“ you yourself may remember it. There are still extant some of Junius's printed books, wherein are writ, with Scaliger's own hand, the fine elogiums following; ape, afs, scoundrel and such like scurrilous expressions, worthy of a buffoon and not of Scaliger.” It may be observed by the way, that Scaliger nevertheless bestowed very great elogiums on Junius's herse (51); so true it is that poems writ on the death of persons, are a scene of the grand farce that is playing in the world. I also observe, that Junius had drawn the hatred of this great man upon him, by his taking the liberty to contradict him sometimes in matters of chronology &c. Some young people threw a great deal of oil into the fire, by reporting after an invidious manner, what Junius used to say of the other, either in his lectures or conversation. Scis quale fuerit illud maximi Scaligeri ingenium. Non ferebat dissentientem. Itaque semper eo nomine offensior Junio fuit, quod in quibusdam ad sacram chronologiam pertinentibus, ac credo in aliis etiam nonnullis a se discreparet. Offensam eam unus & alter discipulorum alebant, maligne interpretantes apud Scaligerum, quæ vel publice docuisset Junius, vel privatim dixisset (52). However this be, this is what made Vossius (53) conclude, that Scaliger's letters had prejudiced Thuanus against Junius. This reflection kept him in suspense at first, whether or no he should draw up an apology for his father-in-law, in opposition to Thuanus: for he foresaw that the son of that great historian would justify his father, by producing those letters of Scaliger that were injurious to Junius; and in this case Vossius would have been obliged to write against Scaliger, but he thought it more proper to throw a veil over the faults of that great man, than to make them known. At last he took the method that may be seen in the preface (54) I have cited. Si calamum adversus Thuanum stringam, periculum video, ne filius Thuanus, juvenis eruditus, & ut genere, atque opibus pollens, ita multis in Galliis carus, & maximis honoribus destinatus, quæ de imperitia Junii modeste Parens scripsit, ea aperte, & sine circumfusione prodita, ostendat a Magno Scaligero Reip. literariæ dictatore, cui doctior orbis lubens eruditionis fasces submittit. Hinc mihi nova cura, etiam tuendi sum adversus Scaligeri calumnias, incumbet. Quem ego virum laudavi semper, ac porro laudare decrevi: non quia ejus impotentiam animi, aut maledicentiam ignorem; aut quasi nesciam, quam multis in locis aliquid humanitatis patiatur: sed quia tantæ virtutes, præclaræque adeo merita sunt, erga historiam ac bonas literas, ut propterea, quæ peccavit, censam ei condonari, & æterna oblivione sepeliri oportere (55). i. e. “ In case I should write against Thuanus, I am afraid lest Thuanus's son, a learned youth, and not only rich and well-born, but also beloved by many in France, and designed for the highest honours, should shew that the mighty Scaliger, Dictator of the Republic of Letters, whom the Literati willingly consider as their monarch, declared openly, and without disguising the matter, what his father observed only in modest terms with regard to Junius's unskilfulness. This will cut out a new task for me, even of defending him in opposition to the slanders of Scaliger, a person whom I have ever applauded, and will still applaud: not that I am ignorant of his violent temper or faculty of slandering, and that he himself mistakes on several occasions; but because I am of opinion that his great talents and deserts, with respect to history and polite literature, ought to atone for his faults, and bury them in eternal oblivion.” He spares Scaliger's name in the preface, but not his person; it is true indeed that he stabs him in a very respectful manner. His words are as follow. Acerbe adeo ut summus vir (Thuanus) pronuntiaret, fecit amicus ejus, vir cætera egregius; sed, quod in aliis damnat, præfidens, planeque idiomatum, &

(51) See in the Preface to Vossius, de Hist. Latinis, the Latin Verses made by Scaliger on Junius's death.

(52) Vossius, Epist. 65. pag. 105. edit. Londin. 1693.

(53) See his Letter to Gomarus, it is 65th.

(54) Operis de Historicis Latinis.

(55) Vossius, Epist. 65. pag. 106.

ad dicitur, sepe etiam turgens loliginis succo, ac si quis non per omnia assentiret, vehemens alieni nominis obtrektor: quo vitio non mediocriter sædabat egregias, imo admirandas animi dotes. Non me ariolari hic, sed certissima promere, multis possim indicis comprobare: sed ea sunt viri illius merita, ut quædam satius sit honoris causa taceri (50). i. e. “ So very bitterly, that that very great man (Thuanus) pronounced, his friend did it, otherwise an excellent man; but, what he condemns in other people, very confident, self-conceited, and severe; fired often with envy, and inveighing against those who did not assent to him in all things, a vice which threw a deep shade over his excellent parts. This is not conjecture, but strict truth, as I can prove by many marks; but so great is this man's merit, that the veneration I have for it obliges me to be silent with regard to some things.” No man could write with more moderation.

[2] It was his opinion that people may be saved in the Romish Communion. He nevertheless called her, as other Protestant Ministers did, the whore mentioned in the Revelations; but he said she still was the spouse of the son of God: a spouse whose infidelity Christ bears with, and has not yet divorced her. This did not please Theodore Beza, a mighty stickler for the monarchy of the Solipsi; a name by which I beg leave to distinguish those communions, which think that themselves only are in the right way of salvation; but Junius allowed a considerable extent to the true Church, a circumstance that perhaps was unknown to Mr. Nicole (57). Doctissimus pater Junius cum nollet ab iis discedere, qui Romanam Ecclesiam censent esse meretricem Babyloniam, & tamen statueret salvari in ea innumera millia, ajebat esse vivum corpus, sed ulceribus obfitum: meretricem esse, sed adhuc sponsam Christi, vel conjugem, quia Christus necdum ei miserit libellum repudiæ. Sed non eo satisfecit Genevensibus: qui illam dicerent idolatricam, ac proinde neminem in ea salvari. Narrauit mihi aliquando doct. Antonius Thysius, cum primum Genevam venisset, & soceri mei nomine multam salutem diceret D. Beza illum continuo subjecisse; Et quomodo valet carissimus frater Junius, vir est egregie de Ecclesiis nostris meritis: quanquam in uno capite dissentiat a nobis. Id caput erat de Ecclesia, quam Junius negabat tam arctis limitibus concludi, ut multi volunt (58). i. e. “ My most learned father-in-law Junius, when he did not care to dissent from those who look upon the Church of Rome as the whore of Babylon, and yet was of opinion that numberless multitudes are saved therein, said she was a living body, but quite full of sores; that she was a whore, but still the spouse or wife of Christ, because he had not sent her a bill of divorce. However, this did not satisfy the Genevois, who said that she was idolatrous, and therefore that no one should be saved in her. I once was told by the learned Anthony Thysius, that at his first coming to Geneva, when he had complimented Beza in my father-in-law's name, he instantly replied: And pray how does my most dear brother Junius? He deserves exceedingly well of our Churches, notwithstanding that he dissents from us in one article. Now this article related to the Church, which Junius was not for including in such narrow limits as many do.”

This is what Vossius relates. He says in another place, that Junius being much freer from prejudices than people generally are, said very frequently in his later years: the longer I live, the more I discover my ignorance. Socer meus Fr. Junius tanti cum a multis retro annis nominis foret, postremis tamen annis crebro illud in ore habebat, magis & magis se in diis videre, quam multa se fugerent. Ita ille, qui cum novellis Doctoribus sociarat antiquos; qui etiam partium studio non paulo minus laborabat quam vulgo fieret solet (59).

(56) Vossius, Prefat. de Historicis Latinis. See also his Letter to Gomarus. It is the 65th.

(57) See the Preface to his Treatise Of the Unity of the Church, wherein he speaks of some Protestant Ministers, who believed that the true Church is to be found in different communions.

(58) Vossius, Epist. ad Hugon. Gratium. It is the 57th in the Epist. Eccl. & Theolog. of the 2do edit. pag. 218.

(59) Idem, apud Colomesium Gallie Orientalis, pag. 96.

☞ We shall add some particulars to this article [A].

[A] We shall add some particulars to this article.] Our Junius was so very sickly in his childhood that his parents were often in danger of losing him. At five years of age his father began to teach him to read, but afterwards got a tutor for him. At twelve he was sent to the public schools, where he soon made a great progress. Junius was so unhappy as to meet with severe and unreasonable masters, who were for ever beating him; but what would have quite disheartened another made no impression upon him; his fondness for learning making him bear their cruel treatment with patience (). The occasion of Bartholomew Aneau's counselling Junius with regard to his studies was this (†). Junius, abandoning himself to the inclination he had to gratify his curiosity, used to read all sorts of books that came in his way; and without fixing to any science in particular, was perpetually shifting from one science to another: when Aneau assured him that this was the way for him not to know any one well; and that he ought to have, in his studies, one fixed point to which every thing should be directed. This advice made such an impression on Junius, that he followed it, and found himself greatly benefited thereby (§). The reason of his leaving the Walloon Church at Antwerp (‡) was, upon an order being made there, that thenceforward only two Protestant Ministers should belong to it, who were born in that city, whereby our Junius was excluded, upon which he went to Limburg (¶). One of the reasons of Scaliger's hatred of Junius has been already told (‡); and the other was this: Scaliger insisting upon having the precedency over all the other Professors of Leyden, was opposed by them; and Francis Junius, who was the first, spoke against Scaliger, and by that means prevented his succeeding in his design (). But notwithstanding the strong aversion, which Scaliger had for Junius in his life-time, he yet made the following panegyric upon him, after his death, wherein he observes, that Junius, who had so lately dealt his excellent instructions to crowded audiences, was unhappily snatched away by the plague. That his scholars bewailed his death; the widowed Church lamented him as her parent, and the whole world as its instructor. That they did not weep for him as the vulgar do, who are not sensible of the value of a thing till they have lost it: but that every one knew the great merits of Junius in his life-time; and therefore they were not more sensible of his value by his death, but were the more grieved.

*Junii, quem modo literis potentem
Pleni Gymnasii frequenti cœtu,
Cœgebat docilis corona pubis
Docti pendula differentis ore:
At nunc, ô series iniqua rerum!
Tactus fidere pestilentis aaræ
Sol pallentibus occidit tenebris!
Te morrens scbola flet suum Magistrum,
Orba Ecclesia te suum parentem,
Doctorem gemit orbis Univerfus.
Flet, flet, non uti vulgus imperitus,
Quem morbus docet ipse, quid valere est,
Quanti est filius, orbitate discit,
Qui nec denique quid potius olim est,
Sed quid perdidit, solet putare.
In te longe alia est vicissitudo;
Nec quantum fueris, carendo discit,
Qui vivi meritum aestimavit olim,
Et nunc conscientia publicæ querelæ,
Postquam tristitia te tulere fata,
Et clarum Jubar abstulere mundo,
Nos quid perdidimus, quid est dolendum est,
Non scimus magis, at magis dolemus ().

(*) Vossius, de Historiis Latinis in Præfat.

The author who gives us these verses adds, that Scaliger writ under them, that he had composed them in bed, at two in the morning; a time in which the mind seems to have a greater ascendancy over the passions than in the day. Besides, it was a very mournful season, the plague having snatched away, in a month's time, two shining ornaments of the university of Leyden, Junius and Trimellius, and making dreadful havock in Holland; and the gloomy reflections which that calamity inspired, doubtless made Scaliger write the above-mentioned verses in the sincerity of his soul; and consequently we are not to believe all the injurious reflections he has cast on Junius, and at the same time we must subtract something from the extravagant encomiums that have been bestowed on him by others. "It will be doing justice, says du Pin (†), to acknowledge that he was a man of very extensive erudition, an able critic and most skilled in languages; and that his notes and reflections are pretty just: nevertheless he can pass for no more than a good Grammarian and but a tolerable Divine." His works consist of forty four articles, the particulars whereof may be seen in father Nicéron (‡).

(†) Biblioth. des Auteurs Hérétiques, tom. 1. pag. 596.

(‡) Tom. 16.

(*) Hommes Illustres, du Pere Nicéron, tom. 16. pag. 175.

(†) See the text of this article, a little after [E].

(§) Hommes Illustres, tom. 16. pag. 176, 177.

(‡) See the text of this article, between [I] and [K].

(¶) Hommes Illustres, tom. 6. pag. 179, 180.

(*) In the notes of this article, a little after citation (51).

(*) Hommes Illustres, tom. 6. pag. 186.

(*) By his third wife, Jane, daughter of Simon l'Ermitte, Lord of Betinart, Echevin of Antwerp, and a relation of Daniel l'ERMITTE, whom we shall speak of in his place.

JUNIUS (FRANCIS) son of the preceding (a) was born in Heidelberg in the year 1589. He at first designed to devote himself to a military life; but the truce that was concluded in 1609 for twelve years made him take a different resolution, which was to apply himself to study. He went into France, and from thence into England in the year 1620. He was taken into the Earl of Arundel's family, and continued thirty years in it; after which he returned to Holland, and there continued a study which he had very much cultivated in England, I mean that of the northern tongues [A], in which he made

[A] He continued the study . . . of the northern tongues.] Having met in England with several Anglo-Saxon books, he resolved to make an advantage of them; and perceiving, by the knowledge he acquired in the Anglo-Saxon language, that it would be of service to him for discovering many etymologies for clearing up the Flemish, English, and German tongues; he therefore devoted himself wholly to that study, and afterwards learnt the antient language of the Goths, Franks, Cimbri, and Frisons; whereby he discovered the etymology of several Italian, French, and Spanish words; for the Goths, Vandals, French, Burgundians and Germans spread their language in the provinces they conquered, of which some footsteps are left (1). He devoted himself entirely to the composing of Glossaries; Totus erat in contexendis Anglo-Saxonici, Francici, & Cimbrici Lexicis ac Glossariis, & explanandis antiquissimis barum gentium scriptoribus (2). And here follows the pedigree which he discovered His omnibus linguis imbibendis cum satis diu infudasset, vidit, quod & privatim apud omnes, quibus cum agebat de hac doctrina, tam publice testatus est, Gothicam esse matrem omnium cæterarum Teutonicarum linguarum, ex qua profuxerit vetus Cimbrica, monumentis Runarum posteris tradita, nec non Suecica, Danica, Nor- wegica, Islandica, quibus illius plagæ homines isto tempore suas animi cogitationes explicant. Ex Anglo-Saxonica, quæ & ipsa aut propago est Gothica, aut illius soror germana, & ejusdem matris filia, manavit Anglica, Scotica, Belgica, Frisica vetus. Ex Gothica & Saxonica orta Francica, quæ Germanicæ superioris parens est: Harum veterimarum linguarum, & dialectorum, quæ ex illis ducta sunt, cognitionem invito studio, & incredibili assiduitate non primus tantum asscutus est, sed & solus, viam secutus nullius ante tritam vestigiis (3). That is, "After he had applied himself sufficiently for the learning of all these languages, he discovered, as he declared both privately to all those with whom he discoursed on this matter, and also publicly, that the Gothic was the mother of all the Teutonic languages; whence sprung the old Cimbrian, transmitted to posterity by the remains of the Runæ; as likewise the Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, Icelandic, in which the inhabitants of that country expressed their thoughts at that time. From the Anglo-Saxon, which itself is either a branch of the Gothic, or its sister, and daughter of the same mother, sprung the English, Scotch, Belgic, and the old language of Friesland. From the Gothic and made a very great and extraordinary progress. He was so passionately fond of this study, that being informed there were some villages in Friesland wherein the antient language of the Saxons was preserved, he went and lived two years in that country. He returned to England in 1675; and after spending two years in Oxford, he retired to Windsor at the house of Isaac Vossius his nephew, and died there within the space of a year. The University of Oxford, to which he bequeathed his manuscripts, erected a very handsome monument to his memory (b). We shall speak of the works he published [B]. He was not only master of very great erudition, but likewise led an excellent life. He was not observed to have any vicious passion. He did not thirst after worldly riches or honours; his books were his only care; and perhaps no man ever studied more without prejudicing his health [C]. I shall transcribe a passage from Colomæsius [D].

(3) Idem, ibid.

(1) Extracted from his Life, written by Grævius, prefixed to the folio edit. de Pictura Veterum.

(2) Grævius, ibid.

(b) Extracted from his Life, written by Grævius, and prefixed to his work, De Pictura Veterum, in folio.

When I spoke of his stay in Oxford, and of the time when he died, I followed the account given by Grævius, but it is not accurate. I rectify it here, by observing that Junius retired to Oxford in October 1676; that he left it in August 1677, in order to visit Vossius, in whose house, near Windsor, he died the 19th of November 1677. He lay ill but a few days, and was buried in St. George's chapel in Windsor (c).

(c) Extracted from Athenæ Oxonienses.

"Saxon languages sprung that of the Franks, which is the mother tongue of Upper Germany. Junius was not only the first man, but the only one, who, striking into a path never trod before, with invincible pains and assiduity, attained to the knowledge of those most antient languages, and the dialects that flow from them."

[B] We shall speak of the works he published.] In 1637 he published a treatise de Pictura Veterum, which abounds with admirable literature. He afterwards enlarged it so much, that the second edition of it (4) is a pretty thick folio; whereas the first is but in quarto, and consists of 318 pages. Very few particulars have escaped our Junius's researches, in the Greek and Latin authors with regard to painting and the antient painters. In 1655 he published remarks on the Francick paraphrasis (5) of the Canticles, written by Abbot Willeram, and first published by Paul Merula. Being returned to Holland after passing two years in Friesland, he met with the old Gothic manuscript called the Silver One, because the four Gospels are there writ in silver Gothic letters: Qui argenteus dicitur, quoniam quatuor Evangelia literis argenteis Gothicis in illo fuerant descripta (6): Junius devoted his whole study to the explication of it, which he completed in a little time. He therefore published this Gothic paraphrase of the four Gospels, corrected from good manuscripts, and illustrated with notes by Thomas Marshall or Marechal. This is but a very small part of his works; those which continue in manuscript being vastly more considerable. His Glossary in five languages, wherein he searches for and explains the original of the northern languages, contains eleven (7) vol. in manuscript, which Bishop Fell caused to be transcribed, in order for their being printed. His commentary on the harmony of the four Gospels by Tatian is very large. I take no notice of a great many other books which he illustrated with notes (8). Consult the catalogue of the manuscripts which he bequeathed to the university of Oxford, annexed to his Life.

(4) At Rotterdam, for Reinier Leers, 1694.

(5) Francica Paraphrasis.

(6) Grævius, in Vita F. Junii.

(7) There are 11 in Junius's Life; but it is 9 in the catalogue of the manuscripts which Junius bequeathed to the University of Oxford.

(8) Extracted from his Life.

(9) Grævius, in Vita Francisc. Junii.

[C] No man ever studied more without prejudicing his health.] He used to rise at four in the morning both winter and summer, and study till dinner time which was at one, and after dinner he used to employ himself, for his health sake, till three, in some bodily exercise, or walk or run. Hora prima prandebat, sequente corpus exercebat vel in area subdivali ambulando contentius, aut etiam subsultim non nunquam currendo, aut, si id non ferret asperior tempestas, per omnes scalas in cœnaculum ascendendo valetudinis tuenda causa [9]. He returned to his studies at three, and did not leave them till eight, when he went to supper, and then to bed. He very seldom went abroad, and that never but when affairs obliged him to it. Notwithstanding this he enjoyed a perfect state of health, and was never once sick. Firma fuit valetudine, ut prosperrima per omnem ætatem sine ulla corporis offensione uteretur, quamvis totos dies à summo mane usque ad noctem incumberet literis, & rarissime, nec unquam nisi negotiorum ratio id ei quasi imperaret, prodiret in publicum (10). Tho' he spent so long a series of years in this solitary manner, poring upon barbarous books and wild words, and in making five Gothic or Teutonic lexicons, it yet did not any ways lessen the gaiety of his temper, not even in his extreme old age. He was ever free from peevishness; and affable to those who visited him, tho' he did not like to be interrupted. Grævius describes this in beautiful words. In assiduitate tanta licet invitatus admodum avocaretur ab his, quibus insudabat, curis, tam longe tamen aberat omnis morositas ingenique tristitia, quæ solent esse propria iis, qui a luce hominum & celebritate alieniores omne tempus & operam domi suæ in doctrinæ & litterarum studiis consumunt, præcipue senes, ut nihil senes nostri fieri possent suavius & facilius (11). People who do not love study cannot think but Junius must have been unhappy. These would choose as soon to be sentenced to the galleys, as to spend their lives, as he did, among his desks, without tasting the pleasures of conversation, wine, women, or gaming. How will it be possible, say these, to pass the day without the bottle, and the night without the fair? But they are in an error if they think themselves happier than he. He doubtless was one of the happiest men upon earth, unless he had the weakness which others have, viz. of being distressed about trifles. For as some people who, tho' they have no cause to be merry, do yet find out chimerical pleasures that amuse them (12); there are on the contrary, others, who tho' unmoved with the most just causes of discontent, are yet troubled from silly and ridiculous motives, which they would be ashamed to complain of.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Dem carum veris-gandia falsa juvenit. Ovid. Heroid. Epist. 13. ver. 108. Compare [D] I shall transcribe a passage from Colomæsius.] "I knew, at the Hague, the learned Mr. Junius, son to the famous Francis Junius, who was Divinity Professor in Leyden. He is about fourscore years of age, but still very vigorous. He studies thirteen or fourteen hours every day, and lately published the four Gospels in the Gothic language, with a very elaborate Glossary. He made me a present of that noble work; and said that he would soon reprint his work de Pictura Veterum, with the names and works of all the painters of antiquity. It will be dedicated to the present Earl of Arundel, who was his pupil when he was Librarian in England to his father. I must not omit, to the honour of our Junius, that Grotius bestows great encomiums on his book of painting, in a letter which you will find here (13)." This letter has been prefixed to the new edition of our Junius's works.

Dacier on Horæc. lib. 1. Epist. 8. pag. 406, 410, 411.

(13) Colomæsius in his Opuscula, pag. 116. Utrecht edit. 1669.

¶ JUNIUS (FRANCIS). We shall make some additions to Mr. Bayle's article of this learned man. After he came first to England, he made frequent excursions to the University of Oxford, for the advantage of the Bodleian and other Libraries, and conversation with the learned men there (a). In 1638 he published at London in 4to an English Translation of his book De Picturâ Veterum, with additions and alterations [A].

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 602. 2d edit. 1721.

[A] In 1638 he published at London in 4to an English Translation of his Book de Picturâ Veterum with additions and alterations.] It was printed under the following title: The Painting of the Antients in three books:

(2) Dated at Hart-Hall in Oxford, Sept. 10, 1736.

A catalogue of the manuscripts, which he gave to the University of Oxford, may be seen in the note [B]. Proposals (b) for printing his Etymologicon Anglicanum have been lately published by Edward Lye, M. A. Vicar of Little Houghton in Northamptonshire [C]. Gerard John Vossius styles him (c) omnifaria Doctrinâ & Generis splendore ornatissimus. Several of his Letters are published in Gerardi Joannis Vossii & Clarorum Virorum ad eum Epistolæ: collectore Paulo Colomesio Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Presbytero. London

(c) De Origine & Progressu Idæ. Latinit., lib. 3. cap. 5.

(1) The Countess of Arundel was daughter of Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury.

books: declaring by historical observations and examples the beginning, progress, and consummation of that most noble art; and how those ancient artificers attained to their still so much admired excellencie. Written first in Latine by Franciscus Junius, F. F. and now by him Englished, with some additions and Alterations. It is dedicated to the Right Honourable the Countesse of Arundell and Surrey, his singular good Ladie and Mistresse. The dedication is dated from Arundel House, March 28 1638; and in it he writes thus: "As the sweet and glorious harmony of your heroicall vertues in so high a birth (1), most happily conjoynd and matched with the most illustrious Lord your husband, the very patternne of true nobilitie, enforceth the world farre and neere with honour and admiration to behold and renouwe you: so doth my condition require, that I within this little Britain world, in which wee live, should unto your publick glory adde my particular testimony of your bountie and munificence, whereby I am engaged, above any of your servantes, to seeke any means both to intimate my humble dutie, and to professè my thankfull mind to your noble familie. Neither needed I goe farre to find my occasion and subject, but even to make use of that, which in your service, and within the walls of your own house, I had produced; I meane, my observations of the manner of painting in use among the antients. For seeing your Ladiship, upon the first sight of my Latine copie, was pleased to expresse your desire of having it Englished, there seemed a way to be opened unto me of effecting that my serviceable intent; and the rather, because some things having passed therein, which (as one day teacheth another) in the review and more mature cogitation I wished might be altered, I thought best to begin that correction in this present edition. Nor doe I so much overween, but that I see and confesse, that this translation befitte rather the native fluency of one in-bred, than the forced stile of a forrainger; &c."

[B] A catalogue of the manuscripts which he gave to the university of Oxford, may be seen in the note.] I. Glossarium quinque Linguarum Septentrionalium. This was caused to be transcribed in nine volumes, in order to have been printed by the care of Dr. John Fell, Bishop of Oxford. II. Notæ illustrantes totam Historiam Ecclesiasticam veter. Bedæ. III. Collatio Chronologie Saxonice cum MS. & Additione trium Schedarum auctior. IV. Guilelm. Lombardi Versio & Notæ ad antiquas Leges Anglorum & Saxonum correctæ, ac variis Notis illustratæ. V. Quædam in Seldeni notis ac Spicilegio in Eadmerum emendata. VI. Spelmanii Psalterium Saxonicum interlineare collatum cum MS. VII. Marginal Notes on Douglas's Translation of Virgil. VIII. Geoffrey Chaucer's Poems illustrated throughout with certain Notes. IX. Cædmonis Paraphrasis, cum conjecturis extemporaneis in Indiculo. X. Varie Lectiones ex MSS. in Gnl. Somneri Lexicon Saxonico. XI. Multi Scriptorum Anglo-Saxonorum veteres Codices, ut & multorum Apographa, quæ ipse Junius manu suâ ex veteribus membranis excerpti & descripsi, in Bibl. publ. Oxon. custodiuntur, quorum indices habes in Appendice clar. Hichesti ad Grammaticam Islandicam, p. 139. & sequentibus. XII. In Willeramii Paraphrasi Cantici Canticorum Notæ longè auctiores. XIII. Tatiani Monotesseron cum Præfatione Victoris Episcopi Capuæ, cum Annotationibus amplissimis Junii, in quibus comparantur cum Francicâ, Gothicâ, & Anglo-Saxonica. XIV. Vocabularius, qui inscribitur Teutonista, Edit. 1475. fol. interspersis per totam Notis Junii. XV. Ejusdem Auctarium Notarum in Tatianum, justum Volumen in 4to. XVI. Ostfridi Evangeliorum Liber, nitidissime scriptus, cum Indice Capitulorum à Junio parante novam Editionem. XVII. Annonis Archiepiscopi Coloniensis Vita, Rythmice. XVIII. Glossarium Theotisco Latinum, cum Notis secundum Literas Alphabeti in diversis Fasciculis, &c. XIX. Dic- tionarium Francicum mutilum, carens initio A. B. C. XX. Dictionarium alterum Francicum. Hæc duo in Fasciculis sunt. Alterum etiam plenum. XXI. Plures alios veteres Francicos Libros manu suâ descriptos, & Frisicâ reliquit Junius Bibl. Oxon. XXII. Leges Frisiorum, Cod. MS. cum Notis quibusdam in margine Junii. XXIII. Liber Legum Frisicarum impressus, in sine mutilus, cui ex Ubbone Emmio Junius nonnulla præmisit, cum ejusdem Notis adpersis passim margini. XXIV. Jus comitatus Frisicæ ex Cod. Werheri Emmen, & aliæ Leges Frisicæ ex Simonis Gabbamæ MSS. cum Notis Junii.

[C] Proposals for printing his Etymologicon Anglicanum have been lately published by Edward Lye, M. A. &c.] Mr. Lye observes, that "our Author's uncommon skill in the northern languages gave him a thorough insight into the English, and enabled him to set its original in so clear a view, that as this work of his cannot but give the greatest pleasure and satisfaction to the reader, so it may justly challenge the preference to any of the like kind, that hath ever yet been published: The ingenious Menage is very deservedly extol'd by his countrymen; but nevertheless I take the liberty to assert, that upon a just comparison he will be found to fall short of Junius; and indeed it could not be otherwise. For without a tolerable knowledge of the northern languages it is impossible to make a complete Etymologit either in English or French, since the greatest part of our words, and no small number of the French, have been derived down to us through those channels. This book, as it contains a Glossary of the English words, whether now in use, or by length of time grown obsolete, will be of great advantage to those, who are desirous to read our old authors; and by the many quotations interspersed from the Gothic, Saxon, and Francic writers of no less service to all such as shall study those languages: It will also be of use to explain great variety of words in the High and Low Dutch, Danish, Islandic, French, Italian, and Spanish, the true originals of which are in vain to be sought for in the Etymologicum, which have been hitherto published of those languages." Mr. Lye tells us, that there will be large Additions from Junius's other manuscripts, Dr. Hickes, Skinner, &c. which will be either put at the bottom of the Page, or distinguished from the text by the Authors names affixed to them; and that the abbreviations shall be explained, and the alphabets of the northern languages printed at the beginning of the book. Dr. Hickes speaks of this work of Junius in the following terms (2): Certe egregium opus est Skinneri Etymologicon, quamvis in quibus lapsus clarissimus auctor, hic illic offenderint Matricium periti; qui e scripitis Bibliothecæ Bodleianæ jam avidissimè expedare ceperunt Fr. Junii Etymologicon Anglicanum, quod tandem aliquando editum morositate istorum plus jatis redarguet, qui se suaque studia nimium mirantes, (nescio sub quâ gravitatis specie) Glossographos & Etymologistas pland quasi pedagogastros sustidiosè contemnunt. And the same writer in another place (3) writes thus: Exemplum habentes, quod sequantur, Fr. Junium F. F. qui linguarum col. Anglo-Saxonice & Franco-Theotisce in primis gnarus, ad Scano-Gothicæ & Mæso-Gothicæ Studium adpulis animum, quibus omnibus præclare eruditus, erut sanè idoneus, qui ad linguæ Anglicanæ Etymologicum conscribendum linguâ Anglicanâ dignum accedet. In quo opere quidem id genus omnium longe præstantissimo, vocum nostrarum Etyma è propriis suis fontibus, scilicet Anglo-Saxonice, Dano-Saxonice, & Normanno-Saxonice, tam peritè & perspicuè hausit, ut non tam Etymologicum linguæ Anglicanæ, quam ejus ex causis scientifica motitia dici mireatur. Illius MS. codicem à se in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ diligenter versatum adeo miratus est doctissimus quædam Suecus, ut Dictionarium Menagii Etymologicum, quem adeo Galli prædicant, no comparandum quædam

(2) Prefat. Grammat. Anglo-Saxon.

(3) Dissert. Epist.

London 1690 in fol. [D], and one to Mr. John Greaves, dated at Amsterdam May the 24th 1652, New Stile, is published in a late edition of Mr. Greaves's works (d), printed at London 1737 in two volumes in 8vo, which, as it was not published, when we wrote the article of GREAVES, we shall here give the title of, viz. Miscellaneous Works of Mr. John Greaves, Professor of Astronomy in the University of Oxford: many of which are now first published. I. Pyramidographia; or a Description of the Pyramids in Egypt. With a great many additions and alterations from a copy corrected by the author. II. A Discourse of the Roman Foot and Denarius; from whence, as from two Principles, the Measures and Weights used by the Antients may be deduced. III. Traëts upon various Subjects, Letters, Poems, and Observations in his Travels in Italy, Turkey, and Egypt. IV. A Description of the Grand Signor's Seraglio. To which are added, I. Reflections on the Pyramidographia, written by an anonymous author, soon after the publication of that book. II. A Dissertation upon the Sacred Cubit of the Jews, and the Cubits of the several Nations; in which, from the Dimensions of the greatest Egyptian Pyramid, as taken by Mr. Greaves, the antient Cubit of Memphis is determined. Translated from the Latin of Sir Isaac Newton, not yet published. Adorned with Sculptures. To the whole is prefixed, An Historical and Critical Account of the Life and Writings of the Author. Published by Thomas Birch, M. A. F. R. S. and Member of the Society of Antiquaries, London.

(d) Vol. 2. pag. 468, 469.

(4) Catalog. Scriptor. Anglo-Saxon.

(c) Life of Mr. Will. Somner.

ad præstantissimum illud opus F. Junii vocem tollens dixerit. Mr. Humphrey Wanley (4) styles it Opus elaboratissimum & utilissimum; and Bishop Kenner observes (5), that "the want of a new edition of Somner's Dictionary would be superseded, could the world at last enjoy the Etymologicum Anglicanum, completed by Fr. Junius in two volumes, and that author's incomparable Lexicon of five northern languages." [D] Several of his letters are published in Gerardi Voffii & clarorum virorum ad eum epistolæ &c.] The first letter of Junius in that collection is dated in 1608; the second at Middleburg Octob. 20th 1615; the third at Paris August 12th 1620; the fourth from that city Septemb. 18th 1620; the fifth from that city Decemb.

12th 1620; the sixth at London August 18th 1621 old stile; the seventh there Decemb. 18 1621 old stile; the eighth from the Bishop of Norwich's house at Ludham August 8th 1622; the ninth from Arundel-House at London April the 19th 1628; the tenth from the same place February 28th 1629; the eleventh April 17th 1630; the twelfth from Arundel-House May 6th 1630; the thirteenth from the same place November 15th 1634; the fourteenth from the same place the same year; the fifteenth is dated there April 1st 1635; the sixteenth is dated there May 22d 1635; as also the seventeenth dated May 12th 1636 and the eighteenth dated Feb. 18th 1637. T.

JUNO, sister and wife of Jupiter, was the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Her father being fully determined to devour his children, for fear they should one day dethrone him, did not spare her any more than his two daughters (a) whom he had already swallowed; but he had been forced to disgorge them some years after; a potion having been given him, which forced him to vomit up all the children whom he had been so inhuman as to devour (b); and thus it was that Juno returned into the world. The particulars of her marriage with Jupiter are variously related. According to a tradition, they had a passion for each other, and lay together unknown to their parents [A]; and it does not appear that Juno kept her lover long in suspense; but others say that she withstood the solicitations of Jupiter, like a maid of virtue and honour [B]; and to free her self from him, flew into a cavern. They add, that she met with a man there, whose arguments swayed her so much in favour of Jupiter, that she consented to crown his

(a) Vesta & Ceres, Juno's elder sisters. Apollodor. lib. 1. pag. 4.

(b) Apollodor. ibid.

[A] According to a tradition, Jupiter and Juno . . . lay together unknown to their parents.] Those who desire an authentic proof of this incident, will find it in the following lines of the Iliad (1).

(1) Lib. 14. ver. 294.

Ὀς δ' ἴδεν, ὡς μὲν ἴρας πυκνὰς φέρας ἀμφικάλυψεν.
Οἷον ὅτε πρῶτισον ἰμῶσι τὸν Φιδότην,
Εἰς εὐνὴν φοιβάνη, φίλος λήθοις τοκάας.

"The God, whose lightning sets the heav'ns on fire,
"Thro' all his bosom feels the fierce desire;
"Fierce as when first by stealth he seiz'd her charms,
"Mix'd with her soul, and melted in her arms.

P O E T.

Homer speaks here of a time when Jupiter, who had been married many ages to Juno, felt, as he spied her by accident, the same passion and fire as when he enjoyed her secretly the first time. To the above testimony of the Greek Poet I will add that of a Latin Poet. It is a lover who speaks; a lover, I say, who had met his fair one in the critical minute (2); and who is vexed that many had been secretly indulged that pleasure before him.

(2) Et mecum tenera gavisia est ludere in verba Purpureos flores, quos insuper accumbebat, Candida formos supponens brachia collo. Valerius Cato, in Dr., pag. 61. Catalectorum veterum Pectorum.

*Istius atque utinam facti mea culpa magistro
Prima foret: letbum vita mihi dulcius esset.
Non mea, non ullo moreretur tempore fama,
Dulcia cum Veneris furatus gaudia primus
Dicerer, atque ex me dulcis foret orta voluptas.
Nam mihi non tantum tribuerunt impia vota,*

*Auctor ut occulti noster foret error amoris.
Jupiter ante sui semper mendacia furti,
Cum Junone prius conjux quam dicitur uterque est,
Gaudia libavit dulcem furatus amorem* (3).

(3) Valer. Cato, ibid.

"I wish my crime had taught her first the joy,
"Then, in her arms, I could have died with rapture,
"My fame had been immortal, and late ages
"Had sung how I first stole the luscious bliss;
"First taught blest'd mortals the delicious pleasure:
"But oh my impious wishes were not crown'd,
"Nor I first fir'd her soul with the soft passion.
"Great Jove enjoy'd, in private, charming Juno,
"Before she was his consort.

[B] Others say, that she withstood the solicitations of Jupiter like a maid of virtue and honour.] According to some writers, Juno was so very virtuous, that had not Jupiter found out a remedy in the room of that which she refused to grant him, he would not have known what to do. But he used to go and seat himself on a mountain (4) whenever he was in the transport of his passion, and used to sooth it in that manner. Ὁ Ζεὺς αὖ ἴσων Ἴρας ἰρῶμενος ἐπὶ τῇ πετεινῇ ἐκάλειτο, καὶ ἀντιπαύειο τῷ ἴρωσι (5). Jovem semper Junonis amore captum ad saxum hoc accessisse, atque ei insidendo amoris impotentiam sedasse. The author who furnishes me with this incident, does not say whether Jupiter was married then to Juno. And indeed there was no occasion to specify any thing on that subject; for the most stupid readers will easily understand that he was not married, and that Juno refused to indulge his wishes.

(4) Locato
(5) Prol. He-phæst. apud Photium, Cod. 190. pag. m. 492.

(c) See the article
ACHILLES.

his wishes that moment (c). Others perhaps would own, that this was the first time that Jupiter enjoyed her, but not the first time she tasted the amorous bliss ; for they pretend that before Jupiter made his addresses to her, she had been enjoyed by Eurymedon, a fickle, lewd giant, who, by the same token, had a son by her called Prometheus [C] ; but Jupiter did not know this incident till after their marriage, and wreaked his revenge on this bastard on other pretences. There were some other occasions in which his wife's chastity appeared to him extremely dubious [D]. Jupiter well deserved this treatment, as his amours were so frequent. There are few animals whose form he did not assume in order to get maidenheads. It is universally known that he metamorphosed himself into a cuckoo, purposely to enjoy Juno [E]. This Goddess presided over marriages (d), but

(d) See the remark [Z].

[C] Eurymedon . . . had a son by her called Prometheus.] The reader may find this relation in the Scholiast on Homer. Ἦσαν τριφασίμην παρὰ τοῦ γούρου εἰς τῶν γυγιάων Εὐρυμέδων Βασίλειον· Ἰσχυον ἑποίσαν. ἢ δὲ Πρωμηθεὶα ἰγύνητος (6). Jupiter's resentment did not break out less against the father of the bastard than the bastard himself ; for as Prometheus was put in chains, Eurymedon was hurled down into hell. I know not upon what pretence it was that Jupiter treated Eurymedon in this manner ; but we may be persuaded that he concealed the true cause of his anger, he having too much sense to throw a disgrace upon himself by his revenge. The pretence he made use of was, that the bastard stole the celestial fire. The Scholiast (7) whom I quote borrows this from Euphorion.

(6) Schol. in Iliad. lib. 14. ver. 295.

[D] Juno's chastity appeared, to him, extremely dubious.] As a commentary to this text I will employ the words of a modern author, who in order to prove that Jupiter was a notorious cuckold, expresses himself as follows : " Eurymedon the Giant had first been favoured, in an amorous way, by Juno his wife (*) ; and not to mention the isle of Samos, which the unchaste amours of that Goddess rendered famous, is it not known that Jupiter, finding a few days after his marriage, that Juno would be delivered of a child which was not his ; she nevertheless wheedled him so well, that he was soon persuaded that it was possible for her to conceive without the assistance of a male, and had completely preserved her virginity. Another time she made him believe, that she had conceived by eating wild lettuce : so that, though the horns which were fixed on his statue in Lybia, had not signified that he was a cuckold ; did not he deserve that they should have this signification, and to give rise to those forms of speech, which, by the consent of all nations, have so long been used (8) ?"

(7) Idem, ibid.

(*) Didy. in Homer. II. 14. Eurasth. ibid.

(8) Girac, Réponse à la Défense de Voltaire, Sect. 64. pag. m. 545.

(9) Costar, Description des Ouvrages de Voltaire, pag. m. 116.

(10) Girac, Réponse à la Défense de Voltaire, Sect. 26. pag. 294.

(†) In Corinth.

(11) Costar, Suite de la Défense, pag. 382. refuses this by the following words : Aristotle relates some where in his Rhetoric, that Hegetippus, being returned from Elis, whither he went to consult the Oracle of Jupiter, would also consult that of Delphi, where he asked Apollo, in the most familiar manner, the following question ; Will you be of the same opinion with your father ? Dare you contradict him ? But Girac, in his Answer, pag. 551. complains that his words have been falsified. He proves that he knew very well that Jupiter gave answers in other places, but gave none through his statue, except in Egypt.

(†) Cic. I. de Natur. Deorum.

" Pan, the Satyrs, the Gods of Rivers, and many others, did not fail to imitate him. Juno herself did the same, to shew that she sometimes was compliant to her husband ; and there are seen to this day several medals of this Goddess with horns. Diana and Venus likewise wore horns, as being a very beautiful ornament to a handsome face." There is a great deal of learning in this answer, but it is false ; for we do not find any thing in it that proves the incident in question. The state of the question is this : whether Jupiter honoured the state and condition of those husbands whose wives had gallants ? Though it should be proved ever so fully, that he greatly honoured the bird which we call cuckoo ; that he would have horns fixed on his statues, and that the rest of the Gods imitated him in that particular ; yet this is nothing to the purpose, because in that age, the word cuckold and horns were not taken in the sense that has been since, and is to this day given them. Farther, for a person to disguise himself in the form of a cuckoo, in order to succeed in his enterprizes, would not be an indication, even in this age, that such a one was desirous of marrying a gay lady. My readers will naturally imagine, that Costar could not but perceive the insignificance of the answers that were made him : but should some persons doubt this, I will soon undeceive him by transcribing his words. They will see that the affectation of making too great a parade of his erudition, makes him intermix certain particulars in his answers that hurt his cause. He begins with the metamorphosis of Jupiter into the bird called Cuckoo, and says of it as follows (12).

(12) Costar, Suite de la Défense, pag. 380.

[§ * 'T would be to no purpose to seek for this tale in the writings of the antients. 'Tis told by Rabelais, book III. chap. xxxii ; but the foundation of it is in Plutarch, N. 17. of his consolation to Apollonius on the death of his son. REM. CRIT.]

" This old Woman's story, this ridiculous invention of a grammarian, who abuses his leisure (a great writer (*) speaking of him as follows : Equidem vix () Erasmus credo hanc fabulam apud veteres inveniri, sed suspicor ab otioso quoniam grammatico fuisse confictam : adeo sapit anile quiddam.*) This story, I say, is borrowed from a scholiast on Theocritus, who relates that Juno having left her female companions, to meditate alone and undisturbed ; after walking a long way, laid herself down in a delightful part of mount Thronax. Jupiter, who saw her at that time, was so charmed with the Goddess that he was smit with a violent passion for her ; and being no longer able to live without soothing it, he assumed a cuckoo's form and plumage, and raising an extreme cold in the air, he flew trembling and frozen, into the arms of the Goddess, and then resuming his usual form, and promising her marriage, he obtained his wishes. The cold which Jupiter raised on that occasion, was not more intense than that of the insipid raillery of our learned author. And indeed it appears that it was not a love for cuckoldom that made Jupiter a cuckold ; since neither among the Gods, nor among men, the name of that bird signified then a husband, whose conjugal bed his wife violated ; at least we do not find any footsteps of this among the antients. So far from this, some women in Plautus call their husbands, whom they catch in adulterous acts, cuckold ; and Juvenal () gives the name of hedge-sparrow to a poor fellow whose wife was unfaithful to him, doubtless because the hedge-sparrow feeds the cuckoo's young ones, that bird laying them in the hedge-sparrow's nest." Costar proceeds afterwards

(*) Tu tibi vnum curruca places, secumque labellos Exorbe, Sat. 6. ver. 276.

but ought not to have had that province allotted to her. This was inauspicious, she leading a bad life with her husband ; and notwithstanding all the strong reasons which prompted him to bear with her, after the many just occasions she had given him to be jealous wards to the consideration of the horns, and expresses himself as follows (13). Has Mr. de Girac seen some old manuscript which proves very manifestly, that in those times horns were indications of cuckoldom? And you, SIR (14), who know all things, could you shew me that those forms of speech, to wear horns, and plant horns, in the sense wherein we employ them, were of much greater antiquity than Artimedorus who flourished under Adrian? The horns of Jupiter Ammon were not those of a cuckold, but of a great ram, prophecying on the sands of Lybia, to speak after our Ronsard. He examines very circumstantially the horns of certain deities whom Girac had mentioned; and plainly shews they bore no relation to the condition of those husbands whom we call cuckolds, and that they were not wore out of complaisance to Jupiter; and here follow his conclusions (15). If out of all this, Mr. de Girac can make any thing that may be serviceable to his design, I am not resolved to oppose him; but I am greatly mistaken if he will succeed in it; and shall force me to acknowledge that Jupiter, when he settled his household, did not forget cuckoldom which had always been of so much service to him. This is a good conclusion; for it is bringing back things to the state of the question and that is the center in which all the lines ought to terminate.

(13) Costar, Suite de la Defense, pag. 381.

(14) He speaks to Menage.

(15) Costar, Suite de la Defense, pag. 386.

(16) Replique à Costar, Sect. 64 pag. 544.

(17) In the remark [D].

(18) Compare in the remark [C] of the article COLOMIES.

(19) Girac, Reponse à la Defense de Peitire, Sect. 26. pag. 190. See Costar, Suite de la Defense pag. 381.

(20) Girac, Replique, pag. 545.

of that bird signified a husband, whose wife was unfaithful to him. I promise and engage my word to satisfy him, when he shall have proved to me, by good authorities, that it was antiently reproached to Jupiter, viz. that in settling the affairs of his household he had not thought of cuckoldom. With regard to horns, that word, in the signification I have given it, is more antient than is generally thought! Nicetas informs us, that Andronicus the Emperor, to ridicule the inhabitants of Constantinople, and reproach them with the lewdness of their wives, used to cause to be set up, in the places of public resort of that great city the finest and largest stag's horns that could be met with; and Artimedorus, who lived above fifteen hundred years since, employs (†) the expression, (††) Liv. 2. to plant horns, as a proverb that was common, and did not begin in his time. (21). It would be trifling away time to search for the origin of it, and to enquire whether it was used in the time of Jupiter Ammon. However this be, my antagonist, who pretends to be so very subtle, did not perceive this time that I only laughed at him. It is plain from this passage, that Girac has lost his cause. He is not able to prove what is denied him, and without which a criticism is of no force; and he boasts that he designed to ridicule his adversary. There is no writer but may employ such subtrefuges when he is nonplussed. We shall now see Costar a little puzzled: his knowledge forsook him when he quoted the authority of Erasmus in a thing where Erasmus was in the wrong (22). What was it to him if Jupiter did not metamorphose himself into a cuckoo? How was it possible for him not to perceive that this metamorphosis is full as credible as so many others we meet with in Ovid? Does he not shew by his anger at those who have related it, that he considers it as an incident which may be of advantage to his adversary? And does not he grossly deceive himself to his enemy's advantage? Accordingly Girac did not fail to take advantage of it. Weigh well all the following passage which is copied from Girac (22). "Being unable to deny, that I very properly mentioned the metamorphoses of Jupiter into a cuckoo; he has taken it into his head to call this fable, an old woman's story, and a ridiculous invention; as though the metamorphosis of the same God into a swan, a bull and an eagle, had something in it more ingenious and like Girac, that better: as though all fables in general were not equally trifling; and that this, like the rest, had not its allegory and mythological application. But when Mr. Costar asserts, that it is the invention of a Grammarian who trifled away his time; that it is borrowed from a scholiast on Theocritus; and that he proves by the authority of Erasmus that it is not found in any author of ever so little antiquity; what does he but shew that he is ignorant with others; and that he reads authors with no other view but to learn their errors? And indeed, I do not find that any fable has been celebrated by a greater number of famous writers than this. And even the scholiast who is mentioned by Costar (so great is this man's stupidity!) affirms, that he borrowed it from a treatise () which Aristotle had made in the temple of Hermione. Plutarch likewise mentioned it in his book concerning rivers; Pausanias speaks of it in several places of his Corinthiaca; and Didymus, upon the fourteenth Iliad, relates it from Euphorion a very antient author; not to cite the scholiast on the Greek epigrams; nor a numberless multitude of others." I omit the other particulars on which Girac animadverts upon him in a just and learned manner, on the subjects of horns and the cuckoo. The great number of good authors, who have mentioned this metamorphosis of Jupiter, gives me pain out of kindness to Erasmus. It were to be wished that he, for his glory, had not touched the old scholiast. He had better have been asleep, than writ such a thing as this. Had he not read what Pausanias (24) says concerning mount Thornax (25), which was named Cocygius, or Cocyx, after that Jupiter, under the form of a cuckoo, had kissed Juno? It is a mountain of Laconia. The same author says, that the reason why*

(†) Liv. 2. chap. 2.

(21) See Menage's Origines Françaises, in folio, under the words Horns and Cuckold.

(22) The passage of Erasmus cited by Costar, is in the Explication of the Adage sic quomodo Jupiter duxerit uxorem. It is the 23d of the 4th Century of Châliad 4. pag. m. 914. He observes that the Scholiast on Theocritus, relates this on the authority of one Aristotele: Adyaniti fabulam quam retulerit Aristoteles nisi quis; whence it appears that he did not believe, like Girac, that Aristotle, the Tutor of Alexander the Great, related that incident. Several Aristoteles have wrote books. See Jonstus, de Hist. Philosoph. pag. 61.

(23) Girac, Replique, pag. 546.

(*) Αριστοτελης δε λεγει εν τῷ αρωπῆ Ἐρμιονικῆ ἱερῆ ἰδρυτησιν αρωπῆ τῷ Διῷ και τῷ Ἡρατι γαμή, &c. Schol. Theocr. in illum Vers. Eid. 15. Παντα γυναικας ἱρασι, και οἱς Ζευς ἱρασι.

(24) Pausanias lib. 2. pag. 78.

(25) So it should be called, and not Θρονας, Thronax, as it is in the Scholiast on Theocritus. We owe this correction to Meursius, Miscol. Lacon. pag. 310. Costar follows Erasmus exactly, who had said Thronax.

jealous, their quarrels rose to such a height that they ended in a divorce [F]; and I believe that Jupiter, before he carried matters to such extremities, had endeavoured to reform her by the cudgel. He once suspended her for some time between heaven and earth [G]. If, on one hand, she presided over marriages and nuptials; she had, on the other, the management of the natural consequences of them; I mean that she presided over child-births, and several things dependant on them [H]. Montagne was not well acquainted the Juno of Argos (26) bore a scepter with a cuckoo upon it, was because Jupiter had assumed the form of that bird to enjoy Juno. I do not believe this, adds Pausanias, but I nevertheles, adds he, thought it would not be proper to omit it. Κέκλυγα δὲ ἐπὶ τῷ σκήπτρῳ καθίσθαι Φαει, λέγουσι τὸν Δία, ὅτι ἦρα παρθέ- νου τῆς Ἥρας, ἐς τῆτον τὸν ὄρθον ἀλλαγῆναι, τὴν δὲ αὐτὴ παύσαι δέησαι. τῶν τὸν λόγον, καὶ ὅσα ἐπιπέσει ἔργαται ἀπὸ τῶν, ἐκ ἀποδείχονται γράφω, γράφω δὲ ἔδω ἦσαν. Cuculum vero avem idcirco sceptru ajunt impostum, quod virginis Junonis amore captus Jupiter, in eam se avem verterit, quam puella tanquam ludicrum captavit. Hæc ego, & quæ his sunt familia de diis vulgata, est vera neutiquam existimo, non putavi tamen negligenda (27).

(26) This is a work of Polyctus, Pausan. lib. 2. pag. 59.

(27) Idem, ibid.

[F] Their quarrels rose to such a height, that they ended in a divorce.] Pausanias (28) relates, that there were three temples of Juno at Stymphalum, a city in Arcadia. The first was called the temple of the virgin Juno; the second, the temple of Juno the wife; and the third of Juno the widow. These three temples had been built in her honour by Temenus, under whom she had been brought up. The last mentioned was built at the time that she lived in Stymphalum, whither she had retired after her divorce. The reader may see in the Dictionary of Charles Stephens augmented by Lloyd (29), in what manner, Jupiter caused Juno to return back to him. He made a report to be spread, that he was going to marry the daughter of Afophus, which made a stronger impression on the heart of that exasperated Goddess, than all the intreaties of Jupiter. See the remark [Q], in that part where I speak of the bringing forth of Typhon.

(28) Idem, lib. 2. pag. 253.

[G] He once suspended her for some time between heaven and bell.] It was because she had railed a storm against Hercules. Jupiter made her call to mind that time, when he was informed of the trick she had played him during the siege of Troy. Juno had the art of charming him to such a degree, and lulling him in her arms, that Neptune had all the time he wanted, in order to prejudice the affairs of the Trojans. I shall speak at large of this artifice in the following remark. Jupiter who had said so many tender things to her, and procured her such exquisite pleasures, no sooner heard of the prejudice which had accrued to the Trojans, whilst he was enjoying her, but he reprimanded her in very severe terms. He threatened to whip her (30); and asked whether she had forgot the time when he fastned an anvil to both her feet, and had suspended her between heaven and earth in the fight of all the Gods, who endeavoured, but in vain, to unloose her; he hurling from heaven to earth as many of them as he could catch.

(29) He cites Phylarchus, lib. 19. but Natalia Comes, Mytbl. lib. 2. cap. 4. pag. m. 133. cites Dorotheus in lib. 2. Narrationum fabuliferarum.

(30) Καὶ οὐκ ἔτι γῶσιν ἰμάσσου. Ἐκ τὴν ἑρβαρίβου ἑσάδαμ. Homer, Iliad. lib. 15. ver. 17.

Ἄ ἢ μὲν μὴ ὅτι ἐκρίμα ἰψόθεν, ἐκ δὲ σποδίου Ἀκμονας ἦρα δὴν, τερὶ χερσὶ δὲ δισμοῖν ἦλα. Χρυσῶν, ἄρρηκτον; σὺ δὲ σὺ μὲν καὶ πηφίλῃσιν Ἐκρίμα, ἡλάσσει δὲ Διοὶ κατὰ μακρὸν Ὀλυμπον. Λύται δ' ἄκ ἰδναιῶν παρὰ σάδν; ὅν δὲ λαβῶμαι, ῥίπ' ἰασκον τεταγῶν ἀπὸ βαλῆ, ὄφρ' αὐ ἰκῆται Ἴνν ὀλυμπιδαίων.

(31) Ibid. ver. 38.

“Hast thou forgot when bound and fix'd on high,
“From the vast concave of the spangled sky,
“I hung thee trembling in a spangled chain,
“And all the raging Gods opposed in vain?
“Headlong I hurl'd them from the Olympian hall, “Stunn'd in the whirl, and breathless with the fall.”

P O P E.

It was Juno's business to be submissive; she excused herself by false oaths, and promised to comply with her husband's desires. The quarrel was carried no farther at that time. I must not omit that Juno occasioned the wars of the Titans. She prompted them to dethrone her husband (32), and to restore Saturn whom Jupiter had dethroned. Jealousy was then more powerful than ambition; for the indignation she conceived when she found that a Kingdom was bestowed on Epaphus (33), made Juno choose rather to be a dethroned Goddess, than to reign with him. But perhaps she might propose to herself such a vengeance as might be no check to her ambition. She might flatter herself with the hopes, that in preferring the interest of her father, who had been unjustly driven from his throne, to that of her husband who was an usurper, she might share in the government under her father when he should be restored; and be separated eternally from Jupiter. The reader will see below (34) another plot in which she engaged against her husband.

(32) Hygin. cap. 350.

(33) He was one of Jupiter's bastards. Hyginus, ibid.

(34) In the remark [F] of the article JUPITER.

I cannot think of Juno suspended between heaven and earth, without proposing to my readers a passage which I do not understand. Hyginus (35) relates that Vulcan having made golden shoes for Jupiter and the rest of the Gods, Juno was no sooner seated, but she found herself suspended in the air. Vulcan was told of this, in order that he might come and unloose his mother; but he answered, I have no mother. He had been hurled from heaven, and he was still exasperated at the treatment he met with on that occasion. Here follows Hyginus's Latin. Vulcanus Jovi cæterisque diis soleas aureas ex adamante cum fecisset, Juno, cum sedisset, subito in aere pendere cepit. Quod cum ad Vulcanum missum esset, ut matrem, quam ligaverat solveret, iratus quod de caelo præcipitatus erat, negat se matrem ullam habere. I applaud those critics who have made such learned remarks on the first words of Hyginus (36); but I wish they would have informed me how, by the means of a pair of shoes, a woman the instant she sits down, finds herself suspended in the air. I do not see even how a chair or a throne can have such an effect, and especially with regard to a person who is bound. Methinks we might justly say that the historian wanted judgment on this occasion. Could he think that his readers would be satisfied with so mutilated and falsified a relation? Why did he not say, that as soon as Juno was seated, the celestial floor split asunder; and that her chair being thus unsupported, fell towards the clouds, and stooped in the spaces situated between heaven and earth? This would have presented an intelligible image to the reader. Scriver relates this incident better; he saying that Vulcan made a chair, on which Juno being seated, she could not rise from it notwithstanding all her efforts (37), till she had granted Vulcan's request, which was to know those, to whom he owed his life. Alii dicunt quod atternumque sedebat Vulcanus parentes suos diu quaereret, nec inveniret: sedile fecit tale, ut cum eo qui sedisset surgere non posset; in quo cum adsedisset Juno, nec posset exsurgere; Vulcanus negavit se soluturum omnino, nisi prius parentes suos sibi reconstreret, atque ita factum est ut in Deorum numerum reciperetur (38). i. e. “According to other writers, when Vulcan had long sought his parents, and could not find them, he made such a chair, that whatsoever fate in it could not rise up from it.”

(35) Hygin. cap. 166.

(36) To enquire whether we ought to read soleas, or soleas: if one can say adamante ex adamante; and whether it be not better to say soleas aureas omnia adamante, or soleas ex auro & ex adamante. See Hyginus, Amsterd. edit. of 1681.

(37) Compare what is said of Thecus, in the 6th book of the Æneid, Sedit infelix Thecus us; and what Commentators say of the seat wherein he was placed. See du Rondel on the Cbenia of Pythagoras, pag. 95, & seq.

(38) Servius, in Ecol. 4. Virg. ver. 62.

“her, unless she first shewed him his parents, and by this means he was received in the number of the “Gods.” The reader may consult Pausanias, who informs us that Vulcan, to revenge himself of Juno, sent her a golden throne, in which, the instant the Goddess had seated herself, she found herself fastened (39). Bacchus only was able to persuade Vulcan to return back into the heavens (40); and he was forced to make him drunk before he could prevail with him to undertake that journey. The Athenians had a picture representing Bacchus leading Vulcan back to heaven (41); and there was a piece of sculpture in Lacedæmonia, which represented Vulcan unloosing his mother (42).

(39) Pausan. lib. 1. pag. 18.

(40) Idem, ibid.

(41) Idem, ibid.

(42) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 99.

[H] She presided over childbirths, and several things dependant acquainted with the origin of an adventure which he takes from Plato, and expresses a little too wantonly [I]. Authors are not agreed concerning the place where Juno was brought

- (43) Terent. Andr. Act. 3. Scen. 1. dependent on them.] When Terence supposes that Glycerium the Courtezan, when just going to be delivered, makes use of the following prayer, Juno, Lucina, fer opem, serua me obsecro (43). i. e. "Help, Juno, " Lucina, save me, I beseech thee," he shews plainly that Juno was the Goddess who presided at childbirths. She was called (44) Opigena and Lucina, when in that character, five te Lucinam quod lucem nascentibus tribuas ac Lucetiam convenit nuncupari (45). i. e. "Whether we ought to call thee Lucina or Lucetia, because " thou givest light to those who are born." Other particular names were bestowed upon her, according to the various services that were expected from her in those conjunctures; for she was called Fluonia, because she could prevent too great a flow of blood. Fluoniam Junonem mulieres colebant, quod eam sanguinis fluxum in conceptu retinere putabant (46). She was called Februa, from her presiding at the ceremony of the purification of lying-in women. These are the limitations which Martianus Capella gives to the surnames Fluonia and Februa; for he introduces Philology who declares, that being a virgin, she has no need to invoke the Goddess Juno on those two accounts; Nam Fluoniam Februalemque ac Februum mihi postere non necesse est, cum nihil contagionis corporeæ sexu intemerata pertulerim (47). She might have had occasion for her in another respect, since St. Austin affirms that Varro had related, that Juno presided over the flowing of the menstrual blood. Ibi est & Dea Mena, quæ mensuris fluoribus præest, quamvis Jovis filia, tamen ignobilis. Et hanc provinciam suorum menstruorum, in libro selectorum deorum ipsi Junoni idem autor assignat, quæ in diis selectis etiam regina est; & hic tanquam Juno Lucina cum eadem Mena principia sua eidem cruori præsidet (48). I am not ignorant that the Goddess who presides over child births, was, according to several authors, different from Juno; for some asserted that Lucina was her daughter (49), and others affirmed that Diana was appointed to assist women in labour (50). But without insisting on the hypothesis, that Lucina, Ilithya, Diana, Luna and Juno were the same Deity (51); I say it is very probable that Juno was looked upon as the principal in this function or office, and as having deputies and substitutes in various places (52). If therefore my readers will not acknowledge her directly and immediately for the Goddess Levana, who caused new-born children to be owned by their fathers (53); nor for the Goddess Rumina, who presided over the action of giving them suck; nor for the Goddess Cunina, who presided over their cradles; nor for the Goddess Nundina, who presided over the naming of them; nor for the Goddess Vaticana, who presided over their cries (54); nor for the Goddess Fabulina who presided over the first loosning of their tongues, that is, over the first words they spoke; let, I say, my readers believe, that all these Goddesses were so many subdelegates to Juno, the intendant-general. The same may be said with regard to the Goddess Prosa and the Goddess Postverta, who were worshipped, to prevent infants from throwing themselves into a disadvantageous posture, at their coming into the world. Quando contra naturam forte conversi (pueri) in pedes: brachiis plerumque diducis retineri solent, ægriusque tunc mulieres enituntur. Hujus periculi deprecandi gratia aræ statua sunt Romæ duabus Carmentibus: quarum una Postverta nominata est, Prosa altera; a recti perversique partus & potestate & nomine (55). i. e. "When infants lie " in an unnatural posture in the womb, women bring " forth with greater difficulty; to ward off which danger, there are two altars in Rome dedicated to the " two Carmentas, one whereof is called Postverta, and " the other Prosa, from the power and name of a right " birth, or such a one as is otherwise."
- [I] Montagne . . . expresses himself a little too wantonly.] "It was from some hungry poet, who was " very greedy of this sport, that Plato borrowed " the following story; that Jupiter being one day fired " with a very hot fit of love, and so very impatient, " that he could not hold till she was come into bed " to him, he threw her on the floor, and thro' " the extasy of the pleasure, forgot the mighty and

" important resolutions he had just before taken with " the rest of the Gods in his celestial court; boasting " that this bout was as agreeable to him, as when he " first disfloured Juno unknown to her parents (55)." (56) Montagne, Essais, liv. 1. chap. 29. pag. m. 309. These are Montagne's words. But he is mistaken in ascribing this idea to some poet, who was greedy of the amorous sport, since Homer, the author of this tale, has manifestly declared, that he did not believe it probable, that a husband could be fired with such a transport for his wife. 'Tis in this view he supposes (57), that Juno was not satisfied with putting on her best attire, but also had the policy to borrow Venus's girdle, an infallible charm, a philter, that never failed to produce its effect. 'Tis to this borrowed assistance that he ascribes the power, which Juno had to inspire her husband with so violent a fit of love. Several other things might be answered in the above passage of Montagne (58), had he not been so prudent as to cite Plato. We therefore must not impute to him the faults, which that Philosopher committed, but apply ourselves to Plato.

'Tis certain that it does not give a just and faithful Relation after Homer. His words are as follow. Ἡ Δία καθυδρόντων τῶν ἄλλων θεῶν τὴν καὶ ἀνδράσιν ὡς μάτος ἰγνηγοῦσας, ἀ ἐβελύσατο, τῆτον πάτηται ῥαδίας ἐπιλαύσασα νόμοι, διὰ τῆν τῶν ἀφροδισίων ἐπιθυμίαν; καὶ ἕτως ἐκπλαγίται, ἰδόντα τῆν Ἥραν, ὡς μὴδ' εἰς τὸ δωματίου ἐθέλειν, ἰλθού, ἀλλ' αὐτῆ ἐυλόμοισι χαρμῶν ἐγγυγινοῦσαι, καὶ λίγισται ὡς ἕτως ὑπὸ ἐπιθυμίας ἔχεται, ὡς οὐδ' ὅτε τὸ πρῶτον ἰφοῖται πρὸς ἀλλήλους — Φίλις λήθοντε ταύτης (59). i. e. " Jupiter, the rest of the " Gods as well as men being asleep, through a strong " desire for the lascivious pleasure, forgot all his resolution; and was struck so forcibly by the sight of " Juno, that he could not stay till he got home, but " would sport with her that instant on the ground, " saying that he was enamored with a yet stronger " gust, than when they used to embrace unknown to " their parents." Plato's meaning is, that one of the reasons for which Homer's Poems ought to be read is, that we there find, that whilst the other Gods and men are taking their rest, Jupiter tempted by loose thoughts, cannot sleep, and forgets all the resolutions he had taken; and that the sight of his wife fires him with so ardent a passion, that he is determined to enjoy her that moment, without staying till she can get to bed &c. I again repeat it, Plato alters the story, for Homer does not say that the rest of the Gods slept, nor that men were taking their rest: He says on the contrary, that the Greeks and Trojans fought with great vigour, and that Neptune was in action against the Trojans. Nor does he say that Jupiter forgot his resolutions. He supposes Jupiter had posted himself on the summit of mount Idæ; and that Juno spying him there, formed a design of firing him with a desire of lying with her. He supposes that, to execute her project in the best manner possible, he went and washed herself with Venus's girdle. By this he undertakes to describe Jupiter as a very amorous God, since the most powerful charms were contained in that girdle.

... "Εἶθε δὲ οἱ θεῶν κτήρια πάντα τίτυκτο.
 "Εἶθ' ἐνὶ μὲν Φιλότης, ἐν δ' ἰμῖρ. ἐν δ' ἰαρίδης, Πάσι φωνεῖ ἢ τ' ἐκλεψέ νοσὶ πικραπὴρ φρονεῖσσαν (60).
 That is,
 " In this was ev'ry art, and ev'ry charm,
 " To win the wisest, and the coldest warm;
 " Fond Love, the gentle vow, the gay desire,
 " The kind deceit, the still-reviving fire,
 " Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
 " Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes. POPE.

I don't pretend to excuse him, and I confess that Plato censures him very justly; for in short 'tis very scandalous, for an author to sport in this manner with the chief of all his Gods. By the way, Jupiter's eagerness and passion were not so violent, but that they allowed him time to repeat a long catalogue of his mistresses. Some critics are of opinion that Homer has not placed this story with propriety. It is not, say these, prudent in a husband who is addicted to gallantry, to inform his wife of the intrigues he may have had with other fair ones; this is not a good way to coax her.

(e) See the remark [K].

brought up; some say in Samos (e), and others in the Sea [K]. There was no city in which greater honours were paid her than in Argos [L]. She likewise was in high veneration her. Others justify Homer, from this reflexion, that it must naturally give vast pleasure to a woman, to hear her husband declare, that he is fired with a stronger passion for her, than when he first enjoyed such and such mistresses. This is what Jupiter's declaration amount- ed to.

Νῶϊ δ' ἄγ' ἐν Φιλόπηλῃ τραπέζοισιν ἐνηθάλε,
Οὐ γὰρ πάπολι μὲν ἴδ' ἑὸς ἔργον ἐδὲ γυναῖκας
Θυμὸν ἐν ἐπίθροισι περιπροχυδαῖς ἰδάμυσσον,
Οὐδ' ὅπ' ἐτ' ἤρασάμην Ἰξιονίης ἀλόχοιο, &c. (61).

(61) Homer, Iliad. lib. 14. ver. 314.

That is,
" Let softer cares the present hour employ,
" And be these moments sacred to all joy.
" Ne'er did my foul so strong a passion prove,
" Or for an earthly, or a heavenly love;
" Not when I press'd Ixion's matchless dame &c.

POPE.

I add that Homer has observed a decorum with respect to Juno. He makes her represent to her husband the indecency there would be in case any God should happen to see them lying together on mount Ida, and go and inform the rest of it; however, says she to him, since you have a fancy for it, lets go up into the chamber. But Jupiter did not approve of this expedient, and found out another, which was, to raise so thick a cloud round his wife, that even the sun could not pierce it; and 'twas under this cloud that he indulged his fierce passion. He did not throw his wife on the floor, as Montagne says; but on the bare ground, in the open air. The earth indeed shot forth, instantly, grass and flowers (62), which served them very well for a quilt. Neither Homer nor Plato make Jupiter say, as Montagne does, that he had found that bout as transporting as when he first discovered her unknown to their Parents. Homer says only (63), that Jupiter spying Juno, was fired with as strong a passion for her as when he first enjoyed her beauties. I am willing it should be said, in order to excuse Montagne, that he did not think there was much difference between these two things.

(62) Idem, ibid. ver. 347.

(63) His words may be seen in remark [A] citation (1).

[K] Some say . . . Juno was brought up . . . in Samos, and others in the sea.] She herself affirms the latter in her speech to Venus when she borrowed her girdle (64). She tells her that she stood in need of it, to reconcile Ocean and his wife Tethys, who had not bedded together a long time. Her gratitude on account of the good education she had received from them, prompted her to take a voyage in order to reconcile them; and she does not doubt of being dear to, and revered by them eternally, in case she can persuade them to cohabit together again.

(64) See also what she says to Ocean and Tethys, in Ovid. Metam. lib. 2. when she desires them to exclude the constellation of the Bear.

Δός τῶν μοι φιλόπηλα καὶ ἕμμεν, ὃ τὸ σὺ πάντας
Δαμναῖ Ἀθναῖος ἠδὲ θνητῶν ἀνδράπων·
Εἶμι γὰρ ὀψομένη πολυφόρου περικτα γαίης.
Ὡ κείνους τε θεῶν γίνεσιν, καὶ μηλίφα Τηθύων,
Ὅ μ' ἐν σφοδαῖς δὲ μοισιν ἰούριφον ἠδ' ἀτίταλλον,
Τὰς εἶμ' ὀψομένη, καὶ σφ' ἀκρίλα νύκτα λίσσω,
Ἢ δὴ γὰρ δρόν χρόνον ἀλλήλων ἀπέχονται
Εὐνῆς καὶ Φιλόπηλα, ἐπεὶ χόλος ἔμπισσι θυμῶ &c.

(65) Homer. Iliad. lib. 14. ver. 198. Juno repeats this on Mount Ida, when Jupiter asks her whither she is going. Ibid. ver. 301.

That is,
" Then grant me, said the Queen, those conquering
" charms,
" That power which mortals and immortals warms;
" That love, which melts mankind in fierce desires,
" And burns the sons of heav'n with sacred fires!
" For lo! I haste to those remote abodes,
" Where the great parents (sacred source of Gods!)
" Ocean and Tethys their old empire keep,
" On the last limits of the land and deep.

" For strife, I hear, has made the union cease,
" Which held so long that antient pair in peace,
" What honour, and what love shall I obtain,
" If I compose those fatal feuds again?

POPE.

Had Juno been allotted Venus's Girdle, that so very effectual charm to work a change in married people who have separate beds, she had very justly been made to preside over marriages; but she has occasion to borrow the pacific method, and powerful instrument of reconciliation: Why was not this employment given to the Goddesses from whom the girdle was to be borrowed? I leave it to persons who have leisure to enquire into the reason of this.

With regard to her education in Samos, consult Pausanias, who says that the inhabitants of this island asserted, that Juno was born there under a little tree which they still shewed (66). The temple of that Goddess was very antient (67). There is no one but remembers the following words of the Æneid.

(66) Pausan. lib. 7. pag. 209.

(67) Idem, ibid.

Quam Juno fertur terris magis omnibus unam Posthabita coluisse Samo (68).

(68) Lib. 1. ver. 15.

" Beloved by Juno more " Than her own Argos, or the Samian shore.

DRYDEN.

The island was named Parthenia, because Juno had also her nuptials with Jupiter were solemnized, whence she was represented in her temple as a maiden who is marrying, and the anniversary of her festival was solemnized as a wedding. Insulam Samum scribit Varro prius Partheniam nominatam, quod ibi Juno adoleverit, ibique etiam Jovi nupsit: Itaque nobilissimum, & antiquissimum templum ejus est Sami, & simulacrum in habitu nubentis figuratum, & sacra ejus anniversaria nuptiarum ritu celebrantur (70).

(69) Scholiast. Apollonii, in lib. 4. He says, on ver. 187. of book 1. that the Imbrus, a river of Samos, was called Παρθένος, because Juno, when a virgin, had been brought up there.

[L] There was no city in which greater honours were paid her than in Argos.] The Argives pretended, that the three daughters of the river Alerion had brought up Juno. One of them called Eubœa, had her name given to the mountain on which Juno's temple was built; and Eupolemus a native of Argos was the architect of it. In the porch of it were the statues of all the Priestesses of the Goddesses (71): their office was very considerable, as I observed, when I spoke of the unhappy Priestess who occasioned the burning of the temple (72). Pausanias says (73) that she escaped to the altar of Pallas in Tegea; and that notwithstanding the indignation of the Argives, they nevertheless suffered her statue to stand. He says that the most antient statue of that Goddess was made of a wild pear-tree, and it was kept with great care. Pirafus the son of Argus had carried it to Tyrinthus; but the Argives having demolished that city, brought it back to the temple of Juno (74). See Benedicinus on Pindar (75), concerning the games that were solemnized at Argos in honour of that Goddess. See also the commentators of Horace on the following words of Ode VII. Lib. I.

(70) Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 17. pag. m. 54. See also St. August. de Civitate Dei; lib. 6. cap. 7.

(71) See Pausanias, lib. 2. pag. 59.

(72) See the article CHRYSIS.

(73) Pausan. lib. 2. pag. 159. See also lib. 3. pag. 86.

(74) Idem, ibid. pag. 142, 628.

Plurimus in Junonis honorem
Aptum dicit equis Argos.

" To honour Juno, Argos some proclaim,
" Renown'd for horses."

Silius Italicus, speaking of the love which Juno has for the city of Carthage, says that she prefers it to Argos and Mycene.

Hic Juno ante Argos (sic credidit alta vetustas),
Ante Agamemnonium, gratissima tecla Mycenam
Optavit profugis æternam condere sedem (76).

(76) Silius Italic. lib. 1. ver. 26.

" Here Juno wish'd, as antient Bards relate,
" To fix the exiles in a lasting seat:
" A seat which she, to Argos and Mycene
" Preferred."

According to Homer (77) the three cities which Juno loved best were Argos, Lacedæmonia and Mycene. It is strange he should say nothing of Samos, the only place mentioned by Virgil, where he speaks of the preference which Juno gave to Carthage.

(77) Iliad. lib. 4. ver. 51.

Let us say something of the founder of the temple which Juno had in Argos; for thereby we shall discover the antiquity of the edifice. It was built by Phœronæus, ration at Carthage [M], and in Olympia. In this last city sixteen Ladies were appointed as overseers over the Games which were solemnized in Juno's honour every five years. Three classes or bands of young maidens used to dispute there for the prize in the race; came down to run in the Olympic Games, and used to take up almost the whole time they lasted. Such Ladies as were victorious received an olive crown; and used to make a Peplus (f), which they consecrated to that Goddess every five years (g). By the way (g) Ex Pausan. lib. 5. cap. 16. pag. m. 417. the conjugal infidelities of Jupiter were so much the more inexcusable, as Juno had the secret of becoming a virgin every year [N]. The love she had for Jason has not been much talked of [O]; and she freed herself with honour from the snares which Ixion had laid

(f) A kind of robe or veil.

Phoroneus, the son of Inachus, and he was the first who gave arms to that Goddess, in recompence whereof he was the first who reigned. Phoroneus Inachi filius templum Argis Junoni primus fecit. Hyginus says this in his CCXXVth Chapter. Phoroneus Inachi filius, says he in his CCLXXIVth Chapter, arma Junoni primus fecit, qui ob eam causam primus regnandi potestatem habuit. Some critics will have us read, instead of arma, aram or sacra; but others insist on the common reading, and confirm it by a passage of Cassiodorus, in Chapter XVIII of Book VII Variarum. See the commentators of Hyginus in the Amsterdam edition of 1681. With regard to the antiquity of Phoroneus, see Scaliger's notes page 19 on Eusebius's Chronicon. It is sufficient to remember that Phoroneus was contemporary with Abraham, or wanted but little of being so.

[M] She likewise was in high veneration at Carthage. I imagined for a very long time, that Virgil made use of a poetical licence, without paying any regard to history, when he represented Carthage as Juno's favourite city (78); and I did not think myself obliged to change my opinion, on reading in Ovid and Silius Italicus, the confirmation of Virgil's assertion; for no one can reasonably doubt but that he was the occasion why Ovid makes Juno speak thus,

(78) Æneid. lib. 2. circa init.

*Pœniteat quod non fovi Carthaginis arces,
Cum mea sint illo currus & arma loco* (79).

(79) Ovid. Fest. lib. 6. ver. 45.

"I fore repented that I frown'd on Carthage,
That city where my arms and chariot lie.

(80) In the preceding remark, citation (76).

(81) Apulei. lib. 6. Metam. circa init.

and yet Silius Italicus asserted what was seen above (80): but having examined other passages of various authors, I began to think that Virgil's hypothesis was grounded on tradition. Psyche's prayer is not of the least force with me: Magni Jovis germana, says she (81), & conjuga: sine tu Sami, quæ querulo partu vagituque & alimonia tua gloriatur, tenes vetusta delubra; sine celsæ Carthaginis, quæ te virginem vedura leonis caelo commeanthem percolit, beatas sedes frequentas: sine prope ripas Inachi, qui te jam nuptam Tonantis, & reginam dearum memorat, inclytis Argivorum præfides mœnibus: quam cunctis oriens Zygiam veneratur, & omnis occidens Lucinam appellat: si meis extremis casibus Juno sospita, meque in tantis exantlatis laboribus defessam, imminenti periculi metu libera. i. e. "Thou sister and wife of mighty Jove; whether thou dwellest in Samos, which glories in giving thee birth, and bringing thee up in thy infancy; or whether thou frequentest the blissful seats of lofty Carthage, which worships thee, as a virgin, drawn by lions from the skies; or near the banks of Inachus, who now commemorates thee, consort of the Thunderer, and Queen of the Goddesses, thou presidest over Argos's renowned walls; whom the whole east adores by the name of Zygia, and every part of the west calls Lucina: be thou to me, (O Juno) in the extremes to which I am reduced, a preserver; and free me, exhausted with these toils, from the fear of impending danger."

(82) It was pretended that her statue had been consecrated by Dido when she built Carthage. See Herodian, lib. 5. cap. 6.

(83) I shall take some notice in the remark [Y] of the temples she had in Italy.

thinking that there was mixed with it, I know not what impressions of the custom that is observed with respect to women. When a woman shares in the government, she is much more waited upon, honoured and respected, than a man is who has the like authority. Consider only how much court is paid to the wives of Governors of Provinces, when they are known to have great credit and authority. Greater honours are paid to them than to their husbands. This is the practice upon earth, and it is carried into heaven. Jupiter was attended upon and served as a King; and Juno as an ambitious, haughty, revengeful Queen, who shared the government of the world with him, and assisted in all his councils.

Οὐτέ ποτ' εἰς εὐνήν Διὸς ἔλυθε μητιόνησθε,
Οὐτέ ποτ' εἰς θάλασσαν πολυδαίδαλον; ὡς τεπέεσθε πηρ,
Αὐτῆ ἰφιζομίην πυκνῆς φραζέσασθε βυδαίς (84).

(84) See Homer's Hymn to Ap. lib. when he says that Juno, on account of Minerva's birth, left her husband for a year.

*Nunquam ad cubile Jovis venit consiliarii,
Nunquam ad thronum variarum, sicuti antea,
Cum ipso sedens, sapientia consultans consilia.*

I dare be so bold as to say, that the extravagancies into which Christians have run with respect to the Virgin Mary; extravagancies which surpass every thing the Heathens could invent in honour of Juno, flow from the same spring; I mean from the custom established of honouring women, and paying court to them with much more assiduity and respect than to the other sex. We cannot live without women, either in religious or civil life. Whoever should take from the Romish communion its devotion for the saints, and especially for her who therein is called Queen of Heaven, and Queen of Angels, would leave a dreadful chasm in it; the rest would fall to pieces, and be arena sine calce, scopæ dissoluta. Erasmus censuring the custom of saluting the Virgin Mary in the pulpit, after the opening or beginning of the sermon, says, "That it is contrary to the example of all the ancients, who ought rather to be imitated than I know not what people, who, perhaps to please women, have followed the Heathens in that particular (85)."

[N] Juno had the secret of becoming a virgin every year. For this purpose she needed but wash herself in a fountain (86). "Juno was very assiduous, says the author of a Dictionary (87) in washing herself annually in the fountain or spring of Canathus, near Nauplia, called at this time Napoli di Romania, where she always received her maidenhead, a circumstance that endeared her to Jupiter. Pausan. lib. 8." Now Pausanias does not observe, that this circumstance endeared Juno to her husband; all he says is, that the Argives spoke of this restoration of Juno's virginity, and grounded what they said on this occasion, on the practice of their occult ceremonies in the mysteries of that Goddess. Many writers, in quoting an author, commit this fault, viz. that they make him say all that, according to them, he ought to have said. Hence it was that the writer in question supposes Pausanias to say, what he really did not. The author who thus ascribes falsely, probably had his thoughts full on what he had before related. "Diego de Tourez, in his history of the Cherifs or Zeffirs, says, that among the felicities, which the Turks hope to enjoy in the life to come, they imagine that their wives will bring them new maidenheads, cap. 74." The virtue of the fountain of youth, so greatly celebrated by our old Poets, and writers of romances, was not to be compared to that of Canathus.

(85) Erasmus, in Ecclesiasti. apud Colomel. Rome Protostant. pag. 25.

(86) Called Canathus; it was in Peloponnesus. See Pausan. lib. 2. sub fin. pag. 80.

(87) Cæsar de Rochefort, Diction. général. & curieux, pag. 612, 613.

[O] The love she had for Jason has not been much talked of. According to some authors, Jason owed entirely laid for that Goddess [P]. If some authors may be credited, she had no children by her husband ; and she never conceived but after a most extraordinary manner [Q] ; but she had milk as women usually have in those cases ; and this must necessarily be supposed, since she is said to have suckled one of her husband's bastards. He was forced to employ a stratagem in order to prevail with her to do it ; and then, as we are told, was formed in the skies, what was called the Milky Way [R]. Some of those authors who tirely the kindness and protection which that Goddess indulged him, to the good service he had done her, without knowing who she was. Juno, disguised under the form of an old woman, desired him to carry her over a river ; which he accordingly did, and lost one of her shoes as he was doing her that office ; but others say that he was obliged to his beauty for the favour she shewed him. Juno, not being able to resist such a blaze of charms, fell distractedly in love with this lovely youth.

(88) Scholiast. Pindari in Pyth. Od. 4. apud Meziriacum, Not. in Epiph. Ovidii, pag. 540.

Ὀπίς ἡ ὑπερβλήσῃς ἢ ὁ Ἰάσονος δῆλον ἐκ τῆς κῆς τῆς Ἡρας καὶ τῆς τιμῆς ἀπὸ τῆς ἐπιμαρτυρίας (88). Jasonem fuisse perplebrum hinc patet, quod juxta quosdam ipsa Juno infans amore cum profecuta fuerit. These are the authors who speak of the other story. Pelias forte vidit Jasonem nudo pede venisse, qui dum Junonem transmutatam in anus speciem credens mortalem petentem per vadum fluminis transferret, alteram ex caligis in limo amiserat (89). i. e. "Pelias by chance (89) Servius, in Eclog. 4. Virgilio, ver. 34.

spied Jason coming with one foot bare, who, whilst " he was carrying Juno disguised in the form of an " old woman, and supposing her to be a mortal, over " a river, lost one of his buskins in the mud." The reader will find this incident related more at large in (90) Hygin. cap. 22. See also cap. 13. Apollon. Rhodius, lib. 3. ver. 66.

Hyginus (90), with the testimonies of gratitude which Juno gave on that account. Valerius Flaccus supposes that it was extreme bad weather when she received this service ; and he adds, that Jason knew her to be a Goddess by the dread with which she was seized, because she knew that thunder to be the voice of Jupiter who called her. She was there flying away ; she had left her husband, and did not care much to return home to him.

Omnipotens regina, inquit, quam turbidus atro Eibere caeruleum quateret cum Jupiter imbrem, Ipse ego praecipiti tumidum per Enipea nimbo In campos & tuta tuli, nec credere quivi Ante deam, quam te tonitru nutaque reposci Conjugis, & subita raptam formidine vidi (91).

(91) Val. Flacc. Argon. 1. ver. 81.

" O Queen omnipotent, whom when stormy Jove " Descended from the gloomy skies, I bore " In a substantial cloud, thro' swift Enipeus ; " Nor did think thee a Goddess, till I saw thee " In dread dismay at thy dire consort's thunder.

[P] She freed herself with honour from the snares which Ixion had laid for her.] Ixion, guilty of a parricide (92), from the guilt of which he could not find any person to absolve him, at last received this good office from Jupiter himself. He retained so deep a sense of gratitude on that account, that he endeavoured to cuckold his benefactor ; he being inflamed with a passion for Juno, and earnestly intreating her to comply with his wishes. However, the Goddess refused, and complained to Jupiter, who resolved to try whether this accusation were justly grounded, formed a cloud in the exact shape of his wife, and left it to Ixion's discretion, who being strongly fired with love, made exactly the same use of it as he would have done of the Goddess, and hence sprung the Centaurs. He afterwards boasted his having had an affair of gallantry with Juno ; and it was then, as we are told, that Jupiter losing all patience, hurled him down to hell, and sentenced him to the punishment of the wheel (93). He did not behave like a jealous husband ; for what Italian would permit his wife's gallants to satiate their passion on her form or figure ? He would prevent, if possible, their diverting themselves with her in imagination or in a dream.

(92) He had killed his wife's father, in a treacherous manner.

(93) Extracted from Natalis Comes, Mytholog. lib. 6. cap. 16. A few circumstances excepted, all this is to be found in Diodorus Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 71. See also Lucian, in Deorum Dialogis, pag. 132, & seq. tem. 1.

[Q] She always conceived after a most extraordinary manner.] According to the most common opinion, she was mother only of three children, viz. Mars, Vulcan, and Hebe. As to Mars, she conceived him by touching a flower which Flora pointed out to her. She was endeavouring to revenge herself on her husband, band, who had brought forth Minerva without her assistance ; and to shew him that she could do as much without the assistance of a male.

Protinus haerentem decerpfi pollice florem, Tangitur, & tacto concipit illa sinu. Jamque gravis Thracen & laeva Propontidis intrat, Fitque potens voti, Marsque creatus erat (94).

(94) Ovid. Fast. lib. 5. ver. 255.

" The flower I gather'd, when lo, so great its power, " She touch'd it, and immediately conceiv'd. " Then enters Thrace, and the Propontic coast ; " And, all her wish indulg'd, brought forth God " Mars.

As for Vulcan, she conceived him by the wind, by an influence directly like to that of the Spanish mares (95). (95) See the article HIPPOMANES, at the end of this work. " The like incident is likewise told of " Juno, viz. that having conceived by the wind, " without the assistance of man, she brought forth " Vulcan." She conceived of Hebe, by eating greedily of lettuces. This maiden was the Goddess of Youth, and served as Cup-bearer to the Gods till the following misfortune happened to her in a grand entertainment. She fell, and so disclosed to the Gods whatever was hid under her petticoats, by which accident she lost her employment (97). I am not ignorant that other authors declare her to be daughter of Jupiter and Juno, after the common way.

(95) See the article HIPPOMANES, at the end of this work.

(96) Lucianus, de Sacrificiis, pag. 352. tom. 1.

(97) Servius, apud Lloyd, voce Hebe.

I must here refute Natalis Comes, who probably has misguided some Lexicographers. He says that Juno, exasperated at the birth of Minerva, besought heaven and earth, and the celestial and infernal Gods, to cause her to bring forth without the conjunction of a male. She struck the earth with her hand, and at the expiration of a certain term the earth brought forth Typhon. Qua cum manu humum percussisset, sequenti postea tempore natus est ex ea terra Typhon, &c. (98). To prove this he quotes some Greek verses, which manifestly signify that Juno brought forth Typhon. How well does he understand what he alleges ?

Ὀν ποτ' ἀπ' Ἡρῆς ἴτιν' ἡ χολωσαμένη Διὶ πατρὶ Εὐρ' ἀρα δὴ Κρονίδης ἱκευδία γυνίωσ' Ἀθήνην Ἐν κορυφῇ.

(98) Nat. Comes, Mythol. lib. 6. cap. 22. pag. m. 644. The same is found in Lloyd's Dictionary.

" Offended Juno brought forth monstrous Typhon, " When, from Jove's head, renown'd Minerva sprung.

Homer, in the Hymn to Apollo, relates this story so clearly, that it is surprizing so many authors should have taken one for the other. He says that Juno having invoked heaven and earth, and all the infernal Gods, in order that she might bring forth a son without the aid of Jupiter, struck the earth and made it tremble, and took this earthquake for a good omen, and lived apart from her husband during a year, at the end of which she brought forth a son, who did not resemble either men or Gods ; and this was Typhon.

Ἡ δὲ ἴτεκ' ἔτι θεῶν ἰμελίχμιον ἔτε θεοῖσσι, Δαμόν τ' ἀρπυγίων τὸ Τυφάεωσ, αἴμασ θεοῖσιν (99).

(99) Homer. Hymn. in Apoll. ver. 351.

Hæc autem peperit neque diis similem, neque mortalibus, Gravemque difficilemque Typhaona, damnum mortalibus.

[R] Then . . . was formed in the skies, what was called the milky way.] She gave suck to Hercules ; but that child, whose strength was at that time prodigious, squeezed and pulled her nipple with so much violence, that she could not bear it ; whereupon drawing back her nipple in a forcible manner, some of her milk was spilt, and this it was that formed the circle that was called

(b) See the remark [U].

who put the word regina among the epithets bestowed on Juno, are guilty of a childish error [S]; though, under that name, she was protectress of the Veientes (b), and placed on one of the seven mountains in Rome. I question whether those who assert, that she did not begin to favour the Romans till the second Punic War [T], say true. She was honoured called by the Greeks γαλαξία, and by the Latins orbis lacteus, via lactea, &c. (the milky way) (100). The Poet Manilius has touched upon this fable :

(100) Achilles Tattius, in Sphæge, ex Eratosthene in Catamerismo, apud Lloyd, voce Juno.

*Nec mihi celanda est famæ vulgata vetustas
Mollior; è niveo lactis fluxisse liquorem
Peñore Reginae Divum, cœlumque colore
Infecisse suo. Quapropter lacteus orbis
Dicitur, & nomen causa descendit ab ipsa* (101).

(101) Manilius, lib. 1, pag. m. 44.

“ Nor must I omit the fable, that a liquor, “ Milk white, flow’d fait from Juno’s breasts, and “ stain’d
“ The heavenly dome, whence milky way ’tis call’d;
“ The name arising from the fabled cause.

Some say that the milk which formed this way, fell from Hercules’s mouth, upon his seizing upon Juno’s nipple too greedily (102). These fictions suppose Juno to be at that time in heaven; but the Thebans did not allow this; they showed the place where that Goddess, deceived by Jupiter, gave Hercules suck (103).

(102) See Philoponus, in I Meteor. apud Philipum Cœsium in Cælo Astronomico Poetico, pag. 15.

[S] Some of those authors who put the word Regina among the epithets bestowed on Juno, are guilty of a childish error.] For they, as a proof of it (104), quote a passage from Virgil, where there is no particular epithet.

(103) Pausan. lib. 9. pag. 300.

(104) Francis Pomey, in Pantheo Mythico, pag. m. 92.

*Ast ego, quæ Divum incedo regina, Jovisque
Et soror & conjux* (105).

(105) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 46.

“ But I, who walk in awful state above,
“ The Majesty of heaven, the sister-wife of Jove.

DRYDEN.

(106) Aristotle, lib. de Morib. 9. shews that Homer, by the following words, σπάρτη ἀνδρῶν τῆς θεῶν τῆς, which denote Jupiter, declares him King of Gods and Men. See the Virgil Variorum of Leyden 1680. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 65.

The father of the people, the magnificent, the great, the just, the wise, &c. are epithets or titles of distinction appropriated to certain Princes; but this cannot be said of the title of King of France: nor can it be said of the title of Queen of France. Now Juno in the above-mentioned verse of Virgil is called Queen of the Gods, in the same manner as Anne of Austria, wife of Lewis XIII, was called Queen of France. Juno was the wife of Jupiter, King of Gods and men, Divum pater atque hominum Rex (106), as she herself styles him in the Æneid (107). In another place (108) she tells him, that he reigns over all the Gods, οὐδὲ πάρος μὲν ἀθανάτοισιν ἀνάσσεις. Had proofs been sought for in Livy, good ones would have been found. See the following remark, where I relate what he says of Camillus, concerning the taking of Veii. The following words of Juvenal, (107) Æn. lib. 1. ver. 65.

(108) Iliad. lib. 4. ver. 61.

(109) Sat. 12. ver. 13.

— niveam Reginae cœdimus agnam (109).

(†) Juno.

“ A snowy lamb, in honour of the (†) Queen,
“ Will now be slain.”

These words, I say, would have furnished a much better proof, than these which are to be found in the first book of the Æneid.

[T] She did not begin to favour the Romans, till the second Punic War.] Camillus, preparing to storm the Veientes, offered the tenth part of the plunder to Apollo; and besought Juno, protectress of the besieged, to abandon them, in order to go to Rome, where a temple worthy of her should be built. Tuo ductu, inquit, (Dictator) Pythice Apollo, suoque namini instinctus pergo ad delendam urbem Vejos: tibi que hinc decimam partem prædæ voveo. Te simul, Juno Regina, quæ nunc Vejos colis, precor ut nos victores in nostram tuamque mox futuram urbem sequere: ubi te dignum amplitudine tua templum accipiat (110). After the sacking of the city was ended, they proceeded to the removal of the Gods, and behaved with great respect on that occasion. Some one asked the statue of Juno, whether she was willing to come to Rome; whereupon she made a sign that she was; and it is even pretended that she said yes. It was no trouble to remove her; and one would have thought that she moved herself in order to follow the victors. Camillus consecrated a temple in her honour on mount Aventinus, pursuant to the promise he had made her. Tum Junoni Reginae templum in Aventino locavit dedicavitque Matulae matri (111). Livy’s words (111) Mem. ibid. are so beautiful and remarkable, that the persons who understand Latin, will be well pleased to read them, without having the trouble to stir out of their places. Cum jam humanæ opes asportatæ egestæque à Veii essent, amoliri tum Deum dona ipsosque Deos, sed colentium magis quam rapientium modo, cœpere. Namque delecti ex omni exercitu juvenes, pure lotis corporibus, candida veste, quibus deportanda Romam Regina Juno assignata erat, venerabundi templum inire, primo religiose admoventes manus: quod id signum more Etrusco nisi certæ gentis sacerdos attrectare non esset solitus. Deinde quum quidam, seu spiritu divino tactus, seu juvenili joco, Viine Romam ire Juno? annuisse ceteri Deam conclamaverunt: inde fabulæ adjectum est, vocem quoque dicentis, Velle, audiam. Motam certe sede sua parvi molimenti admniculis, sequentis modo accepimus levem ac facilem translatu fuisse: integramque in Aventinum æternam sedem suam, quo vota Romani dictatoris vocaverant, perlata; ubi templum ei postea idem, qui voverat, Camillus dedicavit (112). i. e. “ When the riches of Veii were

(110) T. Liv. Dec. 1. lib. 5. cap. 21.

“ all carried away, they began to carry off the gifts of the Gods, and the Deities themselves, but in a manner that resembled worshippers rather than plunderers. For a band of youths selected out of the whole army, having washed their bodies, and being clothed in white garments, and whose employment was to carry the Goddess Juno to Rome, went into the temple in a reverent manner, first touching her religiously; for only a Priest of a certain family (according to the custom of Hetruria) was permitted to touch that statue. At last one of them, whether by inspiration, or out of a juvenile frolic, saying, Juno, will you go to Rome? the rest cried aloud that the Goddess nodded; whence a fable was added, that a voice was also heard, which said yes. It is certain, that the removal of her gave very little trouble, and that she was carried entire to mount Aventinus, her eternal seat or residence, to which the vows of the Roman Dictator had called her, and where the same Camillus afterwards consecrated a temple in her honour.”

Plutarch makes Livy say, that Camillus, upon his desiring Juno to come to Rome, touched the statue of that Goddess; and that some answered that she consented, and would willingly follow him. Αἰεὶ δὲ φησὶν εὐχεσθαι μὲν τὸν Κάμυλλον ἀπὸ τῆς θεῆς εἶναι παρακαλεῖν, ἀποκρίνασθαι δὲ τινος τῶν παρῶν ὅτι καὶ βεβαίως καὶ σὺγκραίνῃ, καὶ συνακαλεθεὶ προθύμως (113). Livius (113) Plutarch. tradit inter precandum attrectasse Camillum Deam & invitasse: inde velle & annuere ac sequi libentem respondisse ex adstantibus nonnullos. Compare this with Livy’s words, and it will appear very evidently that Plutarch did not understand them in any manner; or rather that he cites them without looking into that author, and that he has adulterated the circumstances; and as he probably trusted to his memory on a numberless multitude of occasions, I am afraid that, with regard to a great number of incidents, we find in Plutarch’s writings, not what he had really read; but the idea which the histories he had read, left in his imagination. The prayers which Livy ascribes to Camillus, with respect to Juno, was before the taking of Veii; how then could he say that Camillus offered up his prayers, with his hands fixed on the statue? What follows comes nearer to my text.

Plutarch adds, that those who assert that Juno’s statue spoke, either by signs or by words, that she granted Camillus’s prayers, have a very powerful argument to alledge, I mean the prosperity of Rome; for that city, says he, having been so small, could not have raised itself to so exalted a pitch of power, had it not been perpetually favoured with the presence of a God. Οἱ δὲ ἰσχυρίζονται καὶ τὸ παραδοξὸν βεβαίως, μάλιστα μὲν ἔχουσι συνέθερον τὴν τύχη τῆς πόλεως, ἢ ἀπὸ σμικρῆς καὶ ἀφροσύνης honoured at Rome, under other titles, as that of Moneta [U], of Sospita; &c. The Romans did not only join with the inhabitants of Lanuvium in the year 416, in worshipping that Goddess under this last title (i); but they also built a temple to her in the Forum Olitorium, or Herb Market, in 560. Caius Cornelius Cethegus, who had devoted it four years before, when, being Consul, he was engaged in war against the Infubres (k); consecrated it in quality of Censor (l). This temple was repaired in 663, and that on account of a dream which a woman had (m). The worship of Juno in Rome was of remote antiquity [X]. Very great honours were paid her in other cities of

(i) Livius, lib. 8. cap. 14. See the beginning of the remark [7].

(k) Idem, lib. 32. cap. 29.

(l) Liv. lib. 34. cap. 53.

(m) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 1. init. fol. 304. B. and folio 311. B.

καλαφρομενης αρετης επι της δεξης ης δεξιωνος αποσταθου; αχα δευ πολλων ης μεγαλης επιφανειας εκασου συμπαιονος, αμαχανου (114). Ceterum hoc miraculum adstruuntibus & defendentibus fortuna magnopere suffragatur urbis, qua ex parvo & humili exordio, sine numinis perpetuo ex multis & magnis signis presentis favore, evadere ad eam gloriam & potentiam baudquam potuisset. He therefore thinks that Juno, being removed from Veii to Rome, favoured the Romans, and procured them that series of victories which made them so formidable: and therefore Jupiter's prediction, viz. that Juno would at last favour the Roman people, must have been fulfilled the year of Rome 359 (115).

(114) Idem, ibid.

Quin aspera Juno,
Quae mare nunc terrasq; metu caelumque fatigat,
Conspicua in melius referret, metumque fovabit
Romanos rerum Dominos gentemque togatam (116).

(115) In which the town of Veii was sacked.

“ Ev'n haughty Juno, who, with endless broils, “ Earth, seas, and heav'n, and Jove himself turmoils;
“ At length aton'd, her friendly pow'r shall join,
“ To cherish and advance the Trojan line.
“ The subject world shall Rome's dominion own,
“ And, prostrate, shall adore the nation of the queen.
DRYDEN.

And nevertheless, because some Poets have taken it into their heads to remove this æra to the (117) second Punic war (118), the Commentators depend on this fiction more than on the credit and authority of Historians. I here observe, that Juno, besides the temple which she had on mount Aventin, shared the temple of the Capitol with Jupiter and Minerva (119). The temple of Juno Moneta, which I shall mention in the following remark, furnishes me with a good proof.

(116) Virgil. Ænid. lib. 1. ver. 279.

(117) Who began to reign the year of Rome 535.

(118) Quia bello Punico secundo, ut ait Ennius, placata Juno cepit favore Romanis. Servius in hunc locum Virgilii. See Silius Italicus, lib. 12. pag. m. 520. Horace, lib. 2. Ode 1.

(119) See Daufqueius on Silius Italicus, lib. 10. pag. 435.

(120) Decretum est Junoni Reginae in Aventino Junoniamque Sospitam Lanuvii majoribus hostiis ut sacrificaretur. Liv. lib. 22. sus est. Jamque non simulacrum, sed ipsam caelo Junonem petentem portare se credentes, læti in ea partem Aventini, in qua nunc templum ejus cernimus, collocaverunt. i. e. “ Nor was the removal of Juno to our city, less voluntary; for Veii having been taken by Furius Camillus, the soldiers being ordered by the Generalissimo to convey the statue of Juno Moneta, to which particular adoration was there paid, to Rome, they accordingly set about removing it. One of the persons who were employed on that occasion, asking the Goddess in a joking way, whether she would go to Rome, she answered yes. “ The hearing her speak in this manner turned their jesting into admiration: so that now imagining they were not carrying a statue, but the Goddess herself, they placed her joyfully in that part of mount Aventine where her temple is now seen.”

(121) Val. Max. lib. 1. cap. 8. num. 3.

Valerius Maximus's own words are sufficient to shew how strangely he confounds things; for he relates in another book (122), that the temple of the Goddess Moneta was on the capitol, in that part where Manlius's house had stood. Now Livy says, that the temple which was built where the house in question had stood, was devoted to Juno Moneta during the war of the Arunci; and it was consecrated the year after, i. e. the year of Rome 413 (123). Ovid, in the sixth book of the Fasti, agrees exactly in that particular with Livy. The verses where he mentions this informs us, that this temple was devoted by Camillus; upon which a critic observes (124), that nevertheless Plutarch does not say in any manner that Camillus had made such a vow; and relates only, that Manlius's house was razed with the ground; and that the temple of the Goddess Moneta was built on the same spot where the house in question stood. Doubtless this critic thought that the Camillus whom Ovid speaks of is the same whose life is written by Plutarch; he, I say, who exerted himself so strenuously in order to get Manlius punished. I do not think that Ovid is so grossly mistaken. The person who devoted the temple of Juno Moneta was the younger Camillus. We therefore must not wonder that the historian of Camillus the father should take no notice of that vow; but he may be blamed for relating so of neglecting the fate of the house of this Manlius. He says (125), that the Romans having demolished it, built on the same spot the temple of the Goddess Moneta, and enacted that thenceforward no Patrician should live in the capitol. No reader but would conclude, from such relations, that these three things were done at the same time. Who would imagine that this temple was not devoted till above forty years after the execution of Manlius? There is a circumstance in Cicero which perplexes a little here, viz. that Juno, who had a temple on the capitol, was surnamed Moneta, because she had advised the Romans to sacrifice a sow big with young. Scriptum a multis, cum terræ motus factus esset ut sue plena procuratio fieret, vocem ab æde Junonis ex arca exiisse, quocirca Junonem illam appellatam Monetam (126). i. e. “ It is related by many authors, that an earthquake happening, a voice issued from the shrine in Juno's temple, commanding an expiation to be made by sacrificing a sow big with young, whence that Juno was called “ Moneta.” According to this, we should say that there was a temple of Juno on the capitol, before that the younger Camillus the Dictator devoted the temple of Juno Moneta; or we should say that he only devoted Juno Moneta to Juno; but that in after-ages the Goddess got the surname of Moneta, because of the counsel she gave in that temple. The first of these two hypotheses has no foundation in any authority; and the second would prove historians to be guilty of an extreme negligence, since they observe expressly that this Camillus the Dictator devoted a temple to Juno Moneta, which was built on the same spot where Manlius had lived. Perhaps this obscurity might be removed, if it were supposed that the place whence Juno gave the advice or counsel, was the chapel which had been built in her honour on the capitol (127). From that time she might have been (128) surnamed Moneta, without having a particular temple built to her under that epithet; but during the war of the Arunci, Camillus would have built a temple in her honour, under that surname which she had already. This would be a proof that she had advised the Romans before the year 413, and consequently that her favour for Rome preceded the second Punic war. Rosinus (129) makes Cicero say, that the earthquake which was the occasion of Juno's advising the sacrifice of a sow big with young, happened before the Gauls took Rome. But Rosinus is mistaken, Cicero not having writ any such thing.

(122) Lib. 6. cap. 3. num. 11.

(123) Livius, lib. 7. cap. 28.

(124) See Valerius Maximus Variorum published by Thyfius, lib. 1. cap. 8. num. 3. pag. 105.

(125) Plutarchus in Camill. pag. 148, C.

(126) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 1.

(127) See Dion. Halicarnass. lib. 4. cap. 69. Daufqueius, in Silius Italicum, lib. 10. pag. 435. cites several authorities.

(128) It appears by Livy, lib. 3. pag. m. 79. that the Juno of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was surnamed Regina.

(129) Antiquit. Rom. lib. 2. cap. 6.

[X] The worship of Juno in Rome was of remote antiquity.]

Italy [Y], and she used to work a great many miracles in them. She had a temple in Falerii before Rome was built. It was like that of Argos, and the same ceremonies were used antiquity.] Tatius the colleague of Romulus had established the honours which were paid to Juno Quiritia or Quiritis (130). It appears that under the reign of Tullius Hostilius, the Pontifex being consulted with regard to the expiation of involuntary murders, caused two altars to be set up, and there performed the ceremonies which they thought requisite, in order for the purifying of Horace who had killed his sister. One of these altars was consecrated to Juno (131) and the other to Janus (132). It is related that (133) before this time there stood in Rome a temple of Juno built by Numa Pompilius; and that this Prince being desirous of gaining the favour of that Goddess, forbid, by an express law, all loose women from entering into that temple... or even touching it. These are the very words of the law. Pellex ædem Junonis ne tangito: si tangat Junoni agnum feminam demissis crinibus cædito. This was the reparation they were obliged to make, by sacrificing a lamb in her honour, their hair hanging loose. In a word it may be said, that it was not by too bold an hyperbole, that Virgil introduced Jupiter promising his wife, that the descendants of Æneas should serve her with greater devotion than any other nation. This dialogue is not the least beautiful passage in the Æneid; it contains Juno's resolution not to persecute Æneas any longer, and the favour she asked in recompence for her desisting on that occasion. I would advise my readers to consult Virgil; but I myself will only transcribe the four lines following:

*Hinc genus, Ausonio mistum quod sanguine surget,
Supra homines, supra i.e. Deos pietate videbis.
Nec gens ulli tuos æque celebrabit honores.
Annuit his Juno, & mentem lætata retorset (134).*

“ From blood so mix'd, a pious race shall flow, “ Equal to Gods, excelling all below.
“ No nation more respect to you shall pay,
“ Or greater off'rings on your altars lay.
“ Juno consents, well pleas'd that her desires “ Had found success, and from the cloud retires.”

DRYDEN.

[Y] Very great honours were paid her in other cities of Italy She was worshipped under the title of Sospita, with great devotion at Lanuvium, near Rome in the Via Appia. The Romans were so fond of this worship that the Consuls at the beginning of their consulships, were obliged to go and pay homage to that Juno. Nolite à sacris propriis Junonis sospitæ, cui omnes Consules facere necesse est, domesticum & suum Consulem potissimum avocellere (135). When the inhabitants of Lanuvium were made citizens of Rome, it was enacted, that this worship should be common to them with the Romans. Lanuvinis civitas data, sacraque sua reddita cum eo ut ædes lucusque Sospitæ Junonis communis Lanuvinis Municipibus cum populo Romano esset (136). There was a treasure in the temple of that Goddess, out of which Augustus took considerable sums, and promised to pay the interest (137). 'Tis thought that this temple was founded by the Pelasgi, who came originally from Peloponnesus; and this opinion is supported by Ælian's calling the Juno of Lavinium, Juno Argolica (138). Here follows a description of the Goddess's dress. Nostram sospitam... tu nunquam me in somnis quidem vides, nisi cum pelle caprina, cum basta, in somnis quidem vides, nisi cum pelle caprina, cum basta, cum calceolis repandis (139). i. e. “ You do not see Jupiter Sospita, our Goddess, even in dreams, without her goatskin, her spear, her shield, and her shoes bent backwards.” It is not observed in this passage, whether the goatskin had horns, but some very learned men do not doubt but it had. “ It is certain that the head of Juno of Lanuvium was veiled with a goat's skin, on which were real horns; and this is plainly seen in Goltzius's Roman medals, and in that mentioned by Vigenere, in his annotations on Livy.” These are de Girac's words in section lxx. page 556 of his reply. In the margin of his book are the following words. Romani Junonem Sospitam colebant, cujus caput pellis caprina cum cornibus exornabat (140). i. e. “ The Romans worshipped “ Juno Sospita, whose head a goat's skin with horns “ adorned.” Take particular notice of what follows.

The serpent of the temple of Lanuvium was something miraculous, it being able to tell whether a girl had lost her virginity or not. See Ælian (140).

Juno LACINIA, whose temple was six miles from Crotona, was prodigiously famous. This temple was twice as spacious as the greatest temple in Rome (141). It was covered with marble tiles, if I may use the expression, part whereof were carried to Rome, to cover the temple of Fortuna Equestris, which Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the Censor was building; but as he lost his life in a miserable manner, the Senate caused the tiles to be carried to the same place whence they had been taken (142). Hannibal did not execute the design that was formed, viz. of carrying off the golden column that stood in the temple of this Juno (143). Pliny relates that the ashes which were left on the altar of that Goddess, exposed to all the inclemencies of the weather, never moved from the place where they had been laid. In Lacinia Junonis ara sub dio sita, cinerem immobilem esse perstantibus undique processis (144). Servius relates another miracle; viz. that if any one carved or engraved his name on the tiles of this temple the engraving faded away the instant such person died. In hoc templo illud miraculi fuisse dicitur, ut si quis ferro in tegula templi, ipsius nomen incidere, tandiu illa scriptura maneret, quamdiu is homo viveret qui illud scripsisset (145). Livy also relates a miracle, viz. that the cattle of all kinds consecrated to the Goddess grazed in the meads belonging to the temple, without any person's looking after them; and used to retire voluntarily in the evening, for ever unmolested with wild beasts or robbers. Læta in medio pascua babuit (Lucus) ubi omnis generis sacrum Deæ pascebatur pecus sine ullo pastore, separatimque egressi cujusque generis greges, nocte remanebant ad stabula, nunquam insidii ferarum, non fraude violati hominum (146). He intimates plainly enough, that he would not swear this was true; and that the story concerning the immovable ashes was no less doubtful. Some miracles, says he, are generally ascribed to these sorts of places. Miracula aliqua assignantur plerumque tam insignibus locis. Fama est aram esse in vestibulo templi, cujus cinerem, nullus unquam moveat ventus. No people understand this better than the Christian Monks. He adds that this temple was not only famous for its holiness but also for its riches. Inclutum divitiis etiam non tantum sanctitate fuit (147).

It is no wonder that opinions have been divided with respect to the founder of this temple, and the occasion of its foundation; for all nations are prompted to invent a thousand pretty particulars on those subjects. See Servius (148) who relates, among other opinions, that King Lacinus built it in honour of Juno, because she hated Hercules whom he had refused to entertain in his palace. But if we ought not to wonder at the variations in this respect, we nevertheless cannot but wonder that authors should not be agreed concerning the situation of this edifice. Livy fixes it at six miles distance from Crotona. Sex millia aberat ab urbe (149) nobile templum ipsa urbe nobilitas, Lacinia Junonis sanctum omnibus circa populis (150). i. e. “ At six miles distance from the city, was a noble “ temple erected to Juno Lacinia, which boasted “ greater magnificence than the city itself, and was “ held as sacred among all the people.” But Valerius Maximus fixes it at Locri, and this is not the only point in which he differs from Livy. Here follow his words: Q. Fulvius Flaccus impune non tulit quod in censura tegulas marmoreas ex Junonis Lacinia templo in ædem Fortuna Equestris, quam Romæ faciebat, transfudit. Negatur enim, post hoc factum, mente constitisse: quin etiam per summam ægritudinem animi expiravit, cum ex duobus filiis in Illyrico militantibus, alterum decessisse, alterum graviter audisset affectum. Cujus casu motus senatus tegulas illico Locros reportandas curavit: decretique circumspiciatissima sanctione impium opus censoris retexuit (151). i. e. “ Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who during his Censorship had carried “ away the marble tiles belonging to the temple of “ Juno Lacinia, and put them in that of Fortuna “ Equestris, erected by him in Rome, suffered greatly “ on that account; for it is said that he was for ever “ disordered

(140) Hist. Animal. lib. 11. cap. 16. See also Pliny. Elog. 8. lib. 4.

(141) See the following column citation (152).

(142) Val. Max. lib. 1. cap. 1.

(143) Cicero, de Divinat. folio m. 307. D. See the article SILENIUS.

(144) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 107. Val. Maxim. lib. 1. cap. 8. in Exempl. extern. num. 18. says the same thing. See Livy below.

(145) Servius, in Æn. lib. 3. ver. 552.

(146) Liv. lib. 24. cap. 3.

(147) Idem, lib. 6. pag. m. 180.

(148) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 3. ver. 552.

(149) In Thybæus's Valerius Maximus, pag. 27. Livy is made to say, In urbe nobile templum, ipsa urbe erat nobilitas.

(150) Livius, lib. 24. cap. 3.

(151) Valer. Maxim. lib. 1. cap. 1. num. 20.

(130) Dion. Hal. lib. 2. cap. 52.

(131) Overseer of the sisters, says Dionys. Halicarn. but she is surnamed Sororia in Festus, quem vide pag. m. 262. Voco Sororium digillum.

(132) Idem, Dionys. lib. 3. cap. 28.

(133) See Du Boulay, Trésor des Antiquitez Romaines, pag. 149.

(134) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 12. ver. 838.

(135) Cicero, Orat. pro Muræna. sub fin.

(136) Liv. lib. 8. cap. 14.

(137) Appian. lib. 6. de Bello Civil. pag. m. 399.

(138) Ælian. Hist. Animal. lib. 11. cap. 16.

(139) Cicero, de Natur. Deor. lib. 1. cap. 29.

(*) Lud. Nonnius, in Goltzii Græc.

(*) Quæ nobis natura informati- onem Deorum ip- forum dedit, eadem insculpsit in mentibus ut eos æternis & beatos haberemus. Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 17. See also Aristot. de Repub. lib. 7. cap. 1. pag. m. 321, E. See also rem. [N] of the article SPINOZA, num. 5.

used in it as the Argives had consecrated to her worship. This we are told by Dionysius Halicarnassus in the twenty first chapter of his first book.

I should be glad to know, whether any of the Sages among the Heathens took notice of a circumstance, which methinks occurs very naturally, viz. that no one partici- pated less of a happy life, a state that is very essential to the Divine Nature (*), than the greatest of all the Goddesses. It is scarce possible to figure to one's self a more wretched state than that of Juno. I do not infer this from the nature of her employ- ments, how laborious and disagreeable soever they might be [Z]; and though they have “ disordered in his senses after this action; nay, that “ extreme sorrow killed him, when news was brought “ that, of two sons who served in the wars at Illyri“ cum, the one was dead, and the other very sick.

 “ The Senate being struck with this action caused the “ tiles to be carried back immediately to Locri; and,
 “ by the most circumspect sanction of a decree, took “ down the Censor's impious work.” I have followed the relation above with regard to the motive which prompted the Senate to restore the tiles; but I referred to my self the right of rectifying particulars, as occasion might require, from the account which Livy gives. The reader therefore is to know, that this grave Historian observes that Fulvius Flaccus the Censor used his utmost endeavours, in order that the temple which he was building might not be inferior to any temple in Rome, with regard to magnificence and grandeur. He imagined that a marble roof would greatly heighten the splendor of this edifice, and therefore he half uncovered the temple of Juno
Lacinia. Profectus in Bratius, ædem Junonis Lacinia ad partem dimidiam detegit, id satis fore ratus ad tegendum quod ædificaretur (152). This was enough for his purpose. Having removed those marble tiles to Rome, he was far from blabbing whence he had taken them; however, it was publickly known, which occasioned such murmurings, that the Consuls were forced to consult the Senate on that affair. The Senate then sent for Flaccus; and having suffered him to be some time exposed to the most bitter taunts of every kind, they made an unanimous resolution, that the tiles should be carried back to Juno's temple; and that the Goddess should be appeased by those things which the ceremonies prescribed. Livy's words have enchanted me to such a degree, that I fancy they will be very agreeable to most of my readers, the expressions being charming, and the thoughts very elevated.
*Postquam censor rediit, tegulae expositæ de navibus ad templum portabantur: quanquam unde essent fletatur, non tamen celari potuit. Premittitur igitur in curia ortus est: ex omnibus partibus postulabatur, ut consules eam rem ad senatum referrent. Ut verò accersitus in curiam censor venit, multo infestius singuli universique præsentem lacerare: Templum augustissimum regionis ejus, quod non Pyrrhus, non Annibal violassent, violare parum habuissent, nisi detexisset foede ac prope diruisset.
 Detractum culmen templo, nudatum rectum patris im-bribus putrefaciendum. Censorem moribus regendis creatum, cui facta tecta exigere sacris publicis & loca tuenda more majorum traditum esset; eum per socio-rum urbes diruentem templa, nudantemque tecta ædium sacrarum vagari, & quod, si in privatis sociorum ædificiis faceret, indignum videri posset, id Deum immortalium templa demolientem facere, & obstringere religione populum Romanum, ruinis templorum templa ædificantem: tanquam non iidem ubique Dii im-mortales sint, sed spoliis aliorum alii colendi exornan-dique. Quum, priusquam referretur, appareret quid sentirent Patres: relatione facta in unam omnes senten-tiam ierunt, ut hæc tegulae reportandæ in templum loca-rentur, piculariaque Junoni ferent.* (153). i. e.

“ it, and almost pull it down; that when the roof “ was taken from the temple, it was exposed to the in“ clemency of the weather: that a Censor, elected in “ order to superintend the morals of the people; and to “ whom, pursuant to the custom of our ancestors, the “ care of repairing places devoted to public worship is “ committed; this Censor, I say, marched up and down
 “ the cities of the allies, uncovering and beating down “ their temples; and behaving with that indignity to“ wards the temples of the immortal Gods, which, if done
 “ to the private houses of our allies, would be thought “ shameful: that he had laid a burthen on the consci“ ences of the Romans, raising temples with the ruin of tem“ ples; as if the immortal Deities were not the same in all “ places, but that some were to be adorned and embellish“ ed with the spoils of others. The opinion of the “ Fathers being given before the question was put,
 “ they all unanimously declared, that the tiles in “ question should be carried back to the temple, and “ offerings made to Juno, in order to appease that “ Goddess.” The decree made by the Senate was not executed in all respects; for those persons who were commanded to see the roof repaired, declared, that no workman had been able to fix the tiles again in their places, and therefore they had been left in the court of the temple. Quæ ad religionem pertinent cum cura facta: tegulae relictas in area templi, quia repen-dendarum nemo artifex inire rationem potuerit, redempto-res nuntiarunt (154). Flaccus did not leave off building; he completed, consecrated it, and exhibited the Ludi Scenici for four days, and the Circensian Games for one day. Fulvius ædem Fortunæ equestris, quam Praeconsul in Hispania dimicans cum Celtiberorum legionibus voverat, annos sex postquam voverat, dedicavit, & scenicos ludos per quatrduum, unum diem in circo fecit (155). Here then is a notable difference between Livy and Valerius Maximus, and which shews that the latter of these two authors has done great injury to the Roman Senate; he supposes that they did not think of repairing the damage, till after they had seen the grievous punishment which heaven had inflicted on Flaccus the Censor. But Livy informs us, that the Senate was prompted to this action of piety and justice, from the bare consideration of the incident, and without having seen any traces of the wrath of heaven. He does not deny the fatal end of this Censor, and even represents it more fatal than Valerius Maximus has done; for he says that Fulvius Flaccus hanged himself; and adds, that it was a saying among the common people, that Juno had deprived him of his senses. *2. Fulvius Juno pontifex, qui priore anno fuerat censor . . . facta morte periit.
 Ex duobus filiis ejus qui tum in Illyrico militabant, nun-ciatum alterum decessisse, alteram gravi & periculoso morbo ægrum esse. Obruit animum simul lætus, metusque: mane ingressi cubiculum servi, laqueo dependentem invenerunt. Erat opinio, post censuram minus compotem fuisse sui: vulgo Junonis Lacinia iram ob spolia-tum templum alienasse mentem ferebant* (156). The incident with respect to the taking away the marble tiles from the temple of Juno, is fixed to the year of Rome 579.

(152) Tit. Liv. lib. 42. cap. 3. It was this made me say, above, after Cluverius, Ital. Antiquæ, lib. 4. cap. 15. that the temple of Juno Lacinia was twice as spa- cious as the great- est temple in Rome.

(153) Livius, ibid.

“ After the Censor's return, the tiles were carried “ from the ships into the temple; and though endea“ vours were used to conceal the place whence they “ came, yet this could not be done. Upon this a “ murmur broke out in the Senate; all insisting to “ have the Consuls lay that affair before the Senate.
 “ But when the Censor, upon his being summoned, “ came in, all the assembly attacked him with still “ greater violence: Was it not, said these, sufficient, “ that he did not scruple to violate the most august tem“ ple in all that country, which Pyrrhus as well as “ Hannibal had spared; but he must shamefully uncover

[Z] The nature of her employments, how laborious and disagreeable soever they might be. She superintended marriages, and the consequences of that State. See the Commentators on Virgil on the following words:

*Maestant lætas de more bidentis,
 Legiferæ Ceveri, Phæboque patrique Lyco:
 Junoni ante omnes, cui VINCLA JUGALIA CURÆ* (157).

“ A chosen ewe of two years old they pay
 “ To Ceres, Bacchus, and the God of day; “ Preferring

(154) Idem, ibid.

(155) Idem, ibid. cap. 18.

(156) Idem, ibid. cap. 28.

(157) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 4. vet. 57.

so justly given occasion for turning the theological system of the Heathens into ridicule [AA]; but I infer it from the necessity she was under of perplexing and infesting her “ Preferring Juno’s power; for Juno ties

 “ The nuptial knot, and makes the marriage joys.”
 DAYDEN.

They mention a hundred such passages, and speak of the epithets pronuba, jugalis, ζυγία, γαμυλία, σπαραγμοφῶς, &c. which were appropriated to the consort of Jupiter, because she presided over matrimonial contracts. See the following remark. This office or employment required great care and assiduity; there were a numberless multitude of things to do, and it was exceedingly difficult to discharge it with honour. Had she had no other business but to join people together in wedlock, the difficulties would not have been so considerable; the disposition of the parties and the inclination which nature inspires, might have saved the superintendent-general much trouble; but a Goddess of the first rank was prompted from the motives of her honour and glory, to take care that people should marry happily; I mean that conditions and tempers should be so matched as to form an indissoluble bond of friendship and concord; and hence all marriages that were ill suited and unhappy, must necessarily give her uneasiness; they being as so many blots to her reputation, and so many just occasions of reproaching her, that the care which had been taken to invoke her, and to honour her on the nuptial day, was all lost labour. All those who should be inclined to slander her, had a fine handle; for in short, either Juno used her utmost endeavours to procure happy marriages, or she did not. If the former, people had reason to conclude, that she was very miserable, in having an employment wherein she exhausted all the efforts of her strength and industry, and yet could not help being unsuccessful on a thousand occasions. The numberless experiments, wherein the unsuccessfulness of her endeavours appeared, was a proof, either that the subject she had to work upon was very difficult, or that her power was greatly limited. In the first case, her ill fortune, or the deplorable rigour of her fate, or her imprudence were manifest; for, if she was not allowed to resign an employment, wherein, tho’ she used her utmost endeavours, she yet could not help being unsuccessful on a thousand occasions, her fate merited compassion. But on the other side, if she were allowed to resign her office, and yet she was resolutely determined to keep it, her judgment and prudence might justly be called in question (158); and she continued unjustly in an office, that was above her abilities, and which she discharged to her dishonour. It would have been a trifling excuse for her to say, that her good intentions were traversed by the whim and caprice of another Goddess.

(158) *Metiri se
 quemque suo modulo ac pede ve-rum est.* Horat.
Epist. 7. lib. 1.
 ver. uk.

*Sic visum Veneri, cui placet impari
 Formas, atque animos sub juga abenea
 Sævo mistere cum joco* (159).

(159) Horat. Od.
 33. lib. 1.

“ Thus Venus sports, the rich, the base,
 “ Unlike in fortune, and in face,
 “ To disagreeing love provokes;
 “ When cruelly jocosely,
 “ She ties the fatal noose,
 “ And binds unequals to the brazen yokes.

CREECH.

This would have been to acknowledge the limitation and dependence of her power; a confession that would have been inexpressibly mortifying, with regard to a Goddess of so haughty a disposition as Juno. This is what might be said upon the supposition that she discharged the duties of her office to the best of her power; but if it had been supposed that she could have acquitted herself better in it, she would have been thought guilty of extreme negligence or malice; and consequently as very unworthy of the honours that were paid her, and the employment with which she was invested. Such are the reflexions which the heathens ought to have made naturally. Now the result of these ideas is, to judge that her condition was unhappy, either by reason of the great pains her employment required, or because of the ill success it was attended with. Her rank and her sex made her extremely affected with contempt and disgrace; and it might naturally be supposed that she had sense enough not to be ignorant of what things might be censured in her administration; and to imagine that the rest of the Gods blamed her for it (160); and that if they had the complaisance not to do it in her presence, or not to inform her of the disadvantageous things which were said of her, they nevertheless aspersed her behind her back, or at least thought disadvantageously of her. This was enough to afflict a captious, haughty, ambitious person; and ’tis a sufficient mortification to such a one, to be sensible that her faults are known to the world.

All the reflexions abovementioned, might be made with regard to Juno, as the Goddess who presided over child-births. How troublesome must that office be! ’twas the way not to enjoy a moment’s rest, and to be obliged to labour in a thousand places at the same time. This employment is obnoxious to many displeasing accidents. In spite of all the art of the ablest surgeons, yet many children who, at their coming into the world, lie crosswise, some one way and some another, lose their lives with their mothers. These misfortunes were so many subjects of reproach for the censurers of Juno, who had been fruitlessly invoked under particular and specific names, according to the diversity of the cases (161). I am sensible it may be asserted with great probability, that we must not reduce to Juno singly, but variously named, all the Deities who preside over marriages, childbirths &c; but on the other side it is very probable, that those Deities ought to be considered as so many Substitutes or Deputies of the Superintendent-General; whence it follows that the disorders and misfortunes might very justly be imputed to the Goddess Juno, in like manner as the male-administration of the Governments of provinces is ascribed to a Prince when he does not apply a remedy to it. Besides, Juno’s having so many Substitutes shews, that her employment was thought too laborious. Now those several ideas or reflexions include such a judgment as is disadvantageous to her. We must add to all this, that the Goddess was divested of her two most glorious employments; for the care of reconciling married persons was committed to another Deity Viriplaca (162) by name; and the care of the conversion of wives, whose unchaste conduct had gained them the ill-will of their husbands, was committed to Venus Verticordia (163). Now was it not a signal affront to Juno, to divest her in this manner of part of her superintendance over marriage?

[AA] ... and though they have so justly given occasion for turning the theological system of the heathens into ridicule.] The surnames of Pronuba, Jugalis, &c. which the reader may have seen above (164), were not the only ones which were peculiar to Juno, as the Goddess who presided over marriages: she also had particular surnames, grounded on her presiding over the behaviour and conduct of brides, over their husband’s house... and over the anointing which the bride made on the door-posts of her husband’s house... and because she assisted the bridegroom in losing the virgin zone (165). The reader will find these surnames in the following Latin passage, extracted from a prayer offered up to Juno (166): Interducam, or Iterducam, & Demiducam, Unxiam, Cincliam (167) mortales puellæ debent in nuptiis convocare, ut earum & itinera protegas, & in optatas domos ducas, & cum posses ungent, fastum omen affigas, & cingulum ponentes in thalamis non relinquis.

(163) See Ovid, Book 4. of Fast. pag. m. 74.

(164) At the beginning of the remark [Z].

(165) Du Boulay, Trois des Antiquités Romaines, pag. 149, 150.

(166) Mart. Capell. de Nuptiis Philologiae, lib. 2. pag. m. 37.

(167) Here follows a passage of Festus Pompeius, pag. 35. Cinclæ Junonis nomen sanctum babebatur in nuptiis, quod initio conjugii scilicet erat cinguli quo nova nupta erat cinclæ.

(168) Augustin. de Civit. Dei, lib. 6. cap. 9. pag. m. 599.

It was not expected that she should stop at the door of the nuptial chamber; her assistance was likewise desired in the nuptial bed, she entering it under the title of Dea mater Prema, and of Dea Pertunda, accompanied with Deus pater Subigus. It is upon this that St. Austin has ridiculed heathenism; and as it was scarce possible to employ only grave expressions on such a subject, he has shewed the impertinence of it after a pretty free as well as gay manner. I should expose myself to the censure of all those who set up for scrupulous judges of style, and of all readers of a serious cast of mind, should I translate exactly into French the words of that father, and for that reason I shall give them in Latin (168). Cum mas & femina conjunguntur, her husband's mistresses and bastards, merely to sooth the jealousy with which she was tortured. She was as strongly affected with this passion as could be expected from her haughty and imperious humour, which her characters of sister and wife to the greatest of all the Gods inspired. This sensibility made her tortures less supportable, and prompted her to hurry over land and sea, to procure the pleasure that arises from revenge. She did not omit any thing to satiate it, and was restless; but she never had the satisfaction of a complete and perfect success [BB], and she was for ever obliged to begin junguntur, adhibetur deus Jugalitus. Sit hoc ferendum. Sed domum est ducenda, quæ nubis, adhibetur deus Domiducus. Ut maneat cum viro, additur dea Manturna. Quid ultra queritur? Parcatur humana verecundia: peragat cætera concupiscentia carnis & sanguinis procurato secreto pudoris. Quid impletur cubiculum turba numinum: quando & paranympbi inde discedunt? Et ad hoc impletur, non ut eorum præsentia cogitata major sit cura pudicitia, sed ut sæmina sexu infirma, novitate parvula, illis cooperantibus sine ulla difficultate virginitas auferatur. Adest enim dea Virginitas, & deus pater Subigus, & dea mater Prema, & dea Pertunda, & Venus, & Priapus. Quid est hoc? Si omnino laborantem in illo opere virum ab diis adjuvari oportebat: non sufficerebatur aliquis unus, aut aliqua una. Nunquid Venus sola parum esset, quæ ob hoc etiam dicitur nuncupata, quod sine ejus vi sæmina virgo esse non desinat? Si ulla est frons in hominibus, quæ non est in numinibus? Nonne cum credunt conjugati tot deos utriusque sexus præsentem, & huic operi instantem, ita pudore afficiuntur; ut & ille minus moveatur, & illa plus reluctetur? Et certe si adest Virginitas dea, ut virgini zona solvatur: si adest deus Subigus, ut viro subigatur; si adest dea Prema, ut subacta ne se commoveat, prematur, dea Pertunda ibi quid facit? Erubescat, eat foras, agat aliquid & maritus. Valde inonestum est, ut quod vocatur illa, impleat quisquam nisi ille. Sed forte ideo toleratur, quia dea dicitur esse, non deus. Nam si masculus crederetur, & Pertundus vocaretur, majus contra eum pro uxoris pudicitia posceret maritus auxilium, quam Fœta contra Silvanum (169). Sed quid hoc dicam, cum ibi sit & Priapus nimis masculus, super eum immaniissimum & turpissimum fascinum federe nova nupta jubebatur more honestissimo & religiosissimo matronarum? These objections are prodigiously strong; and I do not see how it would be possible for the ablest apologists for the heathen religion to evade them well. The censure, which St. Austin grounds on the unnecessary multiplication of Deities, was alone sufficient to confound them. Was it not the utmost diffidence of human strength to imagine that Venus stood in need of the succour of three or four other Deities? We only conceive that an apologist might have answered, that St. Austin was in the wrong to object, as an useless circumstance, and which left nothing for the husband to do, the joining of the Goddesses Pertunda, and mater Prema; for according to this detestable system of theology, the one was not less or more necessary than the other, and neither of them excluded the efforts of the bride and bridegroom. There therefore was some little inaccuracy in this part of St. Austin's objections. Perhaps the common answer of the heathens at that time was to say, that the multiplication objected to, was only a multiplication of the names of the same Deity. But this would have been a poor answer; the books of the heathens themselves suggesting the refutation of it.

It may be observed transiently that those Philosophers who undertook to answer the Christian Doctors, had a very hard task. They were punished for the folly of others. The ancient Priests had committed the fault, by ridiculously transplanting the vile fictions of the Poets into the public worship; and the Philosophers were obliged many ages after, to bear all the ignominy of these sopperies; and to torture their brains day and night, to parry thrusts that pierced them through. If those who invented so ridiculous a worship, had been attacked by as dextrous and powerful adversaries as St. Austin, they would have been more circumspect, and not have given such a loose to their impurities; and this is one disadvantage that results from the unity of religion. It must be owned that the diversity of religions has also its inconveniences, and even such as may be very justly dreaded; but then it hinders depravity and corruption from making a certain progress, and obliges the members of the several religions to stand in awe of one another.

[BB] Her jealousy . . . prompted her to hurry over land and sea, to procure the pleasure that arises from revenge . . . but she never had the satisfaction of a complete and perfect success.] Consider the journey she took from heaven to earth, the instant she suspected that a cloud which she spied, might serve as a veil under which her faithless husband was clasped in the embraces of some damsel. Juno was not mistaken, Jupiter being at that time with Io. He transformed her into a heifer, to prevent his wife from catching him in the act. Juno requested to have this heifer, and had it watched by Argus; and afterwards tormented her with a fury which made her run up and down to every part of the earth; and at last was forced to let Io resume her first shape, and become the Goddess Isis (170). Consider also the supplications which Juno went and made to Tethys and Oceanus, after she had spied the same Calisto among the stars which she had changed into a bear. She had treated this mistress of Jupiter in a most outrageous manner; had taken her by the hair of her head, and thrown her upon the ground.

*Arreptam prensu a fronte capillis;
Stravit humi pronam (171).*

(170) See Ovid: Metam. lib. 1.

(171) Ovid. Metam. lib. 2. vers. 477.

“ Her hand within her hair she wound, “ Swung her to earth, and dragg'd her on the “ ground.”

ADDISON.

But let us hear her doleful lamentations. Nothing can be more dismal. She is afraid of being hereafter the butt for all affronts, since the efforts she employs to satiate her vengeance, terminate only in the glory of her enemies.

*Est veto, cur quis Junonem ledere velit,
Offensamque premat, quæ profum sola nocendo?
O ego quantum ægi! quam vasta potentia nostra est?
Esse hominem vetui; facta est Dea: sic ego pœnas Sontibus impono; sic est mea magna potestas (172).*

“ And who shall now on Juno's altars wait,
“ When those she hates grow greater by her hate?
“ I on the nymph a brutal form impressed,
“ Jove to a Goddess has transformed the beast.
“ This, this was all my weak revenge cou'd do &c.

(172) Idem, lib. 2. vers. 519.

ADDISON.

Juno was once in such extreme grief, because she could not satiate her vengeance; that she took a journey to the lowest abysses of hell, to request succour from the three furies:

*Nil poteris Juno, nisi inaltos stare dolores?
Idque mihi satis est? Hæc una potentia nostra est (173)?*

(173) Idem, lib. 4. vers. 426.

“ Yet shall the wife of Jove find no relief,
“ Shall she, still unreveng'd, disclose her grief?
“ Have I the mighty freedom to complain?
“ Is that my power? Is that to ease my pain?”

EVANS.

*Sustinet ire illic, cælesti sede relicta, (Tantum odii iræque dabat) Saturnia Juno.
Quo simul intravit, sacroque a corpore pressum
Intremuit limen; tria Cerberus extulit ora,
Et tres latratus simul edidit: Illa sorores Noctæ vocat genitas, grave & implacabile numen (174).*

(174) Ibid. vers. 447.

“ The Queen of Heav'n, to gratify her hate,
“ And sooth immortal wrath, forgets her state.
“ Down from the realms of day, to realms of night,
“ The Goddess swift precipitates her flight.

“ At

(169) St. Austin had observed just before, that some Deities were appointed to look after lying-in women, in order that the God Sylvanus might not come and torment them. Mulieri facta post partum tres Deos custodes commemorat (Varro) adhiberi, ne Sylvanus Deus per noctem ingredietur & vexet.

begin anew. We must consider as the least of her misfortunes with which her life was chequered, the misfortune she had to lose her cause in a dispute for the prize of beauty ;

“ At Hell arriv'd, the noise Hell's porter heard,
“ Th' enormous dog his tripple head uprear'd:
“ Thrice from three grisly throats he howl'd pro“ found,
“ Then suppliant couch'd, and stretch'd along the “ ground.
“ The trembling threshold, which Saturnia prest,
“ The weight of such Divinity confest.”

EUSOEN.

(175) Others call her Ætina.

If ever she had reason to be satisfied, it was when she persecuted the nymph Thalia (175) whom Jupiter had got with child. The only way by which this nymph could possibly escape, was, to be swallowed up in the bowels of the earth; but when her reckoning was out, the two children she went with sprung forth nevertheless, and became afterwards two celebrated deities (176) to whom extraordinary veneration was paid (177); and thus Juno's joy was very shortlived. She discovered so much obstinacy in persecuting Hercules, that Porphyrius has compared her to such of the most wicked devils, who persecute persons of virtue and probity. Τῆς γὰρ Δαίμονος διαγράφει τῷ λόγῳ (ὁ Πορφύριος) λέγουσθαι, τὸς Φαυλοστάτης Δαίμονος τὰς ἀγαθὰς ἀνδράσι λόγους ἢ ἐνδραῖς καθίζειν, ἢ ἐκείνης ἐπιτίθεισθαι, καθάπερ ἢ Ἡρα τῷ Διονύσῳ ἢ Ἡρακλῆϊ. Dæmones enim oratione describens (Porphyrius) alibi ait: pessimos Dæmones bonis viris insidias & pericula tendere, æque eis insidiis aggredi, ut Juno scilicet Baccho atque Herculi (178). But what did she gain by this? Nothing except toil, ignominy and confusion. She complained of this in the theatres, and in such a manner as might have moved the most flinty hearts. Read the following verses of Seneca; he therein declares that she banishes herself from heaven, since it is filled with nothing but her husband's whores and bastards. She expects to see Hercules ascend thither, whom she had so often attempted to destroy, and who by that means had made himself immortal.

(176) They were called Palici.

(177) See Servius in Æneid. lib. 9. ver. 585. Lucetius in Statium. Theb. lib. 12. ver. 157. Macrobius. Saturn. lib. 5. cap. 19.

(178) Æneas Gæzus in Theophr. pag. m. 43.

*Soror Tonantis (hoc enim solum mihi Nomen relictum est) semper-alienam Jovem,
Ac templa summi vidua deserui ætheris;
Locumque, cælo pulsa, pellicibus dedi.
Tellus colenda est: pellices cælum tenent (179).*

(179) Senec. in Hercule Furente, ver. 1.

*Non sic abibunt odia, vivaces aget
Violentus iras animus, & sævus dolor
Æterna bella pace sublata geret.
Quid bella? quidquid horridum tellus creat
Inimica; quicquid pontus aut aer tulit
Terribile, dirum, pestilens, atrox, ferum;
Frædum atque domitum est, superat, & crescit malis;
Iraque nostra fruitur: in laudes suas
Mæa vertit odia, dum nimis sæva impero, Patrem probavi: gloriæ feci locum (180).*

(180) Idem, ibid. ver. 27.

“The Thunderer's sister (that's the only name
“ Now left to me) obnoxious still to Jove;
“ From Heav'n repuls'd, I fly its widow'd temples;
“ Now leave to harlots my late glorious throne,
“ And go to earth, since strumpets rule the skies.

“ My hatred shall not cease, but rousing all
“ My fury, and inspired by deadly grief,
“ I'll wage eternal war... You ask what war?
“ Whatever is by air, by sea, or earth “ Created fierce, wild, pestilent or horrid,
“ Is broken, conquer'd, and quite crush'd by Jove.
“ My anger he enjoys; my keen resentment
“ He turns to fame, and my imperious sway
“ Adds lustre to his glory.”

The satisfaction of seeing the ruin of Troy was a very inconsiderable consolation for the torments she had suffered during the long resistance made by the Trojans; and she soon was forced to toil anew in order to persecute Æneas, and prevent his landing in Italy. She exerted her utmost endeavours on that occasion; she went to Æolus to request a tempest from him; she cajoled him, and behaved with great humility before him (181). Another time she placed herself on a very cold cloud (182), and exposed herself to the inclemencies of the weather, whilst a battle was fighting between the party she protected and the party she hated. But all this was lost labour. Read what despair extorted from her, before she had recourse to Æolus.

(181) Virgil. Æn. lib. 1.
(182) Qua spe gelidis in nubibus hæret? Virgil. Æneid. lib. 12. ver. 796.
Nec tu me ætria solam nunc sede videres Digna indigna pati. Idem, ibid. ver. 810.

*Cum Juno æternum servans sub pectore vulnus,
Hæc sæcum: Mene incepto desistere visam?
Nec posse Italia Teucerorum avertere regam?
Quippe vector satis. Pallasne exuvæ classem
Argivum, atque ipsos potuit submergere Ponto, Unius ob noxam, & furias Ajacis Oilei (183)?*

(183) Virgil. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 36.

*At ego, quæ Divum incedo regina, Jovisque
Et soror, & conjux, una cum gente tot annos
Bella gero; & quisquam nomen Junonis adoret Præterea? aut supplex aris imponat honorem (184)?*

(184) Idem, ibid. ver. 46.

“ When labouring still with endless discontent,
“ The Queen of Heav'n did thus her fury vent.
“ Then am I vanquish'd, must I yield, said she,
“ And must the Trojans reign in Italy?
“ So fate will have it, and Jove adds his force;
“ Nor can my pow'r divert their happy course.
“ Could angry Pallas, with revengful spleen,
“ The Grecian navy burn, and drown the men?
“ She for the fault of one offending foe,
“ The bolts of Jove himself presumed to throw :

“ But I, who walk in awful state above,
“ The majesty of heav'n, the sister-wife of Jove;
“ For length of years, my fruitless force employ,
“ Against the thin remains of ruin'd Troy.
“ What nations now to Juno's power will pray,
“ Or off'rings on my slighted altars lay?”

DRYDEN.

This is only a specimen of the history of the Goddess in question, but it is sufficient to shew that the heathens must have been persuaded that she was one of the most unhappy Beings in the universe; and as fit to furnish a picture of extreme infelicity as Prometheus on mount Caucasus, Sisyphus, Ixion, Tantalus, the Danaïdes, and the rest of the mighty offenders delivered over to infernal punishments. No words can be truer than those of Horace :

*Invidus alterius macrescit rebus opimis.
Invidia Siculi non invenere tyranni Majus tormentum (185).*

(185) Horat. Epist. 2. lib. 1. ver. 57.

“ The envious pine at th' fatness of their friend.
“ The fiercest tyrants never yet could find,
“ A greater rack than envy to the mind.”

CREECH.

This suits principally with the jealousy that breaks out between husbands and wives. What must it then be when it is joined to the uninterrupted toils occasioned from a fruitless desire of satiating one's vengeance? The being born immortal so far from softning the pangs of this sad condition, serves rather to increase it; for the hope of death's putting an end to a person's sorrows and uneasinesses administers some consolation.

*Nec finire licet: tantos mihi morte dolores,
Sed nocet esse Deum, præclusaque janua leti
Æternum nostras luctus extendit in ævum (186).*

(186) Ovid. Metam. lib. 1. ver. 661.

“ Oh, were I mortal, death might bring relief;
“ But now my Godhead but extends my grief;
“ Prolongs my woes of which no end I see,
“ And makes me curse my immortality?”

DRYDEN.

The pompous title of Queen of Heaven bestowed on Juno; her sitting on a splendid throne, holding a scepter in her hand, and her head crown'd with a diadem; all beauty [CC]; for the resentment she discovered on account of the injury she imagined that Paris, the judge in that contest, had done her, was very violent, and attended with numberless fatigues and afflictions. This doubtless was a more pungent wound than that of the three-pointed arrows, which she received from Hercules in the right breast (o). It all these things are of no service to the inward maladies of the soul. Persons in the most exalted stations are even more sensibly affected with these misfortunes. We may at least say, that discontent is like a fever, which is not sooner cured on a soft bed than on straw.

(187) See Homer, Iliad, lib. 5. ver. 392, & seq. who says that this wound was extremely painful: Τὸν δὲ καὶ μὴν ἀ- νήκετον λάβειν ἀλγος.

*Nec calida citius decedunt corpore febres
Textilibus si in picturis, ostroque rubenti
Jasaris, quam si plebeja in veste cubanda'st* (187).

(187) Lucret. lib. 2. ver. 34.

“Whoever heard a fever tamer grown
“In cloaths embroider'd o'er, and beds of down,
“Than in coarse rags?”

CREECH.

Treasures do not repel either fevers or uneasinesses from the mind.

*Non domus, & fundus, non aris acervus, & auri
Egroti Domini deduxit corpore febres,
Non animo curas* (188).

(188) Horat. Epist. 2. lib. 1. ver. 47.

“Nor house, nor lands, nor heaps of plate, or “gold,
“Can cure a fever's heat, or ague's cold;
“Much less a mind with grief or care oppress, &c.
SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE.

It may be observed, that if the heathens did not make the reflections displayed in the preceding and present remark, they are quite inexcusable; for it was not only from the Poets that they were informed of this unhappy life of Juno; these stories were taken in as part of the public worship, and there were monuments of them in the temples; the consecrated statues, pictures of devotion, those objects which are called the books of the ignorant, informed every one of the jealousy of that Goddess &c.

[CC] The misfortune she had to lose her cause, in a dispute for the prize of beauty. Minerva and Venus were her two rivals. It is universally known that Jupiter (189) not being willing to sit as judge in so delicate a trial, caused these three Goddesses to be carried on mount Ida, in order to plead their cause in that place, and that Paris should decide the controversy. Juno dressed herself in the most splendid manner possible, and promised Paris mighty things, in case he would decree to her the apple, which was to be given to the most beautiful of the three Goddesses. Both Minerva and Venus dressed themselves to all the advantage in their power, and made the most lavish promises to their judge. But the pains they took to trick themselves up, and make speeches were all lost; Paris declaring that he would see the three competitors naked before he would pronounce sentence.

*Car vostre discord gift a vos formostez,
De contempler vos corps, vos naïves beautez.
Prudemment discerner le choix, l'équipolance,
Laquelle est la plus belle en face, & corpulance.
Les Deesses alors eurent timidité,
Parce qu'il leur falloit montrer leur nudité.
Toutesfois à l'ombrage un peu se retirèrent,
En lieu d'une antichambre, ou se deshabillerent
A part l'une de l'autre, ou leurs Nymphes avoient
Qui honorablement en cela les servoient.
Quand eurent deffublé escoffions & guimples,
Leurs Couronnes taurés, destache leurs espingles,
Morrion & chapeau, ceintures, fermaillets,
Chefnes, bagues, carquans, bulletes, bracelets,
Robes, & cotillons, leurs manteaux & cuirace,
Leurs habits pleins d'odeurs, de tresgrande efficace.
Toutesfois retenoient leurs escarpins doréz,
Bravement enrichis decoupez & ouvrez,
De peur que l'aigu bout des pointues verbettes
Leurs plantes n'offençast fort tendres & douillettes.
Ainsi nues estant toutes trois vont marcher
Devant le beau Paris, & droit si vont ranger* (190).

(190) Christopher Deffrans, Esq; Lord of la Jalouziere and la Chalonniere near Nyort in Poictou, lib. 11. of the Histoires des Poëtes, folio 225 verso edit. de Niort 1595. He here only puts into verse what Jean le Maire de Belges, Illustrat. de Gaule, liv. 1. chap. 33. pag. 108. had said in prose.

“Your mighty discord from your beauties spring;
“But here reveal your naked charms, and I “Will then pronounce which fair excells the rest.
“The Goddesses were sore dismay'd, to find “That they must all display their naked graces;
“When lo, instead of a proud antichamber,
“To shady arbourets they trip, and there
“Are soon disrob'd by their attendant nymphs.
“And now the Deities were quite undress'd,
“In bright confusion lay their shining crowns,
“Their girdles, stomachers, their pins and bracelets,
“Their precious rings, their petticoats and mantles, “Whence scents exhal'd that quite perfum'd the air.
“But wisely they their gilded slippers kept,
“To guard their tender feet from pointed thorns,
“They naked all to lovely Paris move,
“And dart their charms on his admiring eye.

The French Poet who gives us this description, forgot one important circumstance, viz. that the three Goddesses bathed in a fountain. This we are told by Euripides (191), and there are some epigrams on that subject in the Anthologia (192). Jupiter's wife was therefore forced to submit to very disagreeable conditions; for, after all, she professed modesty; she was grave and majestic, and knew how to maintain her state; and notwithstanding all this, she yet was forced to appear stark naked before a mortal; and the worst was, another Goddess appeared more beautiful in the eye of the appointed judge, and Venus carried off the golden apple. He did not so much as hint, that he saw any beauties in the face, shape or gait of the three litigants; on the contrary, he had declared, while he surveyed them dressed, that they appeared equally lovely in his eye. As he therefore gave sentence against Juno, after comparing what their clothes had till then concealed, it was an indication that he discovered some signal imperfections in her. At least this might be suspected, and such a reflection must necessarily be a cruel mortification to the Goddess in question (193), and enough to make her quite frantic. I am surprized that Lucian did not exercise a little his pointed wit on this subject, in his Dialogue on the Judgment of Paris. Consult the margin (194). Scarron was not so discreet, he jesting as follows in his first book of Virgil Travesti.

(191) Eurip. in Helena, ver. 682. and in Andromache, ver. 283.

(192) Chap. 19. of book 4. pag. m. 745. 746.

(193) See citation (18) of the article HENRY III.

(194) Lucian. in Deor. Dial. pag. 154. tom. 1. did not forget to introduce Juno who said, that the only reason why Diana revenged herself on Acteon was, her fear lest he should blab the imperfections he had discovered in seeing her naked.

(195) i. e. Juno.

*Ce que craignant la bonne Dame (195),
Et gardant encor en son ame
Le beau jugement de Paris,
Et l'insupportable mepris,
Qu'en faveur de Venus la belle Il eût pour Pallas & pour elle;
Outre qu'il avoit revelé,
(Heureux s'il n'eust jamais parlé)
Qu'elle avoit trop longue mamelle,
Et trop long poil dessous l'aisselle,
Et pour Dame de qualité
Le genouil un peu trop croié.*

“The good Lady (Juno) fearing this (*), and retaining deep in her mind, the judgment which Paris had pronounced against her; and with what horrid contempt he had treated Pallas and herself, for the sake of Venus the Goddess of Beauty; not to mention that he had blabbed (happy if he had never spoke) that her bobbies hung down too low; that her arm-pits were too hairy; and that her knee was a little too dirty for a Lady of quality.”

(*) i. e. Left the Trojans should come and overthrow Carthage.

Here follows another contrast of this passage in Virgil.

“She fearful of this sad prediction,
“(Which prov'd a true one and no fiction)
“And mindful of her injur'd honour,
“When Paris gave the apple from her, &c.

AN

It is related that after her marriage was consummated, she washed herself in a spring or fountain lying between the Tigris and Euphrates; and that from this incident, the waters of that spring diffused a most agreeable odour, which perfumed the air round about it [DD]. Juno was a beautiful Goddess, on which account it may be said, that the adulterous

(196) Jean le Maire de Belges, Illustrat. de Gaule & Singularitez de Troie, liv. 1. chap. 33. pag. 108. Lyons edit. of 1549, folio.

An author who flourished in the beginning of the 16th century, declares that Juno did not shew herself quite naked. She and Minerva, says he (196), being overcome with shame, and not willing to do it, did not answer a word when it was signified to them, that they must take the pains to divest themselves of their noble robes, since their contest related to the comparison of the beauty of their divine bodies; and in a prudent distinction of the choice and preference of their wonderful limbs. But Venus, the boldest of the three Goddesses, said, that things were gone so far there was no going back, and thereupon began to unloose her girdle. "Juno seeing this, spoke thus: Lady Venus, we do not intend to refuse this; for fear of being overcome: but I think it indecent for immortal and chaste Goddesses; even for Pallas who is a virgin, and me who am the wife of a King and Emperor, to appear naked before any mortal man, how little you, who frequent male company with so little scruple, may think of it. However, since this is a thing that must be done, we will not be the last . . . (197). Queen Juno, being full of the gravity that becomes matrons, and decent modesty, kept none of her ornaments on, except that she took a fine crape handkerchief, long, wide, and extremely thin; all hemmed with gold and silk fringes, with which one of her nymphs was adorned. And she put it on her left shoulder hanging it scarf-wise, and tied in a knot on her right side. And because the ends, by their being so light, wantoned sometimes in the wind more than she would have them do, as she walked along she held one of her hands on her breast (pi) (198), and the other lower." Now I fancy that all this is a meer fiction of the author's invention, Lucian not hinting any thing like it. Be this as it will, Juno discovers an extreme resentment for the horrid affront, which she imagined her Judge had put upon her. This was a wound that continued bleeding a long time, and disquieted her mind all the remainder of her life.

(197) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. chap. 33. pag. 109.

(198) A metaphorical expression is employed in the French.

(199) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 29, &c. See also ver. 36 of the same book; Cum Juno æternum servans sub pectore vulnus &c.

"When labouring still, with endless discontent, the Queen of heaven!" DRYDEN.

(200) Macrobi. Saturn. lib. 5. cap. 16. pag. m. 427.

(201) Homer. Iliad. lib. ult. ver. 25, & seq.

(202) Eurip. in Troadib. ver. 924. and in Helenæ, ver. 23.

(203) Coluthus, de Raptu Helenæ.

(204) Ælian. Hist. Animal. lib. 12. cap. 30.

(205) Idem, ibid.

Nec dum etiam causæ irarum sævique dolores Exciderant animo: manet alta mente repostum Judicium Paridis, spreteque injuria formæ (199).

"Besides long causes working in her mind,
"And secret seeds of envy lay behind,
"Deep graven in her heart the doom remain'd
"Of partial Paris, and her form disdain'd."

DRYDEN.

I shall observe by the way, that Macrobius is mistaken in one of the differences he has observed between Virgil and Homer. His words are as follow: Nullam commemorationem de judicio Paridis Homerus admittit: idem vates Ganymedem non ut Junonis pelicem a Jove raptum, sed Jovialium poculorum ministrum in cælum a Diis ascitum refert, velut Διοσκυλλῶς. Virgilius tantam deam, quod curvis de boneffis sæminæ deforme est, velut specie viclām Paride judicante doluisse, & propter catamiti pelicatum totam gentem ejus vexasse commemorat (200). It is certain that Homer has mentioned the judgment of Paris, and gives it as the cause of the implacable hatred which Juno entertained against the Trojans (201): it therefore is not true, as Macrobius asserts, that Virgil has departed from Homer with regard to that point. It would be to no purpose to say, here, that Euripides (202) and Coluthus (203) mention this judgment of Paris.

[DD] She washed herself in a spring or fountain . . . and . . . the waters of that spring dispersed a most agreeable odour, which perfumed the air round about it.] It is Ælian relates this incident. He tells us (204) that this fountain was transparent quite to the bottom; and that the inhabitants of the country, as also the Syrians, had the tradition abovementioned; and attributed to it the agreeable odour that was diffused in the neighbourhood of that place. Ἐς οὖν ὁ χάρις ἐὼς ἡδίας ἀναπτύσσεται ὁ ἀήρ κύκλῳ ταύτης κίρματι (205). Unde locus etiam annum suavem odorem spiret, qui in vicinum etiam aërem circumquaque distribuitur. This shews the character of a superstitious and fabulous cast of mind united. People are easily prompted to derive from some celestial origin, all the singular properties they observe in certain places of the world; and as the Heathens suffered themselves to be imposed upon by a chimerical and silly tradition of the amours and marriages of the Gods; they fancied that Juno, desirous to bathe the day after her nuptials, made choice of a very clear fountain for that purpose, and left some marks of her presence there. Observe that the Deities, according to Turnebus, were discovered by the odours they diffused (206).

Omnia finierat: tenues fecisset in auras. Mansit odor: posses scire fuisse Deam (207).

"She spake no more, but vanish'd into air;
"The fragrancy she left reveal'd the Goddesses."

This is what Ovid says, speaking of Flora; and here follows what Ovid says of Venus:

Dixit, & avertens rosea cervice refulsit, Ambrosiæque comæ divinam vertice odorem Spiravere (208).

"Thus having said, she turn'd, and made appear
"Her neck refulgent, and dishevel'd hair;
"Which flowing from her shoulders, reach'd the ground,
"And widely spread ambrosial scents around."

DRYDEN.

John le Maire de Belges has followed this opinion, he asserting (209), that all terrestrial beings kept silence, and discovered a respectful admiration, whilst the Deities revealed themselves (210); they having already perfumed the circumambient air with their divine, ambrosial odours. The Heathens would easily have persuaded themselves that the spittle, &c. of the Gods, was rose-water at least. Balzac (211) observes that a Poet (212) makes Jupiter spit snow:

Jupiter hibernas cana nive conspuit Alpes.

and that another Poet declares that as much nectar flowed from this God, as was sufficient to form the rivers of the golden age. Balzac adds that, he who is called in Matthieu's history the Chrysofom of France, did not scruple to say, in a sermon he preached before Henry IV, Sir, though your Majesty should weep pearls, should spit emeralds; though rubies should issue at your squeezing, and diamonds when you blow your nose, &c.

Now it would not have been a very difficult matter to persuade the Heathens, that the Gods really did all this. Their children are made to believe, that Urganda, for instance, or some other fairy, whilst her head is combing, and asking, what is it that falls from my head? heard with pleasure the following answer, gold and silver. Most people who believed this in their childhood, would entertain that belief all their life-time, were they not undeceived when they come to years of discretion; or if they found that these things were the common opinion in matters relating to faith. By the way, there are many natural properties, which the traditions of Christians ascribe to miraculous causes, in like manner as the Heathens ascribed to Juno the fragrancy of the spring or fountain abovementioned. Do you see, (said a person to me one day) that small tract of land where the grass looks so pale. It was that way such a martyr went, when he was led from the prison to the place of execution. The whole way through which he went retains the footsteps of it ever since. The corn, the grass, in short, every thing sown there has some tincture of it, and is never so green as what you see to the right and left of it. Few parishes are without such a tale. I wish some travellers would give us an ample collection of them. These (206) Turneb. ad ver. lib. 30. cap. 39. I am not very well satisfied with the two proofs he brings, viz. the passages of Virgil and Ovid I here transcribe.

(207) Ovid. lib. 5. Fæstor. v. 375.

(208) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 422.

(209) Jean le Maire de Belges, Illustrat. de Gaule, liv. 1. ch. 33. pag. 109.

(210) I. e. of Juno, Minerva, and Venus, naked before Paris.

(211) Balzac, Entret. 5. ch. 2. pag. m. 88. See in the remark [HH] of the article MAHOMET; what is related by the followers of that Prophet, with regard to his sweat.

(212) Furina.

adulterous amours of Jupiter were the more criminal [EE]. It would be meer wrangling to animadvert on Arnobius, who has formed that judgment of it. The superstition of the Romans rose to that excess, that some women honoured Juno, by making as though they combed and dressed her, and by holding a looking glass to her [FF]; but others stood in little fear of Juno; for they used to go and seat themselves in the Capitol, near her husband, whose mistresses they fancied themselves to be. Read my last remark.

content themselves with collecting those particulars which relate to great cities; but a collection of what concerns parishes in villages would also be of value. This recalls to my memory what I heard of a judicious man say, that his taste was not like that of the ancient father of the church, who wished to have seen a triumphal entry into Rome. With regard to myself, said the gentleman in question, I had rather have been present during some months at the conversations of the citizens of Rome, and know the manner in which the women practised their devotions, and how they spoke of Jupiter and Juno; what was their common discourse on a wedding day, on a day of child-birth, and of a general procession, a day of LeGisternium &c. with regard to the Gods and Goddesses, Subigus, or Subiga, Fabulinus, Pertunda, and the rest. Books do not teach those minute particulars, and nothing but conversation can bring us to the knowledge of them.

[EE] Juno was a beautiful Goddess, on which account it may be said, that the adulterous amours of Jupiter were the more criminal. In this manner Arnobius argued: Et quid regi Saturno matrimonii fuerat cum alieni rei? Non illi fuerat satis Juno, nec sedare impetum cupiditatum in regina poterat numinum, cum nobilitas eam commendaret tanta, facies, oris dignitas, & ulnarum nivei marmorisque candores (213)? i. e. "What business had Jupiter to concern himself with the wives of others? Was not Juno sufficient for him; and could he not satiate his lasciviousness with the Queen of the Gods, so renowned for her noble air, her beauty, and snowy arm?" A Cavalier Sophister then attack this: Arnobius, and say that the beauty of women, at the end of a certain period, loses all its power with respect to their husbands; things being of such a nature, that use makes us to be no longer affected with them, ab affectu non fit passio. He would maintain, that the following political axiom, that those are the best methods for preserving of dominion and power, which were employed for the acquiring them; Imperium facile iis artibus retinetur quibus initio partum est (214), is false with regard to the empire of beauty; for if beauty achieves conquests, it does not preserve them; a husband who fell in love with his wife merely for her outward charms, does not continue to be passionately fond of her, because she still preserves her beauty; custom makes him grow obdurate with respect to that kind of charm, and he grows more insensible every day: at last become sooner so, and others later; but at last all arrive at it, and the fondness which may be, and is often perceived in reality, is not grounded on beauty, but on other qualities. Experience shews, that such husbands as have handsome wives, are not generally those whose love for them is strongest and most lasting. We must look elsewhere than in beauty for that charm which first unites hearts; and afterwards keeps them united.

A Sophist might produce several other observations of the same kind; but after all, he ought to be looked upon as a caviller; for it is certain that Arnobius's remark is grounded on a kind of common scandal. A whole neighbourhood shall be much more scandalized at the amours of a man who has a handsome wife, than at the intrigues of another whose wife is ugly. A people, how numerous soever they may be, will unanimously be more indulgent to the gallantries of their King, when the Queen is deformed and very loathsome, than if he were married to a Princess of a rare and exquisite beauty. Some one has inserted in the Scaligerana a tale that has some relation to this. "Porthaise a famous Preacher, delivering a sermon in Poitiers, and having heard of the intrigues of one Lumcau a Physician, who, though he had a pretty handsome wife, went sometimes astray; pointed him out one day whimsically enough in the pulpit; when, after having exclaimed against that vice in general, he descended to particulars, and said; We have even heard with concern, that some men are so abandoned as to commit adultery, though they have wives at home who are so agreeable, that for our parts we should be very well satisfied with them (216)."

[FF] Some woman honoured Juno, by making as though they combed and dressed her, and by holding a looking-glass to her. What pity it is that we have not that book in which Seneca condemned that base superstition, and many others of the same cast. St. Auctin has cited it. In Capitolium perveni, said Seneca (217), quod sibi vanus furor adtribuit officii: alius nomina Deo subjicit, alius boras Jovi nunciat, alius licitor est, alius unctor, qui vano motu brachiorum imitatur ungentem. Sunt, quæ Junoni ac Minervæ capillos disponant, longe a templo non tantum a simulacbro stantes, digitos movent ornatum modo. Sunt quæ speculum teneant . . . sedent quædam in capitolio, quæ se Jove amari putant, nec Junonis quidem, si credere Poetis velis, iracundissimæ respectu terrentur. i. e. "I came said Seneca, into the capitol; you will blush at the publick madness, which is idly practised under the notion of honouring the God: One gives him a catalogue of names; another informs Jupiter what hour of the day it is, another is a licitor, another an anointer, who, flourishing his arm, imitates the action of one that anoints. Some are busied in disposing the hair of Juno and Minerva, standing far, not only from the temple, but likewise from the statue; making a motion with their fingers as tho' they were adorning the statues. Some hold a looking-glass . . . Some women are seated in the capitol, imagining that Jupiter is in love with them; nor are terrified, if the poets may be credited, with the aspect of Juno, tho' most highly exasperated." This may be confirmed by a passage extracted from a work that is still extant: Deum colit qui novit. Vetemus lintea & strigiles Jovi ferri, & speculum tenere Junoni (218). i. e. "He worships a God who knows him: I forbid towels and scrapers used in baths to be carried to Jupiter, and the holding a looking-glass to Juno."

(213) Arnobius, lib. 4. pag. m. 141.

(216) Scaligerana, pag. m. 192.

(214) Sallust. in Proem. Belli Catil.

(217) Seneca contra Superstitiones, apud August. de Civitate Dei, lib. 6. cap. 10. pag. m. 605.

(218) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 1. ver. 54.

Hæc res & jungit, & junctos servat amicos (215).

"And this I think will get, and keep a friend.

CREECH.

(218) Senec. Epist. 95. pag. m. 399.

