erat; quidam nimietate pranarum, quas gravi frigore adoleri multas jusserrat. Eutrop. lib. 10. See also Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 25. pag. 443.

(54) See Valerium, in Amm. Marcellin. ibid.

JOVIUS (PAUL) in Italian Giovio, was born at Como in Italy, and gained by his works a great reputation, and the Bishopric of Nocera (a); but he passed for a mercenary writer, so that his Histories are not much credited [A]. It is said that he did not much labour to clear himself of that bad quality [B], and that he ingenuously confessed, that

(a) Pope Clement VII promoted him to it.

[A] His histories are not much credited.] James Gohorri made no scruple to assert, that the adventures of Amadis would appear as probable as Paul Jovius's histories. Illud certe ad sempiternam memoriam testatum reliquit Gorræus Parisiensis, qui quas finxit (1) Amadisi fabulas non minus veras ac probabiles quam Jovii scripta fore confidit (2). i. e. "Gohorri of Paris has indeed

(1) Bodin does not express himself well, for Gohorri was only the Translator of Amadis. But see the critical remark (a).

(2) Bodinus in Methodo Historiarum, cap. 4. pag. m. 71.

(3) Thuan. lib. 11. sub fin. pag. m. 235.

"made in his writings this declaration for an everlasting memorial, that he was certain the stories of Amadis, which he invented, would not appear less true and probable, than the writings of Jovius (a)." Thuanus did not make use of this hyperbolical expression, but yet what he says is sufficient to let us know how little that writer is esteemed. Cum aliqui homo gratis se passim obnoxium prodatur, eoque nomine ipsi in plerisque rebus fides derogetur, quod ad gratiam & in odium scripsisse, & venalem calamum habuisse fere omnibus persuasum sit (3). i. e. "Jovius, though otherwise an agreeable writer, shews his partiality, so that the greatest part of what he relates is discredited, because most people are persuaded that he wrote to favour some, and out of hatred against others, and that he was a mercenary writer." Add to this a passage from Vossius, who acquaints us that Paul Jovius had, in a manner, set up a bank, and promised an ancient genealogy and immortal glory to every villain, that would give him a good sum of money for his pains; and that he used to slander and asperse all those that would not pay him for his falsities. Quam fluxa etiam fidei patrum ævo fuit Paullus Jovius? quem constat in aula Henrici secundi quibusque terræ filiis bene de se merentibus generis claritatem ac perpetuum nomen pollicitum: contraque maledice eos traduxisse, qui venali historico morem non gererent (4). i. e. "How little

(4) Vossius, de Art. Hist. cap. 9. pag. 48.

does Paul Jovius, who lived in our Fathers time, deserve to be credited? For it is certain that he used to promise he would find noble ancestors and give an everlasting reputation, to every obscure fellow at the court of Henry II, that deserved well of him; and on the other hand, this mercenary historian asperged and slandered all those who would not stoop to pay their court to him." We shall see in the following remark whence this is extracted. He offered to write in favour of Don Juan III, King of Portugal, and because his offer was not accepted, he would not mention a victory, which the Portuguese had gained. If he had been well paid for writing the History of Portugal, he would have been so far from omitting true victories, that he would have forged imaginary ones: his credit has therefore been very justly brought into question. Here follows the stroke which the writer of Emanuel's Life levels at him. Victoria fuit præclara: quam tamen Paullus Jovius, cum de Sultani classe hac in Indiam contra Lusitanos delata narraret, silentio suppressit, iratus videlicet, quod cum Lusitanæ historiæ scribendæ munus Joanni, hujus nominis tertio, Lusitanæ regi venale proponeret, rex optimus non illum muneribus Indiciis ad res Lusitanorum virtute gestas monumentis illustrandas invitavit (5). i. e. "It was a very great victory: and yet Paul Jovius did not say a word of it, when he mentions the fleet which the Sultan sent into the Indies against the Portuguese: For he was exasperated against Don Juan III, King of Portugal, because having offered him to write his history for a sum of money, that good Prince would not give him the treasures of the Indies to transmit to posterity an account of the noble actions of the Portuguese." He met with the fate of all liars, I mean, that he was hardly believed, even when he tells the truth. The misfortune is, that he reaped more benefit from his falsities, than the faithful Historians do from their love of the truth. This complaint of Bodinus is very well grounded. Non quod multa non sint verè & eleganter ab eo scripta; sed hunc mendacii fructum tulit, ut etiam cum vera scribit, suspectus habeatur. Hoc tamen acerbius est ac indignius, quod cum historiæ æqualem prestitisset, uberioribus tulit mendacii fructum, quàm qualem aliis vera scribendo (6). That man was not proper to write a good history; for when it was in his power to tell the truth, he had no mind to tell it, and when he designed to be sincere, he could not; for he had no authentic memoirs but such as related to what happened in Italy. This is what Bodinus asserts (7), and he supports his assertion by observing, that Jovius never travelled abroad, that he was not a witness of the events he relates, but lived constantly at the court of the Popes during thirty seven years. But, in my opinion, he could, notwithstanding all this, have collected authentic memoirs concerning the other countries. And besides, Jovius boasts that he had seen sieges, battels, &c. (8). See in the remark [F] another passage of Bodinus, and the judgment which Justus Lipsius passes on our author, whom he charges with an excessive partiality.

(5) Olorius, de Rebus Emmanuelis, lib. 6. folio m. 179.

(6) Bodin. in Methodo Historiarum, cap. 4. pag. 73.

§ (a) James Gohorri is as much an author as a translator with regard to the Xth, XIth, and XIIth book of Amadis, which are the only books he has translated (*), for he has inserted into them a great many things of his own invention. And this is what Bodinus hints at in the words above. REM. CRIT.]

[B] It is said that he did not much labour to clear himself of that bad quality.] Bodinus asserts, that Paul Jovius being asked why he related falsities, and concealed the true events, answered, that he did it for the sake of his friends; that he knew very well, that they who were then living, would not give any credit to his histories, but that he was also sensible, that in future ages men would not in the least question what he related. Cum autem rogareretur cur simularet falsa, vera dissimularet, amicorum gratia id à se factum respondit: ac tametsi superstitibus intelligeret suis scriptis fidem derogaturos, attamen intelligebat infinitæ posteritati credibilia fore quæ sibi suisque popularibus laudem essent allatura (9). Some persons suppose that he made this answer: A hundred years hence there will not be one single proof extant to convince me of imposture; men will therefore be obliged to believe what I relate in my histories. Anzi mi vien detto, che essendo biasmato il Giovio della infedeltà della sua historia, egli li confessò, soggiungendo però, che si riconfortava, sapendo, che dopo lo spazio di centi anni, non vi sarà più alcuna memoria in contrario; onde veranno i posteri necessariamente à dare indubitata fede à suoi scritti (10). Some assert (11) that he boasted he had a golden pen, and an iron pen; the former for those Princes, who bestowed favours upon him, and the latter against the Princes from whom he received none. It is also pretended, that he owned he had suppressed the three books in which he mentioned Anthony de

(7) Cum rariis-bus fidem habuerit, nec conciones, nec Epistolas, nec res gestas, nec alla publica monumenta vidit: sic tamen scribit, quasi rebus interfuisse, nec ullum dubitationis locum relinquit. Quæ igitur verissime scribere potuit, noluit; puta, res in Italia gestas; quæ voluit, non pauit, scilicet externa. Idem, ibid.

(8) See the Dedication of his History.

(9) See the Dedication of his Translation of the 13th book.

(10) Bodinus, in Methodo Historiarum, cap. 4. pag. 73.

(11) Stephano Guazzo, della civile Conversazione, lib. 2. pag. m. 242.

(12) Teiffier, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 1. pag. 67.

(13) Paulus Jovius.

(14) Joseph Scaliger, Epist. de Vaustr. Gentis Scalligeræ, pag. 3.

Leva, because that famous warrior gave him nothing, and he would not suffer that the name of an ungrateful man should appear in his works. Quis nescit quanta fuerit virtus Antonii Levæ Hispani ducis, ut solus dici, aut cum paucis Imperator appellari nostri temporis possit: tamen nequissimus historicus (12), seu potius fabulator, quod pecunias non dedisset, maluit totam corrumpere historiæ, tresque libros qui illi debebantur intermittere, ne (ut agebat) ingratum insereret historiæ (13). i. e. "Who is there but knows what a great man Anthony de Leva was, who alone deserved the title of a General in our time, or at least, could share that glory with but a few: and yet that wicked Historian, or rather fabulous Writer, omitted him in his work, because that great man gave him no money: and he chose rather to falsify the whole History, and to omit three books, in which he was to give an account of him; because, said he, he would not mention an ungrateful man in his History." It is pretended, that he promised an illustrious genealogy to any person of Henry II's Court, who would pay him well, and threatened to traduce all those that opposed him in his trade. Paulus Jovius, me puero, in aula Henrici secundi obscurissimo cuique claritatem generis mercede pollicebatur, maledicentia ulturus qui ejus mundinationi adversaretur (14). For my part, I can hardly believe that Jovius ever confessed such things, as I have here observed. I find that he boldly asserts, that he published his work during the life of most of the persons concerned in it, because he did not fear lest they should convince him of falsity, as they might easily do, had he not been a faithful Historian. Absolute tandem opere quotation (4).

that he commended or blamed according as men took care or neglected to court his favour. No man ever asked for presents with less reserve than he did [C]. You will find in Moreri what Thuanus relates concerning this author's resentment against the Great Constable Anne de Montmorenci. Brantome gives a more full account of it [D]. It is pretended that the reason why Paul Jovius complained that he had lost some books of his History at the sacking of Rome, was only that the publishing of them was inconsistent with his own private interest. He was not much esteemed with regard to his morals [E], and he was charged with being very careless in saying his Breviary. His style is bright enough, but not sufficiently historical nor exact [F]. His partiality is not the only defect they opere id in publicum edere non dubitem, magno verbe incorrupte veritatis argumento: quandoquidem plerique eovum, qui hæc bello paceque gesserunt, adhuc vivunt, ac idcirco gravi existimationis meæ cum periculo mentientem refellere possint (15). i. e. "My work being now finished, I do not scruple to publish it; which is a strong proof that I relate the truth sincerely. For most of those, who have been concerned in these transactions both in peace and in war, are still alive, and would easily refute me, if I had told falsties; so that I should be in great danger of disgracing myself, and losing my reputation."

[C] No man ever asked for presents with less reserve than he did.] "His way of begging (16) calls to my mind that of Paul Jovius, who used to beg more openly and more basely still. I have read some of his letters, which are wonderful in that respect. In one of them he declares solemnly, that in case Cardinal de Lorraine does not take care to have his pension paid him, he will say, that the Cardinal is no longer defended from Godfrey, who promoted a Pedant to the Archbishopric of Tyre. In others he asks the Marquis of Pescara for two horses, and for that effect he desires him to strike the ground a little harder than Neptune did. In other letters he wishes that a certain Lady, who was his friend, would send him some sweetmeats from Naples, because he begins to be tired of new-laid eggs, &c (17)."

[D] Thuanus relates . . . this author's resentment against . . . Anne de Montmorenci. Brantome gives a more full account of it.] Though the passage from Brantome be pretty long, yet I shall transcribe it intire. "I have been told by a great man, says he, that he had read in the first Latin edition of Paulus Jovius (whether it be true or not I cannot tell) a passage, in which it is observed, that when the Grand Seignior Soliman turned his great favourite Ibrahim Bahaw out of his favour, and put him to death, King Francis did at the same time turn his great favourite the Constable Anne de Montmorency out of his favour. But why, says Jovius, did he not also put him to death, as the other did Ibrahim or Hibraun Bahaw? It was not, adds he, but that he had well deserved it: and hereupon he mentions some impertinent stories, which it was not proper to relate, and which are false: but because, continues he, this great King was good-natured and merciful, whereas the Grand-Seignior was a cruel tyrant. I do not know whether this be in the Latin edition, but that Gentleman told me so for certain. It is not in the French translation; nor ought we to credit it in the least, for if the said Jovius asserted it, he did it as a passionate man, who was exasperated against the Constable, who being again called to Court by King Henry, and settling the establishment of the King's household, which was part of his office, found that amongst the pensions granted by the late King, there was one of five hundred crowns to the said Paul Jovius, which he suppressed immediately, giving the King to understand that this money was ill bestowed, since Jovius was more addicted to the Emperor's party than to the French, and was besides a notorious liar. Jovius therefore knowing that his pension was suppressed, began to inveigh bitterly against the Constable, and to asperse him in the most outrageous manner. You see what it is to have to do with the venomous tongue and sharp pen of a writer, who when he is exasperated spares no body. Some say, that the Constable at the time he was out of favour had seen the stroke which that fellow had levelled against him, with a design to please the King, rather than for any other reason, such writers being generally flatterers, because they always get something by it. And therefore when the Lord Constable came to King Henry's Court, he revenged himself on Jovius, and would have treated him more severely still had it been in his power; for a brave and generous man, as the Constable was, is deeply vexed, when he is thus slandered and traduced by a writer without any reason (18)."

(18) Brantome, Elge de François, in the 1st volume of his Memoires, page 228. Some assert that Jovius was exasperated against the Constable, because he had not obtained from him something, which he had asked impudently. Quod equidem expertus est Annas Mommorantius Comes Stabuli Franciæ traductus à venali historico, non aliam ob rem quam quod nescio quod impudenter petens repulsum tulisse (16). i. e. "This is what Anne de Montmorency Conitable to Francis II found by experience, being traduced by a mercenary Historian for no other reason, but because he had refused him I know not what, which he had impudently asked." I shall observe by the by that Francis I had no reason to repent of the pension, which he had granted to Paul Jovius; for he was represented by his pensioner under the character of a conqueror, rather than under that of a conquered Prince. And it is pretended that Charles V complained of this. Cum aliquando Cæsar noster legeret victoriam quam de Gallis habuerat, dixit, profecto non meam, sed Gallorum Regis victoriam hic scripsit, indicans, ex pecuniis acceptis à Rege quanta mendacia inseruisset Historiæ (20). i. e. "Our Emperor reading once an account of the victory he had gained over the French, said, this writer describes indeed the victory of the French King, and mine; hinting thereby how many falsties he had inserted in his History, because of the money he had received."

[E] He was not much esteemed with regard to his morals.] Cardanus charges him with lewdness. Hic noster historicus, says he (21), admirandus profecto magis aliis (22) qui tametsi senex, parum absuit, quin pepereris (*). Sed & id testabilis quod cum esse etiam Antistes, gaudebat numerari (23) procos adolescentulos. i. e. "This Historian of ours was indeed more wonderful still than the others; for though an old man, yet he was like to be brought to bed (see the margin *). But what is more still, is, that though he were a Bishop, yet he delighted to be reckoned amongst the young men, that made love to the women." Cardanus's marginal note contains a very strange particular, namely, that Paul Jovius was an Hermaphrodite. Imperialis (24) confesses that this author was charged with leading a dissolute life, and with great negligence in saying his prayers, and reciting his breviary.

[F] His style is bright enough, but not sufficiently historical nor exact.] Scaliger said of it what you will read in the following passage. Paulus Jovius mendacissimus & Guicciardino inferior, nimis affectato & luxuriantie stylo, potius quam castigato utens (25). i. e. "Paul Jovius is a great liar, and inferior to Guicciardini, has an affected and pompous rather than an accurate style." Roland des Marets speaks of it with the utmost contempt, and even asserts that it abounds with 95 barbarisms. Quantum sentio, says he (26), non bonus est historiæ scriptor (Paulus Jovius) nec judicio satis vult: qui si vernaculè scripsisset, nullo in numero haberetur. Latinus enim sermo quasi fucus quidam labes illius multas contegit: qui prima specie elegans videtur, nam belle sonat, & quibusdam imponit, mihi non item. Vix enim Latinus est, certè minime purus, totusque idiotismi scatet; nihil fere proprie effert, sed plerumque confusè loquitur, nec pene ulla vox est sine epitheto. i. e. "Paul Jovius is not a good Historian, in my opinion, nor does he distinguish himself by his judgment;

(15) Jovius, Præfat. Historiæ ad Cosmum Medicum.
(16) That is to say, the begging of a man whom Balsac calls Jean Jaques. He means the person who made Peirefkius's Funeral Oration at Rome.

(17) Balsac. Lettre 9. to Cbaspelain, liv. 3. pag. m. 114.

(18) Brantome, Elge de François, in the 1st volume of his Memoires, page 228.
(19) Joseph Scaliger, Epist. de Vetuslate gentis Scaligeræ, pag. 3.

(20) Cardanus, in Apologia Neronis.

(21) Idem, ibid.
(22) That is to say, than the Historians, whom Cardanus had just been mentioning, and whom he had charged with several vices.

(*) Quippe Hermaphroditus. i. e. "For he was an Hermaphrodite."

(23) Thus I read in my edition; I imagine that the word inter is omitted.

(24) In Museo Historico, pag. 7.

(25) Scaligerana prima, pag. m.

(26) Rolandus Maresius, Epist. 41. lib. 1. pag. m. 218.

(b) See the remark [F].

they blame in his History (b), which is the most elaborate of all his works [G]. However, it must be confessed that this writer had a great deal of wit, and that his books abound with a great many curious observations. He died December the 11th 1552 (c)

(c) Raufner, in Diario Hist., pag. 185. at ment; he would not have been esteemed in the least had he written in the vulgar tongue. But the Latin language, like a veil, covered many of his faults: his stile at the first sight seems to be elegant, for it sounds well, so that it imposes upon some readers, but not upon me; and indeed it is hardly Latin, and not at all exact; he seldom expresses any thing in terms that are proper, but generally uses periphrases; and there is scarce one word without an epithet to it." We have here two skilful judges. Who then would not wonder to find Lipsius speak so advantageously of our Paul Jovius's stile? Must we not infer from thence, that the most excellent critics differ in their taste, even with regard to such a subject on which they should all pass the same judgment. When men know the rules of eloquence, and those of the art of writing History, ought they not to agree in their commendation or censure of a writer's stile? But let us see what Lipsius observes concerning Paul Jovius (27).

(27) Lipsius, Not. ad 1 lib. Politic. cap. 9. pag. m. 218.

Paulus Jovius multorum judicia magis acerba quam libera experitur. Acriter valde in virum eunt. Ego de eo sic censo, stilo bonum graveque esse & plane ad historiam: judicio ac fide ambiguum. Ubi affectus non distrabunt, rectum, ubi illi adsunt, obnoxium. Ad gratiam scilicet se dat & auram. Laudationum nec causam sepe habet nec modum. Genti suæ, Vastio, Medicis nimis ex professo addictus. His quidem ita ut Laurentium Medicen parricidii reum velut apud judices agat. Orationibus quoque aut frigidus interdum, aut ineptus. Laudandus tamen legendusque ob multiplicem & variam rerum seriem, quas rodegis compositæ & dilucide in unum historiarum corpus (28). i. e. "Several persons judge more severely than freely of Paul Jovius; and inveigh very bitterly against him. My opinion of him is as follows. His stile is good and grave and perfectly adapted to History. His judgment and impartiality are justly questioned: when no passions sway him he relates the truth; otherwise he is suspicious. For he suffers himself to be sway'd by partiality and favour. He praises often without reason, and immoderately. He is too much devoted to his own nation, to Vastius, and to the House of Medicis. And to the latter to such a degree, that he speaks of Laurence de Medicis as though he was pleading against him before the judges. His orations are also sometimes either dull or impertinent. He deserves however to be commended and read, on account of the great number and variety of particulars, which he has collected into a body of History, in a proper order and in a clear light."

(28) La Popeliniere, Hist. des Historiens, liv. 7. pag. 403. giving his opinion of Paul Jovius does only translate this passage, without mentioning Lipsius. He did not even understand these words, Laudationum nec causam sepe habet, nec modum; which he translates thus; Il observe ni les causes ni moyens au ses loanges. i. e. "He observes neither the reasons, nor means in his commendations."

Lipsius's observation concerning the dull and impertinent orations, which Paul Jovius has inserted in his History, calls to my mind what Bodinus says, who ridicules him for making the soldiers speak like students of Rhetoric. *Præsertim in concionibus, epistolis, fæderibus, decretis, quæ Jovius pro arbitrato fingit, in quo tamen decorum ita confudit, ut imperiti milites, ipsius Alciati sui Laudatoris judicio, declamatores scholastici esse videantur (29). i. e. "Particularly in the orations, letters, treaties and decrees, which Jovius invents after his own fancy, in which however he does so little keep up to the characters of the persons he mentions, that, even in the opinion of Alciat his great admirer, he makes the unlearned soldiers speak like young students of Rhetoric." I am persuaded that the reader will not be displeas'd to meet here with Alciat's words, on which Bodinus grounded his assertion. *Id à te præcipue desiderabam, ut ad illud quod Græci ἄριστον vocant, non absurdè responderes. Sicuti in ea oratione animadvertēbam, quæ à Marconio gregario milite, ad legiones jam planè consternatas & ad seditionem spectantes babebantur, quum Solymano Pannoniæ finibus exedente, Carolus Cæsar Vienna profectus in Italiam rediret. In ea siquidem concione omnes artis nervos numerosque ita expressisti, ut ille Marconius nequaquam ab aratro Volaterrani agri ad signa vocatus, sed ex schola Ciceronis & Hermogenis ad suggestum raptus esse videatur, quum passim exacte eloquentiæ schemata intenteant, quæ peroranti turbam parère coegerint (30). i. e. "I wish'd chiefly, that you had not acted absurdly

(29) Bodin, in Methodo Histor. pag. 72.

(30) Alciatus, Epist. ad Paulum Jovium, in limine Historiarum Jovii.

against what the Greeks call ἄριστον, decorum, or keeping up the true character of persons; as I observed you had done in that oration, which a common soldier named Marconius made to the army, which was already under a great consternation and ready to revolt, when Soliman being pass'd the frontiers of Pannonia (or Hungary) the Emperor Charles V went from Vienna into Italy. For you have so well expressed all the strength and elegance of the art of Rhetoric, that this Marconius does not seem to be lifted into the army from the plough, and from the fields of Volterra, but to be hurried from Tully's and Hermogenes's lectures to the pulpit; so much does his discourse abound with eloquent strokes, which made the multitude follow his direction when he had done speaking."

Observe that these words of Lipsius, Laurentium Medicen parricidii reum velut apud judices agat, have been thus translated by Monsieur Teiffier (31): He clears Laurence de Medicis of the crime of parricide, as though he were pleading his cause before his Judges. Paul Jovius does quite the contrary; he speaks as the Countess of this Laurence's accuser would have done (32). Monsieur Teiffier imagined, no doubt, that the great Laurence de Medicis was meant here, who was a great patron of the men of letters in the fifteenth century, whereas Jovius means another Laurence, who assassinated Alexander de Medicis in the year 1537.

[G] His History is the most elaborate of all his works. It is the first which he compos'd, and the last which he published. He formed the plan of it in the year 1515, and continued all his life-time to perform it. He chose for the subject of his work the events that happened in his own time over all the world, beginning with the year 1494, which was that in which the French conquered the Kingdom of Naples under Charles VIII. This History contains XLV books, and extends to the year 1544; but there is a considerable gap from the XIXth book to the XXIVth inclusive (33). These six books, which extended from the death of Pope Leo X, to the taking of Rome in the year 1527, contain only a short summary of the events. He lost, at the sacking of Rome, what he had already compos'd relating to that part of his History (34), and he would not compose it over again, nor complain what was wanting in them. He had two reasons not to do it: the first was, that he would have drawn upon him some people's indignation in a terrible manner; the other was, that he would not employ his pen upon a subject, which was so dishonourable to Italy. Peritos medicos imitatus, carcinomata desperatæ curationis, quæ attraheret, & acri medicamine lacessas, in immensum furere, & pestifera edacique serpentine mortem afferre solent, naturæ relinquenda, neque his ullo pacto manum ad movendam judicavi. Quamobrem existimationi salutique meæ consulens, diræ tempestatis materiam, tamquam abominabilis impique operis, minime attingendam arbitratus sum, quando hæc adversæ fortunæ accepta vulnera, infansæque nostræ detrimenta, non modo non prodenda posteris, sed pro virili occultanda esse videantur: Ea siquidem, quæ Italicum nomen dedecent, neque memoria recoli sine dolore, neque sine uberrimis lacrymis scribi, nec sine flagitio pudoreque posteris enarrari queunt (35). i. e.

(31) Addit. aux Éloges tirés de Mém. de Tbon, tom. 1. pag. 65.

(32) See book the 38th of Paul Jovius's History.

(33) Observe, that there is also a gap, from the 4th book to the 10th inclusive. See his Advertisement at the end of his fourth book.

(34) Fatali illa sub Clemente VII urbis æternæ clade nonnulli libri in seditis tantum descripti illi deperierunt, bond sine suo dolore maximo. Basilus Joannes Armiolus, Epist. Dedicatoria Operum Jovii

I have done like skillful Physicians: as for those desperate cancers, which if you pretend to touch them, and to apply sharp remedies to them, rage more, and spreading their venom farther and farther, occasion a certain death, I thought it proper to leave them to nature, without offering to apply a healing hand to them. Taking care therefore of my own reputation and security, I judg'd that I must not treat of the history of those dreadful times, which was an abominable and impious work; since the mistertunes we underwent, and the wrong we suffered by our own folly were not only improper to be transmitted to posterity, but were even to be kept secret as much as it was possible; I mean those events, which are a disgrace to Italy, which cannot be remembered without grief, nor written without a flood of tears, nor related without shame nor without "crime."

at Florence, to which City he retired, being very much dissatisfied with the Court of Rome, because he had not been able to obtain the Bishopric of Como [H]. He had a brother named BENEDICTUS JOVIUS, who wrote some books [I]. There was one PAUL JOVIUS, who in the Council of Trent voted in a very remarkable manner upon the question concerning residence [K].

Let

(35) In the remark [B].

"crime." We have observed above (26) that this gap in Jovius's History has been found fault with very much to his dishonour. It is remarkable, that though he had urged these two arguments as a very good apology, yet in the very next page he promised the public, that he would soon publish that part of his History which was wanting. Quod si mihi quanquam pedibus capto, atque adeo graviter senescenti, Deus magnus fatalis horæ spatium extendat, perpetua procul dubio lucubratione enitar, ut totum id quod in clade urbis ereptum, vel à me postea contumaci quadam indignatione prætermisum fuit, non diu à bonis mortalibus desideretur (37). i. e. Though I be lame, and grow very old, yet if Almighty God suffer me to live any longer, I shall certainly labour, by my continual study, that what I lost at the sacking of Rome, or what I afterwards omitted, through an obstinate indignation, be not long wanted by the honest part of mankind." He tells us besides, that he has supplied this gap by the particular lives he has published. The Preface from which I have extracted these particulars was written at Pisa May 1, 1552: It is the Dedicatory Epistle of the second volume of his History. The author died in December following, and had not the satisfaction to see the third volume of his work, which is the last, come from the press. He had it printed at Florence. Let us observe, that the author who tells us that this is the first book which Jovius composed, has been wretchedly mistaken in his calculations. He asserts, that Jovius first began this History in the year 1515, being then about thirty years old, that he died whilst he was still engaged in it, at the age of threescore and fifteen, and that he met with a very unsettled fortune during the thirty seven years he spent in composing that work. Cum enim anno à nato CHRISTO qui numerabatur M. D. XV. ætatis autem suæ circa trigésimum, ea quæ post annum M. CD. XC. IV. per totum orbem terrarum gesta essent, atque se vivo gererentur, animo complexus fuisset, illud Historiæ opus omnium suorum primum exorsus fuit, licet omnium postremum illud ediderit, eique quinque ferme annis septuagenario major immortalus est. Triginta itaque illis ac septem annis quibus historiam concinnavit, varia et ipse fortuna (uti fieri solet) jactatus JOVIUS (38). i. e. "In the year 1515, when he was about thirty, he formed the design to write a history of all that happened in the whole world from the year 1494, and in his own time; this is the first work he ever begun, though it be the last he published, and he died when he was near threescore and fifteen, being still employed in this history. He met with an inconstant fortune (as is usual) during the thirty seven years he spent upon that history." We may observe three blunders in this account. I. A man who applies himself to a work from his thirtieth year to his seventy fourth year, applies himself forty four years to it, and not thirty seven only. II. Since Paul Jovius died in the year 1552, he did not live above threescore and fourteen years, if it be true that he was but about thirty in the year 1515: at that rate, he would have lived but about threescore and seven years. III. It is observed in Jovius's Epitaph (39) that he lived 69 years; months, and 22 days: it is not true therefore that he lived near threescore and fifteen years; and to assert that he was about thirty in the year 1515, is speaking without any accuracy.

(37) Jovius, Prefat. tom. 2. Historiarum, sub finem.

(38) Basil. Joh. Heroldus, Epist. Dedic. Operum Jovii.

(39) Apud Paulum Freherum, Theatr. p. 1454. et apud Popo Blouant, Cens. Auteurs pag. 449. where instead of 22 days we read 22; Thuanus says 22.

(40) Herold, Epist. Dedic. Operum Jovii, which acquaints us with the chronological order in which this author's works were published.

(41) Jovius, Epist. Dedic. Libri de Piscibus.

I shall observe occasionally, that the book De Piscibus Romanis (Of Roman Fishes) is the first book which Paul Jovius published (40). He dedicated it to Cardinal Lewis of Bourbon. The dedication is dated from the Vatican March the 29th 1524. He had then a design, which he did not perform; it was to publish very soon the first Decad of his History. Exibit in publicum propediem hujusmodi laboriosissimi operis prima decas, non sine aliqua spe immortalitatis (41). i. e. "The first Decad of this laborious work will soon be published, not without some hope of an immortal reputation."

Alcyonius commends this Decad in a work, which was published in the year 1522. But it does not follow from thence that it had already been printed. He might have seen it in manuscript. Here follows what he says of it. Quam etiam scribendi laudem felicissimè consecutus est Paulus Jovius tuus, in ea Decade, qua res omnes complexus est, quæ toto terrarum orbe gesta sunt; postquam Carolus VIII Rex Gallie, cum maximis copiis transgressus Alpes, tranquillum Italiæ statum perturbavit, et prima funestissimorum in Italia bellorum jecit semina. Historia enim hujus clarissimi scriptoris, omnes elegantie flores, omnia eloquentiæ lumina habet, et mira orationis claritate splendescit, (usque ad omnia ornate narratur,) et regiones aut pugne admirabiliter describuntur, et conciones hortationesque prudenter, et gravissimè interponuntur. Denique illius auctor, varietate, evagationibus, amplificationibus, digressionibus non minus præstantis Historici, quam eximii Oratoris laude, ab omnibus decorari debet (42). i. e. "Which glory of writing your friend Paul Jovius has also most happily acquired in that Decad, in which he gives us an account of all that passed in the world, since Charles VIII King of France had passed the Alps with a numerous army, disturbing the peace of Italy, and sowing the first seeds of those most fatal wars. For the History of this most eminent writer abounds with all the flowers of Rhetoric, and with all the ornaments of eloquence, and is written in a most clear and perspicuous stile (so elegantly is every thing there related): the countries and battles are admirably well described, and the whole is wisely and gravely interspersed with orations and exhortations. Lastly, the author deserves justly the reputation both of an eminent Historian and of a distinguished orator, for the variety, applications, and digressions with which he has adorned his work."

[H] He had not been able to obtain the Bishopric of Como.] This appears from a letter which Andrew Alciat wrote to him (43). It is dated from Pavia October the 7th 1549, and is an answer to a letter, which Paul Jovius had written to him, to acquaint him with his discontent, and with his resolution to leave Rome, and to retire to Florence. Scribis te gravi injuria permotum, Urbe (quod nunquam fieri possè putaram) propediem excessurum, ne diutius acceptæ contumeliæ deformis testis in ea aula specteris, in qua per multos annos (ut mihi videtur) cum aureæ mediocritatis bonis placè beatus, tum studiorum tuarum auctoritate clarus habitus fuisti. Mirum profectò videri potest, quod tibi doctrinæ ac ætatis honore majora promerito, in petitione Pontificatus patriæ tuæ Paulus Pontifex quendam prætulit. At quem hominem? qui Comi neque natus, neque unquam visus sit, et qui (sicut à multis audio) ex arcanis cubiculi sordibus in lucem repente sit productus. i. e. "You wrote to me, that being highly incensed at the injury you have received, you design very soon to leave the city (which I should never have thought) that you may no longer appear a sad witness of the affront that has been offered you, at that Court, where (in my opinion) you lived many years happy in a golden mediocrity, and with reputation on account of your learning. It may indeed appear strange, that though you deserved a greater reward by your age, and by your reputation of learning, yet the Pope should have preferred another to you, in the Bishopric of your own native place. And what man! A man who was neither born at Como, nor ever seen there; and (as I have been told by several persons) who was from the low drudgery of a private servant all on a sudden raised to an high post." This is well enough! it is making pretty free with the holy Father's character. He is not treated much better in the following words. Quis in hoc Pontificem non judicet: non enim hostis bonarum literarum et plane ferreus esse non potest, qui te gravissimarum rerum scriptorem intempestive contempserit. . . . Dices te indignè deceptum ab inveterati astus sene Principe, qui blandis promissis

(42) Petrus Alcyonius, in Mædice Legato Posteriori, pag. 103. edit. Genev. 1624.

(43) It is prefixed to Paul Jovius's History.

Let us not forget to observe, that our Paul Jovius was blamed for giving too much credit to Astrological Predictions, and to other superstitions of the same kind [L]. His promissis vota tua honeste concepta inique sefellerit. i. e. "Who will not judge from this that the Pope is an enemy to the Mules? For whoever does despise you, who are a most grave Historian, must be an enemy to all kind of literature, and absolutely rude and ignorant. . . You will say that you have been unworthily imposed upon by an old Prince of an inveterate malice, who wickedly disappointed the hopes which you had conceived from his promises." I am much mistaken if Thuanus has not committed a blunder here; for he pretends that it was Clement VII, who refused to promote Paul Jovius to the Bishopric of Como, and who for that reason was ill treated in the petitioner's works. Cum ad Novocomensem Episcopatum omnibus votis anbelaret, suaque erga Medicam familiam, in cuius laudes profusus fuerat, observantiae deberi id meritorum fiducia putaret, tamen ab eo obtinere non potuit: quod in causa fuisse plerique credunt, cur Clementem in Historiis avaritiæ & tenacitatis infamulet (44). i. e. "He heartily wished to obtain the Bishopric of Como, which he trusted he had deserved by his great regard and respect for the house of Medices, on whose praises he had expatiated in his works; but he could not obtain it; which most people think was the reason why he charged Pope Clement in his History with avarice and niggardliness."
Elogies

(44) Thuan. lib. 11. pag. 235.

[J] He had a Brother named BENEDICTUS JOVIUS, who wrote some books.] He was Paul's eldest brother, and was to him instead of a father: it was he that educated him; that instructed him, and encouraged him to become an author: for having shewed him two of his works, namely, the History of Como, and a treatise of the actions and manners of the Swiss nation, he raised in him a desire to write a general History. He led a very quiet and retired life in his native place, which he never left but to go to Milan to hear the lectures of a Greek Professor. He had learned that tongue by himself, but he wanted to learn how to pronounce it, and this was the reason of his journey to Milan. He lived to be threescore and thirteen years old, and always continued strong and sound both in body and mind. He intended to present the public with about an hundred letters, which abounded with learned observations: his sons were to take care to publish them, with some other pieces of his composing, with some translations from Greek authors, and with some Poems. Sed hæc & Græcæ translationis non ignobilis opera cum lepidis poematibus eruditorum liberorum diligentia publicabit (45). i. e. "But this, with his Greek translations, which are no inconsiderable work, and with his agreeable Poems, will be published by the care of his children." Their uncle expected this from their diligence (46); but I do not think there was any thing of this author's works printed, but his Latin Poems.

(45) P. Jovius, Elog. cap. 106.

(46) Taken from Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. 106.

We ought not to imagine, that PAULUS JOVIUS, Junior, of whom there are several Latin verses in the Elogies written by our Paul Jovius, was the son of Benedictus Jovius. He was nephew to JULIUS JOVIUS, who was made Coadjutor to his uncle (47) in the Bishopric of Nocera, August 21, 1551, and who enjoyed that Bishopric after him. Paulus Jovius, junior, a good Poet, was made Coadjutor to his uncle Julius Jovius in the same Bishopric, November 29, 1560, and was also his successor in it. He kept that see twenty five years, and died in the year 1585 (48). I have observed in another place (49), that Paul Jovius was no Poet.

(47) That is to say to our Paul Jovius.

(48) Taken from Ughelli, Ital. Sacra, tom. 7. pag. 746.

(49) In the article HADRIAN VI, remark [D].

[K] One PAUL JOVIUS, who voted in a very remarkable manner upon the question concerning Residence.] A friend of mine, who had heard me relate all that I remembered concerning our Paul Jovius, represented to me, that I omitted the most remarkable particulars. He was, said that friend to me, one of the Fathers of the Council of Trent; and as he was not in the least acquainted with Divinity, for he had been a Physician before he was promoted to be a Bishop, and never discontinued the study of the Belles Lettres, I imagine that he did not distinguish himself much in that assembly, when he was to give his opinion upon some point of doctrine. It concerned him very much not to suffer the Council to determine that Bishops are obliged to residence by the law of God. This doctrine, which was strongly asserted by some of the members, could by no means be relished by him; this was

Aux Evêques de Cour prêcher la résidence.

"To preach up residence to Court Prelates."

He refuted that doctrine by arguments borrowed from the common practice: he shewed that there was no less dissoluteness in those Diocesses in which the Bishop resided, than in the others (50), and named particularly the city of Rome. But it is better to hear him speak himself. My friend referred me immediately to page 470 of Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, where I met with the following words. "If these disorders were really occasioned by the absence of the Prelates, there would appear a less corruption of morals in those churches where the Bishops have resided in our time. The Popes have constantly kept at Rome these hundred years past, and have taken the utmost care to have the people instructed, and yet we do not find, that this city is better regulated for all that. The capital cities of kingdoms, in which the Bishops never failed to reside, are much more corrupted than those small and inconsiderable towns, which have not seen their Bishops for a whole century. And none of the ancient prelates who are here, and have constantly resided on their Bishoprics, (for there are some of them) will be able to shew us that their diocess are better regulated than those of their neighbours, who never resided. They who assert that such churches are flocks without shepherds, should consider, that the Curates have the cure of souls as well as the Bishops, and yet the latter only are mentioned, as though there could be no faithful Christians, where there are no Bishops. There are in the mountains some nations, who never saw a Bishop in their life, and who yet may be a pattern to episcopal cities. We ought to commend and imitate (*) the zeal and conduct of the Fathers of this Council under Paul, who have decreed penalties against the prelates, to oblige them to reside; and who have began to remove those obstacles, which keep them from their churches. And instead of flattering ourselves with the vain hopes, that their residence will occasion a reformation of manners in the church, we ought rather to fear, that whereas we now labour to find out some means to oblige them to residence, the inconveniencies (51), that may attend it, will oblige our successors to provide against them by obliging the prelates to be absent from their Bishoprics." I had not much trouble to undeceive my friend: I had only to make him observe, that the Historian of the Council speaks of a Paul Jovius, who was Bishop of Nocera in the year 1562, ten years after the death of Paul Jovius, who is the subject of this article.

[L] He was blamed for giving too much credit to astrological predictions, and to other superstitions of the same kind.] Martin del Rio having related some facts, which seem to prove that future events may be foretold by the means of astrology and chiromancy, adds, Unus ista omnia narrat Jovius (), nec usquequaque indubitata fæci historicus, nec satis à superstiosis & gentilitium ne dicam opinionibus, saltem locutionibus, alienus* (54). i. e. "Jovius alone relates all this; but he is not an Historian on whom we may absolutely depend; he was a little too much addicted to superstitions, and to the expressions, not to say, the opinions of the Heathens." He had already censured him for shewing too much regard for an observation of Amniomancy. Thus they call the art of divining by observing the membrane amnios, which was the fetus in the mother's womb. Sed & Jovius, ne quid superstitionis omitteret, nimis hujusmodi vanitatibus pro Episcopo deditus, in Ferdinandi Davali natiuitate (lib. 1. Piscarii) hujusmodi pelle involutum ex utero prodisse consideravit (55). i. e. "But Jovius also, that he might not omit any superstition, and who for a Bishop

(50) Compare this with what Brantome observes in the page which I have marked [N] of the article FRANCIS I, and add to it the following words from Mezerai's Abregé Chronologique, tom. 6. pag. 434. The Parliament commanded the Bishops to go and reside in their Bishoprics to do their duty there, otherwise they should be forced to it, by the seizing of all their furniture and equipage. But considering the life most of them led, their absence gave perhaps less offence to their flocks, than their residence would have done.

(*) I suppose it should be, but not to imitate, otherwise Jovius seems to contradict himself. ADD. REM.

(51) He pretends that if it were decreed, that residence is Jure Divino, the Bishops would no longer be subject to the Popes, nor the Priests, nor the Bishops.

(52) Fra-Paolo, Hist. du Concile de Trente, liv. 6. pag. 470. under the year 1562, of Amelot's Translation. See pag. 499. of the Italian edition in 4to.

(53) It is Paulus Jovius. I have mentioned him above in the remark [I] towards the end.

(*) In Elogiis. (54) Mart. del Rio, Disquis. Magic. lib. 4. cap. 3. Quest. 5. pag. m. 278.

(55) Idem, ibid. cap. 2. Quest. 7. Sect. 1. pag. 237.

(d) Balzac, *Dif-
fertat. à Dom.
André de Saint
Denys*, at the end of his *Socrate
Chretien*, pag. m.
274.

(e) Henry Stephen. See Crenium, Animado.
Part 5. pag. 163.

(56) See Mr.
Dreincourt's Treatise, an account of which is given in the
Novvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for July
1685, Art. 11.
pag. 815.