JUPITER the greatest of all the Gods in the heathen system, was the son of Saturn and Cybele. There is no crime that could be named but he was polluted with it; for besides his dethroning his own father, his emasculating, and loading him with chains in the lowest abysses of hell [A]; he also committed incest with his sisters, his daughters and

[A] He dethroning his own father, and loading him with chains in the lowest abysses of Hell. Saturn, on this occasion, suffered the law of retaliation, he having usurped the empire of the world which his father Cælus possessed (1); but Jupiter was nevertheless guilty of a dreadful usurpation, it not being lawful for one crime to be punished by committing another; and no person can clear himself by imitating the wicked. It is remarkable and aunts [B], and even endeavoured to ravish his mother. He debauched a numberless multitude of maidens and wives; and used to assume the shape of all kinds of beasts, markable that Cœlus was betrayed by his own wife; for it was Terra, the wife of Cœlus, who stirred up her children to rebellion (2), and put into the hands of the youngest (3) a sickle, with which he mutilated him. Saturn who perpetrated this was treated so exactly in the same manner, that Jupiter employed, for the lopping of his Pudenda, the very same instrument with which he had emasculated Cœlus (4). It is to be observed, that Saturn's party made a pretty long resistance, it not being overpowered till after it had sustained a ten years war (5). Saturn being overcome was loaded with chains, and precipitated into Tartarus, the darkest and deepest dungeon in Hell; and was as far distant from the earth, as the earth is from Heaven. Τόπος δὲ ὕψος ἰσχυρότης ἐστὶν ἡ ἀδύ, τοῦτο ἀπὸ γῆς ἔχει διάστημα, ὅσον ἀπ' ἡμῶν γῆ. Is locus est ad inferos tenebrosissimus, qui tantum a terra distat, quantum a cælo terram abesse ferunt (6). The chains were not heavy, they being made of wool (7). He was allowed his liberty for some days every year during the Saturnalia, a season in which slaves were permitted to do as they pleased (8).

(1) Apollodorus, lib. 1. init.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) It was Saturn.

(4) Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. 2. pag. m. 86.

(5) Apollodorus, lib. 1. init.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Agathonymus in Perfide, apud Natal. Comitum, pag. 85.

(8) Horat. Sat. 7. lib. 2. ver. 4.

... Age, libertate Decembri,
Quando ita majores voluerunt, utere.

“ Go to, and as our antient laws decree,
“ Use boldly thy December's liberty,
“ Speak fairly what thou wilt.

CREECH.

Some say that Saturn escaped out of prison, and withdrew to King Janus in Italy; and others relate that his son drove him only from his throne. Virgil is of the latter opinion:

*Primus ab ætherio venit Saturnus Olympo
Arma Jovis fugiens, & regnis exul adeptis* (9).

(9) Virgil. Æn. lib. 8. ver. 319.

“ Then Saturn came who fled the pow'r of Jove, “ Robb'd of his realms, and banish'd from above.

DRYDEN.

But Statius is not, since he speaks of the liberty that indulged Saturn but once a year:

*Saturnus mihi compede exoluta
Et multo gravidus mero December,
Et ridens jocus, & sales protervi
Adfuit* (10).

(10) Statius, Silva 6. lib. 1.

“ Come hither, Saturn, from thy fetters freed,
“ And old December quite o'erpower'd with wine,
“ With smiling Repartee, and wanton wit.

(11) Lib. 4. pag. m. 143.

Add to this passage the following words from Arnobius (11): Numquid parricidii causa vinculum esse Saturnum, & abluis diebus stans, vinculorum ponderibus & levari. i. e. “ That Saturn was bound in chains on account of the parricide he had committed; and was washed on certain fixed days, and also freed from his bonds.” I forgot to observe that after the complete victory which Jupiter's party had gained, Apollo sung, to his lyre, a poem he had composed in honour of the conquerors. Tibullus informs us of this particular, in an Elegy which he addresses to Apollo (12).

(12) It is the 5th of book 2.

*Sed nitidus pulcherque veni, nunc indu vestem
Sepositam, longas nunc bene pectus comas,
Qualem te memorant, Saturno rege fugato Victori laudes concinuisse Jovi.*

“ Do thou accept the offering, and be there,
“ Consecr'd with laurel foliage round thy hair;
“ But with illustrious pride attend the show,
“ And loosely let thy graceful vestments flow;
“ Array'd as when old Saturn fled above,
“ You sang the victor God, the powerful Jove.

DART.

The best allegories that can be found to be shadowed under these fictions, is to say that the antients intimated thereby that ambition extinguishes all natural affection, and all the duties of friendship and alliances. Natalis Comes who is very fond of allegories speaks as follows (13): Nulla sunt enim vel naturæ, vel amicitie, vel beneficentiæ satis firma vincula, ubi majestatis & imperandi furiosum desiderium invaserit: illa omnia siquidem facillime conculcantur & prosteruntur (13); and (13) Pag. 85. to say also, that poets and orators are ever ready to declare for that party which is victorious.

[B] He also committed incest with his sisters, his daughters and Aunts.] He lay with his sister Juno before she was his wife, and afterwards married her.

This I have mentioned elsewhere (14). He debauched his other sister Ceres, and had Proserpine by her. He lay with three of his aunts, viz. Themis, Dione, and Mnemolyne. From his incestuous commerce with the first sprung the Horæ and Parcæ; by the second he had Venus, and the nine Muses by the third (15). Seeing one day his mother asleep, he attempted to lie with her

(14) In the remark [A] of the article JUNO.

insidiously; but she waking, and making resistance, he employed force; and would in all probability have accomplished his abominable design, had not the struggles he made to overpower his mother, exhausted his fire (16). Arnobius makes the following just exclamation on this occasion. O verum imaginatio indecora, o habitus sædus Jovis ad obscæni certaminis expeditionem parati! Ergone ille rex mundi, cum incautus & proterus obreptionis esset rejectus a furio in impetum se vertit: & quum rapere voluptatem insidiosa fraude non quivit, vi matrem aggressus est, & apertissime cepit venerabilem subruere castitatem? Colluctatus ergo diutissime cum invita est, viduus, fractus, superatusque, desecit: & quem pietas dijugare ab infando matris non valuit appetitu, effusa libido dijunxit (17) ? i. e. “ O unseemly

(15) Hesiod. in Theogonia, Apollodorus. lib. 1. pag. 9.

(16) Arnob. lib. 5. pag. 161.

“ image of things! O foul attitude of Jupiter prepared for the obscene engagements! And did this monarch of the universe, when he could not extort the bliss of the universe, attempt to ravish his mother by force? He struggled long with the reluctant Goddess, and being at last defeated was forced to desist; and he whom filial piety could not restrain from impiously coveting the embraces of his mother, was prevented from enjoying her by his passion being extinguished.” He observes that the heathens took the advantage of these vain efforts of Jupiter, they saying that he impregnated a stone, and that it was delivered of a son ten months after. Et sane hoc loco frugalitatis magnæ viri, & circa res etiam flagitiosi operis parciores, ne sancta illa semina frustra videantur effusa, flex, inquit, ebibit Jovialis incontinentiæ sæditatem. Quid deinde, quæso, consecutum est, dicite? In sum medio lapidis, atque in illa, cotis duritie informatus atque animatus est infans, Jovis magni futura progenies, &c (18).

(17) Arnob. ibid. pag. 162.

Such a kind of propagation was observed with regard to the efforts which Jupiter made to lie with his daughter Venus. This maiden, tho' on other occasions so willing to grant the highest favours, did nevertheless resist Jupiter with great vigour. I explain this in the margin, by the words (which indeed are a little coarse) of a modern author (19). Arnobius mentions another attempt in which Jupiter was successful; but it is according to the opinion of those who said that Ceres was that God's mother. Quonges by Jupiter's dam Diespiter, inquit, cum in Cererem suam matrem sed ubi: sed fell to libidinibus improbis atque inconcessis cupiditatibus æstuarer, be attempted to lie nam genitrix hæc Jovis regionis ejus ab accolis traditur, with Venus who neque tamen auderet id, quod procaci appetitione conceperat, apertissima vi petere, ingeniosas comminiscitur captationes, quibus nihil tale metuentem castitate immineret on Ovid, pag. 173.

(18) Arnob. ibid.

genitricem: fit ex Deo taurus, & sub pecoris specie subfessoris animum atque audaciam celans; in securam & nesciam repentina immittitur vi furens, agit incestus res suas, & prodita per libidinem fraude, intellectus, & cognitus evolat (20). i. e. “ They say that once upon a time Jupiter, burning impiously for his mother Ceres, (for the people of this country declare that she was that God's mother) and not daring to indulge his passion openly, thought of a stratagem whereby he might rob the Goddess of her chastity by surprise: the God was metamorphosed into a Bull; and concealing his bold, insidious designs under the form of that animal, he rushed upon Ceres on a sudden

(19) Nonnus, lib. 14. says, that the rest of the Centaurs were begotten by Jupiter's seed which fell to the earth, when he attempted to lie with Venus who resisted his wild passion. Meziriac, on Ovid, pag. 173.

“ when

(20) Arnob. lib. 5. pag. 170.

beasts, in order to proceed in his intrigues. He even was guilty of sodomy, he carrying off the beautiful Ganymedes (a); and raised him to the employment of cup-bearer to the Gods, in order that he might be ever ready at hand, whenever he wanted to satiate his brutal passion with him. Frauds and perjuries, and in general all actions punishable by the Laws, were very familiar to him (b). It is even said that he devoured one of his wives [C]. Nothing therefore can be more monstrous than the Religion of the Heathens, according to whom such a Deity was looked upon as the supreme master of all things; and who adapted the religious worship they paid him to that idea. The fathers of the Church have laid great stress on this argument, to prove thereby the falsity of the Religion of the Heathens; and it may be asserted, that this system seemed calculated to deprave

(a) See the article GANYMEDES.

(b) See the proofs which Natalis Comes brings of this, Mythol. lib. 1. cap. 18. and Arnobius in the note [B].

“ when she was unguarded, and perpetrated the incest; “ but the obscene action discovering him, he fled a way.” In vain Ceres was offended, this congress made her pregnant of Proserpine, who, when she was of age to inspire an amorous passion, underwent the same trials as her mother. Jupiter deflowered his daughter Proserpine. Quam (Proserpinam) cum vervecus Jupiter bene validam, floridam, & succi esse conspiceret plenioris, oblitus paulo ante quid malorum & sceleris esset aggressus, & temeritatis quantum, redit ad priores actus: & quia nefarium videbatur satis, patrem cum filia comminus uxoria conjugatione misceri, in draconem terribilem formam migrat: ingentibus spiris pavescantem colligat virginem, & sub obtentu fero, molliissimis ludis atque adulatur amplexibus (21). i. e. “ The lecherous Jupiter observing Proserpine to be “ strong, florid, and flushed with wine, and forgetting his rash actions, and the guilt he had lately “ perpetrated, returned to his former pranks; and “ because it looked as criminal for a father to be “ have towards his daughter as though she were a “ wife, he assumed a serpent’s dreadful form; he “ winded his monstrous folds about the trembling virgin; and under this savage disguise, he clasped and “ sported with her in the softest manner.” Meziriac

(21) Ibid. pag. 871.

(22) quotes several authors, who relate that Jupiter, (22) translated into a serpent, got his daughter Proserpine’s maidenhead, and had by her the first Bacchus surnamed Zagreus. I will conclude this remark with a passage from Arnobius. Quid tantum, quæso, says he to the Heathens (23), de vobis Jupiter iste, quicunque est, meruit, quod genus est nullum probri infame, adulterium nullum, quod in ejus non caput, velut in aliquam congeratis vilem luteamque personam? i. e. “ This Jupiter, whoever he be, how came he to de “ serve so well of you; he who did not scruple to “ commit any crime though ever so infamous, nor “ any adulterous action, like the meanest and most “ abandoned of mortals?” This is quite putting the heathen system to a nonplus.

(22) On Ovid, pag. 419. He cites Nonnius, lib. 5 and 6. Arnob. lib. 5. Clem. Alexand. in Protreptico. Tzetzes on Lycophron. The Scholiast of Pindar in 7 lth. The author of Etymologicum magn. under the word Zaypivē. The Scholiast of Aristophan. in Ran. Diod. Sicul. lib. 3. Arrian. lib. 2. de Exped. Alexandri. Hygin. cap. 155 and 157. Cicero, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum.

[C] It is even said that he devoured one of his wives.] Hesiod observes, that Jupiter’s first wife was called Metis. Ζῆς δὲ θῶν βασιλεύς πρότην ἄλοχον θῆτα Μήτιν. Uxorem primam Metim sibi Jupiter addidit (24). Seeing that she was big with child, he devoured her, and by that means was with child himself, and was afterwards delivered of Minerva. Gravidam factam deglutivit, ut scripsit Joannes Diaconus his verbis: Καὶ ἔγκυον ταύτην καταβύβηκε, καταπίνων αὐτήν, ἵνα μὴ ἀλλοῦ τις τῶν θῶν ἀποκυβδίη παρ’ αὐτῆς ἀμειδίης καὶ ἀτάσθαλος: quam cum gravidam fecisset, deglutivit, ne quis alius Deorum nasceretur ex ea impudens ac fatuus. Ex eo cibo mox ipse Jupiter pro uxore gravidus factus Palladem armatam e capite peperit (25). i. e. “ He devoured her after he had got her with child, “ as Joannes Diaconus relates thus; he devoured her “ after he had got her with child, to prevent any other “ impudent and silly God from being born of her. Jupiter himself being pregnant from the birth of this “ tood, gave birth, from his head, to the armed “ Pallas.”

(23) Arnob. lib. 5. pag. 171.

(24) Hesiod in Theog. ver. 886.

(25) Natal. Comes, Mytholog. lib. 2. pag. m. 90.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary, I have examined this matter with greater accuracy; and find that Natalis Comes does not advance any particular but what is founded on the words of Joannes Diaconus whom he cites. This Diaconus is a Greek author and a Christian, who composed allegories and scholia on Hesiod’s Poem, intitled, Θεογονία, or the generation of the Gods. He declares in positive terms that Jupiter, having swallowed his wife Metis, brought forth Minerva; καὶ ταύτην καταπίνων ἀποτίκει ἐκ τῆς τριτογύναιου ἄσπασιν; he uses, I say, those words, immediately after having employed the words contained in the passages of Natalis Comes above cited; and thereby evidently declares, that he would have it supposed that Minerva sprung from Jupiter’s head, because Metis when big with child had been devoured by Jupiter her husband. But Hesiod does not lead us to this thought; nor so much as hints that the tragical end of Metis contributed to Minerva’s birth. Here follows the substance of his narration (26). Metis, the first wife of Jupiter, was going to be delivered of Minerva, but Jupiter prevented her, he inveigling and imposing upon her with flattering words, and swallowed her into his belly. Cælus and Terra had given him this counsel; and told him, that if he did not do this, he should lose his scepter, since the destinies declared that Metis, after being delivered of the wife Minerva, would bring forth a brave boy, who should reign over Gods and Men. Jupiter averted this fatal blow, he swallowing Metis, before she became a mother; he shutting her up, I say, in his bowels, in order that she might foretel him good and evil. Ἄλλ’ ἄρα μὴ Ζεὺς πρόσθεν ἰὴν ἐγκάρδιον ἔσθην, ὡς δὲ οἱ φράσσεται θῆτα ἀγαθὸν τὸ κακόν τε. Sed illam sane Jupiter ante in suum condidit ventrem. Ut-nempe ei indicaret dea bonumque malumque (27). He afterwards married Theon, who brought him many children, as did also his mistresses. Eurynome, daughter of Oceanus, brought him the three Graces; after which he lay with Ceres by whom he had Proserpine. He next fell in love with Mnemosyne, and made her mother of the nine Muses. Latona brought him a son and daughter, viz. Apollo and Diana; and lastly, he married Juno by whom he had three children, Hebe, Mars and Lucina; and Jupiter himself gave birth to Minerva, who sprung from his head. It is plain that if Hesiod intended his readers should suppose, that he meant, that this birth of Minerva was the effect of Metis’s being shut up in Jupiter’s belly, he had done all that was necessary to frustrate his design; he putting between this effect and cause such an interval, as leads our thoughts to a thing quite foreign to his intention. Let us therefore conclude that he had no such intention; or else, that he surpassed every author in the shameful art of giving a wrong account of an incident, and expressing it obscurely. Observe, that if the nineteen verses found in a work of Galen (28) are really Hesiod’s, we could not blame that Poet for having been too obscure. We there see very clearly, that the same Pallas who sprung from the head of Jupiter, was concerned in Metis’s womb; but it must be observed that she was not conceived in it, till after Metis had been swallowed up by Jupiter. This is a variation that deserves to be taken notice of. I add, that it is no ways probable that the verses in question were written by Hesiod; was he the author of them, there would be, in his Poem on the Generation of the Gods, a chasm which has escaped the notice of the critics. Galen deserves censure in some little measure, for not quite putting it out of doubt, whether the pronoun αὐτὸς, ipse, before the nineteen verses, refers to Hesiod or Chryssippus. I am of opinion that it refers to the latter; and that this great Philosopher, after citing the verses of Hesiod which relate to Metis, had quoted those of another Poet, wherein the conception of Minerva was described a little differently. If it should be asked, why Chryssippus quoted the verses from Hesiod and the others? I answer, that it was in order to shew, that his opinion with regard to the seat of the rational soul, was not contrary to the tradition concerning Minerva’s birth. He supposed the heart to be the seat of the rational soul;

(26) Hesiod. in Theog. ver. 887, & seq.

(27) Ibidem, ibid. ver. 899.

(28) Galenus, de Hippocrat. & Platoni Placitis, lib. 3. cap. 8. pag. 131. edit. Paris 1679.

(c) I shall make some mention of this in the article METHYDRUM.

deprave and corrupt mens manners [D]. I shall take no notice of the fictions which relate to Jupiter's birth or education (c). Moreri has taken some notice of them; and they are found in a great number of books that are read daily in schools. I shall speak only of the eagle which carried Nectar to him [E], this not being so common an incident. Charpentier does not relate faithfully a particular for which he quotes Homer [F].

What the heathens have said with regard to the origin of Jupiter, appeared to me for a long time so unaccountable, that the more I reflected on it the more monstrous it appeared to me; and such, in short, that I concluded it was impossible the Philosophers could have maintained it; but I at last discovered, that they might be led into this error, by I know not what kind of reasoning [G], the weakness whereof it was no easy matter foul; and yet Minerva, that is reason and wisdom, sprung from the brain of Jupiter. This is an objection which Chrysippus examined; he took advantage of the circumstance of Minerva's being conceived by Metis, after Jupiter had swallowed her; and asserted that this signified, that reason was formed in the bosom or breast; and that the bringing forth of Minerva, signified speech, i. e. that reason proceeds from the head, in as much as the mouth is the organ by which the thoughts, conceived in the heart, are brought forth outwardly. Galen (29) thinks it very strange that Chrysippus should spend his time in so carefully explaining poetical traditions (30). He deserves the highest censure for trifling away his time in such a manner.

(29) Idem, ibid. pag. 133.

(30) See the citations (49) and (68) of the article CHRYSIPPUS the Philosopher.

(51) See Arnauld in his V Denonciation du Peché Philosophique, pag. 32.

[D] The system... of the religion of the heathens... seemed calculated to deprave and corrupt men's morals (31). "Christian writers, from these infamous actions committed by Jupiter, have drawn powerful arguments to convict the heathens of the falsity of their Gods, as may be seen in several parts in Laëtantius, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius and several others. For not to mention that such horrid crimes are inconsistent with the divine nature; the heathens might justly take a handle from thence, in order to abandon themselves to crimes of every kind... not imagining themselves to be criminal so long, as they imitated their Gods. This too is what Ion means in Euripides, in a Tragedy that bears his name.

"... Οὐκ ἔτ' ἀνδράπων κακῶς
" Λίγυι δίκαιον, εἰ τὰ τῶν θεῶν κακὰ
" Μιμνήμεθ', ἀλλὰ τὸς διδάσκειναι τὰ θεῶν.

" We must not censure wicked wretches,
" Who imitate the Deities, but these
" For setting such examples (32)."

(32) Meziriac, on Ovid, pag. 419, 420.

(33) In Epist. ad Hippolytum.

Meziriac makes this remark on a passage of Ovid, where Phædra (33) observes, that it was fitting the crime of incest should be scrupled in the rude times under Saturn; but that a woman in the reign of his successor, ought to be allowed to lie with her son-in-law. Jupiter's marrying, says she, his sister gives an entire sanction to it.

*Nec quia privigno videar coitura noverca,
Terrorint animos nomina vana tuos.
Ista vetus pietas, ævo moritura futuro
Rustica Saturno regna tenente, fuit.
Jupiter esse plium statuit quodcumque juvaret,
Et fas omne facit fratre marita soror.*

" Let not mere names, step-mother, son-in-law,
" Affright; these scruples under rustic Saturn
" Were good, but banished in politer times.
" Jove bids enjoy whatever we approve;
" And all permits, since he his sister married.

(34) Meziriac, pag. 419, makes this remark.

Ovid commits a very gross error on this occasion (34), since Saturn was married to his sister, as certainly as Jupiter was with his. One might add to the passage of Euripides cited by Meziriac, an hundred others equally strong. Nothing is more common in the antient Poets, than to read of people who, to excuse their crimes, assert, either that they did but imitate the Gods, or that the Gods excited them to commit evil (35). But not to dissemble the truth, it must be observed to the glory of the heathens, that they did not live in conformity to their principles. It is true indeed that the heathens were exceedingly depraved and corrupted in their morals; but then many among them did not follow the example of their false Gods, and preferred the ideas of virtue to so great an authority. A strange circumstance is, that Christians, whose system of religion is so pure, should yet fall but very short of the heathens in their vices. It is a mistake to imagine that the morals of a religion correspond with its tenets.

(35) See remark [C] of the article HELENA.

[E] I shall speak only of the eagle which carried Nectar to him.] A woman, Moero by name, author of a poem intitled Memory (36), says that Jupiter was fed unknown to all the Gods, in a cave in the island of Crete, by doves who carried Ambrosia to him, and an eagle who conveyed to him Nectar. The Ambrosia was brought from the ocean, and the Nectar was drawn from a stone. Jupiter, after he had dethroned Saturn, made that eagle immortal, and carried it to heaven.

(36) Athen. lib. 15. pag. 490.

Νίκταρ δ' ἐν αἰθέρι μίγνυς αἰνὸς αἰὼν ἀφύσσων,
Γαμφαλῆ φέρεισσι [πυρίων] Διὶ μνησθέντι.
Τὸν κ' ἠκρήσας πατήρα Κρόνον ὑψίστη Ζῆνι,
Ἄθανάτων αἰώησσι κ' ἀθανάτῳ ἰγκυκλιόσσωνι.

*Nectar vero ex saxo ingens aquila semper hauriens,
Advolans portabat consulto prudentique Jovi.
Eam visito patre Saturno Juppiter altisonus, Immortalitate donatam, in caelo habitare voluit (37).*

(37) Mem. ibid. pag. 492.

[F] Charpentier does not relate faithfully a particular for which he quotes Homer.] I mean Mr. Charpentier of the French Academy. He expected to make a speech to the King, at the head of the Academy, after the taking of Mons; but that monarch would not be complimented, in a speech, on that occasion. That of Charpentier was inserted in the Mercurie Galant for May 1691. The King is there described as Homer's Jupiter, against whom all the other Gods are united; and who, after upbraiding them with the vanity of their design, shews them experimentally that his strength is immoveable; and whilst they all exert their strength in pulling against him, he lifts them all up with the globe of the earth and sea. But with his leave, Jupiter in Homer (38) does not actually do this; he only boasts and threatens to do it.

(38) See the beginning of Book 8. of the Iliad.

The rest of the Gods did not think his vauntings to be just. They only said, that he would be stronger than any of them singly; but his menace seemed ridiculous to Mars, who remembered that, not long before, Neptune, Juno and Minerva, having undertaken to seize and bind Jupiter, filled him with dread; and would certainly have bound him, had not Tethys pitied the God in question, and called Briareus with his hundred arms to his relief (39). Had Charpentier known the satyrical turn of mind of our libel-writers, he very probably would have forbore making comparisons and similitudes, and Lucian would have occurred to his memory.

(39) Extracted; from Lucian, in Deorum Dialogis, pag. 173, 174. tom. 1. See Homer's Iliad. lib. 1. ver. 398, & seq.

[G] They might be led into that error by I know not what kind of reasoning.] Let us first hear what Hesiod relates concerning the genealogy of the Gods (40). He begins with the chaos which is the first being he supposes. He next brings in earth and love; adds that Erebus and night were begot by the chaos, and that the Æther and the day sprung from the marriage of Erebus and night; and that the earth, without contracting marriage, begot heaven and the sea; and afterwards being married to heaven, she procreated the Ocean, Rhea, Themys, Tethys, Saturn, &c. However, this extremely prolific marriage gave but little satisfaction and comfort to the earth; Heaven, her husband, matter for them to discover. They did not think it possible for any thing to have been created, and did not admit of substances wholly distinct from extension. Now when these two hypotheses are once established, it is almost as easy to suppose that refined or subtilized matter could become God, as to believe the soul of man material, as most Philosophers believed. See the remark G. In Arcadia there stood a temple sacred to the band, imprisoning all their children, in proportion as she was delivered of them. Upon this, she excited them to revenge, and was so successful, that Saturn lopped off with a single stroke of a scythe his father's pudenda, and threw them into the sea (41). These produced a froth or foam whence sprung the Goddesses Venus. The children of Saturn and Rhea were Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune and Jupiter (42). This is what I have extracted from Hesiod's poem. There were some other genealogists (43) who said that Æther and Day, children of Erebus and night, were the father and mother of heaven; and that their brothers and sisters were love, fraud, fear, labour, envy, fate, old age, death, gloom, misery, dreams &c. I related above (44), how Carneades employed this genealogy to refute the theology of the Stoics. I shall only say here, that according to the tree of consanguinity, there must necessarily have been some God whose father was not God: for if, on one hand, it had been granted Carneades, that heaven, the æther, the day, Erebus and night were Deities; it would have been denied him on the other hand, that the chaos, which was antecedent to all those divine beings, was God; and consequently, those who argued in this manner were forced to say, that the Gods had been formed of a matter which was not God, and without an efficient cause which had the nature of God. Such an idea certainly contradicts the most solid and most evident notions of natural reason; nevertheless some great Philosophers have supposed the generation of the Gods, and have assigned them a cause of their being, which was not God. Anaximenes omnes rerum causas infinito aeri dedit, nec deos negavit aut tacuit: non tamen ab ipsis aerem factum, sed ἴψος ἐξ ἀβρῶν ὀρθὸς ἐκρέδιδε (45). i. e. "Anaximenes ascribed the causes of all things to the boundless air, nor did he deny that there were Gods, or was silent with regard to them; yet he did not believe that the air was created by them, but that THEY SPRUNG FROM THAT ELEMENT." We understand the principles of Anaximenes better by the above-mentioned words of St. Austin, than by the following ones of Cicero. Anaximenes aera statuit, eumque gigni, esseque immensum & infinitum, & semper in motu (46). i. e. "Anaximenes thought that the air was God; that it was precreated; was immense and infinite and ever in motion." In all probability Cicero did not well relate the sentiment of this Philosopher; for since Anaximenes ascribed to the air the nature of the principles of all things, and ascribed to it immensity and infinitude; we must believe that he supposed it eternal and unproduced; and that if he called it God under that idea, he did not believe the generation of God in that respect. When therefore he said that the boundless or infinite air was the cause of all beings; and that the Gods themselves had been produced from it, he did not prescribe to it the name and nature of God, in the same sense that he ascribed it to the Gods who derived their origin and existence from the air. Perhaps he meant this. He was willing, in order to avoid all disputes about words, to call God the immense and infinite air, which he considered as the principle of all things; but he did not pretend, that Saturn, Rhea, Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, Minerva, and the rest of the Gods whom the heathens worshipped, were that air, or had produced it: on the contrary, he supposed that this air was their principle, as well as that of the other beings which compose the universe. He ascribed to this principle a perpetual motion, whence we may conclude, that he looked upon it as an immanent cause, which produced in itself a numberless multitude of effects, incessantly without end; and he included among these effects, not only stars and meteors, plants, stones and metals, but also Gods and men. Such a doctrine was in reality that of Spinoza; for according to this opinion, the God, or the eternal and necessary being of Anaximenes, was the only substance of which heaven, earth, animals &c. were but modifications. Thales perhaps entertained such an opinion, he who had taught that water was the principle of all things (47). (47) Diog. Laert. He perhaps had called him God on that account: this lib. 1. num. 27. was the God he meant, when he said, that God not having been begotten or produced was the most ancient of all beings. Προεχότατος τῶν ὄντων, θεός, ἀγέννητος ἦ, κάλλιστος, κόσμος· ποίημα δὲ θεῶν. Antiquissimum eorum omnium quæ sunt, Deus; ingenitus enim. Pulcherrimum, mundus, à Deo enim factus est (48). He (48) Diogen. Laert. lib. 1. num. added, that as the world was the work of God, it was the most beautiful of all beings (49). Spinoza (49) See the last cited Greek passage. would acknowledge as much. He does not deny that God is the cause of all things, that is, the immanent cause, which modifies itself a numberless multitude of ways, whence results all that we call the world, and the whole universe in general. If Thales said also that the world is animated and filled with spirits (50), this perhaps might signify that water, the principle of all things, the unproduced or uncreated God, had modified itself in such a manner that it had formed a soul diffused through all bodies, and particular spirits like to the Gods, who were worshipped under the heathen system. This would assist our understanding what we have seen elsewhere (51), and which doubtless is very surprizing, viz. that Thales and the other Naturalists who preceded Anaxagoras, have explained the generation of the world, without supposing it to be directed by a divine intelligence. Thales and Anaximenes could not admit it, if the one supposed that water, the other that air, were the principle of all things, a principle eternal and uncreated; for though, to avoid a contention about words, they called God that universal and uncreated principle, they could not consider it as an intelligent cause, antecedently to the particular being it formed, since it produced them in itself and from itself, as an immanent cause, and not as an external cause, and distinct from its matter. But because Anaxagoras was the first (52) who acknowledged a spirit distinct from the matter of the world; a pure spirit unmixed with bodies, he must have reasoned in a different manner from the Naturalists his predecessors; he might say, arguing consistently, that the world had been formed by the direction of a spirit which disentangled and put the parts of matter into order. His hypothesis admitted an intelligence antecedent to the formation of the world; the other hypothesis supposed nothing to have existed before the world except the chaos, water or air &c: and thus they were to give a beginning to intelligent beings, as well as to the most groveling creatures. All things issued from the first principle by way of generation or production. Jupiter the greatest of the Gods, his father Saturn, Cælus, his grandfather Æther, and whatever can be named still more backward, was a particular being, which owed its origin, its birth, its existence to eternal and uncreated matter, the principle of all things, the chaos according to Hesiod, water according to Thales, and air according to Anaximenes. But, will it be said, did not Thales confess, that the Gods know the very thoughts of men? Ἡρήνησι τις αὐτὸν εἰ λέγει θεὸς ἀδραπέου ἀδικῶν· Ἄλλ' ἰδὲ διανοῦμεν ἴφθι. Interrogatus lateret ne Deos homo male agens: ne cogitans quidem, inquit (53)? I answer, what is that to the purpose all we can conclude is, that he ascribed a vast extent of knowledge to some of the beings, which water had generated, and which were called Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Neptune &c. It is to be observed that Homer, who gives so pompous a description of the power of the Gods, supposes they all sprung from the ocean.

(40) Hesiod. de Deorum Geneset. ver. 116.

(41) Idem, ibid. ver. 110.

(42) Idem, ibid. ver. 453.

(43) See Cicero, de Natur. Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 27.

(44) Citat. (87) of the article CARNEADES.

(45) August. de Civitat. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. pag. m. 711. See citation (15) of the article DIOGENES of Apollonia.

(46) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 10.

(50) Τὸν κόσμον ἐμάχον καὶ δαιμόνιον πλῆρη. Animalium mundum ac demoniibus plenum. Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 27. See also Aristot. de Anima, lib. 1. cap. 5.

(51) In the remark [D] of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(52) See the same remark.

(53) Diogen. Laert. lib. 1. num. 36.

Ὠκεῖοι τε θεῶν γένεον καὶ μετέφρα Τηθύς.

"... the great parents (sacred source of Gods) Ocean and Tethys— (54)." POPE.

(54) Homer, Iliad. lib. 24. ver. 201.

The prodigious absurdity of these hypotheses is to say, that the Gods, though endowed with great knowledge, were formed from a principle which knows nothing; for neither the chaos, the air, nor the sea are thinking beings.

the good God. Pausanias conjectures that this temple was consecrated to Jupiter ; and for this reason, because the epithet just mentioned ought to suit, by way of eminence, the greatest of the Gods [H]. It is certain that Jupiter's goodness was denoted by several surnames under which he was worshipped ; but then he also was worshipped under several surnames, which declared him to be a most terrible Deity : nay, his employment of thunderer was denoted by the bare idea of his descent upon earth [I]. There were some beings. How then was it possible for them to be the total cause of those divine natures or beings, who, according to the system of the Poets and most ancient Naturalists, possessed such various knowledge? But how false and ridiculous soever these hypotheses may be, I am no longer surprized, as I used to be, at their having been admitted by Philosophers. Most of them supposed that the soul of man is material (55). They therefore imagined that it was formed of the most subtil parts of the blood, or of the seed. Now as soon as this step is taken, we make great advances in a little time. Set aside experience, consult only the ideas of theory, and it will not appear easier for matter received in the womb to transform itself into a child, who by taking in sustenance, becomes a man of great genius, than for a child to be born of a tree. Thence a heathen thinks it possible that men, in the beginning of things, sprung either from the mud of the earth, or from some liquor that fell from heaven (56). The instant this seems possible, people are easily prompted to believe what the Poets related concerning the birth of Venus (57). They no longer think it strange that, by the fermentation, which cleared or disentangled the chaos, or formed various degrees of rarefaction and condensation in the infinite expanse, the stars should have begun to exist in the firmament, and the Gods in heaven, as plants and animals on the globe of the earth. The common difference of the heathens concerning the divine nature, supposed only a greater or less difference between the Gods and men. Now, in consequence of this nothing prevented their imagining, that the most refined and most subtle parts or particles of matter had composed or formed Gods ; since such parts as were gross and solid, and which, as the lees and sediment of the whole had formed the earth, were nevertheless transformed into men. I am to observe the heathens imagined, that some spirituous particles falling from heaven, were sufficient to animate these gross terrestrial parts ; and hence it is, that Lucretius acknowledges that living bodies have a celestial original.

(55) See Plutarch, de Placitis Philosophorum, lib. 4. cap. 3. pag. 898. and Aristot. Book 1. de Anima.

(56) See the remark [B] of the article ARCHELAUS, the Philosopher.

(57) See the remark [C] of the article DIOGENES of Apollonia.

Denique caelesti fumus omnes semine oriundi :
Omnibus ille idem Pater est, unde alma liquentis
Humorum guttas Mater cum Terra recepit,
Fæta parit nitidas fruges, arbutaque læta,
Et genus humanum, Et parit omnia sæcla ferarum,
Pabula cum præbet, quibus omnes corpora pascunt,
Et dulcem ducunt vitam, prolemque propagant.
Quapropter merito Maternum nomen adeptus (38).

(38) Lucret. lib. 2. ver. 990.

“ Lastly, we all from seed celestial rise,
“ Which heav'n, our common parent still supplies,
“ From him the earth receives enliv'ning rain,
“ And straight she bears bird, tree, and beast and “ man,
“ And proper food for all, by which they thrive,
“ Grow strong, and propagate their race, and live ;
“ Thence justly all the name of mother give.”

CREECH.

To these we may add the following lines from Book II, beginning at the 325th verse of Virgil's Georgicks.

Tum pater omnipotens sæcundis imbribus æther.
Conjugis in gremium læta descendit Et omnes
Magnus alit, magno commixtus corpore, factus.

“ For then almighty Jove descends, and pours “ Into his buxom bride his fruitful show'rs.
“ And mixing his large limbs with hers, he feeds
“ Her births with kindly juice, and fosters teeming “ feeds.”

DRYDEN.

From all this it may be inferred, that nothing can be more dangerous or epidemical, than to lay down a false principle. It is a bad leaven, which though small, may spoil the whole lump. An absurdity once laid down, draws a great many after it. Should a person err only concerning the human soul ; should he falsely imagine that it is not a substance distinct from the understanding ; this falsity may lead him to a persuasion, that there were some Gods who first sprung from fermentation, and afterwards multiplied by marriage. I cannot conclude without taking notice of a particular which quite astonishes me. Methinks nothing can be grounded on clearer and more distinct ideas than the immateriality of every thinking being, and nevertheless some Philosophers among the Christians assert that extension is capable of thinking (59) ; and they are Philosophers of very great parts, and very deep meditation. After this, can we lay any stress or depend on the clearness of ideas? But do not these Philosophers see, that on such a foundation the ancient heathens might err so far as to say, that all intelligent substances had a beginning, and that only matter was from all eternity? This was the opinion of Anaximenes the Philosopher, as has been shewn, and it was likewise the doctrine of Anaximander his master (60). This inconvenience is not got over by the following salvo, viz. that matter is made capable of thinking only by a particular gift of God. It would be true nevertheless, that in its nature it is susceptible of thought; and that to make it really think, it is enough to put it in motion, or order its parts in a certain manner: whence it follows, that an eternal, unintelligent, but moveable matter, might have produced or given rise to Gods and men ; as the Poets, and some heathen Philosophers have foolishly given out.

(59) See the remark [L] of the article DICEARCHUS, the disciple of Aristotle.

(60) Anaximander infinitatem materia dixit esse à qua omnia generentur. Cicero, Academ. Quæst. lib. 2. folio 211. B. Anaximandri opinio est naturam esse Deos, longis intervallis, Orientales, Occidentalesque. Idem, de Natura Dierum, lib. 1. cap. 10.

[H] Pausanias conjectures . . . that . . . the epithet good . . . ought to suit . . . the greatest of the Gods.] This reflection of Pausanias seems to me very good, and I thought it would be proper to quote the following passage. “Εστὶ ἡ τῆς ἀθῆς ἐν ἀριστοφῶν, Ἀθάθῃ Θεῷ καὶ οὐκ ἐστὶν ἀθάθῃ οἱ θεοὶ ἀθῆνας ἐκείνῃ ἀθῆνας, Ζεὺς ἡ ἡμέτερος θεῶν ἐστὶν, ἰσομῆτος ἂν τις τῶν λόγων τὴν ἐπιπέλασιν ταύτην Διὸς τεκμηρίοιο εἶναι (61). i. e. “ The temple of the good God stands to the left of this way : “ but if the Gods are the authors of good to mankind, “ and Jupiter is the supreme Deity, we may justly “ conjecture that this name is peculiar to Jove.” See in the article PERICLES (62), several collections relating to the idea which the Heathens had formed to themselves concerning the Goodness of Jupiter and of the other Gods.

(61) Pausan. lib. 8. cap. 36. pag. 673.

(62) In the remark [K].

[I] Jupiter's goodness was denoted . . . but then he also was worshipped . . . nay, his employment of Thunderer was denoted by the bare idea of his descent upon earth.] These two kinds of epithets have been taken notice of by Lucian. “Ὁ Ζεὺς φίλος, καὶ ἕμιος, καὶ ἰταυρῆς, καὶ ἰφῆσι, καὶ ἀστροπηλῆς, καὶ ὀρεῖς, καὶ νεφέληρετός, καὶ ἰριδοπέγῃ. καὶ εἴ τι σε ἄλλο οἱ ἐμὲρόνητοι ποιήσῃ καλῶσι (63). O Jupiter Philie, hospitalis, sodalitie, domesticæ, fulgurator, juramenti præses, nubicoge, grandisfræpe, Et si quod aliud tibi cognomen attoniti pœtæ tribuunt. We here have Jupiter first as protector of friendship, as an hospitable, familiar, and domestic Deity ; and afterwards as the God of lightning, thunder, &c. The reader will find in Pausanias, in what place he was worshipped under the name of mild μελιχικός (64), the distributor of blessings, ἐπιδάτης (65) &c. and under the name of thunderer κεραυνός (66). This title of κεραυνός, is least common both in books and medals. It signifies merely descending, taken grammatically ; but custom has determined it to the action of thundering. The reader need but peruse the dissertation, which Burman published at Utrecht in 1700, and he will be convinced that this is the idea under which Jupiter κεραυνός was honoured. Not that it was thought he never came down upon the earth but only to punish and to hurl his thunder ; but it at last was judged proper to fix the signification of it, either because of the maxim à majori, or à nobiliori parte sumitur denominatio, or for other reasons. The French have said in one of their Operas :
4 Jupiter

(63) Lucian, in Timone, initio, pag. 57. tom. 1.

(64) Pausan lib. 1. cap. 37. pag. 90. lib. 2. cap. 9. pag. 132. and cap. 20. pag. 154.

(65) Idem, lib. 8. cap. 9. pag. 616.

(66) Idem, lib. 5. cap. 14. pag. 412.

some places where it is said that he required men to be sacrificed in his honour [K]. I shall take notice elsewhere (d), that in the book intitled, Cymbalum mundi, there are many jokes on the actions of Jupiter; but I know not whether it be possible to go farther than Arnobius on such a subject. The vivacity of his imagination rushes on like a flood; and having been but just before a professed Rhetorician, he animated his diction with colours and figures of every kind. I have cited some of his thoughts in various parts of this Dictionary; the reader may have seen elsewhere (e) the joke he past on the great Jupiter, for employing nine nights in getting a child, when he, in one night, got fifty young women with child. Probably his memory failed him, and he confounded matters. He had read that Jupiter employed nine nights in begetting the Muses [L]; and he applied this to a quite different subject, I mean to the adventurers of Alcmena. Authors of a lively fancy are pretty liable to such mistakes. Jupiter used to carry on his amours both in heaven and earth; he took the first who fell in his way, whether Goddess or woman, it was all the same to him. Arnobius did not forget this incident, and observed that the bodies of mortals, though quite transparent with respect to Jupiter's eye, had yet beauties sufficient to inspire him with a lewd passion [M]. It may be proper to observe, that the ridiculous stories which the Poets had published concerning this God, served

(d) In the article PERIERS.

(e) Citation (13) of the article HERCULES.

*Jupiter vient sur la terre Pour la combler de bienfaits :
Il est armé du tonnerre ;
Mais c'est pour donner la paix.*

“ On earth Jove comes, to shed numberless blessings ;
“ He's arm'd with thunder, but 'tis to give peace.

I do not know whether they borrowed that idea from ancient monuments.

[K] It is said that he required men to be sacrificed in his honour.] Few temples of Jupiter were more renowned than that which was built in his honour on mount Lycæus in Arcadia. The tradition of the country declared (68) that he had been brought up on that mountain by three nymphs, one whereof gave her name to a fountain which had a wonderful property; for whenever a long drought wasted the fruits of the earth, a plentiful rain never failed to descend, provided the priest of Jupiter Lycæus threw an oaken branch on the surfaces of that fountain, after the requisite prayers and sacrifices (69). On the same mountain was a court consecrated to the God in question, and famous for some very wonderful properties; all the men and beasts that went into it, casting no shade. All persons were forbid to set their feet in it; and if any one was so bold as to enter it, notwithstanding the prohibition, he necessarily died before the year was out. Arcas having pursued thither the boar into which his mother had been transformed, both would have been put to death, had not Jupiter taken them away, and lodged them among the stars. In silvis cum venaretur (Arcas) infelix vidit matrem in urse speciem conversam, quam interficere cogitans, persecutus est in Jovis Lycæi templum: quo & qui accessisset, mors parva erat Arcadam lege. Itaque cum utrunque necesse esset interfici, Jupiter eorum miseratus, ereptos inter sidera collocavit (70). The words of St. Austin, which I am going to transcribe, inform us of those particulars that relate to the sacrificing of children. Nominatim expressit (Varro) quandam Demænotum, quum gustasset de sacrificio, quod Arcades immolato puero deo suo Lycæo facere solebant, in lupum fuisse mutatum, & anno decimo in figuram propriam restitutum, ad pugillatum sese exercuisse, & Olympiaco vicisse certamine (71). i. e. “ Varro has named one Demænotus, who having tasted of the sacrifice, which the Arcadians used to offer up, to their God Lycæus, “ sacrificing a boy, was transformed into a wolf, and “ restored to his natural form ten years after; exercised himself in boxing, and conquered in the Olympic game.” This sacrifice must have a most strange effect, to metamorphose those who tasted of it into wolves. Porphyrius (72) observes, that the custom of sacrificing of men in Arcadia, during the feast of the Lupercalia, remained in his time. It may be observed by the way, that Saturn was not the only Deity who delighted in human victims (73). His son Jupiter was not willing to degenerate in that particular.

(68) Pausan. lib. 3. cap. 38. pag. 678.

(69) Idem, ibid.

(70) Hygin. in Astronomico, cap. 4. pag. m. 362. See also cap. 1. pag. 357.

(71) August. de Civitate Dei, lib. 18. cap. 17. pag. m. 589.

(72) Porphyr. lib. 1. de non edend. Animal.

(73) See Pensées diverses sur les Comètes, num. 69.

(74) Hesiod. in Scyth. ver. 135.

Τὴν ἐν Πιερίᾳ Κρονίῳ τῆος ἀνὰ μνήστρα Μνημοσύνην.

*Ἐνία γὰρ οἱ νύκτας ἐμνήστειτο παλιῖτα Ζεὺς,
Νόσθην ἀπ' ἀθανάτων, ἱερὸν λέχθ' ὑπανάβαινον
Ἄλλ' ὅτι δὴ β' ἡμεῖς ἐσμ', ἀπὸ δ' ἔτραπον ὄρας
Μητῶν φθινόντων, ἀπὸ δ' ἡμᾶς ἀλλά' ἐτελέσθη,
Ἢ δ' ἴτις ἐνὶ πύλαις ἀμύφρονος, ἦσαν αἰεὶ δὴ Μίμωλαι (75).*

(75) Idem, ibid. ver. 53.

“ Whom fair Mnemosyne, by Jove enjoy'd, “ Brought forth on mount Pierius

“ For nine nights Jove, apart from the immortals, “ Climb'd the bright bed, and wanton'd with the “ fair one.

“ She, when the sun had run its annual course,
“ Gave birth to the nine lovely tuneful sisters.

A Scholiast on Hesiod declares, that Mnemosyne was the daughter of Jupiter; but the words of this Poet are not to be understood in that manner; and we must not suppose, that they relate that the Muses sprung from so horrid an incestuous commerce. The Scholiast in question proposes a doubt to himself; how came it to pass, says he, that Hercules got fifty one sons in a single night; and that Jupiter required nine days to beget the nine Muses? He answers that Jupiter, not being ignorant that the love and pleasure of the Muses are slow in attaining to their perfection, was determined to make use of a perfect number. If this Scholiast does not deserve praise for the solidity of his reflections, he at least deserves applause for writing with so much brevity on a subject, which would have suggested to an Allegorist a numberless multitude of observations and moral precepts.

[M] Arnobius . . . observed that the bodies of immortals, though quite transparent with respect to Jupiter's eye, had yet beauties sufficient to inspire him with a lewd passion.] His adulterous practices, says he, might have been borne with, had they been with those of his own rank and quality, with Goddesses; but what could he find worthy of his regard in human bodies? Should he not have abhorred those objects, which lie beneath the skin, and are not hid from his piercing eye? Should not the sight occasion the same disgust in him, which the bare imagination can produce in all others? (76) Et tolerari forsitan maletractatio hæc posset, si cum saltem personis conjungeretur comparibus, & adulter à vobis immortalium constitueretur dearum. In humanis vero corporibus quidnam quæso inerat pulchritudinis, quid decoris, quod irritare, quod fixere oculos posset in se Jovis? Cætes, viscera, pituita, atque omnis illa proluvis intestinorum sub involucri constituta: quam non modo Linceus ille penetrabili acie possit horrescere, verum etiam quævis alter sola vel cogitatione vitare (77). O (77) Compare this with the Tunc animo signa quodcumque in corpore mendæ est. Of Ovid in Remedio Amoris ver. 417.

(76) Arnob. lib. 4. pag. m. 142.

(77) Compare this with the Tunc animo signa quodcumque in corpore mendæ est. Of Ovid in Remedio Amoris ver. 417.

served as a foundation to the Religion of the Heathens; and that some persons of a grave character endeavoured to explain them, either by allegories, or by the principles of natural Philosophy; but their endeavours were as ridiculous as that of the Poets [N], and terminated “ less sheep.” This objection of Arnobius is not a bad one, and is a thousand times stronger than if a great King was to be censured for intriguing and lying with, not only Princesses, but also with women from among the meanest of the populace. I shall here relate what Juno said to Thetis, in telling her the reasons or motives of the friendship she had for her.

Οὐκ οὐκ ἐκ ἑταρῆς ἀνὴρ Διὸς ἰεμέναια
 Λιζασθαί (κίον γὰρ αὐτὸ τὰδὲ ἑστᾶ μέμνηται Ἡσὶν ἀθανάταις ἢ θνητοῖσιν ἰαύουσιν). (78)

(78) Apollon.
 Argon. lib. 4.
 ver. 793. pag. m.
 453. 454.

“ Because you would not yield to Jove’s embraces;
 “ Jove, whose affection mortal nymphs and God“ dessex
 “ Long shar’d promiscuous.

[N] Some persons of a grave character endeavoured to explain the stories which the Poets had published, either by allegories, or by the principles of Natural Philosophy; but their endeavour was as ridiculous as that of the Poets.] We have seen above (79) how Cicero ridiculed Chryssippus the Philosopher, who had taken great pains to reconcile the fictions of the antient Poets with the theology of the Stoics. The following passage will serve as a specimen of that attempt. Hic locus à Zenone tractatus, post à Cleanthe, & Chryssippo pluribus verbis explicatus est. Num vetus hæc opinio Græciam opplevit, exsecratur Cælum à filio Saturno; vinculum autem Saturnum ipsum à filio Jove. Physica ratio non intelligens inclusa est in impiis fabulis. Cælestem enim altissimam, æthereamque naturam, id est, igneam, quæ per sese omnia gigneret, vacare voluerunt, eâ parte corporis, quæ conjunctione alterius egeret ad procreandum. Saturnum autem eum esse voluerunt, qui cursum, & conversionem spatiorum, ac temporum contineret. . . . Saturnus autem est appellatus, quod saturaretur annis: ex se enim natos comesse fingitur solitus, quia consumit etas temporum spatia, annisque præteritis insaturabiliter expletur. Vinculus est autem à Jove, ne immoderatos cursus haberet, atque ut eum siderum vinculis alligaret (80).

(79) Citi-
 on (49) of the article CHRY-SIPPUS the Philosopher.

(80) Cicero, de
 Natura Deorum,
 lib. 2. cap. 24,
 25.

“ This subject was treated by Zeno, afterwards
 “ by Cleanthes, and amply explained by Chryssippus:
 “ for all Greece was anciently of opinion, that Cælus
 “ was emasculated by his son Saturn, who was bound
 “ in chains by his son Jupiter. The prophane fables “ include an elegant physical meaning; it being in“ timated thereby, that the celestial, the highest, and “ etherial, that is the fiery nature, which produceth
 “ all things by itself, is void of that corporeal part,
 “ which requires the conjunction of another, in order “ for procreation. Saturna they affirmed to be that be“ ing, which contains the course and change or revo“ lution of spaces and times. The name (Saturn) is “ given him, because he is filled with years; he also “ is said to devour the children he begets, because “ age or time consumes its various periods, and is “ filled with such years as are past without being sa-“ tiated. He is bound in chains by Jupiter, to pre“ vent his going immoderate lengths, and to check “ him by the bands of the stars.” This is sufficient to “ shew the ridiculousness of these explications. We can“ not read them without having almost a contempt for “ those Philosophers who employ their time so ill; and “ if we deplore, on one hand, the ill consequences of “ the fictions of the Poets, and the unbounded licentious-“ ness with which they treated a subject that merited
 “ so much veneration; we are diverted, on the other “ hand, with the beauty of their fictions, whilst we con“ sider them as witty conceits. But when we see Philo“ sophers who, though of so grave and serious a cha“ racter, do nevertheless seek for mysteries in these fol“ lies, we can no longer bear with their extravagance,
 “ and apply the following sentence to them:

Turpe est difficile habere nugas,
 Et stultius est labor ineptiarum (81).

(81) Martial.
 Epigrammat. 86.
 lib. 2. cap. 25.

“ ’Tis shameful to employ our time in trifles,
 “ Which, the more difficult, are more ridiculous.

The greatest mischief is, that whilst they endeavoured to avoid one impiety, they have fallen into another; for, by rejecting the Gods of the Poets, animated and living Gods, they have substituted others, who had neither life nor sensation or knowledge. Cicero upbraids them with it as follows. Hic idem (Zeno) alio loco æthere Deum dicit esse, si intelligi potest nihil sentiens Deus, qui nunquam nobis occurrit neque in precibus, neque in optatis, neque in votis. Aliis autem libris rationem quamdam per omnem naturam rerum pertinentem, ut divinam, esse affectam putat. Idem astris hoc idem tribuit, tum annis, mensibus, annorumque mutationibus. Cùm verò Hesiodi Theogoniam interpretatur, tollit omnino æsthetas perceptasque cognitiones Deorum, neque enim Jovem, neque Junonem, neque Vestam, neque quendam qui ita appelletur, in Deorum habet numero; sed rebus inanimatis, atque mutis per quamdam significationem hæc docet tributa nomina (82). i. e. “ The same Zeno says, “ elsewhere, that the æther is God, if we can form “ to our imaginations a God wholly insensible, who “ never occurs to our prayers, our wishes, or our “ vows. However, in other books, he imagines, “ that a certain divine nature is diffused over the “ whole nature of things. The Philosopher in ques- “ tion ascribes the same thing to the stars, to years, “ months, and the changes of years. But when he “ would interpret the Theogony of Hesiod, he takes “ away all the common and received notions with re- “ gard to the Gods; he not permitting Jupiter, nor “ Juno, nor Vesta, nor any one so called to be ranked “ in the number of the Gods; but teaches, that these “ names are ascribed, in a certain signification, to in- “ animate and mute things.” They accustomed men, by these false interpretations, to suppose the azure skies over our heads to be Jupiter. Hunc Ennius nuncupat ita dicens,

(82) Cicero, de
 Natura Deorum,
 lib. 1. cap. 14.

Aspice hoc

Sublime candens, quem invocant omnes Jovem,

Planisque alio loco idem,

Cui, quod id me est, execrabor hoc, quo locet, quidquid est.

Hunc etiam Augures nostri, cùm dicunt, Jove fulgente, tonante: dicunt enim celo fulgente, tonante. Euripides autem, ut multa præclare, sic hoc breviter.

Vides sublime fufum, immoderatum æthera,
 Qui tenero terram circumjectu amplectitur:
 Hunc summum habeto Divùm: huic perhibeto Jo-vem (83).

(83) Idem, ibid.
 lib. 2. cap. 25.

“ Ennius mentions this as follows

— — — — — behold yon azure roof,
 “ Which all invoke as Jove — — — — —

“ And the abovementioned Poet, still plainer in ano“ ther place.

— — — — — “ be, what it will, that shines,
 “ I’ll curse it to the utmost of my power.

“ This is meant by our Augurs, when they say, Ju“ piter lightning, thundring, & they saying, the heaven “ or the skies lightning and thundring. Euripides, as “ he describes many things beautifully, so he does “ what follows with brevity:

“ Dost thou behold yon distant, boundless æther, “ Which quite surrounds this earth; ’tis the supreme
 “ Of Deities, ’tis mighty Jove himself.

With regard to Juno, they supposed her to be the air, as Cicero informs us. Aër autem, ut Stoici disputant, interjectus inter mare, & cælum, Junonis nomine consecratur, quæ est soror & conjux Jovis, quod & similitudo est ætheris, & cum eo summa conjunctio. Effeminarum autem eum, Junonique tribuerunt, quod nihil est eo mollius, terminated very frequently in serious impieties. Read the remark [N], where I shall speak of those who said that Jupiter was the Air, and Juno the Æther.

(84) Iidem, ibid. cap. 26.

Ilius (84). i. e. " But the air, as the Stoics assert, lying between the sea and sky or heaven, is consecrated by the name of Juno, who is Jupiter's wife and sister, because it resembles the æther, and is intimately united to it. But they effeminated it (if I may employ that expression) and ascribed it to Juno, because nothing can be softer than the element of the air." Whatever they might advance in this system, there was no possibility of avoiding absurdities and impious tenets, which I prove by asking these Philosophers some questions. You therefore think that the Jupiter of the Poets, and he who is adored in the capitol and all other places, is that vast space or expanse wherein we see so many stars; and that this Juno, Jupiter's sister and wife; that so jealous, haughty and powerful Deity, to whom the Argives and other nations paid so many honours, is the air which surrounds the earth, and gets into the lungs of animals, and where clouds, rain, &c. are formed; but is it not evident that this celestial expanse, and this air are a portion of the matter of the world; and that matter, considered as such, does not think? do we not know clearly, that the air is as void of life and sensation as snow and hail? If then Juno is nothing but the air, it is ridiculous to direct prayers and offer up sacrifices to it: for it does not hear or understand any thing; and therefore your doctrine directly overthrows religion; it is material Atheism; you divest Juno of all her divinity, you only leave her the vain and empty name of Goddess; and you are more absurd than Epicurus, in worshipping what is no more than an illusive and imaginary name. Juno is given here but as an example; but Jupiter and Neptune, and all the rest of the Deities fall after the same manner by the strength of the argument in question. If you say that you do not consider the air as a meer body, when you assert that Juno is the air; I must intreat you to tell me what other idea you entertain of it. Do you pretend to assert, that the air is united to the Goddess Juno; that she is the soul of it, and that he (the air) is as a body to that Goddess; but is not this supposing a sort of animal of which we have no idea? Does not the notion or idea of animal imply an assemblage of parts which form one entire continuum? Does it not exclude what is called discrete quantity? And is it not certain that the particles of air are perpetually separating one from the other; and that the smallest stone that is thrown breaks that continuity, which, if the earth were an animal, must be a grievous wound? To what inconveniences do you not make Juno's divinity obnoxious, in case you make her the soul of the air? Is not the incessantly receiving a numberless multitude of wounds? Should you be answer, that this Deity is united to the air, not to be its soul, but only to give activity or influence to it, you fall into another absurdity which is equally ridiculous as to say that a pilot is a ship, and a rider is a horse. If you answer that there is a wide difference between these things, since a pilot is not joined or united to the ship as Juno is to the air, I must desire you to explain what this union is, and observe how Aristotle puzzles you, when he says that it is irrational to conclude that air and fire are animals; but that in case they are indued with a soul, it is absurd to say they are not so. Weigh well the following words: Δια τίνος μὲν γὰρ αἰτίας ἐν τῷ αἵτι, ἢ ἐν τῷ πνεύματι ἐν ψυχῇ, ἢ αὐτῶν ζώων ἐν τῶν κινήσει, ἢ αὐτῶν βαλόντων ἐν ταύταις ἡμῶν ἀρχαῖς; ἐπιζητήσεως γὰρ αἰτίας, καὶ διὰ τίνα αἰτίας ἢ ἐν τῷ αἵτι ψυχῇ, τῆς ἐν τοῖς ζώοις βαλόντων ἐν καὶ ἀθανάτων. συμβαίνει ὁ ἀμφοτέρω ἀτρεπον καὶ παραλογον; καὶ γὰρ τὸ λέγειν ζῶον τὸ πνεύ, ἢ τὸν αἶρα, τῶν παραλογισμῶν ἐστὶ καὶ μὴ λέγειν ζῶα ψυχῆς ἰνύσει, ἀτρεπον (85), i. e. " For which reason, if a soul be in air, or fire, why does it not form an animal as it does in mixt natures, particularly since it seems to be more excellent in them? Any one may also ask the reason, wherefore that soul, which is in the air, is of a more noble and durable nature, than that with which animals are informed. Something absurd and irrational results in either of these cases; for to advance that fire or air is an animal, is no ways rational; and again, to affirm that they are not animals, if they are indued with a soul, is certainly extremely absurd." You are here between two precipices: if Juno be the soul of the air, and she and the air do not form one animal, it is an intolerable absurdity; and if they form one animal, it is a horrid absurdity and impiety. Carneades, with that strength of reason which was his peculiar characteristic, refused invariablely the pretended existence of this sort of animal (86).

I will conclude with an observation which Pausanias furnishes me with. He relates that he disputed one day with a Sidonian. He relates that he disputed this man asserted, that the Phenicians were much more skillful than the Greeks in those subjects which relate to the Deity, and in others likewise. They say, added he, that Æsculapius is the son of Apollo, and do not relate that a woman brought him into the world; for he is the air, the fountain of health both for men and beasts. Apollo, who is the sun, is directly considered as Æsculapius's father, since by the vicissitude of the seasons, which his motion occasions, he makes the air healthy. Pausanias granted all this; but he asserted that they did not belong to the Phenicians more than to the Greeks; and that it is evident even to children, that the health of men is owing to the sun's motion (87). By this the reader may judge of the orthodoxy of the Heathens. Those who pretend to be best acquainted with theological doctrines, made it appear, when they expressed themselves clearly, that they acknowledged no other Gods but the air, the stars, &c. This, in the main, was a real Atheism; it was converting the necessity of nature into God. I have observed a passage in Euripides, where Jupiter is invoked; without exactly knowing what he is. It is confessed that he governs, by occult methods, all things justly; but the person who delivers these words adds, that it is extremely difficult to know him; and that he cannot say whether he be the necessity of nature, or human understanding. What a faith is this! A follower of Spinoza would sign it with very few alterations.

Ὁ γῆς ὄχημα, καὶ τῆς γῆς ἔχων ἴδιον,
Ὅς τις ἀπ' ἐν δούρατος οὐκ ἰδίῃαι
Ζεὺς, ἢτ' ἀνάγνη φύσεως, εἴτε τῆς βροτῶν,
Προσβαίμεν σε πάλαι γὰρ δι' αἴθερα
Βαίον καλύπτει, καὶ δίκην τὰ δῖατ' ἄγεις (88).

The Sense is,
" O vehicle of earth, residing on it,
" Who'ere thou be, inscrutable to us,
" Necessity of nature, or men's minds,
" O Jupiter, I invoke thee; thou who guid'st
" Mens actions right, thro' fate's still hidden paths,

(85) Aristotel. de Anima, lib. 1. cap. 5. pag. m. 485. tom. 1. Opera.

(86) See his Arguments in Cicero, Book 3. cap. 17. de Nat. Deor.

(87) Extracted from Pausanias, lib. 7. cap. 23. pag. 583.

(88) Heraclea apud Euripidem in Troadibus, vet. 884. pag. m. 107.

JUSTINIANI (AUGUSTINO), Bishop of Nebbio in the island of Corfica, was born at Genoa in 1470. He entered among the Dominicans the 25th of April 1487; and applied himself so assiduously to his studies, and learnt under such able preceptors, that he became a very great scholar. He was well skilled in Philosophy, the Mathematics, Divinity, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic and Chaldee. He taught during eighteen years in the Province of Lombardy, to the great edification of his hearers. He was appointed Bishop of Nebbio the 15th of November 1514, at the recommendation of Cardinal Bandinello Saoli his cousin; and received his bulls before he was informed of the good offices this Cardinal had done him. He assisted at the Lateran Council, and objected to some articles of the Concordate agreed upon between the Courts of France and Rome; notwithstanding which Francis I prevailed with him to come to Paris, and appointed him his Chaplain. He made use of the great knowledge of this Prelate, in order to establish establish the study of the Oriental Tongues in the University of Paris. Justiniani being at so small a distance from England made a voyage thither, and was most graciously received by Henry VIII. He collected a very fine Library, and left it, by his will, to the Republic of Genoa [A]. He made many reparations in his See; increased its revenues; and so finely embellished his Cathedral, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, that Maracci has ranked him among her faithful servants. He also translated into the vulgar tongue some Latin works, the study whereof might be of use to Ecclesiastics (a). He was cast away in his passage from Genoa to the island of Corfica in 1536 (b) [B]. This Prelate was not only a learned man, but also extremely laborious, as appears from the works he composed, and those he caused to be printed [C]. I mention these in a note. He intended to publish a Polyglot Bible, whereof the Psalter he published may be considered as a part. He was at great expence for the edition in question; but finding that he could not get his money by the sale, and that crowned heads did not favour his design, he complained of the ingratitude of his age [D].

(a) Trasportando ancora da Latino in volgare de libri per giovamento del suo Clero. Abbot Michael Justiniani, ubi infra, pag. 17.

(b) Extracted from Abbot Michael Justiniani, gli Scrittori Liguri descritti. pag. 16, & seq.

KECKERMAN

[A] He collected a very fine library, and left it by his will to the Republic of Genoa. It was chiefly valuable on account of the great number of ancient manuscripts in all kinds of languages and faculties, which he had collected with prodigious pains and at a very great expence. But some had come to him without any expence or trouble, I mean those which Andreolo Justiniani, his grandfather, had left him. It is remarkable that this Republic did not receive any advantage by our author's will; these manuscripts being found only in the libraries of some private persons, who to hide their thefts, took out from the frontispiece the marks, by which our prelate used to distinguish such pieces as belonged to him. Benche al presente non si trovi verun vestigio di essi nel Palazzo publico, ma presso diversi particolari, che, per non esser scoperti, gli han levati nel frontispicio i contrafigni di quel buon Vecchio (1).

(1) Michael Justiniani, gli Scrittori Liguri descritti, pag. 18.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. lib. 3. cap. 12. pag. 681.

(4) Paulus Jovius, Eleg. cap. 120. pag. 275.

[B] He was cast away . . . in 1536 [Abbot Michael Justiniani (2) pretends to prove this by the register of the Dominicans at Genoa, and from the Bishopric of Nebbio's being given to Cardinal Jerom Doria the 15th of November 1536. Vossius affirms (3), that it is not known whether Justiniani was cast away, or was taken by Pyrates; that it is only certain, that he was never seen since the year 1530, when he embarked to go from Genoa to his Bishopric. I do not doubt but that he is mistaken with respect to the year. Paulus Jovius says in general, that it was never known whether this Bishop was shipwreck'd, or whether he was taken by the Corsairs of Barbary. In cursu fluctibus obrutus, aut à Pænis prædonibus interceptus creditur, quum nullum usquam naufragii, aut piratarum prædæ vestigium apparuerit (4).

[C] The works he composed, and those he caused to be printed. His Precatio pietatis plena ad Deum omnipotentem composita ex duobus & septuaginta nominibus divinis Hebraicis, & Latinis cum interprete commentariolo, was printed at Venice anno 1513 in 8vo. He published there the same year Æneæ Platonici de immortalitate animorum deque corporum resurrectione aureus Libellus, cui titulus est Theophrastus. He published at Paris in 1520, folio, Chalcidii viri clarissimi luculenta Timæi Platonis Traductio, & ejusdem argutissima explanatio; as likewise Historia Porcbeti adversus impios Hebræos, in qua sum ex sacris litteris, tum ex dictis Talmud, ac Cabalistarum & aliorum omnium Auctorum quos Hebræi recipiunt, monstratur veritas Catholice fidei; moreover Rabi Mossæi Ægyptii Dux seu Director dubitantium aut perplexorum. He spent five years with extreme application in writing a History of Genoa, but death prevented his putting the last hand to it. It was published in 1537 (5). It is said that his manuscript was interpolated in several places by the person who put it to press. Scrisse gl' Annali della sua patria, con grandissima diligenza, e ottima fedeltà, i quali in molti luoghi dopo la morte di lui furono corrotti (6). Such is the testimony of Francis Zazzera, and here follows a confirmation of it by George Justiniani, in an Epistle Dedicatory. Magnum profecto inde me voluptatem cepisse fateor, & in eodem plane sensu fuisse gaudeo ipsius nennianus, in Epist. ad Nebiensem Pontificatum evectus, rerum nostrarum Annales orditus est, quos post ejus obitum imperitus, omnique eruditionis expertus, horridos sane & incultos, ut botie leguntur, ex defuncti scabæis evulgavit (7). i. e. "I own that I received great pleasure from it, and am glad that Augustino Justiniani his grandson was of the same opinion, the person I mean, who being afterwards made Bishop of Nebbio, began to write the transactions of our country, which, after his death, an unskilful and altogether unlearned man published, from the manuscripts of the deceased, in the barbarous, unpolished dress in which they are now seen." These interpolations in the manuscript gave Paulus Jovius occasion to censure this History (8); but he is in the wrong to say, that the author was too eager in publishing it, it not being published till after the death of our Justiniani. The expressions employed by Paulus Jovius are very injurious. Scribende patriæ historia negotium suscepit, adeo ineptis ad id ingenii viribus, ut præcipitata editionis, male audiendo, pænas daret (9). i. e. "He set about writing the history of his own country, but had such small abilities for this undertaking, that he injured his reputation by a hasty edition." I shall mention below what relates to his Polyglot. Here follows a passage extracted from his life written by himself, wherein the reader will see a specimen of his labours. Hò fatto imprimere in Parigi dodici opere in utilità de studiosi: hò tradotto piu cose in materna lingua per utilità di Chierici della mia Diocesi, che sono tutti ignari di lettere: hò tradotto l'Economico di Senofonte per instruzione di mix cognata, e de miei nepoti: hò descritto molio minutamente l'Isola di Corfica per utilità della patria intitolata al Principe Andrea d'Oria, e messa poi la descrizione in distinta pittura hò donato al magnifico Ufficio di S. Giorgio 100. i. e. "I have printed at Paris twelve pieces for the instruction of youth: I have translated several pieces into Italian, for the use of the Clergy of my Diocese, who are all unlearned: I have translated Xenophon's Oeconomicks, for the instruction of my kinswoman and nephews: I have described very minutely the island of Corfica, for the service of my country, inscribed to Prince Andrew d'Oria, and afterwards presented that description to the office of St. George." The last work mentioned in the Italian paragraph above is in the library of the Vatican, and is a manuscript.

(5) At Genoa in folio.

(6) Francesco Zazzera, apud Abbatem Michael Justiniani, gli Scrittori Liguri descritti, pag. 19.

(7) Georg. Justinianus, in Epist. Dedicat. Æneæ Platonici de immortalitate Animæ, apud Mich. Justinian. ibid. pag. 19, 20.

(8) Michel Justiniani, ibid. pag. 17.

(9) Paul. Jovius, Eleg. cap. 120. pag. 275.

(10) Aug. Justiniani, in his Life. It was inserted in his Annals of Genoa. See Abbot Michael Justiniani, gli Scrittori Liguri descritti, pag. 20.

[D] The Psalter he published. . . He complained of the ingratitude of his age. It was printed at Genoa anno 1616, in folio, and in eight columns, Quarum prima habet Hebræam editionem, secunda Latinam interpretationem respondentem Hebrææ de verbo ad verbum, tertia Latinam communem, quarta Græcam, quinta Arabicam, sexta paraphrasin, sermone quidem Chaldeo, sed litteris Hebraicis conscriptam: septima Latinam respondentem Chaldeæ, ultima vero, id est octava, continet scholia, hoc est annotationes sparsas & intercisas (11). i. e. "The first whereof has the Hebrew edition or text; the second a literal Latin version of the Hebrew; the third the common Latin; the fourth the Greek; the fifth the Arabic, the sixth the paraphrase in the Chaldee language, but written in Hebrew characters or letters; the seventh the Latin answering the Chaldee; but the eighth or last, contains the scholia, that is; scattered annotations." The author, in his dedication of this piece to Pope Leo X, tells him that he designs to give the whole scriptures after that manner; and that he does not doubt but he shall complete his undertaking, provided his Holiness will but approve of it, and promote the impression. This is the sense of the Latin words following (12). Quod si tu rem ipsam probaveris, & dignam editione duxeris, in promptu erit nobis universo operi manum extremam imponere, & utrunque instrumentum, iisdem distinctum

(11) Gesner, in Biblioth. folio 104 verso.

(12) August. Justiniani, Præf. Psalter. opud Gesner. in Biblioth. folio 105.

linguis, eademque serie & structura tradere impressoribus formandum &c. He informed Cardinal Bendinello Saoli, by letter, that all the New Testament was completed; and that the Old Testament would be soon ready; and he intreated him to get the whole work printed. In altera quoque epistola ad eundem, novum testamentum jam absolutum esse testatur, vetus autem brevi futurum paratum, & hortatur ut curet to-tum opus prælis excudi (13). He gave leave to Pellican, who was at Rome in 1517, to copy the preface of his New Testament in eight languages, with the first verses of St. Matthew's Gospel (14). Gesner affirms (15) that he saw it, and the two letters which Justiniani wrote to that Cardinal. He has even inserted part of this preface in his Bibliothèque. This well-meaning Prelate was at a great expence for the impression of the Psalter; he caused two thousand and fifty copies to be printed of it; and presented it to all the Princes in the world, both infidel and Christian. He had fifty copies taken off in vellum, Justiniani not only flattered himself with the hopes of gaining great applause, but also great profit, which he, beforehand, designed to set apart for the relief of his relations.
He flattered himself with the hopes, that the success of his specimen would prompt Prelates and Monarchs to contribute towards the impression of the whole Bible; but unfortunately he gained nothing but praise.
His Psalter was applauded, but not bought. It was with great difficulty he got the fourth part of his copies sold; and his circumstances would not enable him to print the remainder of his work. Here follows

Justiniani's complaints. Feci stampare in Genova all'è (16) August.
mie spese con quel travaglio e con quella spesa, ch'ogni Justiniani, in the letterato può giudicare due mila volumi del Davidico Life, cited by Psalterio in le predette cinque lingua Hebraea, Chaldaea, Lancelot di Pe-Greca, Latina, & Arabica, parendomi di quest' opera rugia, Horgidi, dover' acquistare grand laude, e non mediocre guadagno, Part 1. Disin- il quale pensavo esporre in la sovventione di certi mei ganno, 27. pag.
parenti, ch'erano bisognosi, credendomi sempre che l'opera 73, 274.
doveffi havere grande uscita, e che i prelati ricchi, ò Principi si doveffero muovere, e mi doveffero ajutare in la spesa di far imprimere li restante della Bibbia in quella varietà di lingue; ma la credulità mia restò ingannata, perchè l'opera fù da ciaschedun laudata, ma lassata riposare, e dormire, perchè a pena si sono venduti la quarte parte de i libri, come che l'opera sia per valent' huomini, e per ingegni elevati, che sono al mondo rari, e pochi, e con stento puoi ricavar i danari, ch' haveva poste in la stampa che furono in buona quan-tità, perchè oltre i dua mila volumi stampati in papero, ne feci imprimere cinquanta in carta vitellina, e mandai d'essi à libri à tutti i Rè del Mondo, co' Christiani, come Pagani. Paulus Jovius is so hard hearted as not to pity Justiniani's ill success; but even takes a pleasure in insulting him on that account; and will not even allow that he was applauded by the public.
He declares that our honest Bishop was at a great expence, and did not reap either profit or glory by it.
Gravi quidem sumptu & tenui cum laude quum impressa domi præalta volumina emptores rarissimos inveni- (17) Jovius, E-rent, sic ut temere conceptam spem lucri inanes initiæ ra- logior. cap. 120.
tiones eluserint (17). pag. 275.

(13) Gesner. ibid.(14) Idem, ibid.(15) Ibid.

KECKERMAN

K.

(a) Konig places his birth under the year 1571, his death in 1609. Vossius, de Scient. Mathemat. pag. 262 tells us, that he lived two and forty years.

KECKERMAN (BARTHOLOMEW) a native of Dantzick, was Professor of Philosophy there about the beginning of the seventeenth Century. He had been before Professor of the Hebrew Language at Heidelberg. He wrote a great number of books, in which he shews more method than genius [A]. He died in 1609, at thirty eight years of age (a). His books are full of plagiarisms, and have been well pillaged by plagiaries [B].

[A] He wrote a great number of books, in which he shews more method than genius. He composed systems of almost all the sciences. Here is the judgment, which Vossius made of him: Parum idoneè judicat de eo (Diogene Laertio) vir ceteroquin eruditus, sed novellorum scriptorum quam antiquitatis studiosior Bartholomæus Keckermannus. At ille libro suo de Historiâ, scripsisse Laertium languidè & frigidè, sæpe tamen non inutilitè. Quæ frigida profecto laus est operis utilissimi & auro contra non cari. Quippe ex quo discere fit cum alia tam multa ad historiam temporum pertinentia, tum præclara tot veterum apophthegmata, quorum Keckermannus, malo sane exemplo, Erasmus laudare mavult autorem, quam Plutarchum, Laertium, & similes (1). i. e. "Bartholomew Keckerman, a man in other respects learned, but more conversant in modern writers than in antiquity, passes a very wrong judgment upon Diogenes Laertius. For in his treatise concerning History he says, that Laertius has written laughingly and coldly, but often usefully; which is a cold commendation of a work of great use and value; since we may learn from it many particulars relating to History, and excellent apophthegms of the ancients, for which Keckerman, setting an ill example, chooses to quote Erasmus, rather than Plutarch, Laertius, and other writers of that rank."

(1) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 223.

[B] His books are full of plagiarisms, and have been well pillaged by Plagiaries. I have mentioned before (2) the complaint of a Scots writer, who had been pillaged by Keckerman. Another Scots writer (3) did quite the contrary; he pillaged Keckerman: it is Thomasius, who remarks this in his collection of Plagiaries (4). He accuses (5) some other writers of the same crime with regard to Keckerman.

(2) In the remark [B] of the article DO-NALDSON.

(3) Named Andrew Axiu.

(4) Numero 349. pag. 153.

(5) Ibid. numero 351.

KEILL (JOHN), an eminent Astronomer and Mathematician in the eighteenth Century, was born in Scotland about the year 1671, and educated in Baliol College in the University of Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor and Master of Arts; and was afterwards invited to Christ Church by Dr. Henry Aldrich, Dean of that College. About the year 1709 he went to New England as Treasurer to the Palatines; and soon after his return thence, upon the death of Mr. Caswel, Savilian Professor of Astronomy in Oxford, he was chosen to succeed him. He was likewise appointed Decipherer to Queen Anne, and continued in that place under King George I. till about the year 1716. He published several works [A], and died August the 31st 1721, aged fifty years. He had the degree of

[A] He published several works. I. An Examination of Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth: with some Remarks on Mr. Whiston's New Theory of the Earth. Oxford, 1698 in 8vo. A second edition of this book was published at London 1734 in 8vo. In answer to this there was published, Reflections on the Theory of the Earth; and A Defence of Mr. Whiston's New Theory. This occasioned our author to publish, II, An Examination of the Reflections on the Theory of the Earth. Together with a Defence of the Remarks on Mr. Whiston's New Theory. London 1699 in 8vo. In answer to this Mr. Whiston wrote A second Defence of his New Theory from the Exceptions of Mr. Keill and others. III. Introductio ad veram Physicam: seu Lectiones Physicæ habitæ in Scholâ Naturalis Philosophiæ Academiæ Oxoniensis, Anno Dom. 1700. Quibus accedunt Theorematum Hugenianorum de Vi Centrifugâ & Motu Circulari Demonstrationes. Autore Johanne Keill. M. D. R. S. S. Oxford 1701 in 8vo. In the preface he observes, that tho' Mechanical Philosophy was then in repute, and had many followers, yet in most of their writings scarce any thing was to be found besides the bare name of it; and that instead of it, the Philosophers had introduced the figures, pores and interstices of corpuscles, which they never saw; and speak of the intestine motion of the parts, of the struggles and conflicts between the Alkali and Acid, with a variety of such other miraculous effects of the Materia Subtilis. He then shews the absurdity of the Cartesian hypothesis about gravitation; and observes, that the occasion of all the errors, which have crept into Philosophy, has been this, that men wholly ignorant of Geometry have presumed to turn Philosophers, and to give an account of the causes of natural things. For, says he, what can be expected besides conjectures and amusements from those men, who have neglected Geometry, the foundation of all Natural Philosophy, and without knowing the powers of nature, which are only to be estimated by Geometry, have yet ventured to explain the operations of it by a method wholly inconsistent with the rules of mechanism? But though so many have embraced the shadow instead of the substance of Philosophy, yet he observes, that there are some, who bestowed their labour with great success in searching out the true laws of nature, and discovering the causes of things by mechanical principles. Among these he reckons Archimedes, Roger Bacon, Cardan, Galileo, Boyle, Wallis, with others, but above all the incomparable Newton. In the first lecture he treats of the method of Philosophizing; and takes notice of several sorts of Philosophers, who have written of Natural Philosophy; viz. 1. Those, who explained the nature of things by the properties of numbers and Geometrical figures; such as the Pythagoreans and Platonists. 2. The Aristotelians, who explained natural Philosophy by matter and forms, by privations, elementary virtues, occult qualities, sympathies and antipathies, &c. 3. Experimental Philosophers, who have endeavoured by sensible representations to make known to us the properties and actions of all bodies; and to the industry of these, he says, Philosophy is greatly indebted for many advantages. 4. The last sort of Natural Philosophers are the Mechanical, who undertake to explain the Phænomena of nature by the laws and rules of mechanism, such as matter and motion, the various figure and contexture of the parts, subtile particles, and the like. From each of these ways of Philosophizing our author takes what is most proper for his purpose; and in order to avoid all error in treating of Philosophy, prescribes himself three rules. As first, he tells us, it is necessary, according to the method of Geometricians, to lay down such definitions as are requisite for the understanding of things. Secondly, in searching after truth in Natural Philosophy, it will be of use to consider the qualities of things only as they are at first laid down, abstracted from all others whatsoever. Thirdly, it will be necessary to begin with the most simple cases, and when they are once established, of Doctor of Physic conferred upon him by the University of Oxford at the public Act in 1713; and he had been many years Fellow of the Royal Society. He left one son by his wife, whom he married about the year 1717. He was the first who read Lectures upon Experimental Philosophy in Oxford. Some have ascribed to him An Essay established, to proceed to those, which are more compounded. In the second lecture he treats of the solidity and extension of body, which he defines to be an extended, solid, and moveable substance. In the third lecture he treats of the divisibility of magnitudes; and in the fourth answers some objections urged against it by Epicurus, and his followers, the Atomists. In the fifth he discourses of the subtilty of matter, and those minute particles, into which matter may be actually divided. In the sixth he treats of motion, time, and place; and in the seventh gives several definitions concerning motion. The first edition of this book contained only fourteen lectures, but in the second edition printed at Oxford 1705 in 8vo he added a fifteenth or sixteenth, which treat of the motions arising from given forces; for what he had said in the former edition related to motion in general. True and genuine Physics consisting chiefly in the explication of these motions, and in giving an account of the Phenomena, which arise from thence, our author begins with the simplest, viz. that force, which is always directed uniformly, and still with the same tenor towards the same point, such as the gravitating force is commonly supposed to be. These lectures have been translated into English, and printed at London in 8vo. IV. Introductio ad veram Astronomiam, seu Lectiones Astronomicæ habite in Scholâ Astronomicâ Academiæ Oxoniensis. Authore Joanne Keill, M. D. Astronomiæ Professore Saviliano, R. S. S. Oxford 1718 in 8vo. This was translated into English by Dr. Keill himself, and published with many emendations at London 1721 in 8vo under the following title. An Introduction to the true Astronomy: or Astronomical Lectures, read in the Astronomical Schools of the University of Oxford. In the preface he discourses of the uses of Astronomy, and gives us the history of it, and observes, that as the art of sailing does, in a great measure, depend on the knowledge of the stars, so the impetuous and ambitious desires of Kings and Princes to discover unknown and foreign countries, inclined them to cultivate Astronomy. The first and chief of all the sailors was Neptune, who, upon the account of his skill in this art, was celebrated as God of the ocean. His son Belus, being an Astronomer, by his knowledge therein, carried the inhabitants of Libya into Asia, where he instituted Colleges of Astronomers; for Diodorus Siculus (1) writes thus: "It is reported, that the Egyptian Belus, the son of Neptune and Libya, brought a Colony to Babylon, and there he instituted Priests, whom the Babylonians call Chaldeans; who, after the manner of the Egyptians, were to observe the Stars." Before his time, there was Atlas King of Mauritania, a great Astronomer, who first shewed the doctrine of the Sphere. And therefore Virgil introduces Jopas singing what Atlas had taught mankind;

ON

(1) Lib. 1.

—Docuit quæ maximus Atlas,

Hic canit errantem Lunam Solisque Labores (2).

(2) Æneid. lib. 1.

So Uranus, King of the country situated on the shore of the Atlantic ocean, for his skill in Astronomy, is said to have been defended from the Gods. Zoroaster, a Persian Philosopher, is celebrated by all antiquity as a skilful Astronomer. And the dignity of this science was esteemed so great, as to be called the Royal Science, because Kings were most delighted with it above all others. For the Kings of Africa and Syria first invented and improved it, and that long before it was known in Greece. This Plato acknowledges in his Dialogue called Epinomis. The first, says he, who observed these things, was a Barbarian, who lived in an antient country, where, upon the account of the clearness of the summer season, they could first discover them, such as Egypt and Syria, where the stars are clearly seen, there being neither rains nor clouds to hinder their prospect. And because we are more remote from this summer clearness of weather than the Barbarians, we came later to the knowledge of these stars. So Lucian tells us, "that the Ethiopians first took notice of "the heavenly motions, and by finding the causes of "the lunations, they knew that the moon had no "proper light of its own, but borrowed it from the "sun." However, it is certain, that Astronomy, from the very beginning, was cultivated and improved by the Eastern nations. For if we may believe Porphry, when Alexander took Babylon, Callisthenes, at the desire of Aristotle, carried from that city the observations of 1903 years, which brings the beginning of these observations to 115 years after the flood, and 15 years after the building of Babel. Pliny in his Natural History relates, that Epigenes affirmed, that the Babylonians had observations of 720 years all engraved upon bricks. And Achilles Tattius, in the beginning of his Introduction to Aratus's Phenomena, informs us, "that the Egyptians were the first, who measured the "heavens and the earth; and their science in this "matter was engraven on columns, and by that means "delivered to posterity. Yet the Chaldeans take the "honour of the invention to themselves, and ascribe "it to Belus." The Greeks had all their Astronomical Learning from Egypt; for Diogenes Laertius owns, that Thales, Pythagoras, Eudoxus, and many others went to that country to be instructed in the Sideral science. These men were not only the first, but the greatest Philosophers whom Greece produced. And from the same writer we know, that they, who staid longest in that country, were most famous for their skill in Geometry and Astronomy, after they returned home. So Pythagoras, who lived in society, with the Egyptian Priests seven years, and was initiated into their religion, carried home from thence, besides several Geometrical inventions, the true system of the universe, and was the first, who taught in Greece, that the earth and planets turned round the sun, which was immoveable in the center; and that the diurnal motion of the sun and fixed stars was not real, but apparent, arising from the motion of the earth round its axis. At that time no body was esteemed a Philosopher, but who was well acquainted with the Mathematical Sciences. But these Sciences were soon neglected by the Philosophers, who came after them, and in who much degenerating from their Predecessors, had so little care and concern for the Mathematical Sciences, especially Astronomy, that of all the observations of eclipses for the space of near 2000 years, which were sent from Babylon by Callisthenes, Ptolemy could recover but a very few, the rest being lost by the negligence and want of skill of those men, who should have preserved them. For these pretenders to Philosophy having no concern for the useful parts of it, spent their time about trifles and disputes of no value, and endeavouring to find out sophisms, whereby they might impose upon their own and the common sense of all mankind; such were Zeno's arguments against motion, and most of the Philosophers disputations against the divisibility of matter in infinitum; whereas a little knowledge of Geometry would easily have solved all the difficulties they could raise. But though Astronomy was thus banished out of the schools of the common Philosophers, yet it was received and cultivated by some, though but a few, especially by the Pythagorean sect, which flourished in Italy many years; among whom was Philolaus and Aristarchus Samius. The Ptolemies, Kings of Egypt, were also great patrons of learning; they founded an Academy for Astronomy at Alexandria, which furnished several great men, the chief of whom was Hipparchus, who, according to Pliny, undertook a business, which would have been a great work to a God to perform, that is, to number the stars, and leave the heavens for an heritage to all that come after. This man foretold the eclipses of both sun and moon for 600 years; and upon his observations is founded that valuable work of Ptolemy, which he calls his Μεγάλη Σύνταξις, or his Great Construction; for from them he gathered the precession of the equinoxes, and the theory of the planets. When Egypt was conquered by the Saracens, and Alexandria reduced under their jurisdiction, the conquerors received Astronomy, with the rest of the Liberal Arts, under their on the Usefulness of Mathematical Learning, in a Letter from a Gentleman in the City to his Friend in Oxford; printed at Oxford 1701 in 8vo, pagg. 57. But others upon better grounds affirm, that it was written by Dr. John Arbuthnot.

their protection; and took care, that most part of the books concerning the liberal arts and sciences should be translated from the Greek into their own Arabian language. The Saracens passing from Africa into Spain, and having a commerce with the western European nations, imparted to them the science of Astronomy, which before was almost lost in Europe. So that about the year 1230, at the command of the Emperor Frederic, Ptolemy's Almagest, or his Great Synaxis, was translated from the Arabic into Latin. After that time, Astronomy received many improvements from the patronage of the greatest Princes, and the labours of the most celebrated Philosophers; among whom, in the first place is to be named Alphonfus King of Castile, who is never to be forgotten on the account of Astronomical Tables called after his name. Nicholas Copernicus was not only a diligent observer, but also a restorer of the antient Pythagorean system. Prince William, Landgrave of Hesse, who procured quadrants and sextants much larger than what were formerly used, to observe the true places of the stars, and whose observations were published by Snellius. Sir Henry Savile, skillful both in Astronomy and Geometry, who founded two Professorships for those sciences at Oxford. Tycho Brahe, superior in skill to all that went before, who published a catalogue of seven hundred fixed stars, which he had diligently observed. John Kepler, who by the help of Tycho's labours found out the true system of the world, and the laws observed by the celestial bodies in their motions. Galileo, who first applied a telescope to the heavens, and by means of it discovered the satellites of Jupiter, and their motions; the various phases of Saturn; the increase and decrease of the light of Venus; the mountainous and uneven surface of the moon; the spots of the sun; and the revolution of the sun about its own axis. John Hevelius, who has given us a catalogue of the fixed stars much larger than Tycho's, composed from his own observations. Huygens and Cassini, who first saw the satellites of Saturn, and discovered his ring. Gaffendi, Horrox, Bullialdus, Ward, Ricciolus, Flamsteed, and many other eminent Astronomers. "But "we have one here, adds Dr. Keill, who on account of his great merits in Astronomy, does excel them all, that is, the most learned Dr. Edmund Halley, Savilian Professor of Geometry in this University, my most friendly colleague; to whose labours Astronomy owes many great improvements. In him there shines out together (which I know not, if they are to be found in any other person to such a degree) the greatest dexterity in practical Astronomy, and a most profound and exquisite skill in Geometry; which will appear by his Astronomical Tables, which he is shortly to publish; for they will far exceed all others, that ever were or perhaps ever will be published." He also gives a very great character of Sir Isaac Newton, whom he styles a genius of a divine nature. V. Joannis Keill M. D. & R. S. S. in Academia Oxoniensi Astronomiae Professoris, Epistola ad Virum Clarissimum Joannem Bernoulli in Academia Basiliensi Mathematicum Professore. London, 1720, in 4to, pagg. 28. VI. Of the Laws of Attraction; printed in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 315. VII. De Legibus Virium Centripetarum: printed in the same Transactions, No. 317. VIII. Problematis Kepleriani de inveniendis vero Motu Planetarum, Areas temporis proportionales in Orbibus Ellipticis circa Focus alterum describentium, solutio Newtoniana: a D. J. Keill, Astronomiae Profess. Savil. Oxon. & R. S. S. demonstrata & exemplis illustrata: printed in the same Transactions, No. 337. IX. Joannis Keill, M. D. &c. Observationes in ea, quae edidit celeberrimus Geometra Johannes Bernoulli in Commentariis Physico-Mathematicis Parisiensibus Ann. 1710. de inverso Problemate Virium Centripetarum; & ejusdem Problematis solutio nova: printed in the same Transactions, No. 340. X. In 1715 he published at Oxford in 8vo, Euclidis Elementorum Libri priores sex, item undecimus & duodecimus; ex versione Latinae Frederici Commandini. To which he added, Trigonometriae Planae & Sphaericae Elementa. Item Tractatus de Naturâ & Arithmetica Logarithmorum. In usum Juventutis Academicæ.

T.

KEILL (JAMES), an eminent Physician, and brother of the preceding, was born in Scotland about the year 1673, and having travelled abroad, read Lectures of Anatomy with great applause in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, by the latter of which he had the degree of Doctor of Physic conferred upon him. In 1700 he settled at Northampton, where he had very considerable practice as a Physician. He published several works [A], and died at Northampton of a cancer

[A] He published several works.] In 1698 he translated into English Lemery's Chemistry. The sixth edition of his Anatomy was printed at London 1718. In the Philosophical Transactions, No. 306, he published An Account of the Death and Dissection of John Bayles of Northampton, reputed to have been 130 Years old; and in No. 361, De Viribus Cordis Epistola. In 1708 he published at London in 8vo, An Account of Animal Secretion, the Quantity of Blood in the human Body, and Muscular Motion. He afterwards gave a Latin translation of this Book, to which he subjoin'd a Medicina Statica, with tables, never published by any Writer before. In the preface to this treatise he observes, that Diseases being purely disorders of the Animal Oeconomy, whatsoever can add any new light to our knowledge of this, must necessarily clear the nature of those, establish the practice of Physick upon a surer foundation, and enable Physicians to make truer and more certain judgments in most Cases; and that if the animal oeconomy were perfectly understood, and the history of Diseases exactly known, the right method of curing each disease might evidently and certainly be deduced. Whence it follows, that when the history of a disease is exactly known, if the right method of curing it cannot be deduced, it must be because the animal oeconomy is not understood. He concludes his Preface with remarking, that the Vis attractrix, which he supposes to take place in animal secretion, was asserted by the most famous antient physicians, as Hippocrates and Galen, as well as the gravitation of the heavenly bodies one towards another was known to the best antient Philosophers, as well as to Kepler and Sir Isaac Newton. Upon the subject of Animal Secretion, and in explaining the manner how the fluids of the animal body are separated from the blood, Dr. Keill undertakes to shew, 1. How they are formed in the blood, before they come to the place appointed for secretion. 2. In what manner they are separated from the blood by the glands. Upon the former Head he shews, that the blood consists of a simple fluid, in which swim corpuscles of various figures and magnitudes, and endued with different degrees of attractive force. Hence he concludes, that of such Particles as the blood consists of, must the fluids be composed which are drawn from it; and as in the blood the particles attract one another, and cohere together, so likewise may the Particles of the fluids, which are separated from it. This he proceeds farther to shew to be not only possible, but actually so, in several secretions, as milk, urine, &c. And if it is not evident in all, he looks upon it to be, because their constituent principles are more powerfully attracted by the particles of the fluids in which they swim, than by one another, which hinders their separation from that fluid. From this principle, that the blood consists of corpuscles of various figures and magnitudes, and indued with various degrees of an attractive Power, and that of such particles the fluids secreted by the Glands cancer in the mouth in the year 1719, aged forty six years. He was never married.

Glands are composed, the Doctor proceeds to shew how the corpuscles, which compose the secretions, are formed in the blood, before they arrive at their secreting glands. But before he comes to this, he lays down and demonstrates several Propositions relating to the laws of attraction, as fundamental to what he is about to advance; and then determines the force of air upon the blood in breathing, in order to shew, that by the pressure of the air the cohesion of the globules of the blood is dissolved. After this, he shews how the union of the attractive Particles is hindered near the heart; and that the particles, which unite first after the blood is thrown out of the great artery, must be such as have the strongest attractive Force; and that such as have the least, must unite last, and all the intermediate ones, according to their respective attractive powers. He then deduces the reason of the situation of the kidneys; and observes, that though the gall, which is secreted by the liver, and the Semen by the Testiculi, seem to be two considerable Objections against his hypothesis; yet they are so far from proving any thing against his doctrine of secretion, as to be the greatest arguments, that could possibly be urged for the truth of it. This he demonstrates at large; and then shews how some fluids may be secreted any where, and why the Lympha is secreted in several places, &c. and concludes what he had offered upon the first general proposition relating to secretions, with remarking that the knowledge of secretions is necessary for the understanding of the nature of Diseases, as in the diabetes, the rheumatism, the gout and the stone; and with explaining the operation of medicines by attraction. Under the second general proposition he shews the manner, in which the several fluids, after they are formed in the blood, are separated from it by the glands; and as this depends intirely upon the figure and structure of the glands, he determines them to be nothing else but convolutions of small arteries; since all the vessels in the body, in which the liquors are continually moving, can have no other than a cylindrical or conical form from the very nature of fluids, whose pressure is always perpendicular to the sides of the containing vessel, and equal at equal heights of the fluid. As therefore the sides of these vessels are soft and equally yielding every where, they must, by the pressure of the contained fluid, be equally every where distended, and consequently the section of such a vessel perpendicular to its axis, must be a right circle, and therefore the vessel must be either a concave cone or cylinder, or at least such a figure, whose transverse section is a circle. Hence he concludes, that the circular orifices of the glands can only differ in magnitude, and that all sorts of particles of less diameters than that of the orifice of a gland may enter it. The next subject he treats of is the quantity of the blood or circulating fluids of what kind soever in the human body; in order to determine which he supposes the whole body to be nothing but tubes or vessels full of blood or liquors separated from it; and concludes with observing, that in a body weighing 160 pounds there must needs be 127 pounds of blood; from which quantity, that he may put the matter out of all manner of dispute, he deducts the weight both of the fat and bones, (though he thinks, that some arguments might be alledged to prove, that even the fat circulates, and he had before shewn, that there is a fluid in the bones;) and after allowances made for both, concludes, that the fluids in the human body have the same proportion to the solids as 100 to 60, or 5 to 3. He finishes the whole of what he offers about the blood, with a pretty large discourse about its velocity; and observes, that when the whole mass of blood is to be altered, the course of Physic ought to be continued for a long time, since the blood moves slower and slower, the farther it moves from the great artery; and consequently it must be a great while before the whole mass of blood can be mixed with the alterative medicine. And that since the circulation of the blood through the glands, which receive arteries immediately from a great vessel, is very quick, they may carry off a great proportion of the medicine in a very little time; and that therefore it is not the taking of great quantities, but the constant taking, which can alter the mass of blood. In his treatise of muscular motion, he defines a muscle to be a bundle of thin and parallel plates of fleshy threads and fibres, inclosed by one common membrane, in which all the fibres of the same plate are parallel to one another, and tyed together at extremely little distances by short and transverse fibres; the fleshy fibres being composed of other smaller fibres, inclosed likewise by a common membrane, and each lesser fibre consisting of very small vessels or bladders, into which the nerves, veins, and arteries are supposed to open. He proceeds then to explain the reason of the contraction of the vesicular muscular fibres, and to demonstrate into what figure each vesicle is contracted; which he shews with Bernoulli against Borelli, to be spheroidal; any section through the axis of each vesicle, where the axis lies in the plane of the section, being a plane inclosed in two curves, which are arches of two circles; and any section in any part of the vesicle, to which the axis is perpendicular, being a perfect circle. T.

KELLER (JAMES), one of the best writers, who appeared among the Jesuits in Germany about the beginning of the seventeenth Century, was born at Seckingen (a) in the year 1568. He became a Jesuit in 1588, and after he had taught polite Literature, Philosophy, Moral and Scholastic Divinity, he was appointed Rector of the College of Ratisbon, and afterwards of the College of Munich. He held the first of these two offices two years, but he continued in the second for sixteen years successively. He was for a long time Confessor to Prince Albert of Bavaria and the Princess his wife, and was often consulted and employed by the Elector Maximilian in affairs of importance. He disputed publickly with the most celebrated Minister (b) of the Duke of Newburg; and if we may believe his brethren, gained the advantage over him [A]. He published

(a) It is one of the four Frontier Cities.

(b) His name was James Hailbrunner.

[A] He disputed . . . with Hailbrunner; and if we may believe his brethren, gained the advantage over him.] Alegambe and Southwell relate, that James Hailbrunner found himself so much pressed in that dispute, that he was almost reduced to silence, and fell sick the night following, or pretended to be so, that he might not be obliged to enter the lists again next day. Tam fortiter passus est, ut tantum non obmutuerit, morbumque reipsa nocte illa contraxerit, vel, ne cogeretur iterum in arenam descendere, callide simularit (1). This conference was very like that between Perron and du Pleffis Mornai; for it turned upon the charge brought against the Lutheran Minister of having cited several passages of the fathers with a thousand falsifications, in a German work intitled Papatus A Catholicus. The conference between Keller the accuser and Hailbrunner the accused was held at Newburg in June 1615 (2); and if we believe the Lutherans, the innocence of their Minister was proved by the clearest evidence imaginable, Ex inspectione & examinatione dictorum patristicorum, innocentia Hailbrunneriana luculenter patuit. Vide Stratem. Theatrum historicum, p. 1111. D. Dorseti in Kircher dev. prelim. 100 usque 106 (3).

(1) Alegambe and Sotuel, in Biblioth. Script. Societatis Jesu.

(2) Andreas Carolus, in Memoir. Ecclesiast. Saeculi XVII. pag. 384.
(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 383.

(c) Taken from Nathaniel Southwell's Bibliotheca Script. Societatis Jesu, pag. 373, 374.

lished some controversial writings [B], and divers political works upon the affairs of the times. He assumed a disguised name before his political writings [C]. He died at Munich February the 23d 1631 (c). KEN

[B] He published some controversial writings.] Here follow the titles of them. Tyrannicidium, seu scitum Catholicorum de Tyranni internecione adversus inimicas Calviniani Ministri calumnias in societatem Jesu jactatas: Munich 1601 in 4to in Latin and High Dutch. Papatus Catholicus, seu Demonstratio fundamentalis veritatis Ecclesie Catholice Romanæ contra Jacobum Hailbrunner: Munich 1616, 2 vol. in fol. in High Dutch. Compendium ejusdem Operis, in the same place, at the same time in 4to. Agonia seu Sudor mortalis Jacobi Hailbrunneri, hoc est, Refutatio Hailbrunneri, qui extremam unionem insectatus fuerat scripto libro: in the same place in 1618 4to, in High Dutch. Fasciculus olidus 50 Flosculorum, id est, Absurditas Prædicantium in Colloquio (4) Ratisbonensi. He took the name of Jacobus Silvanus before this book, which was printed in 1604 in 4to (5). He took the same name in a book printed at Ingolstadt in 1607, and intitled Philippica in anonymum quendam Prædicantem, qui Societatem Jesu mendacis oneravit. The writers of the Bibliothèques of the Jesuits make no mention of this book of Keller.

(4) And not Collegio, as Placcius, de Pseudonymis, pag. 261. lyy.

(5) Taken from Alegambe and Southwell, Biblioth. Script. Soc. Jesu.

(6) Placcius, de Pseudonymis, pag. 261.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Deckerus, de Scriptis adeptis, rale pratique, pag. 153.

(9) Morale Pratique, tom. 3, pag. 112.

(10) Joh. Frider. Mayerus, de Fide Billarmini suspensa, pag. 197, 198.

(11) Keller. in Appendix Cancellariae Anhaltinae, says that this report was false.

(12) Nicholas Harstein denies this in the Preface to his Responsio Apologetica to the Ajax of Fabius Hercynianus.

(13) Alegambe is mistaken in this name, for he says Blessii, and that this man was Chancellor. Father Southwell has not corrected these two errors: he says Blessii, &c. Placcius, de Aurymis, num. 256. pag. 71. has not corrected them, and erroneously ranks this book among the anonymous ones, not knowing that the author took the name of Fabius Hercynianus.

(14) Nicolaus Harsteinus, Sicamber, in Prefat. Responsionis Apologet. printed in 1625.

(15) Legat. Mysteria Politica nuper à vobis, & quidem a te Jacobo Kellero (ut multorum fert opinio) edita. Nicolaus Harsteinus, Apolog. pag. 8. In the Mercure François, tom. 2. this book is ascribed to an Italian.

(16) See Mercure François, tom. 11. pag. 1062, & seq.

(17) Harsteinus, Apolog. pag. 100.

(18) I write this in October 1695.

[C] He assumed a disguised name before his political writings.] The bloody war which laid Germany waste from the year 1618 till the peace of Munster, was undoubtedly a religious war; for the league, which the Protestants formed, and to which those of the contrary religion opposed a Catholic league, of which the Elector of Bavaria, was head, owed its rise to the suspicions, that the Imperial Court being influenced by the Jesuits would violate the peace of Passau. The Elector of Bavaria a very able Prince, would not suffer with impunity, that the Catholics should be charged with such a design. He procured books to be published, in which the Protestants were accused of having confederated to carry on pernicious designs, and particularly to oppress the Church of Rome. This accusation appeared in 1621 in a work intitled Cancellaria secreta Anhaltina, id est, occulta Concilia, inaudita Proposita, periculose adinventiones, & prodigiöse machinationes Capitum ac Directorum unionis Correspondentium in Germania, occasione Rebellionis Bohemice ad ejusdem Coronæ & Imp. Rom. perniciem agrata. Post nuperam illam, omnibus posteris memorabilem Victoriâ Pragensem, & Novemb. 1620 in Originalibus Scripturis ac documentis Cancellariae Anhaltinae Divinâ

Providentiâ deprehensa. The Protestant Princes ordered an answer to be made to this book, which was pretended to be written by William Jocher Counsellor to the Elector of Bavaria, and by Dr. Leickard (11). It was thought these Princes made use of the pen of Volrad Pleß, Counsellor to the Elector Palatine (12). Our James Keller thought so; for he wrote an answer to this book, printed in 1624 under this title: Volradi Pleßii (13) Heidelbergensis olim Consiliarii Ajax post oppugnatam frustra Cancellariam Anhaltinam in Spongiam incumbens, sive Appendix Cancellariae Anhaltinae, auctore Fabio Hercyniano, J. C. Alegambe and his continuator knew not, that their brother had taken the name of Fabius Hercynianus before this work. He had taken it the year before, when he answered a book, which Lewis Camerarius had published in 1622, under the title of Cancellaria Hispanica: adjecta sunt Acta publica, hoc est, Scripta & Epistolæ authenticæ, à quibus partim infelicis Belli in Germaniâ, partim Proscriptionis in Electorem Palatinum scopus præcipuus apparet. Adjecti sunt sub finem Flores Scoppiani ex Classico Belli Sacri. This book has another title after the table of contents, viz. Viva Demonstratio causarum præsentis in Germania belli Religionis ergo suscepti. The Jesuit Keller's answer to this book of Camerarius is intitled, Litura, seu Castigatio Cancellariae Hispanicae, a Ludovico Camerario Excancellario Bohemico, Exconsiliario Heidelbergensi &c. instructæ. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. A new edition of this book was printed in 1624 under this title. Cancellariae Anhaltinae Pars secunda. In qua non ita pridem à quibusdam edita Cancellaria Hispanica nervose simul ac lepide refutatur: tum ex quibusdam interceptis ad Gaborem Literis, Hungaricorum qui sequuti sunt & adhuc durant motuum Incentores seu Auctores demonstrantur. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. Alegambe and his continuator did not know, that James Keller took this fictitious name in the title of his book. But they were not ignorant of it with regard to two tracts, of which I am going to give the titles. Rhabarbarum demendæ Bili quam in Apologiâ suâ proritavit Ludovicus Camerarius propinatum à Fabio Hercyniano J. C. an. 1625. Tubus Gallicanus, hebescentibus Ludovici Camerarii oculis, in Litura Hispanicae Cancellariae male advertentibus, ad clarius videndum tornatus, à Fabio Hercyniano. Aditis in fine testimonii causa, & pro Tubo, & pro Rhabarbaro, ipsius Camerarii Epistolæ anno 1625. Nicholas Harstein answering the Ajax or the Appendix Cancellariae Anhaltinae, observes, that the Jesuit, who was the author, used very much to disguise himself. Nihil huic homini insolens esse, ut veritatem, ita nomen suum pervertere, & modo sub Aurimontii (à matre suâ Goltbergerâ) modo sub Didaci Tamiæ, modo sub Fabii Hercyniani (à Sylvâ Hercyniâ, sive Nigrâ, prope quam supra Basileam in oppido Seckingen natus est) nomine fallere, & bis literis, J. C. quæ non Jurisconsultum, ut alias, sed Jacobum Cellarium denotant, Lectori imponere (14). i. e. "It is not at all unusual with this man to pervert his own name, as well as the truth, and to impose upon the reader, sometimes under the name of Aurimontius (from his mother Goltberg), sometimes under that of Didacus Tamiæ, sometimes under that of Fabius Hercynianus (from the Hercynian or Black Forest, near which, above Basil, in the town of Seckingen he was born), and to disguise himself under the letters, J. C. which do not signify Jurisconsultus, as on other occasions, but Jacobus Cellarius." Here are disguises not known to the two Jesuits, who compiled the Bibliothéque of the Writers of their Order. The same Nicholas Harstein informs us, that James Keller was author of Mysteria politica (15), a work, which made a great deal of noise (16), and which was very injurious to the Court of France. But he ascribes (17) to another Jesuit the book intitled Secreta Secretorum Calvinico-Turcica, the author of which had disguised himself under the name of Honestus Cogmandolus. The person, who answered him in a book intitled, Secreta Secretorum Turco-Papistica, took the fictitious name of Justinus Justinopolitanus, instead of Lewis Camerarius, which was his true name. The contents of the writers upon the affairs of the time, were then much more grave than they are in the present war (18), and as warm in their kind as those of warriors. At present there are scarce any thing but scurrilous satires published.

☞ KEN (THOMAS), an eminent English Bishop in the seventeenth Century, was son of Mr. Thomas Ken [A] of Furnival's-Inn London, by Martha his wife, and was born at Barkhamstead in Hertfordshire in July 1637 (a), and not in 1635, as Mr. Wood asserts (b). From Winchester school he was sent to the University of Oxford, and entered a Student of Hart-Hall in 1656, and the year following admitted Probationer-Fellow of New-College (c). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts May the 3d 1661, and that of Master January the 21st 1664 (d). December the 8th 1666 he was chosen Fellow of Winchester College (e), and soon after became domestic Chaplain to Dr. George Morley Bishop of Winchester, who preferred him to the Rectory of Brixton in the Isle of Wight (f), and afterwards to the Parsonage of Woodhay in Hampshire, and to a Prebend in the Cathedral of Winchester, in which he was installed April the 12th 1669 (g). In 1675 (h), the year of the Jubilee, he travelled through Italy, and to Rome, and upon his return within the same year, he was often heard to say, that he had great reason to give God thanks for his travels; since, if it were possible, he returned rather more confirmed of the purity of the Protestant Religion, than he was before (i). July the 6th 1678 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (k); and June 30th 1679 that of Doctor of Divinity (l). He was afterwards appointed by King Charles II to attend the Lord Dartmouth to the demolishing of Tangier; and at his return was made Chaplain to his Majesty (m), as he was some time after to the Princess of Orange, then residing in Holland [B]. January the 25th 1684 he was consecrated Bishop of Bath and Wells [C] in the room of Dr. Peter Mews, translated to the See of Winchester. The month following he attended King Charles II at his death [D]. In the following reign he zealously opposed the progress of Popery [E]; and on the 8th

(a) A Short Account of the Life of the Right Reverend Father in God, Thomas Ken, D. D. sometime Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells. By William Hawkins of the Middle Temple Esq; pag. 1. edit. London 1713.

(b) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 983. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Short Account, pag. 8.

(e) Ibid. pag. 3.

(f) Wood, ubi supra.

(g) Short Account, pag. 6.

(h) Ibid. Wood says in 1674.

(i) Short Account, pag. 6, 7.

(k) Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 210.

(l) Ibid, ibid. col. 212.

(m) Short Account, pag. 7.

[A] Son of Mr. Thomas Ken.] His father's family was of great antiquity, and had possessed a very plentiful fortune for many generations, having been known by the name of the Kens of Ken-Place, an estate, in the possession of Earl Powlet, who is descended from an heiress of the Kens, John Lord Powlet of Hinton St. George having married Christian, daughter and heiress of Christopher Ken of Ken in the county of Somerset Esq; (1).

[B] Some time after made Chaplain to the Princess of Orange, then residing in Holland.] In this station his prudent behaviour and strict piety gained him entire credit and high esteem with that Princess. "But a consequential act, says Mr. Hawkins (2), of his singular zeal for the honour of his country, in behalf of a young Lady, so far exasperated the Prince, that he warmly threatened to turn him from the service; which the Doctor repenting, and begging leave of the Princess, (whom to his death he distinguished by the title of his mistress) warned himself from the service, and would not return to that court, till by the entreaty of the Prince himself he was courted to his former post and respect, consenting to continue there for one year longer, (during which time he was taken, at least into a shew of great familiarity;) and when that year expired, he returned for England. This was not unknown to the King, nor did he shew the least dislike to his behaviour." The thing which had given offence to the Prince of Orange was our author's obliging one of the Prince's favourites to marry a young Lady of the Princess's train, whom he had betrayed (3).

[C] January the 25th 1684 he was consecrated Bishop of Bath and Wells.] When that See became vacant by the removal of Dr. Peter Mews to that of Winchester, the King himself stopped all attempts of Dr. Ken's friends, (who would of their own inclination have applied in his behalf,) with this remarkable saying; "That Dr. Ken should succeed, but that he designed it should be from his own peculiar appointment." And accordingly the King himself gave order for a Conge d'essire for the seals of that purpose; and this even just after our author's opinion, that a woman of ill repute ought not to be endured in the house of a Clergyman, especially the King's Chaplain, was publickly known. For at that time the King coming to Winchester, and his Harbinger having marked the Doctor's house, which he held in right of his Prebend, for the use of Mrs. Gwin; he absolutely refused her admittance, and she was forced to seek another lodging (4). [D] The month following he attended King Charles II at his death.] Mr. Hawkins tells us (5), that the Bishop gave close attendance by the royal bed, at least for three whole days and nights, watching at proper intervals [to suggest pious and proper thoughts and ejaculations on so serious an occasion. In which time the Duchess of Portsmouth coming into the room, the Bishop prevailed with his Majesty to have her removed, and took that occasion of representing the injury and injustice done to his Queen so effectually, that his Majesty was induced to send for the Queen, and asking pardon, had the satisfaction of her forgiveness before he died. The Bishop having urged the necessity of a full repentance, several times proposed the administration of the Sacrament. But though it was not absolutely rejected, it was yet delayed from time to time, till the Bishop and others present were put out from the King's presence for about the space of half an hour; during which time it has been suggested, that Father Huddleston was admitted to give his Majesty the Extreme Unction. And the interval between this and his death was so short, that nothing concerning the Bishop's behaviour happened worthy of notice. Bishop Burnet observes (6), that our Bishop "applied himself much to the awaking the King's conscience, and spoke with an elevation both of thought and expression, like a man inspired. He resumed the matter often, and pronounced many short ejaculations and prayers, which affected all that were present, except him, that was most concerned, who seemed to take no notice of him, and made no answer. He pressed the King six or seven times to receive the Sacrament. But the King always declined it, saying, he was very weak. A table with the elements upon it was ready to be offered was brought into the room; which occasioned a report to be then spread about, that he had received it. Ken pressed the King to declare, that he desired the Sacrament, and that he died in the communion of the Church of England; to which the King answered nothing. The Bishop asked him, if he desired absolution of his sins; which he pronounced over his Majesty; "for which he was blamed, since the King expressed no sense of sorrow for his past life, nor any purpose of amendment. It was thought to be a prostitution of the peace of the Church, to give it to one, who after a life led as the King's had been, seemed to harden himself against every thing that could be said to him. Ken was also censured for another piece of indecency; he presented the Duke of Richmond, Lady Portsmouth's son, to be blessed by the King. Upon this some that were in the room cried out, that the King was their common father; and upon that all kneeled down for his blessing, which he gave them."

[E] In the following Reign he zealously opposed the progress of popery.] The King had so far entertained hopes of his absolute obedience to his will and pleasure, that though many of his sermons were framed against the Church of Rome; yet it was thought worth while

(1) A Short Account of the Life of the Right Reverend Father in God, Thomas Ken, D. D. sometime Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells. By William Hawkins of the Middle Temple Esq; pag. 1, 2.

(2) Ibid. pag. 7, 8.

(3) Memoirs of the Life of Mr. John Kettlewell, pag. 423, 424. edit. London 1718 in 8vo.

(4) A Short Account of the Life of the Right Reverend Father in God, Thomas Ken, D. D. sometime Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells. By William Hawkins of the Middle Temple Esq; pag. 9, 10.

(5) Ibid. pag. 10, 11, 12.

(6) History of his own Time, vol. 1. B. 3.

of June 1688 he, with five other Bishops and the Archbishop of Canterbury, was committed prisoner to the Tower of London for subscribing a petition to his Majesty against the declaration of indulgence (n). Upon the Revolution he refused to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary, on which account he was deprived of his Bishopric [F]. Her Majesty Queen Anne bestowed on him a yearly pension of two hundred to attempt to gain him over to the interest of that party at court; but so ineffectually, that upon the preaching of a sermon of his published at the end of the account of his life, in the King's own Chapel at Whitehall, and it being misrepresented to the King, who had not been present at Divine Service, his Majesty sent for the Bishop, and closetting him on the occasion, received nothing in answer, but this fatherly reprimand; That if his Majesty had not neglected his own duty of being present, his enemies had missed this opportunity of accusing him: whereupon he was dismissed. (7).

(n) Pag. 19, 20.

(7) Short Account, pag. 17, 18.

[F] Upon the revolution he refused to take the Oaths to King William and Queen Mary; on which account he was deprived of his bishoprick.] Just before his deprivation Dr. Burnet, then Bishop of Salisbury, wrote to him the following letter;

" My Lord,
 " This Gentleman, who is presented to a Living in your Lordship's Diocese, came to me to receive institution; but I have declined the doing of it, and so have sent him over to your Lordship, that you being satisfied with relation to him, may order your chancellor to do it. I was willing to lay hold on this occasion to let your Lordship know, that I intend to make no other use of the commission, that was sent me, than to obey any orders, that you may send me in such things as my hand and seal may be necessary. I am extremely concerned to see your Lordship so unhappily possessed with that, which is likely to prove so fatal to the Church, if we are deprived of one, that has served in it with so much honour as you have done, especially at such a time, when there are fair hopes of the reforming of several abuses. I am the more amazed to find your Lordship so positive, because some have told my self, that you had advised them to take that which you refuse your self; and others have told me, that they read a pastoral letter, which you had prepared for your diocese, and were resolved to print it, when you went to London. Your Lordship, it seems, changed your mind there, which gave great advantages to those, who were so severe as to say, that there was somewhat else than conscience at the bottom. I take the liberty to write this freely to your Lordship for I do not deny, that I am in some pain till I know whether it is true or not. I pray God to prevent a new breach in a Church, which has suffered so severely under the old one.

My Lord,

" Your Lordship's most faithful servant and brother, Sarum, October 1.

" Gi. Sarum.

Bishop Ken's answer was as follows.

" All glory be to God.

" My Lord,
 " I am obliged to your Lordship for the continued concern you express for me, and for the kind freedom you are pleased to take with me. And though I have already in public fully declared my mind to my diocese concerning the oath, to prevent my being misunderstood; yet since you seem to expect it from me, I will give such an account, which, if it does not satisfy your Lordship, will at least satisfy my self. I dare assure you, I never advised any one to take the oath; though some, who came to talk insidiously with me, may have raised such a report. So far have I been from it, that I never would administer it to any one person, whom I was to collate. And therefore, before the act took place, I gave a particular commission to my Chancellor, who himself did not scruple it; so that he was authorized, not only to institute, but also to collate in my stead. If any came to discourse with me about taking the oath, I usually told them, I durst not take it my self. I told them my reasons, if they urged me to it, and were of my diocese; and then remitted them to their study and prayers for

" farther Directions. It is true, having been scandalized at many persons of our own coat, who for several years together preached up passive obedience to a much greater height than ever I did, (it being a subject, with which I rarely meddled,) and on a sudden, without the least acknowledgment of their past error, preached and acted the quite contrary; I did prepare a pastoral letter, which, if I had seen reason to alter my judgment, I thought to have published; at least that part of it, on which I laid the greatest stress, to justify my conduct to my flock. And before I went to London, I told some of my friends, that if that (8) proved true, which was affirmed to us with all imaginable assurance, (and which I think more proper for discourse than a letter) it would be an inducement to me to comply. But when I came to town, I found it was false; and without being influenced by any one, or making any words of it, I burnt my paper, and adhered to my former opinion. If this is to be called a change of mind, and a change so criminal, that people, who are very discerning, and know my own heart better than my self, have pronounced sentence upon me, that there is something else than conscience at the bottom; I am much afraid, that some of those, who censure me, may be chargeable with more notorious changes than that; whether more conscientious or no, God only is the judge. If your Lordship gives credit to the many misrepresentations, which are made of me, and which I being so used to can easily disregard, you may naturally enough be in pain for me; for to see one of your brethren throwing himself headlong into a wilful deprivation, not only of honour and of income, but of a good conscience also, are particulars, out of which may be framed an idea very deplorable. But though I do daily in many things betray great infirmity, I thank God, I cannot accuse my self of any insincerity; so that Deprivation will not reach my conscience, and I am in no pain at all for my self. I perceive, that after we have been sufficiently ridiculed, the last mortal stab designed to be given us, is to expose us to the world for men of no conscience. And if God is pleased to permit it, his most holy will be done; though what that particular passion of corrupt nature is, which lies at the bottom, and which we gratify in losing all we have, will be hard to determine. God grant such reproaches as these may not revert on the authors. I heartily join with your Lordship in your desires for the peace of this Church; and I shall conceive great hopes, that God will have compassion on her, if I see, that she compassionates and supports her sister of Scotland. I beseech God to make you an instrument to promote that peace and that charity I my self can only contribute to, both by my prayers and by my deprecations against schism and against sacrilege.

My Lord,

" your Lordships very faithful servant and brother,
 " October 5, 1689.

" Thomas Bath and Wells."

His opinion was not agreeable to that of the Nonjurors, who were for continuing a separation by private Consecrations among themselves, as appeared from his answers to several letters, written to him by men of learning upon that subject; and from his requesting Dr. George Hooper to accept of the See of Bath and Wells (9). That Divine having often and earnestly discoursed with Bishop Ken on the subject of compliance with the oath, the latter at last used these expressions to him; I question not, but that you, and several others, have taken the oaths with as good a conscience, as my self shall refuse them; and sometimes you have almost persuaded me to comply by the arguments you have used. But I beg you to urge them no farther; for should I be persuaded to comply, and after see reason to repent, you would make me the most miserable man in the world (10).

(8) The Bishop was about this time assured, that King James II had by some special instrument made over the Kingdom of Ireland to the French King.

(9) Short Account, pag. 26.

(10) Ibid. pag. 38, 39.

(1) See the article of HOOPER (George) vol. 6. pag. 231. at Long Leate in Wiltshire March the 19th 1710. He was interred at Frome-Selwood (p). He published several books [G]. His charity was so extensive, that having once, while he was Bishop of Bath and Wells, received a fine of four thousand pounds, he gave great part of it to the French Protestants (q). He had an excellent genius for and skill in Music; and whenever he had convenient opportunities for it, he performed some devotional part of praise with his own compositions, which were grave and solemn (r). Bishop Burnet tells us (s), that "he was a man of an ascetic course of life, and yet of a very lively temper, but too hot and sudden. He had a very edifying way of preaching; but it was more apt to move the passions, than to instruct, so that his Sermons were rather beautiful than solid. Yet his way in them was very taking."

(1) History of his own Time, vol. 1. B. 3.

[G] He published several books. I. A Manual of Prayers for the use of the Scholars of Winchester College, and all other devout Christians. London 1681 in 12mo. II. An Exposition of the Church Catechism: or, Practice of Divine Love, composed for the Diocese of Bath and Wells. London 1685, in 8vo. There being an expression in the first edition, which the Papists at that time laid hold of, as if it favoured their doctrine of Transubstantiation; he took particular care in the next edition in the reign of King James II., by altering the expression, to ascertain the sense (11). III. Directions for Prayer, taken out of the Church Catechism: printed with the Exposition. IV. A Pastoral Letter to the Clergy of the Diocese of Bath and Wells, concerning their behaviour during Lent: dated February the 17th 1687. London 1688 in one sheet in 4to. V. A Sermon preached at the Funeral of the Right Honourable the Lady Margaret Maynard, at Little Easton in Essex,

June the 30th 1682, on Prov. 11. 16. London 1682 in 4to. VI. A Sermon preached in the Cathedral Church of Bath on Ascension Day May the 5th 1687. This occasioned a piece, intitled, Animadversions on the Bishop of Bath's Sermon on Ascension Day May the 5th 1687. London 1687 in three sheets and an half in 4to. VII. A Letter to Dr. Tennison on his Sermon at Queen Mary's Funeral. London 1695 in 4to. VIII. Mr. Hawkins has subjoined to his Life of our author two Sermons, one preached in the King's Chapel at Whitehall in 1685 on Dan. x. 11. the other preached upon Passion-Sunday on Micab. vii. 8, 9. and six Hymns or Odes. These Mr. Hawkins published as a specimen, in order to a publication of his works at large. VIII. He wrote also an Epic Poem about the time of his voyage to Tangier, which seems to have had his last hand; with several other Poems (12).

(12) Ibid. pag. 24- H

(a) Life of the Right Reverend Dr. White Kennett, late Lord Bishop of Peterborough. With several original Letters of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Tennison, the late Earl of Sunderland, Bishop Kennett, and some curious original Papers and Records never before published, pag. 1, 2. edit. London 1730 in 8vo.

KENNETT (WHITE), a learned English Writer and Bishop of Peterborough in the eighteenth Century, was son of Mr. Basil Kennett, M. A. of the University of Dublin, Rector of Dimchurch and Vicar of Postling near Hythe in Kent, by Mary eldest daughter of Mr. Thomas White [A], a wealthy Magistrate in Dover, who had been a master shipwright or builder of ships, and after the Restoration was employed by the Government in that way (a). Our author was born in the parish of St. Mary in Dover August the 10th 1660; and had the first part of his education at Eleham and Wye, two country-schools in the neighbourhood; from whence he was removed to Westminster school above the curtain; but falling sick of the small-pox at the very time of election, his father thought it not advisable that he should wait another year. He spent a year before he went to the University in the family of Mr. Tolson at Beakshorne, and taught his three sons with great content and success (b). He removed to Oxford, and was entered a Butler and Semi-Commoner of St. Edmund Hall in June 1678 (c), and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts May the 2d 1682 (d). He soon distinguished himself by his vigorous application to his studies, and by his translations of several books into English, and other pieces which he published [B]. He took his degree of Master of Arts,

(c) Wood, Abb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1131. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Idem, Paffi Oxon. vol. 2. col. 219.

(b) Idem, ibid.
(1) Life of Bishop Kennett, pag. 2. edit. London 1730 in 8vo.

[A] Mr. Thomas White. From him, who was our author's godfather as well as grandfather, he had his Christian name, not without hopes of being made his heir; but the old Gentleman afterwards married a second wife, by whom he had three children, who with their mother went away with the whole estate (1). [B] His translations of several books into English, and other pieces which he published. In 1681 he published A Letter from a Student at Oxford to a friend in the country, concerning the approaching Parliament; in Vindication of his Majesty, the Church of England and University. London 1681 in about three sheets in 4to. This pamphlet, which was printed in March, and divers copies of it sent to Oxford about the 15th of the same month 1682 against the time that the said Parliament was to sit, on the 21st of that month, "gave great distaste, says Mr. Wood (2), to the factious party of the House of Commons, who would have endeavoured to find out the author and have him punished, had not they been suddenly dissolved. John Trenchard, sometime Fellow of New College in Oxford, then a Burgess of Taunton in Somersetshire, to serve in the said Parliament, was an active man in this matter, and pretended to know more than another, that it was writ by an Oxford Scholar. The Vice-Chancellor was desired by some of them to sound out the author; but for the reason before expressed he desisted." The same year he published A Poem to Mr. E. L. on his Majesty's dissolving the late Parliament at Oxon, 28 March 1681. It was printed on one side of a sheet of paper, and hath this beginning, An Atheist now must a monster be, &c. It was reprinted in a pamphlet intitled, The Conduct of the Reverend Dr. Kennett. London, 1717. In 1683 he published a Translation of Erasmus's Moria Encomium, which he intitled, Wit against Wisdom, or a Panegyric upon Folly. Oxford 1683 in 8vo. ushered into the world by copies of verses made by Matthew Morgan M. A. of St. John's College, William Osborne M. A. James Shute B. A. both of Edmund Hall, and Thomas Wood Fellow of New College. At the end of which verses is the translator's poem on the argument of this book; This translation has since had several other editions. He translated likewise The Life of Chabrias, written by Cornelius Nepos, published among The Lives of illustrious Men written by the Historian, and done into English by several Hands of Oxon. Oxford 1684 in 8vo. He translated likewise Pliny's Panegyric, which he intitled, An Address of Thanks to a good Prince, presented in the Panegyric of Pliny upon Trajan, the best of Roman Emperors. London 1686 in 8vo. To this translation Mr. Kennett prefixed a large Preface and Life of Pliny, according as Sir Robert Stapylton had done in his translation of that Panegyric, printed at Oxford in 1644 in 4to. Mr. Kennett's translation was reprinted in 1717; before which time several reflections having been made on him for this performance, it occasioned the following account of it in a postscript to the

(2) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1131. 2d edit. London 1721.

(e) Idem, Alben. Oxon. ubi supra. and Life of Bishop Kennet, pag. 3. 4.

(f) Wood, Alben. Oxon. ubi supra.

(g) Life of Bishop Kennet, pag. 6.

(h) Wood, Alben. Oxon. ubi supra.

Arts, and entering into holy Orders became Curate and Assistant to Mr. Samuel Blackwell, B. D. Vicar and School Master of Burcester in Oxfordshire (e). In the beginning of September 1685 he was presented by Sir William Glynne Bart. to the Vicarage of Amerden or Ambrosden in Oxfordshire (f); and after a few years absence made Vice-Principal of St. Edmund-Hall (g). In January 1689 he had the misfortune of being wounded in the skull by the breaking of a gun [C]. He was afterwards presented to the Rectory of Shottesbroke in Berkshire by William Cherry Esq; (h). In 1693 he published at Oxford in 8vo the Life of Mr. William Somner [D]. The year following Mr. Edmund Gibson, now Bishop of London, dedicated to him Mr. Somner's Treatise in answer to Chifletius concerning the situation of Portus Iccius [E]. In 1695 Mr. Kennett published his Parochial Antiquities [F]. While he continued at Amerden, he contracted an acquaintance with Dr. George Hickes, whom he entertained in his house, and was instructed by him in the Saxon and Northern tongues; though their different principles in Church and State afterwards broke off the friendship between them [G]. He had the translation of his Convocation Sermon 1710. "He [that is the Remarker] says, the Doctor dedicated Pliny's Panegyric to the late King James: and what if he did? Only it appears he had not. This is an idle tale among the party, who perhaps have told it till they believe it. When the truth is, there was no such dedication, and the translation itself of Pliny was not designed for any Court-Address. The young translator's tutor Mr. Allam directed his pupil by way of exercise to turn some Latin tracts into English. The first was a little book of Erasmus intitled Morie Encomium, which the tutor was pleased to give to a Bookseller in Oxford, who put it in the press, while the translator was but an Under-Graduate. Another sort of task required by his tutor was this Panegyric of Pliny upon Trajan, which he likewise gave to a Bookseller in Oxford, before the translator was Master of Arts, designing to have it published in the reign of King Charles; and a small cut of that Prince at full length was prepared, and afterwards put before several of the books, though the impression happened to be retarded till the death of King Charles; and then the same tutor, not long before his own death, advised a new preface adapted to the then received opinion of King James's being a just and good Prince. However there was no dedication to King James, but to a private patron, a worthy Baronet, who came in heartily to the beginning of the late happy revolution. This is the whole truth of that story, that hath been so often cast at the Doctor; not that he thinks himself obliged to defend every thought and expression of his juvenile studies, when he had possibly been trained up to some notions, which he afterwards found reason to put away as childish things."

now

[C] In January 1689 he had the misfortune of being wounded in the skull by the breaking of a gun. He was shooting at a bird within the parish of Middleton Stony in Oxfordshire, when the gun burbling, a splinter of the barrel made a grievous wound in his forehead, and broke through both the tables of his skull; which occasioned his wearing a large black patch of velvet on that part of it. While he lay under great disorder of body and brain, just after he had undergone the severe operation of trepanning, for want of sleep he made a copy of Latin verses, and dictated them to a friend at his bedside, who transmitted this copy to Sir William Glynne, in whose study it was found, after Mr. Kennett had forgot every thing but the sad occasion. It is now, says the author of his Life (3), in my possession, and thought by good judges to be no reproach to the author.

(3) Pag. 7.

[D] In 1693 he published at Oxford in 8vo the Life of Mr. William Somner. This piece, which was published in the beginning of that year, was written by way of letter dated from Edmund Hall February the 15th 1692 to the Reverend Mr. James Brome M. A. Rector of Cheriton in Kent, and Chaplain to the Cinque Ports, and prefixed to Mr. Brome's edition of Mr. Somner's Treatise of the Roman Ports and Farts in Kent.

[E] The year following Mr. Edmund Gibson, now Bishop of London, dedicated to him Mr. Somner's Treatise in answer to Chifletius concerning the situation of Portus Iccius. This book was printed at Oxford 1694 in 8vo under the following title. Julii Caesaris Portus Iccius illustratus, sive, 1. Gulielmi Somneri ad Chifletii Librum de Portu-Iccio Responsio. 2. Caroli du Fresne

Dissertatio de Portu-Iccio. The dedication is inscribed Eximio Viro White Kennetto; and in it Mr. Gibson after having taken notice that the study of antiquity is very much discouraged by its being represented as dry and barren, and the bane of all delicacy and politeness, tells our author, "that by this means, those, who apply themselves to it, would be wholly discouraged, but that they were kept in countenance by his example and authority. And that there could not be a more effectual answer to the reproaches cast on this sort of learning, than that vivacity of parts, that strength and delicacy of understanding so remarkable in him. That from his politeness of mind, easiness and affability of manners, and perfect mastery in all the parts of gentile learning, joined with the exactest knowledge in antiquities, the world might see that this kind of study does by no means cramp the genius, or sour the temper; and from his soundness and strength of judgment men may learn, that the more unguarded flights and fallies of imagination are by this means best of all corrected." He then proceeds to tell him, that he esteems himself happy in this respect, that the nature of his studies, and his private obligations, both conspired to engage him to direct that address to him. "For who has a better title to these golden remains of Somner, than one, who by so copiously and exactly writing his life, had at the same time conferred immortality upon him?"

[F] His Parochial Antiquities. They were printed at Oxford 1695 in 4to under this title. Parochial Antiquities attempted in the History of Ambrosden, Burcester, and other adjacent parishes in the counties of Oxford and Bucks. This work is highly commended by Archdeacon Nicholson (4); and Mr. Thomas Tanner, late Bishop of St. Asaph in his Notitia Monastica: or a short History of the Religious Houses in England and Wales. Oxford 1695 in 8vo, in which he often refers to Mr. Kennett's book. And Mr. Philip Falle, Rector of Shenly in Hertfordshire, in a marginal note on his Visitacion-Sermon preached at Hertford June the 12th 1700, having occasion to cite Bishop Grindal's Register, observes, that he does so, "upon the authority of the Reverend Dr. Kennet, whose learned account of the antiquities of his own Parish-Church of Ambrosden shew him excellently accomplished to go on further in the like curious researches."

(4) English Historical Library, pag. 25, 54. edit. London 1696 in 8vo.

[G] While he continued at Amerden, he contracted an acquaintance with Dr. George Hickes, whom he entertained in his house, and was instructed by him in the Saxon and Northern tongues; though their different principles in Church and State afterwards broke off the friendship between them. The writer of Bishop Kennet's Life informs us (5), that our author "freely received Dr. Hickes into his Vicarage-House, and finding, that by his condition of suffering for the cause of King James, his head and thoughts were too much determined to politics; by which he would be apt to disturb the world, and expose himself; Mr. Kennett, to divert him from that mischief (as well as for other reasons) desired his instruction in the Saxon and Septentrional tongues, and particularly the derivation of our oldest English words from the Gothics, and other Northern dialects; to which purpose Mr. Kennett made a large Dictionary of our words so deduced, as he had them from the tongue and pen of Dr. Hickes. And the sheets may be of use

(5) Pag. 21, &

now taken his degree of Doctor of Divinity; and in 1700 was appointed Minister of St. Botolph Aldgate without any solicitation of his own (i). Upon this he resigned the Vicarage of Amerfield, which he might have kept; as he quitted afterwards the Rectory of Shottesbroke, when he might have made it consistent with other preferment (k). In 1701 he was engaged in the controversy relating to the constitution of English Synods [H]. He was soon after named a Member of the Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, the proceedings of which Society he published an account of in 1706 [I]. He designed likewise to have written An Historical Account of the Corporation for the Relief of poor Widows and Children of Clergymen, and of the several Benefactions given to it, and the manifold good services done by it; but was discouraged from it [K]. His Sermon at Aldgate on the 30th of January 1703 exposed him to great clamour, and occasioned many Pamphlets to be written against it [L]. In

1704

"use, when posterity comes to think, that we have no English Dictionary, that gives the true origination of our language. While Dr. Hickes was thus pleased and amused by the Country Vicar, it gave this latter an opportunity to interest the Doctor to look more upon those Studies, to review his Saxon and Islandic Grammar, and to embellish them with notes and observations, that might revive and improve the knowledge of our antiquities in the rise and conveyance of our laws, customs, tenures, and other national rights. It was upon this frequent discourse and importunity of Mr. Kennet, that Dr. Hickes then and there laid the foundation of that noble work, which he brought to perfection in about seven years after, and published under this title, Antiquae Literaturae Septentrionalis Libri duo, &c. Oxon 1705, as he himself acknowledges in these words in the learned preface. Rev. & doctissimus Vir Whittes Kennet, S. T. P. &c. i. e. The reverend and most learned Whittes Kennet, &c. more than forty years ago interested me, that I would undertake this work of the antient Northern words, which in his opinion deserv'd to be more generally understood, I immediately set about it in his house, and having at length finish'd it, if it shall be found to be of any advantage to the learned world, it is intirely owing to him as the encourager and promoter of it." and justly vindicated from the misrepresentations of Mr. Aserbury. By White Kennet, D. D. Part I. London 1701 in 8vo dedicated to the Archbishop of Canterbury; and An Occasional Letter on the subject of English Convocations. London 1701. He is said likewise to be the author of The History of the Convocation of the Prelates and Clergy of the Province of Canterbury, summoned to meet in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul London, on Febr. 5. 1700. In answer to A Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower House of Convocation. London 1702 in 4to.

[I] Of the proceedings of which society he published an account in 1706. It was printed in 4to under this title. An Account of the Society for propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, established by the Royal Charter of King William III. with their Proceedings and Success, and Hopes of continual Progress under the happy Reign of her most excellent Majesty Queen Anne. Within four years after he continued and improved that account by an historical account of what had been transacted by the same society; and especially what steps and measures had been taken by the society De propagandâ Fide at Rome; and what more Christian methods by reformed States and Princes. This was a work of great pains, and brought to some tolerable perfection, but never published, because the printing of it would have been of greater expence to that society than their circumstances would admit of (8).

[K] He designed likewise to have written An Historical Account of the Corporation for the Relief of poor Widows and Children of Clergymen, &c; but was discouraged from it. He had for this purpose collected a great many notions of things and persons, and the several sermons before the Sons of the Clergy from the first by Mr. George Hall, afterwards Archdeacon of Canterbury, and Bishop of Chester, intitled The Tribe of Levi 1658, downwards; and searched the last wills of several donors and benefactors; and would by degrees have connected the materials into some order for the press, but that he was unkindly used, and the spirit of some new members of that corporation raised anger and hatred more than affection and charity to the Church and Clergy (9).

[L] His Sermon at Aldgate on the 30th of Jan. 1703 exposed him to great clamour, and occasioned many pamphlets to be written against it. This Sermon was printed under the title of A compassionate inquiry into the causes of the civil war. In a Sermon preach'd in the Church of St. Botolph Aldgate the 30th of January 1703, London 1704. in 4to. The causes of this war improved by wicked arts and designs he assigns to be, "First, a French interest and alliance, and from thence arising, Secondly, the apprehensions and fears of popery, which led on, Thirdly, the jealousies of oppression and illegal power; which tended more and more to, Fourthly, the growth of prophaneness and immorality; and even this help'd to produce, Fifthly, that hypocrisy and perfidiousness, which accomplished the sin and the infinite scandal of this day." After the publication of this sermon, there appeared several pieces against it; but those, who threatened to complain of it in convocation, where the Doctor had by other writings offended the majority of the lower house, thought fit to drop their intentions. And soon after he received an order to preach before the house of commons on the same occasion, January 30th, 1705-6, and the Doctor had the thanks of the house for his sermon, and was desired to print it, as accordingly it was.

(1) Short Account, pag. 6, 7.

(2) Foli Oxon. vol. 2. col. 210.

(6) Ibid. pag. 14.

(8) Life of Bishop Kennet, pag. 20, 21.

(9) Ibid. pag. 22.

(7) Ibid. pag. 15; 16.

(*) Postscript to a Translation of Dr. Kennet's Convocation-Sermon.

[H] In 1701 he was engaged in the controversy relating to the constitution of the English Synods. He wrote upon this subject, Ecclesiastical Synods and Parliamentary Convocations in the Church of England historically stated

1704 he published his Case of Impropriations [M], and two other tracts upon the same subject [N]. In 1705 he preached the Consecration Sermon for Dr. William Wake Bishop of Lincoln [O]. In 1706 he published the third volume of the Complete History of England [P]. In 1707 his Funeral Sermon upon the Duke of Devonshire occasioned great clamours against him [Q]. Soon after he was preferred to the Deanery of Peterborough, having been before appointed Chaplain in ordinary to her Majesty at the recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Godolphin (m) ^{(m) Life of Bi-} ^{shop Kennet, pag. 38.} The same year by the advice and under the favour of the Archbishop, he resigned his laborious Cure of Aldgate, and accepted of her Majesty's gift of the Rectory of St. Mary Aldermary in London; upon which exchange he lost above one hundred pounds a year for the purchase of a little more retirement and opportunity for study. In 1709 he published A Vindication of the Church and Clergy of England from some late Reproaches rudely and unjustly cast upon them [R]; and A true Answer to Dr. Sacheverell's Sermon before the

[M] In 1704 he published his case of impropriations.] It was printed at London in 8vo under this title: The case of Impropriations, and of the augmentation of vicarages and other insufficient cures, stated by history and laws, from the first usurpation of the Popes and Monks, to her Majesty's Royal Bounty, lately extended to the poorer clergy of the Church of England: with an appendix of records and memorials relating to that subject. From the first publication of this book the Doctor was, upon all occasions of inquiry, gathering up such authorities, and such instances of fact and due inferences from them, as when connected into a new edition of that work, will greatly improve it.

[N] and two other tracts upon the same subject.] The first tract is intitled, De non temerandis Ecclesiis, &c. written by Sir Henry Spelman Knt. The second tract is intitled, The poor Vicar's plea for tythes, &c. By Thomas Ryves, Doctor of the Civil Law. To these Dr. Kennett prefixed a prefatory account of the authors and these works. London 1734. In this preface the Doctor begins thus: "Her Majesty's late pious munificence to the Clergy of the Church of England has made glad the hearts of her best subjects, the best Christians, and has made them reflect on the alienation of tythes and offerings, as the great scandal of Popery and the great defect of our Reformation. To make up a competent maintenance for the parochial ministers and so the better to provide for the service of God, and the care of souls, has been the continual subject of all good men's wishes, proposals and attempts." The Doctor's long course of studies had the better instructed and qualified him for these purposes. He had before delivered many things of that kind in his Parochial Antiquities; and had pursued the same Design in publishing in 1698 another tract of Sir Henry Spelman, intitled, the history and fate of sacrilege, discovered by examples of scriptures of beatens, and of Christians, from the beginning of the World continually to this day. Wrote in the year 1632. A treatise omitted in the late edition of his posthumous Works, and now publish'd for the terror of evil doers.

[O] In 1705 he preached the consecration sermon for Dr. William Wake Bishop of Lincoln.] It was published at London in 1706 under this title. The office and good-work of a Bishop. A Sermon preached in Lambeth Chapel, at the consecration of the right Reverend Father in God William Lord Bishop of Lincoln on Sunday Octob. 21. 1705, published at the desire of the Archbishop and Bishops. The writer of our author's life (10) files this almost learned and excellent discourse; and tells us, that "it was admired so much by the late Lord Chief Justice Holt, that he declared, it had more in it to the purpose of the legal and Christian constitution of this Church, than any volume of discourses."

[P] In 1706 he published the third volume of the complete history of England.] Some Booksellers had been advised to make a collection of the best writers of the lives and reigns of our several English Princes from the conquest to the beginning of the reign of Queen Anne, and to reprint them fairly in three volumes. When they had laid this scheme, they found it necessary to have a continuation made by some one new hand, of the four last reigns of Charles I. Charles II. James II. and William III. and they at last prevail'd with Dr. Kennet to draw up the materials for this third volume. He had no manner of hand in any branch of the two former, nor in the preface to them, which was written by Mr. John Hughes, and concluded thus: "For what remains to be said concerning the third volume, the judicious and accomplished

"writer of it has thought fit in his own words to address the public as follows." And the words, [All new writ by a learned and impartial hand] were added by the booksellers. From whence it is plain, that the author resolved to conceal his name; and we may believe, that the few Undertakers for the press, who were let into the secret, were obliged by promise not to betray it. "But it seems, says the writer of his life (11), (11) Pag. 34.

"in a pragmatistical age, with a restless party, the concealing and withdrawing himself did but raise the fiercer pursuits after him; and the Jacobite outcry was, that Dr. Kennet was the writer of that history, designing to expose them and their cause. Dr. Hickes was the first, who was extremely angry, that there was not a due respect paid to his book Jovian, and to the notions of it. And even some persons, who had gone into the revolution with forwardness enough, and yet had not found their full account in it, were offended, that too much or too little notice was taken of the parts they acted about that time. And above all an eminent Peer (12), very instrumental in the revolution by taking up arms in the North, had made such an improvement of his honours and fortunes by it, that he thought himself privileged and protected from any retrospect upon his conduct in the court and treasury of King Charles II. And therefore finding in that history a narrative of what appeared to be male-administration, though taken from the Parliament Journals and printed Trials, and other public Papers, he was much offended, and taking an opportunity, upon the death of the Duke of Montague, to give some account of his transactions with France from his own papers and letters, complained of the misrepresentation of his services made by the late historian; who really did not seem to mean any thing of reflection on his noble person and family, but related facts as he found them before related. However on the occasion of his Grace's complaint, he enquired more narrowly into those matters, and stated them over again in a most authentic manner; but finding that the more full discovery would only create the greater offence, he would not suffer what he had written, to be published to the world." The Complete History was reprinted at London 1719 in fol. with many corrections and additions.

[Q] In 1707 his Funeral Sermon upon the Duke of Devonshire occasioned great clamour against him.] It was printed at London 1708 in 8vo, under the following title: A Sermon preached at the Funeral of the right noble William Duke of Devonshire, in the Church of St. Mary in Derby, on Friday September 5. 1707. With some memoirs of the family of Cavendish. The passage, which gave the principal offence, has been quoted in our article of CAVENDISH (William) the first Duke of Devonshire.

[R] In 1709 he published a vindication of the Church and Clergy of England &c.] It was printed at London in 8vo, It was occasioned by a pamphlet published by one S. Curate of a parish near the City, who afterwards joined himself to the Non-Jurors, and intitled An appeal of the Clergy of the Church of England to my Lords the Bishops, humbly beseeching them to move her most sacred Majesty to redress their grievances, &c. Dr. Kennet's Answer was designed to vindicate the Clergy from the charge brought against them by this writer, on several heads, "which the Doctor stated with just respect to the rules of the Church, and to the practice of the better part of the Clergy."

the Lord Mayor Nov. the 5th 1709 [S]. In 1710 he was greatly reproached for not joining in the London Clergy's Address to the Queen [T]. The same year he preached the Latin Sermon at the opening of the Convocation [U]. He was exposed to great odium as a Low-Church Man on account of his conduct and writings [W]. In 1713 he presented the Society for propagating the Gospel with a great number of books, suitable to their design, and published his Bibliothecæ Americanae Primordia [X], and founded an Antiquarian and Historical Library at Peterborough [Y]. In 1715 he published a Sermon, intitled, The Witchcraft of the present Rebellion [Z], and afterwards several other pieces.

[S] A true answer to Dr. Sacheverell's Sermon &c.] It was printed at London 1709 in 8vo. It begins thus: "You asked me last night, what I thought the best way of answering Dr. Sacheverell's Sermon on November 5. I told you, one way was to let it drop into silence and contempt, for that there was not one argument to answer, but a jumble of words and periods, that made the crackling of thorns, noise and flame; and therefore it was better to pity the man, and despise the stuff. It could do no harm, but rather great service to make his own party-friends ashamed of him, and to convince the world, that madness is as bad as moderation. But said you, there be some answers in print, and will be more. Pray what is the best course that a new answerer can take with him? Why Sir, said I, to let him answer himself; that is, to produce his own words, and to let him stand or fall by them, without calling him any names, or raking into his life and conversation. You pressed me, Sir, to give a specimen of it. Here it is, cool and calm, under these heads; Propriety, Pertinence, good sense, Veracity, Seriousness, Charity, and Allegiance.

[T] In 1710 he was greatly reproached for not joining in the London Clergy's address to the Queen.] When the great point in Doctor Sacheverell's trial, the change of the ministry, was gained, and very strange addresses were made upon it, there was like to be a like artful address from the Bishop and Clergy of London, and they who would not subscribe it, were to be represented as enemies to the Queen and her Ministry (13). Dr. Kennett fell under this imputation; and advice of it was sent through the kingdom by Mr. Dyer in his letter of August 24th 1710, in these words: "The address of the Bishop and Clergy of London was inserted in this day's Gazette by order of the Queen, as a distinguishing favour to them. The Clergymen, who refused to sign it, were Dr. Barton, and Mr. Baker; and those, who did not answer to the Bishop's Summons were Dr. Kennett, Dr. Bradford, Dr. Hancock, and Mr. Hoady. And therefore as they have no share in the Queen's thanks, so I hope they will have as little in her favours."

[V] He preached the Latin Sermon at the opening of the convocation.] It was printed at London in 4to, under this title: Concio ad Synodum ab Archiepiscopo, Episcopis, & Clero Provinciae Cantuariensis &c. It was translated into English without the author's knowledge for the benefit, as it was said, of the dissenting teachers. Upon which he took care for a more correct translation, to which he subjoined a Postscript, in which he vindicated himself from some reproaches cast upon him.

[W] He was exposed to great odium as a Low-Churchman, on account of his conduct and writings.] He zealously opposed the doctrine of the invalidity of Lay-Baptism. He was supposed likewise to be the author of a letter to the Reverend Thomas Brett, LL. D. Rector of Bettebanger in Kent, about a motion in Convocation: London 1712 occasioned by a complaint in Convocation against Dr. Brett's Sermon, intitled, A Sermon of remission of sins, according to the scriptures, and the Doctrine of the Church of England. He reprinted likewise in 1714 a Sermon of Dr. John Whiggist, Dean of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, preached before Queen Elizabeth at Greenwich, to which he prefixed a preface dated November 28th 1713. He published the same year A memorial for Protestants on the 5th of November, containing a more full discovery of some particulars relating to the happy deliverance of King James I. and the three estates of the Realm of England, from the most traiterous and bloody intended massacre by Gunpowder, anno 1605. In a letter to a Peer of Great Britain: dated October 25. 1712. and A letter to the Lord Bishop of Carlisle, concerning one of his predecessors, Bishop Merks, on occasion of a new volume for the Pretender, intitled, The hereditary right of the Crown of England asserted. London 1713. About this time it was, that a very uncommon method was taken to expose the Dean by Dr. Welton, Rector of the Church of White-chapel. For in the Altar-piece of that Church, which was intended for a representation of Christ and his twelve Apostles eating the Passover and the Last Supper, Judas the Traytor was drawn sitting in an elbow-chair, dressed in a black garment, between a gown and a cloak, with a black scarf and a white band, a short wig, and a mark in his forehead between a lock and a patch, and with a great deal of the air of Dr. Kennett's face. It was generally said, that the original sketch was for a Bishop under Dr. Welton's displeasure, which occasioned the elbow-chair. But the painter being apprehensive of an action of Scandalum Magnatum, leave was given to drop the Bishop, and make the Dean. This giving a general offence, upon the complaint of others (for Dr. Kennett never saw it, or seemed to regard it) the Bishop of London ordered the picture to be taken down (14).

[X] His Bibliothecæ Americanae Primordia.] It was printed at London 1713 in 4to, under this title: Bibliothecæ Americanae primordia: An attempt towards laying the foundation of an American Library, in several books, papers, and writings, humbly given to the Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, for the perpetual use and benefit of their members, their missionaries, friends, correspondents, and others concerned in the good design of planting and promoting Christianity within her Majesty's Colonies and Plantations in the West-Indies.

[Y] Founded an Antiquarian and Historical Library at Peterborough.] He had been long gathering up the scattered remains of our English writers, or any other authors upon the subject of our English affairs, from the very beginning of English printing to the latter end of Queen Elizabeth; which, when put in order of time, would make up such a series and connection of the antiquities and history of this Church and Nation, as would be of great light and service to the world. The collection of these books, amounting to about fifteen hundred volumes and small tracts, was placed in a private room at Peterborough, in order to be daily supplied and augmented under the care of the Reverend Mr. Joseph Sparke, a member of that Cathedral. There is a large written catalogue of them thus inscribed: Index Librorum aliquot vetustorum, quos in commune Bonum concessit W. K. Decan. Petriburg. MDCCXII. In this collection there are most of the printed legends of Saints; the oldest rituals and liturgies; the first printed statutes and laws; the most antient Homilies and Sermons, the first editions of the English schoolmen, Postillers, expounders, &c. with a great many fragments of our antient language, usage, customs, rights, tenures, and such other things, as tend to illustrate the antiquities and history of Great Britain and Ireland, and the successive state of civil government, Religion, and learning in them. In a letter of his to a friend, dated at Peterborough July 27th 1717 he writes thus: I have improved the collection I have been long making for an Historical Antiquarian Library, consisting of the oldest books relating to English writers and affairs: I have considerably increased my catalogue of the lives of eminent men. He likewise enriched the common library of the Cathedral of Peterborough with some very useful books; and added to the stock of monuments and records there, an abstract of the collections made by Dr. John Colens, one of his Predecessors, afterwards Bishop of Durham.

[Z] In 1715 he published a Sermon, intitled, The witchcraft of the present rebellion.] It was printed at London

(14) Ibid. pag. 140, 141.

(13) Ibid. pag. 304.

(n) Life of Bishop Kennet, pag. 181, 182.

pieces [AA]. In 1717 he was engaged in a dispute with Dr. William Nicholson, Bishop of Carlisle, relating to some pretended alterations in the Bishop of Bangor's famous Sermon [BB]; and disliked the proceedings of the Convocation against that Bishop. This with his zeal for the repeal of the Schism Bill rendered him very obnoxious to those of a different party (n). Upon the death of Dr. Cumberland Bishop of Peterborough he was promoted to that See, to which he was consecrated November the 9th 1718. In this Bishopric, having fate little more than ten years, he died at his house in St. James's Street Westminster on Thursday December the 19th 1728, and was interred at Peterborough. Besides his writings abovementioned, he published several others [CC]. Mr. Wood (o) (o) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1132. represents London under the following title: The witchcraft of the present rebellion. A Sermon preached in the Church of St. Mary Aldermary in the city of London, on Sunday September 25, 1715, the time of a publick ordination. Published upon the request of the bearers.

[AA] And afterwards several other pieces.] *A reasonable discourse of the rise, progress, and discovery, and utter disappointment of the gun powder treason and rebellion plotted by the Papists in 1605, 3d of James I. as delivered in a Sermon preached at the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London, on the 5th of November 1715, before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, &c. London 1715. The wisdom of looking backwards to judge the better on one side and t'other, by the speeches, writings, actions and other matters of fact on both sides for the four last years. London 1715 in 8vo. The faithful steward: A Spittal Sermon preached on Tuesday in Easter Week April the 3d, 1716. London 1716. A thanksgiving Sermon for the Blessing of God in suppressing the late unnatural rebellion; delivered in the parish Church of Aldermary in the city of London, on Thursday the 7th of June 1716. London 1716. A second Letter to the Lord Bishop of Carlisle upon the subject of Bishop Merks, &c. London 1716. in 8vo; dated October 22d 1716. A third letter to the Lord Bishop of Carlisle, Lord Almoner to his Majesty, upon the subject of Bishop Merks: in which the nomination, election, investiture, and deprivation of English Prelates are shewed to have been originally constituted and governed by the Sovereign Power of Kings and their Parliaments; against the pretensions of our new Fanatics, who have withdrawn themselves from the established Church into a separate communion, under the name of some deprived Bishops and their supposed successors. London 1717 in 8vo, dated January 25th 1716-7. The second letter was occasioned by a paper seized among the papers of Mr. Laurence Howell, superscribed a letter to Dr. Kennett, which seemed designed for a dedication or preface to a book, intitled, An answer to the brief History of the Crown of England, written at the time when the bill of exclusion was attempted against the Queen's Father, the Duke of York. The letter prefixed to this complained, that "Dr. Kennett had given a vile character of Bishop Merks, and yet against his will had made him strictly faithful to his "rightful Sovereign".*

[BB] In 1717 he was engaged in a dispute with Dr. William Nicholson, Bishop of Carlisle, relating to some pretended alterations in the Bishop of Bangor's famous sermon.] This sermon having been attacked by Dr. Andrew Snape, the Bishop published an Answer, in which, upon occasion of a report spread by some persons about the town, that he was put upon preaching that sermon at Court, to serve some political ends, he uses these words; God knows, I preached what I found there [in the New Testament] without the knowledge of any man living (†). Dr. Snape had been told a story by Dr. Hutchinson inconsistent with the Bishop's positive and solemn declaration, namely, that the sermon was preached with the knowledge and submitted to the correction of a certain person, who advised the making alterations in it. Upon this in the conclusion of his second letter he thus addresses himself to the Bishop: "I must needs say, your evasive equivocal way of writing favours very strongly of such communication [that is, with a Jesuit] and whether the same person may not have helped you to a mental reservation to justify a solemn appeal to God, that what you preached was without the knowledge of any man living, when a living man has testified, that it was preached with his knowledge, and submitted to his correction, your Lordship best knows." Immediately upon the publication of this the Bishop of Bangor called upon Dr. Snape for the proof of what he had asserted; who presently declared, that he had received that account from Dr. Hutchinson, who had heard the Bishop of Carlisle say, that he had spoken with the person, who advised the Bishop of Bangor, upon reading his sermon, to insert such words as absolutely, properly, &c. And that some days after, the same Divine again assured him, that he had heard the same Prelate a second time declare that matter to be true, and that he would justify it to all the world. Upon this Dr. Snape drew up that passage, waited upon the Bishop of Carlisle, read it to him, and was allowed by him to publish it, with an assurance that he would stand to it. This was the substance of Dr. Snape's advertisement; to which the Bishop of Carlisle was persuaded to add, This is true, though he afterwards declared, that it was not strictly so. However being now called upon to name the living man, who was to attest the truth of what he asserted, he fixed on Dr. Kennett, who, he declares, according to the best of his remembrance, was the person, who told him, that the sermon was preached with his knowledge, and submitted to his correction; and that the Doctor advised, and with difficulty prevailed for the inserting the words abovementioned. This was denied by Dr. Kennett in the most solemn manner in all his conversations, public advertisements, and private letters to his friends. The reader may see a particular account of this affair in the Life of Bishop Kennet p. 165 & seqq. and in the Appendix to it.

(†) Answer to the Reverend Dr. Snape's Letter to the Bishop of Bangor, pag. 43. 3d edit.

[CC] Besides his writings abovementioned, he published several others.] A manuscript treatise against Dr. Samuel Parker about the Test (*). The Righteous taken () Wood, Ath. away from the Evil to come, applied to the Death of Oxon. vol. 2. col. Queen Mary; in a Sermon preached in St. Martin's 1132. Church in Oxon, Jan. 20, 1694. A Sermon preached at Bow-Church, London, before the Societies of Reformation, on Monday the 29th of December 1701. Published at their Request. London 1702. The Glory of Children in their Fathers. A Sermon preached in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul before the Sons of the Clergy. December the 3d 1702. Published at the Request of the Stewards. With an Abstract of the Royal Charter erecting a Corporation for relief of poor Widows and Children of Clergymen, and an Account of the Charities annually disposed to those pious Purposes. London 1703. A Sermon preached in the Parish Church of St. Botolph Aldgate in London, on December the 7th 1704, the Day of solemn Thanksgiving for the late glorious Victory obtained over the French and Bavarians by the Forces of her Majesty and her Allies under the Command of the Duke of Marlborough. London 1704. A Thanksgiving Sermon at St. Paul's March the 8th 1707. The Charity of Schools for poor Children recommended. In a Sermon preached in the Parish-Church of St. Sepulchre's May the 16th 1706. London 1706. The Duties of rejoicing in a Day of Prosperity recommended. In a Sermon preached before the Queen at her Royal Chapel at Windsor on Sunday June the 23d 1706. London 1706. The Christian Scholar, in Rules and Directions for Children and Youth sent to English Schools; more especially designed for the poor Boys taught and cloathed by Charity in the Parish of St. Botolph Aldgate. London 1708. The excellent Daughter. A Sermon for the Relief of the poor Girls taught and cloathed by Charity within the Parish of St. Botolph Aldgate: With proper Lessons of the Duties of Daughters. London 1708. Glory to God, and Gratitude to Benefactors. A Sermon preached before the Queen in her Royal Chapel of St. James's on Tuesday the 22d of November 1709, the Day of public Thanksgiving for the signal and glorious Victory at Blaragnies near Mons in Hainault. Published by her Majesty's special Command. London 1709. A Letter to Mr. Barville, a Roman Priest, upon his desire of being reconciled to the Church*

represents him even at his first appearance in the world, as “an excellent Philologist, a good Preacher, whether in English or Latin, and well versed in the Histories and Antiquities of our Nation, and much deserving of the Church of England.” And the author of his Life tells us (p), that he was a man of extensive learning, exemplary character, great zeal in the discharge of his Pastoral and Episcopal Functions, of a charitable and courteous disposition, and of firm probity, courage and resolution in the performance of his duty. “And the same writer in his preface (q) observes, that he had “his imperfections, no doubt; but they were undoubtedly atoned for by many great and excellent virtues. He was of a very communicative and public spirit, would submit to any trouble or fatigue to serve a friend, the public, or posterity. He was a father and true friend of the church; and though he utterly disliked the way of separation, yet he expressed great charity and moderation towards those who are so unhappy as to differ from us. He was a patriot and hearty lover of his country; a champion and faithful assertor of the Protestant Religion; and (what it depends upon in this Kingdom) the Protestant Succession.”

(p) Pag. 185,
1797.

(q) Pag. 10.

of England, dated from Golden Square Crutched Fryars November 30, 1709, printed in a Book intitled, An Account of the late Conversion of Mr. John Barville alias Barton from Popery to the Reformed Church of England: With the form of his solemn Abjuration of the Romish Religion. Written by himself. London 1710 in 8vo. The Works of Charity. In a Sermon preached before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, &c. in the Church of St. Bridget, on Tuesday in Easter Week 1710. London 1710. The Christian Neighbour. A Sermon preached in the Church of St. Lawrence Jewry before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor &c. upon the Election of a Mayor for the Year ensuing on the Feast of St. Michael 1711. London 1711. The Lets and Impediments in planting the Gospel of Christ. A Sermon preached before the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts at their Anniversary Meeting in the Parish Church of St. Mary-le-Bow on Friday Feb. 15, 1711½. With some References relating to Matters of Fact, &c. London 1712. Doing good the Way to Eternal Life. Recommended in a Spittal Sermon preached before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor &c. on Tuesday in Easter-Week the 22d of April 1712. London 1712. The Faithful Steward. A Spittal Sermon preached on Tuesday in Easter-Week, Ap. 3, 1716. London 1716. Dr. Snape instructed in some Matters, especially relating to Convocations and Converts from Popery. London 1718. Charity and Restitution. A Spittal Sermon preached at the Church of St. Bridget on Easter-Munday March the 30th 1719, before the Right Honourable Sir John Ward, Lord Mayor, &c. With an Application to the vain Attempts of a Spanish Invasion in the Year 1588. London 1719. A Sermon preached before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in the Abbey-Church of Westminster the 30th of Jan. 1719. London 1720.

Monitions and Advices delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of Peterborough, at the Primary Visitation held in the Months of July and August 1720. In two Parts. Published at the Request of the Clergy, for their Use and Service. London 1720 in 4to. An Introduction to a new edition of a book intitled, A Discourse concerning the Laws Ecclesiastical and Civil made against Hereticks by Popes, Emperors, and Kings, Provincial and General Councils, approved by the Church of Rome, &c. London 1723 in 8vo. Bishop Kennett in his Introduction intimates, that this discourse was written by Dr. Maurice; but it since appears, that Dr. Daniel Whitby was the true author of it. See Dr. Whitby's Twelve Sermons preached at the Cathedral Church of Sarum, p. 256. and A short Account of Dr. Whitby, p. 5. prefixed to his Last Thoughts. In 1726 our author published at London in 4to. A Treatise of Gavellkind, both Name and Thing. Shewing the true Etymology and Derivation of the one, the Nature, Antiquity, and Original of the other. With sundry emergent Observations both pleasant and profitable to be known of Kentish Men and others, especially such as are studious either of the antient Custom, or the Common Law of this Kingdom. By (a Well-Willer to both) William Somner. The Second Edition corrected from the many Errors of the former Impression. To which is added the Life of the Author, written, newly revised, and much enlarged. Our author's last work was, A Register and Chronicle Ecclesiastical and Civil; containing Matters of Fact delivered in the Words of the most Authentic Books, Papers, and Records, digested in exact Order of time. With proper Notes and References towards discovering and connecting the True History of England from the Restoration of King Charles II. London 1728 in fol. T.

☞ KENNETT (BASIL), a learned English writer, and brother of the preceding, was educated in Corpus Christi College in the University of Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor and Master of Arts, and became Fellow of that College. In 1706 he went over Chaplain to the English Factory at Leghorn, where he met with great opposition from the Papists, and was in danger of the inquisition [A]. He returned to England about the year 1713, and was elected President of Corpus Christi College, and became Doctor of Divinity, He died in the year 1714. He published the Lives of

[A] Where he met with great opposition from the Papists, and was in danger of the Inquisition.] The author of the Life of Dr. White Kennett, Bishop of Peterborough (1) tells us, that the Italians were so jealous of the Northern Heresy, especially the Priests and Regulars were so watchful against it, that the English nation and Minister were forced to begin the exercises of religion with the utmost privacy and caution, to give as little offence as possible. And yet great offence was taken at it, and complaints and informations immediately sent to Florence and to Rome. The Envoy at Florence, Dr. Newton, did all the matter could bear to insist on the right of the English merchants, to have a Minister among them of their own religion; and offered to undertake, that he should not publicly reflect on the religion of the country, nor attempt to bring over any of the Duke's subjects to the Protestant persuasion. But the Pope and the Court of Inquisition at Rome were resolved to expell hereby and the public teacher of it from the confines of the Holy See; and therefore secret orders were given to apprehend Mr. Kennett at Leghorn, and to hurry him away to Pisa, and thence to some other prison, to bury him alive, or otherwise dispose of him in the severest manner. Upon notice of this design upon him, the English Envoy at Florence interposed his offices in that court, but could obtain no other answer, but that he might send for the English Preacher, and keep him in his own family as his Domestic Chaplain; but that otherwise if he presumed to continue at Leghorn, he must take the consequences of it; for in those matters of religion the Court of Inquisition was superior to all civil powers. The Envoy communicated this answer of the Great Duke to the Earl of Sunderland, one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, who, in her Majesty's name returned the following directions.

“ To

(1) Pag. 57, 1797. edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

of the Greek Poets, the Roman Antiquities, and a volume of Sermons preached at Leghorn; and translated into English Puffendorf's treatise of the Law of Nature and Nations. He was a man of the most exemplary integrity, generosity, and modesty.