(57) Florimond
de Remond, *Hist.
de l'Herésie*, liv.
3. chap. 4. pag.
m. 24.

(a) Taken from Valerius Andreas,
in *Topographia
Belgica*, pag. 43,
44.

Elogies of Illustrious Men are judged to be too bitter and too slanderous (d), but they are sometimes also too flattering. See the judgment which a learned Critic (e) has passed upon them in his Dialogue De bene instituendis Græcæ Linguae Studiis; i. e. "Concerning the best Method of studying the Greek Tongue." George Sabinus complains that Paul Jovius does not do justice in his Histories to the Protestants of Germany, and particularly to Sigismund II Elector of Brandenburg. Consult the Letter which George Sabinus wrote to John Sleidan September the 1st 1556 (f). It is necessary to make some additions to what I have observed concerning the first work he published [M].

(f) It is the last of them that have been printed with George Sabinus's Poems, pag. 419. & seq. edit. Lips. 1606. See also Cr. niii, Animado. Part 6. pag. 209.

"was a little too much addicted to these idle things, observed at the nativity of Ferdinand Daval, that he was born wrapt up in such a membrane." This membrane breaks generally when the child comes into the world; but sometimes it keeps whole, and in such a case it is taken for a sign of good luck; whence comes this proverb, il est né coiffé (56), properly, he is born with a coif on; that is, he is born to good fortune. Paul Jovius observed this circumstance very accurately in the nativity of the Marquis of Pescara, and you have seen just now, that he was blamed for it by Martin del Rio. Let us give here another proof of his credulity with regard to astrology. Having observed that there happened revolutions in religion over all the world in the beginning of the sixteenth century, he ascribes it to the influence of the stars. In the account of this particular I shall transcribe Florimond de Remond's words, because they acquaint us with a little artifice of a translator. "Very near the same time, says Jovius, when Ishmael became Emperor of Persia, and changed the religion of that country, mixing it with a new Mahometan superstition, there arose in Germany under Luther's direction that monstrous heresy, which was calculated to overthrow the Catholic Religion, and all that antiquity ever received, as the people had already done in Persia, being obstinate and mad with their new follies and superstitions. So that I am easily persuaded, adds he, that by a secret power from heaven, and by a malignant influence of the stars, all religions began at the same time to be altered through the whole world, since not only the Mahometans, but also the Christians, and even the Idolatrous nations the most remote from us, which worship Idols, in the East-Indies, and the countries newly discovered towards the West, have admitted new religions and opinions. This is what we meet with in Jovius's Latin words. But in the French translation of it you may observe the sincerity and honesty of the translator, who omits all that Jovius relates of these changes of religions, and of the monstrous Lutheran heresy, which sprung up in Saxony. With what impartiality and honesty do they handle the holy and sacred writings, since they are not ashamed thus to mutilate Histories which have but lately been published, in order to conceal from the reader a short passage, which relates to Luther, the father of all the heresies that have disturbed the Christian Church (57)? Florimond de Remond quotes the thirteenth book of Paul Jovius's History, where I met with the following passage, in folio 239 verso of the edition printed at Strasburg in the year 1556. Nec multo post exarsit in Germania auctore Lusbero dira hæresis, quæ populis, ut in Perside acciderat, ad insaniam versis, Christiani dogmatis placita, & veteres sacrorum ritus vehementissimè conturbavit. Ita ut facillè crediderim ab occulta cæli potestate, malignoque syderum concursu provenisse, ut religiones toto terrarum orbe enatis factionibus, uno tempore scinderentur, quando non Mahometani modo Christianique, sed & remotissima gentes idololatræ, aut sydera aut potentia pro Diis venerantes, cum in India quæ ad Orientem vergit, tum in novo orbe ad Occiduum plagam reperto, novas sacrorum opiniones induerint. I know no other French translator of Paul Jovius's General History, than Denis Sauvage. Was he a Protestant? And was he guilty of the artifice with which Florimond de Remond charges the reformed?

[M] It is necessary to make some additions to what I have observed concerning the first work he published. I have observed (58) 1. That it was the treatise De Piscibus Romanis. 2. That he dated the dedication of it, March the 26th 1524. In the 3d place, that he designed then to publish very soon the first Decad of his History. With regard to the first of these three particulars I have quoted Heroldus, who says expressly, illud (scriptum) quod omnium primum edidit de piscibus Romanis. The second particular wants no proof; every one may see it at the bottom of the dedication; and I have proved the third by a passage from Paul Jovius. I have started an objection from Alcyonius's asserting in a work printed in the year 1522, that he had seen this Historian's first Decad, and I have answered that objection as well as I could; but here follows another difficulty. Calcagnini tells us in a letter written from Rome under the Pontificate of Leo X (59) that Paul Jovius's first Decad was printed. Paulus Jovius... tam luculenter, tam doctè, tam eleganter scribit nostri temporis historiam, cujus decem libros JAM EDIDIT, ut pudeat me de homine tam disertò tam indifertè scribere (60). i. e. "Paul Jovius writes the history of our time, of which he has already published ten books, with so much clearness, learning, and eloquence, that I am ashamed to speak with so little elegance of so elegant a writer." If Calcagnini means here that this first Decad was printed, and if it be really so, Paul Jovius is guilty himself of the mistake which one would charge me with. It would be to no purpose to urge, that the date of the dedication of the treatise De Piscibus Romanis has been altered by the Printers; for it is certain, after all, that this dedication was composed under Clement VII, who was chosen Pope in the month of November 1523.

(58) See the remark [G] towards the end.

(59) He died in the year 1521.

(60) Calcagninus Epist. ad Jacobum Zieglerum, in Collectione Colomnesiana Clarorum Virorum Epistol. pag. 234.

JOURS (in English, the Day). This article, which was printed in our proposals, will be inserted at the end of this Dictionary, in the form of a Dissertation. See HIPPOMANES.

IPRES, or YPRES, an Episcopal City in the County of Flanders, borrows its name from a River which runs through it: it was at first but a Castle. The Normans having ruined it, Count Baudouin or Baldwin, the second of that name, had it repaired in the year 880; Count Arnoul added fortifications to it in the year 901; and Count Baudouin III made several additions to it some years after. New additions were made to it from time to time, so that in the year 1473 the City of Ipres contained already within its walls 1173 Verges of Land (or Perches) of fourteen geometrical feet each. It was besieged by those of Ghent and by the English in the year 1373, during nine weeks. Its stone walls were built in the year 1388 by Philip the Bold's consent (a). The woolen manufactures and the art of dying them were in a thriving condition there at the end of the twelfth Century, as it appears from William Brito's testimony (b). The French took that city in the year 1648, and lost it again the next year. They took it a second time in the year 1658, and restored it to the Spaniard by the treaty of the Pyrenees. They took it a third time in the year 1678, and it was yielded to them by the Spaniards in the

(b) Ipra colorandis gens prudentissima lanis. i. e. "The people of Ipres are very skilful in dying of wool." Wil. Brito, Pbilippid. lib. 2.

the treaty of peace, concluded at Nimeguen that same year. The Controversies about Janfenism have made the name of the City of Ipres very famous; for Janfenius is seldom mentioned, but it is observed at the same time that he was Bishop of that City. Thus the connection there is between that City and the Controversies of the Janfenists has been known to all the world; and to this is owing, undoubtedly, the jest of a pretended letter which was handed about as though it had been written by the King of France to Monsieur Arnauld [A], dated from the camp before Ipres in the year 1679. There were a great many transcripts taken from this letter, and I remember, that several persons, who were reckoned to have a very good taste, found it ingenious; it is ascribed to Monsieur Roze private Secretary to the King. I do not believe it was ever printed; which determines me to publish it here.

[A] A pretended letter . . . of the King of France to Monsieur Arnauld.] Here it follows according to the copy I took of it, when it was handed about as a piece quite new.

“ Lettre du Roi à Mr. Arnaud sur le Siege d’Ypres.

“ Monsieur Arnaud. Nous allons commencer un siege où vous pourriez nous servir beaucoup de votre credit. J’ay 5 Propositions à faire à Messieurs d’Ypre: la 1, que je suis venu en Flandre pour faire du bien à tout le monde. La 2, que le commandement que je leur fais de rendre la ville n’est pas impossible. La 3, qu’il est en leur pouvoir de meriter ou de demeriter mes bonnes graces. La 4, que j’ay des leçons avec moi plus que suffisans pour les faire obéir à mes ordres: & la 5, que quelque nécessité qu’ils soient de se rendre, ils ne le feront qu’avec une entière liberté. Il s’agit donc, Monsieur, de leur faire signer ces 5 Propositions, qui renferment tout le Traité de la Grace que j’ay à leur faire. Je ne crois pas qu’ils puissent éluder mes ordres par la distinction du Droit & du Fait; car pour le Droit, il y a si long-tems que je suis en possession de prendre des villes, que le tems seul pourroit me servir de prescription dans le Pays-Bas, quand je n’aurois pas d’aillieurs tant de droits incontestables. Ils ne peuvent donc se retrancher que sur le Fait, & c’est dequoy je les veux convaincre par une trentaine de canons auxquels de les desie de répondre efficacement, car ils percent toutes les difficultez à jour. Par là vous jugerez bien que je ne serai pas si long-tems à leur faire signer mes 5 Propositions, que vous avez été à signer celles du Rape. C’est pour-quooy je vous donne ordre de convoquer le ban & l’arriereban des Janfenistes, & de partir incessamment de Paris pour venir à leur tête chanter le Te Deum, sur le tombeau de Janfenius, pour rendre graces à Dieu de l’heureux succès de mes 5 Propositions. Vous pourrez apporter pour le feu de joye une centaine d’exemplaires du Miroir de la Piété Chrétienne, pour jeter ces bons Flamans dans un saint desespoir d’être à jamais à l’Espagne. Ensuite vous passerez en Angleterre pour y diriger la Chambre basse qui a de grandes indispositions d’esprit & de cœur à la paix. Au reste, je goûte fort votre politique & plus encore votre argent, dont vous vous servez si avantageusement pour persuader aux gens tout ce que vous voulez. Avec cela je suis seur que nous aurons la paix avec l’Angleterre & l’Espagne, avant que vous l’ayez avec les Peres Jesuites. Au Camp devant Ypre le 17 Mars 1678.”

The King of France’s Letter to Monsieur Arnaud upon the Siege of Ipres.

“ Monf. Arnaud. We are going to begin a siege in which you can be very serviceable to us by your

(a) He is also called Wernerus, or Guarnerius.

IRNERIUS (a), a German Civilian, lived in the twelfth Century. He is reckoned to be the first that revived the study of the Roman Law, which had been interrupted since the invasion of the Barbarians. He had great credit in Italy with Princess Mathildis, and having persuaded the Emperor to order that the Code and the Digests should be read in the schools, he was the first Professor that explained them in Italy. His method was to reconcile the determinations of the Civilians, and those Laws, which seemed to be contrary to each other. He died about the year 1190 [A], and was buried

[A] He died about the year 1190.] I can hardly believe that he lived till that time; for in the first place

“ credit. I have five propositions to offer to the Gentlemen at Ipres. The first, that I came into Flanders with a design to do good to all the world. The second, that the command I give them to surrender their city to me is not impossible. The third, that it is in their power to deserve or not deserve my favour. The fourth, that I have brought such assistance with me, as is more than sufficient to make them obey my orders. The fifth, that though they be never so much necessitated to surrender, yet they will not do it but with a perfect liberty. Now, Sir, the question is, to make them subscribe to these five propositions, which contain the whole treatise of the Grace (a) which they have to expect from me. I do not think that they can evade my commands by a distinction de jure and de facto: of what is right, and of what is fact. For as to right, it is so long since I have assumed to me a power of taking cities, that time alone might be to me a title by prescription in the Low-Countries, if I had not so many indisputable claims besides. They can therefore confine themselves only to the matter of fact; but here I will convince them by about thirty Guns, to which I defy them to make an effectual answer, for they pierce all oppositions through and through. You may easily judge by this, that I shall not spend so much time to make them sign my five propositions, as you have spent, before you would sign those of the Pope. I command you therefore to summon together the Ban and Arriereban of the Janfenists, and to set out immediately from Paris, to come and sing Te Deum at their head on Janfenius’s tomb, to give thanks to God for the good success of my five propositions. You may take with you an hundred copies of the Mirror of the Christian Piety, to make a bonfire in order to strike these honest Flemings with a sacred despair ever to be again under the government of the Spaniards. Hence you may go into England to direct the Members of the House of Commons, who both in their minds and in their hearts are very ill-disposed towards a peace. To conclude, I must tell you that I like your policy very well, and more still your money, of which you know so well how to make a good use, to persuade people whatever you please. By this means I am certain that we shall have peace with England and Spain, before you have it with the Jesuits. From our camp before Ypres, March the 17th, 1678.”

§ (a) The whole Treatise of the Grace.] The French words are Tout le Traité de la Grace, in which words there is a double allusion, which it is impossible to preserve in the translation; it is grounded on the double sense of the word Traité, which signifies both a Treatise and a Treaty; and of the word Grace, which signifies both the Grace of God, which assists us in the work of our salvation, and Favour or Mercy. ADD. REM.]

Lotharius II lived at most only till the year 1138; which is an evident proof that Forsterus was not very accurate;

(b) Ex Forstero, at Bologna, where he had been Professor (b). Some authors go farther still; for they say, that Lotharius, repealing all other Laws, ordered that the Laws of Justinian should have again their ancient authority at the bar [B]. The famous Calixtus, Divinity Professor at Helmstad, has maintained (c) that this is false, and has been followed herein by the learned Conringius, his colleague (d). But Bertold Nihufius wrote in favour of the contrary opinion (e), and silenced Doctor Calixtus. It is certain that tradition is not for the latter, and that it gives Irnerius the title of first restorer of the Roman Law [C]. It is he also, say they, who persuaded the Emperor Lotharius, whose Chancellor he was, to bring into the University the custom of making Doctors, and who drew up the form of it; whence it came that even at that time Bulgarus, Hugolinus, Martinus, Pileus, and some others, who began to explain the Roman Laws, were promoted to the Doctor's degree in a solemn manner. These noble ceremonies had their first beginning at Bologna; whence they spread into the other Universities, and passed from the Faculty of the Law to that of Divinity. It is pretended that the University of Paris having admitted these ceremonies, used them for the first time with regard to Peter Lombard, whom that University promoted to the degree of Doctor of Divinity (f).

(1) Incidit hoc revocatio & restitutio Juris Civilis in annum Christi 1150. Forsterus, Hist. Juris Civil. lib. 3. cap. 6.

(2) See the following remark.

(3) Mathias, Theatr. Hist. pag. m. 902.

(e) See the work which he intitled Irnerius, and published in the year 1642.

(f) Mathias, Theatr. Hist. in Vita Lotbarii II.

accurate; for he has asserted that this restoration of the Roman laws happened about the year 1150 (1). Why should we think that he was more accurate in his calculation with regard to the death of Irnerius? Secondly, these transactions are placed under the year 1133 (2). Now who could believe that an affair so important as that was, had been resolved upon, and put in execution by the advice of a young man. It is an hundred times more probable, that Irnerius's advice was followed, only because he had already gained great credit by his learning and prudence; so that we cannot suppose him much less than forty years old at least. If then he had lived till the year 1190, he would have been near an hundred years old, in which case Forsterus had been inexcusable for taking no notice of such an unusual old age. Add to this that generally speaking a Chancellor to an Emperor must be pretty old. But we should make an unanswerable objection against Forsterus, if we should assert that the Princess Mathildis, with whom he supposes that Irnerius had so great credit, was that Countess, who was so liberal towards the Popes, and who died in the year 1115, or that Queen of Italy, who died in the year 1101 (3) and who was married with Conrad, the son of the Emperor Henry IV. She was Roger King of Sicily's daughter.

During the controversy, which arose between Doctor Calixtus, and Bertoldus Nihufius, upon this question, whether our Irnerius revived the study of the Law by the Countess Mathildis's authority, or by that of the Emperor Lotharius II, the University of Bologna being consulted, made such an answer as agreed with Nihufius's assertion. We find in that answer, that it is a constant tradition that Irnerius began to teach the Law at Bologna in the year 1128. This tradition is supported by an inscription on Irnerius's picture, which is to be seen amongst several others in the college of Bologna. Irnerius omnium primus leges commentatus est MCXXVIII. i. e. "Irnerius is the first that began to explain the Law in the year 1128." Such is the inscription. Nicholas Alidofio, in the preface to his book intitled Li Dottori Bolognesi di legge Canonica e Civile, i. e. "The Doctors of the Civil and Canon Law at Bologna," asserts, that whilst this Doctor was teaching Philosophy at Bologna, the Emperor Lotharius commanded him to teach the Law, and that he began to read lectures upon it about the year 1128. However there are reasons to think that he did it of his own accord for some years, and that he was not impowered to it by the Emperor's command till the year 1137 (4). It is certain that he died before the year 1150, and not in the year 1190: for it is well known (5) that James de Porta Ravegnana was Irnerius's successor in the chair of Professor of Law, and that he taught the Law publicly at Bologna as soon as the year 1150. See the author I quote (6).

[B] It is said that Lotharius... ordered that the laws of Justinian should have again their ancient authority at the bar. Here follows what Monsieur Heifs observes in his History of the Empire, under the year 1133. This solemnity being ended the Emperor returned into Germany, where by the advice of a certain man named Werner Ursperg, otherwise Irnerius (7), who was very learned in the ancient laws of Justinian, he ordered that justice should be administered for the future in the empire according to the Digests and the Code, which had been five or six years out of use. So that these laws were introduced into Italy, and Germany, and afterwards into France and Spain, which nations were governed before by such laws as were peculiar to them, and by their own particular custom. Antea homines Jure incerto utebantur, Jure nempe Romanorum corrupto, Jure item Longobardico & Lege Salica (8). i. e. "Men had but uncertain laws before, namely those of the Romans, but corrupted those of the Lombards, and the Salic Law." Calvisius, without mentioning our Werner, observes under the year 1137, that Lotharius found the Roman Laws in Apulia, that he gave them to the people of Pisa, and ordered that they should be explained; and that all the Courts of Judicature in the empire should judge according to those laws. He adds that this book was afterwards lodged in the library of Florence. Another Historian (9) applies this to the time when that Emperor marched against Roger King of Sicily, about the year 1135, and observes that the manuscript of the Roman laws wanting an interpreter, Irnerius was ordered to explain them.

[C] Tradition... gives Irnerius the title of the First Restorer of the Roman Law. An author whom I have already quoted, speaks thus (10). Irnerius primus legibus glossas apposuit; & suo exemplo ceteris illuminandi juris exemplum dedit; unde LUCERNA JURIS dictus fuit: & instaurator legum Romanorum cognominatus. i. e. "Irnerius is the first that wrote explanatory notes on the Laws, and by his example encouraged others to clear up the Laws; whence he was called, the LIGHT OF THE LAW, and surnamed the Restorer of the Roman Laws." An infinite number of writers make the same observation.

(4) See Nihufius, in Irnerio, pag. 13.

(5) Otto Murena in Chronologia Laudensi, apud Baronium, ad ann. 1158.

(6) Nihufius in Irnerio, where he has inserted the whole answer of the University of Bologna.

(7) In the edition printed in Holland they have put Irnerius.

(8) Christ. Mathias, Theatr. Hist. pag. 921.

(9) Christ. Mathias, ibid. pag. 920. He quotes Chytræus in Chronol. pag. 309.

(10) Mathias, in Theatr. Hist. pag. 920.

ISAACITES (a). Rabbi Solomon Jarchi is mentioned under that name in Bartolucci's Rabbinical Library. I may therefore place under this name what is wanting in the article JARCHI. Let us then observe here, that the surname of Raschi, which was given to this Rabbi is composed of the initial letters of his names (b). Father Bartolucci acquaints me with this (c). He adds that this Rabbi was born at Lunir, a City in the province of Aquitain [A], but that some persons make him a native of Troies in France, and

(a) Constantin. L'Empereur, Not. in Itinerar. Beniam. Tatal. pag. 149. says, that Solomon Jarchi was called Isacides, because he was the son of Rabbi Isaac.

(b) R. Salomon Isaacites.

(c) Bartol. Biblioth. Rabbinica, Part 4. pag. 378.

(1) Bartol. Biblioth. Rabbin. Part 4. pag. 378.

[A] Bartolucci says that he was born at Lunir, a city in the province of Aquitain. Bartolucci adds that it is a city where several Jews lived, as St. Gregory witnesses it in the twenty first Letter of the third book (1).

All this abounds with errors: for in the 1st place, he should have said Lunel, and not Lunir. 2. Lunel is not situated in the province of Aquitain. 3. Pope Gregory speaks neither of Lunel nor of Lunir, but and place his birth under the year 1105. Isaacites began to travel when he was thirty years of age. He visited Italy, and afterwards Greece, Jerusalem, and all Palestine; he went afterwards into Egypt where he saw Rabbi Maimonides. He travelled into Persia, Tartary, Muscovy, and into other northern countries, and afterwards into Germany, whence he returned into his own country. He took a wife and had three daughters by her, who were married to very learned Rabbies, authors of a great many books. Some of his Commentaries on the holy Scriptures have been translated into Latin, by Christians [B]. It is said that he understood Physic, Astrology, and several other Languages very well, and that he died at Troies at the age of threescore and fifteen years. His corps were carried into Bohemia, and buried at Prague in the year 1180 (d).

(d) Taken from Bartolucci, Biblioth. Rabbin. Part 4. pag. 378, & seq.

(2) In the remark [A] of the article JARCHI.

(3) Bartolucci, Biblioth. Rabbin. Part 4. pag. 378.

(4) See above, quotation (1) of the article JARCHI.

(5) Benjamin. Tutel. Itiner. pag. m. 6.

(6) Const. L'Empereur, Notis in Itinerar. Benjam. Tutel. pag. 149.

of Luna, an episcopal city in Italy: see a blunder of Hornbeek criticized upon above (2). Here follows another mistake. Ibidem (that is to say in the Catena Cabala) Rabbi Joseph Jachija Autor dicit quod natus fit anno ab Orbe condito . . . 4865. Cbr. 1105. in Urbe Trevis, seu Trevis (2) in Gallia in provincia Narbonensi, vel in Linguadoca (3). i. e. "Rabbi Jachija asserts, that he (Isaacites) was born A. M. 4865, and 1105 of Christ, in the city of Trevis, or Trevis (Troies) in France, in the province called Narbonensis (an- tiently) otherwise Languedoc." This is pretending that Troies is in Languedoc, than which nothing is more ridiculous. Observe that according to some Rabbies the death of our Isaacites happened in the year 1105 (4); but we have seen just now, that according to other authors this was the year of his birth. The Jewish writers never distinguished themselves by any accuracy in Chronology; and it is a strange thing that they should have been so careless in observing the time when their most famous Doctors lived. Benjamin of Tudelle (5), who died in the year 1173, commends very much the Jews of Lunel, and names some of their learned men, and amongst others Rabbi Solomon. Some persons pretend (6) that he means our Solomon Jarchi. And if you object to them, that this Solomon died in the year 1105, they answer, that Benjamin of Tudelle does not assert, that all the Doctors he mentions in the account he gives us of what he did at Lunel, were living then. I do not like this answer. It seems to me, that Benjamin of Tudelle speaks of a Solomon, who was still living: it must therefore be supposed, either that we are mistaken, when we place Solomon Jarchi's death under the year 1105, or that the Solomon mentioned by Benjamin of Tudelle is not our Isaacites. I am apt to believe, that Constant L'Empereur was in the wrong to imagine, that this Benjamin mentioned Solomon Jarchi. If he had mentioned so famous a Doctor as this was, he would have commended him very much, whereas he does not at all commend the Solomon he speaks of. If you have a mind to see an instance of the bad Chronology of the Jewish writers, do but consider, that in the same book (7), in which it is asserted that Rabbi Solomon Isaacites was born in the year 1105, it is also asserted, that Maimonides was born in Spain in the year 1135, and that these two Rabbies met in Egypt, whither Solomon went when he was about thirty two years old (8). Observe that some persons (9) maintain that Rabbi Solomon Isaacites is not surnamed Jarchi in the books of the Jews, and that it would be a difficult matter to find out the time when this false name was given him, for what reason, and on what occasion, and that the Jews ridicule the Christian authors, who call him by that name.

§ (2) Treca, in Bartolucci's Latin words, do not signify Troies in Champagne, but Treys in Provence (2). It is true that the former is named Treca in Gregorius Turonensis; but Thuanus, who calls the latter Treca, always calls the inhabitants of Troies in Champagne Tricoffes. REM. CRIT.]

§ (3) But this would still be a mistake, since Isaacites was born at Troies in Champagne, and not at Treis in Provence. However I am apt to think, that Bartolucci imagined Troies was in Languedoc: he does not mention Provence; for the general expression of Provincia Narbonense, which contained Dauphiné, Provence and Languedoc, is by him explained of Languedoc only. ADD. REM.]

[B] Some of his Commentaries have been translated into Latin by Christians.] His Commentaries on Joel, and Solomon's Song, have been translated into Latin by Genebrard. He published his translation of the Commentary on Joel at Paris in the year 1563, and that of the Commentary on Solomon's Song in the year 1570. Arnaud de Pontac has translated the Commentaries on Obediah, Jonah and Zephaniah into Latin (10). Henry Aquinus published the Commentary on Esther with Notes at Paris in the year 1522 (11).

(7) Catena Cabala. See Bartolucci, Biblioth. Rabbin. Part 4. pag. 378.

(8) See Bartolucci, ibid.

(9) Andreas Acoluthus, in Tractatu de Aquis amarum maledictionem inferentibus, pag. 3.

(10) Printed at Paris in the year 1566, in 4to.

(11) Taken from Bartolucci, Biblioth. Rabbin. Part 4. pag. 380, 381.

ISLEBIANS. This is the name that is given to those who followed the opinions of a Saxon Divine named John Agricola, a native of Islebe, and a disciple and countryman of Martin Luther. I have given a large account of this JOHN AGRICOLA (a). He taught for some time a very false doctrine concerning the use of the ancient Law. He had misunderstood St. Paul's controversies with the Jews, and the opposition which this great Apostle and Preacher of Grace makes so often between the Law of Works, and the Law of Faith. Luther opposed Agricola's errors so vigorously, that he obliged him to retract them. It is an easy matter to understand why this man's followers were called Antinomians. Their opinions have not been fairly represented by their adversaries, nor ought we to question but there are a great many exaggerations in what Prateolus has said of them [A]. But that is nothing if compared with Father Garasse's silly

(a) See his article under the letter A.

[A] There are a great many exaggerations in what Prateolus has said of them.] He has not consulted the original, he has only transcribed Staphylus, Hofius, and Lindanus. Here follows the substance of what he borrowed from Staphylus (1): according to John Agricola the law of God is absolutely useless, it is not necessary neither before nor after our justification; under the gospel men are not obliged to do good works. What he took from Lindanus is much more harsh still; namely, that according to Agricola men may be righteous even against their own conscience; that an adulterer, a usurer, a fornicator, or any other great sinner shall be saved, if he does but believe. Antinomi à Joanne Islebio Lutheri civis ac discipuli exorti. Hi dogma sequuntur legibus divinis contrarium, (ait Querela Lutheri) legem operum rejicientes, finguntque homines, contra conscientiam justos esse. Ajunt enim, teste Lutero lib. de Conciliis; Si es adulter, scortator, usurarius, avarus, aut aliis pollutus peccatis, si tantum credis, salvus es. Haec tenet Lindanus (2). i. e. "The Antinomians sprung up from Islebius, a fellow-citizen and disciple of Luther. They maintain a doctrine contrary to the laws of God (says Luther in his complaint) for they reject the law of works, and imagine that men may be righteous against their own conscience: for they say, according to Luther in his book about Councils, be you an adulterer, a fornicator, an usurer, a covetous man, or given to any other wicked habit, if you have but faith, you are safe." I cannot imagine that this is giving a faithful account of Agricola's opinions.

(2) Prateolus, ibid.

(1) Prateolus, in Elenco Hereticorum, under the word Antinomi, pag. m. 41. He observes that Staphylus extracts this from Agricola's Notes on St. John's Gospel, and from Luther's Antinomian Disputations.

filly jests in his account of the pretended heresies of the Isebians [B].

[B] Father Garaffe's filly jests in his account of the pretended Heresies of the Isebians. It is an advantage for the readers that we should lay before them notorious instances of the impudence with which some persons dare to asperse their neighbours; and therefore the length of the following passage will not prevent me from transcribing it at large. "The Isebians or Antimonians, who are otherwise called Nomomachi, because they oppose the law of Moses, saying in their articles of belief, that it is a constraint upon our souls, are the followers of a certain ploughman, named John Isebius, who coming from behind his plough, Triduo se Theologum professus est, set up for a Divine in three days time, as Melancthon speaks, writing against him. The chief fancies of these upstarts are accurately set down in the book intitled De Libertate Christiana, (Of Christian Liberty) written by Dr. Paul Crellius, one of the most considerable assertors of that cursed sect. I shall mention but three of their tenets, but these the most notorious, which I shall transcribe word for word from their articles of belief. The first is, that the whole Gospel, and all the Old Testament, if they be not preached by word of mouth, sunt veteres calcei in angulo derelicti, are like an old pair of shoes, which are left in a corner, when they are worn out: but when the Gospel is preached, then there is, as it were, a new pair of shoes made, of which it is said in Solomon's Song; Quam pulchri sunt gressus tui in calceamentis tuis, filia principis. i. e. "How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O Princes daughter (*)!" and in the CVIth (+) Psalm, In Idumeam extendam calceamentum meum: that is to say, according to Beza's translation:

"*Contre Edom peuple glorieux
Je jetteray mes souliers vieux,*

i. e. [according to Sternhold's translation,]

"My shoe on Edom will I throw.

"So that according to their saying, the Preachers are Coblers, the Holy Scriptures are old Shoes, the Pulpit is a Cobler's Stall, the time of Lent and Advent is the fair for old Shoes. "The second proposition of the Antimonians is more horrid still, and I am very sorry that I cannot find words proper to express the whole indignation of my heart. That proposition is thus laid down by Dr.

Crellius. Qui querit salutem in veteri lege, querit PEDICULUM IN SCABIE, whoever looks for salvation in the law of Moses, looks for a LOUSE in a scab. That is to say, that the salvation of our souls is like lice, and that God is like a scab. "There are no words that can express my astonishment . . . (3). "The third maxim of the Nomomachi (or fighters against the law) is quoted by Dr. Crellius in these words. Moses ad corvos abeat cum lege sua, nam si non respicit, est damnatus ad omnes Diabolos. i. e. Let Moses go to the gallows with his Law, for if he did not repent, he is damned with all the Devils in hell. For my part I lodge an appeal against this sentence of the Antinomians, as having Moses's Letter of Attorney for it; and I find that the blindness of these Nomomachi is much greater than that of the Manichees was: for when they sent Moses a packing, they pretended to have some honourable reasons for it, as St. Augustin tells us in his XVth book against Faustus: and being asked, why they rejected the Old Testament, and the whole Law of Moses, they answered in plausible words, and in an elaborate stile, that for their part, they obeyed Jesus Christ's command, who forbade his Apostles to put new wine into old casks, and that their church was like a young Lady, who would not receive any love-letters from her old lovers, who endeavoured to debauch her by fair promises: that is to say, that their church does not receive nor acknowledge the Old Testament, which is an old wine that is turned, an old piece of parchment all torn and useles; an old discarded lover; and then they add, boasting and insulting our church, Vos quidem pergitte agere ut carpsistis, rudem pannum veteri vestimento committite, novum vinum veteribus utribus creditis, duobus maritis nulli placituri servite, Christianam fidem Hippocentaurum facite, nec equum perfectum nec hominem: nobis soli Christo servire permittite. i. e. As for you, go on as you have begun; put a piece of new cloth to an old garment, put new wine into old casks, serve two husbands to please neither; make a centaur of the Christian religion, neither a perfect horse nor a perfect man; but suffer us to obey Christ alone. Would not such a cunning boldness, such enchanting words make us believe, that these people are perfect saints? But after all it appears that the Manichees are but poor beggars; but how ragged soever they may have been, they had not so many lice as the Antinomians (4)."

(3) Garaffe, Doctrina Curieuse, lib. 5. Sect. 16. pag. 557.

(4) Ibid. pag. 559.

(*) Solomon's Song, chap. vii. ver. 1.

(+) Or 108 according to the Hebrew.

ITALICA, a city of Spain, was thus called after Scipio Africanus had given it the form of a City (a). It became very considerable; Trajan and Hadrian were born there (b). It continued a pretty while (c) in the condition of those cities, which were called Municipia; the inhabitants desired afterwards to pass to the condition of those cities that were stiled Colonies. Hadrian wondered that they should desire such an alteration (d); for in his opinion the privileges of a municipium were more valuable than those of a Colony. There is nothing to be seen at present of Italica but its ruins (e). Some authors pretend that it was situated near Seville, in a place which is now called Sevilla la Veja (f). I have observed above (g), that I do not think it possible to prove, that there ever was in Italy a city called Italica; I have not altered my opinion, though I know one may make a plausible objection against it [A].

JUBA.

[A] I know one may make a plausible objection against my opinion. It is grounded on a passage in Strabo, who tells us, that certain nations in Italy having revolted against the Romans and entered into a conspiracy against them, chose Corfinium to assemble their army there, and called it Italica. Μετ' ὀνομασθησάν Ἰταλικήν, Italicae nomen indiderunt (1). Observe that Corfinium was the capital city of the Peligni, and that the war we mention was called Sociale, or Marsicum, or Italicum, and began in the year 662 since the building of Rome (2). It is very probable that in the following words of Diodorus Siculus, τῆν κοινὴν πόλιν Ἰταλίας ὀνομάσαντες; i. e. "They called their common city Italica (3)," we must read Ἰταλικήν (Italica) (4) instead of Ἰταλίαν; so that we have here two authors, who assert that the city of Corfinium was called Italica, when those nations confederated against the Romans. Velleius Paterculus may be considered as a third witness, caput imperii sui Corfinium legerant, says he (5), "They chose Corfinium for the capital city of their Empire which they called Italica." Some Critics (6) correct the words thus, quod appellarunt Italicam, which they called Italica. Others (7) keep the word Italicum. It signifies very little to me, the answer I have to make does not require that I should choose the reading, which is the most favourable to my opinion; for here follows what I have to offer. The name of Italica, which the confederated nations give the city of Corfinium, continued no longer than the war. They had given it this new name when they chose it for their common metropolis, and had established there a civil government exactly

(e) See Ludovicus Nonnius, in Hisp. panis, cap. 17. pag. m. 64.

(f) Ibid. pag. 65.

(g) See the remark [A] of the article HADRIAN (Publius Aelius).

(a) Appian, in Ibericis, pag. m. 464.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. 16. cap. 23.

(d) Ibid.

(1) Strabo, lib. 5. pag. m. 167.

(2) See Sigonius, in Faustis, ad ann. 662.

(3) In Excerptis, lib. 37. apud Photium.

(4) See Casaubon, in Strab. lib. 5. pag. m. 94.

(5) Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 16.

(6) Gerardus Vossius, Not. in Patercul. ibid.

(7) Sigonius, de Ant. Jure Italicae, lib. 3. cap. 1. folio m. 100. Boecler, in Patercul. ibid.

JUBA. Two Princes of that name are mentioned in history, one of which was the father of the other. Moreri has given an account of them, but he has committed some errors [A], which it will be proper to observe. We shall take notice of but very few blunders of other authors [B].

(8) See Sigonius, ubi supra.

exactly like that of Rome (8). They had shewed by this not only their emulation for the capital city of the Romans, but also the resolution they had taken to make themselves independent. Since therefore the new name of Italica was a consequence and a memorial of their conspiracy, we ought not to think that the Romans suffered it to remain. Corfinium took its old name again as soon as the war was finished, which was in the year 664 since the building of Rome, nor do we find that since that time it was ever called otherwise than Corfinium. Whence it appears how much they are mistaken, who pretend that the Post Silius Italicus was born at Corfinium, and was for that reason surnamed Italicus.

(1) See the proofs of all this in Father Noris, Cenotaph. Pisana, pag. 235.

(2) Lib. 53. ad ann. 729.

(3) Lib. 17. pag. 570.

(4) See Father Noris, Cenotaph. Pisana, pag. 235.

(5) Plin. lib. 25. cap. 7. pag. m. 400.

[A] Moreri . . . has committed some errors.] I. He asserts that Juba the father was King of Mauritania, which is false. In Juba's time the Mauritania Casariensis belonged to Bocchus, and the Tingritana to Bogud. Some time after, that is to say in the year of Rome 716, Bocchus made himself master of the Mauritania Tingritana. After his death his Kingdom was made a province of the Empire in the year 721, as Numidia had been under Julius Cæsar (1). II. Moreri says, that Juba the son was restored to his father's Kingdom, that is to say, to that of Numidia by Augustus. He should have said, with Dion Cassius (2), that Augustus gave him some parts of Getulia, and the two Mauritania's, and the greatest part of Numidia was left in the condition of a Roman province. Strabo indeed asserts (3), that Augustus restored Juba to his father's Kingdom, and granted him Mauritania besides. But if we consider how this Geographer places the limits of the Roman province, and of this Juba's Kingdom, we shall find that Numidia belonged to the Romans (4). III. He charges Pliny with saying, that Juba the son found a plant, which his Physician Euphorbus called Euphorbia after his own name. This is not what Pliny says. Let us transcribe his words (5). Juvenit & patrum nostrorum ætate Rex Juba, quam appellavit Euphorbiam Medici sui nomine (a). That is to say, that Juba found a plant which he called Euphorbia after his Physician's name. It would be somewhat strange that a Prince's Physician should be so bad a Courtier as to give his own name to a plant, which his master had found: and yet this is what Pliny asserted, if we believe Moreri. It would be much less strange that a King having found out a plant, should choose to give it his Physician's name rather than his own. This is what Juba did, if we must rest satisfied with Pliny's authority in the words which I have quoted. But we have reason to think that Pliny was not on this occasion so accurate as he should have been. What he observes in another place is more probable: namely that the Euphorbia was thus called from the name of the person who found it first, and who was King Juba's Physician. He adds a particular, which was well worthy to be transcribed by Moreri; namely, that Juba wrote a particular treatise on this plant, in which he commended very much the remarkable qualities with which it is endowed. Juba Ptolemæi pater, qui prius utrique Mauritanie imperavit, studiorum claritate memorabilior etiam, quam regno, similia prodidit de Atlante:

præterque gigni ibi herbam Euphorbiam nomine ab inventore medico suo appellatam. Cujus laetum succum miris laudibus celebrat in claritate visus, contraque serpentes, & venena omnia, privatim dicato volumine (6). i. e. "Juba, Ptolemy's father, who reigned over both the "Mauritania's, a Prince more eminent still for his "learning than by his Kingdom, wrote something "like it of mount Atlas; and adds that the plant Euphorbia grows there, which was so called from the "name of Euphorbus the King's Physician, who "found it. Juba composed a particular treatise on "this plant, which he greatly extols on account of "its milky juice, which is good for the eyes, and "against serpents, and all sorts of poisons." IV. I might place amongst Moreri's blunders his wrong way of quoting (7).

§ (a) Rabelais, l. iii. ch. 48, admits this last opinion of Pliny. CRIT. REM.]

[B] We shall take notice of but very few blunders of other authors.] Josephus seems to have asserted, that Juba the son married Glaphyra, the widow of one of Herod's sons. See the article of that woman (8), in which I refute that assertion. Father Sallian imagined that Juba died in the year 759 since the building of Rome. Father Noris (9) has refuted this unanswerably by the following observation. Strabo wrote his fourteenth book soon after the year 771; now in his seventeenth book he mentions Juba as a Prince who was but lately dead. Whence it follows that Juba did not die before the year 772 or thereabout. The same Strabo observes in another place (10) that Juba lived under the Emperor Tiberius; now Tiberius did not begin his reign before the year 767. It seems one might infer from a passage in Tacitus that Juba was still living in the year 776 (11). Noldius is mistaken, who supposes that Dion Cassius asserts, that Augustus gave Egypt to Juba besides his father's Kingdom (12). There is nothing in Dion's words, that obliges us to refer τῶν τῶν to Egypt, and it is certain that it must be referred to Cleopatra. The translator has blundered here wretchedly. Ἡ τῆ ΚΑΙΣΟ-ΚΑΙΣΑΡΟΣ Ἰουβᾶ τῆ τῆ Ἰουβᾶ πατρὸς συνώκιστος τῆ τῆ γυναικὸς οὐκ ἔστιν Ἰουβᾶ τῆ τῆ Ἰουβᾶ, ἀλλ' ἐστὶν Ἰουβᾶ τῆ τῆ Ἰουβᾶ, ἡ συνωκιστικὴ οὐκ ἔστιν Ἰουβᾶ τῆ τῆ Ἰουβᾶ, ἀλλ' ἐστὶν Ἰουβᾶ τῆ τῆ Ἰουβᾶ. Cleopatra autem Juba, Juba filio, in matrimonium tradita est. (12) Noldius, de Hunc Jubam Casar in Italia educatum, ac suam militiam secutum, hoc regno (read ea, Cleopatra scilicet) & Herodum, pag. 176. i. e. "Cleopatra was married to Juba, Juba's son. The Emperor, who had him educated in Italy, and had taken him with him in the armies, gave him that Princess, and his father's Kingdom." Noldius having quoted the passage in which Dion Cassius asserts (14) that Juba, instead of his father's Kingdom, received from Augustus some parts of Getulia, and the dominions of Bocchus, with those of Bogud, observes that Pliny is in the right to mention the two Mauritania's instead of those dominions. Pro quibus videt Plinius, hist. nat. V. c. I. utramque Mauritaniam substituit, hoc est Casariensem & Tingitanam. This is plainly insinuating this falsity, namely that the two Mauritania's and the dominions mentioned by Dion Cassius were not the same thing.

(6) Plin. lib. 5. cap. 1. sub fin. pag. m. 527.

(7) He quotes Dion lib. 41, & seq. he should have quoted particularly lib. 43. He quotes Plin. cap. 1. lib. 25. must be cap. 7. He quotes the 8th book of Athenæus, where there is only a Greek Epigram of Juba mentioned. He should have quoted lib. 3 and 4. He should also have quoted Strabo, lib. 17. and Vossius, lib. 2.

(8) In the remark [B].

(9) Noris, Cenotaph. Pisana, pag. 238.

(10) Lib. 6. circa finem.

(11) See the article GLAPHYRA, grand-daughter, &c.

(12) Noldius, de Vita & Gestis Herodum, pag. 176.

(13) Dion, lib. 51, pag. 520. Leucoclavius has taken notice of this blunder of Xylander, in his edition of Dion.

(14) Idem, lib. 54. pag. 589, ad annum 729.

JUDEX (MATTHEW) one of the chief authors of the Centuries of Magdeburg,

(a) That place is two German leagues distant from Dresden.

was born at Tippolswald (a) in Misnia September the 22d (b) 1528. He shewed great inclination for Literature, wherefore his father gave him leave to go and study at Dresden. He did not continue long there, choosing rather to study in the College of Wittenberg, and afterwards in that of Magdeburg. He was in a sad condition when he arrived in this last city, being all over covered with scabs, and having no money in his pocket. The method he took to get some, was by begging and singing from door to door. But at last it being found that he was a hopeful youth, they procured him a tutor's place at a Lawyer's, who sent him with his son to Wittenberg in the year 1546. He took his degree of Master of Arts there in October 1548. After which he returned to Magdeburg, and taught the second form there for some years, and was afterwards chosen Minister of St. Ulric's Church there, in which post he continued till the year 1559. He left it only to be Divinity Professor in the University of Jena; but he did not perform the functions of it above eighteen months, for he was deprived by the orders of John Frederick

(b) Andrew Schoppius below, quotation (c) observes, that it was St. Matthew's day; he should then have said the 21st, and not the 22d.

deric Duke of Saxony, in the beginning of October 1561. He continued six months longer at Jena, and having staid about as long at Magdeburg he retired to Wismar. He died May the 15th 1564 [A] at Rostock, whither he had been a few days before, to be present at the promotion of the scholars. He was a man of good morals, laborious, zealous, learned, and wrote a great many books [B]. He had suffered many persecutions

[A] He died May the 15th, 1564.] I would not make any remark upon this, if I had not to observe, that most authors are but too apt to be inaccurate with regard to the dates of men's death, and in their calculations. I find in Paul Freher's Theater (1) that our Judex died June the 11th, 1564. This date is put down on the credit of the Nomenclator Professorum Jenensium, i. e. "A List of the Names of the Professors of Jena," written by Hadrian Beyer. Sagittarius (2), quoting the same Nomenclator, places Judex's death on the same day as Paul Freherus does: but I find that in Micraelius (3), this death is placed under the year 1587, which was the seventy ninth of the deceased's life. There is this reference in the margin, Freher. p. 202. It is a difficult thing to guess, how so false a quotation could creep into that place: and observe, that Judex would not have lived seventy nine years, though he had lived till the year 1587; for he was born in 1528. It is asserted in his life (4), that his death was so much the more lamented, that he was not yet past his thirty seventh year. This account is not exact; for since his birth was fixed on the 22d of Sept. 1528, and his death on March 15, 1564, it should have been said, that he was not yet thirty six years old.

[B] He was a man of good morals... and wrote a great many books.] He was so sober, that he did not eat so much in a whole week, as other people, who have but a moderate stomach, eat in two days, and his best friends could never prevail upon him to be so complaisant as to drink more than to satisfy his thirst (5). He abhorred all pomp and luxury so much, that even on his wedding-day he would not suffer his bride to dress fine, and obliged her to be satisfied with a very indifferent gown (6). His chastity was so great, that before he was married, some persons imagined, that there was a kind of frigidity or insensibility in the constitution of his body; and he confessed as a secret to his intimate friends, that he imagined, his staying too long to take a wife was the cause of the ill state of his health, or had at least greatly added to his infirmities. Ante legitimum conjugium adeo pudice vixit, ut à nonnullis frigidus sit judicatus, ac ipse intimis sit confessus, se judicare originem aut certe non leve suae adversae valetudinis incrementum inde existere, quod non prius duxisset uxorem (7). And yet he married at the age of twenty six (8), when he was chosen Minister of St. Ulric's Church at Magdeburg. He married a maiden of fifteen or sixteen, who had no fortune. Some of his friends were sorry, that he should take a wife, who was neither old enough nor rich enough: but he answered them, that he had always prayed to God, to give him a wife unacquainted with wickedness, who was good-natured, and had no pride, &c. Agrius tulere amicorum quidam, quod juvenulam & minus dotatam sibi jungeret virginem, sed iis respondit, se ab adolescentia assidue petiisse à Deo, ut puellam bonis prognatam, honestè educatam, virtutibus & pietate ornatam, malarum rerum etate adhuc imperitam, & morigeram potius, quam natalibus elatam, delicatâ & blandâ educatione ac conversatione malâ depravatam, ac dotibus & ornamentis fortunæ proterviam, sibi dare dignaretur, ac se voti sui compotem factum, in Dei providentia acquiescere (9). i. e. "Some of his friends being sorry that he should take for his wife a virgin who was so young, and had no fortune; he answered them, that from his youth he had always prayed to God, to give him for his wife a young girl, of a good family, honestly educated, adorned with virtue and piety, on account of her tender age, unacquainted with wickedness, and tractable, rather than a woman proud of her family, nicely and delicately educated, and haughty on account of her fortune. And since he had his wish, he submitted and trusted to Providence." He lived a little above ten years with his wife in an agreeable and religious manner, and had six children by her (10). She married to her second husband Andrew Schoppius (11).

translated out of German into Latin Luther's book concerning the literal sense of these words, This is my Body. He dedicated this work to the senate of Ratibone, and refuted in his dedication the fifteen most considerable arguments of the Zwinglians. Here follows the title of a book which he published in the year 1559; Quod arguerit peccata, seu concionari penitentiam sit proprium Legis & non Evangelii proprie dicti, Rationes & Argumenta. i. e. "Reasons and Arguments to prove; that to reprove men for their sins, or to preach repentance belongs to the Law, and not to the Gospel properly so called." His treatise De Typographia inventione, & de praeorum legitima inspectione, i. e. "Of the invention of Printing, and of a lawful Inspection over the Press," was printed in the year 1566. His Enarrationes Epistolarum Dominicalium, i. e. "Expositions on the Epistles read every Sunday," were published in the year 1578. The public has seen six works of his in the German tongue. He and Wiganthus published jointly some works. As for instance (12) Responsio ad Confessionem Majoris de Justificatione & bonis operibus. i. e. "An Answer to Major's Confession concerning Justification, and good Works." Responsio ad scurriles & blasphemos versos Rambocchii Rythmos Wittebergæ impressos. i. e. "An Answer to the scurrilous and blasphemous Verses of the wicked Ramboch, printed at Wittenberg." De Adiaboricis corruptelis in magno libro Altorum Interimisticorum, sub conficta titulo Professorum Wittebergensium edito, repertis, Admonitiones. i. e. "Admonitions concerning the indifferent falsifications observed in that great Book of the Acts of the Interimists, published under the false name of the Professors of Wittenberg." Corpus Doctrinae ex Novo Testamento. i. e. "A Body of Divinity extracted from the New Testament." De Victorini Strigelii declaratione seu patiens occultatione. i. e. "Of Victorinus Strigelius's declaration or rather concealment." Andrew Schoppius adds this. Item cum Illyrico, Musæo, & Wigando misit Epistolam ad quosdam pios fratres de causa Victorini. i. e. "He together with Illyricus, Musæus, and Wiganthus wrote a Letter to some of the pious brethren, concerning the affair of Victorinus." Et cum iisdem se purgavit de factis rationibus demissionis Jenensis, quas echarta iniquè reserebat (13). i. e. "And with the same persons he cleared himself of the false reasons, for which it was asserted in an anonymous piece that he had been deprived at Jena." He gives us afterwards the title of some German books, and those of some Latin pieces which have not been printed. He observes (14) that Judex understood Music very well, and had some knowledge of Mathematics. He was not unacquainted with Astrology, and even drew up some Horoscopes. Judicia nativitatium sibi, liberis suis & Embdenis (15) nonnullis composuit, atque figuras casti, quas vocant, aliis rebus accommodatas erexit. i. e. "He cast up Horoscopes for himself, for his children, and for some of Embdenus's: and made astrological schemes, as they call them, adapted to some other things." He had studied the Law for some time; at Wittenberg; he could write verses, both in Latin and in Greek; and he designed to write an Ecclesiastical History of his own time (16). All the world knows what share he had in the two first centuries (17) of Magdeburg; and that it was a very heavy task: since therefore it is known that Judex died very young, and that he was for fifteen years in a very ill state of health (18), it cannot be questioned but that he was a very studious and laborious man.

Let us take this opportunity to relate a particular, which will serve as a supplement to what we have observed above (19) concerning the centuries of Magdeburg. The three last have never been published, though the centuriators had forwarded them very much, and the Marquis of Brandenburg Duke of Prussia had commanded Andrew Stangewald to put the finishing hand to them in order to their being published. Andreas Stangewaldus... sibi ab inclito Marchione Brandenburgensi,

(1) In page 202.

(2) Sagittar. In-troduct. in Hist. Ec-clesi. pag. 247.

(3) Micraelius,
Hist. Ecclesi. pag.
770. edit. 1699.

(4) Andr. Schop-
pius, Orat. de Vita Matth. Jenensis, apud Cre-nium, Anim.
Phil. & Hist.
Part 4. pag. 71.

(5) Schopp. Ibid.
pag. 58.

(6) Ibid. pag. 58,
59.

(7) Ibid. pag. 57,
58.

(8) Ibid. pag. 58.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Ibid. pag.
50.

(12) In the year
1558.

(13) Taken from Andrew Schoppius, pag. 63, &c.

(14) Ibid.
pag. 56.

(15) He was tutor to Levin
Embdenus's children, a Civilian at Magdeburg.

(16) Andr. Schop-
pius, pag. 56.

(17) Observe, that he had a share in the German translation of the three first Centuries.

(18) Annis quindecim valetudine afflictiſſima. Andr.
Schoppius, pag.
56.

(19) Remark
[H] of the article ILLYRI-CUS.

secutions and vexations during the time he was a Minister (c) [C].

(c) Taken from Andrew Schoppius, in Oratione de Vita Matthæi Judicis; it is to be found at the end of the second Part Enarrationis Epistolæ Dominicæ Matthæi Judicis, in the edition of Illele, 1578, in 8vo. Crenius has inserted this Oration in the 4th Part of his Animadversiones Philol. & Histor. pag. 49, & seq.

burgensi, Duce Borussia, tum temporis negotium datum esse confirmabat, ut reliquas tres centurias Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ Magdeburgens. ab auctoribus affectas jam penitus perfectas, perpoliret, atque ad editionem accuratè præpararet. Crenius (20) transcribes the letter from which I have extracted this passage. He met with it in a posthumous work of Conrad Schluffelburgius printed at Rostock in the year 1624. He wonders that Sagittarius omitted this particular. He acquaints us with another, which he read in a work of Francis Baudouin the Civilian (21): namely, that they printed at Geneva a French translation of the Centuries of Magdeburg, with such falsifications as had been observed in the French translation of Luther's Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (22).

(20) Crenius, Animadv. Part 4. pag. 72.

(21) His Answer to Beza, under the name of Michael Fabricius.

(22) Crenius, Animadv. Part 4. in Addendis, pag. penult.

(23) Ipsi verbera & conculcationem sedissimam minati sunt, quod eos ad Baptismum & usum Cœnæ non admiserat. Andr. Schoppius, apud Crenium, Animadv. Part 4. pag. 62.

(24) Idem, ibid. pag. 63.

(25) Idem, ibid. pag. 67.

(26) That of the Duke of Weimar.

[C] He had suffered a great many persecutions and vexations during the time he was a Minister.] He was one of those who drew up a form of discipline for the church of Magdeburg, which was printed in the year 1554. He took care to have it observed very punctually, and he refused the Sacraments to some impenitent persons. For which reason they threatened to beat him, and to tread him under foot (23). He was severely abused in the libels which were made at Wittenberg against the Centuriators. Scurriles Neministæ & Acolasti Wittebergenses in famosa illius laboris reprehensione & acerba invectiva D. Judicem vocabant Judam & pullum filium asinæ subjugalis (24). i. e. "The anonymous and incorrigible slanderers of Wittenberg, in their abusive censure of that work, and bitter invective against it, called Judex a Judas, and the son of an ass accustomed to the yoke." Whilst he was Professor of Divinity at Jena, he strongly opposed those, who maintain that man co-operates with God's grace. Their party was very numerous, and they dispersed pasquils against him in the most impudent and slanderous manner. They also made use of stones; for there was a parcel of wicked fellows, who committed great disorders about his house, during a whole night, and threw stones at his windows. He was turned out of his post, after he had performed the functions of a Professor during eighteen months amidst great disorders and confusions. The pretext that was used was the publication of a book in the German tongue de fuga Papatus, Of avoiding Popery (25): but one of the true reasons of his deprivation was his opposition to that party, which the court (26) favoured. It was the party of Professor Strigelius, one of the heads of the Synergistæ, or assertors of man's free-will. They disperfed abroad several reasons or rather pretences for Matthew Judex's deprivation, which were all refuted. He was charged amongst other things, with dispersing several copies of Balthazar Winter's Life; and it was demanded of him to name the author of that satire, and to call in all the copies of it, and to deliver them up to the court. He answered, that this work was no libel, that it was only a true account of the life and death of a faithful servant of God, that it had been necessary to publish it in order to refute the calumnies which the enemies of that pious man had spread abroad, and to communicate it to his widow and some other persons, in order to comfort them. He did not think himself under any obligation to name the author of it: but he offered to give an account of this whole affair before impartial judges, partly laymen, and partly ecclesiastics. His adversaries did not care for such a tribunal (27). When he left Jena he retired to Magdeburg with his friend Wigandus, but he did not enjoy long the liberty which the Senate had granted him to continue there. Some Ministers were arrested; others were turned out of the city in the night time. Judex did not approve this conduct of the Magistrates, and exhorted those Ministers to patience. By this behaviour he exposed himself to all sorts of opprobrious language, and outrages, and there was a citizen who was forbidden to let out his house to him. His father-in-law had his share of this ill treatment, because he had given him a lodging in his house. Lastly, the Senate commanded Judex to leave the city immediately. His wife all in tears went to the first Burgo-master, and begged of him most earnestly, that she might have leave to continue at her father's, with her five children, till the sharpness of the winter should be a little abated. She represented to him, that her eldest son was but eight years old, and the youngest but three months, and very ill. All her prayers and representations proved ineffectual: they were obliged to set out, and retire to Wismar through frost and snow (28). The Roman Catholics have triumphed on account of this treatment which the Centuriators of Magdeburg have met with. I shall only quote the reflection of a Jesuit. "The four first authors of the Centuries, says he (29), met with a fate very different from that of Baronius; for soon after they had published their work they were banished by the Lutherans themselves, who could not suffer such wicked men to live amongst them."

(27) Andr. Schoppius, apud Crenium, Animadv. Part 4. pag. 68.

(28) Idem, ibid. pag. 69.

(29) Maimbourg, Hist. du Luth. tom. 2. pag. 179. of the edition printed in Holland.

JUDITH, a Jewish woman, who delivered her native place which was besieged by Holofernes. You will meet with this History in Moreri, where you will also find some observations on the perplexity into which it throws the Commentators. Of all the books which the Protestants have exploded as apocryphal, there is none that deserves this disgrace more than the book of Judith; for all that can be said of it at best is, that it is a religious romance [A]. A few years ago a learned Benedictine wrote a book to solve the objections that are made against this story [B]. If he has not removed the difficulties,

[A] It is a religious romance.] Don Bernard de Montfaucon (1) observes, that the Protestants, in order to remove all objections (against the History of Judith) have said that it is only a fiction or a parable, and that some of them have asserted that it is a Tragedy. I think that the Protestants do not much care whether these objections be removed or not: on the contrary, it is their interest that they should subsist, and be more and more multiplied in the most perplexing manner. This shews that they are in the right to explode that History, and that the church of Rome admits a book as canonical, which is not so. I imagine therefore, that when that author spoke this, he did not call to mind the system of the Protestants, and thought that it was theirs as well as the Roman Catholic's interest to vindicate the honour of the Holy Ghost with regard to that book. When it cannot be vindicated by reconciling the particulars mentioned in a book with the truth of History, men have recourse to allegories, to parables, to a mystical sense, &c. This is what the

(1) Preface de la Vérité de l'Hist. de Judith. At Paris 1690 in 12mo. The 2d edition was printed in the year 1692.

Protestants would do, if they believed that the History of Judith was inspired by God; but as they do not believe it, it does not concern them much to say, it is or it is not a parable.

[B] A learned Benedictine wrote a book to solve the objections that are made against this story.] You may see his name and the title of his work in the foregoing remark. The method he follows to assert the truth of the History of Judith, which the Roman Catholics believe to be canonical, is more instructive, and at the same time more edifying, than that of the other Roman Catholic writers on controversy. The latter do, generally speaking, but return the objections: they endeavour to shew that the difficulties of the Protestants against the Apocrypha may also be urged against the canonical books. But Don Bernard de Montfaucon only glances upon this subject, and applies himself entirely to make a direct answer. His whole recrimination is contained in these words. "Are there not several Histories in the Bible, in which we meet with these culties, he has however furnished us with several useful hints. I remember to have seen a dissertation (a), in which amongst other arguments the author urges the following one, namely, that we ought not to look upon a book as canonical, in which private murder is justified. This calls to my mind a particular concerning the assassin of William I Prince of Orange [C]. Some body has observed, that it is commending Judith in the most significant manner, to say that she has never been the object of slander [D].

JULIA,

(a) Intituled, Ficta Juditha, &c. printed at Verona in the year 1614, and written by Mirabilis de Bonacasa; it is proved there, 1. that the book of Judith is Apocryphal; 2. that Judith's action was criminal; and Rosæus, Mariana, and other opposers of Monarchy are in the wrong to make an advantage of it. The true name of this Mirabilis de Bonacasa was Eberhart de Weibe: he was Chancellor to Prince Julius Duke of Brunwick. See Placcius, De Pseudonym. pag. 166.

“ and even with greater difficulties? and did ever any person deny for that reason that they are true in the literal sense? Does not the History of Esther abound with difficulties, which it is almost impossible to solve? Could it ever be determined with certainty who the Ahasuerus is, who is mentioned in that book, and to what time that History must be referred? Is it not as difficult to determine the time of the History of Ruth, and of the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin? But would any person, for these reasons, dare to assert that these histories are only parabolical, or enigmatical (2)?” I do not know whether he had read Rainolds's objections, who has handled this controversy of the apocryphal books with more accuracy and strength of argument than any other Protestant author.

[C] This calls to my mind a particular concerning the assassin of William . . . Prince of Orange. I mean that villain, Balthazar Gerard, who killed him; for there have been other assassins, who only wounded him. “ Though a sincere Catholic, yet he personated the Protestant. He heard Sermons; he was at the Evening Prayers; he had always Marot's Psalms, or some other Huguenot Book in his hands: he used also to read du Bartas's Poetical Week; and it was observed that that part of the Book was most worn out, which contained the History of Judith cutting Holofernes's throat (3).” This woman's example is certainly very proper to persuade us that it is a very holy action for a man to introduce himself under a thousand false pretences into the Court of a Prince, who is an enemy to liberty and to religion, in order to stab him, the first opportunity that offers. In a word, this History being once looked upon as Canonical, is an encouragement for all assassins to venture any thing against the lives of those Princes, that are reckoned enemies; and affords the orators a crown of glory to put on the heads of all the Clements and the Ravalliacs. Here follows a passage from Father Maimbourg. The Leaguers “ did even publish in their writings printed at Paris and at Lyons, that an Angel had declared to James Clement, that the crown of a Martyr was ready for him, when he would have delivered France of Henry of Valois, and that Clement having acquainted a learned Monk with this vision, the latter approved his design, and told him for certain, that by that attempt he would make himself as acceptable to God, as Judith was by killing Holofernes. And as his Prior, named Father Edme Bourgoing, was of all the Preachers of the League, the most forward and zealous in commending this abominable murder, directing his discourse to him from the pulpit, styling him a blessed child of his Patriarch, and a holy Martyr of Jesus Christ, and comparing him with Judith, it was no longer doubted but he was the Monk whom that young man, who was under his direction, had asked for advice, nor was it questioned but he confirmed him afterwards in his abominable design (4).”

[D] To say that she has never been the object of slander. The reflection I hint at is to be met with in the extract from a panegyrick (5). The Abbé de la Chambre being to deliver a funeral oration on the death of the late Queen of France (6) “ took for his text these words from the book of Judith, She made her self commendable, famosissima, in every thing, because she greatly feared the Lord, and there was none that gave her an ill word. This is perhaps the greatest commendation that ever was past on a woman. For though in spite of that terrible disposition to slander, which prevails in the world after so many ages, there are some women, whom that

“ cruel and insatiable monster never touches, yet those women who have gained a great reputation, and who are, as the text expresses it, famosissima, greatly renowned, seldom meet with that happiness; so that we may boldly challenge all the Greeks and all the Romans to shew us one single passage in all their books, which in so few words gives so great a character of a person, as that which is given us in the book of Judith, in the words we have quoted. Homer's artifice, to give his readers a most exalted notion of Helena's beauty (7), comes infinitely short of the natural simplicity of the Jewish author: and what is still more beautiful in his way of commending is, that he acquaints us in his elogy with the real cause and true spring of the virtue he describes. She had, says he, a great reputation in every thing, and was secure against slander, because she feared the Lord from her heart. It is upon this happy expression of Judith's panegyrist, that Mr. de la Chambre has formed the plan of his funeral oration on the Queen.”

Ausonius mentions among the sentences of one of the seven wise men of Greece, that a chaste woman frightens calumny away.

Quæ dos matronæ pulcherrima? Vita pudica.

Quæ casta est? De qua mentiri fama veretur (8).

He supposes that Bias had two questions to answer. The first was, What is the most agreeable portion of a woman? A chaste life, answered he. The second was, What woman is chaste? She against whom even fame dares not to disperse falsities, answered he. These rules are too severe, will some say; for by them you must condemn all women that have been exposed to the strokes of calumny; and yet it is certain that there have been some very virtuous women, who could not escape them. It must be confessed, that Bias's maxim ought not to be taken for a general rule, without any exception. But yet, when a woman has the reputation of a chaste woman, without any opposition, without any report to the contrary, it is, generally speaking, an argument that she has behaved herself modestly both in her public and private conduct. Magnus est pudicitiae fructus pudicam credi; & adversus omnes illecebras atque omnia delinimenta muliebris ingenii est veluti solum ac firmamentum in nullum incidisse fabulam (9). i. e. “ One of the great advantages of chastity for a woman, is to be reputed chaste. And when she never was the talk of the town, it is a strong argument, that she was always proof against all the alluring pleasures and temptations, to which the fair sex is exposed.” This is what the orator Porcius Latro observed when he pleaded for an husband, who had brought in an action of adultery against his wife, because a rich foreign merchant had made her his heiress, giving this reason for it, that he had not been able to debauch her. The Counsel for the husband grounded one of his arguments upon that particular: he maintained that a woman was justly suspected as soon as a man undertook to debauch her; for if she were very chaste, one might read a refusal in her very face, and her countenance alone would put a lover out of all hopes, so that he would not dare to be so bold as to make a declaration. Or if he did, she would at least refuse him with so much severity, that he would never venture to ask her the question a second time. If she does not mind whether or no people think her capable to commit the fault, she will not scruple to commit it. Matrona quæ se adversus sollicitantes aviam vult, prodeas in tantum ornata, ne immunda sit: babeat comites ejus ætatis, qui impudicos, si nihil aliud, verecundia annorum remouant:

(7) See the article of HELENA, quotation (7).

(8) Auson. in Septem Sapientium Sententiis septenis versibus explicatis, pag. m. 288.

(9) Seneca, Centon. 7. lib. 2. pag. m. 187.

(2) Pag. 283.

(3) Hist. d'Alexandre Farnese Duc de Parme, liv. 3. pag. 205. printed in the year 1692.

(4) Maimbourg, Histoire de la Ligue, pag. 358.

(5) In the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for Dec. 1684, Art. 8. pag. 1041.

(6) I write this Aug. 20, 1695.

removeant: ferat jacentes in terram oculos: adversus officiosum salutatorem inhumana potius quam invero recunda sit etiam in necessariam resalutandi vicem multo rubore confusa longe ante impudicitiam neget ore, quam verbo: in hac servandæ integritatis custodia, nulla libido irrumperet. Proditis mihi fronte in omne lenocinium composita, paulo obscænius quam posita veste nudæ, exquisito in omnes faciatis sermone, tantum non ultro blandientes, ut quisquis vicerit, non metuat accedere. Deinde miramini, si cum tot argumentis pudicitiam proscripserit, cultu, incessu, facie, aliquis repertus est qui incurreret, & reti adulteræ se non subduceret. Internuntium, puto sollicitantis se, arripit, & denudari jussit, & flagella & verbera, & omne genus cruciatu poposcit in plagas deterrimi mancipii; vix imbecillitas muliebris manus continuit. Nemo sic negantem iterum rogat. . . (10). Quæ potest non timere opinionem adulteri, potest non timere adulterium (11). i. e. "A matron, who would be inaccessible to all inticing lovers, must appear in public dressed only so as not to be sluttish; let her be attended with such companions, whose age, if nothing else, might awe the lovers away; let her walk modestly, casting her eyes downwards: if a man offers officiously to salute her, let her be unpolite rather than immodest; and if she must salute him again, let the blushes in her face deny his wicked request long before she denies him by word of mouth. If she thus takes care to keep her chastity, nothing that is lascivious will ever break in upon her. But if a woman has a wanton and enticing air, if she be dressed so as to appear a little more immodest than if she were quite naked, if she be gay and free in all her discourses, and almost courting the lovers herself, so that the first that sees her makes his addresses to her, it is no wonder that being so many ways lost to all sense of modesty, by her dress, her countenance, and by her looks she should meet with some man who would be sure to make an advantage of it, and not avoid the snares of adultery, that are thus laid before him. . . She ordered the messenger (sent, I suppose, by the man who would debauch her) to be taken, stript and severely whipt, and would have him afterwards tortured most cruelly; and though weak as a woman, she could hardly forbear striking him herself. No man will ever ask a woman a second time, who denies him after that manner. . . She who is not afraid to have the reputation of committing adultery, may also not scruple to commit it." These maxims are too severe, and carried too far (12); and would often be unjust, if we were always to judge according to them. But yet the advantage, happiness and glory of our Judith are a prejudice in her favour, which gives us the most exalted notion of her virtue and prudence. I shall observe here by the by, that some Heathens had such strict and severe principles of morality, that they would have a woman give occasion neither to slander nor to commendations; that is to say, they pretended that the true merit of a woman consisted in her being not in the least talked of, nobody speaking well or ill of her. Plutarch did not like this maxim, for he speaks thus in the preamble of one of his works (13): "I am not of Thucydides's opinion. . . concerning the virtue of the women: for he believes that she is the most virtuous and the best, who is the least talked of, and of whom neither good nor ill is said, imagining that the name of an honest woman ought to be kept as secret as her person, and never to come abroad. As for my part, I think that Gorgias was more reasonable, who would have a woman's reputation but not her face to be known to several persons; and I do very much approve the law or custom of the Romans, which is that the women as well as the men received publicly at their funeral after their death the praises they deserve." St. Gregory of Nazianzen was of Thucydides's mind. Dread the praises of men, said he to a woman, but fear is the ornament of your sex.

(10) Seneca, ibid. pag. 186.
 (11) Idem, ibid. pag. 187.

(12) See above, the remark [O] of the article BLONDEL (David).

(13) Plutarch, de Mulier. Virtutib. pag. 242. Mr. Bayle quotes Amyot's French Translation.

(14) Gregorius Nazianzenus.

(15) Synesius, Orat. 1. de Providentia.

i. e. "Leave these vanities to others; fear those commendations that come from the lips of men; that fear is the glory of your sex."
 Add to this these words of Synesius (15). Μίση ἀρετὴν Ὀσφίς ἔπειτο γυναικὸς εἶναι, τὸ μᾶλλον τὸ σῶμα αὐτῆς, μᾶλλον τὸ σῶμα διαβῆναι ἐπὶ αὐλίου. i. e. "Ofiris was of opinion that the only virtue of a woman is, that neither her body nor her name pass the threshold of her house." The opinion which Synesius ascribes to Ofiris is upon the whole the same with that which Plutarch ascribes to Thucydides. Some have given it as an opinion of Pericles. See the following words of John de la Casa. Cujus quidem mulieris (Victoriæ Farnesiæ) modestia ac pudor ingenuus illud profecto præstiffet, quod Periclem ajunt dixisse, primam in muliere laudem esse, ut ne de virtute quidem illius ulla ad viros fama emanet: sed nulla ratione occultari tantæ primariæ fæminæ virtus potest, ad viros quoque emergat, ac suo ipsi splendore se prodat (16). i. e. "This woman's (Victoria Farnese's) modesty and unaffected bashfulness would have produced that, which Pericles, they say, maintained was the chief glory of a woman, namely, that the men hear not the least report of their virtues. But the virtue of this noble woman was so great, that it could by no means be kept secret from the men; it betrayed itself by its own brightness." But though an hundred persons as illustrious as these three (17), had asserted this maxim, we would not be obliged to approve it. It would be condemning the women to a more austere life than that of the Carthusians; it would be requiring of them to keep themselves shut up and to be silent like these Monks; it would be forbidding them to receive any visits in their cells, which yet the Carthusians are suffered to do.

I shall close up this remark by the following observation. Judith's reputation, that reputation, I say, which was entire, free from all suspicions, and proof against all manner of ill reports, is an unquestionable argument of virtue and prudence; but it does not follow from thence, that every woman, who does not meet with the same happiness, and of whom some reports are spread, is guilty at least of imprudence. A woman may have really led a very regular life, and yet because for some good reasons she turned away her woman, or her chamber-maid, or her cook, there will be very soon a thousand reports spread against her reputation. The person that is turned out may be malicious and revengeful; she will go and meet her mistress's enemies; and mysteriously hint to them what a spirit of calumny inspires her with. These slanders will soon be revealed to other people, they will be told as secrets, they will be commented upon and improved with a thousand aggravating circumstances, they will even be printed; and thus a woman who is really innocent, will not have the reputation of being so; so true is it, as I have observed in another place (18), that it is sometimes easier to be honest than to appear so. The former is in our power, but not the latter. The Poet Plautus has expressed this thought very naturally in a scene in which two old men Callicles and Megaronides are introduced talking together,

ME. Quia omnes bonos, bonasque accurare, addeces. Suspicionem, & culpam, ut ab se segregent. C.A. Non potest utrumque fieri. ME. Quapropter? C.A. Rogas?

Ne admittam culpam, meo sum promus peccatori: Suspicio est in peccatore alieno sita. Nam nunc ego si te surripuisse suspicor, Jovi coronam de capite, è Capitolio, Quod in culmine astat summo: si id non feceris, Atque id tamen mihi lubeat suspicariet: Qui tu id probibere me potes, ne suspicet (19)?

C.A. Exspecto, si quid dicas. ME. Primum dum omnium, Malè dicatur, tibi vulgò in sermonibus: Turpilucricupidum te vocant civis tui. Tum autem sunt alii, qui te volturium vocant: Hostesne an civis comedis, parvi pendere, Hæc cum audio in te dicier, excrucior miser.

C.A. Est, atque non est, mihi in manu, Megaronides. Quid dicant, non est: merito ut ne dicant, id est (20).

The sense is,
 "ME. It becomes all honest men and women not only to abstain from evil but even to keep themselves free from the very suspicion of it.
 "CA. It is impossible to do both.
 "ME. Why to?
 "CA. Why! Because it lays in my power to abstain "from

(16) Joh. Casa, in Vita Petri Bambi, pag. 143. Collect. Buteji.

(17) Ofiris, Thucydides, Pericles.

(18) Above, towards the end of the remark [H] of the article AMPHIASCENE in which two old men Callicles and Megaronides RAUS.

(19) Plaut 15, in Trinumm. Act. 1. Sc. 2. ver. 41. pag. m. 732.

(20) Idem, ibid. ver. 61, p. 733.

JULIA, wife to Septimus Severus the Roman Emperor, and daughter of Bassianus Priest of the Sun [A], was born in Syria. The Astrologers had foretold her that she should marry a sovereign Prince [B], for which reason Severus, before he came to the Empire, made his addresses to, and married her. He had a mighty opinion of Astrology, and thence was induced to think that such a marriage would one day insure the throne to him. She was possessed of great talents, and had abilities for conducting of affairs of importance (a). According to some writers, her husband, though he had little affection for her, let her have a great share in the administration [C]. She applied herself to the study of Philosophy [D], and employed a great deal of time in hearing the

(a) See the close of the remark [1].

“ from evil. But the suspicion of it is in the breast of another. If, for instance, I should now suspect you to have stolen the crown from the head of the statue of Jupiter, which stands on the top of the capital, though you had not done it, yet if it pleased me to suspect you of it, how could you hinder it? ”

“ CA. I wait to hear what you have to say? ”
“ ME. Men speak commonly very ill of you. Your fellow-citizens call you covetous of dishonest gain; others stile you an extortioner, and say that you do not care whether you devour a citizen or a stranger. I am vexed to death when I hear such things of you. ”
“ CA. It is, and it is not in my power, Megaronides. What they say of me is not in my power; but that they may not say it justly, that is in my power to prevent.”

This conclusion is very good. I cannot prevent people from speaking ill of me, answered Megaronides, I can only take care that they do it not with reason. Observe that there are a thousand accidents, that may be attended with the same consequence, as the malice of a servant who is turned out of doors.

[A] She was . . . daughter of Bassianus, Priest of the Sun.] This may be inferred from the following

- (1) Aurel. Victor, in Epitome, pag. m. 211.
- (2) Idem, ibid. pag. 212.
- (3) Or rather Soemis according to Herodian, lib. 5. cap. 3.
- (4) Herodian, ibid.
- (5) Herodian, ibid. Julius Capitolinus, in Maxerino, cap. 9. pag. m. 759.
- (6) Dio, lib. 78. pag. 902.
- (7) Lampridius, in Alexandro Severo, cap. 5. pag. 890.
- (8) Dio, lib. 78. pag. 899. edit. 1606.
- (9) Spartian. in Septim. Severo, cap. 3. pag. m. 594. tom. 1. See also Lampridius, in Alex. Severo, cap. 5. pag. 890.

words of Aurelius Victor (1) : Caracalla Severi filius . . . Bassianus ex avi materni nomine dicitur . . . Hujus (Heliogabali) matris Semeæ avus Bassianus nomine, fuerat solis sacerdos, quem Phœnices unde erat, Heliogabalum nominabant (2). i. e. “ Caracalla, the son of Severus . . . called Bassianus from his grandmother by the mother’s side . . . Bassianus, grandfather of Semea, mother of this Heliogabalus, was Priest of the Sun, whom the Phœnicians, whence he was descended, called Heliogabalus.” Semea (3) was the daughter of Mæsa; now Mæsa was Julia’s sister (4); and consequently Bassianus, Priest of the Sun, was Julia’s father. One cannot positively affirm whether Julia was born in Emesa or Apamea; for, according to some authors (5), her sister Mæsa was a native of Emesa; but according to others (6) she was born in Apamea. Lampridius (7) says that Julia was a noble woman of the East, nobilem Orientis mulierem: but Dion (8) says that she was of Plebeian extraction, ἐκ δημοτικῆς γένους.

[B] The Astrologers had told her that she should marry a sovereign Prince.] I will transcribe Spartian’s words, in order that the reader may know, what it was that Severus enquired chiefly about, when he was resolved to marry again. He did not enquire into the merits of the person, but the promises of the horoscope. Quum amissa uxore aliam vellet ducere, genituras sponjarum requirebat, ipse quoque matheos peritissimus: Et quum audisset esse in Syria quandam, quæ id genituræ haberet ut regi jungeretur, eandem uxorem petiit, Juliam scilicet: Et accepit interventu amicorum: ex qua statim pater factus est (9). i. e. “ When having lost his wife, he was desirous of marrying another, and being extremely well skilled in Astrology, he calculated the nativity of those whom he made choice of as a wife: and hearing that there was a certain woman in Syria, whose horoscope declared that she should be married to a King, he sought her in marriage (this was Julia) and obtained her by the good offices of friends, and she soon made him a father.”

[C] According to some writers, her husband . . . let her have a great share in the administration.] “ Dion informs us in the Life of Caracalla, that she had in charge his Memorials, Letters, and Petitions, tho’ of the utmost consequence. This shews her great capacity, for she gave her advice on all affairs of importance: and yet they had little affection for one another, as we find by Dion and Herodian, though she commonly used to receive this honour from him, viz. that he always named her with applause in his letters; and even when he wrote to the Senate, inserting her name with his and that of his armies, according to the style of that age; and indeed she maintained her state very well, she not paying more honour, and not saluting with greater respect, persons of the highest distinction in the Empire, than Severus or Caracalla. However when Caracalla came to the empire, he so far lessened her authority, that he never followed her counsel, particularly when he took it into his head to put any person to death: but with regard to Severus her husband, he was very much swayed by her advice and good sense (10).” This is what we are told by Trifan, but it is certain that he is mistaken, by taking the father for the son; for what he relates does not refer to Julia under her husband’s reign, but ought only to be understood of her, under the Empire of Caracalla. There is no great difficulty in the thing, if we do but read Xiphilinus’s words with some attention (11). Οὐδὲ ἐπιβίβησθε ἐπεὶ περὶ τῶν ἄλλων τῆ μητρὶ πολλὰ καὶ χρηστὰ παρανομήσῃ. καίτοι καὶ τὴν τῶν βιβλίων τῶν τε ἐπιστολῶν ἐκάλειρον, πολλὴν τῶν πάντων ἀναγκαίων, διοίκασιν αὐτῇ ἐπέβλεψας. καὶ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτῆς ἐν ταῖς πρὸς τὴν βασιλὴν ἐπιστολαῖς ὁμοίως τῷ τε ἰδίῳ καὶ τῷ τῶν στρατιωτικῶν, ἐπεὶ σάξῃσαι, μετ’ ἐκείνων πολλῶν ἐγγράφων. Τί γὰρ δι’ ἡμῶν, ὅτι καὶ ὑπεβίβησθε δημοσίᾳ πάλαι τὰς ἀρχαίας, καθέπερ καὶ ἐκείνῳ. i. e. “ In which affair, and in all others, he was far from complying with the just and prudent advice which his mother gave him, although he entrusted her with the petitions and letters of both kinds, those excepted which were of great importance (12); and joined her name to his, and that of his army (with the highest encomium) in the letters he used to write to the Senate, acquainting them that all were well; nor is there occasion for me to relate, that all persons of the highest distinction used to pay their compliments to her, in the same manner as to the Emperor himself.” I shall observe that it was at the request of our Julia, that her husband engaged in the war against Pescennius Niger and Claudius Albinus (13).

[D] She applied herself to the study of Philosophy.] Xiphilinus, immediately after the words just read, affirms that Julia, in the midst of her numberless affairs, devoted some of her hours to Philosophy. Ἄλλ’ ἢ μὲν καὶ μετὰ τῶν ἐπιβιβῶν ἰφιλοσόφου. Sed ea nihil minus philosophabatur. He had said elsewhere (14), that upon her being persecuted by Plautianus, who had prodigious interest, she began to cultivate Philosophy, and to spend whole days with the Sophists. Καὶ ἢ μὲν αὐτῇ τε φιλοσοφῆν διὰ ταῦτ’ ἤρξατο, καὶ σεφισταῖς συνήμιχεν. Quæ dum ob eam causam philosophabatur, Et tempus cum Sophistis transigeret. Philostratus gives her the name of Female-Philosopher: Ἀντιανθῆ, says he (15), speaking of Caracalla, ἦν ὁ τῆς φιλοσοφίας πατρὸς Ἰουλιανῆς. i. e. “ Antoninus was the son of Julia the Female-Philosopher:” In this manner it ought to be read, pursuant to the learned Salmasius’s happy conjecture (16). He has corrected another passage of Philostratus, where we are told that Philiscus the Sophist obtained a Professorship in Athens by Julia’s interest. It was she who ordered Philostratus to write the Life of Apollonius; a circumstance which Philostratus himself tells us (17), who observes at the same time that this Lady was very fond of Rhetoric. Tzetzes takes notice of the society of learned men who used to attend upon

(10) Trifan, Comment. Histor. tom. 2. pag. 110.

(11) Xiphil. in Epitome Dionis, in Caracalla, pag. m. 553.

(12) Trifan should not therefore have said, that she was intrusted with the petitions tho’ of the utmost consequence. He should have made the following exception (as Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. 3. pag. m. 189. does, unless it was an affair of very great importance.

(13) Capitolinus, in Clodio Albino, cap. 3. pag. 689.

(14) In Sept. Severo, pag. 330.

(15) Philostratus, in Vitis Sophistarum, in Philisco.

(16) Salmas. ad Spartian. in Vita Severi, cap. 18. pag. m. 625.