" To Dr. Henry Newton, her Majesty's Envoy in the " Court of Florence.

" Sir,
" Yours of the 16th and 24th I received. In answer to which, I have laid the whole affair before her Majesty, who has commanded me to order you to tell the Great Duke and his Ministers, in her Majesty's name, that if there be any molestation given to her Chaplain residing at Leghorn, she shall look upon it as an affront done to her self and the nation, a breach of peace, and a violation of the law of nations; and shall by her fleets and armies, which will be all the year in the Mediterranean Sea, not only demand, but take satisfaction for any such injury offered. And that the Priest of the Great Duke's Minister here, and all frequenters of his Chapel must expect the same treatment. And if they talk any more of the Pope or Court of Rome, you must cut the matter short, by telling them, her Majesty has nothing to do with that Court, but shall treat with the Great Duke as with other independent Princes and States. And this you must do in the most forcible manner possible. I have no more at present to add, but am
" Your humble servant
" Sunderland."

Before this letter could reach Florence, the English Envoy was extremely embarrassed with the difficulties of treating for the protection and security of Mr. Kennett, and could find no expedient more proper for the present, than to invite him earnestly to his house at Florence, and there cover him till the affair should be adjusted, and for that purpose to send him a qualification as his Domestic Chaplain. But the English Consul and Factory at Leghorn would not readily consent to let him go away, as fearing that if this point was once gained, he would never be allowed to return. Nor was Mr. Kennett himself willing to consult his own safety by seeming to forsake his charge; and therefore continued there, though in the utmost danger. He was forced to confine himself to his chamber, and to have an armed guard at the stair's foot; and when in some evenings he went out for the air, he walked between two English merchants, who with their swords drawn resolved and declared, that no body should dare to seize him but at their peril. But as soon as the Earl of Sunderland's letter came to the Envoy's hands, and was by him communicated to the Duke and his Ministers, the contents of it were soon by them imparted to the Pope and his Cardinals, who so well understood the argument of fleets and armies, that Mr. Kennett escaped their intended fury, and continued for several years to officiate as a Minister of the Church of England in a large room, set apart for a Chapel, in the Consul's house, with public prayers, and a course of sermons since published to the world. When he had seen himself well established in this privilege, and had so laid the foundation of it, he began to think that the having a successor in that place upon the same bottom would be the best confirmation; and therefore earnestly importuned his brother, the Dean of Peterborough, to find out a fit person to succeed him. And he had indeed the greater reason to insist upon coming home, because his constitution did not agree with that warmer climate in his abstemious way of living. However, he declared, that he would not stir till he saw a successor upon the spot to relieve him. This at last, after great delay and obstructions from the Queen's New Ministry, was obtained, and Mr. Kennett was succeeded by Mr. Nathaniel Taubman, who had been Chaplain in her Majesty's fleet in the Mediterranean, and had published an account of the expedition (2).

(2) Ibid. pag. 57-101.

KEPLER (JOHN) one of the greatest Astronomers of his age, was born at Wief in the country of Wirtemberg December the 27th 1571. He began his studies of Philosophy at Tubingen in 1589, and two years after studied Mathematics in the same University under the famous Michael Mœstlin. He made so great a progress in it, that in the year 1595 he wrote an excellent book, which was printed at Tubingen the year following under the title of Prodromus Dissertationum de proportione Orbium caelestium, deque causis caelerum numeri, magnitudinis, motuumque periodicorum geminis & propriis, &c. He had been before invited to Gratz in Styria, to teach Mathematics there (a). Tycho Brahe having settled in Bohemia, and obtained from the Emperor all the sorts of conveniences for the perfecting of Astronomy, was passionately desirous of having Kepler with him, and wrote to him so many letters upon that subject, that he prevailed upon him to leave the University of Gratz, and remove into Bohemia with his family and library in the year 1600 (b). Kepler in this journey was seized by a quartan ague, which continued seven or eight months, so that he could not do Tycho Brahe all the services which he was capable of. He was even a little dissatisfied with the reservedness which Tycho shewed towards him (c); for the latter did not communicate to him all that he knew; and as he died in 1601, he did not give time to our Kepler to be very useful to him, or to receive any considerable advantage under him. From that time Kepler enjoyed the title of Mathematician to the Emperor all his life (d), and gained more and more reputation by his works [A]. The Emperor Rodolphus ordered him to finish the Tables of Tycho,

(a) Taken from Gassendus, de Vita Tyconis Brahei, lib. 5. pag. m. 451.

(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 456, and 459.

(c) Idem, pag. 460.

(d) See the remark [F].

[A] He gained . . . a great reputation by his works.] I shall only give the titles of some of his books. Harmonices mundi Libri V. Apologia pro sua Harmonica mundi contra Demonstrationem analyticam Roberti de Flaubibus. De Cometis Libri tres. Ad Vitellionem Paralipomena, quibus Astronomiae pars optica traditur. Epitome Astronomiae Copernicanae. Astronomia nova, seu Physica caelestis tradita Commentariis de motibus stellae Martis ex Observationibus Tyconis Brahei. Chilias Logarithmorum in totidem numeros rotundos. Supplementum Chilias Logarithmorum. Nova Stereometria doliorum vinariorum & Stereometriae Archimedeae supplementum. Dioptrice. De vero natali anno Christi.

Eclogae Chronicae de tempore Herodis Herodiadumque, baptismi, ministerii, passionis, mortis, & resurrectionis Christi, deque tempore Belli Judaici. Tyconis Brahei Hyperaspistes adversus Scipionis Claramontii Anti-Tyconem in aciem productus. This is sufficient to shew, that our Kepler was not one of those genius's, who are confined to a narrow sphere; his activity extended to a great number of objects. See in the body of this article the title of the first book, which he published. It is the same with his Mysterium Cosmographicum, and was that of all his works which he esteemed most. He was so charmed with it for some time, that he owned, that he would not renounce the glory of (e) See Gassendus, lib. 6. pag. 471.

(f) They were published under that title.

Tycho (e), which were to be called the Rodolphine Tables (f). Kepler applied himself to it with vigour, but the Treasurers were so ill affected towards him [B], that he could not publish them till the year 1627. He died in November 1630 at Ratibon, where he was soliciting the payment of the arrears of his pension (g). LEWIS KEPLER, (g) Gassendus, his son, Physician at Konigsberg in Prussia, finished the impression of his father's Somnium, Lunarisve Astronomia, and was apprehensive, lest it should occasion his death [C].

John

of the discoveries, which he had given an account of in that book for the Electorate of Saxony. Thomas Lanfius in Mantissa Orat. p. 792. memorat, Keplerum aliquando à se rogatum, quem ex editis a se Libris loco dignaretur præcipuo, primatum dedisse Mysterio Cosmographico, testatum in illo scripto quinque corporum regularium sublime secretum tot sæculis absconditum pandi: inventum autem illud, cum adhuc recens esset, tanti se fecisse, ut, si eodem tempore Saxonie Electoratus sibi dono oblatus fuisset, additâ Conditione, alterutrum, aut donum aut inventionem repudiandi, amplissimâ & tot metallorum copiis scetâ provinciâ excidere, quam invidenda & perpetuam Gloriam secum ductura inventionem carere maluerit (1). i. e. "Thomas Lanfius in Mantissa Orat. p. 792. tells us, that Kepler being once asked by him, which of the books published by him he esteemed most, gave the preference to his Mysterium Cosmographicum, declaring that in this book the sublime secret of the five regular bodies, which had lain hid so many ages, was discovered; and that he valued that discovery so much, when it was new, that if the Electorate of Saxony had been offered to him at the same time, upon condition of renouncing either the offer or the invention, he would rather have refused that extensive principality so well furnished with metals, than have quitted an invention, which would bring him immortal honour."

(1) König, Bibliothec. pag. 444. in Vocæ Keplerus.

[B] The Treasurers were so ill affected towards him. Unhappy are those learned men, who depend upon those Gentlemen, and who cannot compleat a work, without the good humour of the Intendants of the Finances; a set of men, who in order to serve their Prince well, are obliged to weary out by a thousand difficulties those who have pensions from him. They leave him by this means the reputation of liberality without its coiting him much. I make use of Gassendus's words to shew the discontent of Kepler. Alacriter quidem ille se accinxit; verum illæ brevi, ac aliæ deinceps, partim ex operis naturâ, partim ex sergiverfatione Præfectorum ærarii, suburbæ suere difficultates, ut priusquam Tabulæ perfectæ evulgatæque fuerunt, annus sæculi XXVII adventarit. Conquestus est certè ab annis II. ac III. configi se limis Præfectorum oculis; & cum anno IX. specimen Laboris insignis, Commentaria de Motibus Stellæ Martis edidisset, ac Rodolphus præter editionis impensas, persolvi illi confestim mandasset, tum stipendorum residua, quæ, inquit, ad duo millia monetæ argentæ majoris excreverant, tum aliæ insuper duo millia; exoptulabat tamen adhuc biennio post, decreta Rodolphi in se munificentissima nullum eventum consequi, ac se incassum facere sumptus, pulfæ regue jam Camera Silesiæ, jam Imperialis ærarii fores (2). i. e. "He applied himself vigorously to it; but such difficulties arose in a short time, partly from the nature of the work, and partly from the delay of the Treasurers, that the Tables were not finished and published till the year 1627. He complained, that from the year 1602 and 1603 he was looked upon by the Treasurers with a very invidious eye; and when in 1609 he had published a noble specimen of the work, and the Emperor Rodolphus had given orders, that besides the expence of the edition, he should immediately be paid the arrears of his pension, which, he said, amounted to two thousand crowns, and likewise two thousand crowns more; yet, he complained, that it was not till two years after, that the generous orders of Rodolphus in his favour were put in execution, and that he in vain knocked at the door of the Silesian and Imperial Chamber." Kepler met with no less discouragement from the Financiers under the Emperor Matthias, than under Rodolphus. Licet anno insequente Matthias Rudolphi successor & continuari stipendia, & exsolvi residua jussisset, querebatur tamen anno XVI. exspectare se adhuc mandatorum exoptatissimum effectum (3). He had occasion to continue his patience under the Emperor Ferdinand; but at last he received his arrears. Perseverarunt adhuc querelæ post exactum XIX, quo Ferdinandus Matthiæ successit, etiamque post XXI, quo edidit partem Doctrinæ Copernicæ theoreticam, juxta quam deductio tabularum foret: quousque optimus imperator rebus licet nondum penitus compositis etiam vetera, quæ Antecessores debebant, stipendia persolvit, ac ut necessarii ad murationem editionemque Operis sumptus suppeditarentur mandavit (4). i. e. "His complaints continued still after the year 1619, when the Emperor Matthias was succeeded by Ferdinand, and likewise after 1621, when he published the theoretical part of the Copernican Doctrine, according to which the Tables were to be deduced; until the good Emperor, tho' his affairs were not then entirely settled, ordered the payment of what was due to him of the pension allowed his predecessors, and commanded, that the necessary expences for finishing the edition of the work should be furnished to him." The punctuality in the payment of his pension was interrupted; for the reason why he went to Ratibon in 1630 was, that he had occasion to solicit there the payment of his arrears. Cum anno XXX. ad Comitium Ratibonensia, ut stipendorum residua postularer, se contulisset, incidit in ardentem febrim, exque eâ . . . obiisse initio Decembris, ut certè ad Deodatum scripsit Beneggerus, cum & eximius Eichladius ad me scripsisset, fuisse eum catarrho extintum, quem apostemata quedam cerebri ob nimiam equitationem præcesserant (5).

(2) Gassendus in Vita Tyconis Brabæ, lib. 6. pag. m. 471.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Idem, ibid.

[C] Lewis Kepler . . . was apprehensive lest the care of the impression of his father's Somnium . . . should occasion his death. The last work, which John Kepler wrote, was the Description of the Moon: he had not the satisfaction of publishing it, for he died during the course of the impression. James Bartschius his son-in-law, and faithful follower in his astronomical opinions, undertook the care of this book, and continued the impression, but was interrupted in this employment by death. Lewis Kepler, the author's son, was so surprized at these accidents, that he was with great difficulty prevailed upon to undertake the care of this book. He was fearful of losing his life as his father and brother-in-law had done; and his mother-in-law, John Kepler's widow, who in very narrow circumstances had a burthen of children, was obliged to make use of many entreaties and arguments to engage him in that work. At last she succeeded. A learned Professor of Utrecht has made use of these circumstances in order to explode Kepler's doctrine concerning the world in the moon. Unum, says he, præterire nequeo, quod spectat Selenographiæ Keplerianæ natales; unde jure merito malè ominor Levaniæ ejusque incolis. i. e. "I cannot omit one thing relating to the birth of Kepler's Selenography, whence I think it to be an ill omen to Levania and its inhabitants." He gives an account of the death of our author and of Bartschius, and then adds. Ista verò ut intellexit Ludovicus Keplerus, Johannis filius, novæ viduæ inopis ac liberis onustæ precibus atque erga patrium nomen affectu vix vinci potuit, ut libelli inchoatæ editioni absolvendæ manum admoveret, territus (quod ipse fatetur) improvise & patris & affinis obitu, metuensque ne cum illis in Levaniam relegaretur (6). i. e. "As soon as Lewis Kepler, the son of John, understood this, he could scarce be prevailed upon by the entreaties of his mother-in-law, who was a widow, and poor, and burthened with children, and by the regard due to his father's name, to take upon him the finishing the edition of the book, which had been begun, being terrified, as he was, by the sudden death of his father and brother-in-law, and fearing lest he should be banished with them into Levania." I have not seen any writer, who has fallen with such severity upon Kepler as Schoockius, as if this great mathematician had made himself the most ridiculous of all men by endeavouring to accommo-

(6) Gerardus de Vries, in Differentiatione de Lunæ, pag. 253, 254. It is printed with the Psychologia of Daniel Voet, at Utrecht 1688.

John Kepler's notions are sometimes very singular ; one would imagine, that he ascribed to the earth a soul endued with sense [D]. It is said, that he furnished excellent hints to Des Cartes [E]. We may place him among those authors, who have said, that they esteemed date the speculations of mathematicians to the explanation of natural philosophy. I do not think that this design can ever succeed ; for the object of mathematics and that of natural philosophy are things irreconcilable ; the one is a quantity which subsists only ideally, and cannot subsist in any other manner ; the other exists out of our mind, and cannot really be in it. However that be, let us see the severe expressions of Schoockius. Ubi Mathematicus, nemo eodem (Johanne Keplero) melior & subtilior, ubi vero Physicus, nemo eodem pejor atque ineptior, ut sapissimè doleam, si non ingemiscam, virum tam eximium, divinam illam Mathefin nugamentis suis Physicis adè seadè commaculasse. Quid absurdius enim vel fabricitans anus in somnio videat, quam quod terra ingens animal sit, quæ per montium crateres & caminas, seu os aut naves, ventos exspiret ! & hoc tamen expressè docet, Lib. 4. Harmonicæ Cap. 7. ubi serio quoque probare nititur, quod terra cum cælo sympathiam colat, & naturali instinctu fiderum posituram cognoscat. Similiter in scripto de Motibus Martis fol. 173. contendit solem magnum magnetem seu magneticum corpus esse, supra proprium centrum diurno motu circumactum, quod secundum speciem quandam diffusam, omnes reliquas Planetarum sphaeras commoveat, & in orbem agitet. Nec sic Keplerus solum, per Mathefin imprudenter & infeliciter Physicæ applicatam, in errorum præcipitum ruit, sed cum eo multi quoque alii, quorum indicem alio in scripto, si Deo placuerit vitam prorogare, exhibebo (7). i. e. "Where he writes as a mathematician, "no person performs better or more subtilly than he ; "where he acts the natural philosopher, no person "perhaps writes more absurdly ; so that I am often "greatly sorry, that so excellent a man should disagree the divine science of mathematics with his "physical absurdities. For what could an old woman "in a fever dream more ridiculous, than that the "earth is a vast animal, which breathes out the winds "through the holes of the mountains, as it were "through a mouth and nostrils ? Yet he writes expressly "thus in the fourth book and seventh chapter of his "Harmonica Mundi, where he endeavours likewise seriously to prove, that the earth has a sympathy with "the heavens, and by a natural instinct perceives the position of the stars. In his book De Motibus Martis "fol. 173, he also asserts, that the sun is a great "magnet or magnetic body, carried round upon "its own center in a diurnal motion, and by a certain diffused power carries round the rest of the "planets. Nor has Kepler alone fallen into gross "errors by the imprudent and unfortunate application "of mathematics to natural philosophy, but likewise "many others have done the same, a catalogue of "whom I shall exhibit, if God shall continue my "life, in another tract."

[D] One would imagine, that he ascribed to the earth a soul endued with sense.] Vossius having remarked how absurd it was to rank the earth among the Gods, the earth, I say, which all the world took for a body, and trod upon, and covered with all kinds of filth ; adds, that the wisest men saw the absurdity of this, and said, that the earth was either an animal, or a part of the vast animal called the world (8). Kepler, continues he, was not far from that opinion ; for he says not only, that the diurnal motion of the earth arises from the earth, but also that it perceives the appearance of Comets, that it sweats for fear, and that this is the cause of rain. "Audiemus eum loquentem Libro de "Cometis anni post millesimum & sexcentimum septimi, atque item duodevigesimi : Facultas mundi "sublunaris cometam PERSENTISCIT ET OBSTUPESCIT, unaque facultates ceteræ omnium rerum sublunarium. Ac postea : Facultas Telluris, insolenti Cometæ apparitione CONSTERNATA, uno terrestris superficie loco multum exsudet vaporum, pro qualitate "illius partis sui corporis : hinc diurnæ pluvie & eluviones" (9). i. e. "Let us hear him speaking "in his book of the comets of the year 1607 and "1618 : The faculty of the sublunary world perceives "and is terrified at the comet, and together with it the "other faculties of all sublunary things. And afterwards : The Faculty of the earth being terrified at "the unusual appearance of the comet, in one part "of the surface of the earth sweats out a great quantity of vapour, according to the quality of that part "of its body ; hence proceed great rains and floods". Gassendi observes, that according to Kepler all the stars are animated, and that as all animals move by means of their muscles, the earth and planets have also muscles proportioned to their bulk, which are the instruments, by which they move. He gives the sun a very noble and active soul, and asserts that the rays of the sun put in action the soul of the planets. Adnoto duntaxat Keplerum ita sidera fecisse animata, ac ut instrumenta motus in Animalibus sunt fibræ digestæ per musculos ; sic censuisse illum, esse & in Terrâ & in Planetis cæteris ingentes fibras aliquas pro ratione molis cujusque, per quas Anima vim suam matricem exercent. Censuit vero etiam, præter speciales Animas & vires, quæ insunt in cæteris, esse in ipso Sole Animam nobilissimam, potentissimamque, quæ dum solem circa proprium Axem (a centro Mundi propterea non discedentem) circumagat, immateriatas species (sic enim appellat) irradiando circumfundit, quibus Planetæ velut correpti ipsi soli circumducantur (10). See what I quote from Leibnitz (11), and observe, that it would be very difficult to refute Kepler's supposition, for we are no more capable of knowing whether the earth be animated, than a louse is of knowing whether we are animated. A louse is contented with nourishing itself with what it sucks from the surface of our bodies : it knows not whether we think ; it cannot even discover the inward springs, which move us. Can we make any more discoveries with regard to the question, whether the earth thinks, and has sensations, which like ours determine certain inward springs to move in a certain manner ?

[E] It is said, that he furnished excellent hints to Des Cartes.] Here is what Baillet acknowledges ; Kepler, says he (12), bad particularly cultivated astronomy and optics ; and though he left a great many things to be discovered and perfected, it must be owned, that the reading of his writings was not useless to Monsieur Des Cartes. In another place (13) he mentions three things, which seem to have been common to Des Cartes with Kepler. "The first is the knowledge of the celestial vortices, "of which Kepler is said to have had at least a confused notion, as well as Jordano Bruno. The second "is the explication of gravity, which Kepler first of all gave by the comparison of small bits of straw, "which by the motion of water turned round in a vessel, gather in the centre. The third is the knowledge of optics, in which Des Cartes owned Kepler for his master in 1638. Here is the testimony, "which he gave of it to father Merfennus. That "person says he (*), who charges me with having "borrowed of Kepler the Ellipsis and Hyperbola's of "my dioptrics, must be very ignorant or malicious. "For with regard to the Ellipsis, I do not remember "that Kepler speaks of it ; or, if he speaks of it, it "is certainly to say, that it is not the Anaclastic, "which he seeks. And as for the Hyperbola, I remember very well, that he pretends to demonstrate expressly, that it is not that neither, though he says it is not very different from it. Now I leave you to think, whether I could have learned that a thing "was true from a man, who endeavours to prove it "to be false. Notwithstanding this I own, that "Kepler was my first master in optics, and that he "understood more of it than all who preceded him." Mr. Leibnitz, whose words I have quoted concerning the vortices, touches in another place upon what relates to gravity. He pretends that we owe to Kepler the cause of this Phænomenon, and charges Des Cartes with having made use of this excellent discovery, without ascribing the invention to the person, to whom it was due. Ipsi (Keplero) primum indicium debetur veræ causæ gravitatis, & hujus naturæ Legis, a qua gravitas pendet, quod corpora rotata conantur à centro recedere per tangentem, & ideo si in aquâ festucae vel palcæ innatent, rotato vase, aqua in vorticem acta, festucas densior, atque ideo fortius quam ipse, excussa a medio, festucas versus centrum compellit ; quemadmodum ipse describit

(7) Martin. Schoockius, de Scepticism, lib. 4. pag. 387, 388.

(8) Vossius, de Origine & Progressu Idolatriæ, lib. 2. cap. 62. sub fin. pag. m. 641.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Gassend. Phys. Sect. 2. lib. 3. cap. 6. Oper. tom. 1. pag. m. 635.

(11) Tamarum tamque constantium Veritatum causas dare non-dam potuit (Keplerus) tum quod Intelligentiæ aut sympathiarum radiationibus inextricatis haberet præpeditam mentem, tum quod non-dum illius tempore Geometria interior & scientia motuum eo quo nunc proficiscitur. Acta Eruditor. Lipsic. 1689. pag. 82, 83.

(12) Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 226.

(13) Tom. 2. pag. 542. He quotes G. G. Leibnitz, tom. 1. Act. Eruditor. Lips. Leibnitz indeed speaks thus, pag. 187. Cl. Speissius ... notat solummodo Cartesio præterire nomen autorum, & exemplum affectu mundanorum Virtutum, ad quos Jordano Bruno & Johannes Keplerus ita digigitum intenderint, ut tantum istud vocabulum ipse desuisse videatur.

(*) Tom. 3. of his Letters, pag. 397.

esteemed a production of the genius above a Kingdom (b). Moreri has committed more faults of omission than of commission [F].

fertè duobus & amplius locis, in Epitome Astronomiæ exposuit; quanquam adhuc subdubitabundus, & suas ipse opes ignorans, nec satis conscius quanta inde sequerentur, tum in Physicâ, tum speciatim in Astronomiâ. Sed bis deinde egregiè usus est Cartesius, eîsî more suo autorem dissimularit (14) i. e. "To Kepler is owing the first discovery of the true cause of gravity and of that law of nature, upon which gravity depends, viz. that bodies whirled round endeavour to recede from the centre in a tangent; and therefore if straws swim in water, in a vessel whirled round, the water being forced into a vortex, and more dense than the straws, and therefore driven from the centre more strongly than they, forces the straws towards the centre; as he has expressly taught in more than two places in his Epitome Astronomiæ, though he was a little doubtful, and knew not his own ability, and was not sensible what great things would follow from this in Natural Philosophy, and especially in Astronomy. But Des Cartes afterwards made an excellent use of this, though according to his custom, he takes no notice of the author". See the Bishop of Avranches (15), who quotes some passages from Kepler, reproaching Des Cartes with having stolen a great many things from that German.

(14) Acta Erudit. Lips. 1689. pag. 83.

(15) In Censurâ Philosoph. Cartesianæ, cap. 8. pag. m. 216.

[F] Moreri has committed more faults of omission than commission.] The faults of the first kind will easily appear to those, who shall take the pains to compare his article with this. What would it be, if it were compared with an article, which contains what I have not taken notice of? Here follow his faults of commission. I. The Name of the Emperor, who succeeded Rodolphus, was not Matthew, but Matthias. These two names are very different, and no person ought to have known it better than Moreri, who as a priest read his breviary every day. Are not the feasts of St. Matthew and of St. Matthias different? II. He should not have said, that Kepler died about the year 1620; it should be 1630. an error of ten years is not pardonable, when the question is concerning a great man of our own age. III. He should not have said, that John Kepler is different from Lewis Kepler; but that Lewis Kepler was the son of John Kepler.

Moreri might very easily have avoided the first (16) Vossius, de error, since Vossius, whom he copies, writes thus: Scientiis Mathematicis Rodolphi Imperatoris, exinde MATTHIÆ, tandem & Ferdinandi Cæs. Mathematicus fuit (16). i. e. (17) Gassend. de Vitâ Tycho. "He was mathematician at first to the Emperor Rodolphus, then to MATTHIAS, and at last to Ferdinand". I shall take this opportunity to observe, that before Kepler had this title, he had been Professor at Gratz in Styria. His engagement with Tycho Brahe was very near being broke off, because the states of Styria did not approve of it. Ex inopinato Literarum patris conditionibus stare, quod à Styriæ proceribus, quorum in ære erat, undequaque non probarentur (17). Tycho informed Kepler, that he had procured for him a larger stipend at the Emperor's Court, with the title of mathematician to his Imperial Majesty; and that therefore the loss of the pension given him in Styria ought not to stop him (18). Upon this Kepler left the University of Gratz. The Emperor Rodolphus made him his mathematician; but he engaged him to serve Tycho as an arithmetician (19). I find that the Emperor Matthias gave Kepler a fixed settlement at Lints, and appointed him a salary from the states of upper Austria, which was paid for sixteen years. Neque enim sibi satis esse, quod Cæsar etiam ante Imperium decrevisset idoneam fixamque sedem Lintii, ac adjecisset exhibenda à Proceribus Austriæ supra-Anisane stipendia, quibus, donec res paciores evaderent, sustentaretur, uti & fuit illis reipsa per annos sexdecim sustentatus (20). This is the reason why Vossius speaking of the Stereometria printed in 1617, styles Kepler Cæsaris Matthias & illustrium Ordinarum Archiducalis Austriæ supra Onasum Mathematicus (21). i. e. "Mathematician to the Emperor Matthias and the illustrious states of Archiducal Austria above the Onasus". I find also that Walftein settled Kepler at Sagan in Silesia, and that it was there that this astronomer published the continuation of his Ephemerides in 1630 (22). Deinceps autem anno xxx post editas Sagani Silesiorum (ubi Dux Meckelburgi Wulfstemius sedem illi tribuerat) Ephemeridas (24) ad Comitata Ratisbonensia... se contulisse. (23) It is thus in my edition of Gassendus. It should be Walfsteinius.

(16) Vossius, de Scientiis Mathematicis, pag. 340.
(17) Gassend. pag. 472.
(18) It is thus in my edition of Gassendus. It should be Walfsteinius.
(19) This must be understood only of the 2d part of the Ephemerides; for the first part was printed at Lintz in 1617.

KERMATIANS, a Sect in Arabia. See the remark [A] of the article of ABUDHAHER.

KESLER (ANDREW), a Lutheran Divine, was born at Cobourg in Franconia in the year 1595. He did not follow the profession of his father, who was a Taylor (a), but applied himself to study, and distinguished himself by his wit, and the progress which he made; which was undoubtedly the reason why Prince John Casimir Duke of Saxony, who had erected a Schola Illustris at Cobourg, gave him a pension (b). He was enabled by this to maintain himself at the University of Jena, and afterwards in that of Wittemberg. He was admitted in the latter into the Faculty of Philosophy, and shewed by several Theses, which he defended, that he was a good master of Logic, and made excellent use of that Science to confute the Socinians [A]. He was sent for from Wittemberg (c) to accept of an employment (d) in the College of Cobourg, and at the end of an year and an half he became Pastor and Superintendent of Eisfeld. He discharged

(a) Spizelius in Templo Honoris, pag. 155.

(b) Kestelus, Epist. Dedicat. Logice Photiniane Examinis.

(c) Spizelius, pag. 156.

(d) Taken from Spizelius, pag. 156.

[A] He was a good master of Logic, and made excellent use of that science to confute the Socinians.] He published a treatise de Principiis Logicis quæ in Photinianorum Librorum Lectione occurrunt, which contains thirteen disputes, which he maintained in the University of Wittemberg: he dedicated it to his patron Prince John Casimir of Saxony. The epistle dedicatory is dated at Wittemberg August 1. 1621. He published a second edition of this work in the same City in 1624 in 4to. It is intitled: Logice Photiniane Examen, seu Principiorum Logicorum, quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio: cui præmissus est Tractatus brevissimus de illegitimo Photinianorum disputandi modo, & legitima ratione pie philosophandi. A new edition, in 8vo, was published at Wittemberg in 1642. Michael Wendelerus, Professor of Philosophy (1), added to it a short preface, in which he ranks among the Socinian writers Smiglecius, who is one of the Jesuits, that have confuted them in the strongest manner. Kessler afterwards attacked the Socinian Metaphysics in a book intitled, Metaphysicæ Photiniane partis generalis examen, seu Principiorum ad generalem Metaphysicæ partem pertinentium, quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio. I have seen only the third edition, which is that of Wittemberg 1648 in 8vo; but I conjecture, that the first is in 1623, for the epistle dedicatory is dated from that City March the 10th, 1623. The Metaphysicæ Photiniane partis specialis Examen, seu Principiorum ad specialem Metaphysicæ partem pertinentium quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio was published, if I am not mistaken, in 1626; for the author's Epistle dedicatory is dated at Eisfeld January 14th that year. I have seen only the third edition, which is that of Wittemberg 1648 in 8vo. He attacks likewise the Physics of the Socinians; the epistle dedicatory of his Physicæ Photiniane Examen, seu Principiorum Physicorum quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, consideratio, is dated at Eisfeld January 1. 1628. I have seen only the Wittemberg edition of 1656 in 8vo, there is a great deal of method and exactness in these treatises.

(1) At Wittemberg.

charged that employment with success, and upon that account Prince John Casimir would not permit him to accept of the Superintendance of the Churches of the whole country of Eisenac. He took the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and at last submitted to a call to Steinfurt. He was offered the Superintendance of the Church; he excused himself, but readily accepted it after he had the misfortune to lose his Library, when the Imperial troops plundered the town of Eisfeld in 1632. Besides the Superintendance of the Church, he had also at Steinfurt the direction of the College, when he was recalled to Cobourg to succeed the Superintendant of the Churches. He discharged this post with applause. His Sermons were very famous on account of his eloquence and learning. He was seized with an Apoplexy in the pulpit (e), and after having languished some months, died May the 5th 1643 (f). He wrote a great number of books [B], some in Latin, and others in High Dutch, part of which only have been published.

(e) Taken from Spizelius, pag. 156.

(f) Henn. Witte, in Diario Biographico.

[B] He wrote a great number of books.] We have the titles of them in the Templum Honoris referatum of Spizelius (z), and in the Diarium Biographicum of Henningus Witte, but without any mention of the time or place of the impression. I have remedied this defect as far as I could with regard to the books, which I have mentioned in the preceding remark. I cannot continue it with regard to the rest, which are Traclatus de Consequentia: Quadriga Discursuum Philosopho Theologicorum: Historia Epiphaniae Dominicae. Responso belli ubiquistici Laurentio Forero opposita, &c.

(z) Pag. 160, & seq.

(a) Memoirs of the Life of Mr. John Kettlewell. Wherein is contained some Account of the Transactions of his Time. Compiled from the Collections of Dr. George Hickes and Robert Nelson Esq; pag. 1. edit. London 1718, in 8vo.

KETTLEWELL (JOHN), a learned Divine in the seventeenth Century, was descended from an ancient family of good note in the North-Riding of Yorkshire (a), and was son of Mr. John Kettlewell of North-Allerton in Yorkshire by Mrs. Elizabeth Ogle his wife. He was born at Brompton a village in the parish of North-Allerton March the 10th 1653 (b). In 1670 he was sent to St. Edmund Hall in Oxford (c), where he became Servitor to Dr. Thomas Tully, then Principal of that Hall, and pupil to Mr. John Marsh, Vice-Principal thereof (d). June the 25th 1674 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e); and on the 28th of July 1675 was elected Fellow of Lincoln-College (f). May the 3d 1677 he took the degree of Master of Arts (g). Afterwards entering into holy Orders, he became Chaplain to the Countess of Bedford (h), and not to William Lord Russel, as Mr. Wood asserts (i); and in 1682 was presented to the Vicarage of Coles-Hill in Warwickshire by Simon Lord Digby (k). October the 4th 1685 he married Mrs. Jane Lybb, daughter of Anthony Lybb of Hardwick in Oxfordshire Esq; a Gentleman of an estate of a thousand pounds a year (l). After the Revolution he was deprived of his Living on account of his refusal to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary. He published several works [A], and died of a consumption at his lodgings in Grey's-Inn-Lane in Holbourn April the 12th 1695, and was interred in the Church of All-Hallows Barking near the Tower of London, where a monument

(c) Wood, Fassi Oxon. vol. 2. col. 195.

(f) Idem, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(g) Idem, Fassi Oxon. vol. 2. col. 206.

(b) Ibid. pag. 6, 7.

(c) Ibid. pag. 21.

(d) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 923. 2d edit. London 1721, and Memoirs, pag. 20.

(h) Memoirs, pag. 56.

(i) Atben. Oxon. ubi supra.

(k) Memoirs, pag. 61.

(l) Ibid. pag. 120, 121.

[A] He published several works.] I. The Measures of Christian Obedience; or a Discourse shewing what Obedience is indispensably necessary to a Regenerate State, and what Defects consistent with it; for the Promotion of Piety and the Peace of troubled Consciences. London 1681 and 1683 in 4to. It was begun and finished betwixt Easter and Christmas (1). The first edition was dedicated to Dr. Henry Compton Bishop of London; but that dedication was omitted by our author in the edition published after the revolution (2). II. The great Danger of Profuseness and Prodigality, in a Letter to a Friend. Written in June 1681, and published by Mr. Nelson after our author's death in 1704. III. An Help and Exhortation to worthy communicating; or, A Treatise describing the Meaning, worthy Reception, Duty, and Benefits of the Holy Sacrament; and answering the Doubts of Conscience and other Reasons, which most generally detain Men from it. Together with suitable Devotions added. London 1683 &c. in 12mo. IV. The Nature of Edification explained. A Visitation Sermon on 1 Cor. xiv. 12. preached at Coventry May the 7th 1684. London 1684 in 4to. V. A Funeral Sermon for the Lady Frances Digby, who deceased at Coles-Hill 29 Sept. 1684, on Prov. xiv. 32. London 1684 in 4to. VI. The Religious Loyalist; a Visitation Sermon on Matt. xxiii. 21. preached at Coles-Hill August the 28th 1685. London 1686 in 4to. VII. A Sermon preached at Coles-Hill in Warwickshire January the 24th 1685, on occasion of the Death of Simon Lord Digby, who deceased 19 January. London 1686 in 4to. VIII. The Practical Believer: Or the Articles of the Apostles Creed drawn out to form a true Christian's Heart and Practice. Part I. Of the Nature and Certainty of the Christian Faith and Knowledge of God; or an Explication of the Divine Attributes of Providence. Part II. Of the Knowledge of Jesus Christ. London 1689. IX. Five Discourses on so many very important Points of Religion, preached at Coles-Hill, and printed in 1696, though written before the Revolution. X. Of Christian Prudence, or Religious Wisdom not degenerating into irreligi-

(1) Memoirs of the Life of Mr. John Kettlewell, pag. 50.

(2) Ibid. pag. 51, 52.

gious Craftiness in trying times. London 1691 in 8vo. XI. Christianity a Doctrine of the Cross, or Passive Obedience under any pretended Invasion of Legal Rights and Liberties. London 1691 XII. The Duty of Allegiance settled upon its true Grounds, according to Scripture, Reason, and the Opinion of the Church, in answer to a late Book of Dr. William Sherlock, intitled The Case of Allegiance due to Sovereign Powers. London 1691. XIII. Of the New Oaths; against those that take them in a lower sense, and also those that make their Concern for the public Good a sufficient Reason to discharge them from the Obligation of a former Oath of Allegiance. This was never printed. XIV. Of Christian Communion to be kept on in the Unity of Christ's Church, and among the Professors of Truth and Holiness. And of the Obligations both of faithful Pastors to administer Orthodox and Holy Offices; and of faithful People to communicate in the same, &c. In three Parts. London 1693 in 4to. XV. A Companion for the Persecuted: Or an Office for those, who suffer for Righteousness; Containing particular Prayers and Devotions for particular Graces, and for their private and public Wants and Occasions. London 1694 in 12mo. XVI. A Companion for the Penitent and for Persons troubled in Mind, consisting of an Office for the Penitent, to carry on their Reconciliation with God; and a Trial or Judgment of the Soul for discovering the safety of their Spiritual Estate; and an Office for Persons troubled in Mind, to settle them in Peace and Comfort. London 1694 in 12mo. XVII. An Office for Prisoners. Written in 1694, but printed after our author's death 1697. XVIII. Death made comfortable: Or, the Way to die well: Consisting of Directions for a holy and happy Death. London 1695 in 8vo. XIX. An Office for the Sick, and for certain Kinds of Bodily Illness, and for dying Persons; and proper Prayers for the Death of Friends. This was published with the preceding treatise. XX. His Declaration and Profession made by him at the receiving of the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the 23d of March 1694. Printed in half a sheet of Paper.

(m) Ibid. pag. 458, & 477.

was erected to him by his widow [B]. He was a man of great sincerity, piety, meekness, and charity (m).

[B] Where a Monument was erected to him by his widow.] The inscription upon it is as follows.

Quod mori potuit.
JOHANNIS KETTLEWELL, A. M.
Ecclesie Anglicanae Presbyteri
Integerrimi, instructissimiq;
Viri Pietatis, Modestiae singularis;
Ut verbo omnia, verè Christiani.
Qualem fatuare par est
Qui totius Officii nostri Rationes
(Annum adhuc agens vigesimum quartum)

Feliciter adeò atque ex animo explicuit,
Ut dictu baud sit facile, mores alienos
Ad Virtutem Evangelicam efformaverit magis,
An ad vitium depinxerit suos.
Ecclesiae Paroch. de Coles-Hill in Agro Warwick.
Per annos septem in vigila vit,
Pastor fidiſſimus prudentiſſimūq;
Fortunae tandem utriusq; Victor
Animam Deo reddidit April 12^o A. D. 1695. Æt. 42.
Morte tali vitâ dignâ.

H.

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 223. 2d edit. London 1731.

(b) From the College Register.

(c) Wood, ubi supra.

(d) Newcourt, Reportorium, vol. 2. pag. 480.

(e) Ibid., vol. 1. pag. 414.

✶ KIDDER (RICHARD) a learned English Bishop, was born in Suffex (a), and admitted into Emanuel College in the Univerſity of Cambridge June the 5th 1649, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1652, and became Fellow of that College in 1655, and the year following took the degree of Maſter of Arts (b). July the 13th 1658 he was incorporated in the Univerſity of Oxford (c). October the 29th 1664 he became Vicar of Raine Parva in the county of Eſſex (d), which he reſigned upon his being choſen October the 24th 1674 Rector of St. Martin's Outwich in London (e). September the 16th 1681 he was inſtalled Prebendary of Norwich (f). In 1689 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity, as appears from the Registers of the Univerſity of Cambridge; and therefore Mr. Wood is miſtaken in aſſerting that he had that degree ſeveral years before. October the 30th the ſame year he was inſtalled Dean of Peterborough, in the room of Dr. Simon Patrick promoted to the See of Chicheſter (g); and June 13th 1691 he was nominated to the Biſhopric of Bath and Wells, in the room of Dr. Thomas Kenn, deprived for not taking the oaths to King William and Queen Mary; and Auguſt the 30th following was conſecrated to that See (b). He publiſhed ſeveral works [A]. He was killed in his bed with his Lady by the fall of a ſtack of chimneys

(f) Wood, ubi supra.

(g) Le Neve, Faſti Eccleſ. Anglicanae, pag. 241.

(b) Ibid., pag. 34.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] I. The Young Man's Duty. A Diſcourſe ſhewing the neceſſity of ſeeking the Lord betimes; as alſo the danger and unreaſonableneſs of truſting to a late or Death-bed Repentance. Deſigned eſpecially for young Perſons before they are debauched by evil Company and evil Habits. London 1663 in 12mo. There have been ſeveral editions ſince. The ſixth edition was publiſhed in 1690. II. A Diſcourſe concerning the Education of Youths. A Sermon on Ephes. i. 4. London 1673. III. Convivium cœleſte. A plain and familiar Diſcourſe concerning the Lord's Supper, ſhewing at once the nature of that Sacrament, as alſo the right way of preparing ourſelves for receiving of it, &c. London 1674 in 8vo, and reprinted afterwards with Additions. IV. Charity directed: Or the Way to give Alms to the greateſt Advantage. In a Letter to a Friend. London 1677 in 4to. V. The Chriſtian Sufferer ſupported: Or, a Diſcourſe concerning the Grounds of Chriſtian Fortitude, ſhewing at once, that the Sufferings of Good Men are not inconſiſtent with God's ſpecial Providence, &c. London 1680 in 8vo. VI. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor and the Court of Aldermen at Guildhall Chapel on July the 16th 1682. London in 4to. The Text is 1 Pet. iii. 2. VII. A Sermon preached at the Funeral of Mr. William Allen, the 17th of Auguſt 1686 on Heb. xiii. 4. London 1686 in 4to. This Mr. Allen had been a citizen and trader of London, and had written ten books, chiefly in defence of the Church of England, againſt the Anabaptiſts, Quakers, &c. VIII. A ſecond Dialogue between a new Catholic Convert and a Proteſtant, ſhewing why he cannot believe the Doctrines of Tranſubſtantiation, though he do firmly believe the Doctrine of the Trinity. IX. An Examination of Bellarmine's thirteenth Note of the Confefſion of Adverſaries. London 1687 in 4to. X. The Texts, which Papiſts cite out of the Bible for the proof of their Doctrine, Of the Sacrifice of the Maſs, examined. Part I and II. London in 4to. XI. The Judgment of private Diſcretion in Matters of Religion defended; in a Sermon at St. Paul's Covent-Garden. XII. Reſtitions on a French Teſtament printed at Bourdeaux Ann. Dom. 1686. Pretended to be translated out of the Latin into French by the Divines of Louvain. London 1690 in 4to. In the preface having obſerved, that the people have a right to read the Holy Scriptures, he tells us, that "the Church of Rome does not ablo-lutely deny the people this liberty, but reſtrains it; for they have their verſions of the Bible in the ſeveral Popiſh countries in the language of them. But for all that, certain it is, that many of that Church do not only diſparage thoſe holy books, but diſcourage the reading of them. And that Church, inſtead of aſſiſting the devout people in their profitable reading the Holy Scriptures, and furniſhing them with all due means to this purpoſe, hath dealt very inſincerely in the whole matter." He obſerves that it has done this, I. By obtruding the Vulgar Latin as that authentic copy of the Bible, from which, in public diſputes and queſtions, there is no appeal to be allowed, which the Trent Council does. "The verſion of the Vulgar Latin, I grant, ſays Dr. Kidder, is venerable for its antiquity, and is of great uſe in the Church, and is not always to be deſpised or declaimed againſt, where at firſt ſight it does not ſeem perfectly agreeable to the original text; both becauſe it ſometimes gives the true ſenſe, where it ſeems in the letter to differ, and alſo becauſe (in the New Teſtament eſpecially) where it differs from the preſent reading, it does not differ from ſome antient copies. But yet after all, it cannot always be defended. . . . And . . . the moſt famed and allowed commentators and interpreters of the Roman Church, do think fit very frequently to forſake the Vulgar; which I ſhall at any time make good againſt that Church, whenever I ſhall be required to do it. II. By commending that for the verſion of the Vulgar Latin, which is not ſo. After the abovenamed decree of the Trent-Council, the minds of men were in ſuſpenſe and doubtful, becauſe they knew not what copy of the Vulgar Latin to follow. And the Pope did not, for above twenty years after, declare what certain copy ſhould be taken for the authentic Vulgar Latin. Afterwards indeed Pope Sixtus V gave notice to the Chriſtian world what his mind was in this matter, Anno Domini MDLXXXIX. He puts out a Latin Bible, in the preface to which he acquaints the reader, "that agreeably to the foreſaid decree of the Council of Trent, he having called upon God, and relying upon St. Peter's authority, for the public good of the Church, had not thought much to ſet forth that Bible. He repreſents his labour in chooſing the beſt readings; his deſign, that according to the decree of chimneys at his house in Wells during the great storm November the 26th 1703. The Bishop in the Dissertation prefixed to his Commentary on the Five Books of Moses, printed at London in 1694, having reflected upon Monsieur Le Clerc, the latter wrote a letter of complaint to him in Latin dated at Amsterdam November the 5th 1694. The Bishop returned a very civil answer in the same language, dated at Wells November the 9th 1694. Monsieur Le Clerc wrote another letter to him dated at Amsterdam December the 1st 1694. All these letters are published by Monsieur Le Clerc in his Bibliothèque Choisie (i), who tells us (k), that after he had written his last letter, he desired a friend of his to wait on the Bishop, in order to know his Lordship's mind with regard to Monsieur Le Clerc; whose friend wrote to him as follows in a letter dated January the 10th 1695. "I also waited upon the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and having reason to speak to him of his book, which he had done me the honour to give me, I led him on that occasion insensibly into a discourse of you. Whereupon he told me, that he had writ to you, and made the same professions to me that he had done to you; and added, that he would be very ready and glad to do you any service; and all this with such candour and frankness, that I am fully satisfied, he is in good earnest very well inclined towards you, and will be the readier to do you any kindness for what he had said in print. I delivered to him the acknowledgment you desired me, for his letter to you. He told me, he thought he should publish his Comment in Latin, and then in his preface to that he would be careful to give you satisfaction. But that yet he could not alter his opinion, wherein he differed from you. Your Paraphrase he spoke of in high terms of praise and admiration, as excelling any thing the world yet had of that kind." All this, says Monsieur Le Clerc (l), was very well; there was nothing

"the

(i) Tom. 4. Article 10. pag. 364. et seq.

(k) Ibid. pag. 388.

(l) Ibid. pag. 390.

the Trent-Council, the Vulgar Bible might be printed most correct; and his performance, viz. that he had accurately purged this edition from various errors, and with the utmost diligence restored it in pristinam veritatem. i. e. to its ancient verity. After this declares his will, viz. he decrees, that the edition should be taken from that Vulgar Latin, which the Trent-Council declared authentic. And this he tells us, he does ex certâ nostrâ scientiâ, deque Apostolica potestatis plenitudine, i. e. from his own certain knowledge and plenitude of Apostolic authority. And that it ought to be received as such, sine ulla dubitatione aut controversiâ, i. e. without any doubt or controversy. After this Clement VIII puts out his edition of the Vulgar, and requires expressly that that be received also; and this he does in the year 1592. The differences between that of Sixtus V and Clement VIII. are too many to be here related; yet are both these to be received by the authority of the Pope and Council, though they contradict each other; and we shall still be at the pleasure of a Pope to give us another authentic copy. III. The Church of Rome hath done very insincerely in allowing versions, which pretend to be true versions of the Vulgar, which they are not. Dr. Kidder more especially considers those, which were done in the French. There was a French Bible printed at Antwerp by the permission of Charles V in 1530, and reprinted in 1534, which differs from the present Vulgar. But this being done before the Bull of Sixtus V. the Dr. does not insist upon it. After this there was another version of the Vulgar Latin into French by the care of certain Louvain Divines, deputed to this purpose; an edition of which printed at Lyons is frequently referred to by our author in his Reflections. This was a version of great fame and authority in the Church of Rome; and the Testament of Bourdeaux pretends to be done by these Divines. So it was, that tho' this Louvain French Bible was designed to keep the people from reading Protestant editions; yet it was complained of by several of the Church of Rome (as Father Simon relates) as coming too near the sentiments of the Protestants. It appears from Dr. Kidder's Reflections, that this version does not exactly agree with the present Vulgar. Since that there have been many Popish versions in the French tongue, which pretend to be versions of the Latin into French, of the New Testament, in which Dr. Kidder is principally concerned in this piece. The first is that of Anselme, who was chosen by the French Clergy to that employment in 1655. He hath printed his version both with and without notes; the first in 1666; that without notes in 1686. This was printed with the attestation and approbation of several Prelates of France, with the permission of the Archbishop of Paris, and General of his Order. Father Simon in his Critical History of the New Testament says, that he was the first Catholic writer, who applied himself with care to turn the New Testament into French. I will not deny him, says Dr. Kidder, to be a person of diligence and good fame; but yet neither is this a strict version of the Vulgar. The second is the version printed at Moss. This, says the Doctor, is common among us, and hath been often printed, and is of great fame, and upon many accounts a very valuable book. But neither is this a strict version of the Vulgar. The third is the New Testament printed at Bourdeaux, against which Dr. Kidder's Reflections are levelled. It bears the title of Le Nouveau Testament de nôtre Seigneur Jesus Christ traduit de Latin en François par les Théologiens de Louvain. i. e. "The New Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ translated out of the Latin into French by the Divines of Louvain." It was printed at Bourdeaux in 1686, and hath the approbation of two Doctors, viz. Lopez and Germain, as very profitable to those, who shall be permitted and have capacity to read it. It hath also the permission of the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, and it is in that permission affirmed to be reviewed and exactly corrected. "I shall make it appear, says Dr. Kidder, that this is not the true version of the Vulgar Latin; that it is not the work of the Louvain Divines, as is pretended to be; that it agrees neither with the Vulgar, nor the celebrated versions of it, which are allowed in the Roman Church; that it hath a considerable number of downright forgeries and falsifications, a great number of gross errors and mistakes; that it adds to the Vulgar, and takes from it; that it is inconsistent with itself, and by no means corrected as to typographical Errata; in a word, it hath not the authority of ancient copies or various readings to support it. I dare challenge all mankind to defend it. Those of the Church of Rome have inveighed against the Protestant versions. They have pretended that we have no Bible. They have scoffed and derided us on this account. They have boasted, that they have been the faithful preservers of these divine oracles, and that what we have of them, we may thank them for. But lo here a proof of their insincerity; here is that, which may convince any honest man even of their own communion, that is willing to know the truth in this important matter... I did intend in the last reign to have made, and to have published these Reflections; but I could by no means procure this Testament. either here or beyond the seas." XIII. Demonstration of the Messias. In 3 Parts. London 1684, 1699, and 1700, in three volumes in 8vo. XIV. His Charge to the Clergy of his Diocese at his primary Visitation, begun at Azebridge, June 2, 1692. London 1693 in 4to. XV. A Commentary on the Five Books of Moses; with a Dissertation concerning the Author or Writer of the said Books, and a general Argument to each of them. London 1694 in two volumes in 8vo. XVI. A Sermon on the Resurrection. London 1694. XVII. Life of Dr. Anthony Horneck, London 1698 in 8vo. XVIII. Critical Remarks on some passages of Scripture. London 1719 in 8vo. T.

thing wanting, but that Bishop Kidder should take the first opportunity of speaking better of me; as he might have done in the second Part of his Demonstration of the Messiah, published in 1699, where indeed he speaks in a civil manner, but without retracing the odious suggestions which he had cast upon me.

KILIANUS (CORNELIUS), a native of Brabant, distinguished himself as an excellent Corrector of the Press, at the Printing-House of Plantin, for fifty years. He was not content with correcting exactly the proof-sheets of other men's writings, but wrote likewise several books, which were esteemed [A]. He had no ill success in writing Latin verse: his Apology for Correctors against Authors [B] is a proof of this. He died very old on Easter-day 1607. Most of the particulars, which I have just mentioned, are proved in the remark, where I insert his epitaph [C].

(1) Athen. Belg. pag. 190.
(2) Description of the Low-Countries.
(4) Pag. 203.
We ought not always to impute the faults in books to the Printers.

[A] He wrote several books, which were esteemed. Swertius (1) has begun the catalogue with these words. Scriptis Etymologicon Teutonice Linguae, seu Dictionarium Teutonico-Latinum à Justo Lipsio laudatum. Typis Moreti 1599 in 8vo. His other works are Latin verses, and a Dutch translation of Philip de Comines and Lewis Guicciardini (2).
[B] His apology for correctors against authors. It is an epigram of eighteen verses, which we find in the Theatrum Vitae Humanae of Beyerlinch (3). Mt. Chevallier has inserted it in his Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris (4), after having mentioned a thing, which deserves to be related. "We do not however charge the printers or correctors with all the errors in printed books. They have their excuse upon the authors. They remain sometimes in an edition through the ignorance or negligence of him who wrote the book, or took upon him the care of publishing it. He gives an incorrect copy, which is printed faithfully, and consequently with the errors of the manuscript. But it happens, that learned men, who judge without statuary, censuring what deserves it, he, who is innocent, is accused, though the whole fault is the author's. An excellent corrector belonging to Plantin's printing-house, named Cornelius Kilian, has written an Apology for correctors against authors, "who after they have mistaken through ignorance, and given incorrect copies, do not scruple to lay the blame on innocent persons."

[C] I insert his epitaph. It was written by Francis (5) Swertius his friend, and is as follows. D. O. M. CORNELIANO KILIANO Duffles, constantis Laboris, & perennis industriae laude ornato & amato viro. L. ann. Plantin Typographia correctorem gessit. Quam fideliter, peritè, doctè, ipsos rogato Libros elegantia, nitore, sancta aeterna artis primos. Nec semper alienos, veritate felix, patriam quaque eloquentiam excoluit, callumque ejus & proprietatem revocavit. Obiit aetate operibusque gravis M. DC. VII. ipso paschatis festo (6). i. e. To the memory of the most industrious and beloved CORNELIUS KILIANUS, who was fifty years corrector to Plantin's printing-house; with what exactness, skill, and learning, is evident from the books printed there with the utmost elegance and beauty. Nor was his care confined to the writings of other men, for he left some of his own composition. He wrote elegantly in Latin, and had a good talent in Poetry, and cultivated his own country language, restoring the purity of it. He died full of years and works in 1607 on Easter Day.

(5) Chevillier, pag. 196. calls him Peter.
(6) Franc. Swertius, Athen. Belg. pag. 189, 190.

KING (JOHN) a learned English Bishop in the seventeenth Century, was great nephew of Robert King the first Bishop of Oxford, and son of Philip King of Wormen-hale or Wornall near Brill in Buckinghamshire, by Elizabeth daughter of Edmund Conquest of Haughton-Conquest in Bedfordshire (a). He was born at Wornall about the year 1559 (b), and educated in Grammar Learning at Westminster School, and became a Student of Christ Church in Oxford in 1576 (c), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts January the 26th 1579 (d), and February the 15th 1582 that of Master (e). He was afterwards appointed Chaplain to Queen Elizabeth (f). August the 12th 1590 he was installed Archdeacon of Nottingham; at which time he was a Preacher at York (b). He afterwards became Chaplain to the Lord Keeper Egerton (i). December the 17th 1601 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (k). In 1605 he was made Dean of Christ Church, and was afterwards for several years Vice-Chancellor of Oxford. In 1611 he was advanced to the Bishopric of London, to which he was consecrated September the 8th the same year (l). Besides his Lectures upon Jonah delivered at York, and printed at London 1594, and Oxford 1599 in 4to, he published several Sermons [A]. King James I used to style him the King of Preachers; and Lord Chief Justice Coke often declared, that he was the best Speaker in the Star-Chamber in his time (m). He was so constant in preaching, after he was a Bishop, that unless he was hindered by want of health, he omitted no Sunday, whereon he did not visit some pulpit in London or near it (n). Dr. William Hull (o) highly extols his eloquence in the pulpit. He died March the 30th (p) 1621, aged sixty two years, having been before much afflicted with the stone in the kidneys and bladder; and was interred in the Cathedral of St. Paul's in London. Soon after his death, the Papists reported, that he died a member of their Church; and Gregory Fisher alias Musket published in 1621 a book, intitled, The Bishop of London his Legacy: Or, certain Motives of Dr. King late Bishop of London for his change of Religion, and dying in the Catholic and Roman Church; with a conclusion to his brethren the Bishops of England. But the fallacy of this story was sufficiently exposed by

(a) Fuller's Worthies, in Buckinghamshire, and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 457. 2d edit.
(b) Wood, col. 458. says, that he was 62 years old, when he died March 30, 1621.
(c) Wood, col. 457.
(d) Idem, Festi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 118.
(e) Ibid. col. 123.
(f) Fuller's Church History, B. 10. pag. 91.
(g) Wood, Athen. Oxon. col. 457.
(h) Idem, ibid.

(i) Idem, Festi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 161. But the same Author in his Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 457 says, he proceeded Doctor of Divinity in 1602.
(j) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 457.
(k) Fuller's Church History, B. 10. pag. 91.
(l) Idem, ibid.
(m) Epistle Dedicatory to Bishop King, prefixed to his Harbour's Guest, edit. London 1614 in 4to.
(n) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 458. But Camden, in his Annals of James I. says that he died March 29.

[A] He published several Sermons. I. A Sermon preached at Hampton Court on Tuesday the last of September 1606 upon 8 Cantic. 11. Oxford 1606 in 4to. II. A Sermon preached at Oxford, 5 Nov. 1607. on Psalm 46. from verse 7. to 11. Oxford 1607 in 4to. III. A Sermon preached at Whitehall 5 Nov. 1608. on Psalm 11. 25. 4. Oxford 1608 in 4to. IV. A Sermon preached at St. Mary's in Oxford, 27 March; being the day of his Majesty's Inauguration, on 1 Chron. vi. 26, 27, 28. Oxford 1608 in 4to. V. Vitis Palatina: A

Sermon appointed to be preached at Whitehall upon the Tuesday after the Marriage of the Lady Elizabeth: on Psalm 28. 3. London 1614 in 4to. VI. A Sermon at St. Paul's Cross for the recovery of King James from his late sickness: preached 11 April 1619, on Ljailab 38. 17. London 1619 in 4to. VII. A Sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross 26 March 1620. on Psalm 102. 13, 14. VIII. A Sermon on 2 Kings 23. 25. printed in 1611 in 4to. IX. A Sermon on Psalm 123. 3. in 4to. X. A Sermon on Psalm 146. 3, 4. in 4to. It

(q) Pag. 81, 82.
2d edit. London
1624, in 4to.

(r) Wood, Ath.
Oxon. vol. 1.
col. 617, 618.

(a) Wood, Ath.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
431. and Walker's
Attempt towards Recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy of the Church of England, &c. Part
2. pag. 11. edit.
London 1714.

(b) Wood, ubi
supra.

(c) Idem, Fashi
Oxon. vol. 1.
col. 118.

(d) Idem, ibid.
col. 197.

(e) Idem, Ath.
Oxon. ubi supra.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Idem, ibid.

by his son Mr. Henry King in a Sermon at St. Paul's Cross soon after, and by Bishop Godwin in the Appendix to his Commentarius de Præfulibus Angliæ, printed in 1622, and by Mr. John Gee, in his book intitled, The Foot out of the Snare (q). His eldest son, Henry, was afterwards Bishop of Chichester; and his second son, John, became a Student of Christ Church in 1608, aged fourteen years, and was afterwards public Orator of the University, Canon of Christ Church in 1624, and the year following Dr. of Divinity and Canon of Windsor, and about that time Prebendary of St. Paul's, and Rector of Remenham in Berkshire. He died January the 2d 1638, and was interred at Christ Church in Oxford (r).

◊ KING (HENRY), Bishop of Chichester in the seventeenth Century, was eldest son of Dr. John King, Bishop of London, by Jane, daughter of Mr. Henry Freeman of Staffordshire, and was born at Wornall in Buckinghamshire in January 1591 (a), and educated in Grammar-Learning partly in the Free-School at Thame in Oxfordshire, and partly at Westminster-School, from which he was elected a Student of Christ Church in 1608 (b). June the 19th 1611 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); and July the 7th 1614 that of Master (d). He then entered into holy Orders, and became an eminent Preacher, and Chaplain to King James I. He was afterwards made Archdeacon of Colchester (e); Residentiary of St. Paul's (f), and Canon of Christ Church (g). May the 19th 1625 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (h). He was afterwards Chaplain to King Charles I. and February the 6th 1638 was installed in the Deanery of Rochester (i). In 1641 he was advanced to the See of Chichester, to which he was consecrated December the 19th that year (k). But though he was always esteemed puritannically affected, and had been promoted to that See, in order to please that party; yet upon the breaking out of the civil wars, and the dissolution of Episcopacy, he was treated by them with great severity; "nor was he suffered to live quietly at his friend's house (for some time, at least) when they could discover him (l)." He lived for the most part with Sir Richard Hobart, who had married his sister, at Langley in Buckinghamshire, by whom he was supported (m). At the Restoration he recovered his Bishopric. He published several works [A]. Wood tells us (n), that "he was esteemed by many persons of his neighbourhood and diocese, the epitome of all honours, virtues, and generous nobleness, and a person never to be forgotten by his tenants and by the poor." He died October the 1st 1669, and was interred on the south-side of the Choir belonging to his Cathedral of Chichester, where a monument was erected to him, with an inscription, in which it is said, that he was antiqua, eoque regia Saxonum apud Danmonios in Agro Devonienſi profapia oriundus, and that he was natalium splendore illustris, pietate, doctrinâ & virtutibus illustrior, &c. He married Anne, daughter of Sir William Russell of Strensham in Worcestershire Bart. who, after the Bishop's decease married Sir Thomas Millington the Physician.

(b) Wood, Fashi
Oxon. vol. 1. col.
232.

(i) Idem, Ath.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
431.

(k) Idem, ibid.

(l) Walker's At- tempt, ubi supra.

(m) Idem, ibid.
and Wood, Ath.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
432.

(n) Athen. Oxon.
vol. 2. col. 432.

◊ KING

[A] He published several Works. I. Several Sermons, as, 1. A Sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross 25 Nov. 1621. upon occasion of that false and scandalous report (lately printed) touching the supposed apostasy of Dr. John King, late Bishop of London: on John 15. 20. London 1621. To which is added, The Examination of Tho. Preston taken before the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth 20 Decemb. 1621. concerning his being the author of the scandalous report of Bishop King's Apostasy. 2. David's Enlargement: the Morning Sermon on Aſſerday, on Psalm 32. 5. Oxford 1625 in 4to. 3. Sermon of deliverance, preached at the Spittle on Easter Monday, on Psalm 91. 3. printed in 1626 in 4to. 4. Two Sermons at Whitehall in Lent, on Eccles. 12. 1. and Psalm 55. 6. Printed in 1627 in 4to. 5. Sermon at St. Paul's on his Majesty's inauguration, on Jer. 1. 10. Printed in 1640 in 4to. 6. Sermon at Whitehall 29 May, being the happy day of his Majesty's inauguration and birth; on Ezek. 21. 27. London 1661 in 4to. 7. Sermon preached at the funeral of the right Reverend Father in God, Bryan, Lord Bishop of Winchester, at the Abby Church in Westminster, April 24, 1662. on Psalm 116. 15. London 1662 in 4to. 8. Visitation Sermon at Lewes, 8 Octob. 1662. on Titus 2. 1. London 1663 in 4to. 9. Sermon preached 30 January 1664 at Whitehall, being the day of the King's Martyrdom, on 2 Chron. 35. 24, 25. London 1665 in 4to. II. Exposition on the Lord's Prayer, delivered in certain Sermons on Matth. 6. 9. &c. London 1628 in 4to. III. The Psalms of David from the new translation of the Bible turned into Metre, to be sung after the old tunes used in Churches. London 1651, 1654, in 12mo. &c.

(1) See the Collection of Letters, In a letter of our author to Archbishop Uther, dated at Langley place near Colebrook, October 30 1651, he writes thus (1): "I did in August last present by one, who undertook the delivery at Harrow-hill, a small book; and lest that should fail, my brother sent another by your Chaplain, which may render your grace some account of my exercise and employment in this retirement. The truth is, one Sunday at Church hearing a psalm sung, whose wretched expression quite marred the pen-man's matter and my devotion, I did, at my return that evening, try whether from the version of our Bible, I could not easily, and with plainness suiting the lowest understanding, deliver it, from that garb, which indeed made it ridiculous. From one to another I passed on till the whole book was run through. Which done, I could not resist the advice and importunity of better judgments than mine own to put it to the press, I was, I confess, discouraged, knowing that Mr. George Sandys, and lately one of our pretended reformers, had failed in two different extremes: the first too elegant for the vulgar use, changing both the Metre and the tunes, wherewith they had been long acquainted: the other as flat and poor, as lamely worded, and unhandfomly rhimed, as the old, which with much confidence he undertook to amend. My Lord, I now come forth an adventurer in a middle way, whose aim was without affectation of words to leave them not disfigured in the sense." IV. A deep groan fetched at the funeral of the incomparable and glorious Monarch King Charles I. printed in 1649 in one sheet, and said in the title to be written by D. H. K. It was printed the same year under the letters J. B. V. Poems, Elegies, Paradoxes, and Sonnets. London 1657 in 8vo. When these poems were first published, it was reported, that Dr. Philip King, brother to our Bishop, was author of them. VI. Divers Latin and Greek Poems, published in several books. VII. He composed several anthems, one of which for the time of Lent, beginning thus; Hearken O God, &c. was set to Musick by Dr. John Wilson, Gentleman of his Majesty's Chapel. VIII. There is a letter of his to Mr. Isaac Walton concerning the three imperfect books of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, dated at Chichester November 17th 1664, and prefixed to Walton's List of Hooker. H.

DR. KING (WILLIAM) a facetious English writer in the beginning of the eighteenth Century, was well descended, being allied to the noble families of Clarendon and Rochester, and was son of Ezekiel King of London, Gentleman, and elected Student of Christ Church in Oxford from Westminster-School in Michaelmas-Term 1681, aged eighteen years (a). December the 8th 1685 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and July the 6th 1688 that of Master. He afterwards entered upon the Law Line, and took the degree of Doctor of Civil Law. In January 1694 he became Secretary to the Princess Anne, afterwards Queen Anne (b). He soon acquired a considerable reputation as a Civilian, and was in great practice; but the natural gaiety of his temper, and the love of company, led him too much into those pleasures, which were incompatible with his profession. He attended the Earl of Pembroke, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, into that Kingdom, where he was appointed Judge-Advocate, sole Commissioner of the Prizes, and Keeper of the Records, and Vicar-General to the Lord Primate of Ireland; and was countenanced by persons of the highest rank, and might have made his fortune, if the change of climate could have made any alteration in his disposition. But so far was he from heaping up riches, that he returned to England with no other treasure than a few merry Poems and humorous Essays, and retired to his Student's place at Christ Church (c). In January 1711 he was appointed Gazetteer; which place he quitted about Midsummer 1712, and retired to a Gentleman's house on Lambeth-side of the water (d). He died at his lodgings over against Somerset-House in the Strand on Christmas Day 1712, and was interred in the Cloisters of Westminster Abbey (e). His writings are pretty numerous [A]. He naturally hated business, especially that of an Advocate; but made an excellent Judge, when appointed one of the Court of Delegates. His chiefest pleasure consisted in trifles; and he was never happier, than when he thought

(a) Life of Dr. William King, pag. 2 and 3. prefixed to his Remains, edit. London 1732.

(b) Ibid. pag. 3.

(c) Ibid. pag. 3.

(d) Ibid. pag. 261-264.

(e) Ibid. pag. 265, 266.

[A] His Writings are pretty numerous. 1. Reflections upon Mr. Varillas his history of heresies Book I. Tome I. as far as relates to English matters, more especially those of Wicliff. Printed in 1688 in 8vo. Mr. Edward Hannes, afterwards an eminent Physician, had an hand in this book; to which is prefixed the following advertisement: "It having been publickly desired, that those, in whose way it should lie to expose Mr. Varillas, would put themselves to the trouble, the author of these papers was willing to contribute his share in the part concerning Wicliff, having formerly laid together some observations conducing to such a design. Mr. Larroque indeed has gone before him in the attempt; but that ingenious Gentleman was not well advised to meddle in a strange country, till time had instructed him more fully in the constitutions and Language of it. Our present reflecter has made use of the Amsterdam edition, not being able to procure that of Paris. He has given Mr. Varillas all the law imaginable; he has made no advantage of mistakes, which with any reason could be charged upon the printer. He has contradicted nothing without express Proof on his side; and in things highly improbable, which seem to have no foundation in history, unless he can confront him with positive and authentic testimonies, he lets the author alone, and suffers the boldness of the assertion to be its own security. Last of all, he intreats the reader's pardon, if the language and expression are without choice and ornament, his protest business and necessary occasions not allowing him any such leisure." In the beginning of the Reflections it is observed, that the enemies of the reformation, as they seem resolved never to leave off writing controversy, and being confuted by our divines; so they are not wanting upon occasion to turn their style, and furnish out matter of triumph to our historians. Sanders and Caussin heretofore, and of late Monsieur Maimburg and Monsieur Varillas have thought themselves qualified for this kind of employment. Above the rest, Mr. Varillas has used his pen with such a partial extravagance, and with so little regard to modesty and truth, that he has not only provoked the learned of the reformed profession to chastise his impudence in their publick writings, but has also drawn upon him the scorn and indignation of several Gentlemen of his own communion, who in a sense of honour and common ingenuity have taken some pains to lay open the smooth impostor. Mr. Hozier, genealogist to the King of France, in his epistle, declares himself to have discovered in him above 4000 errors. Pere Bouhours in a discourse of his makes it his business to expose him. Even his old friend Mr. Dr. (1) seems to have forsaken him, and gone over to his Bouhours, from whose original he is now translating the life of St. Xavier. To be free, there is almost as many faults in every single page of Mr. Varillas, as in a Printer's table of Errata; and if the Archbishop of Paris would do his duty, he would find himself bound to put a holy censure upon his Pensioner; and as he was lately very forward to compel those of the Religion to a recantation of their faith; so he ought here to oblige Mr. Varillas to an abjuration of his history. The Reflections conclude with these words: "He [Mr. Varillas] has writ away all his credit; his last defence of himself has proved him inexcusable, and made men apt to think, that as in England at present, so in France too, the same person that is Historiographer, is also Laureat. Hence it might be that Monsieur Varillas in his Revolutions takes all the liberties of a poet; and Mr. Dr. in his conference between the Hind and Panther, though in verse, has aimed at all the plainness and gravity of an historian. For history indeed is a serious matter, not to be written carelessly, like a letter to a friend; nor with passion, like a billet to a Mistress; nor with blasphe, like a declamation for a party at the bar, or the remonstrance of a minister for his Prince; nor in fine by a man unacquainted with the world, like soliloquies and meditations. It requires a long experience, sound judgment, a close attention, an unquestionable integrity, and a style without affectation; all which glorious accomplishments, as they are wanting in the author of The revolutions in matters of religion, so there is no historian that I know of, in whom they have shewed themselves to so high and admirable a degree, as in a physician (2) of our age, who has obliged the world with a history of diseases, and whose name is too great to mention in a pamphlet of this character." II. Animadversions on a pretended Account of Denmark. London 1694 in 8°. Mr. Molesworth, afterwards Lord Molesworth, was the author of that account. The writing of the animadversions upon it procured Dr. King the place of secretary to Princess Anne of Denmark. He was furnished with memoirs for writing them by Mr. Brink, then minister of the Danish Church in London, and Monsieur Scheel, then envoy extraordinary in England from the King of Denmark. He tells us himself (3), that these Animadversions had the honour not to be unacceptable to his Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark; and when sent to Denmark, were by the King's order turned into French, and read to him as fast as they could be translated. They had two editions, one in Holland, and the other in Germany. The University of Copenhagen wrote him a letter under their seal. As to the matters of fact, says he, laid down in those papers, I am no farther accountable: but I believe none of them can be contradicted. III. He translated from French into English New Memoirs

(2) Probably Dr. Thomas Sydenham.

(3) Preface to his Miscellanies in Prose and Verse.

(1) Dryden.

(g) Pag. 81, 82. 2d edit. London 1624, in 4to.

(r) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 617, 618.

(e) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 431. and Walker's Attempt towards Recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy of the Church of England, &c. Part 2. pag. 11. edit. London 1714.

(b) Wood, ubi supra.

(c) Idem, Fashi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 118.

(d) Idem, ibid. col. 197.

(e) Idem, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Idem, ibid.

by his son Mr. Henry King in a Sermon at St. Paul's Cross soon after, and by Bishop Godwin in the Appendix to his Commentarius de Præfulibus Angliæ, printed in 1622, and by Mr. John Gee, in his book intitled, The Foot out of the Snare (q). His eldest son, Henry, was afterwards Bishop of Chichester; and his second son, John, became a Student of Christ Church in 1608, aged fourteen years, and was afterwards public Orator of the University, Canon of Christ Church in 1624, and the year following Dr. of Divinity and Canon of Windsor, and about that time Prebendary of St. Paul's, and Rector of Remenham in Berkshire. He died January the 2d 1635, and was interred at Christ Church in Oxford (r).

◊ KING (HENRY), Bishop of Chichester in the seventeenth Century, was eldest son of Dr. John King, Bishop of London, by Jane, daughter of Mr. Henry Freeman of Staffordshire, and was born at Wornall in Buckinghamshire in January 1591 (a), and educated in Grammar-Learning partly in the Free-School at Thame in Oxfordshire, and partly at Westminster-School, from which he was elected a Student of Christ Church in 1608 (b). June the 19th 1611 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); and July the 7th 1614 that of Master (d). He then entered into holy Orders, and became an eminent Preacher, and Chaplain to King James I. He was afterwards made Archdeacon of Colchester (e); Residentiary of St. Paul's (f), and Canon of Christ Church (g). May the 19th 1625 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (h). He was afterwards Chaplain to King Charles I. and February the 6th 1638 was installed in the Deanery of Rochester (i). In 1641 he was advanced to the See of Chichester, to which he was consecrated December the 19th that year (k). But though he was always esteemed puritannically affected, and had been promoted to that See, in order to please that party; yet upon the breaking out of the civil wars, and the dissolution of Episcopacy, he was treated by them with great severity; "nor was he suffered to live quietly at his friend's house (for some time, at least) when they could discover him (l)." He lived for the most part with Sir Richard Hobart, who had married his sister, at Langley in Buckinghamshire, by whom he was supported (m). At the Restoration he recovered his Bishopric. He published several works [A]. Wood tells us (n), that "he was esteemed by many persons of his neighbourhood and diocese, the epitome of all honours, virtues, and generous nobleness, and a person never to be forgotten by his tenants and by the poor." He died October the 1st 1669, and was interred on the south-side of the Choir belonging to his Cathedral of Chichester, where a monument was erected to him, with an inscription, in which it is said, that he was antiquâ, eoque regiâ Saxonum apud Danmonios in Agro Devonienfi profapia oriundus, and that he was natalium splendore illustris, pietate, doctrinâ & virtutibus illustrior, &c. He married Anne, daughter of Sir William Ruffel of Strensham in Worcestershire Bart. who, after the Bishop's decease married Sir Thomas Millington the Physician.

(b) Wood, Fashi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 232.

(i) Idem, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 431.

(k) Idem, ibid.

(l) Walker's Attempt, ubi supra.

(m) Idem, ibid. and Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 432.

(n) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 432.

◊ KING

[A] He published several Works. I. Several Sermons, as, 1. A Sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross 25 Nov. 1621. upon occasion of that false and scandalous report (lately printed) touching the supposed apostasy of Dr. John King, late Bishop of London: on John 15. 20. London 1621. To which is added, The Examination of Tho. Preston taken before the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth 20 Decemb. 1621. concerning his being the author of the scandalous report of Bishop King's Apostasy. 2. David's Enlargement: the Morning Sermon on Aët-Sunday, on Psalm 32. 5. Oxford 1625 in 4to. 3. Sermon of deliverance, preached at the Spittle on Easter Monday, on Psalm 91. 3. printed in 1626 in 4to. 4. Two Sermons at Whitehall in Lent, on Eccles. 12. 1. and Psal. 55. 6. Printed in 1627 in 4to. 5. Sermon at St. Paul's on his Majesty's inauguration, on Jer. 1. 10. Printed in 1640 in 4to. 6. Sermon at Whitehall 29 May, being the happy day of his Majesty's inauguration and birth; on Ezek. 21. 27. London 1661 in 4to. 7. Sermon preached at the funeral of the right Reverend Father in God, Bryan, Lord Bishop of Winchester, at the Abby Church in Westminster, April 24, 1662. on Psal. 116. 15. London 1662 in 4to. 8. Visitation Sermon at Lewes, 8 Octob. 1662. on Titus 2. 1. London 1663 in 4to. 9. Sermon preached 30 January 1664 at Whitehall, being the day of the King's Martyrdom, on 2 Chron. 35. 24, 25. London 1665 in 4to. II. Exposition on the Lord's Prayer, delivered in certain Sermons on Matth. 6. 9. &c. London 1628 in 4to. III. The Psalms of David from the new translation of the Bible turned into Metre, to be sung after the old tunes used in Churches. London 1651, 1654, in 12mo. &c.

(1) See the Collection of Letters, In a letter of our author to Archbishop Usher, dated at Langley place near Colebrook, October 30 1651, he writes thus (1): "I did in August last present by one, who undertook the delivery at Harrow-hill, a small book; and lest that should fail, my brother sent another by your Chaplain, which may render your grace some account of my exercise and employment in this retirement. The truth is, one Sunday at Church hearing a psalm sung, whose wretched expression quite marred the pen-man's matter and my devotion, I did, at my return that evening, try whether from the version of our Bible, I could not easily, and with plainness suiting the lowest understanding, deliver it, from that garb, which indeed made it ridiculous. From one to another I passed on till the whole book was run through. Which done, I could not resist the advice and importunity of better judgments than mine own to put it to the press, I was, I confess, discouraged, knowing that Mr. George Sandys, and lately one of our pretended reformers, had failed in two different extremes: the first too elegant for the vulgar use, changing both the Metre and the tunes, wherewith they had been long acquainted: the other as flat and poor, as lamely worded, and unhandfomly rhimed, as the old, which with much confidence he undertook to amend. My Lord, I now come forth an adventurer in a middle way, whose aim was without affectation of words to leave them not disfigured in the sense." IV. A deep groan fetched at the funeral of the incomparable and glorious Monarch King Charles I. printed in 1649 in one sheet, and said in the title to be written by D. H. K. It was printed the same year under the letters J. B. V. Poems, Elegies, Paradoxes, and Sonnets. London 1657 in 8vo. When these poems were first published, it was reported, that Dr. Philip King, brother to our Bishop, was author of them. VI. Divers Latin and Greek Poems, published in several books. VII. He composed several anthems, one of which for the time of Lent, beginning thus; Hearken O God, &c. was set to Musick by Dr. John Wilson, Gentleman of his Majesty's Chapel. VIII. There is a letter of his to Mr. Isaac Walton concerning the three imperfect books of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, dated at Chichester November 17th 1664, and prefixed to Walton's List of Hooker. H.

◊KING (WILLIAM) a facetious English writer in the beginning of the eighteenth Century, was well descended, being allied to the noble families of Clarendon and Rochester, and was son of Ezekiel King of London, Gentleman, and elected Student of Christ Church in Oxford from Westminster-School in Michaelmas-Term 1681, aged eighteen years (a). December the 8th 1685 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and July the 6th 1688 that of Master. He afterwards entered upon the Law Line, and took the degree of Doctor of Civil Law. In January 1694 he became Secretary to the Princess Anne, afterwards Queen Anne (b). He soon acquired a considerable reputation as a Civilian, and was in great practice; but the natural gaiety of his temper, and the love of company, led him too much into those pleasures, which were incompatible with his profession. He attended the Earl of Pembroke, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, into that Kingdom, where he was appointed Judge-Advocate, sole Commissioner of the Prizes, and Keeper of the Records, and Vicar-General to the Lord Primate of Ireland; and was countenanced by persons of the highest rank, and might have made his fortune, if the change of climate could have made any alteration in his disposition. But so far was he from heaping up riches, that he returned to England with no other treasure than a few merry Poems and humorous Essays, and retired to his Student's place at Christ Church (c). In January 1711 he was appointed Gazetteer; which place he quitted about Midsummer 1712, and retired to a Gentleman's house on Lambeth-side of the water (d). He died at his lodgings over against Somerset-House in the Strand on Christmas Day 1712, and was interred in the Cloisters of Westminster Abbey (e). His writings are pretty numerous [A]. He naturally hated business, especially that of an Advocate; but made an excellent Judge, when appointed one of the Court of Delegates. His chiefest pleasure consisted in trifles; and he was never happier, than when he thought

(a) Life of Dr. William King, pag. 2 and 3. prefixed to his Remarks, edit. London 1732.

(b) Ibid. pag. 3.

(c) Ibid. pag. 3.

(d) Ibid. pag. 161-164.

(e) Ibid. pag. 165, 166.

[A] His Writings are pretty numerous. I. Reflections upon Mr. Varillas his history of heresies Book I. Tome I. as far as relates to English matters, more especially those of Wicliff. Printed in 1688 in 8vo. Mr. Edward Haunnes, afterwards an eminent Physician, had an hand in this book; to which is prefixed the following advertisement: "It having been publickly desired, that those, in whose way it should lie to expose Mr. Varillas, would put themselves to the trouble, the author of these papers was willing to contribute his share in the part concerning Wicliff, having formerly laid together some observations conducing to such a design. Mr. Larroque indeed has gone before him in the attempt; but that ingenious Gentleman was not well advised to meddle in a strange country, till time had instructed him more fully in the constitutions and Language of it. Our present reflecter has made use of the Amsterdam edition, not being able to procure that of Paris. He has given Mr. Varillas all the law imaginable; he has made no advantage of mistakes, which with any reason could be charged upon the printer. He has contradicted nothing without express Proof on his side; and in things highly improbable, which seem to have no foundation in history, unless he can confront him with positive and authentic testimonies, he lets the author alone, and suffers the boldness of the assertion to be its own security. Last of all, he intreats the reader's pardon, if the language and expression are without choice and ornament, his protest business and necessary occasions not allowing him any such leisure." In the beginning of the Reflections it is observed, that the enemies of the reformation, as they seem resolved never to leave off writing controversy, and being confuted by our divines; so they are not wanting upon occasion to turn their style, and furnish out matter of triumph to our historians. Sanders and Caussin heretofore, and of late Monsieur Maimburg and Monsieur Varillas have thought themselves qualified for this kind of employment. Above the rest, Mr. Varillas has used his pen with such a partial extravagance, and with so little regard to modesty and truth, that he has not only provoked the learned of the reformed profession to chastise his impudence in their publick writings, but has also drawn upon him the scorn and indignation of several Gentlemen of his own communion, who in a sense of honour and common ingenuity have taken some pains to lay open the smooth impostor. Mr. Hozier, genealogist to the King of France, in his epistle, declares himself to have discovered in him above 4000 errors. Pere Bouhours in a discourse of his makes it his business to expose him. Even his old friend Mr. Dr. (1) seems to have forsaken him, and gone over to his Bouhours, from whose original he is now translating the life of St. Xavier. To be free, there is almost as many faults in every single page of Mr. Varillas, as in a Printer's table of Errata; and if the Archbishop of Paris would do his duty, he would find himself bound to put a holy censure upon his Pensioner; and as he was lately very forward to compel those of the Religion to a recantation of their faith; so he ought here to oblige Mr. Varillas to an abjuration of his history. The Reflections conclude with these words: "He [Mr. Varillas] has writ away all his credit; his last defence of himself has proved him inexcusable, and made men apt to think, that as in England at present, so in France too, the same person that is Historiographer, is also Laureat. Hence it might be that Monsieur Varillas in his Revolutions takes all the liberties of a poet; and Mr. Dr. in his conference between the Hind and Panther, though in verse, has aimed at all the plainness and gravity of an historian. For history indeed is a serious matter, not to be written carelessly, like a letter to a friend; nor with passion, like a billet to a Mistress; nor with bias, like a declamation for a party at the bar, or the remonstrance of a minister for his Prince; nor in fine by a man unacquainted with the world, like soliloquies and meditations. It requires a long experience, sound judgment, a close attention, an unquestionable integrity, and a style without affectation; all which glorious accomplishments, as they are wanting in the author of The revolutions in matters of religion, so there is no historian that I know of, in whom they have shewed themselves to so high and admirable a degree, as in a physician (2) of our age, who has obliged the world with a history of diseases, and whose name is too great to mention in a pamphlet of this character." II. Animadversions on a pretended Account of Denmark. London 1694 in 8°. Mr. Molesworth, afterwards Lord Molesworth, was the author of that account. The writing of the animadversions upon it procured Dr. King the place of secretary to Princess Anne of Denmark. He was furnished with memoirs for writing them by Mr. Brink, then minister of the Danish Church in London, and Monsieur Scheel, then envoy extraordinary in England from the King of Denmark. He tells us himself (3), that these Animadversions had the honour not to be unacceptable to his Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark; and when sent to Denmark, were by the King's order turned into French, and read to him as fast as they could be translated. They had two editions, one in Holland, and the other in Germany. The University of Copenhagen wrote him a letter under their seal. As to the matters of fact, says he, laid down in those papers, I am no farther accountable: but I believe none of them can be contradicted. III. He translated from French into English New Me-

(2) Probably Dr. Thomas Sydenham.

(3) Preface to his Miscellanies in Prose and Verse.

moirs

(1) Dryden.

hands of his relations. However it was soon after attacked by Mr. Charles Lesley in his Answer to a book, intituled, The State of the Protestants &c. printed at London 1692 in 4to [B]. In 1691 the Bishop published at Dublin in 4to, A Sermon preached at St. Patrick's Dublin, 16 Nov. 1690, being a Thanksgiving Day for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person &c. on Psalm cvii. 2, 3. and in 1692 A Thanksgiving Sermon for King William's success in reducing Ireland &c. Dublin in 4to. In 1693 he was appointed a Regal Visitor with two other Commissioners, Anthony Bishop of Meath, and Capel Bishop of Dromore; and they suspended the Bishop of Down. In 1694 his Lordship being settled in his Diocese of Down, and considering the great number of Dissenting Protestants in that Diocese lately increased by a vast addition of Colonies from Scotland, in order to persuade them to conformity to the established Church, published A Discourse concerning the Inventions of Men in the worship of God. Dublin 1694 in 4to. Mr. Joseph Boyse, a Dissenting Minister, wrote an Answer, intituled, Remarks on a late Discourse of William, Lord Bishop of Derry, concerning the Inventions of Men in the worship of God. Dublin 1694 in 4to. In this piece Mr. Boyse owns, that the Bishop's Discourse "is written with an air of seriousness and gravity becoming the weight of the subject, as well as the dignity of his character." The Bishop answered Mr. Boyse in An Admonition to the dissenting inhabitants of the Diocese of Derry concerning a book lately published by Mr. J. B. intituled Remarks &c. from William Lord Bishop of that Diocese. Dublin 1694 in 4to. Mr. Boyse replied in A Vindication of the Remarks &c. Dublin 1695 in 4to. The Bishop rejoined in A second Admonition to the Dissenting Inhabitants &c. Dublin 1695 in 4to. In 1702 he published at Dublin in 4to his celebrated treatise, De Origine Mali; auctore Guilielmo King, S. T. D. Episcopo Derensi [C]. The same year, upon the

[B] Attacked by Mr. Lesley in his Answer to a Book intituled, The State of the Protestants &c. In the preface Mr. Lesley very elaborately vindicates the character of the French King Lewis XIV, and tells us, with regard to his "banishing the Huguenot Ministers, and dragooning others, to work them in to another religion; which does, and justly, eclipse his glory, with those, who know not the true grounds and motives, which induced him to methods so rigid and severe;" that his very enemies, who know the reasons he had for it, do even in this excuse him, and turn it into an argument of his wise foresight and prudence. They tell you, that he was under an invincible necessity of being rid of these men, or hazarding such a revolution as befel King James. He observes likewise, that "the Jacobites think themselves for ever obliged to acknowledge with all gratefulness the noble and generous reception he has given King James in his distress; which as no King in Europe was able to have done but himself, so none but he could have done it in such a manner, with that greatness and every punctilio of honour." Mr. Lesley in the beginning of his Answer tells us (3), that Dr. King's book "is calculated for the destruction of mankind, by setting up such principles as countenance eternal rebellions, and afford pretences for war and confusion to the end of the world; and makes settlement and peace impracticable among men." He first examines the Principles of Dr. King's book, and then the Matters of Fact. With regard to the latter, "I cannot, says he, say that I have examined into every single matter of fact which this author relates; I could not have the opportunity; but I am sure I have the most material; and by these you will easily judge of his sincerity in the rest, which could not all come to my knowledge. But this I can say, that there is not one I have enquired into, but I have found it false, in whole, or in part, aggravated or misrepresented, so as to alter the whole face of the story, and give it perfectly another air and turn. Inasmuch, that though many things he says were true, yet he has hardly spoke a true word, that is, told it truly and nakedly, without a warp." He afterwards remarks (5), that he had been told, that Dr. King "owes his life to the King's mercy. Was he not accused for holding correspondence, and giving intelligence to the rebels (as they were then called) both in England and the North of Ireland, And was it not true? Did he not give frequent intelligence to Schomberg by one Sherman, and keep constant correspondence with Mr. Tollet and others in London? He knows this would have been called treason in those days, and a bloody-minded tyrant would have found another remedy for it than a short imprisonment." He observes likewise (6), that he had been "told by Protestants

"in Dublin, that King James had once so good an opinion of this author [Dr. King], that he had him frequently in private, and trusted him in his affairs, till at last he found him out. And his old friend Lord Chief Justice Herbert was so far mistaken in him, that he vouched for him at the council-table with so much zeal as to say, that he was as loyal a man as any that sat at that board; which did retrieve this author from some inconveniences, that then lay upon him, and continued him some time longer in the King's good opinion." He affirms also (7), that (7) Pag. 113. no man was or could be a higher assertor of Passive Obedience than Dr. King had been all his life, even at the beginning of the Revolution; "and that he told a person of honour, from whose mouth I have it, says Mr. Lesley, that if the Prince of Orange came over for the crown, or should accept of it, he prayed God might blast all his designs. That there was no way to preserve the honour of our religion, but by adhering unalterably to our loyalty. That it would be a glorious sight to see a cart full of Clergy-men going to the stake for Passive Obedience, as the Primitive Christians did. That it would prove the support and glory of our religion; but that a rebellion would ruin and disgrace it. He said, if it were no more than that declaration, which he had subscribed, of its not being lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take arms against the King, &c. he would die a hundred deaths rather than do it." Mr. Lesley then tells us, that at a meeting of the Clergy of Dublin, in the beginning of the Revolution in 1688, to consider what measures they were to take, Dr. King declared, that their taking arms in the North of Ireland at that time, was rank rebellion, if there could be any rebellion; particularly Derry shutting their gates against the King's forces sent thither. And when one there present affirmed, that the subjects might take arms in defence of their laws, &c. the Doctor violently opposed it, even in relation to Derry, and urged, that the Bishop of Derry, Hopkins, who was then there, did protest against their shutting out the King's forces, and refused to join with those who did it; for which and other reasons, which Dr. King then gave, he was against any person's going to the North, or joining with them, as being joining in a rebellion.

[C] In 1702 he published at Dublin in 4to his celebrated treatise De Origine Mali. It was reprinted at London the same Year in 8vo. Part of it was translated into English by Mr. Solomon Lowe, and printed at London 1715 in 12mo under the title of, A key to Divinity; or a Philosophical essay on free-will. By the most Reverend Father in God, William, Lord Archbishop of Dublin. The translator in the dedication to Mr. Samuel Holden, Merchant, has the following passage: "As in accounting for the appearances of Nature, I the promotion of Narcissus Archbishop of Dublin to the See of Armagh he was elected Administrator Spiritualium by both the Chapters of Dublin, during the vacancy of the See; and the same year was translated to the Archbishopric of Dublin by Letters Patents dated the 11th of March. In 1704 he published at Dublin in 4to, A Thanksgiving Sermon for the Victory at Hockstet, preached at Christ's Church Dublin; and at London 1704 in 4to, A Sermon preached before the Queen at St. James's on Humility. In 1706 he published

"esteem the insensible particles of the moderns as unsatisfactory as the occult qualities of the antients; so in the more important affairs of religion, to propose things above reason, as objects of faith, is as ridiculous, as to bid me believe what I know nothing of. Far therefore from crying up faith in opposition to reason, it is my opinion, with Mr. Locke, that reason must be our last judge and guide in every thing. It is this assures me of the necessity of religion, and the excellency of Christianity. By this I interpret the Bible, and understand my duty. Without it I should be a beast, not knowing to defend the doctrines of faith, or convict the pretences of irreligion. Moved by these considerations, and determined by your good judgment, I publish this translation, for the sake of those, that do not understand the original. The subject is of much moment, not only for the satisfaction of the mind, but also for the conduct of life. It has been strongly perplexed and darkened by dull and designing men. A clear notion of it will be very serviceable to solve many difficulties in divinity." Mr. Edmund Law M. A. Fellow of Christ's College in Cambridge, afterwards published a complete translation of this work with very valuable notes, in 4to, the second edition of which was printed under this title, An essay on the origin of evil by Dr. William King, late Lord Archbishop of Dublin. Translated from the Latin with notes; and a dissertation concerning the Principle and Criterion of virtue and the Origin of the Passions. The second edition corrected and enlarged from the Author's Manuscripts. To which are added two Sermons by the same Author, the former concerning Divine Præscience; the latter on the fall of man, never before published. By Edmund Law, M. A. Fellow of Christ's College in Cambridge. London 1732 in two Volumes in 8vo. Mr. Law observes (8), that since the publication of the former edition of his translation, he had received from our author's relations a large collection of his papers on the same subject with this book in Latin and English; which Mr. Law has inserted by way of notes in his translation. And he tells us, that the great value, which the Archbishop set upon this work, appears from the pains he has taken to vindicate it from every the least Cavil; in which view all that he has written, would make a much larger volume than his first. The general view of his scheme is as follows. 1. All creatures are necessarily imperfect, and at infinite distance from the perfection of the Deity; and if a negative principle were to be admitted, such as the Privation of the Peripateticks, it might be said, that every created being consists of Existence and Non-Existence; for it is nothing in respect both of those perfections, which it wants, and of those which others have. And this defect, or, as we may say, Mixture of Non-Entity in the constitution of created beings, is the necessary principle of all natural evils, and of a possibility of moral ones; as will appear in the sequel. 2. An equality of perfection in the creatures is impossible, as our adversaries allow; to which we may add, neither would it be so convenient to place all in the same state of perfection. 3. It is agreeable to Divine wisdom and goodness to have created, not only the more perfect beings, but also the most imperfect, such as matter; so long as they are better than nothing, and no impediment to the perfect ones. 4. Admitting matter and motion, there necessarily follow composition and dissolution of bodies, that is, generation and corruption; which some may look upon as defects in the Divine work; and yet it is no objection to his goodness or wisdom, to create such things as are necessarily attended with those evils. Allowing therefore God to be infinitely powerful, good, and wise, yet it is manifest, that some evils, viz. generation and corruption, and the necessary consequences of these, might have place in his works; and if even one evil could arise without the ill principle, why not many? And if we knew the nature and circumstances of all things as well as we do those of matter and motion, it may be presumed, that we could account for them, without any imputation of the divine attributes. For there is the same reason for them all; and one instance to the contrary destroys an universal proposition. 5. It is not inconsistent with the Divine attributes to have created some spirits or thinking substances, which are dependent on matter and motion in their operations, and being united to matter may both move their bodies, and be affected with certain passions and sensations by their motion, and stand in need of a certain disposition of Organs for the proper exercise of their thinking faculty; supposing the number of those, that are quite separate from matter to be as complete as the system of the whole universe would admit, and that the lower order is no inconvenience to the higher. 6. It cannot be conceived but that some sensations thus excited by matter and motion should be disagreeable, and tend to dissolve the union between soul and body, as well as others agreeable. For it is impossible as well as inconvenient, that the soul should feel itself to be losing its faculty of thinking, which alone can make it happy, and not be affected with it. Now disagreeable sensation is to be reckoned among natural evils, which yet cannot be avoided without removing such kind of animals out of nature. If any one ask, why such a law of union was established? let this be his answer, because there could be no better. For such a necessity as this flows from the very nature of the Union of things, and considering the circumstances and conditions, under which and which only they could have existence, they could neither be placed in a better state, nor governed by more commodious laws. These evils therefore are not inconsistent with the divine attributes, provided that the creatures, which are subject to them, enjoy such benefits as over-balance them. It is to be observed also, that these evils do not properly arise from the existence which God gave to the creatures, but from hence, that they had not more of Existence given them, which nevertheless their state and the place they fill in the great machine of the world could not admit. This mixture therefore of non-existence supplies the place of an ill principle in the origin of evil, as was said before. 7. The happiness and perfection of every thing or agent arises from the due exercise of those faculties, which God has given it; and the more faculties and perfections any thing has, it is capable of the greater and more perfect happiness. 8. The less dependent on external things, the more self-sufficient any agent is; and the more it has the principle of its actions in itself, it is so much the more perfect. Since therefore we may conceive two sorts of agents, one which does not act, unless impelled and determined by external force; the other, which have the principle of their actions within themselves, and can determine themselves to action by their natural power; it is plain, that the latter are much more perfect than the former. Nor can it be denied, but that God may create an agent with such a power as this, which exerts itself into action, without either the concurrence of God, or the determination of external causes, so long as God by a general concurrence preserves the existence, powers, and faculties of that agent. 9. Such an agent may prescribe to itself an end, and prosecute it by proper means, and take delight in the prosecution of it, though that end might be perfectly indifferent to it before it was proposed, and be no more agreeable than any other of the same or a different kind would be, if the agent had once resolved to prosecute it. For since all the pleasure or happiness, which we receive, arises from the due exercise of our faculties, every thing, which is equally commodious for the exercise of our faculties, will give us the same delight. The reason therefore why one thing pleases above another, is founded in the act of the agent himself, viz. the election. This is largely explained in the book itself;

(8) Preface, pag. 29, 18.

lished at London in 4to, A Sermon preached at St. Margaret's Westminster January the 13th 1705, on Prov. xxii. 6. His Sermon preached in St. Michael's Church Dublin before the Lord Mayor &c. on Eccles. viii. 11. was printed at Dublin 1707 in 4to. May the 15th itself; together with the limits, within which it is confined. 10. It is impossible, that all things should agree to all, that is, be good; for since the things are limited, distinct, and different one from another, and are endowed with finite, distinct, and different appetites; it necessarily follows, that the relations of convenient and inconvenient must arise from this diversity. Since therefore every created being is from the imperfections of its nature necessarily limited, and from that limitation there necessarily follows distinction and diversity; it follows, that a possibility at least of evil is a necessary attendant on all creatures, and cannot be separated from them by any power, wisdom, or goodness whatsoever. For when a thing is applied to an appetite or being, to which it is not appropriated, as it is not agreeable to it, it necessarily affects it with uneasiness; nor was it possible that all things should be appropriated to every being, where the things themselves and the appetites are various and different, as they must necessarily be, if created, even in the most perfect manner. 11. Since some agents have a power over their actions, as above, and can please themselves in the choice of such things as may exercise their faculties; and since there are some ways of exercising them, which may be prejudicial to themselves or others; it is plain, that from this power there arises a possibility of choosing amiss, and they may exercise themselves to their own prejudice or that of others. And since in such a variety of things, those that are beneficial or hurtful, cannot be known by an intelligent being, which is in its own nature limited and imperfect, it was agreeable to the divine wisdom and goodness to prescribe some rules and directions to such agents, in order to inform them of what would benefit or incommode them and their fellow creatures, i. e. what would be good or evil; that they might choose the one, and avoid the other. 12. Since therefore, as was said before, an equality of perfections in the creatures is impossible, neither would it be convenient for them to be placed in the same state of perfection; it follows that there are various orders and degrees even among intelligent creatures; and since some of the inferior orders and degrees are capable of those benefits, which the superior ones enjoy; and since there are as many placed in those superior orders as the system of the universe allowed; it follows that the inferior ones, as a more convenient place could not be left for them, ought to be content with a lower portion of happiness, which their nature makes them capable of, and to an higher than which they could not aspire, without detriment to the superior, which possesses that station. For he must quit his place before another can ascend to it; and it seems hard and very inconsistent with the nature of God to degrade a superior, as long as he has done nothing to deserve it. But if one of a superior order shall by his own act, without any violence or compulsion, voluntarily quit his place, or freely choose such things as deserve a degradation; God would seem unjust to those, who are in an inferior degree, and by a good use of their liberty, became fit and qualified for a superior state, if he should refuse them the free use of their choice. It seems unjust for God to condemn or degrade any one arbitrarily; but he is not to be blamed for suffering one to degrade himself by his own act and choice, especially when the use of that elective power belongs to the nature of an intelligent being, and could not in the present state be prohibited without detriment to some other. Here the wisdom and goodness of God seem to have erected themselves in a most glorious manner; the contrivance appears to be the effect of the highest policy and prudence. For by this means God has shewn himself most equitable to his creatures; so that no one can complain of, or glory in, his lot. He that is in a less convenient situation, has no room for complaint, since he is endowed with faculties, and has power to use them in such a manner as to acquire a more commodious one; and he must be forced to own himself only in the fault, if he continues deprived of it: and he that is now in a superior state may learn to fear lest he fall from it by an unlawful use of his faculties. The superior therefore has a dread, that may in some measure diminish his happiness; and the inferior may increase it: by which means they are both brought nearer to an equality, and in the mean time have the utmost provocation and incitement to choose the best and make the most beneficial use of their faculties. This contest makes for the good of the universe, and much more, than if all things were fixed by fate and necessity, and absolutely confined to their present state. Either God must have created no free agents, to be governed by the hope of rewards and fear of punishments; or this will be the fittest means to that end, and worthy of God. For what ground is there to complain of the Deity in this whole affair, except that when an equal share of happiness could not befall every one, he bestows the best on such as use their faculties aright, and takes away what he had given from those that abuse them? 14. If what is laid down above, be true, from thence it is manifest that all kinds of evil, viz. that of imperfection, pain, and sin may enter into the world made by the most wise, good, and powerful author; and its origin may be accounted for, without calling in the assistance of an evil principle. 15. It is plain, that we are tied down to this earth and confined to it, as in a prison; and that our knowledge does not extend beyond the ideas, which we receive from the senses; and who knows not how small a part we understand even of those elements, about which we are conversant? But since the whole mass of elements is a point in regard to the whole universe; is it any wonder, if we mistake when we are forming a judgment, or rather a conjecture, concerning the beauty, order, and goodness of the whole, from this contemptible particle? This earth of ours may be the dungeon of the universe, an hospital of madmen, or a workhouse of reprobates; and yet such as it is, there is much more both of natural and moral good than evil to be found in it. "Thus far, concludes he, has the controversy about the origin of evil proceeded in the author's book. For all that has been said above, is either expressly contained in it, or may very easily be deduced from the principle there laid down." We shall add here a very beautiful passage of our author inserted among the notes of Mr. Law's translation of the Archbishop's book (*), (†) Vol. 2. pag. 473. & seq. 2d edit.

He firmly believes, and thinks he very well comprehends, that there is much more moral good in the world, nay in the earth, than evil. He is sensible, there may be more bad men than good, because there are none but do amiss sometimes, and one ill act is sufficient to denominate a man bad. But yet there are ten good acts done by those we call bad men, for one ill one. Even persons of the very worst character may have got it by two or three flagrant enormities, which yet bear no proportion to the whole series of their lives. The author doth not know the objector, nor with whom he converses; but he must profess, that among such as he is acquainted with, he believes there are hundreds, that would do him good, for one that would do him hurt; and that he has received a thousand good offices for one ill one. He could never believe the doctrine of Hobbes, that all men are bears, wolves, and tygers to one another; that they are born enemies to all others, and all others to them; that they are naturally false and perfidious; or that all the good they do, is out of fear, not virtue. He that describes mankind in this manner may give us cause to suspect, that he himself is such; but if mankind were taken one by one, perhaps not one could be found in an hundred thousand, that could truly own the character. Nay the very authors of this calumny, if their own characters were called in question, would take all possible pains to remove the suspicion from them, and declare that they were speaking of the vulgar, of the bulk of mankind, and not of themselves. Nor in reality do they behave in this manner toward their friends and acquaintance; if they did, few would own them. Observe some of those, that exclaim against all mankind for treachery, dishonesty, deceit, and cruelty; and you will find them diligently cultivating

15th 1709 he preached a Sermon on Rom. viii. 29, 30. before Thomas Earl of Wharton and the Right Honourable the House of Lords, which was printed at Dublin 1709 in 4°, and reprinted at London, under the title of, Divine Predestination and Fore-knowledge consistent with

vating friendships, and discharging the several offices due to friends, relations, and their country, with labour, pain, loss of goods, and hazard of life itself, even where there is no fear to drive them to it, nor inconvenience attending the neglect of it. This, you will say, proceeds from custom and education. Be it so; however the world then has not so far degenerated from all goodness, but the greater part of mankind exercise benevolence; nor is virtue so far exiled, as not to be supported and approved, praised and practised by common consent and public suffrage; and vice is still disgraceful. Indeed we can scarce meet with one, unless pressed by necessity, or provoked by injuries, who is so barbarous and hard-hearted, as not to be moved with compassion, and delighted with beneficence to others; who is not inclined to shew good-will and kindness to his friends, neighbours, children, relations, and diligent in the discharge of civil duties to all; who does not profess some regard for virtue, and think himself affronted, when he is charged with immorality. If any take notice of his own or another's actions for a day together, perhaps he will find one or two blameable; the rest all innocent and inoffensive. Nay it is doubtful whether a Nero or a Caligula, a Commodus or Caracalla (tho' monsters of mankind, and prone to every act of wickedness and fury) have done more ill than innocent actions through their whole lives. It is to be observed in the second place, that one great crime, such as murder, theft, or rapine is oftner talked of, more universally reported, and much longer remembered, than a thousand good, peaceable, generous deeds, which make no noise in the world, nor ever come to public notice, but are silently passed by and overlooked. Which very thing shews, that the former are more rare than the latter; otherwise they would not be received with so much surprize, horror and astonishment. Thirdly, it is observable, that many things are done very innocently, which persons unacquainted with the views and circumstances of the actors, esteem criminal. It is certain, we cannot judge of the goodness or badness of an action from bare appearance, but rather from the inward motions and intentions of the mind, and the light, in which the thing appeared to the agent. Nero killed a man, that was innocent; but who knows whether he did it out of premeditated malice? Perhaps some intrusted with the care of his person, or a flattering courtier, whom he is obliged to depend on, informs of this innocent man as plotting a conspiracy against the Emperor's life, and urges dispatch, lest he be first surpris'd. Perhaps the informer is imposed upon himself, and thinks it real. It is plain such circumstances very much lessen the guilt: and it is probable, if the crimes of Princes were weigh'd impartially, and the whole process laid open, many things might be offer'd, which would greatly alleviate them. Fourthly, many things are done through ignorance of the law, and because those, who commit them, do not know, that they are vicious; nay they are often esteem'd virtues. Thus St. Paul persecuted the Church, and himself owns, that he did it out of ignorance, and therefore obtained mercy. How many things of this kind are done daily by such as profess different religions? It is true, these are sins, but sins of ignorance, which easily obtain forgiveness; and as they do not proceed from an evil disposition and deprav'd will, are scarce to be reckon'd in the number of moral evils. Whoever falls foul on others out of a love of virtue, hatred of vice, or zeal towards God, does wrong; but ignorance and an honest heart make very much for his excuse. This consideration alone would take a great deal off from the number of wicked persons. Neither does this excuse hold only in matters of religion: party prejudices have also a share in it, which induce men to extirpate with fire and sword, those that they believe to be public enemies and traitors to their country. There is no error more pernicious to mankind, and which has produced more or greater crimes, than this; and yet it arises from an honest mind. The mistake lies here, that they forget that their country and commonwealth ought to be defended by just and lawful means, and not at the expence of humanity. Fifthly, prejudice and surmise make many wicked, that really are not so. The most innocent conversation between man and woman gives the malicious a handle to suspect and slander them. From any one single circumstance, that usually attends a criminal action, the suspected person is found guilty of the fact itself. From one bad action a man's whole life is disparaged and judged to be of the same tenor. If one member of a society be caught in a fault, all the rest are presumed to be as bad. It is scarce credible how many are looked upon as scandalously wicked through such suspicions, who are very far from it. Confessors and Judges in criminal cases know very well how small a part of common fame is true, how little it is ever to be trusted. Sixthly, we must distinguish, and the law itself does, between such things as proceed from malice and premeditated wickedness, and those that arise from violence of passion and disorder of mind. The guilt is very much extenuated, when the person offending is under provocation, and as it were transported beyond himself by a sudden fit of passion. These things are all known to our most equitable Judge, who will pass a merciful, and not a rigorous sentence on us; and for these reasons, we believe, he forbids us to judge any thing before the time. We only know the out-sides of things; and it is possible, that such as seem to us the greatest crimes, would upon seeing the whole procedure, and making proper allowances, appear to be the least. Many virtues as well as vices lie in the mind invisible to human eyes; it is speaking at random therefore to pronounce upon the number of one or other; and he that would from thence infer the necessity of an evil principle, ought to be esteem'd a rash judge, and an usurper of God's tribunal. Lastly, it may be observed, that the continuance and increase of mankind is a sure proof that there is more good than evil in the world: for one or two acts may have a pernicious influence on many persons; nay all immoral actions tend to the destruction of mankind, at least to the common detriment and diminution of them; whereas a great many even numberless good actions must necessarily concur to the preservation of each individual. If therefore bad actions exceeded the number of the good, there would be an end of human kind. We have clear evidence of this in those countries, where vices multiply; the number of men continually decreases, and the place grows desolate; but upon the return of virtue and goodness it is again stocked with inhabitants. This is a sign, that mankind could not subsist, if ever vice were prevalent, since many good acts are necessary to repair the loss, which attends one bad one. One single action may take away the life of a man, or of several; but how many acts of benevolence and humanity must necessarily contribute to the bringing up, educating, and preserving every one? "From what has been said, says the Archbishop, I hope it appears, that there is more good than evil among men, and that a good God might make the world, notwithstanding the argument drawn from the contrary supposition. But almost all of this is unnecessary, since the whole Universe may have ten thousand times more good than evil, though this earth of ours had no one good thing in it. This world is too small to bear any proportion to the whole system; and therefore we can form but a very unequal judgment of it from hence. It may be the hospital or prison of the world; and can any one judge of the healthfulness of a climate, from viewing an hospital, where all are sick? Or of the wisdom of a Government, from a place of confinement, where there are only madmen? Or of the virtue of a people, from a prison, where there are none but malefactors? Not that I believe the earth is really such a place; but I say it may be supposed such, and any supposition, which shews how a thing may be, destroys the Manichean argument drawn from the impossibility of accounting for it. In the interim, I look upon this earth, as an habitation abounding with delights, in which a man may live with comfort, joy, and happiness. I own with the greatest gratitude to God, that I myself with the Freedom of Man's Will. A Sermon preached &c. This was attacked by Anthony Collins Esq; in a Pamphlet, intitled, A Vindication of the Divine Attributes. In some self have lived such a life; and am persuaded, that my friends, acquaintance, and servants, have all the same; and I believe that there is no evil in life, but what is very tolerable, especially to those, who have hopes of a future immortality." For a proof, that the good, both natural and moral, in the world, is superior to the evil, the reader may see Sherlock on Providence, c. 7. Hutcheson on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions, Sect. 6. p. 183, 184, Edit. London 1728; Leibnitz, Essais de Theodicée; Cbubb's Supplement to the Vindication of God's Moral Character, in his Treats, p. 281 &c. and Dr. Lucas's Enquiry after Happiness, Vol. I. Sect. 2. C. 2. Monsieur Bernard gave an abridgment of our author's book in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (9). Mr. Bayle in the second volume of his Reponse aux Questions d'un Provincial (10) examined the hypothesis of our author, as it was represented in Monsieur Bernard's abstract, and in a passage cited by the authors of the Acta Eruditorum, but omitted by Monsieur Bernard; who complains (11) of Mr. Bayle for not consulting Archbishop King's book itself, and observes that Mr. Bayle attacks that Prelate upon such principles, as he would expressly deny, since the English Divines do not maintain in every respect the principles common among others of the Reformed. The first of Archbishop King's principles, which Mr. Bayle takes notice of, is, That God always acts for an End, which End in the creation of the world was to exercise his power, or to communicate his goodness; so that it is only improperly said, that God created all things for his glory. Mr. Bayle allows this principle, and that is almost the only point in which he agrees with the Archbishop. But he denies, what the Archbishop asserts, viz. that there is more natural good than evil in the world; and that the establishing of two principles does not remove the difficulty about the origin of evil, because it is as much repugnant to the Divine Goodness to have created beings, which he foresaw would be corrupted by another principle, as to have created those, which were corruptible in themselves. He denies also, in opposition to our author, that every thing derived from matter must of necessity be subject to pains, diseases, grief, &c. And to confute that notion, he seems, as Monsieur Bernard observes (12), to build upon the opinion of occasional causes, as if it were an uncontroversible doctrine, whereas it had very few followers in England. Mr. Bayle asks, to what purpose serve the pains of childbirth? and answers, to call for a midwife; and puts this instance in the margin, that a woman in a wilderness will feel as much pain as in a city. "And no doubt, says Mr. Bernard (13), he would conclude from thence, that those pains consequently serve for nothing. If he knew no other use of these pains, he might have consulted some Physician, who would have informed him of the matter." Mr. Bayle denies, that mistake and ignorance are the natural effects of man's imperfection; and cites upon that head the greatest part of the Divines, who believe that Adam was created to learn, that though his knowledge was not infinite, it would be absurd to suppose that he was in error or ignorance. "But the authority of Divines, says Monsr. Bernard (*), will signify but little, where the question is about reason." Mr. Bayle denies, that it is necessary in order to a man's esteeming himself happy in his right choice, to be persuaded, that the choice was made by the strength of his own free-will. He alledges several sorts of men, who do not think their happiness depends upon their liberty, and quotes a great many authors antient and modern, Poets and others. But he ought, says Monsieur Bernard (14), to have proved to Archbishop King, that all those people, who have suffered themselves to be conducted by others, &c. did not, by an antecedent act of free-will, choose this as the best way for them. For to suppose, that after a man, having examined a ship, which he finds to be good, and the Pilot, whom he finds to be skilful, has resolved very freely to go on board, and intrust himself to the conduct of the Pilot; to suppose, that this man, in order to preserve the freedom of his will must needs, at every motion, which the Pilot makes on board the ship, and at every order he gives out, make a free act of his will, by which he consents to that motion, and without which he is not free; this is certainly what the Archbishop never alledged, and except he had maintained that proposition, most part of Mr. Bayle's instances fall of themselves." Mr. Bayle brings several other reasons against our author's notion of liberty; and afterwards answers that question of the Archbishop, Why God permitted Sin? He pretends, that the inconveniences, which our author alledges, in case God had not created a being endowed with such a liberty, as the Archbishop conceives, are absolutely null. He says the same of what the Archbishop advances to shew, that God was not obliged to employ his omnipotent power, to hinder those free agents from abusing their freedom, or to transport them to another habitation, where they would have had no occasion to prompt them to a bad choice. Monsieur Bernard (15) makes one general remark upon this subject, which he tells us may be applied to many other parts of this controversy; and that is, that Mr. Bayle artfully separates the inconveniences, which Archbishop King proposes, that he may confute them with the greater ease, without taking notice, that divers reasons, which taken separately, would not determine one to act after a certain manner, yet might determine him, if they acted jointly. I have a mind, for instance, to go to such a town; I have a very pressing reason, which hinders me, and I have many others, which incline me to undertake the journey: every one of these are less than that, which should determine me not to go; but taken all together, they turn the scale. You do nothing at all to hinder me from taking the journey, if you only refute each reason apart, which made me determine to go; you must make one argument of them all, and convince me, that all of them together are not so strong as that one, which should hinder my proceeding on my journey. One thing, as Monsieur Bernard remarks (16), which shews it to have been necessary, that Mr. Bayle should have read our author's book, is his way of confuting what the Archbishop has said of the torments of the damned, that they are useful perhaps to keep good men to their duty, and make them persevere in a right conduct. Mr. Bayle pretends, that this cannot be understood of the Saints in Paradise, who have no occasion for such a curb. "But it may be, says Monsieur Bernard, that Archbishop King will not grant him this, but maintain, that the confirmation of Saints in goodness is not the confirmation of an Enthusiast supported by no motives; of which number the Archbishop conjectures that the example of the damned may be one. In the mean time Mr. Bayle supposing it not to be so, imagines that the Archbishop would insinuate, that after the resurrection there will be new inhabitants upon the earth. "This is the effect of confuting a book, which Mr. Bayle never read." Mr. Bayle afterwards attacks our author upon his assertion, that the goodness of things depends solely on God's having chosen them. He replied to Monsieur Bernard, and made several new observations upon Archbishop King's book, in the fifth volume of his Reponse aux Questions d'un Provincial, published after his death. The Archbishop answered his remarks in the papers, which he left behind him, the substance of which is inserted by way of Notes by Mr. Law, in the second edition of his translation of the Archbishop's book. Mr. Law observes (17), that Mr. Bayle frequently introduces among his reasonings the testimonies of other writers, but that most of these testimonies are rhetorical or poetic flourishes, rather than Philosophic truths; and consequently not worth a serious examination. To draw any thing like an argument from another's words, we should at least be sure of his determinate meaning, of the precise number of his Ideas, as well as the justness of their connection together, which we must never expect from such kind of random Quotations. It may not therefore be improper to observe here once for all, that Bayle's usual Method of reasoning from authorities must be very weak and unphilosophical, and calculated rather to blind men's eyes, than to inform their understanding." Mr. Leibnitz wrote Remarks upon

(9) Mois de Mai & June 1703.

(10) Ch. 74. & seqq. Edit. Rotterdam 1706 in 22mo.

(11) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Mois de Janvier, 1706, pag. 57.

(12) Ibid. pag. 63.

(13) Ibid. pag. 64.

(*) Ibid. pag. 65.

(14) Ibid. pag. 67.

(15) Ibid. pag. 69, 70.

(16) Ibid. pag. 70.

(17) Translation of the Essay on the Origin of Evil, vol. 2. pag. 414. 2d edit.

some Remarks on his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin's Sermon, intituled, Divine Predestination &c. [D]. London 1710, pagg. 38. and by Dr. John Edwards in a piece intituled, The Divine Perfections vindicated: or some brief Remarks &c. London 1710 in 8vo. In 1714 he published at Dublin in 4to, A Sermon preached at the Funeral of Narcissus Archbishop of Ar-magh, in St. Patrick's Church. July 17, 1717, he was sworn one of the Lord's Justices of Ireland.

upon the Archbishop's book in French, published by Mr. Des Maizeaux in the third volume of the Recueil de diverses Pieces sur le Pbilosopbie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Histoire, les Mathematiques &c. par Mrs. Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, & autres Auteurs celebres, printed at Amsterdam 1720 in three volumes. Mr. Leibnitz in this piece files the treatise de Origine Mali, a Work full of Learning and elegance; and tells us, that the Archbishop's first four Chapters agree with his own principles; but that the fifth, which treats of human liberty and moral evil, is founded upon principles opposite to his.

(D) Attacked by Anthony Collins Esquire in a Pamphlet, intituled, A vindication of the Divine attributes &c. In this pamphlet Mr. Collins observes the following method, I. To lay down his Grace's notion of the attributes of God. II. Shew what led his Grace to lay down such a notion. III. Offer some considerations against his Grace's scheme. IV. Answer what may be objected from his Grace's Sermon. I. With regard to his Grace's notion of the attributes of God; he says (8), When the Scriptures speak of God, they ascribe hands, and eyes, and feet to him; not that it is designed we should believe, that he has any of these members according to the literal signification; but the meaning is, that he has a power to execute all those acts, to the effecting of which those parts in us are instrumental. And when the Scriptures represent God as affected with such Passions as we perceive in our selves, viz. as angry and pleased, as loving and hating, as repenting and changing his resolutions, as full of Mercy and provoked to Revenge; the meaning is, that he will as certainly punish the wicked as if he was inflamed with the passion of Anger; that he will reward the good as infallibly, as we will those, for whom we have a particular love; that when men turn from their wickedness, he will as surely change his dispensations towards them, as if he really repented, and had changed his mind. In this point all considering men agree with his Grace. But he proceeds, throughout his Sermon, to give the like account of the wisdom, mercy, justice, knowledge, foreknowledge, virtue, and all other attributes of God; and makes them as improperly applied to him, as eyes or ears, love or hatred, or any human parts and passions; for he says, As the nature and passions of men are thus by analogy and comparison ascribed to God; so in the same manner we find the powers and operations of our minds ascribed to him; and he instances in wisdom, and understanding, and mercy, which are, says he (19), of so different a nature from what they are in us, and so superior to all that we can conceive, that in reality there is no more likeness between them, than between our hand and God's Power. And that the terms of foreknowledge and predestination, nay of understanding and will, when ascribed to God, are not to be taken strictly and properly; nor are we to think they are in him after the same manner, or in the same sense, that we find them in ourselves; but on the contrary, we are to interpret them only by way of analogy and comparison (20). Again, Wisdom is in us as different from what we call so in God, as light is from motion (21). Again, There is as great a difference between these foregoing when attributed to God, and as they are in us, as between weighing in a balance and thinking, in truth infinitely greater (22). Nay he says, The best representations we can make of God are infinitely short of truth (23). And lastly he concludes, That understanding, justice, and virtue are not to be understood to signify the same thing, when applied to God and to men (24). II. As to what led his Grace to lay down such a notion of the attributes of God; he thinks (25), that if those attributes are understood literally, and in the same way as we find them with us, absurd and intolerable consequences would follow. And he allows in particular (26), That the foreknowledge and predetermination of God are inconsistent with the contingency of events and our freedom of will, if his foreknowledge and predetermination are of the same nature with ours. The use he makes of this analogous notion of foreknowledge is contained in these words (27): Since we have no more proper notion of fore-knowledge and predetermination in God than a man born blind has of sight and colours, we ought no more to pretend to determine what is consistent or not consistent with them, than a blind man ought to determine from what he hears or feels, to what objects the sense of seeing reaches. Mr. Collins * offers some considerations against his Grace's notions; and observes, 1. That, "according to those notions, it is impossible for his Grace to prove the existence of God against atheists. For our conceptions or ideas, that we signify by the term God, must be the subject of proof, whenever we bring the term God into a proposition. But his Grace says, All our best conceptions of God are infinitely short of truth (29), and as different from truth as weighing (29) in a balance is from thinking (30), or as Light from motion (31). Therefore his Grace cannot prove the being of God, or, which is all one, the existence of any being, that is really conformable to our conceptions of God, unless his Grace will say, that what is infinitely short of truth and different from truth, can be proved true. 2. It being evident from the foregoing article, that whoever proposes to prove the existence of God, must have such an idea of God as is agreeable to the real nature of the being, whose existence is proposed to be proved; I would ask his Grace how he would define the term God, if he undertook to prove God's existence against an atheist. It is evident, he must either contradict his opinion, that all our conceptions of God are false, and assign some conception of God that he would stand by and own to be agreeable to truth; or else acknowledge the impossibility of proving God's existence. And I am inclined to believe his Grace would choose the first, because there are several passages in his discourse, which imply a conception of God, that his Grace may perhaps stand by and own to be agreeable to the truth of things; and that, as I take it, is of a Being, that is a general cause of the wonderful effects in nature, to which we cannot give any particular attributes or perfections: (though in reality, according to his Grace, this can be no better than an analogous conception of God, any more than the conception of him as a holy, good, merciful, and wise being.) Mr. Collins (32) then quotes some words of the Archbishop's sermon, p. 5. to shew, that his Grace can have no other notion of God, than of a being, that is a general cause of effects. "Now if that be the idea, says Mr. Collins, his Grace signifies by the term God, I will allow that the term God may be brought into a proposition, and the being of God in that sense will become capable of proof. But if that be all that is meant by that term, I see not why atheists should not come into the belief of such a Deity; for they, equally with theists, allow some general cause of all effects to have eternally existed; but, as I take it, differ from them in the attributes of that general cause. As for example, the theist affirms the world was made by a wise being, and thinks the wonderful harmony of the Universe, an admirable evidence of the existence of such a being. On the contrary the atheist affirms wisdom is not necessary to such a purpose; but that all these admirable effects may be produced by causes and powers, of which we have no idea. And does not his Grace give up the point to these men, in allowing the world does not proceed from a wise or intelligent being, but only from a being considered as a general cause, of whose particular attributes we have no notion at all? Perhaps his Grace may think there will remain a wide difference between atheism and theism, because he supposes his eternal being to be immaterial; and the atheist supposes his eternal being to be the material Universe. But that difference is, as I conceive, of no consequence; for if all the moral and all the other natural attributes are given up as indefensible; then all the arguments for God's government of the world, for rewarding and punishing men in a future state, which are drawn from

(18) Sermon, pag. 6.

(19) Ibid. pag. 7.

(20) Ibid. pag. 8.

(21) Ibid. pag. 19.

(22) Ibid. pag. 21.

(23) Ibid. pag. 16.

(24) Ibid. pag. 34, 35.

(25) Ibid. pag. 33.

(26) Ibid. pag. 9.

* Vindication of the Divine Attributes, pag. 17.

(29) Sermon, pag. 16.

(30) Ibid. pag.

(31) Ibid. pag.

(32) Ibid. pag.

(32) Vindication, pag. 19.

Ireland. In 1719 he published at London in 4to, A Discourse concerning the Consecration of Churches; shewing what is meant by dedicating them, with the Grounds of that Office. Feb. 24, 1721 he was again sworn one of the Lords Justices of Ireland; as he was likewise June the 13th 1723. He died at his palace at St. Sepulchre's in Dublin May the 8th 1729, and was interred in the North-side of the Church-yard of Donnybrook. A particular account of his manuscripts, charities, character, &c. will soon be published by Mr. Harris in his new translation and continuation of Sir James Ware, De Præfulibus & Scriptoribus Hiberniæ. The Archbishop's heirs intend to publish all his works together, with his life prefixed. There is a Sermon of his Grace upon Gen. ii. 16, 17. printed at the end of the second edition of Mr. Edmund Law's translation of his book, De Origine Mali, at London 1732 in 8vo, two volumes.

from the consideration of the attributes of God taken in a strict and literal sense, are given up. As for instance, Do not we argue for a future state from the justice of God, and conclude, that he will deal with every man according to his merit? Do we not, from the same attribute, conclude the necessity of an incarnate God, suffering for the sins of the world? And do we not conclude from his goodness, his design to save mankind? And do we not infer from his knowledge, that he takes cognizance of our actions; and from his will, do not we infer our duty? But if none of those attributes are in God, nor any others, that we can conceive, we can never argue from them, nor infer any kind of obligation to duty; for all the motives to duty, unless it be that of present pleasure (which is an atheistical consideration) are solely drawn from the consideration of the attributes of God taken in a literal sense. How can men know God's will, when he has no will? How can men know, they shall be rewarded or punished in a future state, or what reason have they to think there shall be a future state, but from the consideration of God's justice, which will certainly make good men amends in another state for their sufferings in this life, and make wicked men sufferers for the pleasure their sins gave them here? But if we lose the use and benefit of the notion of God, that is, have such a notion as has no influence on our practice; what signifies contending with the atheist about so poor a speculation as the question of the existence of an eternal immaterial being? For whether he be material or immaterial, if he can have neither understanding, nor will, nor justice, it is all alike. Besides, if once the Deity be supposed to have no understanding, &c. I do not see how his Grace will be able to prove the existence of one eternal immaterial being, if the atheist should think it worth his while to dispute that point with his Grace. 3. Mr. Collins observes (33), that his Grace has given up the cause to Mr. Bayle. For Mr. Bayle says, there is no answering the Manichean objections against some of the attributes of God, without captivating the understanding to the obedience of faith, or believing against evidence; that is, believing God to be good, though it be evident, says he, he is not so, and believing him to be wise, though it be evident he is not so. And what says his Grace? Why he owns God is not good nor wise, and thereby yields to the force of Mr. Bayle's arguments. Only Mr. Bayle continues to believe God is good and wise, against the force of all human reasoning; and his Grace supposes God is neither wise nor good; which two do not much, if at all, differ but in words; for Mr. Bayle's good and wise against evidence and argument, is much the same with being neither good nor wise." 4. Mr. Collins remarks (34) that, according to his Grace, it is a matter of no great consequence what notions men have of God. The Archbishop thinks (35), that one, who imagines God to be a mighty King, that sits in heaven, and has the earth for his footstool; that has thousands of Ministers to attend him; that has great love and favour for such as obey his orders, and is in a rage and fury against the disobedient; and believes these things literally, will be saved by virtue of that belief. And he calls those officious and impertinent, that raise objections against such a notion, and put them into people's heads (36).

(33) Pag. 22.

(34) Pag. 22.

(36) Ibid. pag. 27.

But Mr. Collins (37) desires his Grace to consider, whether it is not dangerous to leave men to themselves with such erroneous and vicious conceptions of God; for if they will but give themselves the least trouble to reflect on their notion, they must find nothing is so easy as to slide into atheism from the belief of a God, which they take to be such a finite, limited, corporeal, immoral (as fury and rage import) Being, as his Grace describes. I hope his Grace is of opinion, that the Being of God, which is the foundation of all religion and morality, is capable of the clearest proof imaginable; and consequently that there is no danger of well-meaning men's running into atheism, if they should happen to be convinced, that they have erroneous conceptions of God. But suppose his Grace is of the opinion of Tully (38) and Simonides, and thinks the Being of a God a difficult problem, and that it is dangerous to disturb men in their wrong notions of God, for fear they should have no notion of him at all; I must confess, I cannot agree with his Grace in thinking it would be reasonable, even on that supposition, to forbear objecting to a wrong notion. Evidence ought to be the sole ground of assent, and examination is the way to arrive at evidence; and therefore rather than I would avoid examination, arguing, and objecting laid aside, I would choose to say, that no opinions whatever can be dangerous to a man, that impartially examines into the truth of things. And this I hope his Grace will assent to upon second thoughts, rather than prevent so much good preaching as his Grace must needs do, by arguing those men guilty of officiousness and impertinence, that would reclaim men from such an error as believing God to be like a man, if once the Clergy come to be of his Grace's sentiment." 5.

(37) Vindication, pag. 23.

Mr. Collins observes (39), that his Grace, by denying God to be a body, wise, just Being, plainly contradicts all those passages of Scripture, where the example of God is recommended to our imitation. 6. That his Grace has given up the cause to the Unitarians, when he declares, [p. 12.] the distinction of Three Persons in one God to be but a Resemblance, i. e. not truly and really such as we mean by three Persons, but only analogically such, just as Time and a Line are made to resemble one another (40).

7. That "his Grace has failed of his main design, pretended in his discourse, viz. to manifest the Divine Foreknowledge consistent with the freedom of man's will (41)." Mr. Collins at last considers what might be objected to him from his Grace's sermon (12); and concludes with these words: "I hope, I have said enough to make his Grace employ his thoughts once more on the subject, and give us a farther Eclaircissement on the subject of this sermon, and of his book De Origine Mali; which I wish he may perform to the satisfaction of the public, and thereby prevent my design of handling these questions; which would not be thought so difficult as some imagine them to be, if men would but be willing to bring every proposition they use to the trial. Whereas men will for ever esteem some propositions to be sacred and true, and never suspect them of falshood; and that is the true reason why they are so confounded, and advance such contradictory schemes about the prescience, wisdom, justice, and other attributes of God. But if they would impartially examine every thing (how sacred soever it may be to them before they examined) all things would then appear harmonious and consistent in the Intellectual System, as they do in the Mechanical System of the Universe."

(38) Res enim nulla est, de qua tantopere nos san- lum indocti, sed docti dissentiant &c. De Natura Deorum, lib. 1.

(39) Vindication, pag. 24.

(40) Ibid. pag. 25, 26, 27, 28. This remark was written by Mr. Thomas Emlyn, and not by Mr. Collins.

(41) Ibid. pag. 28, & seq.

(42) Ibid. pag. 35, & seq.

KING (PETER) Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain in the eighteenth Century, was descended of a good family of that name in Somersetshire, and son of Mr. Jerom King, an eminent Grocer and Salter in the City of Exeter in Devonshire. He was was born at Exeter in the year 1669, and bred up for some years to his father's business; but in the midst of that employment, his inclination to learning was so strong, that he laid out all the money he could spare in books, and devoted every moment of his leisure hours to study; so that he became an excellent scholar, before the world suspected any such thing, and gave the public a noble proof of his skill in the Church History, in his Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity and Worship of the Primitive Church, that flourished within the first 300 years after Christ. Faithfully collected out of the extant writings of those ages [A]. London 1691 in 8vo. His acquaintance with Mr. Locke, to whom he was related, and

[A] His Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, &c.] In the Preface he observes, that "the design of this Treatise is in general to represent the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the primitive Church, that flourished within the first three hundred years after Christ; but more particularly and especially to describe their opinions and practices with respect to those things, that are now unhappily controverted between those of these Kingdoms, who are commonly known by the names of Church-of-England-Men, Presbyterians, Independents, and Anabaptists; for which reason it comes to pass, that to those points, concerning which there is no difference amongst us, I have not spoken so largely as otherwise I might have done; and some other customs of theirs I have not mentioned at all, because now neglected and disused by us. What I have written as to this subject, I have wholly collected out of the genuine and unquestionably authentic writings of those ages, that are now extant, making use of no other writings whatsoever, except the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, which was written in the beginning of the fourth age, and relates only those affairs, that were transacted in the three former, beyond the period of which time this Enquiry doth not reach; but is wholly limited thereby, and confined thereunto. That which hath been thus collected, has been done, I hope, with the greatest impartiality and fidelity, without any prepossession of mind, or any fraudulent design whatsoever." He afterwards observes, that amongst other reasons of publishing this book, these two were the chiefest, viz. to inform others, and to inform himself; to inform others, says he, what the practices of the Primitive Apostolic Churches were, if any shall be so inquisitive and desirous to know them; or, if I am mistaken (as who is without errors?) to be better informed myself, which I must needs confess was that which I chiefly designed in the publication hereof. Wherefore without ostentation or challenging, but unfeignedly and sincerely to prevent mistakes in my younger years, I humbly desire (if the request be not too bold) and shall heartily thank any learned person, that will be so kind as to inform me, if he knows me to have erred in any one or more particulars; which he may do, either publicly, or, if he think fit, privately, by letters to my bookseller, who will convey it safely to my hands." He concludes his preface with remarking, that when he first resolved on the printing of this Treatise, he designed to have published his observations on the fourth general head propounded in the title-page to be enquired into, viz. the Worship of the Primitive Church, as well as he has done on the three former; but for some reasons, says he, I have reserved this for a particular Tract by itself, which probably, though I do not absolutely promise it, may in a little time more be also published; and that the rather, because in this part I have made two or three references thereunto, which I thought good to acquaint the reader with, that so, if he cannot find some things that I have referred to in this Treatise, he may be assured they are to be met with in the ensuing one." The second Part of this Enquiry was published in 8vo. He concludes the last chapter of it with an earnest persuasion to Peace, Unity, and Moderation, in which he writes as follows: "Certain I am, we need no arguments to induce us hereunto [to Peace, Moderation, &c.]; both the necessity and facility of love and unity require it at our hands. Its necessity is evident from hence, that whilst we spend our zeal and heat about these inconsiderable matters, the very foundation of faith and morals are attacked and shaken; atheism increases, immorality prevails, and those damnable heresies, which for many ages have been silenced and abandoned, are now revived by men of corrupt faith, who take occasion from the lawlessness and licentiousness of this present age, to vent those cursed tenets, which eradicate and destroy all Religion: it is to be feared, that unless we hasten to compose our differences about the skirts and fringes of Religion, the very vitals and essentials thereof will be corroded and devoured by heresy and profaneness. And as for these and the like reasons, the necessity of an union or comprehension is manifest on the one hand; so the facility of such an union is as apparent on the other hand; for, thanks be to God, our differences are neither about faith nor manners. We all believe in one and the same God, hope to be saved by one and the same Redeemer, desire to be sanctified by one and the same Sanctifier, receive one and the same Scriptures, assert the same doctrines, and acknowledge the necessity of the same duties. Our disputes are only about lesser matters, about modes and forms, about gestures and postures, and such-like inferior matters, about which it should grieve a wise man to quarrel, and which with the greatest ease in the world might be composed and settled, if managed by men of prudence and moderation; and such men, it is hoped, are the Reverend Bishops advanced by their Majesties, whose promotion to those places of dignity and trust many honest and peaceable men look upon as a good omen and prognostic of our future union and happy establishment." A second edition of this book has been since printed. An Answer to it was published by Mr. Sclater, a Non-juring Clergyman, at London 1717 in 8vo, under this title: An Original Draught of the Primitive Church: in answer to a Discourse, intitled, An Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, &c. By a Presbyterian of the Church of England. Mr. Sclater in his Preface observes, that our author in his "Preface shews an humble diffidence of his youthful performance, and desires another sense might be given of his several quotations (if need required) for better information of himself and others. I confess, says Mr. Sclater, I saw need enough of that at my first perusal of his book, and not a little wondered, that no friendly hand had done that kindness for him long before. As to my own part, I had never walked in the unpleasant paths of controversy to that day; and besides the consciousness of my unfitness for it, had aversion enough ever to set a foot in them; but seeing none had answered, or was answering (as I could hear of) so reasonable a desire, though men of letters in both Kingdoms of our united Island had declared an earnest expectation of it, and the holy Church of England in particular has reproached the silence of her children in an argument, that so plainly struck at her foundation; filial obedience, (I may say) to so faithful a parent moved me to use the best endeavours I could to vindicate her truly Apostolical Constitution, and to plead the cause of injured Antiquity, as well as hers; for that both are truly one in this case, the impartial reader will easily observe, when he sees the palpable mistakes corrected, and the unfair representations of the venerable Fathers of the Church (so obvious in almost every page of those plausible Collections) restored to their genuine sense again. This is what may be expected here; and I am not conscious I have strained any one passage in antiquity, beyond the true meaning of the venerable authors themselves, to form a different construction of it from that of the ingenious Enquirer. I should count it the worst of sacrilege to do so; the goods of the Church are not so sacred as her sense is.

3

"What

and who left him half his Library at his death, was of great advantage to him ; by his advice, after he had studied some time at Leyden in Holland, he applied himself to the study of the Law, in which profession his learning and indefatigable diligence made him soon be taken notice of. In the two last Parliaments during the reign of King William, and in five Parliaments during the reign of Queen Anne he served as Burgess for Beer-Alston in Devonshire. In 1702 he published at London in 8vo, without his name, his History of the Apostles Creed. With Critical Observations on its several Articles [B]. This Treatise is written with great learning and judgment ;

and
 “ What each quotation appeared to me from the best “ authority and closest attention I could use, I have “ fairly represented here. If defective in apprehend“ ing the true sense, or injudicious in the inferences
 “ from it, I heartily submit, in my turn, to the char“ ity of better information. For as I write with a “ conscientious regard to undeceive some, so I am in“ finitely more concerned not to be deceived myself ;
 “ and I wish no greater freedom from prejudice or “ party in any, who read or censure these papers,
 “ than I am conscious of in the composing of them.” Mr.
 Sclater then observes, that “ every one too well knows “ of what a large and extensive nature this unhappy sub“ ject is, and that the controversial books about it are “ sadly numerous, and full of different schemes and “ arguments, according to the genius of sects, and “ times, and persons ; many of which, says he, might “ have fallen in with several parts of this discourse,
 “ had I been inclined to dispute (as I bless God I am “ not) ; but I have kept close to the single Treatise “ before me, and that for two reasons especially ;
 “ 1. Because I heard from many hands, that the less “ learned and more prejudiced adversaries of the truly “ Primitive Church of England have made their boasts “ of it ; and from its not being answered, have “ proclaimed it an unanswerable vindication of their “ separation from her. 2. Because I think, that all “ the scattered arguments and pleas for their unwar“ rantable schism are reducible to some one or other “ of the great variety of quotations cited in it.” He afterwards remarks, that since his papers were nigh wrought off the press, an ingenious Treatise had come into his hands, intitled, The Invalidity of the Dissenting Ministry, &c. “ wherein, says he, some particular “ quotations in the Enquiry relating to the Presbyter’s “ power of Ordination, are judiciously explained, and “ with clear reasoning answered to the full.” The book mentioned by Mr. Sclater in this passage is intitled, The Invalidity of the Dissenting Ministry, or Presbyterian Ordination an irregular and unjustifiable practice. In answer to Mr. Pierce’s Sermons, entituled, Presbyterian Ordination proved Regular : and to all the pretended instances of Presbyterian Ordination, in a book lately published by Mr. Charles Owen, called,
The Validity of the Dissenting Ministry : with Remarks on the Forgery and Dishonesty of that Writer. To which is added, an impartial View and Censure of the Mistakes propagated for the ordaining power of Presbyters, in a celebrated book, entituled, An Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church, that flourished within the first three hundred years after Christ. By a Presbyter of the Church of England.

[B] He published The History of the Apostles Creed : with Critical Observations on its several Articles. In the preface he observes, that “ if the Explication given “ by himself of any article or part of the Creed, “ should happen to be disliked or not approved by “ any one, the reader must remember, that the author
 “ only acts the part of an Historian ; his design being “ only to collect and discover the sense and meaning “ of the first makers and composers of the Creed,
 “ what it was that the introducers of the several ar“ ticles purposed and intended thereby ; and if in any “ place he seems to speak his own sense, that is only “ for the better carrying on the thread of his dis“ course, and in the quality and person of an Histori“ an, as having collected the sense or explication in “ such place mentioned, to be the intended meaning “ of the framers of that part or clause of the Creed ;
 “ the only intent of the author being to shew the sense “ of the composers of the Creed, and not at all to “ enter into an examination of the justness or truth of “ such sense and meaning ; the author leaving that “ to every man’s private judgment, to be tried and “ determined by the holy Scriptures, the only perfect

“ and infallible rule of faith, by which even this “ Creed itself, and every explication thereof, must be “ tried and judged, and is no farther to be received or “ believed, than as it is consonant and agreeable there-“ unto, which is according to the sixth article of the “ Church of England, that whatsoever is not read in “ the holy Scripture, nor may be proved thereby, is not “ to be required of any man, that it should be believed
 “ as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or ne- “ cessary to salvation.” In the first chapter he cites the encomiums given the Creed by the primitive writ-ters, and the several names by which it hath been called. He shews, that it was principally termed a symbol, for which appellation two reasons are commonly alledged ; the one taken from the manner of common suppers amongst the antients, which is shewn to be weak and uncertain ; the other taken from military affairs, where it denotes the watch-words and signs, by which soldiers knew each other ; which is affirmed not to be the full and proper signification of the word, but that it is rather to be derived from the marks and tokens used by the idolatrous Pagans in their sacred rites, called by them Symbola, which were two-fold, either mute or vocal. He gives instances of both, and proves them to have been secret marks or words, revealed only to those who were initiated in their mysteries, by means of which they were known to each other, and had free admission, wheresoever they came, to the services of those Deities, whose symbols they had received ; and that from the same reasons, and in allusion thereunto, the Creed was called a symbol by the primitive authors. He then proceeds to the authors of the Creed ; and observes, that some ascribe it to the Apostles, which by several reasons is demonstrated to be impossible ; but that nevertheless it is apostolical and antient. He shews, that it is exceedingly difficult to find out the precise framers of it. That the authors of it were many, and the composition of it a work of time. That one part of it was used by the Apostles, and left by them to their successors. That the Creed was always demanded at baptism, both by the Apostles, and by those who came after them.
 That the other part of the Creed was afterwards added
 by the rulers of the Church, in opposition to heresies, as they appeared and sprung up. He shews in what sense the Apostles are said to be the authors of one part, and the succeeding governors of the Church authors of the other. That the meaning of the Creed is to be fetched from the writings of the Fathers. That the Creed was first constantly read in the Eastern Church about five hundred years after Christ, and in the Western near six hundred. That the Creed then read was the Nicene, into whose room afterwards came the Apostles. The contents of the second Chapter are as follow. The reason for which it is said in the singular number, I believe ; the meaning of the word believe.
 By believing in God we assent to his existence and unity. The Greek and antient Latin Creeds read, I believe in ONE God, which was designed against some blasphemous deniers of the Divine Unity, who, negatively, were not the Jews, since they owned it ; nor the heathens principally, seeing the greater, or at least the wiser part of them acknowledged it ; but positively, they were certain antient heretics ; in opposition to whom this clause of ONE God is to be considered, either absolutely or relatively. Absolutely it signifies, that there is but ONE God. The Valentinians, Cerdonians, Marcionites, and others, introduced several Gods. The authors of this heresy lived in the Apostles time. Against it the Creed declares, that we must believe in ONE God ; which being understood relatively, or as it hath reference to what immediately follows in the Creed, signifies that ONE and the same God is the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth, in contradiction to several heretics, who maintained opinions contrary thereunto. The title, FA-THER,

(a) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Mois de Novembre, 1702, pag. 434. and Mr. Peter Coste, who sent an abstract of it in French to Monsieur Bernard, who published it in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for November and December 1702, tells us (a), that a learned English Bishop, who had begun to read it with a disadvantageous prejudice, imagining, that it would prove only a wretched rhapsody out of

THEY, denotes God to be the origin of all beings, in contradiction to the Gnostics and others, who being worse than the heathens disowned him to be such, and refused to give him the appellation of FATHER, (which is here briefly explained), but attributed it to another being different from him. Or it denotes the peculiar relation of the Father unto the Son, in which sense it hath been also understood in the Creed, which is the primary sense thereof, wherein it hath been in the Creed from the foundation of Christianity. The word ALMIGHTY hath a threefold signification in the Creed. First, it denotes God's infinite power, which shews the reason why it is placed before the making of heaven and earth. In this sense it was intended against the Valentinians, Simonians, Menandrians, &c. whose heresies are explained. Secondly, it implies God's providential government of the world, in opposition to the denial thereof by the Gnostics and Marcionites; the former of whom at least ascribed this word ALMIGHTY, thus understood, to another being, different from the supreme and only God. Thirdly, it includes God's immensity and omnipresence, in contradiction to the error of the Gnostics, which confined God within a certain limited space. What is to be understood by MAKER, and what by HEAVEN and EARTH. The blasphemous tenets of several Heretics about the creation of the world. Simon Magus and several others attributed the making thereof to angels. The portentous system of the Valentinians concerning the origin of Beings, and the creation of the Universe. The Cerdonians and Marcionites maintained two Eternal Principles, God and the Devil; the latter of whom they affirmed to have been the Former and Maker of the world. Against all these Heretics it was inserted in the Creed, that the Supreme God, the Father Almighty is Maker of Heaven and Earth. The contents of the third chapter are as follow. The Nicene and more ancient Greek Creeds read in one Jesus Christ, which was a designed opposition to the blasphemous division of Jesus from Christ by the Gnostics and others, whose several Heresies are related. By believing in Jesus Christ we profess, that there was such a man as was known by the name of Jesus of Nazareth, which word Jesus was an usual name among the Jews; and that this Jesus was the Christ or the Messias, which was constantly a part of the Creed from the very beginning of the Gospel, it being the foundation of all Christianity, and that which was most violently assailed by the Jews. The word Christ signifies Anointed, unktion being used among the Jews on several occasions; in allusion whereunto Jesus is called Christ from his consecration to his triple office of Prophet, Priest, and King. His unktion is to be understood in a spiritual sense; God the Father was the anointer, and the Holy Ghost the oil, which was poured upon his human nature at his conception and baptism. His only Son, wherein are two things contained; first, that he is the Son of the Father; his Son, which was foretold by the Prophets; whence Messias and the Son of God were convertible terms amongst the Jews, at the time of our Saviour's appearance. Christ was the son of God in several respects; but in one way peculiarly so, which is the second thing in this clause, that he is his only Son. The Scriptures affirm, that God had one Son in a peculiar manner, which is expressed in the Greek Creeds to be by generation; which was perhaps opposed to the Valentinian emission or division from the Father. Caution is to be used in the searching into this mystery. Christ is said in the Greek Creeds to be the Monoγενης, or the only begotten, in contradiction to the Gnostics and others. This article was coeval with Christianity, and denotes Christ's divine nature. The title Lord denotes the dominion of Christ, who is Lord by way of eminency, being supreme Lord over all, and particularly the Christian's Lord, our Lord. There are two opposite parties in the Universe, the one under Christ, the other under the Devil, who have each their separate Kingdoms. The Devil's interest among spirits is unknown to us; but amongst mankind he very much prevailed, inasmuch that in several places he was worshipped as God; but when Christ came, he destroyed the Devil's Kingdom, which was but an usurped one, and erected his own Kingdom, the admission whereinto was at baptism, when the baptized person not only acknowledged Christ's Lordship, but also expressly renounced the Devil's power. This article was coeval with Christianity, and denotes a submission to Christ as our Lord, in opposition to the Devil. In the next place, the Creed declares Christ's humanity, and the necessity of his being man. His incarnation was blasphemed and denied in sundry ways and manners by various Heretics; against whom was levelled whatsoever is mentioned in the Creed from our Saviour's Conception to his Resurrection. The Conception and Nativity are in most Creeds joined together in one sentence. Ebion, Cerintus and others affirmed Christ to have been a man, conceived and born in the ordinary way of generation; against whom it is declared, that he was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of such a woman as was a Virgin. Several Heretics, whose names are mentioned, denied, that Christ assumed a material Body from the substance of his mother; but held, that his Body was framed in heaven, and passed through the Virgin Mary as water through a pipe. Their reason for this Heresy is represented; which Heresy is emphatically condemned by this expression in Mariam, or of Mary. The strange notion of the Apelleians concerning the making of our Saviour's Body; against whom, with the precedent Heretics, the Creed directs us to believe, by his being born of the Virgin Mary, that he took from her flesh the real substance of his Body. The Birth of Christ employed also in conjunction with his Passion, Crucifixion, Death, and Burial, to denote the Reality of his Body. These last four were not all found in one and the same Creed till St. Augustin's days. The monstrous consequences of an imaginary and fantastical Incarnation, which was maintained by a prodigious variety of Heretics from the Days of St. John, as by the Simonians, Menandrians, &c. against whom was inserted in the Creed the Birth of Christ and his Sufferings; which latter point was so convincing a proof, that to prevent any cavils, as if it were a doubtful and uncertain thing, the time thereof is declared to have been under Pontius Pilate, who was Procurator of Judea in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius. To condemn also the forementioned Heresies, the Crucifixion of our Saviour follows, that it was not Simon of Cyrene, as the Basilideans affirmed, but he himself who was crucified; and likewise his Death, which is mentioned, because the certainty thereof is the foundation of the Gospel. By Death is meant the separation of soul and body; after which, for the same intent, follows that disposal of his dead body, viz. that it was buried or laid in the grave. The fourth Chapter contains the following particulars. The Descent of our Saviour into Hell was never questioned by any differences in the explication thereof. The Moderation of the Church of England herein. This article relates, first, something done by Christ's Soul, which excludes the Burial of his Body from being designed thereby; and, secondly, something done by his Soul in its separate state, exclusive of the sufferings thereof, whilst he was alive. No exact agreement in the notions of the Primitive Writers about this point. The explication of the word Hell or Hades, as it is in Greek. No one word in the modern English, French, or Dutch, comprehensive of the full signification thereof. Hell in old English exactly answers to the Greek Hades, which properly signifies the habitation or receptacle of all separated human souls, whether good or bad. The Pagans, from whom the propriety of any Greek or Latin word is to be fetched, understood it in this sense. The modern, or at least the ancient Jesus placed all separated souls in Hell. The Primitive Christians affirmed, that all good souls, immediately after their separation from the body,

of several discourses on that subject printed in English, and especially of Bishop Pearson's Exposition of the Creed, who seemed to have exhausted that matter, was surprized to find in this History so many curious things not to be met with in Dr. Pearson, without finding any body, passed into a place of joy and happiness, which they termed Hell, as is at large proved. In the declension of the Greek, and chiefly of the Latin tongue the word Hell began to be solitarily applied to the mansion of departed wicked souls. Origen, amongst the Greeks, doubted of the passage of faithful souls into Hell since the Resurrection of Christ. But after him the antient doctrine that all souls go to Hell, and remain there till the Resurrection-Day, generally prevailed in the East to this very day. Ambrose, and after him Jerom, and others entertained the same notion in the West, as Origen had in the East. Augustin was uncertain and wavering in his apprehensions hereof. The recession from the antient opinion occasioned by the mutation of Languages and words. The word Hell in the Apostolical sense could not, according to the propriety of speech, signify any other thing than the state or place of separated human souls whether good or bad. The meaning of the word descended; it sometimes only signifies a simple removal from one place to another. It is used in the Creed, because it was a popular kind of speech arising from the common opinion, that Hell was in the bowels of the earth, or under the earth; from whence it was called by the Latins Infernum, and by the Greeks Hades, and the like. Some of the Fathers imagined Hell to be in the heart of the earth; others under the earth; and some were uncertain of the situation thereof, but all apprehended it to be the common lodge of departed souls, and in a conformity to the common dialect, usually termed the passage thither a Descent into Hell, as in this article of the Creed; by which they meant no other than that our Saviour's Soul being separated from the Body went by a local motion to the unseen habitation of departed souls, where it remained till his Resurrection-Day: which is farther proved from the ends of his going thither, which were chiefly these four. First, to sanctify unto his followers the state and place of their souls, during their separation from their bodies. Secondly, that he might undergo a necessary and principal part of his humiliation. Thirdly, that he might personally, and as the Head of his Church, conquer Death and Hell, which he did by returning therefrom, and bringing the souls of several of the faithful with him. Fourthly, that he might subject himself unto the laws of Death, and be in every thing like unto us. From whence it more evidently appears, that the Descent of Christ into Hell signifies no other than the passage of his spirit unto the receptacle of separated souls. The occasion of inserting this clause in the Creed taken from the Arians, Eunomians, and Apollinarians, who in a more cunning way than the former Heretics assaulted the humanity of our Saviour, by denying, that he had a reasonable soul. The difference between the error of the Arians and Apollinarians herein: it is proved, that the Arians, or at least some of them, with the Eunomians, held, that Christ's Body was void of a rational soul. But that, which rendered this heresy the more considerable and dangerous, was the espousing of it by Apollinarius the Younger, the most noted person of his age for ability and piety; on which account his fall was a very tender and sensible loss to the Church. The time when he vented his heresy, which was, that Christ had no human soul, but that his Divinity supplied the place hereof; the consequences of which opinion are instanced in several particulars. In opposition whereunto this clause was inserted in the Creed, he descended into Hell; which point was pitched upon by the Governors of the Church, because, of all the arguments used against the Apollinarians, it was the most unanswerable; on which account it is frequently urged by the Fathers against them, and it falls in most naturally with the frame of the Creed, without disturbing the order thereof. The time of the introduction of this article. The first Catholic Creed, wherein it is found, is in that of Aquileia, recorded by Ruffinus, though before that in a private Creed of Epiphanius, and even before him in a Creed framed by a party of Arians at the Council of Ariminum, held in the year 359. Several probable designs of those Arians herein, as to clear themselves from the suspicion of the forementioned heresy, to disgrace their great antagonist Apollinarius; and by that means to create feuds and quarrels amongst the Orthodox, who finding Apollinarius openly to declare for his heresy, entirely abandoned him, condemned him in several Synods, and at length, according to the example of the Arians, inserted in the Creed this antidote against his heresy, that Christ descended into hell; which in the Aquileian Creed is expressed in a greater latitude by descending into the lower parts, wherein the burial might be comprehended and designed. But as it is expressed in the Roman or our present Creed, it can have no other than the forementioned signification, which, to prevent mistakes, is again repeated. The contents of the Fifth Chapter are as follow. The Resurrection of Christ being a necessary fundamental of our Religion, was always part of the Creed, by which our belief is declared, that Christ rose from the dead, and returned to life again. The farther consideration whereof is referred to the article of the resurrection of the body. The reason for which our Lord's resurrection is said to be in, and not after the third day. The Ascension of our Saviour was introduced against an opinion of the Apelleians, viz. that at his ascension, his body was resolved into its first principles, and ascended not up on high, or into heaven; the nomination of which place might probably have been designed in contradiction to a conceit of Hermogenes, that his body went into the body of the Sun. Sitting at the right hand of God the Father explained; by which we must not imagine Christ confined to that singular posture, but it signifies his advancement to the full exercise of his regal office; all things being subjected unto him by the Father, who was infinitely able to do it, seeing he is Almighty; which word in the Greek is different from that used in the beginning of the Creed, and in this place denotes the irresistibleness and efficacy of God's power. This clause is first found in the Creed of Tertullian, and was inserted, either as a continued proof with the Ascension, that our Lord's body was not dissolved a little after his resurrection, or, rather was designed against some heretics, who imagined the body of Christ to be in a stupid and unconcerned posture in heaven, and not to be late down at his Father's right hand, exercising all power and authority for the good of his Church. A brief explication of From thence he shall come to judge the Quick and the Dead. Three interpretations of the Quick and the Dead. The last most natural, that by the Quick are meant those, who shall be alive at the coming of our Lord; and by the Dead, those who shall then be actually void of life. This article was designed against the Marcionites and Gnostics, of whom the one blasphemed the final Judge, the other the Judgment. Marcion with his master Cerdon, held, that the true God, and his Son Christ Jesus were all mercy and love, and would never judge the world; which opinion opened a flood-gate to all impiety; in opposition whereunto the Creed declares, that he shall come to judge. The word judging explained; it supposeth a liberty and freedom of action in the person judged; both which were denied by the Gnostics, as by the Valentinians, Basilidians, Carpocratians, and others, who all sprung from Simon Magus, and united in these two heresies, that man was fatally necessitated to all his actions, and that he should not be judged according to his works, but according to his spiritual seed, election, and the like, which tenets were attended with most abominable consequences; and therefore against them both it was inserted in the Creed, that Christ shall come to judge the Quick and the Dead. Wherein, first, the liberty of man was acknowledged; which is farther evident from this, that the word Autē, or that man hath a power over himself, was in several of the antient Creeds part of this article: the Fathers could not imagine a just judgment without supposing a freedom of the person judged. Secondly, it is farther declared by this clause, that men shall be judged according to their works; for which reason, while the heresy of the Gnostics raged, it was expressed with a suitable periphrasis, to prevent any equivocating evasions. A brief

(b) Tabl. Mois de
Decembre, pag.
 633

any thing it borrowed from that writer's Exposition. Mr. Coste observes (b), that the whole Treatise is written in so accurate and masterly a manner, that whoever should translate it into Latin would do a great service to those learned men, who do not understand English. July the 27th 1708, upon the death of Sir Salathiel Lovel, he was chosen Recorder of the City of London, and September the 12th following was knighted by Queen Anne. In 1710 he was one of the Managers of the House of Commons at the trial of Dr. Sacheverel. October the 26th 1714 he was appointed Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; and April the 5th following he was made one of the Privy Council. May the 25th 1725 he was created a Peer of England by the title of Lord King, Baron of Ockham in Surrey; and June the 1st following was appointed Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain; in which post he continued till November the 29th 1733, when he resigned the Seals, which were given to Charles Talbot Esq; afterwards Lord Talbot. Some time before his death he was troubled with a paralytic disorder; and July the 22d 1734, at eight in the evening, he died at Ockham in Surrey, having been taken speechless about noon that day; and was interred at Ockham. He married Anne, daughter of Evan Seys of Boverton in Glamorganshire Esq; by whom he had issue four sons. John, Peter, William, and Thomas, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Anne. John, his eldest son, and heir to his titles and estate, was, during his father's life, Member of Parliament for Launceston in Cornwall, and in May 1726 married Elizabeth daughter of Robert Fry of Yeury in Devonshire Esq; which Lady died January the 28th 1733 in the 23d year of her age, leaving no issue. There are some Letters between the Lord King and Mr. Edmund Elys written in 1692 upon the subject of the Enquiry into the Constitution, printed in the Letters on several Subjects, published by Mr. Elys at London 1694 in 8vo.

brief repetition of the true intended sense of this article. The contents of the sixth Chapter are as follow. I believe in the Holy Ghost: why the word believe is again repeated. This article was always part of the Creed. Why so little is said of the Holy Ghost, when so much is said of the Father and of the Son. His Divinity intended by the Creed's requiring us to believe in him; whereas we are only required simply to believe the ensuing articles as in particular the Holy Catholic Church, which is next of all considered. In the Greek, wherein they are followed by the modern French and Dutch, the word believe is again repeated before the article of the Church, which, for different ends, was variously placed in the primitive Creeds. Its usual order after the Holy Ghost. This article just mentioned by Tertullian. The most antient Creeds read only the Holy Church; the term Catholic being added by the Greeks to be an explication or determination thereof. By the Church is to be understood the universal one, which is affirmed to be one Holy, and Catholic. That the Unity of the Church was here intended, appears from that the Greek Creeds read in one holy Catholic Church. The Church universal is to be considered as one, either as to faith or charity; in which sense it was, for several reasons which are mentioned, inserted in the Creed in opposition to Heretics and Schismatics. The Church termed Holy from the purity and holiness of her Doctrine, which is assented to thereby. The affection Catholic, which signifies universal, not always in the Creed; first introduced by the Greeks, to prevent narrow and limited conceptions of the Church. A brief repetition of what is assented to, when we repeat this article, the Holy Catholic Church. Whereunto is added as an appendix, the Communion of Saints; which was introduced about St. Augustin's time, in opposition to the Donatists. By Saints are to be understood particular Churches and the members thereof. For what reason they were called Saints. By Communion is signified the mutual society and fellowship of particular Churches and their members. Various Methods used by the antients to maintain their communion. The Donatists refused communion with other Churches; and for that Schism were justly condemned and rejected by them. In opposition unto whom, this article may be considered, either as a mark to know a true particular Church by, that she is one that is acknowledged so to be by other Churches; or rather as the quality, property, and practice of such an one to hold communion with other particular Churches; in which sense it is also added as an explanation of the Holy Catholic Church, and was intended to declare, that there ought to be a due communion and fellowship between the particular Churches and members of the Catholic and universal one. The contents of the seventh and last chapter are as follow. A brief explication of the forgiveness of Sins; not constantly repeated in the Creed till the days of Cyprian, though sometimes expressed, and always supposed from the very beginning of Christianity. Two Interpretations are given hereof, a primary, and a secondary one. To have a clear idea of the primary one, which respects sins committed before Baptism, it will be necessary to reflect on the great wickedness of the world before the publication of the Gospel; by means whereof they were under guilt, which the Heathens knew by the light of nature, but could not tell how to remove it. The Jews had no universal assurance of the pardon of sins; wherefore the Apostles were sent forth to reveal an infallible way for the obtaining it, viz. by believing and being baptized. This is proved to be the primary sense of this article, always supposed, or else expressed in the creed, from the very first preaching of the Gospel, viz. that all past sins are for the sake of Christ remitted to all penitential believers at baptism: wherein these two things are contained; first, that our sins are forgiven for the sake of Christ: secondly, that the time of their forgiveness is at Baptism. Remission of sins ascribed to baptism, which is always to be understood with due regard to the qualifications of the persons baptized. Why sins are said to be forgiven at baptism. The secondary sense of this article respected sins committed after baptism. The rigorous notions of the Basilidians, Montanists, but especially of the Novatians, who denied the pardon of God, or at least of the Church, to scandalous sins perpetrated after baptism. The wretched consequences of this opinion, as an antidote against which this clause was constantly recited in the creed. Both the senses of this article repeated. The resurrection of the body is in some creeds the last article, and may be considered in conjunction with the resurrection of our Saviour. The resurrection from the dead being a necessary point of our religion, and withal being early opposed both by heathens and heretics, it hath always been a part of the creed from the Apostles days. In the Greek and Latin creeds, as also in the modern French and Dutch, it is the resurrection of the flesh. Several hereticks would equivocatingly assent to the resurrection of the body, who denied that the same fleshy substance should arise again. Against them it was emphatically inserted in the creed, that there should be the resurrection of the flesh; that is, that the very same fleshy and material Body should rise again, though the qualities thereof shall be changed and altered. Life everlasting differently placed in the antient creeds, pertinently put at the end of the Apostles, because it is the end of our faith, as the determination of every man to his proper place. The Gnostics affirmed, that the greatest part of Mankind should be annihilated at the day of judgment; against whom it is declared by this article, that after that there shall be Life everlasting; wherein are included the eternal misery of the damned, and the everlasting happiness of the blessed. T

KIRCHER (JOHN), a native of Tubingen in the Dutchy of Wirtemberg, studied with great success in the University of his own country, and gave very great hopes; but but having chosen another kind of life, and not seeing any probability of a good settlement, left the Religion for that of Rome, and went into Hungary (a). This was about the year 1640. He published according to custom the motives of his change. Several answers were made to them [A]: I cannot pursue my account of him any further, and I should be very blameable not to own it, since the learned Mr. Baillet has made no scruple to acknowledge, that he knew nothing of the adventures of this person [B].

(a) Joh. Georgius Dorſcheus, Epifc. Dedicat. Hodegetici Catholicici.

[A] He published . . . the motives of his change. Several answers were made to them.] The book which he published, is intitled, Ætiologia, in qua migrationis suæ ex Lutherana Synagoga in Ecclesiam Catholicam veras & solidas rationes succinctè exponit & perspicue, doctisque omnibus & judicandi dexteritate pollutibus ritè, accuratè & modèstè considerandas proponit. It was printed at Vienna in Austria in 1640, and dedicated to Emeric Lofi Archbishop of Strigonia. This work turns upon these two points; one, that it is our duty to abandon the Lutheran Religion, since we cannot find in it an infallible authority to direct us to judge what we ought to believe, the other, that we ought to embrace the Roman Catholic Religion, since we find in it such an authority (1). Several answers to him appeared. Consult Mr. Baillet (2), who will inform you, that John Conrade Schragmuller published in German an Anti-Kircher in 1654, and that Abraham Calovius published an Examen Anti-Kircherianum at Konigsberg in Prussia in 1643. He does not speak there (3) of the work of John George Dorſcheus Professor of Divinity at Strasburg, though one might consider it as an Anti-Kircher. The title of it is as follows: M. I. Kircherus devius; sive Hodegeticus Catholicus, quo ostenditur M. Johannem Kircherum Tubinga Wittembergicum migrationi suæ ex synagoga, quam vocat, Lutherana in Ecclesiam Catholicam institutione ivisse, non qua eundem esse sed qua itur. It was printed at Strasburg in 1641 in 12mo and contains two parts, intitled at the top of the pages, the 1st, Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. prælim. the 2d, Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. Dorſcheus maintains the perspicuity of the Scriptures, which is the foundation of the protestant faith; and he shews on the other hand, that neither the councils nor decisions of Popes can be a good foundation of certainty. Above half the book consists of quotations, especially in those places where he examines the complaints of Kircher, that the protestants impute to the Catholic Religion all the impertinences of particular authors. This book of Dorſcheus was confuted by a German Jesuit named Henry Wangnereck, who published an Anti-Dorſcheus in 1653, and who in his turn was confuted by an Anti-Wagnereck, which Balthasar Bebelius (4) published in the form of Theological Theſes in 1682.