(17) Philostrat. in Vita Apollonii, lib. 1. cap. 3.

the discourses of those wits who used to make their court to her. It is a great pity we cannot justly affirm, for the glory and advantage of the Sciences, that her virtue equalled her capacity ; for Historians relate that her adulterous practices reflected ignominy on her husband [E]. It is related by some authors that Julia, after Severus's death, contracted an incestuous marriage, by marrying Caracalla her husband's son [F] ; but this is a falsity.

(18) Tzetzes, Cbil. 6. Hifl. 45. upon Julia. Εἰς τῆ χορῆ Ρητορικῶν τε καὶ Γραμματικῶν τῶν Ἰουλαίᾳ τῆ πρώτης τελευτῆ Βασιλίδι (18). i. e. "One of those Rhetoricians and Grammarians who used to wait often on the Empreſs Julia."

Mr. le Moyné has made two observations that deserve to be mentioned. I. He is surprized that Scaliger, who was so bold in his conjectures, durst venture none with regard to Antoninus the son of Julia, spoken of by Philostratus. II. He has confirmed by Tzetzes's words the correction of Salmaſus, which he yet seems to have never heard of. Here follows what he says with regard to Scaliger : " Sic Philoſtratus in vitis Sophiſtarum, in Philoſo, Ἀντωνίου δὲ ἢ ὁ τῷ φιλοσοφῶ πατρὶς Ἰουλαίᾳ. Antoninus erat Filius Philoſophi Juliae. Ad quæ verba hærens ἔσ attonitus Scaliger, " Antonino Philoſopho alius filius quam Commodus, alia uxor præter Fauſtinam ? Nifi legamus ὁ τῷ Σεβέρῳ πατρὶς καὶ Ἰουλαίᾳ. Hoc etiam tenuit ancipitem " Tzetsem, nec mihi minorem movit admirationem. " Quæ nos proponimus Chronologis eruditus, & Antiquitatis investigatoribus, ut quærant, & nos doceant, quæ ingenue nos nescire profiteamur. Sed mirum hic retulimus Scaligeri acumen, ἔσ moratam istam felicem " audaciam, quæ loca, hoc multo difficiliora, tam strenue " ἔσ alacriter superaverat (19)." With regard to the passage of Tzetzes, he makes use of it to shew that Philostratus did not write τῷ φιλοσοφῶ ; for if Tzetzes had read this in Philostratus, he would not have said that this author does not specify the person to whom the Empreſs Julia was married. Συζῶσθαι δὲ αὐτῇ ἢ φησὶ τῷ Σεβέρῳ βασιλεὺς. Non dicit vero cujus Imperatoris illa fuerit conjux (20). He might have easily perceived that Julia's husband was either Marcus Aurelius, furnamed the Philosopher, or Septimius Severus, who, in imitation of Marcus Aurelius, was extremely fond of philosophical studies. Amore Marci, quem fuisse vel fratrem suam dicebat, ἔσ cujus Philoſophiam literarumque institutionem semper imitatus est (21). Philoſophicæ, declamandi, cunctis postremo liberalium deditus studiis (22). Philoſophicæ ac dicendi studiis satis deditus ; doctrinæ quoque nimis avidus (23). By the way, le Moyné generally gives our Julia the surname of Severa, for which he is authorized by some inscriptions (24).

(19) Stephanus le Moyné, in Prolegomenis Variorum Sacrorum, folio * 25.

(20) Tzetzes, Cbil. 6. Hifl. 45. perceived that Julia's husband was either Marcus Aurelius, furnamed the Philosopher, or Septimius Severus, who, in imitation of Marcus Aurelius, was extremely fond of philosophical studies. Amore Marci, quem fuisse vel fratrem suam dicebat, ἔσ cujus Philoſophiam literarumque institutionem semper imitatus est (21). Philoſophicæ, declamandi, cunctis postremo liberalium deditus studiis (22). Philoſophicæ ac dicendi studiis satis deditus ; doctrinæ quoque nimis avidus (23). By the way, le Moyné generally gives our Julia the surname of Severa, for which he is authorized by some inscriptions (24).

(21) Spartian. in Vita, cap. 2.

(22) Aurelius Victor, in Cæſaribus.

(23) Spartianus, in Severo, cap. 18. pag. 625, 626.

(24) See Trifſtan. Comment. Hiſtor. tom. 2. pag. 121.

(25) Aurelius Victor, in Cæſaribus. Trifſtan, pag. 110. has not translated the passage justly ; he imagines that it signifies that Julia's debaucheries threw a deep shade on the glory of Severus, both at home and abroad.

(26) Spartian. in Severo, pag. 626, 627.

(27) Comment. Hiſtor. tome 2. pag. 100.

(28) Xiphilin. in Severo, pag. m. 329, 330.

Ἄρα καὶ τὴν Ἰουλαίαν τὴν Αὐγούſταν πρὸς τὸν Σεβέρῳ ἑσὶ διὰ Καλλίαν, ἐκζητήσας τε κατ' αὐτῆς, καὶ βαſάνου; κατ' εὐſινῶν γυναικῶν ποιῶμεν (29). Ut etiam apud eum Juliam (29) Idem, ibid. Augustam semper calumniatus sit, ἔσ in eam ac de matronis nobilibus tormentis quaesiverit (30). The Historian (30) Caseneuve, an who informs us of this, does not say that the Empreſs sought to free herself by engaging in a conspiracy against her husband ; he only observes, that this was the cause that she applied herself to the study of Philosophy. We cannot but applaud Julia for having recourse to that consolation : the misfortune is, that whilst the favourite made too insolent an abuse of his power, she perhaps furnished him with but too many reasons to impeach her for her adulterous practices. Let us here insert the answer that was made her in Great Britain. She had followed her husband into that island (31) ; and observing that the women of this island indulged their favours to many men without the least sense of shame, she rallied very severely the wife of Argentocoxus on that account, who made her the following answer ; We satiate the cravings of nature in a better manner than your Roman Ladies ; for we dally publicly with the most worthy men ; whereas the women of your country secretly commit adultery with the most wicked wretches. Μαλὰ ἀσπίως Ἀρσινόκοζου τῆς ἑσὶ γυνὴ Καληδονίᾳ πρὸς τὴν Ἰουλαίαν τὴν Αὐγούſταν ἀποσάπλισσάσθαι τὴν πρὸς αὐτὴν μετὰ τῆς σπονδῆς ἐπὶ τῇ ἀνίσει σφῶν πρὸς τῆς ἀρρίνας συνουσίᾳ, ἐπὶ τὴν λέγειναι, ἔστι πολλὰ ἄμεινον ἡμῶς τὰ τῆς φύσεως ἀναγκαίᾳ ἀποσάπλισσασθαι ἡμῶν τῶν Ῥωμαϊκῶν ἡμῶς γὰρ φανερῶς τοῖς ἀρρίστοις ὀμιλοῦμεν, ἡμῶς δὲ λάβρα ὑπὸ τῶν κακίστων μετὰ χυμῶν.

Urbane imprimis Argentocoxi Caledonii uxor, Julia Augustæ quæ ipsam mordebat, initis fœderibus, quod ipsæ impudenter cum maribus versarentur, dixisse fertur, Nec (inquirit) multo melius explemus ea, quæ naturæ postulat necessitas, quam vos Romanæ. Nam apertè cum optimis viris habemus consuetudinem : vos autem occultè pessimi homines consuprant (32). If any one should ask on what occasion the Historian mentions this answer, I say it was on account of a law which the Emperor had enacted against adultery ; the execution whereof he was forced to neglect, because such multitudes (33) were impeached, that the courts did not care to concern themselves any more with those trials. It must be confessed that this female Barbarian made a very arch answer to the Empreſs's railleries ; but then we must not think, that the impudence of these islanders was less criminal than the secret adulteries which were carried on in Rome. Those who commit evil secretly retain the ideas of virtue, and pay some homage to it ; but such as sin without the least sense of shame, have no regard to justice either in theory or practice (34). Brantome relates a particular which I have not read in ancient Historians, in giving the reason why Severus bore so patiently his wife's lewdness. Brantome's words are as follow (35). " The Emperor Severus was not under much concern with regard to his wife's honour, she being a public prostitute ; and yet he did not even take the least pains to reform her, saying that her name was Julia, and therefore he ought to excuse her, in as much as all the women, from the most remote antiquity, so called, used to be very great whores, and to cuckold their husbands ; I know many Ladies, bearing certain Christian names (36), which I forbear to mention out of the reverence I bear to our holy religion, who are more subject to be prostitutes, and to &c. more than women who go by other names ; and few have been seen that have escaped it."

(31) Anno 208. (32) Xiphilin in Severo, pag. 343.

(33) Three thousand persons had been impeached for adultery.

(34) We may here apply the two verses following of Rutilius Numatianus : Nominibus certos credam decurrere mœres, Maribus an potius nomina certa dari.

(35) See remark [B] of the article JONAS (Arngimus).

(36) Brantome, Dames Galantes, tom. 1. pag. 33.

[F] It is related by some authors that Julia married Caracalla.] This is not a story lately invented, but is found in Spartian and Aurelius Victor. Brantome tells it as follows. " It is farther related of Julia the Emperor Caracalla's step-mother, that being one day, as though it had been inadvertently, half naked, and Caracalla spying her, said only these words : how gladly would I, if I might ! Julia replied that instant, you may if you please ; do not falsity [G]. She was no less the true mother of Caracalla than of Geta. Julia was so unhappy as not to be able to maintain unity and concord between her two sons (b); her endeavours, though so very industrious, not being able to compass such a work. Geta was

(b) Herodian, lib. 4. cap. 3.

"you know that you are Emperor, and as such impose laws, and not receive them from others? Finding she had such an inclination for him, he married, and lay with her (37). She must needs have been a prostitute, to love and marry that very man who some time before had killed her son in her arms. She must have been an arrant prostitute, and very mean spirited; and yet it is a great thing to be an Empress, and so exalted an honour atones for all imperfections. This Julia was very well beloved by her husband, though she was far advanced in years, notwithstanding which her beauties were not lessened in any manner, she being extremely handsome and courteous, as is manifest from her words which greatly increased her grandeur (38)." That the reader may see whether the circumstances are heightened here, I shall cite the very expressions of the Latin authors who have mentioned this incident. *Interest scire, says Spartian (39), quemadmodum novercam suam Juliam uxorem duxisse dicatur. Quæ quum esset pulcherrima, & quasi per negligentiam se maxima corporis parte nudasset, dixissetque Antoninus, Vellem, si liceret: respondisse fertur, Si libet licet. An necis te imperatorem esse, & leges dare, non accipere? Quo audito, furor inconditus ad effectum criminis roboratus est: nuptiasque eas celebravit quas si sciret se leges dare, vere solus prohibere debuisset. Matrem enim (non alio dicenda erat nomine) duxit uxorem, ad parricidium junxit incestum: squidem eam matrimonio sociavit, cujus filium super occiderat. Aurelius Victor exhibits the same the emperor a little more clearly. She was not so impolitic as to undress herself at once before Caracalla; so loose and impudent a behaviour might have shocked the young man: she so ordered matters, that the whole passed for a surprize; she pretended not to know that Caracalla could see her that time, and feigned being ignorant of his being in the place where she was naked. Pari fortuna, & eodem matrimonio, quo pater: namque Juliam novercam . . . forma captus, conjugem affectavit: cum illa factiosior, aspectui adolescentis, presentie quasi ignara, semet dedisset, intecto corpore, asserentique, Vellem si liceret, uti: petulantius multo (quippe quæ pudorem velamento exuerat) respondisset: Libet? plane licet (40). I know not where Vigenere found what he specifies with respect to the circumstance of the place. The Empress Julia, says he (41), was doubtless the wife of Severus; for Antoninus Caracalla married her afterwards though she was his mother-in-law: and this incestuous commerce rose from his spying her one day naked in the hot bath, through a private window that looked into it; he revealed himself: and she asking Caracalla how he liked her, he answered, Were it lawful, I should desire you above all other women. How! replied she on a sudden, are you still so ignorant as not to know, that all things are lawful to you, who are the sovereign of the whole earth? Saying which they immediately proceeded to their guilt."*

(37) Brantome, Damus Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 205.

(38) Ibid. pag. 206.

(39) Spartian. in Caracalla, cap. 10. pag. 730.

(40) Aurel. Victor. in Cesarib. pag. m. 144. See also Eutropius, Book 8. and Orosius, lib. 7. chap. 18. who speak of this incestuous commerce.

(41) Vigenere's Preface to Philostrata's de Pictur.

"The second proof is borrowed from the age of our Julia. Tristram supposes (43), that at the time those authors represent her as so beautiful, that Caracalla was so captivated by it, that he was desirous of marrying her, she must be 45 at least; for she must have been seventeen or fifteen years of age when she married Severus; and as she brought Caracalla into the world the first year of her marriage, and as Caracalla was 27 when it is supposed he saw her naked, it follows that she was 44 or 45. This author had reason to say, that Julia was not Caracalla's mother-in-law, but his own mother. He need not fear any strong objection on that occasion; those which might be made to him, in order to lessen Julia's age, and against the consequences he draws from her being 45, might puzzle him still more. Nothing hinders, will it be said, but that Julia might be no more than fifteen when she married Severus; and it is probable that Caracalla married her a year after he had killed Geta (45). Now Caracalla reigned six years since his brother's death (46), and lived but 29 years in all (47). He therefore might have married Julia when he was but 24, which added to sixteen (his mother's age when she brought him into the world) make but forty in all. According to Tristram the age of 44 or 45 years is not a period of life in which Julia's lustre, gratefulness and vigour would be so great, as to incant Caracalla to such a degree, that he was forced to marry her in order to possess her. This might be objected the example of some women, who at that age, or even in a more advanced one, have fired Princes with a very strong passion; but Tristram might answer, that the women in question did not achieve such conquests on a sudden by displaying their beauties naked. The charms of conversation, the stratagems of love, and a thousand pretty ways were the strongest arms by which they gained their conquests; and then I know not what cast or turn of body or mind enabled them to preserve their conquests. The bare revealing of a body, which has been subject to the influences of above forty years, is not an object fit to gain victories; on such an occasion a woman does not shew herself to the greatest advantage. It is therefore no ways probable, that so artful a woman as Julia employed the expedients we are told in history, in order to captivate Caracalla; or that, in case she did, she was successful in her attempt. I go no farther, I believe a reply might be made to this; the reasons given here are not of a nature to admit of no room for doubting. Let us see the third proof. Dion (49) observes, that when Julia "knew of the death of her son, she struck her breast (50), in order to occasion her own death by reviving and irritating a cancer, which had been troubled with for a long time, and that it contributed very much to her death afterwards. This shews how ridiculous they made themselves, who have forged this pretended history, that Julia shewed herself naked to Caracalla, and that the sight of her, when she was naked, inspired him with a desperate passion for her. For is it probable that this woman would have shewn herself naked, when she was thus full of ulcers: and that Caracalla, a young Prince, Monarch of the world, who had the option of all that was beautiful in so extensive an empire, could have been captivated by such an object as they represent?" As there is nothing too difficult for a sophist, some caviller might be found, who would object to Tristram, that Julia did not expose her whole body (51). Spartian says, that she only shewed above half of it. We may then suppose, that the part concealed by her was her breast, and so her cancer did not appear. Mr. Chevreau would not be a proper person to make this objection; for he says, that Julia appeared before Caracalla, in a negligent manner, and with her breast naked (52). It would be in vain to examine, whether it is likely, that a woman, who would expose herself naked, except some part, would determine to hide her breast before all others. This, I say, would be in vain, since, by supposing the cancer, there were particular reasons to induce her necessarily not to shew her breast. Let us proceed therefore to a third remark, which

(43) Ibid. pag. 114.
 (44) This in all probability is an error of the press for 18.

(45) He put to death his wife who was Plautian's daughter, after he had got rid of Geta. Herodian, lib. 4. cap. 6.

(46) Herodian, lib. 4. cap. 13. in 10th.

(47) Tristram, Comment. Hist. tom. 2. pag. 119, 148.

(48) Ibid. pag. 114.

(49) Ibid.
 (50) See the remark [I].

(51) See maxima corporis parte nudasse. Spart. ubi supra.

(52) Chevreau, Hist. du Monde, tom. 2. pag. 3-6. Dutch edit. 1679.

[G] . . . but this is a falsity.] It has been proved so manifestly, that Moreri is inexcusable for relating this story as a certainty. Had he read Tristram's commentaries, he would have seen sufficient proofs of the falsity of it; though it must be owned that all the arguments of this author are not demonstrative.

His first proof (42) is drawn from the silence of those Greek authors, who have given a faithful account of Caracalla's actions, without employing the least flattery. Dion Cassius lived in that age, and had exercised very high employments: he consequently could not be ignorant whether Caracalla had married Julia or not; and had he known of such a marriage he certainly would have spoke of it, to throw the greater odium on that Emperor, whom he seems not to spare in any manner; since then he does not speak of it, it is a certain proof of the falsity of that marriage. The same circumstance is confirmed by Herodian's silence; Herodian, I say, who relates many particular and blackening incidents; and who lived much nearer that period than they who vouch the truth of this pretended marriage.

was killed by Caracalla in the arms of Julia, who received a wound on that occasion, but durst not afterwards discover the least uneasiness on that account (c). If I mistake not, the best expedient which Caracalla employed, in order to comfort his mother, was to let her enjoy a considerable share in the Government [H]. The Lady found infinite charms in this; and if she attempted to kill herself when news was brought her that Caracalla had been assassinated, it did not proceed so much from grief at her son's death, as from the fear of being soon reduced to the condition of a private person (d); and accordingly she laid all thoughts of dying aside, the instant she perceived that Macrinus, Caracalla's successor, used her well: but as soon as she was informed that he intended to resent the injurious expressions she had vented against him, upon her being told of Caracalla's murder, she starved herself to death [I]. The title of Domna that was given

(c) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag. 346.

(d) Xiphil. in Macrinus, pag. 362.

which weakens the proof of Trifan. Let us observe, that the cancer was formed after Julia married Caracalla. If it was formed after marriage, she might have had it four years, when Caracalla was killed; and so Dion might say, that she had been troubled with it for a long time (53).

(53) Έκ πάνυ πολλού χρόνου: jam multo tempore, Dio, in Macrinus, pag. 362.

The fourth proof of Trifan is, that Dion, who was perfectly well acquainted with Caracalla, observes, that he had been prodigiously enervated for a long time, and extremely incapable of that sort of exercise, having reduced himself to that condition by his debaucheries, ὕψιστον γὰρ ἐξουθενώσαν (54) αὐτῶν πάντων ἢ παρὰ τὰ ἀφροδίσια ἰσχυρῶς; for,

(54) It should be ἐξουθενώσαν.

says he, the natural vigour necessary for the service of the Ladies was exhausted in him during the last years of his life (55). It is not true that Dion observes, that Caracalla was enervated in that point for a long time; and therefore the fourth proof lies exposed to the same objection as the preceding; for it may be answered, that this Emperor exhausted his vigour by his debaucheries after his marriage with Julia. The reader will perhaps be pleased to know upon what occasion Dion makes this observation. He had said, that Caracalla put four Vestals to death, and that he enjoyed one of them as much as his strength would give him leave. The Historian afterwards says what is cited by Trifan, and adds, that this Vestal cried out when she was conducted to the place of execution, The Emperor himself very well knows that I have kept my virginity. Τίσσaras δὲ τῶν αὐτῶν παρθένων ἀπέβλεπον, ὡς μίαν βίαν, ὅσα γὰρ ἢ ἡδύατο, ἡσχύνετο ὕψιστον γὰρ ἐξουθενώσαν αὐτῆς πᾶσαν ἢ παρὰ τὰ ἀφροδίσια ἰσχυρῶς ἀφ' ἑαυτῆς ἢ ἐκ τῶν τῶν ἀσχετηγῶν ἰλιγύτο ἢ διὰ τὴν αὐτῆς ἐξ ἡλίου, Κλαδία Λαίτια ἀνομάζοντο ἢ τις καὶ μέγα βούσα. Ὅϊδιν αὐτὸς Ἀρλωνῶν ὅτι παρδίνῳ ἡμῖν, ζῶσα κατωρύγη. Vestales occidit quatuor, ex quibus unam, quantum in ipso fuit, vitiaavit: nam eum ad extremum vis in rebus Veneriis defecerat, qua ex re dicebatur flagitia obscena alterius defecerat, qua ex re dicebatur flagitia obscena alterius defecerat, qua ex re dicebatur flagitia obscena alterius defecerat.

(55) Trifan, ubi supra, pag. 114.

It is certain, that if Julia had been his wife, when she died, her body would not have been deposited first in the monument of the two brothers, Lucius and Caius Cæsars, and afterwards in that of the Antoninus's with the bones of Geta, but with him (57). This proof is a very bad one, and shews, that Trifan did not know, that Caracalla and Geta were in the same tomb. Geta was laid in the sepulture of Severus (58), that is to say, in that of the Antoninus's (59), and Caracalla was laid there likewise. Corpus ejus Antoninorum sepulchro illatum est, ut ea sedes reliquias ejus acciperet que nomen addiderat (60). His corps was sent to Rome by the order of his murderer himself (61). Others affirm, that Macrinus caused it to be burnt, and put the ashes in an urn, which he sent to Julia (62).

(56) Xiphil. in Caracalla, pag. 352.

(57) Trifan, ubi supra, pag. 115. He quotes no body. This is to be found in the fragments of Dion, pag. 899. of the edit. of 1666.

(58) Funus Getæ accuratus fuisse dicitur quam ejus qui à fratre videretur occisus. Illatusque est majorum sepulchro, hoc est Severi. Spartianus, in Geta, cap. 7. pag. m. 744.

(59) Urnulam auream . . . Severi reliquias continentem eandemque Antoninorum sepulchro illatam. Idem, in Severo, cap. ult. pag. 640.

(60) Idem, in Caracalla, cap. 10. pag. 730.

(61) Capitolin. in Macrinus, cap. 5. pag. 753.

(62) Herodian, lib. 4. cap. 13.

The sixth proof is a very good one, and is founded upon Julia's being the mother, and not the mother-in-law of Caracalla. This is evident from the testimony of Dion, a person of eminence in the Empire, who had seen Severus, Julia, Caracalla, Geta, &c. an hundred and an hundred times. Herodian affirms the same, and what can be more convincing upon this point, than these words of Oppian? τὸν μεγάλαν βασιλέα φησὶ σάτω Δόμνην Σεβήρω. Since Oppian, in a book, which he dedicated to Caracalla, asserts, that Julia brought forth Caracalla, can there be the least doubt concerning it? Can a contemporary writer be mistaken in such a thing? And would he venture to assert a falsity in the face of the whole court about a thing, which every body knew? Can any body be ignorant in a Prince's court, whether his wife is the mother or the mother-in-law of his sons? I say nothing of the inscriptions, in which Julia is stiled the mother of Caracalla (63). Now all those writers, who mention the pretended marriage of Julia and Caracalla, suppose that she was his mother-in-law, and therefore deserve no credit, as building upon a mistake. Observe likewise, that they even fall into a contradiction. Does not Spartian somewhere say, that Geta was better beloved by his mother than Caracalla? Fratri semper invidus, matri amabilior quam frater (64). Would a person, who should make this observation, while he believed that Julia was Geta's mother, and Caracalla's mother-in-law, have common sense? This is not the only argument which Spartian furnishes us with against himself (65). Aurelius Victor (66) asserts, that Caracalla died when he was near thirty years of age; which cannot be true, if this Emperor was not Julia's son. See the remark [L]. The same Historian observes, that Caracalla having secretly lain with Semea, his cousin, had a son by her, who was the Emperor Heliogabalus (67). If Caracalla was Semea's cousin, he was Julia's son. I shall observe by the way, that Mammea, Semea's sister, and Alexander Severus's mother, is called by Ulpian Caracalla's cousin (68). Here then is a contemporary writer, who says, that Julia was Caracalla's mother.

(63) See Salmasius in Spartian. cap. 20. pag. 633. and Spanhem. de Præstant. Nominif. mat. pag. 628.

(64) Spartian. in Geta, cap. 5. pag. m. 740.

(65) See the remark [L].

(66) Aurel. Victor. in Epitoma, pag. 212.

(67) Heliogabalus dicitur Caracalla x Semea CONSOBRINA occulte suprata filius. Idem, ibid.

(68) Ulpian. Leges ultima de Senator. apud Trifan, pag. 117.

[H] Her son . . . let her enjoy a considerable share in the Government.] See what has been cited from Dion, in the remark [C]; and add to it what that Historian tells us, when he gives an account of the tragical fate of Caracalla. He says, that during Caracalla's expedition against the Parthians, Julia staid at Antioch, and received all the dispatches, and communicated to the Emperor only such as were of importance. Thus all the affairs of State passed through her hands, and it was she who judged whether such or such letters written to the Emperor, deserved to be sent to him, or whether she might not spare him the time of reading them. This is at the same time a proof of the confidence which Caracalla reposed in her, and of his opinion of her capacity. Ἐπεὶ δὲ αὐτῆς πᾶσι τοῖς ἀφικνούμενοις διατάγμασι, ἵνα μὴ μόνον αὐτῆς ὄχλησθαι γραμμάτων ἐν τῇ πολέμῳ ὄντι σιωπήσῃ. Cui mandatum erat, cuncta que mitterentur, discernere, ne ad Antoninum occupatum in terra hostili frustra multitudo literarum mitteretur (69).

[I] As soon as she was informed that Macrinus intended to resent the injurious expressions she had vented against him . . . she starved herself to death.] Macrinus sent her Caracalla's ashes (70), and wrote her an extremely polite letter (71). He desired her to keep all her retinue, and the same guards as usual, which made him suppose that she had laid aside all thoughts of destroying herself. Ἐπειδ' ὡς ἔτι τε τῆς βασιλικῆς θρησκείας καὶ τῆς τῶν δημοφώνων παρὰ αὐτῆς φρονίας ἠλλοιωθεῖν, καὶ ἐκείνη χρησάμενος αὐτῆ ἐπέμπετο, θρασυτάτα, τὴν τοῦ θανάτου ἐπιθυμίαν κατέδειξε. Sed postquam ille non modò nihil de regio famulatu ejus, aut de stipatoribus quos secum habebat custodia causa immutavit, verùm etiam multa ad eam percommode scripsit, cepit bona spe injectis desiderium mortis deponere (72). But when he was told that she had inveighed bitterly against him, and formed factions, in order to obtain the sovereignty in that country, after the example of Semiramis and Nitocris, he commanded her to leave Antioch immediately, and to retire whithersoever she might think proper. And now Julia was quite sick of life; she dreading the condition

(69) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag. 357.

(70) Herodian, lib. 4. cap. 13.

(71) Xiphil. in Macrinus, pag. 362.

(72) Idem, ibid.

(e) Trifan gives them in tom. 2. pag. 117, 118. of his Commentaires Historiques.

given her was the surname of a family [K]. The time of her marriage with Severus [L].

There are some difficulties with respect to There are extant some inscriptions (e) in which

(73) Herodian, lib. 4. cap. 13.

condition of a woman devoid of authority, more than death. Some authors (73) doubt whether she put an end to her life; but Dion does not speak of it in a doubtful manner, he affirming (74) that she starved herself to death; and that she effected this the more easily, as she had inflamed her cancer, by the blow she gave herself on the breast. Trifan fancies that she struck herself on the breast, in order to kill herself by inflaming her cancer; but I doubt very much whether this be the historian's meaning. I fancy Dion meant no more than this, that the Lady in question, by striking her breast, whilst she was bewailing her son's murder, inflamed the cancer (75). It was the usual custom of women, at the news of a loss like this, not only to weep, but also to strike their breasts. Julia did like other women; but in all probability she did not strike herself so hard, as though she intended directly to kill herself by those blows. Since she is compared to Semiramis, she must necessarily have been looked upon as a very ambitious and very artful woman. She did not want this last quality, if Dion may be credited. Ἦτος δὲ τῶν αἰσίων εἶχε καὶ τὸ πανουργοῦν τῆς μητρός, καὶ τῶν Συρίων ὄδον ἐξείναι ἢ (76) i. e. "She had the deceit of her mother, and of the Syrians from whom she sprung."

(75) See the Fragment, pag. 299. of Dion, edit. of 1606.

(76) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag. 349.

[K] The title of Domna . . . was the surname of a family.] Trifan (77) proves this very learnedly; and censures Rittershusius (78), who thought that in the following verse of Oppian, Τὸν μεγάλην μεγάλην φουρίσσαν Δόμνα Σέβηρον, the word Δόμνα is an epithet borrowed from the Latin Domina; and that the Poet, by giving it a Greek turn, had introduced it with the licence of the elision of the iota. He censures another error of the abovementioned Rittershusius, which is, his imagining that Oppian speaks of Marcia Severus's first wife. See Menage (79), who censures Gantilis (80), who had committed the same error as Rittershusius's first. See likewise Spanheim (81), who takes notice of the same error in the Notes on Nicephorus Brunnus.

(77) Comment. Hist. tom. 2. pag. 119, 120.

(78) Not. in Oppiani Cynegetica.

(79) Anonit. Juris, cap. 25. pag. m. 139.

(80) Lib. 2. Pa- rergorum Juris, cap. 22.

(81) Spanhem. de Praesant. Numismat. pag. 626.

(82) Xiphilin. in Severo, pag. 310.

(83) Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. tom. 3. pag. 389.

[L] There are some difficulties with respect to the time of her marriage with Severus.] Dion (82) asserts that Faustina, wife of Marcus Aurelius, prepared the nuptial chamber of Severus and Julia, in the temple of Venus that was in the palace. Now Faustina died in the East about the close of the year 175 (83). The marriage of Severus and Julia was not therefore after that year. Julia was soon made a mother. It is not known whether Caracalla was the eldest of all her children, but that might be, according to Spartian, who declares him to have lived forty three years. Caracalla was killed in the year 217; and consequently he was born in the year 174, in case he lived to the age we are told by Spartian. Should it be objected to this author, that Caracalla and Julia must have been married about the year 212, since it was after the beginning of Caracalla's reign, a reign that continued but six years; and should it be concluded from thence, that this marriage is a mere chimera, since Julia was then above fifty years of age; this author, I say, will answer that Julia was not Caracalla's mother: he will insist that she was not married to Severus till a long time after the year 174. Nevertheless Dion furnishes us with a strong proof that Julia must have been fifty years of age at least, when her naked charms are said to have enchanted Caracalla to such a degree. From what he says, we should suppose that she married before Faustina's death, and consequently that she was at least twelve or thirteen in 175. I will now shew, that Caracalla could not possibly have been born the first year of Julia's marriage, if it be true that this marriage happened before Faustina's death.

Spartian says, that Caracalla was but five years old when his father was Governor of Aegyptum (which cannot be fixed before the year 190) and that he put on the Toga virilis when he was nominated Consul (that is at the close of the year 201; and so he was then at most but in the beginning of his fifteenth year.) He says every where, that Caracalla was very young when Severus came to the Empire. He represents him as a child of two or three years old, at most, at Geta's birth, i. e. the 27th of May 189 (84). All this is inconsistent with the forty three years of age which he declares this Emperor to be, he being killed in the year 217. He therefore contradicts himself. Dion affirms, that Geta lived but twenty two years and nine months (85), and that Caracalla lived but twenty nine years (86). Now Caracalla lived but six years (87) after Geta's death, and was killed in the year 217. Geta therefore must have been born in 189, and Caracalla (86) Idem, ibid. in 188. There then must have been a long interval between Julia's marriage, and Caracalla's birth, in case Faustina had prepared the nuptial bed, as Dion relates; and nevertheless, according to Spartian, Julia's marriage was quickly fruitful, and gave Severus a second son a few years after the birth of the first. Ex qua (Julia) statim pater factus est. A Gallis obibat Caracalla severitatem & honorificentiam & abstinentiam, tantum quantum nemo dilectus est. Deinde Pannonias proconsulari imperio rexist. Post hoc Siciliam proconsularem forte meruit, suscepitque Romae alterum filium (88). i. e. Dion, edit. of 1606.

"By whom (Julia) he was soon made a father. "The Gauls had a prodigious affection for him, "because of his severity, honour, and temperance. "He next governed Pannonia in quality of Proconsul; was afterwards Proconsul of Sicily, and "had another son in Rome." There is a great deal of confusion in all this. I know not whether the reader will approve of a conjecture I am going to venture at random. Methinks Dion does not say that Faustina really prepared the nuptial chamber; but that Severus imagined he had seen her, in a dream, prepare it. This historian relates, in that place several prelates of Severus's exaltation; and after speaking of the six first, he adds, that they appeared to him in his sleep. Ταῦτα μὲν ἐκ τῶν ὀνειράτων ἰσθῆσαν. Ἐπεὶ δὲ ἴετα τὸν βασιλικὸν δόμον ἰσθῆσαν ἂν ἴτι ἀγνοία ἰσθῆσαν. Quae omnia quum ex somnis intellexerit Severus, tam id revera evenit, quod quum adhuc ephebus esset, confedit in sella principis per imprudentiam (89); and then the Historian (89) Xiphilin. in question speaks of the seventh preface as of a fortuitous action done when he was awake. In relating the six first, he does not always observe, on each in particular, that it was a dream, but he does this three or four times. This must have misled the interpreters; for he does not observe it as to this action of Faustina, which is one of those six prefaces or omens; he tells it as a real thing, I mean without giving notice that it was a dream. Now since he does thus with respect to some of the other omens, which it is manifest were only dreams; and since, before he relates the omen that consisted in a real action, he gives notice that all the preceding omens appeared in his sleep; methinks we may conclude, that he gives this preparation of the nuptial bed by Faustina in the temple of Venus, as the vision of a man who sleeps. I know not whether a nuptial chamber was ever prepared for a particular person in a temple. It is easier therefore to come to the assistance of Dion than to disengage the other Historians; and nevertheless many contradictions are objected (but without much foundation) to the latter. This I will here examine, after observing that Mr. de Tillemont should not have preferred this passage of Dion, to the hypothesis which Spartian leads us to (90). This hypothesis is to say, that Severus married Julia, whilst he commanded in Gallia Lugdunensis, in the year 186. According to some Historians (91) Caracalla was born at Lyons.

"The Gauls had a prodigious affection for him, "because of his severity, honour, and temperance. "He next governed Pannonia in quality of Proconsul; was afterwards Proconsul of Sicily, and "had another son in Rome." There is a great deal of confusion in all this. I know not whether the reader will approve of a conjecture I am going to venture at random. Methinks Dion does not say that Faustina really prepared the nuptial chamber; but that Severus imagined he had seen her, in a dream, prepare it. This historian relates, in that place several prelates of Severus's exaltation; and after speaking of the six first, he adds, that they appeared to him in his sleep. Ταῦτα μὲν ἐκ τῶν ὀνειράτων ἰσθῆσαν. Ἐπεὶ δὲ ἴετα τὸν βασιλικὸν δόμον ἰσθῆσαν ἂν ἴτι ἀγνοία ἰσθῆσαν. Quae omnia quum ex somnis intellexerit Severus, tam id revera evenit, quod quum adhuc ephebus esset, confedit in sella principis per imprudentiam (89); and then the Historian (89) Xiphilin. in question speaks of the seventh preface as of a fortuitous action done when he was awake. In relating the six first, he does not always observe, on each in particular, that it was a dream, but he does this three or four times. This must have misled the interpreters; for he does not observe it as to this action of Faustina, which is one of those six prefaces or omens; he tells it as a real thing, I mean without giving notice that it was a dream. Now since he does thus with respect to some of the other omens, which it is manifest were only dreams; and since, before he relates the omen that consisted in a real action, he gives notice that all the preceding omens appeared in his sleep; methinks we may conclude, that he gives this preparation of the nuptial bed by Faustina in the temple of Venus, as the vision of a man who sleeps. I know not whether a nuptial chamber was ever prepared for a particular person in a temple. It is easier therefore to come to the assistance of Dion than to disengage the other Historians; and nevertheless many contradictions are objected (but without much foundation) to the latter. This I will here examine, after observing that Mr. de Tillemont should not have preferred this passage of Dion, to the hypothesis which Spartian leads us to (90). This hypothesis is to say, that Severus married Julia, whilst he commanded in Gallia Lugdunensis, in the year 186. According to some Historians (91) Caracalla was born at Lyons.

Trifan (92) alleges as a proof of the contradictions of Spartian, the following words of Caracalla's Life. Hic tamen omnium durissimus, & ut uno complectar verbo, parricida, incestorum reus, patris matris, & fratris inimicus (93). i. e. "He yet was the most hard-hearted of men; to say all in a word, he was guilty of parricide and incest, and an enemy to his father, mother, and brother." But methinks he cannot hereby be convicted of contradiction, and of forgetting his hypothesis: he might assert, that he takes the word mater, in the same idea which he explains two pages before; Matrem enim (non alia dicenda erat nomine) duxit uxorem. i. e. "He married his mother, "for this was the only name she could be called by." And we find that he does not omit the incest, in the words

(90) See Tillemont, Hist. des Emperours, tom. 3. pag. 389. and Spartian, in Severo, cap. 3 & 4. pag. 594.

(91) Aurel. Victor. in Caesarib. pag. 211.

ENQUIRY into some contradictions objected to Spartian.

(92) Trifan, Comment. Hist. tom. 2. pag. 119.

(93) Spart. in Caracalla, sub fin. pag. 732.

which she is called the Mother of the Camps, the Mother of the Country, and Mother of the Senate.

(94) Trifan. Comment. Hist. tom. 2. pag. 119.

words related by Trifan (94). "The abovementioned Spartan mentions the just reason which Caracalla said he had to get his brother dispatched, viz. that he despised their mother, and did not pay her the veneration that was due; whence it is plain that Spartan, or the author from whom he borrowed it, was persuaded that she was their common mother; for he would not have had any reason to be so much exasperated at his brother's irreverence with regard to Julia, had she not been his mother; and the pretence had been as ridiculous as it was judged barbarous, notwithstanding all the other reasons he invented to palliate his cruelty and guilt." Here we have a very bad objection; for first, these words, matri sum irreverentem fuisse (95), signify only, that Geta did not respect his mother; and they must not be translated as if being spoken by Caracalla, they mean, Geta does not respect our mother. Nevertheless, Trifan understood them in this sense, which was his own fault. Secondly, it is a very specious pretence, in order to extenuate the guilt of a murder, to say that the person murdered used his mother ill. An usurer, who should have dethroned a Prince who had treated his mother with insolence, would not fail to accuse him of that crime, though he were not related to the family dethroned. Cromwell and his adherents would have exhausted all the common places of rhetoric, could they have reproached Charles I with so irreverent a behaviour: much more could this pretence be alledged, if a person was son-in-law to the Lady who had met with ill treatment from her own son. Such a man would say, that it was incumbent on him to defend all the rights of his father's widow against all opponents whatsoever; in a word, he would lay down an hundred very plausible reasons, such as might make the strongest impression; so that I do not know what Trifan was thinking of, when he called this a ridiculous pretence.

(95) Spart. in Geta, cap. 2. pag. 709.

Here follows a more real objection against Spartan. He says (96) that Caracalla, being in his thirteenth year, was proclaimed as a partner of the Empire by the soldiers, on the taking of Ctesiphon. He adds that Severus, being returned to Syria, gave the Toga virilis to Caracalla, and appointed him his colleague in the Consulate, which they entered upon immediately. This Consulship was in 202, and Ctesiphon was taken in 198: and therefore it was not possible that Caracalla, who was killed in the year 217, should have lived so long as is affirmed by this Historian, that is, forty three years.

(96) In Severo, cap. 16.

(a) Strabo, lib. 10. Suidas, Stephanus.

JULIS, a town of the island Cea in the Ægean Sea. This city (a) gave birth to Simonides the Poet, Bacchylides the Poet his nephew, Prodicus the Sophist, Erasistratus the Physician, and a Philosopher called Ariston [A]. Valerius Maximus (b) relates a very singular thing whereof he was witness, when he passed by Julis, in the retinue of Sextus Pompeius, who was going to Asia to exercise his Proconsulship. I have spoke of this elsewhere (c). When the four cities in this island were reduced to two, Julis was one of the two (d). It was built on a mountain three miles from the sea. As it was the native place of so many great men, it should not have been omitted by Moreri, nor expunged from the Dictionary of Charles Stephens by Lloyd, who ought to have rectified that article [B] rather than quite suppressed it.

(b) Lib. 2. cap. 6.

(c) In the article ZIA, near the close of the remark [C].

(d) Strabo, lib. 10.

[A] A Philosopher called Ariston.] Thus we ought to say, and not like Moreri (1) the Philosopher Ariston; for this expression would induce me to think, either that there was but one Philosopher so called; or that the Ariston born at Julis, was infinitely more famous than all the rest of the Aristons. Now both these circumstances are false.

(1) Under the word Cea.

[B] Lloyd... ought to have rectified that article.] Charles Stephens had done well not to declare in so absolute a manner, that the island of Cea was called indifferently Cia or Cos: and to examine better what he relates, viz. that there was a law in Julis which sentenced to death all persons that were above threescore; and that this law was enacted in order to keep the rest of the inhabitants from being in want of victuals. Read what we shall say on this subject in the notes on the article ZIA.

JULIUS II, created Pope the night between the 31st of October and 1st of November 1503, was nephew to Pope Sixtus IV, and his name was called Julian de la Ruvere (a). It is related that he had been a waterman [A]. There was a very singular circumstance

(a) So the Italians pronounce it.