[B] Mr. Baillet has made no scruple to acknowledge that he knew nothing of the adventures of this person]. As there is a good deal of wit in his confession, I shall report at large what he says (5). "You would not have any ground to reproach me with this, if I could have discovered the register of his baptism or burial. Of the four German Kirchers, whom I know to have been authors, and of whom two were Jesuits, our Kircher, whose name was John, is he, of whose life and employments I have the least information. I believe that if he had died a Lutheran, Henning Witten would have done him the honour to have placed him in his memoirs with so many others, who did not deserve it more than he. Another of his brethren would have made a funeral oration, or Historical Elogium upon him. It might have happened likewise, that if Kircher, upon his abandoning the Lutheran Religion for that of Rome, had become a Monk in some Monastery, some Bibliothecque Writer or other curious person of his order, would have taken care to have collected an account of his life and writings, and placed him among the illustrious men of the order, which he might have embraced. But I have too good an opinion of your memory to repeat to you what I have said in the article of Anti-Cochleus upon this subject, when you were solicitous to know why the protestant writers are generally better known to us than the Catholic writers, and why among the latter the Monks of whatever order are commonly better known than the other Catholics."

(4) Professor of Divinity at Strasburg. See the Acta Eruditorum, 1682, pag. 249. and Baillet, tom. 1. of the Anti, pag. 268. (5) Baillet, tom. 1. of the Anti, pag. 206, 207. (6) That is, of not having said any thing of the life or death of Kircher.

(1) Taken from the Hodegeticus Catholicus of Dorſcheus, pag. 1. and 329, 330.

(2) Baillet, tom. 1. des Anti, num. 25. pag. 204, 205.

(3) Observe that he speaks of it in page 267. of the same tome, but not under the notion of Anti-Kircher.

KIRCHMAN (JOHN), who gained a reputation by his works, was born at Lubeck January the 18th 1575. He studied in his native place till he was eighteen years old, when he went to Frankfort on the Oder, where he continued four years, hearing diligently his Professor's Lectures, and being very averse to all the diversions and debaucheries, in which most of the scholars use to lose their time [A]. He studied afterwards in the University of Jena, and then in that of Strasburg. He had a great mind to travel, but as he was not rich enough to bear the expences of it, he was obliged to restrain his desire. But it was not long before he could gratify his inclination; for a Burgomaster of Luneburg chose him to accompany his son into France and Italy: he returned into Germany in the year 1602, and stopping at Rostock he gave there such proofs of his learning, that the next year he was appointed Professor of Poetry. The work which he published in the year 1604 on the burials of the ancient Romans, de Funeribus Romanorum, gained him the reputation of a very learned man, and was perhaps also the occasion of his meeting with a very good match as soon as he wished. For he desired

[A] He was very averse to all the diversions and debaucheries, in which most of the Scholars use to lose their time.] It is a question, which has been controverted for several ages, whether it be better to have one's children study at home, or to send them to the University (1). There are arguments pro and con. But the most plausible argument that can be urged against sending them to the University, is that they are in imminent danger there of being debauched. Studious Scholars are very scarce. But the number of those who either by their bad example, or by their solicitations, or even by their railleries bring others to a dissolute life, is very large. Here follows what is said of Kirchman, and of most of his fellow-students. Ibidem per quadriennium fere subsistit; non cibos & potiones tantum percolando, non Charadrii vitam agendo, non ludicris aliorum exagitationibus aut lascivis Gynaeci lustrationibus se oblectando, non scurrilibus Lurconum nugis optimam juventutis florem corrumpendo, quibus egre- giis, scilicet! exercitiis, deplorato & exulcerato hoc saculo, maxima (2), prob dolor! Academicorum pars dedita est; sed lectiones & disputationes diligenter vistando, cum viris doctis familiariter conversando, & indiu noſtque bonis literis, quibus animam totam applicu-rat, strenue incumbendo (3). i. e. "He spent almost four years there, not indeed in minding only eating and drinking, and living like a glutton; not in taking a delight in the trifling exercises which the others performed, or in frequenting the Ladies of pleasure; not in corrupting the flower of his youth; in which fine exercises the greatest part, alas! of the students indulge themselves in this desperate and corrupted age; but in frequenting the public lectures and disputationes, in conversing familiarly with learned men, in applying himself carefully day and night to the study of literature, for which he had a strong inclination."

(2) See below the remark [D] quotation (12). Consult also the article ER-FORT, remark [D]. (3) Jacob. Sto-leerphotus, Orat. Funebri Johannis Kirchmanni, apud Witten. Memor. Philo-soph. Orator. &c. pag. 525.

(1) See Quintilian. Instit. Orator. lib. 1. cap. 2. and Monf. Dacier, Remarques sur la Vie de Numa, towards the end; and the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1700, pag. 686.

fired as much to encrease the number of the inhabitants of this world [B] as the number of books. It was a particular happiness for him to meet with a wife the same year he set up for an author; especially since the wife he met with made him compass his design, for he got a great many children by her, and besides, they lived together in great union and friendship [C]. As he was looked upon as a man who gave youth a very good education, and who would not suffer his boarders to be dissolute at his house [D], he had a great many scholars sent to him from the other cities in Germany. Lastly, when the Magistrates of Lubeck found that their college wanted a new Rector or Principal, they desired him to take that employment upon him. One of the reasons that made him accept it was, that he feared lest it had been a sin in him not to accept of so lawful a calling as this was [E]. He was installed in that office in the year 1612, and performed

[B] He desired to increase the number of the inhabitants of this world.] It is necessary on this occasion more than on any other to transcribe the very words of my author. They are as follow. Quemadmodum prole animi bonas litteras promoveri studuit Kirchmannus, ita etiam prole corporis humanum genus augere apud se constituit. Quamobrem eodem anno, quo Funera Romanorum publici juris fecit, disque nominis sui Funera plane exterminavit, vitæ sociam sibi elegit Virginem castissimam & pudicissimam Emerentiam, Joachimi Schellii, Senatorii Rostockiensis prudentissimi, filiam (4). i. e. "As he endeavoured to improve literature by the offspring of his mind, so he designed to encrease mankind by the offspring of his body: wherefore, the same year in which he had published the Funerals of the antient Romans, by which he prevented his name from being for ever buried in oblivion, he chose for his partner a most chaste and modest virgin, namely Emerentia, the daughter of Joachim Schellius, a very wise Senator of Rostock." Here was a public-spirited man indeed. He did not confine his zeal for the public to the Republic of Letters only, he would also promote the advantage of the state by begetting children. He conversed both his mind and his body to the happiness of mankind. The learned Helena Piscopia Cornara was not of the same character with him. For in order to shew that she followed the steps of Minerva the Goddess of Learning, who always kept her maidenhead, she would be aggregated to the Academy ægli infecundi, i. e. "of the unfruitful." But on the other hand the most learned Tiraqueau was an example to our Kirchman, for it is said that he used to write a book and to beget a child every year. See the Novelles de la République des Lettres (5) with regard to Mademoiselle le Fevre. Here follows a passage which proves that our Kirchman was not disappointed in his hopes. Quoniam vero præcipuum conjugii scopus quo Kirchmannus collimavit est procreatio librorum . . . etiam hunc scopum attigit, & conjugium ex benedictione divina uti jucundum ita & fecundum habuit. Ex uxore quippe suavissima, proba vidua maerissimâ, quinque liberos suscepit, filios tres, & filias duas (6). i. e. "As the chief design for which Kirchman married was to have children, he was not disappointed; for as by God's blessing his marriage was very agreeable to him, so it proved also fruitful. He had by his most beloved wife, now, alas! a most afflicted widow; five children, three sons and two daughters."

[C] They lived together in great union and friendship.] It is asserted in his funeral oration, that they never wanted to be reconciled together during the thirty seven years their marriage lasted. Quod conjugium felicitibus auspiciis ceptum felici etiam successu non caruit. Tanto enim amore hi conjuges se mutuo sunt complexi, tanta concordia septem & triginta annos transegerunt, ut nunquam in gratiam redire, aut ad aram bonæ Deæ litare necesse ipsis fuerit (7). i. e. "This marriage auspiciously begun had also a very happy success: for this couple loved each other so well, and lived thirty six years in so great an union, that they never wanted to be reconciled together, nor to offer any sacrifice to Fauna or the Good Goddess." Pomponius Atticus had the same happiness with his mother (8), but not with his wife. The author of the funeral oration pretends, that this conjugal concord of our Kirchman with his wife was owing to their being both sensible that such an union is acceptable both to God, and to men: and that the inconveniences of wedlock, which in their own nature are considerable enough, ought not to be aggravated by troublesome quarrels, but rather softened and made easy, by a sweet temper and complaisant behaviour of man and wife towards each other. Nimirum uterque ipsorum probe intellexit, Deo hominibusque gratum, si bene inter maritum & uxorem conveniat, nec conjugii molestias, alias sat graves, odiosas rixas & acerbis concertationibus cumulandas, sed suavissima potius oblectatione, & jucundissima conversatione leniendas esse (9). Whereupon he breaks out with this pathetic wish: Oh that all married persons, says he (10), who do not live well together, would seriously reflect upon that important truth. I do not believe that this author hit the true cause. There is hardly a person but knows that important truth. Even in those families, where discord rages with the greatest fury, men are convinced of it; but they do not act from that persuasion; nay, I imagine that they choose to quarrel, because it is less troublesome to them. They would be much more tormented and inwardly racked by a sad antipathy, if they were not to vent their grief by a thousand complaints and by a thousand quarrels. Scolding is like tears (11), it eases the grief that oppresses us.

[D] He would not suffer his boarders to be dissolute at his house.] There are some Professors so covetous, that they suffer their boarders to take all the diversions they please, lest they should discredit their house: for these young men, in order to be revenged of a master for keeping them too strict, would make their parents believe a thousand falities, that they might go and lodge at another's house. Kirchman did not regulate his conduct by such an apprehension. Non enim Bacchanalia cum convivoribus suis Kirchmannus vivebat, non dolo. Scyphos ad ordinem evacuabat; non ad mensuras sine mensura vivebat, non noctem Baccho ut pervigilem ducerent domesticis suis permittebat, quemadmodum nunc nonnullos in Academicis Professores, & juventutis Censores, egregios scilicet! facere audimus; sed ita in omnibus se gerebat, ut studiis mores convenienter irent; ipsiusque domesticis, adeoque omnes literis humanioribus addicti vivum haberent exemplum, ad quod vitam, mores, & res suas omnes examussum componerent (12). i. e. "Kirchman did not live in a riotous manner with his boarders; he did not make the bumpers go round; he did not live regularly without a rule; he would not suffer his boarders to spend the night in drinking; which we hear is practised by some Professors at the University, and by some Tutors to the youths; egregious Tutors, indeed! But he behaved himself so in every thing as to make his morals answer the dignity of his studies. And thus his boarders and all the lovers of literature had a living example in him, according to which they might frame their life, their morals, and their whole behaviour."

[E] He feared lest it had been a sin in him not to accept a calling.] This shews that he had a very scrupulous conscience. There were several reasons why he should not have left Rostock; to all which he opposed the following consideration. Contra vero ab hac parte non minus sollicitè secum perpendebat, divinam & legitimam vocationem, quam si contemptim repudiaret, in gravissimam Dei iram, & certam ejus vindictam incurreret (13). i. e. "On the other hand he considered seriously, that this was a divine and lawful calling; so that if he should refuse it scornfully, he should draw upon him God's dreadful anger and an unavoidable revenge." I think that he was too scrupulous; his calling was not like Abraham's; he might have refused it without fearing to provoke God's wrath.

(4) Idem, Stolterhotus, pag. 530.

(5) For Nov. 1684, Art. 12. pag. 977.

(6) Orat. Funeb. apud Witten, Memor. Philo- sopl. pag. 531.

(7) Idem, ibid. pag. 530.

(8) See his Article, remark [C].

(9) Orat. Funeb. apud Witten, Memor. Philo- sopl. pag. 530.

(10) Utinam id secum probe voluerent illi, qui conjugium, quod debet esse caritatis vinculum, faciunt certamen rixosum, quo se ipsos excarnificiant, & quotidiana quasi morte mulcent! Sæpius istos esset nunquam matrimonium contraxisse, quam contractum tam fæde deturpasse. Idem, ibid. pag. 531.

(11) Est quedam flos voluptas; Expletur lacrymis egeriturque dolor. Ovidius. Trist. lib. 4. E-log. 3. ver. 27.

(12) Orat. Funeb. pag. 533.

(13) Ibid. pag. 533.

(*) Taken from his Funeral Oration delivered by his son-in-law, James Stolterfohtus. Witte has inserted it in his Memoria Philosophorum.

performed the functions of it the remainder of his days with the utmost application; though he had the vexation to be exposed to a thousand slanders [F], under this pretext, namely, that the college declined visibly. It is asserted that it was not his fault. He died March the 20th 1643 (a). I shall give a catalogue of his works below [G]:

[F] He had the vexation to be exposed to a thousand slanders, under this pretext, that the College of Lubeck declined visibly. When the scholars committed some frolics, the rector was made answerable for them, and he was publicly slandered. Statim bonus Kirchmanus cum suis collegis vapulabat, et neglecti officii ac disciplinae reus agabatur. Neque hæc cantilena in conviviis, transris et privatis congressibus tantum à vulgo, cui neque iudicium neque veritas, identidem canebatur; verum etiam in publico sæpius vir optimus acerbe perstringebatur, ab iis, quorum officium potius fuisset, Kirchmanni et Scholæ nostræ causam agere, ipsiusque auctoritatem et existimationem, signa a malevolis arderetur, defendere (14). i. e. "The fault was immediately laid upon honest Kirchman and his colleagues; they were charged with neglecting their duty: This was not only told at table and in private meetings of the vulgar, who want both sense and truth; but that good man was also publicly aspersed by those whose duty it was to vindicate Kirchman and our schools, and to support his credit and reputation, if it were attacked by wicked persons". He had patience, and even bravely despised these injuries. Ut magni et nobilis erat animi, more magnæ feræ latratum minorum canum securus exaudiebat, et ut culicem aut muscam moleste circumstrepentem levi manu et citra iracundiam abigimus. Sic ipse perverse iudicantium calumnias sine ulla tristitia eludebat probe intelligens Sapientis virtutem per ea, quibus petitur, illustrari (15). i. e. "As he had a noble and exalted mind, he despised those reports, as a great dog does the barking of a little cur; and as we drive away with the hand, and without passion, a gnat or a fly that troubles us by its buzzing, thus he went through the calumnies of those that judged of him, without any grief, well knowing that the virtue of the wife becomes more illustrious by the very slanders that are dispersed against it." His son-in-law expatiates very much upon this, and though he does not pretend that Kirchman was without any blemish (16), yet he maintains that the college declined, because it was become the fashion in the City to have private tutors at home. Qui primus clancularios præceptores in nostram civitatem introduxit, quisquis etiam fuerit, et quot domos tot fere scholas in urbe aperuit, hunc violentas huic Lyceo manus intulisse, et ad proferendum primo icu petiisse, tam confidenter assevero ut nihil confidens. Quid præterea accesserit, et scholæ nostræ fundamenta pene everterit, unusquisque ipse secum reputet, in animo enim mihi non est, omnia refri-

(14) Orat. Funer. apud Witte, pag. 540.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Ibid. pag. 542.

care, et camarinam, quod aiunt, movere (17). i. e. (17) Ibid.

"He that first introduced in this city the custom of having private tutors, and opened as many schools almost as there are houses, has ruined our College, and given it such a blow as was sufficient to overthrow it: this is what I dare to assert with the utmost confidence. What contributed besides to ruin the foundation of our school, let others consider: I have no mind to rehearse unpleasant stories."

[G] I shall give a Catalogue of his works hereunder.

It is to be met with at the end of his funeral Oration (18). Oratio funebris amplissimo viro, Jacobo Bordingo, Consuli Reipublicæ Lubecensis, scripta. i. e. "A funeral Oration on James Bordinga Magistrate of Lubeck." at Rostock 1616, in 4to. De Funeribus Romanorum Libri quatuor. i. e. "Of the burials of the Romans, in four Books." Hamburg, 1605, in 8vo. Lubeck, 1623, 1637. Brunswick, 1660. Francfort, 1672, in 8vo. Leiden, 1672 in 12mo. De ira cobibenda disputatio. i. e. "A Disputation concerning the restraining of one's passion." Rostock, 1611, 4to. Oratio de Vita et Obitu Pauli Merula, i. e. "An Oration on the Life and death of Paul Merula." Rostock, 1607, in 4to. and Leiden, 1672, in 12mo. Εὐχαριστικὸν, de Pacificatore Boitzenburgensi ad Legatos Ordinum unitarum Belgii Provinciarum. i. e. "A congratulation on the Peace of Boitzenburg; to the Embassadors of the States of the united Provinces." Lubeck, 1620, in 4to. Oratio de vita et Obitu Georgii Stampelii, Ecclesie Lubecensis Superintendentis habita. i. e. "An Oration on the Life and Death of George Stampelius, Superintendent of the Church of Lubeck." Lubeck, 1622, in 4to. De Annulis liber Singularis. i. e. "Of Rings, in one Book." Ibid. 1623. Sleswick. 1657. Francfort, 1672, in 8vo. Leiden, 1672 in 12mo. Rudimenta Rhetorica. i. e. "The Elements of Rhetoric." Bremen, 1652, in 12mo. Rudimenta Logicæ peripateticæ. i. e. "The first Principles of Logic, according to the Peripatetic Philosophy." Lubeck, 1669, and several times since, in 8vo. Tabule Logicæ & Rhetoricæ. "Tables for Logic and Rhetoric, ibid. in folio. Genethliacum illustrissimi Principis, Adolphi Frederici, Ducis Megalopolitani Primogenito Filio scriptum. i. e. "The Horoscope of the first born Son of the most illustrious Prince, Adolphus Frederic, Duke of Mecklenburg." ibid. 1624, in 4to. He designed to publish with notes a manuscript, which was not printed till the year 1684, by the care of his grandson (19).

(18) Apud Witte, pag. 553.

(19) See the Nouv. de la Rep. publ. des Lettres, for Feb. 1685, Art. 2.

(a) Orat. Funer. Kirstenii, apud Witten, Memor. Medicor. pag. 114.

KIRSTENIUS (PETER) Professor of Physic at Upsal, and Physician Extraordinary to the Queen of Sweden, was born at Breslaw, in Silesia, December the 25th 1577. He learnt the Greek and Latin tongues, a little Hebrew and Syriac, and natural Philosophy, Anatomy, and Botany in his native place, and went afterwards to visit the Universities of Leipzig, Wittenberg, and Jena; and having made a great progress during four years under the Professors of these Universities, he took a journey into the Low-Countries and into France. He had been told that a man cannot distinguish himself in the practice of Physic, unless he understands Avicenna; he had therefore a strong inclination to learn Arabic, for he knew that the Translation of that Physician's works is very indifferent. He applied himself then very diligently to the study of Arabic, but designed to read not only Avicenna, but also Mesue, Rhasis, Abenzoar, Abukafis, and Averroes. He was confirmed in that resolution by Scaliger and Casaubon, who judged him proper to make a great progress in that language, to the great advantage of the Republick of Letters. Qui cum indolem hominis viderent animum verbis & exemplis addiderunt, ut pertenderet, atque istas literas, quæ nondum inter Christianos debitum cultum & nitorem acceperant, a barbaris vindicaret, ac liberali manu affereret. Istud magno fore Republ. literariæ bono, & sibi ornamento illustriori (a). i. e. "Who (Scaliger and Casaubon) observing his inclination, encouraged him by their discourses, and by the instances they lay before him, to continue that study (of Arabic) and to retrieve from the hands of the Barbarians, that part of polite literature, which had not yet been cultivated by the Christians as it deserved: this would be a great advantage to the Republick of Letters, and raise his reputation considerably." This passion did not hinder him from gratifying the inclination he had to travel. He visited Italy, Italy, Spain, England [A], and did not return home till after seven years. He was admitted Doctor of Physic at Basil at the age of twenty four. Soon after his return into Silesia, he went to Jena and married there. He was afterwards chosen by the Magistrates of Breslaw to have the direction of their College and of their Schools. A fit of sickness having obliged him to resign that difficult employment, with which he was also very much disgusted, he applied himself entirely to the practice of Physic, and to the study of Arabic; he did even study chiefly that language [B], and shewed that he was born to succeed in it. He joined a great piety with the practice of Physic [C]. We are not told why he removed into Prussia with his whole family; but he had reasons to be well satisfied with this removal, since it gave him an opportunity to enter into the family of Chancellor Oxenstiern, whom he accompanied into Sweden, where they did him the honour to appoint him Professor of Physic in the University of Upsal in the year 1636, and Physician to the Queen. He would have acquitted himself much better still of the functions of his Professorship, had the constitution of his body been as strong as his mind was vigorous; but he was very much broken, and he lived only till the 8th of April 1640 (b). He published several works [D].

(b) See his Funeral Oration delivered by John Loccenius his Collegue, and Law-Professor. Witte has inserted it in his Memoriae Medicorum.

It

[A] He visited Italy, Spain, England.] This is all that is mentioned of his travels in his funeral oration. There is not a word there of Kirstenius's journey into Greece and Asia. His epitaph only acquaints us with this. Neve huic satis fuit tot vidisse populos Europæ celeberrimos, ni matrem ultimæ artium permearet Græciam, & Alcurani sedem permigraret Asiam, vinasque per Hungariam reverteret (1). i. e. "It was not enough for him to have seen the most celebrated countries in Europe, he would also visit Greece formerly the mother of all arts and sciences; and travel over Asia the seat of the Alcoran, and return through Hungary a country fruitful in wine." Such a journey was proper for his design.

(1) Apud Witten, Memoriae Medicorum, pag. 112.

[B] He did even study chiefly that language.] For he did not only dedicate to that study all the time he could spare from the practice of Physic, but he even applied all the money he could save from his income to the printing of Arabic books. Quicquid successu temporis laboriosæ praxi Medicæ suffurari potuit, hoc excolendæ Arabicæ linguæ totum destinavit: adeo ut cum linguæ isthæc, velut cætra, superiorum facultatum, ut vocant, & imprimis Medicinæ ministra debuisset, contra praxi Medicæ isti linguæ sæpe serviret: dum quicquid bernus inde lucri redundantis abradere potuit, illud Arabicæ typographiæ adornandæ, & monumentis in illa edendis impendit (2). It is observed here, that whereas the Arabic as well as all the other languages ought to be subservient to the other higher faculties, as they are called, and especially to Physic, Kirstenius made Physic serve to improve him in the knowledge of the Arabic tongue. Kirstenius's Panegyrist is also in the right to observe that there are but few instances of men who make such an use of the money they get. They that have a profitable profession are infinitely more disposed either to buy estates, or to put their money out to interest, or to treat themselves delicately, than to lay it out in the printing of books. Raro sane & laudando exemplo. Quales sunt bujus ævi mores, plerique si rem faciunt, aut sænori eam locant, aut fundis emendis, aut gulæ deputant. In publicandis ingenii monumentis sumptus facere, rem sterilem esse credunt, & quæ nihil heredem juvet (3). To spend money in the printing of books is thought an unprofitable action, which is of no advantage to a man's heirs. To the shame of literature be it said, most of them that pretend to do it, labour to grow rich in land and money.

(2) Orat. Funeb. Kirstenii, apud Witten, ibid. pag. 115.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Horat. Sat. 2. lib. 1. ver. 13.

Dives agris dives positus in sænore nummis (4).
 " ——— Rich in money out at use.
 " And lands."

CREECH.

They follow this wicked maxim;

Vos sapere & solos ajo bene vivere, quarum conspicitur nitidis fundata pecunia villis (5).

(5) Ibid., Epist. 25. lib. 1. ver. 45, 46. Compare this with the remark [B] of the article HORSTIUS (JAMES).

" ——— Those are blest and only those " Whose stately house their hidden treasure shews,
 " None live so well, none take such soft repose."

CREECH.

[C] He joined a great piety with the practice of Physic.]

This would not be less remarkable than his generosity, if we were to credit the common reports concerning the religion of the Physicians: it is asserted that Kirstenius never depended on the efficacy of the remedies, without God's assistance; and that he made the whole success of Physic depend on a blessing from heaven. Auspiciis suorum laborum a pietate Christiana fecit, quam Æsculapius ignorabat. Noster autem senex sciebat, virtutem barbarum & usum medendi inutilem esse sine virtute divina; itaque à DEO, cui soli est potestas summa in omnia à se creata, in ipsam vitam & mortem hominum, Medicinæ felicitatem & successum petendum esse (6). i. e. "He began all his labours with actions of a Christian piety, with which Æsculapius was unacquainted. For our old man knew, that the vertue of Plants, and the use of Physic is ineffectual without God's grace. So that the good success of Physic must always be asked of God, in whose hands alone all things are which he has created, even the life and death of men." It seems even to be hinted that he seldom undertook to cure a patient, till after he was reconciled to God. Ita ægroti non minus DEO reconciliati curationem aggrediebatur. Ab ægrotis tamen in valetudine adhuc recenti quam ingravescente advocari malebat, præsertim in gravibus & acutis morbis (7). i. e. i. e. "He thus undertook the cure, when the patient was reconciled to God. But he chose rather to be called in the beginning of a distemper, than when time had made it worse; especially in dangerous and acute diseases." He was also used to encourage his patients, by exhorting them to trust to God, who in one moment can cure the most desperate diseases, unless he judge it more proper to take his children out of this valley of misery, to transport them into heaven. Ægroti malo ex lege humanitatis indolebat, cumque homo animo esse, deoque fidere jubebat, etiam in morbo dubiæ salutis, quod cum Comico sciret bonum animum in re mala dimidium esse mali. Ægrotum jam a medico desertum, vel solo DEI nutu facile, ad sanitatem reduci posse, si Deo volenti ipsi saluti esset. Aut ex hac calamitosa vita ad meliorem transferri (8). He was very exact in going to Church, he began and ended the day with reading the Bible, and he had read that holy book sixteen times over from the beginning to the end. A Bibliorum Lectione diem ordiens & claudens multoties illa pervolvavit. Sedecies illa perlecta liberi ferunt (9). He died with a great sense of devotion (10).

(6) Orat. Funeb. Kirstenii, pag. 117.

(7) Ibid., ibid.

(8) Ibid., pag. 118.

(9) Ibid., pag. 110, 120.

[D] He published several works.] We meet with the following catalogue of them at the end of his funeral oration (11). Decas Sacra Canticorum & carminum Arabicorum ex aliquot MSS. Cum Latina Interpretatione. i. e. "A holy Decad of Arabic Canticles, with a Latin Translation." At Breslaw, 1609. Evangelistarum quatuor ex antiquissimo Codice MSS. Arabico Casarto eruti. i. e. "The four Gospels taken from a very antient Manuscript in Arabic." Frankfurt 1609, in folio. Tria Specimina Characterum Arabicorum, nempe Oratio Domini nostri Jesu Christi, Psalm. 1. &c. i. e. "Three Specimens of Arabic Characters, namely, the Lord's Prayer, the 50th Psalm, &c." Ibid. 1609, in folio. Grammatica Arabica. i. e. "An Arabic Grammar." Ibid. 1609, in folio. Liber secundus, de Canone Canonis à filio Sina studio, sumptibus

(10) Ibid., pag. 121.

(11) Apud Witten, Memoriae Medicorum, pag. 124.

It is observed in his epitaph that he understood twenty six languages.

bus ac typis Arabicis, qua potuit furi fide, ex Asiatico & Africano Exemplari MSS. Cæsareo Arabicè per partes editus, & ad verbum in Latin. translatus, notisque textum concernentibus illustratus. i. e. "The second Book of the Canon of Avicenna, printed by the care, and at the expence (of Kirftenius) in Arabic Characters, from an Asiatic and Arabic Manuscript, published in Arabic by Paris, and translated word for word into Latin, and illustrated with notes relating to the text." Ibid. 1610, in folio. Epistola S. Jude ex MSS. Heidelbergensi Arabico ad verbum translata, additis notis ex textum Græcorum & versiois Latine vulgaris collatione. i. e. "St. Jude's Epistle translated word for word from the Arabic Manuscript of Heidelberg, with notes gathered from the collation of the Greek Text with the vulgar Latin Translation." Breslaw, 1611, in folio. Liber de vero usu & abusu Medicinæ. i. e. "A Book "of the use and abuse of Physic." Frankfort, 1610, and in the German Tongue, ibid. 1611, in 8vo. Oratio introductoria in Gymnasio Uratislaviensium habita. i. e. "An Oration delivered in the College of Breslaw, at his Inauguration." Ibid. 1611, in 4to. Notæ in Evangelium S. Matthæi, ex collatione textuum Arabicorum, Syriacorum, Ægyptiacorum, Græcorum & Latinorum. i. e. "Notes on St. Matthew's Gospel, from the collation of the Arabic, Syriac, Ægyptian, and Latin Translation with the Greek Text." Breslaw, 1612, in folio. Ἱερατικῆς ἢ Informatio Medicæ artis studio perutilis, aliquamdiu Pharmacopolio versaturo Caspari Peuceri, edita à MSS. Petri Kirstenii. i. e. "An Institution of Physic, very useful to a student who will apply himself some time to Casper Peucer's Dispensary; published from Peter Kirftenius's Manuscript." Upsal, 1638, in 8vo.

(a) His true name was Matthias Wilson. Sotuel, ubi infra.

(b) Sotuel, in Biblioth. Script. Societatis Jesu, pag. 185.

KNOT (a) (EDWARD) born in Northumberland in England, entered amongst the Jesuits at the age of twenty six, being already in Priest's Orders; this happened in the year 1606. He taught a long time at Rome in the English College; and was afterwards appointed Sub-Provincial of the Province of England; and after he had performed the functions of that office out of the Kingdom, he was sent Provincial thither. He was twice honoured with that employment. He was present as Provincial at the general Assembly of the Order of the Jesuits, held at Rome in the year 1646, and was chosen Definitor. He died at London January the 14th 1696 (b). Alegambe had put in the Catalogue of this Jesuit's works a piece concerning Hierarchy [A], at which the Bishops took

[A] Alegambe had put in the catalogue of this Jesuit's works a piece concerning Hierarchy. Here follows Alegambe's words. Scriptis doctissimum libellum, qui sub nomine Nicholai Smithii est editus, hæc Epigraphæ, Modesta & brevis discussio assertionum D. Doctoris Kellisoni, quas in suo de Ecclesiastica Hierarchia tractatu probare conatur, ex Anglico in Latinum a Georgio Wrighto conversa, & plurimis Doctorum atque adeo Catholicarum Universitatum suffragiis approbata (1). i. e. "He wrote a very learned book, which is published under the name of Nicholas Smith with this title; A modest and compendious Examination of Dr. Kellison's Assertions, which he endeavours to prove in his Treatise of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, translated out of English into Latin, and approved by several Doctors and likewise by the Catholic Universities." This book was printed at Antwerp in the year 1631, in 12mo. I am persuaded that my readers will be pleased to find here an account of the origin and progress of this controversy concerning Hierarchy.

(1) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societatis Jesu, pag. 99.

CONTROVERSIES between the Jesuits and the other Roman Catholics, about Episcopal jurisdiction.

(2) A Jesuit who was but lately dead.

(3) Intituled, Apologia S. Sedis Apostolicæ quoad modum procedendi circa Regimen Catholicorum in Anglia, 1631, in 8vo. Alegambe mentions it pag. 242. but Sotuel does not say a word of it.

(4) Stillingsfleet, ubi infra, citation (7), pag. 394.

(5) Ibid. pag. 394, 395, 396.

You must know then, that Richard Smith Bishop of Chalcedon being invested with the authority of an Ordinary over the Roman Catholics in England in the year 1626, came soon after into this island. He pretended to extend his jurisdiction over the Jesuits, and the other Friars. But he met with so many difficulties, that he was obliged to desist and to return into France. The Jesuits had perceived that the presents which this Prelate received, that he might support the dignity of his character, were not bestowed upon him by their means: his receiving them from other hands exasperated them; so that they formed a party against him with so much artifice, that they forced this Bishop to retire. This was soon followed by a terrible paper-war. The first that entered the list was Dr. Kellison Professor at Doway. He wrote a vindication of the Bishop's authority. Knot, Provincial of the Jesuits, answered him under the name of Nicholas Smith (2). There was soon after another work published upon that subject (3), the author of which took the name of Daniel a Jesu, though his true name was John Floyd. He was a Jesuit and Professor at St. Omer. The Archbishop of Paris censured the books of these two Jesuits. The Sorbonne and the General Assembly of the French Clergy did the same (4). Which was so far from silencing the Jesuits, that it engaged them to reprint their books with great commendations annexed to them. They also published a Remonstrance against the Bishop of Chalcedon, in the name of the English Roman Catholics. The Secular Clergy published the same year 1631 in England (5) three pamphlets "against the Jesuits, who were so far from quitting the field, seeing the great number of their adver-

ries, that on the contrary they began again to attack the Doctors of the Sorbonne, and the Clergy of France, under the fictitious name of Hermannus Loemelius, the chief author amongst them being the Jesuit Floyd, whom we have mentioned above... There was also another book published against the Faculty of Paris... to which were annexed a great many approbations of Bishops, Universities, and private Doctors: but it was only a vindication of Knot or Nicholas Smith, and a defence of the propositions of Ireland, which had also been condemned at Paris. There came out soon after a book under the name of Edmondus Urfulanus, whose true name was Macmahone, Prior of the Convent of the Franciscans at Louvain. About the same time the Jesuits published their Critique of the Apostles' Creed (6) in imitation of the censures that had been made on their opinions at Paris... In which they charged the Bishops, who were their adversaries, with reviving old Heresies, and broaching new ones. The Jesuits having thus done great matters, exulted very unjustly every where, as though they had entirely routed their enemies, and forced them to quit the field, when two Doctors of the Sorbonne, Hallier and le Maître, engaged in a controversy with a certain Doctor, who appeared only under the name of Petrus Aurelius, and to whom the Clergy of France fillily adjudged the victory, with as much commendation and applause, as the mighty deeds of the Maid of Orleans ever received. And to shew how much they esteemed his work, they printed it at their own expence, and prefixed to it a beautiful eulogy of their author. Even the Secular Clergy of England wrote a congratulatory letter to him, signed by John Colleton Dean of the Chapter, and by Edmund Dutton, Secretary; in that letter they lamented sadly the disorders, that had till then prevailed amongst them, and the Heresies which this gave these adversaries an opportunity to revive. The chief point in this controversy related to the dignity, necessity, and jurisdiction of the Episcopal Order, as it appears from the censures of the Bishops of France, and from Aurelius's assertion (*), who observes, that though the Bishop of Chalcedon had occasioned this controversy with the Clergy of England, yet it had been carried further; namely, whether the Episcopal Order be necessary to make a Church what it is? Whether it be of Divine Right or not? Whether Confirmation might be administered without Bishops? Whether the Episcopal Order be more perfect than the Monastical? Whether Regular persons were under the jurisdiction of the Bishops?

(6) See the remark [A] of the article GEDICUS.

(*) Petri Aurelii Opera, tom. 1. pag. 62.

took offence. Southwel has left it out. You will find in a note the catalogue he has given us of Edward Knot's works [B].

[B] You will find here the catalogue which Southwel has given us, of Edward Knot's works.] Misericordia & Veritas seu Charitas propugnata a Catholicis. i. e. "Mercy and Truth or Charity maintained by the Catholics." It is a book printed at St. Omer in the year 1634 in 4to, against Dr. Potter, who had charged the Church of Rome with wanting charity, because she asserts that a man cannot be saved in the Protestant Communion. Christianitas propugnata, de eodem fere argumento adversus replicam cujusdam Heretici Chillingworthii. i. e. "Christianity maintained: it is almost upon the same Subject with the former, and is an answer to the reply of a certain Heretic named Chillingworth." Printed at St. Omer in the year 1638, in 8vo. Directio prævia ad eundem Chillingworthium. London 1636, in 8vo. Infidelitas detecta adversus librum ejusdem, quo docuerat Religionem Protestantium esse securam viam ad Salutem. i. e. "Infidelity detected, against a Book of the same, in which he maintained that the Religion of the Protestants is a safe way to Salvation." Printed at Ghent in the year 1652 in 4to. As to his Monita utilissima pro patribus Missionis Anglicanæ (8). i. e. "Most useful advices to the Fathers of the English Mission;" they have not been printed. One may easily imagine that some political reasons have prevented the publishing this last book.

KNOX (JOHN) a Minister of Scotland, was one of the chief instruments and promoters of the Reformation in his own country in the sixteenth Century. He had been a disciple of John Major, one of the most acute schoolmen of those times; he followed his master's steps so well when he taught the School-divinity, that in some things he subtilized upon it even better than his master himself. But having examined St. Jerom and St. Augustin's works, it altered his taste entirely, and he applied himself to a plain and solid Theology: he discovered a vast number of errors, and published a Confession of Faith, which made him pass for an heretic. He was imprisoned [A], and would have lost his life at the place of execution, had he not been so happy as to make his escape. He retired into England, where he was so much esteemed by King Edward, that he might have been promoted to a Bishopric, if he had had a mind to it; but he fell into a great passion when it was offered him; and refused it as favouring too much of Anti-Christianism [B]. After that Prince's death he retired from England, that he might

[A] He was imprisoned.] Melchior Adam gives us here a lame account and in some particulars inconsistent with Beza's. Let us correct it, and observe, that John Knox not being satisfied with exploding the School-Divinity, but having also very freely condemned several other things, was obliged to retire from Edinburgh to Hamelton then the only sanctuary of the faithful (1). He published there (2) a Confession of Faith, the consequence of which was that David Beton Archbishop of St. Andrews had him condemned as an Heretic for non-appearance, and degraded him from the Priesthood (3). He would have been murdered by some Assassins, had not a Gentleman of Scotland secured him against their snares. There happened great revolutions; for that Archbishop, who was also a Cardinal, was murdered, the French took the Castle of St. Andrews: Knox fell into their hands; and being set at Liberty he went to Berwick a city of England on the borders of Scotland. He disputed there, according to Beza, with the Bishop of the place (4), illius civitatis pseud-Episcopo: i. e. "the False-Bishop of that city:" their controversy was referred to the Parliament of England, who adjudged the victory to Knox. Utroque ad supremum Angliæ Senatui rejecto (tum autem Edwardus regnare cæperat) tantum effectus ut vicioria penes veritatem stante, damnaretur quidem falsæ religionis pseud-episcopus, ipsum vero tum pietas, tum diligentia magnopere commendaret (5). i. e. "They being both referred to the Parliament of England (King Edward was then lately come to the throne) he argued so well, that victory being on the side of truth, the false Bishop of a false Church was condemned, and Knox's piety and industry gained him a great reputation." I do not know whether this dispute may not be the same in which John Knox was engaged in the Diocese of Durham. He was forced to declare his opinion concerning the Mass, and in a sermon he shewed so evidently the blasphemies and idolatry, with which that sacrifice is attended, that neither Bishop Tonstal, nor any of his Doctors had any thing to answer to the purpose. I imagine that of one event they have made two. However it be, here follows the proof of what I have just now observed concerning that sermon. Specimen ejus illustre deposuit tum alias tum anno 1550 in terra Dunelmensi: quando coactus coram Episcopo Tonstallo & ejus Doctoribus super Missa Pontificia opinionem suam exponere. Pro concione illius idololatriæ & horrendas blasphemias tam solidis argumentis demonstravit, ut adversarii, quod vere oppo- nerent, non haberent (6). This particular will perhaps be cleared up by consulting the life of our John Knox (7), which I have not by me. We shall now see what the King did for him.

[B] He might have been promoted to a Bishopric, but he... refused it as favouring too much of Anti-Christianism.] His zeal against the Hierarchy appeared most evidently on this occasion. For here follows what we meet with in Melchior Adam, in page 137 of the lives of foreign Divines. Cum Episcopatus de Regis voluntate Knoxo esset oblati, indignabundus Knoxus non solum honorem recusavit, sed etiam oratione gravi titulos illos improbat, quasi regni Antichristiani quiddam redolentes. i. e. "When Knox was offered a Bishoprick by the King's command, he not only refused that dignity with indignation, but also condemned in a serious discourse, those titles as favouring something of Antichrist's Kingdom." Beza commends him very much for refusing such a preferment; and whatever some modern Ministers may say, Beza and his Collegues were fully persuaded that the equality of the Pastors is of divine right, and consequently that the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy is a fundamental abuse. Beza inveighs terribly against Episcopacy in the following words. Inde Novocastrum ac deinceps Londinum ad Regem accito (Knoxo) quum Episcopatus quidam offerretur, tantum abest ut illum receperit, ut etiam in totam illam vere satanicam potestatem graviter sit invehens, ut quæ divino jure nullo nitatur, ac ne ex veteribus quidem canonibus administratur: qua in re est non obtinuit (quod si in Anglia & alibi factum esset, id est, si causa illa Tyrannidis omnis Ecclesiastica præcipua & primaria esset sublata, longe alia facies Ecclesiarum esset) conscientiam tamen suam singulari cum Christianæ modestiæ exemplo liberavit (8). i. e. "Hence being sent for to Newcastle, and afterward to London by the King, he (Knox), was so far from accepting the Bishopric which was offered him, that on the contrary he exclaimed strongly against that power, which is really diabolical, and not in the least grounded on any divine right, and is not even administered according to the ancient Canons. And though Knox did not succeed in this (which if he had done in England and in other places, that is to say, if that chief and first cause of all Ecclesiastical tyranny had been removed, the Churches would be quite in another condition) yet he followed the dictates of his conscience, leaving a remarkable instance of Christian modesty."

(6) Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. Exterior. pag. 142.

(7) Written by Thomas Smeton.

(8) Beza in Iconibus. A little lower he speaks thus. Non veram tantum doctrinam, sed etiam veram tum ipsius statuerit. . . . Sibi non in ulla gradus pseud-Episcopatus tyrannide, cui merito fuit inimicissimus, sed in Evangelico ministerio una cum reliquis collegiis & Presbyteris a quo profusus jure administrando, Joannem Lausunum. . . . successorem designavit amplexus.

(1) Hamelton unicum tum piarum asylum perfugere cogetur. Beza, in Iconibus.

(2) And not at Edinburgh, as Melchior Adam says, in Vitis Theolog. Exterior. pag. 137.

(3) Melchior Adam is guilty of a great omission, for not observing that Knox was in Priest's Orders.

(4) Barwick is not an Episcopal Sec. Beza has not well expressed himself.

(5) Beza in Iconibus.

might not fall into the hands of the persecutors, and went to Frankfort, and thence to Geneva, where he preached to the Refugees of his own country, and engaged in a great friendship with John Calvin. He returned into Scotland in the year 1559, and laboured with an extraordinary zeal to establish there the doctrine of the Protestants both by his preaching and by his writings. His enemies having obliged him to leave Edinburgh, he retired to St. Andrew's, where the Devil raised a great many adversaries against him, chiefly when he had declared against some persons who conspired against the Royal Majesty. Quo ut primum venit multos illi Satanas excitavit hostes, præsertim cum se illis, qui contra Regiam Majestatem conspirarant opposuisset (a). The news of the slaughter of the Protestants committed in France on St. Bartholomew's day, overwhelmed him with grief; but he found himself soon eased by the good turn which things began to take in Scotland. They that had been banished were called back to Edinburgh; he was one of them (b), and began again to perform his pastoral function. The Collegue he desired to have was granted him, and he installed him November the 9th 1572, which was the last Sermon he preached. He fell sick soon after, and from that time till the 24th of November, on which day he died, he did nothing but talk of religion and piety with his wife, with his servant, and with those that came to see him (c). He lived fifty seven years (d). It is impossible to load a man more with injuries and opprobrious language than Moreri has done our John Knox, from Spondanus. Those passages have been castrated in the editions printed in Holland. The misfortune is that the English Episcopalians agree with the Popish writers, in representing him as an Apostle who established his Reformation with fire and sword [C], and who taught

(a) Melchior Adam, in Vit. Theol. Ext. pag. 138.

(b) It does not appear that Beza knew he had been banished.

(c) Taken from his Life in Melchior Adam, in Vit. Theol. Ext. pag. 138.

(d) Beza, in Iconibus.

[C] The English Episcopalians agree with the writers in representing him as an Apostle who established his reformation with fire and sword. Spondanus having said that Knox a Priest and an apostate Monk, a debaucher of several women, and of his own Step-Mother, and a Magician, returned into Scotland in the year 1559, being well provided with instructions from Calvin, adds the following words. Adeo prædicationibus suis & invektivis rem auxit, ut non solum passim templa & monasteria destructa fuerint, sacra conculcata, Imagines confractæ, ornamenta et bona expilata, exturbati Monachi, Sacerdotes pulsi, Episcopi ejecti, verum etiam omnis obedientia Regenti renunciata, omnisque auctoritas abrogata & in quorundam, quos tanquam consiliarios eligebant, (manus) translata (2). i. e. "By his Sermons and invectives he carried things so far, that now not only the Churches and Monasteries were every where pulled down, the sacred things trod under foot, the Images broken, the ornaments and goods plundered, the Monks expelled, the Priests driven away, the Bishops ejected; but even all obedience was denied the Queen Regent, she was deprived of all her authority, which was conferred on some persons, whom they chose and appointed as a council." He asserts in another place (10) where he gives us an account of the different opinions of those, who consulting about Queen Mary Stuart's fate, that some, by Knox's advice, gave their votes for putting her to death immediately. Lastly he observes, that King James recommended to his son not to read Buchanan's Libels, nor Knox's Chronicle; but rather to punish severely those who should keep such wicked books, and to suppose according to Pythagoras's opinion, that the souls of those seditious authors passed into the bodies of them that read their works, or maintained their opinions, and that therefore they deserved the same punishment, which those authors would justly be condemned to if they should rise from the dead. Haud tamen famulos Libros Buchananani, aut Knoxii Chronica evolveret; sed si quod ejusmodi scriptum inveniret, cum ejus depositariis ex legis severitate ageret. In eo Pythagoræ discipulum se profiteretur, ut existimaret ipsos manes istorum seditionum fiabellorum metempsychosfi quadam in eorum corpora transiisse, qui eorum vel libros retinerent, vel dogmata defenderent: eosque non minori supplicio plendendos, quam si ipsi auctores jam a mortuis essent resuscitati (11). He quotes the second book of the Doron Basilicon. I have consulted it, but I met only with the following observation in it concerning the matter before us. "I do not mean those histories, which abound with malice and invectives; those slanderous libels, which your subjects are neither to read nor to keep, upon very severe penalties. For I would have you believe, as a true Disciple of Pythagoras, that the souls of those firebrands of sedition pass into the bodies of them that read their works, or maintain their opinions; who must therefore be punished as the authors them-

(9) Spondanus, ad ann. 1559. num. 33. pag. 587.

(10) Ad ann. 1567, num. 3. pag. 690.

(11) Idem, Spond. ad ann. 1539, num. 7. pag. 456.

“ selves.” These are King James's words according to the French translation of the Doron Basilicon made by the Sieur Villiers Hotman, and printed at Paris in the year 1604. Consult the second part, folio 57. Spondanus acts against the rules of history, when he pretends that King James named these two authors expressly: he should have offered, only by way of conjecture, that he imagined the King meant both these writers. Let us see now what the Episcopalians say, as they are quoted by Breleius: for as I could not meet with their books, I have been obliged to trust to him; all I can do is to transcribe fairly what he relates both in the body of the page and in the margin (12) Et primo quidem de Joanne Knoxio. . . . notum atque istorum Protestantium testimonio confirmatum est, eum postquam Geneva in Scotiam rediisset, Religionem vi et armis ad phantasiam suam, ibi reformare aggressum esse. Cumque Caltrum Sancti Andreæ clancularis insidiis occupasset, et Cardinalem horrendo assassinatu in cubiculo suo occidisset, et ob id scelus a Regina Stryulingam ad jus dicendum vocatus fuisset, nec compareret, perduellem declarationem esse. Ille vero audaciam non deponens, sed confirmans, mox Perthæ turbas ciere. Magistratum Sancti Joannis et Dundæ cum plebe ibidem tumultuante ut Imagines, & Altaria, per omnes Ecclesias, & Monasteria, aliaque Religioforum domicilia undique per circuitum diruerent, hortari: Ipse autem post concionem, qua talia auditoribus suavit, habitam, Carthusianorum, Prædicatorum, & Carmelitarum Domos subvertere, Imagines & Altaria Fisæ, Angusæ, Mernæ, & aliis in locis destrueret, & sic omnes Religionis illius Ecclesias (novo scilicet modo) reformare pergebat. Post hæc inquit Bancroftus (qui & ipse Knoxii Chronicon citatis ipsis foliis, ubi singula facta narratur, in testimonium adducit.) (†). “Alia vice coierunt reformatores ad Sancti Andreæ, ubi ex instigatione Knoxii pro concione tam fratrum Religionis domos, quam reliqua illius oppidi Monasteria spoliarunt, dejecerunt, vastarunt. Idem Sconi, Stryulingæ, Lithquo, & Edinburgi patrarunt: Regina ob metum fugam capescente, duobus mensibus in campo castra metati sunt, & monetæ cudendæ instrumenta diripuerunt, & factum defenderunt, &c. Reginam mentiam esse sæpe conviciati sunt, eamque indignissimis lædoriis onerarunt, eique obedientiam præstare renuerunt, immo eam (†) omni autoritate regali exuerunt, expresso instrumento ad id à Knoxio exarato. i. e. And first with regard to John Knox, it is well known and even confirmed by the testimony of the Protestants themselves, that when he was returned from Geneva into Scotland, he undertook to establish by fire and sword a Reformation in religion according to his own fancy. For when by secret intrigues he had made himself master of the Castle of St. Andrews, and horribly murdered the Cardinal in his bed-chamber, for which crime he was summoned by the Queen to answer,

(12) Joannes Breleius, Sacerdos Anglus, in Apologia Protestantium pro Romana Ecclesia. Tract. 3. Sect. 2. pag. 623, 624. * See Holinshed's Great Chronicle, the last edition, pag. 140. from the beginning to the end. And Bancroft in his Propositions, &c. pag. 16. a little before the middle, where he says, That horrid murder of the Cardinal and Archbishop of St. Andrews, who had been and still was a strenuous adversary (namely, of the new Gospel) that murderer, I say, committed in the year 1545, had been lately vindicated as a pious action, and is proposed as an encouragement for others to attempt the like, by John Knox in his History of Scotland, pag. 187. (†) Holmthead, ubi supra, pag. 366, b. Lin. 14, 15, &c. (‡) Bancroftus, in the book intitled, Dangerous Propositions, &c. pag. 12. (†) Ibid. pag. 13. at the beginning; and Sutcliff in his answers to a certain Petition, pag. 193. towards the end, asked the Puritans, whether they approve the opinions asserted by Knox and Wollock; namely, that a Prince or Governor lawfully established may be deposed by his subjects; as they had really deposed the King of Scotland, who was Governor of the Kingdom.

the most seditious doctrines [D]. I could not read his works to examine whether all that he is charged with be true or not. But when I consider what is answered in his behalf [E], I cannot

“ he did not appear, and was declared a rebel. But “ yet he continued in his audaciousness and wicked “ attempts; and went immediately to raise commoti“ ons at Perth. He encouraged the magistrates of that “ City and of Dundee (the people having already rai“ sed a tumult) to pull down every where the Images,
 “ and the Altars in all the Churches. He himself, af“ ter a seditious Sermon, in which he had endeavoured “ to persuade the people to such attempts, demolished
 “ the houses of the Carthusians, Franciscans, and Car“ melites, and pulled down the Images and Altars in “ the shires of Fife, Angus, Merns, and in other pla“ ces (a). Thus he went on to reform the religion
 “ of those Churches, but after a strange manner.
 “ After this, says Bancroft, (who quotes for his vou“ cher the very history of Knox, setting down the “ pages where every particular is mentioned) another “ concourse was made of these reformers at St. Andrews, “ where by Knox’s persuasions in his Sermon they “ made the like havock, and did cast down, spoil and “ destroy both the houses of the fryars, and the Abbays
 “ in that town. So dealt they also within a very short “ time with the Abbey of Scone, the Friars at Stri“ vellington, at Lithquo, and at Edinburgh, the Queen “ being fled from thence for fear. They kept the field
 “ two months, and took away to themselves the coining “ tools, . . . and justified the same. &c. They gave “ the Queen the lie divers times, and loaded her with “ most despitiful speeches, they renounced their o“ bedience unto her, and even deposed her from her “ government, by a formal act, penned by Knox “ himself for that purpose.”

(a) This is an accurate translation of Brerleius: But Holinshed’s own words are as follow. “ The Queen “ Regent caused summons to be given to John Knox, “ John Wullocke . . . to appear at Striveling the tenth “ day of May: and for non-appearance they were de“ nounced rebels, and put to the horne. Whereupon “ the said John Knox being in Perth, persuaded the “ Master of Lindsey . . . and divers others being “ there assembled, with the Burgesses of the towns of St.
 “ John’s-town and Dundee, to pull down the images and “ altars in all Churches, and to suppress the houses of “ Friars, and other religious places. Who after a Ser“ mon made by him to that effect, the same tenth of “ May they began in St. John’s town, and cast down
 “ the Abbies of the Charterhouse, the Blacke and Car“ melite Friars, . . . and reformed all other Churches “ thereabout, breaking down the images and altars in “ Fife, Angus, &c.”

[D] . . . And who taught the most seditious Doctrine.
 Let us continue to quote Brerleius, page 625. “ Sum“ ma autem opinionis ejus, ut ex scriptis suis colligitur, “ et ex ipso folio pro qualibet harum assertionum citato
 “ patet, his Propositionibus, (quas citat Bancroftus) conti“ netur. (§) Proceres tenentur si modo Rex nolit, Re-“ ligionem reformare. Plebis (††) est Religionem re-“ formare (††). Deus constituit Proceres ad effrænes “ Principum appetitos coercendos. () Principes ob “ justas causas deponi possunt. (§§) Si Principes adver“ sus Deum ac veritatem ejus tyrannice se gerant, Sub-“ diti eorum a juramento fidelitatis absolvuntur.” i. e.
 “ The substance of his opinions, as they are collected “ from his own writings, with a particular reference “ to the pages whence they are extracted may be re“ duced to these propositions, as they are related by “ Bancroft. Noblemen ought to reform religion, if “ the King will not. Reformation of religion belong“ eth to the commonalty. God has appointed the No“ bility to bridle the inordinate appetites of Princes.
 “ Princes for just causes may be deposed. If Princes
 “ be tyrants against God and his truth, their subjects
 “ are freed from their oaths of obedience.” Compare
 “ this with Petra Sancta’s words in the following remark.

[E] When I consider what is answered in his behalf.]
 I must observe first of all, that they who speak ill of our John Knox’s actions and opinions, do maliciously take it for granted, that he went hand in hand with Calvin, and had learned at Geneva the opinions which he taught in Scotland (13). With this view they quote with affectation the elogies which Calvin and Beza have bestowed upon him. We must again hear Brerleius, page 619. Hinc Joan Knoxius scholæ (*) Geneva discipulus, (quem Calvinus †). Virum insignem vocat & fratrem suum reverendum) doctrinæ Calvinianæ probe consciis, ex opinione Calvinii et aliorum quorundam Ministrorum Geneva commorantium (esse §). Sutcliffe et Bancrofto docuit; Licere subditis, si Principes nollent, imo si id opus esset, vi et armis Religionem reformare. Hinc est quod licet doctrinæ et facta Goodmanii et Knoxii sic conjugationi foveant, ut id nulla tergiversatione clari possit, eos tamen ambos Calvinus †; Fratres suos venarandos nominet; et audacem Knoxii in eo genere temeritatem laudet, () quem egregiam Christo et Ecclesiæ operam navasse ait, (§§) et se vehementer lætari dicit, quod tam felices et latos progressus fecerit. i. e.

 “ Wherefore John Knox, who was brought up at “ Geneva (and whom Calvin styles an eminent Man,
 “ and his reverend brother) who was also perfectly ac“ quainted with Doctrine, did by the advice of Calvin,
 “ and some other Ministers, who lived at Geneva (ac“ cording to Sutcliffe and Bancroft) teach, that it is law“ ful for subjects to reform religion with fire and “ sword, when the Prince refuses it, or even when it is “ necessary. Hence it is, that though Goodman and “ Knox’s Doctrine tend to visibly to justify plots and “ conspiracies, that it is not possible to deny it by any “ evasion whatsoever, yet Calvin files them both his “ reverend brethren, and he commends Knox’s auda“ cious temerity in this respect, asserting, that he has “ laboured gloriously for Christ and his Church, ad“ ding that he rejoices very much for the happy and “ great success he met with.” Brerleius would not omit to observe that Beza, in his Icones, files Knox the Apostle of Scotland. Aquibus (Anglis), says Sponnus under the year 1559, num. 30 (14) ad Scotos tran-sunitibus primus occurrit magnus ille JOANNES KNOXIIUS, quem si Sotorum in vero Dei cultu instaurando velut Aposto-lum quandam dixerit, dixisse me quod res est existimabo, et sequens vera ipsius vita narratio testabitur. i. e.
 “ Passing from the English to the Scots, we meet first “ with that great man, John Knox: and if I should “ say that he was as it were an Apostle sent from God
 “ to restore his true worship amongst the Scots, I “ should think I said nothing but the truth, as it will “ appear from the following faithful account of his “ life.” Cardinal de Richelieu, when he was but Bishop of Luçon, published a book of controversies, in which he made great use of John Brerleius’s collections, particularly with regard to John Knox’s seditious opinions. (§§) Calvinus, I have examined the answers that were made to that work of the Bishop of Luçon, and I must confess that I did not meet with any thing in them, that could make me suspect Brerleius’s quotations.

Peter de la Vallade Minister at Fontenai le Comte, published a book in the year 1619 in 4to, at La Rochelle, with this title. Apologie pour l’Eglise de Messieurs les Ministres du S. Evangile de Paris, adressée au Roi:
opposée au Livre qu’a produit contre eux Armand Jehan non novum est:
du Plessis de Richelieu, Evêque de Luçon, &c. i. e. A Vindication of the Ministers of the Gospel at Paris, adressed to the King; being an Answer to the Book, which Armand John du Plessis de Richelieu, Bishop of Luçon published against them: Containing a Summary Determination of the chief Controversies of these Times relating to Religion; by the Authority of the Holy Scripture, and the Testimonies of the ancient Doctors of the Church. With a short Apology for the Reformed against the Reproaches they are loaded with on account of the disturbances and wars, which happened in France, Germany, England, Scotland and Denmark. Chiefly extracted from the History of James Augustus Thuanus, President in the Court of Parliament at Paris, or from the very same Histories quoted and admitted by the Bishop of Luçon.
 He transcribes the objection word for word. I might show, it is the Bishop of Luçon that speaks, from a great many Authors, what is your opinion upon this subject: and I should be willing to do it, if what you teach upon this subject was as favourable as it is prejudicial to you. I only desire the reader to consult a book intituled Apologia Protestantium, i. e. “ the Pro“ testants Apology for the Church of Rome, one of “ the most useful books that have been printed this great “ while. The reader will meet there with a great many more

(*) Thus speaks Bancroft, in his Seditious Asserti- on, pag. 10, in the beginning.

(†) Calvin, in Epist. & Resp. Epist. 305, sine, pag. 565, in the conclusion of the Letters he writes to Knox, says to him, Vale eximie vir, & ex animo colende frater.

And Beza, Epist. Theologicis, Epist. 74, has these words, Joanni Knoxio, Evangelii apud Scotos restauratori, fratris & Symmista ob- servando.

(§) See this in the History of the Church of Scotland, by Vantrollier, p. 213; it is quoted by Sutcliffe, in his Answer to the Position, &c. pag. 191 and 71; Dangerous Position, &c. pag. 10.

(†) Calvinus above, quotat. (†). See also Calvinus, Epist. 306, where he calls him Virum eximium, fratrem colendum, & Knoxii coadjutorem fidelem.

() Calvinus, Epist. ubi supra, pag. 566, towards the middle, says, Serenæ operam suam Christo & Ecclesiæ impendit.

(§§) Calvinus, ubi supra, Epist. 309 to John Knox, pag. 565, says, Evangelium apud vos tam feliciter lætæque progressus facere vehementer, ut par est, lætor: certamina vobis moveri non novum est: sed eo clarior res fulget Dei virtus, quando adversus invidiosos pares Armandi Johannis du Plessis de Richelieu, nonnunquam suscitatis, opem tulisset, qui superior est toto mundo.

(14) He quotes Beza’s own words.

* In his book intituled, Dangerous Positions, &c. pag. 14, 15.

(§) Knox’s Ap- peal, fol. 25.

(††) Idem, Ap- peal to the People, fol. 49, 50.

(††) Idem, Hif- tory, pag. 343.

() Idem, Hif- tory, pag. 371.

(§§) Idem, Ap- peal to England and Scotland, fol. 76.

(13) See Spon- dan. ad ann. 1559 num. 30.

I cannot but think that he really had such sentiments concerning the Regal authority, as the more passages upon this subject; and some amongst others, by which it appears that your party has taught, that by the laws of God and Man, it is lawful to kill impious Kings; that according to the word of God a private man may, by a particular instinct kill a tyrant; this is an abominable doctrine in every respect, which will never be liked by the Catholic Church. Here follows the answer to this objection. "As the question was to enquire after truth, there was no occasion for such flourish of Rhetoric, which are nothing but fictions and falsities. For how is it possible that he should have had it in his power to quote so many authors to prove us guilty of that abominable doctrine, and yet should not quote one single writer that says a word on it? And even in order to find that weak argument which he urges, he has been obliged to travel over the whole earth, and to go into the other world, amongst savages, to call Buchanan from the grave, who was born amongst them, and who never yet set up for a Divine. Who can believe that the Bishop of Luçon would forbear to quote a great number of authors, because it would not be advantageous but prejudicial to us, since he undertook to write against us. It would be betraying one's own cause, thus to omit what is against one's antagonist and adversary, and to quote what is advantageous to him. Such unfair dealings do but ill become a Bishop, whose duty it is always to be sincere: he ought not to have spared us, since he designed to make us acknowledge our faults in a matter of so great consequence. He should not have referred us to the Apologia Protestantium, which book I have not seen, not having been able to meet with it. But I know very well, that if the author of that book be of our party, he does not speak as the Bishop makes him speak; and if he be of their party, he asserts it from his own head, supposing he does assert it, and has not one good argument to support his assertion (15)." It is plain that this answer does not in the least clear Knox. There was another Minister (16), of much greater learning than the Minister of Fontenai-le-Comte, who answered the Bishop of Luçon. He had read (17) John Brerleius's work, and he answered very well the objections, that had been grounded on some passages of Calvin. But he does intirely give up John Knox, and asserts that the elogies which Calvin and Beza bestowed on him, do not in the least relate to the opinions concerning the King's authority, nor to the particular actions, which might in some measure favour of rebellion. Here follow that Minister's words (18). "As for Knox, Goodman, and Buchanan, the circumstances of the times in which they wrote, do in some respects lessen the odiousness of the doctrines, which they inconsiderately spread through Scotland against the truth, which they could not well perceive on account of the passionate temper, which is natural to that nation, and of the troubles and commotions of the state, by which they were hurried away; for it is natural to men to choose rather to vindicate, even bitterly or obstinately, an evil action, which they have committed in a passion without any wicked design, rather than to confess that what has been done, was ill done either by themselves, or by their friends. Yet notwithstanding their wrong notions, they were great men and have well served their country; Buchanan particularly in the education of the King of Great Britain, and the others in their pastoral functions, to which they ought to have applied themselves entirely and absolutely. I suppose then that Calvin (*) in the letters he wrote to them, stiled the two first his brethren, and excellent men, and that Beza gave the first of them . . . the title of restorer of the Gospel amongst the Scots; does it follow from thence, that Calvin and Beza approved their opinions concerning the sovereign power of Kings, or that they were acquainted with their opinions, or that they even knew what happened in Scotland as a consequence of the Reformation, or that our adversaries are well grounded, when they falsely assert, that the Books of Knox and Goodman were printed at Geneva, with Calvin and Beza's approbation? If these Gentlemen are pleased to prove all that they assert on their bare word, and to shew by unquestionable evidence that the Ministers of Geneva corresponded with Knox, Goodman or Buchanan about other affairs than such as related to the Church, or that they were acquainted with their private opinions concerning the Prerogative of Kings, or that they knew exactly and approved what the others taught in matters of Civil Government, then they shall have leave to complain. But on the contrary, it appears from the very letters, quoted in the Bishop of Luçon's book, that the Ministers of Geneva corresponded with foreigners, only about matters purely Ecclesiastical; and it appears particularly, from Beza's letters to Knox, that they had no certain account at Geneva of what passed amongst the Scots. . . . If therefore Calvin, if Beza, if Whitaker, if some others of our people called Knox and Goodman brethren, they did not however admit their opinions, but considered them only in their pastoral functions, to which they were called. If they commended them, it was only according to the best of their knowledge, and not that they thought them incapable of sin. For it is very possible that amongst those who preach Christ, there be some, as St. Paul says to the Philippians, who preach Christ even of envy and strife, whose fervent zeal is a little tainted by their natural defects, by whom the Lord often performs his own work, creating light out of our darkness, and order out of our confusion; that the glory of what is well done may be ascribed only to his providence, and what is ill done to the natural imperfections of the instruments he makes use of." Is not this granting, that Brerleius and the authors he quotes have not calumniated John Knox, with regard to the opinions they ascribe to him?

As the Bishop of Luçon had made use of Brerleius's collections, so the Jesuit Petra Sancta made use soon after of that Bishop's work, and objected against du Moulin, what several Protestants have asserted concerning the obedience of subjects. Here follows what he said of Knox (19). *Si Principes, inquit (†), ad verius Deum & veritatem ejus tyrannicè se gerant, subditi eorum a juramento fidelitatis absolvuntur. Idem præter alia multa, Illud, inquit, audaciter affirmaverim, debuisse Nobiles, Rectores, Judices, Populumque Anglicanum non solum resistere & repugnare Mariæ illi Jezabel, quam vocant Reginam suam, verum etiam de eâ & Sacerdotibus ejus, & aliis omnibus, quotquot ei auxilium tulerunt, mortis supplicium sumere, ut primum ceperunt (†) Evangelium Christi suppressere. i. e. "If Princes, says Knox, behave themselves as tyrants against God and his truth, the subjects are free from their oath of allegiance. And besides several other things he adds this; I can boldly affirm, says he, that the Nobility, Governors, Judges and people of England ought not only to have opposed and resisted Mary, that Jezabel whom they call their Queen; but even to have put her to death, with all her Priests, and all other persons who assisted and supported her, the moment they began to suppress Christ's Gospel." What did Du Moulin reply to this? He did not in the least mention John Knox; he observed only that Buchanan, whom the Jesuit had also quoted, treated only of the rights of the Scots; and that if other authors had carried things to an excess, their particular temper, and not the spirit of their religion must be charged with it (20). Buchanan scripsit de Jure Regni apud Scotos; sed hoc nihil ad Galliam, Angliam, Germaniam, Hispaniam. Nec si quis aliquid scripsit quod modum excadat, debet continuo adscribi ejus Religioni, potius quam ejus genio. Nam ejusmodi Libri, quos citat Jesuita, sive veri, sive falsi, nullam præferunt secum approbationem Doctorum. Rivetus in his answer to the same Jesuit referred him to the two works against the Bishop of Luçon, which I have already quoted; and declared positively, that the Reformed condemned the opinions of John Knox and others like him, who acted according to the spirit of their nation, rather than according to the spirit of their religion. On which occasion he observes (21), that of 105 Kings, who had reigned in Scotland before Mary Stewart, three had been deprived, five banished, and thirty two killed. *mini nostrum probantur, quæ vel ex Goodmanno, vel

(15) La Vallade, Apologie, pag. 544.

(16) David Blondel, his Answer was printed at Sedan, 1619, in 8vo. It is intitled, Modeste Declaration de la Sincerité & Vérité des Eglises Reformées de France.

(17) See his Reponse, pag. 237.

(18) Blondel, pag. 294.

(*) There are but five letters to Knox, three of Calvin and two of Beza. One of Calvin to Goodman, and one of Beza to Buchanan. And there is in none of them one single word of advice relating to State Affairs.

(19) Silvester Petra Sancta, Not. in Epistol. Molinæ ad Balzacum, pag. 104. This book was printed at Antwerp in the year 1634, in 8vo.

(†) Admon. to the Nobility and People of Scotland and England.

(20) Petrus Molinæus, in Hypocritæ, lib. 5.

(21) David Blondel had already observed it. Modeste Declaration, pag. 213.

the Church Men and the Roman Catholics charge him with. Some pretend he had a prophetic spirit [F].

It is certainly vindicating John Knox's Memory to some purpose, to shew the extravagant impertinencies of those who have aspersed his reputation. I shall therefore transcribe a passage from Thevet, in which the reader will see such gross and excessive slanders [G], that this alone is sufficient to prepossess us against all that the Roman Catholic Writers have published concerning this Reformer of Scotland. I wish it were not a more difficult task to clear him of that inconstancy, with which a Lutheran has charged him [H].

KNUZEN

ex Knoxo vel ex Buchananano in eam sententiam describuntur, quamvis eo usque non procedunt, quo Jesuita procefferunt, vel alii, qui in Gallia scripserunt de iusta Henrici tertii abdicatione, & etiamnum in Belgio foventur, ut scribit Jesuita Romanus. Id præterea observandum est, si quæ durissimis persecutionum temporibus a Scotis & Anglis nonnullis temere scriptæ fuerunt, ea posse imputari non tam Religioni, quam nationum illorum, Scoticanæ præsertim, fervido ingenio, & ad audiendum prompto, quod tamen valde mitigatum fuisse, accensa veritatis Evangelicæ luce, ex eo constat, quod ex centum quinque regibus suis, usque ad Mariam, tres exauctorant, quinque expulerunt, & triginta duos necarunt: quod ne Religioni imputetur magis vestra interest, quam nostra (22). i. e. "None of our people approve what is transcribed upon this subject from Goodman, or Knox, or Buchanan; though the Jesuits have carried things farther still, as those who published in France, a book Concerning the lawful deprivation of Henry III, who are still favoured and supported in the Low-Countries, as a Romish Jesuit asserts it. It must also be observed, that if some Scots or English authors have written something rashly during those cruel persecutions, this must not be ascribed so much to their religion as to the fierce and enterprising genius of those nations, particularly of the Scots. Which has however been much softened since the light of the Gospel began to shine amongst them, as is plain from this observation, that of the 105 Kings that reigned in Scotland before Queen Mary, three have been dethroned, five banished, and thirty killed; which it is your interest more than ours, not to ascribe to religion." After all those quotations and remarks, I am persuaded that I shall be suffered to believe that Knox's works do really contain the propositions, which Brierleius has quoted from them on the credit of the Episcopalian.

[F] Some pretend he had a Prophetic spirit.] Petra Sancta having quoted the elogies which Calvin and Beza bestowed on our John Knox, adds the following words (23), à Witakero ex omnium Scotorum sententia spiritu prophetico & Apostolico præditus appellatur. i. e. "Whitaker says, that according to the opinion of all the Scots, he had a Prophetic and Apostolical spirit." David Blondel is more particular (14). "He was endued with a spirit of Prophecy, by which, as they of his own nation relate, he foretold several things which happened since, as Whitaker observes in his works."

[G] Here follows a passage from Thevet, in which the reader will see... gross and excessive slanders.] This man might pass for a Monk that had forsaken his order, though he continued to profess the Roman Catholic Religion. He was so little accurate, that pretending to write of the affairs of Scotland, he did not so much as give himself the trouble to observe, how the names of the persons he mentioned were spelt. You will see in the following passage that he did not know the name of our John Knox. "During that time, says he (25), the Scots never left England in peace; it was when Henry VIII plaid his pranks with the chalices, relics, and other ornaments of the English Churches; which Tragedies and Plays have been acted in our time in the Kingdom of Scotland by the exhortations of Noptz (*) the first Scots Minister of the bloody Gospel. This firebrand of sedition, who delighted in nothing but broils and tumults, could not be content with barely following the steps of Luther, Zuingle, Farel, and less still those of his master Calvin, who had not long before delivered him from the galleys of the Prior of Capua, where he had been three years for his crimes,

"unlawful amours, and abominable fornications; for he used to lead a dissolute life in several shameful and odious places; being also found guilty of the parricide and murder committed on the body of James Beton, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, outrageously perpetrated by the connivance and artifice of the Earl of Ropphol, of James Lesclé, John Lesclé their uncle, and William du Coy. This Simonist, who had been a Priest of our Church being fattened by the benefices he had enjoyed, sold them for ready money; and finding that he could not make his cause be good, he gave himself up to the most terrible blasphemies. First, he denied the power of God; he preached publicly that virginity is not more valuable than marriage; this he had stolen from Luther's heresy set down in his new Epithalamium. He persuaded also several devout wives, and religious virgins to abandon themselves to wicked adulterers; by which devilish exhortations he caused them to be ravished in a most sacrilegious manner. He also taught that we must explode, despise and scorn the holy Lent, pull down the Images, dig up and burn the bodies of the Saints, and seize upon the treasures of the Church. This is not all; for he never ceased during two whole years to rouse the people, encouraging them to take up arms against the Queen, and to drive her out of the Kingdom, which he said was elective, as it had been formerly in the time of Heathenism. Could the most barbarous men in the world say any thing worse, more cruel, and more mortal? ... The Lutherans have Churches and Oratories; their Ministers sing the Psalms, and say Mass; and though it be different from ours, yet they add to it the Kyrie eleison, Credo, Sanctus Agnus (Lord have mercy upon us, the Creed, Holy Lamb) and other prayers as we do. And when their Ministers officiate, they wear the cope, the chafuble and the surplice, as ours do, being concerned for their salvation, and careful of what relates to the public worship. Whereas the Scots have lived these twelve years past, without laws, without religion, without ceremonies, constantly refusing to own a King or a Queen, as so many brutes, suffering themselves to be imposed upon by the stories told them by this arch-hypocrite Noptz, a traitor to God and to his country, rather than to follow the pure Gospel, the councils, and the doctrine of so many holy Doctors, both Greek and Latin, of the Catholic Church. This gentle Preacher, after the death of his first wife, did by the eloquence of his venomous tongue, animate all on a sudden the Nobility of Scotland against the Clergy more than he had done before: and the rude country people assaulted, plundered, burnt and destroyed the castles and houses of the Gentlemen, Merchants, and others, who would not join with them in their leud actions and massacres... It is certain that this inconstant traitor, filled with ambition and carnal lust, gained so great credit and reputation with the ignorant people of that country that he married to his second wife a Gentlewoman of an ancient and noble family, allied to the Princes of the Royal Blood of Scotland." Are not men who write with so little judgment very proper to make us doubt even of the true particulars they relate, suppose there be one or two that drop from their pen?

[H] A Lutheran charged him with inconstancy.] James Thomafius Professor at Leipzig has published a little Discourse, intitled, Historia affectuum se miscentium controversiæ de Gynæcocratia. He gives there an account of the passions which affect men in the controversy about the government of the women: he observes

(22) Rivet. in Cognitione. Notarum in Epistol. ad Balsacum, cap. 13. num. 14. Oper. tom. 3. pag. 539.

(23) Petra Sancta, Not. in Epistol. Molinæ ad Balsacum, pag. 105. He quotes Whit. Contr. 2. q. 5. c. 13.

(24) Blondel, Modeste Declar. pag. 295. He quotes Whitaker, de Eccl. 9. 5. cap. 13.

(25) Thevet, Cosmographie U niverſelle, liv. 16. tom. 2. folio 666.

(*) Thus Thevet writes the name of Knox.

(a) Oldensworta Eiderstadiensis. Moller. Itaque ad Histor. Cber-son. Cimbrica. Part. 3. pag. 164.

(b) Tobias Pfannerus, Systemat. Theologiae Gentiliis, pag. 35.

KNUZEN (MATTHIAS) born in the country of Holstein (a), carried his mad-ness to such a height, that he publickly maintained Atheism, and undertook long journies to make profelytes. He was a turbulent man, and had first broached his impious notions at Konigsberg in Prussia (b). He boasted that he had a great many followers in the chief Cities in Europe [A], and even seven hundred at Jena only (c). The followers of that sect were called Conscienciaries, because they asserted that there is no other God, no other Religion, no other lawful Magistracy, but Conscience, which teaches every man the three serves that this question was very much controverted in the sixteenth Century, when Mary succeeded to Edward King of England, and when Elizabeth succeeded her sister Mary. These two Queens acted from quite contrary principles in matters of Religion. The former banished the Protestants; the latter restored them, and established the Reformation. They who had been persecuted by Queen Mary maintained that it was against the law of nature, against all human and divine laws, that a woman should govern a whole Nation; but they spoke quite in another strain under Queen Elizabeth. See how Schluffelburgius has abused our Knox and some other authors upon that account. Qui Calvini placita sequerentur, bis nil erat magis ex- osum fœmineo Mariæ regimine; iisdem vicissim, ubi ad Clavum Reip. feliciter evectam conspexissent Elisabetham, nihil magis venerabile, quam Regina talis. At- que ut hoc de suo Schluffelburgius (), magnæ constantiæ doctrinaque Theologus, largiatur mihi, ex eadem Calvini religione Gilbuis, Goodman & Knoxus, (qui scilicet ex- ilium suum Mariæ imputabant, publicis libris (Genevæ pro Fr. Balduino, impressis,) docuerunt esse contra jus naturale, divinum & humanum, ut mulier etiam in rebus politicis regnet. At ubi Mariæ imperium Elisabetha excepisset, eximia & Pontificiorum hostis, & Calvinisequarum faulrix, protinus verso remigio à Reformatis Angliis, non Regina tantum in temporalibus, illa est proclamata, sed etiam Caput Ecclesiæ in spiritualibus. Ita spacio duorum anno- rum (ipsissima Schluffelburgii verba recito,) quod prius fuit Calvinistis Genevæ moratis ipsissimum verbum Dei, mox atque in Angliam redierunt mutatum est in ver- bum Diaboli. Tantum videlicet potuit amor in Religi- onem, quam sub alterius fœminæ Regno conculcatam viderent, sub alterius resurgentem, ut à personis in ipsum imperii genus descedente se affectu, jam proscriberent Gynæocratiam, jam dignitati ac fœmæ restituerent (26). i. e. " Nothing was more odious to Cal- vin's followers than a woman's reign under Queen Mary. But on the other hand when they saw Queen Elizabeth raised to the throne, nothing was more venerable than such a Queen. And, to quote again Schluffelburgius, a Divine of great learning and constancy, Gilby, Goodman and Knox, all Calvinists (who ascribed their banishment to Queen Mary) have asserted in their books (printed at Gene- va) that the Government of a woman, even in civil affairs, is against the law of nature, and laws human and divine. But after Mary's death Elizabeth being raised to the throne, who was an eminent Princess, an enemy of the Papiſts, and a protectress of the Calvinists, the English Protestants altered their notion of government immediately, and the Queen had not only a supreme authority in civil affairs, but was also proclaimed the head of the Church in spirituals. Thus in two years time (these are Schluf- felburgius's own words) what was the very word of God in the opinion of the Calvinists, when they were at Geneva, was changed into the word of the Devil at their return into England. Such was the effect of their love for Religion, which was persecuted under one woman's reign, and restored again under another's, that their passion passing from the persons to the very nature of government, now they con- demn the government of a woman, and then again restore it to its dignity and reputation." Thomasius, who furnishes me with those words, pretends, that the Calvinists in France did also alter their maxims after the persecution they suffered under Charles IX, and he quotes particularly Lambert Daneau who de- clared on the one hand against the Monarchy, and on the other for the government of women, in favour of Elizabeth Queen of England. Ut Anglico regimini præ Gallico faveret, (Daneus) illud maxime fecit, quod sua sectæ hominibus et sub Elizabetha lautissima esset fortuna, et sub Carolo Gallo vix aliud præter gladium, crucem, ignem expectandum. Notæ sunt Parisinæ nuptiæ (2), eo actæ eventu, ut ab illis maxime temporibus scriptores Galli pestilentem inciperent in Politica doctrina sectam sive () Lib. IV. Theol. Calvinist. pag. 324, 325. Conf. Respons. ad Calvin. & Bez. pro Fr. Balduino, impressis, pag. 75.

(c) See below quotation (4).

(26) Jacobus Thomastus in Præfatione LVI, pag. 328. edit. Lips. 168.

(2) Anni 1572.

novam condere, sive sepultam resuscitare, quam solemus vocare Monarchomachorum. Huic nomen addixit etiam suum Daneus; ut mirari aliquis possit, quomodo Scriptor ille, qui vix Regem æquo animo pati posset in folio Monarchico, ferre in eodem potuerit Reginam. Nempe vereor ut hic suas partes egerit hinc odium in perfidiam Galli, illinc amorem in felicissimam Elizabethæ Gubernationem (), tum in Religionem Calvini, cui per fugium eâ tempestate in ista insula satis tutum erat (27). i. e. " The reason why Daneau preferred the English Government to that of France, was that his sect was very happy under Queen Elizabeth, whereas under Charles IX King of France, they had nothing to expect, but fire, and sword, and the gallows. All the world remembers the nuptials at Paris, the event of which was such, that from that time the French writers began to revive an abominable sect in Politicks which we use to call of the Monarchomachi, or opposers of Monarchy. Daneau also declared for that sect, so that we may well wonder, how this writer, who could hardly bear that a King should sit on the Monarchical Throne, would suffer a Queen on it. I suspect very much that the passions acted their part here: on the one hand, the indignation against the perfidiousness of the French King, and on the other hand, the love both for Queen Elizabeth's happy administration, and for Calvin's religion, which at that time met with a pretty secure sanctuary in England." It is certain that the state affairs were at that time in so fluctuating a condition, both in France and in England, that both Parties, of the Protestants and Roman Catholics, altered their principles by turns. See the remark (I) of the article HOTMAN. The Roman Catholics, who exclaimed very much against the women's Government under Queen Elizabeth, had commended it very much under Queen Mary. Knox and some others acted on the other side with the same inconsistency. The Roman Catholics in France insisted strongly on the submission to the Royal Authority under Charles IX (28). But they did quite the contrary during the league, which their adversaries thought very strange. I have read a particular in Savaron, which I think is very curious (29). *Petro Corneio, a Spaniard ... thinks it very strange and wonderful, that this City should have continued loyal to its Prince, and that the last civil wars never interrupted its constancy nor shook its resolution, since, says he, it is very zealous for the Roman Catholic Religion, and is adorned with a Church, in which God is worshipped, with modesty, ceremonies, musick, and organs, and is as much revered there, as in any Church he ever saw. When the same persons speak for or against the right of Princes, according as the interest of their cause changes, it is, generally speaking, a sign, that they are swayed by their passions.

(*) Hoc nostro tempore, (inquit Polit. Christian. lib. 6. cap. 3. p. 398.) ELIZABETHÆ felicissimæ Anglorum Regine imperio nihil ulla unquam acta vidit felicius & optatius.

(27) Thomast. Præfat. LVI. pag. 331.

(28) See the remark [E] of the article SAINCTES.

(29) Jean Savaron, Traicté contre les Malguez, pag. 44. of the Paris edition, 1611. He quotes Brevi Relatione de la Liga, en Bruxelles, en la Casa de Roger Vilpis, 1591.

(30) Clermont in Auvergne.

[A] He boasted that he had a great many followers in the chief Cities of Europe.] Here follow his words. Nemo homo mihi vitio vertet, si una cum meis gregalibus (quorum innumerus mihi numerus Lutetiæ, Amstelodami, Lugduni, in Anglia, Hamburgi, Hafniæ, nec non Holmiæ, imo Romæ et in contiguis locis adstipulatur) universa Biblia bellæ fabulæ loco habeam, qua bellæ, id est Christiani, rationem captivantes, et cum ratione insanientes, delentantur (1). i. e. " No man will blame me, if with my followers (of whom there is an infinite number, at Paris, at Amsterdam, at Leiden, in England, at Hamburg, at Copenhagen, at Stockholm, and even at Rome and in the adjacent places) I look upon the whole Bible as a downright story, in which the Beasts, that is to say, the Christians, captivating their reason, and being mad with reason, take a delight." We ought not to imagine, that he made use here of an artifice common with those who conspire against the state, who in order to draw a great many persons over to them, always say that they have a large number of accomplices. It is much more probable that Knuzen spoke thus, because he was a hare-brained and heedless fellow.

(1) Apud Miguelium, Syn- tagm. Hist. Ec- clies. pag. 2391. edit. 1699.

three fundamental principles of the Law, to hurt no body, to live honestly, and to give every one his due. He gave the substance of his system in a short letter, several copies of which were spread abroad [B]. It is dated from Rome. You will find it entire in the last editions of Micrælius. He dispersed also some writings in the German tongue (d). All this was refuted in the same language by a Lutheran Professor named John Musæus [C]. This sect sprung up about the year 1673.

There was a Work against Knuzen printed at Wittemberg in the year 1677 [D].

[B] He gave the substance of his system in a short letter, several Copies of which were spread abroad

(2) Hæc Epistola plus mille de- scripta est. Mi- cræli. ubi infra.

(2.) The Continuator of Micrælius reduces the contents of that letter to the six following heads. I. Non esse Deum neque Diabolum. II. Magistratum nihil estimandum, Tempa contemnenda, Sacerdotes rejiciendos. III. Loco Magistratus, et loco Sacerdotum esse Scientiam, et rationem cum conscientia conjunctam, quæ doceat honeste vivere, neminem lædere, et suam cuique tribuere. IV. Conjugium a scortatione nihil differre. V. Unicam esse vitam, post hanc nec præmium nec pœnam dari. VI. Scripturam sacram secum ipsam pugnare (3). i. e. " I. " There is neither a God nor a Devil. II. Magis- trates are not to be valued, Churches are to be de- pised, and Priests rejected. III. Instead of Magis- trates and Priests, we have learning and reason, " which joined with conscience teach us to live honest- ly, to hurt no man, and to give every one his due. " IV. Matrimony does not differ from fornication. " V. There is but one life, which is this, after which " there are neither rewards, nor punishments. VI. " The holy Scripture is inconsistent with itself." This system, besides that it is most horribly impious, is also manifestly impertinent. For a man must be stark mad to believe, that mankind could subsist without Magistrates. There would indeed be no occasion for them, if all men followed the dictates of their con- science, which that infidel mentions to us; but do they really follow them, even in those countries where the judges punish with the greatest severity those that do any injury to their neighbours? I do not know whether we might not assert, that there is no impertinency; how silly soever it be, but acquaints us with some truth. The impertinencies of this German shew us, that the notions of natural religion, the Ideas of the honestum, the impressions of reason, in a word the in- ward light of conscience, may continue in the mind of a man, even when the notion of the being of God, and the belief of another world are intirely rooted out of it.

(3) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hist. Ecclesiast. pag. 2289, edit. 1699.

[C] He was refuted by a Lutheran Professor named Musæus. The author, who acquaints us with this, observes, that Musæus undertook that work in order to remove the suspicions that might be entertained to the prejudice of the University of Jena. For this wicked Knuzen had boasted that he had a great many accomplices there (4). That book of Musæus contains several ridiculous particulars of the life of that wretch. But if you have a mind to meet there with a good vindication of the Holy Scripture against that man's blasphemies, you must consult the second edition. And if you understand the German tongue, you may also, by Mollerus's advice (5), consult the book he refers you to (6), and take notice of his reflexion. He observes, than if men continue to raise suspicions of atheism against their enemies, as the author of that work does, by an inconsiderate zeal, mixed with his

(4) Blasphemis suis, . . . in solo oppido Jenensi 700 civis atque studiosi falso jac- tabat ad stipulari. Mollerus, Ifagoge ad Hist. Cberjon. Cimbr. Part. 3. pag. 166.

(5) Ibid. pag. 165.

(6) Atheismus devictus. It was printed in the year 1672. The author's name is Jo. Mullerus, Antistes Ham- burgensis. i. e. " A " Minister at " Hamburg."

private passions, they will afford a copious subject to Christian Thomafius, who is writing an Apology for those that have been unjustly loaded with such reproaches. The author of the Penses sur les Cometes (7) has hinted the design of such a work, and has given us a pretty curious sketch of it. But let us see, in Mollerus's words, the wickeness of such accusers. Quo in opere optandum esset ut Theol. celeberrimus (Jo. Muller- rus Antistes Hamb.) suo in Antagonistas odio minus indul- fisset, nec per insignem animi impotentiam, Schuppil ræ- pueris Demegorias, pns omnibus commendatissimas & Cbrist. Hoburgii, ad extremum Atheismo contrarium, su- perstitionem sc. & Enthufiasmum, proclivioris, scripta collo obtorto iis, quæ Atheismum vel occultant, vel qua- damtenus promouent, aggregasset. Certe, si zelo hujus- modi præcipiti, privatique affectibus obnoxio, Theo- logi Atheomastiges sibi invisos in suspensionem impietatis Atheismo affinis pergent adducere, vereor ne calamo Cbrist. Thomafii παρρησιαστικῶ, Gabr. Naudæi (qui magicæ reis est patrocinatus) exemplo apologiam pro Atheismi falso in- simulatis parturienti, campus se pandat ampliffimus inno- centiam illorum, cum hominum cordatorum applausu, vin- dicandi (8). i. e. " It were to be wished that this " most celebrated Divine (John Mullerus Minister at " Hamburg) had not, in that work, so much indulged " his hatred against his adversaries; nor by an immode- rate passion put the writings of the late Schuppil, " which are highly esteemed by all pious men, and " those of Christ. Hoburgius, who was so far from " Atheism, that he was rather inclined to the contrary " extreme, namely to superstition and enthufiasm; it " were to be wished, I say, that he had not put those " works in the same rank with those, in which atheism " lies concealed, or which may in some measure pro- mote it. And indeed, if those Divines who write " against atheism, being hurried away by an incon- siderate zeal, and swayed by their private passions, " continue to raise suspicions against their enemies, " charging them with impious notions bordering upon " atheism, I am afraid they will open a large field to " the most eloquent Christ. Thomafius; who, after " the example of Naudé (who took upon him the de- fence of those who were charged with magic) is " writing an apology for those who are falsely accused " of atheism. He will thus have new opportunities " to vindicate a number of persons, with the approba- tion of all sensible men."

(7) In the Pre- face to the Addi- tion, printed at Rotterdam in the year 1694. N. B. That au- thor is Mr. Bayle himself.

(8) Mollerus, Ifagoge ad Hist. Cberjon. Cimbr. Part. 3. pag. 167.

[D] There was a work against Knuzen printed at Wittemberg in the year 1677. It is intitled. Exercitationes Academicæ II de Atheismo, Renato Des Cartes & Matthiæ Knuzen oppositæ. Autore Valentino Greiffingio Corona-Transsylvano Elector. Saxon. alumno. i. e. "Two Academical Dissertations concerning A- theism, against Des Cartes and Knuzen. By Va- lentin Greiffingius, of Cronstadt in Transilvania, " the Elector of Saxony's Scholar." I have extracted this from a book of Casper Sagittarius (9).

(9) Intitled, Introductio ad Hist. toriam Ecclesiast. ticam, pag. 279. It was printed in the year 1694. in 4to.

KœMPFER (ENGELBERT) was born the 16th of September 1651 at Lem- gow, a small town in the Circle of Westphalia, belonging to Count de Lippe. His father John Kœmpfer was Minister of St. Nicholas Church in that town; and his mother, Christiana Drepper, was the daughter of Joachim Drepper, formerly Minister of the same Church (a). His father observing that he had a genius for study, cultivated it to the utmost of his abilities [A]. After studying in several towns he went to Dantzick, where he made some stay, and gave the first public specimen of his proficiency, by a Dissert- ation de Majestatis divisione, defended in 1673. He then went to Thorn, and from thence to the University of Cracow, where, for three years, studying Philosophy and foreign Languages, he took his degree of Doctor in Philosophy, after which he went to Ko- ningsberg

(a) Kœmpfer's Life by Dr. Scheuchzer his Translator, p. v. prefixed to vol. 1. of Kœmpfer's History of Japan. London 1728, fol.

[A] His father . . . cultivated . . . his genius . . . to the utmost of his abilities. He first sent him to the school of Hameln, in the dukedom of Brunswick: and after- wards to Luneburgh, Hamburg, and Lubeck, in all which places he distinguished himself by an industrious application, and the quick progress he made in the learned languages; in History, Geography, and Mu- sic both vocal and instrumental (1).

(1) Kœmpfer's History of Japan, in Scheuchzer's Life of the Au- thor, pag. v. vol. 1. London editæ 1728, fol.

ningsberg in Prussia, and staid there four years [B]. He next travelled into Sweden, where he soon began to make a figure [C]; and being appointed Secretary of the Embassy to the Sophy of Persia, he set out from Stockholm, with the presents for that Emperor, March the 20th 1683, O. S. and went through Aaland, Finland and Ingermanland to Narva, where he met Mr. Fabricius the Embassador, who had been ordered to take Moscow in his way [D], whither he arrived, after meeting with great difficulties; and made his public entry the 7th of July [E]. The Embassador having ended his negotiations at the Russian Court, set out from Moscow on his way to Persia [F]. During their stay in Georgia, Dr. Kœmpfer went in search of simples, and of all the curiosities that could be met with in those parts [G]. The expressès sent to the Persian Court being returned, Mr. Fabricius set out on his journey thither in January 1684; and arriving at Ispahan, was not admitted to audience till the 30th of July [H]. During their stay, which was near two years at Ispahan, Dr. Kœmpfer, whose curious and inquisitive disposition suffered nothing to escape him unobserved, made all the advantages possible of so long an abode in the capitol of the Persian Empire [I]. The Embassador having ended his negotiations towards the clofe of 1685, and preparing to return into Europe, Dr. Kœmpfer did not judge proper to go back with him [K]; but entering into [B] He ... staid ... four years ... in Konigberg. During all that time he applied himself very intently to the study of Physick and Natural History; his father's design, and his own genius and inclination, happily conspiring to bend his thoughts that way; and it was here he laid the foundation of those many excellent and useful discoveries and observations, which he afterwards had frequent opportunities of making, in the long course of his travels (2).

(2) Idem, ibid.
pag. vi.

[C] Sweden, where he soon began to make a figure. His learning and prudent behaviour soon brought him into great reputation both at the University of Upsal, and at the Court of Charles XI, a great encourager of learning; insomuch that very advantageous offers were made him, upon condition that he would settle in that Kingdom; but he thought fit to decline them, from the strong desire he always had of seeing foreign countries; and chose to prefer the employment of Secretary of the Embassy, which the Court of Sweden was then sending to the Sophy of Persia; the chief design of which Embassy was, to settle a commerce between the Kingdoms of Sweden and Persia (3).

(3) Idem, ibid.
pag. vi.

[D] The Embassador ... had been ordered to take Moscow in his way. As a trade could not be well settled between the two crowns, unless their Czarian Majesties, Iwan and Peter, who at that time governed the Russian Empire jointly, would consent to let the European and Persian commodities pass through their dominions on reasonable terms; the Embassador was ordered to go first to the Court of Moscow, and conclude a treaty on that head (4).

(4) Ibid.

[E] Whither he arrived, after meeting with great difficulties. A mistake in the Embassador's credentials, wherein the name of the Persian Sophy was inadvertently writ before that of their Czarian Majesties, and the unwillingness of the Waywode of Novogrod, to furnish the expences necessary for conducting and defraying him, with his retinue, pursuant to the tenor of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns, detained them on the borders of Russia a considerable time: but this affair was at last amicably adjusted (5).

(5) Idem, ibid.
and pag. vii.

[F] Having ended his negotiations ... he set out from Moscow. The Embassador had continued about two months in that city. He then went down the rivers Mosco, Occa and Wolga, to Casan and Astracan, the capitals of two powerful Kingdoms, which had been conquered, and added to the Russian Empire, by that heroic Prince Iwan Basilowitz. After meeting with a dangerous passage over the Caspian sea, in which they had like to have been lost by an unexpected storm, and the unskilfulness of the Pilots, the ship having two rudders and consequently two Pilots, who did not understand each other's language, they arrived safe on the Persian coasts, and landed at Nisabad, where they made some stay, living under tents after the manner of the natives. They then proceeded with two other Embassadors to the Persian Court, to Siamachi, the capitol of the province of Schirwan, in Georgia, where they arrived in December, and staid till the Governor had notified their arrival to his Sovereign, and received orders from thence, as to the manner in which they were to be treated, and the way they were to be sent to Court (6).

(6) Idem, ibid.

[G] Dr. Kœmpfer went in search of simples, and of all the curiosities &c. He visited all the neighbourhood of Siamachi, gathering herbs, and observing whatever was remarkable in nature and art. To these laborious and learned excursions we owe that curious and accurate account he has given in his Amoenitates Exoticae, of the origin and fountains of the Naphta in the peninsula Okefra, which he visited on the spot (7). Dr. Scheuchzer observes on this occasion, (7) Idem, ibid.
pag. viii.

that few are sensible of the pleasure a Natural Historian receives, when he meets with some new and singular phenomenon in unfrequented places (8). Dr. (8) Ibid. Kœmpfer had the satisfaction of meeting, in that Median Peninsula, with more wonders than he went in search of; for he saw the town of Baku on the Caspian sea, the monuments of antiquity still extant in the neighbourhood of that place, the fountains of Naphta, the burning field, boiling lake, a mountain which threw out a fine potter's earth, and some other singularities, which abundantly repaid the trouble and hazard of his excursion thither (9).

(9) Ibid.

[H] Mr. Fabricius ... was not admitted to audience till the 30th of July. Schah Solyman, the Persian Sophy, being of a sickly constitution, was at that time, by the advice of his Astrologers, under a kind of voluntary confinement in his palace. Dreading the fatal consequences of a malignant constellation, they would not suffer him to appear in public till the 30th of July, on which day he treated his whole Court with the utmost magnificence. There were then many foreign Embassadors at Ispahan, who were severally admitted to audience on that day; it being the custom of the Persian Monarchs, not to admit the Embassadors of foreign powers to their presence but on some such solemn occasion, in a full Court, and in the most pompous manner. Mr. Fabricius was admitted to audience first; and very particular and distinguishing honours were shewn him, during the whole time of his abode at Ispahan (10).

(10) Idem, ibid.
and pag. ix.

[I] Dr. Kœmpfer ... made all the advantages possible of so long an abode. His principal and favourite enquiries here, and in all other places, tended chiefly to the improvement of Physic and History in their several branches; but he nevertheless did not absolutely confine himself to that subject, though extensive enough. The political History of a country, the succession and remarkable actions of its Princes, the state of their Court and Government; their personal qualities, vices or virtues; the customs, manners, and inclination of the natives; their way of life, commerce, the remains of antiquity, the modern buildings, whether sacred or civil, the flourishing or low condition of arts and sciences, and such like, equally exercised his industry and attention (11). Our author was greatly assisted (11) Idem, ibid.
in his enquiries into the Persian affairs, by Father du Mans, Prior of the Convent of Capuchins in Ispahan, who had acquired a thorough knowledge of the Persian language, government, customs, &c. (12).

(12) Idem, ibid.

[K] Dr. Kœmpfer did not judge proper to go back with the Embassador. He was offered the employments of Chief Physician to a Georgian Prince, with a considerable stipend &c; but his inclination to travelling not being yet abated, he resolved to go further into the East; and the advice of Father du Mans, with into the service of the Dutch East India Company, in quality of chief Surgeon to the Fleet, then cruising in the Persian Gulph, he set out for Gamron or Benderabassi, in November 1685 [L], whither he arrived, after making some stay in Sijras, and was seized with a violent fit of sickness [M]. Being a little recovered, he spent a Summer in the neighbourhood of Gamron, during which he made a great number of very curious observations [N]. He did not leave that city till the end of June 1688, when he went on board the Fleet, which, after touching at many Dutch settlements, came to Batavia in September 1689 [O]. This city having been so particularly described by preceding writers, Dr. Koempfer turned his thoughts chiefly to the natural history of the country about it [P]. He possessed many good qualifications necessary for the making a good Botanist [Q]. In May 1690 he set out from Batavia on his voyage to Japan, in quality of Physician to the embassy, which the Dutch East-India Company sends once a year to the Japonese Emperor's Court [R]. He quitted Japan, in order to his return to Europe, in November 1692, and Batavia in February 1693. He staid near a month at the Cape of Good Hope, and arrived at Amsterdam in October following. In April 1694 he took his degree of Doctor in Physic at the University of Leyden; on which occasion he communicated, in what are called inaugural Theses, ten very singular and curious observations, made by him in foreign countries [S]. At his return to his native country, with the recommendations of Mr. Fabricius, prompted him to enter into the service of the Dutch East India Company, as Chief Surgeon of their fleet; a place, as he himself observes in one of his letters, less honourable indeed, but more adapted to his views of travelling (13).

(13) Idem, pag. 2.

[L] He set out for Gamron or Benderabassi. This is a celebrated trading town on the Persian Gulph, Dr. Koempfer was honourably attended a mile out of Ispahan by the Ambassador's retinue. He staid some time in Sijras, as well to make the necessary enquiries concerning the celebrated Persian wines which owe their name to that town, as to visit the boasted remains of the ancient Persepolis, and the royal palace of Darius, that noble structure, which fell a sacrifice to wine and wantonness; and whose scattered ruins are a still existing undeniable monument of its former splendor and greatness (14).

(14) Idem, ibid.

[M] He was seized with a violent fit of sickness... in Benderabassi. The sultry heat of the air, and the want of water is such, that few Europeans can live there any considerable time without great prejudice to their health. Dr. Koempfer felt the baleful effects of it soon after his arrival, he being seized with a malignant fever of which he lay delirious for some days. However, Heaven was pleased to spare him. His fever abating, threw him into a dropsy, and that into a quartan ague; and it was by these dangerous and unusual steps that he recovered his health, but not his former strength and vigour. As soon as he was able to remove, he retired into the country, as well for the change of air and recovery of his strength, as to make new discoveries and observations, chiefly on those things which, on account of the unhealthiness of the climate, and other difficulties, had not, before, been thoroughly enquired into (15).

(15) Idem, ibid.

[N] Being... in the neighbourhood of Gamron... he made a great number of very curious observations. To this retirement we owe his account of the mountain Benna in the province Laar, on the Persian Gulph; of its plants and animals, of the precious Bezoar, and the animal in whose stomach it is found, of the singular hot baths, a native balsam, and other curiosities observed on that mountain and in its neighbourhood. His description of the native mummy, that most precious balsam, which sweats out of a rock in the province Daar, and is gathered once a year with great pomp and ceremony, for the sole use of the Persian Sophy. His observations on the Asa Fatida, of the plant, which grows only in Persia, yielding that substance, and on the manner of gathering and preparing it. His observations on the Vena Medicinosa of Arabian writers, or Dracunculus, as he calls it, a singular worm bred between the interfices of the muscles, in several parts of the human body. His account of the Sanguis Draconis, viz. of the true Eastern one, which he ascertains to be obtained from the fruit of a coniferous palm. His curious and accurate History of the Palma Dactylifera, growing in Persia; its differing species male and female; its culture, growth, preparation and uses, far beyond whatever was known of this singular tree; with many other observations equally curious and instructive (16).

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. xi.

[O] The fleet... touching at many Dutch settlements... It having orders to do this at most Dutch settlements, in Arabia Felix, the Great Mogul's country, on the coasts of Malabar, in the island of Ceylon, in the gulph of Bengal and the island of Sumatra, Dr. Koempfer had an opportunity of seeing these several countries; animated wherever he went with the same spirit of industry, and the same thirst of knowledge (17).

(17) Idem, ibid.

[P] He turned his thoughts chiefly to the natural History of the country about Batavia. The rich and curious garden of Cornelius Van Outhorn, then Director General of the Dutch East India Company, Mr. Moller's garden, and the island Bidam, lying but a few leagues from Batavia, offered to his observation a great number of rare and singular plants, native and foreign, many of them till then unknown, the description and figures whereof he intended to have published, together with many others observed by him in the course of his travels, particularly in Persia, the island of Ceylon, the Kingdom of Siam, and the Empire of Japan, all which are now in the hands of Sir Hans Sloane (18).

(18) This was writ about 1728.

[Q] He possess many good qualifications necessary for the making a good Botanist. He had a competent knowledge of that science, so far as it was improved in his time; a body inured to hardships; a great stock of industry and application, and an excellent hand at designing. With all these advantages he did not confine himself barely to the curious part of this science, an accurate description of the plants and their parts, which, though ever so necessary, is yet thought too dry a subject by the generality of readers: he endeavoured to make his observations beneficial to mankind; and took great pains to enquire into the various uses of the plants he describes, whether relating to Physic, Husbandry, Manufacture, &c; as likewise into the manner of cultivating and preparing them, in order to make them serve for these several purposes, in all which he was very successful (20).

(19) Idem, ibid.

[R] He set out for Batavia on his voyage to Japan. To make all the advantages possible of this voyage, he obtained leave to go on board the ship which was ordered to touch at Siam, that he might have an opportunity of seeing that Kingdom also (21). After taking also a transient view of the Kingdom of Cambodia, Southern China, and the adjacent countries, he arrived in Japan (22), where he resided two years. This was not only the last Eastern country he intended to visit, but also that which he had long desired to see, and always considered as a subject worthy of a laborious enquiry. The almost insurmountable difficulties, enough to deter even the most industrious, spurred him on to more painful researches; and he willingly sacrificed his time, art and money, to procure for himself and others, a thorough information of a country, of which, till then, no satisfactory account had been given (23).

(20) Idem, ibid. pag. xii.

(21) Idem, ibid. pag. xiii.

(22) Niceron, Hommes Illustres, tom. 19. pag. 244. Paris 1732; 12mo.

[S] He communicated... ten very singular and curious observations. On the famous Agnes Stybica, or Borometz,

(23) Koempfer's Life, pag. xiii. in vol. 1. of his Hist. of Japan, edit. ut supra.

country, he intended immediately to digest his papers and memoirs into proper order, but was prevented by the honour which the Count de Lippe, his Sovereign, did him [T]. He married [in 1700 [U]. The long course of his travels, the fatigue of his profession, and some private misfortunes in his family (b), had very much impaired his constitution; so that, after a variety of ailments, he died the second of November 1716 [W], aged a little more than sixty five years, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Nicholas at Lemgow (c). His History of Japan is very much esteemed [X]; for which the public

(b) Kämpfer's Life, ubi supra, pag. xiv. In Father Nicéron's Hommes Illustres, tom. 19. pag. 246. it is said, that the uneasiness he felt, on account of the debts he had contracted, in order to defray the great expences he had been at, very much impaired his constitution.
(c) Kämpfer's Life, ubi supra, pag. xv. which Life Dr. Scheuchzer informs us was extracted chiefly from Kämpfer's manuscript memoirs, journals, letters, &c. and his funeral sermon by Bertholdus Haecius, a Minister at Lemgow. . . Dr. Kämpfer is mentioned also in Novæ Litterariæ Lipsiensiæ, 1728.

metz, a pretended plant animal, which he shews to be a mere figment, occasioned, perhaps, by some affinity of the name Borometz, with Borannetz in the Russian, and Borannek in the Polish language, denoting a particular kind of sheep about the Caspian sea, in Bulgarian Tartary and Chorasmia: on the bitter taste of the waters in the Caspian sea: on the true Persian native Mummy, called Muminabi: on the Torpedo, a singular fish, which benumbs the fingers of those who touch it: on the Sanguis Draconis made out of the fruit of a coniferous palm: on the Dracunculus, or Vena Medeni of Arabian writers: on the Andrum, a sort of Hydracela, or watry rupture; and the Perical, an ulcer in the legs, two epidemical distempers among the Malabarians: on the Japonese way of curing the cholick by the Acupunctura or needle pricking, and on the Moza, a caustic in frequent use among the Chinese and Japonese (24).

(24) Idem, ibid. pag. xiii, xiv.

[T] He intended to digest his papers . . . but was prevented. That would have been the best time for it, as every thing was fresh in his memory: but his reputation and experience, and the honour he had of being appointed Physician to his Prince and family, soon involved him in so extensive a practice, as chiefly prevented his pursuing so laudable a design with the vigour he himself desired, and it deserved: for these reasons principally the Amœnitates Exoticæ were not published till the year 1712 (25).

(25) Idem, ibid. pag. xiv.

[U] He married in 1700. His wife's name was Maria Sophia Willstach, only daughter of an eminent Merchant at Stolzenau, by whom he had one son and two daughters, who all died in their infancy (26).

(26) Idem, ibid.

[W] He died . . . after a variety of ailments. In the latter part of his life he was frequently troubled with the cholick, of which he had two very severe fits, one in November 1715, and another at the beginning of 1716. The last fit laid him up for three weeks; nevertheless he recovered it so far, that he was able to attend his Prince and family, in quality of their Physician at Pymont; whence he returned, in July, to his country seat (27) at Steinhof near Lemgow in pretty good health. However on the 5th of September following he was suddenly seized with fainting fits and a vomiting of blood, which continuing all night, brought him very low. From that time he continued in a lingering condition, though not altogether without hopes of recovery, having gathered strength so far as to be able to walk about the room: but on the 24th of October, having been troubled, ever since this last attack, with a nausea and loss of appetite; his vomiting of blood returned very violently upon him, and a fever, which lasting till the second of November, carried him off on that day (28).

(27) It is said he had inherited it from his ancestors, in Nicéron's Hommes Illustres, tom. 19. pag. 246.

(28) Kämpfer's Life, ubi supra, pag. xv.

[X] This history of Japan is very much esteemed. Our author himself published, Amœnitatum exoticarum Politico-Physico-Medicarum Fasciculi V. quibus continentur variae Relationes, Observationes & Descriptiones rerum Persicarum & ulterioris Asiae multa attentione in Peregrinationibus per universum Orientem collectæ. Lemgovicæ 1712. 4to. p. 912. This work, which is properly but an essay of what was afterwards published of our author, contains a great many singular, curious and useful observations. The perusal of his inaugural Theses, and his Amœnitates exoticæ, gave Sir Hans Sloane the first idea of his abilities, and prompted him to purchase all his curiosities, and manuscripts. The work for which our author is so deservedly esteemed, is his Historia Imperii Japonici &c. or the history of JAPAN: giving an account of the ancient and present state and government of that Empire; of its Temples, Palaces, Castles, and other buildings; of its metals, minerals, trees, plants, animals, birds and fishes; of the chronology and succession of the Emperors, ecclesiastical and secular; of the original descent, religion, customs and manufactures of the natives, and of their trade and commerce with the Dutch and Chinese. Together with a description of the Kingdom of Siam. Written in high Dutch by Engelbertus Kämpfer, M. D. Physician to the Dutch Embassy to the Emperor's Court; and translated from his original manuscript, never before printed, by J. G. Scheuchzer, F. R. S. and a member of the college of Physicians, London. With the life of the author and an introduction. To which is added, part of a journal of a voyage to Japan, made by the English in the year 1673: Illustrated with many copper plates. In II Vol. folio. London 1728. This noble work is dedicated to the King by the learned translator, who observes in his epistle, that it gives an account of a mighty and powerful empire, which owes its greatness to itself, and the flourishing condition it is in, to its being debarred all communication with other nations (29). It unfolds the rules and maxims of a government, where the mutual checks, jealousies and mistrusts of Powers invested with Power are thought the most effectual means to oblige them to a faithful discharge of their respective duties: It shews a long series of ecclesiastical emperors, all descended from one family, who swayed the scepter of Japan for upwards of two thousand years, and still keep up their titles, rank and grandeur, though dispossessed of the supreme power by the secular monarchs; It describes a valiant and invincible nation, a polite, industrious and virtuous people, enriched by a mutual commerce among themselves, and possessed of a country on which nature hath lavished her most valuable treasures (30). Dr. Kämpfer says in his preface, that "if the pride and warlike humour of the Japonese are set aside; they are as civil, as polite and curious a nation as any in the world; naturally inclined to correspond and entertain a familiarity with foreigners, and desirous to excel, to be informed of their histories, arts and sciences (31)." He afterwards tells us, that besides the private informations he received from those who came to visit him, he was particularly happy in the assistance of a discreet young man, by whose means he was richly supplied with whatever notices he wanted, concerning the affairs of Japan. This man, who was appointed to wait upon him, at his arrival in Japan, as his servant, was taught the Dutch language by him; after which he employed him to procure as ample accounts as possible, of the then state and condition of the country, its government, the imperial court, the religions established in the empire, the history of former ages, and remarkable daily occurrences, and this Japonese was so very servicable to our author, that he procured him and explained, whatever books he wanted (32). He had said before; I can assure the reader, that both my descriptions and representations of things, though perhaps less elegant and perfect, are yet strictly agreeable to truth, and without embellishments, such as they occurred to me. I must own that as to the more private affairs of the empire, I could not procure full and ample informations enough: It is known, how difficult a matter it is for a foreigner to do it in any country, and I found by experience that it is much more so in Japan. Ever since the Roman Catholic religion hath been extirpated, the Dutch and Chinese Merchants in a manner imprisoned, and the whole empire shut up to all commerce and communication with foreign nations, the natives must be extremely cautious and reserved in their behaviour with regard to these foreigners, who are permitted to trade

(29) This paradox is maintained and illustrated with the example of the Japonese Empire, by our author, in chap. 6. of the Appendix to his History of Japan.

(30) Scheuchzer's Dedication.

(31) The Author's Preface, pag. iii.

(32) Idem, ibid. pag. iv.

lic is obliged to that great encourager of learning Sir Hans Sloane, who purchased, for a considerable sum of money, all our author's curiosities both natural and artificial, as likewise all his drawings and manuscript memoirs; and prevailed with the late learned Dr. Scheuchzer, to translate the Japonese History abovementioned into English, which he has done in such a manner as does the greatest honour to his memory.

(33) Idem, ibid. trade and are tolerated among them (33). He afterwards declares, that all such Japonese as have any transactions with the Europeans, are obliged to take an oath not to discover any thing relating to their government, country, &c. (34). Dr. Scheuchzer has given an excellent introduction to the history of Japan. "My design therein, says the learned translator, is in a short survey of the present work, to point out some of its peculiar excellencies, and to illustrate the whole with a few additional remarks, tending to clear up some doubtful points from the latest discoveries, and to explain others which have been hitherto but slightly, if at all, touched upon. As the translation and publication of this History led me into farther searches concerning the Empire of Japan, and put me upon enquiring what other authors have wrote on this subject, I thought that it would not "be unacceptable, nor altogether useless, to publish a list of them, with some observations I made upon perusal, on the character, transactions and several editions of the most considerable (35)." This introduction contains an ample catalogue of the authors, in the Library of Sir Hans Sloane, relating to the ecclesiastical, political, or natural history of Japan; and ends with a list, which is very curious, of the Japonese writers themselves; the far greatest part whereof, says Dr. Scheuchzer, were brought by Dr. Kaempfer into Europe, and are now in the valuable collection of Sir Hans Sloane (36). A French translation of this work, from the English, was published at the Hague in two volumes in folio, 1729, which is ascribed to Mr. Des Maizeaux (37). There is also a second edition of the French in 12mo.

(35) Introduction by the Translator, pag. 17.

(36) Idem, ibid. pag. xvii.

(37) In Father Nicéron's Hommes Illustres, tom. 19.

KONIG (GEORGE MATTHIAS) in Latin Konigius, Professor of Poetry and of the Greek tongue, and Library-Keeper in the University of Altorf, deserves a place here in the most particular manner: for I should be ungrateful if I did not acknowledge that the book which he published in the year 1678 (a) is of very great use to me. And I do not question but it is also very useful to a great many men of letters, notwithstanding the defects that have been observed in it [A]. Our Konig died towards the end of the year 1698, at the age of fourscore and two (b). He was the son of GEORGE KONIG (c), a native of Amberg, who died in the year 1654, having taught Divinity thirty eight years in the University of Altorf.

(a) Intituled, Bibliotheca vetus & nova. I quote it often, and sometimes I criticize upon it.

(b) Acta Eruditorum Lipsi. 1699. pag. 360.

(c) Konig, Bibliothec. pag. 447. See his Elogy in Witten, Memor. Theolog. renovatae, Decad. 8. pag. 1100, & seq.

[A] The defects that have been observed in his work. A very learned man named John Mollerus, who in the year 1691 published at Hamburg an Isagoge ad Historiam Cbersensium Cimbricae, (An Introduction to the history of Denmark) had published four years before Cimbriae literatae prodromus, "An essay on the history of the learned in Denmark"; in which, according to that liberty, which every subject of the republick of Letters ought to enjoy, he spoke very freely of the defects he had observed in Konig's work. Whereupon Daniel William Mollerus an Hungarian, and professor of Metaphysics and history in the University of Altorf, rose immediately against the critick, and was nevertheless obliged to confess, that a great part of the defects, that had been observed, were real defects. Now the critic's judgment, as he has expressed it in a preface (1), comes in short to this. Innumeros in Opere Konigiano autores esse omisos, de Antiquis paucissima satisque confuse in medium allata, de Recentiorum, etiam Polygraphorum, Scriptis quamplurimis plerumque vix unius aut alterius factam mentionem, ac raris Synopticam aliquam de Autoris patria, aetate ac vita, librique editi loco ac tempore, narrationem adjectam, manifestius est, quam ut latere lectorem eruditum, aut negri ab homine candido possit. Nomina etiam saepius, ut in Prodomo monui, et scripta falsa auctoribus esse attributa, circa patriam atque vitam illorum erratum, inedita pro editis venditata, et ex uno scriptore duos aut tres inepte proclusus, exemplis plurimis ἀφθαλμοφανούς possem ostendere, si in expurgando hoc Augie stabulo tempus pariter atque operam vellem perdere, aut sordes alius in praefationem hanc convertere. i. e. "A great many authors are omitted in Konig's work; he tells us but very few particulars of the antients, and without any order; and he hardly mentions a book or two of the moderns, even of those who wrote a great deal, and published a vast number of works; he seldom gives us so much as a short account of their life, in what country they lived, and at what time; nor does he tell us when and where their books were printed. This is so evident, that it cannot be unknown to the learned, nor denied by any candid man. He does also often give false names to the authors he mentions, as I have observed in my essay, and ascribes works to them, which they never wrote. He blunders in mentioning their native Country, and the time when they flourished; he gives us manuscripts for printed books, and makes two or three authors out of one. I could prove all this by a great many instances, if I would lose my time and labour in cleansing this Augean stable, or carry the dirt out of it into this preface." He adds that his opinion in this respect agrees with that of several of the most learned men. Agnoverunt eandem, quoiquot ex chori literarii primiceriis, de Opere Konigiano, aut eadem necum, aut his etiam asperiora judicavunt. Petrus scilicet Lambecius, non alio, quam Rhapsodi, titulo Autorem dignatus (), Dan. Georg. Morbofius (†), et (qui meum de eodem judicium suo verbotenus adjecit) ἀπιστίας Wilb. Ern. Tenzelius (‡). Alii item complures, quorum verba allegare superjedo, cum rerum testimonia ipsi adversario, nolenti volenti, veritatis confessionem extorserint. Non audit enim is Bibliothecam hanc, cui patrocinatur, veterem ac novam pro accurata, aut talem, quae Saeculi applausum mereatur, venditare, sed fatetur nomen in ipsa intermissum, cum nomine esse confusum, errata nonnulla commissa, et Autores aliquot omisos, in qua ipsius confessione acquiesco.* i. e. "This has been acknowledged by the most eminent men in the republick of letters, who passed the same judgment with me, or even a more severe one, on this work of Konig. As Peter Lambecius, who did not think he deserved a better name than that of a Rhapsodist. Daniel George Morhoff, and the most ingenious William Ernest Tenzelius (who added my judgment word for word to his) and a great many more, whose names it is needless to mention, since the matter is so plain, that my adversary has been forced to acknowledge the truth, whether he would or not. For he dares not maintain that this ancient and modern Library, which he undertakes to vindicate, is exact, or such as to deserve the approbation of the world. But he confesses, that there is now and then one name put for another, that there are some blunders committed, and some authors omitted, in which confession I agree with him." Observe that Mollerus does not deny Konig the reputation of an old Professor, who had done some service to the Republick of Letters.

(1) In the Preface to his Isagoge ad Historiam Cbersensium Cimbricae.

(*) See the passage from the most celebrated Tenzelius quoted below.

(†) P. 1. Polybist. Literarii, cap. 18. pag. 202.

(‡) In his German Dialogues, for March 1689, pag. 316, 317.

KOORNHERT (THEODORE) a native of Amsterdam, and Secretary to the City of Harlem in the sixteenth Century, made himself famous by some very extraordinary

(a) Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. lib. 6. pag. m. 435.

(b) Idem, ibid.

nary works on subjects relating to Religion (a). He is reckoned to have been one of those spiritualists or enthusiasts, who imagine that all the sects amongst the Christians were corrupted a great many ages ago, and that no man has a right to take upon him the office of a Minister of the Gospel without an extraordinary mission supported with miracles (b). And accordingly he condemned openly Luther and Calvin's undertakings, though he acknowledged that the Church of Rome was not the true Church. He wished that till such time as God should be pleased to raise reformers in all respects like the Apostles, all the Christian sects would unite together by way of interim [A]; his scheme being, that only the text of God's word was to be read to the people, without proposing to them any explication, and without prescribing the congregation any thing by way of commandment, or prohibition, but at most by way of advice. He did not believe that it is necessary, in order to be a true Christian, to be a member of any visible Church; and he acted accordingly [B], for he did not take the Sacrament either with the Roman Catholics or with the Protestants. He wrote very freely against the Reformed

[A] He wished . . . that all the Christian sects would unite together by way of interim.] Hoornbeek, who had read over Koornhert's books written in Dutch, explains this fancy of his to us, in the following words. Iste Coornbert passim suis libris . . . aliquod schema Ecclesie communitate erigendae proponit, in qua, vel solus Scripturae textus legeretur, absque glossis & expositionibus, vel etiam admonitiones ex Scriptura sub aliorum iudicio, non autem ex auctoritate, aliquando ferent, ad modum alterius & novi Interim, usque dum novam divinamque ad extruendam aliam Ecclesiam missionem accederent Ministri quales Apostoli fuerunt, Ecclesiam ex Christi praescripto novam erecturi, qua jam divina missione ad erigendam per Reformationem aliam Ecclesiam omnes, juxta eum, careant. Tomo primo, pag. ult. in delineatione istius Ecclesiae sic loquitur. "Raro aut nunquam utuntur hic humanis glossis non quod peccatum sit, sed quia incertum, a sole ad stellas, & a fonte ad cisternas recurrere. Atque ita etiam nemo hic sibi (absque certa & speciali missione) arrogat docendi officium, ut cum auctoritate mandet vel prohibeat, bene quidem ut meliori sententia admoneat, idque ex Scriptura (1)." i. e. "This Koornhert throughout his books . . . proposes some form of a Church, in which the Holy Scripture is only to be read, without any gloss, or exposition, or at most some warnings from the Scripture, with submission to other people's judgment, be sometimes offered, but not with authority; thus he would establish a kind of new Interim, till there should come some Ministers like the Apostles, with a new and divine mission, to establish another Church, according to Christ's command; all the Ministers at present wanting, according to him, such a mission to establish a new Church by way of Reformation. In the last page of the first volume of his Description of that Church he speaks thus: These human glosses or explications are seldom or never used, not that it is a sin, but it is unsafe to go from the sun to the stars, from the spring to the cistern. And none take upon them, without a certain and particular mission, the office of a Minister, to command or forbid any thing without authority, but only by way of advice, from the Scriptures, and with submission to other people's better judgment." This Visionary would have the Magistrates command the Preachers not to say any thing but what was contained word for word in the Scriptures, and oblige the Laymen, upon pain of paying a fine, to part with all their Theological books. You will meet with a more accurate account of this in the following Latin words (2).

(1) Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. lib. 6. pag. III. 435. 436.

(2) Idem, ibid. pag. 436, 437.

(3) That which is intitled, De Minuendis Sectis. i. e. "Of suppressing the Sects."

Hoc Libello vel Dialogo (3), ita sententiam suam exponit. "Existimo, magistratui significandum, quaecumque scripta humana, glossas, dogmataque, quid impuri, erroris & ambagis continere, a quibus omnibus immunis est Scriptura, certam pandens salutis viam. Quare reverenter rogandus esset, ut vellet ad modum novi alicujus interim (& hoc ad tempus usque quo concorditer decretum esset, qua doctrina sequenda foret) omnibus Concionatoribus interdicere, ne e suggestu populorum aliud quid docerent, praelegerent, dicerentve, praeter clarum Scripturae textum, citra unius syllabae aut additionem aut demissionem, quomodo in Veteri Novoque Testamento solebat fieri. Hoc demum pacto sectas evanitas, praeterea populo sub multa injungendum esset, ut omnes suos libros de Scriptura tractantes, quae ipsae non essent mera Scriptura, ad manus Magistratus deferrent, ibique servarentur, ut vel redderentur postmo-

dum suis Dominis, vel prout visum foret, de istis disponeretur." Haec Coornbertus. i. e. "In that pamphlet or dialogue he expresses his opinion thus. "I think that we ought to give notice to the Magistrates, that all human writings, glosses and doctrines, contain something amiss, some errors, and some ambiguities, from all which the Holy Scripture is entirely free, shewing us a safe way to salvation; the Magistrates therefore must be desired, that they would be pleased to establish a kind of new Interim (till such time as it should be unanimously agreed what doctrine must be followed) and to forbid all the Preachers to teach, read or say any thing from the pulpit, but the bare text of the Scripture, without adding or omitting one single syllable, as it was the custom under the old and the new Testament. "This is the only method to make all sects vanish away at last. And besides, the people must be ordered, under the penalty of a fine, to carry all their books which treat of the Scriptures, and are not the bare Scriptures, to the Magistrates, to be kept by them, in order to be afterwards returned to the owners, or otherwise disposed of, as it should be thought proper." "Thus far Coornhert."

[B] He did not believe that it is necessary . . . to be a member of any visible Church, and he acted accordingly.] As he did not think, that there is now one single Church upon earth without a blemish, and governed by true Pastors, he took the sacrament no where. He did not deny but it was necessary, for the security of those that are weak, to establish an outward communion, but he pretended that no man had a right to claim a divine mission, or to teach that it is necessary to take the sacrament. This is the substance of the Latin passage which I shall now transcribe. Coornbertus palam scribebat inter omnes sectas se nullibi Christi Ecclesiam deprehendere; Romanam nostram, quam ne quidam Ecclesiae nomine dignabatur, meliorem esse, Tom. 1. in Dialogis, fol. 484. nec S. Caenam ullibi idcirco participabat, quia veram Ecclesiam, & legitimum ministerium scilicet desiderabat! unde & communionis illam esse necessitatem, quae vulgo docetur, negabat. Tom. 1. lib. Consistorium, in initio. Tom. 111. in Delineatione impartialis Ecclesiae: ubi statim à principio docet, posse nunc quem esse verum Christianum, utcumque non sit membrum visibile alicujus ecclesiae: rogatusque, quid praestaret, an extra visibilem Ecclesiam vivere, quousque ipse Deus per certos Ministros Ecclesiam restauraret: an Ecclesiam, infirmorum gratiam, non valentium vivere absque externa illa forma, quin ad Sectarum partes prolabantur, colligere? respondit: prius quidem esse magis certum; at secundum videre sibi necessarium. Collapsam quidem esse Dei Ecclesiam, sed non apparere manifestum mandatum eam restaurandi: at tamen ovile alicujus pro infirmis adversus varios lupos defendendis, sub tali nempe libertate, qua nemo sibi arroget, à Deo se ad docendum missum esse, & Sacramentorum baptismi ac Caenae usus relinquatur liber, pro infirmis habendum; nullum verò istorum urgeri debere praecipit aut necessitatem (4). i. e. "Coornhert wrote publicly, that amongst all the sects he could meet no where with the Church of Christ, and that the Church of Rome was better than ours, which he would not honour even with the name of a Church. Tom. 1. In his Dialogues, fol. 484. Nor did he take the sacrament any where, because there was no true Church, as he said, nor any lawful Pastor: wherefore he denied that it is

(4) Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. lib. 6. pag. 438.

"necessary

Reformed Religion, and particularly against Calvin and Beza. Ex oppugnata in herbis reformatione nostrarum Ecclesiarum, praesertim nostra Catechesi, & probata sibi nec nostra Ecclesia nec aliis, solum intentus carpendis omnibus, & magnis impetendis nominibus; Calvinum dico, Bezam, Danæum, Saraviam, alios, gloriam hinc inanem inter suos aucupatus fuit (c). i. e. "By opposing the rising reformation of our Church, and especially our Catechism; by approving neither our Church, nor any other; by finding fault with every thing, and particularly by attacking all our great men, as Calvin, Beza, Danæus, Sarrau, and others, he endeavoured to raise himself an empty glory with his party." And he was considered as so great a disturber of Religion, that the Magistrates of Delft banished him their City, and the States of Holland came to several resolutions, which made him complain that they revived the Inquisition (d). Nothing, in his opinion, was more inconsistent with Reason and with the Gospel, than the persecuting of those who are not of the Religion established by law. He wrote upon this subject against Beza, and against Lipsius [C]. He died October the 20th 1590 (e), acknowledging the truth of the doctrine of Predestination, which he had so strongly opposed [D].

(c) Hoornbeek, Summa Controversiarum, lib. 6. pag. 435.

(d) Voetius, de Politica Eccles. tom. 2. pag. 434.

(e) See the Advertisement to the Reader, at the end of his Reply to Jusus Lipsius. Observe that Kong has erroneously placed his death under the year 1599.

They

"necessary to take the sacrament, as it is commonly taught. Tom. 1. In the Book concerning Consistories. Tom. III. In the Description of an impartial Church. Where he asserts, in the beginning, that a man may be now a true Christian, without being a member of any visible Church. And being asked which was better, to live out of a visible Church, till God should restore the true Church by the means of unquestionable Ministers, or to gather a Church for the sake of the weak, who not being able to live without an outward form of worship, would fall off to one sect or another? He answered that the former is more certain, but that the latter seemed necessary. That the Church now indeed was fallen, but that there did not appear any positive command to restore it. However that there ought to be a sheep-fold to protect the infirm flock against a great many wolves, but yet with such a liberty, that no man pretend to be sent from God to teach, and that the use of the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's supper be left free: nothing of all this being urged as a commandment necessary to be obeyed."

[C] He wrote upon persecution against Beza and against Lipsius. There is something to censure in the following words from Voetius. Cornbertus, qui Latino Dialogo contra Lipsii Politicam hanc causam agit, eundemque Dialogum postea contra Lipsii Responsum (cui tit. adversus Dialogistam) defendit, idem Belgico scripto Processum de hæreticid. edidit contra Bezam (5). i. e. "Coornhert, who defends this cause against Lipsius's politicks, in a Latin Dialogue, vindicated that same dialogue afterwards against Lipsius's reply (intituled against the dialogist). The same writer published a book in Dutch intituled A Dispute about punishing Heretics with death, against Beza." It is not true that Koornhert's dialogue against Lipsius's politicks is in Latin; it is in Dutch (6). Voetius himself confesses it, in a passage which I shall soon quote. Observe that the title of that Dutch work answers these Latin words, Lis, seu Processus de Hæreticid. Koornhert's reply is in Latin (7). It had been longer, if he had not died so soon (8). Here follows the title of it. Defensio Processus de non occidendis hæreticis contra tria capita libri IV Politicorum J. Lipsii: ejusque libri adversus Dialogistam confutatio. Sub extremum mortis fatum per suæ patriæ libertatis studiosissimum THEODORUM VOLCHARDUM COORNHERT scripta.

(5) Voetius, de Politica Eccles. tom. 2. pag. 386.

(6) Plebeia (scriptio) futilis & conscripta plebeio stylo. Lipsius in Præf. Libri de una Religione, adversus Dialogistam.

(7) He had wrote it in Dutch, but his executors had it translated into Latin.

(8) See the Advertisement to the reader at the end of that Reply.

"A defence of the dissertation, in which it is proved that heretics ought not to be capitally punished; against three Chapters of the 1Vth book of John Lipsius's politicks; with a refutation of Lipsius's book against the dialogist. Written by that most zealous friend of the liberty of his country, Theodore Volchard Coornhert, a little before his death." The edition I make use of was printed at Hanaw in the year 1593. If you have a mind to see how much Lipsius was perplexed by this reply, read the following passage. Lipsius petitis libello Belgico à Diederico Volckero Coornhert, postea libro, de Una religione dicto Died. Coornhert reposito addidit, se veram & probam intelligere: sed non explicat, & explicaturum se negat, quænam sit vera & proba religio. Hinc dictus Cornbertus in refutatione libelli Lipsiani a. 1591. tit. Defensio processus de non occidendis hæreticis, &c. ita constrinxit Lipsium, ut à Papisicâ, aut

Ethnico-Machiavellicâ (quarum alterutram pectore præmebat, quamvis tunc Leidæ conciones publicas frequentaret) se liberare non potuerit. Et hanc unam putant ex causis præcipuis fuisse, cur statione Leidensi turpiter desertâ hypocrisios larvam deponeret, ad partes hostiles transfugeret, atque ibi Papisini professionem susciperet (9). i. e. "Lipsius being attacked in a Dutch book by Theodore Volckard Coornhert, answered him in his treatise intituled the one Religion, in which he declared, that he meant thereby the true and sound religion; but he did not explain, and even declared that he would not explain which is the true and sound religion; which gave Coornhert an opportunity, in his confutation of Lipsius's work, which he published in the year 1591 with this title, A Defence of the dissertations in which it is proved that hereticks ought not to be capitally punished &c. to press Lipsius so closely, that he could not clear himself of being either of the popish religion, or of the heathen religion mixed with Machiavellism (for he was really of one of those religions in his heart, though at that time he used to go to Church at Leyden.) And it is thought that this was one of the chief reasons, why leaving his post at Leyden in a disgraceful manner, and throwing off the mask of hypocrisy, he went over to the enemy, and professed the popish religion there." Add to this the remark (B) of the article LIPSIUS.

(9) Voetius, de Politica Eccles. pag. 433.

[D] He died. . . acknowledging the truth of the doctrine of predestination, which he had so strongly opposed. O God, cried he when he was dying, it is from thee I received my soul, it is in thy power either to save it or to reprobate it, according to thy will and pleasure: I have no reason to complain. Obit A. ΟΙΟΝΟΧΟ, et quod valde observandum, is, qui tam impotenter de Prædestinatione multa sibi nequaquam intellecta, adversus Theologos nostros conscripsit, sub mortem veritatem ejus in se sentire & agnoscere coactus fuit, ad Deum exclamans; "se animam suam ab eo possidere, quam Deo integrum sit pro suo bene placito servare, an reprobare, sibi nil esse quod conqueratur." Quod nil est, quam vim et summam prædestinationis divinæ in nobis aut solvendis aut abjiciendis pro Dei summo in nos omnes arbitrio, proprio sensu confiteri, et in morte sincerius testari, quam tot infruitis & impetuosius adversus eam scriptis, per vitam (10). i. e. "He died in the year 1590; and, what is very remarkable, this man, who had so passionately wrote a great many things concerning predestination, which he did not understand himself, against our Divines, was when he died forced to perceive the truth of it within himself, and to confess it; crying out to God; that he had received his soul from him, which God could either save or reprobate according to his will and pleasure, without leaving him any reason to complain. What was this, but to feel within himself the power of predestination, and God's Sovereign authority over us; either to save or to damn us according to his will, and dying to bear witness to that truth, which during his life he had endeavoured to refute by so many silly and passionate writings?" It was necessary to transcribe this passage, considering the reflections it contains, and those which it may give the reader an occasion to make.

(10) Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. pag. 435.

(f) Lewis Guicciardini in Descriptio Belgii, cap. de Antwerpia, pag. m. 118.

(g) He is mistaken for Coornhert was born at Amsterdam.

They published an edition of his works in the year 1630, in three volumes in folio. I shall observe below that he began pretty late to study [E]. Lewis Guicciardini (f) mentions an excellent Engraver who was born at Harlem (g), and named THEODORE COORNHERT. He is undoubtedly the same who is mentioned in Freherus's Theatre [F], and who is the subject of this article. This is all that I had been able to collect from some Latin books, and I was ready to send it to the press with the six remarks, which the reader will find below; and I had no thoughts of making any additions to this article, but being told that there was a Life of our Coornhert written in Dutch, and prefixed to his works, I have procured some extracts from it, which will give me an opportunity to make this article much longer. I met with the following particulars in those extracts. Coornhert was born in the year 1522 of an ancient and good family of Amsterdam. Being still very young he took a journey into Spain and Portugal, and on his return he married contrary to what his father, who was dead, had ordered by his last will, and without asking his mother's advice. As he had taken a wife who had hardly any estate, he was obliged to enter into the family of Reynold of Brederode Baron of Vianen, who made him his steward, and whose favour he gained; but yet he soon left him, because he did not like a Court-life. He settled at Harlem, and gained a livelihood there by following his profession of an Engraver. Being puzzled with some difficulties upon Theological subjects, he imagined that he should meet with the solution of them in St. Augustin, and in some other fathers: so that he began to learn Latin at the age of thirty; and he made such a considerable progress in that study, that he was soon capable to translate Tully's Offices and several other works into Dutch; he understood Music and Poetry, and was very agreeable at an entertainment, but so as always to direct his discourses to the edification of his neighbour, and he never went beyond the rules of temperance. He loved working, and had made it his constant practice never to be above six hours in bed. He was admitted a Notary in the year 1561, and Secretary to the city of Harlem in the year 1562, and Secretary to the Burgomasters of the same City in the year 1564. In the years 1565 and 1566 he was several times sent to the Prince of Orange Governor of Holland, and had several conferences with Henry of Brederode on account of the troubles [G], which began to arise in the Low-Countries, and of the famous petition which was presented to the Dutchess of Parma in April 1566. He was taken up at Harlem and carried to the Hague, where he suffered a long and cruel imprisonment; during his confinement he composed several Poems in Dutch. His wife being persuaded that he should never be set free, endeavoured to get the plague, that by communicating it to him they might both die. He reproved her severely for such an attempt, forbidding her to do the same again, and desiring her to wait patiently how Providence should dispose of him. He defended himself so dexterously that he was set at liberty, being only commanded not to leave the Hague; but hearing that there were fresh orders come from Brussels to imprison him again, he stole away to Harlem, and thence he went into the country of Cleves, where he got a livelihood by his old trade of an Engraver. The States of Holland having taken the vigorous resolution in the year 1572 to assert their liberty against the tyranny of the Spaniards, Coornhert returned into his own country, and was honoured with the office of Secretary to the States of the Province. He had endeavoured to put a stop to the disorders and disturbances which the soldiers committed; and was deputed to inform against them, which made him so odious to the commanding officers of those daring troops [H], that in order to secure his life he was

(11) Observe that Volcard was not his name but his father's. (12) It is observed in his Life, that Doctor Jobn Bafius, who was afterwards Counsellor to the Prince of Orange, taught him Latin, but there is not a word said of the Greek tongue.

(13) Colomiés, Mélanges Historiques, pag. 63.

(14) Vir ingenii quidem alicujus, sed uti opus est (quippe ad annum ætatis decimum xxx linguam Latinam cepit addiscere) ita, &c. Hoornb. Summa Controversiarum, pag. 43. (15) Boxhorn, in Tetractis Hollandicæ, cap. de Urbe Amstelredamo, pag. m. 263.

[E] He begun pretty late to study. "I have seen at the Hague in Monsieur van Beuning's library the works of Theodore Volcard (11) Coornhert, in Dutch. He was an Enthusiast, who had a very ready wit. He learnt the Greek and Latin tongues by himself (12) at the age of forty years, and made so great a progress in these two languages, that he could translate any author into Dutch. He wrote several theological treatises, some of which have been refuted by Calvin and by Daneau. He wrote even against Lipsius, who answered him in his book de una Religione. The Dutch speak of him as of a wonder. He died in the year 1590, at the age of 68 (13)." There are some exaggerations in this passage of Colomiés. I have read in a very good author, that Koornhert was but thirty when he began to learn Latin (14). He was never thoroughly master of it, and it is a great while ago since his writings have been much esteemed. Observe that Boxhornius (15) relates most of the particulars contained in the passage quoted from Colomiés.

[F] In Freherus's Theatre We read there, that Theodore Cornhertius, an excellent lawyer, followed his profession with great reputation at Amsterdam his native place; that he left several works behind him, which he had done after the model of Martin Hemskerck, whom he endeavoured to imitate. He was also a good Poet. He died at Gouda in the year 1590, at the age of seventy eight (16). This is our Coornhert: But it should have been said that he died at the age of sixty eight, and not seventy eight. See the margin (17).

[G] He had several conferences with Henry of Brederode on account of the troubles. Coornhert had been steward to Rainold of Brederode, and had done him some service. By this means he had made himself known in an advantageous manner to Henry of Brederode Rainold's son. He had conferences with him at Vienna, at Utrecht, at Amsterdam and at Harlem, concerning the means to maintain the liberty of his Country; and he persuaded him to present to the Dutchess of Parma that petition, which had such remarkable consequences. He was the author of the first Manifesto, which Prince William published in his Camp (18), and which was intitled, An advertisement to the inhabitants of the Low Countries, for the Law, for the King, and for the flock (19). Bor, who mentions that Manifesto in the fourth book of his history, folio 182, declared to some persons, that he knew perfectly well, Koornhert had composed it (20.)

[H] Having been deputed to inform against the soldiers, he became odious to the commanding officers of those troops. The Captains who were conscious of several extortions, found out a very effectual method to prevent their being known: they gave Koornhert a very bad character, representing him as a dangerous Papist, whereby

(16) Paul Freher. in Theatre, pag. 1483. He quotes the Academia Germ. Pictorum Joab. à Sandrast.

(17) It should be Engraver and not Carver. And it should have been said, that he followed his profession at Harlem and not at Amsterdam.

(18) In December 1566.

(19) This is the translation of the Dutch title.

(20) Taken from the Latin Extracts, which have been communicated to me of Theodore Koornhert's Life, written in Dutch was obliged to go into a voluntary banishment. He acquainted the Prince of Orange and the States of Holland with the reasons which obliged him to look for a sanctuary, and retired to Embden: he returned to Harlem when things were in a better situation, and engaged in controversies, in which the most zealous Ministers were his antagonists. He published several writings in defence of his cause, which he maintained by disputations at Leyden and at the Hague; he went to live at this last place, that he might be the sooner ready to enter the list. These verbal disputations being prohibited by the authority of the Sovereign [1], he petitioned the States and the Ministers several times, particularly in the Synod held at Gouda, desiring that these disputations might be continued and completed; he presented also a petition to the Prince of Orange upon the same subject, and supported it by several arguments. He humbly requested of him, that in case his whereby they exposed him to a thousand dangers. They had a very plausible pretext to represent him thus; for he was continually asserting, that it was but just, and the interest of Holland, not to persecute the Roman Catholics, but to perform the promise which the Prince of Orange had made them, concerning the free exercise of their religion, &c. Count de Lumei, who commanded the army in Holland, was very far from performing that promise. Koornhert blamed his conduct with some freedom; and was therefore traduced as a most cursed favourer of Popery. Count de Lumei, with whom they had made him very odious, swore his ruin, and gave orders to kill him. He was not safe either in the roads in the country, nor in the streets in the towns. He applied to the Prince of Orange for his protection, but this was not sufficient to balance the great credit which the Count had with the soldiers. So that Koornhert was obliged to retire into the country of Cleves (21). This happened in the year 1572. Observe that he was so far from favouring the cause of the Spaniards, that he was excepted by name from the Act of Oblivion, which Lewis de Requesens caused to be proclaimed at Brussels in the year 1574, in favour of those who within two months should receive absolution from a Priest (22). Let us relate here a story which shews, that Koornhert did not love the Church of Rome, and yet wished that the Papists might be allowed a liberty of conscience.

when the states of the province put a stop to it. It was renewed by their order, and in the presence of their Commissioners at Leyden April the 14th: but it continued only a day and a half, for Koornhert retired, complaining that his adversaries made use of the secular power against him: he boasted that he had silenced the two Ministers, though he had not been suffered to attack them upon the last article (24). He pretended that his mentioning Calvin and Beza furnished his adversaries with an evasion, because the Commissioners declared the States would not suffer that these two Ministers of Geneva should be concerned in that controversy; so that Koornhert might expect to suffer from the resentment of the States. Finding himself thus threatened, he declared that he would no more come to a meeting, where he had not full liberty to speak. The Commissioners and the Ministers went nevertheless to the place where the conference had been first held. They waited for Koornhert, sent to his house, and took his absence for a flight, and for an unquestionable proof of his defeat. The States of Holland prevailed with the Magistrates of Harlem to forbid him to publish any thing relating to this conference (25).

Some years after he wrote against the Catechism of Heidelberg, which the Reformed Churches had admitted. He dedicated his work to the States of the province, representing to them with an excessive boldness the bad consequences, which he pretended would attend the admitting of that Catechism, and the design, which he said the Ministers had to put every one under a necessity to think and to speak as they did. He begged that these misfortunes might be prevented, and offered to prove his assertions. The Ministers also presented to the same States a writing full of complaints against Koornhert, and declared that they were ready to prove their propositions. The States, after mature deliberation, resolved, with the approbation of the Prince of Orange, to make Koornhert dispute with the Ministers, in the presence of fifteen Deputies. Hadrian Saravia, Divinity Professor at Leyden, was chosen to maintain the cause of the Ministers. They appointed a Notary for him, and another for Koornhert, that all that should be said on both sides might be taken down in writing in the most authentic manner. The dispute began in the Hague October the 27th 1583, and continued till the 3d of November, on which day Koornhert begged leave of the Commissioners to go to Harlem to see his wife who was dying. The dispute began again November the 28th. But as Saravia had dictated very long writings to his Notary during four days following, the Deputies resolved to send Koornhert home, that he might there compose his answer. It was still more prolix than Saravia's writings, and was refuted by a reply of the Ministers much more prolix still. The States hearing that of above fifty articles, which were to be examined, so many meetings had been spent in treating of one only, judged that they would never see the end of this affair, and put a stop to it. Koornhert boasted that he had gained the victory, and that he went on purpose to live at the Hague, that he might be more at hand to dispute. Notwithstanding the order of the States to break off the conferences, the parties continued to attack each other in writing (26).

The Synod of South-Holland meeting at Gouda in August 1589, Koornhert, who lived in the same city, sent a letter to the assembly, offering to begin the dispute again. The Synod having read the letter, sent it back to the author, declaring they had nothing more to do with him, and that if he desired any thing he might apply to the States (27).

(21) Taken from the Latin Extracts of Gerard Brandt's Dutch History, which have been communicated to me, Part 1, book 9. pag. 535. under the year 1572.

(22) Ibid. Book 21. pag. 593.

(23) Ibid. book 22. pag. 667, 668. under the year 1581.

(24) That of punishing the Hereticks

(25) Extracts from Gerard Brandt's, pag. 597. under the year 1578.

(26) Ibid. B. 13. pag. 693, 694, 695. under the year 1583.

(27) Ibid. B. 15. pag. 759. under the year 1589.

his petition was rejected, he might at least be suffered to continue to refute the errors in a modest and christian manner, and to enjoy in this respect that liberty of conscience, which had been so dearly bought; and in case this also was denied him, the last favour he begged was, that he might have leave to retire into some country situated near Holland, and in alliance with it, that he might employ the remainder of his life in compleating an Index to the Holy Scriptures; to the writing of which he had already applied himself twenty six years, and that he might also enjoy liberty of conscience, and avoid the dangers to which he was exposed, the hardships of poverty and want, and the offence which the Protestant Church might take at him. He asked for a safe conduct, and promised that he would return to the Hague to finish the disputation, as soon as it would be thought proper to recall him. All his petitions being rejected, he continued nevertheless to declare that he found a great many errors in the Catechism of Heidelberg; by which he only raised more enemies against himself; he was exclaimed against and exposed from the pulpit, and in other places: he was loaded with injuries and slanders; and had a great many vexations to suffer, his conduct having prepossessed and exasperated a great number of persons against him. He suffered this adversity with great moderation and constancy. It is very probable that the Prince of Orange protected him [K]. None in those times wrote so strongly as he did in favour of the liberty of his country, and of liberty of conscience [L]. His writings against the doctrines of Predestination and of Original Sin were supported with so many arguments, that when the Consistory of Amsterdam charged James Arminius, some years after, to refute them, that Minister answered, that he did not think that he himself or any other person could find in the holy Scripture wherewithal to refute those arguments (b). When he had almost finished his Dutch Translation of Erasmus's Paraphrase (i), he had a fit of sickness, during which time he gave strong proofs of his patience and held very edifying discourses till he expired, trusting in God's mercy, October the 29th (k) 1590. He was buried at Gouda (l); for he would not be buried at Amsterdam where he was born, nor at Harlem, where he continued longer than in any other place. He has been commended by Isaac Pontanus in his description of the City of Amsterdam, and by Grotius, and even by his adversary Justus Lipsius. This is what I borrow from the Latin Extracts of Theodore Koornhert's Life written in Dutch, which Extracts have been communicated to me. I shall transcribe some other particulars from them in the remarks.

(b) See hereupon the text of the article ARMINIUS, between the quotations (b) and (c).

(i) That of the New Testament.

(k) I have quoted an author above, who says the 20th. But this difference is owing probably to that which is between the old and the new style; and also to this reason, namely, that when a man dies in the night between the 19th and the 20th day of a month, some say he died the 19th and others the 20th.

(l) In the great Church, with a very honourable epitaph, written by his good friend Henry Laurence Spiegel. See Gerard Brandt, History of the Reformation in the Low-Countries, book 15. under the year 1590.

[K] It is very probable that the Prince of Orange protected him.] It is certain that the Prince knew him to be a man of genius, a great lover of liberty, and a great enemy to the Spaniards; so that he judged him proper to be employed in the affairs of those times. He made use of his pen on several occasions; he charged him with divers commissions, and desired that he should be recalled from his banishment (28): and one can hardly comprehend how Koornhert had been able to stand his ground against the great number of his enemies, had he not been secretly supported by a powerful protection, artfully managed: for he had not the least regard for the public doctrines of the Churches of Holland; he attacked the calling of the Ministers, he condemned all the sects, and would have the Roman Catholics enjoy a full liberty of conscience, which considering the circumstances of those times would have been very dangerous. His censure of the Catechism of Heidelberg was so bold and abusive, that since the States of Holland, who had it examined by a Professor of Divinity and by a Minister, only ordered that the copies of it should be lodged in the hands of the Magistrates (29), we ought to think that some persons, who had an unlimited power, protected him. If the Prince of Orange had not been dead, when Koornhert went to live at Delft, I do not believe that the Magistrates would have commanded him to leave that city in four and twenty hours time, as they did in the year 1518 (30). Some persons would have him imprisoned for the remainder of his life, but the Prince of Orange and the Sovereign Magistrates would not consent to it (31).

(28) Taken from Extracts of Koornhert's Life.

(29) Ibidem.

(30) Extracts from Gerard Brandt, book 15. pag. 737.

(31) Ibid.

(32) In the country of Cleves.

[L] None wrote so strongly as he did in favour of the liberty of his country, and in favour of liberty of conscience.] Whilst he was at Santen (32) in a voluntary banishment during the year 1574, he drew up the plan of a book, in which he designed to shew to all Christian Princes, that the conduct of those provinces which resisted the King of Spain and the Duke of Alva, was not a rebellion, nor a popular inclination to pull down images, but a consequence of that sovereign right which all nations have to defend their privileges, their laws, and liberty of conscience. Add to this what I have related in the remark [H]. The Acts of the Pacification of Cologne, begun in the year 1579, published at Delft with a licence from the States, and with excellent notes by Haggai Albada, an intimate friend of our Koornhert, are thought to be the work of the latter. Eusebius Philalethes ascribes all this to him in a book printed in the year 1617. See also Koornhert's first treatise against Justus Lipsius. In the year 1584 he wrote a pamphlet concerning the means of resisting the King of Spain; and shewed amongst other things, that the Dutch must put themselves under the protection of the French King. Being persuaded that peace amongst Christians is one of the most important doctrines of the Gospel, and that it could not be obtained but by reducing the articles necessary to salvation to a very small number, and by suffering a diversity of opinions with regard to the other articles, he endeavoured as much as lay in his power to put things upon that footing. He supported his opinion in this particular by the authority of the great Erasmus (33), and agreed with two Doctors of the Reformed Church (34); it seems even that Prince William was a little inclined that way, Consult Bor's History, Book XXI, folio 107.

Koornhert was continually saying, that Luther, Calvin and Menno had briskly attacked an infinite number of errors of the Roman Catholics; but that they succeeded very ill with regard to the horrid and impious doctrine of persecuting for conscience sake; and that instead of refusing it effectually, they had rather confirmed it the more, each of them acting from that principle, when and where they could be masters; having thus raised up a new Papacy by erecting a schismatical Church, which condemns all the other Churches. By this means, said he, they have encouraged Popery to continue its ancient method; and they have not only gained nothing against its persecuting maxims, but they have even introduced new confusions, and new schisms, by depriving men of the liberty of prophesying (35). As for him, he maintained that we ought to hate no man, and that all pious persons, who by their faith in Jesus Christ endeavour to imitate him, are good Christians; and that the Magistrates ought to hold all peaceful inhabitants for good and loyal subjects (36). He was so full of that hypothesis, that he made a sacrifice of his rest, and of all his temporal advantages, to assert it with all the courage, wit and learning he was master of (37).

(33) In Epistola ad Archiepiscopum Panormitanum, Operibus prefixa.

(34) Huybert Duyhuus, & Taco Sybrand.

(35) That is to say, of professing all that their conscience dictates to them.

(36) Extracts from Koornhert's Life.

(37) In the Dutch Distich, which Peter Hooft made to be put under his picture, it was said, that he was unsatiable of learning and liberty.

I shall also make use of some Latin Extracts from a work of Gerard Brandt, I meant the History he wrote in Dutch of the Reformation of the Low-Countries. They were made by the same person who communicated to me those from Koornhert's Life, and who understands Dutch very well, and is very accurate. I believe that we may depend upon him.

KORNMANUS (HENRY) a German Civilian, author of some pretty curious treatises [A], and which bore several impressions. He lived in the beginning of the seventeenth Century.

[A] Author of some pretty curious treatises.] That intitled de Virginitatis jure Tractatus novus & jucundus, ex jure civili, canonico, patribus, historicis, poetis, &c. confectus, and that which is commonly joyned with it intitled, Linea Amoris, sive Commentarius in versiculum Gl. visus, colloquium, convivium, oscula, factum, have borne several impressions. The oldest edition that I know of is of Frankfort 1610. The subject is great and fruitful, but this author always rides post; he does not go to the source of things, and publishes nothing but very true particulars, and is very fit for those who love brevity. His other works are as follow. Templum Naturæ historicum, seu de natura & miraculis qua- tuor Elementorum. De Miraculis vivorum, seu de natura, proprietatibus &c. hominum vivorum, Frankfort 1614. De Miraculis mortuorum, &c. Some one has said, that Kirchmannus, in his book de Funeribus Romanorum borrows a great number of particulars from this last work of our Kornmannus (1). Nevertheless I do not find that the treatise de Miraculis mortuorum was before 1610. Now the book de Funeribus Romanorum was printed in 1604. The author indeed gave a new edition of it in 1625, and he might have taken advantage of the treatise of our Kornmannus, with regard to his additions. This may be examined another time, in case there be opportunity for it.

(1) Anton. Burremans, Variat. Lecton. cap. 4. pag. 32.

KORTHOLT (CHRISTIAN) Doctor and Professor of Divinity at Kiel, was born the 15th of January 1633 at Burg in the Isle of Femenen (a). He was educated very carefully in piety and learning, in his father's house, and at the school of Burg till sixteen years of age, after which he was sent to Sleswick where he continued his studies two years. He afterwards studied in the College of Stetin, and there gave public proofs of the progress he had made; he maintaining two theses (b), the one de veracitate & taciturnitate, and the other de natura Philosophiæ ejusque in Theologia usu. He was author of the latter. Going to Rostoch in 1652, he assiduously frequented the Lectures of the Professors, and maintained two other theses (c) to great advantage, the first whereof he had wrote. His father's death obliged him to leave that Univerfity in a year; but he returned to it some months after, and there gave new proofs of his erudition, as well by the thesis or disputation de Christo θεανθρωπῶ which he composed and defended publicly, as by the Lectures he read at home on Logic, Metaphysics and Hebrew. He took his degree, in a solemn manner, of Doctor of Philosophy in the year 1656; and afterwards went and studied in the Univerfity of Jena, where he gained great reputation by the academical acts, wherein he was sometimes respondent, and sometimes moderator; and by the private Lectures he read on Philosophy, the Eastern Tongues, and Divinity. He left the Univerfity of Jena in 1660; and went and visited those of Leipzig and Wittemberg, and returned afterwards to Rostoch, where he displayed his capacity a variety of ways; so that, in February 1662, he was made Greek Professor. He took his degree of Doctor in Divinity in December the same year. Not long before he had shewed his genius and learning, in three disputes with Roman Catholics [A], in presence of Christian Duke of Mecklenburg. He married the 26th of April 1664; and the next year was invited to be the second Professor of Divinity, in the Univerfity founded just before in Kiel. He was appointed Vice-Chancellor of it in 1666; and succeeded, in 1675, Peter Musæus, who had had the first Divinity-chair there. He was so zealous for the prosperity of that new Univerfity, and so grateful for the kindness the Duke of Holstein his master had for him, that he refused all the employments, though very beneficial and honourable, which were offered him in several places. This Prince bestowed upon him, in 1680, the Professorship of Ecclesiastical Antiquities; and declared him Vice-Chancellor for life of the Univerfity in 1689. He discharged the duty of those several posts, and that

(a) Near the Baltick Sea in the country of Holstein.

(b) i. e. Disputations, and not here positions.

(c) The one de Supposito & Persona, the other de Sphæra æstivitatii.

[A] He had shewed his genius and learning, in three disputes with Roman Catholics.] Here follow the particulars of it, as related in his funeral Programma. An. M DC LXI, à Serenissimo Duce Mecklenburgico, CHRISTIANO, Principe eruditione, facundiâ, comitateque singulari prædito, per Cancellarium ejus, D. CHRISTOPHORUM KRAUTHOFIUM, invitabatur in aula Suerinensem, ad colloquium cum Pontificio Austriaco, EGGEFELDIO, viro quidem docto, sed admodum supercilioso, de religionis negotio, habendum. Quod & in conspectu multorum aulæ Procerum, ac peregrinorum etiam, qui fortè tunc aderant, institutum, ac postero die cum alio Pontificio Polono, ELLERNIZKIO, continuatum est Stinchenburgi, ipso Principe præsentem, qui eum illuc accersitum clementerque acceptum toto ocliduo secum retinuit. A quo & sequenti anno M DC LXII denuo ad certamen, cum Pontificio quodam Parisiensi, cui nomen de la BUISSON (1) erat, ibidem instituendum, provocatus comparuit, in eoque de gravissimis religionis controversiis cum omnium applausu per aliquot dies disputavit. i. e.

Anno 1661, Christian Duke of Mecklenburg, a learned, eloquent and gracious Prince, gave him an invitation, by Christopher Krauthof his chancellor, to the court of Suerin, to engage in a religious conference, with an Austrian Roman Catholic, EGGEFELD, a very learned but supercilious man. This being begun before a great number of Courtiers, and also strangers who happened to be there, was continued the next day with another Roman Catholic, ELLERNIZK a Pole, at Stinchenburg, in presence of the Prince, who having invited him thither, and received him in the most gracious manner, detained him eight days, and being again invited, the following year 1662, by the above-mentioned Prince, to engage in a controversy with one du BUISSON, a Roman Catholic of Paris, he appeared, and disputed, with universal applause, during some days, upon the most weighty points in religion."

(1) It should be du Buisson.

(d) It was in fact the same as Rector; because there was no other Rector in Kiel but the Prince himself who founded the Academy.

that of Vice-Rector (d), which he had five times, with great ability, application and prudence. His death, which happened the 31st of March 1694, was a great loss to the University of Kiel, and to the Republic of Letters which he had enriched with a very great number of works [B], and might have added many others, had he lived longer. He left some sons, who tread very worthily in his steps (e) [C].

(e) Extracted from his Funeral Programma, printed at Kiel in 1694.

KOTTERUS

[B] He had enriched the republick of letters with a very great number of works.] I have seen the catalogue of it, which was printed in Kiel, anno 1694. Some are in German, and others in Latin. Here follow the title of those in the latter language. Traëtatus de Origine & Progressu Philosophiæ Barbaricæ. Jenæ in 4. 1660. Traëtatus de Perfectionibus Ecclesiæ Primitivæ, veterumque Martyrum Cruciatibus. ibid. in 8. 1660. Prodiit longè accuratior, & triplo auctior, Kilonii ann. 1689. in 4. Valerianus Confessor, hoc est, Solida Demonstratio, quod Ecclesia Romana hodierna non sit vera Christi Ecclesia; deducta ex Valer. Magni, Capuccini, Apologia Anti-Jesuitica. Rost. in 12. 1662. Opusculum illud auctius Kilonii in 4. est editum 1666. Dissertatio de Nestorianismo. ibid. in 4. 1662. Traëtatus de Calamniis Paganorum in veteres Christianos. Rostochii, in 4. 1663. Longè auctior publicatus est Kilonii anno 1668 novoque planè habitu, in tres Libros distinctus, brevi, V. D. e Typographèo Kiloniensis proditurus est (2). Exercitatio in Historiam Judith. Rostoch. in 4. 1663. Exercitatio in Præfationem Hieronymi in Judith. ibid. in 4. 1663. Traëtatus de Canone Scripturæ, Bellarmino, ejusque propugnatoribus, Gregorio & Erbermanno Jesuitis, oppositus. Rostochii, in 4. 1665. Traëtatus de Religione Eibnica, Muhammedana, & Judaica. Kilonii, in 4. 1665. Oratio de Scholarem & Academicorum ortu & progressu, præsertim in Germania, inter solemniam inaugurationis Academiæ Kiloniensis habita. Slesv. in fol. 1666. Dissertatio Historica de Philippo Arabis, Alexandri Mammææ, Plinii Junioris, & Annæi Senecæ, Christianismo. Kil. in 4. 1667. Apologia pro Valeriano Confessore, adversus Capuccinum Salisburgensem, ibid. in 4. 1667. Traëtatus de Variis Scripturæ sacræ Editionibus. ibid. in 4. 1668. Longè auctior vulgatus est Kilonii ann. 1686. Pseudadelphina Heiniana, D. Johanni Heinio, Theologo Reformato Marburgensi, opposita, ibid. in 4. 1669. Traëtatus de Lectione Bibliorum in linguis vulgo cognitis. ibid. in 4. 1670. Revifus & auctus Plœnæ recusus est anno 1692. Funus Ecclesiæ Romanæ in Clemente IX Papa defunctæ. ibid. in 4. 1670. Papa Utopicus. ibid. in 4. 1670. Traëtatus de Origine & naturâ Christianismi ex mente Gentilium. Kil. in 4. 1672. Apologia pro Valeriano Confessore, adversus Christianum Fabrum, Gallo-Sebastianum. Kil. in 4. 1673. Commentarius in Epistolas Plinii & Trajani de Christianis primævis. ibid. in 4. 1674. Commentarius in Justinum M. Athenagoram, Theophilum Antiochenum, Tatianum Assyrium. Kil. in fol. 1675. Auctior editus est Lipsiæ ann. 1686. Dissertatio de Viribus humanis in ordine ad Civilia & Spiritualia. Kil. in 4. 1676. Exercitatio anti-Salmasiana de Pane ἰσχυρῆ, quem in Oratione Dominica petimus. in 4. 1676. Disquisitiones anti-Baroniana. ibid. in 4. 1677. De Tribus Impostoribus Magnis, liber, Edwardo Herberti, Thomæ Hobbes, & Benedicto Spinosæ oppositus. Cui addita Appendix, qua Hieronymi Cardani & Edwardi Herberti de Animalitate Hominis opiniones philosophicè examinata. ibid. in 8. 1680. Disquisitio anti-Baroniana peculiaris de Reliquiarum cultu. ibid. in 8. 1680. Traëtatus de Vita & Moribus Christianis primævis per Gentilium malitiam affectis. ibid. in 4. 1683. Theses Theologicæ XXV Disputationibus publicis in Universitate Kiloniensi propostæ. ibid. in 4. 1684. Prodiere & ventilatæ sunt altera vice 1686, ac rursum anno 1692. Traëtatus de Processu disputandi Papistico. Cui subjuncta Dissertatio de Hostiis Eucharisticis, sive Pæcentulis orbiculatis, quibus in S. Synaxeos administratione utimur. ibid. in 4. 1685. Exercitatio de CHRISTO CRUCIFIXO, Judæis scandalo, Gentilibus stultitia, Creditibus autem Dei potentia & sapientia, 1. Cor. 1. 18, 23, 24. ibid. in 4. 1686. Exercitatio de Atheismo Veteribus Christianis, ob Templorum imprimis aversionem à Gentilibus objecto, inque eosdem à nostris reortato. ibid. in 4. 1689. Silentium Sacrum, sive, de Occultatione Mysteriorum apud veteres Christianos Dissertatio. ibid. in 4. 1689. De Studio Belli ac Pacis Dissertatio Theologica, in gratam memoriam reddita divina clementia Cimbricis provinciis Concordiæ, restitutique fe-

(2) It was published in 1698. See the Acta Erudit. for Sept. 1693, pag. 420.

liciter Reverendiss. Serenissimique Slesvici & Holsatiæ Ducis regnantis Dn. CHR. ALBERTI. Ibid. in 4. 1689. De Actionibus Forensibus Exercitatio Theologica. Ibid. in 4. 1690. Alexander Papa Octavus Pseudonymus. Ibid. in 4. 1690. De Magnimitate Aristotelica, Christianæ Modestæ aliisque veris Virtutibus inimica, Dissertatio. Ibid. in 4. 1690. De Schismate, superiori seculo Protestantibus inter & Pontificis enato, Dissert. Historico-Theologica, ib. in 4. 1690. Aposthectis Papæa. Ibid. in 4. 1691. In Canonem 6. Nicænum Cardd. Baronio & Bellarmino opposita Exercitatio. Ibid. in 4. 1691. Miscellanea Academica. Ibid. in 4. 1692. Disquisitio de Pontifice Romano. Ibid. in 4. 1692. De Rationis cum Revelatione in Theologia concursu. Ibid. in 4. 1692. De Veterum quorundam locutione illa: Filius Dei assumpsit Hominem. Ibid. in 4. 1692. De Nominibus, quibus per ludibrium & contemptum Christiani olim à profanis appellati: deque Notis oculiis, quibus iidem se insignivisse crediti, Dissertatio: addita Mantissa, qua disquiritur; Num filiola, quam octo dierum infans enixa est, Baptismi capax. Ibid. in 4. 1693. De Sacris Publicis, debita cum reverentia præsentisque Numimis Metu colendis, Diatribæ Ascetica. Ibid. in 4. 1693.

There was published after his death a treatise intitled, Pastor fidelis, sive de Officio Ministrorum Ecclesiæ Opusculum, Hamburgi. 1695 (*), 12mo. See Acta Eruditorum (3). There has likewise been published his Historia Ecclesiastica Novi Testamenti, Lipsiæ, 1697, 4to. See the abovementioned Acta Eruditorum (4). [This is but an epitome which was not finished by the author, and the imperfect condition in which it appears, made some think that it is not a work of Kortholt; however, that is not a sufficient reason why it should be ascribed to another. It was reprinted at Hamburg in the year 1708 in 4to.] Addit. by the translator.

(*) It is 1696, in Father Nicéron's Hommes Illustres, vol. 31. pag. 62. Paris 1735, 12mo] Addit. by the Translator.

[C] He left some sons who tread very worthily in his steps.] He had ten children, five sons and five daughters, whereof four of each sex were living at his death, The two eldest daughters were then married; one to Mr. Lindeman professor of physicks and metaphysicks in Rostoch; and the other to Mr. Pasch, Morality Professor in Kiel (5). The oldest of the sons, HENRY CHRISTIAN KORTHOLT, was studying physic, and abroad at that time upon his travels. MATTHIAS NICHOLAS KORTHOLT and SEBASTIAN KORTHOLT, his brothers, had already given excellent testimonies of their genius. JOEL JOHN KORTHOLT, the youngest of all, pursued his studies very happily, and was a very promising youth. Natu minor, these are the words of the funeral Programma. JOEL JOANNES, pietatis & literarum studio diligenter incumbens, optimam de se spem excitat, quam abunde jam impleverunt ætate profectibusque multò majores, MATTHIAS, NICOLAUS, & SEBASTIANUS, pluribus præclaris bonæ indolis ingenique excellentis specimenibus editis. i. e. "JOHN JOEL, the youngest, applying himself assiduously to piety and literature, gives the most hopeful promises, which MATTHIAS, NICHOLAS, and SEBASTIAN had already greatly fulfilled, they being much older than he, and having made a much greater proficiency in learning, and given many specimens of an excellent disposition and genius." I have seen the dissertation de Poëtis Episcopis, which Sebastian Kortholt published in 1699, and submitted to the examination of the learned, examini Eruditorum publico, when he was preparing to receive his Doctor's degree in philosophy: Pro summis in Philosophia honoribus impetrandis. It is a very curious piece, and shews the author's great reading. Since the printing of this, I have seen two other of his works, of which I form the same judgment; the first is intitled Disquisitio de entusiasmato Poëtico, and was printed at Kiel in the year 1696, in 4to. The other treats de Puellis Poëtriis omiffis ab Adriano Baillev, and was printed in the same city, in the year 1700, in 12mo, I have also heard that the author has been made poetical Professor in the university of Kiel in February 1701; and that

(3) For January 1696, pag. 7, & seq.

(4) For Sept. 1697, pag. 438.

(5) He caused to be printed in 1695, Sciedrasma de curiosis bujus sæculi inventis quorum accuratiori cultu faciem prætulit aut quitas. He is reprinting a new edition of it with large additions.

KOTTERUS (CHRISTOPHER) was one of the three Fanaticks, whose Visions were published at Amsterdam in 1657, with the following title, Lux in tenebris [A]. He lived at Sprottaw in Silesia, and his visions began in June 1616. He fancied he saw

an

(6) Jo. Burchardus Majus, Eloquentia & Historie Professor Primarius. His writings have gained him great fame.

that Matthias Nicholas, his brother, having been invited to be professor of eloquence and poetry in the university of Gießen, made his inaugural oration the 22d of June 1700. It treated de antiqua eloquentia recentiorum perperam postposita à Carolo Peraltio scriptore libri, cujus est titulus, Parallèle des anciens & des modernes &c. I thought this oration a very good one. The elogium of this professor may be seen in a letter of Mr. Majus (6), dated at Kiel the 22d of May 1700.

(1) In the article DRABICIUS, citation (r).

(2) His name was Laurence de Ceer.

[A] The following title, Lux in tenebris.] I took notice elsewhere (1) why this title was given it, and therefore will not repeat it here. This work was printed in 1657, at the expence of a rich patron (2) whom Comenius had met with in Amsterdam. It comprehends the visions or revelations of our Christopher Kotterus, those of Christina Poniatovia, and those of Nicholas Drabicius. Comenius published an abridgment of them in 1660, with this title, De Revelationum divinarum in usum seculi nostri factarum Epitome. He republished the whole work with additions, and under the following title, Lux à tenebris novis radiis aucta &c. This last edition contains the sequel of Drabicius's Revelations till the year 1666. A Divinity Professor in Franeker, a Pole, named Nicholas Arnoldus, wrote publicly and speedily against this work, and answered Comenius's Apology. Des Marets (Maresius) Divinity Professor at Groningen, attacked this same work in his theses de tribus Videntibus, anno 1659; and when he published ten years after, an answer (3) to a little piece of Comenius concerning the Millenium, he reproached him more than once, and with great strength, for printing the pieces of those three pretended Prophets. This work, in a few years, was contemned and forgot; but was prodigiously sought after when the Turks besieged Vienna 1683. Those who had lodged the copies of it in garrets, where they had laid a long time, took them out, and sold several at a high price; and had the Turks made themselves masters of Vienna, I do not doubt but a new edition of it must have been made, how dear soever the copies might have cost. A great number were sought after in France, and Mr. d'Avaux sent some thither, whence we may very much wonder why Mr. Jurieu supposed, in 1691, that Drabicius was not known in Paris. This is an unpardonable supposition, because he himself, not long before, had greatly contributed to spread the name of that fanatic all the world over. Besides, he alledged this supposition as a proof of a state-crime; for he pretended that the Avis aux Refugees, i. e. "Advice to the Refugees," as it mentioned Drabicius, could not have been writ in France. These are particulars which my readers could hardly be induced to credit; and therefore it will be necessary for me to prove them, by giving an account of the reply that was made to him. Here then follows the answer which was made him by the author he accused (4).

(3) Intituled, Anthibeticus, sive Defensio pii xeli &c. contra J. A. Comenium.

(4) In the Cabale Chimérique, pag. 130, & seq. of edit. 2.

(5) Pag. 18.

"The first of these proofs is, that the Avis aux Refugees was not writ in Paris. Now this he demonstrates thus.

"The person (*), who wrote this Avis, gives a circumstantial account of Drabicius's prophecies; he has seen it, he has read it, and knows all the particularities concerning it.

"Now the Literati of Paris scarce know Drabicius's name.

"Consequently the author of the Avis is not in Paris.

"If I should deny his first proposition, I am sure he could never be able to prove it; because it does not appear from the Avis aux Refugees, that the author of it knew any more of Drabicius, except that he did all that lay in his power, to stir up a war against the House of Austria. Now could not any man of letters know this, without having ever read the books of that prophet?

"But the second proposition is still more visibly false. For not to say that, during the siege of Vienna, Drabicius's book was very much talked of in France, and that several copies of it were sent for from hence; I myself was desired by a friend

"of Roan to send him one, who does not know that the great elogiums which Mr. Jurieu has bestowed on the prophetic triumvirate, I mean on Christina Poniatovia, on Kotterus, and on Drabicius, in a (z) work more common, and more universally spread than Almanacks, as he himself boasts (i), making use of the most just comparison that was ever employed; who does not know, I say, that the great elogiums bestowed on Drabicius, and so well adapted to make this Prophet become the topic of all conversations, have drawn on the panegyrist some very mortifying censures from the Bishop of Meaux (i), and of Mr. Pellisson (), in books published at Paris before the Advice to the Refugees was printed? Who can doubt that the satyr entitled L'Esprit de Mr. Arnauld, which has been in so much vogue since the year 1684, excited a curiosity in a numberless multitude of Frenchmen to see Drabicius's prophecies, the plan (o) whereof is drawn by Mr. Jurieu in such a manner, that he promises the public, on one hand, from Drabicius, the ruin of the House of Austria; to the King of France the Imperial Crown; to the Turks the taking of Vienna, Carinthia, Stiria; with the destruction of the commonwealth of Venice, and of the city of Rome? And to promise, on the other hand, in the name of the Protestants, all that they can do to fulfil these prophecies?" The Literati of Paris must have been very stupid, had they not enquired after a work of which Mr. Jurieu has given the following idea. "I found, says he (5), in the prophecies of Kotterus, Christina, and Drabicius, which Comenius published, something great and surprizing. Kotterus, the first of these three Prophets, is great and lofty; the images of his visions are also noble and majestic, that those of the ancient prophets are not more so. They all are wonderfully well concerted or drawn up; they are all of a piece, and no inconsistency is found in them. I cannot conceive how it was possible for a meer mechanic to hit upon such exalted things without the assistance of God. The two years of Christina's prophecy are, in my opinion, a series of miracles, as great as have happened since the Apostles time: nay, I have not met with any thing in the lives of the greatest Prophets more miraculous than what has befallen the maiden in question. Drabicius has also his loftinesses, but then he is much more difficult and obscure. These three Prophets agree in foretelling the fall of the Anti-Christian Empire, as what must come to pass very soon; but on the other hand, so many things in them offend, that one cannot well set one's heart upon them." Had not this excited a desire of knowing Comenius's prophetic collection; at least those would have had such a curiosity as had seen Pellisson's Reflections on the disputes concerning Religion: for when a writer has displayed a great deal of haughtiness, it is impossible for a person not to feel some joy, when he sees such a writer mortified as Mr. Jurieu was by the following words of M. Pellisson. "A Prophet, and more than a Prophet; doubtless a forerunner of the Millenium which he declares to us; who, at least, assumes the authority of reforming, correcting, and chastising at pleasure, those whom he has expressly acknowledged to be inspired men and prophets (*); a set of people whom the event has already proved to be guilty of and hundred impostures; and whom Heaven has just now confounded in the sight of the whole world, by the taking of Buda, though they had assured us, in the name of God, that the Christians would never recover it by force of arms, but by a treaty with the Turks (6)." He gave (7) express proofs of all this, by citing Mr. Jurieu's own words (8); and the places where Drabicius declared so expressly, that Buda should never get out of the hands of the Turks but in an amicable way. When people are affected towards an author, as the Parisians were with regard to Mr. Jurieu, they are so highly pleased to see such an author convicted either of imposture or fanaticism, that they will go to the source of such a conviction. But is it true, say these people, that Drabicius

(z) Accomplissement des Prophet. printed in the year 1686.

(i) XXI Pastoral Letter of 1689.

(*) Hist. des Variations, lib. 13. num. 41. printed in 1688.

() Reflex. sur les differens de la Relig. Part 2. printed in 1687.

(o) Tom. 2. pag. 291.

(5) Préface de l'Accomplissement des Prophetes. printed in 1686.

(*) Christopher Kotterus of Silesia. Christina Poniatovska of Bohemia. Nicholas Drabicius of Moravia.

(6) Reflections sur les Differens de la Religion, Part 2. Sect. 17. pag. 435. edit. of Amst. 1689.

(7) 501, & seq. See also Chimères de Mr. Jurieu, Part 4. pag. 141.

(8) Those which I quoted above, from the Préface de l'Accomplissement des Prophetes.

an angel under the form of a man, who commanded him to go and declare to the Magistrates, that unless the people repented, the wrath of God would make dreadful havoc. Though he had received this order six times successively, he yet did not put it in execution; he being dissuaded from it by his pastor and his friends: but imagining, in April 1619, that he saw the same spirit, who threatened him with eternal damnation in case he continued silent, he executed his commission in a full assembly of the Magistrates, the 29th of August 1619. Kotterus was laughed at; the visions or apparitions continued, and were followed by extasies and prophetic dreams. The Elector Palatine, whom the Protestants had declared King of Bohemia, was introduced in these visions. Kotterus waited upon him in Breslaw in December 1620, and informed him of his commission. He went to some other places, and at last, in the year 1625, to the Court of Brandenburg [B] (a). He got acquainted the same year with John Amos Comenius, who did all that lay in his power to promote his prophecies (b) [C]. Now as most of these

(a) Extracted from his Revelations, published by Comenius.

(b) Comenius, Hist. Revelat. on, pag. 16, & seq.

bicius affirms such a particular? may one not see this with one's own eyes, that no scruple may be left, to lessen the ridiculousness of such a scene? Then the people in question seek for one of Drabicius's books wherever they think it may be found: and if they cannot meet with any of them, they nevertheless treasure up the name in their memory, and consider it as worthy of ridicule.

No one can say that I digress from my subject; for since it is a falsity, in point of fact, to assert that Drabicius's name was scarce known in France in the year 1690, it belongs properly to this Dictionary; and it was proper for me to make use of all the proofs which refute this falsity.

Had Mr. Jurieu been contented with saying, that in comparison of the noise which Drabicius's name would have made, in France, in case the Turks had taken Vienna, he was scarce known at Paris when the Advice to the Refugees was writ; I am of opinion that he would not have been in the wrong; for, had Vienna been taken, Drabicius would have been more talked of than the Grand Visier. The book which Jurieu wrote during the siege of that city, to praise and vindicate Comenius's three Prophets, by fine illustrations and learned commentaries, would have been translated into several languages, and have made Drabicius, for a long time, the topic of conversations. Now his performance came to nothing with regard to Drabicius's memory, by the raising of the siege; the mighty Sobieski, at the distance of two or three hundred leagues, destroyed a book that was just going to press. I began to know during the siege of Vienna, how greatly I had mistook, in imagining that mankind were quite cured with regard to those chimerical hopes that are so often grounded on visions. I met every where with people, who spoke of nothing but Drabicius's prophecies, of the truth of which they seemed perfectly persuaded; and who built so many castles in the air, that they were to destroy Babylon in an instant. They could not sufficiently wonder how Drabicius came to guess so pat with regard to Tekely. This is what I wanted them to say; for I made it appear that Tekely, at that time the great actor of this Opera, makes no manner of figure in Drabicius's book, which is a perfect nullity. I do not doubt but the French would have been vastly attentive, had the Grand Visier succeeded in his enterprize; and they would gladly have assisted the credulous, in making them believe as much as possible, with regard to Drabicius's visions, since they promise the Empire to the King of France. It is therefore certain, that this false Prophet's name would have become infinitely more famous in Paris, in case the Turks had taken Vienna.

[B] He went... in the year 1625 to the Court of Brandenburg.] The Elector George William having heard the great noise which Kotterus's Revelations made, had a mind to see him. He then put it into the hands of the Divines of Francfort on the Oder, in order for them to examine it; after which he sent for them twice to Berlin, the first time in 1625 and afterwards in 1626. The fame of our Kotterus having reached Strasburg, it made such an impression on one of the Burgomasters there, that he sent a messenger into Silesia, to desire Kotterus to explain to him sixty two points; and to come to Strasburg where his prophetic ministry might be in greater safety. Kotterus answered the sixty two questions; but excused himself from going to Strasburg, upon his declaring that he had no commission for it from the Spirit, and permitted his picture to be sent to the Burgomaster (9).

[C] He got acquainted... with John Amos Comenius, who did all that lay in his power to promote his prophecies.] After the Emperor's edicts, by which all Protestant Ministers of Bohemia and Moravia, in the year 1624, were ordered to leave the country, it was resolved in a private assembly, held in March in 1625, that the Ministers of Bohemia should retire into Poland, and those of Moravia into Hungary; and that some of them should be deputed with letters, both into Poland and Hungary, to prepare a reception for them. Comenius was sent into Poland. Passing through Gortlitz in Lusatia, the tutor of young Count de Zerotin informed him, as a very consolatory article of news, that the ruin of Antichrist was at hand, since the Holy Ghost had revealed this to one Christopher Kotterus, an honest man of Silesia. He mentioned and read several passages in it; and because Comenius made too many scruples, he advised him to go upon the spot, in order to confer with the Prophet. Comenius passing through Sprottaw desired to see Kotterus, but was told by his wife that the Elector of Brandenburg had sent for him. This was likewise confirmed to him by the Minister of the place (10), who assured him that Kotterus was a true Seer, and gave him his Revelations to read. Comenius waited for Kotterus, during which time he perused and meditated on the manuscript in question, and was amazed at it. Not long after he saw Kotterus, performed his journey, returned soon to Sprottaw, translated the manuscript of Revelations into the Bohemian language, and was fully convinced that they came only from God. He returned to Poland, and carried the Prophet thither, who informed him in the way, that he knew by Revelation that a Council would be held of all Christendom, wherein the Pope would be deposed, and a Canon enacted, forbidding all persons hereafter to usurp the title of universal Bishop. Comenius represented to him, that he had not read that article in the manuscript, to which Kotterus made the following answer, I have not been ordered to write it, but I nevertheless heard it. Being returned from Poland, Comenius left Kotterus, and went to Berlin, where he found that, even among the refugees of Bohemia and Moravia, a very different judgment was formed of this man; some considering him as a true Prophet, and especially when the post brought advice, that the King of Denmark was raising a body of troops; others declared that Kotterus was a knave, who having spent his all, and not knowing which way to turn himself, had set up for a Prophet. Alii rursus ex iisdem meis scabiosissima de Cottero effutiebant: belluonem, rei sue decoctorem, desperationeque ad prophetandum adactum dilittantes, miraque de prophetiis ipsius mendacia inter se spargentes, mibique referentes (11). This gave Comenius some uneasiness; but Christopher Pellargus, Superintendent General of the Churches of Brandenburg, who had examined Kotterus by the Elector's order, made him easy, by saying, that he ought not to question the truth of this man's extraordinary mission, nor repent his having translated his Revelations into the Bohemian Language. Vides hanc Bibliothecam meam (instructissimam habebat, celeberrimus ob eam totam per Germaniam, quo me secretius hoc colloquium expetentem introduxerat) omnes Auctores, antiquos & recentes consului, ut quid de questione illa, Utrum post Christum & Apostolos, obfignatumque Novi fœderis Canonem, ulla novæ admittenda sint, divi-

(9) Comenius, in Epit. Revelat. Append. 3. pag. 209.

(10) His name was Abraham Menclius.

(11) Comenius, Hist. Revelat. pag. 21.

these things related to presages of felicity with respect to the Elector Palatine, and unhappiness for his Imperial Majesty; it so fell out that David Wachsman, the Emperor's Fiscal or Exchequer Attorney in Silesia and Lusatia, set every engine at work to seize Kotterus, whom he looked upon as a seditious impostor. Accordingly Kotterus fell into his hands the second of January 1627. He was examined, was thrown into a dungeon, and the sentence of the Chamber of Appeals was waited for from Prague. The Fiscal Attorney received it the 28th of April, but happening to die a little after, the purport of it was not known. Kotterus was taken out of the dungeon, and his wife and friends were allowed to visit him; but he at last was set on the pillory [D], and banished the Emperor's dominions, not to return upon pain of death. Upon this he went to Lusatia, at that time subject to his Electoral Highness of Saxony, and lived there unmolested till his death, which happened in 1647 (c). It is by an error of the press that he is said, in Moreri's Dictionary, to have lived fourscore and twelve years [E]. Comenius is inexcusable for printing such prophecies [F]. He had seen part of them evidently na vel Angelicæ, revelationes sentiendum sit cognoscere? sed nemo me scrupulis liberare potuit. Ego igitur ad preces conversus, ardentissime invocabam Deum (sepe etiam noctu surgens & me in faciem provolvens) ut ne pateretur illudi Ecclesie suæ orans. Post omnia vero tandem pensata divinitusque suggesta, non aliud habeo quod dicam, nisi DEUM MISISSE ANGELUM SUUM, qui nuntiaret nobis servis ea, quæ oportet fieri cito: quæ sunt Angeli verba Apoc. 22, 6. (12).

(c) Extracted from the Abridgment of his Revelations, Append. 3. and of Historia Revelatio-num, pag. 21, 22.

(12) Comenii, Hist. Revel. pag. 21.

The translation in question was not kept secret as the author says he desired; but was shewn to persons who would keep a copy of it by them, by which means the copies multiplied prodigiously in Bohemia; a circumstance which however we need not wonder at, as it promised King Frederick an hundred triumphs. Some time after it was printed, in the Bohemian tongue, at Perna in Misnia, with encomiums and marginal notes. However all the Ministers were not caught in this trap. Two of them, with some of the Elders of their Church, blamed the copying of the book in question. The interest of the true faith, and the danger to which they exposed themselves, were the two causes or motives which prompted them to vote for the suppression of those chimæra's, as being either a meer invention, or the wild dreams of an enthusiast.

Scriptum illud (sive id ab aliquo ingenio confictum, sive ab ipso fanatico homine conscriptum esset) suppressi petierunt. Duplex enim subesse periculum: & Conscientiarum, si se homines a certo Dei Verbo ad incerta id genus figmenta abduci paterentur: & Corporis atque vitæ, si hæc in adversariorum veniant manus (13).

(13) Ibid. pag. 23.

In 1626, the Electress Juliana, mother of King Frederic, having informed a Moravian Nobleman of high distinction, who as well as herself was at that time a refugee in Berlin, that she had received a letter from the King her son, to enquire whether it was possible to get a manuscript copy of the prophecies of the Silesian; the Nobleman abovementioned procured a copy of them; and not being able to present it himself, because he was sick, he employed Comenius, at that time in Berlin, to do it. Comenius, instead of delivering it to the Electress, went directly to the King, who was at the Hague, where being admitted to audience, he made a speech to him; and told him, among other particulars, that since his Majesty and his children were the principal characters in that divine Drama, the persons possessed of it would have thought themselves guilty of an absurdity, had they not communicated it to his Majesty. Cujus (Cotteri) omnia cum sint in scriptum relata, ibidemque Majestas Vestra, cum Progenie suâ, tanquam primaria in hac Dei Comædia introducitur Persona: absurdum visum est illis, qui ea suis ba'tenus custodierunt manibus, ad notitiam Majestatis vestræ hæc non deduci. Non quidem ut Majestati Vestræ ista præcisè credendi imponatur necessitas, sed, Primùm, ut hæc apud Majestatem vestram tanquam in archivo sacro afferrentur, in futurum testimonium: nè; si demùm post completa prædicta hæc palam fiant, ex eventu sic esse collecta, suspicari quis, aut calumniari possit. Deinde, ut occasio sit attendendi, num fortè divina providentia tales in eventus res disponat. (Nam si de imminente rerum mutatione Politicos discursus, vel Astrologicas prædictiones, aut similes Prudentiorum conjecturas, cognoscere non aspernamur, cur hæc ab aliori venientia principio aspernari libeat?) Curarunt itaque ex autentico describi exemplar, quod Majestati vestræ per me humili cum observantia exhibent: simulque exhibui (14).

(14) Ibid. pag. 26.

This is not meant, adds he, to impose on your Majesty the necessity of believing these things; but only to desire you to keep them in your archives; in order that if they are confirmed by the event, no one may have room to object, that those predictions were made after the event; and that you likewise may have an occasion to observe from thence, whether providence prepares the way to those great revolutions.

The mystery lies here; they would have Princes who are capable of executing a design, and interested in the execution of it, form such a design, in hopes of succeeding in it. This is very frequently the first spring or motive of our Prophets and Apocalyptic Commentators, and of those who favour and support them. But to resume the thread of our History.

Comenius was graciously received and dismissed by King Frederic, and went to Bohemia, whither Kotterus went also in October 1626, and was in conference with some Ministers and Gentlemen (15).

The following passage does not appear to me accurate. Quam turpiter vero in horum (Cotteri & Drabicii) & Christianæ Pontatoviæ virginis Bohemæ conatibus, qui ejusdem omnino farinae erant, juvandis modo dictus Comenius se dederit, è Voetii Dissp. part. 2. p. 1080 (16).

i. e. "How scandalously the said Comenius assisted the endeavours of Kotterus, Drabicius, and Christina Pontatovia, a Bohemian maiden, who were all of the same stamp, is manifest from Voetius. Dissp. part. 2. pag. 1080." Thus speaks Hartnac, in his new edition of Micrælius's Ecclesiastical History. He had just before condemned the pretended Prophecies of Kotterus, and Comenius who published them. He had been saying, that Drabicius's head and hand had been cut off, he having justly deserved that punishment.

Interceptus in illo regno (Hungariæ Drabicius) capite manique amputatis libro quoque cui titulus, Lux in Tenebris, infami loco combusto dignam pœnam luit (17). He adds immediately after, that it appears from pag. 1080, of Tom. II. of Voetius's Disputations, that Comenius committed a most shameful fault in publishing the Revelations of the persons in question. I have consulted this place in Voetius; but there is not so much as one word relating to Comenius, either in page 1080 or the following.

[D] He at last was set on the pillory.] Here follow Comenius's words. Post aliquot adhuc mensium deliberationem ignominia pœna affecerunt tali. Eductum carcere collocarunt ad cippum fori, ferreo adstrictum collari, affixaque supra caput scbedæ, cui inscriptum fuit: Hic est Pseudo-propheta ille, qui prædixit quæ non evenerunt. Hora spatio sic spectaculo relictus, per Liaborem urbe fuit eductus, exiveque patriâ, nec in Cæsaris ditidnes redire sub capitis pœna, jussus (18). i. e. "After delibrating some months, the following punishment was inflicted on him. Being led out of prison, he was set on the pillory with this inscription over his head: This is the false Prophet, who foretold things that never came to pass. Being thus left as a public spectacle during an hour, a Serjeant led him out of the city; and he was commanded upon pain of death to leave his country, and not return into the dominions of his Imperial Majesty."

[E] It is by a typographical error that he is said, in Moreri's Dictionary, to have lived fourscore and twelve years.] He is said to be born in the year 1585, and to have died in 1647: he consequently lived sixty two years, and not ninety two; but Printers often mistake the figures 6 and 9 one for the other.

[F] Comenius is inexcusable for printing such Prophecies.]

(15) Extracted from Historia Revelationum, published by Comenius, in the year 1639, pag. 15, & seq.

(16) Micræli. Hist. Eccles. pag. 1324, edit. 1699.

(17) Idem, ibid. See citation (18) of the article DRABICIUS.

(18) Historia Revelat. pag. 28.

fall in his book; and whereby, as it is said, he discovered the secret of his design.
The

" chief motive, which prompted me to deliver my self in
" so decisive a manner, and with so much confidence
" on the explication of the prophecies. It will be known " to us, most dear brethren, in the manner he shall " then think fit to explain it. If he be mistaken, as " it is natural to believe he will, he will say; I only
" conjectured; but a good cause ought to have been sup" ported as well as possible; it was necessary to animate
" our people by a little hopes. I know that prophecies, e" ven such as are fictitious, are used to produce the like " effect. But if, on the contrary, the present Junc-
" tures, the jealousy of nations, the indignation con" ceived by the Protestant States at seeing their reli" gion attacked, or the disputes of the French with " the Court of Rome, should produce any important
" effect that might give you fresh hopes: I know ve" ry well, would he cry, what I said as early as the " year 1686. An Angel had spoke to me; but had I " revealed this at that time I should have been looked " upon as an impostor: the angel himself had forbid me
" to speak of it. He speaks to me again, and permits
" me to declare this to you. Follow me; we are going " to begin this Kingdom of God of which you doubted,
" and which you nevertheless begged of God every day
" in your prayers." Were it true that Mr. Jurieu is guilty of the imposture laid to his charge, he would have been afraid that the world would not have been able to dive into his secret; and therefore chusing to preserve the reputation of his good sense at the expense of his honesty, he would have let drop some words (38), that might discover the mystery to the clear-sighted.

(38) The two passages, for instance, quoted by Pelisson out of the Accomplissement des Prophecies.

The knaveries, that have been discovered among the petty Prophets of Dauphiné, have given occasion to a very large commentary on the abovesaid passage from Pelisson. We need not read a work entitled, Histoire du Fanaticisme de notre tems &c. i. e. The History of the Enthusiasm of our Age; and the design there was of exciting the malecontents among the Calvinists, in France, to take up arms. It was printed at Paris in the year 1692. Mr. Brucey, author of the tract in question, having collected a great number of passages out of Mr. Jurieu's book, to prove that this Minister set up for a Prophet, adds immediately after: " We nevertheless must not imagine, that this Minister was himself persuaded of the truth of those things of which he wanted to persuade others; he had an artful design in assuming the air and manners of a Prophet; he knew perfectly well that he was not a Prophet; but he was desirous of imposing on the people, in order to excite them to take up arms, and light up a civil war in the heart of this country, in order to favour the inclinations of our enemies. He was so full of this detestable project when he wrote his Book of Prophecies, that he cannot forbear discovering his design to a reader of ever so little penetration. The time in which he wrote it, the motives which prompted him, and the touches that escape from his pen, and on which occasion he has inadvertently let fall some drops of the venom, with which his heart was filled: all these things discover the false Prophet's design (39)." I shall not transcribe the proofs he has given of each of these remarks; and will only mention what he observes with respect to the last. Here, says he (40), is what has escaped him in some part of his book, and which manifestly shews that he had no other view but to excite nations to take up arms.

(39) Brucey, Histoire Fanaticisme, pag. 44.

(40) Ibid. pag. 51.

(a) Tom. 1. Addit. à l'Avant. sec. edit.

" The Prophecies that are inserted in this piece, had at first scandalized the most judicious of his party, which he himself owns in the 2d edition of his book. There are some people, says he (a), who believe that the hopes I give of a restoration in a few years, may be of great prejudice. He first endeavours to shew that this need not be feared, and adds as follows. It is certain, says he, that frequently Prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those for whom they were made, with the design of undertaking those things which were promised them. Could he have declared more expressly the design he had of running the hazard to vent false Prophecies, in order to excite the malecontents of France to make an insurrection; and to fire them with a design of

" attempting to procure themselves, by force of arms, that speedy deliverance which he promised them? Those of his party had not only been scandalized at his presuming to publish Prophecies, but were still more so at his speaking in too affirmative a tone. It is still himself who informs us of this. With regard to the remark, says he (e), which so many people have made, viz. that I speak too confidently of things, which I ought perhaps to have proposed, at most, as weighty conjectures; the world may perhaps one day be informed of the chief reason, which made me speak in so decisive a tone, and so confident an air. What then is that chief reason which he does not dare to mention, and which the world may perhaps be informed of one day? Is he firmly persuaded of the truth of those things which he declares? This is the only motive, that ought to make a man of honour and probity speak with a resolute affirmative tone of voice. But if this be his, why does he not say so? Is he afraid of speaking the truth? Let us urge him no farther on that subject; he is sincerer than we imagine; he himself has already told the chief reason: had he not just before said, It is certain, that frequently Prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those for whom they were made, with the design of undertaking those things which were promised them. This is his chief reason, and we must not look for any other. This false Prophet did not expect that those two passages would one day be joined (41). He had designedly placed them in two separate volumes; but now they are together; and they explain one another so naturally, that a man must be blind not to see, that the reason why Mr. Jurieu speaks in so decisive a manner, and with so confident an air of the approaching deliverance, which he promised the Protestants of France, was, because he is of opinion, that frequently Prophecies, whether fictitious or true, inspire those for whom they are made, with the design of undertaking those things which are promised them."

Brucey seems so fully persuaded of his having discovered the whole mystery, that he repeats this observation more than once; nay he is so malicious as to remind the reader of the artifices of the heathens. I will also quote that passage. " This Minister promised the Calvinists that Popery should have its downfall, and the approaching deliverance of their Church. He promised her those things as from God, by telling them that they were contained in the oracles of the Revelations. It therefore was not possible that those Prophecies could inspire those for whom they were made, with the design of undertaking those things which were promised them; because nothing has a greater ascendancy over the mind of man than religion; and that all things appear lawful to them, when they firmly believe that God is on their side, and that they only execute his orders. Those who know the use which the artful Greeks and Romans made of their Oracles, their Southsayers, their Augurs; and of those Priests whom they called Haruspices, Feciales, Præpotes and Oscines (42), whose employment was to foretell the will of the Gods, whenever any important affair was debated on; some in viewing the entrails of the victims, the harmony, the flight, or various motions of certain birds. Those, I say, who know of what use these things were formerly, are sensible that persons of good sense gave no manner of credit to them; and made no other use of them than to inspire nations and soldiers with the designs which they promised them in the name of their Gods; but which, in the main, was nothing but what they themselves had resolved to do, before they consulted their oracles. Here we have directly the pretended Prophecies of Mr. Jurieu, and his pretended persuasion (43)."

I again repeat, in this place, the protestation I already made, viz. that I do not here set my self up as judge, but only relate what is said by others. I indeed will not conclude this remark without observing, that in all ages and countries, Prophecies have been forged in order to excite people to rebellion. I could cite an hundred examples, but one will be sufficient on this occasion.

(41) Brucey often repeats the consequences he draws from the joining of those two passages. See particularly, pag. 227, 230, 241.

(42) These two names Præpotes & Oscines were not given to Priests, but to Birds that were employed in Divination.

(43) Brucey, Hist. du Fanaticisme, pag. 230, 231.

occasion. The Spaniards who rebelled against Charles V, spread a malicious prophecy, viz. that a Prince named Charles would reign over Castile; a Prince who would destroy and burn the country; but that a son of the King of Portugal would possess himself of Castile, and restore the country to a very flourishing condition. The ringleaders of the sedition caused this Prophecy to be printed, and commanded every one of their partizans to keep a copy of it by them (44).

[J] The things with which he is charged are a little too much exaggerated. If the reader examines carefully the following words of le Brueys, he will find such an artful rhetoric in them as ought justly to be suspected. "It is impossible but Mr. Jurieu's best friends must own, that the sole motive of his publishing his predictions on the Revelations, was, in order to excite the malecontent Calvinists in France to take up arms, in order that the League which was then forming, finding this Kingdom divided against itself, might have the easier opportunity of ruining it entirely; and that the Calvinists might see their Religion re-established on the ruins of their country."

"Let any person now sum up, if this can be done, all the crimes and wicked attempts that are comprized in so execrable a project; the artifices, fictions and impostures made use of, in order to seduce the simple; the profanation of the holy Scriptures and its sacred Oracles; the impieties and blasphemies against the Holy Ghost; the violation of the most sacred Laws of the Christian Religion; the overthrowing the principles of the morality of Jesus Christ; the contempt of the constant practice of the Church, and of the examples of the Martyrs; the forgetfulness of his own maxims; the precepts of rebellion against the powers established by God; the exhortations to Subjects, Christians and Frenchmen to take up arms, and join those who have conspired the ruin of their country; the horrid wishes he prompts them to make for the defeat of our armies; the plundering of this Kingdom; the desolation of our provinces; the burning of our Cities, the effusion of blood, and the murder of their fellow-citizens, friends and relations. In fine, all the inhuman and barbarous actions which a civil and intestine war could have added to the most furious and most bloody foreign war that was ever known."

Tantum Religio potuit suadere malorum.

The sense is,

"Strange, that Religion should persuade such evils!

(44) See among the Golden Epistles of Ansbony de Guevara, that which the Admiral of Castile wrote to the inhabitants of Seville, in 1520. It is the 17th of book 3. What I quote is pag. m. 65.

(45) Brueys, Hist. du Fanaticisme, pag. 241.

(46) This is not the only anachronism in Mr. Brueys's book. We are told here, pag. 17, that Mr. Jurieu, tired with writing controversial pieces and pastoral letters, resolved to take another course, and set up for a prophet. He did not begin his Pastorals till after he had published his Prophecies. Brueys, pag. 14, speaks of a peace concluded in 1682, but he should have said 1684.

(47) Nicole, Préface de l'Unité de l'Eglise, pag. 24.

(48) This book of Mr. Jurieu was printed the same year with his Accomplissement des Prophecies.

"army of a hundred thousand Protestants combined together, to restore the pretended reformed Religion in France? Jurieu might even be accused of high-treason, and looked upon as a seditious person. It is therefore proper to undeceive the world in this particular, and to inform them that this discourse is not grounded on any conspiracy formed against France. . . (49). All that he says here, transiently, in so terrible a manner, is much less dreadful when explained at length by his Accomplissement des Prophecies: for it is there we see that this glorious re establishment of the pretended reformed (the Calvinists) will be brought about without any, or very little effusion of blood (*); or that it shall not even be, either by foreign troops, or by a multitude of Ministers who shall spread themselves over France; but by the effusion of the Spirit of God, which shall reanimate the extended bodies of Enoch and Elias; that is, according to Mr. Jurieu †, of the Protestants who were formerly witnesses to the truth, and who having basely abandoned it are now deprived of life, and stretched out in the great square of the city of Antichrist; that is, over all France, the principal part, according to him, of the Antichristian Empire." There is another particular, in which Mr. Brueys appears to me blame-worthy; he insinuating (50) that Mr. Jurieu is the oracle who was consulted, in order for the setting up of a school (51) where children should be taught inspiration. Here follows the description of that infamous school: Could any one believe this who had not seen it? It was then that a school was first opened, in which the art of Prophecy was taught; where people went to learn to foretel things to come; and where, after having pass'd through the necessary trials, they imagined they received the Holy Ghost from the impure mouth of a sacrilegious master, who pretended to breathe it with a kiss into the mouths of those wretched pupils (52). This is a design of so horrid a nature, that it ought never to be declared, nor even so much as insinuated without strong proofs, that a Minister was so wicked as to suggest the plan of it. Brueys has given too much extent to the consequences he draws from Mr. Jurieu's prodigious care to save the honour of the petty prophets (53). "He could never be prevailed upon to revoke the particulars he had published at first concerning this prophet's (54); and he entertained it with so much obstinacy in all his letters, that even after Heaven had recovered the maiden in question from her errors, and she was become a true and pious catholic, and had owned to her Judges in what manner du Serre had seduced her; still this Minister persisted in what he had advanced; was constant to his shepherds notwithstanding her infidelity; and had even the impudence to say, speaking of her and of the other sleeping petty prophets, that they might be become knaves, but that they nevertheles had been prophets . . . (55): This Minister declared himself publickly in favour of the petty prophets, in spite of all that the honest men of his party could say to him; and maintained that they were really inspired, with an invincible but affected obstinacy, as I before observed; because he had his views, and would appoint successors to himself in prophecy, as he had already appointed forerunners. . . (56). Can we (57) wonder after this, that Mr. Jurieu could not prevail with himself to abandon a sect of people, who had improved so well by his lessons; and that like a fond father, who is blind to the faults of his Children, he would never own the folly of those to whom he had given birth?" The consequences which are drawn from thence are not very just; for how many things are there, which men persist obstinately in maintaining, when they find them already done or formed, without knowing the whole guilt that was in their formation; which they would never advise to produce or form after a criminal manner, in case they were to be formed or produced? In this manner charity prompts us to extenuate, as much as possible, our neighbours faults, and to suspend our own judgments, notwithstanding the strongest probabilities, in case they do not amount to a good proof.

The reader will have a still better idea of Mr. Brueys's rashness, if he observes that Mr. Brueys, not contented with insinuating his accusation, proposed it in clear

(49) Nicole, Préface de l'Unité de l'Eglise, pag. 25.

(*) Accomplissement des Prophecies, pag. 206, 207. See Accomplissement des Prophecies, Part 2, pag. 188, 189, 206, 222.

† Mr. Jurieu, Part 2, pag. 175.

(50) Brueys, Hist. du Fanaticisme, pag. 79.

(51) In a glass-house situated on a mountain of Dauphiné called de Peyra. Brueys, ibid. pag. 76, 77.

(52) Ibid. pag. 75, 76.

(53) Ibid. pag. 98.

(54) That is, the shepherds of Cret.

(55) Brueys, Hist. du Fanaticisme, pag. 106.

(56) Mr. Brueys, pag. 39, had said, that Mr. Jurieu, like a great Prophet, would have forerunners, viz. Kotterus, Christina Pontatovia and Drabicius.

(57) Brueys, Hist. du Fanaticisme, pag. 145.

evidently convicted of falsity by the event ; and since his death, they have been more and more refuted by the course of affairs in Europe. The Turks who, according to Kotterus, were to ruin the House of Austria, have restored it to its former glory by their continual cies.] Heaven forbid that I should pronounce judgment, with regard to my neighbour's thoughts. Those mysteries belong only to God ; but on some occasions men may give their judgment on appearances ; much more may I be allowed to relate, historically, the judgment of others with regard to Comenius's conduct. Whilst he resided in Prussia, some debates were made concerning him in the Courts of some Princes ; and it was given as a case of conscience, to examine, whether he would not deserve the punishment enacted by the Law of God against false Prophets. He has been suspected to have been Counsellor and Secretary to those who meditated an inroad into Bohemia ; and which would have been put in execution, had the English (19) furnished them the succours desired. He, and those of his character were looked upon as the abettors of the war which Ragotzki and the Princes Radzivil undertook against Poland. The object that was set before their eyes, in order to excite them to take up arms, was the delivery of the Church from Papal tyranny. I relate nothing here but what I have good authority for, Arnoldus writing as follows to Comenius. Prævaricatio illa, quam dicis, tanti tamen non fuit, ut super ea in aula Principum deliberaretur, casus conscientie formati viris doctis decidendi mitterentur, an sim falsus Propheta, & consequenter, an in me pena divinitus in falsos Prophetas statuta animadvertendum non esset, quod de te in Borussia cum adhuc morarer perscriptum memini, & forte autographum illarum literum adhuc possideo. Tanti, inquam, non fuit illa prævaricatio, ut propter eam ἀδελφότητιν audirem, ac desertâ statione mea Professoria, Magnatibus pro stabello in concitandis motibus bellicis essem, uti de te rumor est, qui à manu & consiliis intimis fuisse illis diceris, qui in Bohemiam irruptionem ante annos moliebantur, si modo annuissent illorum votis Angli sollicitati. Ego id non dico, quanquam stilus literarum tuo non sit absimilis. Jam per rumores in Borussia (uti, nisi me omnino fallat memoria, illinc ad te perscripti,) audiveram, Principes Radzivilios & Rakocium à vobis fuisse inductos, qui arma contra Polonos capefferent, spe liberandæ Ecclesiæ à tyrannide Pontificia, cujus rei baud exigua passim in volumine illo triumphant argumenta. Ego tamen non defixio (20). i. e. " Nevertheless the prevarication you mention, was not so great, as to occasion deliberation about it in the Courts of Princes ; and for cases of conscience to be drawn up, and sent to learned men, in order that they should give the decision of them whether I am a false Prophet ; and in consequence thereof, whether the punishment which Heaven inflicts on false Prophets ought not to be inflicted on me ; which I remember was writ with regard to you, at the time that I resided in Prussia ; and I happen still to have the copy of those letters by me. I say, that that prevarication was not so great, as to get me the name of meddling fellow, who, abandoning my Professorship, am as an incendiary in stirring up the great to engage in war ; as is reported concerning you, who are declared to have been the principal fomenter of those, who intended, in case the English had succoured them, as was desired, to have made an inroad into Bohemia some years since. However, I don't pretend to affirm this, although the style of the letters is not unlike yours. I before had heard it reported in Prussia, (which I informed you of by letter from thence, if my memory fails me not) that the Princes Radzivil and Ragotzki, had been excited by you, in order that they should take up arms against the Poles, in hopes of freeing the Church from Popish tyranny, whereof many strong arguments or proofs, in many places, appear in that three-one volume. Nevertheless, I don't determine any thing." I don't wonder that Comenius should have been suspected of carrying on political machinations and intrigues of war ; for a Divine who travels so much as he, and has business so often in the Courts of Princes, is a man who is not to be very much trusted. The Electress, mother to King Frederic, asks whether a collection of Kotterus's Prophecies can be procured ; the person to whom she makes the application gets a copy transcribed ;

and not having an opportunity of presenting it, he desires Comenius to do it. The last mentioned, who is at Berlin, and could, in a quarter of an hour's time, present it to the Electress, chuses rather to come to the Hague, in order to give it into King Frederic's own hand, and harangue him on the contents of the book in question, which would, at least, said he, make him attentive to the occurrences (21). These persons foretel the things they desire should be attempted ; and after this they set every engine at work, in order to engage all such in the enterprize as they think fit for it. It is very probable, that the great application with which Comenius laboured at the reunion of the Protestants (22), proceeded from a desire he had to form a powerful party, which might fulfill the Prophecies with temporal weapons. Another circumstance did Comenius an injury : he was a man of parts and learning ; he argued very sensibly on other matters, and in these like a man of wit ; and there was nothing in his person that appeared like an enthusiast. This made people conclude that he did not believe the things he uttered. There may be, and there sometimes is, imposture in extatic grimaces ; but those who boast their being inspired, without shewing by their countenance or expressions that their brain is disordered, and without ever doing any action that is out of nature, ought to be infinitely more suspected of fraud, than those who, from time to time, fall into strong fits, as the Sybils did more or less.

*Deus, ecce, Deus: cui talia fanti,
Ante fores subito non vultus, non color unus,
Non comæ mansere comæ: sed pectus anhelum,
Et rabie fera corda tument: majorque videri,
Nec mortale sonans, adflatæ est numine quando
Jam propiore Dei (23).*

*At Phœbi nondum patiens immanis in antro
Bacchatur vates, magnum si pectore possit
Excussisse deum. tanto magis ille fatigat
Os rabidum, fera corda domans, figitque premendo (24).*

" He comes, behold the God, thus while she said,
" And shiv'ring at the sacred entry staid,
" Her colour chang'd, her face was not the same,
" And hollow groans from her deep spirit came.
" Her hair stood up ; convulsive rage possess'd
" Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her lab'ring
" breast.
" Greater than human kind she seem'd to look,
" And with an accent, more than mortal, spoke.
" Her staring eyes with sparkling fury roll ;
" When all the God came rushing on her foul.

DRYDEN.

" Struggling in vain, impatient of her load,
" And lab'ring underneath the pond'rous God,
" The more she strove to shake him from her breast,
" With more, and far superior force he press'd ;
" Commands his entrance, and without controul,
" Usurps her organs, and inspires her soul."

DRYDEN.

I am willing to have it thought, that Comenius did not harbour any sinister design. But what shall we say against those who censure him for publishing Kotterus's Prophecies, as inspired by heaven, even when the event had proved the falsity of them (25) ? I will own that this appears to me quite inexcusable. And with regard to Drabicius, could any one imagine that he was inspired by heaven ? Had heaven inspired him, he would have been strongly desirous that Prince Ragotzki should destroy the House of Austria, and have known that heaven designed him for that mighty work. But had heaven been strongly inclined to this, would he not have inspired that Prince with a desire of engaging in war against the Emperor, or at least with some little credulity in favour of Drabicius ? Here follows a circumstance, that shews the obstinacy of Comenius. His son-in-law (26) desired Arnoldus, Professor of Divinity in Franeker, to favour his father-in-law with

(21) See about the middle of the remark [C] above.
(22) He owns, in his book de Uno necessario, that one of the three labyrinths in which he was bewildered was, the Pseudo-irreducum, sine varietate proxie profusque exitio circa fidem desidentes Christianam reconciliandi desiderium. See Spinoza, in infelicis Literato, pag. 1025.
(23) Virg. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 46.
(24) Ibid. ver. 77.
(25) It was proved to him, by his own words, that he himself looked upon some of Drabicius's Predictions as false ; that, for instance, which declared that Comenius should be present in Preshburg at the coronation of the King of Hungary. Arnoldus, in Discursu Theologico contra Comenium, pag. 42.
(26) His name was Figulus.

(19) It was in Cromwell's time. See the article COMENIUS, remark [G], num. 6.

(20) Arnoldus, Discursu Theologico contra Comenium, pag. 10.

continual losses [G]. Kotterus has been greatly suspected of having a design to stir up wars. The same suspicions are entertained of a Minister, whose prophecies are more recent [H]. An advantage has been taken of some words which he had let fall his good advice, he seeming to hesitate about the printing of the three Prophecies. Arnoldus advised him not to print them (27); his son-in-law did the same (28), and enforced his opinion with very strong reasons. But how should Comenius follow the advice of two persons, since he had paid no deference to the decree of the Polish Churches, which, after having examined the pretended Revelations of Kotterus and Christina Poniatovia, sentenced them to be for ever suppressed? Cotterianæ & Poniatovianæ visiones ut vane ad silentium & tenebras fuerunt ab illis condemnatæ (29).

(27) In Dissertu Theologico, pag. 5.

(28) Ibid. pag. 56.

(29) Arnold. ibid. pag. 28.

[G] The Turks who, according to Kotterus, were to ruin the house of Austria, have restored it to its former glory by their continual losses. See, on this occasion, the indecent insults of the author of the advice to the Refugees. It is certain, says he (30), that the glory and felicity of his imperial Majesty in this war against the Turks are wonderful; and that God, to the eternal confusion of the prophecies of your DRABICIUS, has given greater success to the Prince than to the Emperor Charles V. That false prophet, more eager at cursing than Balaam, who, even when a neighbouring Monarch importuned him with mighty promises, would do nothing rashly, pronounced against the house of Austria, during several years, the most dreadful curses that came into his head; and had devoted it, as it were, to the furies and infernal Gods, Diris & numinibus infernis, because it had persecuted their religion. But the event has shewn that he did not understand the trade, and that he was not very expert at cursing. No man ever less deserved the elogium which was bestowed on Balaam, he whom thou blestest shall be blessed, and he whom thou cursest shall be cursed; and if all your prophetic imprecations are like those of Drabicius, people will be extremely solicitous hereafter to be cursed by you; and you will be sought for with greater importunity to utter them, than the King of the Moabites employed, to make the false prophet Balaam curse his enemies. Since the printing of the advice to the Refugees, the success of the Emperor's arms has been interrupted sometimes (31); but this has been but a short respite for the Turk; their ill fortune soon displaying itself with its utmost fury. This fortune had like to have crushed them last year (32): She made them feel every where her indignation, in Dalmatia, Hungary, Poland and the Archipelago; and, if our Gazettes are to be credited, they lost two naval battles in a very short space of time, last winter; thus the victors have not thought proper to pursue their victory, but rather to abandon the island of Chios. The new Sultan raises in some measure the hopes of the Port. They apply to him what Florus said of Trajan, viz. that the empire, which was almost ruined by the indolence of former Emperors, was reviving, and flourishing under Trajan. Quibus inertia Cæsaris quasi consensit atque decoxit, nisi quod sub Traiano Principe movent lacertos, & præter spem omnium senectus imperii, quasi reddita juventute, revirescit (33); but we do not find hitherto, according to the relations of our Gazetters, that he has been very successful. With regard to Tekely, who, during the siege of Vienna, was exhibited to us as Drabicius's chief Hero, we have lately been told in our news papers, that the Turks, quite weary with the continual malignity of his star, have imprisoned him in the seven Towers.

This I wrote in October 1695. at a time when we saw a kind of suspension of the great and glorious fortune of the imperial arms in Hungary. The Paris Gazettes daily magnified the victory which the Sultan had lately gained, whilst the other News Papers were perpetually lessening it. It was not yet known according to those news-writers, to which party the consequences of this battle would be favourable. The progress of the Turks would have confirmed the accounts given by the Paris news-writers, and refuted those of Holland and Germany. But the Turks made no progress at all; they retiring a little after into their own territories, without achieving one action that shewed them to be conquerors, whereby the contest was ended to the confusion of the Paris news-writers. His imperial Majesty's arms triumphed afterwards, (31) For instance, when the Turks recovered Belgrade in 1690.

(32) I write this in October 1695, when our Gazetters have already told us, that the Imperialists have sustained a very considerable loss, in the battle of Lugos.

(33) Florus in Proemio, Exr.

and chiefly in 1697, when the Turks sustained so complete, so shameful and prejudicial a victory, that the like can hardly be found in their annals. The Sultan, who was there in person, received so signal an overthrow on this occasion, that he thought of nothing but peace; and accepted it in the following year on any conditions which the victors were pleased to prescribe; conditions exceedingly glorious and advantageous to his imperial Majesty. No false prophets ever met with such cruel affronts, as those which the prophecies published by Comenius received by this signal treaty of peace. The Emperor, whom they so highly menaced, mortified, humbled, and trod under foot the haughtiness of the Turks, to whom they had promised so many conquests over the house of Austria. He added the splendor of an advantageous peace to the glory which had accompanied his arms; and which had made him triumphant, as well by the reduction of the stoutest places, as by the gaining of several battles. All things are at his disposal in Transylvania; he has made a kingdom (34), which was always elective, hereditary; and he formerly possessed but a little part of it, but is now master of the whole. What shall we say of the advantages and glory he gained by the treaty of Ryfwick; by the recovery of so many countries which had been taken from the Empire, or his allies; and by the reunion of Friburg and Brisac to the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria? If the Prince in question is happy abroad, he is no less so at home; fecundity, marriages &c. give prosperity to his family. His second son is to inherit almost the whole monarchy of Spain, by such stipulations as France it self has consented to fix (35). Take warning by these confusions of Comenius's false prophets, all you who had presumed to menace, with the book of revelations, all those who are not agreeable to you.

[H] The same suspicions are entertained of a Minister, whose Prophecies are more recent. What I have said of Comenius, I apply to a famous divine of Rotterdam, who has explained the scripture prophecies, with an extreme bold pretence of his being inspired.

I do not take upon me to judge of his heart, and will allow it to be supposed, that he did not act against his conscience; but no one ought to be offended with my declaring, that he has been suspected to harbour no other design than that of exciting people to take up arms, and to set all Europe in a flame. The foundation of their belief is this, viz. his not shewing any signs of confusion, after that the event had given the lie to his prophecies, in such a manner as was quite indisputable. He entertained, say these people, so high an opinion of his own genius and knowledge, that he would have been seized with the deepest grief and fallen into a state of the lowest humiliation, by so flagrant a proof of illusion and ignorance as his would be; but being inwardly convinced that he was not mistaken or deceived, he has retained all the same good opinion he had before entertained of his understanding; and so the ill success of a prophecy, which, with respect to him, was no more than a juggler's trick, has not humbled him in any manner. They build likewise on this, viz. that after the example of Comenius, he has attempted to reunite the Lutherans and Calvinists (36); in hopes, as 'tis said, of increasing the number of the troops to attack Antichrist.

Once again, I am willing that this should be considered only as a faithful relation of what many think and say. Let us go farther, and see what one of his adversaries has published (37). "A man must be stupid not to see through so gross an artifice, particularly when he himself seems to give you notice of it; and leaves here and there in his work, some traces as it were, by which he may discover his secret to you hereafter, and secure himself from your reproaches. It is certain, says he in one place, (*) that frequently () in the second prophesies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired edit. of l'Accomplissement des prophesies, a Rotterdam, 1686, chap. 15.

Persons of good sense need no more than this, in order to make them understand his intention, and see into his views. And in another place; The world may perhaps be one day informed of the chief

(34) That of Hungary.
(35) I write this in June 1700, at a time when the News-writers mention a treaty of Partition of the Spanish Monarchy, agreed upon by France, England, and the States-General.

(36) See Mr. De Meaux, Addition à l'Histoire des Variations.

(37) Pellisson, Cibiners de M. Jurieu, Part 4. pag. 184, 185. Dutch edit.

The things with which he is charged are a little too much exaggerated [I]; of which my readers may form a judgment, by examining the passages I have cited. The author of the Thoughts upon Comets asserted, that Drabicius's prophecies met with little credit [K].

(58) Pag. 73.

and affirmative terms, not only against Mr. Jurieu the minister, but likewise against several others. The most factious among the fugitive (refugee) Ministers, says he, (58) who burnt with impatience to revisit what they had left in France, considering that the stratagem which Mr. Jurieu had hit upon might promote their affairs; hearing how greedily the malcontents of that Kingdom received prophecies, which assured them of an approaching deliverance, and being persuaded that there was no better way to prompt them to rebel; imagined that they ought not to let slip so fine an opportunity of lighting up, in the heart of the country, that civil war which was to give it its mortal wound, in hopes of seeing their religion rise up again on the ruins of a monarchy which they imagined was near its destruction. And yet these were the very Ministers who, at first, had cried aloud against his prophecies; threatened to complain of them, and were offended at his speaking in too affirmative a tone of voice: but the false prophet having whispered his secret to them, and given them to understand, that frequently prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those for whom they were made with the decision of undertaking those things which were promised them; and having told them in the ear, that principal and secret reason they were to know one day, and which had prompted him to speak with so confident an air; they were soon agreed; his stratagem was approved in their secret council, and a resolution was taken to prophesy, in order to excite people to take up arms. Two things may be criticized here; for, in the first place, no proof can be given that the French ministers were concerned in the horrid combination of those seducers, who taught young children to pretend to inspiration; and 2dly, it is false to assert that the French Ministers had cried aloud against Mr. Jurieu's prophecies, and threatened to complain of them. Mr. Brueys alleges that false supposition an hundred times (59), though he has cited, page 216, a passage which might very easily have undeceived him. The passage is as follows. "The other thing they are offended at (these are Mr. Jurieu's words) relates to the MILLENIUM. Several Divines of this country have murmured aloud, and even threatened to complain of it." It is manifest that these loud murmurs and these threats to complain, came from the Flemish Divines, and not from the French Ministers; and did not relate to the promises of an approaching deliverance &c. But the Millemium, a doctrine that is extremely odious to the Churches of Holland; and for which Mr. Jurieu would have been brought into trouble, had he not been favoured with human supports. But notwithstanding these supports, complaints were made against him in the Walloon Synod, the members whereof inserted a few words in an act or instrument, of which we may say what cardinal d'Offat said of those strokes of the switch, which the proxies of Henry IV received (60).

(59) See pag. 30, 219, 220, 223.

[K] The author of Thoughts upon Comets asserted, that Drabicius's prophecies met with little credit. He has been more equitable than the writer cited in the remark [G], and acknowledged that the Protestants had little esteem for Drabicius. "The protestants themselves," says he, (61), are not very strongly persuaded that "Drabicius was a prophet. Some indeed fancy that he was an enthusiast, whose brain had been turned by his reading the commentaries on the prophecies of the old testament, and those of the revelations; that after he had filled his imagination with these ideas he looked upon the emperors of Germany as so many Pharoos, Sennacheribs, Nebuchadnezzars, and emissaries of the great whore, drunk with the wine of the wrath of her whoredom; and that he at last was persuaded, that God appointed him to command several princes to extirpate those persecutors. Those who had suffered these persecutions, and imagined that divine providence would one day punish the authors of so barbarous a conduct, in all probability gave credit to Drabicius's visions. Nevertheless, most of them paid little regard to them; especially after finding that he was deluded, and contradicted himself pretty often in a very visible manner; in a manner that cannot be excused but by having recourse to a great number of glosses, which make unbelievers laugh more than the sincere confession of that man's errors would; for, by the help of such glosses, which are multiplied as occasion serves, there is no false prophet but may find an apology."

(60) We felt them no more than if a fly had gone over our clothes. See the article of HENRY IV, citation (41).

(61) Pag. 785.

KRANTZ or KRANTZIUS (ALBERTUS) a famous Historian, and native of Hamburg [A], had no sooner gone through his classical learning in his own country, but he set out upon his travels. He visited the principal parts of Europe; and so studiously cultivated the Sciences in his travels, that he became a very able man. He was Doctor of Divinity, and of the Canon Law, and Professor of Philosophy and Divinity in the University of Rostoch; and was Rector there in 1482 (a). Those who affirm that he was a Canon of Naumburg are mistaken [B]. He went from Rostoch to Hamburg, and was made a Canon in the Cathedral of that City. He did not enjoy, in an indolent manner, like so many of his brethren, this preferment, to which he had been raised; but spent his time in preaching, and reading theological Lectures. He was elected Dean of the Chapter of 1508, and went through the visitation of his diocese, with the frame of mind of a man, who was desirous of reforming such disorders as he should find in it. He did the same in 1514. He did many good Services to the city of

(a) Chytr. Part 1. Chronici Saxonici, pag. 496; and Petr. Lindebergius, lib 5. Chron. Reflect. cap. 11. apud Mollerum, Hist. ad Hist. Cbronici Cimbrici Part. 1. pag. 95, & seq.

(1) De Scriptor. Ecclesiast. (2) In Patrolog. pag. 673. apud Mollerum, Hist. ad Hist. Cbronici Cimbrici, Part. 1. pag. 95. (3) In Teatro Hist. (4) De Johanne Papista. (5) Hist. Eccles. tom. 4. pag. 148. (†) In Dissert. de morte Henrici VII. pag. 71. (6) Mollerus, Hist. ad Hist. Cbronici Cimbrici, Part. 1. pag. 95.

[A] A native of Hamburg. And not of Bamberg as Bellarmine, (1), John Gerard (2), Christian Matthias (3), David Blondel (4), and Hottinger (5), affirm. This is out of all doubt, though a modern author has affected to be in suspense on this occasion. Res in ap- plico est posita, ac proinde risu digna iuxta Mart. Disenbachii (†) nupera, qui litem de loco ejus natali sovere quam decidere putavit consultus. i. e. "The thing is evident; and therefore Martin Disenbachius's doubt, who imagined it to be more adviseable to keep up the dispute with respect to the place where he was born, than to fix and determine it, is trifling and ridiculous."

[B] Those who affirm that he was a canon of Naumburg are mistaken. This is affirmed by two very learned authors; but Sperlingius, who is writing the life of Albert Krantz, will shew that they are mistaken. Sunt qui in Collegio etiam Canonicorum Numburgensium aliquamdiu vixisse, ac Diaconi partes obisse perhibent, & hos inter Duumviri celeberrimi, Henr. Meibomius Jun. (†) ac Conr. Schwartzfleischius (‡). Sed falsi eos, ac Krantzium Numburgum forte nunquam vidisse, satis sibi esse exploratum, Dn. Sperlingius nobis significavit, in ipsa Krantzii Biographia prelixius sententiam hanc impugnavit (7). i. e. "It is related by some, that he resided some time in the college of the canons of Naumburg, and officiated in quality of Dean; and among these are two celebrated men, Henry Meibomius the younger, and Conrard Schwartzfleisch. But I have been told by Sperlingius, that he is certain they are mistaken; that, Krantzius possibly never saw Naumburg; and that he will relate this opinion in a more ample manner, in Krantzius's Life."

(†) In Introduct. ad Hist. Saxa. infer. pag. 72.

(‡) In Diss. de Rebus Meclenburgicis, §. 17.

(7) Mollerus, Hist. ad Hist. Cbronici Cimbrici, Part. 1. pag. 96.

(b) Extra-from Mollerus,
Istogoge ad Hist.
Cberjon. Cimbricæ,
Part. 1. pag.
95, & seq.

of Hamburg [C], and other Hanse-towns; and was so famed for his abilities and prudence, that the King of Denmark himself appointed him arbitrator in a considerable contest [D]. He died the 7th of December 1517 [E], having been very sensible that the Church stood in great need of being reformed (b) [F]. Several good books of his are extant;

[C] He did many good services to the city of Hamburg. One could not deny, upon pretence that this city began but in 1546 to have ordinary Syndics, what is inserted in the Danish remonstrance in answer to the apology of the Hamburgers in the year 1642, viz. that Albert Krantz was Syndic of Hamburg; for that title, in his time, was given to those persons, who were deputed by the city on some particular affair. Now it is certain that Albert Krantz was sent upon two or three deputations. He was present, in the name of the Hanse towns at the assembly of Wismar, in the year 1489 (8); he went into France in the year 1497 to sue for a truce; and to England in the year 1499, to desire some privileges against pirates (9). These particulars we are told by Mollerus in the above-cited work. His proofs are inserted in the margin.

[D] The King of Denmark himself appointed him arbitrator in a considerable contest. It was in 1500. Read what follows (10). Quantam vero, in reliqua etiam Cimbrica, Prudentia & integritate singulari sibi conciliarit auctoritatem, vel inde perspicias, quod A. 1500, Johannes, Rex Daniæ, & Fridericus, Dux Holstatiæ, Arbitri ipsi Honorarii Partes, in Controversiis, quæ cum Dithmaris sibi intercedebant, decidendis, deferre non dubitaverint (*). i. e. "The great esteem which his prudence and integrity procured him in the rest of that country, is evident from this, viz. that in the year 1500, John, King of Denmark, and Frederic, Duke of Holstein, did not scruple to make him umpire, in a contest they had with the Dithmars."

[E] He died the 7th of December 1517. This we find by his epitaph; so that it is an error, to say with the continuators of Gesner and Theodore Zwinger, that he flourished in the year 1520. Mollerus ought not to have looked upon this as an error in Gesner (11). Father Fournier the Jesuit, and John Andrew Bosius have made a much greater mistake. The Jesuit says that he died in 1569 (12), and the other in 1570 (13). But these errors would be inconsiderable in comparison of those of a famous Professor in Oxford (14), in case he took Albert Krantz to be the same with Albert the Great, Bishop of Ratisbon. But Mollerus who had charged him with it has found his mistake, and acquits him entirely of that error. No one had taken notice of it to him; he himself discovered the error, and owns it publicly like a man of honour. See page 738, 739 of his treatise De Scripturibus homonymis.

[F] . . . Having been sensible, that the Church stood in great need of being reformed. He perceived the necessity of this as well with respect to doctrine as morals, if we may credit Melchior Adam. "Animadvertitis in doctrinâ ejus temporis multum fuisse errorum superstitionum; & mores Canonorum ac Monachorum ætate reprehendit; eosque in ordinem redigere conatus est. Sed cum id frustra se tentare videret, quod perveritas illorum hominum munita esset auctoritate Pontificis, dixisse fertur; nunquam posse eos reduci ad meliorem frugem, nisi prius à viris doctis expugnata arce. Interrogatus cur sese ipse non opponeret tam crassis erroribus, respondit: se neque eruditione neque ætate parem esse tantis negotiis (15)." i. e. "He saw that there were, in the doctrine of the age in which he lived, many errors and superstitions; and he inveighed very sharply against the morals of the Canons and Friars, and used his endeavours to reform them. But perceiving that this was a vain effort, because the perverse conduct of that set of men was defended by the Papal authority, we are told that he declared, that it would be impossible for them to be made to conduct themselves better till their fortress should be taken by learned men. And it being asked, why he himself did not oppose those gross errors, he answered that he had not learning enough, and was too far advanced in years for to great an undertaking." A circumstance that recalls to my memory Telestinus in Velleius Paterculus. This Telestinus was General of the Samnites, and a very brave warrior. He bore a mortal hatred to the Romans, and advanced near Rome with an army of forty thousand men, firmly determined to finish his exploit at once; and to effect this he was perpetually encouraging his soldiers with the following words. It will be absolutely necessary for us to destroy this city; for there never will be wanting a set of wolves, those ravishers of the liberties of Italy, so long as the forest wherein they shelter themselves shall be standing. Paterculus's Latin deserves to be transcribed here. Circumvolans ordines exercitus sui Telestinus, ditiansque adesse Romanis ultimum diem, vociferabatur eruendam delendamque urbem, adjiciens nunquam defuturos raptores Italicæ libertatis lupos, nisi silva, in quam refugere solerent, esset excisa (16). He did not reason amiss. Albert Krantz judged in like manner, that so long as the Court of Rome should be suffered to continue in all its strength and vigour, it would be impossible ever to suppress the corruption of the Monks and Ecclesiastics. I must here animadvert on a flagrant act of insincerity in Moreri, for this name we ought to give to his fault. He had read what Melchior Adam relates, viz. that Albert Krantz seeing the positions of Martin Luther against the doctrine of indulgences, cried; He has too powerful adversaries; he will not succeed; I advise him to desist from his enterprize, and to shut himself up in his cell, in order to say, Lord have mercy upon me. Nihil effecturum esse contra tam potentes adversarios, suum esse consilium ut ab incepto desisteret. Frater, frater, inquit, abi in cellam tuam, & dic miserere mei Deus (17). "What has Moreri done? He has castrated the passage? has taken but the last words of it; and turns them in such a manner as though Krantz had condemned Luther's attempt. Krantz, says he, bewailed this misfortune (18), in his expiring moments, which he had foretold in his life-time. It is affirmed that, at the juncture in question, he often repeated the following words, speaking against Luther; Frater, abi in cellam, & dic miserere mei Deus. i. e. "Brother, go into thy cell, and say, God have mercy upon me." Though we should not consider many passages in Albert Krantz's works, which testify the opinion he entertained with regard to the corrupt state of the Church; the words which he spoke when he saw Luther's first positions, would alone sufficiently discover Moreri's prevarication. Consider what follows (19). Vitia, quæ doctrinam & cultum Ecclesiæ Romanæ publicum deformabant, agnovit, & quanto emendationis eorum desiderio teneretur, cum locis Scriptorum suorum plurimis, tum vocibus hinc Cygneis esset testatus, quibus suum de Theobaldo Lutheri Anti-Tezeliani in lectulo sibi emortuali oblatis, judicium exposuit (+). Vera quidem dicis, bone Frater: sed nihil efficies: Vade igitur in cellam tuam, & dic miserere mei Deus. i. e. "He owned the vices and corruptions, which deformed the doctrine and public worship of the Romish Church; and how strongly desirous he was that those corruptions should be reformed, appeared both by many passages of their writers, and by these swan-like words, wherein he gave the opinion he entertained with regard to Luther's Anti-Tezelian Theles, which were brought to him whilst he lay on his death-bed; Good Brother, what you say is true, but it is to no purpose; retire therefore to your cell, and say, God have mercy upon me." I will conclude this remark with a passage which shews, that if Flaccius Illyricus did not employ Albert Krantz's authority against the Church of Rome in his catalogue of witnesses of the truth, Catalogus testium veritatis, the compilers who followed him, made amends for that omission; they having given good collections of those particulars, which they had read in Albert Krantz, which favoured their design. Nay, the editors of the Frankfort edition have taken the pains to specify those things in marginal notes. Here follows the passage I promised (20). Ipsi Theobaldi Protejantium cordatores scriptoris hujus, licet Pontifici, atque adeo, ἀλλοφώλου, Lectorem sibi habent commendatissimam, & Arma ex illo depromunt, quibus adversus Ecclesiæ Romanæ Hyperaspistas haud infeliciter κατ' ἀντίπερν depugnatur, Invektivæ scilicet in Vitiis non Monachorum solum ac Canonorum, sed & Episcoporum atque Pontificum, πικρῆς σιωπῆς, crebraque de statu Ecclesiæ & Aulæ Pontificiæ corruptissimo

(8) Petr. Lindeb.
Chron. Rosloch.
lib. 4. pag. 401.
apud Mollerum,
Istogoge ad Hist.
Cberjon. Cimbricæ,
Part. 1. pag. 97.

(9) Haraldus
Huitfeldius,
Chron. Danic.
Part. 6. pag.
1021, 1022, &
Ad. Tratisgerus,
Chron. Hamburg.
MSS., apud Mollerum,
ibid.

(10) Mollerus,
ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(*) Vide Huitfeldium,
l. c. pag. 1035, & Ant.
Heimreichii, Chronicon Dithmarisæ,
lib. 2. cap. 3. pag. 126,
127.

(11) Moller.
Istogoge ad Hist.
Cberjon. Cimbricæ,
Part. 1. pag. 99.

(12) Lib. 4. Notitia
Orbis Geographica,
cap. 14. pag. 132.
apud Moller.
ibid.

(13) In Dissert.
de comparanda
Prud. & Eloq.
civilis, num. 37.

(14) Degory
Wheat, in Prælectionibus beimadolegendis Historias,
pag. 252, 253.
apud Mollerum,
Istogoge ad Hist.
Cberjon. Cimbricæ,
Part. 1. pag. 94.

(15) Melch.
Adam. in Vitis
Pbilosophorum,
Pag. 34.

(16) Paterculus,
lib. 2. cap. 27.

(17) Melch. Adam. in Vitis
Pbilosoph., pag. 34.

(18) That is Luther's Attempt.

(19) Mollerus,
Istogoge ad Hist.
Cberjon. Cimbricæ,
Part. 1. pag. 98.

(+) V. J. Balch.
Schuppii, Speculum
pœnitentiæ
Niniviticæ, pag.
m. 18. alioque
Theologos complures.

(20) Mollerus,
Istogoge ad Hist.
Cberjon. Cimbricæ,
Part. 1. pag. 110.

extant [G] ; but he is not author of all that are ascribed to him [H]. Some Criticks have fallen very foul on his reputation [I].

(†) Centenario
XV Lectionum
memorabilium,
Pag. 963, 977.
(‡) In Breviario Pontificum.
(§) In Lib. de Script. Eccles.
pag. 304.
() In Catalogo
Autorum, Operi
de Psalmidia divina prefixo.
(††) P. r. Bibl.
Eccles. pag. 278.

corruptissimo querelas. Quas uti à Matth. Flacio in Catalogo Tellium Veritatis miror omiffas, ita à Job. Wolfio (†), Job. Conr. Dieterico (‡), aliisque recentioribus, satis diligenter video esse congestas. Observationes etiam, quas Wechelianis Operum Krantzii editionibus accessisse diximus Marginales loca ejusmodi studiose notarunt; obelo viciffim banc ob causam notatæ, & Impietatis infimulatæ, à Rob. Bellarmino (§), Job. Bona (), & Aub. Miræo (††), qui Textum etiam ipsum ab Hæreticis esse vitiatum affirmare non erubescit. i. e. "The more judicious among the protestant Divines highly approve the reading of this author, although a Roman Catholic; and borrow weapons from him, with which they charge successfully the Church of Rome; I speak of his; invectives against the vices, not only of the Friars and Canons, but also of the Bishops and Roman Pontiffs; and his repeated complaints with regard to the exceeding corrupt state of the Church and Court of Rome: which, as I wonder how they came to be omitted by Matthew Flacius in his Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth, so I perceive they are diligently compiled by John Wolfius, John Conrad Dietericus, and other modern writers. The marginal remarks also, which I said Wechel added to the editions of Krantz's works, constantly refer to such kinds of passages; and, on that very account, are branded as impious, by Robert Bellarmine, John Bona, and Aubertus Miræus, who do not blush to affirm, that the Heretics have corrupted the text itself."

[G] Several good books of his are extant.] A chronicle Regnorum Aquilonarium, Danicæ, Suevicæ, & Norwegicæ. Henry of Eppendorf translated it into German, from the manuscript of it which he found at Colen (21), and published his Translation at Strasburg in the year 1545. He published the Latin text the next year in the same city. A second edition of it was printed in the year 1562. John Wolfius, Counsellor to the Marquis of Baden, procured a third and fourth edition at Frankfort, in the year 1575, and in the year 1583 (22). II. The work intitled, Saxonia, sive de Saxonica gentis vetusta origine, longinquis expeditionibus susceptis; & bellis domi pro libertate diu fortiterque gestis Historia; libris 13 comprehensa & ad A. C. 1501 deducta. The first edition is of Colen 1520, which was procured by John Soter or Heylius, and is dedicated to the Emperor Charles V. The work was printed in the same city in the year 1574, and in the year 1595. The Wechels printed three editions of it at Frankfort, in 1575, 1580 and 1621, which are preferable to the Colen editions. A German translation of this work by Basil Faber was printed at Leipzig in 1563, and 1582 (23). III. The work intitled, Vandalia, sive Historia de Vandalorum vera Origine, variis gentibus, crebris à patria migrationibus, Regnis, item, quorum vel auctores fuerunt, vel everfores, Libris XIV à prima eorum Origine, ad A. C. 1500 deducta. The first edition, which is of Colen 1519, was followed by three others at Frankfort (24), and one at Hanaw (25). The German translation, printed in Lubeck in the year 1600, was by Mark Stephen Macropus (26). IV. The work intitled, Metropolis. It includes, in twelve books, the Ecclesiastical History of Saxony, Westphalia and Jutland; with the Lives of the Prelates who, from 780 to 1504, enjoyed the twelve Bishopricks of that country. Joachim Mollerus the younger, a native of the city of Hamburg, and Counsellor to the Dukes of Hamburg, first published this work, which he did, at Melanchthon's request, from the author's original. This was the only manuscript in being of that work; and Henry Bucholz, Bishop of Lubeck, had given it to this Mollerus's father. The first edition is by Operinus at Basil in the year 1548, which was followed by that of the year 1568, from the same press; and by two others (27), (27) In 1574 and at Colen (28), and three more at Frankfort (29). 1596. V. The work entitled Spirantissimum Opusculum in Officium Missæ in optimum Ordinem pro sancta & suavi Sacerdotum Ecclesiæ institutione digestum (30). That entitled Ordo Missæ secundum ritum Ecclesiæ Hamburgensis, in Strasburg 1509, folio. Consilium de ordine & privilegii creditorum in bonis suorum debitorum. It is inserted in the fourth volume Responsorum Juris printed at Frankfort in 1572. Institutiones Logicæ, compendiosæ admodum, pariterque absolutissimæ, nec minus Latine, at Leipzig, in 1517. Grammatica culta & succineta, at Koitoch 1506. In the Leipzig Library some Philosophical treatises of Krantz, that were never printed; are found (31).

[H] . . . He is not author of all the works that are ascribed to him.] He did not write Tractatus de Romanis Pontificibus, & præsertim de Victore II, alias Episcopo Eistettenfi, which Father Jacob (32) ascribes to him; nor the Life of Ansgarius, which the continuators of Gefner falsely ascribe to him; nor of the Scriptura de Imperii Romani interitu ascribed to him by Scherzerus (33).

[I] Some Criticks have fallen very foul on his reputation.] Krantzius, as well as many other great men, might have this motto, per convicia & laudes bestowed upon him by several learned men, (34), but then he has been strongly attacked by some criticks. He is accused of publishing a great number of falsehoods with regard to the origin of nations; of giving very wrong citations of antient authors; of transcribing whole pages from other writers without naming any person; and of falsifying the monuments of history, to gratify his passions. Mollerus (35) names the authors of these various censures, and says something in his vindication. He does not deny but that Krantzius was guilty of plagiarism; he only endeavours to apologize for him, from its being the practice of the age. Solenne præterea ei esse fatemur, Eginhardum, Witkindum, Herm. Contractum, Adamum, Helmodum; Arnaldum Saxonem, Albertum Stadensem, Gobelinum, Blondum, Cornerum, aliosque veteres, de verbo ad verbum exscribere, ac non Periodos solum, sed & paginas atque Capita integra, in sua inde scripta, nulla plerumque Auctoris mentione adjecta, transferre. Observatum id nobis in accuratiori Narrationum de iisdem Rebus Collatione: Observatum & ante nos Vellejo, Reineccio, Meibomiorum Trigæ, Voffio, Malincrotio, Conringio, Bangerto, Sagittario, Schurtzsteischio, Madero, quorum Testimoniis Lectores meos nolo obruere (36). i. e. "I also own, that he often copies literally Eginhard, Witkind, Hermannus Contractus, Adam, Helmod, Arnold the Saxon, Albertus Stadenfis, Gobelinus, Blondus, Cornerus, and other antient authors; and that he borrows, not only periods, but even pages and entire chapters, commonly without once mentioning the author whence he copies them. I took notice of this in my accurate comparison of various relations of the same particulars. It also was observed before me, by Vellejus, Reineccius, the Meibomii, Voffius, Malincrot, Conringius, Bangertus, Sagittarius, Schurtzsteischius, Maderus, with whose testimonies I shall not trouble my readers."

(21) In the Library of Reinhard Count of Wetterburg, Dean of Colen.

(22) Extracted from Mollerus, Isagoge ad Hist. Cberfon. Cimb. Part. 1. pag. 35.

(23) Extracted from the same, pag. 100.

(24) In 1575, 1580 and 1601.

(25) In 1619.

(26) Extracted from Mollerus, Isagoge ad Hist. Cberfon. Cimb. Part. 1. p. 102.

(a) John Pincier, brother-in-law to the Professor Hyperius, Professor of Divinity at Marburg.

(31) Extracted from Mollerus, Isagoge ad Hist. Cberfon. Cimb. Part. 1. pag. 105, 106.

(32) Bibliotheca Port. fe. pag. 243.

(33) Apud Mollerum, pag. 107.

(34) See the catalogue of them in pag. 107, & seq.

(35) Ubi supra, pag. 111, & seq.

(36) Ibid. pag. 112.

KUCHLIN (JOHN), Minister and Professor of Divinity, was born in 1546, in a little town in the country of Hesse, called Wettera. His father, who was a good honest mechanic, and had the charge of ten sons and three daughters, whom he supported merely by the labour of his hands, designed him for learning; but was prevented by death from seeing him make any considerable progress. The Minister (a) of the place took care of the child with so much the more satisfaction, as he saw, that he made a good progress in Latin and Greek under Justus Wulteius Rector of the school at Wettera. But when it was time to go to the University, Kuchlin had no small difficulties to encounter on account of his poverty. However he did not lose courage; he resolved to seek his fortune; and for that purpose went to travel, as a young College-adventurer. He met met with nothing at Frankfort. His landlord at Mentz carried him to the Jesuits, who kept him no longer than till they found, that he would not abjure the Protestant Religion. All that he met with at Straßbourg was a letter of recommendation from John Sturmius to Brentius, who was Professor at Tübingen. The latter did not keep him long; he thought him not sufficiently inclined to the opinion of the Ubiquitarians. Kuchlin having got back the letter of Sturmius, went to Heidelberg, where he at last obtained what he sought for; for Ursin procured him a subsistence, in order that he might continue his studies at ease. The University of Heidelberg was then in a very flourishing state. The young man made a considerable progress there for six years; after which he was sent to teach in the school at Neustad [A], where he had, among other colleagues, Fortunatus Crellius and Frederic Sylburgius (b). He was afterwards admitted Minister, and settled in the Church of Tackenheim; which he served faithfully, till after the death of the Elector Frederic in 1576, when Lewis his successor banished the Ministers who would not become Lutherans. Kuchlin retiring to Hesse his own country, and meeting with nothing but discouragement there, took refuge (c) by his wife's advice in the great Ark of the Refugees, I mean in Holland. He passed through Embden in 1577, and staid there for some time, whence he was sent for to Amsterdam to be Minister there [B]. He accepted the call, and discharged that post eighteen years; after which he exerted himself vigorously in the Rectorship of a College of Divinity, which the States of Holland had erected at Leyden in 1591, and of which he had from that time the direction for some months. It was in 1595 that he disengaged himself intirely from his Church at Amsterdam, in order to apply himself wholly to the business of this College. He taught Divinity there till his death, which happened July the 2d 1606.

(b) He was his countryman and kinsman.

(c) Meursius, whose words are quoted in the remark [B].

(d) Taken from his Funeral Oration, pronounced by Luke Trelectius. See also Meursius, Atben. Batav. pag. 182.

He had married his two daughters to two learned men; one to Peter Bertius, and the other to Festus Hommius (d). All the Theological Theses, which he had caused to be maintained at different times, have been collected in one volume in 4to at Geneva in 1613. Guy Patin has extremely commended him, and a little too much; for he calls him one of the most learned men of his age (e).

(e) Patin, Lettre 258. pag. 427. of the 2d tome.

[A] He was sent to teach in the school at Neustad.] The author of the Diarium Biographicum (1) tells us, that Kuchlin was rector of that school; but his funeral oration, in which that preferment would not have been omitted, expressly informs us, that he taught at Neustad when Basil Pithopæus was rector there. There is another mistake in the same Diarium; it represents as two different works the Disputationes Theologicae ad Catacheseos Ecclesiarum Belgicarum explicationem, and the Disputationes de Religione Christiana præcipuis capitibus. They are one and the same book.

[B] He was sent for to Amsterdam to be Minister there.] Moreri examined so little the authors, which he consulted, that he considered only the first part of the period of Meursius. If he had had the patience to read the whole period, he would have seen the direct contrary of what he affirmed. He says that Kuchlin was Minister at Emden and Groningen in the Low-countries; but it is certain that he was not at Groningen. He had the choice between that City and Amsterdam, and he inclined rather to the former than the latter. However he was induced to fix upon the latter. Let us hear Meursius (2). Infinu uxoris, quæ Belgica erat in Belgium abiit, Emdamque venit anno c1

16 LXXXVII, ubi cum operam aliquamdiu tam in schola quam in Ecclesia navasset, eodem tempore ab Amstelodamensibus & à Groeningensibus evocatus fuit. Ille, cum propter Germanici idiomatis vicinitatem Græningenses præferendos judicaret, à clarissimo viro D. MENSINGIO gravissimis rationibus permotus fuit, ut operam suam Amstelodamensi Ecclesie addiceret. i. e. "At the solicitation of his wife, who was born in the Low Countries, he went thither, and came to Emden in the year 1587, where having spent some time in the service of the school and the Church, he received at the same time an invitation from the inhabitants of Amsterdam and Groningen. He inclined to Groningen on account of the neighbourhood of the German Idiom, but was at last prevailed upon by that eminent man, Menso Alting, upon very important reasons, to devote himself to the service of the Church of Amsterdam."

It is a great instance of negligence in the same Moreri, to say in general, that Kuchlin taught Divinity at Leyden. He should have specified whether he did this as Professor in the University, or Principal of the College of Divinity. Meursius would have furnished him with a clear account of this.

(1) Henningus Witte, ad ann. 1606.

(2) Atben. Bat. pag. 182.

KUHLMAN (QUIRINUS) was one of the Visionaries of the seventeenth Century.

He was born at Breslaw in Silesia February the 25th 1651 (a), and gave great hopes by the early progress which he made (b). But it was interrupted by a sickness, under which he laboured at eighteen years of age (c). He was thought to be dead on the third day of his illness. That day he had a terrible vision. He thought himself surrounded with all the devils in hell, and this at mid-day when he was awake. This vision was followed by another of God himself, surrounded by his Saints, and Jesus Christ in the midst. He saw and felt then things inexpressible. Two days after he had more visions of the same kind (d); and when he was cured of his distemper, he perceived in reality a great change with regard to those sights, but saw himself perpetually accompanied with a circle of light, on his left hand (e). He had no longer any taste for polite learning. He (f) had sometimes such extatic distractions, that they hindered him from seeing and hearing those who were with him; and he formed the plan of a vast number of books, which were so many methods to learn every thing, without much pains and to perfection. At nineteen years of age he left his country, where he had not justice done him sufficiently, and went to see the Universities. He put out a second edition of his epitaphs (g), a work which he had composed at fifteen years of age, and he published a Treatise of Morality (h); but as he made an extraordinary progress from day to day, he found the sheets, which the Printer sent to him, unworthy of him, so much was his knowledge increased during the course of the impression (i). He had no value for the public

(a) Epist. Theosophicae Leidenses, pag. 11.

(b) See his Prodromus quinquenni mirabilis, pag. 10, 11. and the Fragments of the Letter prefixed to it by him.

(c) Prodrom. pag. 3.

(d) Ibid. pag. 6.

(e) Ibid. pag. 11.

(f) Ibid. pag. 13, 14.

(g) Ibid. pag. 25.

(h) I believe that this book was intitled, Moralis Heraldus Historicus.

(i) Prodrom. pag. 26.

(1) Idem, pag. 30.

(1) Sept. the 3d 1673.

public lectures or disputes of the University of Jena; and he would not have any other master than the Holy Ghost (k). His desire to see Holland was so strong as not to permit him to delay his journey thither, till he might see more clearly what would be the issue of the war, which had been so fatal to that country in 1672. He landed at Amsterdam (l) three days before the retaking of the City of Naerden (m). He went to Leyden a few (n) Prodom. days after; and was not there long before he met with Behme's works [A], of which he had never heard any mention before. The reading of them was like oyl thrown into the fire: he was surprized that Behme should have prophesied of things, of which no body but Kuhlman himself had the least knowledge (n). There was at that time in (o) Ibid. pag. 40. Holland one JOHN ROTHE, who undertook to prophesy [B]. Kuhlman contradicted the

[A] He was not at Leyden long before he met with Behme's works.] Jacob Behme or Boehme was a Fanatic, of whom I shall speak some time or other more fully. He was born in a village of Germany near Gorlitz in 1575; and when he had learned to read and write, he was taken from school in order to be a shoemaker. He began to exercise that trade at Gorlitz in 1594. He was seized with an extasy in 1600, if we may believe what he has published in a book, which he intitled Aurora. This book was carried to the Magistrates of Gorlitz by George Richter, Dean of the Ministers of that place; it was carried to them, I say, as containing a great many of the errors of Paracelsus and Wigelius; for Behme had amused himself with Chemistry in his youth. The Magistrates suppressed this Aurora as much as possible, and commanded the author to write no more. He was silent for seven years; but when he found that the director of the electoral laboratory had recommended him to a great many persons of the Court as a good Chemist, he lifted up his head, and boldly opposed Richter, and wrote above twenty books in the space of five years. He died

(1) Taken from Michaelius, Hist. Eccles. p. 1449. & seq. edit. 1699.

(2) Michael. ibid. pag. 1324.

November 18, 1624 (1). A great many persons have been infatuated by the visions of this man. Kuhlman was not the least of his admirers. Here is a passage, which will inform us of this. Ejus (Johannis Rothii) inde vestigia legit Quirinus Kuhlmannus Silesius, Jacobi Bobemi simul propugnator, Calovii vero atque Scherzeri acerrimus insectator. Sic enim in Bobemo redivivo C. 12. In Museo meo solus paucis diebus plura didici ex uno Bohemo, quam ab omnibus ævi sapientibus simul auditis discere potuissem. Et in præfat. Operis ejusdem. Inter innumerabiles visiones accidit, ut erepto mihi ex museo millena luminum millia circa me exorientium intueri daretur. Plura ejusmodi legi possunt apud Calovium in Anti-Bobemo, C. 32. & seq. i. e. "His [John Rothe's] steps are followed "by Quirinus Kuhlman of Silesia, who is a defender "of Jacob Behme, but a most zealous antagonist to "Calovius and Scherzer. For this he writes in his "Bobemus redivivus, C. 12. I have learned more being "alone in my study from Behme, than I could have learn- "ed from hearing all the wise men of the present age "together. And in the preface to the same work he "says thus: Amidst an infinite number of Visions it "happened, that being snatched out of my study I saw "thousands of thousands of lights rising round about "me. More to this purpose may be read in Calovius's "Anti-Bohemus, C. 32 and seq."

[B] JOHN ROTHE, who undertook to prophesy.] He was a native of Amsterdam, and had always led a very regular life; but he discovered very soon that he was of an extreme melancholy disposition, and was fond of changing in matters of religion. Ut a prima Lanugine summè melancholicus, ita in eligendis quas quoad Religionem sequeretur partibus inconstans plane ac desultorius. Salden. in Otiis Theolog. 194. (3). He was so charmed with the Sieur Labadie, that he devoted himself to his sect, and used all his endeavours to procure him new Disciples; but some time after he became a schismatic from him, and erected himself into the head of a party. He said, that the glorious kingdom of Jesus Christ was coming on; and he was not contented with the office of St John the Baptist, I mean, of forerunner and harbinger, but he pretended to be director of that great work, and more than standard-bearer of this new world. Hic a Johanne Labadæo, novo, ut videri volebat, Ecclesiarum Reformatore, morumque rigidiore Castigatore, sub intensioris Devotionis specie, ita primum dementatus fuit, ut totus ei adhæserit non tantum, sed quoscunque posset, ad familiam ejus novam pertrahere totis viribus allaboravit. Verum postea eo quod parem forsau non ferret, nequum superiorem, quo loco Labadæum novæ devotionis artificem & præconem habere tamen tenebatur, quandiu civitati ejus adscriptus esset, secessionem ab eo molitus est, gloriosum in Christo Regnum infando strepitu in terris, magno illo vexillifero, multo feliciter erecturus (4). He boasted of his revelations; he promised mountains and wonders to those, who should enlist themselves under his standard; he disturbed the Church and State by his libels; he saw nothing fall out, which he had foretold: and to complete his misfortune he was shut up in the prisons at Amsterdam. See all this more particularly related in the following passage of Saldenus (5). Hinc numerosas vacillantium animarum copias colligere, sociis suis aureos montes promittere, Ecclesiam Rempublicamque libellorum famosissimorum plaustris conturbare, Servum Dei Johannem Propbetamque eximium seipsum indigitarè, Revelationum tandem extraordinariarum universa volumina in vulgus spargere, neque erubuit neque desistit. At quis tandem omnium horum exitus? (5) Idem, ibid. pag. 195.

(3) Saldenus, in Otiis Theolog. pag. 194.

Mons parturivit natumque est ridiculus mus.

Eorum, quæ prædixerat, nihil evenit, evenire ò contra multa, quæ nec prædixerat nec præstigerat. Misso enim, quod crederetur se esse gloriosus eras, vexillo, & cum De Raatis, Someris, Richardsonis, novi Regni designatis Assessoribus, redux in Patriam factus, solatâ societate tributitiâ & schismaticâ, patriæ urbis dignitatem inclusus est: impetratâ simul plenissimâ facultate & potestate, Prophetias suas ludicras & ridiculas resumendi & retractandi, periculumque faciendi, num prædicere certiuscule forsau possit, quo tempore & modo ex illo suo ergastrio liberandus tandem sit, quam multa alia prænucciarit. i. e. "Hence he neither was ashamed nor ceased to collect a number of weak souls, to promise mountains of gold to his companions, to disturb the Church and State with whole loads of libels, to style himself John the servant of God, and an excellent Prophet, and at length to disperse among the vulgar volumes of extraordinary revelations. "But what was the issue of all this?

"The mountain laboured, and produc'd a mouse.

"Nothing of what he foretold fell out; on the other hand many things happened, which he neither foretold nor foresaw. For the standard, which he boasted that he would erect, being laid aside, he returned into his own country with de Raats, Somer, and Richardson, the designed assertors of the new Kingdom; and his factious and schismatical society being dissolved, he was shut up in prison in his own native city; having full leave at the same time to review and retract his absurd Prophecies, and to try whether he could foretell with any greater certainty, when and how he should be set free, than he had predicted many other things." Madam Bourignon did not suffer herself to be deceived by the chimeras of John Rothe; she had a sovereign preservative against such charms; that is, she would have her Prophecy to be like the privileges of Gentlemen in Germany, who hold them immediately of the Empire; she would be a Prophetess in chief, and receive her revelations only from God, without any subordination, or any collaterals. However that be, let us see her judgment concerning John Rothe and Kuhlman. "Which (6) appeared then particularly upon the occasion of a famous and pretended Prophet of Holland, who erected standards to gather under them the twelve tribes of Israel, whom he was to reitore; and he was followed by some good people,

(6) That it to say, that God made her know by experience how far the presumption and folly of the human mind, joined with the illusions of the Devil, may go; how being never permitted her to be deceived, she discovered every thing to her internally. Vie continûée d'Antoinette Bourignon, pag. 293.

(6) Figulus figulo invidet, faber fabri.

(7) The Letters which he wrote, and the Answers which he received, are printed under the title of Theosophica Epistola Leidenjsis.

the proverb, which says that persons of the same profession envy each other (6) [C]; for he wrote in the most humble manner imaginable to this John Rothe (7). He styled him a man of God, and John III, the son of Zacharias. He desired the assistance of his knowledge, and pronounced a woe upon those who did not hearken to him [D]. He dedicated to him his Prodromus quinquennii mirabilis, printed at Leyden in 1674. This was to be followed by two other volumes. He had a design to introduce in the first the studies and discoveries which he had made since his first vision till the year 1674. There would have been in it an hundred thousand inventions, which would have astonished all ages. Multa millena millia inventa omnem aetatem ad stuporem provocantia (8). The last volume would have been the key to Eternity, and Aeveternity, and Time. He communicated his design to Father Kircher; and particularly the Ars Combinatoria sive Ars magna sciendi, he let him know, that he had only sketched out what himself had a design to carry much farther [E].

(8) Page 13.

This

besides others, who without following him, gave credit to his chimerical revelations. In some visits, which he made her, she easily discovered the imposture, tho' he assured her, that he had frequent conversation with Angels and God, and told Madam Bourignon, that he should be for the future as a God to her, since God would no longer discover himself to her but by his means. She was so weary of him, that she would not see him any more, nor open his prophetic letters, which are at present sealed up among her papers. She advised her friends to take care of him, since he was undoubtedly not of God, for she had applied to God expressly to know what he was, and God, upon her asking him, Lord, is this man your Prophet? had answered, No; and upon her asking again, What is he then, Lord? he had answered, he is a presumptuous man, over whom the Devil has great power. God had given her the same sentiments of those of his cabal, and particularly of one Quirinus Kuhlman, who a little before had published a letter addressed to this Gentlewoman, in order to try whether he could mingle together the spirit of God with the reveries of Satan, of which the false Prophet's head was full, he wandering up and down to seduce those, who deserved to be misled, on account of their slight esteem of the truth sent from God (7).

much against John Rothe, and laughed at his visions. Kuhlman asserted, that heaven had declared for this Prophet by the great storm on the 24th of May 1674, and by the rains, which happened in divers places May the 21st following (12). He referred to the Gazettes, which had mentioned this, and applied to his friend the celebrated words of an antient Poet. O Misselli Theosophista & Diabologi! nullis verbis, calumniis, invektionibus eluditis Prophetam, nimium Deo dilectum, (12) Præfatio Prodrom.

Cui militat æther, Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti (13).

(13) Ibid.

i. e. "O ye wretched Theosophists and Speakers for the Devil, with no words, or reproaches can you escape the Prophet, who is greatly favoured by Heaven, for whom the æther fights, and the winds agree to enlist themselves under his banner." He addressed himself particularly to Amsterdam (14), where the wind had torn up many trees, and did not omit the thunder, which fell upon the Church of Utrecht; but especially he cried out a miracle (15), because it had thundered on the 24th of March, the evening before John Rothe the Holland, when there was still snow in the streets, and ice in the canals. These storms, these thunders, these lightnings, according to him, were the forerunners of the ruin of the country. Notwithstanding this the affairs of the United Provinces became more prosperous from that time. It is proper to remark all these things, in order to shew the spirit, which governs this sort of people: they abuse every thing; they find their pretended myteries every where. We have instances of a later date.

(14) In calce Epist. ad Kircher. pag. 52.

(15) Theosoph. Epist. pag. 36.

[E] He let Father Kircher know, that he had only sketched (16) out what himself had a design to carry much farther. Father Kircher did not trouble himself to defend his works, nor to vie in knowledge with this man. He struck sail before him, and declared, that having written only as a man he did not pretend to equal those, who wrote by inspiration. Quod porro de arte combinatoria, caterisque paradoxis meis, tum in polygraphia, tum in musurgia, jam publica luci traditis meliori modo fieri potuisse contendis, nil moror, cum quædam scientiæ tuæ tam sublimis et stupendæ profusus incapax ineptumque me esse humili mentis obsequio fatear. Quæ scripsi ego divina aspirante gratia, humano more, id est studio & labore adquisita scientia scripsi, non divinitus inspirata aut infusa, cujusmodi puram inter mortales dari non existimo. Non dubitem quin tu pro incomparabili ingenii tui vastitate meis nugis & majora & admiratione digniora sis proditurus. i. e. "With regard to what you say, that what I have advanc'd in my Ars combinatoria, and other Paradoxes, already published, might be improved, I am not at all uneasy about it, since I frankly own myself incapable of your sublime and celestial knowledge. What I have written, I have written after an human manner, that is, by knowledge gained by study and labour, not divinely inspired and infused, which I think is not to be obtained pure among men. . . . I do not doubt, but that you, by means of the incomparable and vast extent of your genius, will produce discoveries much greater and more admirable than my trifles." Our author took this for a serious complement, and did not perceive, that the Jesuit ridiculed him. He took great care to publish Father Kircher's answers, and to use capital letters in those passages where he thought himself praised.

(16) Innumera ex arte combinatoria inventi posse in Medicina Chymique recte paradosis sed iudicium quædam libere ut magis interna quam externa, nucleum quam corticem quærerent.

(7) Vie continuée d'Ant. Bourignon, pag. 293.

(8) His name is Daniel Hartnaciens.

(9) Micraelius, Hist. Eccles. pag. 1324. edit. 1699.

(10) That is, in the year 1700.

We find in Micraelius's continuator (8), that John Rothe being the son of a man, whose name was Zacharias, boasted of being the forerunner of the Son of God with respect to the Last Judgment; and that in the year 1668 he declared on the part of King Melchisedeck to the Emperor, the Kings, and Princes, that they ought to lay down their sovereignties, since the Kingdom of Christ was at hand. That he was examined in 1677, and shut up in prison by order of the States of Holland and West Friseland: and afterwards being set at liberty, was laughed at by every body, his Prophecies being found contrary to the event (9). The author should have added, that he was cured of his visionary-humour, and married, and returned to the common course of life. He is living at the time I write this (10).

[C] He contradicted the Proverb, which says, that persons of the same profession envy each other. This was more edifying upon the whole, than what we have seen above. We have seen two expositors of the Apocalypse write one against the other, though they agreed upon the pretended myteries of the year 1689. But because they came to this point of reunion by different paths, each of them would maintain his hypothesis in prejudice to his brother-expositor. This was not right; and if the public had been less indulgent than it was, it ought not to have been thought at all strange.

[D] Pronounced a woe upon those, who did not hearken to him. He declared in a thundering and redoubled manner (11), Vae, vae! si prophetias servorum Dei spreveritis, seu Batavia, olim mirabilis, nunc miserabilis spernit & moriens spernit. i. e. "Woe! Woe! if you shall despise the Prophecies of God, as Holland, once flourishing, but now wretched and dying, despised them, and continues to do so." Hoc anno, adds he, & bujus anni una die veniet & mors & ludus & fames Babylonis Belgicæ, & igne exuretur caelesti, quia validus est Dominus Deus damnans eam. i. e. "This year, and on one day of this year, death and mourning and famine shall befall the Belgic Babylon, and it shall be burnt up with fire from heaven, because the Lord God, who condemneth it, is mighty." All this, because they had exclaimed

(11) Ad calcem Epist. Kircheri scriptæ, pag. 51.

(r) In quibus majora in omni scibili eruntur, quam a nobis vel
ullo homine expectantur. Mon-
nit. ad Lector.
in limine Epist.
ad Kircher.

(s) Omnia quæ
possideo sapientia incarnata non mibi veniunt adscribenda. Ibid.

This Jesuit wrote to him a civil answer, and gave him good advice [F], particularly with regard to his design of writing against the Pope [G]. For the rest, the prophetic spirit had not made our Kuhlman renounce the pleasure of being praised; for there was no compliment written to him, either by those to whom he had sent copies of his works, or by others, which he did not take the pains to prefix to his Prodromus. With respect to the commendations which he gives himself to his writings, they are undoubtedly very strong (r); but as he declares, that every thing which he does comes from the incarnate Wisdom (s), I will not determine, that it is a mark of pride (t). I am not certain when he left Holland, but have just seen a book (u), which acquaints us, that he wandered a long time in England, France, and the East [H], and that at last he was burnt in Mus(t) See Entrée sur la Cabale chymique, printed in 1691, p. 109.

(u) Diarium Biographicum Henningi Witte, tom. 2. pag. 168.

COVY

[F] Kircher gave him good advice.] Kircher's second letter plainly shews, that he had discovered the illusion of the man, and that he laughed at him, when he says with so serious an air, Magna sane tibi soli notam, cæteris inexplicabilem scientiam. i. e. "You promise great and incredible things, which as they far transcend all human capacity, so I affirm boldly that they have never been attempted or even thought of by any person but myself; and therefore I cannot but suspect, that you have obtained by the gift of God such a knowledge, as the Scriptures ascribes to Adam and Solomon, I mean an Adamic, and Salomonic, in short, an infused knowledge, known to no mortal but yourself, and inexplicable by any other." But what follows is a piece of charitable advice. All things being well considered Father Kircher advises him to keep this infused knowledge to himself, and not to expose himself to the raillery of an age so apt to scoff as ours. It seems indeed, that our age is more formidable to visionaries than the preceding. The Bishop of Meaux has touched something upon this in one of his letters; but I do not know whether at the bottom the appearances do not deceive us in this point (17). Quicquid sit, it is Kircher, who speaks, ego sane considerato rei non parvi momenti negotio, pro singulari quo te prosequor affectu etiam atque etiam quam obnixissime contendere, ne hanc tuam noviter obtentam scientiam Centralifque abyssif profunditatem ulli vana quadam jactantia ostenderes, ne Tertii post Adamum Salomonis dicam & cum risu nomen incurras. Potissimum hoc sæculo sarcastico, quo Criticorum, Thrasorum, & Sycophantarum non parvus est numerus, qui aliud non moluntur quam ut gloriosos aliorum labores canino dente rodere, fannis ludibriisque exponere non cessent. i. e. "However that be, having considered the whole affair, which is of no small importance, I earnestly entreat you out of the singular esteem, which I have for you, not to discover, out of vain glory, to any person the profound knowledge lately obtained by you, lest you should be ridiculed with the name of the third Solomon after Adam; especially in this sarcastical age, in which there is no small number of pretenders to criticism, boasters, and sycophants, who aim at nothing else, than to carp at the glorious labours of others, and to expose them to contempt." And to make the greater impression upon him by his remonstrances, he owns to him what had happened to himself. He acknowledges to him, that he knew by experience, that a man exposes himself to an infinite number of evils, when he rashly and inconsiderately becomes an author. Quanta malorum liras ex inconsiderata scriptione resultet, ego jam 40 annorum spatio quo in hoc omnium gentium & nationum theatro, meam utut possum personam ago, frequenti experientia comperi.

[G] Particularly with regard to his design of writing against the Pope.] Though Kuhlman imagined, that he was the person promised by Drabicius, and though he knew that Drabicius's promises related to the destruction of the Roman Antichrist; yet he had an inclination to write to the Pope. He consulted Father Kircher upon this point, and assured him, that he was passionately desirous to communicate to the Pope his great secrets for the good of Christianity. A Te, Reverendissime Pater, peterem ne denegares mihi occasionem præbere, qua Pontificis Maximi manibus propriis quædam Epistola à me in signum observantia transmittenda traderetur... Vellem enim arcana ponderosissima ad Christianæ Ecclesiæ commodum singulariter proficua, candido ore styloque candido, tam admirabili tempestate Pontifici communicare, amore Reip. Christianæ impulsus. I do not know the particular good advice which he received from that Jesuit upon this subject; he omitted them in the answer which he had received; for here is the manner in which he published that passage. Quod denique de litteris ad summum Pontificem dandis, eidemque propriis manibus à me consignandis te cogitare scribis... quæ scribo ut quanta cautela & circumspectione Romæ procedendum sit cognoscas. i. e. "As for what you write, concerning your design to write to the Pope, and delivering your letter to him by my hands... which I write in order that you may know with what caution and circumspection things are to be conducted at Rome." But he did not omit the place, where he was assured, that his great work dedicated to the Pope would be applauded and admired, provided that he left nothing in it, which might offend the censors of books, and took care not to ascribe to himself an inspired knowledge, silentio quoque suppressa divinitus Tibi inspirata scientia. This last advice, though good in itself, was the least probable to be relished by him; for it is by boasting of a celestial illumination, that a man strikes the people with amazement (18). Let us speak a word concerning the impostures or illusions of false Prophets. About the time that Kuhlman was ready to write respectfully to the Pope for the good of Christianity, he wrote to others his hopes of the approaching destruction of the Papacy. This is what the following words of Kuhlman signify, according to the style of our visionaries. O Pontifex Clemens X! an sigilli mei duplicatum Quinarium X excedes, mox orbis aspiciet univversus? In Clemente I Petro & Lino jure præterito Episcopatus Romanus incepit: in Clemente X quid futurum sit tempus evolvet. i. e. "Pope Clement X! whether you will exceed the double Quinary X of my seal, will the whole world hereafter judge? In Clement I (Peter & Linus being very justly omitted) the See of Rome began: what shall come to pass under Clement X, time will shew." I could name a man (19), who was greatly vexed, when the public was informed, that while he was declaiming furiously against Lewis XIV, he wrote letters to a Duke and Peer full of flattery towards that Monarch.

[H] He wandered a long time in England, France, and the East.] I have just found several pieces of this Fanatic printed at London at his expence, some in 1681, and others in 1682. The first of these pieces, dated at London June the 24th 1681, is dedicated to Lewis XIV, with this familiar inscription, Salve, Ludovice XIV, Rex Liligere, salve. The author exhorts that Prince to assert the Regale, which was so much spoken of at that time, and informed him, that Drabicius had promised him the city of Rome (20). We find in this collection a letter, which he wrote from Lubeck to Father Kircher in February 1676, de Sapientia infusa Adamæa, Salomoneaque; and a piece, which he addressed to Mahomet IV, de Conversione Turcarum. It is dated at Constantinople August the 1st, 1678, The author set his mystical seal to it at London May the 1st 1681, and signified to the Sultan, that the comet, which had appeared the preceding winter, presaged the conversion of all nations; and he congratulated his Highness upon his having appointed a fast one day throughout his Empire. Aspexisti ante aliquot (18) See the Bishop of Meaux sur l'Apocalypse, pag. 429. Holland edition.

(19) Quem coram dicere non est, Signis per facile est. Horat. Sat. 5. lib. 1.

(20) A Deo data scientia Romæ nunc cribrans à DRABICIO Tibi olim promissa.

(17) See the article of ABARIS remark [I].

covy October the 3d 1689, on account of some predictions which were actually feditious (x). I cannot tell whether he caused a medal to be struck of him, as other modern Prophets have done; but the same book informs me, that there was a picture of him, under which so many titles were given him [I], that I believe the Monarchs of the East never assumed more. If it should be thought that I speak of him too seriously and too long, I would have the reader know that there is a serious air upon such subjects as these, which is ten times worse than raillery; and that it is proper that the world should be informed of the prodigious variety of fanaticism. It is an evil more contagious than is imagined. The reading of Drabicius completed the ruin of Kuhlman [K]. Those who have not the Prodromus of the latter, have occasion to read only three or four pages of Morhof's Polybistor (y), in which they will see the magnificent promises and vast designs of this Fanatic.

(x) Ob vaticinia quadam & feditiosum motum auctum. Ibid.

(y) From pag. 357. to pag. 361.

For the rest, he was not one of those inspired men, who value themselves upon their continence; he married more than once, if we may call a marriage, and not concubinage, that commerce between a man and woman, which wants the formalities, which the Canon and Civil Law have prescribed. He understood likewise the art of getting money from people, and there were some, to whom he wrote in a magisterial and prophetic style, that it was necessary for the advancement of the new Kingdom of God, that they should raise such and such a sum, in failure of which he threatened them with the most dreadful judgments from the vengeance of the most High. Van Helmont was one of those who received such letters, but he was not so simple as to be terrified by them, or to pay any regard to them (z).

(z) I have been informed of this by some persons who knew Kuhlman.

KUSTER

*aliquot menses, O Capitaneæ grandis ab Oriente Solis, Cometæ in-audite-ingentem, NUNTIUM REALEM REGNI JESUELIARUM, hoc est Restitutionis Populorum omnium ad Deum Unicum & Triunum! Bene Te, quod cor tuum coram Deo flexeris, & Proclamationis Diei penitentialis Catholici in Regno tuo, inciperis adimplere Verba Dei ad Prophetam Drabicius? Si Christiani voluntatem meam in destruendo Antichristianismo, Doctrinæque pravæ & Idololatriæ exequi renuent, facient id Christianis in opprobrium Turcæ & Tartari: quod horrore erit angelis meis & hominibus. i. e. "You, O great Captain of the East, saw some months ago a comet of an unheard of magnitude, A REAL MESSENGER OF THE KINGDOM OF THE JESUELITES, that is, of the restitution of all people to the one-three-God. Happy are you, because you have bowed your heart before God, and by proclaiming a fast through the whole Empire, have begun to fulfill the words of God to his Prophet Drabicius. If Christians shall refuse to perform my will in destroying Antichrist, and false Doctrine, and Idolatry, the Turks and Tartars will do this to the disgrace of Christians; and the horror of my angels and men." He wrote to the Aga of Smyrna June the 28th 1678 (21). Some months after he dedicated to the Sieur Van Dam the mystery of the 21 weeks of Kottelus, in which he declares, that the House of Austria was about to lose the Imperial Crown. By the piece De magnalibus naturæ ultimo ævo referatarum, which he addressed ad adeptos magosque reseratarum, at Geneva January the 30th 1682, it appears, that he went to the Holy Land. His Arcanum microcosmicum is dated at Paris November the 1st 1681.*

ses, Hussitas, Zwinglianos, Lutheranos; besides in High Dutch, de cælesti osculo amoris, sive Cogitationes Poeticæ ex Cantico Canticorum. Discursus sacri & profani de pulcherrimis virtutum fosculis. Mortalitas immortalis, sive centum Epitaphia. Caduceator Historicus. Neobebimus illustratus, &c.

[K] The reading of Drabicius completed the ruin of Kuhlman. Kuhlman had found in the prophecies of Drabicius two passages, which he applied to himself (23). The first contains these words (24: *Qui legit, intelligat! cum numerabitur quinque in cælo, terintumaciæ, conspecto me potestatem habere in caelos, terram, mare. i. e. "Let him, who reads, understand! when FIVE shall be numbered, the sons of obstinacy shall receive their end, it being perceived, that I have power over Heaven, Earth, and Sea." Here is the other passage (25): *Abundantia benedictionis te (Drabicius) parata expectat Wratislavia, ac si oculis videas tuas. i. e. "The abundance of blessing waits thee (Drabicius) at Breslaw, as if you saw with your own eyes." Let us add to these two passages that which he took from the Astrologico-Prophetic Prognostic written by Paul Felgenhaver in 1647, and published in 1665, *Quantus error sit pacis spes illud nobis duplicatus QUINARIUS demonstrabit, cum venerit post paucos dies. i. e. "How great an error it is to hope for peace, the double QUINARY will shew, when it shall come after a few days." He imagined, that he was that double Quinarius, which Felgenhaver had promised: two reasons convinced him of this: one was, that his name was Quirinus; the other, that in 1674 it was five years since he had received an infused knowledge (25). He believed therefore, that the time promised filii Drabicius, cum numerabitur quinque finem accipiet filii intumaciæ, was come; so that he hoped to overthrow Antichrist and Babylon with his pen in a short time. Let us hear the Hallelujah which he thundered out beforehand: Corruet Antichristus proprio suo judicio, & Babylon excidium suum properabit cum admiratione populorum. Hallel. Quem Cæsares armis potentibus non debellaverunt, juvenis inermis debellavit in virtute Jesu Christi prælians. Hallel. Stant Mercatores Antichristi horrore inprospere timore, desunt interitum suum in speratum ab inprospere timore futurorum. Hallel. (27). i. e. "Antichrist shall fall by his own judgment, and Babylon shall hasten his destruction to the admiration of all people. Hallel. He whom the Emperors have not subdued by powerful arms, shall be subdued by an unarmed youth fighting in the might of Christ Jesus. Hallel. The merchants of Babylon stand trembling afar off, and lament their unexpected destruction through the unexpected fear of what shall come to pass. Hallel." If I had not seen with my own eyes all that I have transcribed, I could scarce have thought, that the extravagance of Fanaticism could have proceeded so far.

(23) Epist. Theophr. pag. 2.

(24) Revelat. 594. Feb. 7. ann. 1664.

(25) Revelat. 608. 24 May 1664.

(26) Epist. Theophr. pag. 2.

(27) This is what he wrote to his brother-prophet John Raibe, April 21, 1674, at Leyden. See Epist. Theophr. pag. ult.

(21) Kuhlman was then in the Port of Smyrna on board a French ship. He was still at Smyrna Oct. 27, 1678, as appears from the letter which he wrote to James Van Dam, the Dutch Consul.

(22) Diarium Biographicum Henningi Witte, Part. 2. pag. 168.

[I] So many titles were given him. Here is what I find in the book which I have quoted (22). In effigie quam Andreas Lippius edidit, ita celebratur: Alter Scaligerum, Taubmannus, Grotius, Opitz, Barbius, Icanus, Grybbius, Muretus, Erasmus! Henoch, Josephus, Davides, Josua, Moses, Elias, Daniel, Salomon, Eliza, Johannes! Cyrus, Alexander, Constantin, Karl, Fridericus! Liligerus, Juvenis, Frigerans, Artista, Sobhata! O Pater, hæc tua sunt! Hæc ad te cuncta reflexit.

i. e. "In the picture of him published by Andrew Lippius, he is thus celebrated.
"Another Scaliger, Taubman, Grotius, &c."

A little before it is said, that he was sometimes called LUDOVICUS LUDOVICI. The catalogue of his writings, such as Mr. Witte gives it, does not contain the Epistolæ Theophræ Leidenses; but in compensation for this it contains nine letters to Father Kircher; besides Epistolarum Londinensium Catholica ad Wicklefo Waldensium.

☞ KUSTER (LUDOLF), a very learned writer [A] in the beginning of the 18th Century, was born in February 1670 at Blomberg, a little town in the county of Lippe in Westphalia, and was son of Ludolf Kuster, Magistrate of that place. His elder brother, who was an excellent scholar, inspired him very early with a love to learning, and took a particular care of his education. This brother taught polite learning at Berlin in the College of Joachim, called so from the Elector, who founded it. Ludolf Kuster was

[A] A very learned writer.] This appears from his works, the catalogue of which is as follows. I. Historia Critica Homeri. Francfort 1696 in 8vo, This book shews a great extent of reading; but our author did not value it much afterwards, when he had made a greater progress in learning. He thought that he had begun too early to appear in the world under the character of an author. In this tract he took upon him the name of Neocorus, which in Greek signifies a sexton, as Kuster does in High Dutch. The following book appeared under the same name; II. Bibliotheca Librorum collecta a L. Neocoro. Utrecht five tomes in 8vo. This work was continued from the month of April 1697 to the end of the year 1699. Mr. Kuster was at first employed alone in this journal; but being afterwards engaged in some other works, he took into his assistance Mr. Henry Sike, who was afterwards Professor of Hebrew in the University of Cambridge. They wrote in conjunction till June 1699, when Mr. Kuster left this work to Mr. Sike, who continued it no longer than the last six months of that year. III. Jamblichi de Vita Pythagoræ Liber, Græcè & Latine cum nova versione, emendationibus, & Notis L. Kusteri. Accedit Porphyrus de Vita Pythagoræ cum Notis L. Holstenii & C. Ritterbusii; itemque Anonymus apud Photium de Vita Pythagoræ. Amsterdam 1707 in 4to. Dr. Kuster's notes are merely critical, in which he restores a prodigious number of passages in his authors. IV. Suidæ Lexicon Græcè & Latine. Textum Græcum cum Manuscriptis Codicibus collatum à quamplurimis mendis purgavit, notisque perpetuis illustravit, versionem Emiliæ Porti innumeris in locis correxit, indicesque Auctorum & Rerum adjectit Ludolfus Kusterus Professor Humaniorum Literarum in Gymnasio Berolinensi. Cambridge 1705 three volumes in fol. In this edition Mr. Kuster has collated the text of Suidas with three manuscripts in the King of France's library in the Louvre, and marked the various readings of other manuscripts. By this means he has corrected the text in a prodigious number of places. He has likewise corrected Emiliæ Porti's translation. His notes are short, and in them he gives the reasons of his corrections, whether taken from manuscripts, or made by conjecture. He frequently points out the authors, whose words are quoted by Suidas without mentioning their names. He has likewise inserted the observations of Dr. John Pearson, Bishop of Chester, written with his own hand in the margin of a copy of Suidas. These Remarks are distinguished from the rest by the Bishop's name. The author of a Latin letter dated at Oxford January 13, 1706 under the name of C. Veratius Philoellen to M. Lucilius Profuturus, published by Mr. Le Clerc (1), observes, that though he had great expectations from Dr. Kuster, yet this edition much surpassed it. Et si multa a V. C. Ludolfo Kustero, expectaveram, attamen Expectationem meam superavit nova Suidæ editio, quam ab aliquot Mensibus magnâ cum voluptate verso. And Mr. Le Clerc tells us (2), that this edition is very correct and very beautiful in all respects; and that the university furnished part of the expence of it. However it was attacked by James Gronovius, upon which our author wrote; V. Diatriba L. K. in quâ Editio Suidæ Cantabrigiensi contra Cavillationes J. G. Aristarchi Leydenfis defenditur: inserted in Monsieur Le Clerc's Bibliothèque Choise Tom. XXIV. p. 49 & seqq. and published separately in 12mo. A new edition of it with additions was published under the title of Diatriba Anti-Gronoviana at Amsterdam 1712 in 8vo. VI. De Museo Alexandrino Diatriba. Inserted in the VIII tome of Gronovius's collection of Greek Antiquities. VII. Ludovici Savoti Dissertationes de Nummis antiquis linguâ Gallicâ in Latinum translatae à L. Neocoro: inserted in the XI Tome of Grevius's Roman Antiquities. VIII. Picturæ antiquæ sepulchri Nasoniorum in Viâ Flaminiâ delineatæ & incisæ à Petro Sancto Bacteriolo, explicatæ à Joanne Petro Bellorio: ex Italicâ Linguâ in Latinam translulit L. Neocorus: inserted in the XII

Tome of Grevius's Roman Antiquities. IX. Aristophanis Comediæ undecim Græcè & Latine. Amsterdam 1710 in fol. The reader may see an account of this edition in the article of ARISTOPHANES (3). X. Novum Testamentum Græcum cum Lectionibus Variantibus MSS. Exemplarium, Versionum, Editionum, S. S. Patrum & Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, & in easdem Notis. Accedunt Loca Scripturæ parallela, aliaque exegetica. Præmittitur Dissertatio de Libris Novi Testamenti, & Canonis constitutione & S. Textus Novi Fœderis ad nostra usque tempora Historiâ. Studio & Labore Joannis Millii S. T. P. Collectionem Millianam recensuit, meliori ordine disposuit, novisque accessionibus locupletavit Ludolphus Kusterus. Rotterdam 1710 in fol. Dr. Kuster in his Preface having highly applauded Dr. Mill's work, observes, that those, who would explode the use of Criticism upon the sacred writings, as unprofitable and pernicious, labour under a great mistake. For they cannot deny that there are various readings; and they dare not assert, that Robert Stephens or any other editor of the new testament were inspired in such a manner, as never to mistake the true text of the sacred writers, especially considering the difference, which there is between the Manuscripts, which they had in their hands. Those different readings either are of some importance, or they are not. If the former, why should those valuable monuments of Antiquity be suppressed, by the assistance of which, we are enabled to discover the true reading of the sacred text? If the latter, why should not they be published, since they are so far from being any prejudice to religion, that they may be of the greatest service to it, by shewing the wonderful conformity between the vast number of manuscripts, editions, versions, and quotations of the scriptures, in every thing, even of the lightest nature? This will easily appear by comparing all the various readings collected with so much care by Dr. Mill; for except a small number, all those different readings are of no importance. However this does not diminish the value of that learned man's work, but on the contrary advances it; since the consequence which may be drawn from it is this, that we have the sacred text as perfect as is necessary to make it the foundation of our faith. Dr. Kuster afterwards explains the nature and different sorts of the various readings. It must necessarily be laid down as a principle, that of all the various readings of one and the same text there can be but one true. So that when we have the characters, by which we may know the true one, all the rest are not to pass for various readings, but for corruptions of the text, whatever may be the cause of them. Thus if we had the originals of the apostles now extant, there would be no various readings. But because we have them not, and there is frequently reason to doubt which of all the various readings is the truest, we ought to take all the corruptions of the text for various readings, at least they must be looked upon as such till the true reading be certainly discovered by the principles of solid criticism. After this explication Dr. Kuster divides the various readings into four kinds. I. Those, which are improperly called so. II. Those, which are ambiguous. III. True ones, but not very important. IV. Those which are of considerable moment. Upon all these various readings he makes useful and judicious reflections: he observes, for instance, that the different manner of spelling of the same word among writers must not be taken for so many different readings, the orthography of the Greek Language not being the same at all times, nor in all places. Some authors write φιν, others φιν; some ετρου; others εττι, &c. There are several readings of this sort in Dr. Mill's collection. As to those, which are ambiguous, we are to place in this rank all those collected from the quotations of the fathers, when it is uncertain whether they were so in their copies, or whether quoting them by memory they have not forgot the proper terms of the original. It is necessary

(1) Biblioth. Choise, tom. 9. pag. 187, & seq.

(2) Ibid. pag. 180.

(3) Vol. 2. pag. 264.

was admitted there very young, and soon made a considerable progress in his studies. Upon the recommendation of Baron Spanheim he was appointed tutor to the two sons of the Count de Schwerin, Prime Minister of the King of Prussia, who, upon our author's quitting that station, procured him from that Prince a pension of four hundred livres. He had likewise a promise of a Professorship of polite learning in the College of Joachim. Till this should be vacant, Kuster, who was then but between twenty five and twenty six years of age, resolved to travel into Germany, France, England, and Holland. He went first to Francfort upon the Oder, where he studied the Civil Law for some time, and thence to Antwerp, Leyden, and Utrecht, where he staid a considerable time, and wrote there several works. Having collected some money by this means, and by reading Lectures upon the public Law to the German Noblemen, he left Utrecht in 1699; and took a voyage to England, from whence he went to France in the beginning of the year following. His chief employment there was to collate Suidas with three manuscripts in the King's Library, which furnished him with a great many fragments, which had never been published. About the end of the year 1700 he returned to England, and in four years finished his edition of Suidas, in which he laboured day and night. He related himself, that being one night awaked by thunder and lightning, he was seized with a dreadful apprehension on account of this work, so that he rose immediately, and carried it to bed with him, with all the affection of a father for an only son. He was honoured with the degree of Doctor by the University of Cambridge, which made him several advantageous offers to continue there, but he was obliged to wave them, being recalled to Berlin, where he was installed in the Professorship which had been promised him. The first Professor of the College of Joachim dying, our author imagined, that the date of his appointment, which he carried as high as the moment of his departure, and his new title of Library-keeper to the King, gave him a claim to that post of honour. But a Professor, who was prior to him in the exercise of his function, obtaining that place, he extremely resented it. At the end of the year the Treasurer, who paid the Professors, demanding a fee out of his stipend, Kuster refused to allow it; and exclaiming the second time against it as an injustice, proposed at last to resign his places for a sum of money. The Treasurer taking him at his word, he received ten thousand livres, and returned to Holland, and went to Amsterdam, where he boarded for some time, and afterwards took an house. He had gained some money by his edition of Suidas, and was assisted by some of his relations. But the expence of living at Amsterdam being great, he removed to Rotterdam, where he hoped to live cheaper; though he found himself mistaken. He went some time after to Antwerp to confer with the Jesuits with regard to his doubts about Religion; and being brought over by them to the Roman Catholic Religion, he abjured that of the Protestants on the 25th of July 1713 in the Church of the Noviciate belonging to the Jesuits. The King of France rewarded him with a pension of two thousand livres, and as a mark of distinction ordered him to be admitted supernumerary Associate of the Academy of Inscriptions. But he did not enjoy this new settlement long; for he died on the 12th of October 1716 of an abscess in the Pancreas, being forty six years of age. He was of an easy and quiet disposition. He was a great master of the Latin tongue, and wrote well in it; but his chief excellence was his skill in the Greek language, to which he almost entirely devoted himself. He considered the history and chronology of Greek words (these were his usual expressions) as the most solid entertainment of a man of letters.

Upon

cessary to proceed with caution in that case. In the mean time if the manner, in which a passage is quoted in the works of a father, does not appear in an ancient manuscript or version, nor in any other father of the Church, it is to be supposed, that the reading is false, and that the same is owing only to the forgetfulness of him, who makes the quotation. But if it be confirmed by the authority of one or two fathers of the Church, and not to be found in any manuscript or version, the same ought to be ranked among these, which are doubtful. With respect to the various readings, which are of some importance, Dr. Kuster makes some remarks omitted by Dr. Mill, and corrects some in which he believes that learned Divine to have been mistaken. Dr. Mill, for instance, has set down a various reading from Suidas relating to a passage, which he thought that author had quoted from Luke XVI. 3. whereas it was really a quotation from Aristophanes. But as Dr. Kuster has taken notice of some errors of Dr. Mill, on the other hand he sometimes vindicates him against such critics, who have censured him without cause. He has compared the text with twelve MSS. which Dr. Mill never saw. Of these twelve there were nine in the King of France's library; but except one, which has all the books of the new testament, all the rest contain no more than the four Gospels. The tenth MS. belonged to Mr. Carpzovius, a Minister at Leipzig, and contains the four Gospels.

The 11th was brought from Greece by Mr. Seidel of Berlin; but it has not the four Gospels. The last, which was one of those, that Dr. Kuster esteemed most, was communicated to him by Mr. Bornier, who bought it at the public sale of the library of Mr. Francius, Professor of Rhetoric at Amsterdam. After the preface of Dr. Kuster there follows a letter of Monsieur Le Clerc, concerning Dr. Mill's work, XI. Epistola, in qua Præfatio quam V. C. J. P. [Jacobus Perizonius] novissimæ Dissertationi suæ de ære gravi præposuit, refellitur. Leyden 1713 in 8vo, XII. De vero usu Verborum Mediorum apud Græcos, eorumque differentia a Verbis Aëviis & Passivis. Annexa est Epistola de Verbo Cerno ad Virum Clar. J. P. Auctore Ludolpho Kustero, Regiæ Inscriptionum Academiæ socio. Paris 1714 in 12mo. XIII. Explication d'une Inscription Greque envoyée de Smyrne, inserted in the Mémoires de Trevoux for September 1715. XIV. Examen Criticum Editionis novissimæ Herodoti Gronovianæ: inserted in Monsieur Le Clerc's Bibliothèque ancienne & moderne, Tom. V. p. 383, & seqq. There has been published in Holland under the name of Grævius, and with the title of Nova Cobors Musarum, a little tract of Kuster written in 1699 for the instruction of some young noblemen. Our author published a specimen of a new edition of Robert Stephens Thesaurus, with great improvements, in Monf. La Roche's Memoirs of Literature, Vol. V. p. 298, & seqq.

(a) Memoires de Trevoux, Mars 1717; Nouvelles Lettres, du 19 Decemb. 1716, & du 9 Janv. 1717.

Upon this account he despised all other parts of learning; and Mr. Themiseul relates in his Letters, that this zealous Grammarian meeting one day with Monsieur Bayle's Commentaire Philosophique in a Bookseller's shop, he threw it down, and said, "This is nothing but a book of reasoning: non sic itur ad Astra (a)." Since the writing of this, we have received a letter from the very learned Mr. Joseph Wasse [B], Rector

[B] A letter from the very learned Mr. Joseph Wasse . . . containing several curious particulars concerning our author. Mr. Wasse writes as follows. "Dr. Kuster, a tall, thin, pale man, seemingly unable to bear fatigue, was nevertheless indefatigable and of an uncommon application to letters. He formed himself under Grævius. I was acquainted with him from 1700 to 1714. Upon my collecting the Remains of Anacreon for Mr. Barnes about 1702, he introduced me to Dr. Bentley. You must be known, says he, to that Gentleman, whom I look upon, not only as the first scholar in Europe, but as the best of friends. I only hinted to him the difficulty I lay under in relation to the officers of the customs, and presently after he accommodated that troublesome affair to my intire satisfaction, without so much as once letting me know he had any hand in it till near a year after: unde satis compertum mihi Bentleyum esse re officiosum, non verbis. Many an excellent emendation upon Suidas have I received from him. I the rather mention this, continues Mr. Wasse, because when that Lexicon was in the press, Kuster with indignation shewed me an anonymous letter in Latin addressed to him, wherein he was advised not to treat the Doctor with that distinction, if he intended his book should make its way in the learned world. But to proceed, when he came to write upon Suidas, he found himself under a necessity of making Indices of all the authors mentioned by the antients, Eustathius particularly, and 19 Volumes of commentaries upon Aristotle &c. of the history, Geography, and chronological characters occasionally mentioned. Dr. Bentley prevailed upon me to give him some assistance. Those that fell to my lot were chiefly Eustathius on the Odyssea, seven or eight scholars, Plutarch, Galen. You may judge of Kuster's dispatch and application, when I tell you, I could by no means keep pace with him, though I began the last author Jan. 9. 1703, and finished him March 8th of the same year, and in proportion too the remainder. Though I corrected all the sheets of the first volume, yet I never perceived he had omitted some less material words, nor ever knew the true reason. I have heard him blamed too for not mentioning the names of one or two persons, who sent him a few notes. But this was occasioned, I am confident, by the hurry he was always in, and the great number of letters, memorandums, and other papers he had about him. As I remember he translated de novo in a manner five or six sheets a week, and remarked upon them; so that the work was hastily executed, and would have been infinitely more perfect, had he allowed himself time. Some people thought they assisted him, when they did not. A person of figure took him into his closet after dinner, and told him he would communicate something of mighty importance, a καμψύλιον, which in all difficulties had been many years his oracle. In an ill hour I met Kuster transported with delight. We found it was Budaus's Lexicon, large paper, with only the names of the authors he quotes writ in the margin, without one single remark or addition. Kuster, the best natured man alive, was terribly put to it how to treat one, that meant well, and continually enquired what service it did him, and triumphed that he was able to contribute so largely to the worthy editor of Suidas. Towards the close of the work, Kuster grew very uneasy, emaciated to the last degree, cold as a statue, and just as much alive as a man three parts dead. Sure I was to hear every time I called upon him, O utinam illucescat iste Dies, quo huic Operi manum ultimam imponam! It may now be proper to acquaint you in what manner this Gentleman used to relax and forget his labours over a bottle (for even Scipio and Lælius were not such fools as to be wise always); and that was generally in the Poetical way, or in conversations, that turned upon antiquities, coins, inscriptions, and obscure passages of the antients. Sometimes he performed on the spinet at our music-club, and was by the connoisseurs accounted a master. His chief companions were Dr. Sike, famous in Oriental Learning, Davies, and Needham; Mr. Oddy, who writ Greek pretty well, and has left notes upon Dio, and a version of Apollonius Rhodius, which are repositied in Lord Oxford's Library; he is the person whose conjectures upon Avienus were printed by Dr. Hudson at the end of his Geographers; and Mr. Barnes the Greek Professor; concerning whom I beg leave to insert a few particulars known to none besides myself. His mother that was afterwards, was carried to Church to be buried; but the nails of the coffin being observed to make her bleed, they immediately gave her air, and she recovered. Sir Erasmus Smith of Essex, aged near 60, and not intending to marry, resolved to adopt one of the scholars of Christ's Hospital. Barnes was recommended by the master, and approved of by the Knight, who offered to settle an estate of two thousand pounds a year upon him, provided he would change his name. The mother, a woman of sense, was for it; but his father would by no means interpose, and left it entirely to his son to act as he pleased; and poverty was his option and fate. The Knight afterward married, and had issue, and often invited Joshua to his house. I have the same opinion of dreams that Petronius had; however I cannot help relating one, that he spoke often of. Two or three years before the intended adoption, when he knew not what a verse was, he thought himself assaulted by a ragged boy, who called himself Poverty. They fought a long time, and Barnes at last killed him near a Church-door; upon which his father appeared in the habit of a genius, and congratulated him in words that ended thus;

*"Felixque vincas, & domabis
"Pauperium malè pervicacem.*

He protested to me, that he told this next morning to his school-fellows, and they acquainted him with the sense and measure. The event was, that he got rid of poverty by marrying an old rich widow, that knew nothing of Greek, but admired and loved the sound of it. His Essex was thought to exceed any thing of Duport's on Rhodomannus, and pleased the University so much, that he ventured to appear for the Professorship, but was not well used by the Electors. One of them (Dr. Montagu) told me that the candidates examined each other publicly; that Barnes challenged Mich. Paine to speak or write; both which he wisely declined; then they opened Aristophanes, in which Barnes appeared vastly superior. However the Doctor voted, but with reluctance, for one of his own College. This repulse in a thing he had set his heart upon, quite turned his head, insomuch that he could hardly bear the sight of a Greek book for a long time. At last he turned himself to English History, which made him known to numbers of Gentlemen, whose regimen was too warm for a man of letters; so that when I knew him, he seemed to be nil nisi magni nominis umbra. When some of us pointed out any of his mistakes in Euripides, Ye little Smatterers, says he, I have forgot more Greek than any of you ever knew. Kuster often amused himself in challenging Barnes, though more than his match in composition. Both spoke the language, but neither readily. Both wrote in several measures; Kuster after much premeditation, Barnes generally in eight or ten minutes. Kuster's talent lay in the Iambic and Hendecasyllabon; the other was equally ready in any kind of verse; but when he corrected any thing, it was for the worse. In many trials I " never

Rector of Aynho in Northamptonshire, containing several curious particulars concerning “ never once saw Barnes hesitate. There lay once before him some lines, among which the word Knapfack occurred. Every body whispered (he was a little deaf) This must nonplus him; but he overheard them, and wrote on without being any way disconcerted; Silence; τῷ λυτῷ is the proper term: See Leo Imperator's Taciturnitas, & Simocatta. I am sensible how frigid these trifles will appear to a reader, who has time to criticise and invent; whereas they appeared otherwise to those, who were in re presenti. One gave, Nocte pluit notā &c: Barnes immediately cries.

“ Νυκτὸς οὖν πάσης, ἕκαστος διαμάτα πρῶσι “ Χθυσὸν δ' ἀρχῆσι σὺν Διὶ Κείσασε ἔχει.

“ but afterwards allowed my correction μειομαίνων ἀρχῆσι. Another time some Dutch and Swedish travellers, who could speak English, suspecting collusion, insisted, that a book should be opened by one of their company. It was done at these words,

“ A Squire he had, whose name was Ralph

“ and Barnes writ

“ Ὅπλαφόρος δὲ οἱ ἦν ὃ ἔνομα ἔσκε Ραλφῶ, ἤμισυ ἀρ' οἱ ἀγῶνι ἐπέετο ἀνδροφόνειο.
“ Ἄλλοι ῥά λφον ἔπειον ἰπιστόμῳ μινύ σφῷ
“ Ῥαλφῶν δ' ἄλλοι ὀνομακλήδην καλέουσιν.
“ Ἡμῶς δ' ἔντ' ἐδίλωσι κασίγηται Κλαρίοιο “ Ῥαλφον, Ῥαλφῶν τε Ραδῶλφον τ' ἐξήρομεν, “ Μίτρον γὰρ πρώτῃ σέλιται διλοῖσι ποιηταῖς
“ Ὡ ἐπὶ ὅς ἦναι σαρλαθῶνομεν ἀιδματι πῶνι.
“ Ἐν δ' ἔπῳ ἀν' ἰλογοῖ, κ' ἀν' μίτροιο χάρην δῖ.
“ Ἐι τοιαῖσι λέγουμαι, ἐν χρόνῳ ἀρκιον ἔσι.

“ In the last verse νοτὸς means rather what may be understood, than one that understands. The wine being but indifferent one evening, some body repeated Martial's Quid te, Tucca, juvat &c. which Barnes rendered at the desire of the company, as I remember, thus.

“ Ὅινω τί σε, Τύκκα, παλαιῶ μίξαι δφίλλαι “ Ἐν Βυτικάνοις εὔπφα τιδύλα κάδοις;
“ Ποίησεν τι γὰρ ἰδῶν ὁ οὐκ ἀγαθὸς Διόνυσος
“ Ἦ τί σε ἐγγύτης Βάκχος ἔδρακε κακῶ;
“ Ῥάδιον ἰδ' ἡμῶν, τῷ δ' ἀγῶνι Διόνυσος ἐκέρσῃ, “ Καμπάνῳ τε φέρον τοξικῶ λυγρῶ δῖῳ,
“ Συμπόται ἄξιο ἰσὶ τοῖ ταχῶ πότμον ἰλοπιῶν,
“ Τίμοι ἀμφοτεριῶς ἄξιον ἢ μιλίτης.

“ Upon publication of Suidas, Kuster in a little time grew very fat, and returning into Prussia found his patrons retired from Court, and his salary precarious. What was more, his principles, which inclined to what is now called Arianism, rendered him not very acceptable to some persons. In a little time measures were taken to make him uneasy, and he retired to Amsterdam. It seems the people of Berlin were of a different opinion from an old Gentlewoman, who thought herself somebody. She boarded in the same house with Kuster, and heard him often speak of Pearson's manuscript Suidas. Is Mr. Kuster within, Madam? said a Gentleman. I think he is; you are a young man; I am glad you keep such company. You intend, I hear, to give him a degree: I am sure he gives you a good example. He is a devout Christian: he will go to Heaven be sure, for he reads blessed Bishop Pearson day and night.—Pray Madam, shorten your sermon; I am in haste.—Ab these scholars, they love nothing that's good.—Mary, call the Professor. At Amsterdam Kuster reprinted Dr. Mills's New Testament, and published Aristophanes, and some additional remarks upon Suidas under Mr. Le Clerc's cover. But his banker failing, he was reduced to extreme poverty; and happening at that very juncture to be invited to Paris by his old friend l'Abbe Bignon, was unfortunately prevailed on to join himself to the Galli-

“ can Church. He desired me to write to him as usual, but never on the article of religion; declaring at the same time, how he had not been obliged to make a formal recantation, or condemn the Reformed by any express act of his; but merely to conform. How far this is true, I know not; what is certain is only, that he was promised all the favour and distinction any convert could expect. He was presently admitted a Member of the Royal Academy of Inscriptions, and in 1714 in return for a paper of verses I sent him, made me a present of his book De vero usu verborum mediocritatis; χροστια χαλκίων. The last I had from Kuster contained only Queries upon Hesychius, on whom, before he left England, he had made about five thousand emendations. His Queries were not over difficult; and from thence I guessed his health much impaired; and it proved so indeed, for we heard soon after, that he had been blooded five or six times for a fever, and that upon opening his body, there was found a cake of sand along the lower region of the belly. This, I take it, was occasioned by his sitting in a manner double, and writing on a very low table, surrounded with three or four circles of books placed on the ground; which was the situation we usually found him in. He had a clear head, cool, and proper for debate; he behaved in a very inoffensive manner, and I am persuaded the last error of his life was almost the only one, and will by charitable persons be placed in good measure to the account of his deplorable circumstances; for if oppression, which only affects a part, will, why shall not the loss of all one's fortunes, purchased with so much labour, make a wife man mad? Let those only censure him, who in plentiful circumstances have the spirit to serve their country without place or title.” We shall subjoin here the following letters of Dr. Kuster to Mr. Wasse.

“ Viro doctissimo & amicissimo Josepho Waffio S. D.
“ Ludolphus Kusterus.

“ En tibi Epistolam à Relando, quæ de Apparatu Kobliano te edocebit. Addidi Schedulam a D. Leibnitio, quæ specimen Collationis cum MSS. Guelferbytanis continet. An integram Collationem ejus operâ nacturi simus, proximè scire licebit, nam denuo ad eum scripsi. In ultimâ ad me Epistolâ hæc tantum eâ super re scripsit, non proletariâ diligentia opus fore, ut MSS. illi cum editis conferantur. In eadem Epistolâ miratur hiatus Gervassii eisdem fuisse in MS. Cantabrigiensi, ac in Apographo ad vos transmisso; subdubitaturque annon forte per ἀελευψίαν quædam in collatione prætermissa fuerint. Sed mihi quidem nullum dubium est, quin lacunas illas suppleturus fuisset, si MS. vester integer fuisset. De Collatione Plutii & Nubium cum MS. Arundeliano tibi & Dom. Daubio gratias quam maximas ago, speroque me itidem collationem Plutii cum MS. Dom. Wheleri tuâ operâ nacturum esse. Audio & Oxonii aliquas Aristophanes fabulas MSS. exitare. Quare pergratum mihi, faceres, si eâ de re Literas dare velles ad Hudsonum qui jam ante aliquot menses prolixè mihi pollicitus est usum omnium illorum, quæ in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ hanc ad rem pertinentia reperirentur. Refricabis igitur ipsi haud gravatim rei hujus memoriam. Aristophanes Dom. Posslerii nondum ad manus meas pervenit, Apparatus ad futuram editionem Aristophanis quotidie crescit, omnesque hic non spernendam ejus Auctoris Editionem sibi pollicentur, Owenum denuo ad incitas redactum ex aliis quoque audivi, omnemque proinde spem abjeci illum mihi unquam solvendo fore. Clariss. Bentleio salutem meo nomine nunties plurimam, eique dicas me responsum expectare ad id, quod de Suidâ ad ipsum scripseram. Si vel ipse vel tu abiens eris, quæso per Literas hoc ipsum meo nomine roges. Est enim res alicujus momenti; & Bibliopolæ identidem me hac de re percontantur. Doctorem Perkinsum (cui dicas, quæso, me sæpe hic Amstelodami cum amico ejus Tobinsono poculum in ejus salutem haucerning our author, which we shall present to the reader in the note.

“ fiffe) Sikium, alioſque item meis verbis ſalutabis. Quando te hic expectabimus? Sane deſiderium tui hic videnti apud me creſcit in horas, ex quo mihi ſcripſiſti te huc venturum eſſe. Clericus te ſalutat, itidemque tuum expectat adventum. Vale, mi Waſſi, perſuaſumque habe me in pauciſſimis te amare & diligere. Amſtelodami d. 18 Mart. St. Nov. 1707.

“ P. S. Quæſo an ad Gradum Doctõris in Theologiã Cantabrigiæ promotus es? Id enim ex unis Literis tuis colligi poſſe videtur. Si ſic, ſcribas mihi eã de re clariuſ, ut tibi eo nomine gratulari poſſim.”

“ Viro doctiſſimo & longe amicitioſiſſimo Joſepho Waſſo S. P. D. Ludolphus Kuſterus.

“ In amicitiam noſtram me peccatum credebam, ſi Cronfeldio ad vos redituro nihil ad te literarum darem, præſertim cum tam longo tempore nihil ad te ſcripſiſſem. Quamvis autem ob diuturnum ſilentium me negligentia in ſcribendo jure forſan condemnare queas, non tamen ideo me in te amando, memoriamque tui recolendo ſegniorem fuiſſe concedo; de quã re, etiam me tacente, te minimè dubitare perſuaſus ſum, quippe qui ſciam, meum erga te animum jam à pluribus annis abunde tibi peripetum eſſe. Saluſtius tuus quãdo tandem in Lucem exhibit? Ex Cronfeldio enim intelligo, eum ante diſceſſum tuum Cantabrigiæ (quod tamen ante ſperaveramus) non potuiſſe ad finem perducere. Ariſtophanes meus prælo mox liberabitur, & ut puto, proximo menſe in lucem prodibit. Opto tantum, ut expectationis, quam nonnullos de hac Editione concepiſſe video, reſpondere valeam. Nova Editio Irenæi Pariſiſ paratur, eaque prælum jam ſubit, ut ex Literis illuſtriſſimi Bignonii nuper intellexi. Plura Cronfeldius coram tibi narrabit. Vale, Vir amicitioſiſſime, & me amare perge, Amſtelodami, d. xii Maii 1709.

“ P. S. Cum proximè ad me ſcribes, quæſo fac me certiore, annon de Diodoro aliquando edendo ſeriò cogites. Nam ejus Libri Editio valde deſideratur.”

“ Amico optimo Joſepho Waſſo S. P. D. Ludolphus Kuſterus.

“ Quamvis non dubitem te benè valere, meique memorem adhuc vivere, id ipſum tamen ex te cognocere malo per literas, quarum me poſt longum illud, quo inter nos uſi ſumus ſilentio, ingens nunc deſiderium tenet. Apud me quidem priuſtinus ille, quo te proſecutus ſemper fui, amor integer adhuc & illibatus durat, eoque firmiores in animo meo radices agit, quo magis ad vetuſtatem accedit; tantum abeſt, ut diuturnitate temporis ſeneſcat. Qui haſ tibi reddet, eſt Juvenis doctus, nomine Burgius, Sileſius, à Clar. Oleario, Proſſore Lipſienſi, mihi commendatus; quem viciffim tibi trado, ſi forte ei vel Londini vel Cantabrigiæ aliquã in re commodare queas. Cupidus enim eſt cognoscendi viros doctos, ſtatumque rei literariæ in Britannia veſtra; quippe cujus rei gratiã peregrinationem hanc ſuſcepit. Ego benè adhuc valeo, totumque me in Literas abdidi, & potiſſimum nunc in Heſychio perpoliando occupatus ſum; ad quam rem & ſymbolam tuam expecto; non dubito enim, quin non pauca in eo Scriptore obſervaveris, quæ me alioſque fugerint. De Lite, quæ nuper Clericum inter & Burmanno exorta eſt, nota tibi omnia eſſe non dubito. Quamvis non diffiteor Clericum aliquando latus apertum adverſariis ſuis præbuiſſe, non tamen merebatur, ut tam indignis modis a Burmanno acciperetur. Effrañis enim illa Linguae Licentia, & immodica verborum acerbitas, a viris doctis & humanitate profitentibus quam longiſſimè abeſſe debet. De ſtatu rei Literariæ in Belgio noſtro plura coram ipſe Burgius tibi narrabit, ſub cujus diſceſſum haſ ipſas Literas raptim exaravi. Vale & me ama, Amſtelodami, d. 16. Sept. 1710.

“ P. S. Si forte Cantabrigiæ hæ Literæ te offendant, rogo ut ſalutem meo nomine impertiariſ amicis veteribus, Perkinſo, Barneſo, Daviſo, & aliis.

“ P. S. Saluſtium tuum nondum vidi, ſed valde videre cupio.” T

KYRIANDER (WILLIAM), a German Civilian, having begun his ſtudies of Civil Law in Germany, continued them in France and at Padua; and went afterwards to Venice, in order to join the practice to the theory by frequenting the bar (a). He undertook there a tranſlation of a work of Leander Alberti [A], which was printed at Cologne in 1567. You will find in Moreri, that he was Syndic of Treves, and that he published the Annals of that City [B]; but you will find there that he changed his Religion; and that his work was greatly decried on that account by the Jeſuits [C].

(a) Kyriander, Præfat. Deſcript. Italiae.

[A] He . . . undertook a tranſlation of a work of Leander Alberti.] This work contains a Deſcription of Italy, and has not been deſpiſed by learned men. Read Voſſius, Ch. XII. lib. 3. de Hiſtoricis Latinis (1), and la Popeliniere, pag. 414. of the Hiſtory of Hiſtories. Kyriander made uſe of three Italian editions of the work, which he tranſlated into Latin; but I am ſurprized that he ſays nothing of the edition, which was enlarged with the Deſcription of the Iſlands near Italy. This edition was printed at Venice appreſſo Ludovico de gli Avanzis in 1561 in 4to. The Tranſlator was greatly in the wrong not to have followed this, and not to have added to his work this Deſcription of the Iſlands.

(1) Pag. m. 680.

[B] He published the Annals of that City.] It is a work in folio, and was printed at Deuxponts in 1603. Michael Hertzius does not mention this edition; he only takes notice of that of 1625, and pretends, that theſe Annals begin in the year of the world 966 (2). This is carrying them up above ſeven hundred years before the deluge. Zeiller (3) might have informed him, that he ſhould have ſaid 1966, and not 966. In the ſecond edition of Moreri printed in Holland it is 1066. This is carrying it back near ſix hundred years before Noah.

(2) Hertzius, Bibliotheca Germanica, num. 464.

(3) De Hiſtoricis, Part. 2 pag. 81.

[C] He changed his Religion; and his work was greatly decried on that account by the Jeſuits.] Let us ſee what Maſenius ſays: Kyriander res Trevirenſium, ut ſiatm Deo Principique ſuo violarat, perverſè perſecutus eſt (4). i. e. “Kyriander has written an erroneous account of the Hiſtory of Treves, having before violated his faith to God, and his Prince.”

(4) Maſenius, in Deſcript. Compend. Hiſt. Trevir. apud Mazarinum, Epityma pag. 493.

L.

LABE (LOYSA or LOUISA) a curtezan of Lyons, has been ranked among the French authors by la Croix du Maine, and du Verdier-Vau-Privas. She flourished at Lyons under Henry II in the year 1555 (a), and her works were printed there the same year [A]. She did not act like curtezans in all respects; for if she, on one hand, was of their turn of mind, in that she would be well paid for her favours; on the other hand she shewed a certain regard for men of learning which women of that character have not, she indulging them the favour on free cost. Her character will be better known by the passage cited below [B].

(a) La Croix du Maine, pag. 291.

[A] Her works were printed at Lyons in 1555.] They consist of a dialogue in French prose intitled, Le Debat de Folie & d'Honneur; i. e. "The Contest between Folly and Honour," and several Poems of her writing (1), as also Encomiums written by several Poets in her honour, in Greek, Latin, Italian, and French (2).

(1) La Croix du Maine, pag. 291.

(2) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bib. Francoise, p. 822.

(3) Idem, ibid.

[B] Her character will be better known by the passage cited below.] I make no alteration in du Verdier's words. "Louisa Labbe, says he (3), a curtezan of Lyons, (otherwise called the beautiful rope-maker's wife, her husband being of that trade) was a very skilful rider; for which reason the Gentlemen who had access to her, used to call her Captain Lewis. She was a woman of wit, but not very beautiful. She entertained at her house in the most obliging manner, Lords, Gentlemen, and other persons of merit, with conversation, with music both vocal and instrumental, in which she was excellently well skilled, with the reading of good Latin, Italian, and Spanish authors, with which her closet was abundantly stocked; and with the most delicious sweetmeats. In a word, she used to communicate to them the most secret things she had; and, to say all in word, was free of her body to such as would pay for it; however, not to all, and upon no account to mechanicks and persons in a low way of life, though they would have given her ever so much. She was particularly fond of learned men, who were so much in her good graces, that those of her acquaintance were preferred before any Nobleman though of the highest distinction; and she would rather have indulged a favour to the one gratis, than to the other for a great number of crowns, which is contrary to the practice of women of her profession." This passage has been quoted in the continuation of the general critique of Maimbourg's History of Calvinism (4), and the following remark is added to it (5). "Demosthenes would have been glad had Lais the curtezan resembled this; he would not have made a voyage to Corinth to no purpose; nor found by experience,

(4) Letter 18. pag. 595.

(5) Ibid. pag. 596.

"That at such treats an author, like a fool, Must draw his purse out, and pay down his reckoning."

This female honoured and dishonoured learning at the same time; she dishonoured it, by her leading the life of a prostitute at the same time that she was an authoress; and she honoured it, because [the Literati were more favourably received by her gratis, than ignorant people, though they offered her a considerable sum.

☞ This being a curious article, and very imperfect in Bayle, because he had not the materials for it, we shall endeavour to supply what is wanting in it.

LABBE (LOUISA). Writers are divided with regard to the true orthography of her name [A]. Her charms were so great, that her contemporaries lavished every kind of applause on her [B]. We shall here give an account of her works [C], which are very

(1) From the remarks to the Paris edit. 1734, of Bayle's Dictionary, tom. 3. pag. 896. This author thinks her name was Labbé. See also Nicéron, Hommes Illustres, tom. 23. pag. 242, 243. Paris 1703. 12mo.

[A] Writers are divided with regard to the true Orthography of her name.] LABE (1) is her true name, and not Labbé, L'Abbe, or Labe, as Bayle calls her. Our authoress, on account of her charms, was called the beautiful rope-maker's wife, because her husband was of that trade; or rather, as father Colonia believes with probability enough, because he traded in cordage and cables; a name she left to the city in Lyons where she lived, and which it retains to this day, it being called Ruë Belle-Codiere.

[B] Her contemporaries lavished every kind of applause on her.] La Croix du Maine calls her a very learned woman, who wrote finely both in prose and verse, and adds that she had the following words for her anagram, Belle à soy. Paradin, who was at Lyons in her time, and very probably was acquainted with her, bestows an extravagant eulogium on her, and applauds particularly her virtue and chastity. "Louisa Labé (say he) had a face, which resembled more that of an angel than of a human creature; but this was nothing in comparison of the beauties of her mind, which was so chaste, so virtuous, so poetical, and filled with such excellent knowledge, that she seemed to have been created by Heaven, to be admired as a shining miracle among men. For she was not only skilled in the Latin tongue, in such a manner as is above the capacity of her sex, but she likewise excelled surprisingly in the poetry of the vulgar tongues, of which the works she has left to posterity are a proof (2)." James Poilleier, a physician, mathematician and poet, wrote an ode in her praise, wherein he highly applauds her learning and merit. Others also wrote verses in her commendation, and some of these are annexed to her works. Besides her knowledge in languages and her talent at composition, she played finely on the lute, and was a very skilful rider; a proof of her having been well educated, and that she was not so meanly descended as the profession of a rope-maker, which du Verdier ascribes to her husband, might make it to be supposed (3). The author from whom I now borrow, goes on to observe, that all the fine qualities which were admired in her, were depraved by a licentiousness, which though more refined, than that of Lais or Phryne's, was not therefore less blame-worthy (4).

(2) Paradin, Mém. de l'Hist. de Lyon, pag. 355. fol.

(3) Nicéron, Hommes Illustres, tom. 23. p. 244.

(4) Ibid. pag. 245.

[C] We shall here give an account of her works.] All the compositions she left are comprised in a book which is extremely scarce, and entitled Ouvres de Louise Labé, Lionnoise. Lion. Jean de Tournes 1556, in 16mo, pag. 176 not figured. However du Verdier dates it 1555; but I nevertheless am of opinion that there was an edition before that of 1556. He perhaps put that year, because the dedication is dated the 24th of July 1555, and the book was published at the close of that year. Louisa Labé inscribed this dedication to A. M. C. D. B. L. that is, A Mademoiselle Clemence de Bourges, Lionnoise, who also was conspicuous for her merit and learning. I find by Mr. de la Monnoye's manuscript additions to the Bibliothèques Françaises de la Croix du Maine and du Verdier, that John Garou printed a second edition of them in Roan the same year 1556 in 16° (5). The pieces contained very rarely met with. Among these are her elegies, of which we will give a specimen [D].

(5) Ibid. pag. 247, 248.

She

in this collection are as follow: Debat de Folie & d'Amour; i. e. "Contest of Love and Folly." This is a very ingenious dialogue in prose, the subject of which is as follows. Jupiter had invited all the Gods to a banquet. Love and Folly happened to come, at the same time, to the gate of the palace of that God, in order to be one of his guests; but the gate was shut, and only the wicket open. Folly seeing Love just going to step one foot in, advanced in order to get before him, Love being thrust upon, fell into a passion, but folly insisted that she ought to have the precedence: upon this they fell a quarrelling about their respective prerogatives: love finding he could not gain his point by reason and argument, bends his bow, and lets fly an arrow at folly, who baffles all his attempts by becoming invisible; and a moment after satiates her vengeance on love by tearing out his eyes, and covering the place with a bandage, which could not be taken off. Venus complains to Jupiter against folly, and the God is determined to hear their cause. Apollo is council for love, and Mercury for folly; when Jupiter after hearing the debates and consulting the rest of the Gods, pronounced sentence as follows: On account of the difficulty and importance of your disputes, and the diversity of your opinions, we have suspended your contest from this day to three times seven times nine centuries. In the mean time we command you to live amicably together, without injuring one another. Folly shall lead love, and take him whither soever he pleases; and when restored to his sight, (after consulting the fates) Sentence shall be pronounced (6). This charming fiction has since been exhibited in a variety of lights, several Poets having laid claim to it.

[D] Her elegies, of which we will give a specimen.] There are three elegies, part of the third of which we shall transcribe, because it relates to our Louisa Labé. Her lines are as follow:

Quand vous lirez, O Dames Lionnoises,
Ces miens écrits pleins d'amoureuses noies;
Quand mes regrets, ennuis, dépits & larmes
N'oserez chanter en pitoyables Carmes,
Ne veuillez point condamner ma simplesse,
Et jeune erreur de ma sole jeunesse,
Si c'est erreur: mais qui dessous les Cieux
Se peut vanter de n'être vicieux?
L'un n'est content de sa sorte de vie,
Et toujours porte a ses voisins envie.
L'un forcenant de voir la paix en terre,
Par tous moyens tâche y mettre la guerre.
L'autre croyant pauvreté être vice,
A autre Dieu qu'Or ne fait sacrifice.
L'autre sa soy a parjure il emploira
A decevoir quelqu'un qui le croira.
L'un en mentant de sa langue lezarde
Mille brocards sur l'un & l'autre darde.
Je ne suis point sous ces planetes nées,
Qui m'eussent pu tant faire infortunée.
Onques ne fut mon oeil marri, de voir
Chez mon voisin mieux que chez moi pleuvrir.
On ne mis noise ou discord entre amis;
A faire gain jamais ne me soumis;
Mentir, tromper, & abuser autrui,
Tant m'a déplu que medire de lui.
Mais si en moi rien y a d'imparfait,
Qu'on blâme amour, c'est lui seul qui l'a fait,
Sur mon verd âge en ses laqs il me prit,
Lors qu'exercois mon corps & mon esprit,
En mille & mille euvres ingenieuses,
Qu'en peu de temps me rendit ennuieuses,
Pour bien savoir avec l'aiguille peindre,
J'eusse entrepris la renommée estreindre
De celle là, qui plus docte que sage,
Avec Pallas comparoit son Ouvrage,
Qui n'eût vû lors en armes fiere aller,
Porter la lance & bois faire voler
Le devoir faire en l'estour furieux,
Piquer, volter, le Cheval glorieux,
Pour Bradamante, où la haute Marphise,
Sœur de Roger, il m'eust, possible, prise.
Mais quoi? Amour ne put longuement voir
Mon coeur n'aimant que Mars & le savoir,
Et me voulant donner autre souci,

En souriant, il me disoit ainsi:
Tu penses donc, o Lionnoise Dame,
Pouvoir fuir par ce moyen ma flame:
Mais non feras; j'ai subjugué les Dieux
Es bas Enfers, en la Mer & es Cieux:
Et penses tu que n'aye tel pouvoir
Sur les Humains, de leur faire savoir
Qu'il n'y a rien qui de ma main échape?
Plus fort se pense, & plus tôt je le frappe.
De me blamer, quelquefois tu n'as bonte,
En te fiant en Mars, dont tu fais conte:
Mais maintenant, voy si pour persister
En le suivant me pourras resister.
Ainsi parloit, & tout echauffé d'ire,
Hors de sa trouffe une fagette il tire,
Et decobant de son extrême force,
Droit la tira contre ma tendre corce;
Foible harmonis, pour bien couvrir le coeur,
Contre l'Archer, qui toujours est vanqueur.
La Breche faite, entre Amour en la place,
Dont le repos premierement il chasse;
Et le travail qu'il me donne sans cesse.
Boire, manger, & dormir ne me laisse,
Il ne me chaut de solail ne d'ombrage:
Je n'ai qu'Amour & feu en mon courage,
Qui me deguise & fait autre paroître,
Tant que ne peux moi même me connoître.
Je n'avois vû encore seize Hivers,
Lorqu'j'entrai en ces ennus divers;
Et jà voici le troizieme Eté,
Que mon coeur fut par amour arrêté.
Le temps met fin aux hautes Pyramides,
Le temps met fin aux fontaines humides,
Il ne pardonne aux braves Colosses,
Il met à fin les Villes plus prisées;
Finir aussi il a acoutumé
Le feu d'Amour, tant soit-il allumé.
Mais, las! en moi il semble qu'il augmente
Avec le temps, & que plus me tourmente.
Paris aimait Oenone ardemment,
Mais son amour ne dura longuement.
Medée fut aimée de Jason,
Qui tôt après la mit hors sa maison.
Si meritoient elles être estimées,
Et pour aimer leurs Amis, être aimées.
S'étant aimé, on peut amour laisser,
N'est il raison, ne l'étant, se laisser?
N'est il raison te prier de permettre,
Amour, que puisse à mes tourmens fin mettre?
Ne permets point que de Mort fasse épreuve,
Et plus que toi pitoyable la treuve:
Mais si tu veux que j'aime jusqu'au bout,
Fais que celui que j'estime mon tout,
Qui seul me peut faire plorer & rire,
Et pour le quel si souvent je soupire,
Sente en ses os, en son sang, en son ame,
Ou plus ardente, ou plus égale flâme.
Alors ton saix plus aisé me sera,
Quand avec moi quelqu'un te portera (7).

The sense is,

"Ye Ladies of Lyons, when you shall read these compositions of mine filled with amorous contests; when you shall hear me sing in doleful strains, my uneasinesses, vexations, woes and tears, condemn not my simplicity, and the error of my silly youth, if it be an error; but what mortal under the cope of Heaven can boast perfection in all respects? One is not contented with his condition of life, and is eternally envying his neighbour. A second, enraged to see the earth blessed with peace, sets every engine at work to light up a war on it. Another imagining poverty to be a vice, offers sacrifice to no other Deity but gold. A fourth employs his perjured faith, to deceive any person, who shall trust in him. And a fifth lying with his venomous tongue, darts out a thousand taunts and scoffs one upon another. Now I was not born under one of those inauspicious planets, which should make me so unhappy in myself. My eye was never pained to see my neighbour more favoured with the smiles of fortune than myself. I never created strife or discord among friends; and never was venal enough to hunt after profit; to lie, deceive and impose on another,

(7) Œuvres de Louisa Labé, Lionnoise. Lyon, 1556.

She also wrote twenty four sonnets [E], the first of which is in Italian. To the writings of our authorefs are annexed Verses of various Poets in her praise. These consist of twenty four pieces in different kinds of Poetry, one whereof is in Latin, four in Italian, and the rest in French; but there are none in Greek, notwithstanding the assertion of du Verdier. The last copy of verses is of a very great length (20 pages) some particulars whereof being of use, shewing especially her great bravery, we shall transcribe them below [F]. By them we find that she was born about the year 1526 (a). La Croix du Maine has committed two errors, 1st in calling our authorefs Louisa L'Abé, instead of Labé; and 2dly, in giving her Dialogue the title of the Contest of Folly and Honour, instead of Folly and Love (b).

(b) See Father Colonia's Literary History of the City of Lyons, vol. 1. and Nicéron, Hommes Illustres, vol. 23. pag 242. & seq.

(a) See the proof of this in the close of the remark [F].

“ther, would have been as ungrateful to me as to slander him. But if there are any imperfections in me, Cupid only, as being the cause of them, ought to be blamed. The amorous God caught me, when very young, in his snares, at a time when I exercised my body and mind in a thousand ingenious operations, which he soon rendred distasteful to me. So skilful was I in needle works, that I would have attempted to eclipse the renown of that mortal, who, more learned than prudent, set her works in parallel with those of Pallas. Any person who should have seen me at that time, proved in armour, carrying a lance, and shooting darts, doing duty in furious battle, riding forward, and turning the glorious horse, would very possibly have taken me for Bradamante, or the renowned Marphisa, a sister to Rogero. But Cupid could not long bear to see my heart inflamed with no other passions but those of war and learning; and being determined to involve me in different cares, spoke thus to me: O Lady of Lyons; thou fanciest thou mayest by this means, escape my flame; but thou art quite mistaken: for I have subdued the Gods, in Hell, in the Seas and in Heavens. And thinkest thou that I have no power over mortals; to make them sensible that nothing escapes me? The stronger a mortal thinks himself, the sooner I strike him. Thou sometimes dost not scruple to censure me, relying on Mars who is high in thy esteem. But now see whether, by continuing to follow his standards, thou canst be able to resist me. Saying these words, and inflamed with anger, he drew a shaft from his quiver, and letting fly with all his might, levelled directly at my frail body; too weak an armour to defend my heart from the ever-victorious archer. Cupid had no sooner made a breach, but he marches into the place, whence he first drives away quiet; and the incessant toils, which he obliges me to undergo, will not suffer me to eat, drink, or sleep. The sun or the shade are equally indifferent to me; I have nothing but love and fire in my courage, which disguises me to such a degree, that I do not know myself. I was not sixteen years old, when I was subjected to these various cares; and thirteen summers are now past since my heart was first captivated by love. . . Time destroys the most lofty pyramids, dries up the most copious springs; does not spare the most magnificent amphitheatres, nor the most renowned cities. He also used to extinguish the fire of love, how strongly soever it might blaze; but alas; time seems to encrease its ardors in me, and to torture me still more. Paris was fired with a strong passion for Oenone, but then his passion was not lasting. Medea was beloved by Jason, who soon after turned her out of doors. Nevertheless they merited esteem; and love ought to have been repaid with love. . . If a person may leave an object to whom he is dear; is it not reasonable that one who loves and is not loved again should grow tired? Is it not reasonable, O Cupid, for me to beseech thee to permit me to end my torments? Suffer me not to fall a victim to death, and to find it more compassionate than thou. But if thou wilt have my passion to be lasting, cause the dear man, whom I esteem as my only treasure; who alone has the power to make me laugh or weep, and for whom I so often sigh; cause him, I say, to feel in his bones, in his blood, in his soul, a more ardent, or at least an equal flame. Thy burthen will then be lighter, when another shall assist me in supporting it.”

[E] She also wrote twenty four sonnets.] Our Louisa declares her real sentiments with regard to love, when she says at the end of the eighteenth:

*Permetts m'Amour penser quelque folie:
Toujours juis mal, vivant discrettement;
Et ne me puis donner contentement
Si hors de moi ne fais quelque saillie.*

The sense is,

“Suffer me, Cupid, to entertain some wild notions; living discreetly never agrees with me; and I am never well pleased, but when I indulge myself in some extravagant flight.”

[F] Some particulars being of use, we shall transcribe them.] They inform us of her courage, and present us with a date, which is of some service.

*Louise ainsi furieuse
En laissant les habits mols
Des femmes, & envieuse
De bruit, par les Espagnols
Souvent courut, en grand' noise,
Et maint assault leur donna,
Quand la jeunesse François
Perpignan environna.
Là sa force elle de ploye
La de sa Lance elle ploye
Le plus hardi assaillant,
Et brave dessus la selle,
Ne demonstroit rien en elle
Que d'un chevalier vaillant (8).*

(8) Idem, ibid.