[A] It is related that he had been a waterman.] Erasmus has inserted this tradition in his Adages. Armo ad tribunal, says he (1), Dici solitum ubi quis repente ab infima conditione provebitur ad honesti muneris administrationem. Id quod haud scio an ulli contigerit feliciter quam Julio secundo. Nam fama est, hunc juvenem ad stipem scalum remo subigere solitum, & tamen à remulco non solum ad tribunal, verumetiam ad summum illud rerum humanarum culmen evectus est. Nec contentus hoc fastigio, pontificiæ ditionis pomeria multum protulit: longius etiam producturus, si per mortis inclementiam vitam illi producere licuisset. i. e. "From the oar to the tribunal (says he) is said in a proverbial way, when a man is advanced from a low condition, to an honourable post. I do not know whether any man was more fortunate on this article than Julius II; for it is said that he, in his younger days, used to row for money: and nevertheless he was raised, not only from a boat to the tribunal, but even to the summit of all human honours. And not satisfied with this exaltation, he very much enlarged the authority of the Popes, and would have enlarged it much more, had he not been snatched away by death." Father Theophilus Raynaud is mistaken, when he says (2) that Erasmus mentions the same thing in his explica-

(1) Erasmus. Adag. Chil. 3. Cent. 4. num. 86. pag. m. 725.

(2) Theophil. Rainaud. Hoplobeca, Sect. 2. Serie 3. cap. 1. pag. m. 303.

tion of the proverb, A scapha triumphalem quadrigam: i. e. "From a boat to a triumphal chariot:" for it was not Erasmus but Hadrian Junius (3) who explains this adage, and says, Efferrit potest de quovis è face hominum ad magnas opes dignitateque provecto, quemadmodum Julius Ligur post sedentariam operam in ducendo scalmu diu navatam, Sixti Pontificis beneficio insignibus Ecclesiasticorum honorum ornatus, tandem ad Pontificatum maximum emerfit. i. e. "This may be said of any one who, from the dregs of the people, is raised to great wealth and honours, as Pope Julius, who, after having been long employed in rowing a boat, was by the indulgence of Pope Sixtus, raised to high honours in the Church, and at last ascended to the pontifical throne." Anastasius Germonius Archbishop of Tarantasia, has asserted, that whatever is related concerning the birth of Sixtus IV and Julia II is false; and that Leonard de la Ruvere, father to Sixtus, was a very noble Knight; and that the Ruvere family, before this Pope's exaltation, lived in great splendor. Sixtus IV falso jactatus est à plebeis & piscatoribus editus, cum patrem haberet Leonardum de Ruvere, Equitem nobilissimum, ut observavit Anastasius Germonius, exponens indultum Hieronymi Cardinalis de Ruvere §. Sixtus num. 28. qui etiam § Magnis, de gentibus Ruveræ antiquo, (etiam ante Sixtum) splendore, agit diffusissimè (4).

(3) Hadr. Jun. Adag. Cent. 6. num. 43.

(4) Theophil. Rainaud. Hoplobeca, pag. 304. Mr.

circumstances in his election [B]; for, strictly speaking, it was before the Cardinals entered into the Conclave. He had won over the Duke of Valentino's faction, by making this Nobleman believe that he was his father [C], and promising to treat him as his son. However, he did the very contrary afterwards. No man was ever formed with a more martial soul than our Pope Julius [D]. He used to be present at the siege of

(5) In a manuscript remark he favoured me with.

Mr. de la Monnoie (5) pretends that Anastasius Germonius, "who only copies Onuphrius, cannot stand against Philephus, Baptist Fregoso, Volateranus, Corio, Erasmus, Machiavel, Chaffeneuz, Bandello, du Ferron, Maffo, and so many others, many whereof are quoted by Spondanus in his Continuation of Baronius, in the year 1471. n. 10." Bandello affirms that Julius II used to boast that he had formerly rowed a boat. Giulio secondo Pontefice, anteborche di bassissima gente fosse disceso, e non si vergognasse spesso fate dire che egli da Arbizuola, villa del Savonese, haveffe con una barchetta più volte, quando era garzone, menato de le cipolle à vendere à Genova, fù nondimeno buono di grandissimo ingegno, e di molto elevato spirito (6). i. e. "Pope Julius II, although of very mean birth, was not ashamed to say often, that from Arbizuola, a village of the Savonese, he, when a boy, carried onions in a boat to sell at Genoa; he yet was a man of prodigious parts, and master of an excellent genius."

(6) Bandello, Novell. 31. of Part 1. fol. 219 verso. This passage was communicated to me by Mr. de la Monnoie.

[B] There was a very singular circumstance in his election. He was sure of it before the Cardinals entered into the conclave; so that Julian de la Ruvere was Pope at his coming into it. There was an exception to this pretty common proverb, that he who is a Pope at his entering into the conclave, comes out a Cardinal: Cbi entra Papa, esce Cardinale (7). He had made sure of his faction by so many promises, and was enabled, so many ways, to enrich those who should favour him, that it was not possible for him to miss the Pontificate; for besides the wealth he had already amassed, he had that of other people's, every one being eager to offer him money, and even benefices; so that by these means he was enabled to promise more than was desired of him. Such are the iniquitous steps by which he ascended to the Pontificate. It is not a Protestant who observes this; it is an Italian author. Ma molto più ve lo promouono le promissioni immoderate, & infinite fatte de lui à Cardinali, à Principi, à Baroni, & à ciascuno, che gli potesse essere utile a questo negotio, di quanto seppono dimandare: & hebbe oltra ciò facultà di distribuir danari, e molti beneficii, e dignità Ecclesiastiche, così delle sue proprie, come di quelle d'altri: perche alla fama della sua liberalità molti concorrevano spontaneamente ad offerirgli, che usasse a proposito suo i danari, il nome, gli officii, & i beneficii loro: ne fu considerato per alcuno essere molto maggiore le sue promesse di quello, che poi Pontefice potesse, o dovesse osservare: perche haveva lungamente havuto nome tale d'buomo libero, & veridico, che Alessandro Sesto, nimico suo tanto acerbo, mordendolo nell'altre cose, confessava lui essere buono verace; laqual laude, egli sapendo, che NIUNO più facilmente inganna gli altri, che chi è solito, & ha fama di mai non gl'ingannare; non teme conto, per conseguire il Ponteficato, di maculare (8). i. e. "But the circumstances which contributed so much more to his advancement, was, the extravagant and numberless promises he made to the Cardinals, Princes, Barons, and to all those who might be of service to him in that affair. Besides, he had an opportunity of distributing monies and a great number of benefices, and spiritual dignities, not only such as were his own, but also those of other people; for so great was the fame of his liberality, that many came to him spontaneously, and desired him to dispose at pleasure of their monies, their names, their offices and benefices. Nor were his promises thought by many to be much greater than he could or would fulfil, when he should be raised to the Pontificate; for he had so long enjoyed the reputation of being an ingenuous man, and true to his word, that Alexander VI, who was so bitter an enemy to Julius, and inveighed so sharply against him on other occasions, confessed that he was a man of his word; an encomium which he, in order to obtain the Pontificate, did not scruple to stain; well knowing, that no persons have a more easy opportunity of imposing upon others,

(8) Guicciardin. lib. 6. folio m. 165 verso.

"than those who are not used to cheat, and do not pass for deceivers." Had he not employed those simoniacal methods, how would it have been possible for him to prevail with the Cardinals to give him their voices; he who had ever discovered so turbulent, so dreadful a disposition, and had created so many enemies? Il qualo era notissimo essere di natura molto difficile, e formidabile a ciascuno; & il quale inquietissimo in ogni tempo, e che haveva consumato l'eta in continui travagli; haveva per necessità offeso molti, esercitato odii, e inimicitie con molti buomini grandi (9). i. e. (9) Idem, ibid.

"Who being universally known to be of a very severe and terrible turn of mind; who had ever been restless, and having spent his life in perpetual toils, must necessarily have offended multitudes, and exercised hatreds against many persons of high distinction." Money effects all things; it created a Pope before the Cardinals had met in order to elect one; a circumstance that had never happened before. Il Cardinale di San Pietro in Vincola potente d'amici, de reputatione, e di ricchezze, haveva tirati a, e i voti di tanti Cardinali, che non havendo ardire di opporlegli quegli, che erano di contraria sentenza, entrando in Conclave gia Papa certo, e stabilito; fu con effempio incognito prima alla memoria de gli buomini, senza che altrimenti si chiudesse il Conclave, la notte medesima, che fu la notte dell'ultimo giorno d'Otobre, assunto al Ponteficato (10). i. e. (10) Idem, ibid. folio 165.

"The Cardinal of St. Peter in Vinculis, who was powerful in friends, in reputation and riches, had gained the voices of so many Cardinals; that those who were against him not daring to make any opposition, he, at his entrance into the Conclave, was elected Pope that night, the last of October, a circumstance not to be paralleled in the memory of man."

[C] He making... the Duke of Valentino believe, that he was his father. I have read this no where but in a work of Varillas. This Historian (11) relates, that the French accused Julius II "of having ascended St. Peter's throne by two irregular ways, viz. those of simony (12) and knavery. To prove the simony, they specified the benefices and legateships promised in the Conclave, and bestowed after the election on such Cardinals as were chiefs of the factions; and mentioned the sums of money which other Cardinals had received as a reward for their voices. To prove the knavery, they remonstrated to the same Pope that the Spanish Cardinals having bound themselves by an oath, not to give their voices but to that person, who should be proposed by the Duke of Valentino; the Cardinal of St. Peter in Vinculis, who was that Duke's enemy, bribed some persons, who wrought so far upon that Duke as to make him believe he was his father; that he had kept his mother, at a time when she was thought to be enjoyed only by Cardinal Borgia, who was afterwards Alexander VI; that the jealousy which this Borgia had conceived on that account was the sole cause of his persecuting him for upwards of ten years; but that now since a new Pope was to be elected, he, provided the Duke would employ his interest for him, would treat him as a son. The Duke of Valentino gave credit to what was told him in confidence, so far as to consent, that the Cardinals of his faction should elect him of St. Peter in Vinculis, who did not fail immediately to divest him of all Romagna and Umbria, instead of acknowledging him for his son."

(11) Anecdotes de France, pag. 229, 230.

(12) With regard to the Simony, see what has been cited from Guicciardin, remark [B] above.

[D] No man was ever formed with a more martial soul than our Pope Julius. Here follows what John le Maire, Historiographer of Lewis XII says concerning this matter. "Let us farther observe another surprizing difference in the conclusion of that work; I mean the gracious treatment and tractable behaviour of the Soldan towards the Most Christian King, in comparison of the rigour and obstinacy of the present Pope, who quite martial and sour, in his armour, as though of towns; and shewed greater ardour at them, than those who commanded his armies [E]. A vast number of writers affirm that he one day threw St. Peter's keys into the Tyber [F], in order that he might make use only of St. Paul's sword; but as those writers copy one another, though he was desirous that his dreadful and warlike armaments should be spoke of, as those of the mighty Tamerlane, Emperor and Soldan of the Tartars, will always continue wars, which become him as much as it does a Friar to dance in his habit. He yet must not think of making a new world wholly monstrous, as he thinks to do; for hogs will always eat acorns. The oak shall be stript of its leaves in due time, and the wood applied to such uses as are proper for it. But the beautiful stelferous crown, and the eagle of Jupiter, which, as Astrologers declare, are bright celestial luminaries, fixed and immoveable, shall shine in the firmament so long as the world lasts (13). William Budæus calls him a sanguinary leader of gladiators, Cum interim sub ipso lanista sanguinario (14); and has represented in very strong colours the scandal that Pope gave, who, at the age of seventy, appeared publicly in a military habit, whilst the people were going in procession to beg a peace from the Almighty. Cum

(13) John le Maine de Belges, Prologue to his Treatise of Schisms, pag. 2. Lyons edit. 1549 folio.

(14) Budæus, de sacerdos septuagenarius Christi, Pacis conditoris & parentis Legatus, Bellonæ sacris operaretur: cui cum gentium, cum profanum vulgus ad delubra pacis & concordie miserabili specie supplicationes inibat. Enimvero visendum spectaculum, Patrem non modo sanctissimum, sed etiam senio & canitie spectabilem, quasi ad tumultum Gallicum Bellonæ fama suos evocatos cientem; non trabea, non augustis insignibus venerandum, non Pontificis gestaminibus sacrosanctum, sed paludamenta & cultu barbarico conspicuum; sed furiali, ut ita dicam, confidentia succinctum, fulminibus illis brutis & inanibus lucidam, eminente in truci vultu cultuque spirituum atrocitate (15). i. e. "When a Minister of Christ, aged seventy years, an Ambassador sent from the Prince of Peace, was busied in offering up sacrifices to Bellona, to whom vows were made in a great profusion of human blood, and that at a time when the vulgar were mournfully praying in the Churches of Peace and Concord, it indeed was a surprizing spectacle, to behold a most holy father, venerable for his old age and silver hairs, rousing his subjects to war; not dressed in kingly robes or in a pontifical habit, but in that of a dreadful warrior, girded as it were with furious confidence; glittering with vain and empty fulminations; and discovering by his air and dress the rage with which he was fired." This is but a small part of Budæus's violent exclamations against this Pope. The reader may see them more at large in Flacius Illyricus's twentieth book of his Catalogus testium veritatis.

(15) Idem, ibid. apud Hottinger, ibid. pag. 546.

(16) Du Pleffis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 578.

(17) Du Pleffis cites Monstrelet in the new Additions, but it is an error; for Monstrelet died before the Pontificate of Julius II, and is not author of those Additions.

[E] He used to be present at the siege of towns, and shewed greater ardour at them than those who commanded his armies.] Du Pleffis Mornai does not make any additions to Guicciardin's expressions, when he says (16), "Being determined to attack Ferrara, he was advised to take Mirandola first; and being tired with the slow progress of the siege, which went not to his mind (a circumstance not expected, and that never happened before) Christ's Vicar upon earth, was there in person, against a Christian town, says Guicciardin, and though so old and sick, was so obstinate and impetuous, in a war, which he had raised against the Princes of Christendom, that nothing was done soon enough; he was ever crying aloud against the Captains, ever in a fury; and having his quarters so near the battery, that two men were killed in his kitchen, notwithstanding all the remonstrances his Cardinals could make with regard to the scandal he brought upon himself and the Roman Pontificate. Monstrelet (17) says as follows on this occasion; He abandoned St. Peter's chair, to assume the title of Mars God of Battle, to display his three crowns in the field, and to sleep in a watch tower; and God knows what a charming figure these miters, crosses and crosses made fluttering up and down the fields; the devil was not so silly as to be there, for benedictions were too cheap." Guicciardin represents in very strong terms the particulars relating to the siege of Mirandola; he observing that the Pope did not regard in any manner the horrible feverity and coldness of the season which retarded the besieger's works. Parò il secondo dì di Gennaio (18) da Bologna accompagnato da tre Cardinali, (18) Of the year e giunto nel campo, alloggiò in una casetta d'un villano, 1511. sottoposta a' colpi dell' artiglierie de' nimici: perche non era più lontana dalle mura della Mirandola che tiri in due volte una balestra commune: quivi affaticandosi, & esercitando non meno il corpo che la mente, e che l'Imperio, cavalcava quasi continuamente hora quà, hora là per il campo, sollecitato che si desse perfezzione al piantare dell' artiglierie, delle quali infino a quel giorno era piantata la minor parte, essendo impedito quasi tutte l'opere militari da' tempi asprissimi, e dalla neve quasi continua (19). i. e. "The Pope set out the second of (19) Guicciard. January from Bologna accompanied by three Car- lib. 9. folio 262 dinals; and being come to the camp, he took up verso. "his quarters in a country cottage that was exposed to the enemy's canon: it not being farther from the walls of Mirandola, than twice the distance of a common cross-bow shot. There toiling no less with his mind than his body, he was continually riding up and down the camp, in order to finish the planting of the cannon, the greatest part of which could not be employed till then; most of the operations of war being suspended by the very rigorous season, and the almost perpetual snows." Complaining of his Captains, he encouraged his soldiers by the hopes of plunder, he promising them not to capitulate with the city, but to permit them to sack it. Stette alla Concordia pochi giorni riconducendolo all' esercito la medesima impatienza, & ardore; il quale non raffreddò punto nel camino la neve grossissima, che tuttavia cadeva del Cielo, nè i freddi così smisurati che a pena i soldati potevano tollerargli: & alloggiato in una Chiesetta propinqua alle sue artiglierie, e più vicina alle mura, che non era l'alloggiamento primo, nè gli satisfacendo cosa alcuna di quelle, che si erano fatte, e che si facevano; con impetuossime parole si lamentava di tutti i Capitani, eccetto che di Marc' Antonio Colonna, il quale di nuovo haveva fatto venire da Modena; nè procedendo con minore impeto per l'esercito, hora questi sgridando, hora quelli altri confortando, e facendo con le parole, e con i fatti l'ufficio del Capitano. Prometteva, che i soldati procedevano virilmente, che non accetterebbe la Mirandola con alcuno patto; ma lascierebbe in potestà loro il saccheggiarla (20). i. e. "The Pope did not stay (20) ibid. folio long at Concordia, the same impatience and heat 263. "drawing him back to the army; nor was his fury lessened in any manner by the prodigious snows that fell perpetually in the road, nor by the cold which was so extreme that the soldiers could scarce bear it. He himself was quartered in a little Church near to his artillery, and nearer the walls than his former quarters were; and not being satisfied with any thing that had been done or was then doing, he vented the most bitter complaints against all his Captains, except Mark Anthony Colonna, whom he had lately sent for from Modena. He rode with great impatience about the camp; one moment crying out to one, and the next exhorting another, and acting as a Captain both in his words and actions. He promised that if the soldiers would signalize themselves, he would not suffer the citizens of Mirandola to come to any composition whatsoever, but suffer his army to sack it." Mezerai (21) re- (21) Avérgi Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 455. ad ann. 1511.

lates that the city having been surrendered upon articles (22) He should have said the 20th of January. (22) the 19th of March (22), the Pope would be, and was carried into it through the breach.

[F] A vast number of writers affirm that he one day threw St. Peter's keys into the Tyber.] I have not hitherto met with any other authority for this incident than the following Latin epigram of one Gilbertus Ducherius Vulto (23) of Aigueperre.

*In Gallum, ut fama est, bellum gesturus acerbum, Armatam educit Julius urbe manum:
Accinctus gladio, claves in Tiberidis amnem
Projicit, & sævus, talia verba facit:
Quum Petri nihil efficiant ad prælia claves,
Auxilio Pauli forsitan ensis erit.*

(23) Du Pleffis, pag. 580. cites only this author, and calls him Gilbertus Ducherius. He was of Aigueperre in Auvergne. His Epigrams were printed at Lyons in 1538.

" Julius

another, without citing one original author of credit, I would not advise any person to warrant that incident. However this be, it may be said that if this Pope was not endowed with the qualities that form the good Bishop, he at least had those of a conquering Prince. Pope Julius was very courageous, and had a head that was well turned for politicks, by which he formed alliances, or broke them, accordingly as it suited his interest. He made a very formidable League against the Commonwealth of Venice; and employed, among other things, the thunder of his excommunications; but finding that the victory which the King of France, one of the Chiefs of that League, had obtained over the Venetians, weakened that Republic too much, he abandoned his allies, and joined those of Venice. The Emperor and King of France being equally disgusted at him, endeavoured to bring him to reason, by a method that was always formidable to the Popes, viz. by calling a Council (b). However, this did not intimidate our Julius in any manner, but he proceeded with severity against this Council; and called another which gained the superiority, and to which the King of France at last submitted, after a low and groveling manner [G]. Julius II was indeed not alive at that time. The sacred

(b) It was convened at Pisa, and afterwards transferred to Milan, and lastly at Lyons.

“ Julius, as fame reports, resolv'd to wage “ Fell war with Gaul, leads out a mighty army :
 “ Girt with his sword, he into Tiber throws
 “ The keys; and furious, loudly thus he cries ;
 “ Since, Peter, thy fam'd keys in war avail not,
 “ I'll now unsheathe, O Paul, thy mighty sword.

It must be confessed that this is a very weak foundation; for when a Poet has a pretty thought, but does not find a subject proper for him to apply it, he does not scruple very much to supply the want of it by amplifications and fictions; and will rather sacrifice the truth than lose a smart saying. Poetae modo aliquid argute vel acute dicere audeantur, plerumque verumne sit an falsum, propemodum non curant (24). Be this as it will, this action of Julius II, whether true or false, is related by a great number of authors. One of the latest writers where I have seen it relates it thus (25). Percusso cum ipsis (Veneti:) foedere exercitum suum adversus Imperatoris confederatos Ferrariensem & Ludovicum XII, Regem Francorum, iniquissimus & perfidissimus bellator eduxit (26), cum ea voce, quae ipsum non S. Petri, sed perditissimi & sceleratissimi latronis successorem esse monstravit. Cum exercitu enim Roma egressus, Petri clavem furibundus in Tiberim jactavit, adeoque, uti ingeniose Bibliander conclusit, omne, quod à Sancto Petro se habere finxit jus, Tiberini fluminis resignavit; additis hisce verbis: Quia clavis S. Petri amplius nil juvat, (evaginato gladio) valeat gladius S. Pauli. i. e.

(24) Pappo Maffio, in Vita Leonis X.

(25) Joan. Henric. Heideggerus, Hist. Papatus, pag. 192, 193.

(26) Du Pleffis, pag. 580. should not have fixed this expedition a little after his election to the Pontificate.

“ Having concluded an alliance with the Venetians, “ this most unjust and most perfidious warrior marched “ out his army against the Emperor's allies, viz. the “ Duke of Ferrara, and Lewis XII of France, employing such an expression as shewed him to be the “ successer, not of St. Peter, but of a most abandoned “ and most villainous robber; for leading his army out “ of Rome, he, in a fury, threw St. Peter's key into “ the Tyber; in this manner resigning, as Bibliander “ ingeniously concludes, all the right and power which “ he pretended to have received from St. Peter; adding the following words, since St. Peter's key is now “ of no service, (saying which he unsheathed his sword) “ let's see what St. Paul's sword will do.” I must not omit that Hotman relates the same incident on the credit of Arnould du Ferron a Catholic Historian. Is est Julius secundus, says he (27), de quo & Arnoldus Ferronus, vir imprimis doctus, & Galliae nostrae historicus, & Burdegalenfis quondam Parlamenti Senator, itemque alii complures memoriae prodiderunt: quod cum exercitu comparato Roma in Galliam, infesto in Regem nostrum animo, contenderet, suasque armatas copias ipse loricator ex urbe per Tiberis pontem educeret, multis hominum audientibus haec pronuntiavit: Quando nobis claves Petri nihil profunt, age, gladium Pauli distingamus: simul claves, quas secum attuleras, in Tiberim projecit, gladiumque vagina eduxit. Qua de re notum illud vetus carmen est (28).

(27) In Bruto Fulmine, pag. m. 110, 111.

(28) It is Ducherius's Epigram quoted above: Hotman gives it at length.

I could never have believed that Hotman could be guilty of the unfairness, of which I am going to convict him. I have looked into Arnould du Ferron, and do not find that he cites Ducherius's epigram, as Hotman seems to say. The verses he quotes are of a very different kind; and he has added to them the answer which John de Lascaris made in favour of Julius II. I do not deny but that he relates the incident concerning the throwing of St. Peter's keys into the Tyber, but he questions whether it be not a fiction. Quin vulgatum est, says he (29), JOCONE CONFICTO an vero, quando Romani pictores Petro claves, Paulo ensem tribuunt, illum in Gallos emissurum copias ense accinctum & clavibus ad Tybrim profectum in aquas amnemque projecisse claves, haec inferentem, quandoquidem nihil Petri claves prodesse, Pauli ensem (quem mox eduxerat) auxilio futurum. i. e. “ It is reported, truly “ or jokingly, that whereas the Roman painters draw “ St. Peter with keys and St. Paul with a sword, our “ Pope being about to march out an army against the “ French, armed with the sword and keys, and passing “ by the river Tyber, tossed the keys into it, saying “ at the same time, that since St. Peter's keys were of “ no benefit, he would make use of St. Paul's sword “ which he immediately drew.” Now is it consistent with fairness and sincerity, to ground such a story on the authority of a great Catholic Magistrate, and to omit the declaration he made, viz. that he did not know but it might be an imposture? Most books are full of such quotations; and that person, who often takes the pains to verify whether those who quote authors act with candor and exactness on those occasions; any person, I say, who often takes that pains, must necessarily contract such a distrust as will prompt him to believe only his own eyes. If an author of so great a reputation as Hotman takes such a liberty, what will not the little fry of authors do, who have nothing to lose? We here must argue just contrary to him who cried out, Quid Domini facient, audent cum talia fures (30)? (30) Virgil. Æneid. 3. ver. 16.

 The sense is,
 “ What wou'd not masters do, if servants take “ Such freedom?

[G] The King of France submitted after a low and groveling manner.] This confirms what I have said elsewhere (31), that Princes seldom or never ended their quarrels with the Popes but to their confusion. Lewis XII had convened an assembly of the Gallican Church at Tours in 1510, in order to enquire whether he could justly make war on Julius II. This assembly had told him, that his cause was just, and that of the Pope was not so: and that he might proceed to the offensive part, in order to defend himself (32). At his and the Emperor's request, and in execution of the decree of the Council of Constance (33), some Cardinals had convened a great Council at Pisa. He and the Emperor had approved by their letters patents (34) the calling of this Council; he had protected the fathers who composed it, and who had declared Julius suspended from the administration of the Pontificate, and forbid all obedience to him (35); he had protected them, I say, against this Pope, who excommunicated and degraded them in his Council of Lateran; and nevertheless the same King declared some time after, that he looked upon the assembly of Pisa as a pretended Council. “ His proxies, these are the words of the instrument (36), having in their hands the letters patents of the said Most Christian King, sealed with his seal, and signed by him, and dispatched by his command, after the reverence and humility required in such cases, have entirely departed from the pretended Council of Pisa, and fully renounced it: and “ entirely, freely and simply adhered to the most holy “ Council

(31) The end of the note [B] in the article GREGORY VII.

(32) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 453.

(33) Ibid. pag. 457.

(34) Dated in July 1511.

(35) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 462.

(36) It is found entire in la Reponse de Coeffeteau au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1221, & seq.

(c) The 11th of April, being Easter Sunday of the year 1512.

sacred League which he formed in Italy received a dreadful blow by the battle of Ravenna (c); and if his enemies had known how, or been able, to make a proper use of that advantage, they doubtless would have humbled this haughty Pontif; whereas they gave him an opportunity to recover himself after this severe shock [H], by the little benefit they made of this victory, to which the powerful diversions made in his favour contributed greatly. The Swiss indulged him great succours; in return for which our Pontif bestowed, with great liberality, titles and a great many marks of honour on the Cantons [I]. He was snatched away by sickness, in the midst of the great designs he was meditating [K]; the twenty second of February 1513. He was a lover of “ Council of Lateran, as the only true and lawful

 “ one. Farther, pursuant to their procuration aforesaid, “ they have promised, that henceforward the said
 “ most Christian King shall not shew any favour, or “ give any assistance, in any manner whatsoever, to “ the said pretended Council of Pisa: but rather, that “ all those who shall be in his city of Lyons, or in “ any other part of his Kingdom, Territories and “ Lordships belonging to him, persisting in their ad“ herence to the said pretended Council of Pisa, shall “ be forced to quit those places in a month; and all “ those, of what state, degree, dignity or condition
 “ they may be, whether Laity or Clergy, who shall “ refuse obstinately to obey, he will drive them out,
 “ and consider them as Schismatics; and as such,
 “ on any order of the said holy Father, shall pursue
 “ them with an armed force in case it be necessary.
 “ Farther, the said proxies have promised as above,
 “ that the said most Christian King shall cause six “ Prelates, and four Doctors, or most eminent Gra“ duates among those who were in the said pretended “ Council of Pisa, shall be deputed to our said holy “ Father the Pope, for and in the name of the said “ pretended Council of Pisa, and representing the “ body of all those who adhered to it, to appear in “ person, between this and the first of January, be“ fore his Holiness, in order to renounce entirely and “ simply the said Council of Pisa, and abjure it, after “ having asked and received, humbly and in due “ form, forgiveness and absolution from his Holiness.
 “ And moreover, that they shall adhere and incorpo“ rate themselves with the said Council of Lateran, “ as to the only true and undoubted one, both in “ their own name and in that of their adherents.
 “ But in case they shall refuse to do this, the said
 “ King shall not give any succour, assistance, or fa“ vour against the authority of the holy, Apostolical
 “ See, to any of those that were present at, or fa“ voured the said pretended Council of Pisa; on the “ contrary, he shall to the utmost of his power, cause
 “ to be executed the sentences, decrees, and censures
 “ of our holy Father, even by force of arms, in case
 “ it be necessary, without the least dissimulation or “ fraud.” This is what those Prelates gain who side
 “ with their Prince in the contests he may have with
 “ the Court of Rome; they are sacrificed to the Pope
 “ when the divisions are ended. It is surprizing that so “ great a number should prefer their temporal to their “ spiritual Prince.

[H] They gave him an opportunity to recover himself after this severe shock.] He recovered himself so well, that the French were forced to evacuate the Milanese that very year. Nothing did so much prejudice to Lewis XII as the superstition of Anne of Bretagne his queen. She filled her brain with so many scruples, with respect to the war which the French waged against the Pope, that she retarded all her husband's good designs (37).

[I] Our Pontif bestowed, with great liberality, titles . . . on the Cantons.] “ Whereas his predecessors gave privileges to the Mendicant Friars, this Pope bestowed them on the Swiss Cantons, who were then the chief executors of his high enterprizes, to whom he gave the perpetual title of Defenders of Ecclesiastical Liberty, with several Bulls, Standards, a Sword and a golden Cap, and other presents, to oblige them “ to obey all his commands (38).”

[K] He was snatched away by sickness, in the midst of the great designs he was meditating (39).] This we are told by Guicciardin (40). In questi tali e tanti pensieri (that is, to prompt the King of England to make war on France, and dethrone Lewis XII, and bestow his Kingdom on the first who should be able to conquer it) e forse an-cora in altri più oculti, e maggiori (perche in un animo tanto ferace non era incredibile concetto alcuno, quantunque vasto, e smisurato) l'opresse dopo infirmata di molti giorni la morte. . . . Principe d'animo, e di costanza insuperabile, ma impetuoso, e di concetti smisurati, per i quali che non precipitasse, lo sostenne più la riverenza della Chiesa, la discordia de' Principi, e la condizione de' tempi, che la moderazione, e la prudenza: degno certamente di somma gloria, se fusse stato Principe secolare, o se quella cura, e intentione, che hebbe ad esaltare con l'arti della guerra, la Chiesa nella grandezza temporale, bavesse havuta ad esaltarla con l'arti della pace nelle cose spirituali: e nondimeno sopra tutti suoi antecessori, di chiarissima, e honoratissima memoria, massimamente appresso a coloro, uguali, essendo perduti i veri vocaboli delle cose, e confusa la distintione del pesarle rettamente, giudicamo che sia più ufficio de' Pontefici, aggiungere con l'armi, e col sangue de' Christiani, imperio alla Sedia Apostolica, che l'affaticarsi con l'esempio buono della vita, e col correggere, e medicare i costumi trascorsi per la salute di quelle anime, per laquale si magnificano che Christo gli habbia costituiti in terra suoi Vicari (41). i. e. “ In (41) See a passage of Mezerai, in the remark [O] citation (60).

 “ these mighty and various thoughts, and perhaps “ in others more secret and more important (for in so “ fierce a mind as his, no idea or imagination, how “ vast soever it might be, is incredible) he, after “ many days sickness, drew near his end. . . . he “ was a Prince of wonderful constancy and courage,
 “ but so impetuous and full of vast conceptions, that
 “ the reverence due to the church, the discord of “ Princes, and the state of the times, did more to “ prevent his ruin, than his own moderation or pru“ dence. He doubtless would be worthy of the “ highest glory, had he been a temporal Prince; or “ if that care and attention he had to raise the tem“ poral grandeur of the church by means of war, had “ been employed to raise it, by means of peace, in “ spiritual matters. Nevertheless he was bewailed “ more than any of his predecessors, though ever so “ worthy; and particularly by those persons, who “ having lost the true names of things, and confound“ ed distinctions in such a manner that they were not “ able to weigh them rightly, thought it an office
 “ more duly belonging to the Popes, to increase the “ power of the See of Rome by arms and the blood of “ Christians, than to endeavour, by good examples “ of life, and a proper curing of corrupt manners, at
 “ the salvation of those souls, for which they glory,
 “ that Christ has appointed them his Vicar upon “ earth.” How judicious is this, and how admirable
 “ a censure is it of those impatient Doctors, who believe “ that every thing is just, provided it contributes to the “ temporal grandeur of the church! This strikes Cardinal “ Pallavicino in particular, who speaks so faintly of
 “ the faults of Julius II, and excuses them on account of “ the temporal advantages they brought to St. Peter's “ patrimony. *Fu dotato, says he (42), di spiriti eccelsi, (42) Istoria del
 “ a tal che se fosse stato principe di dominio sol tempo. Concilio, lib. 1.
 “ rale, meriterebbe d'esser contato fra gli Eroi . . . Certamente senza una tal ferocia non bavrebbe recuperato egli “ alla Chiesa il piu e' l meglio del suo dominio. i. e.* “ That “ Pope was endowed, says he, with a high spirit, in“ somuch that had he been a temporal Prince, he “ would deserve to be ranked among the Heroes . . .
 “ Had it not been for that fierceness, he certainly “ would not have recovered to the church the “ most and best parts of its jurisdiction or patrimo“ ny.”

Paulus Jovius (43) declares that Julius II, at his (43) Ibid. num. death, had meditated a grand design on the Kingdom of Naples. Hæc ingenti animo, verum agro corpore co- gitantem, diuturnus sumentis alvi moribus intercept (44). Vita Alfonsi Ferraria Ducis, pag. m. 353, which 354.

(37) See Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. pag. 457, 460.

(38) Du Pleffis Mornai, Mystère d'Iniquité, pag. 580. See also Heidegger, Hist. Papatns, pag. 192, 193.

(39) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII, liv. 10. pag. m. 217, & seq. specifies several.

(40) Guicciardin, lib. 11. folio 325.

of the fair-sex and the bottle [L]; and he is even accused of sporting with his own sex [M]; and there is not a single crime he escapes being accused of, in a dialogue which it is pretended he had with St. Peter at Paradise Gate. The hatred he conceived against France, where he had found so secure an asylum under the Pontificate of Alexander VI, was so excessive, that he gave orders for killing all the French that should which he suffered himself to be flattered, was but an empty name, whilst the Spaniards were possessed of Naples: If God will but enable me to act, answered he, striking his staff against the floor, it shall not be so long. Ad quod Pontifex quassato scipione quo innixus pavimentum infrendendo pertundebat, respondit brevi futurum, ut Neapolitani non iratis superis externum jugum excutierent (45).

(45) Idem, ibid.

[L] He was a lover of the fair sex and the bottle. We are told that the Emperor Maximilian made the following exclamation: Deus æterne! nisi vigilares quam male esset mundo, quem regimus nos, ego miser venator, & ebriosus ille ac sceleratus Julius (46). i. e. "Eternal God! if thou didst not watch over the world what would become of it, under such an Emperor as I (a poor hunter) and so wicked and drunken a Pope as Julius II?" Some Historians observe, that this Pontif. invented a new name in order to accuse the French of drinking wine too copiously, and voiding it immediately by urine, and they add that this was his great vice. Gallos in universonum novo nomine augens Romanam supellestem, Miscurivinos vocaret, quasi immodicos vini potores quod mox emittendum esset, quo vitio ipse maxime laborabat (47). i. e. "He added a new word to the Roman tongue, giving the French the general name of Wine-Pissers, as though they drank wine immoderately, which was to be voided afterwards; a vice to which he himself was very much addicted." I proceed next to his lewdness. He had a daughter, who was married to John Jordan de Urfinis, and he is made to say in a dialogue he had with St. Peter (48), that he had had the foul disease.

(46) Du Pleffis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 580. citing Joachim Curæus, Preisdienfis, in Annalibus Gentis Silesiæ.

(47) Arnoldus Ferronus, in Ludovic. XII., fol. 52 verso.

(48) I speak of this Dialogue in the remark [N]

It is to be observed, that there is an error in the words of Arnold de Ferron above cited. He supposes that the Pope coined the Latin word Miscurivinos to denote the drunkenness of the French; but Julius II did not express himself in that language; he employing the Italian tongue, and the word Pisciavini. It is said that one of his officers, a Norman, said one day to him, alluding to this, By my troth, holy Father, you are a true Frenchman then; for you are one of the greatest Wine-Pissers upon earth (49).

(49) I am obliged to Mr. de la Moënoie for this remark.

[M] He is even accused of sporting with his own sex. It is certain that Julius II is accused of this abominable vice. We read in a treatise of one of our Divines of Paris, of two young Gentlemen forced by him, whom Queen Anne, consort of Lewis XII, had recommended to Cardinal de Nantes, in order to carry them into Italy (50). In all probability du Pleffis gives us here a translation of the following words of Wolfius. Legitur in Commentario Magistrorum Parisiensium (2) de Julio secundo Papa, quod duobus nobilissimi generis adolescentibus, quos Anna Galliarum Regina Nantensi Cardinali informandos commiserat, & aliis multis diabolicâ rabie (prob facinus) suprum intulerit (51). This quotation seems to me too vague and indeterminate; he should have told us where, and in what place, the treatise of the Paris Doctors was printed. John Crepin, has been guilty of an anachronism, in the relation he gives of this adventure. "We read, says he (52), in a certain commentary of the Doctors of Paris against the Lutherans, that this Julius, excited by a diabolical frenzy, forcibly enjoyed two youths of a noble family, whom Queen Anne of France had sent to Robert Cardinal de Nantes, to be instructed by him." The Doctors of Paris would have been far from inserting such a particular in a controversial piece against the Lutherans; if they had inserted it any where, it is in the pieces that were wrote against Julius II under Lewis XII.

(50) Du Pleffis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 581.

(51) Wolfius, Leſion. Memorab. tom. 2. pag. 21.

(52) In his Etat de l'Eglise, ad ann. 1513, pag. m. 512.

§ (2) This citation of Wolfius is false. He should have said: in Commentario super Articulos Magistrorum Parisiensium: whence it would have appeared, that this Commentary being a composition of the new Lutherans, one might expect to find such facts in it, as could not be decently advanced by the Sorbonne. This commentary, (to observe it transiently) is cited by John Bale in his Life of Clement VII; and it relates to the XXV articles of the Sorbonne, published by Peter Gallandius in 1543, and refuted by Calvin in his Antidote, &c. See Du Boulay, Tom. VI, pag. 384 and 385 of his History of the University of Paris. REM. CRIT.]

[N] A Dialogue which it is pretended he had with St. Peter at Paradise gate. This is a very satyrical piece. Wolfius has inserted it in his Leſiones memorabiles (53). Rivetus (54) affirms that it was printed at Paris with the King's licence in the year 1612, at the end of the acts of the Council of Pisa. The substance of this Satyr is as follows. "Paulo post ipsius mortem Vir quidam doctus in lucem emisit Dialogum, quem inscripsit, Julius, in quo Pontificem hunc horrendorum criminum infimulat, nim. quod fuerit hominem scelerosum, temulentum, homicidam, simoniacum, veneficum, perjurum, rapax, portentosis libidinum generibus undique confpurcatus, denique scabie, quam vocant Gallicam, totus coopertus (55). i. e. "Soon after his death, a certain learned man published a dialogue, to which he gave the title of Julius, wherein this Pope is accused of horrid crimes, viz. with being publicly a mischievous man, a drunkard, a murderer, guilty of simony, a poisoner, a perjured wretch, rapacious, defiled in every respect with lusts of a monstrous kind; in fine, quite covered over with what is called the French disease." Some declared that this sharp piece was wrote by Faustus Andrelinus (56), and some ascribed it to Erasmus. Placcius affirms that several authors declare this, in the two places he quotes of Melchior Adam (57). I have looked into those two places, and find no other testimony than that of Leo Juda. Thus Placcius imposes upon us. Erasmus was very angry that this piece should be ascribed to him, and he endeavours to clear himself, very seriously, of this imputation in a letter; wherein he observes, that the piece in question was wrote against Pope Julius during the schism, but that he could not tell who the author was. That he had just cast his eye upon it five years before; and had met with it in Germany, but under different titles. That some said it was composed by a Spaniard, others by Faustus the Poet, and others again by Jerom Balbus. That he was not able to guess who it was wrote by; that the author, whoever he was, must be silly; but that he who published it was much more in fault. That he is surprized that some persons should declare it to be his, merely from the style, he judging it to be vastly different from it, &c. Dialogi cujusdam suspicionem mihi moluntur impingere. Is, ut ex argumento satis constat, scriptus est in odium divi Julii Pontificis maximi schismatis tempore, sed à quo incertum, ante quinque annos degustavi verius quam legi. Post reperi in Germania apud quosdam descriptum, sed variis titulis. Quidam testabantur Hispani cujuspiam esse, sed suppresso nomine, rursus alii Fausto Poeta tribuebant, alii Hieronymo Balbo. Ego quid de his conjeſsem non habeo, subodoratus sum quoad licuit, verum nondum perveſtigavi, quod animo meo faceret satis. Ineptiſſi quisquis scripsit, at majore supplicio dignus, quisquis evulgavit. Ac miror esse qui solo styli argumento mihi obtrudere parent, quum nec mea sit phraſis, nisi prorsus ipse mihi sum ignotus, nec mirum sit futurum, etiam si qui in oratione nonnihil referrent Erasmicum, quum verſer in manibus omnium, & referimus serè, in quorum assidua leſione verſamur (58) (8).

(53) In the edition of Wolfius, it is in the title F. A. F. Poeta Regii Libellus de obitu Julii secundi.

(54) A Desiderio Erasmo Rotodamo conscriptus esse diversorum testimoniiſ confirmatur apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. Germ. pag. m. 96. (it should be 97.) and pag. 167. (it should be 197) in Vitis Medic. Germ. Placcius, de Anonymis, num. 299. pag. 72.

(55) Erasmus, Epist. 1. lib. 12. pag. 575, 576.