The sense is,

“Louisa thus furious, laying aside the effeminate habit of her sex, and panting after fame, often rode fiercely among the Spaniards, and charged them several times when the French troops invested Perpignan. There she displays her strength, there she repulses, with her lance, the boldest assaillant; and fighting with great bravery on horseback, her every action seems to speak her a valiant Knight.”

Perpignan was besieged in 1542. Louisa Labé was present at it, in a man's habit, when but a Pucelle, as the author cited by me styles her, and before she knew what love was; and consequently at fifteen or sixteen years of age; since according to the elegy quoted above (9), her breast began to be fired by love, and occasioned her to quit a military life, before she was sixteen. But it was presently after this siege, that she laid aside the sword, as is manifest from the third elegy in question, where she says that thirteen summers are now past, since my heart was first captivated by love. For as this elegy was writ, the latest, in 1555, when our Louisa wrote the dedication to her compositions; subtracting 13 from that number gives us 1542, which was the very year of the siege of Perpignan. From all this it follows that Louisa Labé was about twenty nine years of age in 1555, and consequently was born about the year 1526 (10).

(9) In the remark [D].

(10) Nicéron, Hommes Illustres, tom. 23. pag. 257.

LABERIUS (DECIMUS) a Roman Knight, and a Poet, had a wonderful talent at making of Mimi or Farces. He did not dare to refuse Julius Cæsar, who was desirous he should play one of those pieces; though extremely unsuitable to his age and condition.

condition. He made the best excuse he could in the prologue [A]; and maliciously levelled some strokes against Cæsar [B], which determined that Prince to mortify him a little, by preferring another Poet before him [C]. Laberius was rallied by Ciceró that day (a), and paid him in his own coin [D]. He died ten months after Julius Cæsar (b). His

(a) That is, the day he played to please Jul. Cæsar.

(b) Ensch. in His Chronica.

[A] He made the best excuse he could in the Prologue.] Macrobius has preserved it; and says very judiciously, that a master, even when he beseeches, employs a kind of authority which cannot be resisted (1). Laberium asperæ libertatis equitem Romanum Cæsar quingentis milibus invitavit, ut prodiret in scenam, & ipse ageret mimos quos scriptitabat. Sed potestas non solum si invitet, sed et si supplicet, cogit. Unde se & Laberius à Cæsare coactum in prologo testatur his versibus:

(1) Aufonius, says more; Quod est potentissimum imperandi genus, rogabat qui jubere poterat. Præfat. Centon. Nupt. i. e. "Which is the most powerful kind of command, he who might have commanded, desired."

Necessitas, cuius cursus transversi impetum,
Voluerunt multi effugere, pauci potuerunt,
Quo me detrusit pæne extremis sensibus?
Quem nulla ambitio, nulla unquam largitio,
Nullus timor, vis nulla, nulla auctoritas
Movere potuit in juvena de statu:
Ecce in senecta ut facile labefecit loco
Viri excellentis mente clemente edita
Submissa placide blandiloquens oratio?
Etenim ipsi Dî negare cui nihil potuerunt,
Hominem me denegare quis posset pati? &c (2).

(2) Macrobi. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. m. 342.

"Laberius, a Roman Knight was invited by Cæsar, upon the promise of a great reward, to come upon the stage, and act a part in a farce of his own writing. But power, not only when it invites, but also when it supplicates, compels: and therefore Laberius declares himself to have been compelled by Cæsar in the following prologue.

"Necessity, which all men strive to shun,
But few can do it, whither has it led me,
In my old age? I, whom nor vain ambition,
Nor bribes, nor fear, authority nor power,
Could influence in my gay, youthful years;
Behold how easily I'm drawn away
By the smooth Rhetoric of a mighty man!
For, can I any thing refuse to him,
To whom the Gods themselves can nought refuse?"

[B] He maliciously levelled some strokes at Cæsar.] Macrobius informs us of this (3). In ipsa quoque actione subinde se, qua poterat, ulcisceretur indulto habitu Syri, qui velut flagris cæsus præripientique se similis exclamabat:

(3) Macrobi. ibid. pag. 344.

Porro, Quirites! libertatem perdimus.
& paulo post adjecit:
Necesse est multos timeat quem multi timent.

Quo dicto universitas populi ad solum Cæsarem oculos & ora convertit, notantes impotentiam ejus hac dicacitate lapidatam.

The sense is,
"Whilst he was upon the stage he presently after had his revenge in some measure, in the character of Syrus, who, as tho' he were whipped, and running away, cried aloud

"Our darling liberties we (Romans) lose, and added a little after
"He must fear many men, whom many fear."

"At which words, all the spectators turned their eyes on Cæsar, perceiving that he was affected with that raillery." Father Briet did not attend duly to this passage, he supposing that Laberius did not satyrise Cæsar till long after. Procedente tempore ipsum Cæsarem offendit, & maximè hoc versu

Porro Quirites libertatem perdimus,
Item & isto
Necesse est multos timeat, quem multi timent (4).

(4) Briet. de Poet. Lat. pag. 12.

The sense is
"In process of time he offended Cæsar himself, and particularly by the following verse,

"Our darling liberties we (Romans) lose,
and likewise by this
"He must fear many men, whom many fear."

[C] Cæsar... preferring another Poet before him.] Here follows another passage of Macrobius. Ob hæc in Publium vertit favorem. It... produciunt Roma per Cæsaris ludos omnes, qui tunc scripta & operas suas in scenam locaverant, provocavit, ut singuli secum posita invicem materia pro tempore contenderent. Nec ullo recusante superavit omnes; in quibus & Laberium: unde Cæsar arridens hoc modo pronuntiavit:

Favente tibi me victus es Laberi à Syro:

Statimque Publio palmam, & Laberio annulam auream cum quingentis sestertiis dedit. Tunc Publius ad Laberium recedentem ait: Qui cum contendisti scriptor hunc spectator subleva (5). i. e. "On this account he turned his favour to Publius. This person, coming to Rome during the time that Cæsar exhibited games, challenged all the dramatic writers to vye with him: they accepting the challenge, he was victorious over all of them; and among others over Laberius, which made Cæsar, smiling, say as follows:

"Crown'd with my favour, thou old bard (Laberius)
By Syrus art overcome."

"Immediately after which he bestowed the palm on Publius, and gave Laberius a gold ring and five hundred sesterces. Then Publius said to Laberius as he was going away: Him, whom you contended with when a writer, assist when a spectator." Laberius wrote some time after, a Mime or Farce, wherein he declared, that success is as doubtful on the stage as elsewhere; and that if he had fallen from the first rank, his successor would meet with the same disgrace. Sequenti statim commissione mimo novo interjectis versibus:

Non possunt primi esse omnes omni in tempore.
Summum ad gradum cum claritatis veneris,
Consistes ægre; & quam descendas, decides.

Cecidi ego, cadet qui sequitur, laus est publica (6):

(6) Macrobi. ibid. pag. 345.

The sense is,
"Immediately in the next context, he inserted the following verses in his new Mime:

"No man, at all times, can excell o'er others.
When you've attain'd the highest point of fame,
'Tis hard to stand; and when you once descend,
You'll fall. My self am fall'n, and he who follows
Will also fall. To th' public, praise belongs."

I will here insert a passage from Aulus Gellius (7). C. autem Cæsarem ita Laberii maledicentia & arrogantia offendebat, ut acceptiores & probatores sibi esse Publii quam Laberii mimos prædicaret. i. e. "Laberius's arrogant satyr was so displeasing to Cæsar, that he declared publicly, that he was better pleased with Publius's Mimes than with those of Laberius."

[D] Laberius was rallied by Ciceró that day, and paid him in his own coin.] After that Laberius had played his pieces, Cæsar presented him with a ring, and gave him leave to retire. Laberius went to look for a place among the Knights, but they ordered it so that he could meet with none. Ciceró seeing him perplexed, said, recepissim te nisi anguste sederem. i. e. "I am crowded, otherwise would have made room for you." Mirum, replied the other, si anguste sedes, qui soles duabus sellis sedere (8), i. e. "It is surprizing that you, who use to sit on two seats, should be crowded." Ciceró killed two birds with one stone: He laughed at Laberius, and the great number of newly created Senators, whose number had been greatly augmented by Cæsar; simul & illum respiciens, & in novum Senatum jocus, cuius numerum Cæsar supra fax auxerat (9). But the answer accused him of trimming (10), i. e. of not being the true friend either of Cæsar or Pompey: Ciceró male audiebat, tanquam nec Pompeio certus amicus, nec Cæsari, sed utriusque adulator (11). I will observe by the way, that Macrobius has confounded the seats of the Knights with those of the Senators;

(7) A. Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 14.

(8) Macrobi. lib. 2. cap. 3. pag. 329.

(9) Idem, ibid. and lib. 7. cap. 3. pag. 582. See also Seneca, Controvers. XLIII.

(10) Expressa levitate Ciceroni. Macrobi. ibid. Obiciens tanto viro lubricum sedit. Idem, Macrobi. lib. 7. cap. 3. pag. 582.

(11) Seneca. Controvers. 12.

His verses were not so much contemned by Horace, as may be imagined [E]. Moreri has committed some errors [F].

(12) Macrobius, Saturnal. lib. 7. cap. 3. pag. 582. nators; he imagining that the Senators used to sit on what were called the fourteen benches, (12), in which he is mistaken; Quod Cicero dixit, nisi anguste sederem, scilicet fuit in C. Cæsarem, qui in Senatum passim tam multos admittēbat, ut eos quatuordecim gradus capere non possunt. i. e. "When Cicero said, I am crowded, otherwise &c. it was to ridicule Cæsar, who admitted so many members into the Senate, that the fourteen seats or benches could not hold them." This had been the feat of the Knights ever since the law of Roscius Otho.

(13) Juvenal. Sat. 3. ver. 159. Sic libitum vana qui nos distinxit Othoni (13).
" ——— Such was the pleasure of vain Otho
" Who separated us."

[E] His verses were not so much contemned by Horace as may be imagined.] Here follows what Horace says:

(14) Horat. Sat. 10. lib. 1. ver. 5. Nec tamen hoc tribuens, dederim quoque cætera, nam sic Et Laberi mimos, ut pulchra poemata miror (14):
" But this one sort of excellence allow'd
" Doth not infer that all the rest is good:
" For on the same account I might admit
" Laberius' Farce for Poems and for wit." CRÆCH.

Mr. Dacier's note is thus. "Horace does not absolutely condemn Laberius in this place, nor even censure his works, he speaking only comparatively of him. Laberius's Mimes were agreeable, but not beautiful and perfect Poems. And indeed they were not made for that end; the Mimes consisting only of obscene Pleasantries, for which reason Ovid calls them Mimos obscena jocantes, and they were written in no other view but to make the common people laugh. Had Julius Scaliger understood Horace's thought, he would not have condemned the judgment he here forms of Laberius's Mimes (15).

(15) Dacier, Remarques sur Horace, tom. 6. pag. 607. [F] Moreri has committed some errors.] I. Laberius's prænomen is not Decius but Decimus. II. He lived so short a time after Julius Cæsar, that it was not necessary to say he lived in Augustus's time. III. He never received presents from Augustus. IV; nor does Macrobius say so. V. It is a falsity to assert that Cæsar made him a Roman Knight. Laberius delivers himself as follows in the prologue to the farce, which he played out of complaisance to that Emperor.

*Ergo bis tricenis annis ætis sine nota,
Eques Romanus Lars egressus meo
Dumum reuertar mimos* (16).

" I who spent thirty years twice told, with Fame;
" Who left my house, a Roman Knight, shall now
" Return a Farcer."

(16) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. 143.

This is an indisputable proof, that he was a Roman Knight independently of Cæsar. The circumstance which misled Moreri and many other writers (17) is, that Cæsar, at the end of the games, gave a ring to this farce player, as Macrobius informs us; but it is easy to find in this very place a proof of the justice of my censure. Here follows the whole passage.

(17) Julius Cæsar liked him so well, that he made him a Knight. Dacier, Rem. sur Horace, tom. 6. pag. 607.

Deinde cum Laberius in fine ludorum annulo honoratus a Cæsare e vestigio in quatuordecim ad spectandum transit, violato ordine, & cum detrectatus est EQUUS Romanus, & cum nimis remissus, ait Cicero prætereuntem Laberio & sedile querenti, recepissē te nisi anguste sederem (18). i. e. "Afterwards when Laberius, being honoured by Cæsar with a ring at the end of the Games, would have past over to the fourteen benches, a affront being put on the order; by a place being refused to a Roman Knight, and a Mime sent back; Cicero said to him as he was passing by, and looking about for a seat; I am crowded, Laberius, otherwise would have made room for you." It is plain Macrobius says, that the order of knights was dishonoured two ways; I, because a Roman Knight was refused a seat; and II, because a farce player was sent from the stage to that part, where the Roman Knights used to sit. From this we must necessarily infer, that Laberius was not obliged to Julius Cæsar for the honour of Knighthood. All that can be said is, that he did an action derogatory to his character by playing on the stage, but was restored to his honour by Julius Cæsar. The ring, which he received from that prince, might be considered as a fresh patent of nobility, but this does not excuse Moreri. Seneca confirms what was just now said. Divus Julius ludis suis mimum produxit (Laberium) deinde equestri illum ordini reddidit jussit ire seffum in equestrio: omnes ita se coactaverunt ut venientem non reciperent (19).

(18) Macrobius, Sat. lib. 2. cap. 3. pag. 329.

(19) Seneca, Controvers. 18. sub fin.

LABOURLOTTE (CLAUDE) one of the bravest Captains of his age, owed his fortune entirely to his bravery, he being of so low an extraction, that it is still disputed whether he was a native of Lorrain or Franche Comté (a). It is said he had been Count Charles of Mansfeld's Barber [A], and that he did him a signal service [B]. He passed through

(a) See the remark [A].

[A] It is said he had been Count Charles of Mansfeld's barber.] Bongarsius affirms this, in a letter written to Camerarius the 6th of August 1596, in which he sent him advices with regard to the siege of Hulst. Some, says he (1), write that Labourlotte has been killed there (2); that man so renowned for his intrepidity and courage. He had formerly been barber to that Count Charles of Mansfeld who died in Hungary. The cardinal made use chiefly of this Labourlotte's intrepidity, and de Rons' counsel (3). The author, who published in 1693 the history of Archduke Albert, does not own that Labourlotte had been a barber, but he does not say any thing that can prove the contrary. His birth, says he (4), resembles that of great men, which is frequently doubtful, Lorrain claims this honour, and Burgundy does the same. The name Claude favours the Burgundians. Whatever country he may have been born in, he certainly is well descended. The great numbers of enemies he has had, are a manifest proof of his extraordinary merit. The thunder of every pass over bushes, and strikes lofty trees. They say that he was of mean extraction, and that he had handled the razor and lancet, before he wielded the sword and pike; but those who are exempt from prejudice speak otherwise. They say that he indeed knew how to cure wounds; but that he had been prompted to this study, not from necessity, but out of curiosity and covarity. When

(1) Bongarsius's Letters, pag. 493. Hague ed. 1695.
(2) That was not true. See the remark [E] above.
(3) It is thus we must translate the Rosnii confilio of Bongarsius, and not de Rosne, as is done in the translation of his Letters.
(4) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert. lib. 4. pag. 263.

d'Aubigne (5) relates that Labourlotte was killed at a skirmish in the counterfarp of fort Isabella, which he recruited and furnished with fresh provisions, he adds, that he was bewailed by the Archduke and his superiors; but not by his companions, who bursting with envy, could not bear to think that merit should have raised a country barber to the post of colonel.

(5) Hist. Universelle, tom. 3. liv. 5. chap. 19. pag. 729.

[B] . . . and that he did him a signal service.] He delivered him from a marriage that was very ungrateful to him. An author whom I have quoted won't believe this: he speaks thus. "It is said that he gained Mansfeld's favour by ridding him of his troublesome wife; but I do not believe any thing of this, he being a man of more honour than to commit so vile an action (6)." The action indeed would be a very vile one, whatever pleasure it might have given the Count. The reason why I say, that this writer's incredulity might be ill grounded is, that Grotius has hinted at this action; a plain indication that he did not believe that the report spread concerning it was idle. I will cite his words, they deserv'ing it, and informing us of Labourlotte's merit, with some circumstances which are well expressed. Huc quo se Claudius Burlota transfulerat, bonamque & extremam navavit operam, trajecitque globo vir nobilis aurdacia, Lotbaringus ortu, curandis olim vulneribus vitam

(6) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert, liv. 4. pag. 264.

(7) That is, Isabella.

through all the military degrees, till he rose to be commander of the Walloon troops in the Spanish service. Patria Lotharingus, virtutis suae suffragiis ex gregario milite per omnes militarium honorum gradus ad Tribunatum evectus. Vallones aliquot annos magna cum laude gubernavit (b). He was more fortunate than judicious [C]; he never engaging more willingly in an enterprize, than when it was extremely dangerous (c). He was wounded on several occasions [D]; and at last was killed by a musket ball, the 24th of July 1600 [E], as he was making an intrenchment between Bruges and Fort Isabella. He had a great share in the barbarous actions, which the troops of the Admiral committed in the territories of the Emperor in the year 1598 [F]. He left a son [G], who was a Dominican Friar, and a daughter who married Robert de Celles Baron de Foi, in the county of Liege near Dinant (d).

(b) Angellus Gallucius, de bello Belgico, lib. 13. pag. m. 35.

(c) See Strada, Dec. 2. lib. 2. pag. 513.

(d) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert, printed in the year 1693, pag. 264.

tam toleraverat: mox per facinus haud bonestum conciliatus Mansfeldio ferebatur; dictus uxorem ejus sustulisse: sed nactus bonores, ita se gesserat, ut mereri majora semper judicaretur, quo mors ejus nec lucru apud ducem, nec apud ipsius novitati invidentes gaudium caruit (8). i. e. "To this place came also Claude Labourlotte, who exerted himself to the utmost; he was surprizingly intrèpid; was born in Lorraine, and had supported himself by practising Surgery. It is related that he afterwards insinuated himself into the favour of Count Mansfeld, by an action no ways honourable, viz. ridding him of his wife. But when raised to honours, he behaved so well, that it was always thought he deserved more; and therefore the General was grieved at his death, but it was a subject of joy to those who envied his exaltation."

(8) Grotius, Hist. de Rebus Belgicis, lib. 9. ad ann. 1600, pag. m. 572.

[C] He was more fortunate than judicious. Father Gallucci writes as follows on that occasion (9). Animosus magis quam cautus, accersere saepe non expectare mortem visus est. i. e. "He was more courageous than circumspect; and was frequently seen to go in quest of death rather than wait for it." He was a man who would go upon any attempt, and was not intimidated at any danger; he began a fight as though he was sure of victory. He was ordered out upon, and headed all bold enterprizes. Those persons, who did not care to venture on those occasions, and were eclipsed by his success, called him a fortunate rash man (10)."

(9) De Bello Belgico, lib. 13. pag. m. 35.

[D] He was wounded on several occasions. At the siege of Noion in 1593, that of Andres in the year 1596, that of Hulst the same year, and at the battle of Newport in the year 1600. See Father Galucci (11). I fancy he is mistaken as to the last wound. I do not find any other Historian who mentions this; and besides, they all say that Labourlotte, a few days after the battle, led a considerable succour to Newport, which contributed greatly to the raising of the siege that Prince Maurice had laid to that place. As to the wound at Hulst, it was not mortal as Bongarsius pretended. What I cited from him in the first remark, was wrote the 6th of August 1596; he was not undeceived twenty days after; for he affirmed, in his letter dated the 27th of August of the same year, that Labourlotte was dead of his wounds; Burlotta post Rosnium ex vulneribus obiit (12). In this manner the ministers themselves of Princes are subject to publish false advices, and not to know quickly, that they are false. They ought to be more circumspect on this article, than the person I am speaking of was, whose abilities otherwise deserve great elogiums. But when we examine him attentively, we cannot forbear saying that he too lightly believed agreeable news, and communicated it in too hasty a manner to his friends. Here follows a proof of this, taken from the same letter, wherein he affirmed that Labourlotte was dead:

(10) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert, pag. 264.

(11) In Historia Belli Belgici.

(12) Bongarsii Epist. pag. 500. Hagae ed. 1695.

You probably will rejoice, when you are told that the King of Spain is dead, and that the Spaniards will not accept of his son for King, as being born from an incestuous marriage. Rideas etiam, cum intelliges Regem Hisp. mortuum, & filium repudiari ab Hispanis natum nuptiis incestis (13). This he wrote to his friend the 6th of August 1596. At that time all advices, which were disadvantageous to Spain, were believed as easily as those now (14) are, which are of disadvantage to France.

(13) Idem, ibid. pag. 491.

(14) I write this in 1695.

[E] He was killed . . . the 24th of July 1600. The author of the History of Archduke Albert says, pag. 138. that it was the 25th of July in 264. he gives Labourlotte's epitaph, which says the twenty fourth of that month. This epitaph is of service in the history of that brave man, and therefore deserves to be copied here. "He lies buried at Lopogne, in a monument whereon is the following epitaph. Here lies the noble and illustrious Lord, Messire Claude Labourlotte Knight, a Counsellor of War to the King, Colonel of twelve Companies of Luxemburgers, Lord of Bernstein, Boncour, la Vallée, Lopogne and Basi. He was killed at Fort Isabella near Ostend the 24th of July in the year 1600 (15)." I do not think that this author copied accurately; for, to give an epitaph faithfully, the least letter ought not to be changed in it; the barbarisms and solecisms in it must be retained, unless the copyist gives only the substance of it. Here follows the epitaph as given by le Baron le Roi, which I fancy differs very little from the original. Here lies the noble and illustrious Lord Messire Claude de Labourlotte, Knight, and of the council of war; Colonel of twelve companies of Luxemburgers, Lord of Berlestein, Lord of Boncourt, La Vallée, Loppogne, Basy, who was killed near Ostend in his Majesty's service the 24th of July 1600. Pray to God for for his soul.

(15) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert, pag. 264.

[F] He had a great share in the barbarous actions, which the troops of the Admiral committed . . . in the year 1598. Their exactions and inhuman actions strike with horror those who read them in History. Read the description which d'Aubigné has given of them in few words, in Chapter XIX, Book V of Vol. III. Some Noblemen saying to Bourlotte, adds he (17), that the Emperor and the German Princes would resent such an outrage, he pointed to a cow, and said; as much as that stupid animal. It is to be observed that the Admiral who commanded those troops was Francis de Mendosa, whom I mentioned before (18).

(16) In Topographia Gallic-Brabantiae, printed at Amsterlaus 1693, folio pag. 74.

(17) Pag. 718.

[G] He left a son. I here correct my author. He should have said that Labourlotte left two sons, Ernest and Francis. The former was Lord of Loppogne and died with issue; the latter was a friar, so that the sister inherited their father's estate. See Topographia Gallo-Brabantiae (19).

(18) Citat. (64) of the article GREGORY VII.

(19) Le Roi, Topographia Gallo-Brabantiae, pag. 74.

LACYDES, a Greek Philosopher and native of Cyrene, was the disciple of Arcefilas and his successor in the Academy (a). Some pretend that he did not follow his master's doctrine; but I fancy they are mistaken [A]. He was very poor in his youth; and

(a) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 59.

[A] Some pretend that he did not follow his master's doctrine; but I fancy they are mistaken. Diogenes Laertius asserts that Arcefilas was the founder of the second Academy, and that Lacydes founded the third. Ἀρκεσίλαος ἦεν ὁ τῆς πρώτης Ἀκαδημίας κρητάρης ἀρχὴ. Ἀρκεσίλας πρῶτος μετὰ τὴν ἐκείνου ἔστη ἡ δεύτερη Ἀκαδημία. . . . (1). Ἀρκεσίλαος ἦεν ὁ τῆς τρίτης Ἀκαδημίας κρητάρης. Λάκυδης ἦεν ὁ τῆς τρίτης Ἀκαδημίας πρῶτος ἀρχὴ. Lacydes nova Academiae princeps fuit (2). But I had rather believe Cicero, who affirms that Lacydes retained Ar-

(1) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 28. See also the same author in Prooemio, num. 14.

(2) Idem, ibid. num. 39. See also the same author in Prooem. num. 14.

cefilas's method, and that Carneades reformed it. Cujus (Arcefilae) primo non admodum probata ratio . . . proxime à Lacyde solo RETENTA est: post autem confecta à Carneade qui est quartus ab Arcefilae (3). Most authors agree that Carneades founded the third Academy. They suppose therefore that Lacydes adhered to Arcefilas's doctrines without making any innovation in them. See the remark [A] of the article CARNEADES.

(3) Cicero, Academ. Quaest. lib. 4. cap. 6.

and nevertheless gained great reputation by his intense application to his studies ; not to mention that he spoke in a very graceful manner (b). He taught in a garden (c) which Attalus King of Pergamus had caused to be made [B]. This King sending for him to court, he answered, that the pictures of Kings should be viewed at a distance (d). He taught Philosophy twenty six years (e), and gave up his employment to his own disciples (f). He imitated his master in one laudable particular, viz. that he took a pleasure in doing good, without caring to have it known [C]. The affection which a goose had for him is very remarkable [D]. He died of a palsy caused by his drinking to excess [E]. The particulars which Numenius relates concerning him, have all the air of a pleasant fiction [F]. Moreri has committed some very egregious errors.

- (b) Idem, ibid.
- (c) It was in the Acad. ivy.
- (d) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 60.
- (e) Idem, ibid. num. 61.
- (f) Idem, ibid. num. 60.

[B] He taught in a garden which Attalus King of Pergamus had caused to be made.] Ο γῶν Λακιδης ἐσχολαζον ἐν Ἀκαδημία, ἐν τῇ κατασκευασθεῖσιν κήπῳ ὑπὸ Ἀτταλῶν τῷ βασιλευσιν· καὶ Λακιδίῳ ἀπ' αὐτῶν ἀποσημασιότα. Lacydes igitur in Academia scbolam habebat in borto quem Attalus Rex feri curaverat, Lacydiumque ab ipso appellatus est (4). If we add to this the desire he had that Lacydes should reside at his Court, it will be evident that he loved Philosophy. Menage is grossly mistaken here : he applies (5) to this Attalus what Plutarch (6) and Justin (7) relate of another Attalus's delight in Husbandry. It is strange he should make such a confusion in chronology.

- (4) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 60.
- (5) Menage in Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 60.
- (6) Plutarch. in Demetrio.
- (7) Justin. lib. 36.
- (8) Plutarch. de Discrim. Adulat. & Amici, p. 63.
- (9) Plutarch had just before mentioned a secret good action of Arcefilas.

[C] He took a pleasure in doing good, not caring to have it known.] This was one of Arcefilas's good qualities, as has been seen in the remark [J] of his article. Here follows a passage from Plutarch (8). "Because that in Philosophy children are born like to their parents, Lacydes, one of Arcefilas's (9) disciples, assisted with several others, at the trial of a friend of his named Cephifocrates, impeached of high treason; at which trial the accuser required that Cephifocrates should produce his ring, which had just before dropped; which Lacydes perceiving, he immediately set his foot upon it, and hid it, because the whole proof depended on that ring. Cephifocrates being cleared, went to pay his respects, and return thanks to his Judges for the justice they had done him; but one among these having seen all that passed, spoke thus to him, Thank Lacydes for it; and so told him the whole story; Lacydes not having once mentioned it to any person."

[D] The affection which a goose had for him is very remarkable.] It used to follow him every where, both at home and abroad, by night as well as by day. Read the following words of Pliny. Potest et sapientiae videri intellectus his (anseribus) esse. Ita comes perpetuo adhaesisse Lacydi philosopho dicitur, nusquam ab eo, non in publico, non in balneis, non noctu, non interdiu digressus (10). When it died, Lacydes solemnized its funeral obsequies with as much magnificence, as if it had been his son or brother (11).

- (10) Plin. lib. 10. cap. 22. pag. m. 408. See also Athen. lib. 13. pag. 606.
- (11) Aelian. lib. 7. Hist. Animal. cap. 41.
- (12) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 61.
- (13) Athen. lib. 10. cap. 10. pag. 438.

[E] He died of a palsy caused by his drinking to excess.] Ητθανεν δὲ αὐτῷ ἀπαράλυσις ἐν πρῶτῳ οἴνῳ. Mortuus est autem ex paralyti quam ex immodica potione contraxerat (12). Athenæus (13) relates that Lacydes and another Philosopher named Timon were invited for two days together to a feast; and that, in compliance with the humour of the company, they quaffed lustily. Lacydes gave it over the first day, and withdrew the instant he found he had enough. Timon seeing him quit the field cried out victory, but the next day he yielded first. He could not drink off the goblet that was carried to him. Lacydes was even with him. This is vastly unseemly. Philosophers ought never to dispute for such a victory. It is not only a fault to gain it, but also to strive for it; and though the ignominy of the victor is greater than that of the person vanquished, yet the latter deserves to be strongly censured. How many Christian Philosophers and even Divines have imitated Timon and Lacydes?

- (14) Numenius, apud Eusebium, Præpar. Evang. lib. 14. cap. 7. pag. 734. & seq.
- (15) Τὸ ταμίσιον, penus.
- (16) I do not follow the Greek where it is said αἷς τῆ κλειῶν παραματιῶν, cavea quadam in arcula.

[F] The particulars which Numenius relates concerning him, have all the air of a pleasant fiction.] Here follows the substance of his relation (14). Lacydes was vastly penurious in his house-keeping. He never trusted his servants with any thing; the place where the victuals was lodged was inaccessible to them. He himself put in, and took out, whatever he wanted, and he never left it open; but to prevent his being troubled with the key, he laid it in a hole (16) which he sealed; after which he used to let fall his seal into the pantry (17), through the key-hole. His servants discovering this cheated him whenever they pleased. They easily got the key; put it into the place whence they had taken it, and sealed the hole. They drank, they eat, they plundered whatever they thought proper, laughing at him at the same time. Lacydes soon found that his wine and provisions dwindled away; and not knowing whom to accuse, he remembered to have heard, that Arcefilas taught that neither our senses nor our reason comprehend any thing; and ascribed the emptiness of his bottles and baskets to that incomprehensibility. Such are the auspices, under which he began to philosophize in Arcefilas's school, against the certainty of human knowledge. He even made use of that domestic experiment to prove that he was in the right to suspend his judgment in all things. I do not, said he one day gravely to a friend, tell you a hearsay; I myself know by experience, what I am going to tell you, and can speak of it without the least doubt. Upon this he told him the whole story of his pantry. What could Zeno, added he, say against so powerful an argument, which has plainly shewn me the acatalepsia? Have I not reason to mistrust all things, since though I myself shut, sealed, unsealed, and opened my pantry with my own hands, I do not find, in my pantry, the provisions I had left in it? I find nothing but my seal, a circumstance that will not let me think I am robbed. Here his friend could hold no longer. He laughed so loud and so long that the Philosopher perceived his mistake, and resolved to take more care of his seal. However, his servants did not mind this; and whether they had learnt from the Stoics or other Philosophers to dispute against him, they unsealed his key, without minding to put his seal on it again; they would make use of another seal, and sometimes of none at all. Lacydes would be in a passion when he found out their roguery; but they affirmed that they had not broke up any seals, and that he had forgot to use his seal. He then would hold forth in a long discourse, to prove to them that he remembered perfectly well his having applied his seal, and would even swear it. They used to answer; you only joke, and mean to laugh at our simplicity. A Philosopher, such as you are, has neither opinion nor memory; for you yourself maintained the other day before us, that memory is an opinion. He would refute them by arguments different from those of the Academics; but they addressed a Stoic, who taught them how to answer their master, and to elude all his proofs by the doctrine of incomprehensibility, on which occasion they would throw out a great many pleasant jests. The worst of it was, they continued to plunder the provisions, and Lacydes saw his goods vanish away daily. He was strangely puzzled: his principles instead of being favourable to him, were the very contrary; and he was obliged to behave like the vulgar. The whole neighbourhood echoed with his clamours and complaints; he protesting by all the Gods and Goddesses that he was robbed. Πιστὸν οἷς ταμῆχανον, τὸς γυίτοις ἐνταράγῃ, καὶ τὸς Θείοις, καὶ ἐν ἰσ, καὶ φῖν φεῖ, καὶ ἐν τὸς Θείοις, καὶ ἐν τὸς Θείοις, ἀλλὰς τὶ ἴσαι ἐν ἀπιστίας διωλογομῖνῳ ὑπὸ ἀλλοῦ ἀπίστῳ, ταῦτα ἐπίση ἐλέγχετο καὶ ἀξίωσις. Inopi consilii vicinis inclamare, appellare Deos: sepe hei mihi, prob facinus indignum, per Deos Deasque omnes ingeminare, ac cætera id genus argumenta, quæ homini gravioribus in querelis, ubi fidem non impetrat, sine arte natura suppeditat. Quæ quidem omnia magno clamore deplorata, magnam utique probabilitatis speciem ostendunt (18): at last he resolved not to stir out of his house, but watch his pantry door. Οὐκ ἐξῆς ἐν φιλῶ τῷ ταμίῳ ἀρραπάθῃμῃ. Domi deinceps barabat perpetuo, ac proculle

- (17) Τὸ ταμίσιον, penus.
- (18) Numenius, apud Eusebium, Præpar. Evang. lib. 14. cap. 7. pag. 736 [B].

errors [G]. The difference which Father Rapin found between Arcefilas and Lacydes is mere chimera. Philosophy, says he (g), grew restless under the former, and contradicting under the latter: now it is certain that it never was more contradicting than under Arcefilas.

(g) Rapin. Reflex. sur la Philosophie, num. 8. pag. m. 326.

(19) Idem, ibid. I approve of that translation more than that of Kuhnus, (who makes a friend watch on this occasion) in his notes on Diogenes Laertius, pag. 523. Semper amicam calle penuria custodem domi reliquit.

(20) Numenius, apud Eusebium, Præpar. Evang. lib. 14. cap. 7. pag. 736, C.

(21) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 59.

(22) Moreri says so under Arcefilas.

(a) Melch. Adam, in Vita Petri Martyris, pag. 33.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, ibid. pag. 34.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid. pag. 35.

(f) See the lines which I quote from Horace in the remark [B] of the article LAMIA a Roman family.

(1) That is to say, Longe distantes habent portas Læstrygoniam. These two Greek words are borrowed from Homer, Odys. lib. 10. ver. 82.

calle suæ foribus affidebat (19). What did he get by disputing with his servants? He employed the method of the Stoics against them, and they answered him according to the manner of the Academics; they beat him with his own weapons. The affair ended at last thus. Lacydes being determined to rid himself once for all from the intolerable perplexity he was under, he plainly and frankly told his servants, we dispute one way in the schools, and live in a different manner in our families. Οὐδὲν δὲ ἡμεῖς ἐν τοῖς σχολαῖς, ἀλλὰ ἐν ταῖς οἰκίαις, ὡς οἰκίαις, ἐν ταῖς οἰκίαις, ἐν ταῖς οἰκίαις, ἐν ταῖς οἰκίαις. Verum ubi nihil agit, secum ipse cogitans, quo sua sibi verfusia recideret: tandem animi sensum palam ac sine fuce aperiens, nimirum, inquit, famuli, aliter hæc in schola disputamus, aliter vivimus (20). This is a pretty tale, and Mr. de la Fontaine could work it up in a very jocosé manner; but who does not perceive that it was forged by a pious fraud of the Stoics? This method is employed in all ages and countries. Men have always endeavoured, and they still endeavour, to ridicule the doctrine and person of their adversaries; and to effect this, they invent unnumbered fictions, if the least pretence can be found, to strain maliciously the consequences of their opinions. This passion or prejudice has been so blindly followed against the sceptics, that not only sincerity but even probability have been given up; for they never denied that, in the common conduct of life, men must govern themselves by the testimony of the senses. They only denied the certainty, that the absolute nature of objects is just as it appears. It is to be observed that Diogenes Laertius says no farther, than that our Lacydes, having sealed his pantry door, used to throw his key into it; and that his servants made use of that seal to steal provisions undiscovered by him.

[G] Moreri has committed some very egregious errors. I. Instead of saying that Lacydes's father was born in Cyrene, he should have said that Lacydes himself was born there. II. He ought not to have given into the error of Diogenes Laertius, with regard to his founding an Academy. III. He should not have fixed his death to the fourth year of the 36th Olympiad. This is not an error of the press; he adding, that it was the 113th of Rome. Had the Printers omitted something in the first calculation, they could not have mistook so exactly in the second. One may therefore be assured that they copied the manuscript exactly. Now what can be more absurd, than to imagine that Arcefilas lived in the 120th Olympiad, and that Lacydes his disciple died the last year of the 34th Olympiad (32)? IV. Though his death had been fixed to the fourth year of the 134th Olympiad, it nevertheless would have been an error; he not dying till about the second year of the 141st. This I prove as follows. Diogenes Laertius observes that Lacydes, who, began to be Principal or Head of the Academy, the 4th year of 134th Olympiad, died after he had taught Philosophy twenty six years. Ἐβίβηθη δὲ σχολάρχῳ ἀρχέμειο τῷ τετάρτῳ ἔτη τῆς τετάρτης ἢ τριακοτῆς ἢ ἑκατοστῆς Ὀλυμπιαδῶν, τῆς σχολῆς ἀφῆγοντο μὲν ἐξ ἑσθῆς τοῖς κίοντι ἔτη. Obiit autem cum scholam administrare cepisset quarto anno centesimæ trigesima quartæ Olympiadis, viginti sex annis in schola consumptis (23). V. It is an absurdity to find in the above words, that Lacydes began to be in reputation. . . after he had taught twenty six years (24). VI. It would not be very just to say this of any Professor whatsoever; for if such a one should teach twenty five years without gaining any fame, he would run the hazard, generally speaking, to die without reputation.

I am to observe that Father Harjoun is mistaken with regard to the time in which Lacydes the Philosopher died. Obiisse dicitur, says he (25), anno 4 Olymp. CXXX. He cites the 120th page of the London edition 1664, in folio, of Diogenes Laertius. But besides that we there find (26) the hundred and thirty fourth Olympiad, and not the hundred and thirtieth; it is certain that it relates to Lacydes's entrance into his Professorship, and not to his death. Father Labbe has committed but one of these two mistakes; he says (27), citing Diogenes, that the Philosopher Lacydes died the last year of the 134th Olympiad. Some one will perhaps ask me, if it can be proved that he did not die at that time? I answer that two proofs of it can be given. The 1st is, that he was not Head of the Academic School till after Arcefilas's death (28); and we know that Arcefilas was contemporary with Eumenes Prince of Pergamus (29), who did not succeed Philetærus till the 129th Olympiad. Father Labbe says so (30); for in order that this Philosopher should correspond with Eumenes, it was necessary that he should have lived till the 130th Olympiad. This being so, it cannot be said that his successor died the fourth year of the 134th Olympiad, for he taught twenty six years. My 2d proof is drawn from this, viz. that Attalus King of Pergamus caused to be made the garden of the Academy in which Lacydes taught, and that he sent for this Philosopher to his Court. It is hardly probable that these two particulars relate to the first year of his reign, that is, to the 3d year of the 134th Olympiad (31). Let us therefore say, that Lacydes did not die the year following; and let us remember, that if he had taught but a very few months in that garden, it would be absurd to suppose he had no other school but that, and even to observe, that it took its name from him. He therefore must have taught several years there; and consequently that he did not die a year after Attalus's accession to the throne. Seth Calvisius (32) has committed the same error as Father Labbe.

(23) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 61.

(24) Moreri cites only Diogenes Laertius.

(25) Harjounus in Plin. lib. 10. cap. 22. pag. 408.

(26) That is in the Greek, for the Printers have left out the word quartæ in the Latin translation.

(27) Father Labbe, Cronol. Franc. tom. 2. pag. 301. ad ann. Romæ, 513.

(28) Diogenes Laertius, lib. 4. num. 60. says that Lacydes is the only Philosopher, who resided his Chair in his life time.

(29) Diog. Laert. ibid. num. 38.

(30) Labbe, Cronol. Franc. tom. 2. pag. 285.

(31) See Father Labbe, ibid. pag. 300.

(32) Sethus Calvisius, ad ann. Mundi 3709. pag. m. 268.

LACISIUS (PAUL) a Regular Canon of the Congregation of Lateran in the sixteenth Century, was born at Verona (a). He taught the Latin tongue in the Priory of St. Fridianus, when Peter Martyr was Prior there (b), and as he approved the opinions of the Protestants, he accompanied him into Germany, where they both declared themselves Protestants in the year 1541. They continued some time at Zurich, and then at Basil (c), and going thence to Strasburg, they were detained there by Martin Bucer, who procured a Chair of Divinity Professor for Peter Martyr, and the Professorship of the Greek Tongue to Paul Lacisius (d), who died at Strasburg I know not when (e). His Latin Translation of Tzetzes's Chiliads was printed with the Greek Original in the year 1546 at Basil for John Oporin (f).

LÆSTRYGONES were a very brutish people, situated in Italy near Cajeta *. Their capital city was that which has been called Formiæ (a) [A]. Homer calls it Læstrygonia

[A] This capital City was that which has been called Formiæ. Cicero leaves us no room to question it; for he applies to the City of Formiæ, the Epithet, which Homer gives to the City, in which Lamus and Antiphates reigned. Si in hæc τηλέπολι νεονοῖς Λαεστρυγονίῳ (1) (Formiæ Dico) qui fremitus hominum? quam

irati animi (2)? i. e. "When you come to Læstrygonia, which has such wide gates (I mean Formiæ), what a blustering noise you hear, and how passionate ate the men you meet with?" See also the seventeenth ode of the third book of Horace; and add to it the following words of the foregoing ode;

(*) Now called Gajetta.

(2) Cicero, ad Attic. Epist. 13. lib. 2.

(b) Homer. Od.
lib. 10. ver. 81.

(c) Eustath. in Homer. ibid.

(d) See Horat.
Ode 17. lib. 3.
and Silius Ital.
pag. m. 368.

(e) Homer. Od.
lib. 10. ver. 117.

(f) Ovid. Fag.
lib. 4. ver. 69.

Læstrygonia or the City of Lamus (b); it was because Lamus King of the Læstrygones and son of Neptune had built it (c). His dominions were pretty large (d). Antiphates, who reigned in that country when Ulysses landed there, was a very cruel man, who would have devoured all Ulysses's Deputies [B], had they not made their escape, after they had been witnesses to the dismal fate of one of their number (e). It is certain that the Læstrygones have passed for men-eaters [C]. Moreri, instead of observing this, tells us that they used to eat raw flesh. It is not known whether they passed from Sicily into Italy, or from Italy into Sicily; but that they had been settled in Sicily cannot be questioned; since the fields about the City of Leontium were called Campi Læstrygonii [D]. Ovid supposes them to have been descended from Greek ancestors (f). It is certain that Homer compares them with giants: but yet Bozius ought not to have inferred from thence, that according to the fables of the ancients, they waged war against the Gods; that Hercules fought against them, that they were destroyed by thunder-bolts, that for this reason the fields situated between Mount Vesuvius and Puteoli were called Pblegræi Campi, and that the flames of the Vesuvius come from those which burn the Læstrygones in hell. He pretends that Homer, Pindar, Polybius in his 2d book, and Strabo in his 5th book assert those particulars (g); but he is mistaken. The Læstrygones did not till the ground, but they had cattle (h). Homer betrayed a great ignorance in Cosmography, when he supposed them situated in a climate, where the nights were very short (i). It is not true that Thucydides imagined, the Læstrygones were a fabulous Nation (k): he observes only, that it had been related, the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily were the Læstrygones and the Cyclops, but that he has nothing to say of their origin, and that he does not know whence they came or what was become of them (l).

(g) See the book of Thomas Bozius, de Italiae Statu antiquo & novo adversus Machiavellum, pag. m. 64.

(h) Homer. Od.
lib. 10. ver. 85.

(i) Homer, ibid
ver. 86.

(k) Britannicus, in Juven. Sat.
14. ver. 20. asserts it.

(l) Thucydid.
lib. 6. init. pag. m. 410.

Nec Læstrygonia Bacchus in Ampora Languescit mihi

i. e. "No wines by rich Campania sent
In my ignoble Casks ferment.

CREECH.

By which he means the wine of Formiæ. Pliny's words are very express. Oppidum Formiæ, Hormiæ prius olim dictum: ut existimare, antiqua Læstrygonum sedes (3). i. e. "The City of Formiæ, anciently called Hormiæ, is thought to have been the ancient habitation of the Læstrygones."

[B] Antiphates . . . would have devoured all Ulysses's deputies. I beg leave to call thus the three men he sent to take a view of the country. You will see by and by, that Antiphates devoured one of them, and vented his fury on Ulysses's ships, so that there was but one that escaped.

*Inde Lami veterem Læstrygonis, inquit, in urbem Venimus; Antiphates terra regnabat in illa.
Missus ad hunc ego sum, numero comitatus duorum:
Vixque fuga quaesita salus, comitique, mibique.
Tertius è nobis Læstrygonis impia iuvavit
Ora cruore suo: fugientibus inflat, & agmen
Concitat Antiphates, cœnans, & saxa trabesque
Conjiciunt: merguntque viros, merguntque carinas.
Una tamen, que nos ipsamque vehebat Ulysses, Effugit (4).*

"Forthwith outrush'd a Gulf, which backwards
" bore
" Our Gallies to the Læstrygonian shore,
" Whose Crown Antiphates the Tyrant wore.
" Some few commiffiond were with speed to treat;
" We to his Court repair, his Guards we meet.
" Two friendly flight preserved, the Third was " doom'd
" To be by those curs'd Cannibals consumed.
" Inhumanly our helpless Friends they treat:
" Our Men they murder, and destroy our Fleet.
" In time the wife Ulysses bore away.

GARTH.

Hence it came, that this barbarous Læstrygonian used to be mentioned as an instance of cruelty and want of hospitality. Quis non Antiphates Læstrygonia devoret? Who does not curse Antiphates the Læstrygonian? says Ovid, in the ninth elegy of the second book of Ponto. In another place he express himself thus:

LÆVIUS, a Latin Poet. It is not well known when he lived, but he was, very probably, more ancient than Cicero. He had made a Poem intitled, Erotopœgnia, that is to say, Love Games. Aulus Gellius (a) quotes two lines from it. Apuleius (b) quotes

(a) NoE. Attic.
lib. 2. cap. 24.

(b) Lib. 17. ca. 21.

Nec tu contuleris urbem Læstrygonis unquam Gentibus, obliqua quas obit Ister aqua (5).

"Never pretend to compare the City of Læstrygon,
" with those nations, who live where the Danube
" runs with turnings and windings."

(5) Ovid. Eleg.
10. lib. 4. de
Ponto.

I omit several other passages, and shall only transcribe the following lines from Sidonius Apollinarius.

Bistonii stabulum regis, Bufiridis aras Antiphates mensas, & Taurica regna Thoantis, Atque libaci ingenio fraudatum luce Cycloperum (6).

"The stable of the King of Biston, the Altar of " Bufiris, the table of Antiphates, the reign of Thoon
" King of Taurica, and the Cyclop, who was blind-
" ed by Ulysses's artifice."

(6) Sidon. Apol-lon. Carm. 22.
pag. m. 170.

[C] The Læstrygones have passed for 'men-eaters' Add to the proofs alledged in the foregoing remark the following words of Pliny. Esse Scytharum genera, & quidem plurima, que corporibus humanis vescerentur, indicavimus. Id ipsum incredibile fortasse, ni cogitemus in medio orbe terrarum, ac Sicilia & Italia fuisse gentes hujus monstri, Cycloper & Læstrygonas (7). i. e. "That there are nations amongst the Scythians, and even many, who feed upon human flesh, is what we have already shewed. This would perhaps seem incredible, if we did not know, that in the midst of the earth, even in Italy and in Sicily there have been such monsters, as the Cyclopes and the Læstrygones."

(7) Plinius, lib.
7. cap. 2. pag. m.
6.

[D] The fields about the City of Leontium were called Campi Læstrygonii. See Pliny (8) and his commentator Father Hardouin, who quotes a passage from Polybius, in which it is observed, that they who had been possessed of Leontium and the lands about it, were called Læstrygones. He quotes also these words from Silius Italicus:

(8) Idem, lib. 3.
cap. 8. pag. 344.

*Prima Leontinos vastarunt prælia campos
Regnatam dero quondam Læstrygonis terram (9).*

(9) Silius Italicus, lib. 14. ver.
127. pag. m. 591.

"The first battles laid waste the fields of Leontium,
" where the cruel Læstrygon reigned of old."

See Daufqueius's notes on these words of the same Poet,

Post dirum Antiphates sceptram & Cycloperum regna (10).

(10) Idem, ver.
33. pag. 581.

"After the cruel government of Antiphates, and the " reign of the Cyclops."

fix lines of this same Poet, but he does not tell us from what work he borrowed them. Lævius had also composed a Poem intituled, The Centaurs, which Festus quotes under the word Petrarum. I shall take notice of some mistakes [A].

(1) De Poet. Lat.

(2) Philip. Carolus, Animado. in A. Gallium, pag. 162.

(3) It is Licinius's passage in which a law is mentioned (3), which was made in the year 656 after the building of Rome; how I say,

[A] I shall take notice of some mistakes.] Since Vossius (1) was acquainted with the two quotations, I have set down, that it is very surprizing that he should have placed Lævius amongst those poets, of whom we know only that they lived before Charles the Great. But this is a trifling mistake, if compared with the blunder of an author (2), who corrects Lævius into Livius in Aulus Gellius, and pretends that this writer quoted Livius Andronicus. How could he quote from that Livius a passage in which a law is mentioned (3), which was made in the year 656 after the building of Rome; how I say, could Livius Andronicus be quoted for this, who was already a grown man in the year 514 after the building of Rome? For one of his plays was acted that year (4). The author whom I refute pretends that Nævius and Pacuvius flourished after Livius Andronicus. But did he not observe a particular in Aulus Gellius, which proves that this Livius could not have the least knowledge of the Licinian Law. For Aulus Gellius tells us (5), that Nævius had his plays acted in the year 519 of Rome, and that he bore arms in the first Punic war.

(4) It is the first that was acted at Rome. See Cicero in Bruto.

(5) Lib. 17. cap. 21.

LAIS a famous curtezan was born at Hyccara a City of Sicily [A]. She was carried into Greece, when her native place had been plundered by Nicias General of the Athenians. She settled at Corinth, which was the most proper City in the world for women of her trade [B]; and she gained such a reputation there, that there was never a curtezan who enticed more people to her than she did [C]. She had been informed in a kind of

(1) Plutarch. in Nicia, pag. 533. See also in Alcibiade, sub finem.

(2) Eri xipm; fill a virgin. Idem, in Nicia, pag. 533, C.

(3) Thomæus, De Varia Hist. lib. 1. cap. 81. One of the Commentators on Alciat's Emblemata, pag. m. 330. Du Verdier Vau-Peiras, Diverses Leçons, liv. 3. chap. 6. pag. m. 184.

(4) Παϊδα ἔσται, being a child. Pausanias, lib. 2. pag. 45.

(5) Solin. cap. 5.

(6) Polemon, Nicophorus, and Timæus.

(7) Polemo, apud Athen. ibid.

(8) In voce Ταρπία.

(9) In voce Ευκαρπία.

(10) In voce Κραρπία.

(11) In Stephan. in voce Ευκαρπία.

(12) In Athen. pag. 869.

(13) Solin. cap. 5.

(14) See Pinedo in Stephanum, voce Ευκαρπία.

(15) Pinedo, under the word Κραρπία. See the same under the word Ταρπία.

[A] She was born at Hyccara a City of Sicily.] Plutarch acquaints us with this in the account he gives us of the taking of that City (1). The inhabitants of it were sold, and Laïs met with the same fate. She was carried into Peloponnesus; and was still a virgin then (2). Some moderns assert that she was sold at Corinth (3); but they did not consult Pausanias nor his translator, from whom they might have known that she was first sold at Hyccara, and then carried to Corinth. Pausanias agrees in every particular with Plutarch. He asserts, like the latter, that she was still a young maiden (4). Solinus observes only that she was born in Sicily (5), without telling us exactly in what City: but Athenæus, in his thirteenth book, page 588, quotes three authors (6), who assert expressly, that she was of Hyccara in Sicily. One of these three writers observes, that she was a slave when she went to Corinth. 'Αφ' ἧς αἰχμαλωτῆος ὑποπύμα ἦεν εἰς Κόρινθον. From which (City of Hecara) she went to Corinth being a captive (7). This refutes the moderns whom I have mentioned. Stephanus Byzantinus (8) also asserts that she was of Hyccara, and he quotes (9) Synesius, who called her ὑκαρπία ἀσκήματος, The Hyccarian slave. But on the other hand he quotes (10) Neanthes, who wrote the lives of Illustrious Persons, and who asserts that she was born at Crastus a City in Sicily. He quotes even Timæus as saying that she was born at Eucarpia in the same Island. And yet we have seen just now, that Timæus, as quoted by Athenæus, makes her a native of Hyccara. And as there is not one author, that mentions a City in Sicily named Eucarpia, I think that Berkelius's (11) conjecture is very probable, namely that Stephanus Byzantinus made use of a copy of Timæus, in which the transcriber wrote ὑκαρπία instead of ὑκαρπία. Casaubon observes (12) that Laïs's native place, like that of Homer and of some other illustrious persons, has not been exactly known; and he quotes Solinus, who says, Lais eligere patriam maluit quam fateri (13). i. e. "Lais would rather choose a country for her own, than declare which was her native soil," Casaubon adds that some suppose she was born at Pancarpia in Phrygia (14). But his memory deceived him here; he remembered in some measure to have read that some say she was born at Eucarpia in Sicily, a place which Stephanus Byzantinus mentions in the article of Eucarpia in Phrygia: hereupon his notions mingled together in his head; he imagined he had read that Pancarpia in Phrygia was the native place of Laïs, according to some writers. The Sieur Pinedo goes infinitely farther than Casaubon, in his Parallel of Homer with this Courtezan; he pretends that several Cities claimed the glory of being Laïs's native place. Celebres meretrices urbes etiam si Diis placet illustrant: de qua (Laïde) decertabant quædam civitates haud secus ac de Homero (15). i. e. "Even Courtezans, forsooth, illustrate their native places; several cities claimed the glory of having produced Laïs, as others did with regard to Homer."

[B] Corinth . . . was the most proper City in the world for women of her trade.] You ought not however to believe all that Lotichius relates of it. He asserts that the Corinthians in their solemn devotions prayed to the Gods to increase the number of the Courtezans (16): Whereupon he quotes Athenæus, who says nothing like it. But Lotichius was perhaps misled by giving too much credit to the following words of Erasmus. Tantus Corinthi bonus habebatur meretricibus, ut quemadmodum ex autoribus docet Athenæus, illic in templo Veneris prostarent, atque in solemnibus precibus illud addi soleat, ut Dii auferent meretricum numerum. Quin & illud refert meretrices facto sacro Veneri, Civitatem extremo periculo laborantem servasse placata Veneri (17). i. e. "Courtezans were so much honoured at Corinth, that they stood to be hired in the Temple of Venus, and in the publick prayers it was added, that the Gods would be pleased to increase the number of courtezans, as Athenæus relates from other authors; he tells us also, that the courtezans, having appeased Venus by a sacrifice offered to her, delivered the City of an imminent danger." Erasmus exaggerates here: Athenæus says only, that there was an ancient Law at Corinth, by which it was enacted, that when the City should make public supplications to Venus for some important affair, they should gather together as many courtezans as could be found, that they might assist at the procession, pray to that Goddess, and continue the last in her temple (18). The rest of Erasmus's account is very accurate; for it is certain that Athenæus relates, that it was thought the Courtezans of Corinth had very much contributed to the preservation of Greece, by the prayers they offered up to Venus at the time of Xerxes's invasion: He adds that the Citizens of Corinth used to promise a certain number of those creatures to Venus, if she granted them the favours they prayed for; and that Xenophon the Corinthian made such a promise to her, in case he should be conqueror at the Olympick Games. Having gained the victory, he performed his promise very punctually; he consecrated twenty five maidens to the service of Venus, and offered them to the Goddess during the Ceremony of the sacrifice, which he made to her after his return from the Olympick Games. These twenty five maidens began even the Hymn, which was sang whilst they were sacrificing the victim. Concerning this whoredom of the Corinthians, see Erasmus's proverbs (19), where he quotes a remarkable passage from Strabo (20)

This is sufficient to prove the assertion in my text, and at the same time to shew that the heathens could not pretend, that the abominable actions which they ascribed to their Gods, were only poetical stories: for we have here a most flourishing City, the very laws and worship of which shew it was believed there, that the Courtezans did a very acceptable service to Venus by prostituting themselves, and that their intercession with her was greatly effectual to divert public misfortunes: which shews that they believed the stories that were reported concerning the adulteries of this Goddess.

[C] There was never a Courtezan who enticed more people to her than she did.] Propertius (21) asserts it very positively.

(16) Lotichius in Petronium, pag. 232.

(17) Erasmus. Κορινθιακή Σάτις, in Proverb. id est: scortationibus ac lasciviis indulgere, innocentiæque excercere. It is in the 68th Proverb. Com. 3. Chilian. 4. pag. m. 904.

(18) Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 57. ex Chamæleonis Heracleote in Libro de Pindaro.

(19) Erasmus, in Proverbium Non est cuiuslibet Corinthum appellare. It is the 1st of the 4th Century, of the 1st Chilian, pag. m. 132.

(20) Strabo, lib. 7. pag. m. 261.

(21) Propert. lib. 2. Eleg. 6.

of revelation, that she would signalize herself, and get a considerable sum of money; for she dreamt once that Venus appeared to her to acquaint her with the arrival of some very rich customers [D]. The most illustrious Orators, and even the most unfociable Philosophers fell in love with her. All the world knows that Demosthenes went on purpose to Corinth to pass a night with her, but was disgusted by the high price she put upon her favours [E]. It is also well known how strong an affection Diogenes the Cynic had for her [F], and notwithstanding his poverty and slovenliness he found her very kind. It is pretended that she did not love him, and that he was ridiculed on that account. The answer he made to it was very smart [G]. Some assert (a), that the envy she

(a) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 588.

(22) That is to say of Corinth, for the ancient name of that city was Epbyra. Plin. lib. 4. cap. 4.

Non ita complebant Epbyrae (22) Laidis aedes, Ad cunjs jacuit Graecia tota fores.

i. e. "Lais's house at Corinth was too small for the number of her lovers, for all Greece lay down at her door."

(23) Plutarch, in Amatoris, pag. 767.

Plutarch's expressions are as strong as they could be. He asserts that all Greece was in love with Lais, that the two seas fought together for that woman (23), and that she had an whole army of lovers (24). 'Ἰνι δὲ πύκνῳ αἰκοῦ Λαΐδα τὴν αἰσίδαμον ἐκείνην καὶ πολυήρατον ὡς ἐπιφύλαξι πρὸς τὴν Ἑλλάδα, μᾶλλον δὲ ταῖς ἄλλοις ἢ παρὰ τὴν ἑαυτῆς. i. e. "You have heard, no doubt, of Lais, that celebrated and lovely woman, who enflamed the hearts of all Greece, so that even two seas fought for her." See her epitaph in the remark [K].

(24) Ἀποδράσασα τῶν ἄλλων ἡραστῶν κρύφα μίγαν ἑραστῶν. i. e. "Secretly escaping an whole army of other lovers." Idem, libid.

The Lady Jacqueline Guillaume asserts in page 77. of her Dames illustres (25), or Illustrious Ladies, that one of the chief lovers of Lais a publick Curtezian raised a statue to her like that of Pallas, and caused the following Inscription to be engraved on it; To the Deity of Lais, for triumphing over the wit of all the Philosophers, and over the courage of all the conquerors." I wish some credible author, or some author at least, had been quoted for this particular; for the person whose words I have transcribed, is not so accurate as to make us depend upon her testimony.

(25) That book was printed at Paris in the year 1665.

[D] She dreamt once that Venus appeared to her to acquaint her with the arrival of some very rich customers.] It was Venus surnamed Melænis or the Black, who appeared to her. She had under that name a temple consecrated to her in one of the suburbs of Corinth

(26) Pausan. lib. 2. cap. 2.

(26). The reason of that surname was thought to be this, namely that men generally speaking apply themselves to the multiplication of their species in the night time (27), and not in the day time like brutes (28). If this be the true reason of the surname of Melænis, one cannot see why Venus the Black should appear in a dream to young Lais, who was not used to be so nice as to make any distinction between the day and the night with regard to the pleasures of love. However it be, there was an Orator, who mentioned that dream in one of his pleas. Read only the following passage from Athenæus. Ἡ δὲ Ἀφροδίτη ἢ ἐν Κορίνθῳ ἢ Μελανίς καλεῖται, τὴν δὲ ἐπιφάνισατον ἑμπίαν ἡραστῶν ἰσθόδῳ ἀποδράσασαν ἢ Τασπιδῆς μνημονεύει ἐν τῷ κατὰ Ἀριστοτέλους δυνάμει (29). i. e. "Venus surnamed the Black at Corinth appeared to her (Lais) in the night, and acquainted her with the arrival of some lovers, who were immenely rich, as Hyperides relates in his 3d Oration against Aristagoras."

(27) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 6.

(28) Compare this with what is observed above, in the article of the 3d Duke of GUISE, quoted in (45).

(29) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 588.

[E] Demosthenes went on purpose to Corinth to pass a night with her, but was disgusted by the high price she put upon her favours.] This story has been very prettily dressed in the French tongue by Monf. le Puys (30). Aulus Gellius relates it as follows (31). Lais Corinthia ob elegantiam venustatemque formæ grandem pecuniam demerebat: conventusque ad eam ditiorum hominum ex omni Græcia celebres erant: neque admittentur, nisi qui dabat, quod poposcerat. Poscebat autem illa nimum quantum. Hinc ait natum esse illud frequens apud Græcos adagium, οὐ πωτὸς ἀνδρὸς ἐς Κορίνθον ἰσθ' ἢ πωλῶς. Quod frustra iret Corinthum ad Laidem, qui non quiret dare quod poposceretur. Ad banc ille Demosthenes clanculum adit; & ut sibi sui copiam faceret, petiit: at Lais prociâs δραχμῶν ἢ τάλαντων ποσέσσι. Hoc facit nummi nostratis denarium decem millia. Tali petulantia mulieris atque pecuniæ magnitudine iâns expavidusque Demosthenes avertit; & discedens, Ego, inquit, permittere tanti

(30) In his Amitias, Amours, & Amourettes.

(31) Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. lib. 1. cap. 8. ex Sotionis. Libro cui Titulus, Κίρας ἀμαλδίας.

non emo. Sed Græca ipsa, quæ fertur dixisse, lepidiora sunt, cetera ἀνοῦμαι, inquit, μολίον δραχμῶν μολιμίλιον. i. e. "Lais the Corinthian got a great deal of money by her beauty; for a vast number of the richest men flocked to her from all parts of Greece; nor would she admit any man to her embraces but who paid her the price she asked: and she used to ask an extravagant price. Which gave rise to this proverb so common among the Greeks; It is not in every man's power to sail to Corinth. For they went thither to no purpose, who could not give her her own price. Demosthenes went secretly to her, and desired to lie with her. But Lais asked him ten thousand Drachms, or a talent, which makes ten thousand denarii, of our [that is Roman] money [about 317 pound sterling]. Demosthenes being shocked and frightened at the woman's sauciness, and at her extravagant price, went away; saying, he would not buy a repentance so dear. But the Greek words he is said to have spoken on this occasion are smarter still. I will not pay ten thousand drachms, said he, for a repentance." [F] It is . . . well known how strong an affection Diogenes the Cynic had for her.] She did him the curtesty intire; he kissed her gratis. This is what Aristippus's servant represented to his master, when he saw him spend great sums upon that harlot. But Aristippus answered, I pay her well, not to prevent others from enjoying her, but that I may enjoy her myself. Οὐδὲ γάρ μοι ἐπὶ οὐκίβη, ὅτι σὸν μὲν αὐτῆς τοσούτων ἀργυρίου δίδως, ἢ δὲ πρὸς αὐτὴν Διογένην τῷ κυνὶ ἐνυγκολίβηαι. ἀπειρήναι, ἵνα αὐτῆς χαρῆσθαι πολλὰ, ἵνα αὐτὸς αὐτῆς ἀπολαύσῃ, οὐχ' ἵνα μὲν ἄλλῳ. (32). Aristippus was the most easy man in the world with regard to his mistresses: he was not in the least jealous of them; nor did he care whether or not they bestowed upon others the same favours they granted him. This he declared to Diogenes, who had told him (3), you lie with a common whore; either forsake her, or be a Cynic like me. Do you think it is impertinent, answered Aristippus, to lodge at a house, where there have been several other lodgers, or to embark on board a ship, which has carried several other passengers? No, said Diogenes: Well then, replied Aristippus, it is not more impertinent to lie with a woman, whom several other men have already known (34). Here follows a very diverting description of the dress, in which these two Philosophers used to ramble about Lais's house, if we may believe Tassoni. Ma che bel vedere Diogene Cynico col Mantello di romagnuolo squarciato, e rappezzato, la barba squalida, senza camicia, e lordo, e pidocchioso far dell' innamorato, passeggiando lungo la porta della famosa Laide, e dall'altra parte comparire il suo rivale Aristippo, tutto profumato, e attillato, sputando sibetto, e mirarlo di torto, e leuargli il muro; e la Signora starfi alla gelosia, pigliandosi gusto di vederli passeggiare al sereno (35). i. e. "But what a pretty thing was it to see Diogenes the Cynic with a cloak of coarse cloth all ragged, and patched up, with a dirty face, without a shirt, and nasty and lousy, setting up for a lover, and walking before the famous Lais's door; and on the other hand to see his rival Aristippus appear, all perfumed, neatly dressed, spitting civet, looking with an evil eye upon the other, and climbing upon the wall; and the Lady standing at her window, and taking a delight in seeing them walk in the dew."

[G] The answer he made to it was very smart.] When he was told that Lais did not love him, he made the following answer; I do not imagine that the wine I drink, or the fishes I eat love me, and yet I take a pleasure in living upon them. Plutarch acquaints us with

(32) Aristippus was the most easy man in the world with regard to his mistresses: he was not in the least jealous of them; nor did he care whether or not they bestowed upon others the same favours they granted him. This he declared to Diogenes, who had told him (3), you lie with a common whore; either forsake her, or be a Cynic like me. Do you think it is impertinent, answered Aristippus, to lodge at a house, where there have been several other lodgers, or to embark on board a ship, which has carried several other passengers? No, said Diogenes: Well then, replied Aristippus, it is not more impertinent to lie with a woman, whom several other men have already known

(32) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 588.

(33) Idem, ibid.

(34) See the Nouvelles Lettres de la Critique du Calvinisme, pag. 550. There is in Du Verdier, Bibliothèque Française, pag. 989 a very pretty Poem upon this subject, written by Peter de Brach, of Bourdeaux.

(35) Tassoni, Pensieri Diversi, lib. 7. cap. 11. pag. 228.

(6) It was Pbyne.

she bore another curtezan (b) made her admit the poor as well as the rich, that she might distinguish her self by the great number of her gallants. Others maintain that it was only when she was old that she used to prostitute her self for a trifle [H]. There are authors who tell us that she was only a bawd in her old age [I]. Some pretend that notwithstanding with this particular; Amiot did not well understand his words, for he supposes that Aristippus answered, I love neither wine nor fish, though I take some pleasure in using them. Here follow the Greek words, which offer no such thought. Ἀριστιππῶ τῷ καὶ φιλοσοφῶντι Λαίδῳ. πρὸς αὐτὸν ὡς οὐ φιλοῦσθαι, ἀποκριθεὶς ἔειπεν ὅτι ἴσθαι οἴσται καὶ ἴχθυον μὴ φιλεῖν αὐτὸν, ἀλλ' ἰδίως ἰκαλεῖσθαι χερτίαι. i. e. "A person representing to Aristippus, that Lais did not love him, do you think, answered he, that the wine or the fishes

(36) Plutarch. in Amatorio, pag. 750, D.

(37) Cicero, Epist. 26. lib. 9. ad Familiares.

(38) Lib. 12. pag. 544

(39) Lactant. lib. 3. cap. 15. pag. m. 184.

(40) Laert. 6, 7. Menag. ad Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 75.

(41) Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 84, 85.

(42) Epicrates, in Anti Laide, apud Athen. lib. 13. pag. 570.

love me? And yet I use both with pleasure (26)." On another occasion he made an answer, which has been mentioned by several authors, and which shews more evidently still, that though he used to go often to Lais, yet he was by no means a slave to his passion. Cum esset obiectum habere eum Laida, habes, inquit, non habeor à Laide (37). i. e. "It being objected to him, that he was in Lais's power; he answered I keep Lais, but I am not kept by her." The answer is shorter still in Athenæus (38), ἔχω καὶ οὐκ ἔχομαι. i. e. "I keep, but am not kept." This answer is mentioned by several authors; Diogenes Laertius does not omit it in his Life of Aristippus; and Lactantius relates it after the following manner. Aristippo Cyrenaiorum magistro cum Laide nobili scorto fuit consuetudo, quod flagitium gravis illi philosophiæ doctor sic defendebat, ut diceret, multum inter se, & ceteros Laidis amatores interesse, quod ipse haberet Laidem, alii vero à Laide haberentur. O præclara, & imitanda bonis sapientia: huic vero liberos in disciplinam daret, ut discerent habere meretricem. Aliquid inter se, ac perditos interesse dicebat, scilicet, quod illi bona sua perderent, ipse gratis luxuriaretur. In quo tamen sapientior meretrix fuit, quæ philosophum habuit pro lenone, ut ad se omnis juvenentis doctoris exemplo, & auctoritate corrupta, sine ullo pudore concurreret (39). i. e. "The founder of the Cyreniac sect conversed with Lais the noted Curtezan, and that grave teacher of Philosophy pretended to vindicate that wickedness by observing, that there was a great difference between him and the other lovers of Lais, for that Lais was in his power, and they in her's. Oh! the noble wisdom, proper to be imitated by all good men! You may give him your children to educate, that they may learn to keep a whore. He pretended that there was some difference between him and profligate men, namely this, that they squandered away their estates, whilst he rioted gratis. Wherein however the Curtezan shewed the greatest wisdom, who made a pimp of a Philosopher, that the young students should not be ashamed to go to her, being encouraged thereto by the example of their teacher." This Father of the Church's reflection is not entirely well grounded; Lactantius, it seems, did not well understand the Philosopher's thought. His meaning was this. "I go to Lais's house; I have a right to do it"; ἔχω γυναικὸν Ἕλῶν ἁπάντων, ὡς ἔχουσιν οἱ ἄλλοι φιλοσοφῶντες, ὡς ἔχουσιν οἱ ἄλλοι φιλοσοφῶντες, ὡς ἔχουσιν οἱ ἄλλοι φιλοσοφῶντες. mulierem, de eo qui ad eam pro suo jure cum volebat, ventitabat. . . Latinae dictionis exemplum habes apud Terentium in Andria I. 1. Quis Chrysidem habuit? Qua de re Muretus variat. (40); but she does not govern or rule over me: I am still the master of this correspondence, and can put a stop to it whenever I please." He did not mean, as Lactantius supposes, that this correspondence cost him nothing. We have seen above, how Aristippus's servant complained of his master's expences on this account. I must not forget to observe, that this Philosopher dedicated some of his works to Lais (41).

[H] Others maintain, that . . . when she was old she prostituted herself for a trifle.] Epicrates wrote some verses, in which he abused her most cruelly. When she was young, said he (42), she was so proud on account of her riches, that it was a more difficult matter to have access to her, than to Pharnabazus. But now she is old it is the easiest thing in the world to have one's will of her. She goes and drinks in any place. She admits to her embraces both the old and the young indifferently. She is become so humble and meek, that she even begs for the curtesy. Athenæus relates these lines of Epicrates, extracted from a work entitled Anti-Lais. Monsieur Baillet has omitted it in his collection of the books entitled Anti. It is impossible to reconcile together the authors who mention Lais. According to Epicrates, she was almost inaccessible when she was young. Another author asserts that she was surnamed Axine on account of her shyness, and because she extorted large sums of money from her lovers. Ὅτι Λαίη καὶ ἄξινη ἰκαλεῖτο. ἄλογον δὲ αὐτῇ τὸ ἐπὶ ἡλικίᾳ τῷ τῷ ἄδυνος ἀγνώστῳ, καὶ οὐκ ἐπὶ ἐπιτηδεύσει, καὶ ἴδι μὴ δὲ λαιω σαφῶς τῶν ἔτινων, αἷς ἀπαλαττομένων θάπτῳ (43). i. e. "Lais was called Axine; which surname was given her to signify her shy temper, and that she would get too much money, especially from strangers, because they were to go away very soon." She would demand too much, and gave no quarter in that respect. Neque admittebatur nisi qui dabat quod poposcerat; posebat autem illa nimium quantum (44). She was particularly guilty of an excessive covetousness with regard to strangers; for as they were soon to go back, she knew that they would not have time to bargain with her, and that if she did not receive a large sum at once from them, she should not meet with another opportunity to get again what she might have bated of her price. See Ælian's Greek words quoted above (45). Athenæus represents her of a much easier temper. He asserts that she made no difference between the poor and the rich, ὡς διακρίσειν πτωχῶν καὶ πλουσίων (46). She took nothing from Diogenes. She acted probably like the charitable Physicians, who visit their poor patients gratis; but she made the rich pay the more for it, as several Physicians do, who accept no money from the poor.

[I] . . . Some pretend that she was only a bawd in her old age.] There was no Deity among the Heathens, that was more faithfully served than Venus; for the women who prostituted themselves, used to make their prostitution last as long as they could; and when old age made them unfit for the trade, they did not however give over the service, but set up for teachers of young maidens, and procured interviews and meetings between lovers. This is what Claudian reproaches Lais with.

*Haud aliter juvenum flammis Ephyreia Lais
E gemino ditata mari, dum ferta refundit
Canities, dum turba procaax, molisque recedit
Ambitus, & raro pulsatur janua tactu,
Seque reformidat speculo damnante senectus,
Stat tamen, atque alias succingit lena ministras,
Dilectumque diu quamvis longæva lupanar
Circuit & retinet mores, quos perdidit ætas* (47).

i. e. "Thus the Corinthian Lais, grown rich by the love of young men, and the spoils of two seas, when old age came upon her, when the crowd of lovers forsook her, when she was obliged to lie alone all night, and there was seldom any knocking at her door, when she was frightened at her own face seen in the glass, yet she would continue her ancient trade; she turned a bawd, and though a decrepit old woman, she could not leave her beloved stew. Her inclinations were still the same, though she could not gratify them on account of her old age."

This puts me in mind of those invalids, who have sometimes been mentioned in our News-Papers. As they are no longer able to bear arms, they are sent on the sea-coast, to exercise the militia there. Or, if you want another comparison, consider that mule, of which a Greek Historian speaks (48). As she had served the Athenians a long time, she was discharged from any labour, and was suffered to graze wherever she would. But that she might not be entirely useless, she used to walk before the waggons, and encouraged in some manner the horses or oxen that drew them for which reason it was ordered that she should be nourished

(43) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 14. cap. 35. See also the 5th chap. of the 12th book, where Aristophanes Byzantius is quoted for this particular.

(44) A. Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 8. translated above, quotation (31).

(45) Quæstion on (43).

(46) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 588.

(47) Claudian. lib. 1. in Eutrapiam, ver. 90.

(48) Plutarch. in Vita M. Cornelia.

notwithstanding the pleasure she took in distinguishing herself by the great number of persons who courted her favours, yet she left Corinth, where she had always a crowd of lovers, and went into Thessaly to meet a young man with whom she was passionately in love [K]. The women of that country entertained such a jealousy against this beautiful creature, that they got rid of her in a very cruel manner. They enticed her into the temple of Venus, and stoned her to death (c), or, according to others, they knocked her down with the chairs they happened to meet with there. It is not a general opinion amongst authors, that she died after that manner [L]. I have observed in another place (d), that Apelles taught her her trade; and it seems indeed, that he got her maidenhead, if we consider only the authors I have quoted. See (e) the answer he made to those who ridiculed him for choosing a raw unexperienced girl; but if we examine things critically we shall find reasons to question this story [M]. The conjecture of those who assert that

(d) In the article APELLES, remark [E].

(e) Ibid.

that

nourished all her life-time at the expence of the public.

I must not omit to observe a mistake of the learned Barthius. He imagined (49) that Synesius gives us the History of Lais in the letter in which he mentions a Curtezian, who was the first mistress of a master of a ship, then of a rhetorician, afterwards of a footman, then a public prostitute, and lastly a bawd. It is certain that Lais is not meant there, but the mother of a rhetorician, who was lately married to Synesius's niece, which unequal match he very much disliked. Here follows the whole passage. Πλὴν εἰ μὴ τι λέγουσιν ὅσοι καὶ τὸ νυμφίον ἡμῶν μὴ πρότερον ἀποσημειώσιν ἡμιλογησίντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ τῆς ἐν Φίμῃ Λαίδου. ἡ γὰρ Λαίς ἔφη τις ἦδη λογογράφου, ἀνδραποδῆν, ἢ Ἰταλικῶν ἐν Σικελίας ἐνομήσιοι, ὅθεν ἡ καλλιπεία ἢ τεκῆσα τὸ περιβόητον. καὶ αὐτὴ πάλαι μὲν ἰταλλοκλήστον ναυκλήρων διαπόνη. ἔπειτα μὲν τοῖς ῥήτορι, καὶ τέλος διαπένη. τρίτῳ μὲν ἐκείνους ἐμποδίσθη καὶ λάθρα τῆ πόλει. ἔπειτα λαμπρῶς τῆ πόλει, καὶ περιεστῆ τῆς πόλεως, ἢς ἐπειθὴ τὴν ἐργασίαν ὑπὸ χαλαρῶ ῥυθμὸν κατέλιπον, τὰς ἐν ἡλικίᾳ παιδοτρέχει, καὶ τοῖς ξένοις ἀντικαθίστησιν. i. e.

(49) Barthius, Animadv. ad lib. 1. Claudiani in Eutropium, ver. 95. p. 1291, edit. in 4to.

(50) Synesius, Epist. 3. pag. 21. Mr. Bayle followed Thonaeorgus's translation into Latin, and the Basil edit. 1588, in 8vo.

Unless it be, that they say something to the purpose, who extoll this bridegroom on account of his mother's family, making him descend from the famous Lais. Who, as a certain Historian relates, was a slave from Hyccara, bought in Sicily, whence came also this mother of beautiful children, who brought forth that celebrated man. And she herself was formerly kept by a master of a ship, who was a freeman, afterwards by a rhetorician, also a freeman, and then by one of her fellow-servants; to whom she prostituted herself in an unknown city, and afterwards became a public harlot, being the chief of her trade. But when the wrinkles of her face made her unfit for the service, she instructed young girls in it, whom she offered her customers instead of herself." Here is a person of whom it may be well asserted that her last state was worse than the first; for her prostitution was less pernicious than the trade of a bawd, which she followed at last.

[K] She went into Thessaly to meet a young man, with whom she was passionately in love.] What we have just now observed concerning Lais's poverty and her trade of a bawd, does not agree with Plutarch's account of her; for he asserts that when this Curtezian left Corinth she had a whole army of lovers there, and that the women of Thessaly killed her only out of envy for her great beauty. Ἐκεί δὲ αὐτὴν αἱ γυναῖκες ὑπὸ φθόνῳ καὶ ζήλῳ διὰ τὸ κάλλος εἰς ἱερὸν Ἀφροδίτης παραγῆσαι κατέλιπον καὶ διέφθειραν (52). i. e. "The women there, out of ENVY and jealousy OF HER BEAUTY, having conducted her into the Temple of Venus, stoned her there to death." The Thessalian, with whom she fell in love, was named Hippolochus, if we may believe Plutarch; but Athenæus calls him Pausanias (53). They both agree that the Temple of Venus, in which she was killed, had a surname which signified that crime. According to Plutarch, it was called the Temple of Venus the Manslayer, Ἀφροδίτης ἀνδροφόνου, and according to Athenæus the Temple of Venus prophaned, ἀνοσίης Ἀφροδίτης. They built a tomb to Lais on the banks of the river Peneus with this epitaph.

Τῆς δὲ πόδος ἡ μεγαλαυχῶν Ἀνικητὴς τὴ πρὸς ἄλλην Ἑλλάδα ἐδουλόθη καλλιῶν ἰσοθεία, Λαίδου, ἢ τίκουσαν Ἐρμῆ, θεῶν δὲ Κορῆθου, Κούται δ' ἐν κλεινοῖς Θεσσαλιῶσι πεδίον (54).

(51) In the two preceding remarks.

(52) Plutarch. in Amatoris, pag. 768, A.

(53) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 589.

(54) Athen. ibid.

i. e. "Proud Greece, invincible by her courage, has been vanquished by the heavenly beauty of this "Lais, whom Love begot, and Corinth educated; "here she lies in the celebrated fields of Thessaly."

By this particular Athenæus refutes those, who asserted, that she was buried in the suburb of Corinth called Clanton. It is true however that there was a monument erected to her in that suburb (55). But there might be one there and another at the same time in Thessaly; for though the Corinthians were not possessed of her corps, yet they would, no doubt, raise a tomb to her, on which they caused a lioness to be engraved, whose forefeet rested on a ram (56). See Alciat's Emblemata (57). According to Pausanias, the lover, whom Lais went to meet in Thessaly was named Hippostratus. Let us observe here that Geufius's conjecture does not in the least appear to be well grounded: he imagines that the women of Thessaly, made Lais fall a sacrifice to Venus, because she had rendered herself odious to that Goddess, by her ambition in pretending to be equal to her, or even to excell above her in beauty. He grounds his conjecture on their carrying her into the Temple of Venus, though they might very easily have killed her any where else. Verisimile est, says he (38), quod hæc Lais ab invidiis & furiosis istis sœminis non simpliciter necata, sed tanquam piacularis viclima Deæ Veneri in ejus templo immolata fuerit; quia forma sua & pulchritudine Veneris ipsius gloriam affectasse, imo obscurasse, & ita indignationem & iram ejus in se excitasse videbatur. Nam quare ipsam non in alio loco, in foro, platea, vel ædibus occiderunt? Quare ipsam in Veneris templo lapidibus & scamnis obruerant, nisi propterea, ut Laida Veneris amulam coram ipsa Veneri in sacrificium mactarent? i. e. "It is probable that Lais was not killed by these envious and furious women, but that she was offered up in the Temple of Venus as a peculiar sacrifice to that Goddess, because she pretended to vie with Venus, or even to excell her in beauty, by which she drew upon her the hatred and indignation of that Goddess. For why did they not kill her in any other place, in the market-place, for instance, in the street, or in an house? Why did they kill her by throwing stones and benches at her in the very Temple of Venus, if it were not to make Lais the rival of Venus fall a sacrifice in the presence of Venus herself?"

(55) Pausan. lib. 2. pag. 45.

(56) Pausan. ibid.

(57) The 74th, pag. m. 329.

(58) Jacobus Geufius, Theologus & Medicus Frisius, in Tractatu de Victimis humanis, Part 2, pag. 482, 483.

[L] It is not a general opinion amongst authors that she died after that manner.] Some assert (59) that she was choked with an olive stone, in which case her death had been much like Anacreon's. Others pretend she died in the venereal act. Οὐχὶ Λαίς μὲν τελευτῆσ' ἀπέθανε βουμένη. i. e. "Lais was not yet dead, she died in the venereal act." This was a glorious death for a person who had consecrated herself to the service of the Goddess Venus; it was dying in the bed of honour, and when she was giving signal proofs of her loyalty. It is as when a warrior is killed in battle. It has been said, that an Emperor ought to die standing. But according to the principles of the Heathens, a Curtesian ought to be in a quite different posture to die gloriously. Lais in her profession did what Vespasian required from the Emperors.

(59) Ptolema Hephæst. apud Photium, pag. m. 472.

(60) Philetærus, in Venatrice, apud Athen. lib. 12. pag. 587. See Bigar. de des Accords, liv. 1. folio 181 verso, 182, & 191.

[M] There are reasons to question this story.] Let us remember that Lais was born the fourth year of the 89th Olympiad; and that Apelles being at sea was by fires of weather forced to put into the harbour of Alexandria under the reign of Ptolemy the son of Lagus (61), and that the reign of that King could not begin before the 114th Olympiad. The most favourable that there have been two curtezans named Lais [N], is grounded on this observation, namely, that the applying all that is said of Lais to one and the same woman, is inconsistent with Chronology. It is not at all probable that she was Alcibiades's daughter (f), nor that she wrote books [O]. There is a very pretty epigram in Aufonius concerning this vourable supposition, which the authors of that story could make, would be to say, that Apelles was but twenty years of age, and Lais twenty five at the time they speak of, and that he arrived at Alexandria the first year of Ptolomy's reign; whence it would follow that he was born the first year of the ninety first Olympiad. But according to this supposition, would he not have been near fourscore and fifteen, when Ptolomy the son of Lagus begun his reign? And is it probable, that at such an age, he had been able to undergo the fatigues of the sea, and to perform what he is supposed to have done at the Court of Egypt? Would none of the authors who are extant, have mentioned his great age? These difficulties cannot be removed, but by making Lais's virginity last longer; that is to say, by supposing that this painter being twenty years old, sent for her to the entertainment, when she was already forty or at least thirty five years old. Now these suppositions are not in the least probable, and are inconsistent with the accounts we meet with in the ancient authors. It would be much more reasonable to suppose, that Apelles was twice as old as Lais; it is infinitely probable that this Lady begun her wicked trade very soon, and therefore that it was not Apelles who debauched her first. Observe that the fountain of Pyrene, whence it is supposed she was returning when her beauty struck him, was at Corinth. Wherefore if this story were true, it would follow from thence, that he continued some time in that city, and I do not believe that any author ever asserted it positively.

(61) Above, quotation (9) of the article APELLES.

(f) See the remark [T].

[N] It is conjectured that there have been two courtezans named Lais. She, who is the subject of this article was carried to Corinth, when Nicias commanded the army of the Athenians in Sicily; that is to say, the second year of the 91st Olympiad. She was then seven years old, if we may believe the Scholiast on Aristophanes (62). Now since Demosthenes did not dare to go to Corinth but secretly, in order to enjoy Lais, it follows that he was not a young scholar then, but a man who had already gained a great reputation. We ought therefore to suppose that he was at least thirty; so that Lais would have been then threescore and seven years old (63). There is not therefore the least probability, that Demosthenes would have cared to see her, nor that she would have asked him a large sum of money. It was therefore another Lais who asked the Orator that sum; whence it follows that there have been two courtezans named Lais. The difficulty will be very great still, though it were supposed, that Demosthenes took a journey to Corinth at the age of about twenty years; for our Lais would have been then about threescore. I find that several authors ground their opinion, that there have been two Lais's, on a passage in Athenæus, where it is asserted that Alcibiades always had two concubines with him, namely, Damasandra the mother of Lais the younger (64), and Theodota who took care of his funeral when he had been killed in a town of Phrygia. There is some strength in that passage of Athenæus, for it supposes that there had been one Lais before her who was Damasandra's daughter. But it is still liable to a great many difficulties. In the 1st place, Athenæus, who relates so many particulars concerning Lais, does never make the least distinction; he goes on throughout his whole discourse, as though there had never been but one Lais? Does an author express himself after such a manner, when he is persuaded that there have been two persons of that name, and when he would acquaint his readers with it? II. Plutarch, speaking of Lais the daughter of Alcibiades's concubine, asserts positively, that she was born at Hyccara in Sicily, and that she was carried from thence a slave. Τῆς δὲ Λαΐδας θυγατρὸς γυνώσκει Λαΐδα, τὴν Κορινθίαν μὲν ἀρπαγαυομένην, ἐκ δὲ Ἰακάρων Σικελικῆ πόλεως αἰχμαλώτου γινώσκουσα (65). i. e. "They say, that her daughter was Lais, who was called the Corinthian, though she was born at Hyccara a town in Sicily, whence she was carried away a slave." So that according to Plutarch, the same Lais, whom Athenæus calls the younger, is she who was born in Sicily before the 91st Olympiad; so that if the courtezans who demanded a large sum of money from Demosthenes differ from this, it will follow from thence, that there have been three Lais's; for she, who would be the first according to Athenæus, would be anterior to the Sicilian, who was sold at Hyccara the second year of the 91st Olympiad, and would have been less capable still than the second of Athenæus, to have received a visit from Demosthenes. In the 3d place, the large sum of money demanded from that Orator, does evidently suppose that the courtezans who asked it, was still very young. A woman does not put so high a price upon her favours, when she is past thirty five. Now as it is very probable that Alcibiades's concubine had been already delivered of Lais, when that General died in the 1st year of the 94th Olympiad, it would follow from thence, that Lais was at least twenty five years older than Demosthenes. If therefore that Orator at the age of thirty had taken a journey to Corinth with a design to enjoy Lais, he would have loved a woman of fifty, who asked about four thousand livres for one night's lodging with her. Λαΐς πορναῖα θυγατρὸς τῆς Λαΐδας ἑπορεύθη, hoc facit nummi nostratis denarium decem millia (66). For my part, instead of supposing two Lais's, I should rather think that the authors, who were very inaccurate with regard to Chronology (67), applied to a courtezans of that name a story of Demosthenes, which related to another Lady of pleasure. Observe that Athenæus asserts in another place, that Alcibiades being General of the Army had two concubines with him, Timandra the mother of Lais the Corinthian, and Theodota the Athenian (68). This is hinting plainly enough that Timandra was then already mother of Lais; and it is certain, that the same Lais, who was born in Sicily, has been surnamed the Corinthian. Plutarch asserts it positively (69). Observe also that Athenæus calls the mother of Lais sometimes Damasandra, and sometimes Timandra, and that he ascribes to Theodota the care of Alcibiades's funerals. But Plutarch asserts, both that Timandra was Lais's mother, and that she buried Alcibiades (70).

[O] It is not at all probable . . . that she wrote books] Pliny (71) relates two particulars, which he had read in the works of a woman named Lais. He quotes her the first time with Elephantis, and the second with Salpe, and soon after he mentions a midwife called Sotira. It is well known that Elephantis had composed some books which abounded with obscenities. See the remark [P] of the article HELENA, and Suetonius, in the forty third chapter of the life of Tiberius, and the forty third Epigram of the twelfth book of Martial. Galen asserts (72) that Elephantis wrote a treatise of Cosmeticks. I have explained the sense of that word in another place (73). Salpe was of the Isle of Lesbos (74), and had composed a work of jests, of jokes and pleasantry, but it is not probable that Pliny quoted her with regard to this work. Lais & Salpe, says he (75), canum rabioforum morsus, & tertianas quartanasque febres, menstruo in lana arietis nigri, argenteo bracciali incluso. i. e. according to du Pinet's French translation; Lais and Salpe, both of them famous Courtezans, assert that if the menstrual blood be wrapped up in the wool of a black Ram, and put in a silver bracelet, it serves to cure the bite of a mad dog, as also the tertian and quartan ague. i. e. hinting very plainly, that both these women wrote books of prescriptions. Father Hardouin asserts that Salpe wrote de remediis muliebribus (76), of remedies proper for women. The second passage in Pliny, where Lais and Elephantis are mentioned together, hints the same thing. Quæ Lais & Elephantis inter se contraria prodidere de abortivis, carbone e radice brassicæ, vel myrti, vel tamaricis in eo sanguine extincto: item asinas non concipere tot annis, quot grana bordei contacta ederint, quæque alia nuncupaverunt monstrifica, aut inter ipsas pugnantia, cum hæc fecunditatem fieri iisdem modis, quibus illa sterilitatem, prænunderet, melius est non credere (77). That (66) A. Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 8. Denarium decem millia, amount, according to Galsendi, to 3722 livres, French money.

(67) See Scaliger in Eusebium, num. 786. pag. 49.

(68) Athen. lib. 2. pag. 535.

(69) Plutarch. in Alcibiade, sub fin. pag. m. 213.

(70) Ibid.

(71) Plin. lib. 28. cap. 7.

(72) Galen. in Libris contra venus.

(73) Above, remark [A] of the article CRISTO, num. 4.

(74) Athen. lib. 7. pag. 321, 322.

(75) Plin. lib. 28. cap. 7. pag. 588.

(76) Hardouin. in Indico Annot. Plinii.

(77) Plin. lib. 28. cap. 7. pag. 587.

(62) Ad Plautum.

(63) Demosthenes was born the 4th year of the 98th Olympiad. See Exercitationes Palmerii apud Lloyd, Voss Lais, & apud Menagium in Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 75.

(64) Τῆς Λαΐδας πορναῖας θυγατρὸς. i. e. "The mother of Lais the younger." Athen. lib. 13. pag. 574.

(65) Plutarch. in Alcib. sub fin. pag. 213. D.

this courtesan's looking-glass [P]. I forgot to observe that she was so passionately in love with Eubates, that she obliged him to promise her marriage [Q], but he found means to evade his promise. Notwithstanding her great beauty, it was impossible for her to conquer

That is to say, according to du Pinet's translation; As for what the Courtesan Lais () and the Poetess & Elephantis assert, of the menstrual blood, that it is proper to make the fetus melt away in the mother's womb, and of a coal of the root of a Cabbage, or of a Myrtle tree, or of a Tamarisk extinguished in the same blood, we ought not to believe it, for they absolutely contradict each other. We say the same of what they observe farther, namely, that a she-ass will continue as many years without conceiving, as she has eat grains of oats tainted with menstrual blood. Nay these two Courtesans relate monstrous things upon this subject, which ought by no means to be believed; for what the one prescribes as proper to get children, the other prescribes as proper to prevent conception.* This translator (Du Pinet) has took upon him to determine a particular, which Pliny does not mention. He asserts boldly that the Courtesan Lais is hinted at here, and he means undoubtedly the same, who is the subject of this article. If he had determined it only in a marginal note, it would not have been so great a rashness; but he asserts it as though it were a true translation of his original: Which is an inexcusable boldness. Father Hardouin has been infinitely more modest. He confesses, that he does not know whether Pliny quoted one of the two Courtesans, who were called Lais, and he cites her, whom Pliny quoted, a Midwife, Obstetrix (78). If I did not meet in Pliny's words with prescriptions for tertian and quartan agues; if they contained only remedies against barrenness, and prescriptions for miscarriages, I could easier believe, that he quoted a work written by our Lais, or ascribed to some famous Courtesan: for few persons are better acquainted with the means to facilitate or prevent conception, and to make a fetus vanish away, than women of Lais's trade; a trade which includes the wicked art of being serviceable to those, who dread a publick disgrace; in a word, a trade which ends in this art, to which alone it is at last reduced, when age does not suffer a woman to perform any longer the other functions of it. But upon the whole, I do not think it probable that our Lais wrote books. I would not however deny, that those which Pliny quotes, and which he opposes to those of another wicked woman, named Elephantis, have been ascribed to our Lais. I question, whether an honest matron, well skilled in the use of secrets, and a midwife by trade, would have been pleased with being named together with Lais: For that name as well as those of Chrysis, and Thais, and such others, was used to be particularly applied to bad characters in the works of the poets. And it was, no doubt, this custom which was followed in a book printed in France towards the beginning of the sixteenth Century with this title; Dialogue de l'Aretin, où sont deduites les Vies, Mœurs et déportemens de Lais & Lamia Courtisanes de Rome. i. e. "A Dialogue of Aretin and Lamia, Courtesans of Rome." Aristænetus gives his sweetheart the name of Lais (79), understanding by that name, not only his mistress, a girl, he loved (80), but also a girl, who loved him, and granted him all favours without exception; for he observes that her bones were almost flexible, and so soft that the impression of his embraces remained upon them almost as upon the flesh that covered him. Οὐτω μὲν τοὶ σύμμοτρα καὶ τρυφερά τῆς Λαίδας τὰ μέλη, ὡς ὑγροφωῶς αὐτῆς λογίζεσθαι τὰ ὅσα τῷ περιουσομένῳ δίκην τοιγαυρὶ ταῦτα μικρὰ γὰρ ὁμοίως δι' ἀπαλότῆρα συναπομαλατῆται τῆ σαρκεὶ, καὶ ταῖς ἐρωτικαῖς ἀσκαλαῖς ὑπίκει. Lais's members are so soft and delicate, that if you press them a little close, her very bones seem to be tender and flexible. For by their tenderness they receive impressions almost like the flesh, and yield to the lover's embraces (81).

[P] There is an Epigram in Aufonius concerning this Courtesan's looking glass.] Aufonius only translated an epigram of Plato, which is in the anthologia; but he succeeded very well in his translation.

Lais anus Veneri speculum dico: dignum habeat se
Æterna æternum forma ministerium,

VOL. VI.

At mihi nullus in hoc usus, quia cernere talem
Qualis sum nolo; qualis eram nequeo (82).

(82) Aufon.
Epig. 55.

i. e. "I Lais, being now an old woman, consecrate my looking-glass to Venus. Let her, whose beauty is everlasting, use it for ever, it is worthy of her: I have no longer any occasion for it; since I do not care to see myself in it as I am now, and I cannot see my self as I was formerly."

This supposes that Lais outlived her beauty, so that her looking glass became an useless and even disagreeable furniture to her. This agrees with the authors I have mentioned in the remarks [H] and [I], but not with Plutarch. See the remark [K].

You will meet, in the commentaries on Alciat's emblems, with some Latin verses, in which Lais's mournful complaints are very prettily described. They were grounded on two reasons; the first was, that she found herself quite ugly, when she looked in her glass; the second, that she still felt the fire of lust burn within her breast. She complained that she had all the warm desires of youth in a body almost decrepit. This was a sad thing indeed.

Et tamen idem animus stimulos sub pectore eosdem
Et motu sensit servida corda Deo;
Sic secum: Facie nimium vivacior, o mens,
Cur dudum hæc anus est, tuque puella manes (83)?

(83) Emblem.
Alciati, pag.
330. edit. Patav.
1662, in 4to.

i. e. "She has still the same inclination; the same lust inspires her breast; she feels still in her heart the arrears of that God who is not unknown to her: She speaks thus to herself, too much liveliness appearing in her face, O my mind, why should you continue young, when my face is long since grown old?"

The truth of the matter, is, that an old Courtesan of Venice was represented under Lais's name. Accipi pridem a Viris Italici soli, id scriptum fuisse in quandam meretricem Venetam, quæ ætatis lapsa seu decussa fore, quoties se in speculo conspiceret, fronte jam rugis obfita, misere contabescebat, et nibilo segnius ardore sentiginis premebatur (84). i. e. "I have been told lately by some Italians, that this was written against a certain Courtesan of Venice, whose face abounded with wrinkles, either through age or by the decay of her beauty, and who whenever she looked in her glass, was sadly grieved, and yet continued to feel the fire of lust rage never the less in her breast." This hint is borrowed from Horace.

(84) Ibid.

Dices, heu (quoties te speculo videris alterum)
Quæ mens est bodie, cur eadem non puero fuit?
Aut cur his animis incolumes non redeant genæ (85).

(85) Horat. Ode
10. lib. 4. ver. 6

i. e. "Ah thou shalt say, when'er the Glass shall shew thee quite another face, Ah whilst I was a vigorous boy, Why did not I this mind enjoy! Or since I now so freely burn, Why won't my former face return!"

CREECH.

[Q] She was so passionately in love with Eubates, that she obliged him to promise her marriage.) Her passion must have been exceedingly strong, since she would submit to the laws of wedlock (86), under which she would not have been at liberty to continue her trade. She communicated to Eubates the design she had to marry him: he seemed to consent to it; for he was afraid she would serve him some ill turn; but he did not lie with her: he put that affair off, till the games were over, in which he was to contend for the prize. He gained it; and never thought of performing his promise of marriage. He returned to Cyrene, his native place, taking only Lais's picture with him. He imagined that by doing this he acquitted himself of his promise. The wife he had at Cyrene thought herself under

(86) Ἡδὲ δὲ αὐτοῦ διαμύχια, καὶ πρὸς γάμου λόγους προσήκειν. i. e. "She loved him passionately, and offered to marry him." Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 10. cap. 2.

7 N

quer the Philosopher Xenocrates's continency [R]. She defended herself once very artfully against Euripides, who reproved her justly [S]. Tatian has censured the heathens for the monument which they erected to this dissolute woman (g). He mentions Turnus the Sculptor who had made it, whence we may infer that he was a famous master in his art; and yet neither Pliny nor any other writer mention him in the least. I shall take notice in one single remark of Moreri's error, and of those that occur in some other Dictionaries [T]. There never was a more extravagant boldness than that of Anthony de

(g) Tatian, Contra Graecos, pag. m. 170.

(87) Idem. ibid.
(88) Οτι Κυρηναίως Ἀριστοτέλης Λαίδα ἠρώσαν ὑπεράρα μιν, ὁμοκεκασ ἀν τῆ ἑταίρα, ἢ μὴ ἀτάξιν αὐτὴν εἶναι πατρίδα, ἢ συμπαρεῖν αὐτῶπινα πρὸς τοὺς ἀταξυνιστάς, ἢ πικρὴν διατραπέσοτο. χαρίεντος ἐκτελέων τῶν ἠρώτων, γρηγορήσας αὐτὸς ὡς οὗτο μάλιστα ἐκείνη ἀνοστούνει εἰς Κυρήνην. i. e.

Of all the lovers of Lais, Aristotele of Cyrene is the only one that slighted her. For after he had promised this courtesan upon oath, that he would take her with him into his own country, in case she assisted him in gaining the victory over his antagonists; when she had done it, he evaded his oath in a cynical manner, that he had raised a statue to her at Cyrene, which was very much like her."

Clemens Alexand. Stromat. lib. 3. pag. 447.
(89) In Ukrat. Satyr. 3. lib. 2.
(90) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 7.
(91) Diogen. Laert. lib. 4. num. 7.
(92) Cum se ad libidinem excitari praesensisset.

(93) Machon. apud Athen. lib. 13. pag. 582.

(94) In his Medea, where we meet with this line, "Εἶπ' αἰσχροῦται, καὶ τίκων μισαροῖται. i. e. "Go and be hanged, you that commit obscene actions, and are tainted with the murder of your own children."

(95) Apud Ath. lib. 13.

(96) It is the 5th verse of Euripides's Æolus in Barnes's edition.

(97) Machon, apud Athen. lib. 13.

under an obligation to reward so noble an instance of continence; wherefore she caused a beautiful statue to be erected to her husband. I am apt to think, that Ælian, who relates this story (87), spoiled and enervated it entirely. Clemens Alexandrinus tells it in fewer words (88), but he calls Aristotle the person, whom Ælian names Eubates, and he quotes the Book of Περὶ κατὰ ἰδιότητα ἀδελφῶν. Concerning the nature of exercises. He does not agree with Ælian in every particular.

[R] It was impossible for her to conquer the Philosopher Xenocrates's continency. She had laid a wager that she would oblige this Philosopher to divert himself with her at the sport of love. She feigned to be frightened, and with this pretence she took sanctuary in his house, and continued there all night, but he did not touch her. When she was called upon to pay the wager, she answered that she did not pretend to lay a wager about a mere block, but about a man. Thus an ancient interpreter of Horace (89) relates this fact. Diogenes Laertius ascribes this to the Courtesan Phryne, and does not mention the wager. He tells us (90) that she took shelter in Xenocrates's house, pretending she was pursued, and as there was but one bed in the house, she desired the Philosopher to let her have half of his, to which he consented. Afterwards she proposed some other questions to him, but to no purpose. So that when she was asked, how things went between them, she answered, that she had lain with a block and not with a man. Some asserted that Xenocrates's Disciples put Lais once into his bed, and that he was so fully determined to keep his continency, that he suffered several times his privities to be cut and even burnt. Εἶνος δὲ Λαίδα φασὶ παρακαλεῖσθαι αὐτὴ τῆς μωβήλας, τὸν δὲ ἔταος εἶναι ἰσχυρῆν, ὥστε καὶ τεμαῖς καὶ καίσις πολλὰκις ὑπερμῖναι πρὶ τὸ αἰδοῖν. The Latin translation is as follows, Quidam vero discipulos Laidem illi in seculo tradunt, illumque ad se fuisse continentem, ut cum se ad libidinem incitari praesensisset, et secare et urere verenda sepe pateretur (91). We have reasons to complain here both of the Greek Author, and of his translator. The latter adds of his own accord, that Xenocrates perceived the rebellion of lust was coming upon him (92); and as for Diogenes Laertius, he does not tell us what became of Lais; he puts her into the Philosopher's bed, without relating what she did there, nor how she got out of it again, and instead of completing his account of this particular story, he falls upon discoursing on a general fact, namely the means which Xenocrates had several times made use of to be proof against love.

[S] She defended herself once very artfully against Euripides, who reproved her justly. Euripides with a pen in his hand was ready to compute something in a garden. Lais observing him in that situation went to him, and asked him; Τὶ βυλόμοπος ἰσχυρῆς ἐστὶ τραγῶδιᾶ ἔπ' αἰσχροῦ (93); i. e. "What do you mean by these words in your tragedy; Go and be hanged, you that commit obscene actions?" what he meant by certain expressions which he made use of in one of his tragedies (94), to represent in the general a man committing obscene actions. He was amazed at such an impudent question, and answered to Lais, you are yourself one of those I hinted at. Σὺ γὰρ εἶπαι τις ἐφ' ἡμῶν δακτύ; Αἰσχροποιός, (95). i. e. "You, says he, seem to be one of those who commit obscene actions." She fell a laughing, and quoted a line to him (96), in which he asserted, that no action was obscene, unless the person that committed it thought it obscene: Τὶ δ' αἰσχρὸν εἰ μὴ τοῖσι χρημῖναι δοκῆι; "Is there any thing obscene, but what seems so to those who commit it (97)? We are not told whether Euripides was silenced by this argument ad hominem, or whether he made any reply; but it is certain that Lais could not get off more wittily, and more artfully puzzle her censurer. This maxim would extend the Philosophical sin as far as is possible, and would be of the most dangerous consequence. Wherefore the Philosopher Antisthenes (98) corrected it after this manner, Αἰσχρὸν πῶ' αἰσχρὸν καὶ σοφὴ καὶ μὴ δοκῆι. i. e. "What is obscene, is so whether or not it seem obscene to the person who commits it." Stobæus ascribes this correction to Diogenes the Cynick (99), and not to Antisthenes as Plutarch does (100).

There are reasons to question the truth of this conversation; for since Euripides died in the 93d Olympiad (101), when Lais could be but about fifteen or sixteen years old, it is not in the least probable that this Poet discoursed with this courtesan either upon that subject or upon any other. The Reader will be the better convinced of this, if he consider that Euripides passed the latter part of his life at the court of Archelaus, whither it is not observed by any Author that Lais ever went. Though it be never so much supposed, that there have been two Courtezans of that name, this will not remove the difficulty. For the first must be she, who was sold when Hyccara was plundered by Nicias. But, according to the Scholiast on Aristophanes, she was then but seven years old. From this Chronological account that Scholiast urges a very good objection from the mention, that is made of Lais in Aristophanes's Plutus, a Play that was acted at a time when Lais could not yet be famous. Docte et acute dubium movet, atque Aristophanem dicere ea, quæ rationi temporum nequeunt convenire; quippe cum eo tempore quo Plutus fabulam dabat, non potuerit Lais esse valde celebris, quippe quæ a Nicia imperatore captâ sit in Sicilia septennis (102). i. e. "He does with learning and judgment start a difficulty, observing that what Aristophanes says is inconsistent with Chronology. For Lais could not yet be very famous, when his Plutus was acted, since she was but seven years old, when she was taken in Sicily by the general Nicias." The objection vanishes away, if it be supposed, that we must read Nais instead of Lais in that Poet's Plutus. You will meet with that correction in Athenæus (103). It is certain that there has been a Courtesan named Nais, and several Authors have probably mistook her for Lais. It was perhaps with Nais, that Euripides had the conversation we have mentioned.

[T] I shall take notice in one single remark of Moreri's errors, and of those of . . . some other Dictionaries. Moreri's first blunder is his asserting that Lais lived in the year 420 since the building of Rome. According to this supposition she must have lived towards the end of the 111th Olympiad. Judge whether this can be said of a person, who was carried from Sicily to Corinth the second year of the 91st Olympiad. We cannot have recourse here to the supposition of two Lais's; since Moreri mentions but one, and observes also expressly, that he means Lais born in a little Town in Sicily, called Hyccara. This Lais is evidently the same who was seven years old when Hyccara, her native place, was taken, the second year of the 91st Olympiad. Secondly, it is not true that Plutarch asserts, she was thought to be the daughter of Alcibiades. Moreri could not clear himself by charging Amiot with this fallacy, for it is plain that in this phrase, l'on dit que Lais . . . étoit sa fille (104), i. e. "it is said, that Lais . . . was her daughter," the word Sa (her) relates to Timandra, Alcibiades's concubine, and not to Alcibiades. The Greek words (105) leave not the least room for an equivocation. How could Alcibiades be Lais's father, since he did not go into Sicily but with Nicias? Was not Lais then already six or seven years old. Thirdly; it is not true that Lais went to Alexander's Camp. She had been dead a long while before Alexander was born. This blunder was occasioned by Amiot: for as he did not understand a passage in Plutarch (106), in which there are some words wanting, he took it into his Head to translate

(98) See Prolegomena, Miscellanea, lib. 6. cap. 19.

(99) See Leopoldus, Emendat., lib. 2. cap. 6.

(100) Plutarch, de audient. Pat. pag. 33.

(101) See the remark [E] of his article.

(102) Valerius, Not. in Nicias, Mausæus ad Herodotum, pag. 124.

(103) Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 597. See also Harporastion, voce Nais.

(104) Amiot's French translation of Alcibiades's Life, towards the end.

(105) Timandra, Alcibiades's, concubine.

(106) In the treatise of Lælius, pag. m. 96. edit. in 8vo, 1621.

de Guevara. He has related a thousand ridiculous falsties concerning Lais [U], as though he had met with them in the writings of the Ancients. I had almost omitted to mention the story of Myron the Statuary [X].

translate it thus; Lais atteinte de l'amour d'Hippolochus quitta le Mont d'Acrocorinthe et s'en alla bonnêtement au grand Camp d'Alexander. i. e. "Lais being in love with Hippolochus, left Mount Acrocorinthus, and went modestly to the great Camp of Alexander."

Charles Stephens is mistaken, when he asserts, that Lais went from Sicily to Corinth, that she might get more money by prostituting herself. She was not seven years old when she went to Corinth; nor did she go thither of her own accord: she had been bought at Hyccara by a man, who took her with him into Greece as a slave. Neither Lloyd nor Hofman have corrected this blunder. I can hardly believe that Charles Stephens borrowed from credible Authors what he relates; I. that Lais being gone into Theffaly was so much beloved there by the young men of that country, that they used to pour wine before her door. II. That the Theffalian women out of envy stabbed her, whilst a divine Service was performing in the Temple of Venus, at which the men were not suffered to be present. III. That for this action the country of Theffaly was visited with the Plague, which did not discontinue, till they had built a Temple to Venus ἀλλοσία (107). Lloyd and Hofman have transcribed these three blunders.

(107) The Paris edition of the year 1620 has the word ἀλλοσία, which is right.

(108) Ant. de Guevara, Epit. dorées, liv. 1. pag. m. 262. of the French translation made by Guterry.

[U] Anthony de Guevara . . . has related a thousand ridiculous falsties concerning Lais]. I shall not lose my time in refuting them; and shall even transcribe but a few of them. He asserts (108) that she was of the Isle of Bithrith, in the Confines of Greece, and, according to what the Chroniclers wrote of her, she was the daughter of an High-Priest of Apollo's Temple, who lived at Delphos, a man highly skilled in the magical art, by which knowledge he foretold the ruin of his daughter. Now this lascivious Lais was in her prime under the reign of the celebrated King Pyrrhus . . . who being a young man of sixteen or seventeen, went into Italy, to wage war against the Romans . . . This lascivious Lais continued a long while in King Pyrrhus's Camp, she went with him into Italy, and returned with him from the war She retired into the City of Corinth, with a design to settle there, and was there waited upon and courted by several Kings, Lords and Princes. He relates afterwards the story of Demosthenes, and finishes his account with observing, that Lais died at Corinth at the age of three score and twelve. How can a man be so bold as to publish so many falsties? There was above an hundred and thirty years between the birth of Lais, and Pyrrhus's expedition against the Romans, and above forty between the death of Demosthenes and that same expedition. And yet such an Impostor has misled some men of wit: for it is from him Brantome relates a great many fabulous stories concerning Flora (109): not to mention Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who asserts, that Lais continued a long time in Pyrrhus's Camp in Italy (110). He had read this in Guevara, and he took it for current money.

(109) See the article of the second FLORA remark [F].

(110) Du Verdier, Diverses Leçons, liv. 3. chap. 6. p. 185.

(111) Aufon. Epigram. 17. pag. m. 17.

[X] The story of Myron the Statuary.] It is one of the ridiculous stories of a gray-haired lover. Myron, a man venerable by his hoariness, went to Lais, and asked to lie one night with her. He was sent back without hardly any hearing. He imagined he guessed at the true cause of his being thus slighted. He flattered himself, that if he did but present himself with brown hairs, he would certainly enjoy his love. He altered therefore the colour of his head, and returned to Lais; you fool, said she to him, you ask me a favour, which I have already refused to your father. Aufonius relates this very prettily (111).

Canus rogabat Laidis noctem Myron:
Tulit repulsam protinus.

Causamque sensu: Et caput fuligine
Fucavit atra candidum.
Idemque vulu, crine non idem Myron,
Orabat oratum prius.
Sed illa formam cum capillo comparans,
Similemque non ipsum rata,
Fortasse Et ipsum, sed volens ludo frui,
Sic est adorta callidum:
Inepte, quid me, quod recusavi, rogas,
Patri negavi jam tuo?

Costar has made a collection of witty sayings, which are ascribed to different persons, and has put this answer of Lais amongst them. "Spartian, says he (112) relates, that an old man, whose hair was quite grey, to whom the Emperor Hadrian had refused some favour, went some days after to ask it again, having painted his hair with the finest black he could meet with. The Prince discovering the artifice, answered him wittily, The favour you ask me, I have already denied your father. Yet according to Aufonius, it was the Courtezan Lais that made so ingenious an answer, though it be not mentioned by Athenus, who took so much care to transmit to us all the witty sayings of this beautiful Lady." If the conjecture of some moderns be well grounded, we ought not to wonder at Athenus's silence with regard to this witty stroke of Lais. For they pretend that Aufonius invented it (113). I mean that having read the Emperor Hadrian's answer, he feigned that Lais made it, and turned it into an epigram. I am apt to think, that this answer comes from a woman rather than from the Emperor Hadrian; for one cannot easily imagine plausible reasons why an old man after a refusal, should take it into his head, that if he appeared as a man without grey hairs, he would obtain from that Prince the favour he desired. But one can easily understand why he should entertain such hopes, if he had made his addresses to a Lady. It may therefore, in my opinion, be said that the writers of Hadrian's life, men of an indifferent taste, and very inaccurate, mistook for his own jests those which he only related. He had read somewhere what Lais is supposed to have answered to Myron; or perhaps he had read, that this answer was made to some other old lover by some other Courtezan; he told the story to his friends, which being told over and over again, lost its most material circumstances; so that at last Hadrian passed himself for the inventor. Joca ejus plurima extant. Nam fuit etiam dicaculus. Unde illud quoque innotuit, quod quum cuidam canescenti quiddam negasset, eidem iterum petenti, sed infesto capite, respondit, Jam hoc patri tuo negavi (114). i. e. "There are a great many of his jokes extant, for he used to jest, &c. The rest is the story mentioned above, quot. (112).

(112) Costar, Suite de la Description de Voiture, pag. 55.

(113) Scaliger in hunc locum Aufonii. Baptista Pius, in Annotationibus posterioribus, apud Vinnium in Aufonium, Epig. 17.

(114) Spartian. in Hadrian.

I must not close this remark without observing that Monsieur Costar does too much commend that witty saying of Lais. I confess that this answer does not want sprightliness, and that it was very proper to mortify the lover, and to afford the Courtezan the pleasure of ridiculing the good old man. But after all she argued very wrong, and against the rules of her own trade. I have refused the son, how much more ought I to refuse the father? This is the principle of a Courtezan, this the ground of all her arguments; but she on the contrary supposes, that because she denies the father, a decrepit old man, she ought also to deny the son a strong and vigorous young fellow. This is renouncing her own principle, and acting against the fundamental rules of her trade.

Let us observe that Myron must not have been young, when Lais was in her prime. He flourished in the 87th Olympiad (115) seven or eight years before she was born.

(115) Plinius, lib. 34. cap. 8. pag. m. 108.

LAMBECIUS (PETER) one of the most learned men of his time was born at Hamburg in the year 1628. He went very young to study in foreign countries, at the expence of his uncle the learned Luc Holstenius. He made such a considerable progress, that at the age of nineteen he published a work (a), which was extremely applauded. He continued eight months at Toulouse at the house of the Archbishop Charles de Monchal,

(a) Intituled, Lucebrationum Gellianarum Prodrum.

Monchal, and two years at Rome at Cardinal Barberini's. He was chosen Professor of History at Hamburg January the 13th 1652, and appointed Rector or Principal of the College of that same City January the 12th 1660. He had taken his degree of Doctor of Law in France some years before. He suffered a thousand vexations in his own country, both because the scholars would not obey him, and because his enemies charged him with heterodoxy, and even atheism, and censured bitterly his labours and writings. An unhappy marriage, which he contracted [A] in the year 1662, completed his misfortunes; so that he willingly hearkened to the hints which the Queen of Sweden gave him, who advised him to retire to another place. He left therefore his wife and his native place, and took a journey to Vienna, and having had the honour to pay his respects to his Imperial Majesty he went to Rome, and publicly professed there the Roman Catholic Religion: it was long before this he had abjured Lutheranism [B]; but he had continued nevertheless to profess it outwardly. He returned to Vienna towards the end of the year 1662, and was very kindly received by the Emperor, who appointed him immediately his Sub-Library-Keeper, and afterwards his Library-Keeper in Chief, with the title of his Counsellor and Historiographer. D. 27 Novemb. 1662, Præfectura Biblioth. Augustæ vicaria, A. autem sequenti 1663 D. 26 Maij suprema ejusdem, qua Math. Mauchterus Tb. D. se abdicaverat, Eboria cum Consiliarii atque Historiographi Cæsarei titulo, collata (b). He continued in that employment till his death, and gained a very great reputation by the works which he published [C]. He had begun several others,

(b) Mollerus, ubi infra, quotation (c), pag. 539. He refers to a Letter of Lambecius, which will be quoted in the remark [B].

[A] An unhappy marriage which he contracted.] One may say of several learned men, that they behave themselves with regard to matrimony, as Pomponius Atticus did with regard to Poetry. Attigit quoque poeticon: credimus ne ejus expertus esset suavitatis (1). They will taste it, that they may not be quite strangers to the sweets of it. But I do not think that Lambecius had such a design; for he married an old woman, and as she was very rich, it is probable that the only pleasure he expected from his marriage, was that of having a large estate. But he was very much disappointed in his hopes. The old Lady was so covetous, that she would not suffer her husband to make use of any of her riches. She declared her mind so soon upon this subject, that it was not yet a fortnight after the nuptials had been celebrated, when Lambecius being disgusted and tired with his condition, left his house and his native country, never to return thither any more. Here is my voucher. Ad hæc adversa postquam tedium conjugii, inauspicato A. 1662. cum Vetula divite, sed parca, atque avara (A. 1690. Hamburgi defuncta,) contracti, accessit, haud difficulter a Christina, Suecorum Regina, Hamburgum delata, persuaderi sibi est passus, ut, duabus post nuptias Hebdomadibus vix elapsis, Patriam & Uxorem d. 14. Apr. 1662. desereret, ac Vindobonam commigraret (2).

(1) Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Attici, cap. 18.

(2) Moller. Itaque ad Historiam Cberjonesi Cimbrica, Part 3. pag. 538.

(*) V. Epist. ad Ren. Franc. Slusium, Libro I Operis de Biblioth. Vindeb. insertam.

(3) Moller. in Itaque ad Historiam Cberjonesi Cimbrica, Part 3. pag. 538.

[B] It was long before this he had abjured Lutheranism.] Nihusius a famous profelyte to the Roman Catholic Religion, had the direction of Lambecius's studies in Holland. He began to be his converter, after which James Sirmond the Jesuit completed the work at Paris. He endeavoured to persuade his new convert to enter amongst the Jesuits, but he could not prevail with him. Let us see how these particulars are proved. Cæui Ecclesiæ Romanæ publice se aggregavit. () Sacris enim ejus diu ante jam erat initiatus, cum in Batavia a Barth. Nibufio, Apostata celebri, ac Studiorum ipsius Academicorum Eboro, tum in Gallia a Jac. Sirmondo, Jesuitarum doctissimo; sed externa Lutheranismi Professione civis incautos hæcenus sefellerat. Constat id mihi ex Illustris Gudii, quo familiariter ille apud Exteros est usus, Narratione, & Gallica, quam idem asseruabat, Claud. Sarrauii, Senatoris Parisiensis, ad Salmasium Epistola. Huic enim ille jam A. 1647. significat, Lambecium, Holstenii ex Sorore Nepotem, a Sirmondo in Jesuitarum cum Societatem pertrahere conato, & Milleterio persuasum, ad Pontificios defecisse (3).* i. e. "He professed the Roman Catholic Religion publicly, for he had been already secretly instructed in that Religion, first in Holland by Barth. Nihusius, a famous apostate, who had the direction of his studies in the University, and afterwards in France by James Sirmond, one of the most learned Jesuits; but by professing the Lutheran Religion outwardly, he had till that time imposed upon the unwary. This I knew certainly from the illustrious Gudius's account, with whom he conversed familiarly abroad; and from a letter of Claudius Sarrau Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, to Salmasius; which the same Gudius kept. In that letter it is observed that even so early as the year 1647, Lambecius, Holstenius's nephew by his sister, was gone over to the Roman Catholics, being persuaded to it by La Milletiere, and by F. Sirmond, who also endeavoured to draw him over into the society of the Jesuits."

[C] He gained a very great reputation by the works which he published.] Let us mention those which he had published before he was Library-keeper to the Emperor. The first was his Prodromus Lucubrationum Gellianarum; i. e. "An Essay of Observations on A. Gellius;" printed at Paris in the year 1647. The second, if I am not mistaken, was, Origines Hamburgenses, sive Liber Rerum Hamburgensium primus ab V. C. & A. C. 808 ad 1225. Adjecta est tum duplex Vita Ansgarii à Remberto, & Gualdone scripta, ac notis Lambecii illustrata, tum diplomatum libri hujus historiam illustrantium Enneas (4). i. e. "The Antiquities of Hamburg, or the History of that City from its building in the year 808, to the year 1225, Book the first. To which are added two Lives of Ansgarius, the one written by Rambertus, and the other by Gualdo, illustrated with Lambecius's Notes; as also nine ancient Records serving to illustrate the History contained in that Book." He designed to carry on that History till his own time, but he published only the second book of it. Liber secundus Rerum Hamburgensium ab A. C. 1225 ad A. 1292, una cum diplomatum vetustorum, lucem ei afferentium, Mantissa Chronologia & Auxilio Libri I ab A. 808 ad 1072. Dissertatione de Asino ad Lynam, Monumento Aedis Cathedralis Sepulchrali insculpto, Scriptorum Autoris Catalogo, & Epistolis tandem Job. Christiani, L. Baronis à Boineburg, & H. Conringii ad eundem encomiasticis (5). i. e. "The second Book of the History of Hamburg, from the year 1225, to the year 1292. To which are added ancient Records disposed in a Chronological Order, and a Supplement to the former Book from the year 808 to the year 1072, a Dissertation upon this inscription An Asi playing on the Harp, which is engraved on a tombstone in the Cathedral Church, a Catalogue of the Author's Works, and lastly commendatory Letters from John Christianus, Baron of Boineburg, and H. Conringius to Lambecius." Here follows the judgment, which the author, whom I often quote in this article, passes on these two words. Ambo libri (in quibus, præter nimii in patriam Affectus vestigia, passim obvia, & ab eodem subinde proflexerunt, ωραωματα, nihil facile reprehendas) summa diligentia & fide sunt congesti, & Narrationum singularum Veritas Locis Scriptorum ac Diplomatum Antiquissimorum, cum judicio selectis, confirmata (6). i. e. "Both these Books (in which there is hardly any thing to censure but his too great partiality for his native country, and some oversights, of which he is guilty in several places) are compiled with great care and faithfulness; and the truth of every particular is supported by passages quoted from ancient authors and records, very judiciously chosen." In the year 1655 Lambecius published at Paris a book in folio, in which he displayed very great learning; I mean his Animadversiones ad Codicem Originis Constantinopolitanas,

(4) Printed at Hamburg in the year 1652, in 4to.

(5) Printed at Hamburg in the year 1661, in 4to.

(6) Moller. in Itaque ad Historiam Cberjonesi Cimbrica, Part 3. pag. 541.

(c) Taken from Mollerus, Isagoge ad Historiam Cbristofoni Cimbrici, Part. 3. pag. 537, & seq.

others, which he had not time to finish, being surprized with death in April 1680 (c) [D].

tinopolitanas, & ad Anonymi Excerpta & ad Leonis Imp. Oracula. i. e. "Remarks on Codinus's antiquities of Constantinople, and on the Fragments of an Anonymous Writer, and on the Emperor Leo's Decrees." I shall say nothing of the Orations he published in the year 1660, nor of some other books of his which are extant. I come now to that voluminous work, which he compiled at Vienna, and of which the reader will get a true notion by the following words of Monsieur Baillet. "Tho' the catalogue of the manuscripts of the Emperor's library at Vienna be divided into eight volumes in folio, yet it is not compleat; the author's untimely death deprived us of so curious and important a work. Lambecius undertook to give us in this large work an account of the manuscripts which are lodged in that library, and he has done it in a critical and historical manner; for he designed to exert all his skill and learning in that catalogue; whereby he has very much distinguished himself from all the other compilers of catalogues, whom we have mentioned. It must be confessed that there are a great many very remarkable and curious particulars in that prolix and noble commentary. But the author might have brought the substance of the long discourses contained in so "many volumes, within a much narrower compass, (7) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. pag. 250.

[D] He was surprized with death in April 1680.

I keep to that date, because I believe that Nesselius (8) deserves in this respect more credit, than they, who suppose (9) that Lambecius died in September 1679. Meibomius might perhaps be easily reconciled with Nesselius with regard to the day; for the 24th of March according to the old stile, belongs to the month of April according to the new stile. But these two authors differ widely with regard to the distemper of which Lambecius died. The one says it was the plague, the other a dropsy. Henr. Meibomius Jun. (8) Peste illum Viennensi Epidemia obiisse perhibens, ad d. 24. Mart. A. 1680. Successor autem ipseus, Dan. Nesselius, qui Hydropem mortem ejus accelerasse testatur (†), ad M. Aprilem ejusdem A. 1680 (10). i. e. "Henry Meibomius the Younger says, that he died March the 24th 1680 of the plague, which was epidemical at Vienna: but his successor Daniel Nesselius asserts that his death was occasioned by a dropsy, and happened in April the same year 1680."

(8) He succeeded Lambecius in the post of Library-keeper.

(9) Hennineus Witte supposed it in his Diario Biographico.

(10) In Introd. ad Hist. Sax. inf. pag. 62. 42.

(†) In Supplemento Operis de Biblioth. Casarea, A. 1690 edito V. Tenuit Colloqu. Monfr. M. Oct. A.

1690, pag. 946. (10) Moller, in Isagoge ad Hist. Cbristofoni Cimbrici, Part. 3. pag. 540.

LAMBERT, Bishop of Liege, or rather, of Maestricht. It is a pretty general opinion, as I have observed in another place (a), that he was killed by Pepin's order, at the instigation of Alpaide: but the fact is not very certain. We shall examine it below [A]. So many authors have wrote his Life, that the account of it is become exceedingly

(a) In the article of ALPAIDE.

[A] We shall examine it here below.] We shall make use of the arguments, which the Baron Le Roy urges in one of his books. His opinion is that neither Pepin nor Alpaide were concerned in St. Lambert's murder. He grounds his opinion (1) I. On the silence of Godecalcus a contemporary writer. Here then we have a reasoning grounded on the negative argument, of which Dr. John de Launoi knew so well how to make an advantage. This Godecalcus ascribes the massacre committed on the body of St. Lambert to no other cause, but to the murder of two brothers, who were related to Dodon. These two brothers had abused Lambert, for which reason they were killed by two of this prelate's relations. Dodon a powerful Lord, who had great credit with Pepin, would not suffer this murder to go unpunished, nor would he revenge himself only on mean and inconsiderable persons: he resolved therefore to get rid of St. Lambert, for whose sake his two cousins had been killed. This, according to Godecalcus, is the true cause of that Bishop's death: he does not say the least thing of Pepin nor of Alpaide. II. Monsieur le Roi (2) observes, that the first who charged Pepin with this murder, was a Canon of Liege named Anselmus, who lived in the eleventh Century. This Canon observes, as well as his predecessors, that Dodon caused St. Lambert to be murdered, in order to be revenged of the death of his two relations: but he gives us also an account of Alpaide's resentment against that prelate, as though this too had been a tradition. III. It is observed (3) that Sigebertus (4) suppressed the ancient cause, which all the authors had mentioned, and spoke only of the new cause, which Anselmus had begun to publish. Let us see how errors get ground and increase successively and by degrees. The authors, who wrote after Sigebertus, have not in the least mentioned the ancient cause, or they have blended it together with the new one, and added to the latter a thousand circumstances unknown to the former historians (5). Monsieur Le Roi quotes very grave authors, who intirely explode the new tradition, and who answer the arguments that are offered against the proof grounded on Godecalcus's silence. It is pretended that he suppressed the true cause of St. Lambert's Martyrdom, for fear of exasperating Pepin's successors. Father Mabillon answered to this, that since men did not scruple to publish that Charles Martel was damned, why would they not have been bold enough to assert, that this Prince's Father caused a Bishop to be put to death? Ut hæc ratio valuerit in Godecalco, inquit Mabillon, cur eam causam dissimulavit Stephanus, qui sub extremis Carolinæ stirpis regibus vivebat? Sane longe atrocior erat fabula de Caroli Martelli damnatione, quam tamen Hincmarus Remorum Archiepiscopus, Adrevaldus, alique auctores imperante Carolo Calvo Martelli abnepote in vulgus jactare non debuerunt. Unde omnino incertum videtur, an Landebertus ob increpitum de pellicatu Pipinum casus sit, at vero alienum omnino videtur a tanti Principis bonitate & clementia, ut cædis illius fuerit auctor (6). i. e. "Though this reason might have prevailed with Godecalcus, says Mabillon, yet why should Stephanus omit that cause, who lived under the last Kings of the Caroline family? The story which is told of Charles Martel's damnation is more shocking still, and yet Hincmarus, Archbishop of Rheims, Adrevaldus, and other authors, who lived under Charles the Bald, the grandson of Martel's grand-child, did not scruple to publish it. It is therefore very uncertain, that Lambert was killed for reproving Pepin on account of his concubine; and such a murder seems to be quite inconsistent with that Prince's good nature and mild temper." Father Jourdan, quoted by Monsieur Le Roy, does not question but Pepin married Alpaide in due form, after he had divorced Plectrude. Such marriages, indeed, and such divorces were prohibited by the Christian law, but yet, they were still permitted by the human laws in those times, even amongst Christians. These second marriages had nothing disgraceful nor infamous in them, in the eyes of the world (7). That historian observes (8), that Pepin and Alpaide had been parted long ago, when Lambert was murdered in the year 708. Alpaide, adds he, was not concerned in that murder, since she had been parted from Pepin in the very beginning of that Century, and was retired into a Monastery. . . . Ado, was the first who, after 180 years time, charged Pepin and Alpaide with the murder of that Saint. Hadrian Valesius quoted by the same Monsieur le Roi, observes, that notwithstanding the Canons of the Church, men used to take a second wife during the life of the first, from whom they were divorced, and that Pepin followed that custom. He asserts however that others maintained, that Pepin was never divorced from Plectrude, and that he never married Alpaide, and that Bede favours that opinion. He is in the right to add, that when the Historians supposed that

(6) Idem, ibid.

(1) Jacobus Le Roi, in Topogr. Hist. Gallo-Brabant. lib. 7. cap. 2. pag. 250.

(2) Ibid. pag. 251. ex Carolo le Coigne, Ann. Ecclesiast. Francor. tom. 4. pag. 476.

(3) Idem Le Roi, ibid.

(4) Sanctus Lambertus Pipinum Principem increpare ausus, quod pellicem Alpaidem Plectrudi legitime uxori suæ superdixerit, a Dodone fratre ipsius Alpaidis Lesdii martyrizatur. Sigebert. ad Cbrist ann. 698. under which he erroneously places Lambert's death. Jacobus le Roi, in Topogr. Hist. Gallo-Brabant. pag. 251.

(5) Jacobus le Roi, in Topogr. Hist. Gallo-Brabant. lib. 7. cap. 2. pag. 252.

(7) Jourdan, Hist. de France & de la Maison Royale. tom. 3. pag. 69, &c. quoted by Le Roi, Topogr. Hist. Gallo-Brabant. pag. 252.

(8) Quoted by the same, ibid. pag. 253.

ceedingly perplexed [B]. I have read only that which was printed at Liege in the year 1657, written by the Sieur de Bosc de Montandre. It is intitled, Le Courtisan Cbretien immollé en Victime d'Etat à la passion de la Cour : ou St. Lambert Eveque de Tongres & Martyr, sacrifié pour les intérêts de l'honneur conjugal. i. e. "The Christian Courtier made a State-Victim to the Passion of the Court : or St. Lambert Bishop of Tongres and a Martyr, offered a Sacrifice to the dignity of the married state."

that Pepin married Alpaide, it was probably with a design to flatter the defendants of that Prince, who reigned in France (9), lest Charles would be thought to have been a bastard, which had been a disgrace to the Royal Family. Certe haud parum simile veri est, finxisse hoc in Principum suorum gratiam Auctores, qui dominantibus Pipini posteris, scripsere, & Alpaidem, quæ virva Plestrude justa et legitima Pipini conjux esse non poterat, uxorem Pipini posteriorem vocavisse, ne Carolus ex pellice susceptus crederetur, ceu regio generi aliqua inde nota inureretur (9).

(9) Hadr. Valerius, Rerum Francicarum, tom. 3. lib. 23. p. 379. apud Le Roy, ibid.

We meet in the supplement to Moreri's dictionary, with Monsieur Godeau's arguments against those, who in this particular follow Siebertus's Chronicle. But these arguments do only perplex the matter. One thing seems certain to me, namely, that it is to no purpose, with regard to the true cause of St. Lambert's murder, to know whether Alpaide was married in due form, or whether she continued to be Pepin's concubine. For since the Church condemned severely those marriages which were contracted after a divorce, Bishop Lambert might still call Pepin's commerce with Alpaide a concubinage, though Pepin had married her. So that even the supposing of a marriage does not render improbable the opinion of those, who assert that Pepin was reproved. And as the mistress of a Prince has generally more power with him than a lawful spouse, one may easily understand that Alpaide might prevail upon Pepin to put the censorious Bishop to death, without supposing that Pepin had married her with all the necessary formalities. Father Jourdan's chronological observation is, in my opinion, the strongest argument that can be urged against Siebertus.

[B] So many authors have wrote his life, that the account of it is become exceedingly perplexed.] This is father Mabillon's observation. Monsieur le Roy has furnished me with it. Sanctus Landebertus . . . plures habuit vitæ suæ scriptores, Godescalcum Diaconum Leodiensem supparem. Stephanum Episcopum Leodiensem in eunte sæculo x. Anselmum ejusdem Ecclesiæ Canonicum medio sæculo xi. Nicolaum itidem Canonicum, & Reinerum Monachum sæculo xii. Denique Ægidium Aurea Vallis Cænobitam medio sæculo xiii. Felicitior certe futurus, si vel unicum eumque diligentem habuisset. At S. Landeberto, id quod pluribus sanctis, accidit, ut dum auctores alius post alium ipsius res gestas illustrare exornando amplificandove moliti sunt; eas è contrario incertis ac fabulosis narrationibus inepte obscurarint atrocibusque mendis sedarint (10). i. e. "Several authors have written St. Lambert's life, as Godescalcus a Deacon of Liege, who was almost his contemporary; Stephanus Bishop of Liege in the beginning of the tenth Century; Anselmus a Canon of the same

(10) Mabillonius, in Commentario ad Vitam S. Lamberti, apud Baronem Le Roy, in Topogr. Gallo-Brabant. pag. 251.

"Church in the middle of the eleventh Century; Nicholas also a Canon, and Reinerus a Monk in the twelfth Century; and lastly Ægidius a Monk of Orval in the middle of the thirteenth Century. "It had been happier for him, if he had had but one historian, but a careful and accurate one. But he met with the same fate as many other saints. "Whilst several authors one after another pretend to set off their actions, by commending or extolling them, they do on the contrary disguise and perplex them by uncertain and fabulous accounts, and spoil them entirely by false circumstances." This is very justly observed; it is hinting the true cause, and real spring of so many impertinent and false stories, with which the lives of the saints abound. The multiplying of panegyrics and lives will always produce that effect. No writer is fully satisfied with the wonders, which they, who went before him, have related; he must add new ones to them; and that much more for the sake of the book and of its author, than of the Hero whose actions are described.

Except, however, the writers of Legends; for very often they are much more concerned for the reputation of the Saint, than for any thing else; but it is because the greater the Saint's Reputation is, the more it is capable to increase the number of his Votaries, and consequently of alms given out of devotion. Let us transcribe here a beautiful passage of Lewis Vives, in which the Reader will see that false zeal condemned, which makes the lives of the Saints abound with so many idle and fabulous stories. Quæ de iis sunt scripta, præter pauca quædam, multis sunt commentis sedata, dum qui scribit affectui suo indulget, & non quæ egit divus, sed quæ ille egisse eum vellet, exponit: ut vitam dicat animus scribentis, non veritas. Fuere qui magnæ pietatis loco ducerent mendaciola pro religione confingere: quod & periculosum est, ne veris adimatur fides propter falsa, & minime necessarium: quoniam pro pietate nostra tam multa sunt vera, ut falsa tanquam ignavi milites atque inutiles oneri sint magis, quam auxilio (11). i. e. "What has been written concerning them, a few particulars only excepted, is entirely spoiled with fictitious stories, whilst the Author, indulging his own zeal, relates, not what the Saint has really done, but what he wished he had done. So that it is the passion of the writer, and not the truth that dictates the story. Some have imagined that it was a great piece of piety, to tell lies for the sake of Religion: which is not only needless, but even dangerous, lest the false accounts discredit those that are true: and our Religion is supported by so many true facts, that those which are false ought to be exploded, as so many lazy and useless Soldiers, which are a burthen rather than a help."

(11) Ludov. Vives, de tradendis Disciplinis, lib. 5. pag. m. 360. See also lib. 2. pag. 90.

LAMBERT (FRANCIS) a Franciscan Friar born at Avignon, was one of the first in France, who left his Convents to embrace the Lutheran Religion. He arrived at Wittemberg in January 1523 (a). He taught Divinity, and set out with explaining the Prophecy of Hosea. The Commentary he wrote on that Prophet was printed at Straßburg in the year 1525 in 8vo. He dedicated it to Frederic Duke of Saxony, and inserted in it in his Dedication an account of the martyrdom of John Castellanus, who had been burnt at Mentz because he followed the Reformed Religion. He added to his Commentary on the fourth chapter of Hosea a treatise De Arbitrio hominis vere captivo contra impios liberi arbitrii adsertores. i. e. "Of man's will being really enslaved, against the impious assertors of free-will." He had published in the year 1524 his Commentary on Solomon's Song; and he observes in his dedication to Francis I, that he had already sent to that Prince his treatise on marriage De sacro & fidei Conjugio; and that he had inserted there a letter, in which he gave that Prince an account of the reasons why he renounced Popery, and married a wife (b). He published several other Commentaries on the Holy Scripture; and some books of Controversy [A], which have been

(a) See Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran. lib. 2. pag. 40.

(b) Ex Gesneri Bibliob. folio 249 verso, & 250.

[A] He published several other . . . Books.] The following works are set down in the Oxford Catalogue. Commentarii Evangelici in Regulam Minoritarum, unde palam fit quid de Monachorum Regulis sentiendum sit. i. e.

(1) Seckendorf, Hist. Lutherana, lib. 2. pag. 41. Freher, in Theatro, pag. 104.

been long while out of date. He had a great share in Luther's esteem [B]. I do not well know when he left Wittenberg; but I believe it was in the year 1526; and I know that he settled at Marburg, that he was Divinity Professor there, and that he died there April the 18th 1530 (C). He was one of the chief persons whom the Landgrave of Hesse employed to establish the Reformation in his dominions [C].

i. e. "An Evangelical Commentary on the Institutes of the Franciscan Fryars, whence it appears plainly, what we ought to think of the Institutes of the Monks." in 8vo. Commentarii in Amos, Abdiam, Jonam, Micbeam, Nabum et Habacuc. i. e. "A Commentary on Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Michah, Nahum, and Habakkuk." Printed at Strasburg, in the year 1525. in 8vo. Farrago omnium fere rerum Theologicarum. sc. Paradoxa. i. e. "A mixture of all kind of Theological matters, as Paradoxes." in 8vo. De Fidelium Vocatione in Ecclesiam, et ad ministeria ejus, deque Vocatione Matthiae per sortem. i. e. "Of the calling of the Faithful into the Church, and to the office of Ministers there; and of the calling of Matthias by casting Lots." in 8vo. Exegesis in Apocalypsin. i. e. "A Exposition of St. John's Revelation." At Basil in the year 1539. in 8vo. This is not the first Edition of his Commentary on the Revelation: for here follows what Bullinger tells us of it. Monsieur Francis Lambert, a learned and very pious man, has very much studied the Revelation; he read publick Lectures on that Book in the noble University of Marburg, and since composed and published an Exposition of it in seven Books in the said City in the year 1528 (1). Gesner mentions our Lambert's Commentary on Joel, and on St. Luke's Gospel (2). In Gesner's Epitome we find Antitheses Verbi Dei et inventorum hominum. i. e. "God's word opposed to the inventions of men." Confessio de Symbolo fœderis nunquam rumpendo quam communionem vocant, in qua spectari potest quid Marpurgensi colloquio effectum sit (3). i. e. "A Confession concerning the never breaking through the bond of the Covenant, which is called Communion, in which may be seen what has been done in the Conference held at Marburg." De Prophetia, Eruditione, Linguis, deque Litera et Spiritu. i. e. "Of Prophecy, Learning, and Languages; and of the Letter and the Spirit." Commentarius de causis excecationis multorum seculorum. i. e. "A Treatise concerning the blindness which prevailed during several ages." In Acta Apostolorum et Libros Regum. i. e. "On the Acts of the Apostles, and the Books of the Kings." De Cœlibatu regni filii perditionis. i. e. "Of Celibacy under the Reign of the Son of Perdition." De Differentia Stimuli carnis et Satanae nunciis. i. e. "Of the difference there is between the thorn in the flesh, and the messenger of Satan."

[B] He had a great share in Luther's esteem.] That Reformer spoke of him in the following words in a Letter he wrote to Spalatinus. Adest Johannes ille Serranus, vero nomine Franciscus Lampertus, imaginibus quoque nobilis, inter Minoritas viginti annos versatus, & generali (ibi forte legendum est: Generalis (4)) officio functus, ob persecutionem exul, & pauper factus. De integritate viri nulla est dubitatio: testes sunt apud nos, qui illum & in Francia & in Basilea audierunt, tum Basileensis suffraganeus ille Tripolitanus, cum Pellicano, dant illi pulchrum testimonium. Et quamquam nos abundemus Lectioribus optimis, si quid poterit, non abjiciemus: mihi per omnia placet vir, & satis spectatus mihi est, quantum homo spectari potest, ut dignus sit, quem in exilio paululum feramus & juvemus. Sed tu meam nostri facultatem, ut non sit opis meæ illum alere, qui ipse alienis viro: videretur mihi Principi persuadendum, ut jam non perdat, sed in charitate Christo fœneret viginti aut triginta florenos, in eum collocandos, donec vel a suis tribulibus, vel proprio stipendio sese sustentet de labore suo (5). i. e. "John Serranus, or, as his true name is, Francis Lambert, is with me, a man of a noble family; who continued twelve years amongst the Franciscans, and has been there General of the

"Order (or perhaps rather Superior of a Monastery) but being now persecuted and banished, he is in want. The man's honesty cannot be questioned. We have witnesses to it here, who have heard him both in France and at Basil, and the suffragan Bishop of Tripoli at Basil, with Pellicanus give him a very good Character. And though we have here a great many very good Readers, yet if he can do any thing, we shall not neglect him. I like him very well in every respect, and I am persuaded, as much as a man can be persuaded with regard to another, that he deserves to be a little supported and assisted in his banishment. But you know my estate is such, that I cannot assist him, since I myself live by other people's charity. I think we ought to persuade the Prince to grant him twenty or thirty gilders, till he be assisted by his own countrymen, or till he can get a livelihood by his own works: which will not be squandering the money away, but rather lending it charitably to Christ himself, and at an interest." We find by this passage, that our Lambert took the fictitious name of John Serranus, that he was of a noble family, that he had been a Franciscan during twenty years, that he had been preferred to some employment in that order, that he had made some stay at Basil, whence he had a good certificate of his morals. Luther (6) wrote a Preface to the Book which this Ex-monk of Avignon published concerning the Institutes of the Franciscans. It appears from another Letter of Luther that this Profelyte making himself ready to go to Zurich, that he might be nearer to France, some persons endeavoured to get him some money from the Elector to pay the expence of his journey (7). If that Letter of Luther had been written to Spalatinus in August 1523, we should infer from thence that Lambert altered his mind, because they gave him some employment in the University; so that what Seckendorf adds, namely, that he had nevertheless composed at Wittenberg, and dedicated to the Elector his Expositions of some Prophets, of Solomon's Song, and of St. Luke's Gospel (9), would not be referred to its proper times and there would be a tamen (nevertheless) pretty ill-placed. But it is probable, that Luther wrote that letter in August 1526, whence we must infer that the tamen is right, and that the journey to Zurich was not undertaken, because Lambert was called into the Country of Hesse, as I shall relate in the following remark.

[C] He was one of the chief persons, whom the Landgrave of Hesse employed to establish the reformation in his Dominions.] He had been recommended to that Prince as a man distinguished by his piety, by his wit, and by his learning, and capable to confound and silence all the Popish Doctors. He was sent therefore to the Synod that was held at Hamburg, October the 21st 1526. Lambert offered there to a publick disputation 150 Lutheran propositions, and defended them in a victorious manner against all the objections of the superior of the Franciscans of Marburg. The Landgrave gave every one leave to enter the lists, and ordered his Chancellor to translate Lambert's Theses into German, whenever any person desired it. After the disputation he commanded the Monks and Nuns to leave their Convents, and applied their income towards supporting the University and Hospitals of Marburg: he established Lutheran ministers in the churches, and caused all the images to be pulled down. Lambert was appointed Divinity professor in the University founded at Marburg in the year 1527 (10).

(1) Bullinger, Preface to his hundred Sermons on the Revelation. I make use of the French translation, printed for John Crespin, in the year 1525, in 8vo.

(2) Printed the same time at Strasburg in 1525, in 8vo.

(3) Printed in the year 1530.

(4) I think it should rather be Guardiani.

(5) Luther. Ep. lib. 2. pag. 121. apud Seckendorf, Hist. Lutherana, lib. 2. pag. 40.

(6) Genes. chap. iv.

(6) See his Letters, lib. 2. pag. 128.

(7) Seckendorf, Hist. Lutherana, lib. 2. pag. 40.

(8) Seckendorf mentions that month, but he does not mention the year.

(9) Scripturæ tamen Lampertus Wittenbergæ & Electori dedicaverat, teste Chytraeus, lib. 12. fol. 346, Enarrationes in Prophetas aliquos, in Canticum Salomonis, & Historiam Lucae. Idem, Observe that he dedicated his Commentary on Solomon's Song to Francis I, and that on St. Luke to Spalatinus; so that Chytraeus is mistaken.

(10) Taken from Seckendorf, Hist. Lutherana, lib. 2. who quotes Chytraeus. See also Paul Freher's Theatre, pag. 104. and observe that according to Freher and several others, the University of Marburg was founded in the year 1626.

LAMECH, descended from Cain in a direct line, was in the seventh generation, reckoning from Adam. It is observed in the holy Scripture (a) that he had two wives, the one named Ada and the other Zilla; it is imagined that there is some hidden mystery in this observation, and that it is designed to shew us whence Polygamy had its first rise. It did not begin amongst the descendants of Seth, who feared God, but in the wicked wicked and corrupted posterity of Cain, and that too by such a man as Lamech [A], who himself tells his wives that he would kill a man. Such an origin, say they, cannot but be disgraceful. However it be, the marriage of this first transgressor of the Law of Monogamy, established in Paradise, would not appear to have been attended with any mark of reprobation, if we were to judge of it by temporal blessings; for there came from it some children, who had the skill to invent many useful things [B]. Now the inventors of arts have been so much esteemed, that most of them were placed amongst the Gods. It was therefore a very great honour, and consequently a considerable temporal advantage to have the wit necessary to invent; but it does by no means follow from thence that God approved Lamech's Polygamy. There are but four children of this man mentioned in Genesis (b); but Josephus asserts (c) that he had threescore and seventeen children by his two wives. Lamech's discourse to his wives is a riddle to me [C]; and I confess ingenuously that it is beyond my capacity. I shall kill a man, says he to them (d), I being wounded, and a young man I being hurt; for if Cain be avenged sevenfold, Lamech shall be avenged seventy sevenfold. A great many Commentators are of opinion, that Lamech asserts here he had killed Cain [D], and Tubal-Cain.

(d) Gen. chap. iv. Mr. Bayle quotes the French translation made at Geneva; and as it differs a little from our English translation, we thought it proper to follow the French here.

For

(b) See the remark [B].

(c) Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(1) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for April 1685, Art. 1. and 2.

(2) Polygam. triumph. pag. 188.

(3) Ibid. pag. 191.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Josephus supposes that the wife of Tubal-Cain's daughter.

(6) Apud Genebrard. in Chron. and in the margin of the French translation of Josephus.

(7) Apud Rivetum. Oper. tom. 1. pag. 186.

[A] And by such a man as Lamech. The author of the Polygamia triumphatrix was an odd man indeed, who spent his health to establish the doctrine of the plurality of wives, though one only had been too much for him (1). He tiles the resolution which Lamech took to marry two an heroic action (2), and he commends him extremely for being the first who examined with the utmost attention that order of God, Be fruitful and multiply; and who having duly weighed it, put himself in a condition to perform it to the utmost of his power by marrying two wives (3). None dared to undertake it before him; the memory of Eve's fault and the consideration of Adam's banishment, had filled people's minds with fear. Lamech was the first who dared to venture himself with an undaunted courage, without minding the difficulties he had considered. He made a commentary, not indeed in words, but by his actions, on the text of that universal law, Be fruitful and multiply; a law, which is a downright commandment, and not a mere blessing only. Ipse autem insuper habitis omnibus imminentibus & præconcepitis difficultatibus, heroico animo hoc primus ausus, & proprio factæ verba legis catholice (crecite & multiplicamini) non benedictoria tantum, sed simul imperatoria, explanare, & bono exemplo omnibus suis posteris præire voluit (4). By this means he paved the way, and gave a good example to those who should come after him. Thus you see, how that poor author had prepossessed himself in favour of Polygamy; it was his darling fancy, he imagined that the Scripture mentioned Lamech's two marriages as an admirable deed, whereas Divines maintain very justly that the Scripture designed thereby to condemn Polygamy in its very infancy.

[B] The skill to invent many useful things. Jabel and Jubal the sons of Adah, Tubal-Cain and Naamah (5) his sister, whose mother was Zillah, are Lamech's four children mentioned in the Scripture. Jabel invented the use of tents; Jubal invented some musical instruments; Tubal-Cain invented several bras and iron tools. The Holy Scripture, which acquaints us with these particulars, does not ascribe any invention to Naamah; but if we may believe the Rabbies, she invented the art of working wool, and of making linnen (6).

[C] Lamech's discourse to his wives is a riddle to me. It is not an easy matter to guess how the original words of Lamech's discourse ought to be translated. The French translation of Geneva, which I have quoted, renders them in the future tense, I shall kill, and represents Lamech to us as a man who is to receive some wound before he kills. But in the vulgar Latin translation it is rendered in the præter tense, I have killed; and as for the wound one does not know what to make of it; for this phrase, occidi virum in vulnus meum, is a barbarism, which signifies nothing in Latin, and which may signify any thing, as soon as we are got rid of the rules of Grammar. Some interpreters, who are very well skilled in the Hebrew tongue (7), translate that passage neither in the præter tense nor in the future tense; but they make a conditional proposition of the whole. I would kill a man by wounding him, and even a young man with a stick or with my fist, if they offered to attack me. Now how can we come at the true construction of a period, which may be rendered in the future tense as well as in the præter tense, in the optative mood, as well as in the indicative? But though we could get over the Grammatical sense, it would signify but little, since we should still have to examine what Lamech designed to say to his two wives; now this is no trifling difficulty. Nothing seems more improbable to me, than the opinion of those, who imagine that all this is nothing but a rodomontade of Lamech (8). Others take it for a threatening to kill his wives, if they continued to vex him by their clamours and disputes (9). But others, on the contrary, take it for an interrogation designed to comfort them under their fears; they were afraid lest some person might kill him; and he encourages them by these words; Have I killed a man &c (a)?

* (a) Others take it for an interrogation . . . Have I killed a man? This is also the opinion of the Reverend Mr. Shuckford: and as Lamech's discourse may be a riddle to several of our readers, as it was to Mr. Bayle, we beg leave to lay here before them the explication of the ingenious Gentleman we have mentioned just now. "The descendants of Cain, says he (*), lived a long time in some fear of the family of Adam, lest they should attempt to revenge upon them Abel's death. It is supposed (§) that it was for this reason that Cain built a city, that his children might live near together, and be able more easily to joyn and unite for the common safety. Lamech endeavoured to reason them out of their fears, and therefore calling his family together, he argued with them to this purpose: Why should we make our lives uneasy with these groundless suspicions? We have not killed a man, nor offered any injury to our brethren of the other family; and surely reason must teach them, that they can have no right to hurt us. Cain indeed, our ancestor, killed Abel; but God was pleased so far to forgive his sin, as to threaten to take sevenfold vengeance on any one that should kill him; if so, surely they must expect a much greater punishment who shall presume to kill any of us; if Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, surely Lamech or any of his innocent family seventy sevenfold. This I take to be the meaning of the speech of Lamech to his wives, Gen. iv. 23. Moses has introduced it without any connection with what went before or what follows after, so that at first sight it is not easy to know what to apply it to; the expression itself is but dark, and the expositors have attempted to explain it very imperfectly . . . The most probable sense of the word is, I think, that which I have given them in the paraphrase above. *I have slain a man, should be read interrogatively, have I slain a man? i. e. I have not slain a man, to my wounding, i. e. that I should be wounded for it; nor a young man to my hurt, i. e. nor have I killed a young man, that I should be hurt or punished for it. And this is the sense, which the Targum of Onkelos most excellently gives the place. I have not killed a man, says Onkelos, that I should bear the sin of it, nor have I destroyed a young man, that my offspring should be cut off for it." ADD. REM.*

[D] A great many commentators are of opinion that Lamech

(8) See Rivetum, Oper. tom. 1. pag. 187.

(9) See Heidegger, Hist. Patriarch. tom. 1. pag. 212.

(*) Shuckford's Connexion &c. vol. 1. pag. 9. &c.

(§) Menochius in Loc.

For it is a pretty general tradition, that Lamech, who always loved hunting, continued to take that diversion, even when he was almost blind with age (e). He used then to take his son Tubal-Cain with him, who not only served him for a guide (f) but also gave him notice when and where he was to shoot at any beast. Now it happened once that as Cain was lying down in a thicket, Lamech's guide observing something that moved there, gave him notice of it, whereupon Lamech shot his arrow and killed Cain. He was extremely vexed at it, and beat his guide so severely, that he left him dead on the spot. Thus, say they, one may put a reasonable sense on Lamech's words, which according to the vulgar Latin translation runs thus, Occidi virum in vulnus meum, & adolescentulum in livorem meum. i. e. "I have slain a man to my wound, and a young man to my bruise." Here is a distinction between the manner after which he killed the man, namely by a wound, and the manner after which he killed the boy, by bruises which rendered his body black and blew. This story and the circumstances with which it is attended, abound with absurdities [E]. Suidas pretends, that Lamech killed two brothers of Enoch, and married their wives (g).

You will meet with large collections upon all this in a Dissertation or Thesis (b), which was held at Wittemberg in the year 1673, sub præsidio Joh. Wilhelmi Hillegeri, under John William Hillegerus.

[Lamech asserts here, he had killed Cain.] A commentator (10), who is otherwise very judicious and learned, has been much mistaken here; for he imagines that to be the most probable explication of Lamech's speech. He alleges two arguments for it. First, says he, Cain's posterity continued till the flood; and yet Moses makes it end at Lamech and his sons, for which no other reason can be given but this, namely that Cain's life ended in the generation of Lamech who killed him. Secondly, says he, the only reason why Moses would relate the murder committed by Lamech, was to hint thereby the unhappy death of Cain. I could refute these arguments several ways, but I shall only observe that Pererius supposes a fact which is not the least probable, namely, that Moses designed to let the world know that Lamech killed Cain. If such had been his design, would he have left so great a darkness in the fourth chapter of Genesis with regard to that particular? Was there in Cain's death any thing mysterious, that must be wrapped up in so many enigmatical expressions? Indeed, if it could be proved that Moses had such a design, one might apply to him this verse of the Gospel, Never man spake like this man (11), and cry out, Tacui, Domine, quia tu fecisti. i. e. "I was dumb, O Lord, because thou didst it." One would never pardon this in an uninspired author. However, I do not pretend to refute, generally speaking, the opinion of those, who take for signs of inspiration in the accounts given us by Moses, some singularities, which are of such a nature, that an author would never have made use of them, had the direction of his work been left to him alone (12).

[E] This story and the circumstances with which it is attended, abound with absurdities. I. It is a very ill-contrived supposition to assert, that Lamech was almost blind (13), through age, whilst Cain his great-grand-father's father was still living. II. It is absurd to make him go a hunting in such a decrepit old age, that he could not see the game, and wanted a guide to tell him when he was to shoot his arrow. III. It is absurd to suppose, that the reason why he made the speech before us to his two wives, was, that they abused him in his old age, either because they could not resist his excessive lasciviousness, or on account of his children's savage temper. Hanc tradunt historiam, Lamechum in senectute male tractatum esse ab uxoribus, vel propter nimiam ejus libidinem atque lasciviam, vel propter truculentam filiorum ejus ingenia (14). What likelihood is there, that at such an age he would have given two wives reason to complain of his too frequent caresses? IV. It is absurd to suppose, that when Lamech had committed that double murder, his wives refused to lie any more with him, because that Cain's offspring was to perish

according to the oracle, after the seventh generation (15): this, I say, is absurd; for it is so far from being true that God threatened Cain to make his issue fail or perish after the seventh generation, that on the contrary, he had assured him, that whosoever should slay Cain, vengeance should be taken on him sevenfold. V. It is more absurd still to suppose (16), that Lamech took his two wives with him to Adam, and desired him to reprove them for refusing him their bed: and that when Adam had begun his lecture, he was interrupted in such a manner as loaded him with confusion. You are a fine man indeed, says Lamech's wife to Adam, to reprove us: let your censure fall upon yourself first, you, who after so many years have not lain with your wife. I omit observing that Lamech's supposed old age does not agree with the eagerness with which he endeavoured to bring his wives to reason with regard to conjugal embraces: I do not say, that the recrimination had been imagined with a little more probability, if it had been supposed, that Lamech was censured by Adam at the request of his two wives, and upon their complaint; but I assert, that since according to the fancies of the Rabbies, Adam continued but an hundred and thirty years after Abel's death, without lying with Eve, it is absurd to suppose that he was censured for it, as though he did not lie with Eve when Cain was killed. Vossius the younger mistook here Lamech Noah's father for Lamech who married two wives. Judæorum est fabella, says he (17), Lamechum de uxoribus conquestum esse apud Adamum, illum his jussisse ut ad maritum reverterentur ac sui facerent copiam. Istas respondisse Adamo ut ipse prius juæ satisfaceret conjugii, à qua jam per centum & triginta annos propter scelus Caini esset separatus. Verum quis adco sit hebes, ut non videat narratiunculam hanc esse ineptissimam? Ex ea sequeretur Lamechum qui à Setho septimus fuit diu fuisse antequam Sethus nasceretur. i. e. "The Jews relate the following story. Lamech, say they, complained of his wives to Adam, who commanded them to return to him, and to suffer him to enjoy them. But they answered him, that he should first satisfy his own wife, from whom he had been parted an hundred and thirty years on account of Cain's crime. But who is so blind as not to see the silliness of this story, since it supposes that Lamech, who was the seventh from Seth, existed long before Seth was born?" VI. It is absurd to suppose that Tubal-cain being still a boy was killed by his father. How could he have been the inventor of several brass tools, as the Scripture supposes he was? Let us observe here that Josephus does not in the least mention that pretended murder of Lamech; so that Tostatus, who quotes him for that ancient tradition (18), was deceived by his memory.

LAMECH the son of Methuselah, and Father of Noah, was the ninth person after the Creation including Adam (a); he lived seven hundred seventy seven years. Isaac Vossius (b) complains, that Sigismund Gelenius inserted in the Latin Translation of Josephus a particular, which is not in the Greek text of that Jewish Historian; namely, that Adam was still living in the time of Lamech: this critic, at the same time that he censures

(e) See Perer. in Genes. cap. iv. ver. 23, 24. Heidegg. Hist. Patriarch. tom. 1. pag. 211.

(f) Others say, one of his servants led him.

(g) Suidas in As. 147.

(10) Pererius, in Genes. cap. 4. ver. 23, 24.

(11) In the Gospel of St. John, chap. vii. ver. 46.

(12) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, for July 1686, Art. 2. in the beginning.

(13) Some suppose him quite blind. See Polygamia triumphatrix, pag. 185.

(14) Pererius, in Genes. cap. iv. ver. 23, 24.

(a) Genes. v.

(b) De Vera etate Mundi, pag. 13, 14.

(15) Gedalia in Caton Fab. & H. tinger, Hist. Oriental. apud Lyserum, Polygamia triumph. pag. 192.

(16) Aben Ezra, apud eundem.

(17) Isaac Vossius, Dissert. de etate Mundi, cap. 4. pag. 14.

(18) See Pererius, in Genes. cap. iv. ver. 23, 24.

centures this blunder, commits another himself; for he mistakes Lamech Noah's father, for Lamech descended from Cain, as we have shewed it in the last remark of the foregoing article.

LAMIA, a Roman family. It was a branch of the family of the Ælii [A], and it was probably admitted into it only by adoption; for it was supposed to be descended from LAMUS (a) Neptune's son, and King of the Læstrygones, who lived in a city, which was afterwards called Formia. This is Horace's opinion [B]. Such an ancient descent as that, with which the Poet compliments his friend ÆLIUS LAMIA, was doubtless the reason why Juvenal, designing to hint at a Lady of the first quality, describes her in these words, quædam denumero LAMIARUM (b); i. e. "one of the family of the Lamiaë," that is, of an high descent. It is very probable that the person to whom Horace inscribes the seventeenth Ode of his 3d book, and whom he commends also in several other places, was the father of LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA (c), who died towards the latter end of Tiberius's reign in the year 786 after the building of Rome; he had been Governor of Syria [C], whence he was removed and appointed Governor of Rome. He was honoured with a Censor's funeral (d). From him was perhaps descended ÆLIUS LAMIA, Domitia Longina's husband, whom Domitian took away from him. He put him to death some time after [D]. There was also one LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA, who was banished, because he had taken Cicero's part against Piso with too much zeal. He afterwards was an Ædile, and then Prætor after Cæsar's death in the year 711 after the building of Rome. It is imagined that it was he, who being reputed dead, so that the funeral pile on which he was laid was already kindled, recovered his senses by the action of the fire [E]. Consult Streinius's Roman families, and Glandorp's Onomasticon (e).

(a) Homer, Odyss. lib. 10. ver. 18. mentions this Lamus, who lived, says he, in a great city.

(b) Juvenal, Sat. 6. ver. 383.

(c) Glandorp, Onomast. pag. 14. supposes the person mentioned by Horace to be the same who died in the year 786; but this is making him live too long.

(d) See the remark [C] quotation (5).

(e) Pag. 14. & seq.

[A] It was a branch of the family of the Ælii.] The Antonini, Roman Emperors, were descended from this family; it consisted of seven or eight branches, all plebeian; that of the Cati, that of the Tubero's, that of the Galli, that of the Stilo's, that of the Præconini, that of the Sejanii, and that of the Lamiaë (1). It is not asserted by any author, that the Ælii were descended from Lamus King of the Læstrygones, but it was said of the Lamiaë; the latter must therefore have been admitted into the family of the others by adoption.

(1) See Glandorp, Onomast. pag. 10, & seq.

(2) Ode 17. lib. 3. init.

[B] This is Horace's opinion.] He speaks thus:

*Æli vetusto nobilis ab Lamo,
Quando & priores hinc Lamias ferunt
Denominatos, & nepotum
Per memores genus omne fastos;
Autore ab illo ducis originem
Qui Formiaram mœnia dicitur
Princeps, & innantem Maricæ
Littoribus tenuisse Lyrin Late tyrannus.*

"Great Sire, from antient Lamus sprung,
"As noble a descent, as long;
"(From him, the spring, thy gen'rous blood
"In undisturbed streams had flow'd;
"From him the Lamias took their name,
"And swell the annals of our fame:
"Thy gen'rous blood rould nobly down
"From him that fill'd the Formian throne,
"Where swoln with rain swift Lyrin roars,
"And washes fair Maurica's shores;
"A potent scepter grac'd his hand,
"And measur'd out a wide command."

CREECH.

The antient Romans were as silly as men are at present with regard to genealogies. Of how many families was it not said, that they were descended, either from one of Hercules's fellow-travellers, or from some other man famous in the fabulous times? Silius Italicus imagined, that Lamus had reigned at Cajeta (3). See Bochart's Geographia Sacra (4).

(3) Et regnata Lamo Cajeta. Sil. Ital. lib. 8. ver. 530. See Dausque's Notæ.

[C] LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA... Governor of Syria.] He had only the title of it, which he did not keep long. The injustice he suffered in that respect, raised his reputation. Extremo anni moti Ælii Lamiaë funere censorio celebrata, qui administranda Suria imagine tandem exfolutus urbi præfuerat. Genus illi decorum, vivida senectus; & non permessa provincia dignationem addiderat (5). i. e. "Ælius Lamia dying

(4) Lib. 1. cap. 34.

"towards the end of the year, was buried as a censor. "He was Governor of Rome, having been at length "discharged from his government of Syria, of which "he never had but the title. He was of a noble family, and enjoyed a lively old age. The refusing "his government to him added fresh glory to his "character." He had commanded in Africa (6).

(5) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 27. ad ann. 786.

(6) Idem, lib. 4. cap. 13.

[D] ÆLIUS LAMIA... Domitian put him to death.] I mention him in the article of DOMITIA LONGINA, and quote there the necessary authorities. Juvenal hints at this Lamia's death in his fourth satire.

*Sed periit postquam Cerdonibus esse timendus
Cæperat, hoc nocuit Lamiarum cæds madente* (7).

(7) Juvenal, Sat. 4. in fine.

"But when he dreadful to the rabble grew "Him, who so many Lords had slain they slew."

DRYDEN.

[E] LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA... being reputed dead... recovered his senses by the action of the fire.] Here follows Valerius Maximus's account of this, L. quoque Lamiaë prætorio viro æque vocem fuisse super rogum confisit (8). i. e. "It is certain, that L. Lamia, who "had been a Prætor, recovered his speech on the "Pile." Pliny mentions it also (9).

(8) Val. Max. lib. 1. cap. 2. pag. m. 113.

(9) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 52.

LAMIA, a City in Thessaly. It is chiefly remarkable on account of the battle which was fought in its territories between the Athenians assisted by the other Greeks; and Antipater Governor of Macedonia, after the death of Alexander. This battle proved very fatal to the Athenians, and to several other Cities of Greece (a). Suidas is mistaken when he asserts that Antipater lost the victory (b).

(a) Diod. Siculus, lib. 18. Paulanias, lib. 7. pag. 213.

(b) Suidas in Antipater.

LAMIA, Neptune's daughter. The Greeks asserted that the Africans had called her Sibylla, that she was the first woman that ever prophesied, and that Jupiter had a daughter by her, who was called Hierophyle, and who was one of the Sibyls (a). Others assert, that Lamia was a beautiful African woman [A], by whom Jupiter got several

(a) Paulanias, lib. 10. pag. 327.

[A] Others assert that Lamia was a beautiful African woman.] There are many authors, who agree in supposing that Lamia was born in Africa. Doris or Duris (1) asserts it; Hesychius does the same. 'The Scholiast

(1) In Suidas, under the word Antipater.

several children, all which Juno destroyed out of jealousy, which gave their mother such a terrible grief, that she not only became ugly, but even so cruel, that she used to take other people's children and murder them (b). This gave rise, undoubtedly, to the vulgar traditions, which the Poets followed in their Tragedies [B]. There is another particular related of Lamia, or of the LAMIAE, namely, that they could take and leave their eyes when they pleased. They put them by when they were at home, and took them again when they went abroad. This is the emblem of curiosity, and of self-love [C]. Philostratus describes them as very lascivious [D]. I cannot tell whether the first LAMIA [E] was thus called on account of what the fables reported of the Lamiae, or whether the latter borrowed their name from that fish. Moreri's blunders are not considerable [F].

(b) Suidas, in Adama. See what Aspasius in Arist. de moribus lib. 7. cap. 5. says of a Lamia of Pentus.

(1) In Pecem. Scholiast on Aristophanes (2) tells us, she was the daughter of Belus and Libya. Consider the following passage from Euripides.

Τὴς τέρουσι τὸ ἰωνίδειον θελοῦσι
Οὐκ αἰδῆ Λαμίασι τῆς Λιβυτικῆς γένεσσι (3).

(3) Euripides, apud Bochart. Geograph. Sacra. lib. 1. cap. 33.

i. e. "Who does not know the opprobrious name of "Lamia, a woman born in Arabia?"

Diodorus Siculus relates, that Ophellas King of Cyrene going to meet Agathocles, who was waging war against the Carthaginians, formed a Cave, in which, it was said, Queen Lamia was born (4). Bochart (5) imagines that the name of Lamia comes from the Punic word Labam or Labama, which is still in use at this time amongst the Arabians, and signifies to devote.

(4) Ἄρμον ἰωνίδης, ἡρώς καὶ οὐκ αἰδῆσι στυγαίᾳ ἐν ἡρώσι δῶκεται γένεσθαι βασιλοῦσαν Λαμίαν i. e. "A large cave, covered with ivy and stones, in which it is reported Queen Lamia was born." Died. Siculus, lib. 20. Apud Bochart, Ibid.

[B] The vulgar traditions, which the Poets followed in their tragedies. Horace gives them very good advice upon this subject.

*Fida voluptatis causa sint proxima veris,
Nec quodcumque volas, poscat sibi fabula credi,
Nec praevisa Lamia vivum puerum extrahat alvo* (6).

i. e. "Be sure whatever pleasant tales you tell, "Be so like truth, that they may serve as well: "And do not Lamia's eating children feign? "Then shew them whole, and make them live "again.

CREECH.

(6) Horat. de Art. Poet. ver. 338.

Philostratus observes that the Lamiae were very fond of human flesh (7). Amongst the old womens tales, that are used to be told in some countries, there are many in which Fairies are introduced, that are great eaters of children.

(7) Σαρπην καὶ μάλα αἰσθητῶν ἡρώων ἴσθι. i. e. "They love flesh, especially human flesh." Philostrat. in Vita Apollin. lib. 4.

[C] This is the Emblem of Curiosity and self-love.

Consult Plutarch (8) who tells you, that after the example of Lamia, who was blind at home, and who when she designed to go abroad took her eyes out of a box, which she had on purpose to keep them in, each of us curiously pries into the defects of our neighbours, though we make no use of our eye-sight to discover our own vices.

(8) Plutarch. de Curiositate, init. pag. m. 515, 516.

[D] Philostratus describes them as very lascivious.

He observes (9), that out of lasciviousness they inticed the men they had a mind to devour at a proper time and place; and that they chiefly delighted to eat beautiful boys, when they were become very fat and plump. It was not, I think, an easy matter to grow fat in the service of those lewd creatures. Philostratus ought to have taken notice of this objection. One might perhaps apply here the explication which has been given of the fable of Diomedes King of France, who made his mares feed upon the flesh of his guests. This signifies, according to some persons, that he obliged them to gratify the lust of his daughters, till these men were nothing but skin and bones. Diomedes Thraciae Rex, cum aliquot haberet filias salacissimas,

(9) In Vita Apollin. lib. 4.

cogebat hospites ut earum libidinem satiarent; diis ob id equas humanis carnibus pascere: equa enim & mulier sola animalium appetunt marem etiam pregnantis; unde equitandi vocabulum, ut ait Aristoteles (9), trahitur maledicto in feminas procaces: comedunt verò carnes humanas, cum viros exsugunt, & coitu emaciatos ad tabem perducunt; ut rectè Solomon (†) à mulierum consuetudine revocet adolescentes, ne frustra gemere incipiant, postquam carnes suas consumpserint (10). i. e. "Diomedes King of Thrace having some very lascivious daughters obliged his guests to satisfy their lust: for which reason he was said to feed his mares with human flesh: for a mare and a woman are the only living females that long for the male, even when they are pregnant: hence, as Aristotle tells us, equi to desire to go to the horse, is applied to lascivious women by way of reproach. They eat human flesh, when they suck up the substance of the men, and throw them into consumptions by their frequent embraces: So that Solomon is very much in the right to dissuade men from conversing with women, lest they in vain mourn at the last, when their flesh and their body are consumed."

(9) Arist. de Gener. Animal. lib. 4. cap. 4. Idem, Hist. Animal. lib. 6. cap. 18.

(†) Prov. v. 11.

[E] The fish LAMIA. It is of a monstrous bigness, and prodigiously voracious. The whole body of a man has sometimes been found in the belly. See John Ray's history of fishes, and the following remark, where I censure Calepin.

(10) Balthasar Bonifacius, Hist. Ludæa, lib. 5. cap. 2. pag. mo 125.

[F] Moreri's blunders are not considerable. I. Phavorinus, who is a modern author (11) ought not to have been quoted, II. Lefs still should he have been quoted before Suidas. III. Instead of saying that the ancients gave the Lamias the name of Lares, Genii, or household Gods, it should be said Larvae, Spectres. IV. Rhodiginus should not have been quoted, but Philostratus, from whom he extracted all that he relates concerning the Lamias (12). V. However the twenty ninth book ought to have been quoted and not the forty ninth, for his Antiquæ Lectiones contain but thirty books. VI. Pliny ought not to have been cited, since he says nothing of the fish called Lamia (13). And yet Moreri wanted an author who considered the Lamias as an extraordinary fish. This calls to my mind a false quotation, which I have observed in Calepin. He quotes Pliny, lib. 29. cap. 24. immediately after these words. Lamia item piscis est (unde & Lamiarum strigum nomen, quod ut Lamia sunt voracissima, à λαμῆος guttur) tanto oris rictu, tantaque voracitate, ut & loricatorum hominem devorasse comperitum sit. Itaque de hoc intelligunt, qui Jonam deglutivit.

(11) He published this Dictionary in the year 1523.

(12) Lloyd and Hofman seem to have been ignorant of this.

(13) Father Hardouin in bune Locum Plinii, lib. 9. cap. 24. thinks it is a kind of Ray or Thornback.

i. e. "Lamia is also a fish (hence a kind of owls "are called Lamias, because like the Lamias they "are very voracious, from the Greek word λαμῆος, "the throat). Those fishes have such a large mouth, "and are so greedy, that it has sometimes been observed that they have swallowed a man armed with "his coat of mail. So that some persons imagine, "it was such a fish that swallowed Jonah." Pliny says nothing of all this; and after all, the ninth book and not the thirty ninth ought to have been quoted.

LAMIA a celebrated Courtezan was the daughter of an Athenian named Cleanor (a). She was by trade a player on the Flute, and became the concubine of Ptolemy the first of that name King of Egypt. But before that time she had already made her self famous in the character of a Lady of Pleasure [A]. She was taken with several of her companions

(a) Polemo apud Athenæum, lib. 13. pag. 577.

[A] She had made herself famous in the character of a Lady of pleasure. Plutarch asserts it: Let us quote his own words. Ἐν δὲ ταῖς ἡμετέροις ἡ Λαμία, τῆν μὲν ἀρχῆν σπουδαῖον διὰ τὴν τέχνην, (ἰδοὺν γὰρ αὐτὴν ἐν σὺκταφρονήτοις) ἕταρον δὲ καὶ τοῖς ἑρωτικοῖς λαμῆος ὑποκρίσθαι. i. e. "Lamia excelled in this, and "was companions in the sea-fight in which Demetrius Poliorcetes gained the victory over Pro- lemy near the Island of Cyprus (b). Being carried to Demetrius she pleaded him so well, though she began to be in a declining age [B], that she was ever after the most beloved of his mistresses; whence it was said, that the others loved him, but that he loved this, which exposed him to some railleries [C]. He loaded her with so many fa- vours, that she was able to live in a very magnificent manner [D]. She excelled in witty sayings

(b) Plutarchus in Demetrio, pag. 895 E.

(1) Plutarchus, in Demetrio, pag. 895 E.

“ was at first esteemed for her art, for she played “ pretty well upon the flute: afterwards she became “ famous in the trade of a Courtezan (1).” When the art of fingering, or dancing, or playing upon musi- cal instruments, is practised by one of the fair sex with a design to be commended, I mean, when she makes a trade of it, and performs on the stage, it soon leads her to a downright prostitution. Do not won- der therefore that our Lamia from a Player on the flute turned a Courtezan. The descent is very steep and slippery from the one to the other.

[B] She pleased Demetrius very well, though she be- gan to be in a declining age] I should have made use of some expressions more proper to represent her as an old woman, if I had consulted Plutarch alone: But having read in Athenæus, that she had a daughter by Demetrius (2). I thought I was obliged to soften my expressions. Here follows what Plutarch tells us.

(2) Δημήτριος ὁ Πολιορκητὴς ὁ Παιστήριος ἢ Δαμνίας τῆς αὐτοκράτορος, ἢ τῆς Ἰσχυρῆς καὶ Στρατηγῆρα Φιλαν. Demetrius Poliorcetes (and not Pbalereus, as it is in the translation of Athenæus) was passionately in love with Lamia the Player on the flute, by whom he got a daughter named Phila. Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 577.

Τότε γὰρ ἔτι λίγην αἰῶνος, καὶ πολὺ νεώτερον ἐαυτῆς λαβοῦσα τὸν Δημήτριον, ἐκράτησε τῇ χάριτι καὶ καλέσθη ὡς ἐκείνης εἶναι μόνῃς ἰραστὴν τῶν δὲ ἄλλων γυναικῶν ἰρό- μιν. i. e. “ Lamia, whose beauty began to de- cline, inspired Demetrius with love, though he was “ much younger than she; and she gained him so “ well by her engaging ways, that he was a lover “ to her alone, though he were beloved by the other “ women (3).” I shall quote below (4) another passage, which is not less to the purpose. It is generally said, that in families friendship descends much more than it ascends: Fathers love their children much more than children love their fathers. One may say the same with regard to the love of men towards wo- men. They are generally older than the women they love. But this rule is liable to a great many excep- tions; even in royal families; witness the Dauphin who was in love with an old widow under the reign of Francis I. I mention it in the Article of Diana of POITIERS. And here we see a young King, who suffers himself to be captivated by a woman, who was much older than her. It is no great wonder: for old Courtezans with some remains of beauty, supported by a great deal of craft and artifice, are capable to make a young man go a great length. However it be, if Demetrius met with great charms in Lamia the first time he saw her, he found her not less charming in his greatest intimacy with her. Φησὶ δὲ τὴν Δαμνίαν τὴν βασιλῆϊ ὑπερβολῶς καλεῖσθαι ὑπερπαισθηταίῳ. Idem ait Demetrium ab incubante Lamia concinne suaviterque sub- gignatum fuisse, & idcirco eam laudasse (5). It was not only her agility, that enchanted Demetrius so much. She used also to bite him amorously (6) at which that Prince was perhaps as much pleased, as his friends were displeased with his passion for that woman. They could not conceal their displeasure; for when his Em- bassadors had seen the scars which Lyfimachus shewed on his thighs and arms, they answered him, that the King their master had also scars on his neck, occa- sioned by the teeth of that cruel beast Lamia. You must know that Lyfimachus had fought with a Lyon, and shewed the Embassadors the marks of the wounds he had received in that fight. The words in the ori- ginal are more elegant than the summary account I have given of them. Ἀφικέσθον γὰρ τινες παρ’ αὐτῷ κατὰ πρῶτον πρὸς Λυσίμαχον, οἳ ἐκείνῳ ἄγαν σχολὴν ἐπέδει- ξον ἐν τοῖς μὲν καὶ τοῖς βραχέσσιν ὀνυχῶν βαθείας ὀφθαλμῶν λισσίων. καὶ διηγεῖτο τὴν γενομένην αὐτῷ μάχην πρὸς τὸ θῆριον, ὑπο Ἀλιζάνδρου συγκρατηθέντι τῷ βασιλεῖ. οἱ δὲ, γελῶντες ἔφασαν, καὶ τὸν αὐτῶν βασιλεῖα δινῆ δρῆν δὴ γμάλα φέρον ἐν τῷ τραχήλῳ Δαμνίας. i. e. “ Some “ Ambassadors (from Demetrius) came to Lyfimachus, “ who at his leisure hours shewed them the marks of “ a Lyon’s claws in his arms and thighs, and gave “ them an account of his fight with that wild beast, “ with which he had been shut up by King Alexan- “ der. At which the Embassadors answered with “ a smile, that their King had also been severely bit “ in the neck by a wild beast called Lamia (7).”

(3) Plutarchus, in Demetrio, pag. 895, F.

(4) In the re- mark [C].

(5) Machon, apud Athenæum, lib. 13. pag. 577.

(6) See above the remark [A] in the article of the 2d FLORA.

(7) Plutarchus, in Demetrio, pag. 901.

[C] . . . Which exposed him to some railleries] Men wondered to see that Demetrius, who had been very soon disgusted with his wife Philla, because she began to be of a declining age, had thus made himself a slave to Lamia, even when she was almost decayed, Ἦν δὲ θαυμάσιον ὅτι τῆς Φίλλας ἐν ἀρχῇ τὴν μὴ κατ’ ἡλικίαν διασχερῆσαν, ἔπειθε τῆς Λαμνίας, καὶ τοσούτοις ἡμᾶ χρόνον ἔδη παρακμακούσας. i. e. “ Men wondered, that he who was “ disgusted with Philla as soon as she began to decline, “ was thus conquered by Lamia, and loved her so “ much even when she began to grow old (8).” (8) Idem, ibid.

He asked Demo once what she thought of Lamia, who was playing on the flute whilst they were at table. She is an old woman, answered Demo. When the Desert was brought, Do you see, said he to Demo, how many things Lamia sends me. My mother, replied De- mo, would send you a great many more, if you would also lie with her (9). Observe that this was a Courte- zan, who had been the Concubine of Antigonus De- metrius’s father, and whom Demetrius himself loved afterwards (10). Plutarch asserts that she was furnished (10) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 578.

Mania; but Athenæus (11) speaks of Demo and of Mania as of two Courtezans. There arose a violent hatred between Lyfimachus and Demetrius; which was the reason why Lyfimachus cast very severe jokes on Demetrius on account of his love for Lamia. She is the first Courtezan, said he, I ever saw, who came from the play-house. Demetrius answered, I will have him to know, that my Where is more honest than his Penelope. Σωφρονεῖσθαι εἶναι τὴν ἐαυτοῦ πόρνην τῆς ἐκείνου Πηνελόπης. i. e. “ That his own whore was more mo- “ dest, than the other’s Penelope.” James Amiot did not understand this passage in Plutarch; he makes Lyfimachus say, I had never seen before a Courtezan who acted in a Tragedy. Plutarch’s words do not signify this. Λυσίμαχος τοιδούτων εἰς τὴν ἐκείνου τῆς Λαμνίας ἄλγος ἐν πρώτῳ ἰσρακίαις πόρνην προσφωμῆν ἐκ τραγικῆς σκηνῆς. Lyfimachus insectans eum ob Lamia amore, dixit abate nunc primum scortum se ex tragica prodens (13) scena vidisse. i. e. “ Lyfimachus ridiculing him on “ account of his love for Lamia, said, this is the “ first prostitute I ever saw coming from the tragic “ Theatre.” The best translation in the world would not explain that thought, if we did not know a par- ticular, with which Athenæus acquaints us (14); and which is this; Demetrius had said that Lyfimachus’s court was like a Comic Theatre; no person came from it, but whose name was of two syllables. Thus he ridiculed such men as Bithes, Paris, and some o- thers whose names were not longer, and who were Lyfimachus’s greatest favourites: when Lyfimachus was acquainted with this raillery, he only said, that he never saw at his court a prostitute who came from the tragic Theatre. He hinted at Lamia’s trade, who played on the flute (15), which was used to be practised in the acting of Tragedies.

[D] She was able to live in a very magnificent manner.] The Mistresses of Kings use to take a delight in im- mortalizing their name by stately buildings. Lamia was also of that temper. She caused a very beautiful Portico to be built at Sicyone, of which a certain Author (16) published a Description. The entertain- ment she gave Demetrius once was exceedingly grand. There was a book written upon this Subject. Χωρὶς δὲ τούτων αὐτὴ κατ’ ἐαυτὴν ἢ Λαμνία τῷ βασιλεῖ παρασκευάσασα δῖπαιον, ἠργυρολόγησε πολλὰς. καὶ τὸ δῖπαιον, ἕως ἡνθροσ τῇ δόξῃ διὰ τὴν πολυτέλειαν, ὥστε ὑπὸ Λαμνίας, τῆς Σαμῆος συγκληθέντα. δι’ ἧ καὶ τῶν κοινῶν τις ἐφώλου τὴν Λαμνίαν Ἐλίπολις ἀλεθῶς προσέειπε (17). i. e. “ Be- “ sides this Lamia did separately give an entertain- “ ment to the King, for which she exacted money “ from a great many persons. This entertainment “ was so much celebrated on account of the vast sum “ of money which was spent in it, that Lynæus of “ Samos gave an account of it in writing: and one “ of the writers of Comedies very justly titled Lamia “ Helepolis, i. e. the Conqueror of cities (18).” Plu- tarch

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 578.

(11) Ibid.

(13) There is prodens in the Latin translation of Plutarch, which is a fel- cism or a fallacy; namely, as it makes Lyfima- chus say of him- self that he came from the The- atre.

(14) Athen. lib. 14. pag. 614.

(15) Τὴν αὐτοκράτορος Λαμνίας λύρον. i. e. “ Hinting at “ Lamia, who “ played on the “ flute. Idem, ibid.

(16) His name was Polemon. See Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 577.

(17) Written by an author, nam- ed Lynæus. See Athenæus, the beginning of the 4th book.

(18) Plutarch. in Demetrio, pag. 901.

fayings and smart repartees [E]. And as the Athenians carried their adulations with regard to Demetrius to the most extravagant impieties, they built a temple to this courtezan under the name of VENUS LAMIA [F], though on some occasions they had been very angry to see that their money was designed for this woman [G]. The Thebans committed the same impiety (c). The story which we read in Athenæus concerning Demetrius and Lamia is such, that it is not proper to tell it in English [H]. I question whether Ælian has been accurate in the account he gives us of these two persons [I]. Plutarch relates Lamia's censure of a sentence given in a love-affair [K]. What I have observed against Anthony de Guevara with regard to Lais, I repeat it here with regard to Lamia. He has related as many falsities of the one as of the other. Brantome has been misled by him [L]. As Morcri's account of this Lamia contains but three lines,

(c) Polemo, apud Athen. lib. 6. pag. 253.

(19) See the remark [G].

(20) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 577.

(21) Idem, lib. 6. cap. 14. pag. 253.

(22) Έπ' άδω, apud inferos, amongst the shades below, instead of Έπ' αιρου, sua estate, of his time.

(23) Tacit. Annal. lib. 3. cap. 65.

(24) Plutarch. in Demetrius, pag. 901. A.

(25) We meet with this marginal note in Amie's French translation of Plutarch. As for the Lamia's, all the soap and all the water in the world would not be sufficient to clean and wash those, who gave so many talents extorted from the people, to make Lands and Lordships everlasting memorials of the lasciviousness of such prostitutes, the execrable plagues of public States, and the eternal infamy of those, who trifled their time away with them; such women are proper instruments to rob both the great and the meaner sort of their money.

tarch had mentioned just before, the large sums of money which Demetrius had forced the Athenians to give to Lamia (19); and he adds here, that this woman on her part, and over and above these sums, obliged several persons to give her money for the entertainment, which she was preparing for Demetrius.

[E] She excelled in witty sayings and smart repartees. This is what Athenæus observes. Ητι δι, says he (20), Λαμία σφόδρα εύδουλθη και άπικη προς τας άσωπιους. i. e. "Lamia was very witty in her sayings, and very smart in her replies."

[F] The Athenians . . . built a temple to this Courtezan under the name of VENUS LAMIA.] They courted another to Leæna, the same Demetrius's concubine (21), and they paid the same respect to that Prince's favorites; you may be sure that neither Altars, nor Libations, nor Hymns were wanting in these temples. Demetrius himself was so much surprized at it, that he publicly declared there was then not one Citizen at Athens, who had any courage. His reflexion has been wretchedly spoiled by the Translator of Athenæus. He makes Demetrius say, that there would not be one courageous Citizen of Athens amongst the shades below. Admirante ipso Demetrio quæ tum ferent, palamque dicente, apud inferos nullum unquam futurum magni excelsique animi civem Atheniensem. One letter being put instead of two others (22) has occasioned the prodigious alteration of that reflexion. Here follow the Greek words as they are in Athenæus.

Ότι και αυτον Δημητριον θαυμάζειν ιωι τοις γνομονοις, και λιγειν οπιδις ιω αυτω Αθηναιων γιγνοι μεγας και ανδρος την ψυχην. This reflexion of Demetrius calls to my mind an exclamation of Tiberius. Memoria proditur Tiberium, quotiens curia egrederetur, Græcis verbis in hunc modum eloqui solitum, ô homines ad servitutum paratos! scilicet etiam illum, qui libertatem publicam nollet, tam prope servientium patientiæ tædebat (23). i. e. "It is reported that whenever Tiberius came from the Senate-house, he used to cry "berius in the Greek tongue; how these men are ready for slavery!" Himing thereby, that he himself, "who would not suffer the nations to be free, was yet ashamed of the base patience of those slaves."

[G] Though . . . they had been angry to see that their money was designed for this woman.] Amongst the several oppressions, which the Athenians suffered from Demetrius, nothing vexed them more than the order he gave them to find him immediately two hundred and fifty talents. They raised that money with a great deal of severity and haste; and when it was ready, he commanded them to send it to Lamia, and to the other Courtezans, who waited upon her; it is for their Soap, said he. These words and that use of the money grieved the Athenians more than the loss of their money. Ιων υδροισμειον το αργυριον, εκλυουσ Λαμία και ταις περι αυτην εταραις εις σμυγμα δαδηναι. η γαρ αισχυνη, τής ζημιας, και το ρημα το πρόγμαλο μάλλον ηνάχλησι τος άνδρας. Ubi coactum argentum vidit, Lamia jussit id, cæterisque meretricibus quæ circa eam erant, ad smagma præberi. Pupugit enim cives pudor magis quam jaçura, Ές verba, quibus est usus, quam exαλιο (24). We should say now Paragnante or Pin-money, rather than make use of that expression, Money for their Soap. See the margin (25).

[H] The story which we read in Athenæus concerning Demetrius and Lamia is such, that it is not proper to tell it in English.] Judge of it by the following Latin passage. De Lamia rursum Macbon hæc scribit, Deme-trium aliquando inter pocula, varia genera unguentorum ostentantem Lamiaæ tibicinae, ut illa non ita jucundè olere dixit, non nihil commotum tanquam et vellicatum, quod improbens omnia petulantius illuderet, innuisse ut Nardinum quoddam afferretur; et cum pudendum manu confricuisset, ac digitis contrectasset, dixisse, hoc Lamia ofacito, quantum à reliquis distet, cognosces: illam verò subridentem respondisse, atqui, ô miser, omnium longè putidissimum hoc esse mihi videtur: regem mox subjecisse, è regia tamen glande per Jovem est, ô Lamia (26).

[I] . . . I question whether Ælian has been accurate in the account he gives us of these two persons.] Demetrius, says he (27), who reigned over so many nations, used to go often ready armed with his diadem on his head to the Courtezan Lamia. He would have disgraced himself very much had he sent for her; but he went very carefully to her house. I have a leis value for that Prince than for Theodore the player on the flute, who refused to hearken to Lamia's prayers, when she desired him to go and see her. Such is that Author's story; but I question the truth of it: For Demetrius did not see Lamia before she had been presented to him after the naval battle, in which he gained the victory over the King of Egypt. Lamia did no longer follow the trade of a common prostitute, she was a King's mistress. If it be urged, that even since she was Demetrius's mistress, she had a house to herself, and that therefore it was very possible that Demetrius was seen going to her house; I answer, that he did not go to her as to a common prostitute, but as to a mistress, whom he imagined he enjoyed alone, and to whom he had given means to be stately lodged. So that Ælian's censure falls to the ground; for when a Prince once indulges himself in the crime of a publick concubinage, it is the same thing whether he goes to his mistress's house, or sends for her. It is even a more scandalous thing to see her lodged in the royal palace, than to see her live in a house by herself. I am fully persuaded that Lamia lodged in Demetrius's palace, or at least, that Demetrius did not go to her as to a Courtezan any more of his visits. And yet this is what Ælian supposes, and on which he grounds the moral of his chapter.

[K] Lamia censured a sentence given in a love-affair.] The story is as follows: Thonis (28), an Egyptian Courtezan, had demanded a large sum of a young man, who was in love with her; whereupon the bargain was broke off; and the lover retired without doing any thing. He dreamt in the night that he enjoyed that woman, which cured him of his passion: Thonis hearing of this, pretended that the young man was obliged to pay her, and summoned him before the Judges. Bocchoris sentenced the defendant to put into a purse the sum he had been asked, and to move it to and fro, so as to make the shadow of it fall upon Thonis. The judge hinted thereby, that opinion is nothing but the shadow of truth, and that the enjoyment in a dream was but the shadow of a real enjoyment. Lamia, who was a competent judge in those matters, said one day, that that sentence was unjust, because the shadow of the purse did not cure the Courtezan of her longing to get that money, whereas that young man's dream had cured him of his love (29).

[L] Guevara has related as many falsities of Lamia, as of Lais. Brantome has been misled by him.] He relates some maxims (30), as though they had been spoke by Lamia, which yet are mere inventions of Guevara. If upon this subject, says he (31), we should ask advice of a woman, who was one of the

(26) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 577.

(27) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12. cap. 17.

(28) That was her Egyptian name. The Greeks called her Archedice, or Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12. cap. 63. and Kuhniius's Notes.

(29) Ex Plutarcho, in Demetrio, pag. 901.

(30) Memoires des Dames Galantes, tom. 2. towards the end.

(31) Epitres doctes, liv. 1. pag. m. 260, &c.

(d) Intituled, Histoire de Ptolemée Auletes, &c. See there the 7th chap. of the 2d Part, pag. 317, &c.

lines, I have not many errors of commission to charge him with [M]. I am surpris'd at a doubt of Monsieur Menage [N].

You will meet with a great elogy of this Lamia (d) in a work, which Monsieur Baudelot published in the year 1698.

the most celebrated Courtezans in her time, and who understood her trade perfectly well, I mean Lamia who used to say &c. One Francis Voilleret, Sieur de Florizel, Counsellor, Notary and Secretary to the King's Household and Crown of France, relates (32) as matter of fact, all the false stories, which he had read in that Spanish author, concerning the three Courtezans Flora, Lais, and Lamia. So true is it, that one bad author is sufficient to mislead several others.

(32) In a book printed at London in James I's reign, intituled, Le Preau des Fleurs mesléées. See there the 8th chap. of the 2d book, pag. 244, &c.

(33) Lloyd suppressed the quotation of Plutarch. Hofman has done the same.

(34) Menage in Diog. Laert. lib. 5. num. 76. pag. 221.

[M] As Moreri's account of this Lamia contains but three lines, I have not many errors . . . to charge him with. I. This expression, The Thebans consecrated the Temple of Venus Lamia to her, is equivocal, it may make us think, that the Thebans had already a Temple of Venus Lamia, which they consecrated to Demetrius's mistress. To prevent all equivocations, Moreri ought to have said, that the Thebans built a Temple to this mistress, and called it the Temple of Venus Lamia. II, It is not true that Plutarch mentions this; Athenæus should have been quoted for it. Moreri borrowed that false quotation from Charles Stephens (33).

[N] I am surpris'd at a doubt of Monsieur Menage. He questions whether the Courtezan Lamia was the same Athenian Lady, whom Demetrius Phalereus kept. An eadem est ac illa nobilis fœmina quam amabat Phalereus (34). When he styles her noble, he grounds that expression on these words of Diogenes Laertius: Ἀλλὰ ἀγῆ καὶ ἐργαῖοι σπουδαῖοι Λαμία τῇ ἐρωμένῃ. i. e. "He enjoyed a noble Athenian woman, called Lamia, whom he loved." If you distinguish the sentence thus, you must deny without the least hesitation, that Lamia Demetrius Poliorcetes's mistress was beloved by Demetrius Phalereus; for Demetrius Poliorcetes's mistress was only a player on the flute, and was not, consequently, of a noble family. Monsieur Menage was in the right to censure Dalechamp, who translated the following words of Athenæus, Δημήτριος δ' ὁ Πολιορκητὴς ἢ δημοσίως ἢ ἐκαμίας τῆς αὐτοῦ (35), thus, Demetrius Phalereus Lamiam tibicinem amavit perditissime; i. e. "Demetrius Phalereus did passionately love Lamia who played on the flute." But he should also have censured Aldobrandinus, who asserted that the Thebans, out of complaisance for Demetrius Phalereus, built the Temple of Venus Lamia, with a design to honour the memory of his mistress Lamia (35). Aldobrandinus quotes here Cælius Rhodiginus, Lib. 26. Cap. 5. There are three critical observations to be made here. 1. The Thebans built that Temple, out of complaisance not for Demetrius Phalereus, but for Demetrius Poliorcetes. 2. Athenæus ought to have been quoted, and not Cælius Rhodiginus. 3. It should have been observed that the Athenians had the same complaisance, which the Thebans had.

(35) Thebani autem Demetrio blandientes, Venus Lamia templum excitavisse, ut Lamia ab eo amata memoriam colerent, scribit Cælius Rhodiginus lib. 29. cap. 5. Aldobrandinus in Diog. Laert. lib. 5. num. 76. He must mean here Demetrius Phalereus, whom he had mentioned just before.

LAMPONIANO (JOHN ANDREW) descended from an illustrious family in the Milanese (a), was one of the three servants of Galeazzo Sforza, Duke of Milan, who conspired against that Prince, and killed him in St. Stephen's Church December the 26th 1476. Lamponiano gave him the two first strokes. He came as though he intended to disperse the crowd which surrounded that Prince, and pretended he had some letters to give him. He was exasperated against him on account of a law-suit [A], in which he had not been able to prevail upon that Prince to favour him against his party, and he expected to find his account in a revolution in the State; he wanted to retrieve his affairs, having spent the greatest part of his estate, and he was still as proud and as much given to luxury as he had been before. His two accomplices were Charles Visconti, and Jerom Olgiati. The latter was persuaded to enter into that wicked conspiracy by the instigation of a school-master, an enemy of the Duke, who represented to him that he would gain a great reputation by murdering a tyrant [B]. As for Charles Visconti

(a) Erenatus, Exemptior. lib. 3. cap. 2. sub fin. folio m. 95 verso.

[A] He was exasperated against the Duke of Milan, on account of a law-suit. Here follows an account of the whole matter according to Paul Jovius. Ad audendum immane usque adeo & periculosum facinus vehementer incitabat illata sibi injuria à Castellione Comensum antistite, à quo sacri latifundii possessione contra jus interrupta locazione, se periniquè spoliatum querebatur. Totum autem ejus injuriæ odii que venenum vertebat in principem, qui à se suppliciter deprecante eam contumeliam, sæpe rogatus adversarium in extrahenda lite præpotentem, neque advertere, neque mollire voluisset (1). i. e. "He was prompted to that cruel and dangerous attempt by the injury he had received from Castellioneus Bishop of Como, by whom he complained he had been very unjustly deprived of a piece of Church-land, which Castellioneus refused, against law, to let to him. He turned all the bitterness of his resentment for that injury against the Prince, whom he had often humbly but in vain requested to do him justice against his party, or at least to move his party to compassion, who being very powerful prolonged the process." This calls to my mind Philip King of Macedon, who was killed by a man (2), who could not prevail upon him to punish another by whom he had been very outrageously abused. Pausaniam Attalus mero onustum nefariis conviviæ ludibrii exposuerat. i. e. "Pausanias being in liquor had been exposed by Attalus to the base outrages of the company (3)." He did no longer think of revenging himself of the person who abused him, but of the Prince who refused to

(1) Paulus Jovius, in Elogio Galeacci Sfortiæ, lib. 3. Elog. pag. m. 244.

(2) Named Pausanias.

(3) Freinshemius, Supplem. in Quint. Curt. lib. 1. cap. 9.

him justice. Adolescens . . . odium ab auctore injuriæ in negligentem ejus vindicem convertit (4). [B] Olgiati . . . was persuaded . . . by a schoolmaster, an enemy of the Duke, who represented to him that he would gain a great reputation by murdering a Tyrant. His name was Cola Montanus; he had been tutor to Galeazzo Sforza, who remembering more than it was proper the lashes he had received from his tutor, caused him one day to be publicly whipped upon his bare buttocks. Hic Cola quondam Galeacci pædagogus dirum in principem odium conceperat impotenti ejus contumelia percitus, quod ille pueritium verberum nimis memor, postquam adolevit, imperiumque suscepit, ipsi Colæ tanquam immiti subagrestique præceptoris, acceptas olim plagas nudatis clunibus loro palam rependi jussisset (5). Cola being extremely exasperated at this injury, animated young Olgiati with a strong desire of Glory, of such a Glory, I mean, as should accrue to him, if he restored his country to its ancient liberty by the murder of a tyrant. He exalted to the sky the merit of Brutus and Cassius: In a word, it was he, who by his violent exhortations encouraged him to undertake and perform that attempt (6), as Olgiatus confessed on the rack. Olgiatum penè imberbem, levissimumque adolescentem inani spe parandæ gloriæ inflaverat Cola Montanus litterarii luderi magister, si occiso tyranno patriam in libertatem asfereret; sæpe Cassios & Brutos in scabola magnis extollens laudibus, qui gloria ducti pulcherrimi facti consilium olim suscepissent (7). So true is it, that wicked advice may be attended with very bad consequences, and that Princes ought to take care not to exasperate

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Jovius, Elog. Gal. Sfort. Elog. lib. 3. pag. 245.

(6) Hujus Cole diris exhortationibus conjurationem imbecillam ad exitumque perducendam fuisse, Olgiatus ipse ex quaestione perscripsit. laem, ibid.

(7) Idem, ibid. pag. 244.

(b) Lamponianus
insultantis plebis & puerorum tur-bae ad ludibrium concessus, injectis per cunctas
urbis regiones rapatus est. Jovius, in Elogio
Galeacii Sfortiae.

Visconti he had two powerful motives to engage in that conspiracy [C]. Lamponiano was killed by a Moor whilst he endeavoured to make his escape through a crowd of women. His corps biting the ground [D] was delivered to the populace (b), who abused it for some time (c). Peter Crinitus wrote verses to the honour of this assassin [E]. It is reported that this Duke of Milan was adorned with eminent qualities (d), and governed his dominions like a good Prince, without any considerable blemish but excessive lewdness, in which he could so much the easier indulge himself, as the Ladies of his court took a pride in their amorous intrigues [F].

(c) Taken from Paul Jovius in Elogio Galeacii
Sfortiae.

(d) Jovius, ibid.

LANCELOT

rate even mean and inconsiderable persons. There are few enemies but can do a great deal of mischief. Cola being taken some time after fell into Laurence de Medicis's hands, who caused him to be hanged (8). The courage, with which he filled Olgiati's breast, by the hopes of an everlasting fame, was not daunted at the sight of the capital punishment to which he was condemned. Olgiati and his companion had time to make their escape, by means of the great disorder and confusion, which the Duke's murder had occasioned in the Church. But as no person dared to shelter them, they were taken two days after, and condemned to suffer the punishment which their crime deserved. Here follows an account of Olgiati's constancy. Olgiatus ipse mirum visa audituque vesana constantia obstinatum animum in conspectu carnificis gerens, seseque in ipsa morte confirmans haec contumaci ore protulit verba; Collige te, Hieronyme, stabit vetus memoria facti; mors quidem erit acerba, sed tormentum brevis, atque ejus fama perpetua (9).

(8) Idem, ibid.
Pag. 247.

(9) Idem, pag.
246.

i. e. "Olgiati himself, (it was wonderful to behold " and to hear it,) having an undaunted courage, " and steady mind at the very sight of the execu- " tioner, and comforting himself on the point of " death, spoke there with a haughty countenance; " Take heart, Jerome, the memory of thy action " will never perish: death indeed is bitter, but the " pain of it will be but short, and the glory ever- " lasting."

The reader will not perhaps be displeas'd to meet here with some verses, which he wrote in prison. They are a proof of his boldness, and an abuse of the Prince he had murdered.

*Quem non mille acies, quem non potuere phalanges Sterneret, privata Galeaz dux Sfortia dextra
Concidit, atque illum minime juvere cadentem
Assantes famuli, nec opes, nec regna, nec urbes.
Hinc patet humanis quae sit fiducia rebus,
Et patet hinc saevo tutum nil esse tyranno* (10).

(10) Idem, pag.
247.

i. e. "Galeazzo Sforza, whom the most numerous ar- " mies could not conquer, fell by my own hand. " Nor could the servants who surrounded him, nor " his riches, nor his estates, nor his Cities save him. " Hence it appears, how little the affairs of this " world are to be depended upon; hence it appears, " that nothing can secure the life of a cruel tyrant."

[C] . . . As for Charles Visconti, he had two power- ful motives to engage in that conspiracy.] In the first place he was exasperated against the Sforza's for usurping the sovereign power to the prejudice of his own family. II. He had a sister, whom Galeazzo had debauched, and whom he afterwards yielded to the lust of a beautiful young man, who was his Gany- mede. Germanæ sororis probro quam Galeacius ad- amaret, atque subigeret, permoveretur: tanto indignantius quod eam decore adolescenti, qui ætatis florem principis fruendam dedisset, conciliaffe & communicasse suspicaretur (11). This Prince was reckoned to be so lascivious that men talked not only of his amorous intrigues, but even of his pimping. Principem enim in amore improbum atque adeo impudentem plerique vel falso existimabant, ut alienæ libidini lenocinii obsequium lubens præbere crederetur. i. e. "Most people, though " perhaps unjustly, thought this Prince so wicked in " his amours, and so impudent, that it was imagi- " ned, he was even willing to pimp for other peo- " ple (12)." We have here an instance of the wo- man's compliance. Francis Visconti's sister did not only favour this Duke of Milan with the use of her body, but was even ready to gratify the passions of his catamite, whenever he pleaded. I suppose it was not with a great reluctance that she gave him this proof of her complaisance, since it was in favour of a beautiful young man.

(11) Idem, ibid.
Pag. 244.

(12) Idem, ibid.
Pag. 246.

[D] His Corps biting the ground.] I may use this phrase in a literal sense, since Paul Jovius expressed himself thus: Ipsius Lamponiani cadaver solum lingua & dentibus commordens jacebat (13). i. e. "Lampo- " niano's corps lay on the ground licking the dust " and biting the sand with his teeth."

[E] Peter Crinitus wrote verses to the honour of this Assassin.] You will meet with them in the second book of his poems (14); they are intitled, de virtute Joannis Andreae Lamponiani Tyrannicidæ. i. e. "On the courage of John Andrew Lamponiano " the tyrant-killer." Here follow the six first lines of that Poem.

(13) Idem, ibid.
Pag. 146.

(14) P. m. 833.

*Parabat olim sacra Bruti manibus Antiqua virtus Italum.
Ac forte lætam dum rependit hostiam
Marti dicatam vindici,
Frontem retorfit illico ad acres Infubres Mirata sortem dexteram.*

i. e. "The brave Italians of old prepared a sacri- " fice to the shade of Brutus, and being ready to " strike the chosen victim consecrated to the aveng- " ing Mars, they cast on a sudden an eye forwards " on the stout Infubrians, and admire the bold stroke."

We ought not to wonder at Peter Crinitus's com- mending this murderer. For amongst the sacred poems of Levinus Torrentius Bishop of Antwerp there is an hymn (15) in praise of Baltazar Gerard (16), in which amongst other elegies is the following enco- mium.

(15) Hymnus in laudem Baltasaris Gerardi fir- tissimi tyranni- cidæ.

*Morte inferendus calicolum choris
Æterno ab omni labe puram Reddis ovans animam parenti.*

(16) He mur- dered the Prince of Orange in the year 1584.

i. e. "As death must introduce you into the af- " sembly of the saints in heaven, you return with " joy your untainted soul to your eternal Father."

[F] The Ladies of his Court took a pride in their amorous intrigues.] The description which Paul Jovius left us of the corrupt morals of the women of that country is shocking. They imagined that chastity was inconsis- tent with good manners; they thought that to prac- tise that virtue was not to know the world, it was, ac- cording to them, to behave like country girls. In a word, they did not think, that to lie with a Prince was doing any thing inconsistent with modesty; they pre- tended that the best method to raise the condition of their husbands above that of other men, was to make them wear golden horns. Galeazzo, who was an hand- some, young and vigorous man, found his ac- count in this. Paul Jovius's words are infinitely more expressive than mine, I shall therefore trans- scribe them in this place: His artibus quum boni splendidissimique principis nomen tueretur, premebant ejus famam intemperantes vagæque libidines. Nam ea tum erat ex multo otio luxuriantis seculi conditio, in ipsis præcipue nobilioris matronis, ut totum pudicitiae decus ab humanitate aulae alienum proorsus & subagreste putaretur, ideoque princeps ad licentiam libidinis proclinatus, & juvenis vigore venustateque oris supra omnes spectatu dignissimus, procacibus foeminarum oculis & desiderii cupidissime deserviret. Erat enim tum vulgatum inter foeminas, nullam ex principis concubitu fieri impudicam, earumque maritos qui ineptis birici videri possent, ita excellere aureis cornibus, ut dignitate cunctos anticerent (17). This is a corruption of manners carried to the utmost excess. for if any thing can prevent chastity from being quite banished, it is that the opposite vice carries with it a notion of shame and disgrace with regard to the women (18). This is the chief bar which God's Pro- vidence made use of to stop a little the progress of lasciviousness, and prevent its overflowing all mankind after the manner of the flood, which spared but very few persons.

(17) Jovius in Elog. Galeacii
Sfortiae, pag. 243.

(18) Compare this with what is observed above in the remark [C] of the article JONAS (Ara- grinus).

(a) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Hist. & de Littérat. pag. 123.

(b) Ibid.

LANCELOT (CLAUDIUS) a Benedictine Monk was born at Paris (a). Having (b) studied very well in his youth he was entrusted with the education of a child of Quality, and retired afterwards into the Abbey of Port-Royal in the Fields, where he taught polite learning with very good success. Some years after he entered Monk in the Abbey of St. Cyran, being very intimate then with the late Abbot de Barcos; at whose death this Society was suppressed, and the Monks dispersed, and Don Claudius Lancelot was sent into banishment in Lower-Britany, where he died two or three years ago (c). He wrote several good books [A]; but he did not put his name to them, and they were ascribed to the Gentlemen of Port-Royal in general.

(c) I imagine that this signifies in the year 1694, or thereabout.

(1) I have quoted it above in the remark [A] of the article AUSTRIA (Don Juan et).

(2) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Hist. & de Littérat. pag. 126.

[A] He wrote several good books.] The Nouvelle Méthode pour apprendre la Langue Latine, & la Langue Grecque. i. e. "The New Method to learn the Latin and Greek tongues." Le Jardin des Racines Grecques. i. e. "The Garden of Greek Roots," (in French verse, with explanatory notes). An Italian Grammar, a Spanish Grammar (both in French). A French Translation of Phœdrus's Fables, and another of some of Terence's Comedies. A Treatise on the Hemina (1) (a); the second edition of this treatise, which was published in the year 1688, is much more compleat than the first. In a word all the pieces and observations which are to be met with at the end of the Bible printed at Vitré to serve as an introduction towards understanding the Holy Scripture (2) were written by our Lancelot. The author from whom I have extracted this asserts that the Grammaire Generale & Raisonnée i. e. "The General and Rational Grammar" was invented by Monsieur Arnaud, and composed by Don Claudius Lancelot.

(3) Ibid. pag. 125.

* (x) A Treatise on the Hemina. The Hemina was an ancient measure, which contained three quarters of a pint, or about eight ounces of liquor. St. Benedict allowed the Monks of his Order but an Hemina of wine a day, and fifteen ounces of bread, as F. Mabilon has shewed in a particular treatise upon this subject. Let us observe here, that Monsieur Furetiere (*) erroneously ascribes the treatise of the Hemina mentioned by Monsieur Bayle, to Monsieur Arnaud, whereas it was written by Don Claudius Lancelot. ADD. REM.]

(*) In his French Dictionary under the word Hemina.

(a) It is the 13th of the 6th book of Bembus's Letters.

LANDA (CATHERINE) ought to have a place amongst the learned women. She was but very young when she wrote a letter in Latin to Peter Bembus in the year 1526, which is printed amongst those of that writer (a), with the answer he made to it. Hilarion de Coste (b), who erroneously calls her LANDA, observes that she was of Placenza, and that she was very beautiful, and the sister of Count Augustine Landa, and the wife of John Fermo Trivulcio.

(b) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illust. tom. 2. pag. 728.

(a) Mercuré Hist. for October 1702 pag. 388. See also Lewis du May, Etat de l'Empire, Dial. 8. pag. m. 536. and Munster, Co'm. pag. 471.

LANDAU, a City of Lower-Alsace near the river Queich on the borders of the Palatinate, at an equal distance from Spires and from the Rhine, was mortgaged for a very small sum to the Bishop of Spires by the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria in the year 1308, but in the year 1511 Maximilian the first redeemed it, and restored it to all its ancient liberties (a). It is one of the ten Cities, which make up what is called the Provostship or Prefecture of Hagenau, and which pretended to hold immediately of the Empire [A], except

(1) Heifs, Hist. de l'Empire. Part. 2. pag. 452. of the edition printed at the Hague in the year 1685.

[A] It is one of the ten cities . . . which pretended to hold immediately of the Empire.] Monsieur Heifs will explain this to us. Hagenau, says he (1), "is the first of the cities of Alsace dependent on the Prefecture, of which the Court of Judicature was settled in the same city. After the peace of Munster, the French King, after the example of his predecessors the Landgraves of Alsace, continued to keep that Provincial Council there, at which his Grand Bailif or Lieutenant presided. But as that city has been entirely ruined in the last war, the Most Christian King removed that Council to Brisac. That city, as well as the other nine, acknowledged at that time the King for their Protector, on the same terms upon which they had acknowledged the Emperor and Princes of Austria as such, without renouncing their right of holding immediately of the Empire. But as they have been convinced of the French King's right to a sovereignty over them, they have given up that pretension of holding immediately of the Empire, and have submitted entirely to his Most Christian Majesty. The other nine cities are Colmar, Schlestadt, Weiffembourg, Landau, Oberkheim, Kaiserberg, Munster in the valley of St. Gregory, Rosheim, and Turcheim." These cities had not yet submitted to the yoke in the year 1673; far from it; do but read the following words of the Duke of Navailles. As I designed to go to Brisac, I took Colmar in my way. I found that the Inhabitants there, though in the neighbourhood of so strong a city as Brisac, affected a great independency. Their city was stored with all sorts of ammunition and provisions, and they seemed to be very little inclined to receive and obey the King's commands. They took not the least care to shew me that respect which they ought to have for persons to whom the King commits his authority. There were besides in that country Schlestadt, Hagenau, and four other small Imperial towns: they were all very much united together, and had at all times their Deputies at the Diet of the Empire, and were continually endeavouring to take such liberties as were contrary to the allegiance they owed the King. When I was arrived at Brisac, these seven cities, which pretended to be Imperial, sent Deputies to me. Those of Colmar were at the head of the Deputation, and spoke for the rest. They harangued me after the same manner as they had done my predecessors. It seemed to me that they used some expressions, which did not sufficiently shew the submission they owed the King, styling him only their Protector: I answered them, that he had a more considerable title with regard to them, that he was their guardian, and that it was his right to rule and govern them. I spoke so stoutly to them, that the Intendant, who was present, told me before their faces, Sir, if your predecessors had taught them their duty as you do, the King would have had more power in this country, and these Gentlemen would not spend so much money in keeping Deputies at the Diet. These Deputies were very much amazed, and fell on their knees before me. I thought it was proper to mortify them a little, and therefore I sent the next day five hundred horse to take away some cattle at the very gates of their cities. This opened their eyes, and shewed them how much they were mistaken in pretending to be independent of France. They came a second time to speak to me, but I would not give them audience, and sent them word that I was obliged to go to Philipsburg (2). He told the King soon after, that there was a favourable opportunity to bring Colmar, and the other cities that pretended to be Imperial, to that condition, in which they ought to be (3). The King soon followed that advice; for he went into Alsace, and secured Colmar and Schlestadt (4). The other cities surrendered also to him on a bare summons, upon this pretence, that the King as Grand Bailiff of Hagenau had a right to those

(2) Mémoires du Duc de Navailles, pag. 268, &c. under the year 1673. The Amsterdam edition, printed in the year 1701.

(3) Ibid. pag. 273.

(4) Mercuré Hollandois, for the year 1673, pag. 479.

(b) Du Val, Descrip. de l'Allemagne, pag. 159.

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) Du Val, Acquisitions de la France, pag. 38.

(e) Memoires de Puysegur, pag. 113, 122. of the Dutch edition, under the year 1635, erroneously printed, for it should be 1634.

except in civil and criminal matters, which are brought before the Provost of Hagenau (b). They were yielded to France by the treaty of peace concluded at Munster, with this condition, that they should belong to the French King after the same manner as they had belonged to the Emperor; but this restriction wore insensibly out of date (c). It has been observed by some writer, that the Citizens of Landaw had not been cavillers, and that they kept their City in a flourishing condition, at a time when the others were plundered (d). This signifies, I think, that during the long war, which ended by the peace of Munster, and at other times like that, they were not obstinately resolved unseasonably to resist the strongest party. They gave an instance of this submissive temper in the year 1634, as may be seen in Puysegur's Memoirs (e). Another writer (f) observes, that they have not been subject to domestic broils, and that they endeavoured constantly not to exasperate the neighbouring Princes in words or deeds, and that in the year 1552 the troops of Henry II King of France, and those of Albert of Brandenburg did them a great deal of damage. The Sieur du Val asserts that the wine of Landaw is the best Rhenish wine that can be drunk (g). This city was but indifferently strong at the time of the peace of Ryfwick in the year 1697, but it has been fortified since with all the care imaginable: the famous Monsieur du Vauban exerted all his skill in it. The Imperialists, under the command of Prince Lewis of Baden blockaded it in April 1702, and opened the trenches the 17th of June following. The city was surrendered to them by a capitulation September the 10th. The King of the Romans arrived at the camp July the 17th [B]. What the News-writers published concerning this siege will give us an opportunity

(f) Munst. Cof-mogr. pag. 472.

(g) Du Val, Acquisitions de la France, pag. 38.

(5) Ibid.

those cities, and had secured them to prevent the Imperialists from taking an advantage of two such considerable places as these two cities were (5).

I remember that men reasoned very much on the surrendering these cities, and that some persons maintained, it was a folly to pretend that they could preserve their liberties. It was not impossible for them, added they, to be at once in the form of a commonwealth, and under the guardianship of the Landgrave of Alsace as long as this Landgrave was a German. But as soon as a King of France became Landgrave of Alsace, these cities must of necessity fall sooner or later under his absolute sovereignty. This was agreeable to the constant order of political affairs, and the natural course of human things. There was a kind of inconsistency between the nature of a free city, and a city which acknowledged for its Protector or Guardian, a King, who might be at war with the Emperor and with the Empire. Have clients a right to declare against their patrons? If they cannot do it lawfully, the Prefecture of Hagenau must side with France in such wars. Or if it could not do it justly, being a member of the Empire, it must either declare against France, or ask to stand neuter. In the former case the King of France had as much right to conquer Colmar, and the other Imperial cities of Alsace, as he had to take the four forest-towns. In the latter case, it was to be examined, whether the cities of the Prefecture of Hagenau did really desire to stand neuter, or whether they only pretended it with a design to secure themselves till such time as they could surrender to the Emperor's troops. If they demanded a neutrality with such a view only, they were to expect to be treated as a secret enemy, to whom it is not prudent to give time to shew his ill designs. But in case they had sincerely desired to stand neuter, it was still to be examined whether they could defend themselves against the German troops, that would have forced them to admit garrisons. It is plain that they were not strong enough to maintain themselves in a state of neutrality. It was therefore but proper that France should not suffer the Germans to have arsenals and store-houses there, especially considering that the Spaniards were masters of the French-Comté. The Protector and Guardian was under a necessity to prosecute his right, that his pupils might not declare against him. If as a Protector and Guardian he was under an obligation to defend those cities of Alsace against any enemy, who might do them some injury, he had also a right to prevent them from taking up arms against him. How absurd would it be, if a Monarch was obliged to protect a State, which should think it his duty to declare war against him? This is inconsistent with reciprocal obligations; and consequently they who gave up the Imperial cities of Alsace to the protection of France, did thereby unavoidably give room to absolute dominion. It began even then to be spread abroad that it is impossible a city should continue to be Imperial and be at the same time under the protection of France; and if the Emperor had made arsenals and store-houses of Colmar and Schlestadt, to make afterwards an inroad from thence into France as far as Dijon and Lyons, the French had not been commended for suffering those cities to enjoy their privileges; but they would have been ridiculed for their imprudence and simplicity.

Men argued almost after the same manner, when the French seized upon Straßburg, a city which never would or could stand neuter, and which had yielded its bridge to the German armies toties quoties whenever it was demanded. This nettled the French too much to suffer it long. Either Straßburg must have sincerely desired a neutrality, and kept it faithfully, or that city must have been in a condition to resist those that should attempt to force it to take part with them. Now neither of these two things was true, said these reasoners. I believe that they who teach the law of nations in the Universities, could have refuted them very easily.

[B] The King of the Romans arrived at the camp July the 27th. The News-writers of his Party have asserted, that Count de Melac Governor of Landaw sent him the same Day a trumpeter, to pay his respects to him, and to desire him to let him know, where he would fix his Quarters, that the Garrison might not shoot that way. But the undaunted Monarch having given him thanks for his civility, sent him word at the same time, that he might order the garrison to shoot which way he pleased; for that his quarters were every where (6). An officer of the garrison relates this piece of news thus (7). "Monsieur de Melac sent a trumpeter July the 31st, at eight a clock in the morning to the Enemy's camp . . . to ask the Prince of Baden where the King's quarters were. The prince gave the King of the Romans notice of it, who answered, 'That his quarters were at Inphling, that he thanked him for the sword which he sent back to him (8), and that he might shoot every where, serving his King as he had done till then.'" It is certain that Monsieur de Melac did only what has been long since practised with regard to Monarchs, who are present at a Siege. The beleagued Governor pays them that compliment. As for the King of the Romans's answer, we have two observations to make here; the one is, that the accounts of the two parties do not differ in the main; the second, that such an answer being always noble, it is so chiefly the first time it is made. For when a King knows that another made it, he thinks himself in honour bound to imitate him, and even to go beyond him, if it be possible. It is no longer a matter of choice, but a kind of necessity. I have heard some persons say, that the late King William III. made that answer, when

(6) Mercur Hist. for August 1702, p. 159.

(7) Journal du Siege de Landaw, pag. 112, 113. of the Paris edition, 1702.

(8) It was that of an officer who had been taken prisoner in a Sally of the besiegers. Ibid. pag. 113.

portunity to offer some remarks [C], without hoping however that they will be any ways serviceable to them, nor proper to cure that deceitful credulity, which they know so well how to inspire their readers with. They could not fail to reflect on the long time which this when the Governor of a place besieged sent him the same compliment: but I know perfectly well that he never besieged any place, of which the Governor owned his Title of King: and after all, he would not be the first Author of that answer; for not to mention those, who may have used it before the year 1667, there is a proof in print that it was made that year at the siege of Lisle in Flanders. Read the following passage. As soon as Count de Brouay Governor of the place had notice that his Majesty (9) was arrived at the camp, he judged that there was no longer room to think the siege was only a feint, and made the Citizens of Lisle take the oath of Allegiance, and about ten thousand of them swore that they would all perish sooner than surrender. He sent afterwards a compliment to his Majesty, desiring him to choose any of the most beautiful boues at a league's distance from Lisle, and offering him all that he might have occasion for from the City during the siege; he also asked him where he would fix his quarters, that he might give orders not to fire that way. But he added, that he desired his Majesty not to take it amiss, if he defended the place with the utmost vigour, for the service of his master the Catholick King. His Majesty having given Count de Brouay thanks for his compliment, sent him no other answer, but that his quarters were throughout his whole camp, and that the more the Governor's defence was stout and obstinate to prevent this conquest, the more glorious would the success of it be to his Majesty (10).

(9) That is to say Lewis XIV.

(10) Dalincourt, la Campagne Royales années 1667 and 1668, pag. 78, 79. of the Paris edition, 1668.

(11) Journal du Siege de Landau, pag. 296.

(12) Compare this with what has been observed in the remark [P] of the article AGRIPPA (Henry Cornelius) num. 1.

(13) Journal du Siege de Landau, pag. 295, 296.

(14) Mercur Galant, for September 1702, pag. 338.

(15) Ibid. pag. 340.

The King of the Romans gained a great reputation during this long siege; this first campaign was very glorious to him. Monsieur de Melac, who saw him the eleventh of September, was very much honoured and commended by him (11). He supped the same day with Prince Lewis of Baden, who loaded him with kindness, and told him that it was imagined in the Imperial Army, that he corresponded with Spirits (12); to which Monsieur de Melac replied, that "the Prince corresponded with them as much as he, but that that correspondence was better than his, since the Spirits had served the Prince better than they served him (13)."

[C] What the News-writers published concerning this siege, will give us an opportunity to offer some remarks.

Those of France asserted continually, that it did not in the least go forward, that the garrison repulsed all the assaults, and killed a numberless multitude of Germans. The News-writers on the other side asserted on the contrary, that the besiegers carried without much difficulty every thing they attacked, that the Imperialists lost very few men, that the mines of the besieged were always countermined; or if they were not, the enemy set fire to them so untimely, that they caused no damage at all. The Author of the Mercur Galant argued very much about the consequences, with which the conquest of that place might be attended. He pretended that it cost the Emperor at least five or six millions (14), and that the number of soldiers who perished before Landau amounted at least to fifteen thousand men (15). I believe, adds he, that if I were to calculate the loss, which the Germans themselves confess in the Journals they are used to publish, I should find it amount to a much greater number, though these Journals do not contain a faithful account. I do not know what Journals of the Germans he means, but I can hardly believe that he ever saw any others, but those which they sent to the News-writers in Holland, and which are printed in the Lettres Historiques and in the Mercur Politique of the Hague. Now it does not appear from these Journals that the Germans had above 800 men killed from the beginning of the siege till the beginning of September. We have not seen in those books a particular account of what happened the following Days; but we may judge that it could not mention but about forty men killed. The number of the wounded is incomparably greater, according to the same Journals; and yet since the Capitulation it has been asserted in some Dutch news-papers, that the number of the wounded was but double the number of those who were killed. The latter amounted to seven hundred or a few more, and the former (most of whom were recovered) to fourteen hundred or a few more. It is not an easy matter to reconcile this with what had been asserted in the same news-papers, that for want of Infantry the Germans had been obliged to make use of the Dragoons, and that as most of them, who were wounded, died, they were persuaded that the besieged made use of a particular kind of bullets; but the question is not here, how the News-writers may be made consistent with themselves; the thing would be almost as difficult as to reconcile together the News-writers of two different parties. The question is only, whether or not the great loss mentioned by Monsieur de Vitzé be acknowledged in the Journals published by the besiegers. Let us observe by the by, that a prisoner, taken by the garrison of Landau July the 31st, asserted that the Germans had lost very near two thousand five hundred men, and that it was a general opinion amongst them, that the bullets of the besieged were all poisoned because none of those who had been wounded, recovered (16). The other news which he told are so false, that one ought to give but little credit to his testimony with regard to the loss of the Germans.

Monsieur le Noble asserts, that they lost at this siege 4 Princes, 286 officers, and twelve thousand Soldiers, or thereabout (17). I believe that with regard to the four Princes, he has been misled by the following passage. "The young Prince of Bareith died the first of this month, of the wound he received before Landau at the attack which was made in the night between the 16th and 17th of August. This is the fourth Prince, whom the war has carried off in a very little time; and I am to acquaint you with the death of them all in this single month (18)." If Monsieur le Noble had been a little more attentive, he would easily have known that the four Princes, mentioned here, are the Duke of Holstein, the Prince of Commerci, the Count of Soissons, and the Prince of Bareith. But the first of them lost his life in Poland, and the second in Italy; and the fourth recovered of his wounds, as Mon. le Noble might have learnt from the retraction of the very Author, whom I suppose he had misunderstood (19). Judge whether a writer, who commits such a gross blunder with regard to the number of Princes killed at a siege, deserves to be credited in what he asserts concerning the number of the officers and soldiers who perished at that siege.

One cannot sufficiently wonder at the ignorance which the Authors of the Paris Gazette and of the Mercur Galant betrayed with regard to the condition of the siege (20). They who credited their accounts would have sworn that the affairs of the besiegers were not more forward in the beginning of September, than they had been in the beginning of July, and that they were even in a worse condition by that terrible slaughter, which the besieged had made the 25th, 26th and 27th of August, by repelling the assaults of the Germans. These three assaults are chimerical. We meet with the following words in a Mercur Galant dated August the 14th (21). It is very strange, that after a siege that has already lasted two months and an half, a large army should not yet have taken any of the outworks of Landau. This Author might still have spoke thus a month after, if he had argued from his own accounts, and of those of the Paris Gazette, in which no progress of the besieged had been taken notice of since the 14th of August mentioned above. But what is more surprizing still, is, that the Author of the Paris Gazette continued to talk after the same rate the 16th of September, on which day it was known at Paris that Landau had surrendered; so that this Writer prepared his reader infinitely more for hearing that the siege was raised, than for the news of the place having capitulated. It may be asked hereupon, did these publick News-writers know how things went before Landau, or did they not know it? If they imagined things were as they published them, their ignorance was very gross and inexcusable; for in the very beginning of September there were private persons in the remote provinces, who

(16) Journal du Siege de Landau, published by the author of the Mercur Galant, pag. 121, 122.

(17) Le Noble, Entretiens Politiques, for Nov. 1702, pag. 17.

(18) Lettres Hist. for Sept. 1702, pag. 364.

(19) See the Lettres Hist. for October 1702, pag. 431.

(20) Observe that I only give an account of the reflections which I heard several persons make, and that I do not pretend to answer for nor to vindicate their uncivil expressions.

(21) Mercur Galant for July 1702, pag. 575. Observe that Landau was not surrounded with troops but about the 15th of June.

this siege lasted [D]. The 4th article of the capitulation was thought to be very extraordinary, who knew very well that Landaw could not hold out at most till the tenth of the same month. There were Letters from them in Holland, in which this piece of news was positively told. Would it not be a shame for a publick News-writer to be more unacquainted with the condition of a siege than a mere merchant in a remote province? Would it not be a kind of disgrace for them to know nothing but from the accounts of deserters, men who endeavour only to make themselves acceptable by telling pleasing falsties, that they may be well received? If these News-writers were acquainted with all that passed at Landaw, their dishonesty is prodigious and absolutely inexcusable. Why did they thus misrepresent things? Were they afraid lest a true account might raise a rebellion? This fear, which might perhaps be well grounded in other countries, would be ridiculous in that in which they wrote. One does not know therefore how to account for the perplexity in which these writers intangle themselves, by the necessity they are under to find out some method to unravel the whole mystery, when at last they must come to tell the unexpected news of a capitulation. They had been loaded with such heavy censures (22) on account of the taking of Namur in the year 1695, that it is a wonder this did not render them more cautious. I imagine that the siege of important places will always be a dangerous stumbling block in the News-writers ways (23): I wish they would consider seriously that the taking of a Town is not liable to historical Pyrrhonism, as the gaining of a battle is (24); and that it is therefore much better to prepare the readers by degrees to hear the news of the taking of a city, than to surprize them at once with it, when they expect it the least. The indignation they have at being imposed upon exasperates their grief occasioned by a capitulation told suddenly, and which disappoints all the hopes they had conceived: I do not mention the outrageous raileries to which News-writers expose themselves, when they are at last forced to confess the surrender of a place, before which they had supposed that the enemies spent their time in vain, without suffering them to make the least progress. They expose themselves to be ridiculed by the News-writers of the opposite party (25).

Here follows another particular, which is very surprising. They did not know at the Elector of Bavaria's Court, what passed before Landaw, and this gives us room to think that Monsieur de Catinat was not better acquainted with it. The garrison beat a parley September the 9th (26), it was reduced to the last extremities, and even so soon as the 4th of September the Governor had represented to the council of war that it was high time to capitulate (27). It is asserted (28) that about the 22d of August he had sent a man (29), to Marshal de Catinat, to give him notice that he could not hold out above a week. And yet the French Envoy at the Duke of Bavaria's court imagined September the 9th, that the seizing upon the city of Ulm would oblige the enemy to raise the siege of Landaw. His Electoral Highness, this the Envoy wrote that very day (30), does not question but this will make the enemy give up the siege of Landaw . . . when his Troops will be joynd with those of France, we shall cut out so much and such dangerous work for the King of the Romans and for Prince Lewis of Baden in those countries, that they will not think Landaw a place important enough, to detain them on the other side of the Rhine. The Elector of Bavaria wrote to the King of France, "that a person whom he had sent to the Imperial camp before Landaw, brought him word, that this city could hold out a fortnight longer, so that it would still be time enough to relieve it, after Ulm was taken by surprize (31)." If these words may serve either to comfort or excuse the News-writers of Paris, I am glad that I have quoted them.

Some of them, who had been imposed upon by the fabulous accounts that were sent from Alsace, have themselves undeceived the publick they had misled: for here follows what we meet with in a work of the Author of the Mercurie Galant. "As for the chimerical stories which have been spread abroad of the pretended sallies of the garrison, in which it was asserted that we (the French) had killed two or three thousand men, and of the desperate assaults made by the besiegers with thousands of men, in which assaults their loss was supposed to have been no less considerable; there has not been any such action. The garrison was not strong enough to make such sallies, and the enemy had not made breaches sufficient to venture such assaults. So that the very condition which things were in at that time, is a full answer to those who have told these news, and who gave credit to them, only because they were of too easy a belief. We do not meet with any action that might be stiled a battle, in the Journal you have been reading (32)."

Let us close this remark with another passage from the same Author (33). "It is unquestionably certain, that there will be no peace concluded, but the Emperor will be obliged to surrender this place (34), in case it be not taken again before that time. Whenever the King (of France) was pleased to consent to a peace, this Prince, for the security of the same peace, surrendered all the places he had beyond the Rhine, and it was agreed at the same time that he should keep all the places he was in possession of on this side of the Rhine, and this has been followed as a rule, because the Rhine is a kind of a Barrier." I wonder that the Author who speaks thus, did not know, that by the peace of Nimeguen the French kept Brisac and Friburg, two very important places beyond the Rhine. I might add that by the Peace of Munster they were suffered to keep Philipsburg as well as Brisac. Where then is that rule, which is here mentioned to us?

[D] The News-writers could not fail to reflect on the long time which the siege of Landaw lasted. Let me only transcribe the words of a man, who has a great deal of wit; he will furnish me not only with a commentary on my text, but also with proper additions to the foregoing remark. "This siege is so forward that we expect daily the news of a capitulation; the French reproach us with the slowness of this conquest, but I am apt to think it is a disgrace to them rather than to us. His Highness of Baden judged prudently, that he was to spare his men. With this judicious precaution this wise prince never followed that desperate and killing method, which makes so many brave soldiers perish, and by which all the choicest men of an army are sometimes lost. When Landaw is surrendered, the army on the Upper-Rhine will not have suffered any extraordinary fatigue, and will come out of their trenches, as it were from a camp, still fresh, and in a condition to go upon a new expedition. But since his Highness of Baden did not carry on his enterprize with vigour, it follows from thence that he gave the enemies all the time they could want to relieve the place. Why then did they not stir? Does it not seem as though the Prince of Baden acted with slowness, and without much diligence, on purpose to expose the weakness of France? Was not that General's wary conduct, and slowness, a kind of challenge, by which he defied the French to prevent him from accomplishing his design? It were to be wished for Monsieur de Catinat's reputation, or rather for his master's, that the city had been taken in a few days. The siege lingers, and yet the Marshal, who was to attempt to relieve the place, or to give the enemy a diversion, removes farther back, and entrenches himself, as though the noise of the besieger's guns discouraged him, and he suffers the town to be taken without offering to strike a blow . . . The French are very far from confessing that this long duration of the siege of Landaw is owing to the moderation and prudence of the Prince of Baden. As they are used to value themselves upon every thing, and to make their very losses subservient to the increase of their glory, they pretend that this delay was occasioned only by the stout and vigorous defence of the besieged. If you will credit their Journalist, the besiegers fall before Landaw like the leaves of a tree shaken by an high wind towards

(32) Journal du Siege de la Ville & du Fort de Landaw, pag. 318. Mont. De Vize is not the author of that Journal, but he has added his reflections to it, from page 292. to the end.

(33) Mercurie Galant, for Sept. 1702, pag. 346, 347.

(34) That is to say Landaw.

(22) In a pamphlet of 32 pages in 8vo, intitled, Lettre au Gazetteur de Paris sur le Siege de Namur, par l'Auteur du Salut de l'Europe.

(23) See the remark [D] of the article MOHAMMED II.

(24) That of Luzara for instance, which was fought August the 15th 1702, and about which the news-writers on both sides contended for the victory, with a great shew of objections and answers, which cannot prove any thing to the disadvantage of the French, but they must prove as much or more to the disadvantage of the Imperialists.

(25) See in the following remark a passage from the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe.

(26) Journal du Siege de Landaw, pag. 240.

(27) Ibid. pag. 225.

(28) Mercurie Histor. September 1702, pag. 317.

(29) That man was taken prisoner by the besiegers.

(30) See the Lettres Historiques, for Oct. 1702, pag. 415.

(31) See the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, for October 1702, pag. 413.

extraordinary, since the Governor of Landaw stipulated in it, that the inhabitants should " towards the end of Autumn ; they lose a thousand men at the attack of one single outwork, which yet they do not carry ; if the next day they make themselves masters of that post, they are driven from it the third day ; you will see, that they will soon talk of raising the siege . . . How can men dare to publish such enormous falsities ? Can one put a greater affront on the publick, than to think it capable of believing such wretched nonsense (35) ?" Thus this man of wit reasons in his Nouvelles for the month of August 1702 : let us transcribe also what he offered to the publick the next month.

(35) Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, for August 1702, pag. 179, &c.

(36) Ibid. for Sept. 1702, pag. 314.

" The city of Landaw has at last changed its master (36) . . . A bad omen this, with regard to its consequences. And indeed they have taken all possible precautions in France to deceive the people, and to make it be believed that this misfortune would never happen. Never was the forgery of the news-mongers more worked at than on account of the siege of Landaw. If all that has been published of the besiegers were true, there would be nothing left of their army but broken remnants, and nothing could surprize us more than the surrender of that city. The Imperialists exposed themselves to be knocked down without carrying any of the works ; or if they were so lucky as to take one, they were driven from it very soon. These falsities are not very honourable at present, either to Monsieur de Melac, or to his garrison. How came this brave Governor to spoil at once his brave defence ? What panic fear seized upon him and seduced him ? Ought he not to have crowned his courage, and wearied the patience of the Germans ? A good commander never capitulates but in order to prevent a general storming of the place ; and it is pretended that the besieged had hardly lost one man. Now the city is taken, with what seasoning shall this pill be sweetened, that the people may the less taste the bitterness of it (37) ? . . . Let us not imagine, that though the French suffered Landaw to be taken without offering to prevent it, this lessens in the least the glory of this conquest. It can hardly be denied but the besieged made a very stout resistance ; the long time the siege lasted is a proof of it. Nay, if we may believe the French, they surrender'd only because the garrison was too much weakened. His most Christian Majesty is supposed to have said, that if Monsieur de Melac could have been supplied with only fifteen hundred men, the place had been safe. A sad comfort this, which only exasperates the wound ! But how can this be reconciled with the pretended good fortune of the besieged in losing but very few men in every assault ? The garrison must then have been very small at first ; which would be an unpardonable neglect with regard to a fortress of so great importance. Let us compromise the matter ; the vigour has been reciprocal : if the Imperialists have assaulted the town with a great deal of courage and resolution, the French have not answered them with less bravery and stoutness ; this circumstance however must be observed, that as the Prince of Baden wisely resolved to spare his troops ; he went on step by step, being sure to conquer, and bidding defiance to all oppositions (38) ."

(37) Ibid. pag. 315.

(38) Ibid. pag. 318.

Let us make some remarks upon this author's ingenious reflections, and let us observe in the first place, that considering the situation of affairs then, it had been much more for the common good of his Imperial Majesty and of his allies, that the city of Landaw had been taken after a siege of three weeks only. Prince Lewis of Baden might then have undertaken any expedition, if the French had not been in a condition to disappoint his designs ; whereas the long time which this siege continued gave them an opportunity to take such measures, as made those of the Imperialists miscarry, so that Prince Lewis of Baden could do nothing after the surrendering of Landaw. The only hope of France was that the enemy should spend a long time in this siege ; the Governor of the place received a letter from Monsieur de Catinat August the 10th, in which he was ordered to hold out as long as was possible, that the enemy might not go upon any other expedition during the remainder of the campaign ; and that this would be the greatest service he could do the King (39). So that the loss of a greater number of soldiers and Officers, which the besiegers might have sustained, by pressing their attacks more vigorously, had been abundantly made up by the other designs, which they might have performed before the end of the campaign.

(39) Journal du Siege de Landaw, pag. 140, 141.

I observe in the second place, that our News-writer's thought is very well grounded, when he tells us that it would have been a disgrace for Monsieur de Melac to have behaved himself as he is reported to have done in the accounts published in France. This Governor would have imitated those Poets, who do wonders in the four first acts of a Tragedy, but succeed very ill in the fifth, in which good Poets chiefly exert the whole strength of their genius, and for which they keep their most noble expressions and exalted thoughts (40). It cannot but be denied that all the world was extremely surpris'd at the conclusion of this siege : even they, who were of the besieger's party, imagined that it would be very bloody, and that the last storm would prove fatal to a great many brave Officers. Whereas they heard that it proved the most easy thing in the world, so that men did not know what to think of it, nor how this would be at last accounted for. The News-writers related several things, which are not worth mentioning. The most probable account I have heard is, that the garrison was too weak to venture to stand the last assault. We find in the Diary of that siege, that as early as the 4th of September Monsieur de Melac represented, that there were a great many brave men in the garrison, which it was the King's interest to save ; that they were in want of the most necessary things, as money, remedies, and provisions ; that it was six days since they had had nothing but horse-flesh to make broth for the sick, and that besides this their ammunition had failed them (41). It is related in the same Diary (42), that when the enemies made the last assault, the besieged were retired into the half-moon over the bridge of communication ; which is the reason why the enemies met with very little resistance.

(40) Ilud te ad extremum & oro & hortor, ut tanquam Poeta boni & aetere industrii silent, sic tu in extrema parte & conclusionem numeris ac negotii tui diligentissimus sis. Cicero, ad Quinct. fratrem, Epist. 1. lib. 1.

(41) Journal du Siege de Landaw, pag. 225.

(42) Ibid. pag. 238.

Thirdly, Let us consider these words. The garrison must then have been very small at first ; which would be an unpardonable neglect with regard to a fortress of so great importance (43). As soon as it was known that the place was surrounded with troops, the News-writers in Holland published, in emulation of one another, that the garrison was very small, and wanted a great many necessaries. I know some persons who blamed these News-writers, for thus lessening the glory of Prince Lewis of Baden. They will make amends for it at a proper time and place, answered other persons ; do not trouble yourself about it. For when the town shall have surrendered, they will be sure to publish a long catalogue of the ammunition and provisions, which the Imperialists will be supposed to have found there. They will not fail to tell you also, that the garrison was very numerous at first, but that most part of it perished by the fire and sword of the Germans, by desertion, by distempers, &c. It is not yet time to confess, that this town is well provided with every thing ; the only business at present is to make the reader hope it will be soon taken.

(43) Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, for Sept. 1702, pag. 318.

I have wondered at the silence of the Officer, who drew up the Journal or Diary of this famous siege. He ought to have told us of how many men the garrison consisted, when the place was first invested ; but he does not say one word of it. They who find every thing mysterious, pretend that out of court-flattery he chose rather to lessen the reputation of the garrison, than to reflect in the least on the King's prudence. If he had told us that the place was not well stored with the necessary ammunition and provisions, nor provided with a sufficient garrison, he would have charged the King his master with a prodigious negligence, and greatly extolled the long resistance of the besieged. Now it was much better that the latter should lose a part of the glory they deserved, than that their common Prince should be blamed. This, say some persons, was the true reason of that Officer's silence. Others observe that there was a method to do justice should be maintained in the exercise of their Religions, and that the Roman Catholic and Apostolic Religion should be preserved uncorrupted [E].

to both; namely by observing on the one hand, the garrison and ammunition were far from being sufficient, and on the other, that the King might judge without imprudence that they were sufficient, since he had reasons to think that the Elector of Bavaria would declare against the Imperialists soon enough to make their design of taking Landaw miscarry, and such reasons as were proper to satisfy all prudent politicians.

I have read in a News-writer, that when the garrison of Landaw left that place, it was two thousand and two hundred men strong, and that the French report they left but 412 soldiers at that siege (44). If this be true, it consisted at first but of 2612 men, which is a number much too small for the defence of such a fortress.

(44) Lettres Historiques, for October 1702, pag. 432.

Let us not omit the following observation of a News-writer at Paris (45). The besiegers "had still a great way to go, and many assaults to make, and they would have had much more still, and had lost a much greater number of men, than they have done . . . had it not been for the treachery of an engineer, who went into their camp, and discovered several mines to them. Thus this engineer's perfidiousness, together with the want of a great many necessaries, are the reasons why the Germans made themselves masters of that place." The News-writers in Holland acknowledged, that the engineer, who deserted from the garrison, did the Imperialists a great deal of service (46); but what they add seems to be groundless, namely that "he was surprised on his return into the city, after he had taken an exact view of the works of the besiegers. The Prince of Baden would have him hanged immediately on a tree without any trial; but this engineer having offered to drain the ditches of the place, and to do other services, if they would save his life, General Thun-

(45) Mrs. de Vize, at the end of the Journal du Siege de Landau, pag. 307.

gen represented that it would be proper to try whether he could do what he promised, and this advice was approved. The engineer was immediately put in chains, and they sent him word by the hangman of the army, that in case he did not effectually apply himself to perform his promises, he should be hanged at a gallows, which was shewed him (47). It is not in the least probable, that he had any intention to return to Landaw: he knew too well that he should be condemned there to suffer the most disgraceful punishment. We find in the Diary of the siege, that on the 26th of August, "Monsieur de la Roussilliere Captain of the Gates was commanded by Monsieur de Melac to deliver into the hangman's hands Ladoder's (48) commissions, and to see the said Ladoder's picture hung on a gibbet by the hangman, under which picture was this inscription, 'The unworthy engineer Ladoder, a traitor to his King and to his country.' They likewise put up a gibbet in an half-moon of the fort, where he was also hanged in effigy (49)." Monsieur de Melac was so exasperated against him, that when this Governor went to receive Prince Lewis of Baden's hostages for the capitulation, he commanded that if Ladoder should appear, they should fire an hundred musquets at him, notwithstanding the cessation of arms. But the hostages told him, that he had been wounded in the arm the day before (50) by a musquet ball.

(46) Lettres Historiq. for Sept. 1702, pag. 355.

(47) Ibid. pag. 359.

(48) This is the name of the Engineer who deserted.

(49) Journal du Siege de Landau, pag. 204, 205.

(50) Ibid. pag. 243.

The News-writer, who observed that the diversion intended by the surprising of Ulm did not prevent the King of the Romans from taking Landaw (51), did not remember the dates; for how could the taking of Landaw be retarded or prevented by the surprising of Ulm, of which the news was not yet known, when Landaw capitulated?

(51) Mercure Hist. for Jan. 1703, pag. 6.

[E] The Governor stipulated, that the Inhabitants should be maintained in the exercise of their religions, and that the Roman Catholic and Apostolic Religion should be preserved uncorrupted.] This article was not granted but with this restriction, according to the treaties of Munster and Ryfwick. The two parts of this article seem surprising, when it is considered that the King of France who surrenders Landaw, and the Emperor to whom he surrenders it, are both of them Princes who have shewed great zeal for the extirpation of the Protestant religion, and for the propagation of the Roman Catholic. Was it reasonable to require from such an Emperor, that he should maintain the Roman Catholic religion in that city? Was not this a superfluous care? And farther, must his hands be tied up to prevent him from rooting heresy out of that city? He had a right to do it in a conquered town; for this the laws of war allowed him, unless the contrary were stipulated and granted by the articles of the capitulation. If his Imperial Majesty does not labour as effectually to reunite this whole city to the body of the Popish Church, as he has done to reunite it to the body of the Empire, will not the King of France be answerable for it, who has declared himself the Protector of the heretics at Landaw, by procuring a solemn promise that they should never be disturbed in the exercise of their religion (52)? He hoped, say some, that the place would be restored to him by the next treaty of peace. But do they observe, that in order to act consistently with his former conduct, and not to contradict himself, he ought to choose to recover Landaw, all the citizens being Roman Catholics, rather than to recover it with different religions professed in it? And consequently he ought to have given the Imperialists a full liberty to convert all the heretics by such means as they should think proper. If he thought it his duty not to suffer them to enjoy such a liberty, which might have been very prejudicial to the inhabitants who were heretics, in a word, if he designed to promote the advantage of those inhabitants, what is become of his zeal to convert? What irregularity, what inconsistency would this not be in his conduct? But after all, his fears would have been somewhat superfluous; for in the present situation of things, there is no danger that the Emperor would persecute the Protestants of Landaw; their whole party has laid so many obligations on his Imperial Majesty, and it is so much his interest to have a great regard for them, that there is not the least reason to fear that he would introduce the spirit of convertors and persecutors into the conquered places. One cannot therefore guess at the reason of this fourth article of the long capitulation presented to the besiegers.

(52) The author of the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe urges this very artfully in his month of Sept. 1702, pag. 320, 321.

Some persons, who by pretending to discover hidden mysteries, fall into chimerical notions, venture to assert, that the Court of France stipulated the preservation of the Roman Catholic religion so expressly, with a design to hint that the Catholics of Landaw wanted to have their religion secured to them, considering they were to be under the government of an Emperor, who was intirely devoted to the Protestants. What idle fancies are these?

As for the Roman Catholic religion being preserved uncorrupted, as is demanded by the besieged, I have not yet met with any person who could explain to me what this means. For to pretend that the design was to prevent the introduction of Janensism, or on the contrary the introduction of the superstitious practices, and loose maxims, with which the Jesuits and the Monks infect religion, would be indeed a very whimsical notion. Did they then dread some kind of Samaritanism? Would they provide against I know not what mixture of Lutheran or Calvinistical opinions with the articles determined in the Council of Trent? I understand very well that this is chimerical; but I am at a loss what to determine.

LANDO (HORTENSIO) a Physician born at Milan, lived in the sixteenth Century. He is the author of several works; and took a delight in publishing them under fictitious names. He is thought to be the author of a Dialogue published under the name of Philaethes, against the reputation of Erasmus. This conjecture, in my opinion, is very very well grounded [A]. He wrote two Dialogues, which have been erroneously ascribed to Cardinal Aleander [B].

[A] This conjecture, in my opinion, is very well grounded] I shall perform here a promise, which I made in the remark [C] of the article ERASMUS. Here then follows what is contained in the memoirs which I have quoted there. Herold imagined that a physician born at Placenza, and named Bassiano Lando or Lando, concealed himself under the name of Philaethes. But for my part I think rather that it is Hortensio Lando of Milan, who was also a Physician, and a man of wit. He published several works both in Latin and in Italian, in which he always affected to disguise himself. He took that same name of Philaethes in a dialogue, which he intitled Forciane Questiones, in which he examines the manners and genius of several nations of Italy. It is true that in this last dialogue he calls himself Philaethes; Polytopienfis; whereas in that against Erasmus it is Philaethes Utopienfis, or ex Utopia Civis; which is so far from showing any real difference, that on the contrary it shows that the same Genius produced both the works. He also called himself sometimes Hortensius Tranquillus, of which Simler the Abbreviator and Continuator of Gesner was not aware, since he speaks of Hortensius Tranquillus, and of Hortensius Landus as of two different writers. We have a work of Lando intitled Un Commentario delle piu notabili & mostruose cose d'Italia, i. e. "A treatise of the most remarkable and wonderful things in Italia." in 8vo. It is a diverting work: as he did not prefix his name to it, he supplied this omission by a short advertisement, which is at the end, in which he says, Godi, lettore, il presente Commentario nato del costantissimo cervello di M. O. L. detto per la sua natural mansuetudine il Tranq. i. e. "Reader, peruse this treatise, the product of the most constant brains of M. O. L. who on account of his natural meekness is stiled, Tranq." Who is there but sees that these three letters M. O. L. signify Messer Ortenfio Lando, and Tranq. Tranquillo? After this there is un Catalogo de gli inventori delle cose che si mangiano, e delle bevande ch'oggi si usano. i. e. "A list of the inventors of such things as are fit to be eaten, and of the drinkables which are now a days in use;" at the end of which list or catalogue are the following capital letters, SUISNETROH SUDNAL ROTUA TSE, each separate word of which being read backwards, but in the same order as it stands here, you find, HORTENSIUS LANDUS AUTOR EST. Thus at the end of his Paradoxii (Paradoxes) printed at Venice in 8vo, in the year 1544, SUISNETROH TABEDUL, that is to say, HORTENSIUS LUDIBAT. It is therefore very probable that Hortensio Lando, and not Bassiano, is the author of the dialogue which Herold answered: What confirms me in this opinion is that, Hortensio desirous to prove in his paradoxes, that to be a bastard is no disgrace, quotes the instances of several men of letters, of Peter Lombard, de Giason Maino, of Longolius, of Celio Calcagnini, and of Erasmus, and of this last he speaks thus: O quanti letterati hannoci ancora dati i furtivi abbracciamenti &c. hannoci dato un Erasmo di Roterodamo, e per opera d'un valente Abbate ce lo dettero. i. e. "Oh how many more learned men have these secret embraces produced us, &c. They have produced us an Erasmus of Rotterdam, and as we are told, by the means of a valiant Abbot."

We must not omit a collection of letters, which he published at Venice apresso Gabriel Giolito, in the year 1548, in 12mo. It is intitled, Lettere di molte valoroze donne, nelle quali chiaramente appare non esser ne di eloquentia ne di dottrina alli huomini inferiori. i. e. "Letters of several eminent ladies, from which it appears evidently, that they are not inferior to the men, either in eloquence or learning." There is at the end of it a short advertisement (1) of Bartolomæus Pefalossa Rhetus, by which it appears that Hortensio Lando collected these letters into a volume, at the request of Oravianus Raverca, qui ob insignem animi pietatem Terracinae Pontifex designatus est, who for his eminent piety was made Bishop of Terracina (2).

[B] He wrote two dialogues, which have been erroneously ascribed to Cardinal Aleander.] What I am going to observe has been communicated to me by the author of the preceding remark. "The two dialogues, one of which is intitled Cicero relegatus, (Cicero banished) and the other Cicero revocatus, (Cicero recalled) were not written by Jerome Aleander, but by Hortensio Lando, of Milan, surnamed Tranquillus. They are dedicated to Pomponius Trivulzio, and as the inscription of the dedication is thus, Pomponio Trivulzio H. A. S. D. Henry Lewis Chastaignier Bishop of Poitiers imagined that the letters H. A. signified Hieronymus Aleander. But they were either put there for joke's sake, or perhaps H. A. was put by mistake for H. L. A. that is to say, Hortensius Landus, the author's true name. Simler the continuator of Gesner ascribes these dialogues to Hortensius Tranquillus Mediolanensis whom he erroneously distinguishes from Hortensius Landus. This Landus and this Tranquillus are but one and the same writer. He loved to conceal his name, and yet he was glad to be known. L'Autore della presente opera, says he under the name of Paulo Mascranico in an advertisement to the reader at the end of his Paradoxes, il qual fu M. O. L. M. (*) detto per soprannome il Tranq. i. e. "The author of this present work was master Hortensio Lando, surnamed the peaceable." At the end of his Commentario d'Italia, in another advertisement to the reader, under the name of Nicolo Morra, he speaks thus: Godi lettore &c. (3). At the end of his Sermoni funebri delle bestie, he calls himself at length and without any disguise, Hortensio Lando ditto (†) il Tranquillo. Now this Lando or Tranquillo owns in his last Paradox the Cicero relegatus for his own work. Non dubito certamente, says he, che molti non si habbino da maravigliare che ancora fatto non habbia la pace con M. Tullio, qual gia sono poco meno di dieci anni (‡) chio mandai con suo gran scorno in effiglio. i. e. "I do not question but a great many persons will wonder, that I have not yet made peace with Tully, who has been now almost ten years banished, which is a great disgrace to him: And a little lower. Quando scrissi il Dialogo intitolato Cicero relegato. i. e. When I wrote the dialogue intitled Cicero banished."

(1) It is in Latin.

(2) I am obligated to Mr. Des Maizeaux for these particulars.

(*) That is to say, Messer Ortenfio Lando Lancese.

(3) See the rest in the preceding remark.

(†) After the Dialect of Lombardy for detto.

(‡) The Paradoxes were published at Venice in the year 1544; and the Dialogues of Cicero had been published at Lyons in the year 1534.

(a) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. b. 2. pag. 122. and Alben. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 220. edit. 2. London 1721.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 249.

(1) Alben. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 220.

(d) Idem, ibid. col. 257.

(e) Idem, Alben. Oxon. ubi supra.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 249.

LANGBAINE (GERARD), a learned English writer in the seventeenth Century, was son of Mr. William Langbaine, and born at Barton-Kirke in Westmorland (a) in the year 1608 [A], and educated at the Free-school at Blencow in Cumberland. He became a Student in Queen's College in Oxford under the tuition of Mr. Thomas Wetherall in the beginning of the year 1626, where he was entered a poor serving child (b). July the 24th 1630 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); and June the 27th 1633 that of Master of Arts (d). He was afterwards chosen Fellow of his College (e). In 1644 he was unanimously elected Keeper of the Archives of the University; and in the latter end of the year following Provost of his College (f). June the 22d 1646 he was created Doctor of Divinity (g). His writings shew him to have been a man of most extensive learning [B]. He was highly esteemed by Archbishop Usher, Selden,

[A] Born... in the year 1608.] Mr. Wood tells us (1), that he was 18 years old when he became a student of Queen's College in Oxford in 1626.

[B] His writings shew him to have been a man of most extensive learning.] What he published are as follow. I. Longinus de grandis Eloquentia seu sublimi and other great men of that age. He died February the 10th 1657, and was interred about the middle of the Inner Chapel of Queen's College, having a little before settled twenty four pounds per ann. on a Free-school at the place of his nativity; towards the purchasing mi dicendi genere à Græco Latine redditus, & Notis illustratus. Oxford 1636 and 1638 in 8vo. II. Brief Discourse relating to the times of Edward VI. Or, the state of the times, as they stood in the reign of King Edward VI. By way of Preface to a book, intitled, The true subject to the rebel: or, the Hurt of sedition, &c. written by Sir John Cheek. Oxford 1641 in 4to. To this Dr. Langbaine prefixed the life of Sir John Cheek. III. Episcopal Inheritance: or, a Reply to the bumble examination of a printed abstract; or the answers to nine Reasons of the house of Commons against the votes of Bishops in Parliament. Oxford 1641 in 4to. To which is added A determination of the late learned Bishop of Salisbury (Davenant) Englished. These two pieces were reprinted at London in 1680. IV. A Review of the Covenant: wherein the Original, Grounds, Means, Matter, and Ends of it are examined; and out of the principles of the Remonstrances, Declarations, Votes, Orders, and Ordinances of the prime Covenanters, or the firmer grounds of Scripture, Law, and Reason, disproved. Printed in 1644. It was reprinted at London 1661 in 4to to which edition is prefixed an Advertisement to the reader; in which it is said, "that this treatise being composed by our author in the heat of our late Civil Commotions, when the pen was no less than the sword, and each of them so furiously contended for victory over the adverse party, his prudence would not then suffer him publickly to own it, as for other reasons, so perhaps because of some harsh expressions against the framers of this covenant, which his zeal to his Majesty's righteous cause did against his moderate Genius prompt him to. But had it not by some sinister accident miscarried in its first birth, it might in all probability have proved an effectual means to compose those unhappy differences, which had fallen out amongst us, at least to withdraw such, as had not lost their judgment with their Loyalty, from a cause, whose foundation must needs therein have appeared so rotten. The suppression therefore of so useful a piece is to be looked upon as no small part of the public calamity of those times, wherein it was written, and its loss must have been prejudicial to ours, wherein, though we have seen the covenant reduced to ashes, yet even those ashes may be fruitful of issue, no less monstrous than its Parent." This treatise contains 13 chapters. Chapter the first: By what means the Covenanters were reduced to the necessity of entering into this combination, confessed to be their last refuge. Chapter the second: The grounds of the Covenant, and false assertions laid down in the preface to it, disproved. Chapter the third: The unlawfulness of the Covenant in respect of the cause efficient, as made by subjects against the will of their superior in such things as necessarily require his consent. Chapter the fourth: The matter of the Covenant examined; and proved, first, to be against truth. Chapter the fifth: That the Covenant by reason of the many ambiguities in it, especially this, who shall be the authentic interpreter of it, cannot be sworn in judgment. Chapter the sixth: That the performance of sundry clauses in the Covenant cannot be without great inconvenience or injustice. Chapter the seventh: That many things vowed in the Covenant are not possible to be fulfilled. Chapter the eighth: That the very taking the Covenant and other avowed actions of the Covenanters are in fact contradictory to the formal words of their oath. Chapter the ninth: That many particulars vowed in the Covenant, and intended by the covenanters, are simply and absolutely unlawful. Chapter the tenth: That the Covenant is repugnant to those general ends, for which it is pretended to be taken. Chapter the eleventh: That the particular ends of the several articles are likewise inconsistent with the matter of them. Chapter the twelfth: The true end of framing and enjoying this Covenant, The bringing in of the Scots, absolutely unlawful. Chapter the thirteenth: From these premises the Covenant is concluded unlawful in respect of the form. V. Answer of the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Oxford, to the petition, articles of grievance, and reasons of the City of Oxford: presented to the committee for regulating the University of Oxford 24 July 1649. Oxford 1649 in six sheets in 4to. Reprinted there again in 1678, and likewise a book intitled, A defence of the Rights and Privileges of the University of Oxford, &c. published by James Harrington, then Bachelor (soon after Master) of Arts, and Student of Christ Church, at Oxford 1690, in 4to. VI. Quæstiones pro more solenni in Vesperis propositæ ann. 1651. Oxford 1658, in 4to. Published by Mr. Thomas Barlow, afterwards Bp. of Lincoln, among several little works of learned men. VII. Platonicorum aliquot, qui etiamnum supersunt, Authorum, Græcorum imprimis, mox & Latinorum, syllabus alphabeticus. Oxford 1667, in 8vo. It was drawn up by our Author at the desire of Archbishop Usher, but left imperfect; which being found among his papers, was, with some few alterations (where there was found good reason of so doing) placed at the end of Alcini, in Platonicam Philosophiam Introductio, published by Dr. John Fell Dean of Christ Church. VIII. There is also ascribed to our Author, A view of the New Dictionary, and a vindication of the ancient Liturgy of the Church of England: in answer to the reasons pretended in the Ordinance and Preface, for the abolishing the one, and establishing the other. Oxford 1645 in 4to. pagg. 112. Dr. Langbaine also published, 1. The Foundation of the University of Oxford, with a Catalogue of the principal Founders and special Benefactors of all the Colleges, and total number of Students, &c. London 1651, in three sheets in 4to. mostly taken from the Tables of John Scot of Cambridge, printed in 1622. 2. The Foundation of the University of Cambridge, with a Catalogue, &c. printed with the former Catalogue in three sheets, and taken from Mr. Scot's Tables. He likewise laboured very much in finishing Archbishop Usher's Book, entitled, Chronologia Sacra, but died when he had almost brought it to an end. Mr. Thomas Barlow completed it. He translated into Latin, Reasons of the present judgment of the University concerning the solemn League and Covenant, and assisted Dr. Robert Sanderson and Dr. Richard Zouch in the drawing up of those Reasons. He translated into English A Review of the Council of Trent, written in French by a learned Roman Catholic, Oxford 1638, in fol. wherein is represented the dissent of the Gallican Church from several conclusions of the Council. He left behind him 13 quartos and 8 octavos in manuscript, with innumerable collections in loose papers, all written with his own hand, collected chiefly from ancient manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, &c. He had also made several Catalogues of manuscripts in various libraries, and of printed books likewise, in order, as was supposed, for an universal Catalogue in all kinds of learning. Dr. Fuller tells us (2), that he took a great deal of pains in the continuation of Brian Twyne's Antiq. Academ. Oxon. and that he was intent upon it, when he died. But Mr. Wood observes (3), that he cannot find any ground for this assertion; and that Dr. Thomas Barlow and Dr. Lamplugh, who looked over his library after his death, assured him, that they saw nothing done towards such a design. Dr. Langbaine greatly assisted Dr. Arthur Duck in composing his book De usu & autoritate Juris Civilis Romanorum in Dominio Principum Christianorum, printed at London 1653 in 8vo. In the Collection of three hundred Letters written between Archbishop Usher and most of the eminentest persons for piety and learning in his time both in England and beyond the seas, published by Dr. Richard Farr at London 1686 in fol. we have several letters of our Author to that Prelate. In one dated from Queen's College, February 9th 1647. he writes thus: "For myself, I cannot tell what account to make of my present employment; I have many Irons in the Fire, but of no great consequence. I do not know how soon I shall be called to give up, and am therefore putting my house in order; digesting the confused notes and papers left me by several pre-

(2) Worthies of England, in Cumberland. See likewise David Lloyd's Memoirs, pag. 518.
(3) Atten. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 221.

(b) Idem, Atb. Omon. ubi supra.

purchasing of which he received twenty pounds from a certain Doctor of Oxford, who desired to have his name concealed (b). He had a son, GERARD, who was born in the parish of St. Peter in the East in the City of Oxford, July the 15th 1656, educated in decessors both in the Univerfity and College, which I purpose to leave in a better method than I found them. At Mr. Patrick Young's request I have undertaken the collation of Constantine's Geoponics with two manuscripts in our publick library, upon which I am forced to bestow some vacant hours. In our College I am ex officio to moderate Divinity-disputations once a week. My honoured friend Dr. Duck has given me occasion to make some inquiry after the law. And the opportunity of an ingenious young man come lately from Paris, who has put up a private course of Anatomy, has prevailed with me to engage myself for his Auditor and Spectator upon three days a week, four hours each time. But this I do ut explorator, non ut transfuga. For though I am not sollicitous to engage myself in that great and weighty calling of the ministry after this new way; yet I would be loth to be λιπολόγητος, as to divinity. Though I am very insufficient to make a Master-builder, yet I could help to bring in materials from that publick store in our library, to which I could willingly consecrate the remainder of my days, and count it no loss to be deprived of all other Accommodations, so I might be permitted to enjoy the liberty of my conscience and study in that place. But if there be such a price set upon the latter, as the former, as I cannot reach without pawning the former, I am resolved, the Lord's will be done." Eleven other letters of our Author to Mr. Selden are published by Mr. Thomas Hearne in the first part of his Appendix to Leland's Collectanea, Vol. V. p. 270 and 282 & seqq. The first is dated at Queen's College, March 20th 1647. In one dated November 17th 1651. he has the following passage: "In pursuance of those injunctions (for such to me are all, which you call requests) which your last of the 6th instant laid upon me, I have made search into such Greek manuscripts, as our publick library affords of the First Epistle of St. John, which are not many. Of these latter we have only three copies, and one of them defective at the end, and so wanting some of the Canonical Epistles. The other two read that place, chap. 5. thus: Οτι τις ειςιν οι μαρτυροεις εν τη γη, το πνιυμα, και το υδωρ, και το αιμα, και υτας οι τρεις εν ειςι without any vestigium of that, which usually passeth for the 7th verse. You know what Beza has noted upon the place; to which I may add, that in the interlineary of Raphelengius in 8vo. 1612, those words, εις το εν ειςι, make the close of the 7th verse, and are totally wanting as in the 8th, with which agrees the Geneva edition in 4to. 1620. But I suppose it was not to your purpose to inquire after the varieties of editions, but manuscripts, and whether you meant only Greek and Latin too, I cannot tell; and therefore do yet forbear to trouble you with the several Lections in our Latin Copyes, some having nothing of the 7th verse, some putting it in the margin, some placing it after what we ordinarily account for the eighth, and those that have both varying diversly; which, if it may be usefull to you any way, I shall upon the first notice, more methodically digest, and more particularly certify." In another dated March 16th 1651 he has this passage. For myself, I have engaged a matter of a score of our ablest men in that kind to undertake a thorough survey of our publick library, intending to make a perfect catalogue of all the books according to their severall subjects in severall kinds; and when that's done, to incorporate in it all the authors in any of our private College libraries, which are wanting in the publick, so as he that desires to know, may see, at one view, what we have upon any subject. Dr. James made some beginning in this kind; but none yet has ventured either to perfect his, or begin a new. In another dated August 22d. 1653. he writes thus: "Upon occasion of the businesse of tythes now under consideration, some, whom it more nearly concerns, have been pleased to enquire of me, what might be said, as to the civil right of them; to whom I was not able to give any better directions than by sending them to your History. Happily it may seem strange to them, yet I am not out of hopes, but that work (like Pelias' Hafta) which was looked upon as a piece, that struck deepest against the divine, will afford the strongest arguments for the civil right; and if that be made the issue, I do not despair of the cause. . . . It is a mere difficulty to me to imagine, what argument (as the law now stands) can be brought against the ministers title and propriety, than for it; but of this we shall hear (I doubt not) soon enough." In another dated September 19th 1653. he writes thus: "Touching the abolition or continuance of the judiciall law either to the Jews or Christians, I do not remember to have seen any peculiar tract. . . . With submission to your judgment, I should think these two propositions no paradoxes: 1. That the judiciall law of Moses, as such, (abstracting from what in it is of the law of nature and Nations, &c.) was never binding to Christians, as Christians. 2. That to the Jews, as Jews, it never ceased to be so, save only by accident, as countermanded by the civil fancies of those Princes and States, in whose dominions their lot of residence has fallen, since their final dispersion; with what variety and temperament, both in the Roman empire and other nations, no man knows better than yourselfe. I find in St. Austin (Epistola 49) out of Porphyry, of their law in general affirm'd: Procepit in fines Italos post Caium Casarem, aut certe illo imperante. Those severall laws in both Codes concerning sometimes the restraint, sometimes the toleration of it, I need not mention. For matter of fact, I know not, whether it be worth the while to take notice of that passage in Theodorus (or rather Diodorus) Tarfenus (apud Photium in Bibl. Cod. 223. ex Lib. 6. de Fato) who gives this testimony of the Jewish nation, that as formerly, so since their universall dispersion till that time (about 400 years after Christ) they never apostatized from their antient laws. And tho' that were a time, when the Jews (if ever) were in most flagrant favour with the Emperors; yet that the Christians of those days did not conceive themselves oblig'd by the Jewish judicialls, may be collected from that return of Basil to (as I suppose) the same Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, touching the case of a man's marrying the sister of his deceased wife (Basil. Ep. 187. & vid. Balsamon in eandem) where he waves the authority of the Mosaical law with οσα ε νόμος λεγει, τοις εν τη νεμω λεγει, &c. We have in our public library amongst the Greek MSS. given by Sir Thomas Roe, a great volume containing, inter alia, several Collections of Laws both Civil and Ecclesiastical, many of those already extant in the Basilica and Jus Græco-Romanum, with others (for ought I know) not yet in print: in which book betwixt some novels of Basilus and some others of Leo Imp. comes in a piece of about six leaves in quantity with this title: Έκλογή εν επιτομή τῶ παρα τῷ Θεῷ δια Μωυσίως δαδένῳ νόμῳ τοῖς Ἰσραηλῖταις. The first title thus: Περὶ κρίματῶν καὶ δικαιουσύνῃς ἐκ τῆς Ἐξοδῆ καὶ κ.κ. The beginning runs thus: Οὐ παραλήθη ἄκοη ματαίαν, εὐ συγκάθηση μετὰ τῷ ἁγιῷ γυνιάζ μαρτυρῶν ἀδικῶ &c. In the margin over-right against the title, there is this note in the rubrick, of the same hand with the rest, τῶς συμβάλλουσι ταῦτα πάντα τοῖς εἰς ἡμᾶς νομοθετημένοις; by which, as it is apparent at the time of the transcript, it was otherwise, so it may be doubted, whether in the first design of the collector those laws were not supposed to concern the Christians of those times as rule of life. The method of the collection is not much unlike that in the Collatio Legum Mosai-carum & Romanarum set out by Pithæus, of which, I think, you make Licinius Rufinus to have been the author. The whole volume was writ about 300 years since by one Constantinus Sapiens, for so I read in the close of the book, and sometimes belonged in Grammar learning at Denton in the parish of Cudeston near Oxford under Mr. William Wildgoose, M. A. and bound apprentice to Mr. Nevill Simmons, a Book-feller in St. Paul's Church-yard, but soon after called thence by his mother upon the death of his elder brother William, and by her entered a Gentleman Commoner of University College in Oxford in Michaelmas Term 1672, "where though put under the tuition of a good tutor, says Mr. Wood (i), yet by his mother's fondness he became "idle, a great jockey, married, and run out a good part of the estate that had descended to him. But being a man of parts, he afterwards took up, lived for some years a retired life near Oxford, improved much his natural and gay genius, that he had to dramatic Poetry, and at first wrote little things without his name set to them; which he would never own." But he afterwards published some works, which he owned [C]. August the 14th 1690 he was elected Inferior Beadle of Arts in the University of Oxford; and on the 19th of January following was chosen Superior Beadle of Law. He died June the 23d 1692, and was interred in the Church of St. Peter in the East in Oxford (k).

(f) Idem, ibid. col. 892.

(k) Idem, ibid. col. 892, 893.

"to the monastery viz. Evangelii in Insula Cbalce. I can not tell whether any of later times, Carolostadius and the Anabaptists excepted, have maintained the Jewish Judicials to be universally and indispensably binding to Christians." In another letter dated November the 8th 1653 he writes thus: "I was not so much troubled to hear of that fellow, who lately in London maintained in public, that learning is a sin, as to see some men (who would be accounted none of the meanest amongst ourselves here at home) under pretence of piety go about to banish it the Unity. I cannot make any better construction of a late order made by those, whom we call visitors, upon occasion of an election last week at All-Souls College, to this effect, that for the future no scholar be chosen into any place in any college, unless he bring a testimony under the hands of four persons at the least, (not Electours) known to these visitors to be truly godly men, that he who stands for such a place is himself truly godly; and by arrogating to themselves this power, they fit judges of all men's consciences, and have rejected some, against whom they had no other exceptions (being certified by such, to whom their conversations were best known, to be unblameable, and statumly elected after due examination and approbation of their sufficiency by that society) merely upon this account, that the persons who testified in their behalfe, are not known to these visitors to be regenerate. I intend (God willing) ere long to have an election in our College, and have professed, that I will not submit to this order. How I shall speed in it, I do not pretend to foresee; but if I be baffled, I shall hardly be silent."

[C] He afterwards published some works which he owned. I. The Hunter: a Discourse of Horsemanship. Oxford 1685; in 8vo. This is subjoined to the third edition of a book, intitled, The Gentleman's Recreation, in four parts, viz. Hunting, Hawking, Fowling, Fishing, &c. whereunto is prefixed a large Sculpture giving easy directions for blowing the Horn: With an Abstract at the End of each Subject of such Lords as relate to the same, &c. This Gentleman's Recreation was written by Colonel Edward Cook of Highnam in Gloucester-shire, who attended King Charles I. at Newport in the Isle of Wight, during the treaty between his Majesty and the Parliament, and was there when the King was carried thence to Hurst-Castle in November 1648, when his Majesty commanded him to commit to writing the manner of his seizure, which he did. The Colonel died at London January the 29th 1683, and was interred on the 2d of February at Highnam abovementioned. There was published of his writing Certain passages, which happened at Newport in the Isle of Wight November the 29th 1648, relating to King Charles I. London 1690 in four sheets and an half in 4to. II. Momas Triumphant: Or the Plagiaries of the English Stage expressed in a Catalogue of Comedies, Tragedies, &c. London 1688 in five sheets in 4to. Which title, with the book, and a large preface of 15 pages of Mr. Langbaine's writing, being published by another hand contrary to the mind of the author, and 500 of the copies sold, he caused another title to be put to the rest of the copies, with an advertisement against the first. The title is thus: A New Catalogue of English Plays, containing Comedies, Tragedies, Tragi-Comedies, Operas, Masques, Pastorals, Interludes, Farces, &c. both ancient and modern, that have ever yet been printed, so this present year 1688. To which are added the Volumes and best Editions, with divers Remarks of the Originals of most Plays, and of the Plagiaries of several Authors. London 1688. This is the ground-work of another book, written by Mr. Langbaine; and entitled, III. An Account of the English Dramatick Poets: Or, some Observations and Remarks on the Lives and Writings of all those that have either published Comedies, Tragedies, Tragi-Comedies, Pastorals, Masques, Interludes, Farces, or Operas in the English tongue. By Gerard Langbaine. Oxford 1691 in 8vo. Dedicated to James Earl of Abington. IV. While he was Superior Beadle of Law, he wrote and published an Appendix to a Catalogue of all the Graduates in Divinity, Law, and Physic, &c. which Catalogue was written by Mr. Richard Peers, Superior Beadle of Arts and Physick. Mr. Langbaine's Appendix contains the names of all those, who proceeded in Divinity, Law, and Physic in the University of Oxford from the 14th of July 1688, where Mr. Peers left off, to the 6th of August 1699. V. Mr. Wood tells us; that he had been informed by Mr. Langbaine and others, that he had written the Hermaphrodite: a Novel; which perhaps might be the same with The Gallant Hermaphrodite, an amorous Novel, London 1687 in 8vo, translated from the French of the Sieur de Chavigny. T.

LANGIUS (PAUL) a German Monk, would be but little known by the Chronicle he composed, had he not inserted in it great complaints against the wicked lives of the Clergy, and bestowed elogies on Martin Luther (a). This is the reason why the Protestants have quoted him a thousand times over and over. He was born at Zwicka in Voigtland, and entered amongst the Benedictine Monks in the year 1487 in the monastery of Bozaw near Zeits in Misnia (b). The Abbot Trithemius sent him in the year 1515 to search all the Convents in Germany, in order to make a collection of all the manuscripts, which could serve to illustrate History; or to improve the catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers (c). Langius laboured for himself also when he was visiting the Libraries; for it proved very useful to him when he wrote his Chronicle (d) [A]. It begins

(a) See Wolff, Lib. Memorabilia, tom. 2. pag. 169, & seq.

(b) Vossius, de Hist. Latinis, pag. 644.

(c) Idem, ibid.

[A] His Chronicle. It is intitled Chronicon Citicense. i. e. "The Chronicle of Zeits." But it does not follow from thence that Du Pleffis was in the right to call the author of it Moine de Citique. i. e. "A Monk of begins with the year 1468 according to Voffius, but he is mistaken [B]. Coeffeteau had recourse to a very indifferent evasion [C], when he answered the Mystere d'Iniquité, in which some passages of Langius were quoted. There is a Reflection of Andrew Rivetus relating

(d) Vignier, Theatre de l'Ance-Christ, in the Index of the authors quoted.

“ of Citicus.” Coeffeteau instead of correcting that blunder, made use of the same words. Rivetus's expressions are not much better, le Moine Citique. See their passages in the remark [C]. Strangers have much reason to complain, that the French are used to alter and disfigure the proper names so, that one does not know what to make of them. Voffius made this observation against the celebrated Thuanus (1). But here the fault consists not only in disfiguring the name of a city; it is something worse, for because Langius composed the Chronicle of a Cathedral Church, they give him a name derived from that Church. Now such a name does not in the least belong to him.

(1) Voffius, De Arte Historica, cap. 12. pag. 69.

[B] Voffius is mistaken.] This work of Langius is a Chronicle of the Episcopal Church of Zeits. The Emperor Otho I founded this Cathedral in the year 968. Pope John XIII confirmed it. Teste Paulo Langio in Chronico Citizenfi, quod a dicto anno (968) usque ad annum 1515 deduxit Episcoporum Citizenfium & aliorum in vicinia Antifitum res gestas commemorans (2). Langius carries his Chronicle from that foundation to the year 1515: he does not only give us the History of the Bishop of Zeits, but he mentions also the other Bishops of the neighbouring cities.

(2) Aub. Miræus, in Geographia Ecclesiastica, pag. 124.

[C] Coeffeteau had recourse to a very indifferent evasion.] Du Pleffis Mornai could not omit to mention the Elogies, which Langius bestows on Martin Luther. “ Paul Langius, a Monk of Zeits (*), and a disciple of Abbot Trithemius just when Luther began to appear in the world, though he did not quit his Monastery, yet was greatly moved by Luther's preaching, and gives him such a noble character as could hardly be expected from a Monk. This Martin, says he, was a most learned, and incomparable Divine, who endeavoured to restore the sacred Divinity to its primitive dignity, its ancient purity, and to the innocence, plainness and simplicity of the Gospel, despising intirely all worldly Philosophy. . . . And in another place under the year 1503, he mentions him together with Carlostad and Melancthon, and observes of them all, that they handle and teach the sacred Theology so as to give the pure wheat of the word of God, without any straw: that is to say, without mixing Philosophy and Syllogisms with it; but confining themselves only to the Gospel of Christ, and to the Apostle St. Paul, whom they take for their patrons and the only authority; and with the study of the Holy Scripture they join the fear of God, and the seeds of all the moral virtues, which they sow into the hearts of their disciples, by their words, by their example, and by their writings. And that it might not be objected to us, that this was said before Luther had declared war against the Pope, here follows what Langius observes under the year 1520, after he had expatiated on the abuse and excess of indulgences. The same (Luther) says he, by his doctrine and admirable preaching discredited intirely the indulgences; he raised doubts about them, and dissuaded the people from buying them, shewing that they were not in the least necessary to salvation, they not being a remission of sins, but serving only to make men careless of repenting, and neglectful of good works, nay, that they were a stumbling block and an excitement to vice: that the merits of Christ and the Saints were not the flock and store of these indulgences, since nothing of all this was ever written in the primitive Church nor even during a thousand years by the Saints and Doctors of the orthodox Church; so far were they from having such a value for them, and such an high opinion of them, as men have now, on account of the money they raise by them. He asserted also and proved that the Church of Rome is not the first and the head of the others by any divine right &c. And for this reason, adds he, they persecute him now like another Athanasius, particularly because he asserted this thesis, and some other great and sublime articles of doctrine, which not only the Romans but even some learned men, especially the Thomists continue to oppose. And yet this Martin, who is the first and wisest man of this time in matters of controversy, could never

(*) This is a mistake. See the remark [A]. Du Pleffis says, Moine de Citique.

“ yet be vanquished, for he supports and proves his doctrine by passages from the Gospel, and from the Apostle St. Paul's Epistles, and even from the original works of the ancient orthodox Fathers (3).” Du Pleffis does not omit the salvo which Langius makes use of to soften so many bold propositions. Thus speaks that Monk, says he, non assertive, sed admirative, not with a design to affirm any thing, but out of admiration, suspending his judgment after the example of several other persons, till the matter be determined by a general Council. I have here transcribed Langius's own words. Porro quæ de Martini Lutheri Doctrina differunt, non sicut discipulus ejus assertive, quod abfit, sed potius admirative posui: utpote nullius adhuc juratus in verba magistri. Sed cum sim & ego more suspensus multorum, quousque per Oecumenicum universale & generale Concilium, quid in tam ardua re tenendum sit, decretum fuerit, paratus nibilo tamen minus, & modo, semper a recte sapientibus doceri, quorum etiam & potissimam Romanæ Ecclesiæ judicio hæc præsentia, & alia qualiacunque mea scripta & corrigenda & examinanda subjicio, tametsi ego supra narrata, non de Romanis sed de Romanensibus, id est, non indigenis, sed aliunde ad eum confluentibus descripsim (4). i. e. “ What I have observed of Martin

(3) Du Pleffis Mornai, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 573.

“ Luther's doctrine, I have not related affirmatively, as a disciple of his; God forbid; but rather by way of admiration, as a man who is not addicted to any party. For I am still in suspense, like many other persons, till it be decreed by a general Council, what we ought to believe in these difficult and abstruse matters. And yet I am always ready to learn from those, who think right, to whose judgment, and particularly to that of the Church of Rome, I submit both this and all my other writings, to be by them examined and corrected. However what I have observed above must be understood not of the native Romans, but of those, who from other parts flock to Rome.” These words are a strong proof of his being a Roman Catholic.

(4) Langius, ad Wolfium, Lect. memorabil.

Here follows Coeffeteau's answer to this. “ What the Sieur du Pleffis objects against us from Paul Langius a Monk of Citicus (Zeits) and a disciple of the Abbot Trithemius, shews us the sincerity of the Protestants, and with what honesty they publish the works of some authors. For they make Langius say such things concerning Luther, as are intirely inconsistent, not only with the doctrine, which Langius professed till his death, but also with what he wrote in that same Chronicle, which contains those commendations on Luther. The Protestants imagine perhaps, that they will make us believe this author was a Lutheran and a Papist, an Heretic and Orthodox, for indeed they cannot otherwise reconcile with his former writings what they make him say here. And let no man be imposed upon by the name of Pistorius, who published that work; for though he turned Catholic, yet it was some time after, and he was still a Protestant when he published this Chronicle, with some other works of German writers, and he does even declare, that he had it from Henry Petreus, who lived at Basil amongst the Heretics. Farther, the authors of this forgery are sensible that the world would hardly believe Langius spoke so honourably both of the doctrine and person of Luther; and therefore they added to it a pitiful and silly evasion, making him say, that what he wrote was not affirmative, but admirative, not to affirm any thing, but out of admiration, suspending his judgment &c. One would think that this Langius wants a master, and is not yet determined what religion he ought to choose (5).” This is a wretched reply. It were better to be silent than to make such an answer. Father Gretier waved it, and imagined he should find his account better in supposing that honest Paul Langius, who longed to take a woman in his arms, looked upon Luther as an hero, who would soon exterminate celibacy. Let us see what the Sieur du Pleffis's apologist replied to this railery, and to Coeffeteau's evasion.

(5) Coeffeteau, Reponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1218, 1219.

“ Paul Langius a Citique Monk gives such a noble and beautiful character of Luther's doctrine, that

(c) See them in the 1st edition of that Dictionary. We shall set them down in the remark [E].

relating to Pistorius, who published this Monk's Chronicle in the year 1583, which Reflection is ill-grounded in my opinion [D]. Moreri's blunders are not considerable (c) [E].

" that our Monk (Gretser) cannot bear it, but he must charge those, who published Langius's work, with adding to it from their own brains all that is quoted from it to that purpose; thus he measures their Corn by the bushel of the Papists, who are used to falsify with additions and mutilations, all the writings that pass through their hands. And yet to deprive them of this objection, God suffered this work to be published by a man, who even then had already secretly designed to apostatise, which he did at last publicly: I mean Pistorius, who would certainly have since that time discovered this artifice, had he been concerned in it, or any other person to his knowledge. Gretser, who had it in his power to examine him upon this particular, had not the impudence to charge the publisher of this chronicle with falsifying it, though otherwise he be impudent to the highest degree. He chose rather to abuse this poor Monk in these words. It is this Langius, who at the first preaching of the Lutheran Gospel longed to leave his Monastery, imagining that the happy time was now come, when the Monks would be at liberty to throw off their hood and marry Nuns. But in those times the Monks knew very well how to find means to lie with Nuns, without marrying them: and if they had not been hindered by other considerations, Coeffeteau does not want to be told, that they had opportunities enough to gratify their desires (6)." These last words shew evidently, that the common topics which the Missionaries insist upon against the marriage of the Reformers, and of the Monks who improved the Protestant Religion, are not so favourable to them, as they imagine. They afford them indeed a large field for declamations; the most odious descriptions of sensuality drop very thick from their pen.

But it is an easy matter to retort their own objections upon them; for it is but too true that they who make a vow of celibacy, do not always keep it; and common sense teaches us, that if the Ministers of the Church have not power enough over themselves to abstain from women, it is much better that they should satisfy their passion with their own wives, than with their neighbour's wives.

[D] A reflection of Andrew Rivetus . . . which is ill-grounded in my opinion. We have seen just now, that he pretends Pistorius would have discovered his falsification after he was become a good Papist. I believe that he is mistaken. If Pistorius had falsified Langius's manuscript, he would never have boasted of it. The advantage which might accrue to the Church of Rome from such a confession; would have been very inconsiderable. Whether Langius commended Luther in the year 1520, or spoke ill of him, or did not mention him at all, it is after all of very little consequence. But Pistorius could not have discovered his wicked artifice, without making himself contemptible to the Roman Catholics, and exposing himself to the abuses of the Protestants, who from his own confession would have had an argument to prove him a dishonest man. Such faults are never confessed; they are attended with too bad consequences to be owned.

[E] Moreri's blunders are not considerable. He ought to have called Langius's native place Zwiska and not Bozan (7). His Monastery was called Bozan and not Bozan. The mistake of Pistorius instead of Pistorius has been corrected in the editions printed in Holland. It ought not to have been said, that his Chronicle begins with the year 1468; this is a blunder of Vossius, which I have already censured, and which Zeillerus has transcribed (1).

(6) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mythe de l'Iniquité, Part. 2. p. 633.

(7) It is called Zurickau in the edition of Moreri printed in Holland.

(8) Zeillerus, de Historicis, Part. 1. pag. 85.

LANGIUS (RODOLPH a Gentleman of Westphalia, and Provost of the Cathedral Church of Munster towards the end of the sixteenth Century, distinguished himself by his learning, and by his zeal for the restoration of polite Literature. He went through his first studies at Deventer, and was afterwards sent into Italy; by his uncle the Dean of Munster, and applied himself to the greatest masters in Literature, Laurence Valla, Mapheus Vegius, Francis Philadelphus and Theodore Gaza. By this means he acquired a good taste of the Latin stile both in verse and prose, and confirmed himself in it by composing several pieces. His fellow-travellers in that journey were Maurice Count of Spiegelberg, and Rodolph Agricola: after they were returned into Germany, they laboured all three to banish ignorance, and were the first who by their example and by their exhortations established a good method of writing in Latin, and of teaching that tongue. Langius being sent to the Court of Rome by the Bishop and Chapter of Munster, under Pope Sixtus IV, acquitted himself very well of his Commission, and came back with letters from this Pope and from Laurence de Medicis, which made him still more considered than he was before, by those who had sent him to Rome, so that he was more able to prosecute his design of making the Belles Lettres flourish, by banishing from the schools the ignorance which prevailed there. He was obliged to struggle some years with those who protected it [A], and who objected that the

[A] He was obliged to struggle some years with those who protected ignorance. The University of Cologne thwarted Langius's commendable design; but it was approved by the Italians, and their suffrages had such a power with the Bishop of Munster, that they determined him intirely. You will see a more particular account of this in Chytraeus's words (1). Causam bonarum literarum & emendationis studiorum doctrinæ barbaræ, passim in omnibus Collegiis & Scholis regnantium, majore cum fructu egit (Langius) tamen aliquot adhuc annos reluctans veteris Barbarici patronis, ac nominatim Academia Coloniensis, quæ datis ad Conradum Ritbergensem Episcopum, qui Henrico Swartzburgensi successerat, & summum Collegium, literis, usitatum tot seculis instituendæ adolescentiæ & docendi rationem & libellos, in scholis retineri, & mutationes novas, & studii & disciplinæ periculosas, severi flagitabant. Etsi autem erudite & graviter Consilii sui causas Rodolphus explicabat: tamen ad Italorum doctorem judicia ipsi provocare necesse fuit. Qui cum emendationem doctrinæ in scholis usitatæ necessariam esse & Langium recte, Lovanienses (2) perperam judicare, in responsis ad Episcopum suis pronunciaissent: Episcopus qui Italorum, apud quos olim vixerat, censuram magni faciebat, facultatem aperiendæ novæ bonarum literarum scholæ Collegio dedit. i. e. Langius strenuously asserted the cause of polite literature, and shewed effectually how necessary it was to alter the method of studying, which in those times of ignorance had prevailed in most of the colleges and schools; though the patrons of ignorance opposed his design for some years, particularly the University of Cologne, which sent a letter to Conrad Ritberg, who had succeeded Henry Swartzburg in the Bishoprick of Munster, and to the Chapter, desiring them to continue the old method of teaching, and the books that were in use for so many years, and to prevent all changings, which were dangerous to the studies and to the education of the youth. Though Rodolph explained the reasons of his de-

(1) David Chytraeus in Saxonia, lib. 3. pag. 20. 20.

(2) As the author had only mentioned the University of Cologne, and not that of Louvain, we ought perhaps to read Colonienses instead of Lovanienses. But he had perhaps forgot to observe, that the University of Louvain did also write to the Bishop of Munster to thwart Langius's design.

the introducing a new method of teaching was dangerous; but at last he got over all these difficulties, and persuaded his Bishop to found a school at Munster, the direction of which was committed to learned men. He pointed out to them the method they were to follow, and the books they were to explain, and gave them the use of his fine Library. This school being thus established a little before the end of the fifteenth Century, became very flourishing, and served as a nursery for Literature to all Germany till the Revolutions which were occasioned at Munster by the Anabaptists in the year 1554. Langius died in the year 1519 at the age of fourscore. He published some Poems, by which it appears that there were Latin Poets of some reputation in Germany before Conrad Celtes (a) [B]. Rodolph Agricola dedicated his Latin Translation of Plato's Axiochus to Langius (b).

(a) Taken from David Chytræus, in Saxonia, lib. 3. pag. m. 80, & seq. See also his Oration de veteris Saxonie Provincia amplissima quæ Westphalia bodie nominatur, pag. m. 108, & seq.

(b) Idem, in es Oratime, pag. 108.

“sign with a great deal of learning and wisdom, yet he was obliged to ask advice of the learned men in Italy, who gave it as their opinion, that it was necessary to alter the manner of teaching in the schools, that Langius had judged right, and that those of Louvain were in the wrong in their answers to the Bishop; whereupon the Bishop, who had a great respect for the judgment of the Italians, amongst whom he had lived formerly, gave the Chapter a power to open a new school for polite literature.”

(†) See the marginal note (2).

[B] He published some Poems, by which it appears that there were Latin Poets of some reputation in Germany before Conrad Celtes.] Let us quote again the same voucher. Primus autem Germaniæ Poeta, ipseus Rodolphi Agricolæ judicio, ævorum ætate, aliquot ante Conradum Celten annos celebris, hic Rodolphus Langius fuit, editis, de excidio Hierosolymæ postremo, de obsidione Novæsi, de Paulo Apostolo, de Maria Virgine, Poëmaticis claris. Deque condiscipulo & æquali suo Hegius cecinit:

Jam ferre Poetas
Barbarie in media Westphalis ora potest.
Langius hanc decorat majorum sanguine clarus,
Monasteriaci lautque decusque soli,

Primus Melpomenem qui rura in Westphala duxit,
Cum caneret laudes, maxime Paule, tuas.

i. e. “Rodolph Langius was, in Rodolph Agricola's opinion, the first amongst the German Poets; he was famous in our grandfather's days, some years before Conrad Celtes, having published the following poems, on the last destruction of Jerusalem, on the siege of Nuys, on the Apostle St. Paul, on the virgin Mary, by which poems he has gained a reputation. Hegius his schoolfellow and contemporary says of him: Westphalia can now suffer Poets, in the midst of the darkness that covers it. Langius eminent by his noble extraction, the glory and ornament of Munster, illustrates this country. He is the first who led the muse into the fields of Westphalia, when he sung thy praise, O great Saint Paul.”

Observe that Chytræus by using the word editis, published, hints that these poems had been printed: and yet the abbreviator of Gesner's Bibliothecque (3), who mentions some other poems of Langius, raises some doubts; for he observes that Herman Hamelman, who acknowledges that he had seen those poems, does not declare, whether they were printed or only manuscripts.

(3) Epit. Biblioth. Gesneri, pag. m. 714.

(a) Cæsaremontanus.

(b) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 388.

(c) And yet the edition of 1512 is set down in the Oxford Catalogue.

LANGIUS JOSEPH) born at Keifersberg (a) in Upper Alsace, and Professor of Mathematics and of the Greek Tongue at Friburg a city of Brisgaw, was composing in the year 1612 his Elementale Mathematicum (b), which, according to Vossius, was not printed (c) till five years after (d). Isaac Habrecht a Philosopher and Physician made Additions to it, and adorned it with Notes and Plates, and published it thus (e) in the year 1625. Langius had published at Strasburg in the year 1598 a Florilegium [A] in 8vo, which some years after was followed by a work in folio intitled, Polyanthea nova [B]. He lived several years in the Protestant Communion, and then he turned Roman Catholic (f). I shall give the titles of his other works below [C].

(d) At Friburg.

(e) At Strasburg.

(f) Taken from the Preface of his Polyanthea.

[A] A Florilegium. It is a collection in an Alphabetical order of sentences, Apophthegmas, Comparisons, examples, and symbols. Such a work is very useful to young scholars, when they have some discourses or exercises to make upon any subjects. Learned men might also use it with some advantage, if all that is quoted there had been carefully compared with the originals. But nothing like this has been done. Our Langius did only transcribe modern compilers, and amongst others Thomas Hibernicus (1), whose work intitled Flores Doctorum (the flowers of the learned) abounds with errors.

(1) Dietericus nihil aliud in Longio reprehendit, quam credulitatem, qua se ab Hibernico decipi passus. Thomæsius, de Plagio, num. 482.

(2) At Basil, and then at Sarno in the year 1514, and at Cologne, in the year 1539. Index Libror. prohib. pag. 726, edit. 1667.

(3) It was printed at Venice in the year 1592.

[B] Polyanthea nova. The author follows in this work the same method as in his Florilegium. There are some passages of it corrected in the Spanish expurgatory Index, which contains also an history of the books intitled Polyanthea. I imagine that the reader will not blame me for giving here the substance of that history. The first Polyanthea was printed in the year 1512 (2): it was written by the Monk Dominicus Nanus Mirabellius, the author of the Monotesaron Evangeliorum, or the harmony of the four Gospels. The second was compiled by a bookseller of Cologne named Maternus Cholinus, and published in the year 1585 (3). He added to Mirabellius's work, all that he thought fit to transcribe from three other books which had been published, I mean the collection of Bartholomæus Amantius, the Sententiarum opus absolutissimum ex probatissimis auctoribus excerptum (4). i. e. “A most complete work containing sentences, collected from the most approved authors.” And an anonymous work printed at Lyons. Cholinus added to all this his own collections. The third, intitled Polyanthea nova, is our Joseph Langius's work: it was printed at Geneva in the year 1600, at Lyons in the year 1604, at Francfort in the year 1607, and several times since. The fourth, intitled Polyanthea novissima, is divided into twenty books, and differs from the preceding only with regard to some additions which it contains. The fifth with this title, Florilegium magnum, seu Polyanthea floribus novissimis sparsa, was published at Frankfort in the year 1621. The new additions contained in this work are owing to the Lucubrations of Franciscus Sylvius Insulanus. We have mentioned Gruter's Supplements in another place (5): they are in two volumes, so that the Florilegium magnum contains three. The 1st is of Sylvius Insulanus, the 2d and 3d, printed at Francfort in the year 1624, were compiled by Gruter.

(4) By Franciscus Tertius, or De Tert, of Anjou. This work was printed at Paris in the year 1560, and reprinted in the year 1580.

(5) In the article GRUTER (James) remark [1].

[C] I shall give the titles of his other works below.] He published an edition of Juvenal and Persius at Friburg in the year 1608. Tyracinium Græcarum Litterarum (an introduction to the Greek tongue for young beginners) printed in the same City in the year 1607. Adagia, sive Sententiæ proverbiales, (A collection of Proverbs, or proverbial sayings).

LANGLE (JOHN MAXIMILIAN DE) Minister of the Gospel, was born at Evreux in the year 1590. He was called to the Reformed Church of Roan in the year 1615, being then but twenty five years old. He performed there all the functions of a Minister during fifty two years, and always with a great reputation, piety and eloquence. We have of him two volumes of Sermons, the one on the eighth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, the other on several texts of the holy Scripture, and a Dissertation in the form of a Letter being a defence of Charles I King of England. Seven years before his death he fell sick of a palsy, which caused an impediment in his speech; but yet he continued to please and edify by his conversations, which were both pious and witty. He died in the year 1674, at the age of fourscore and four years, leaving several children behind him [A], who have inherited his merit and virtue (a).

(a) This article is printed just as it has been communicated to me.

[A] He left several children behind him.] SAMUEL DE LANGLE his eldest son was born at London, and was carried into France when he was but a year old; he continued in that country till the last persecution obliged him to retire into England. He was a minister at about the same age as his father had been, and served the church of Roan with him during three years. He was afterwards called to Paris in the year 1671, to be a minister to the congregation which met at Charenton; he was very much esteemed in both on account of his strict morals, sound learning, and consummate wisdom: there was an intimate friendship between him and Monsieur Claude. The persecution which the reformed suffered in France, and particularly the King's Edict by which the fathers were deprived of their children, forced him to take sanctuary in England. The University of Oxford took a pride in conferring the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon him, without his petitioning for it; and King Charles II. shewed him how much he esteemed him by making him a Prebendary of Westminster. He was born in the year 1622. In June 1693, when he was threescore and eleven years old, he fell sick of a violent distemper, in which however he enjoyed all the strength of his mind, addressing continually excellent discourses to his relations, to his friends, and particularly to his children, to whom he had given the same education as he had received from his father. The publick has not yet seen any of his writings, but a letter concerning the controversy between those who are called Episcopals and Presbyterians in England. Doctor Stillingfleet now Bishop of Worcester (1) had it printed at the end of one of his books on the same subject. But they found amongst his manuscripts a treatise of the Christian truth, which he had begun some years ago, and which he had finished a little before he died. It is hoped that his eldest son Monsieur de Langle, who is also a minister, will soon publish that work. The illustrious deceased had also made several critical remarks on divers passages of the Scripture, and particularly on the Psalms, which it is thought he would have published himself, had he lived long enough to put them in that order and condition, which it seems he designed to do (2). As for the other children of John Maximilian de Langle, the memoirs I quote do not mention a word of them.

(1) He died since the first impression of this, namely in the year 1694.

(2) Memoirs communicated to me, which I publish just as they have been sent to me.

LANGUET (HUBERT) born at Viteaux in Burgundy (a), gained a great reputation by his learning and virtue in the sixteenth Century. Having read a book of Melanchthon in Italy, it created in him so strong a desire to be acquainted with that great man, that he went into Germany on purpose to visit him. There was the most intimate friendship between them [A]. He charmed him by his agreeable conversation; for with a strong memory he had also a very acute judgment (b). He continued a long while

(a) Thomas, lib. 74. towards the end, under the year 1581.

(b) See the remark [A].

[A] There was the most intimate friendship between Melanchthon and him.] All that I have to observe upon this subject is extracted from Joachim Camerarius's life of Melanchthon. Hunc (Languetum) lectio libri cujusdam in Italia, ubi tum ipse degeret, a Philippo Melanchthone compositi cupiditate incenderat videndi autorem illius, et ea stimulis perpetuo admoveens perpulcrat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret, et Wittenbergam se conferret (1). Languet arrived at Wittenberg in the year 1549 (2), and kept so constantly to Melanchthon that he never left him, except to take a journey now and then. Neque ab ipso discessit nisi interdum per intervalla quedam peregrinationum quibus mirifice delectabatur, donec Philippi Melanchthonis vita in terris duravit (3). Languet's conversation was admirable; he discoursed very pertinently on the interest of Princes, and was perfectly well acquainted with the history of illustrious Men. Erat autem Philippo grata atque jucunda multarum magnarumque rerum, quas ille tenebat, commemoratio, et oratio de Regibus Principibusque gubernationum, et altis sapientia, virtute, doctrina prestantibus borum temporum (4). i. e. "Melanchthon was very much pleased and delighted with his conversations, in which he gave him an account of several important affairs, which he remembered very well, and with his discourses concerning Kings and Princes, and other men of those times eminent for their wisdom, virtue, and learning." His memory never failed him with regard either to the circumstances of times, or to proper names; and he discovered the inclinations of men, and foresaw the success of things with a wonderful sagacity. The person who gives him that character had been particularly acquainted with him. Neque ego, says he (5), audivi ullum alterum, qui tam prudenter et certo, et plane, dilucide, disertè exponeret, quicquid narrare institisset. Non ille in hominum nominibus falli, non indicis temporum errare, non confundere rerum negotiorumque seriem. Erat autem in eo singularis sagacitas in notandis naturis hominum, et conjiciendo, quo quisque suo ingenio deserretur, et quæ esset voluntatis inclinatio. Consiliorum etiam solertissimus estimator, et eventuum futurorum provisione admirabilis. i. e. "I never heard a man, who could expound with so much prudence, certainty, plainness, evidence, and eloquence, whatever he undertook to relate; he never mistook the names of men; he was never wrong in the circumstances of time; nor did he ever confound the order and series of things and events. He had also a wonderful sagacity to discover the Characters of men, and to conjecture which way men's tempers would lead them, and what was the inclination of their minds. He judged almost with certainty of their designs, and could most wonderfully foresee the event of things."

Let us add to this what Monsieur de la Mare relates. He observes that about the year 1548, a German gave Languet Melanchthon's Common Places or Body of Divinity; that Languet having read that book four or five times over that same year in his travels, found all his doubts removed which had a long time perplexed his mind, and conceived an extraordinary esteem for Melanchthon; that having conferred the most considerable divines at Leipzick, he embraced the Protestant Religion; and became a pupil of Joachim Camerarius who was professor of polite literature in the University of Leipzick; that he even lodged at that Professor's house; that seeing the troubles arising in that country he undertook a journey into Italy till such time as he could settle in Germany when the publick tranquillity should be restored there; that he studied the law a whole year at Padua, and took his Doctor's degree there; that he went afterwards to Bologna, and that at this time, as Joachim Camerarius relates it (6), he was so enchanted with the reading of a new book of Melanchthon, that he longed

(6) Quo tempore narrat in Philippo Melanchthonis Vita Joachimus Camerarius elegantis illius et multiplici eruditione referti de anima libri à Melanchthone non ita prius scripti lectione Languetum tanta aviditate incensum fuisse Et Philipp. de la Mare, in Vita Langueti, pag. 10.

(1) Joach. Camerari. in Vita Melanch. pag. m. 333.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Ibid.

(c) Thuanus, lib. 74. towards the end, under the year 1581.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) See Essais de Literat. for July 1702, pag. 23.

(7) Melanchthonem ab eo tempore tanti aestimare, ut reliquos cœcutire ac propriis assensibus indulgere judicaret, unum autem sapere Melanchthonem. Idem, ibid. p. 9.

(8) Camer. in Vita Melanchthonis. pag. m. 344.

(9) Languet, Epist. 15. ad Joach. Camerari. pag. m. 27.

(10) It is the 28th of those which he wrote to Camerarius the son.

(11) Vie de Du Pleffis Mornai, pag. 56. under the year 1581.

while one of the first Counsellors of Augustus Elector of Saxony (c), and if we may believe Thuanus, he left that Court only [B] because he was suspected to be one of those who advised Gasper Peucer to publish an Exposition of the Doctrine of the Lord's Supper agreeable to the Geneva Confession of Faith. That Historian adds, that having left the Court of Saxony he retired with the Prince of Orange, and was employed in very important affairs; but that whilst he applied himself to them he fell sick and died at Antwerp September the 50th 1581 at the age of threescore and three years (d). He was very much esteemed by Monsieur du Pleffis Mornai [C]. He is thought to be the author of the Oration which was delivered before Charles IX King of France, December the 23d 1570, in the name of several Princes of Germany [D]. It is to him people ascribe the famous Treatise which is intitled, VINDICIÆ CONTRA TYRANNOS [E]; i. e. "A Defence against Tyrants." The Latin Letters which he wrote to Sir Philip Sidney were printed at Frankfort in the year 1639 (e). Those which he wrote in the same tongue to both the Camerarius's, father and son, were published in the year 1646, and have been reprinted with some others (f) in the year 1685: there is a beautiful Preface (g) prefixed to them, which contains a noble Panegyric upon him.

They published at Hall in the year 1699 a large Collection of those Letters, which he wrote to his master the Elector of Saxony [F] during the course of the negotiations.

(f) Which he wrote to Augustus Elector of Saxony.

(g) Written by Joachim Camerarius, grandson to the author of Melanchthon's Life.

for nothing more passionately, than to return into Germany, to see the author of that book; which he did accordingly in the year 1549.

I find something in this account, which puzzles me; for it is not at all probable, that a man who has conceived such an esteem for Melanchthon, by reading his Body of Divinity, that he takes him for the only wife man in the world (7), should take a journey to Leipfick, continue there some time, and embrace there the Protestant Religion without waiting once upon that divine; and that he should be impatient to make him a visit, only upon reading at Bologna another work of that author. It is not true that Camerarius asserts this other work was the treatise de Anima (concerning the soul) and that it determined Languet to return into Germany. He expresses himself so as to hint, not a second journey, but the first, pepulerat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret. i. e. "Determined him at last to come into Germany (8)." Lastly it is very strange, that if Languet had been Camerarius's disciple and boarder at Leipfick in the year 1548, Camerarius should yet assert that Langius did not come into Germany till the year 1549, out of a desire to see Melanchthon, occasioned by a book he read in Italy. It is unquestionable that either Camerarius or Monsieur de la Mare must be here mistaken. It is most probable that the former is in the right, for Languet (9) himself relates, that having read Melanchthon's Body of Divinity in Italy in the year 1547, and not being thoroughly satisfied with what is there observed concerning the Lord's Supper, he was determined to go and consult the author himself, and saw him in the year 1549. Would he speak thus, if he had embraced the Protestant Religion at Leipfick, in the year 1547, and if Camerarius had been his professor and his Landlord that same year in the same city?

[B] If we may believe Thuanus, he left that court only &c.] Thuanus gives us too imperfect an account of this. The exposition of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper was published in the year 1573. Languet was not then at the court of Saxony, but at the Emperor's; and he did not leave that employment till the year 1577 (10), that his Electoral Highness of Saxony had given him leave to retire where ever he pleased; and since that time he always kept up a great correspondence with that Prince, though he applied himself to the affairs of Prince Casimir, or to those of the Prince of Orange. All this is proved by the letters published in the year 1699.

[C] He was very much esteemed by Monsieur du Pleffis Mornai.] This appears from the following passage (11). "Du Pleffis at his arrival at Antwerp found his wife and children sick. And even a son whom God had given him in his absence, was soon after snatched away from him. But besides this, his intimate friend Monsieur Languet was dead: Madam du Pleffis, though sick herself, had attended him to his last moment. His dying words were these. That the only thing which grieved him was, that he had not been able to see Monsieur du Pleffis again before he died, to whom he would have left his very heart, had it been in his power. That he had wished to live, to see the world reformed; but since it became daily worse and worse, he had no longer any business in it; that the Princes of these times were strange men; that virtue had much to suffer, and little to get: That he pitied Monsieur du Pleffis very much; to whose share a great part of the misfortunes of the times would fall, and who would see many unhappy days; but that he must take courage, for God would assist him. For the rest he begged one thing of him, in his last farewell, namely that he would mention something of their mutual friendship, in the first book he should publish. Which Monsieur du Pleffis did soon after in a short preface to the Latin translation of his treatise of the Truth of the Christian religion." The commendations, which he bestows on Languet in that preface, and what others have published upon the same subject, have been carefully collected by Voetius (12). The epitaph alone is worth a panegyrick. You will meet with it in the same Voetius.

Observe that Languet shewed himself a very affectionate and zealous friend to Monsieur du Pleffis, at the time of the massacre committed on St. Bartholomew's day (13).

[D] He is thought to be the author of the oration which was delivered before Charles IX. . . . in the name of several Princes of Germany.] Monsieur Colomies gives a very strong proof of it in his Melanges Historiques (14) or Historical Miscellanies. He takes it from a letter of Languet to his hero Sir Philip Sidney, dated from Vienna January the first, 1574.

[E] It is to him people ascribe the famous treatise, which is intitled VINDICIÆ CONTRA TYRANNOS. What I have observed upon this subject in the first sketch of this dictionary is too long to be conveniently inserted in this place; I thought it therefore more proper to refer it to the end of this work in the form of a dissertation.

Some persons suppose him to be the author of the book, entitied de Furoribus Gallicis (15), of the madness of the French: but without any just ground (16). It was thought in his family, that he wrote the famous apology for the Prince of Orange; the reason of this opinion was, that he had sent a copy of it to every one of his relations, as a work of his own composing. And yet Grotius ascribes (17) this apology to another French man, named Peter de Villiers (18).

[F] They have published . . . a large collection of the letters, which he wrote to his master the Elector of Saxony.] Monsieur Ludovicus professor in the University of Hall has given us this edition. We should be still more obliged to him, had he added to it an index of the principal subjects mentioned in them, and had he taken care to have the errors of the printers or of the transcribers with regard to proper names more exactly corrected. People wonder that he prefixed no preface to this book, and that whereas the editions published in Germany are generally considerable by their indexes, there is none to Languet's letters, where it was wanted more than in a great many other books; because each of these letters contains several particular

(12) Dissert. Theologic. vol. 4. pag. 238, & seq.

(13) See the Vie de Mr. Du Pleffis, pag. 22. See also pag. 12.

(14) Pag. 13, 14.

(15) Mentioned above in quotation (44) of the article BEZA.

(16) See Mr. de la Mare, in Vita Langueti, pag. 67, 68.

(17) Lib. 3. Belgic. Annual.

(18) La Mare in Vita Langueti, pag. 121, 122.

tiations. We must not omit what Thuanus relates of a conversation he had with him in the year 1579 [G].

facts, which are not in the least connected with any general subject. This work is intitled, Arcana sæculi decimi sexti. Huberti Langueti, Legati, dum viveret, & Consiliarii Saxonici, Epistolæ secreta ad Principem suum Augustum Sax. Ducem & S. R. I. septemvirum. Ex APXEIΩ Saxonico descriptas primus à Museo edit. Jo. Petr. Ludovicus. i. e. "The secret history of the seventeenth century, being a collection of letters written by Hubert Languet, Ambassador and Counsellor of the Court of Saxony, to his master, Augustus Duke of Saxony and Elector of the Empire, transcribed from the publick records of Saxony, and now published for the first time by John Peter Ludovicus." The Abbot Nicaise had told me for certain, that the author's life written by Monsieur de la Mare would be prefixed to these letters; but this did not prove true. It has been published by itself in the same city of Hall, in the year 1700, in 12mo. If I had met with it soon enough, this article would have been much better, more complete and more connected. Consult Monsieur Bernard (19), who has given a very full and accurate account of this piece; which is very well written and very curious.

(19) In his Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for March 1701, pag. 286, &c.

[G] We must not omit . . . a conversation, which Thuanus had with him. . . . He got acquainted with Languet at the wells of Baden in the year 1579, and was so well pleased with this man's behaviour, and with his agreeable and learned conversations that he thought he should never be able to part with him. Here follows the elogy he bestows upon him; I transcribe it here, because neither Voetius nor Monsieur Teiffier mention it in the least. Argentina Badam ventum, ubi Thuanus Languetum vacuum nactus ita mordicus per triduum ei adhaesit, ut ab eo divelli non posse putaretur. Ita candor hominis illum ceperat, insigni probitate, judicio non solum in literis, sed in publicis negotiis, quæ tota vita sub variis Principibus magna fide gesserat, præditi ad hæc rerum Germaniæ callentis. Ut Germanos ipsos res patrias suas doceret. Toto illo tempore cum eo assiduus, nisi quantum aquis sumendis impendebat, cum multa didicit, tum breviculum manu ipsius perscriptum, quod & nunc servat, postquam hinc discessit, ab eo accepit, quo generalis Germaniæ status, sicut hodie est, comitiorum jus, circularum numerus, consiliorum ordo describitur (20). i. e. "From Strasburg we came to Baden, where Thuanus meeting with Languet, who was free from all business, stuck so closely to him during three days, that it was imagined he could never part from him: so pleased was he with this man's eminent probity, and with his great judgment not only in the Sciences, but also in publick affairs, in which he had been engaged all his life-time, having served several Princes very faithfully: he was particularly so well acquainted with the affairs of Germany, that he could instruct the Germans themselves in the affairs of their own country. Thuanus being constantly with him all that time, except when he was drinking the waters, learnt a great many things from him; and when he had left that place, he received from him some memoirs, written in his own hand, containing an account of the present state of Germany; of the rights of the diets, of the number of the circles, and of the order or rank of the different councils of that Country, which memoirs he still keeps by him."

(20) Thuan. de Vita sua, lib. 2., towards the beginning, pag. in. 1176.

Thuanus also relates that Languet made him take notice of a German Lord who was at a window with his wife, and asked him afterwards with a smile, If you were put to your choice, would you prefer a woman as beautiful as she is, before the Archbishopric of Cologne? Thuanus who did not understand the design of this question, made no answer to it. Whereupon Languet explained the whole mystery to him, and told him that the German Lord was the Count of Isenburg, who had lately resigned the Archbishopric of Cologne, to marry Jane de Lignes, the Count of Aremburg's sister. He added that the suppression of Celibacy was burthensome to the great Protestant Lords in Germany; for whereas in the time of Popery they used to put their daughters into Nunneries, with certain hopes to see them soon raised to the dignity of Abbesses in some rich Nunnery, they were now obliged to provide husbands for them, though they lived in a country, where people were very prolific (21).

These inconveniencies which attend the suppression of celibacy in the noble Protestant families in Germany.

(21) Filiæ omnes quibus homines proletarii abundunt, matrimonio elocare teneantur. Idem, ibid.

LANSBERGIUS (PHILIP) had a rank amongst the Mathematicians of the seventeenth Century. He was born in Zealand (a) in the year 1561 (b), and was a Minister of the Gospel at Antwerp in the year 1586, and afterwards for several years [A] at Goes in Zeland; and being afterwards discharged of his functions on account of his old age, he retired to Middleburg (c), where he died in the year 1632. You will find the titles of his works below [B].

(a) Vossius, de Scient. Matbem. pag. 341.

(b) Lansberg. Epist. Dedic. Uranometrie.

(c) Vossius, de Scient. Matbem. pag. 341.

(1) De Scient. Matbem.

[A] He was a minister . . . for several years.] Vossius (1) asserts in page 237, that he was Minister at Goes thirty nine years more or less: but in page 341 he sets down but twenty nine years. There is certainly an error of the press here; but whether it consists in the omission or in the addition of an x, I own I cannot tell it: It must be one.

[B] You will find the titles of his works below.] Chronologia Sacrae Libri VI. "Six books of sacred Chronology"; printed in the year 1626. Progymnasmata Astronomiæ restitutæ. "Essays on the restitution of Astronomy"; printed at Middelburg in the year 1629. Triangulorum Geometricorum Libri IV. "Four books of Geometrical triangles"; printed in the same City, in the year 1631. Uranometriæ Libri III. "Of measuring the Heavens, in three books"; printed the same year, and in the same City. Commentationes in motum terræ diurnum & annum, & in verum aspectabilis cæli typum. "An account of the diurnal and annual motion of the earth, and of the true situation of the visible celestial bodies": In this work he declares himself openly for Copernicus's opinion, and even pretends to improve it. He composed this work in Dutch; but it was translated into Latin by Martin Hortensius, and printed at Middelburg in the year 1630. Fromond a Doctor of Louvain refuted it in his Anti-Aristarchus, sive orbis terræ immobilis: "A treatise in which it is proved that the earth stands still." Lansbergius, who did not live long enough to reply to this refutation, left a son, who published an answer to Fromond, and at the same time to Morin, Regius Professor at Paris, and to a Dane named Peter Bartholinus. This answer is intitled, Jacobi Lansbergii Medicinæ Doctoris Apologia pro Commentationibus, &c. i. e. "A defence of the account &c. By James Lansbergius, Doctor of Physick"; it was printed at Middelburg in the year 1635, and refuted in a new work of Fromond printed in the year 1634, and intitled Vesta or Anti-Aristarchi Vindex. "The earth, or a vindication of Aristarchus". I think the controversy ended here.

LANSDOWNE (GEORGE GRANVILLE, Lord) was descended of an antient and noble family derived from Rollo, the first Duke of Normandy, and was second son of Bernard Granville, who was second son of Sir Bevil Granville, killed at the battle of Lansdowne in 1643, and younger brother of Sir John Granville, who was a chief instrument in the Restoration, after which he was created Earl of Bath and Viscount Lansdowne. The Nobleman, of whom we treat in this article, received the first tincture tincture of letters in France under the tuition of Sir William Ellis, a Gentleman bred up under Dr. Busby, and who has since been eminent in many public stations. At eleven years of age he was sent to Trinity College in Cambridge, where he remained five years; but at the age of thirteen was admitted to the degree of Master of Arts, having before he was twelve years old spoken a copy of English verses of his own composition to the Duchefs of York, at his College (a), when her Royal Highness paid a visit to the University of Cambridge. October the 6th 1688 he wrote a letter from Mar near Doncaster to his father upon the expected approach of the Prince of Orange's Fleet [A]. In 1690 he wrote a copy of verses to Mrs. Elizabeth Higgons in answer to one sent him by that Lady in his retirement [B]. In 1696 his Comedy called The She-Gallants was acted at (a) These verses are printed in his Genuine Works in Verse and Prose, vol. 1. pag. 4. 5. edit. London 1736, in 12mo.

[A] October the 6th 1688 he wrote a letter from Mar near Doncaster to his father upon the expected approach of the Prince of Orange's Fleet. It was written before he was twenty two years old, and was as follows:

" Sir,
 " Your having no prospect of obtaining a commission for me, can no way alter or cool my desire at this important juncture to venture my life in some manner or other for my King and my country. I cannot bear living under the reproach of lying obscure and idle in a country-retirement, when every man, who has the least sense of honour, should be preparing for the field. You may remember, Sir, with what reluctance I submitted to your commands upon Monmouth's Rebellion, when no opportunity could prevail with you to permit me to leave the Academy. I was too young to be hazarded; but give me leave to say, it is glorious at any age to die for one's country, and the sooner, the nobler sacrifice. I am now older by three years. My uncle Baibe was not so old, when he was left among the slain at the battle of Newbury; nor you yourself, Sir, when you made your escape from your tutors to join your brother at the defence of Scilly. The same cause is now come round about again. The King has been misled; let those who have misled him, be answerable for it. No body can deny but he is sacred in his own person, and it is every honest man's duty to defend it. You are pleased to say, it is yet doubtful, if the Hollanders are rash enough to make such an attempt. But be that as it will, I beg leave to insist upon it that I may be presented to his Majesty as one, whose utmost ambition it is to devote his life to his service, and my country's, after the example of all my ancestors. The Gentry assembled at York to agree upon the choice of Representatives for the country, have prepared an Address, to assure his Majesty they are ready to sacrifice their lives and fortunes for him upon this and all other occasions; but at the same time they humbly beseech him to give them such magistrates as may be agreeable to the laws of the land; for at present there is no authority, to which they can legally submit. They have been beating for Volunteers at York, and the towns adjacent, to supply the regiments at Hull; but no body will list. By what I can hear, every body wishes well to the King; but they would be glad his Ministers were hanged. The winds continue so contrary, that no landing can be so soon as was apprehended; therefore I may hope, with your leave and assistance, to be in readiness before any action can begin. I beseech you, Sir, most humbly and most earnestly, to add this one act of indulgence more to so many other testimonies, which I have constantly received of your goodness, and be pleased to believe me always, with the utmost duty and submission,

" Sir,

" Your most dutiful, and most " Obedient Servant,
 " Geo. Granville."

[B] In 1690 he wrote a copy of verses to Mrs. Elizabeth Higgons, in answer to one sent him by that Lady. That Lady's verses were as follow.

I.
*Why, Granville, is thy life to shades confin'd,
 Thou whom the Gods design'd
 In public to do credit to mankind?
 Why sleeps the noble ardour of thy blood,
 Which from thy ancestors, so many ages past,
 From Rollo down to Bevil flow'd,
 And then appeared again at last,*

In thee, when thy victorious lance Bore the disputed prize from all the youth of France?

II.

*In the first trials, which are made for fame,
 Those to whom fate success denies,
 If taking counsel from their shame,
 They modestly retreat, are wise.
 But why should you, who still succeed,
 Whither with graceful art you lead
 The fiery barb, or with as graceful motion tread
 In shining balls where all agree
 To give the highest praise to thee?
 Such harmony in every motion's found,
 As art could ne'er express by any sound.*

III.

*So loved and prais'd, whom all admire,
 Why, why should you from Courts and Camps retire?
 If Myra is unkind, if it can be,
 That any nymph can be unkind to thee;
 If penfive made by love, you thus retire,
 Awake your muse, and string your lyre;
 Your tender song and your melodious strain
 Can never be address'd in vain;
 She needs must love, and we shall have you back again.*

His Lordship's answer begins thus:

" Cease, tempting Siren, cease thy flatt'ring strain,
 " Sweet is thy charming song, but sung in vain:
 " When the winds blow, and loud the tempests roar,
 " What fool would trust the waves, and quit the " shore?
 " Early and vain into the world I came,
 " Big with false hopes and eager after fame:
 " Till looking round me, e'er the race began,
 " Madmen and giddy fools were all that ran.
 " Reclaim'd betimes I from the lists retire,
 " And thank the Gods, who my retreat inspire.
 " In happier times our ancestors were bred,
 " When virtue was the only path to tread.
 " Give me, ye Gods, but the same road to fame;
 " What'er my fathers dar'd, I dare the same.
 " Chang'd is the scene, some baneful planet rules
 " An impious world, contriv'd for knaves and fools."

He concludes with the following lines.

" Happy the man, of mortals happiest he,
 " Whose quiet mind from vain desires is free;
 " Whom neither hopes deceive, nor fears torment,
 " But lives at peace, within himself content,
 " In thought or act accountable to none,
 " But to himself, and to the Gods alone.
 " O sweetness of content! Seraphic joy!
 " Which nothing wants, and nothing can destroy.
 " Where dwells this peace, this freedom of the " mind?
 " Where, but in shades remote from human kind;
 " In flow'ry vales, where nymphs and shepherds
 " meet,
 " But never comes within the palace-gate.
 " Farewell then cities, courts, and camps, farewell,
 " Welcome, ye groves, here let me ever dwell,
 " From cares, from business, and mankind remove,
 " All but the Muses and inspiring love:
 " How sweet the morn! how gentle in the night!
 " How calm the ev'ning! And the day how bright!
 " From hence, as from a hill, I view below
 " The crowded world, a mighty wood in shew,
 " Where several wanderers travel day and night,
 " By different paths, and none are in the right."

at the Theatre Royal in Lincoln's-Inn Fields [C]; as his Tragedy intitled, Heroic Love, was in the year 1696 [D]. He wrote likewise a Dramatic Poem, intitled, The British Enchanters: or, no Magic like Love [E], which was performed at the Queen's Theatre in the Hay-Market; and altered Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, under the title of The Jew of Venice, which was acted with great applause, and the profits of it were designed for Mr. Dryden, but upon his death given to his son. In 1702 he translated into English the second Olymbian of Demosthenes. He was returned Member for the County of Cornwall in the Parliament which met in November 1710, and soon after made Secretary of War, next Comptroller of the Household, and then Treasurer, and sworn one of the Privy Council. The year following, by Letters Patents bearing date December the 31st, he was created Baron Lansdowne of Biddeford in Devonshire. In 1719 he made a speech in the House of Lords against repealing the Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity [F]. His Lordship died in February 1735. By his Lady, Mary, widow of Thomas Thynn Esq; (Father of Thomas Lord Viscount Weymouth,) and daughter of Edward Villiers Earl of Jersey, he had issue four daughters, Anne, Mary, married March the 14th 1729 to William Graham of Platten near Drogheda in Ireland Esq; Grace, and Elizabeth. His Lordship's works have been printed together at London in 4to and 12mo. His Lady died but a few days before him.

[C] His Comedy called, The She-Gallants.] He afterwards altered this Comedy, and published it among his other works under the title of Once a Lover, and always a Lover, which, as he observes in the preface, "is a new building upon an old foundation. It appeared first under the name of the She-Gallants; and by the preface then prefixed to it is said to have been but the Child of a Child. By taking it since under examination so many years after, the author flatters himself to have made a correct Comedy of it. He found it regular to his hand; the scene constant to one place; the time not exceeding the bounds prescribed; and the action intire. It remained only to clear the ground; and to plant, as it were, fresh flowers in the room of those, which were grown into weeds, or faded by time; to retouch and vary the characters; enliven the painting; retrench the superfluous; and animate the action, where it appeared the young author seemed to aim at more than he had yet strength to perform."

[D] His Tragedy intitled Heroic Love.] Mr. Charles Gildon tell us (1), that "this is one of the best of our modern Tragedies, and writ after the manner of the antients, which is much more natural and easy than that of our modern Dramatists." The Prologue to it was written by Henry St. John Esq; and the Epilogue by Bevill Higgons Esq; Mr. Dryden wrote a copy of verses to our author upon this Tragedy, which begins thus:

*Auspicious Poet, wert thou not my friend,
How could I envy, what I must commend!
But since 'tis nature's law in love and wit,
That youth should reign, and with'ring age submit,
With less regret those laurels I resign,
Which dying on my brow, revive on thine.*

[E] The British Enchanters.] In the preface our author observes, that this "was the first essay of a very infant muse, rather as a task at such hours as were free from other exercises, than any way meant for public entertainment. But Mr. Betterton having had a casual sight of it many years after it was written, begged it for the stage, where it found so favourable a reception, as to have an uninterrupted run of at least forty days. The separation of the principal Actors, which soon followed, and the introduction of the Italian Opera put a stop to its farther appearance." Mr. Addison wrote the Epilogue.

[F] In 1719 he made a speech in the House of Lords against repealing the bill to prevent Occasional Conformity.] It is printed among his works. In this speech, among other things, he says thus: "I always understood the Toleration to be meant as an indulgence for tender consciences, not a licence for hardened ones; and that the act to prevent Occasional Conformity was designed only to correct a particular crime of particular men, in which no sect of Dissenters was included, but those followers of Judas, who came to the Lord's Supper for no other end but to sell and betray him. This crime, however palliated and defended even by so many Right Reverend Fathers of the Church, is no less than making the God of Truth, as it were in person, subservient to acts of hypocrisy; no less than sacrificing the mystical Body and Blood of our Saviour to worldly and sinister purposes: an impiety of the highest nature! which in justice called for protection, and in charity for prevention. The bare receiving the Holy Eucharist could never be intended simply as a qualification for an office, but as an open declaration, an indubitable proof of being and remaining a sincere member of the Church. Whoever presumes to receive it with any other view, profanes it; and may be said to seek his promotion in this world, by eating and drinking his own damnation in the next." H.

LARROQUE (MATTHEW DE) in Latin Larroquanus, one of the most illustrious Ministers the Reformed ever had in France, was born at Leirac a small city of Guienne near Agen in the year 1619. He was hardly past his youth when he lost his father and mother, who by their condition and by their virtue were the chief persons in their city. This misfortune was soon followed by the loss of his whole patrimony; nor could it be known by what fatality it happened, or to whose fraud it was owing. But this was so far from discouraging him, that on the contrary it animated him more strongly to comfort himself by studying, and to add to polite Literature, which he had already learnt, the knowledge of Philosophy, and above all that of Divinity. He made a considerable progress in these Sciences, and was admitted a Minister with great applause. Two years after he had been installed in his office, he was obliged to go to Paris to answer the cavils of those, who intended to ruin his Church. He could not prevent the effect of their artifices, but he happened to meet with such circumstances as proved favourable to him. He preached sometimes at Charenton, and was so well liked by the Duchels de la Tremouille, that she appointed him Minister of the Church of Vitre in Britany, and gave him afterwards a great many proofs of the particular esteem she had for

(a) Son to the Ducheſs De la Tremouille.

(b) Daughter to the ſame Ducheſs.