§ (8) Notwithstanding these protestations of Erasmus, yet this dialogue has still been ascribed to him; and the late Mr. Baluze has left, at the beginning of his copy, a Preface in his own hand writing, wherein he asserts that Erasmus is certainly the author of it. See Num. 2656 of Bibliotheca Baluziana, printed at Paris; for Martin and Boudot, 1719, in three volumes in 12mo. REM. CRIT.]

should be met with [O], and promised a reward to all those who should execute his command. We must not believe that the wine and hams which he sent to the King of England, were the true cause of the war which the English proclaimed against France [P]. I don't know whether it be possible to find a certain speech wherein he was very much abused. Varillas who speaks of this, has exposed himself to censure [Q]. Cardinal Bembo's

[O] The hatred he conceived against France... was so excessive... that he gave orders for killing all the French that should be met with. "Pope Julius observed no bounds in his anger. He had drawn up a decree, in the name of the Council, to transfer the Kingdom of France, and the title of Most Christian to the King of England (56). As he was just going to make this public, heaven taking pity on him and of Christendom snatched him away the 23d of February. He died of a hectic fever, caused, as it is related, by the uneasiness he was under, at his not having been able to prevail with the Venetians to be reconciled with the Emperor; so furious were his passions, and more becoming a Turkish Sultan than the common father of the Christians (60)." As for his order to murder all the French, I have read it no where but in page 109 and 110 of Francis Hotman's Brutum Fulmen. Si quæ patrum memoria, says he, in hoc regno contigerunt recordari volumus, primum hoc reperiemus: Ludovicum XII (at, quem Regem? qui Patris patriæ nomen summo bonorum omnium consensu adeptus est) urbes aliquot Italia, bello captas, Papæ Julii secundi ditioni adjunxisset. Papam intermissis aliquot mensibus hanc Regi pro accepto beneficio gratiam retulisset, ut non modo eum schismaticum et hæreticum pronuntiaret, proscriberet, diris suis excommunicationum fulminibus infestaretur: verum etiam Gallos omnes hostilem in modum cruciandos, interficiendosque curaret: præmium etiam percussoribus polliceretur, peccatorum omnium veniam, et impunitatem, si quis vel unicum Gallum quoquo modo trucidaret... Quo nuntio (61) Julius accepto tanto dolore atque iracundia exarsit, ut non modo Gallis omnibus aqua et igne interdiceret, verum etiam obvium quemque mactari, trucidarique imperaret: præmiis etiam, ut dixi, scarios ac percussores invitaret. i. e. "If we would recollect those things which happened in this Kingdom in the memory of our fathers, the first incident that occurs is this: Lewis XII (but what kind of Monarch was he? One who obtained the title, by the universal consent of all good men, of father of his country) added some cities of Italy, that had been taken during the war, to the dominions of Pope Julius II. That this Pontif, some months after, rewarded the King in the following manner for the favours he had received; viz. that he not only pronounced him a schismatic and heretic; proscribed and excommunicated him; but even caused all the French to be tortured and murdered; and even promised all those who should kill, in any manner soever, but a single Frenchman, not only a reward, but likewise the pardon of all their sins... This news being brought Julius (61), he flew into such a passion, that he not only excommunicated all the French, but even commanded those who should meet with them to murder them; he also encouraged ruffians and murderers, as I before observed, by promising them rewards."

[P] We must not believe that the wine and hams... was the true cause of the war which the English proclaimed against France. Spondanus has been so unfair as to insinuate this, and to joke upon it; and he pretends that the only reason why Polydore Virgil suppressed such an incident, was, that he might have at one and the same time the honour both of Italy and England. This Polydore was an Italian, and he resided in England, for which reason he interested himself for the honour and glory of both nations. Now he thought it shame that Italy should win over people by such a lure, and a shame for England to let itself be caught by such a bait. Here follows the Annalist's words. Festivum est quod refert Guicciardinus, appulisse hoc tempore in Angliam Pontificiam longam navem Falerno vino, caseis suminisque onustam; quæ nomine Pontificis Regi, ac Principibus, Antistitibusque donata, ab omnibus miro applausu accepta sunt: et plebem, quam plerumque non minus leviam quam graviam movent, ad eam navem videndam summam cum voluptate accurrisse, gloriantem antea nunquam in eâ insulam navim ullam cum Pontificis vexillis conspectam. Quibus bellam gentem nobis depingit Guicciardinus, et vini acutique gustus appetentem, quibus sciret Pontifex eam facile in partes suas trahi posse; scuti olim Narses fecisse dicitur (), ut Longobardos in Italiam alliceret; omnis generis poma, aliarumque deliciarum irritamenta, quorum Italia ferax esset, mittens, ut pauperrima sua rura desertentes ad occupandam regionem cunctis refertam divitiis venirent. Eam rem ad id insignem, et Regi, principibusque, et Antistitibus, ac populo maxime acceptam gratamque, cum Polydorus Virgilius suæ Historiæ Anglicanæ non inferuerit; existimamus, ut Italum et in Angliam commorantem, utriusque nationis gravitati parcere voluisse (62).* i. e. (62) Spondanus, ad ann. 1512, num. 3. pag. m. 289. where the following words are put by way of summary; Quibus illicis Pontifex sibi Augusti benedictos reddiderit. i. e. "The allurements employed by the Pope, in order to win over the English." Guicciardin tells a pleasant story, viz. that one of the Pope's ships, laden with Falernian wine, cheeses, and hams, came at that time to England; all which things being presented in the Pope's name to the King, the Lords and Prelates, were received universally with applause; and that the common people, who are generally as much affected with trifles as with things of a solid kind, flocked with the utmost pleasure to view this ship; boasting that they had never before beheld a ship in their island carrying the Pope's colours. Guicciardin says, that the fine nation in question was very fond of wine and high seasoned meats, by which the Roman Pontif knew he should easily prevail with them to side with him: as it is related that Narses did formerly, in order to entice the Lombards into Italy; sending them fruits of every kind, and other dainties of which Italy is fruitful, in order that they might be prevailed upon to leave their extreme poor rural cottages, and possess themselves of a country abounding with riches of every kind. Now Polydore Virgil has omitted, in his History of England, this remarkable incident, so highly acceptable to the King, the Lords and Prelates, and especially to the people; and the reason for his omitting it I take to be this: as he was born in Italy, and resided in England, he did not care to expose either of those nations." Mezerai comes much nearer to truth and good sense; he observing, that the Pope fired Henry VIII with the ambition of protecting the true Church. The English, says he (63), "were upon the point of breaking with the King: for the Pope had intoxicated them with the vain glory of defending the Holy See, and with the flavour of the delicious wines of every kind, whereof he had sent them a large ship-load, together with hams, sausages and spices, to make them relish the better." According to Varillas (64), it was from a religious motive, that an English Bishop founded an alarm for war the day after the feast (65), at which the chief men of the Parliament were regaled with the good wines and excellent cheeses, which the Pope's galley had brought to London. The Prelate in question represented, that Lewis XII was a persecutor of the Church, and that it would reflect eternal shame on the English nation, to live in peace with those who persecuted the Holy See. Varillas ought to have explained a little better the several reasons employed by this Prelate; and not have contented himself with hinting, that religious motives were blended with those of policy. There is no doubt but the English Prelate represented, that Lewis XII wanted to dethrone the Pope, in no other view but to elect another who might suffer him to conquer all Italy. This doubtless was the true spring that put Henry VIII in motion. He saw plainly that if this was not opposed, Lewis XII would have the glory of deposing Pope Julius II, the scourge of the Christian world; after which he would elect any man he pleased for Pope, and subdue all Italy. Neither human politicks nor jealousy will let a Prince consent to such an increase of the glory and power of his neighbour; and for this reason Lewis XII was attacked by England, Switzerland and Spain.

[Q] Varillas who speaks... of a certain speech... has exposed himself to censure. He says (66), that Pompeo Colonna and Antonio Savelli hearing that

(59) Concitava il Re d'Inghilterra alla guerra: al quale aveva ordinato che per decreto del Concilio Lateranense se trasferisse, il nome del Re Christianissimo: sopra la qual cosa era già scritta una Bolla, contenendosi in essa medesimamente la privazione della dignità, e del titolo di Re di Francia, concedendo quel Regno a qualunque lo occupasse. Guicciardi. lib. 11. folio 325.

(60) Mezerai, Abreg. Chronolog. tom. 4. pag. 464. ad ann. 1513.

(61) i. e. that he had been suspended by the Council of Pisa transferred to Milan.

(*) Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Longob. lib. 1. cap. 5.

(62) Spondanus, ad ann. 1512, num. 3. pag. m. 289. where the following words are put by way of summary; Quibus illicis Pontifex sibi Augusti benedictos reddiderit. i. e. "The allurements employed by the Pope, in order to win over the English."

(63) Abregé Chronolog. tom. 4. pag. 459. ad ann. 1512.

(64) Varill. Histoire de Louis XII. liv. 8. pag. 81.

(65) Henry VIII gave the entertainment.

(66) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII. liv. 8. pag. 8. ad ann. 1512.

Bembo's History of Venice, is sufficient to shew the passion, the insincerity, and prodigious ambition of Julius II, though this Historian is not so prolix on this article as Guicciardin.

Our Pope was so tired of the plaisters which his Surgeon had put unsuccessfully upon an ulcer, that at last there was no possibility of prevailing upon him to let it be dressed. The Surgeon who had promised with an oath not to use such plaisters any more, had recourse to an artifice which wrought a cure [R]. Bandello relates a pleasant incident.

Pope was fallen " into a kind of swoon which lasted four hours, and made the persons present think he was dead . . . assembled (67) their friends, ran up and down the streets, stirred up the citizens to rebellion, and led them to the Hotel de Ville, where Colonna the best orator of the two, made the most satirical speech that is extant, against the Popes in general, and Julius in particular. He declared that most of them had abused the supreme authority ever since the time they had usurped it; and enumerating all the cities that had formerly been governed by Tyrants, he concluded that none of them had met with such ill treatment as Rome. He descended to the particulars of the conduct of the last Popes, and dropt some particulars on that subject which it is not decent to relate." Varillas adds (68) that " Guicciardin had drawn up this speech from the memoirs of two or three people who had heard it spoke, but it has been struck out of the body of his history. It is nevertheless printed separately in Italian; and his French translator who had recovered it, restored it to the place from whence it had been taken." I have occasion for another passage of this author, before I make my criticism; let us therefore see the beginning of his preface (69). " When I caused, says he, the eighth book of this history to be printed, I imagined that the speech of Pompeio Colonna to the principal citizens of Rome, to prompt them to shake off the Papal yoke, was a very scarce piece: and indeed I had seen it no where but in the King's library. But I have been informed since, that it had been reprinted, by the direction of the late Mr. de Wicquefort, in the beginning of the book published by him, entitled Thuanus restitutus, and consequently that it is not hard to be met with at present. It is nevertheless certain, that Mr. de Wicquefort has discharged, in this respect; only part of what he owed the public, since he has not mentioned the motives that occasioned this speech, which is the most insolent that can be read; and as Guicciardin has not related them, the curious will perhaps not be displeas'd if I should supply the defect of those two historians. " The first motive &c." I cannot affirm that this speech is in the King's library, nor can I say that it is not, but I may venture to declare that Guicciardin never inserted it in his history. He speaks (70) but transiently of the insurrection, which the two men in question endeavoured to raise; and does not say that Pompeio Colonna, being the best orator, made the speech. It is not true that his French translator has restored that speech to the place from whence it had been taken. If this was so, it would not be a scarce piece, the French translation of Guicciardin being easily met with. It was not reprinted by the direction of Mr. de Wicquefort at the beginning of the Thuanus restitutus: but doubtless what follows misled Mr. de Varillas. In Guicciardin's fourth book, a long discourse has been omitted with respect to the manner how the Popes made themselves temporal sovereigns of part of Italy. The Protestants have preserved this discourse, and published it separately a numberless multitude of times (71). It is (72) in Latin, in Italian, and in French, at the end of the Thuanus restitutus printed at Amsterdam in 1663; and it is inserted in its proper place in the French translation of Guicciardin, by Jerom Chomedey, and printed at Geneva in the year 1593 with summaries, and marginal notes that plainly seem to be writ with a true Protestant spirit (73). Varillas having been told something concerning the history of the discourse in question, and concerning the speech made by those who endeavoured to excite the Romans to rebellion in 1511, has confounded the one with the other (74).

true, as Bayle pretends, that Guicciardin never inserted Pompeio Colonna's speech in his history, and spoke only transiently of the popular insurrection that he and Antonio Savelli endeavoured to excite in Rome in the year 1511; it is also true that he has inserted an extract of their speech to the people on that occasion; and that this extract, after having been omitted in most of the editions of Guicciardin, has been placed, not in the beginning, as Varillas says, of Wicquefort's Thuanus restitutus, but at the end of it; and it is surprizing, that Mr. Bayle, not only did not perceive this, but even affirmed positively the contrary, since he speaks of three passages of Guicciardin collected by de Wicquefort; and that the third of these passages is the very extract of Pompeio Colonna's speech. It is true indeed on the other side, that Varillas should not have spoke of this, as tho' it had been the speech itself, nor as being " the most insolent speech that can be read, and " the most satirical extant against the Popes in general " and Julius in particular," nor that Colonna descended " to the particulars of the conduct of the last Popes, " and that he dropt some particulars concerning this " subject which it is not very decent to relate;" since, besides that there is nothing like this in the extract in question; that nothing is there said in particular concerning the last Popes, and that Julius II is not so much as named in it, there are but two small pages in 12mo, in which they content themselves with representing in general the inconveniencies and irregularities of Church government. Nor should he have said, that the French translator, who recovered it, restored it to the place, whence it had been taken; for it is not there; a circumstance that is pretty surprizing, since that the other two castrated passages of Guicciardin, and collected by Mr. de Wicquefort, are each fixed in their proper places in the translation just mentioned. It was therefore just in Bayle to affirm that the speech in question was not restored, and this is the only thing on which his censure is grounded; for with regard to what he adds, viz. that doubtless Varillas confounded a castrated passage of the 4th book of Guicciardin, with this which belongs to the 10th book; what has been said above, shews sufficiently that these assertions are not well-grounded; and it is a proof of what Mr. Bayle has himself said elsewhere with so much judgment, viz. that on matters relating to facts, a person ought to be very cautious in his conjectures; and that such a one had much better suspend his judgment till such time as he has perused several writings or memoirs (*). I am informed by Mr. Lieve of Leipzig, that this extract of the speech in question is in its proper place, in the Italian edition of Guicciardin ap- presso Jacobo Storer 1636; but as to the speech itself, which Varillas says he saw in the King of France's Library, his authority is so much suspected, that it is not safe to rely upon it. REM. CRIT.]

[R] His Surgeon . . . had recourse to an artifice which wrought a cure.] Naudé brings this as an example, in a Dissertation where he enquires whether a patient may be imposed upon. Is (celeberrimus Chirurgus Joannes de Vigo) dum modum carnosum Julii secundi contumaciorem in dies fieri, & Pontificem omne genus remedium constanter respuere animadverteret, novam quamdam medendi rationem meditatus est: pannos siquidem veteres frustillatim conscriptos unâ cum panis filiginei mica molliore, & arsenici sublimati in aquis rosarum & plantaginis excepti fomento, ad tertias in vase aëneo decoxit, expressisque demum illis, & pulveris modo ulceri admotis, quod nullis deinceps unguentis se curaturum jurjurando receperat, brevi summa cum omnium admiratione Pontificem à gravi & molesto affectu liberavit (74). in Pentade Quæst. i. e. " That celebrated Surgeon John de Vigo, observing that Julius the Second's ulcer grew more stubborn every day, and that the Pope constantly refused every kind of remedy, projected a new method of cure; for he boiled, to a third part, in a brass cap. 3.

(67) Ibid. pag. 10.

(68) Ibid. pag. 13.

(69) Of tome 3. of the Hist. of Lewis XII.

(70) Guicciardin. liv. 10. folio 230. See also Paulus Jovius, in Vita Leonis X. pag. m. 108.

(71) See the article GUICCIARDIN, remark [A].

(72) With two other passages that had been retrenched, the one of the 3d book, and the other of the 10th of GUICCIARDIN.

(73) Written by de La Noue.

(*) Bayle's article of SEYMOUR (Anne, Margaret and Jane.)

(74) Naudæus, in Pentade Quæst. i. e. " That celebrated Surgeon John de Vigo, observing that Julius the Second's ulcer grew more stubborn every day, and that the Pope constantly refused every kind of remedy, projected a new method of cure; for he boiled, to a third part, in a brass cap. 3.

incident [S]. I have just now read in a French author, that this Pope was so malicious, as to invent a fiction injurious to the memory of Gaston de Foix Duke of Nemours; and which might heighten the superstition of the people, to the prejudice of France. This fiction was, that a serpent had been seen to come out of the Duke de Nemour's sepulchre. The author who tells this story, inveighs very sharply against this Pope [T].

"brass kettle, old rags torn to scraps, with crumbs of the finest white bread, and a fomentation of arsenic sublimated in rose-water and plantain; then expressing or drying them, and applying them to the ulcer, to which he had sworn he would no more apply any salve or plaster, he speedily cured the Pope, to the admiration of every one, of a very troublesome disease."

[S] Bandello relates a pleasant incident. The Germans, says he (75), "having asked the Pope leave to eat flesh on St. Martin's day when it should fall on a fish day, Julius being unwilling to deny their request publicly, granted it them, but on condition that they should drink no wine that day." Now this was equivalent to a refusal, there being more to be lost than got by such an indulgence.

[T] This Pope was so malicious, as to invent a fiction injurious to the memory of Gaston de Foix . . . The author who tells this story, inveighs very sharply against this Pope. I will first relate the story: Non desuere qui predicarent serpentem visum de Fuxensis tumulo sibilum exilire, & hi maxime sacrificuli; nam ab iissem sæpe aliquid spectri novi intelligimus, sed Physici mitiores (76). i. e. "There were not wanting some who spread a report, that a serpent was seen to issue swiftly, hissing, from Gaston de Foix's monument, and those persons were chiefly trifling Priests; for these frequently entertain us with the account of some new phantom or prodigy; but natural Philosophers are more indulgent to us." The reader will observe by the way, that this author says that the Priests were the chief promoters of this tale, and that it is pretty much their custom to spread prodigies. I omit his quotations from Elian and Sozomen (77), and will take only those particulars which relate to our Julius II. Tales nugas in vulgus emiserat malignitas Julii II Pontificis Rom. credulitas rudis dederat incrementum (78). i. e. "Those trifling stories owed their rise to the malice of Pope Julius II, who spread them among the people, and which their credulity greatly increased." He afterwards relates in what manner this Pope imposed upon Cardinal George d'Amboise; made Rome to echo with the sound of arms; and how delighted he was with satyrical verses written against France. He pardoned a Poet who was guilty of several crimes; and ordered him a handsome sum of money, for a distich that will be seen below. versiculis ad Gallorum ignominiam spectantibus mirè delibatur; adeo ut præter stateres aureos ducentos muneravit, præter delictorum abolitionem, qui bos vulgasset:

(76) Forcatulus, de Gallor. Imperio & Philosphia, lib. 4. pag. m. 553.

(77) Book 9. chap. 17. concern two serpents found in the sepulchre of Zachariah the Prophet.

(78) Forcat. de Gallor. Imperio & Philosphia, lib. 4. pag. 554.

*Julius evulsi Gallis cythereis alas:
Martius hic prisco Cæsare major erit* (79).

(79) Idem, ibid. pag. 550.

"He was exceedingly pleased with verses that reflected ignominy on the French; inasmuch that he presented to a Poet two hundred pieces of gold, besides the pardon of all his offences, for publishing the following lines:

"Greater by far than Rome's immortal Cæsar Shall Julius be, who pluck'd the wings of Gaul."

JULIUS III, elected Pope the 7th of February 1550, was named John Maria del Monte. He was of mean extraction, and a true soldier of ecclesiastical fortune. He had risen gradually till he came to be President of the Council of Trent [A]. Julius was [A] He had risen gradually till he came to be President of the Council of Trent. To omit his first employments, I shall observe, in the first place, that he assisted in the Council of the Lateran, and made a solemn speech at the conclusion of it. He was Archbishop of Siponto, Auditor of the Apostolical Chamber, and twice Governor of Rome. He was given in hostage when Rome was sack'd by the forces of the Emperor

Forcatulus, my author in this remark, contrasts these two verses with a very satyrical distich that was made against this Pope. Eminuit in contrarium non inelegans distichum, dignum, opinor, quod Catulli esset, non auctoris incogniti:

*Fœx Ligurum Romam, ponti fœx concutit armis
Julius, huic Brutum Gallia fortis alit* (80).

(80) Idem, ibid.

"In opposition to this, there was handed about a pretty distich, worthy, in my opinion, of Catullus, not of an unknown author,

"Gaul nurtures a brave Brutus, who shall march
And crush this Julius, tho' he now shakes Rome."

Some persons, continues he, observed, that the times were come, when another Julius, by the profuse bestowing of monies he had borrowed, had obtained the Pontificate, and supplanted his competitors; but that the new Julius had nothing in common with the other, neither with regard to knowledge, to clemency, or honesty; nor any thing in common with the Apostle St. Peter, not even to the Fisherman's boat, since the Apostle just mentioned employed it only in a just and honest manner, whereas Julius (as it was said) made use of it only as a Pirate. A reader who understands Latin, will soon find that I do not add the least expression to Forcatulus (81). Nonnulli adjiciebant rediisse pro certo Julii seculum, quo ille nimirum profusa largitione Pontificatum indeptus fuerat confiato nullo ære alieno, superatissime, ut Tranquillus ait (), duobus competitoribus () In Julii cæp. 12.*

ætate & dignitate potioribus . . . Julius demum, qui nihil doctrinæ cum illo primo & perpetuo Dictatore commune habuit, nihil fidei & benevolentia, nihil cum Apostolo Petro sanctitatis & prudentia, nihil morum (nisi forsitan quod Petrus in mari innoxiam piscationem exercuit, ille aliquandiu, ut ajunt, piraticam) post novenne imperium, & si quid mensum excurrit, obstinatum in Galliam animum ad Manes tulit (d).

§ (d) In 1511 Julius II put the whole Kingdom of France, the Dukedom of Brittany excepted, under an interdict, which was levelled particularly at the city of Lyons, whose fair he removed to Geneva. This appears from the decree made by him in the third Session of the Council of Lateran, where we read the following words. Anno M. D. XI. die nono Calendas Novembris, & anno sequenti Idibus Augusti, Franciæ Regnum, Lugdunum præcipue, (Britanniæ Ducatu excepto) Ecclesiastico Interdicto subjecit, Nundinasque Lugduni solitus habere in Genebensium civitatem transiit, ut referret Pontificum Diploma in tertia Sessione Synodi Lateranensis, in qua etiam hæc leguntur: "Damnationis alumnos Bernardinum Carvajal, Guillelmum Briffonet, Renatum de Pria, & Fridericum de S. Severino, Cardinales, eorumque fautores sacro Concilio approbante damnandos, reprobamos & detestandos." Porro Julius Papa, qui antea Julianus, in hæc verba prorupit moriens, Ut Julius Cardinalibus indulgeo Schismaticis, ut Julianus justitiæ rationem habendum judico: id notatum est a Parisio Crass. Cæremoniarius Sacelli Pontificii Magistro (†). R. E. M. C. R. I. T.]

Charles V; and after his being Cardinal he was several times Legate in the chief provinces of the Ecclesiastical State, and in Bologna (†). "He assumed the name of Julius in memory of Julius II, who had raised his family, by promoting Anthony del Monte his uncle to the Purple, and from whom he had obtained the Archiepiscopal See of Siponto. He was born in the district of Rome called del Parione, but was a very voluptuous man [B], and was passionately fond of a very ugly lad, who was very meanly descended [C]. As soon as he was elected Pope, he gave the youth in question his Cardinal's hat [D]; and made a whimsical answer when he was told how unworthy his family came originally from Monte-San-Savino in Tuscany, whence he took the name of Monte, instead of that of Giocebi, by which he was called before (2). He obtained of the Duke of Tuscany the investiture of Monte-San-Savino for his brother. He could not deny himself the pleasure of seeing his family governing, in that place, those who once were their equals: Impotens sibi temperandi ab ea voluptate qua suos aspiceret in illis dominantes, inter quos educati fuerant aequales (3).

(†) Extracted from Palavicino, Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. 13. cap. 10. num. 2.

[B] Julius was a very voluptuous man. Thuanus speaks as follows on this subject. Sub id tempus Julius III interperantia vitæ magis quam senio effectus fato concessit, qui Joanne Baptista Balduini fratris F. mortuo, cum non ita a Fabiano juniore Baptiste fratre sollicitaretur, totum se voluptatibus mancipaverat, parato ad delicias nobili illo secessu structura & operibus antiquis admirando, in quo fere reliquam vitam a negotiis vacuus cum amicis sui similibus inter ludos, aleam, comædiâs, & quæ solia comitari amant, sacro fastigio indigna oblectamenta, continuâ nocti diebus transiegit (4). i. e. "Near that time Julius III left the world, he owing his death to intemperance rather than old age. This Julius, after the decease of John Baptist, his brother Baldwin's son, being not so much sollicitated by Fabian, Baptist's younger brother, abandoned himself entirely to pleasures, in that charming and elegant retirement, so wonderful for its structure and works of antiquity, wherein he spent most of the rest of his life, disengaged from all business, among friends of his own cast of mind; passing whole nights as well as days, in gaming, seeing of plays, and such like festivities, unworthy of his sacred dignity."

[C] He . . . was passionately fond of a very ugly lad, who also was very meanly descended. Some used to say that this was his son; whilst others denied this, and related how that Cardinal del Monte, having found this lad playing with a monkey in the streets, took him into his service, because no body but he had the courage to play with that animal. This was the foundation of a favour or kindness, which afterwards grew to be a wild passion. The lad in question was loathsome in every respect, except that he had got a knack of playing the buffoon. We are told these particulars by Thomas Erasmus, whose words are as follow. Habet puerum quendam, nigram, turpem, arrogantissimam bestiam, ineptam, ignorantem, & plane inertem, nisi quod nonnihil eorum, quæ scurræ, deteriorum in ore habet. In summa, corpore & animo monstrum. Quis, unde, aut cujus ille puer sit, tam sunt variae hominum sententiæ & opiniones, ut nemo exploratum habere videatur. Animadverti ego quosdam, qui filium arbitrabantur; & qui filium negabant, ingeniose aliorum dicta refutare, atque in plateis repertum eduxisse e parvulo, propter simiam, cum qua, præter illam nemo hominum laedere auderet. Ea re Cardinalem (aut Episcopum tum) ita delectatum, ut pro suo haberet. Hunc puerum, miser, ita amat perditæ, ita deperit (dicitur autem alios omnes vincere in 17 ἀνδραγαθία) ut nihil possit dici vehementius (5). i. e. "He has I know not what boy; a black, filthy, and most domineering brute, silly, ignorant, and quite devoid of all talents except that he can play the buffoon a little. In short, he is a monster both in body and mind. No one seems to have certainly discovered who he is, or whence he sprung. I have found some who think him Julius's son; and those who deny this, come off ingeniously by saying, that he met with him in the streets, and brought him up from a child, because he played with an ape, which no one but that boy had the courage to do. The Cardinal, (or Bishop at that time) was so delighted with this, that he took him for his own. He is distractedly fond of this boy, as he indeed is said to surpass all others in the unnatural vice." Thuanus says a thing, which confirms part of this; as first, that this boy was called the Monkey or Ape, even after he had been raised to the Purple. Secondly, that he bore this name, because his employment, under the Cardinal his master, was to look after a monkey or ape. Soluti ad omnem licentiam animi homo (these are the words of this great Historian, which give a very ill character of Pope Julius III) statim adepta dignitate qualis esset, omnibus manifestum fecit. Nam cum antiquæ consuetudinis sit, ut novus Pontifex galærum, cui velit, suum largiatur, cum juveni cuidam, cui Innocentio nomen, quique, quod in familia simiæ curam gereret, Simiæ etiam post adeptam dignitatem nomen retinuit, cognomine etiam suo atque insignibus attributis donavit (6). i. e. "This man being addicted to licentious pleasures of every kind, was no sooner raised to the Pontificate, but he bestowed to every one his disposition: for it being a custom from time immemorial, for the new Pontif to bestow his hat on whomsoever he pleases, he gave it to a certain young fellow named Innocentius; and who on account of his looking after an ape in his family, retained the name of Simia after he was raised to the purple; in this manner bestowing on him a surname and marks of honours" See the notes on the Confession Catholique de Sancy, pag. 249, edit. of 1699.

[D] He gave the youth in question his Cardinal's hat. We just now heard from Thuanus, that Cardinal del Monte, upon his being elected Pope, immediately bestowed his hat, his name and his arms on a young man whose name was Innocent, and whose business it was to look after a monkey. Erasmus, whom I have already cited, will give us a more circumstantial relation of this matter. This lad had been left at Bologna; so that Julius III, who would not let him come to Rome before he had raised him to the Purple, and who wanted a little time in order to get this promotion approved, suffered all the rigours of absence, and sought for the best remedies possible. He was never cheerful and gay but when he heard of his Innocent; and he enquired about him of all persons, who were able to give him the least information. He caused him to come near to Rome, in order that he might have the conveniency of visiting him; and having once brought him secretly into the city, he waited for him at the window as impatiently as a lover does for his mistress, who had promised to pass the night with him. He was heard to say, that the chief reason why he rejoiced at being Pope was, that it gave him an opportunity of being a benefactor to Innocent; and that he thought himself less obliged to the Cardinals for creating him Pope, than for their consenting to honour Innocent with the purple (8). He appointed him his first Minister; and all those who wanted to intercede for any favours were ordered to apply themselves first to Innocent. Here follows the original of what I have now said. Dum Romæ post electionem commoraretur (manserat autem Innocentius, id ei nomen, Bononiæ) dicitur nunquam lætus fuisse, nisi dum aliquis de Innocentio intelligeret. Et audiivi ego à gravibus viris, inter tam multos Bononienses, qui Romam sint profecti, neminem esse repertum, quem sciret cum Innocentio, aut suspicaretur fuisse, qui non interrogatus ab eo esset, quid, & quomodo Innocentius ageret. Post aliquot menses propius Romam accedere jussit, ut ad eum deambulatum aliquando Roma exire possit. Non enim potuit adduci, ut pateretur eum ingredi Romam, nisi galero rubeo esset ornatum turpe caput. Ab hac re plurimi Cardinales videbantur abhorre, minimeque passuri, ut in Cardinalium numerum cooptaretur, quem ne hominem quidem esse cognovissent. Accersivit igitur noctu aliquando in urbem clam, atque ita in festris expectabat, ut ii solent, quibus amica, qua nihil habent in vita charius, pollicita est noctem. Dicitur dixisse, se lætari, quod in amplissimam illam potestatem esset collocatus, non tam sua causa, quam quod posses bene de Innocentio mereri. Et tandem factus Cardinalis dixit, se pro beneficio magis Cardinalibus obstrictum esse, quam quod se Pontificem esse voluerint. Præterea, ut qui aliquid à se velint, id per Innocentium esse impetrandum. Quamobrem Legati Civitatum, Principum & Regum ad puerum concurrunt, illi sua negotia exponunt, ut is de rebus suis gravissimis etiam ad Papam referat (9). Some satires were published at Rome, wherein it was said

(2) Amelot de la Hooft, in the margin of his translation of Fra-Paolo, pag. 280. ex Onufrio.

(3) Palavin. Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. 13. cap. 10. num. 8.

(4) Thuan. lib. 15. pag. 306.

(6) Thuan. lib. 6. pag. 121. vcl.

(7) See the remark [M], citation (30) in the margin.

(8) Compare what is said below, remark [M] citation (†)

(5) Thomas Lucrus, (qui Erasmus postea voce Græca appellari amavit) in Epistola ad Palliæm, apud Hottingerum, Hist. Ecclesiast. tom. 5. pag. 572.

(9) Erasmus, apud Hottingerum, Hist. Ecclesiast. tom. 5. pag. 572.

unworthy a choice he had made [E]. There was little gravity in his discourses, which is manifest from the reflection he once made on the answer of two Cardinals [F]. The want of gravity was not his greatest fault; for it is declared that he sometimes would be profane and blasphemous in his discourse, as, when he apologized for his fire and passion, by instancing the anger which God expressed against Adam for an apple [G]. During the Conclave in which he was elected, some of his letters were intercepted; whereby it was said that this favourite, though so very ugly, was a new Ganymedes. This the Pope did not make a mystery of; but would sometimes tell the Cardinals some stories of this boy's lascivious tricks. Romæ fama erat & libellis quoque perscriptum fuit, à Jove Ganymedem foveri, licet deformem: sed nec ipse Pontifex hoc ad reliquos Cardinales dissimulare, & per jocos fertur aliquando commemorare, quam sit lascivus adolescens & impertunus (10). I shall speak further of the adventures of this man in the remark [M].

(10) Sleidan, Hist. lib. 21. folio m. 609, verso.

[E] . . . and made a whimsical answer, when he was told how unworthy a choice he had made.] I will borrow the words of John Bodin. "A Prince who exalts an unworthy man above men of virtue and merit, or who ranks them with the greatest persons, in doing good to one does an injury to all the rest: as it was represented by the Consistory of Cardinals to Pope Julius del Monte, when he bestowed the Cardinal's hat he had worn on a young boy he loved; that it was a great dishonour to admit a person who had neither virtue, knowledge, nobility, possessions, nor any other quality, as these said, that deserved being raised to so exalted a station. But the Pope, who was a facetious man, directing himself to the other Cardinals; what virtue, says he, what nobility, what knowledge, what honour, did you find in me, to raise me to the Pontificate (11)?" Was not this laughing at the Sacred College? And might one not apply to this Pope the following exclamation of Cato; What an odd sort of Consul have we! Adjungit Plutarchus eum (Ciceronem) cum Murænam Consul dederet, quem accusasset Cato, scite exagitasse sententias & præcepta Stoicorum in Catone; unde risus ingens à corona pervenerit ad subsellia, subrississe porro ipsum Catonem leviter, atque ad confessum dixisse, quam ridiculum, Judices, habemus Consulem (12). Some relate Pope Julius's answer as follows, What, pray, did you find in me, to do me the honour of making me Pope undeservedly? But let us raise this young man, and he'll deserve it (13). These last words are a pretty smart jeer, and reprove a fault that is found every where. The instant a man is raised to an employment, a thousand flatterers start up, and say that he very well deserved it. Montagne says somewhere (*), that Antisthenes one day made the Athenians sensible of the abuses that were committed in the bestowing of public employments: He advised them to order, that their asses should be made to plough no less than their horses: it was answered, that the beast in question was not formed for ploughing: No matter for that, replied he, all depends on your decree; for the most ignorant, and most unqualified persons, on whom you bestow the command in your wars, become nevertheless instantly extremely worthy of them, because they are employed by you.

(11) Bodin, de la Republique, liv. 5. chap. 4. pag. m. 748.

(12) Vavassor, de Ludicra Dictione, pag. 329.

(13) Jean Crespin, de l'Etat de l'Eglise, ad ann. 1550, pag. m. 551. ex Paulo Vagerio.

§ (x) Liv. III. Chap. VI. See, on this occasion, in Feneste, Liv. IV. Chap. VII. a smart saying by la Renardiere, a native of Britany, to Henry IV. REM. CRIT.]

[F] The reflection he one day made on the answer of two Cardinals. They found him in the court of his palace in a very indecent posture; he having thrown off his clothes, and walking only in his drawers, because of the heat. He obliged them to do the same, and then asked what the people would say of them, should they go and shew themselves in the field of Flora and the streets of Rome? They would take us, said he, for so many rascals, and so throw stones at us. We therefore, says he, are obliged to our clothes, for preventing our being looked upon as rascals; are we therefore not prodigiously obliged to our clothes? Cum aliquando exutis vestibus, diploide & caligis tantum indutus, in aula, quod ferretur tempestas, obambulare, venerunt Cardinales duo, collocuturi cum ipso. Quos ipse ad exuendas vestes suas, & deambulandum secum urgebat, mox autem nudos interrogabat: Quid si in Campo Floræ, aut per plateas nudi sic deambularem, quid oro populum existimatis de nobis judicaturum? Responderunt: Judicarent nos esse nebulones, & conjicerent in nos rudera atque lapides. Exceptit Pontifex: Ergo quod non habemus pro nebulonibus, id acceptum ferre debemus nostris vestibus. Quantum igitur, o fratres, debemus illis nostris vestibus (14)?

[G] He apologized for his fire and passion, by instancing the anger which God expressed against Adam for an apple.] This particular is related thus by John Crespin (15). "He loved, among other meats, hogs flesh and peacocks; but as his Physician had earnestly advised him to refrain from eating of pork, because it was bad for the gout with which he was often afflicted, and yet he would not abstain from it, the Physician privately admonished the Clerk of the Kitchen, not to order any more pork for the Pope's table. As therefore it was omitted for some time, and the Pope took notice of it, he asked the Clerk of the Kitchen where was his dish of pork. The Clerk answered, that the Physician had ordered that none should be served up at his table; upon which the Pontif cried, bring, bring me my dish, in spite of God (Ad dispetto di Dio). . . . Seeing one day a peacock at dinner, and none of the guests having eat of it: keep, says he, this peacock cold for my supper; and let a table be spread for me in the garden, for I shall have company to night. As afterwards he saw, as he sat at supper, hot peacocks brought to table, but not the cold one which he ordered should be kept, he flew into a terrible passion, and uttered a most horrible blasphemy against God. Then some of the Cardinals who sat at table with him, saying, we beseech your Holiness not to be so much exasperated for such a trifle, Julius replied, If God was so angry about an apple, that he drove our grand parent Adam out of paradise on that account, why may not I be allowed (I who am his Vicar or Lieutenant) to be angry for a peacock, since a peacock is of much more value than an apple?"

(14) Bullinger, in Vita M. S. Julii III. apud Heideggerum, Hist. Papas, pag. 235.

(15) Etat de l'Eglise, ad ann. 1550, pag. 553.

Those who should be desirous of reading this incident in two languages, may gratify their curiosity by reading what follows (16). Sapissimè nequissimus iste homo blasphemis illis usus fuit, quæ impurissimis lenonibus frequentè desperatæ malitiæ hominibus tunc temporis frequenter in ore fuerunt, ad quas animus totus quantus exborrescit, vid. Al dispetto di Dio, in contemptum Dei, & Potta di Dio, i. e. ad vulvam Dei &c. exemplum hujus rei proponit Auctor libri cui titulus, Lectura super Canonem de consecr. dist. 3. (3) ajens: "Intellexi, portatam fuisse in Civitatem Paduæ quandam historiam, impressam Latine, Italice, Germanice, & Gallice, in qua narratur, quod Sanctissimus Dominus noster Papa Julius III proximis diebus valde fuit iratus cum Episcopo Arimense, ejus Magistro domus, propter certum pavonem, & quum sua prælibata Sanctitas bis blasphemasset, primo dicendo, Potta di Dio, deinde, Al dispetto di Dio, quod fecit tanquam Johannes Maria de Monte, & sic tanquam homo, non tanquam Julius III Papa, & Vicarius Christi, de quo supra dixi. Et quum unus Cardinalis illi dixisset, quod non deberet irasci propter unam tam parvam rem, id est, propter unum pavonem, tunc sanctissimus D. Papa respondit: Si Deus fuit totus turbatus, & in magna ira & colera, propter unum pomum, & tanta mala fecit omnibus hominibus; quare non possum ego, qui sum suus Vicarius in terris, irasci cum meo Magistro domus propter unum pavonem?"

(16) Joan. Zoin-blaspheemiis illis usus fuit, quæ impurissimis lenonibus frequentè desperatæ malitiæ hominibus tunc temporis frequenter in ore fuerunt, ad quas animus totus quantus exborrescit, vid. Al dispetto di Dio, in contemptum Dei, & Potta di Dio, i. e. ad vulvam Dei &c. exemplum hujus rei proponit Auctor libri cui titulus, Lectura super Canonem de consecr. dist. 3. (3) ajens: "Intellexi, portatam fuisse in Civitatem Paduæ quandam historiam, impressam Latine, Italice, Germanice, & Gallice, in qua narratur, quod Sanctissimus Dominus noster Papa Julius III proximis diebus valde fuit iratus cum Episcopo Arimense, ejus Magistro domus, propter certum pavonem, & quum sua prælibata Sanctitas bis blasphemasset, primo dicendo, Potta di Dio, deinde, Al dispetto di Dio, quod fecit tanquam Johannes Maria de Monte, & sic tanquam homo, non tanquam Julius III Papa, & Vicarius Christi, de quo supra dixi. Et quum unus Cardinalis illi dixisset, quod non deberet irasci propter unam tam parvam rem, id est, propter unum pavonem, tunc sanctissimus D. Papa respondit: Si Deus fuit totus turbatus, & in magna ira & colera, propter unum pomum, & tanta mala fecit omnibus hominibus; quare non possum ego, qui sum suus Vicarius in terris, irasci cum meo Magistro domus propter unum pavonem?"

§ (3) Two burlesque pieces, writ in the sixteenth century, bear this title. The first, intitled Lectura super Canonem de Consecr. Dist. 3. De aqua benedicta, spectabilis viri, Lamperti de Nigromonte. Ad sacra Theologiæ Magistros nostros D. Job. Eckium, & Job. Cochleum Ecclesiæ Catholicæ sincerissimos defensores was published at Wittemberg in 1543 (*). The second, which is the piece in question, was published eleven years after, and the author D. D. Geraldus Bujdagnus de Luca, there styles himself Doctor in Decree, Bishop of Naples, of Romania, and Suffragan of Padua. REM. CRIT.

(17) The word contemptus, that is contempt, does not express the strength of the Italian dispetto: It should be invito Dom.

(*) Antiqua Litterarum monumentorum autographa &c. Brunsvic. 1600. tom. 2. pag. 418.

was conjectured that the Pope they were going to elect would be of a lewd disposition, those letters being filled with the most abominable obscenities [H]. It is thought that his money frustrated the election of Cardinal Pole, which had been concluded on, and the publication whereof had been deferred for no other reason than for fear that the notifying it in the night should be of an ill omen. Post longam Cardinalium in conclavi disceptationem, cum, teste in Museo Historico Johanne Imperiali, ὁμοῦντος Papa jam electus esset Reginaldus Polus, eamque electionem promulgare nocte appetente inauspicatum duxissent idem; nocte transacta & mutatis rationibus aureis Julius Papa subito emerfit (a). The medal which he caused to be struck after the death of Edward King of England, had for its motto a passage of Scripture, the application whereof soon proved false [I]. This Pope died the 20th of February 1555, being about sixty eight years of age (b). He had feigned an indisposition [K]; and the better to impose on the world, he had confined himself to a regimen, that brought a real distemper upon him of which he died. It is related, that there was so great an intimacy between our Pope and Cardinal Crescentio, that they had mistresses in common, and maintained the children they had by them at a common expence [L], for want of knowing who was the genuine father. Each of them also

(a) Heidegg. Hist. Papatus, pag. 233.

(b) Spondanus, ad ann. 1555, num. 43. but Palavicin. Hist. Concil. lib. 13, cap. 10. num. 10. says he was seventy years old.

[H] Those letters being filled with the most abominable obscenities.] They were writ the 26th of January 1550 to one Hannibal Contin, by Camillo Oliva a Conclavist of the Cardinal of Mantua, together with a little poem, in which the author described very obscenely his passion, and the burning desire he had to be again with his friend. It is John Sleidan who relates these particulars. Dum in Conclavi res agitur, intercepte fuerunt literæ, quas ex Cardinalis Mantuani familiaribus, quidam, Camillus Olivus, ad quendam suum Annibalem Continum, Januarii die XXVI scripsisse ferebatur, & simul carmen lingua populari scriptum, ubi de sua locutus affectione, & absentis desiderio, tam pudendis utitur verbis, ut sine flagitio vix ea recitari liceat. Hinc jocus illorum, qui Pontificem dicebant aliquem obscænum prænunciari, qui proditurus esset ex eo Conclavi, quod ejusmodi literas daret (18). An author before cited does not relate this passage without saying what follows. Vir Doctus anonymus in Epist. ad amicum narrat, ex eo Conclavi, in quo creatus est Julius, interceptas fuisse literas alicujus ex Conclavistis, i. e. ex illis, qui solent affidere Cardinalibus, Papam electuris, quibus quidem literis non putet ulla memoria unquam scriptas fuisse ulla obscæniore, sceleratiorisque. Nudis enim nefandissimisque verbis illic agi cum cinædo, salvo honore. Has, fateri, ad se primum in Germaniam fuisse missas, sed dare typis excudendas (ut multi voluissent) nunquam quidem se voluisse. Paulo post addit, Julium III valde male audire in hoc obscæniissimo genere, (Sodomitici nim. criminis) ita ut neque a Cardinalibus abstineat (19).

(18) Sleidanus, Hist. lib. 21. folio m. 609 verso. It is also in Thuanus, Frankfort edit. of 1625, lib. 6. pag. 121.

(19) Joan. Zuingerus, in Tractatu de Festo Corporis Christi, pag. 146.

[I] The medal which he caused to be struck, had for its motto a passage of Scripture, the application whereof proved false.] There was extraordinary joy at Rome for the death of young King Edward, because Princess Mary who succeeded him, restored England to the obedience of the Holy See; but the motives which occasioned that joy ceased in a little time; for Queen Elizabeth restored the reformation, and made that island one of the most flourishing Kingdoms in all Christendom, so that the prediction of the medal proved a mere chimæra. Eo insanix Julius pervenit, ut in perpetuum rei memoriam excudi curaverit montem, cujus altera pars ejus imaginem tricorniferam ostentavit, altera inscriptionem ejusmodi habuit: Gens & Regnum, quod non fervierit tibi, peribit. Sibi solide vendicans; quod Christo Esaias. Sed diuturnum & stabile gaudium nequiquam fuit (20). i. e. "Julius became so mad, that he caused a medal to be struck to perpetuate the remembrance of that particular. On one side of this medal was a figure with three horns, and the other the following inscription; The people and Kingdom, which shall refuse to serve thee, shall perish, ridiculously arrogating to himself what Isaiah applied to Christ. But this joy was very short-lived."

(20) Heidegger. Hist. Papatus, pag. 233.

[K] He had feigned an indisposition.] The reason of this was, his discovery that the Cardinals would refuse to consent to the demand, which his brother urged him to make to them. His brother had a passionate desire to possess himself of a city, and was for ever importuning the Pope on that account. Julius therefore, in order that he might have a pretence not to hold a consistory, feigned to be sick. To carry on this trick with the greater art, he was obliged to eat little or nothing, and to make choice of such aliments as are fit for sick people: now it is said that this change of diet brought upon him the sickness of which he died (21). This puts me in mind of Cælius in Martial.

*Discursus varios, vagumque mane,
Et fastus, & arve potentiorum,
Cum perferre patique jam negaret;
Cæpit fingere Cælius podagram.
Quam dum vult nimis approbare veram,
Et sanas linit obligatque plantas,
Inceditque gradu laborioso;
(Quantum cura potest, & ars doloris!)
Desit fingere Cælius podagram* (22).

(21) Spondan. ad ann. 1555, num. 4. pag. 556. ex Onuphrio Panvinio. Thuanus relates this, lib. 15. pag. m. 306.

(22) Mart. Epig. 39. lib. 7.

The sense is,
"Cælius quite tired with waiting on the great;
"Their haughtiness, and ever fruitless visits,
"Resolves to feign the gout, and feigns so well;
"So artfully anoints and swathes his feet,
"And limps so long, till he no longer feigns,
"But has the fell disease, and is a cripple."

Some say that his sickness was indeed owing to his change of food; but not that he grew abstemious purposely to impose on the world: they say that he hoped thereby to get rid of the intolerable pains of the gout. Others assert that his death was owing to an old distemper; and they own that he was very fond of pleasures, and that he was much more desirous of enjoying them than of exercising the Pontificate: he spending his whole time in building voluptuous recesses, therefore devoted himself more to luxury than to business. Sunt etiam qui dicant, eum veterano interisse: cum, ut idem etiam auctor narrat, externa quæque parum curans, fruendo potius quam regendo Pontificatus incumberet, totusque esset in extruenda elegantissima ad voluptarios secessus extra portam Flaminiam Villa Julia; cujus insanire studio videbatur; in qua convivii potius quam publicæ procurationi vacabat (23).

(23) Spond. ad ann. 1555, num. 4. pag. 556. ex Onuphrio Panvinio.

[L] It is related . . . that our Pope and Crescentio . . . had mistresses in common, and maintained the children they had by them at a common expence.] Thomas Erasmus informs me of these particulars. Julius III Pontifex, says he (24), & Crescentius fere omnes meretrices communes habuerunt, propriisque sumtibus neuter, sed communibus aluerunt, atque ut breviter dicam, omnium scelerum socii extiterunt. Susceperunt ex quadam muliere, bonefi viri Viterbienfis, filiam, quam, quod neuter suam esse dicere credereque posset, ut matrem, ita filiam quoque communibus sumtibus educandam tradiderunt, nuptiisque dederunt nobilissimo hujus urbis adolescenti, & inter Principes hujus urbis, qui sunt 40, constitutum voluerunt. i. e. "Pope Julius III, and Cardinal Crescentio had the greatest part of the prostitutes in common, and maintained them at a common expence; to say all in a word, they were companions in all kinds of wickedness. They had a child by a certain woman, the daughter of a gentleman of Viterbo, and as neither of them could say or believe that it was his, because they had enjoyed the mother in common, they brought up the daughter at a mutual expence, and married her to a most noble youth in this city; and would have ranked him among the Princes or chief men, who are forty in number, of this city." We here have a surprizing instance of a freedom from jealousy, and what is rarely seen in that country.

(24) Apud Hottinger. Hist. Eccles. tom. 5. pag. 574.

also paid his quota towards the support of those mistresses. Cardinal Palavicino extenuates to the utmost of his power the faults of this Pope; but he does not refute what Fra-Paolo says of him [M]. I forgot to take notice, that the Court of France offered this Pope's nephew a Princess of the blood, but that this alliance was refused [N].

[M] Cardinal Palavicino extenuates... faults of this Pope; but he does not refute what Fra-Paolo says of him.] He owns this Pope loved to divert himself; but adds, that he was as fond of applying himself to business. Pronus ad laxamenta, sed æque etiam ad negotia (25). He grants that he died without being much loved or esteemed. Æstimatione tenui, nec majore benevolentia mortuus est (26); but Palavicino pretends, that this was owing to his acting with a little too much freedom and familiarity; because, by his not attracting the veneration of the public, it was concluded that he was not a worthy Pontif. The author adds, that this judgment was not just; and that if the faults of Julius III were more conspicuous than his good qualities, they perhaps were not of so much consequence as his virtues: Nihilominus, ut mea fert opinio, hæc de illo existimatio fuit iniqua: ipsius quippe vitia majora quidem ad speciem erant quam virtutis, sed non fortasse ad pondus (27). With respect to the promotion of the

(25) Palavicin. Hist. Concl. Trid. lib. 13. cap. 10. num. 8.

(26) Idem, ibid.

(27) Idem, ibid.

(28) Idem, lib. 11. cap. 7. num. 4.

(29) Idem, ibid.

(30) Palavicin. lib. 11. cap. 7. num. 4. says that it appears by the Journal of Masfariellus, Secretary of the Council, that the young lad in question was adopted, as he was acting in a dramatic Pastoral, the 2d of March 1549.

(31) Palavicino, ibid. says that it was not at Bologna, as Father Paul will have it, but in Piacenza.

(32) Fra-Paolo, lib. 3. ad ann. 1550. pag. 281. of Amelot's Translation.

(†) Qui occupatis totus inuentus Cardinalis, veluti furim, voluptates sequebatur, Pontifex factus, votorum jam annuum compis, abdicata rerum cura, bisaritati & genio suo nimium indulgit. Onuphr. in Vita.

lad, he only says (28), that it reflected dishonour in the first days of his Pontificate. He acknowledged that the man in question was so meanly descended, that no one has yet been able to say from whence he sprung; but he pretends that the friendship which Cardinal del Monte had for him, was grounded on his considering him as the son of his judgment, the meaning whereof is this. Whilst the Cardinal was Legate at Piacenza, he was struck with the pretty pranks of a little boy, who was often about his table. The Legate looking upon this as an indication of genius and good sense, resolved to bring up this young plant at his own expence; and finding the boy made a great progress, he loved him more and more; was pleased with his happy conjecture: and considered him as a son of his judgment, a sort of creature whom we value more than a bodily child. Obletatus ex eo berus, sibi que plaudens, quod sua quasi perspicacia plantam eximiam, adhuc minutulam & in luto, discreuisset, majori in puerum benevolentia incauit, qua illum prosequeretur veluti sui iudicii prolem, cujus filii pluris quam corporis soboles æstimantur (29). He would have his brother adopt him; and the instant he was elected Pope he honoured him with the purple, the 30th of May 1550. He had made him reside till that day in a village a day's journey from Rome. He settled twelve thousand crowns a year upon him, but did not then intrust him with the administration of affairs. This new elected Cardinal was hardly seventeen years of age. He behaved in such a manner as shewed him to be altogether unworthy of the honour to which he was raised; inasmuch that the succeeding Pontiffs were obliged to punish him for his riotous excesses. This is all that Palavicino takes notice of. He cautiously forbore to animadvert on Fra-Paolo, who has shewn very plainly, that the public considered this creature of Julius as his catamite; prudence suggesting that it would not be proper to revive the memory of those ideas. For this reason Palavicino does not accuse Fra-Paolo of maliciously collecting slanders; but is content with saying, that he is mistaken with respect to the time of his adoption (30), and the place where this young man first captivated the Pope (31). Here follow Father Paul's words (32). "Julius soon gave a specimen of what his future government would be, by spending whole days in walking in his gardens; in projecting the building of country-houses: in discovering a strong propension to pleasures, and very little inclination to business (†), especially those which were found difficult. Mendoza the Ambassador having observed this turn of mind in the Pope, wrote to his sovereign, and told him, that it would be an easy matter to succeed in negotiations of every kind with this Pope, who, as he was studious of nothing but joy and pleasures, might, by being put in fear, be made to turn any way. The opinion which was entertained, viz. that he would prefer his private interest and affections to the public welfare, was soon confirmed by the promotion he made " the 31st of May of a Cardinal, on whom he bestowed his hat, pursuant to the custom of the Popes. When he was but Archbishop of Siponto, and governed the city of Bologna, he took into his house a young boy, born in Piacenza, whose original is not yet discovered. He took an affection for him, as though he had been his own son; and took him to Trent, where a grievous fit of sickness had like to have deprived Julius of him: but sending him, by the advice of Physicians, to Verona, for the change of air; Innocent (for so was this minion called) recovered his health there, and returned some time after to Trent. The day he was to arrive, the Legate came out of the city, as if to take a walk, accompanied by a great number of Prelates; and meeting him, received him with prodigious testimonies of joy and tenderness: which occasioned much speculation, whether it were an accidental meeting, or designed purposely to take him in the way. The Legate used to say, that he loved him as the author of his fortune (†), inasmuch as the Astrologers had predicted great wealth and exalted dignities to the boy in question, which could never happen but by his exaltation to the Pontificate. Scarce was he made Pope, but Baldwin del Monte, the brother, adopted him for his son; and after the Pope's bestowing many benefices upon him, honoured him with the Purple as was before observed. This occasioned Pasquinades, and gave courtiers an itch to speak out the real cause of so surprising an action, by several conjectures drawn from past accidents."

[N] The Court of France offered this Pope's nephew a Princess of the blood, but this alliance was refused.] The Pope answered, that marriages between persons of so different a rank could not be happy; and that as he acknowledged the Royal Family in France to be the noblest in the world, he acknowledged his own to be the meanest and most despicable upon earth. Nevertheless the Pope did not give the true reason of this refusal; for the circumstance which prompted him to refuse so glorious an alliance was, his desire of marrying his nephew to the Grand Duke's daughter; which would be of more advantage to him, in order for the putting in execution a project he had in view in favour of his family. Thuanus informs us of these artful particulars. Julius, says he (3.), ad scurrilitatem usque festiuus, & alienam ab innata decessoribus Pontificibus ambitione mentem præ se ferens, cum tam interea Cosmi, ut proximi & suorum rebus utilissimi principis adfinitatem ultra modum expeteret, & Camertium principatum Fabiano destinaret, ut conditionem tam amplam eluderet, sic Lansacum urgentem dimisit, ut diceret, quam ex nobilissima omnium, quæ usquam fuissent, familia rex prognatus esset, tam se ac suos omnium, qui viverent, mortalium ignobilissimos agnoscere, proinde nuptias, quæ inter pares melius coirent, inter inæquales adeo personas commode contrahi non posse. i. e. "Julius, who was

" facetious even to buffoonery, and of a cast of mind different from the ambition of his predecessors; as he ardently solicited the alliance of Cosmo, a Prince who lay nearest to him, and was most likely to be of service to his interest, and as he intended to make Fabian Prince of Camercio; in order to get rid of the importunity of Lansac, told him, that as the King sprung from the noblest family in the world, so he owned himself and his family to be the most ignoble among mortals; and therefore that marriage, which is best when contracted by equals, could not conveniently be solemnized between persons whose condition was so very unequal." It is to be observed that one of the daughters of Cosmo Duke of Florence was betrothed to Fabian del Monte, who was Baldwin's son, and not yet marriageable. See the thirteenth book of Thuanus. Palavicino, in the place above cited, observes that he was Fabian's bastard.

(†) Onuphris relates that Julius used to say, that he owed his exaltation to the Pontificate, for the good he had done that child. Affirmans se ad tanti honoris decus evectum, ab eo beneficia quibus illum paucorum assessisset.

JUNCTIN (FRANCIS) or rather GIUNTINO according to his Italian name, one of the most famous Mathematicians and Astrologers of the sixteenth Century, was born

(a) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 301.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Vossius, de Scient. Mathematicis, pag. 194.

born in Florence, but spent a good part of his life in Lyons (a), and published many books there [A]. Though he was a Doctor of Divinity (b), he nevertheless was extremely fond of judicial Astrology in which he was extremely credulous. I know not the year in which he died. He was fifty six when he published a Commentary on the Sphere of Sacrobosco in the year 1557 (c); whence the reader may infer the year in which he was born. Junctin would sometimes descend from the skies to divert himself with human researches; he composing a discourse on the æra of Petrarch's amours (d). I have spoke elsewhere (e) of his Horoscope of Luther. The reader will find below the particulars of his life, as published by Possévin [B].

(d) See the title of it in the remark [A].

(e) In the remark [B] of the article LUTHER.

(1) Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca.

(2) This word refers to Commentaria.

(3) Printed at Lyons, apud Jo. Tornesium. Vossius mentions only this edition. Du Verdier Vau-Privas speaks only of that of 1578, apud Symphorianum Beauzad.

(4) La Croix du Maine, pag. 101.

(5) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Française, pag. 404.

(6) See Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibliotheca Française, pag. 404, 405.

[A] He published many books at Lyons.] He there published in 1570 his Traictatus judicandi revolutiones natiuitatum, in 8vo. Three years after he published his Speculum Astrologiæ quod attinet ad judicariam rationem natiuitatum atque annuarum revolutionum, cum nonnullis approbatis Astrologorum sententiis (1). This work was in 4to, but in the edition of 1581 he swelled it to a folio by the Commentaries he added in duos posteriores Quadrupartiti Ptolomæi libros innumeris observationibus referta (2), & certissimis Aphorismis (quatenus ex siderum positione liceat Christiano more aliquid conicere) ex probatissimorum Astrologorum scriptis depromptis, insignita. His Latin Commentaries on John de Sacrobosco's Sphere were published in 1577 (3). There was printed at Colen in 1580, a book intitled, De Divinatione quæ fit per astra diversum ac discrepans duorum Catholicorum sacre Theologiæ Doctorum judicium, scilicet Francisci Junctini ac Joannis Lensæi. There are two French tracts of Junctin, viz. A large Discourse on the things with which the Comet that appeared in November 1577 threatens many Princes, Countries and Nations of Christendom. Printed in Paris by Gervais Mallot 1557 (4), and at Lyons by Francis Didier 1578, in 8vo (5); and A Discourse on the Reformation of the Year made by our Holy Father Pope Gregory XIII's together with the Causes of his taking away ten days of the Golden Number. At Lyons 1582, 8vo. He printed in the same city in 1580, 8vo, Discorso supra il tempo dello innamoramento del Petrarca. Con la spositione del Sonetto, Gia fiammeggiava l'amorosa stella (6).

[B] I knew him in France, says he (7), where he lived in exile, and devoted himself to the pernicious speculations of astrology. He was a fugitive apostate. He had been a Carmelite, and raised to the Priesthood, and even appointed Provincial; after which he forsook his vows, his profession, and the Romish religion; but by the charitable counsels of some devout persons he was brought back, in some measure, into the right path. He publicly abjured the heretical principles he had imbibed in the Church of the Holy Cross at Lyons; and gave people room, for some time, to think that he intended to labour for the advantage of the Catholic Church. However, he was far from retracting the works he had writ upon prognosticating impieties; Non vidimus eum libros suos de impietate divinatrice retractasse (8). He was one of those who putting their hand to the plough, and looking back, are not fit for the Kingdom of Heaven. He traded in bills of exchange; he put out money to interest, and by those methods gained sixty thousand crowns, no part of which could be found after his death. He had bequeathed a legacy of three thousand livres to the Junti, whose corrector of the press he had been. However, this testimony of his friendship proved of no service to them. Juntis beneficissimis Typographis (in quorum ædibus sæpe librorum correctionibus operam Lugduni posuerat) mille aureos nummos cum moriens legasset, ii mihi facti sunt, eos uti reliquos evanuisse; nimirum omnia perditâ fuisse, que perditus ille anxie hinc inde corraserat (9).

(7) Possévin. Biblioth. Selectæ, tom. 2. pag. m. 245.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid.

JUNGERMAN (GODFREY) made himself known by his learning in the beginning of the seventeenth Century. He was born in Leipzig, where GASPAR JUNGERMAN his father [A] was Professor of the Civil Law. His mother was daughter of the famous Joachim Camerarius of Bamberg (a), also Professor at Leipzig. Godfrey Jungerman was perfectly well skilled in the Greek tongue. The public is indebted to him for first publishing Cæsar's Commentaries in Greek [B]. He had already published his Latin Translation of the Pastoral of Longus with Notes (b). He printed in 1609 remarks on the Treatise De Equuleo [C], which Magius had wrote during his imprisonment. Some of his Letters have likewise been printed. He died the 16th of August 1610 (c) at Hanaw, where he had long been Corrector of the Press to the heirs of Wechel [D].

(a) Bapenberger's. I add this title, to distinguish this Camerarius from his son Joachim Camerarius, who is surnamed Norimborgensis.

(b) The reader will see in the remark [A] of the article LONGUS an error of Moseri with regard to Jungerman.

(c) Diarium Biograph. Henning. Witten.

[A] GASPAR JUNGERMAN his father.] It is he very probably who is the author of some disputations on certain points of the Civil Law, which Draudius (1) mentions: and of a poem de Custodia Angelica, mentioned by Draudius abovementioned (2) and by Simler (3). [B] The public is indebted to him, for first publishing Cæsar's Commentaries in Greek.] He added to that version, ascribed by some to Planudes, the manuscript whereof which was in Petavius's library, had been communicated to him by Bongarsius (4); he added to it, I say, not only his own remarks on the Greek translator, but also those of several learned critics on Cæsar's Commentaries. This edition printed at Francfort in the year 1606, in 4to is greatly esteemed. [C] He printed in 1609 remarks on the treatise de Equuleo.] The Journal des Savans (5) spoke contemptuously of those remarks; as though the greatest part of them were upon trifles; as for instance, ubæter nos ought to say equuleus or eculæus; but we can assure our readers; that this censure is a little too hasty; for though Jungerman has enquired something too minutely into this little article of orthography, yet the Journalist ought not to have judged of all the remarks from this, which besides is not useless to the subject, and may please many. [D] He had been corrector of the press to the heirs of Wechel.] This we find by the letters he used to write to Goldast (6). We there see also that he was writing on Julius Pollux; but this was known before by the preface to his edition of Herodorus. He added a great many curious pieces to that edition, and among others several fragments of Ctesias. Chevillier might have put him in the catalogue of learned men who have been correctors of the press (7).

(1) Bibliotheca Classica, pag. 716.

(2) Ibid. pag. 2507.

(3) Epitome Biblioth. Gesneri, pag. 256.

(4) See the French Epist. wrote to Scaliger, pag. 368.

(5) Of March 2, 1665, pag. m. 282. Dutch edit.

(6) See the Collection of Letters to Goldast, printed at Frankfort in 1688, and Goldast's Letters, published at Utrecht in the year 1697.

(7) Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 195, 196.

JUNGERMAN (LEWIS) born at Leipzig the 4th of July 1572, and brother of the foregoing, was an excellent Botanist. He applied himself early to the knowledge of Plants, and acquired so great a reputation, that he was offered, in England, the employment of the celebrated Matthias Lobel, who died in London in the year 1616; but he chose rather to live in Germany. He had already distinguished himself, by having a great share in a work intituled, Hortus Eystettensis, comprehending the figure and description of all the Plants in the Bishop of Eichstet's garden; and he had drawn up a catalogue of all those that grow in the neighbourhood of Nuremberg, which was printed under the direction of Gaspar Hoffman in 1615. He was appointed Professor of Physic at Gießen in the year 1622 [A], after having raised a garden there, which had greatly contributed to the improvement of the Students. He passed three years in this Professorship; and afterwards had such another bestowed upon him, together with that of Botany, at Altdorf in 1625. He continued in them till his death, which happened the 7th of June 1653; and during the twenty eight years he passed in those Professorships, he took so much care of the Physic Garden, that the fame of it spread even to foreign countries. He had the more time to spend in this employment, because he was never married, nor ever engaged in an amour; whence it was said that his continence could not be applauded, since he had had no occasion for women; for continence is a virtue, which, in the opinion of Aristotle, ought to occasion a conflict, of which there did not appear any signs in Jungerman's life. In quo (coelibatu) non est necesse continentiam prædicari, qua nulla in ipso opus erat, virtus enim est cum lucta, Aristotele censore, conjuncta, cujus indicium nulla quæ unquam in hoc genere emicaret flamma, præbere animadversa est (a). A man who was to write a Panegyric on a Friar, would have given quite another turn to this affair. This Professor bequeathed his Library to the University of Altdorf. I must not omit that he took an extreme pleasure in writing Anagrams [B]. I know not whether he devoted himself to judicial Astrology; but in the programma whence I extract this article, it is observed very seriously that the humours of a St. Anthony's Fire, stopping on a sudden when Mars was retrograde, occasioned a scorbutic gangrene in the extremity of his feet [C]. Godfrey and Lewis Jungerman had a brother named GASPAR who was a learned man. See Godfrey Jungerman's Notes on Chapter IV de Equuleo.

(a) Abdias Trew, Matbes. & Pbyf. Prof. & Rector Universitatis Altdorfinae, in Programmate, apud Henning. Witten, Memor. Medicorum.

[A] He was appointed Professor of Physic at Gießen in the year 1622.] The Rector or Principal of the University of Altdorf has perplexed the chronology a little in his Programma. He declares that Jungerman had gained so great a reputation, whilst he was Professor at Gießen, that he was invited into England, to be successor to Lobel that very famous Botanist. But this is confounding the times; for Lobel died 1616, and Jungerman was not Professor of Gießen but from the year 1622 till 1625. What likelihood is there, that the English should have suffered Lobel's employment to be vacant six or seven years? They doubtless nominated Jungerman to it soon after it became vacant. He therefore had acquired, before he was Professor at Gießen, the reputation that procured him those great testimonies of esteem, which the English had entertained for him. Paul Freherus, who has given (1) the substance of this Programma, has, on one hand, specified the dates better; but on the other, this serves only to shew more evidently the error of his calculation. He ranks the dates as follow. Doctör Med. creatus, & ad Professionem Med. publicam promotus est A. 1622. Hinc (2) per triennium ea nominis celebritate præfuit, ut in Angliam quo celeberrimi Botanici Matthiæ Lobellii successor fieret invitaretur A. C. 1616; sed ille Germaniæ conditiones prætulit. Ad descriptionem etiam Horti Eichstettensis tota Germania celebris laudabilem nec vulgarem operam contulit. i. e. He was created Doctor of Physic, and appointed Professor in that science in the year 1622. He ac-

(1) Theatri, pag. 138.

(2) One would conclude that the particle Hinc, which answers to the word Cui of the Programma, was, by an error of the press, put for Hinc. But this error of the Printer has not put the order observed by the author in a worse condition.

quired so great a reputation three years after, that he was invited in 1616 to England, to succeed Matthias Lobel that very eminent Botanist; but he chose rather to live in Germany. He gave an excellent description of the garden of Eichstet, so famous throughout all Germany." This Hortus Eichstettensis was printed in the year 1613; whence the reader may judge whether the particulars are ranked here according to their proper periods. It is supposed in Witten's Diarium Biographicum, that our Jungerman was Professor at Leipzig, and afterwards at Altdorf. The reader may not scruple to correct this, by putting Gießens instead of Lipsiensis.

[B] He took an extreme pleasure in writing anagrams.] He published a collection of these at Gießen in the year 1624, intituled Anacram Academicum in 4to. There are two other works of his, viz. the catalogue I mentioned in the body of this article, and such another catalogue entitled Cornucopia Floræ Gießensis &c; Gießæ 1624 in 4to.

[C] It is observed... that the humours of a St. Anthony's Fire... occasioned a scorbutic gangrene.] Here follow the words of the Programma. Cujus (erepselatis) fluxus consueti subito subsistentes, gangrenam scorbuticam ante trimestre (circa motum Martis in loco Lunæ natalitio opposito tardum & retrogradum) in extremitate pedum pepererunt. The Physicians at that time used, in discoursing on distempers, to ascribe much to the influence of the stars.

JUNIUS (ADRIAN) born at Horn in Holland [A] the first of July 1511, ERRORS of Moreti, and of a Translator of Thuanus.

[A] Junius... born at Horn in Holland.] Moreti, in the article of Adrian Junius, says, that vulgarly his name was Jonghe or Du John; and afterwards when he speaks of Francis Junius Professor at Leyden, he only makes his vulgar name to be Jonghe. But this is no ways accurate; for, in the first place he should have said de Jonghe, and have said it only with regard to Adrian Junius; since it is false that his name, in the Flemish tongue, could have been indifferently either de Jonghe or du Jon. Secondly, it is false that the vulgar name of Francis Junius was any other but Du John. It is asserted in the translation of Thuanus (1), that Horn the native place of Adrian Junius, is a village of Gueldres. This is a notorious blunder which I do not find in the Francfort edition of Thuanus, printed in 1625. If the translator made use of an edition in which was such an error, he may be excused; but here follows another particular that deserves censure. He says that Junius, having left Haerlem on account of the siege, went to Armuuden near Mildeburg, where having employed, to no purpose, his utmost care and diligence, in order to give redress to the calamities of that besieged city, the change of air was so pernicious to him &c. It is pretty plain that this besieged city does not refer either to Middleburg, or to Armuyden, but to Haerlem. Now it is absolutely false to assert that Junius thought in any manner to relieve that besieged city, when he was at Armuyden; he not going thither till after the taking of Haerlem. Ad Armuydam juxta Mildeburgum in Mattiacis se contulerat, ubi cum frustra consilio & diligentia sua concivibus laborantibus opem ferre conatus esset, ex cæli mutatione... in letalem morbum incidit (2). Now Thuanus cannot be well excused for this mistake; for though a person who writes in Latin, is not obliged to clear a period according to the strictness of the French Grammar, he yet would never have expressed himself as he did, had he imagined that Junius did not go into Zeland, till after the taking

(1) Apud Teisfieri, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 1. pag. 479.

(2) Thuan. lib. 62.

1511 [B], was one of the most learned men of the age in which he lived. He was son to a burgomaster of great merit [C], and studied first at Haerlem, afterwards at Louvain and Paris, and lastly at Bologne in Italy, where he was admitted Doctor of Physic. After his return to his native country, he went to England in the year 1543 (a), and was Physician to the Duke of Norfolk there, and afterwards to a great Lady. He composed books in that country, and among others a Greek and Latin Lexicon, to which he had added above 6500 words. He dedicated it to young King Edward in the year 1548; and because he gave him the title of King, he was prosecuted for it a long time after at the Court of Rome. He was strongly affected with this prosecution; for we find by some of his Letters (b) to Lindanus Bishop of Ruremond, and to Cardinal Granvelle, that he passionately wished to be freed from the ignominy with which he found himself branded, ever since the Censors had put his works in the Index expurgatorius. For this purpose he wrote, by the advice of Arias Montanus, to the Pope; and prepared an apology, where, at the same time that he protested he had always been a good Catholic, he shewed that he was under an indispenfible necessity of bestowing the title of King on Edward (c). Being a very good Poet he published in 1554, an Epithalamium on the marriage of Philip II with Queen Mary (d). This perhaps would have been a considerable fortune to him, had England continued in a peaceable state; but he left it during the troubles [D], and confined himself in Horn; but the King of Denmark made him soon leave it, in order to make him tutor to the Prince his son (e). Junius not being able to reconcile himself [E] either to the climate or the genius of the inhabitants, left the country so very abruptly, that he did not so much as take leave of the King. It is very probable that this was in 1564 (f). He settled in Haerlem [F]; practised Physic there, married and was principal of the college or great school in that town. The States of Holland gave him a commission in order for writing the History of the Province; a task he would have performed worthily, and with greater accuracy than he has done, could he have given the finishing stroke to his work, which was published after his death under the title of Batavia (g). When the Spaniards had besieged the city of Haerlem, he found means to get out of it, in order to go to the Prince of Orange, who wanted to make use of his prescriptions. The city being taken in 1573, his Library

(a) See his Apology among his Letters, pag. 392, where he says that he went thither when Charles V besieged Landreci.

(b) Pag. 388, 469.

(c) See his Letter to Vulcanius, pag. 124, where he boasts that he despised this disgrace.

(d) Ibid. pag. 214.

(e) See the remark [E].

(f) See his Letters, pag. 385.

(g) Vossius, de Scient. Marbim. pag. 259. Pontus Heuter. lib. 2. de Vet. Belgii, cap. WAS 25.

of Haerlem. It cannot be said that he speaks there either of the siege of Middleburg or of Armuyden, since those two towns were not besieged whilst Junius lived in Zealand. Melchior Adam has copied Thuanus's error. These ought to have known that our Physician made some stay at Delft, after the taking of Haerlem, before he went into Zealand.]

[B] The first of July 1511. This we are told in the Life of Junius prefixed to his epistles; vitam banc orditur Kalendis Junii, anni 1511. Some pages after we read, that he died die 16 Junii anno 1575, cum EXPLEVISSET annum etatis 63 qui magnus climactericus annus Medicis vocatur. i. e. "He died the 16th of June 1575, when he had completed his sixty third year, which Physicians call the great Climacteric." By this we refute Thuanus and Melchior Adam, who say that he died in his Climacterical year: but as this Life of Junius is not very accurate, and as the edition of the epistles (3) to which it is prefixed, is said to have been printed in 1552, tho' it includes the author's epitaph who died in 1575, and some of his letters dated in 1574, I would not too rigorously condemn the chronology of Meursius, who fixes the birth of this learned man to the year 1512 (4). The reason why I say his life (5) is not accurate is, that besides the two dates abovecited, I there find his epitaph which says that he lived sixty three years. If the author of that life thought the epitaph was right, he did wrong to fix Junius's birth-day to the 1st of July 1511, and to assert that, the sixteenth of June 1575, he had completed the sixty third of his age. On the other side, when a man is full sixty four years of age within a fortnight, that writer would be extremely negligent who should say that he is sixty three of age, or is past his sixty third year. But whether there be much or little negligence in this, it is very certain, that Moreri, Freherus, Melchior Adam, Sir Thomas Pope Blunt, and those who fix Junius's birth to the year 1513, are thereby refuted. The edition of his letters is not very correct; and besides they are not ranked in the order in which they were writ; and no care has been taken to search for and supply the dates when they are wanting, which is very often the case. These two defects are but too common in collections of that kind.

[C] He was son to a Burgomaster of great merit. Our Junius's father had not only been Secretary, and afterwards five times Burgomaster of Horn, but also twice deputed to the Court of Denmark, and once to Sweden and other places. He was a scholar; and wrote a Latin work which has not been printed, containing an account of the origin and increase of Horn (6).

[D] He left it during the troubles. I have followed, for want of a better guide, the Life of Junius prefixed to his Letters, although I am sensible that it will not be accurate to make this author live in England, from the first time he went thither, till the troubles that broke out after the marriage of Mary with Philip II; for I find some of his letters (7) dated from Haerlem or Horn in 1552, and the beginning of 1554, which speak of a man that led a pretty sedentary life. Many of those who have writ Lives were in great want of good advice.

[E] Not being able to reconcile himself. This appears from page 385 of his letters, where he speaks thus to Sambucus. Liberet mihi Polydori exemplo erumpere in hæc verba, adsum profectus Danica & caligine, nisi longinquæ ac molesti itineris cum partus recordationem obliterasset jucundum amicorum reduci quotidie gratulationum... occurfus. i. e. "I might, in imitation of Polydore break into the following words; I am here emerged out of Danish gloom; in case the grateful meeting of my friends, who are every day congratulating me on return, did not obliterate the remembrance of a tedious and troublesome journey, as of child-birth." He adds several reasons why he threw up the salary, which was considerable enough (8), and which he might enjoy at Copenhagen. He declares in another letter (9), that both himself and his wife abhorred that country. In another he desires to have his salary increased. I there find that he had been invited to be the King's Physician, but not to be tutor to the young Prince.

[F] He settled in Haerlem. The author of his life has not well distinguished the periods. He does not settle him in Haerlem or marry him till after his return from Copenhagen. Now I have proved (10) that he returned from thence in 1564; and it appears from a letter (11) which he wrote in 1559, that he had then been settled some time in Haerlem, and was married to a handsome young Gentlewoman, who had brought him a good fortune. The dedication of his treatise de Anno, that of the treatise de Cama, and that Ani-madversorum, are dated from that city anno 1556.

(6) Boxhornius, Theat. Holland. pag. 373.

(7) Pag. 339, 345, 348.

(8) It was a salary of four hundred Rix Dollars, pag. 409.

(9) Ibid.

(10) See citation (f) above.

(11) Pag. 179. See concerning his mistress, pag. 109.

(3) I make use of an edition printed at Dort, apud Vincentium Caimax, 12mo.

(4) Valerius Andreas, Bibliob. Belg. & Bullart, Academ. des Sciences has followed it.

(5) I know not whether it be that which Beverwyck promises in a Letter to Vossius, dated the 12th of June 1626. See Letters wrote to Vossius, num. 78. pag. m. 47.

was plundered, wherein he had left a great many works which had cost him much labour, and whereby he had hoped to eternize himself. A circumstance that added to his affliction was, they were almost fit for the press. He went to Zealand, where, by the Prince's recommendation, a public salary was decreed him, for practising Physic in Middleburg; but the air of the country did not agree in any manner with his health; and he there contracted some distempers which, added to the grief which he felt for the loss of his Library, brought him to his end the 16th of June 1575, he being threescore and four years old wanting a few days. His body was carried from Armuyden to Middleburg, where he was honourably buried by his eldest son, who also wrote his epitaph [G]. He is author of several books [H]. I shall make some mention of them in the last remark. There was a design to give him a Professorship in Leyden [I], the University whereof was but just rising when he died. I have not yet had time to examine fully whether he at last turned Protestant [K].

(6) Epist. pag. 387.

(i) Ibid. pag. 149. See also pag. 254.

It appears by one of his Letters (b), that he flew into a violent passion, upon his hearing that one of his pupils had accused him of ordering his boarders not to go to Church. So far from this, he protests that he obliged them to go on holidays; and laid a heavy forfeit on those who should neglect on these occasions. We see, in another place (i), that he complains of his poverty; and that being over head and ears in debt, and obliged to equip himself, he had not a penny in the world.

☞ We

[G] His eldest son . . . wrote his epitaph.] Boxhornius having added an appendix to his Theatrum Urbium Hollandie, for the omissions which he thought it necessary to supply, inserted, amongst other particulars, this epithet in great letters, but he let three faults creep into it, velint instead of meruit; 67 instead of 63, and 15 instead of 16: Vixit ann. LXIII. obiit die XV. &c.

(12) In the text of this article.

(13) The Bodleian Catalogue ranks this book among those of Francis Junius, Professor of Divinity in Leyden.

(14) Bishop Huët, De claris Interpretibus, speaks very contemptuously of these versions.

(15) See his Life, prefixed to his Epistles; and Melchior Adam.

(16) See his Letters, pag. 5, 6.

(17) Epist. pag. 173. See also pag. 116.

(*) It has borne three impressions, or more. See the remark [A] in the Additions to this article.

(18) Pag. 406.

(19) Pag. 116.

(20) Meursius, Atben. Batav.

(21) Biblioth. Belg. pag. 12.

(22) Opuscul. pag. m. 132.

(23) It is wrote to a Bishop, pag. 460.

[H] He is author of several books.] The chief of these, exclusive of those I have already mentioned (12), are, Animadversorum libri sex. Commentarius de Com. Adagiorum ab Erasmo omisso Centuriae octo cum dimidia (13). Appendix ad Epitheta Textoris. Copia cornu, sive Oceanus Enarrationum Homeriarum ex Eustathii Commentariis collectus in unum volumen. A Nomenclator. Commentarius de Anno & Mensibus. Latin verses (poems) of several kinds. The translation of Eupapius de Vitis Sophistarum; those of Hesychius Milesius, of Plutarch's Table Talk (14); Cassius's Iatro-sophista, composed and printed at Paris in 1541, which I believe was the first of his works. I omit a very great number of authors which he has illustrated with notes, as Nonius, Marcellus, Plautus, Seneca, Pliny (15), Virgil, and Horace (16). He had employed a great deal of time on Suidas; and he even intended to dedicate it to the son of the Prince of Orange, as he tells an English Nobleman (17), whose good offices he implores with respect to the Prince, in order to get a present beforehand; for our Junius understood as well as any man, how to make advantages of a Dedication.

I have something to observe concerning three of his works. I. The author of his Life says, that the Animadversorum Libri sex was lost at the taking of Haerlem. I do not very well understand what he means; they being published by the author himself, and dedicated to Anthony Perenot, Bishop of Arras, in the year 1556. Gruterus has inserted them in Vol. IV of his Theaurus Criticus (*). II. With regard to the Appendix ad Epitheta Textoris, it may be affirmed that Junius treated this subject with much greater erudition than Textor, who committed some very gross faults in it, some whereof are found in Junius's Letters (18). He looked upon it as a most useful and at the same time a very laborious work (19). III. His Nomenclator is an excellent work in its kind. The choice of expressions and terms in eight languages, proves at the same time the learning and indefatigable patience of our Junius. It is said (20) that he was master of eight languages, Greek, Latin, Italian, French, Spanish, German, English and Flemish. His travels had been of great service to him on that account. I find he had been in France, Italy, Germany, and England; but not in Spain, as is affirmed by Valerius Andreas (21), Moreri and Freherus. Colomescius has published (22) a little story that Isaac Vossius told him, which would prove that Junius did not neglect any thing that might contribute to the improvement of his Nomenclator, and that he condescended to drink with Carmen, in order to learn the terms used by them in their business. I believe it appears from one of his Letters (23), that Junius would not have thought it a great crime, to have drunk a great quantity, if he could do it without intoxicating himself.

When I say that Junius's Nomenclator is an excellent work in its kind, I will not deny but that there are some gross errors in it (24); all I mean is, that the good things in it very much exceed what is commonly published on that subject. Now in works of this kind, in which it is impossible not to commit some errors, perfection does not require an author to be free from all faults. It is in these as in man; the most perfect is he who has the least defects.

Nam vitium nemo sine nascitur, optimus ille est qui minimis urgetur (25).

(24) See what Crenius, Animadvers. Phil. & Hist. Part 1. pag. 33. & seq. quotes Gronovius, &c.

(25) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 1. ver. 68.

[I] There was a design to give him a Professorship in Leyden.] It is Meursius informs me of this. Sub mortis tempus, says he (26), Academiae nascenti inter primos Professores destinatus, sed inter ipsa initia morte abreptus inchoare manus non potuit. Freherus (27), transcribing this without adding what University is meant, throws his reader into the dark, or misleads him; and as he had just before spoke of Middleburg, they may imagine that an University was newly risen there. I shall observe on this occasion, that nothing causes a greater obscurity in books, than the not taking the pains to add the proper supplements to what is taken out of other authors. A thousand particulars are clear in the originals, which become quite unintelligible, when jejunely transplanted into another place.

[K] I have not yet had time to examine fully, whether he last turned Protestant.] The circumstance which keeps me in suspense, is a Letter (28) which he wrote to the Bishop of Haerlem in 1573, to inform him of the endeavours he had used, in order to keep that Prelate's house from being plundered. He tells him that he preserved this tract as long as he possibly could; and that he would not have abandoned it to the plunderers, had he not been overpowered; a pistol having been put to his breast, and himself threatened with immediate death. He adds, that as these wicked attempts were carried on with impunity, he found himself obliged to desire leave to quit the city, which was granted him. It is certain that he complained in very strong terms to the Magistrates, of the violence that had been done to him (29); and told them, that the Spaniards would hardly proceed to such violent methods, were they masters of the city. What I do not very well understand is, his telling this Prelate, that, in order to preserve his house, he had been forced to drive the French out of it, who profaned all things with a cruel rage, excludendo barbaram & crudelem Gallorum omnia profanantium rabiem (a). I do not look upon his being called in the Index Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum (30) a Calvinist, and an author damnatae memoriae, as a convincing proof of his being a Protestant.

§ () These in all probability were some of the scattered remains of the Protestant troops, which being defeated in 1571, had followed Genlis into the Netherlands (). These were no longer those Protestant soldiers who, in the first civil war, had appeared such enemies to vice and every kind of violence.

REM. CRIT.]

(26) Pag. 497.

(27) Pag. 381.

(28) Pag. 476. edit. of 1667, folio.

(29) Thuanus, lib. 51.

¶ We shall add some particulars to this article of Mr. Bayle [A].

[A] We shall add some particulars to this article of Mr. Bayle.] Adrian Junius had a great memory, which enabled him to treasure up a vast deal of learning; for besides his skill in Physic, which was his profession, he was an Historian, Poet, Philosopher; and understood perfectly eight languages, as has been seen (†). His works make up twenty four articles, as appears by the catalogue of them (†). Huetius speaks very unfavourably of our Junius's translations in general. "Although, says that learned writer, Junius was well skilled in Philosophy, he yet did little service to the public by his translations, most of which are bad: for he often mistakes his authors, and consequently translates them falsely. There are a thousand errors in his version of Eünapius de vitis Philosophorum & Sophistarum (*)." But here follows a work of our author's which is very much applauded: Animadversa & de Coma Commentarius, Basileæ 1556 in 8vo. It. Francofurti 1604 in 8vo. eadem ab auctore innumeris in locis emendata & insignibus supplementis locupletata. Accedit Appendix Adriani Junii ad animadversa sua, nunc primum ex Cl. V. Autographo in lucem edita ex bibliotheca Cornetii Van Arckel. Rotterodami 1708 in 8vo. pp. 632. "The six books of Observations included in these volumes, relate to various points of criticism. Junius herein proves himself to be deeply skilled in antiquities both Greek and Roman; his criticisms are equally delicate and judicious, his diction is polite; and every part of this work speaks the candid and modest writer, who sincerely endeavours to find out truth. The treatise de Coma is very curious, and abounds with erudition (†)." (†) Idem, ibid. pag. 406, 407.

JUNIUS (a) (FRANCIS) Professor of Divinity (b) at Leyden, was born at Bourges the 1st of May 1545. He was of a noble family [A]. His father, who was of the long Robe, was exposed to many persecutions, on account of his being suspected to be a Lutheran [B]. He exposed his wife to most horrid calumnies, by her proving with child,

[A] He was of a noble family.] WILLIAM du Jon his grandfather, Lord of Boffardiniere near Issoudun, was ennobled for his good services in the expedition of Navarre, when endeavours were used to restore John d'Albret, dispossessed unjustly of his Kingdom by Ferdinand of Arragon. He also had been in the King's household (1). He left three sons, the youngest of whom named DENYS, or Dionysius, studied Civil-Law, and had a Diploma at Toulouse. He made no progress in his studies (2), for being very courageous, he always engaged in the quarrels of the students. In short, he was a mighty Duellist. He was appointed King's Counsellor at Bourges, by way of recompence for a bold action he had performed. This action will be seen in the following remark. He had nine children, one whereof was our Francis Junius (3).

[B] His father . . . was exposed to many persecutions, on account of his being suspected to be a Lutheran.] The Father Guardian or Superior of the Franciscans of Issoudun preached in so impudent a manner against Margaret Queen of Navarre, Duchefs of Berri, and sister of Francis I, as to say that, because she was a Lutheran, she deserved to be tied up in a sack and to be cast into the river. The Magistrates of the place exhorted him not to be thus wanting in the respect which was due to that Princess; but he laughed at their advice, and continued to sermonize in the same strain; upon which informations were taken out against him, and sent to the King. This Monarch being resolved to inflict on him the same punishment, to which he had judged the Queen, gave orders to have that Monk in question brought before him; but the Queen of Navarre, interceding for the guilty Friar, prevailed so far as to have the punishment mitigated. The difficulty was, how to seize upon this Friar, he having the common people on his side; so that the Magistrates of Issoudun were afraid of executing his Majesty's order. Denys du Jon, who was returning from the schools where he had fought so often, declared, that if the King would give him a commission to seize the person of the Monk, he would execute it punctually. Accordingly, such a commission having been issued in his name, he put himself at the head of the sheriff's Officers; and in spite of the opposition made by the common people, he forced out of his monastery the Friar, who was sent to the galleys for two years. Du Jon ingratiated himself indeed, by this action, into the favour of Francis I, and of the Duchefs of Berry; but he incurred the hatred of the people and the Franciscans, and drew upon himself a numberless multitude of calumnies, and menaces, and involved him in persecutions, which at last ended in the cruel massacre committed on his person. Hæc prima fuit actio, quæ in gratiam Regis, sororisque Reginae insinavit patrem: sed apud illam inconsultam plebeculam & Franciscanorum ordinem odia perpetua conciliavit: indignissimaque calumnias, minas, criminationes, persecutiones, damna, cruentam denique cædem patri apportavit (4). He was accused of being a Lutheran, and his servant-maid was suborned, to attest that he did not keep fast days. Et Franciscanorum arte, & plebis imprudentia odioque maximo pressus est sub religionis specie & Lutheranismi . . . accusatus, subornata ad eam rem ancilla quæ domi serviverat. Ea patrem à se visum, quum diebus vetitis carnes ederet, pro testimonio dicebat falso, ut matrem sepe audivi confirmantem (5). Junius fled away, being not willing to venture himself among people who were so much governed by their passions. His goods and chattles were all seized; and the Queen of Navarre was obliged to supply him, for almost a twelvemonth, wherewith to subsist. However, the accusations, by the King's authority, were at last brought to nothing, upon which du Jon got a Counsellor's place, &c. Liberatus ab accusatione pater auctoritate Regis, patrium solum repetit, atque immigrat in Biturigum metropolin, ubi cum laude ad exitum usque vitæ Consiliarii Regii & pro Tribuno militum honoribus à Rege collatis defunctus est: præter alia commoda honoraria, quæ à Regina sorore illius & Biturigum Duce acceperat (6). i. e. "His father being freed from the accusation by the authority of his Majesty, returns to the place of his birth, and goes to Bourges the capital of Berry, where he acquitted himself, till he died, with honour, in the employments of Counsellor and Colonel, which the King had bestowed upon him; exclusive of several other honorary advantages that were conferred on him by the Queen, that Monarch's sister, and the Duke of Berry." Here follows the manner of his being killed. On Corpus-Christi day the Roman Catholics of Issoudun, regardless of the treaty of peace that had been concluded just before, committed a thousand outrages against the Protestants. The King then issued out a commission to Denys du Jon to enquire into that sedition, and punish the authors of it. Du Jon went to Issoudun accompanied only by three Sheriff's Officers; and posted the rest in various places before he entered into the city, it being necessary to act with prudence in so delicate an affair. However, his precautions were of no service to him; the common people guessed the motive of his coming, upon which they seized the gates, and besieged the Commissioner's house. They entered it by force, killed du Jon, threw his body out of the window, dragged it through the streets, flung it to the dogs, and publickly forbid (7) it burial (8). The King's Council conceived a due indignation against this insolence, and gave orders for demolishing the walls of Issoudun; but Cipierre and some other Lords caused this arret to be changed; and that chiefly because the murdered Commissioner had been suspected of being a Lutheran above twenty four years. The widow of the deceased, by her attempting to revenge this murder, incurred the hatred of many persons, and consumed her estate. Hæc cædes consilium Regis commovit plurimum: & decretum de labefactandis muris totius oppidi in eo factum propter atrocitatem sceleris, & periculosissimum exemplum illius. Sed postea con-

(†) Nicéron, Hommes Illustres, tom. 7. pag. 401.
(†) Idem, ibid. pag. 401, & seq.
(*) Idem, ibid. pag. 404.

(a) The name he commonly went by was Du Jon, and not Jonghe, as Moreri supposes.

(1) In custodia & equili . . . Ludovici XII, ministravit. Franciscus Junius, in Vita sua, tom. 1. Oper. pag. 6. col. 1.

(2) Hinc ab ævo solemniss. literarum quas Dionysio filio mittebat, & falsa inscriptio, Dionysio dilecto filio misso ad studendum, pro eo quod alii vulgo inscribunt studenti. Idem, ibid.

(3) Extracted from Junius's Life.

(4) Idem, ibid. col. 2.

(b) And not a Civilian, as is said by Father Jacob, Bibliotheca Perisifia, pag. 460.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Extracted from the Life of Junius, pag. 7. col. 1.

(7) Nevertheless a woman buried him in the night. Idem, ibid.

(8) Extracted from the Life of Francis Junius, pag. 14.

child, at a time when the world imagined that he had fled from his country [C]; and it was not known that he had come once secretly to see her. Our Francis Junius was carefully educated, and became a very learned man, to which his innate modesty, added to great ambition [D], did not a little contribute. He began to study the Law under Hugo Donellus at thirteen years of age. Some years after he was sent to Lyons, in order to meet the Ambassador whom the King of France was sending to Constantinople; but as the Ambassador was set out before Junius's arrival, he stopt at Lyons, and applied himself to study with incredible vigour. Bartholomew Aneau [E], who was principal of the College in that city, gave him excellent instructions with regard to the right method of studying (). The young man saw himself exposed to two temptations of a very () See note [A] in the additions to this article.

versa est factionibus tota ratio consilii: tum propter Sipierrii Gubernatoris & nonnullorum ex nobilitate proce-rum inveterata odia, tum propter religionis Pontificiæ Zelum, cujus odio indefinenter flagravisse inde ab annis amplius viginti quatuor criminabantur patrem. Itaque cædem illam necesse habuit mater in Regis consilio perse-qui ex eo tempore: quo factò, cum ipsa in se multorum concitavit odia, tum omnia ferme commoda quæ ex bellica licentia, furtis, rapinis, grassationibusque restabant ipsi, in hac persecutione occupavit (9).

(9) Idem, ibid.

An important reflection on the effects of false zeal.

I do not suggest to any one here, to wonder at the evil effects of a religious zeal. Those who are possessed with it, must approve of murders, and condemn the conduct of a woman, who desires to have the murderers of her husband brought to condign punishment. But I beg my readers to attend to one thing. Religion, which is universally looked upon as the firmest support of the Supreme Authority, and which would really be so, if it were rightly understood and well practised, is commonly the thing that most enervates that very authority. Nothing could be more just than the arrest of Francis I against the preacher of Issoudun, for his insolence in treating so ignominiously in the pulpit, his Sovereign's own sister. Nevertheless, not one Magistrate dares to execute the orders of his King against that seditious wretch; and when a Gentleman has the courage to put them in execution, he makes himself obnoxious to a thousand persecutions; and incurs such odium, that his murderers are openly protected. The Queen of Navarre was the first who advised the Gentleman in question to leave his country, since the putting in execution his Prince's very just orders would make him be the object of the hatred of bigots. Felicius certe utiliusque politicos honores gesturo, & Remp. administraturo, si post tam forte ausum benefica & cauta migratione, quam sæpe fieri Navarrenæ Regina & nonnulli Proceres cupiverunt, ut alibi Reip. inseruiret pater, sibi prospexisset (10): an evident proof that the Court did not believe itself powerful enough to protect its good servants when persecuted by the Ecclesiastics. It is generally said, that the Gospel Ministry est ipsi Angelis tremendum, (is formidable even to Angels); and we may add, & ipsi quoque Regibus, (and likewise to Kings themselves). Whoever reads the History of the Church of Rome attentively, will find that the greatest Princes in the world had more reason to dread the passions which devotees raise, than the arms of Infidels; thus that which ought to form the support of the State, and its grandeur and Majesty, is frequently the mightiest obstacle, which Sovereigns meet with in the execution of their orders (11).

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 6. col. 2.

(11) Compare what has been said in the article ABDAS, remark [B].

[C] . . . he exposed his wife to most horrid calumnies, by her proving with child, at a time when the world imagined he had fled his country.] It is imprudent for a woman to venture the being so, when her husband is a fugitive; for if he should die in his absence, before her delivery, and without owning himself the father of the child (three things that might very easily happen) how could a woman clear her reputation with regard to the public? But farther, are we to consider as nothing the furnishing a handle to slander, as du Jon's wife did? It will be answered, that it is very easy for a person to say this, when he speaks of it coolly, and does not put himself in the place of persons in love. After some months absence, their flames rage to such a degree, that no consideration can check them. passion hurries them along, and they will not listen to the voice of reason:

(12) Virg. Georg. lib. 1. ver. 514.

Fertur equis auriga, neque audit currus habenas (12).

“ So four fierce couriers starting to the race,
“ Scower thro' the plain, and lengthen ev'ry pace;

“ Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threatening cries they fear,
“ But force along the trembling charioteer.

DRYDEN.

However this be, our du Jon's mother was slandered, which pierced her to the heart. Profugus pater clam ad matrem semel redierat, hinc gravida facta mater proscindebatur à vulgo, tanquam si prostituta fuisset pudicitia illius. Utraque hoc incommodo sanæ illius semine animus oppugnabatur, objicientibus maligne quam plurimum tum Franciscani illius reverentem, tum graviditatem, ut agebant, impudicam (13).

(13) Junius, in Vita sua, pag. 7. col. 1.

[D] His innate modesty, added to great ambition.] These two passions do not seem to be formed for one another, and yet they sometimes are united. Junius is an example of this. He confesses that, from his childhood, he had an immoderate desire of being honoured and applauded; and that it was intolerable to him to hear others praised. Natura me puerum ad honoris & laudis appetentiam plus satis accendens. Sic enim mala radix illa vix quodvis in me germinabat, ut nec alienam laudem ista ætate æquo animo ferre possim miser, nec in mea existimatione illa conquiescere, quam mihi conciliabam pertinacissima diligentia. On the other hand, he confesses that he was of so fearful a nature, and so bashful, that even when he was near fifty he could not speak to his own wife without blushing; and that he scarce dared to command his own servants. Pudor summus, qui me ad hanc usque ætatem sic pressit, ut rusticus magis ad omnia quam urbanus meritis habere possim. . . . Quid dicam nisi impudentem ferme pudorem esse, qui me tantopere impeditum distinet, ut vix sine pudore uxori res vulgares enunciem, vix jam domi servitio imperem. He declares that this bashfulness had been of great advantage to him; because the diffidence he had of himself made him apply with much greater assiduity, in order to improve by what he both heard and saw. Ex pudore hæc consequuta sunt inde à puero quod mihi semper sum diffusus, quod aliorum factis audiendis, sermonibus observandis & advertendis in usum meum studuerim (14). He declares, that he would not have informed his readers of his infirmity, had he not thought that it would be a most useful lesson, with respect to modesty, for youth. Hoc eo libentiùs prædico de infirmitate mea, ut juventus ab exemplo meo præceptum bauriat ræσωφοσύνης atque modestiæ, ut certum fructum peritiæ certo judicio assequatur. Id enim testor, nihil mihi secundum benedictionem Dei tam commoda-visse in rebus omnibus, quàm illam de me ipso diffidentiam ex conscientia infirmitatis & pudoris mei, & studiosam aliorum, quibuscunque adfui, observantiam. One cannot too much applaud the modesty, and that rare humility, which makes a man distrust his own abilities; but it is very certain that it is a very bad quality for one, who would make his fortune in the world; and I would advise any father, who is desirous that his children should attain to dignities, to inspire them with vanity and presumption rather than a distrust of their merit. Junius is perhaps the only man, who with respect to worldly advantages, was not the worse for his modesty. I don't pretend to establish it as a maxim, that arrogance is always useful; it sometimes ruining (15) young people, and preventing their rising in the world; I speak of this only in general, without having any regard to exceptions.

(14) Idem, ibid. col. 2.

(15) In the article ALCIATUS (Andrew) remark [A].

[E] Bartholomew Aneau.] I have spoke elsewhere (16) of his Commentary on Alciatus's Emblems. He was called in Latin Annulus or Anulus. He was born in Bourges and published several books (16). He lost his life in a miserable manner in the tumult on a religious account, wherein Junius had like to have lost his life. His wife would have met with the same fate, had not the Prevot of Lyons saved her, by throwing her into prison (17).

(16) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 35. and Du Verdier Vau-Privas, pag. 110. 111.

(17) See Junius's Life, pag. 10. col. 2.

a very different kind, that of love and that of impiety. He resisted the first with great vigour, he giving a stout box on the ear to a girl who offered to caress him [F]; but he was so far overpowered by the sophistry of a Libertine, that he became a perfect Atheist [G], after listening to him some days. However, he did not continue long in that unhappy condition; a tumult on account of Religion, which obliged him to fly to save his life, gave him an opportunity of returning to his first faith. His father recalled him to Bourges; and discovering some of the principles which his son had imbibed, he gave him excellent instructions; and brought him, in an easy and insensible manner, to the perusal of the new Testament. The first words (c), which Junius fell upon there, affected him so strongly [H], that he soon had a distaste for every thing wherein piety was not concerned. He went, in the beginning of the civil wars, to Geneva, to study the Languages there. As he had brought but little money with him, and did not receive any remittances, he was reduced to extreme necessity [I]. However, he at last got wherewithal

(c) The beginning of St. John's Gospel

(18) See remark (C) of the article HELIODO-RUS.

[F] He gave a stout box on the ear to a girl who offered to caress him.] This is an incident, that is much more to be wondered at than the action of Theagenes is a mere fiction. Junius was so much devoted to his studies that he little thought of making love, upon which he was censured for shewing so little gallantry, and asserted that he would never learn good breeding and politeness, unless he got him a mistress. But as these exhortations had no influence upon his conduct, some of his acquaintance exposed him to the caresses of three or four wenches, who attacked him in an impudent manner; slinging themselves upon him, and using their utmost endeavours to get the better of his modesty. At last he grew out of all patience, and gave one of them a box on the ear, which occasioned a great noise in the house. The girl who had been thus assaulted, perceiving by the air of our young man, that he had not given the blow in jest, began to cry and roar; which made the people laugh at her and at Junius also, a circumstance that made him odious to many. Here follow his own words: Dies et noctes appetebant canes illos promiscue, nescium quid sibi vellet, et gravitatis honestatisque illius, quam in domo paterna videram, subinde recordantem. Neque id seorsim tentabant fugule, vermetiam ternas aut quaternas simul confertis manibus in me irruerant immodestissime, ut perducto ad suam impuritatem animo meo de spoliis pudoris mei triumpharent. Tandem vero adeo me puduit illarum impudentie, ut quum una multis spectantibus me amatorie esset adorsa palpo, ego contra colapbum gravem ei impegerim: quem illa addubitans utram in partem acciperet, defixis oculis attenta respexit ad me, aliquantisper observans aliquam mei animi significationem: ut autem rem seriam a me esse vidit, tum illa vociferationibus et ejulatibus implevit domum, omniumque risum imprudens in sese, stultorum odia in me contavit (19). Junius was so tired with these temptations, that he a thousand times had formed a resolution to return to his father's, without taking leave of the people of the house, where his chastity met with such frequent attacks; but he was afraid of their resentment, and the slanders they might employ, in order to injure him with regard to his own family.

(19) Junius in sua Vita, pag. 9. col. 2.

[G] He was so far overpowered by the sophistry of a Libertine, that he became a perfect Atheist.] Junius, by the advice of Bartholomew Aneau, had read Cicero de Legibus, and made collections out of it. During this interval, he was visited by a certain person, who maintained with so many arguments what Cicero alleges concerning Epicurus's rejecting a Providence, that he gave way the more easily to that impious doctrine, as it was spoke of every day at table, [and all the house rung with it. Ista horribili impietate conftrata erat quotidie mensa, personabat domus, circumstrepabant omnia aureis meas, adeo ut jamque ad alia omnia obsunderem. Nam quum omnibus horis aliquid atrociter fieri videmus, aut audimus, inquit Tullius, etiam qui natura mitissimi sumus, assiduitate molestiarum sensum omnem humanitatis ex animis amittimus: quum impie fieri aut dici, pietatis sensum (20) ... Memini, quum libros M. Tullii de legibus per illud tempus, auctore et suatore Anulo (de quo ante dixi) expenderem, et notas quasdam in eos animadversionisque colligerem, venire hominem ad me, et illa Epicuri verba, que libro primo exstant (21), nihil curare Deum nec sui, nec aliorum, multis quam diligentissime confirmare: ad qua ego non ratione judicioque certe respondebam: sed assensionem

(20) Idem, ibid. pag. 10. col. 1.

(21) Here Junius's memory failed him, he mistaking the first book, De Natura Deorum.

paulatim adhibens, sentiebam venturam serpens, quod imberberam, confirmari in me: et cum auctoritate hominis, tum argutis dictorum ejus preceptis edeserebar, ut meus animus in isto malo haerens occallesceret, totisque fieret amarus (22).

(22) Junius in Vita sua, pag. 10. col. 1.

[H] The first words which Junius fell upon in the New Testament affected him.] This incident is so edifying, and so well adapted to imprint a due sense of the efficacy of God's word, that I must not retrench any part of it. Hic ergo novum illud testamentum divinitus oblatum aperio: aliud agenti exhibet se mihi aspectu primo augustissimum illud caput Joannis Evangelistae et Apostoli, In principio erat Verbum, &c. Lego partem capituli, et ita commoveor legens, ut repente divinitatem argumenti, et scripti majestatem auctoritatemque senserim longo intervallo omnibus eloquentiae humanae fluminibus praecentem. Horrebat corpus, stupebat animus, et totum illum diem sic afficiebar, ut qui essem, ipse mihi incertus viderer esse. Recordatus es mei, Domine Deus mi, pro immensa misericordia tua, ovemque perditam in gregem tuum recepisti. Ex eo tempore, quum in me Deus tam potenter Spiritus sui virtute irruisset alia frigidius et negligentius legere et tractare cepi: de his vero qua ad pietatem pertinent cogitare amplius, et ardentius in eis versari (23). i. e. "Here I therefore (23) Ibid. pag. 11. col. 2. "open the New Testament that was brought from "Heaven, and at first sight fall unexpectedly on that "august chapter of St. John the Evangelist, In the "beginning was the word &c. I read part of the "chapter, and am so struck with what I read, that I "infantly perceived the divinity of the subject, and "the authority and majesty of the Scriptures to surpass "greatly all human eloquence. I shuddered in my "body, my mind was confounded; and I was so "strongly affected all that day, that I hardly knew "who I myself was. But thou, my Lord God, didst "remember me in thy boundless mercy, and receive "a lost sheep into thy flock. From that time, when "the Almighty had granted me so great a portion of "his Holy Spirit, I began to read and treat other "books more coldly and negligently; and to reflect "more upon, and be much more conversant in such "things as are relative to piety."

[I] He was reduced to extreme necessity.] He gives a long detail of this, whereof I will observe only the two following things. Being possessed, at the approach of winter, of only a little doublet and a little cloak, he resolved to imitate Cleanthes, that is, to earn something by the labour of his hands. Certum deliberatumque erat hebdomade proxima sequutura . . . alterius dies inegerenda terra ad fossam urbis, et in studiis consumere, Ckantis exemplo, ut levarem inopiam meam (24). (24) Idem, ibid. He was resolved to put himself out to hire, and to work as a pioneer in the trenches of Geneva; but met with a young countryman of his, who gave him some assistance. However, as he stood longer in need of his friend, than he had flattered himself he should, he was afraid of growing troublesome, and thence was prompted to make but one slender meal every day. He continued this abstemious course four months, whereby he became so weak and thin, that he scarce was able to bear his shirt on, and would have died in a short time, had not his friends been urgent with him to eat a little more. Utro ad menses quatuor jejunium ipse indixi mihi, et boram prandii in ambulatione, legere et memoriam colens, meditari, orari occupavi: vespere autem carna frugali usus sum, plurimum sorbens bina ova, et mediocre vini cyathum hauriens. Sed ex diuturna

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) In the year 1565.

(f) Scænovienfis Ecclesia.

(g) Tremellius joined with him in writing that work.

withal to free himself from his misery, and to pay his debts; and hearing of his father's tragical end (d), he resolved to gain his livelihood by instructing youth. He accordingly followed that way of life in Geneva, till such time as he was sent into the Low-Countries (e), to be Minister of the Walloon Church in Antwerp. He discharged the ministerial functions in the midst of several dangers; for although he opposed the indiscreet zeal of those who, without any lawful authority, broke to pieces images, and plundered the Churches; he yet was considered as the fomentor on those occasions, for which reason attempts were frequently made to imprison him; but he always was so happy as to get timely notice, by which means he avoided being taken. It was thought proper that he should go into the territory of Limburg, where he continued his ministerial functions with great success; till such time as the dangers to which he found himself exposed, made the Magistrates resolve to advise him to retire into Germany. The curiosity of a silly old man deserves to be told [L], it being perfectly well adapted to shew the knavery of persecutors and the stupidity of the common people. Junius was received very graciously at Heidelberg by the Elector Frederic III, and went and visited his mother at Bourges, whence being returned to the Palatinate, he was there Minister of a small Church (f). Some time after the Elector sent him to the Prince of Orange's army, during the unfortunate expedition of the year 1568. He was Chaplain to this Prince till the troops had got back into Germany; when he returned to his Church in the Palatinate, and there acquitted himself of his ecclesiastical functions till the year 1573, after which the Elector Palatine sent for him to Heidelberg, to translate the old Testament (g). He was sent to Neustad in 1578, and at the end of fourteen months to Otterburg, where he staid eighteen months; after which he returned to Neustad, and read public Lectures, till Prince Casimir, Administrator of the Electorate, sent for him to Heidelberg, to be Professor of Divinity. He returned to France with the Duke of Bouillon, and paid his respects to Henry IV, who sent him back to Germany to execute some affairs. He thought proper to go through Holland, before he went to give an account of his commission to Henry IV; and being invited to be Divinity Professor at Leyden, he accepted of the offer, having first obtained the consent of the French Ambassador (b). He discharged the duties of that employment with great ability, till the year 1602, when he was snatched away by the plague. He had borne an aversion to women; but, as he himself confesses, heaven punished him for this, by his marrying four wives [L]. He

(b) Extracted from his Life, written by himself, and published by Merula in the year 1595, and afterwards prefixed to his works. Meichior Adam has given a large extract of it. Moreri is mistaken in citing Merula in Descripti Vita Junii.

diuturna ista & pernicace inedia paulatim me invasit, & ita exedit, graviter, ut vires omnes exhaustum corpus deficerent. Quod malum tum demum sensi, quum instantibus amicis & tabem meam ex vultu recognoscentibus, ad majorem cibi copiam sumendam veni, & vivere institui liberalius; nam vel indusit solius onere prægravati mihi esse humeri videbantur (25). i. e. "I enjoyed myself a voluntary four months fast, and past the hour of dinner in walking, reading, recollecting things, contemplating and praying. In the evening I eat a slender supper, which consisted generally of two eggs and a moderate glass of wine. But this long obstinate abstemiousness threw me into a consumption, which wasted me to such a degree that I lost all my strength. This I was sensible of, when at the urgent intreaties of my friends, who discovered my distemper by my aspect, I eat a greater quantity and lived more freely; for my shoulders seemed to be quite burthened with the single weight of my shirt."

[K] The curiosity of a silly old man deserves to be told. He had been made to believe that Junius an heretical Preacher had cloven feet; and was not undeceived till after he had surveyed him from head to foot. This was in presence of a great number of people, who were met in hopes of hearing a dispute between Junius and a Franciscan. The time and place for the conference had been pitched upon; but the Franciscan had gone back, upon pretence of his having forgot something. I had heard such stories a hundred times, but never found them supported by so authentic a testimony, and that too in print. For this reason I will here transcribe Junius's own words. Ridiculum est quod dicam, sed tamen indicium horum simplicitatis, & mendacissimæ illorum impudentiæ. Quum in campo essemus, Franciscani illius adventum expectantes, vir quidam senex frequentiam illam maximam quæ tum aderat perumpens, copiam sibi fieri videndi mei postulavit. Audito strepitu rogabam quid rei esset. Cognito hominem esse mei videndi cupientem, monui ut daretur homini ad veniendum locus. Tum ille demisso vultu inde a pedibus ad verticem usque observans diligentissimè constitutionem meam, erupit in hæc verba: eho, jamjam video non esse id verum, quod mihi de te fuerat enunciatum.

Me autem dicente, quid ergo illud est? tibi, inquit, pedes sfisos esse (26). i. e. "The incident I shall here relate is ridiculous, but it is an example of the simplicity and most lying impudence of those persons. When we were come to the place of controversy, waiting for the arrival of that Franciscan, a certain old man forcing his way through the great crowd, desired to see me. Hearing a noise, I enquired what the matter was; and being informed that one desired to have a sight of me, I bid the people make way for him. Then he, throwing his eyes to the ground, surveying me very diligently from head to foot, broke into the following words: I now have ocular demonstration, that what was told me concerning you is not true; and upon my enquiring of him what this was: I was told, replied he, that you had cloven feet."

[L] He had borne an aversion to women; but, as he himself confesses, Heaven punished him for this by his marrying four wives. I should be afraid of ill translating the following words, and I therefore will only transcribe them. In conjugiiis varie me duriterque exercuit Dominus. Nam quatuor uxores duxi hætenus: adeo me (qui prius propter tantum impiarum scelera a sæminis abhorrebam, & functionis meæ studio conjugium refugiebam pernicacissime) castigavit Dominus, præposterum judicium meum tacite exprobravit, & perjuranda optimarum fidelissimarumque conjugum consuetudine evicit peccatum, indignamque de sexu sæmineo toto opinionem meam (27). He observes that he lost his first wife by the ignorance of a midwife, who, in delivering her of twins, spoilt her uterus (28). Hæram primam injuria obstetricis & vita sustulit, quum ita corruptus in obstetricatu fuisset illius uterus, ut annos amplius septem indefinente sanguinis defluvio afflicta sit atque exhausta, incredibili cruciata ipsius & labore meo (29). The consequences of this delivery were very grievous, not only for the wife, but also for the husband, viz. she being continually afflicted with a bloody flux for above seven years. His second wife died, being with child, of a fever the fifth day. The third died of a dropsy; and the fourth was alive when he wrote this, about the year 1592, but afterwards died of the plague.

(26) Ibid. pag. 20. col. 2.

(25) Ibid. pag. 13. col. 2.

(27) Junius, in Vita sua, pag. 21. col. 2.

(28) Who did not live. Ex prima, says he, gemelli vix viderunt lucem.

(29) Junius in Vita sua, pag. 22. col. 1.

left some children [M], and published a great many books [N]. Thuanus is greatly mistaken in what he relates concerning him [O]. In all probability the Memoirs of Scaliger, who hated Junius, prejudiced that celebrated Historian [P]. Junius did not deserve

[M] He left some children. By his second wife, daughter of John Cornput, Secretary and Burgomaster of Breda, he had, among other children a daughter that was married to the learned John Gerard Vossius, and a son named JOHN CASIMIR JUNIUS (30), who studied Divinity, and was, by his father, designed for Hebrew Professor, but did not succeed. He quitted letters for the sword, at the solicitation of his uncle John Cornput (31), who made him lieutenant of his company. He died in Gertrudenberg. He had published, in the Flemish tongue, an apology for the speech of Sir Dudley Carlton, King James's Ambassador. This was writ by way of answer to James Taurin, an Arminian Minister at Utrecht, who had refused (32) that speech. He left a son named FRANCIS JUNIUS, born at Embden the 20th of September 1624, who was Law Professor in the university of Groningen (33). I shall treat in the following article of another FRANCIS JUNIUS, whom our Leyden Professor had by a third wife.

[N] He published many books. His Theological works, collected into a body make two volumes in folio, and contain among other things: I, a commentary on the three first chapters of Genesis; with an answer to the twenty two objections made by Simplicius (34) to that sacred book. II. An analysis of the Pentateuch: An explication of the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel and Jonas. III. Sacred parallels, and notes on the Revelations, and the epistle of St. Jude. IV. Observations against Bellarmine; and on the excommunication of Gebhard Truchses, Archbishop of Colen, by Gregory XIII. He also wrote criticisms on profane authors, he publishing notes on Manilius and Tully's epistles, as also on Tertullian, and a work on George Codinus Curopalates. He likewise gave some versions from the Latin; that of Bodin's Demonomania, John du Tillet, Arnauld's plea against the Jesuits, &c. He drew up an answer (35) in French to Francis Charron's Trois veritez contre tous Athies &c. i. e. "Three Truths, against all Atheists &c. I must not forget that he understood Greek and the Oriental tongues. He was the first who published George Codinus's book de Officialibus Palatii Constantinopolitani, & Officiis magna Ecclesie, to which he added a Latin translation and notes. He published two editions of this work, the first in 1588, to which he prefixed his name in Hebrew, viz. Nadabus Agmonius (36), and dedicated it to the Magistrates of Francfort. He dedicated the second to Marquardus Freherus, who had procured him some manuscripts which enabled him to fill up several chafms of the former edition. He prepared a third, which would have been free from part of the faults that had escaped in the two former, and which have been criticized by Gretserus the Jesuit (37). The observations which Vossius makes on this critic are very just. He does not deny that Gretserus's work abounds with erudition; but he thinks that the good services which Junius had done to the Republic of Letters had not been sufficiently considered. Gretserus has applied himself to nothing but the pointing out his errors, which indeed, says he, is the epidemical distemper of the Literati. Multa in iis sunt, quibus etiam doctissimus doceat (Gretserus). Nec pauca tamen, quae pro Junio possim reponere. Sed hic eruditorum morbus est epidemicus: ut non tam cogitent, quantum boni aliquis praestiterit: quale est hic, quod primus eum scriptorem Junius sua lingua ediderit, Latine verterit, etiam illustravit Nois; in quibus humani aliquid subinde, in tam arduo negotio, perpersum fuisse, nec ipsi negamus. Sed, ut diu solet, inventis aliquid superaddere; vel quando omnes sumus homines, etiam errores observare, non est usque adeo difficile (38). i. e. "There are many particulars in them, wherein Gretser may teach those who boast the greatest learning; and not a few which I can return in favour of Junius. But this is the epidemical disease of the Literati, that they do not sufficiently reflect on the good things which a person may have done, such as, Junius's being the first who published that author in his own language, translated it into Latin, and even illustrated it with notes; in which arduous undertaking I will confess he now and then commits errors. But, as is frequently said, to improve upon discoveries that have been made, and to point out faults to which all men are liable is no very hard task." Junius had translated the three books of Gelasius Cyzicenus, concerning the Council of Nice, and illustrated them with notes (39), all which Vossius promised to get printed (40). I do not say Junius translated out of Greek into Latin the books that are called Apocryphal; and from the Arabic the Acts of the Apostles, and St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians. He translated, in conjunction with Tremellius, all the books of the Old Testament out of the Hebrew.

[O] Thuanus is greatly mistaken in what he relates concerning him. His words are as follow. Vir de sultorio ingenio, qui multa conatus, an adsecutus sit quod moliebatur, doctorum erit judicium: Lugduno Bataavorum ubi diu professus est, ob rerum suspensionem ab Ordinibus Belgii exactus, novarum scuti suo loco diximus, & Altorf ubi defecit, a Norimbergensi Rep. honorifico stipendio invitatus (41). i. e. "A man of a roving disposition, who attempted many things, but whether he succeeded in them, the learned will judge. Banished by the States from the city of Leyden where he had been Professor many years, upon a suspicion of engaging in factions, as I said in its place; and invited to Altorf, where he died, by the republic of Nuremberg, who at the same time offered him an honourable salary." I shall not examine, whether Thuanus had reason to say, that Junius was of a roving or fickle disposition and undertook too many things, Vossius his son-in-law having cleared him sufficiently with respect to that point (42): I shall observe after him (43), that Thuanus is strangely mistaken, in supposing first, that Junius was banished by the States of Holland upon a suspicion of his engaging in cabals. Secondly, That he accepted of an invitation made by the Magistrates of Nuremberg, and died in Altorf. Thirdly, That Thuanus has spoke of his exile under the proper year. To begin with this last error; I say that Thuanus has not spoke of Junius, but of Donellus, when he describes the cabal that was discovered in 1587 (44). Junius was then in the Palatinate, and did not come to Leyden till five years after. It is universally known that he was Divinity Professor of Leyden from the year 1592, till his death. It was Donellus who retired to Altorf, and died there (45).

[P] In all probability the memoirs of Scaliger prejudiced Thuanus. This is Vossius's conjecture (46), and it may very probably be true. Scaliger's hatred and passion against Junius appeared both in his conversations (47) and letters. But this is not so manifest to every one in his letters, because Heinsius (48) who published them in 1627, put stars in all those places where Junius was injuriously treated, and suppressed the proper names; but the invectives therefore are not the less real for it. Hocce anno Heinsius noster in lucem edidit Epistolas Scaligeri, in quibus non urbanitatem sed rusticitatem Junium tanquam Camanum asinum tangit, homo caetera magnus, sed nimis malignus (49). i. e. "Our countryman Heinsius published this year Scaliger's epistles, wherein that author, who otherwise is a great man but too spiteful, jokes, not in a polite but clownish manner, on Junius, whom he calls the Cumean ass." These are Vossius's words. He had said just before, that there were found in some of Junius's printed works, a great number of very injurious expressions, written with Scaliger's own hand. What are not those authors capable of who go such lengths? Memor eram qualia superstes evomeret adversus Junium, cum totus in fermento jaceret. Et meminisse ipse potes. Adhuc in nostris, & aliorum manibus versantur codices Juniani, Scaligeri manu opplati bellis illis elogiis, simia, asinus, cojone, & aliis id genus convitiis, βομολόγῳ (scurra) non Scaligero dignis (50). i. e. "I remember in how injurious a manner he treated Junius in his life-time, and with how much fury he wrote, and you

(30) Godson to Prince John Casimir, Administrator of the Palatinate.

(31) He was Governor of the Citadel of Groningen. Meteren speaks of him. Vita Profess. Groning. pag. 224.

(32) His piece is intitled, Statera Oratorum Carletoni, &c.

(33) See The Lives of the Professors of Groningen, pag. 224, 225.

(34) And not Symmachus, as is said by Melchior Adam, in Vita Junii, pag. 201.

(35) It was printed at Leyden, in 4to, in the year 1599.

(36) And not Agmonius, as Placcius, de Pseudonymis, says, pag. 229, who a little after puts Cornelius instead of Codinus, and apprehend it instead of reprehendit.

(37) See Vossius, de Historicis Graecis, pag. 368.

(38) Vossius, ibid.

(39) Ibid. pag. 264.

(40) Ibid.

(41) Thuan. lib. 127. sub fin. ad ann. 1602.

(42) Vossius, in Praefat. de Historicis Latinis.

(43) Ibid.

(44) Thuan. Hist. lib. 38. pag. 147.

(45) Idem, lib. 100. pag. 405.

(46) In Praefat. de Hist. Latinis.

(47) See the Scaligerana.

(48) See Vossius's Letter to Grocius, among those of the Arminians, num. 448. pag. 726.

(49) Vossius, in eadem Epistola.

(50) Ibid.

deserve to be treated in so contemptuous a manner by Scaliger; the injustice of it is very palpable; and when we consider the elogiums which a numberless multitude of great authors have bestowed upon him (i), we find our selves more inclined to pity than indignation with respect to that injustice. He was a learned and honest man; and so far from running into extremes, that it was his opinion people may be saved in the Romish Communion [2]. He never was more sensible of the deficiency of his knowledge, than when he knew most (k), which was an indication of a right understanding.

(i) See Colomesius, Gallia Orientalis, pag. 95, & seq.

(k) See the remark [2] citation (59).

☉ We