(c) Named Martin.

for him; as did alſo the Prince (a) and Princeſs of Tarente, and the Ducheſs of Weimar (b). He ſerved that Church about twenty ſeven years, and ſtudied the ancient Fathers with the utmoſt application. He gave very ſoon public proofs of the progreſs he had made in that ſtudy, for the answer he publiſhed to the motives, which a certain Miniſter (c) had alledged for his conversion to Popery, abounded with paſſages quoted from the Fathers. The works which he publiſhed afterwards raiſed his reputation exceedingly [A]. There was an intimate frienſhip between him and Meſſieurs Daillé father and ſon, which was kept up by a conſtant literary correſpondence. The journey he took to Paris procured him the acquaintance of ſeveral illuſtrious men of letters [B]. The Church of Charenton reſolved to call him in the year 1669, but the envy of ſome falſe brethren againſt him was ſo ſtrong, that they had recourſe to ſeveral artifices to prepoſſeſs the Court againſt him, ſo that his Majeſty ſent a prohibition to that Church not to think of calling him, notwithstanding the Deputy General of the Reformed (d) had offered to answer for Monſ. de Larroque's good behaviour. The grief he was under at being calumniated was very great, but the teſtimony of a good conſcience was his comfort. He was choſen to be both Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Saumur. He accepted the office of a Miniſter, but reſuſed the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, not thinking it conſiſtent with the ſtudy of Church-Hiſtory, for which he had a very ſtrong inclination. He was preparing himſelf for his journey to Saumur, when the Intendant of the Province (e) forbade him to go thither. The Church of Saumur brought in their complaints againſt this unjuſt prohibition, and petitioned very zealouſly for the neceſſary permiſſion, which ſhe obtained. But Monſieur de Larroque did not think it proper to make an advantage of it, nor to enter upon an employment in ſpite of the Intendant. He continued therefore ſtill at Vitré, where he did not ſuffer his pen to be idle. Three of the moſt conſiderable Churches of the Kingdom choſe him at once, namely the Church of Montauban, that of Bourdeaux, and that of Roan. He accepted the invitation of Roan, and there he ended his life January the 31ſt 1684, at the age of threeſcore and five years, having gained the reputation not only of a learned man, but alſo of an honeſt man, and

(d) The Marquis de Ravigni.

(e) Named Monſ. Voifin.

of

[A] The works which he publiſhed afterwards raiſed his reputation exceedingly.] In the year 1665 he publiſhed an answer to a book of the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, intituled, L'Office du S. Sacrement, ou Tradition de l'Eglife touchant l'Euchariftie, recueilli des Saints Peres & autres Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques. i. e. "The Office of the Holy Sacrament, or the Tradition of the Church concerning the Lord's Supper, collected from the Holy Fathers and other Eccleſiaſtical Authors." This answer was very much eſteemed. Mirâ cum ſolertiâ nimis Catholicorum virorum, qui ut legentibus ſuum facerent, SS. Patrum textum vel mutilaverant, vel pravo commento inquinaverant, pias fraudes vel impias dicam neſcio, retexit. Mirati ſunt omnes nihil inter reſpondendum illum fugiſſe, nihilque vindicandum intactum fuiſſe, tantâ ſagacitate ac diligentâ unum quodque expendens officium, ut in ejus meſſem nemo pedem, vel Spi-cilegii cauſa intulerit (1). i. e. "He laid open with great ſubtlety the pious or impious frauds, I know not how to call them, of thoſe over-catholic men, who to impoſe upon their readers had caſtered the text of the Holy Fathers, or perverted the ſenſe of it by a wicked commentary. All the world wondered how he could remember every thing in his answer, and forget nothing that deſerved to be vindicated; he had diſcharged his whole taſk with ſo much ſagacity and diligence, that no man pretended to undertake it after him, even by way of eſſay." How good ſoever this book was, it was not to be compared with the excellent work, which the ſame author publiſhed ſome years after with this title, Hiſtoire de l'Euchariftie. i. e. "The Hiſtory of the Eucharift, or of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper." There were two editions of it publiſhed in leſs than two years, and it has been tranſlated into Engliſh. The author's name was not put to the firſt edition, but it was prefixed to the ſecond, which was printed in the year 1671. It is true that his name was a little altered through an error of the Printer, who undoubtedly took a q for a g, in the author's manuſcript ſigning (2). Hence it came that ſeveral polemical writers of the Roman Catholic Church called him Larrogue inſtead of Larroque. In the year 1670 he publiſhed at Geneva two Latin diſſertations de Photino & Liberio, in which he took notice amongſt other things of ſome errors committed by Father Petavius concerning the time when Photinus was condemned. He reſuted in a third diſſertation what Mr. David had objected againſt the firſt. After this he undertook the defence of his good friend the learned Monſieur Daillé, (in Latin Dallens) againſt two celebrated Engliſh writers. That work is intituled, Observationes in Ignatianas Pearsonii Vindicias, nec non in Beverigii Annotationes. i. e. "Observations on Dr. Pearson's Vindication of Ignatius, and on Dr. Beveridge's Remarks." He had almoſt finiſhed his reply to Dr. Beveridge's answer; but being deſired by ſome friends to give up this controverſy, he very willingly granted them their requeſt. His book of the agreement between the diſcipline of the Reformed Church in France with that of the Primitive Church was publiſhed after the works I have been mentioning, and was followed by a treatiſe on receiving the Sacrament in both kinds, wherein he reſutes a work of the Biſhop of Meaux. This is what we find in the author's life, prefixed to a poſthumous work of his, which his ſon Monſieur Daniel de Larroque publiſhed in the year 1688. He does not mention there the treatiſe of the nature of the Church, nor that of the Regale: we muſt therefore add theſe two treatiſes to the former; and as for his poſthumous work, let us obſerve that it is intituled, Matthæi Larroquani Adverſariorum ſacrorum libri tres. Opus poſthumum. Acceſſit Diatriba de Legione fulminatrice, in quo expenduntur Veterum teſtimonia quibus hætenus hæc Hiſtoria vera habitæ eſt. Authore Daniele Larroquano M. Filio. i. e. "Three Books of Sacred Observations, by Matthew de Larroque: A Poſthumous Work: To which is added a Diſſertation on the Thundering Legion, wherein are examined the authorities of the Ancients on which this hiſtory has hitherto been admitted as true." Monſieur Daniel de Larroque the ſon, who had already given proofs of his learning and wit, is the author of that diſſertation on the Thundering Legion. He tells us that his father undertook to write a Church-hiſtory, and had finiſhed the three firſt centuries, and begun the fourth. It is to be hoped that the publick will ſome time or other be preſented with that work.

[B] The journey he took to Paris procured him the acquaintance of ſeveral illuſtrious men of letters.] Amongſt others that of Monſieur Juſtel, of Monſieur Amproux (3) and of Monſieur Conrart. They with Meſſieurs Daillé and Monſieur Allix were the Pro-teſtants, for whom he had the greateſt friendſhip. He alſo made himſelf known to ſeveral learned men of the church of Rome, particularly to the Abbot de Marollea, and to Monſieur de Launoi. They have found amongſt his papers ſeveral letters of theſe two gentlemen, and chiefly of the latter (4).

(3) Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris.

(4) Taken from his Life prefixed to his Adverſariorum Sacrorum Libri tres.

(1) Daniel Larroquanus, in Vita Summa Matthæi Larroquani, fol. 225.

(2) Compare this with what is obſerved above, in the remark [N] of the article CAYET.

(f) Taken from the Short Account of his Life, prefixed to a work, which his son Mr. de Larroque published at Leyden in the year 1688, intitled, Matthæi Larroquani Adversariorum Sacrorum Libri tres.

of a good Pastor (f). All these good qualities were united in him [C], though they be but too often separated. See his Elogy in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for March 1684, Article V.

[C] All these good qualities were united in him. I have referred you to his Elogy in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres; I refer you also to the preface from which I have extracted this article, and from which I shall again transcribe some lines of Gregory of Nazianzen. Id duntaxat subjungamus colophonem huic elogio imposturæ, quod de suo parente nimirum dicebat Gregorius Nazianzenus, etenim nostro apprime accommodari potest (5).

(5) Daniel Larroquanus, in Summa Vitæ Matthæi Larroquani, in fine.

Ἦν μοι πατήρ καλός τε καὶ γαδὸς σφόδρα,
Γρηγόριος, ἀπλῆς τῶν τρόπων, εὐλόγη βίῃ,
Πάτερρχο· ὄντως Ἀβραάμ τε δότιμχο.

Ὦν ἡ δοκῶν ἄριστος, ἡ τῶν νῦν τρόπος (6).
- - - - - Χριστὸν Φιλῶ.
Ἐπίστα σομῶν, ποιμῶν ὅτι κρείττο.

(6) This is the Elogy which Æschylus bestows on Amphiarus. See above, the remark [H] of the article AMPHARAUS before the 1st break, or a-linea.

That is, "To conclude this elogy, let us add here, what Gregory of Nazianzen said of his father, for it may very well be applied to mine. My father was a very good and honest old man, sincere, of a regular life, like another Patriarch Abraham; he chose rather to be than to appear good, which is not the fashion now. . . . He loved Christ, was a true pastor, and an ornament to his order."

LASCARIS (CONSTANTINE) left Constantinople his native place in the year 1454, and retired into Italy. He was one of those who restored polite Literature in the West. He taught it first at Milan, whither he was called by Francis Sforza. He went afterwards to meet Cardinal Bessarion at Rome, who gave him several proofs of his friendship. Then he went to Naples, where he taught Rhetoric and the Greek Tongue with reputation. Lastly he went to Messina, where he settled for the remainder of his days. He drew a great many scholars thither, and amongst others Peter Bembus, who was promoted to the dignity of a Cardinal by Pope Clement VII. He bequeathed his Library to the Senate of Messina: it contained excellent books, which he had brought with him from Constantinople. The Senate had complimented him (a) with the freedom of the City, and had him buried at the expence of the public. His marble tomb, which was in the Church of the Carmelites, has been ruined by the injury of the time, and has never been repaired (b). Our Lascaris has composed some works [A].

(a) In the year 1465.

(b) Taken from Jerom Ragusa, in Elogiis Siculorum.

[A] He composed some works. They treat of the Greek Grammar; Aldus Manucius printed them with some other small treatises of the same kind in Greek and Latin. Lascaris also made a collection of the lives of the learned men who flourished anciently in Sicily (1).

(1) The Jesuit Jerom Ragusa has inserted it in his Elogia Siculorum, a book printed at Avignon in the year 1690.

LASCARIS (JOHN) furnamed Rhyncacenus (a), was of the House of Lascaris, of which there have been some Emperors of Constantinople. He took sanctuary in Italy after the destruction of the Eastern Empire in the fifteenth Century, and was very kindly received by Laurence de Medicis. This great protector of the Learned judged him proper to collect the best manuscripts that were to be met with in Greece, and therefore he sent him to the Sultan [A]. This deputation was attended with very good success:

(a) Perhaps from a city named Rhyncacus situated between the Hellespont and Phrygia; Stephen of Byzantium mentions it.

[A] Laurence de Medicis . . . sent him to the Sultan. He sent him twice to him, if we may credit Paul Jovius, who adds that this Sultan loved Philosophy, and had a particular esteem for Laurence de Medicis. It is necessary to transcribe the very words of this Historian, because I must compare them with Monsieur Varillas's account. Is (Laurentius Medices) tum absolvendæ Bibliothecæ studio tenebatur. Ob id Lascarem, adquirenda volumina Byzantium cum legatione ad Bajazetem bis misit: nec desuit honesta petenti, nusquam Barbarus Imperator, quippe qui erat totius Philosophiæ studiosus, Averroisque sectator eximius, & de Laurentio privatim tanquam de illustri cultore virtutis, optimè sentiret, quum paulo ante Bandinum percussorem fratris, fuga in Asiam elapsum in catenis ad supplicium tradidisset (1); singulari quidem religionis, atque justitiæ exemplo; quòd ille immane scelus in templo ausus, merita pœna plelendus censeretur. Itaque Lascares, tunc abdita Græciæ perscrutatus, quum patriæ opes victoribus effissent, nobiliora divitiis antiquæ dignitatis volumina collegit, ut in Italia servarentur (2). i. e. "Laurence de Medicis had a strong desire to complete his library; for which purpose he sent Lascaris twice in the character of his Ambassador to Bajazet, that he might make a collection of books. Nor did the Sultan, who was by no means a barbarian, refuse to comply with his request; for he had applied himself to every part of Philosophy, and was an eminent follower of Averroes; he had also a great esteem for Laurence de Medicis as for a man distinguished by his virtues; he had given him a proof of it some time before, when he sent back to him in chains Bandini the murderer of his brother, who had made his escape into Asia; which was a remarkable instance of piety and justice; for he judged, that this wicked wretch

(1) Paul Jovius is here mistaken, it was not Bajazet II, but his father Mahomet II, who caused Bandini to be arrested, and who sent him to Laurence de Medicis in the year 1478. See Guillet, Hist. de Mahomet II, tom. 2. pag. 320, &c. and pag. 439. Observe that Mr. de Wicquefort has committed many blunders upon this subject. See his treatise de L'Ambassadeur, tom. 2. pag. m. 269.

(2) Jovius, Elog. cap. 31. pag. m. 74.

having committed that horrid attempt in a church, ought not to escape the punishment he deserved. Lascaris therefore, having searched all Greece without the least danger, instead of his paternal estate, on which the conquerors had seized, brought more valuable treasures with him; I mean considerable works of the ancients, to be kept in Italy." Monsieur Varillas imagined that this account, which Paul Jovius gives us, is too dry and lame, and therefore he has adorned it with a great many circumstances, as though instead of translating faithfully another's work, he had been ordered to turn it into a Romance. Here follows his relation (3). "Laurence de Medicis received Lascaris with open arms, and committed the care of his library to him. It happened one day, as they were discoursing together how they might improve it, it came into Lascaris's mind, that Bajazet II. Emperor of the Turks had an inclination for Philosophy, and that having caused Averroes's commentaries on Aristotle to be explained to him, he would not be sorry that the Peripatetics should be saved from the general ruin of literature. Laurence de Medicis promised that he would furnish him with all things necessary for a voyage to Constantinople, if he would undertake it with such a design. Lascaris took him at his word, and embarked without any credentials, except a letter which Laurence de Medicis gave him for his factors. However he found means to get access to the Grand Signior, and to be presented to his Highness, who received him even better than he expected. They had a pretty long conversation together, and Bajazet shewed him all the esteem, of which an Infidel is capable, for Laurence de Medicis's virtue, and gave Lascaris leave, for his sake, to buy all the manuscripts, that were to be

(3) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 183.

fold

for the Grand Seignor gave Lascaris leave to visit all the Libraries; by which means numberless scarce and valuable treasures of Literature were carried into Italy. Lascaris went afterwards into France, and was esteemed by Lewis XII, who sent him Embassador to Venice [B]. He went to Rome under Pope Leo X, and took another journey into Greece, “ sold in his dominions. His Highness gave him some “ persons to escorte and conduct him to all the places “ where he knew there had been libraries formerly

 “ and to take care, that those who had plundered them, “ might not sell the books for more than they were “ worth. Lascaris therefore was able to travel conveni“ ently over all Greece, and collect those scarce volumes, “ which are still kept in the King's library. And yet
 “ he brought but half of them with him in the first “ voyage he made, because the joy he had to be in “ a condition to shew to his patron the authors he “ had discovered, though they were thought to be “ lost for ever, made him return to Florence two “ years after he set out from thence. But Laurence “ de Medicis sent him back again three “ months after, and desired him to continue to “ search every place where there had ever been “ learned men. Lascaris waited again on Bajazet, “ and received new favours from him. He travelled “ over the whole Peloponnesus, and came back as it “ were in triumph on board a ship laden with the “ spoils of the Greek tongue. But he had not yet “ lodged his manuscripts in the stately building de“ signed for them, when Laurence de Medicis died, “ leaving Italy in a state of tranquillity, which did “ not continue long. The French army entered Flo“ rence, and dispersed both the books and all the “ other furniture of the house of Medicis.” There are here not only several circumstances, which Monsieur Varillas forged to adorn his account and make it more full, but also some falsifications of facts; for he supposes, I. That Lascaris had no credentials for the Grand Signor. If it be so, what can be the meaning of these words of Paul Jovius, Byzantium cum LEGATIONE ad Bajazetum misit? i. e. “ He sent “ him to Byzantium in the character of his Embassa“ dor to Bajazet?” II. That the scarce volumes which Lascaris collected, are in the French King's library, the French army having plundered the books and other furniture of the house of Medicis, under the reign of Charles VIII. To refute that Historian's assertion, we need only to put him in mind of what he has observed in another work (4), namely that the house of Medicis was plundered by the Florentines, before ever Charles the eighth's troops entered Florence. He asserts positively that the Florentines dis- persed the prodigious collection of statues, pictures, books and medals which strangers used to behold with admiration in the palace of Medicis. Observe that the books of that library, which may have been carried into the French King's library, were brought thither another way, than by the means of Charles the eighth's expedition. They were lodged there much later: See father Jacob in his treatise of libraries; he tells you that Catherine de Medicis brought to her husband Henry II. amongst other things, the manuscripts of the famous library of Medicis, which were lodged in the royal library, where they still remain (5).

If it be ever proved that Monsieur Varillas does not ground the account he gives us of Lascaris in his Anecdotes (or secret history) of Florence, only on Paul Jovius's eulogies, I shall then examine whether I were in the wrong to charge him with forging most of the circumstances he relates. If he had been acquainted with what Paul Jovius relates in another book, he would have given us a story much more paraphrased still; it had been a scene adorned with a great many decorations. Paul Jovius relates, that the Bashaw Cherseoglis obtained leave for John Laf-caris to visit all the Libraries in Greece, when by Pope Leo the tenth's orders he was searching for ancient manuscripts. Nec illud quidem erga literarum studia eximia benignitatis officium prætermittendum vi-detur, quod Lascari, quem supra memoravimus Græcorum nobilissimo, pariter atque doctissimo antiquos codices justa Leonis decimi conquiriti, cunctas Græciæ bibliothecas impetrato ad id regio diplomate, liberè excutiendas aperuit (6). i. e. “ Nor ought we to omit the fol“ lowing remarkable instance of Cherseoglis's kind “ inclination to protect literature: for when Lascaris,

“ that most noble and learned Grecian, whom we “ have mentioned above, was by Leo the tenth's “ command searching for ancient manuscripts, Cher-“ seoglis got him a patent from the Sultan, by which “ he was permitted freely to search all the Libraries “ in Greece.” This historian had observed just before, that the Bashaw, who was turned Mahometan out of spite, was still a Christian in his heart, and had a crucifix hid in his closet, which he used to worship in the night time, when no man could be a witness to it. He shewed this Crucifix to John Laf-caris, who related afterwards all these particulars to Paul Jovius. Let us acquaint the reader with the reasons of that spite, which determined Cherseoglis to abjure the Christian religion outwardly. He was upon the point of marrying a beautiful maiden; when his father who liked her very much took her for himself. This injury exasperated the son to such a degree, that he retired to the neighbouring garrisons of the Turks, and thence to Constantinople, where Bajazet received him very kindly, and promised him one of his daughters. Whereupon the young man turned Mahometan, renounced his name of Stephen, and took the names of Achomat and Cherseoglis, and became Bajazet's son-in-law (7). With what romances, with what flourishes should we not meet in the secret history of Florence, if Monsieur Varillas had been acquainted with the following Latin passage? Non, ut cæteri
ferè omnes à prima pueritia per delictis Christianis parentibus erepti, sed jam planè vir (Cherseoglis) ita à majorum religione discessit, ut nunquam ex arcano vera pietatis oblivisceretur. Is Chersechii regni in Illyrico, ad montem Nigrum filius, quum adamata ei sponsa que erat è Stirpe Serviciæ Despoti, ad paratas nuptias ducer-etur, concupivit eam illico, quod esset egregia venustatis, procaci oculo improbus pater, omnemque pudorem super-ante libidine, sibi statim impotenter excluso filio nuptias celebravit, frustra reclamantibus propinquis: qui id faci-mus filio contumeliosum patrique & domui infame detesta-bantur. Itaque juvenis tantæ injuriæ indignitate commotus, præcipitque aclus desperatione, &c. (8). i. e.
 “ Cherseoglis was not, like a great many others,
 “ snatched away from his parents in his childhood,
 “ but being already a grown man, he renounced the “ religion of his ancestors, yet so, that he could never “ forsake nor forget the truth from the bottom of his “ heart. He was the son of Chersechius, a petty “ King of Illyricum, near the black Mountain. He “ was going to marry the daughter of the governor “ of Servia, whom he loved intirely, when his wic“ ked father finding her beautiful, looked upon her “ with a lustful eye, and his lust banishing all shame “ from his heart, he snatched her away from his “ son and married her himself, notwithstanding all the “ endeavours of his relations, who abhorred the fact “ which was an injury to the son, and a disgrace to “ the father. The young man being highly exasper-“ rated at so great an affront, and hurried away by “ a sudden despair, &c.”

I leave others to examine whether Paul Jovius did not mistake the voyages which John Lascaris made by Laurence de Medicis's command, with that which he supposes he made under Pope Leo X. Bajazet died before Leo X was chosen Pope, and I question much whether Cherseoglis had great credit under that Sultan's successor; it is certain that he never was any longer able to do John Lascaris service, than under the reign of Bajazet.

[B] Lewis XII. . . sent him Embassador to Venice.]
 I find that he sent him thither in that character in the year 1503, and in the year 1505. See Peter Bembus's history of Venice (9), where he relates the subject of these embassies, and gives us the substance of the embassador's orations. Vianoli (10) asserts, that in the year 1507 the republick being acquainted with the league of Cambray dismissed Lascaris, Lewis the twelfth's ambassador. But how could the republick be acquainted at that time with a league, which was not concluded till December 1508? See the margin (11).

(7) Jovius, ibid.
255 verso.

(8) Jovius, Hist.
lib. 13. folio 255.
See also Melanchthon, in the 5th
book of Carion's Chronick.

(9) Lib. 6. fol.
m. 144 verso, &
lib. 7. folio 152.

(10) Historia
Veneta, Part. 2.
pag. 76.

(11) I imagine that the alliances which were forming before the conclusion of the treaty of Cambray are called the League of Cambray by way of anticipation.

What

(4) Varillas, Hist. de Charles VIII. liv. 3. under the year 1494, pag. 262. of the edition printed in Holland.

(5) Jacob, Traité des Bibliothèques, pag. 458.

(6) Jovius, Hist. lib. 13. folio, m. 256.

Greece, from whence he came with some young Gentlemen who were to be educated in the College which was founded on the Mons Quirinalis, in order to preserve the true pronunciation of the Greek Tongue (b). He returned into France under the reign of Francis I [C], and after he had continued there some time he went again into Italy, and died of the gout at Rome aged about fourscore and ten years. He was buried in the Church of St. Agatha. Though he had no settled income, yet he had always wherewithal to bear his expences, though he took no care of his domestic affairs, and loved to live in a grand manner. His laziness would not suffer him to write many books (c) [D]. He understood the Latin Tongue very well, and he did not judge it beneath

(b) Taken from Paul Jovius, in Elog. cap. 31.

(c) Ex eodem, ibid.

(12) Wicquefort, de l'Ambassadeur, liv. 1. pag. m. 166.

What Monsieur de Wicquefort relates of this embassy is not very obliging. The Pope, says he (12), discovered too late the fault he had committed in choosing so impertinent and ridiculous a Minister. John Lascaris, whom Lewis XII sent ambassador to Venice in the year 1503, was not much less impertinent. He was of a family, which had formerly afforded great Princes to the empire of Constantinople, and he was a very learned man; but he was not in the least acquainted with publick affairs. He had besides such a mean countenance, and lived in such a pitiful and fordid manner, that instead of appearing like an ambassador, and doing honour to the King his master, it seemed as though he affected to imitate the false modesty of those, who applying themselves entirely to speculative Philosophy, pretend to a wilful poverty, and are a kind of Cynicks. His commission was so much the more difficult, as he was ordered to borrow money, and to conclude an alliance, at a time when the senate was not in the least inclined to favour the French; because the King's affairs were not in a very good situation in Italy. Laurence Suarez de Figueroa, Ambassador from Ferdinand the Catholick, made an advantage of the republick's discontent, who could not bear that the King should have sent them a pedant instead of an Ambassador; Suarez therefore said in a full senate, that the republick might judge how the King of France would treat them, if after the conquest he pretended to make of the kingdom of Naples, he came to be superior, and in a condition to oppress all Italy without controul, since even at a time when he was in the utmost necessity, and wanted assistance, he shewed such a contempt for the senate, as to send them a Greek Philosopher newly come from the schools.

[C] He returned into France under the reign of Francis I. Paul Jovius's not mentioning this has been the occasion why Monsieur Varillas did not mention it neither. His paraphrase of the Italian historian is as follows. Lascaris not knowing what course to take, applied himself to Charles VIII; and as he was skilled in matters of state, he was sent ambassador to Venice, and acquitted himself worthily of that employment, under this Monarch, and under his successor Lewis XII. Lastly Leo X being raised to the Papal Throne, sent for Lascaris to Rome to be of his council (13). This, according to Monsieur Varillas, was John Lascaris's last employment. But there is more than one mistake here; for the Pope did not make him his counsellor, (13) Varillas, Anecd. de France, pag. 184.

(14) See a Letter of Budæus, amongst those of Erasmus, it is the 30th of the 2d book, pag. 156.

but director of a college for the Greek tongue (14), and after that time this learned man had some employment at Paris. I imagine it was that of Library keeper to the King; the reason I have to think so is taken from a letter, which James Tusa wrote to Angelo Lascaris the son of John, in which we meet with the following words (15). Fani patris tui excellentem in Romana lingua, nedum vestra, peritiam Græcæ literaturæ quantum usu, quantum scientiâ præcellat, ex hoc intelligi vel maximè posse, quod sum ex cunctis vestri generis hominibus de sententia doctissimum delectum Princeps noster Franciscus accersendum esse tenuerit, ut Musæo quod in hac urbe longe omnium Principe multo celeberrimum speramus excitatum iri, propediem, velut alter Apollo præsideat. i. e. "I do not design to expatiate on your Father's eminent knowledge in the Roman, not to mention your own language; however I cannot but observe, that how much he excelled both in the practice and in the Theory of the Greek literature, appears from this,

(15) Gesner, in Biblioth. folio 39 verso.

that our King Francis judged him the most proper man, amongst all the learned of your nation, to be intrusted with the care of his library, which is to be erected in the most noble city in the world, and will, we hope, become much more considerable by his care, who is to preside over it as another Apollo." Here follows another passage, which is not free from errors, but yet it will serve us for an argument. I transcribe it from the Theatre of the antiquities of Paris composed by James du Breul (16), Emanuel Chrysoloras had for his scholar Angelo Tifernas, who being at Paris in the year 1523 taught the Greek tongue to John Lascaris and to William Budæus two learned men, who published several noble works, as Genebrard observes in his Chronology in these words. Anno 1523 Chrysoloræ, qui primus Litteras Græcas Florentiam Cosmo Mediceo Florentino Duce attulit, discipulus Tifernas in Franciam venit, Budæumque litteras Græcas docuit. Deinde Janus Lascaris, mortuo Laurentio Medico Mæcenate suo. Atque inde literatura Græca, deserta Italia, ad nos migravit. i. e. "Tifernas a disciple of Chrysoloras, who first introduced the knowledge of the Greek Tongue into Florence, under the grand Duke Cosmo de Medicis, came into France in the year 1523, and taught Budæus the Greek Tongue. After him came John Lascaris after the death of his protector Laurence de Medicis. Thus the Greek literature leaving Italy came over to us." Now Lascaris and Budæus, as the same author witnesses, were the first at whose persuasion King Francis I erected the library of Fontainebleau, and established afterwards Regius Professors, as the same author asserts. Lascaris & Budæo auctoribus, Franc. I. Bibliothecam Fontainebleam instruxit, indeque anno 1530 Linguarum & Mathematicum professores. Nam cæteri sunt adscriptitii. i. e. "Francis the first established the library of Fontainebleau at the persuasion of Lascaris and Budæus; and in the year 1530 he established Professors of the languages and of Mathematicks; for the others are supernumeraries".

(16) Du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, liv. 2. pag. 563. of the Paris edition 1659, in 4to.

There are several things to censure in this passage. In the 1st place, Tifernas's Christian name was Gregory and not Angelo. 2. He died in the fifteenth century; how could he then come to Paris in the year 1523? Father du Breul had observed just before, that Chrysoloras, who died at Constance April the 15th 1415, had taught him the Greek tongue. Should not this have made du Breul sensible, that Tifernas was not alive under the reign of Francis I? 3dly. It is absurd to pretend that John Lascaris, who was a Greek by nation, learned the Greek tongue from an Italian (17). It is gross ignorance to assert, that he and William Budæus were young scholars in the year 1523. Budæus was then fifty two years old, and was reckoned to be the most learned man, and the greatest Grecian in France. 5. The passage quoted by Du Breul from Genebrard signifies, that John Lascaris came into France after Tifernas, and after the death of Laurence de Medicis. Du Breul did not understand it. Observe that Lascaris returned into France in the year 1518 (18), and that he was there still in the year 1528 (19). This proves Moreri guilty of a gross blunder, who asserts that Lascaris died soon after Leo X had been chosen Pope.

(17) Tifernas was an Italian.

[D] His laziness would not suffer him to write many books. They wished that he would translate Greek authors; but they could hardly force from him the translation of some treatises of Polybius on the military art (20). I find that the Oxford catalogue mentions his book de veris Græcarum literarum formis ac causis apud Antiquos; i. e. "Of the true Form and Origin

(18) See Erasmus's Letters, lib. 11. num. 4. pag. 548. and num. 5. pag. 549.

(19) See the same Letters, lib. 20. num. 72. pag. 1030.

(20) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. 31. pag. 74.

beneath him to be a Corrector of the Press [E]. We must examine Giraldis's account [F].

I do not know how I came to forget a particular which deserves to be related; namely, that "he is the first who invented or at least restored and brought again into use the large letters, or to speak more properly, the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, in which he caused some moral sentences and other Greek verses to be printed in the year 1494, and dedicated them to Peter de Medicis, in a long Epistle, wherein he acquaints him with his design, and with the great pains he was at, to find out the true figure of those capital letters, in the most ancient medals and other monuments of antiquity (d)."

(d) Naude, Ad-dit. à l'Hist. de Louis XI., pag. 303, 304.

(21) Gesner, Biblioth. folio 39 verso.

(22) In the remark [A] of the article MUSURUS.

(23) Jovius, in Elog. cap. 31. pag. 74.

(24) Mentioned above, in the remark [C] quotation (25).

(25) See Erasmus's Letters, pag. 1030, 1039, 1044, and in other places, of the London edition.

(26) Erasmus in Ciceronians, pag. m. 70.

(27) Henricus Stephanus in Artis Typogr. Quæstionibus, apud Almelovenium, de Vitiis Stephan. pag. 140.

(a) See the remark [B].

"of the Greek Letters;" printed at Paris in the year 1536 in 8vo, and his Orations printed at Francfort in the year 1573. Gesner (21) observes that his Greek and Latin epigrams were printed at Basil in the year 1537.

[E] He understood the Latin tongue very well, and he did not judge it beneath him to be a Corrector of the Press. It appears from a passage in Erasmus, which I quote in another place (22), that John Lascaris was a perfect master of the Latin tongue. Paul Jovius bestows the same commendation upon him. Valubat Latina facundia, ita ut versus, qui extant, perscriberet (23). i. e. "He was well acquainted with the Latin tongue, as appears by the verses he wrote which are extant." I might add other authorities to these two, and to that of Tusa (24), if it were necessary. Observe that Lascaris was not well pleased with the elogy which Erasmus bestowed on him, in the dialogue entitled Ciceronians. He joined with the discontented persons, who wrote satirical verses at Paris against the author of that dialogue (25). He was too exceptious on this occasion, and had no reason to be angry; for Erasmus had expressed himself as follows. De Jano (Lascaris) quoniam adhuc superest, dicendum est parcius. Morum comitate generis nobilitatem præ se fert, acri judicio vir, multe in Epigrammatibus arguitur: poterat inter Ciceroniani cognominis candidatos numerari, ni crebra legationes ac regum negotia revocassent hominem à Musis (26). i. e. "We must speak more cautiously of John Lascaris, considering that he is still living. His noble descent appears in his polite behaviour: he is a man of an acute judgment, his epigrams abound with smart touches; and he might have been reckoned amongst those, who aim at the title of Ciceronian, had not his frequent embassies and the affairs of Princes, in which he was engaged, diverted his thoughts from the Muses."

With regard to his functions of a Corrector of the Press, read the following passage from Henry Stephens (27). Quid verò dicturus M. illum Musurum & Janum Lascarin putamus, in quibus primis Græcia reviviscere cepit, & qui Principes in pandendo nobis ad linguæ Græcæ adyta itinere fuerunt! quid, inquam, dicturus remur, si, quum ipsi tantum honoris arti typographicæ detulerint, ut non indignam existimarint cui suam operam navarent, fungentes munere correctorum (liceat enim de rebus typographicis typographicè loqui) id rem devenisse videntur, ut si quis &c. i. e. "What do we think would Mark Musurus and John Lascaris say, who are the first by whose means Greece began to revive amongst us, and who paved us the way to the most hidden recesses of the Greek tongue? what do we think, would they say, if they, who did so much honour to the Art of Printing, that they did not think it unworthy to receive assistance from them by their performing the functions of Correctors of the Press (for since we are speaking of things relating to printing, let us be allowed to make use of the technical words of that Art) if they, I say, should see, that things are now come to that pass, that if a man &c." Add to this the following words of Monsieur Chevillier (28). "I imagine it was Lascaris who corrected the proof-sheets of the Avicenna, printed at Lyons in three volumes in folio by John Trechsel and John Cleym in the year 1498, with the commentaries of James de Partibus; as I am apt to think from his prefixing to that book a dedication to John Ponceau the King's Physician.

[F] We must examine Giraldis's account. He tells us, that the Family of the Medicis being driven from Florence, Janus Lascaris wandered for some time from place to place, till Leo X invited him to Rome; that after this Pope's death he went into France at the invitation of Francis, who having employed him in the foundation of a College, and of a Library, sent him Ambassador to Venice; that he continued a long time there; and that at last after the death of Clement VII, he was determined by the many promises of Paul III, to return to Rome, where he died soon after, leaving behind him a son called Angelo (29). Let us observe first that there is a considerable omission here, Giraldis not saying one word of the embassy to Venice under Lewis XII. Observe next, that he supposes Francis I sent Lascaris to Venice in the character of an Ambassador, but I think he is mistaken. Lastly, take notice that he did not know, that this learned Greek was at Rome in the year 1532 under Pope Clement VII. See the 28th letter of Bunel, in which he tells us that he saw John Lascaris at Rome that same year (30).

(28) Chevillier, Orig. de l'Impri-merie, pag. 194.

(29) Taken from Lilius Gregorius Giraldis, de Pœt. suor. temp. Dial. 1. pag. m. 552.

(30) Bunell. Ep. 38. pag. 108. ed. Tolcl. 1687.

LASICIUS (JOHN) a Gentleman of Poland (a) in the sixteenth Century, gained some reputation by his writings [A]. Genebrard gives him a very bad character; he represents him as a downright Proteus, and as a weather-cock in matters of Religion. "This man, says he (b), favoured the Anti-Trinitarians about the year 1565; soon after

(b) Genebrardus, Chronol. lib. 4. under the year 1582, pag. m. 786.

(1) Pag. m. 464.

[A] He gained some reputation by his writings. It is observed in this epitome of Gesner (1), that he had published a work in his mother-tongue, in which he re-futed with great learning and judgment the new Samofatenians and Arians, and that he had also written a Latin treatise against their errors, which he dedicated to Duditi-us. The Oxford catalogue mentions the following works of his. De Diis Samogitarum cæterorumque Sarmatarum & falsorum Christianorum: item de Religione Armeniorum, & de initio regiminis Stephani Batorii. i. e. Of the Gods of the Samogitians, and of the other Sarmatians and false Christians; as also of the Religion of the Armenians, and of the beginning of Stephen Batorii's reign; printed at Basil in the year 1615. Historia de ingressu Polonorum in Valachiam anno 1572, & Dantiscanorum clades anno 1577. i. e. "An Account of the Poles entering Walachia in the year 1572, and of the overthrow of the Dantzickers in the year 1577;" printed at Basil in the year 1582. Vera Religionis Apologia & falsa Confusio; printed at Spire in the year 1582, with the Collectio variorum Authorum de Russorum, Muscovitarum, & Tartarorum Religione, Sacrificiis, & Nuptiarum ac Funerum Ritu. i. e. "A Collection of several Authors, concerning the Religion, Sacrifices, Ceremonies in the Marriages and Funerals, of the Russians, Muscovites, and Tartars." This is the work which Genebrard meant. It is proper to observe that it contains a Latin translation made by Lascius of a manuscript, which the Great Duke of Muscovy gave in the year 1570 to a Protestant Minister, who accompanied the King of Poland's Ambassadors (2). Qui Johannes Rokyta Anno Christi 1570 jussu seniorum suorum, Serenissimi Regis Poloniae Legatos in Muscoviam comitatus, ipse a sacris fuit Concionibus. Hic cum ipso Magno Moscoviæ Duce, Basilio (votatus in arcem Moscoviensem die 10 Maii) colloquium habuit, & in magna Procuratione gentis ejus frequentia fidei suæ rationem reddi-

(2) Martinus Grut. de primo Ecclesiar. Unctis Fratrum in Polonia Narrat. ad Calcem. Jo. Lascii, Hist. Fratrum Boben. pag. 381.

“ after he turned Calvinist, and then became a Bohemian Brother or a Picard [B] : and “ in the year 1582 he declared himself a Lutheran in a work printed at Spires on the “ Religion of the Mahometans (c). It is to be feared that loaded with his sins he will “ become a Mahometan himself next year. This seems to be hinted by what he ob“ serves in page 16. of that book, namely, that there are a great many various readings
 “ in the Hebrew, Greek and Latin manuscripts of the Scripture, the Heretics having “ suppressed some things in it, falsified others, and altered and added others, all which “ he proves by fine passages from Erasmus, Beza, Castalio, Francis Lucas, and Francis “ Junius; he is very angry with those who assert that Mahomet is the Antichrist, and “ who apply to him the number 666, which is mentioned in the thirteenth chapter of “ St. John’s Revelation. He declares himself the assertor of all kind of intempe“ rance (d) : they who have seen him will not wonder at it ; for his gross bulk shews
 “ that he was born only for his belly ; if he be the same whom I was acquainted “ with at Paris, and whom I strengthened against the arguments of the Anti“ trinitarians.” Such is Genebrard’s discourse ; the reader will not lay much stress upon it, if he does but remember, that this author used to slander with the utmost fury all those who were not Roman Catholics. Lascius travelled a great deal, and he had the character of Envoy from Stephen Battori King of Poland. He was still living in the year 1599. See the proof of these last particulars in the remark [B].

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) *Illic gula bibacitatis, vo-luptatis, impudicitiae patrum
agit. i. e.* “ He “ pleads for “ gluttony, “ drunkenness, “ pleasure, and “ lasciviousness.”
Genebrard. *Chro-
nol. lib. 4. pag.
786.*

*dit. A quo etiam (die 18 Junii Librum Rbutenicis characteribus (quorum illic usus est) enarratum, accepit, quo summa Religionis Moscoviticæ continetur. Qui liber a Domino Joanne Lascio Latino donatus Spiræ Nemetum
Anno 1582 typis editus est, una cum Responsonibus, quibus errores Moscovitarum deteguntur & refutantur.*
i. e. “ John Rokyta was appointed by his Elders “ Chaplain to the King of Poland’s Embassadors in the “ year 1570, and went with them into Muscovy. He “ had a conversation with the Great Duke of Mos-“ covy (being sent for to the castle of Moscow May “ the 10th) and in a great assembly of the Nobles of “ that nation, he gave an account of his faith. And “ the 18th of June he received from the same Great “ Duke a book written in Russian characters (which they “ use) containing a summary account of the reli“ gion of the Muscovites. This book has been trans“ lated into Latin by John Lascius, and printed at “ Spires in the year 1582, with a reply to it, in which “ the errors of the Muscovites are laid open and re“ futed.” Regenvolcius mentions the same particular. *Hanc fidei Confessionem, à se, mandato Principis Moschi, conscriptam, Rokita toti Senatui ipsius, eo præ-sente exhibuit. Tum Moschus Dux Responsonem ad banc Rokitæ Confessionem, libro eleganter in quarto Rubenicis litteris scripto, & pretiosè tela auro textâ ornato, comprebensum, ei in manus porrexit. Autor hujus Historiæ vidit librum hunc, in Bibliotheca eximii cujusdam Patroni. Colloquium hoc, & Quæstiones ulro citroque inter Moscovitarum Principem & Rokitam Ministrum habitas, descripsit Latino idiomate Job. Lascius, in Theologiâ Moscovitarum, Spiræ Nemetum An. 1582 edita:
cum Refutatione superstitionum Russicarum & Evangelicorum, atque ipsius Lutheri Defensione (3).* i. e. “ This “ Confession of Faith, which Rokyta wrote down,
“ by the Great Duke of Muscovy’s order, was by him “ presented to the whole Senate in the Duke’s pre“ sence : who gave him an answer to this Confession, “ fairly written in a book in quarto in Russian charac“ ters, and covered with a rich cloth interwoven with “ gold. The author of this History has seen that “ book in the library of an illustrious patron. This “ conversation with the questions and answers that “ passed between the Great Duke of Muscovy and
“ the Minister Rokyta, have been related in the Latin “ tongue by John Lascius, in his Theology of the “ Muscovites, printed at Spires in the year 1582 ;
“ with a refutation of the superstitions of the Russians
“ and of the Evangelics, and a vindication of Lu“ ther.” We shall mention another work of Lascius in the following remark.

[B] A Bohemian brother or a Picard.] I find in the preface, which is prefixed to his history of the brethren in Bohemia (4), that he first embraced the Reformation of Zwinglius, when the lesser Poland was reformed by some Ministers, who came from Zurich :
 that hearing afterwards that the Churches of Great Poland shaking off the yoke of Popery followed, some the Confession of Augsburg, and others the Confession of Bohemia, he enquired carefully into the reasons of this diversity ; that he travelled into Bohemia, Germany, and France ; that he examined very exactly all that was necessary ; that there was no discipline, nor Confession of Faith he liked so well as those of the Bohemian brethren ; and that finding there had been but very few and imperfect accounts given of them, he undertook to write their history ; that he applied himself several years to it, and composed a work divided into eight parts, and intitled, Origo, Progressus, resque tam prosperæ quam adversæ, nec non Mores, Instituta, Consuetudinesque Fratrum Bobemicorum. i. e.
 “ The Origin, Progress, fortunate and unfortunate “ Events of the Bohemian Brethren, together with “ their Manners, Laws, and Customs ;” that about the year 1585 he sent that work to Churches in Bohemia, desiring them to publish it, after they had made such alterations and suppléments to it, as they thought proper ; that not meeting with the success he expected, he sent a more correct copy of his work to Baron Charles of Zerotin (5), in the year 1591, desiring him to exert both his authority and his generosity to procure the printing of that manuscript ; but that all this proved unsuccessful, At last one of the Bohemian brethren published the eighth book of this History of Lascius, in the year 1649, with some extracts of the seven others. Here follows the title of that edition. *Jobannis Lascii nobilis Polonii Historia de Origine & Rebus Gestis Fratrum Bobemorum Liber Octavus, qui est de moribus & institutis eorum, ob præsentem rerum statum (6) seorsim editus.
Adduntur tamen reliquorum VII Librorum Argumenta & particularia quedam Excerpta.* The History of the “ Origin and Deeds of the Bohemian Brethren by “ John Lascius, a noble Pole. Book VIII,
 “ which treats of the Manners and Laws of the said “ Brethren, now published by itself on account of “ the present State (*) of Affairs ; to which is ad“ ded however the contents of the seven other Books,
 “ with some particular Extracts from them.”

(4) *Fuit Lascius
ille gente Polonus
natalibus ; Eques
dignitate ea ut a Rege Stephano ad
exteros Principes
Legatus adhibe-retur ; Religione
vero Evangelicus,
& Confessione
Helveticus, quam scilicet Confessionem Polonia minor, Reformatores
suis Tururo nacta,
suam f. erat.*
P. 101. pag. 10.

(5) Who was soon after Govern-
nor of Moravia.
(6) That is to say, on account of the corrupt morals of the Bohemian Brethren in that dispersion ; which made it necessary to shew them
how much they were degenerated
from the virtue of their ancestors.
(*) See the marginal quotation (6).

(3) *Adrian Re-
genvolcius, Syll.
Historico-Chron.
Ecclesiarum Sla-vonicar. pag. 91.*

(a) Gonsales of Corduba, grandson to the renowned Captain

LATINUS (JOHN) a Moor by birth, was brought into Spain when a little boy, and was a servant in the Duke of Suesfia’s family (a) [A]. The happy genius which was observed in him, was the cause of his being permitted to share in the instructions
 and

[A] He was a servant in the Duke of Suesfia’s family.] This he himself declared, in an inscription given by Don Nicholas Antonio (1). Hæc Joannus Æthiops Chresticola ex Æthiopia usque infans advectus excellentiſſimi & invictiſſimi Gonsali Fernandi à Corduba Ducis Suesfiæ, Gonsalvi Magni Hispaniarum Ducis

nepotis servus, ab ipso infantia lacte simul nutritus, cum ipso à rudibus annis liberalibus artibus institutus & doc-tus, & tandem libertate donatus, Granatæ ab illustrissimo pariter & reverendissimo Petro Guerrero Granatensi Archiepiscopo extra omnem aleam doctissimo, S. Ecclesiæ Granatæ cathedram Grammaticæ & Latini ser-monis

(1) *Nicol. Anton. Bibliorb.
Hispan. tom. 1.
pag. 547.*

and lessons that were bestowed on his young master; and this gave him an opportunity of acquiring so much learning, that having obtained his freedom, the Archbishop of Granada made him master of the Grammar-School belonging to the Church of Granada. Here he acquitted himself worthily of his function for twenty years; and being no less esteemed for his morals than for the brightness of his parts, he married to very great advantage [B]. He published several Poems (b) [C]. Some say that Clenard brought him from Ethiopia into Spain [D], and taught him polite Literature; but this is not true. The mistake of these writers might easily be shewn. Moreri has committed but few errors, but they are very gross ones [E].

LAUD

minis accepit moderandam, quam per viginti annos feliciter moderatus est. i. e. "John the Ethiopian, a worshipper of Christ, brought an infant out of Ethiopia, servant to the most excellent and invincible Gonzales Fernando of Corduba, Duke of Suesfa, grandson to the great Duke Gonfalso, brought up with him from a child, and instructed with him in the liberal arts; being at last restored to his liberty, he was made master of the grammar school, belonging to the church of Granada, (and taught that school very successfully during twenty years,) by the most illustrious, most reverend and most learned Peter Guerrero, archbishop of Granada." Schottus the Jesuit has therefore committed an error, in saying that our Moor learnt the Latin tongue, by his having an opportunity of waiting on Mendoza at college. Hic dum Mendozium Heroa, (I fancy this is an error of the press for Herum) Granatæ in ludum literarium comitaretur, linguam Latinam eadem opera arripuit (2). The matter of our Latinus was not nam'd Mendoza. The reader will find in Aubertus Miræus (3), very near verbatim all that Schottus says of this learned Ethiopian.

(2) Schottus, Biblioth. Hispan. pag. 450.

(3) De Scripturis Seculi 16. pag. 92.

(4) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hispan. tom. 1. pag. 547.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Schottus, Biblioth. Hispan. pag. 450.

(7) Ludov. Nonnius, in Hispantia Illustrata, p. 83.

(8) Extracted from Nicol. Antonio, Biblioth. Hispan. tom. 1. pag. 547.

(9) It is in Nicholas Antonio, ubi supra, and in Moreri.

[B] He married to very great advantage.] He married Donna Anna de Carleval (4); Charus omnibus propter ingenii ac morum dotes, matrimonio insuper bonæ nec ignobilis fœminæ supra conditionem ornatus (5). i. e. "Being dear to all persons on account of his talents and worthy conduct, he married a virtuous lady of a very good family." 'Tis said that he was a handsome man; a circumstance which perhaps was as rare, according to the taste of the Europeans, as to see a Moor teach the Latin tongue. Granatæ linguam Latinam publice profiteri cepit, stupendo exemplo in cathedra nigrum hominem Latine loqui (6). . . Ludum hic (Granatæ) parentum memoria aperuit (quis credat?) Joannes Æthiops genere, Latinus hinc dictus, at præstanti forma & Musicæ ac Poëticæ in paucis peritus (7). i. e. "John the Ethiopian, in the memory of our fathers, open'd (who could believe it?) a school here, (in Granada) whence he was called Latinus; he being a very handsome person, and greatly skill'd in musick and poetry."

[C] He published several Poems.] One on the battle of Lepanto, another on the death of Pope Pius V. and a great number of epitaphs. Here follow their titles: Auftriacos libri II, sive de victoria navali Joannis Auftriaci ad Echinadas Insulas. De obitu Pii V, ejusque in Philippum regem studio. De augusta regalium corporum ex variis tumultis in unum regale templum Escurialis translatione, atque illinc in Granatense Reginæ Joannæ, Epigrammatum, sive Epitaphiorum libri II, Granada 1576. The inscription which I inserted in the first remark, is taken from this last mentioned book; and as the author observes that he was fifty eight years of age (8), we may know (will it be said) the year of his birth. A man who is in his fifty eighth year in 1576, must have been born in 1518. But we must not pretend to argue in that manner; for tho' Latinus's epitaphs and epigrams were published at Granada in 1576, it does not follow that the inscription we speak of was composed that year. This consequence or inference would not hold, even tho' we should know for a certainty that he was alive at that time; much less will it be conclusive, if we suppose that he died anno 1573, as his epitaph declares (9). Here follows what we may be certain of; since he died in 1573, this inscription was not made after that year; and therefore the author was fifty eight years old, at least, that year, and could not be born after the year 1515. Nicholas Antonio would have deserved censure, for not having mentioned, in case he could have done it, the year in which Latinus said he was fifty eight years old. I could wish, for the singularity of the thing, that our Latinus had found a place among Baillet's Poets.

[D] Clenard brought him from Ethiopia into Spain.]

The author of the academy of sciences (10) says, that Clenard left the court of Fez, followed only by an Ethiopian disciple, with whom arriving in Granada anno 1542, he wrote an elegant letter to the Emperor Charles V. died the same year, and left his Ethiopian disciple (known by the name of John Latinus) so well instructed in literature, that he wrote a fine Latin poem on the victory . . . of Lepanto. I am persuaded, for several reasons, that there are some falsities in this narrative. I. Latinus declares, that he was but a child when he was brought from Ethiopia into Europe (11); which would not be true, had he come out of Africa into Spain, with Clenard in 1542, he being then at least twenty seven years of age. II. He says that he was brought up and instructed, from his infancy (12), with Gonzales Ferdinand of Corduba his master, who at last gave him his liberty (13). Now would he have spoke in this manner, had he owed all his credit to James Clenard, as Bullart supposes? III. He does not say any thing that bears the least relation to Bullart's account. My third observation persuades me, that Aubertus Miræus is mistaken in saying (14), Discipulum reliquit (Clenardus) Joannem Latinum Æthiopem (quod prodigii simile est) Rhetorem Illiberitanum, cujus Poëma extat panegyricum de navali Jo. Auftriaci ad Echinadas Insulas victoria. i. e. "Clenard left a disciple, John Latinus, a Moor, (which is next to a prodigy) a schoolmaster in Granada, whose panegyric poem written on the naval victory of Don John of Austria at the islands Echinades (Lepanto) is extant at this time." Doubtless Bullart was misled by this passage of Aubertus Miræus, but then he added to it an error of his own, by supposing that James Clenard brought Latinus into Europe anno 1542. Probably his error proceeded from what follows. Clenard relates (15), that having been sent to Braga to set up a school there, he brought forth his three Moorish servants before his scholars, and commanded them in the Latin tongue, to perform certain postures. These Moors had learnt Latin enough, by rote, at his house, to be able to understand all his orders in that language. Exant mihi Seruuli tres, quos supra (16) nominavi, non sane periti Grammatici, verum domestica consuetudine tantum consecuti, ut me perciperent, quicquid dicerem, & contra Latine responderent, licet idēntidem peccantes in Priscianum. Hos in ludum productos, dialogos agere jussi, spectantibus discipulis, & cum eis multis de rebus sermonem miscebam, attentissimo auditori, adeo miraculi loco fuit, quod Æthiopes loquerentur Latine. Heus Dento, inquam, alta, &c. From this incident it might easily have been concluded, that John Latinus had been a disciple of that learned Grammarian.

[E] Moreri has committed . . . very gross errors.] It is not true that Gonzales Ferdinando of Corduba made our Latinus a slave, in his infant years. The inscription I have copied (17) intimates manifestly, that he and Latinus were pretty near of the same age; and therefore Gonzales, when but in his infancy, must have undertaken expeditions into Africa, or by sea, if it were true that he made Latinus a slave. I would fain know why Moreri did not endeavour to translate his originals faithfully. He had Nicholas Antonio's book before him; why therefore did he not content himself with saying, that Latinus was the slave of Gonzales Ferdinando of Corduba? Does this signify that Gonzales himself had taken this Ethiopian, and afterwards (18) took him to Spain? II. Latinus's employment in Granada was not merely to teach the young clerks or students of the Cathedral; he taught publicly Latin to all comers, this being the custom of the schools of Cathedral Churches, as Joli has shewn in one of his books. III. It shews great ignorance to speak of a poem entitled Auftriacos (19). 'Tis in vain to endeavour an excuse from the original, since Nicholas Antonio does not employ the genitive Auftriacos, without adding libros duos.

(10) Bullart, tom. 2. pag. 237.

(11) See the remark [A].

(12) A rudibus annis.

(13) Et tandem libertate donatus.

(14) Aub. Miræus, in Elog. Belg.

(15) Clenard. Epist. lib. 2. pag. 303.

(16) This word refers to the following words of pag. 295: Præter Gulielmum ministrum tres seruos adduxerunt Æthiopes, Dentonem, Nigrinum, & Carbonem; nam sic eos nominavit Resendus.

(17) In the remark [A].

(18) This is a consequence of Moreri's relation.

(19) This error has been corrected in the Dutch editions.

(a) Heylin's Cyprianus Anglicus, or the Life and Death of Archbishop Laud, lib. 1. pag. 42. edit. London 1671, in fol.

(b) Diary of Archbishop Laud, published by Mr. Henry Wharton in his History of the Troubles and Trial of Archbishop Laud, pag. 1. edit. London 1695 in fol.

(c) Heylin, ubi supra, pag. 44.

(d) Diary of Archbishop Laud.

LAUD (WILLIAM) Archbishop of Canterbury in the seventeenth Century, was son of William Laud, a Clothier of Reading in Berkshire, by Lucia his wife, widow of Mr. John Robinson of Reading, and sister of Sir William Webb Lord Mayor of London in 1591 (a). He was born at Reading October the 7th 1573 (b), and educated in the Free-school there (c), and in July 1589 went to Oxford, and in June the year following was elected Scholar of St. John's College there (d), under the tuition of Dr. John Buckeridge (e). In June 1593 he was made a Fellow of that College (f); and July the 1st (g) the year following took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and June the 26th 1598 (h) that of Master of Arts, being Grammar Reader that year (i). January the 4th 1600 he was ordained Deacon, and April the 5th 1601 Priest; both which Orders were conferred on him by Dr. Young Bishop of Rochester (k). In 1602 he read a Divinity Lecture in St. John's College, which was maintained by Mrs. May (l). May the 4th 1603 he was chosen Proctor of the University of Oxford, and September the 3d following was made Chaplain to Charles Blount Earl of Devonshire. July the 6th 1604 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (m) [A]. December the 26th 1605 he married the Earl of Devonshire to Penelope, then wife of Robert Lord Rich; which action gave him afterwards the most sensible regret [B]. October the 21st 1606

(e) Heylin, pag. 44.

(f) Diary of Archbishop Laud.

(g) Wood, Faßt Oxon. vol. 1. col. 147. The Archbishop in his Diary says, it was in June.

(h) Wood, Faßt Oxon. vol. 1. col. 154. The Archbishop in his Diary says, it was in July.

(i) Diary, p. 1.

(k) Ibid. pag. 2.

(l) Ibid.

(m) Ibid.

he

[A] July 6th 1604 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity.] Upon this occasion he performed an exercise, in which he maintained these two points: First, The necessity of Baptism. Secondly, That there could be no true Church without Diocesan Bishops: for which last, says Dr. Heylin (1), he was shrewdly rattled by Dr. Holland (2), as one that did endeavour to cast a bone of discord betwixt the Church of England and the reformed Churches beyond the seas. And for the first it was objected, that he had taken the greatest part of his supposition out of Bellarmin's works; as if the doctrine of the incarnation of the son of God, or any necessary truths, were to be renounced because they are defended by that leared cardinal."

(1) Cyprianus Anglicus: or the Life and Death of Archbishop Laud, lib. 1. pag. 49.

(2) Rector of Exeter College, and Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford.

[B] Married the Earl of Devonshire to Penelope, then wife of Robert Lord Rich; which action gave him afterwards the most sensible regret.] The Earl being a younger brother of William Lord Montjoy, and while his brother lived, known only by the name of [Sir Charles Blount, had bore a strong affection to the Lady Penelope, daughter of Walter Devereux Earl of Essex; and there passed between them some assurances of a future marriage. But her friends looking on him as a younger brother, considerable only for his dependance at the Court, chose rather to dispose her in marriage to Robert Lord Rich, a man of independent fortune, and a known estate, but otherwise of an uncourtly disposition, unfociable, austere, and no very agreeable Conversation to her. Against this Blount had nothing to plead in Bar, the promises, which passed between the Lady and him, being made in private, no witnesses to attest to it there, and therefore not amounting to a Pre-contract in due form of law. But long she had not lived with the Lord Rich, when the old flames of her affection unto Blount began to kindle again in her; and if the Sonnet in the Arcadia, (a neighbour mine not long ago there was &c.) be not too generally misconstrued, she made her husband the sole instrument to acquaint him with it. But whether it were so or not, it is certain, that having first had their private meetings, they afterwards conversed more openly and familiarly with one another, than might stand with honour to either, especially when by the death of his elder brother, the title of Lord Montjoy, and the estate remaining to it, had accrued to him. Finding her, at his return from the wars in Ireland, to be free from the Lord Rich by a divorce, and not a voluntary separation only à mensâ & thoro, he thought himself obliged to make her some reparation in point of honour by taking her into his bosom as his lawful wife. Besides, he had some Children by her before she was actually separated from the bed of Lord Rich, (some of which afterwards attained to titles of honour) whom he conceived he might have put into a capacity of legitimation by his subsequent marriage, according to the rule and practice of the civil laws, in which it passes for a maxim, that subsequens matrimonium legitimat prolem. And to that end he dealt so powerfully with his Chaplain, that he disposed him to perform the rites of that solemnization; which was accordingly done at Wanstead December 26, 1605 (3). "Nor did he want, says Dr. Heylin (4), some reasons to induce him to it (besides the persuasion of his friends) which might have gained upon a man not so much concerned in it as he was, and may be used for his excuse, if not for his justification also. He found by the avowment of the parties, that some assurances of marriage had passed between them before she was espoused to Rich; which though they could not amount to a pre-contract in Foro Judicii, in a court of judicature, yet he might satisfy himself in the truth thereof in Foro conscientie, in the court of his own private conscience. And thereupon he might conclude, that being satisfied in the reality, and truth of those assurances, and finding that Rich had quitted his pretensions to her by a formal sentence of divorce, he might conceive it lawful for him to perform that service, which was required at his hands. He had found also three opinions touching the lawfulness or unlawfulness of such marriages, which are made after a divorce. The first, that such marriages are lawful unto neither party, as long as either of them liveth, which is the doctrine of the Papists, determined positively in the council of Trent. The second, That such marriages are lawful to the party wronged, but not unto the guilty also; which opinion is maintained by some of the Calvinists, and divers of the ancient writers. The third, that both the innocent and the guilty party may lawfully marry, if they please; which Maldonate (5) makes to be the general opinion of the Lutheran and Calvinian ministers, as also of some Catholic Doctors. And then why might he not conceive that course most fit to be followed, in which all parties did agree, than either of the other two, which was commended to him but by one party only? And though he followed in this case the worst way of the three, yet may it serve for a sufficient argument, that he was no Papist, nor cordially affected unto that religion, because he acted so directly against the doctrines and determinations of the Church of Rome. If any other considerations of profit, preferment, or compliance did prevail upon him (as perhaps they might) they may with charity be looked on as the common incidencies of human frailty, from which the holiest and most learned men cannot plead exemption." But whatsoever motive either the Earl or he had to put a fair colour upon the business, it is certain, that it succeeded well with neither. The Earl found presently such an alteration in the King's countenance towards him, and such a lessening the value, which he formerly had set on him, that he was put to a necessity of writing an apology to defend his action; but finding how little impression it made both in Court and country, he became so uneasy upon it, that he died before the end of the year following. Nor did his Chaplain bear it long without such a check of conscience, as made him turn the annual festival of St. Stephen into an anniversary fast, and composed a prayer for that occasion. And though I doubt not, continues Dr. Heylin (†), but

(3) Heylin, ubi supra, pag. 52, 53.

(4) Pag. 53.

(5) In Matth. xix. 9.

(†) Pag. 54. that he preached at St. Mary's in Oxford a Sermon, for which he was questioned by Dr. Airay, the Vice-Chancellor [C]. November the 13th 1607 he was inducted into the Vicarage of Stanford in Northamptonshire; and in April the year following he had the Advowson of North Kilworth in Leicestershire given him (n). June the 6th 1608 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (o); and August the 5th following was made Chaplain to Dr. Richard Neile, then Bishop of Rochester (p). September the 17th 1609 he preached his first Sermon before the King at Theobalds; and in October following exchanged his Advowson of North Kilworth for the Rectory of West Tilbury in Essex, in order to be near his Patron Bishop Neile, who in May 1610 gave him the Rectory of Cuckstone in Kent (q). October the 2d following he resigned his Fellowship of St. John's College in Oxford. The air of Cuckstone not agreeing with him, he exchanged it for the Living of Norton, into which he was inducted in November 1610 by proxy (r). About Christmas the same year the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere complained against him to the King, at the motion of Dr. Abbot, Archbishop elect [D]. May the 10th 1611 he was elected President of St. John's College; but his election being disputed, it was at last confirmed by his Majesty [E]. November the 3d the same year he was sworn the King's Chaplain. April the 18th 1614 Dr. Neile, then Bishop of Lincoln, gave him the Prebend of Bugden, and December the 1st 1615 the Archdeaconry of Huntingdon. In November 1616 he was advanced by his Majesty to the Deanery of Gloucester, and attended him towards Scotland, and returned a little before him in 1617. He resigned his Living of West Tilbury, and was inducted into that of Ibstock in Leicestershire August the 2d 1617 (s). January the 22d 1620 he was installed Prebendary of Westminster, having had the Advowson of it ten years the November before (t).

June

(n) Ibid. pag. 2.

(o) Wood, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 180.(p) Diary, pag. 2.

(q) Ibid.

(r) Ibid. pag. 3.

(s) Ibid. pag. 3.

(t) Ibid. pag. 4.

that the Lord in mercy did remit this fault, yet was he not so mercifully dealt with at the hands of men, by whom it was so frequently and reproachfully cast in the way of his preferment, that he was fain to make the Duke of Buckingham acquainted with the story of it, and by his means to possess King Charles, his gracious master, with the truth thereof; so long it was before his enemies had desisted from pressing this unhappy error to his disadvantage.

[C] A Sermon, for which he was questioned by Dr. Airay, the Vice-Chancellor. The Vice-Chancellor excepted against it as containing in it sundry scandalous and Popish passages; "the good man, says Dr. Heylin (5), taking all things to be matter of Popery, which were not held forth unto him in Calvin's Institutes; conceiving that there was as much idolatry in bowing at the name of Jesus, as in worshipping the Brazen Serpent, and as undoubtedly believing, that Antichrist was begotten on the Whore of Babylon, as that Pharez and Zarah were begotten on the body of Tamar. Which advantage being taken by Dr. Abbot, he so violently persecuted the poor man, and so openly branded him for a Papist, or at least very Popishly inclined, that it was almost made an heresy (as I have heard from his own mouth) for any one to be seen in his company, and a misprision of heresy to give him a civil salutation as he walked the streets." Dr. Heylin observes likewise (6), that this scandal being raised at Oxford, it was not long before it flew to Cambridge also, when Mr. Joseph Hall (afterwards Bishop of Norwich) was exercising his pen in the way of epistles, in one of which, inscribed to Mr. W. L. it was generally supposed, that he aimed at him. The epistle was as follows (7). "I would I knew where to find you? then I could tell how to take direct aim; whereas now I must pore and conjecture. To day you are in the tents of the Romanists, to morrow in ours, the next day between both, against both. Our adversaries think you ours, we theirs, your conscience finds you with both, and neither. I flatter you not: this of yours is the worst of all tempers. Heat and cold have their uses: lukewarmness is good for nothing, but to trouble the stomach. Those that are spiritually hot, find acceptance; those that are stark cold, have a lesser reckoning; the mean between both is so much worse, as it comes nearer to good, and attains it not. How long will you halt in this indifferency? Resolve one way, and know at last what you do hold, what you should cast off, either your wings or your teeth, or loathing this bat-like nature, be either a bird or a beast. To die wavering and uncertain, yourself will grant fearful. If you must settle, when begin you? If you must begin, why not now? It is dangerous deferring that, whose want is deadly, and whose opportunity is doubtful. God

(5) Pag. 49, 50.

(6) Pag. 50.

(7) Hall's Epistles, Decade, Epist. 3.

"cryeth with Jehu, Who is on my side, who? Look at last out of your window to him, and in a resolute courage cast down the Jezebel, that hath bewitched you. Is there any impediment, which delay will abate? Is there any, which a just answer cannot remove? If you had rather waver, who can settle you? But if you love not inconstancy, tell us why you stagger. Be plain, or else you will never be firm."

[D] The Lord Chancellor complained against him to the King at the motion of Dr. Abbot, Archbishop Elect. Dr. Laud writes thus in his Diary (8). "The Lord Chancellor Ellesmere's complaint against me to the King at Christmas 1610. He was incited against me by Dr. Abbot, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury Elect." Dr. Heylin informs us (9), that the Archbishop insinuated to the Chancellor, that "Dr. Laud was at the least a Papist in heart, and cordially addicted to Popery; that he kept company with none but professed and suspected Papists; and that if he were suffered to have any place of government in the University, it would undoubtedly turn to the great detriment of religion and dishonour of his Lordship." The Chancellor hereupon informed the King of all that had been told him concerning Dr. Laud, which was like to have destroyed his hopes of being chosen President of St. John's College Oxford, notwithstanding his petition to the King to believe otherwise of him, if Bishop Neile had not acquainted his Majesty with the abilities of Dr. Laud, and the old grudge which Abbot had conceived against him.

[E] Elected President of St. John's College; but his election being disputed, it was at last confirmed by his Majesty. Rawlinson, once a Fellow of the same College, and afterwards Principal of Edmund Hall, was a competitor for the place of President. Each of them having prepared his party, the fellows proceeded to an election May the 10th 1611. The scrutiny being made, and the election at the point of being declared, one of the Fellows of Rawlinson's party, seeing which way the business was like to go, snatched up the paper, and tore it suddenly to pieces. The nomination being thus frustrated, an appeal was made to the King, who spent three hours in giving audience to both parties; and upon full consideration of the proofs and allegations on either side, gave sentence in favour of Dr. Laud on the 29th of August 1611; upon which he was sworn and admitted President. He could not, for example sake, but inflict some punishment on the person, who had torn the scrutiny; but knowing him to be a man of hopeful parts, industrious in his studies, of a courage not to be disliked, he not only released him from the censure, under which he lay, but took him into special favour, trusted him in all his weighty businesses, made him his Chaplain, preferred him from one good benefice to another, married him to his brother's daughter, and

(8) Diary of Archbishop Laud, published by Mr. Henry Wharton, pag. 3.(9) Ubi supra, pag. 56.

June the 29th 1621 the King gave him the grant of the Bishopric of St. David's [F], to which See he was chosen October the 10th following, and resigned the Presidentship of St. John's College on the 17th of November [G]. Soon after this he became intimately acquainted with George Villiers, then Marquis of Buckingham, before whom and the Countess his mother he had a conference with Fisher the Jesuit, which fixed them in the Protestant Religion [H]. January the 31st 1622 he was inducted into the Rectory of Creeke in Northamptonshire, which he held in Commendam with his Bishopric (u). In October 1623 he fell under the displeasure of Dr. John Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, then Lord Keeper of the Great Seal [I]. April the 17th 1623 he became Deputy Clerk of the Closet to King Charles I. for Dr. Neile, then Bishop of Durham, who was indisposed,

(10) Ibid. pag. 5, 6.

(10) Ibid. pag. 56, 57.

(11) Pag. 4.

(12) Pag. 4.

(13) Pag. 5-8.

and lastly promoted him to the very Presidentship, which had been the first cause of that breach, and to one of the best Deaneries in the Kingdom (10).

[F] June the 29th 1621 the King gave him the Grant of the Bishopric of St. David's. He writes thus in his Diary (11). His Majesty gave me the Grant of the Bishopric of St. David's. The general expectation in Court was, that I should then have been made Dean of Westminster, and not Bishop of St. David's.

[G] Resigned the Presidentship of St. John's College on the 17th of November. The King had given him leave to hold that place in commendam with the Bishopric of St. David's: but by reason, says he in his Diary (12), of the strictness of that statute, which I will not violate, nor my oath to it, under any colour, I am resolved before my consecration to leave it. This passage is omitted by Mr. Prynne in his edition of the Diary. The Bishop resigned his Presidentship on the 17th of November.

[H] Had a conference with Fisher the Jesuit. In his Diary (13) he writes thus. 1622. April 23. being the Tuesday in Easter Week, the King sent for me, and set me into a course about the Countess of Buckingham, who about that time was wavering in point of religion. April 24. Dr. Francis White and I met about this. May 10. I went to the Court at Greenwich, and came back in the coach with the Lord Marquis Buckingham. My promise then to give his Lordship the Discourse he spake to me for. May 19. I delivered my Lord Marquis Buckingham the paper concerning the difference between the Church of England and Rome in point of justification, &c. May 23. My first speech with the Countess of Buckingham. May 24. The conference between Mr. Fisher a Jesuit, and my self, before the Lord Marquis Buckingham, and the Countess his mother. I had much speech with her after. September 1. My answer given to his Majesty about 9 articles delivered in a book from Mr. Fisher the Jesuit. These articles were delivered me to consider of August 28. The discourse concerning them the same night at Windsor in the presence of the King, the Prince, the Lord Marquis Buckingham, his Lady, and his mother. September 18 aut circiter, There was notice given me, that Mr. Fisher had spread certain copies of the conference had between him and me, May 24. into divers Recusant's hands. "October, I got the sight of a copy &c. made an answer to it. December, I was three times with the King this Christmas, and read over to him the answer, which I had made to Fisher, which he commanded should be printed; and I desired it might pass in a third person, under the name of R. B. 1622. January 11. I was with his Majesty to shew him the epistle, that was to be printed before the Conference between me and Fisher the Jesuit May 24. 1622, which he was pleased to approve. January 16. I was all day with Dr. White about my papers of the Conference, and making them ready for the press. Februar. 4. Dies Mercurii erat. Colloquium cum Fishero "Jesuita habitum Maii 24. 1622 jussu serenissimi Regis Jacobi scriptis mandatum, Regi ipsi antea perlectum, typis excudendum hodie traditur, cum approbatione Episcopi London. Nunquam antebac sub prelo laboravi. Nullas Controversas. Et ita oro, amet beaque animam meam Deus, ut ego bene & ad gloriam nominis ejus scriptas cupio conorque Ecclesie nunquam satis defendas distractiones. 1624 April 16 Friday, My Conference with Fisher the Jesuit printed, came forth." It was published in the name of R. B. i. e. Richard Baylie, afterwards President of St. John's College in Oxford, and Dean of Salisbury, who was at that time one of Bishop Laud's Chaplains. It was printed with Dr. Francis White's Reply to Jesuit Fisher's Answer to certain Questions. This Conference is filed by Hammond L'Estrange Esq; (14) the exactest master-piece of Polemic Divinity of any extant at that time; and he observes, that the Bishop declared himself so little theirs [the Papists] as he had for ever disabled them from being so much their own as before they were. Sir Edward Deering also, his professed adversary, in the preface to his book of Speeches (15), tells us, that the Bishop in this Conference, especially in the last half of it, had muzzled the Jesuit, and should strike the Papists under the fifth rib, when he was dead and gone; and being dead, that wheresoever his grave should be, Paul's should be his perpetual monument, and his own book his epitaph. It was reprinted by him, with great improvements in 1637. It was answered by Thomas Carwel alias Thorold, a Jesuit, born in Lancashire, in a book intitled, Labyrinthus Cantuarenfis: Or Dr. Laud's Labyrinth: Being an Answer to the late Archbishop of Canterbury's Relation of a Conference between himself and Mr. Fisher &c. Paris 1659 in folio. This was replied to by Dr. Meric Casaubon in a treatise intitled, Of the Necessity of Reformation in and before Luther's time, and what (wisely) hath most hindered the Progress of it: Occasioned by some late virulent books written by Papists, but especially by that intitled, Labyrinthus Cantuarenfis. Here, besides some other Points, the grand Business of these Times, Infallibility, is fully discussed. London 1664 in 4to. There was another edition of Bishop Laud's Conference in 1673 in folio.

[I] In October 1623 he fell under the displeasure of Dr. John Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, then Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. We find the following passages in his Diary (16). "October 3d Friday. I was (16) Pag. 7, 8 with my Lord Keeper, to whom I found some had done me very ill offices; as he was very jealous of Lord Buckingham's favour. October 31. I acquainted my Lord Duke of Buckingham with that which passed between the Lord Keeper and me. December 15th. on Monday morning, I went about business to my Lord Buckingham. We had speech in the Shield Gallery at White-hall. There I found, that the Lord Keeper had strangely forgotten himself to him, and, I think, was dead in his affections. December 27. St. John's day, I was with my Lord Duke of Buckingham. I found, that all went not right with the Lord Keeper, &c. He sent to speak with me, because he was to receive the next day. January 11. My Lord Keeper met with me in the withdrawing chamber, and quarrelled me gratis. January 14. I acquainted my Lord Duke of Buckingham with that which passed on the Sunday before between the Lord Keeper and me. February 6. Friday, my Lord Duke of Buckingham told me of the reconciliation the day before made with the Lord Keeper. February 18. Wednesday, my Lord Duke of Buckingham told me of the reconciliation and submission of my Lord Keeper, and that it was confessed unto him, that his favour to me was a chief cause. Invidia, quo tendis? &c. At ille de novo sedus pepigit." Dr. Heylin observes (17), that while (17) Ubi s. pro, the Duke of Buckingham was with Prince Charles in Spain, the Lord Keeper, and Lord Treasurer Cranfield, with others of the court endeavoured to ruin the Duke's interest with the King: of all which practices and proceedings Laud gives intelligence to the Duke, and receives back again Directions in his actions for him, From hence proceeded the constancy of Affection, which the Duke carried to him for ever after the animosity between Laud and Williams; the fall of Cranfield first, and of Williams afterwards, Laud by his diligence and fidelity overtopping all.

(14) History of the Reign of King Charles I. pag. 178. edit. 1656.

(15) Collection of Parliament Speeches, pag. 5.

(16) Pag. 7, 8

(17) Ubi s. pro, pag. 107.

(x) Ibid. pag. 17.

(y) Ibid. pag. 26, 28.

(z) Ibid. pag. 34, 35.

(aa) Ibid. pag. 36.

(bb) Ibid. pag. 41.

(cc) Ibid. p. 43.

posed, and executed that office till the first of May following (x). February the 2d 162½ he officiated at the Coronation of his Majesty as Dean of Westminster [K], the King having commanded Bishop Williams, the Dean of that Church, not to be present at the ceremony (y). June the 20th 1626 he was nominated to the See of Bath and Wells, to which he was elected August the 16th (z). In the beginning of October the same year he was made Dean of the Royal Chapel (aa); and April the 29th 1627 was made Privy Counsellor to his Majesty (bb). July the 15th 1628 he was translated to the Bishopric of London (cc). About this time his ancient acquaintance Sir James Whitelocke a Judge, used to say of him, that "he was too full of fire, though a just and good man, and " that his want of experience in State-matters, and his too much zeal for the Church, " and heat, if he proceeded in the way he was then in, would set this Nation on " fire (dd)." April the 12th 1630 he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford (ee). In May 1633 he attended the King into Scotland, and June the 15th was sworn Counsellor of that Kingdom (ff). August the 4th the same year, upon the death of Archbishop Abbot, the King resolved to advance him to the See of Canterbury (gg). The same morning a person came to him, and offered him to be a Cardinal [L].

(dd) Memoria's of the English Affairs. By Bulstrode Whitelocke Esq; pag. 34. edit. London 1732.

(ee) Diary, pag. 45.

(ff) Ibid. pag. 48.

(gg) Ibid. pag. 49.

September

[K] Officiated at the Coronation of his Majesty as Dean of Westminster. It was objected to him in the time of his fall, that in the digesting the form of the Coronation, he had altered the Coronation Oath, making it more advantageous to the King, and less beneficial to the people than it had been formerly; from which imputation the King cleared both himself and the Bishop, when they were both involved by common speech in the guilt thereof. To clear this point, we shall first set down the Oath itself, as it was taken by the King, and then the King's defence for his taking it. The form of the oath is as follows (18).

(18) Essays Collection of Edward Husbands, pag. 290. London 1643, in 4to.

Archbishop. Sir, will you grant, keep, and by your oath confirm to your people of England the laws and customs to them granted by the Kings of England, your lawful and religious predecessors, and namely, the laws, customs and franchises granted to the clergy by the glorious King Saint Edward your predecessor, according to the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel established in this Kingdom, and agreeable to the prerogative of the Kings thereof, and the ancient customs of this Realm? King. "I grant and promise to keep them."

Archbishop. Sir, will you keep peace and goodly agreement entirely (according to your power) both to God, the holy Church, the Clergy and the People? King. "I will keep it." Archbishop. Sir, will you (to your power) cause law, justice, and discretion in mercy and truth to be executed in all your judgments? "I will." Archbishop. Sir, will you grant to hold and keep the law and rightful customs, which the commonalty of this your kingdom have; and will you defend and uphold them to the honour of God so much as in you lieth? King. "I grant and promise so to do."

Then one of the Bishops reads this admonition to the King before the people with a loud voice: Our Lord and King, we beseech you to pardon, and to grant, and to preserve unto us, and to the Churches committed to our charge, all canonical privileges and due law and justice, and that you would protect and defend us, as every good King in his kingdoms ought to be protector and defender of the Bishops and the Churches under their government.

The King answers: "With a willing and devout heart I promise and grant my pardon, and that I will preserve and maintain to you and the Churches committed to your charge all canonical privileges and due law and justice; and that I will be your protector and defender, to my power, by the assistance of God, as every good King in his Kingdom in right ought to protect and defend the Bishops and Churches under their government."

Then the King ariseth, and is led to the Communion-Table where he makes a solemn Oath in sight of all the people to observe the premises; and laying his hand upon the book, saith, The things, which I have before promised, I shall perform and keep: So help me God, and the contents of this book. King Charles I. in his answer to a printed book, entitled, A Remonstrance, or, The Declaration of the Lords and Commons now assembled in Parliament, the 26th of May 1642. observes, that he had taken this oath at his Coronation, warranted, says he, and enjoined to it by the custom and directions of our predecessors; and the ceremony of their and our taking it they may find in the record of the Exchequer. Bishop Laud tells us himself (19), that upon his trial, on the eleventh day of hearing, May 27th 1644, Mr. Serjeant Wild charged him with two alterations in the body of the King's Oath: one added, namely these words, agreeable to the King's prerogative; the other omitted, namely, these words, Quæ populus elegerit, which the people have chosen, or shall choose. "For this latter, says he, the clause omitted, that suddenly vanished; for it was omitted in the oath of King James, as is confessed by themselves in the printed votes (*) of this present Parliament. But the other highly insisted on, as taking off the total assurance, which the subjects have by the oath of their Prince for the performance of his laws. First, I humbly conceive, this clause takes off none of the people's assurance, none at all: for the King's just and legal prerogative and the subjects assurance for liberty and property may stand well together, and have so stood for hundreds of years. Secondly, that alteration, whatever it be, was not made by me; nor is there any interlining or alteration so much as of a letter found in that book. Thirdly, if any thing be amiss therein, my predecessor gave that oath to the King, and not I. I was merely ministerial both in the preparation and at the coronation itself, supplying the place of the Dean of Westminster. After this day's work was ended, it instantly spread all over the city, that I had altered the King's oath at his coronation, and from thence into all parts of the Kingdom; as if all must be true, which was said at the bar against me, what answer soever I made; the people and some of the Synod now crying out, that this one thing was enough to take away my life. And tho' this was all that was charged this Day concerning this oath, yet seeing how this fire took, I thought fit the next day that I came to the bar to desire that the books of the coronation of former Kings, especially those of Queen Elizabeth and King James, might be seen and compared, and the copies brought into the court, both from the Exchequer, and such as were in my study at Lambeth; and a fuller inquisition made into the business, in regard I was as innocent from this crime, as when my mother bare me into the world. A salvo was entered for me upon this; and every day that I after came to the bar, I called upon this business; but somewhat or other was still pretended by them, which managed the evidence, that I could not get the books to be brought forth, nor any thing to be done till almost the last day of my hearing. Then no books could be found in the Exchequer, nor in my study, but only of King James; whereas when the keys were taken from me there were divers books there, as is confessed in the printed votes of this Parliament; and one of them with a watchet fattin cover, now missing. And whether this of King James (had not my Secretary, who knew the book, seen it drop out of Mr. Prynne's bag) would not have been concealed too, I cannot tell. At last, the book of King James's coronation, and the other urged against me concerning King Charles, were seen and compared openly in the Lord's house, and found to be the same oath in both, and no interlining or alteration in the book charged against me."

(19) History of his Troubles and Trial. Written by himself during his Imprisonment in the Tower. Published by Mr. Wharton, pag. 318, 319. edit. London 1694, in fol.

(*) Pag. 706.

[L] The same morning a person came to him, and offered

(bb) Ibid. September the 19th he was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury (bb). May the 13th 1634 he received the Seals of his being chosen Chancellor of the University of Dublin in Ireland, to which Office he had been elected September the 14th 1633 (ii).
 (ii) Ibid. pag. 30. March the 14th 1634 he was named one of the Commissioners of the Exchequer, upon the death of Richard Lord Warton, Lord High Treasurer of England (kk).
 (kk) Ibid. pag. 52. March the 6th 1634 he procured the Staff of Lord High Treasurer of England for Dr. William Juxon Bishop of London [M]. June the 14th 1637 he made a speech, in the Star-Chamber at the censure of Dr. John Bastwick, Henry Burton, B. D. and William Prynne Esq; [N]. In October following he fell under the displeasure of her Majesty for complaining of the increase and behaviour of the Romish Party [O]. In the beginning of the Long Parliament he was attacked on account of the Canons made by the Convocation in May 1640 [P]; upon which he wrote a letter to Mr. Selden dated November (20) Pag. 49. offered him to be a Cardinal.] We find the following passage in his Diary (20). August 4. That very morning at Greenwich there came one to me seriously, and that would ability to perform it, and offered me to be a Cardinal. I went presently to the King, and acquainted him both with the thing and the person. August. 17. Saturday, I had a serious offer made me again to be a Cardinal. I was then from court; but so soon as I came thither (which was Wednesday August 21.) I acquainted his Majesty with it. But my answer again was, that somewhat dwelt within me, which would not suffer that, till Rome was other than it is.

[M] Procured the Staff of Lord High Treasurer of England for Dr. William Juxon, Bishop of London.] In his Diary he writes thus (21). "No Church-man had it since Henry VII's time. I pray God ble's him to carry it so, that the Church may have honour, and the King and the state service and contentment by it. And now if the Church will not hold up themselves under God, I can do no more."

[N] Made a speech in the Star-chamber at the censure of Dr. John Bastwick, Henry Burton, B. D. and William Prynne, Esq;] It was printed at London 1637 in 4to. In this speech, he declares (22), I can say it clearly and truly, as in the presence of God, I have done nothing as a Prelate, to the uttermost of what I am conscious, but with a single Heart, and with a sincere intention for the good government and honour of the Church, and the maintenance of the orthodox truth and religion of Christ professed, established, and maintained in the Church of England. He afterwards observes (23) with regard to the Prelates, that "he assured himself, they could not be so base, as to live Prelates in the Church of England, and labour to bring in the superstitions of the Church of Rome, upon themselves and it. And if any should be so foul, says he, I do not only leave him to God's judgment, but (if these libellers, or any other can discover that his base and irreligious falsehood) to shame also, and severe punishment from the state. And in any just way, no man's hand shall be more or sooner against him; than mine shall be. And for my self, to pass by all the scandalous reproaches, which they have most injuriously cast upon me, I shall say this only: First, I know of no plot nor purpose of altering the religion established. Secondly, I have ever been far from attempting any thing, that may truly be said to tend that way in the least degree. And to these two I here offer my Oath. Thirdly, if the King had a mind to change Religion, (which I know he hath not, and God forbid he should ever have) he must seek for other instruments. For as basely as these men conceive, yet I thank God, I know my duty well both to God and the King; and I know that all the duty I owe to the King, is under God." He then proceeds to consider the Innovations, which were charged upon himself and the rest of the Bishops.

[O] Fell under the displeasure of her Majesty for complaining of the increase and behaviour of the Romish party.] He writes thus in his Diary (24). October 22, Sunday, A great noise about the perverting of the Lady Newport: speech of it at the council; my free speech there to the King concerning the increasing of the Roman party, the freedom at Denmark house, of the carriage of Mr. Walter Montague and Sir Toby Matthews. The Queen acquainted me with all I said that very night, and highly displeas'd with me, and so continues:

[P] In the beginning of the long Parliament he was attacked on account of the Canons made by the Convocation in May 1640.] The Parliament, which met April 13th, had been dissolved May 5th; but the Archbishop persuaded the King to continue the sitting of the Convocation by a new commission granted to them for the conclusion of such matters, as were then in treaty among them. Yet by the opinion of Finch, Manchester, Littleton, Banks, Heath, and Shelton, signified to the King, the Convocation called by the King's Writ, was not to dissolve but by the King's Writ, notwithstanding the dissolution of the Parliament. But it was held best, in order to clear all objections, to continue them by this new commission (25). In this Convocation there were made seventeen canons. The first, concerning the regal power. The second for the better keeping of the day of his Majesty's most happy inauguration. The third for suppressing the growth of Popery. The fourth against Socinianism. The fifth against Secularies. The sixth entitled, An oath enjoyned for the preventing of all innovations in doctrine and government: and the Oath itself was as follows: "I A. B. do swear, that I do approve the doctrine and discipline or government established in the Church of England, as containing all things necessary to salvation. And that I will not endeavour by myself or any other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any Popish doctrine, contrary to that, which is so established. Nor will I ever give my consent to alter the government of this Church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it stands now established, and as by right it ought to stand; nor yet ever to subject it to the usurpations and superstitions of the See of Rome. And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation, or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever; and this I do heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the faith of a Christian. So help me God in Jesus Christ." By this canon it was ordered, that all masters of Art, (the sons of Noblemen only excepted) all Bachelors of Divinity, Law, or Physic, all that were licensed to practise Physic, all registers, notaries, and proctors, all school-masters, all such as being natives or naturaliz'd, do come to be incorporated into the Universities here, having taken any degree in any foreign University, should be bound to take this oath; and that it should be administer'd to all of the persons above-named residing in any University by the governors of their several houses; and by the Bishop respectively to all, who should from thenceforth be admitted to holy orders, or receive any institution, collation, or license for the serving of any cure; with several penalties to all benefited persons, and all such as were then in any Ecclesiastical dignity, for their refusal of the same; that is to say, a suspension ab officio for the first refusal, a beneficio & officio for the second, and deprivation for the third, a month's deliberation being granted betwixt each refusal. The seventh canon was entitled, A declaration concerning some rites and ceremonies. The eighth of preaching for conformity. The ninth entitled, One book of articles to be used at all parochial visitations. The tenth concerning the conversation of the clergy. The eleventh concerning Chancellors patents. The twelfth entitled, Chancellors alone not to censure any of the clergy in sundry cases. The thirteenth, entitled, Ex-

(25) White-locke's Memorials of the English
Affairs, pag. 34
edit. London 1732.

vember the 29th 1640 [2]. December the 16th these Canons were condemned by the House of Commons "as containing in them many matters contrary to the King's Prerogative, to the fundamental Laws and Statutes of this Realm, to the Rights of Parliament, to the Property and Liberty of the Subject, and tending to Sedition, and of dangerous consequence." December the 18th he was accused by the Commons of High Treason; upon which he was committed to the custody of the Usher of the Black Rod, and on the 1st of March to the Tower. March the 12th 1641 he was brought to his trial [R], which was carried on for twenty days of hearing till July the 20th 1644; and on the 21st of September he made his recapitulation. November the 13th a Bill of Attainder of him passed the House of Commons, and January the 6th 1645 it passed the House of Lords. He was beheaded on Tower Hill Friday January the 10th, aged seventy one years, thirteen weeks, and four days; and his body was interred in the Chancel of the Church of Allhallows Barkin; from whence in July 1663 it was removed to Oxford, and deposited in the Chapel of St. John's College. There are several pieces of his writing, besides his answer to Fisher [T]. "He was low of stature," says communication and Absolution not to be pronounced but by a Priest. The fourteenth concerning commutations and the disposing of them. The fifteenth touching concurrent jurisdictions. The sixteenth concerning licences to marry. The seventeenth against vexatious citations.

[2] Wrote a letter to Mr. Selden dated November 29th, 1640. We shall give the reader this letter exactly as we transcribed it from the original amongst the papers of Mr. Selden, now in the hands of Nicholas Harding Esq; clerk of the honourable house of Commons.

"To mye much honored friend Mr. John Selden these.
"Sal. in Christo.

"Worthy Sir,

"I understand, that the byness about the late canons will be handled againe in your house to morrowe. I shall never aske any unworthy thinge of you; but give me leave to saye as followes. If wee have erred in anye point of legalitie unknowne unto us, wee shall be hartelye sorrye for it, and hope that error shall not be made a crime. We heare that shipmony is layd asyde as a thinge that will dye of it selfe; and I am glad it will have soe quiett a death. Maye not these unfortunate canons be suffer'd to dye as quietlye without blemishinge the Church, which hath to manye enemies both at home and abroad? If this maye be, I heare promise you, I will presentlye humblye beseech his Majestye, for a licence to reviewe the canons, and abrogat them; assuringe my selfe that all mye brethren will joyne with me to preserve the publicke peace rather then that any act of ours shall be thought a publicke greivance. And upon mye credit with you I had moved for this licence at the verye first sittinge of this Parliament, but that both my self and others did feare the House of Commons would take offence at it (as they did at the last,) and sayde, wee did it on purpose to prevent them. I understand you mean to speake of this busynesse in the house to morrowe, and that hath made me wright these lynes to you, to lett you knowe our meaninge and desyers. And I shall take it for a great kindnes to me, and a great service to the Church, if by your means the house will be satisfied with this, which is heare offerd of abrogatinge the canons. To God's blessed protection I leave you, and rest

"Your lovinge poore friend

"Lambeth November
"29th 1640.

W. CANT.

"I mean to move the Kinge this daye for a licence, as is within mentioned."

[R] March the 12th 1641 he was brought to his tryal. The council assigned him were Mr. John Hearne, Mr. Matthew Hale of Lincolns-Inn, and Mr. Chaloner Chute of the Middle Temple, to whom afterwards was added Mr. Richard Gerard of Grays-Inn, and certain servants of the Archbishop to attend him in the tryal, viz. Mr. W. Dell his secretary, Mr. Richard Cobbe and Mr. George Smith. The managers against him were John Maynard Esq; Sergeant John Wyld, Samuel Brown of Lincolns-Inn Esq;

Robert Nicholas of the Temple Esq; and Roger Hill of the Temple Esq; Mr. Prynne had the care of providing all the evidence, and had on the last day of May 1643 by an order of the House of Commons taken from the Archbishop twenty one bundles of Papers, which that Prelate had prepared for his defence; his diary, his book of private devotions, the Scots service-book, and directions accompanying it &c (26),

[S] He was beheaded on Tower Hill Friday January 10th. In his speech upon the scaffold he says thus: "I was born and baptized in the bosom of the Church of England established by law. In that profession. I have ever since lived, and in that I come now to die. This is no time to dissemble with God, least of all in matters of religion. And therefore I desire it may be remembered, I have always lived in the Protestant religion established in England, and in that I come now to die. What clamours and slanders I have endured for labouring to keep an uniformity in the external service of God, according to the doctrine and discipline of the Church, all men know, and I have abundantly felt. Now at last I am accused of high treason in Parliament, a crime, which my soul ever abhorred. This treason was charged to consist of two parts, An endeavour to subvert the laws of the land, and a like endeavour to overthrow the true Protestant religion established by law. Besides my answers to the several charges, I protested my innocency in both Houses. It was said, Prisoners Protestations at the bar must not be taken. I can bring no witness of my heart and the intentions thereof: therefore I must come to my Protestation, not at the bar, but my protestation at this hour and instant of my death, that I never endeavoured the subversion of law or religion; and I desire you all to remember this protest of mine for my innocency in this and from all treasons whatsoever. I have been accused likewise as an enemy to Parliaments. No, I understand them and the benefits that come by them too well, to do so. But I did mislike the misgovernment of some Parliaments many ways, and I had good reason for it. For corruptio optimi est pessima, there is no corruption in the world so bad as that, which is the best thing within itself; for the better the thing is in nature, the worse it is corrupted. And that being the highest court, over which no other hath jurisdiction, when it is misinformed or misgoverned, the subject is left without all remedy. But I have done: I forgive all the world, all and every of those bitter enemies which have persecuted me; and humbly desire to be forgiven of God first, and then of every man, whether I have offended him or not, if he do but conceive that I have."

[T] There are several pieces of his writing, besides his answer to Fisher. Several Sermons, as 1. Sermon preached before his Majesty at Wanstead, 19 June 1621. on Psalm 122. 6, 7. London 1621 in 4to. 2. Sermon at Whitehall 24. March 1621 being the day of the beginning of his Majesty's most gracious reign, on Psalm 21. 6, 7. London 1622 in 4to. 3. Sermon before his Majesty at Whitehall, on Psalm 75. 2, 3. London 1625 in 4to. 4. Sermon at Westminster 6 Feb. 1625 at the opening of the Parliament, on Psalm 122. 3, 4, 5. London 1625 in 4to. 5. Sermon at Westminster 17 March (26) History of the Troubles and Trial of Archbishop Laud, cap. 18. pag. 205, 206.

(11) Ubi supra,
p. 507.

“ says Dr. Heylin (11), but of a strong composition; his countenance chearful and well-blooded; which chearfulness and vivacity he carried with him to the very block, notwithstanding the afflictions of four years imprisonment. Of apprehension he was quick and sudden, of a very sociable wit, and a pleasant humour; and one that knew as well how to put off the gravity of his place and person, when he saw occasion, as any man living whosoever.” We shall give the rest of his character from several writers in the note [U].

LAUDICE

March 1627, at the opening of the Parliament, on Ephes. 4. 3. London 1628 in 4to. 6. Sermon at Whitehall at a solemn fast before the King, 5 July 1626. on Psalm 74. 22. London 1626 in 4to. 7. Sermon at Paul's Cross on the King's inauguration, on Psalm 22. 1. These seven sermons were reprinted at London in 8vo 1651. The memorables of King James I. of famous memory. They are twenty nine in number, and were printed with the Archbishop's Diary by Mr. Prynne. They are called by the author, Short Annotations upon the life and death of the most August King James. They were drawn up at the desire of George Duke of Buckingham. Answer to the remonstrance made by the House of Commons in June 1628. Officium quotidianum: or a manual of private Devotions. London 1650 and 1663 in 8vo. A summary of Devotions. London 1667 in 12mo, published according to a copy written with his own hand in the library of St. John's College in Oxford. Diary of his life. This, which is partly written in Latin, but mostly in English, was published by Mr. Prynne in his Breviate of the life of William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury: extracted (for the most part) verbatim out of his own Diary, and other writings under his own hand. Collected and published as the special instance of sundry honourable persons, as a necessary prologue to the history of his trial, for which the criminal part of his life is specially reserved. London 1644 in fol. But Mr. Wharton observes (27) that Mr. Prynne did not publish the Diary intire, nor faithfully, as far as he did publish it, but altered, mangled, corrupted, and glossed in a most shameful manner, accompanied with desperate untruths, as the Archbishop complains in this history, and therefore addeth: For this Breviate of his, if God lend me life and strength to end this (history) first, I shall discover to the world the base and malicious slanders, with which it is fraught. This the Archbishop wrote, when he despaired that ever his Diary should be recovered out of those vile hands, in which it then was, and be published faithfully and intirely, which would be the most effectual discovery of the baseness and malice of Prynne therein. Mr. Wharton therefore prefixed to the History of the Troubles and Trial of Archbishop Laud an exact and complete edition of the Diary, which came into his hands. History of his Troubles and Trial written during his imprisonment in the tower. He began to write this before the end of the year 1641, and continued it from time to time till the 3d of January 1643, which was the seventh day before his execution. He wrote in the first leaf of it, Non apposui manum ultimam. W. Cant. It was published by Mr. Wharton in 1694 in fol. with several marginal notes by Archbishop Sancroft. To this Mr. Wharton has added, 1. His speech at his death on the scaffold. 2. His last will and testament, made in the Tower 13 January 1643. 3. Several passages of his conference with Fisher the Jesuit, from the edition of 1639, and referred to in the preceding history; besides other passages from other books, which are also referred to in the said history. 4. His answer to the speech of the Lord Say and Seal, touching the Liturgy: dated in the Tower December the 3d 1641. 5. His Annual accounts of his Province presented to the King in the beginning of every year, with the King's Apostills, or marginal notes. Those Annual accounts are from 1633 to the end of 1639. 6. His Notes on Rome's Master-piece or the grand conspiracy of the Pope and his Jesuited instruments to extinguish the Protestant Religion, &c. which book is there reprinted. 7. Several Letters, of which a large one to Sr. Kenelm Digby upon his embracing the Roman Catholic religion is dated March 27th 1636. After Mr. Wharton's death there was printed The second Volume of the remains of Archbishop Laud, written by himself, collected by Mr. Henry Wharton, and published, according to his request by the reverend Mr. Edmund Wharton, bis Fa- ther. London 1700 in fol. This Volume contains, I.

An answer to the Lord Say and Seal's speech spoken in Parliament upon the bill about Bishops power in Civil affairs and Courts of judicature, anno 1641. 2. A speech delivered in the star-chamber on Wednesday 14th of June 1637 at the censure of J. Bastwick, H. Burton, and W. Prynne. 3. An Historical account of all material transactions relating to the University of Oxford from Archbishop Laud's being elected Chancellor to his resignation of that Office. Written by himself. There are about 18 letters of his in Latin to Gerard John Vossius printed by Colomesius in his edition of Gerardi Joannis Vossii & clarorum Virorum ad eum Epistole, London 1690 in fol. and some letters of his are published by Dr. Richard Parr among the letters written by and to Archbishop Usher. London 1686 in fol.

[U] We shall give the rest of his character from several writers in the note.] Sir Edward Dering (28), who had greatly opposed him in the House of Commons, speaks of him in these terms. “ I profess, I did and do bear a good degree of personal love unto him, and love unto some parts and qualities, which I think him master of. His intent of public uniformity was a good purpose, though in the way of his pursuit thereof he was extremely faulty. His book lately set forth, (especially for the latter half thereof) hath muzzled the Jesuit, and shall strike the Papists under the fifth rib, when he is dead and gone. And being dead, wheresoever his grave shall be, Paul's will be his perpetual monument, and his own book his lasting epitaph. It is true, the roughness of his uncourtly nature sent most men discontented from him; yet would he often of himself find ways and means to sweeten many of them again, when they least looked for it. Lastly, he was always one and the same man; begin with him at Oxford, and so go on to Canterbury, he is unmoved, unchanged. He never complied with the times, but kept his own stand untill the times came up to him.” Fuller tells us (29), that he was generally charged with Popish inclinations; and the story is commonly told and believed of a Lady, still alive, who turning Papist, and being demanded of the Archbishop the cause of her changing her religion, tartly returned, My Lord, it was because I ever hated a crowd. And being desired to explain her meaning herein, I perceived, said she, that your Lordship and many others are making for Rome, as fast as ye can; and therefore to prevent a press, I went before you. “ Be the tale true or false, take Papist for a Trent Papist, embracing all the decisions of that Council; and surely this Archbishop would have been made fewel for the fire, before ever he had been of that persuasion. Witness his book against Fisher, wherein he giveth no less account of his sincerity than ability to defend the most domitative points, wherein we and the Papists dissent. However most apparent it is by several passages in his life, that he endeavoured to take up many controversies betwixt us and the Church of Rome, so to compromise the difference, and to bring us to a vicinity, if not contiguity therewith; an impossible design (if granted lawful) as every way his equals did judge.” Fuller remarks likewise, that “ amongst his human frailties, choler and passion most discovered itself. In the Star-Chamber, (where if the crime was not extraordinary, it was fine enough for one to be sued in so chargeable a Court) he was served always to concur with the severest side, and to infuse more vinegar than oyl into all his censures; and also was much blamed for his severity to his predecessor, easing him against his will, and before his time, of his jurisdiction. But he is most accused for over-meddling in State-matters, more than was fitting, say many, than needful, say most, for one of his profession. But he never more over-shot himself than, when he did impose the Scotch Liturgy, and was ἀλλοτρι-αρχιστεκετος over

(28) Collection of Speeches, Sect. 1. pag. 4, 5. edit. London 1642.

(29) Church History of Britain, B. 11. pag. 217.

(27) Preface to the History of the Troubles and Trial of Archbishop Laud, pag. 2.

LAUDICE, sister and wife of Mithridates, ought to be ranked in the catalogue of persons of unhappy memory. Her husband revolving a mighty design in his mind, stole from his Court in order to go and see incognito, and with very few followers, the situation of the places, which he resolved, one day, to make the seat of the war. Laudice, hearing no news of him, imagined that he was dead, and consequently would not return back; and therefore, instead of abandoning herself to grief, she immersed herself in the most impure pleasures. Her husband's return gave her prodigious uneasiness; and being under an indispensable necessity of concealing, if possible, her fault, she could not think

" a free and foreign nation. At home many grumbled at him for oft making the shallowest pretence of the Crown deep enough, by his powerful digging therein, to drown the undoubted right of any patron to a Church-living. But Courtiers most complained, that he persecuted them, not in their proper places, but what in an ordinary way he should have taken from the hands of inferior Officers, that he with a long and strong arm reached to himself over all their heads. Yet others plead for him, that he abridged their bribes, not their fees; and it vexed them, that he struck their fingers with the dead palsy, so that they could not, as formerly, have a feeling for Church-Preferments. He was conscientious according to the principles of his devotion; witness his care in keeping a constant Diary of the passages in his life. . . . He was temperate in his diet, and (which may be presumed the effect thereof) chaste in his conversation. Indeed in his Diary he confessed himself lapsed into some special sin with E. B. for which he kept an anniversary humiliation. Indeed his (*) adversary makes this uncharitable note thereon, perchance he was unclean with E. B. which is but an uncharitable suspicion. Now an exact Diary is a window into his heart, who maketh it; and therefore pity it is, that any should look therein but either the friends of the party, or such ingenuous foes as will not, especially in things doubtful, make conjectural comments to his disgrace. But be E. B. male or female, and the sin committed of what kind soever, his fault whispers not so much to his shame, as his solemn repentance sounds to his commendation. He was very plain in apparel, and sharply checked such Clergymen, whom he saw go in rich and gawdy cloaths, commonly calling them of the Church-Triumphant. Thus as Cardinal Wolsey is reported the first Prelate, who made silks and fattens fashionable amongst Clergymen; so this Archbishop first entrenched the usual wearing thereof. Once at a visitation in Essex, one in Orders of a good estate and extraction appeared before him very gallant in habit, whom Dr. Laud, then Bishop of London, publicly reproved, shewing to him the plainness of his own apparel: My Lord, said the Minister, you have better cloaths at home, and I have worse; whereat the Bishop rested very well contented." Fuller likewise tells us, that he was not partial in preferring his kindred, except some merit met in them with his alliance; and that generally the persons promoted by him were men of learning and abilities, though many of them Arminians in their judgments. That he perfectly hated covetousness; and being a single man, and having no project to raise a name or family, he was the better enabled for public performances, having both a price in his hand, and an heart also to dispose thereof for the general good. Philip a Limborch, in the preface to the second edition of Præstantium ac Eruditorum Virorum Epistola Ecclesiastica & Theologica, speaking of the letters of our Archbishop inserted in that collection, tells us, " that he appears to great advantage in them, who though abused by so many grievous calumnies, yet in his familiar letters to Gerard John Vossius used no reproachful term against his most inveterate enemies, but after his Saviour's example, when he was reviled, reviled not again, when he suffered threatened not, but blessed those, who cursed him, and prayed earnestly for those, who persecuted him. He is here so fully cleared from the shocking imputation openly cast upon him by his most implacable enemies, of endeavouring to bring Popery into the Church of England, that calumny itself cannot find any ground to accuse him. We find here continual solicitations in his letters to Vossius, to undertake the task of confuting Baronius; so that he never ceased to urge him to it; I am greatly desirous, says he, before I *leave this world, to see Baronius falling under your attack; and you cannot expect any letters from me without reminding you of it." Sed imprimis admirabilem se ostendit reverendissimus Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis Gulielmus Laudus, ob causam religionis à feravidis zelotibus securi percussus; qui adeo graviter impetitus, tot calumniis oneratus, in familiarissimis ad Vossium Epistolis nullum contra ferocissimos inimicos maledictum profert, sed ad Servatoris sui exemplum, cum malediceretur, non maledixit, & cum peteretur non comminatus est, sed maledictibus benedixit, & pro persecutoribus se ardentissimè precatus est. Hic ab immani Criminatione, quâ ab insensissimis inimicis coram toto orbe palam & odioso est traductus, quasi Papatum in Ecclesiam Anglicanam reducere moliretur, adeo plenè purgatur, ut ne ipsa quidem diabolus quicquam quod admordeat reperire possit. Extant hic continuatæ ipsius flagitationes, vel decies in Epistolis ejus repetitæ, ut Vossius provinciam Baronium confutandi in se suscipiat, adeo quidem ut id urgere nunquam destiterit. Magnoperè, inquit, cupio, antequam fata mihi aperiant, sepulchrum Baronium videre sub tuis telis cadentem, nec Literas potes a me ullas expectare sine stimulo." Bishop Burnet (30) observes, that " he was a learned, a sincere and zealous man, regular in life, and humble in his private deportment; but was a hot, indiscrete man, eagerly pursuing some matters, that were either very inconsiderable or mischievous, such as setting the Communion-Table by the East walls of Churches, bowing to it, and calling it the Altar, the suppressing the Walloons privileges, the breaking of lectures, the encouraging of sports on the Lord's Day, with some other things that were of no value; and yet all the zeal and heat of that time was laid out on those. His severity in the Star-Chamber and in the High-Commission-Court, but above all his violent and indeed inexcusable injustice in the prosecution of Bishop Williams, were such blemishes, that nothing but the putting him to death in so unjust a manner could have raised his character; which indeed it did to a degree of setting him up as a pattern, and the establishing all his notions as standards, by which judgments are to be made of men, whether they are true to the Church or not. His Diary, though it was a base thing to publish it, represents him as an abject fawner on the Duke of Buckingham, and as a superstitious regarder of dreams. His defence of himself, writ with so much care, when he was in the Tower, is a very mean performance. He intended in that to make an appeal to the world. In most particulars he excuses himself by this, that he was but one of many, who either in Council, Star-Chamber or High-Commission voted illegal things. Now though this was true, yet a chief Minister, and one in high favour, determines the rest so much, that they are generally little better than machines acted by him. On other occasions he says, the thing was proved but by one witness. How strong soever this defence may be in Law, it is of no force in an appeal to the world; for if a thing is true, it is no matter how full or how defective the proof is. The thing that gave me the strongest prejudice against him in that book is, that after he had seen the ill effects of his violent counsels, and had been so long shut up, and so long at leisure to reflect on what had passed in the hurry of passion in the exaltation of his prosperity, he does not in any one part of that great work acknowledge his own errors, nor mix in it any wife or pious reflections on the ill usage he met, or the unhappy steps he had made. So that while his enemies did really magnify him by their inhuman persecution, his friends Heylin and Wharton have as much lessened him, the one by writing his Life, and the other by publishing his Vindication of himself."*

(*) Mr. Prynne in the Breviate of his Life, pag. 30.

(30) History of his own Time, vol. 1. B. 1.

think of a safer expedient than the poisoning Mithridates. Accordingly she was preparing for it, but one of her maid-servants betrayed her, and revealed the mystery; upon which Mithridates, without the least hesitation, put his wife to death (a). A modern author (b) affirms falsely, that the Monarch in question was actually poisoned by his wife; but that being accustomed to his antidote, he cured himself, though with much difficulty. Those who puzzle themselves, because of Justin's relating that Laudice was delivered of a child during her consort's absence [A], raise difficulties out of nothing. I have spoke elsewhere (c) of another LAUDICE, sister to this, and still more wicked than she. Justin is unjustly accused of contradicting himself, when he speaks of these two women [B].

(a) Extracted from Justin, lib. 37. cap. 3. pag. m. 544.

(b) Christ. Mathias, Theat. Hist. pag. m. 28.

(c) In the article CAPPADOCIA; remark [I] num. 3. to the end of the paragraph.

[A] Laudice had been delivered of a child during her consort's absence. This delivery was regular, and Mithridates could not take offence at it; the computation of the time allowed of his considering himself as father of the boy, of which Laudice was delivered in his absence. The circumstance, which makes me speak in this manner, is, Justin's observing that Mithridates was congratulated, at one and the same time, on his return and on the birth of a Prince. Inter gratulationem adventus sui & filii geniti (1). No person would have dared to congratulate him, as a felicity, on a shameful and indisputable proof of his being a cuckold; what then, (will be objected to me) could occasion Laudice's uneasiness? I answer, that in all probability she was with child, or was afraid of being so, by having sported with her gallants since her delivery. Hence she was prompted, in order to conceal her adulterous practices, to dispatch her husband. Laudice, cum perisset eum crederet, in concubitus amicorum projecta, quasi admissum facinus majore scelere tegere posset, venenum advenienti paravit (2). i. e. "Laudice . . . thinking her husband was dead, and abandoning herself therefore to her gallants, prepared to poison him at his return; as tho' she could cover or conceal the crime by the commission of a greater.

(1) Justin, lib. 37. cap. 3. pag. 544.

(2) Idem, ibid.

[B] Justin is unjustly accused of contradicting himself, when he speaks of these two women. Freinshemius charges him either with this, or with confounding history in a most egregious manner. Aut contradicit sibi auctor, aut historiam mire confundit (3). His reason is, that Justin relates in other places, I. that (4) Laudice, widow of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, was killed by his subjects, for poisoning five of her children. II. That (5) Laudice, widow of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, married Nicomedes King of Bithynia, whilst her brother Mithridates was preparing to succour her, against the Nicomedes in question, usurper of Cappadocia, in prejudice of Ariarathes the late King's son. There is no foundation for this charge of Freinshemius, Justin mentioning two Laudices, queens of Cappadocia. The first had married an Ariarathes, who died during the war of Aristonicus, about the year of Rome 622. The second was sister of Mithridates and wife to the Ariarathes who succeeded the former. Here therefore is neither contradiction nor confusion. I must observe, that Justin is censured in many places where he is right, and that no notice is taken of many incidents which are certainly misrepresented by him. The Commentator in Usum Delphini has repeated the accusation of Freinshemius.

(3) Freinshemius, in Justin, lib. 38. cap. 1. pag. 543.
(4) Justin, lib. 38. cap. 1.
(5) Idem, lib. 38. cap. 1.

LAUNOI (MATTHEW DE) (*), one of the most violent Leaguers in France, had exercised during several years the ministerial functions among the Calvinists; but having committed adultery, and not believing that the severity of the Laws would be softened in any manner on his account, he returned to the Romish Communion. I dare not affirm what I have read in great authors, viz. that he was a Priest when he turned Protestant [A]; but if he was not so at that time, he certainly became such after he had abandoned

(*) [He himself says that he was born in la Ferté-Macé, in the diocese of Sens. Tho' he wrote his name Launoy, he seems to have been generally called Launoy.] From the Remarks to the Paris edit. (1734) of Bayle's Diction.

(1) Thuan. Hist. lib. 36. pag. 112. ad ann. 1587. See also Malmibourg, Hist. de la Ligue, liv. I. pag. 55.

[A] I dare not affirm . . . that he was a priest when he turned protestant. This is affirmed by Thuanus. Matthæus Launæus, says he (1), sacri Sueffonum collegii Sodalis, olim sacerdos, & postea egerata majorum religione doctrinam protestantium amplexus pastorisque officio diu inter eos functus, uxore etiam ducta, cujus cum propter egestatem etate jam inclinata tæderet, errore recantato ad nos redierat, sed incerta fide, quam mox ut se vere Catholicum approbaret, sacrilegus addixit. i. e. "Matthew Launoy, canon of the Cathedral at Soissons, formerly a priest, and afterwards forsaking the religion of his forefathers, and embracing the faith of the Protestants, executed the ministerial functions a long time among them; having likewise married a wife, of whom growing weary, on account of the narrowness of his circumstances, when advancing in years, he recanted his errors and came back to us, but still doubtful with regard to his faith. However, he soon after joyned the Leaguers, to shew himself a true Catholic." The same thing is repeated in Book XCV (2), with a very considerable addition; for in enumerating the motives, which had prompted our Launoy to leave the Protestants; the punishment he had to dread, on account of his having been found guilty of adultery, is not omitted. He returned into the pale of the Church, says Thuanus, whether it was that he repented of his errors, or was grown weary of his wife, or feared the punishment which is inflicted by the protestants, on those who are found guilty of violating their conjugal faith. Rursus seu penitentia ductus, sive uxoris partus, & adulterii penam, cujus convictus fuerat, metuens, ad sacerdotium relicta uxore redierat (3). I shall transcribe another passage hereunder, in which Thuanus repeats part of these particulars. I pass over the following words of Du Verdier Vau Pri-vas (4); Matthew de Launoi, first priest, after a minister of the pretended Reformed Religion (a Protestant minister) and now return'd into the pale of the Christian Catholic Church. The authority of Thuanus is sufficient to prove what I advance. Let us see whether there be any room to doubt that Matthew de Launoi was a priest, when he turned Protestant. The motive of my doubting is from the silence of our Launoy himself, on an occasion, wherein one would think he should have mentioned his being a priest, I pass over, says he (5), what they say of my vocation, before they had drawn me out of the bosom of the Christian and Catholic Church, and of my deserting my former employment; for I have always been in public authority and office, ever since I left my studies: and notwithstanding my youth, which was very rare at that time, and far from maturity, I behaved with applause and honour, to the satisfaction of those I was concerned with, till some ministers and others of their sect turned my brain with their illusions and chimeras. And so great was their esteem for me, that the instant I went over to them (in 1560) they forced me to accept of an employment among them; and were so hasty on this occasion, that they did not give me time to breathe or recollect myself, so much they were afraid of losing me. They even obliged me to make but one probation sermon; nay, the moment they found I began to enter on my subject, being satisfied with my beginning, they made me leave off, and admitted me among them, in order that I might be sent to Champagne. ["Launoy certainly was a priest when he turned Protestant; and John Bruneau the counsellor . . . says folio 7, of his Discours Chrétien, printed at Paris in 1581, 8vo. that Launoy having been honoured with the dignity of the priesthood, and quitted it industriously; being better advised, returned into the pale of the Church . . . and that he, at last, was re-established

(1) Bibliotheque de la ville de Paris, p. 860.
(2) Défense de Matthieu de Launoi & d'Henri Penancier . . . contre les fausses Accusations & perverses Calomnies des Ministres de Paris, Sedan, & autres, pag. 43, 44. This book was printed at Paris, for John du Carroi, in the year 1577, 8vo.
(3) Défense de Matthieu de Launoi & d'Henri Penancier . . . contre les fausses Accusations & perverses Calomnies des Ministres de Paris, Sedan, & autres, pag. 43, 44.
(4) Bibliotheque de la ville de Paris, p. 860.
(5) Défense de Matthieu de Launoi & d'Henri Penancier . . . contre les fausses Accusations & perverses Calomnies des Ministres de Paris, Sedan, & autres, pag. 43, 44.

(2) Pag. 280, ad ann. 1589.

(3) Thuan. ibid.

abandoned the Protestant faith. Though he had been branded at Sedan in a very ignominious manner [B], on account of his adulterous practices, he nevertheless was received with open arms by the Roman Catholics. They collected money for him (a); gave him a Canonry in the Cathedral of Soissons, and the Living of St. Mederic in Paris (b). He employed his tongue, his pen, in short all his abilities to foment the rebellion of the Parisians [C]; and made himself so considerable in the horrid faction of the Sixteen, that he presided in all the assemblies which were held, in order to put to death Barnabas Brisson, President in the Parliament of Paris [C]. Had he not made his escape suddenly, he would have accompanied those whom the Duke of Mayenne caused to be hanged (*), for being instrumental in the execution of that great man (d). He retired to Flanders (e); and, I believe, ended his days in that country. He published some controversial pieces; particularly one concerning the motives of his changing his Religion [D], and an answer to the calumnies which he pretended the Protestant Ministers had spread against him. He writes with great weakness in his answer to the charge brought against him, viz. of his committing adultery [E]; and as his conduct during the time of the League proves him a profligate wretch,

(a) Mém. de la Ligue, tom. 6. pag. 349. Our Historians do not say that this Parsonage was given to him.

(b) Mém. de la Ligue, ibid.

(c) Thuan. lib. 95. pag. 220.

(d) Cayet, Chronologie Novenaire, ad ann. 1591.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(*) [The author of the Remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary does not believe this. See vol. 5. pag. 899.]

“re-established in his first order and condition of the priesthood.”] From the remarks of the Paris edit. (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary.

(6) Tom. 6. pag. 351.

[B] He had been branded at Sedan in a very ignominious manner.] 'Tis related in the Memoirs of the League (6), that having been found guilty of getting his cousin with child, in Sedan, where he exercised the holy ministry, he was hanged in effigy there. [The author of the notes to the Paris edition (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary, is strongly of opinion that Launois was not hanged in effigy, for which he gives a variety of Reasons. See Vol. III. pag. 898. of that Dictionary.]

(7) Tom. 1. folio 508, & seq. ad ann. 1591.

[C] He presided in all the assemblies which were held, in order to put to death Barnabas Brisson, president in the Parliament of Paris.] Let the reader consult the Chronologie Novenaire of Peter Victor Cayet (7), and he will find a more particular account than in the following words of Thuanus: Matthæus Launois qui olim Presbyter, postea egerata majorum religionis Minister uxorem duxerat, ejusque pertæsus ad sacra redierat . . . principem locum in iis conciliabulis semper tenuit (8). i. e. “Matthew Launois, who being formerly a Priest, afterwards forsaking the religion of his ancestors became a Protestant minister, and married a wife, whom growing weary of, he returned to the Church, . . . was always the chief in those consultations.” This proof is sufficient for me.

(8) Thuan. lib. 102. pag. 443. ad ann. 1591.

[D] He published some controversial pieces, particularly one concerning the motives of his changing his religion.] 'Tis entitled, The declaration and refutation of the false suppositions and perverse applications of some texts of Scripture, which the Protestant ministers have employed in these latter times to divide Christians; and with an exhortation to the said ministers to reunite themselves, and to bring back their bearers to the Catholic, Apostolic and Romish Church, from which they ought not to have separated. . . . By Matthew de Launois, and Henry Penmetier, late ministers of the pretended reformed (Protestant) Religion, and now returned into the pale of the Christian and Catholic Church, the whole digested and divided into three books, by the said de Launois. The dedication (9) to King Henry III. informs us, that these two Protestant ministers met in the town of Guines in the reconquered country, the first of June 1576; Penmetier being returned thither from England some time before, and the other just come from Holland. 'Twas there (say they) that they drew up this work, and resolved to abjure publicly their heretical tenets.

(9) It is dated from Paris the 29th of September 1577.

[E] He writes with great weakness in his answer to the charge brought against him, viz. of his committing adultery.] He owns himself to be a weak man, and liable to fall into sin (10). He does not confess the fault he is accused of; but alledges, in justification of himself, only some little cavils. My accusers, says he (11) have mistaken with regard to the time, for want of a good memory; I being in Holland in the year 1574. They are guilty of several inconsistencies, (adds he;) they say that she was a young maiden who had been left me in trust, by honest people who fear God: and afterwards they say that she was a servant wench. Now there is a wide difference between the one and the other. For when a young woman is given in trust, she supposes her to be of a good family, and that she has a fortune; so that she is not a servant wench of six or seven French Livres a year. Besides; they wanted to beigh-

(10) Défense de Matthieu de Launois, pag. 45.

(11) Ibid. pag. 47.

ten still more the enormity of that pretended incident; for it would be a much greater crime to debauch a young woman, well born, who had been left in trust, than a servant wench, who lets herself out for hire, to serve and stay so long as her service is approved of, or till some other thing makes her quit her place. This is making but an ill defence. I have cited above (12), a writer who says, that Launois got his own cousin with child. In all probability 'twas a young woman who had been sent to his house during the persecutions in France; for at that time several Protestants made Sedan their asylum. Now as Launois was not in very flourishing circumstances, and his fair refugee perhaps had not money to pay for her board, 'tis probable enough, that by her domestick services she gave him an opportunity of living without a maid servant; and therefore, some might say (without inconsistency or contradiction) that he had lain with his servant wench; and others, that he had lain with a young woman who had been committed to his care.

Here follows another pretended contradiction. They say, that having been found guilty of the fact in presence of the confessor, I confessed it to three or four among them (they are uncertain as to the number) (13); but they don't say in what manner I was found guilty. It was not, continues he (14), by my being caught in the fact by the Judge himself, attended by his Sergeants, and others of his court. 'Twas not by unexceptionable witnesses, for witnesses are not called on such occasions. 'Twas not by a violent presumption; for had there been any, they themselves would have greatly transgressed, according to their own principles. A presumption is grounded, either on the too great familiarity of the parties, or upon the woman's being with child. In case they grounded their presumption on familiarity, they ought to have given us notice of it, to prevent, by good remonstrances or exhortations, our committing evil; so that they would be greatly to blame, for having suffered us to continue in sin, without opposing it by a brotherly charity, or by proper censures. If their presumption arose from her being with child, it is not sufficient to accuse me, much less to condemn me. It would be a fine law, if a servant wench plays the fool in her master's house, and is got with child, that the master must be looked upon as guilty of the crime. What reason would there be for this? Fathers and mothers often find it an extremely difficult task to keep in their daughters, though they watch them ever so narrowly; how then could a master be accountable for a servant wench's being with child, since he cannot always have her under his eye? It would be much better, in such a case, for a person to be his own servant. Such a presumption therefore would be of no force. But when they saw their pretended young woman of a good family with child, they ought to have sent for, and enquired of her how all this had happened; and who had got her with child, and then they had known the truth. But they forgot to do this, and therefore they cannot alledge a presumption without condemning themselves; and still it would be of no force. The weakness of this defence might easily be shewn, if one would be at the pains to do it; but 'tis really not worth while. I only say, that though he had sent the young woman in question out of the way, people might yet have had very convincing proofs of her being with child; so that he could not take any advantage of her not having been confronted or examined.

(12) In the remark [B].

(13) Défense de Launois, pag. 47.

(14) Ibid. pag. 48.

wretch, we must not give credit to the stories which he published against the Protestants [F].
That

The following pretended contradiction is not better than the foregoing ones. They say that I was found guilty in presence of their consistory, which, according to them, was composed of seventeen Ministers and thirteen Elders, making in all thirty persons. Now they assert that I was found guilty by that confession, which, (say they), I made in presence of three or four: It therefore was not their consistory, twenty six or twenty seven persons being wanting (15). An empty, childish cavil. 'Twas not pretended that he had confessed his crime in presence of the whole consistory; 'twas pretended that, without his confessing it before that assembly, he had been found guilty of it; and 'twas added, that he had confessed the charge, in private, to three or four people.

(15) Ibid. pag. 49, 50.

He complains (16) that they sentenced them both as being equally guilty of adultery, and to the same penalties. Now adultery, as distinguished from fornication, is committed between or by married persons. Nevertheless they say that it was a maiden; she therefore did not commit adultery in that sense. This is a pitiful argument; for, to commit adultery properly so called, it is not necessary that both parties should be married; if either of them be so, that is sufficient. " [Bayle " would not have called this argument of Launoi a " pitiful one, had he understood it. The question is " not, (in Launoy's answer) about the sin of adultery, " but concerning the punishment of this sin enacted " by the laws. You pretend, said Launoy, that having been judicially convicted, sentence was past; and you say that this sentence condemned the young woman and I, to the same punishment, as being equally guilty of adultery. A proof that this incident is false, and that the sentence is a mere calumny of your raising, is, that the laws enacted against adulterers relate only to a double adultery, that is, to such an one as is committed between married persons; but not against that kind of adultery which a married man commits with a maiden. In this latter case, the laws do not look upon the maiden as guilty of adultery. This sentence therefore which you say was past upon me, would not be agreeable to the tenor of the laws; and this authorized me to say, that 'twas you forged this incident, merely out of hatred to me &c. . . Had not Bayle endeavoured merely to condemn Launoy, but only to examine what relates to him, in order that he might be enabled to condemn or clear him after a mature enquiry, he would not have omitted a method, which, to me, appears sufficiently decisive, and which Launoi did not enough insist upon. You accuse me (might he say) of having committed a crime at Sedan in 1574, and I then had left that city. You pretend that I was found guilty in a full consistory, and even that I afterwards confessed the fact to three or four particular persons. Now nothing can be falser than all this; I had then left the city; and farther, neither the girl nor I were ever examined or confronted. To all this you add that, in consequence of the conviction and my confession, sentence was past upon me. It is plain that this is an untruth. Either produce the instrument of my conviction; the names of those persons who heard me own the fact; and the judicial sentence past upon me, or know that you will be looked upon every where as manifest calumniators." From the remarks on the Paris Edition (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary, Vol. III, pag. 897, 898. The last thing he objects, is the respect to persons (17). He pretends that they had shewn great indulgence to the same kind of crimes; he names persons and places; and whether it were that he sought for a greater conformity between the crime he was charged with, and that with which he charged some of his brethren; or for other reasons, servant maids seldom fail of acting a part in his recriminations. He names a Protestant Minister, who made a figure in the frontispiece of some noble books, and who was called, in Holland, the schoon Predikant (18); if we may believe Launoy, the handsome minister in question would have made himself formidable to his landladies by his exploits on servant wenches, and have made an excellent use of the maxim of a Roman Poet,

(16) Ibid. pag. 50.

(17) Ibid. pag. 51, 52.

(18) i. e. the handsome Minister.

Ne sit ancillæ tibi amor pudori (19).
" Blush not, my Friend, to own the love.
" Which thy fair captive's eyes do move.

(19) Horat. Od. 4. lib. 2. See the article BRISEIS, remark [E].

DUXE.

I shall observe in the following remark, that Launoi was not honest man enough, to injure those persons whom he slandered.

I will make a little digression. Either Clergymen should be allowed to marry, or they should be forbid to keep young maid servants; for all the horrid concubinage of priests, which has scandalized the publick for so many ages, owes its rise to the permission, which was granted them, of having women about them, to manage their household affairs. The design of the superiors was, that they should confine themselves to the business of maid servants; but they suffered themselves to be prevailed upon to serve to every other purpose: the office of concubine seemed so convenient to them in all respects (20), that their masters did not find it a very difficult task to bring them to it. Since Luther's reformation, the priests have lessened, by insensible degrees, this great scandal; but to this day their maid-servants, unless they are very antiquated, are strongly suspected to serve them in a double capacity. Every one knows the song,

(20) Compare what is said above, with the remark [E] of the article HADRIAN VI.

*De necessitate necessitante
Il faut que je baise ma servante.*

By strong necessity betrayed,
I'm forc'd to kiss my servant-maid.

A priest is supposed to say this. Generally speaking in all religions, if any lewd affair happens, which occasions complaints against unmarried Ecclesiastics, it almost always arises from their maid-servants. The reason of this is manifest; the temptations on both sides, and the opportunities for sinning present themselves more readily and conveniently; and doubtless hence it is why tender casuists greatly extenuate the sin of a servant wench, who is got with child by her master. The Latin of the lower ages furnishes us with a word which is of great weight here. The word foecaria, was taken, at first, in a virtuous sense; it signified a woman or girl who served in a house, and dressed her master's victuals, but it afterwards was made use of only to denote the concubines of clergymen (21): the reason was, most of their maid servants continued indeed to be cooks, but then they also lay with their masters. Let us conclude, that it ought to be a law in all countries, not to suffer unmarried young clergymen to keep young maid servants.

(21) See De Cange's Glossary, at the word foecaria, pag. 469, 470. Paris edit.

[F] We must not give credit to the stories, which he published against the Protestants.] Though we should even overlook the dreadful crimes which he committed during the league, we might with reason consider him as an impostor, with respect to many particulars he relates concerning the Protestant ministers, they being quite improbable. He says (22) that the Protestant Ministers who fled for refuge to Neuchâtel in Switzerland, having formed a resolution to ruin a young man, who had preferred the study of physick to that of divinity, accused him of many false doctrines, but that one of the most eminent among them opposed their evil design; that notwithstanding this they continued to do him all the injury in their power; Some calling him wizard, others anabaptist, others atheist. Others would say to him; How dare you say that you do not believe all the doctrine of Calvin, by whose mouth we all speak? He answering that Calvin was a man liable to error as others were; immediately they cried aloud, O cursed Philosophy! O execrable Blasphemy! For to speak against Calvin's doctrine, and against the intention and will of these venerable doctors is, in their opinion, speaking against God, and lying against the holy Ghost: and they make no conscience of prosecuting a man on this account, even to death; if they can come at him (23). The words he makes these Protestant Ministers say of Calvin (24) is so different from the spirit and maxims of the Protestant Church, and so inconsistent with the style of the Protestants, that this is sufficient to shew that he himself forged (and in the most gross

(22) Déferse de Mathieu de Launoi, pag. 38, 39.

(23) Ibid. pag. 42.

(24) See also what he relates Book 2. of his Declaration and Refutation, folio 136 verso.

That which relates to two pretended Demoniacks, is the most ridiculous [G].

gross manner) the slanders published by him. It therefore cannot be any prejudice to the memory of the parties concerned, if I take the liberty to insert in this place the following scandalous story. "The eldest Capel had, a little before, played another such mad trick to a lady of a good family, who being come to Sedan about business, would not shew herself to, or be known by any person. Nevertheless, his over great curiosity made him so rash, as to abuse the name and authority of the duke and dutchess de Bouillon to get into the chamber of the lady in question, and to see her. At the same time he played another prank, which shewed both his Genius and lewd and wicked inclinations. For coming out of Church, and moved by I know not what kind of devotion, he took by the arm a beautiful, virtuous, and nobly-descended young lady, and begged to speak a word or two with her. This being granted, he whispered to her as follows; "Young Lady, charmed with your shining qualities, both of body and mind, and particularly with your wit, I am so bold as to offer up a petition to you, but then I would not be denied. The Lady answering, that she could not grant him any favour till she first knew what it was; he then said to her: I would beg you to give me one hour's amorous pastime with you; we will find a place where there shall be no one but you and I. The poor gentlewoman quite ashamed, and surprized at the instructions which the Protestant Philosopher gave her at his coming out of church, flew immediately to her mother; to whom she told the whole story; which her mother told me, the same day, by way of complaint (25)".

(25) Defense, pag. 35, 36.

[G] That which relates to two pretended Demoniacks is the most ridiculous.] Here follows an abstract of this story. Matthew de Launoi was a famous Protestant Minister in 1562. Some Merchants of the Netherlands, who were his auditors at Aï in Champagne, were so pleased with his sermon, that they kept him at their houses, just as he was going for England. They admired both his stile and his diligence; he often preaching six times in different places, in four and twenty hours, upon which they appointed him their Minister at Tournay. Whilst he was in that city, advice was brought that several people possessed with the devil had been delivered by the exorcisms of the Catholic Church. This displeased the Calvinists; they fearing that their sect would lose their credit, if their Ministers should not have the gift or power of driving out devils, which had been so conspicuous in the Apostles, and was seen also among the Papists. They therefore suborned two persons, a man and woman, and engaged them to act the part of demoniacks, upon condition of receiving a sum of money, and having a pension for life. The two persons in question played their parts to admiration; and thereupon Matthew de Launoi who knew nothing of this contrivance, was desired to go and succour the two demoniacks. Accordingly he went, offered up prayers, and preached; which brought so happy an effect, that the two demoniacks, after a great many tricks, which they had been directed to play, declared that the devil was come out of them. The miracle was spread univerfally, and gained de Launoi the highest veneration. However the knavery was discovered some time after, because that the two persons who acted the farce, not being paid the reward which had been promised them, brought their action against the seducers. A weaver and a rope-maker informed Launoi of this in Holland 1574. Non ante sunt ea technæ à Matthæo intellectæ, quam pecuniis non præstitis litem movere debitoribus demoniaci cæperunt: totaque est ea fabula in Hollandia ad annum M. D. LXXIII. Matthæo à duobus, Christiano de la Quennoillerie textore lini, & Joanne Walle, qui chordis netendis vitam ducere consuevit, commemorata (26). This was the motive of his conversion, if we may believe Sedulius the Franciscan, who has inserted this whole story at full length, in his answer to the Alcoran of the Franciscans, printed in 1607 (27). He says that Matthew de Launoi, being still alive in Brussels, and writing several pieces against the Calvinists, could vouch the truth of it. Vixit hodieque Matthæus Bruxellæ Principum urbe Brabantia, & multa adversus illos scribit, quibus mendacio pallente non possunt rescribere (28). Spondanus has inserted the substance of this fine story in his Annals (29). It would be needless to shew the impertinence of this relation; it is univerfally known that the Protestants made it their business to discredit all the miracles of the latter ages, and to assert that they were not any way necessary to justify the Reformation. Apply here what I say in the remark [T] of the article CALVIN.

(26) Sedulius, ubi infra, pag. 283.

(27) Henr. Sedulius, Apologia adversus Alcoranum Franciscanorum, pag. 280, & seq. He quotes Florentius vander Haer, de initiis tumultuum Belgicorum.

(28) Idem, Sedulius, ibid. pag. 283.

(29) Ad annum 1562, num. 30.

LAUNOI (JOHN DE) in Latin Launoius, Doctor of Divinity in the University of Paris, was born in a little village of Normandy near Coutances. He went through his philosophical and theological studies in Paris, with so much success, that he became a most formidable disputant. He was ordained Priest, and took his degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1636 [A]; he did not make these two characters of use to him for amassing of wealth, and soliciting for benefices [B]; he having no other view but to acquire learning

[A] He was ordained Priest and took his degree of Doctor in Divinity in 1636.] I have not followed Moreri, who affirms that John de Launoi entered into Holy Orders in 1634, and took his Doctor's degree in June of the same year. My reason is this: It is affirmed, in this Doctor's elogium, that he entered upon his course of Divinity in 1633; and that he made so great a progress therein in two years, that no one surpassed him; and that he excelled many persons of great genius and erudition. It is added that he was raised the following year to the Priesthood, and took his Doctor's degree in Divinity. Studium Theologicum ingressus est anno trigesimo tertio supra millesimum & sexcentessimum, illudque biennio integro ita percurrit, ut multos ingenio & eruditione præstantes vinceret, & à nemine vinceretur. Ad ordinem sacerdotalem anno insequenti, & ad Theologiæ Magisterium evectus (1). I believed it was proper for me to put this following year, after the two years of his studying Divinity; for had I fixed it immediately after the year 1633, it would follow, that this Doctor had studied Divinity one year, as a scholar, after he had taken his Doctor's degree. I would not, however, insist upon having the preference of Moreri; for the author of the elogium, did not perhaps pretend to great accuracy in such minute particulars relating to Chronology. Did he not say (2) that after

(1) Elog. Launoi, pag. 2.

(2) Ibid.

John de Launoi had spent five or six years in studying Philosophy and School Divinity, he began his course of Divinity and employed two years in it? Is this writing according to the strictness prescribed by the laws of accuracy? But how negligent soever he may have been, I prefer his authority to that of Moreri.

[The Latin word studium seems to be an error of the press for studium. This last word was employed by the author to denote what is called the course of Licenses, which is of two years continuance, and which presupposes five other years of Divinity, viz. three years, during which the student goes to the lectures of two Professors, after which he may be bachelor, and two years interval between the bachelor's degree, and the entrance into the Licenses. The bachelor is supposed to spend these two years in study, but privately. Besides the three years spent in study in the schools, the student must be Master of Arts, and consequently have gone through, during two years, a course of Philosophy in the University. By the way, the anonymous author is mistaken, in supposing that de Launoi began this studium or Licenses in 1633, it being in 1632.] From the remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary, Tom. III. pag. 900.

[B] ... he did not make these two characters of use to him learning, for which purpose he continued to apply himself to his studies with prodigious intenseness. He was not satisfied with reading of all sorts of books, but kept company with the most learned Divines [C], in order to have an opportunity of consulting them upon all the difficulties he met with (a). The conversation he had with the learned Father Sirmond proved most advantageous to him [D]. It was not for his own satisfaction, but

(a) Ex Elogio Joannis Launoi typis vulgato Londini 1685, in 3vo.

him for amassing of wealth and suing for benefices.] This requires a remark; for it is so very uncommon to find, even among Doctors of Divinity, any persons exempt from avarice and ambition, that when we meet with any such, the public ought to be carefully informed of them. Such examples ought to be consecrated; all the justice they merit ought to be immediately done to them, a circumstance that serves to the edification of the public, as it shews that Providence does not quite give up mortals to depravity and corruption. I say then that John de Launoi discovered from his childhood an entire indifference with regard to the good things of this world; and that these happy inclinations were not changed in him after he was more advanced in years, he then making over to his brothers and nephews all his pretensions to his father's estate. Omnem ab ineunte adolescentia exuerat opum cupiditatem, quam divina vox flagitiorum fontem appellat. Sed ad firmam ætatem cum pervenisset, paternam hæreditatem, parvam illam quidem, fratribus nepotibusque reliquit (3). He would never listen to the counsels of his friends, who advised him to sue for prebends and benefices. To put a stop to their officious exhortations, he declared to them, that he did not believe himself qualified either for singing or preaching; and that he would not enrich himself with the possessions of the Church, since he could not do it great service, by his ministerial functions. Monitus aliquando ab amicis, ut paræciam præbendamque vacantem, eo nomine peteret ab eo, cui conferendæ illius munus incumbebat, respondit, se huic utrique officio parum aptum esse à natura, cum per latera parum firma, perque vocem minimè canoram, neque verba apud populum facere, neque psalmos hymnosque decantare posses. Ingerentibus nonnullis inde provenire non modicam copiam, quâ quis commodius ageret, continuo regebat, se si jure illo uteretur, prospicere, rem ita comparatum iri, ut Ecclesia sibi opibus suis fructum magnum, ipse nullum Ecclesie, aut cerè exiguum, Ministerio suo afferret, quod factum minimè sane vellet, tanquam iniquum nimis et invidiosum (4). We are not to wonder at his acquiring so much erudition, since he applied himself to study with a frame of mind exempt from a desire of amassing riches and acquiring preferments. How many people would be very eminent in learning, if the torturing care of making their fortunes did not draw them perpetually out of their closets? Here follows what a Poet says with regard to the obstacles or impediments attached to his profession.

(3) Ibid. pag. 3.

(4) Elog. Launoi, pag. 3.

*Ad hæc animos ærugo et cura peculi
Cum semel imbuerit, speramus carmina fingi
Poffe linenda cedro, et levi servanda cupressu* (5) ?

(5) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 330.

“ When once their minds are with low avarice “ tainted,
“ Can generous actions be expected from them;
“ Can verses writ by persons thus brought up
“ Lay claim to immortality? —

I must not forget John de Launoi's will. The preamble to it was remarkable. After the usual words, In the name of the Father, &c. were the following; I shall soon have done, for I have not much to bequeath (6). Menage did not say all; the reason was also given why the testator did not leave much behind him, viz. that God had made him understand, that it is much more difficult for a Christian to make a right use of riches, than to live without them. Præfatur ideo testaturum se de re tenui, quoniam à quo admotus fuerat studiis sublimioribus, singulari Dei beneficio intellexerat, facilius esse homini Christiano bonis carere, quam iis recte uti (7). This is a remarkable circumstance; Mr. de Launoi left more money behind him than he thought he would be found master of; a manifest proof of his indifference with regard to the good things of this world. He did not give himself the trouble to count over his money, and sometimes forgot where he had laid it. (8) Certum illum (9) fecit Launoius, plus penes

(6) Menagiana, pag. 216.

(7) Elog. Launoi, pag. 35.

(8) Ibid. pag. 36.

(9) That is, the person who executed his last will.

se post obitum signatæ pecuniæ repertum iri, quam præbandis legatis requireretur; et revera longè plus repertum est, plusque quam Launoius ipse repertum iri crederet. Sed id tantum abest ut ei vitio verti possit; quin potius laudi duci debet, cum illud omne quantumcumque fuerit, non avara manus asservasset usquam, sed contemptor opum animus domi projectum oblivioni penè dedisset. i. e. “ He was assured by Launoi, that more money “ would be found at his decease, than was sufficient to pray “ the legacies; and indeed much more was found than “ Launoi himself could have thought. But this, so “ far from being imputed as a fault to him, should rather be looked upon as a virtue, since the whole sum “ of money, how great soever it might be, had not “ been heaped up out of avarice, but carelessly thrown “ about the house out of contempt.” We here have a proof, that an indifference with regard to riches, and a strong passion for amassing them, may produce the same effect; for some misers hoard up so much wealth, that they themselves do not know what they have.

*Exilis domus est ubi non et multa supersunt,
Et dominum fallunt, et profunt furibus* (10).

(10) Horat. Epist. 6. lib. 1. ver. 45. See what Horace says of Lucullus a little before.

“ Ill furnished is that house where things superfluous “ Abound so much, the master knows not of them;
“ Which rogues may steal, and no one be the wifer.

[C] He kept company with the most learned Divines. He was not contented with this; he used to consult by letter, such learned men as lived in the provinces of France or in foreign countries (11); and when he went to Rome, it was not in order to view the antiquities there, but to get acquainted with those who were famed for their erudition. He visited chiefly in that city, the Duke of Holstein and Leo Allatius (12). Iter etiam suscepit in Italiam, non quidem ut flavios inspiceret et maria, non ut urbes lustraret, non ut vetera artium monumenta, novæque ædificiorum moles mirabundus intueretur, sed ut consuetudine fruere tur eruditorum (13).

(11) Elog. pag. 70

(12) Ibid.

(13) Ibid.

[D] The conversation he had with the learned father Sirmond proved most advantageous to him. He used to go and propose his doubts to him, which the other would clear up without the least noise or heat. The Jesuit in question was quite averse to this contentious manner of disputing on the sciences. Suam seu percontationem, seu sententiam, de maximi momenti capitibus proponentem benigne audiebat perspicacissimus et cordatissimus senex, mentem ei suam candidè aperibat, et cum esset ab omni quæ in scholis viget rixandi consuetudine alienus, abstinere à contentione et pugna verborum, locosque indicabat conciliorum aut patrum, quibus innixus ita sentiret (14). i. e. “ This most sagacious and “ most prudent old gentleman listened with the great- “ est humanity to his enquiries or opinions, on such “ subjects as were of the greatest moment, and then “ would disclose his own sentiments to him with the “ utmost candour; and hating the custom which prevails in schools, of disputing with clamour, he forbore all contest or jangling; and would point out the “ places in the councils or fathers, on which he founded his sentiments.” Mr. de Launoi would examine these with the greatest accuracy, and return to visit father Sirmond, who after hearing him discourse on those matters would say; At first I understood these matters better than you, but you now are a much greater master of them than I. Tunc ejus solertiam et sagacitatem suspiciens Sirmondus, dicere solebat, cum primum loqui hac de re cœpimus, erat in ea forsitan aliquid quod paulo melius perspexissem quam tu: nunc vero cum eam accurate pertractasti, nihil superest quod te fugerit, quodque plenius perfectiusque non teneas, quam ego unquam tenuerim (15). No Jesuit had a greater share in his intimacy and confidence, than de Launoi, a circumstance which was no way pleasing to the society. Cum nullum haberet inter sodales suos Sirmondus quocum fidentius loqueretur, de quo et ipse nonquam conquesti, sunt crebrius invisi, vehementer optabat à Launoi,

(14) Elog. pag. 8.

(15) Ibid.

but for the benefit of the public that he got together so vast a treasure of learning ; very few Divines having printed a greater number of books [E]. He attacked several false traditions with great intrepidity [F] ; and was one of the strongest supports of the privileges of the Gallican Church. He extended his Critique even to subjects of devotion ; and some Saints would have been expunged from the Calendar, had his arguments been admitted. It may be proper to read what Gui Patin said on that occasion [G]. The subject

(16) Ibid.

Launio, cui nihil erat quod minus crederet quam sibi (16). I will add the following circumstance from the Mona-giana. "Father Sirmond used to say of Mr. de Lau-noi, that whenever he had heard him say some-thing that was good, he would go and write a book (17)."

(17) Mona-giana, pag. 223. of the 18 Dutch edit.

[E] Very few divines have printed a greater number of books.] See the catalogue of them in the history he published of the college of Navarre, in the year 1677. His bookseller had often published it sepa-rate. The following delicate remark deserves, in my opinion, a place here. "Of all his books, this (18) was his favourite ; whether it were that he took a pleasure in this glorious testimony he had given the publick, of his gratitude to that college of the faculty which he considered as his parent ; or that he was not quite insensible to the pleasure of seeing all his own works particularized in this book. For he has inserted in it the catalogue of all his com-positions, which he chose to draw up himself ; as well to make it more exact, as to explain with greater ease and readiness the titles and even sub-jects of his smallest tracts, and of all his letters in particular ; wisely judging that any other person would be discouraged at the great number of them, and at the so extensive amplification of their titles (19)."

(18) i. e. The History of the College of Na-varre.

(19) Baillet, Jugemens des Sa-vans, tom. 2. num. 139. pag. 171.

[F] He attacked several false traditions with great intrepidity.] Such as the arrival of Lazarus and Mary Magdalen in Provence ; Dionysius the Areopagite's mission, as an Apostle, in Gaul ; the cause of the retirement of St. Bruno founder of the Carthusians ; the vision of Simon Stoch ; the privileges of the Sabbatine Bull. Those whose interest it was to maintain this kind of sentiments, inveighed the loudest against him ; and declared him to be a destroyer of Religion. Credi vix potest quantam invidia bis scriptis in se confluverit : licet enim antiquam atque adeo genuinam traditionem propugnaret, ejusque fidem, ut ipse saepe ad locum Tertulliani alludens dicere solebat, ex temporibus assereret, tamen qui historias quas expungebat à teneris annis imbiberant, quæ illas credula plebi non sine aliquo commodo suo ingererant, eas sibi eripi ægre patiebantur, nec qui id tentasset mitius incusabant, quam si firmissima religionis fundamenta convellere decrevisset (20).

(20) Elog. Laun. pag. 10.

i. e. "It is scarce possible to conceive how much en-vy these writings drew upon him at first : for notwithstanding that he was a strenuous defender of the ancient, and therefore genuine tradition ; and vindicated its authority, as himself used frequently to say, alluding to a passage of Tertullian, from the times ; nevertheless, those who had believed, from their infancy, the stories or legends he had expung'd ; and had impos'd 'em, for their own profit, on the credulous vulgar, were exasperated at the loss of them ; and exclaimed with as much violence against him, for attempting this, as though he had resolv'd to destroy the strongest fundamentals of Religion." But de Launoi was not affected in any manner with their clamours, but still pursued his point ; and undeceived not only the true Literati, but also some of the vulgar. Vicit tamen inexpugnabili constantia Launiois hominum imperitorum, & malè seriatotum importunas inofficinasque querelas, & aniles eorum fabellas ita revocit, ut nullum jam patronum inveniant inter eos, qui aliquâ curâ veritatem indagant, multo pauciores quàm antea apud vulgum, & apud eos qui ne literas quidem norunt (21). He attacked with great vigour the Monks on two other heads (22), for he shewed the falsity of the pretended privileges, by virtue whereof they refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of Bishops ; and refuted the arguments they employed, to prove the right they had to administer the Sacrament of penance. I will here cite what Abbot de Marolles says of him. "He has found out the art of discovering the most hidden truths ; and those who love them are as much pleased with him for it ;

(21) Ibid.

(22) See his Elogium, pag. 10. usque ad pag. 13.

as those who are incapable of knowing and hon-ouring them, thought they had reason to com-plain of him, for having atchieved such glorious conquests. However, they have nothing to reproach him with ; and his adversaries have not hitherto been able to convict him of the least falsity, or of one wrong inference from the testimonies of the writers with regard to the points he has examined. It is true indeed that what we have seen of his writings, is but inconsiderable in comparison of what we may expect ; devoting himself, as he has done, to very serious studies on important subjects ; but persons of the greatest learning and abilities will always find benefit by the perusal of his works, either from his method, or the certain knowledge of those things, for which the ortho-dox Church will have no less reason to glory, than infamous superstition to repine and grieve (23)."

[G] It may be proper to peruse what Gui Patin said on that occasion.] "I give you notice that I have delivered a small packet to a young man of Lyons. Among other books you will find that of Mr. de Launoi, wherein he attempts to prove, that there never was any such Saint as Renatus, nor any Bishop of Angers of that name. 'Tis he who wrote against St. Dionysius the Areopagite, and de-clared that he had never been in France ; against the scapulary of the Carmelites, and against Mary Magdalen, affirming that she never came into Pro-vence. He is a Doctor of Divinity, a Norman, a person of a mean aspect, but learned, and chiefly in Church history. Some people here call him a de-sperate, damn'd wretch, saying, that people ought to be aware of him ; that he every year ejects a Saint from Paradise, and that there is reason to fear he will at last eject God himself from it ! Notwithstanding this, no one has answered him yet. One of his friends informed me that he had been a long time a boarder in the Jesuits Col-lege (24), who made use of him, in order to make an eulogium of their books ; but that they at last struck off his pension, because he would not give an approbation to a new doctrine they intended to publish (25)."

What follows is curious, which I borrow from Menage, and it is he who speaks (26). Mr. de Launoi, Doctor of Divinity of the faculty of Paris, has pretended that some of our Saints never ex-isted ; which made Mr. Feramus say as follows of him (*).

(23) The Abbot de Marolles, Memoirs, pag. 160. See also his Catalogue of such authors as pre-sented books to him, under the word Launoi.

(24) There is no probability he ever was so.

(25) Patin, Let-tre 49. pag. 207. tom. 1. It is dat-ed the 18th of Nov. 1650. See also Letter 151. pag. 594. of the same volume.

(26) Menage, Ani-Baillet, tom. 2. pag. 216.

(*) In his Elegy on the death of Mr. du Fay.

Tu quoque, Launoi, veri indagator & index,
Addita qui factis Numina falsa doces.

The sense is ;

"Thou too, Launoi, discoverer of truth,
Who pointest out to us the spurious Saints.

I myself made the following Greek Epigram upon him,

Τὸν Ἀνεοῖον ἄρτι, δὲ σφόδρα Οὐρανίου
Ῥίψι, ποδὸς τελευτῶν ἀπὸ θαλάσσης ἀναισθησίας.

The sense is,

"From the vast skies Launoi kicks scoundrels down,
As Jupiter once treated prating Vulcan."

They say this last verse is taken entirely out of Homer, who has employed it in his Iliad, speaking of Jupiter who kicked Vulcan out of Heaven ; but this forms the beauty of my epigram. It would be ridiculous, were this verse my own ; and I dare presume to say that it is very beautiful, on account of this application, for which I have been often congratulated by the elder Mr. Daille, a gentleman extremely well vers'd in Homer. Abbot Faydit did not observe, that only the last verse of Menage must be ascribed to Homer : He has cited part of the first as though it was in the Iliad ; and, which is still worse, he pretends that Jupiter drove out the subject suited the jocose humour of that Physician; and it was so whimsical in itself, that many

the whole rabble of the Gods. His words are as follow (27): "Rome could not bear without indignation, that Mr. de Launoi, how great a scholar soever he might be, should uncanonize five or six unknown Saints, who, in the ages of ignorance, had crept into the breviary; and that, like Homer's Jupiter, who expelled the whole rabble of Gods, and with a kick of the breech, threw 'em from Heaven to earth; this Doctor should, with one stroke of his pen, remove from the Throne of glory some Saints whom Rome had too credulously placed on it.

gard to the procession of the equinoxes; and whereas a bare subtraction of ten days sufficed for this latter reformation, the latter would require a subtraction by hundreds and thousands. The year has not, for a long time, been able to furnish a day for every canonized Saint; many Saints must be heaped upon one another in the same places; and 'tis now that one may say with Juvenal;

Nec turba decorum
Talis ut est bodie, contentaque fidera paucis
Numinibus miserum urgebant Atlanta minori Pondere (33).

(33) Juven. Sat. 13. ver. 46.

The sense is
"E're Gods grew num'rous, and the heav'nly croud
"Prest wretched Atlas with a higher load."

CREECH.

How many Senators would be found vitis creati (34), in the celestial Court, were one to proceed rigorously in that affair? To how great a number of volumes the Acta Sanctorum are already swelled? One might apply to them the well known distich following (35);

(34) See the Valesiana, pag. 48, 49. Dutch edit.

(35) See Observes diverses de Balzac, Discours 16. pag. m. 409.

Scripta gigantea quorum sub pondere molis
Tristior Encelado bibliopola gemit.

The sense is,
"The Bibliopole, oppress'd beneath such works
"Gigantic, feels Enceladus's tortures."

Be this said without prejudice to the esteem, in which their learned compilers are held. It must even be said, in their honour, that they reject a great number of fables; and that their sincerity daily exposes them to the same complaints which have been made against de Launoi. See father Papebroch's (36) reply to the Exhibitio errorum, of a carmelite named Sebastian de Saint Paul; and it will be found that Jesuit has drove a great number of intruders out of the calendar, and that for very substantial reasons. These intruders are not modern Saints, but of very remote antiquity. Cardinal Bessarion, seeing in Rome the canonization of some persons whom he thought had been ill livers, cried out, these new Saints make me very much call in question the old ones: asse che questi Santi moderni mi fanno assai dubitare delli passati. Bessarion cardinalis cum inter Divos inepta quadam auctoritate Romae quam plurimos referri videret quorum vitam improbat, se valde dubitare dixit utrum vera essent quae ab antiquis prodita fuerant (37). But it may be said, that we are infinitely more certain with regard to modern Saints than with respect to many of the ancient ones. We cannot doubt but that the former have lived upon earth; but we have almost demonstrative proofs that the latter never did. A man of wit said the other day in good company, that if we were obliged to have recourse to the intercession of Saints, he would choose new-comers, for instance Capistran, or Thomas de Villeneuve, rather than a Saint Catherine or Saint Alexis. See the remark of the article PEREZ (Joseph). I shall observe below (38), that the inquisitors censured the work of Papebroch the Jesuit.

(36) It was printed in Antwerp in the year 1666, 4to.

(37) Bodinus, Method. Hist. cap. 4. pag. m. 72. See in the remark [F] of the article BELLAI (William du) how these words of Bessarion have been applied.

(38) Towards the close of the remark [Q].

A canon of Passaw, an able preacher and professor of divinity, in the fifteenth century, said in one of his sermons, that though there should be as many festivals as minutes, the year would not suffice to give each Saint his festival, and he cites Durandus Bishop of Mande, who observes that there are above five thousand Saints for each day. Tanta (inquit ille) est Sanctorum numerofitas, quod totum tempus anni non sufficeret etiam si singulis horis, etiam singulis minutis, ageremus festum unius sancti: deinde Durandum citat: Quia sicut dicit (inquit) Gulielmus in rationali, pro qualibet die plusquam quinque millia sanctorum concurrerent (39). The author who quotes the sermon of this German canon, adds, that the feast of all-Saints was instituted, to supply or make up for the too small number of days in the year, and to prevent the resentment of those Saints to whom no honour might have been paid: Quo circa quum Pontificiorum divorum tanta illis auctoribus fore infinito sit, in supplementum cultus Sanctorum festum omnium Sanctorum excogitatum est. Quoniam humani cultus illos appetentes esse somniant, & in suos cultores prolixas

(39) Pantus Wan, Sermones de omnibus Sanctis.

(32) Michael Renigerus, de Pii quinti & Gregorii decimi furoribus contra Elizabetham Angliam Reginam, cap. 13. fol. 108. edit. Lond. 1582.

(27) Extrait d'un Sermon prêché le jour de St. Polycarpe, pag. 296.

(28) All the errors in these Greek lines are, in all probability, errors of the press.

(29) Homer. Iliad. lib. i. ver. 591. There is, in lib. 15. of the Iliad, a passage which seems to favour Abbot Faydit more. It is in the article JUNO, citation (31); but, in the main, it is not favourable to him.

(30) Suite de Menagiana, pag. 293, 294. Dutch edit.

(31) The Greek distich follows here, in the sequel of the Menagiana, probably with some errors of the press.

(32) They are a long.

"Ο πρύπιος ἰπασίμων
" Πύλα πύδοι τεταγῶν ἰσῆς ἑδῆς θουρωτίσσι (28).

"She has inveighed against this attempt, as being the most horrid sacrilegious act that could be committed. She has delivered up his books to the Inquisition, as the author himself could not be delivered up to it. She has exclaimed against him as a man whose faith is suspicious, and as an enemy to the Saints." 'Tis certain Homer says no more, than that Jupiter taking Vulcan by the foot, precipitated him from Heaven (29). If Menage said the same thing in conversation as Abbot Faydit, we must conclude from it, either that he had not considered the matter so thoroughly, as when he was writing for the publick; or that he embellished that incident, in order to make it the more pleasing, and more capable of the parallel. Be this as it will, here follows a passage from the sequel to Menagiana, in which some words are falsely ascribed to Homer (30). "Mr. Godfrey the Historiographer, being gone out of his house very early on New years day, met, in Harpstreet, Mr. de Launoi, who was going to the Sorbonne. He went up to him, and embracing him, said, Good morrow Sir, and a happy new year to you. What Saint will you discard this year out of Heaven? Mr. de Launoi, surprized at this question, answered him; I do not discard, from Heaven, those true Saints, whom God and their merit have placed here; but those who, by the ignorance and superstition of the vulgar, have crept insidiously into it undeservingly, and without the approbation of God and the Literati. This answer gave occasion to the Epigram I made on Mr. de Launoi, in which I compare him to Homer's Jupiter, who drove from heaven the whole rabble of the false Gods who had crept into it among the true ones; and who giving them a kick on the breech, precipitated them, from the summit of his throne and the stars, down to earth (31)."

If I was not afraid of making too many digressions, I would say that it were to be wished that several learned men were allowed to imitate Mr. de Launoi. False Saints are as much increased as pretended or false Nobles: so that as Kings cause, from time to time, commissions of enquiry to be issued out, in order for discovering such persons as usurp titles without having any right to them, and reducing them to their Plebeian state; the clergy should also appoint some commissioners as rigid as Boisseau, to examine the titles and patents of saintship. No one can forget the verses (32), the substance of which is as follows:

For some years past, we've none but Nobles met,
On ev'ry street, loaded with sacks of Parchment.
These they perpetually turn o'er and o'er,
And scream: —behold my awful, splendid titles!
But scarce have they display'd the mussy heap,
E're Boisseau (dread Commissioner) arrives,
Who cries;—This instrument, I'll prove, is false;
That engross'd copy, there, I now reject;
And will see the soul Draught.

Were the forces of the Church triumphant to pass muster before honest commissaries, a great number of faggots would be found; not among the common soldiers; but among the high officers, I mean among the Saints who are invoked. The calendar has more need of being reformed in that respect, than with re-many other people have told merry stories concerning it [H]. It was scarce possible but our learned Doctor must make himself a great number of enemies, as he wrote so many volumes against the maxims of the Pope's flatterers [I], and against the superstitious and pretended immunities of the Monks. He found, in the decline of life, that he had disgusted a most formidable party. He was forbid holding assemblies at his own apartment, prolixos, ne omittis & præteritis divinis stomachandi ulla causa sit, quod suo cultu orbentur. Sic omnibus minutis etiam & manipularibus divinis, & non solum patriciis & majorum gentium, hoc omnium sanctorum festo & supplemento satisfactum esse putant. Atque hoc Gulielmi illius Minatensis Episcopi est, quasi salutari hoc pharmaco omnium divorum repulsæ & offensæ placari debeant. Durandi verba hæc sunt. (†) Propter ipsorum inquit multitudinem festare de illis specialiter non valeamus. Ergo ut antea idem ait propter omisso rum (inquit) festorum supplementationem institutum est festum omnium sanctorum (40).

(†) Guil. Durand. Rubrica de festo omnium Sanctorum lib. 7.

(40) Idem, Reniger, ibid.

i. e. "Since therefore there are almost a numberless multitude of Saints of the Pope's making, all-Saints day was thought upon, in order to complete the worship of them. Because, as it is vainly supposed they are very greedy of human worship, and are bountiful to their votaries, in order that such Saints as might have been omitted may not have any cause to resent their being deprived of worship; this festival of All-Saints is looked upon as a supplemental worship, not only of those of the highest order, but such as are of the lowest class. And this, according to the abovementioned William Bishop of Mande, is a kind of salutary remedy or expiation, to appease all such Saints as may have been omitted. The words of Durandus are as follow. There are so great a number of Saints, that we cannot give to each a particular holiday. Therefore, as the same author observed before; the festival of all-Saints was instituted, to make up for those who may have been omitted". Those who make it their business to draw parallels, cannot but call to mind, on this occasion, the provident care of the Athenians, who consecrated an altar to the unknown Gods (41), from the fear they were under of neglecting some revengeful deity whose names and qualities they might be ignorant of. They imagined they had suffered for it just before; and therefore, to play a sure game (42), they resolved to offer up worship even to such deities as they might not know; which was a sure way not to omit any God.

(41) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for Jan. 1687, pag. 76.

(42) Trip. orationes de divinis operibus, i. e. "for the better security." Chrysost. Homil. 38. in Acta Apostol. See several other passages in Meursius's Treatise de Piræto, pag. 42, & seq.

(43) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Histoire & de Littérature, pag. 266, 267. printed at Roan, 1699.

(44) Valesiana, pag. m. 48.

(45) Ancillon, Mélanges Critique de Littérature, tom. 2. pag. 329.

[H] Many other people have told many stories concerning it.] Here follows that of Vigneul Marville, which is as good as the story I borrowed from the Menagiana, "Mr. de Launoi was a terrible critic, formidable both to heaven and earth. He has expelled a greater number of Saints from paradise than ten Popes have canonized. He suspected the whole martyrlogy; and he sought for, or examined all the Saints in their turn, in the same manner as the Nobility are in France. The rector of St. Eustachius's church in Paris used to say: Wherever I meet Dr. de Launoi, I bow as low as the ground; and never speak to him but with my hat in my hand, and with the utmost humility, for fear he should deprive me of my St. Eustachius, who indeed hangs but by a thread (43). (a)". These last words are very true, and here follows a passage from the Valesiana which confirms them. "St. Eustachius's life is all so a heap of fables; and I am greatly surprized that the largest parish in Paris should have quitted the name of one of our most renowned and illustrious martyrs, for that of an unknown and very suspicious Saint (44)". Ancillon had heard Daillé say, that meeting him one day at Mr. Cramoisi the bookseller's shop in Paris, they expressed a great deal of esteem and friendship for one another; and that at their parting, Mr. de Launoi said to him; Sir, I expunge a Saint every month out of the breviary, do you strike out an error from it (45). If de Launoi spoke in that manner, it was only in jest; he did not speak seriously, but exaggerated; for the number of Saints he would have degraded, it is too inconsiderable to be compared to all the months of his life. But he might have compared, without exaggerating, the number of Saints, whether doubtful or fabulous, to the number of minutes comprized in his long life. See the excellent history of the Church, which Basnage published in the year

1699, in two vol. folio. There (46) are so many false Saints and false Martyrs discarded, that de Launoi's attempt is but a rivulet in comparison of that ocean. (*). This passage has been omitted in the Paris edition of 1713. REM. CRIT.

(46) See the pages referred to in the Index, under the words Martyrs and Saints.

[I] He wrote . . . against the maxims of the Pope's flatterers.] To go to the root of the evil, in refuting the immunities which the Monks claim, he thought it necessary to establish the following important truth, viz. that the Pope has no power with regard to the canons of Councils. He wrote several letters on this subject, which were so much approved of in England; and so proper to mortify the Italians, that they were reprinted in Cambridge (47). He fell chiefly on Bellarmine; and the following account is given of the victory he obtained over that mighty champion of the Popes. In eo vero adversarium inter alios nactus est Cardinalem Robertum Bellarminum, qui absurdissima queque Romanæ curiæ placita defendenda susceperat. Si que porro in eorum confirmationem desumpta ex sacris libris testimonia adduxit, clarissimè demonstravit Launoius, fuisse ea in pravum detorta sensum, & aliter intellecta quam ea sanctissimi quique patres intellexerint, à quorum sensu in exponendis Scripturis recedere, nihil aliud est quam fidelissimos duces, & à Tridentina Synodo datos aspernari, & in errores omnes seipsum conjicere. Si que etiam canones aut patrum textus laudat Bellarminus, eos plerumque interpolatos ostendit Launoius, & malâ fide re-latos, Sicque hominem armis Scripturæ & traditionis nudatum exponit, velut nutritum in philosophica palestra tyronem, qui adversus invictam castrorum aciem irritò ridendoque conatu digladiatur; & tela ab Aristotele desumpta juvenitè vibrat (48). i. e. "Among other

(47) Ann. 1689, folio.

(48) Elog. Launoi, pag. 21.

adversaries he met with, on this subject, was Cardinal Bellarmine, who had undertaken to defend the most absurd ordinances of the Court of Rome. But de Launoi demonstrated very clearly, that all the testimonies he had alledged out of the sacred writings to confirm them, were wrested from their genuine sense, and taken quite differently from what all the Fathers had understood them; the departing from whose sense in expounding the Scriptures, was contemning the most faithful guides, given by the Council of Trent, and running into errors of every kind. Whenever Bellarmine cited any passages from the Canons or Fathers, Launoi shewed that the greatest part of them were interpolated and unfaithful. Thus he pulls off the armour of scripture and tradition, with which this man had clothed himself; and exhibits him naked, like a youth just mutilated, foolishly contending with a very learned opponent, and brandishing, with an infantine air, the weapons borrowed from Aristotle." Reiserus a Lutheran Minister (49), published a book in 1685, which, in strictness of speech, is but an abridgment of our Doctor's letters. He put two titles to them which serve to our purpose. At the top of the pages, throughout the whole book, are the following words; the running title JOH. LAUNOI THEOL. PARIS. Anti-Bellarminus: but the title of the book is as follows; Johannes Launoius Theologus & Sorbonista Parisiensis testis & confessor veritatis Evangelico-Catholicæ in potioribus fidei capitibus controversis adversus Robertum Bellarminum & alios quosdam sedis Romanæ Defensores egregius & luculentus, nunc post obitum contra Christianum Lupum Lovaniensem, Immanuelè Schelstrate Antverpiensem, Natalem Alexandrum Parisiensem, Dominicum Galesium & Franciscum Marchesium Romanos, vindicatus. The author of this book pretends, that John de Launoi is a person proper to be inserted in Illyricus's Catalogus testium veritatis. Mr. Cousin has spoke, a little too late, of this work of Reiserus, in his Journal des Sçavans; he speaking of it only in the Journal of the 30th of July 1696, and in that of the 6th of August following. These two extracts are well enough adapted to acquaint us with Mr. de Launoi's character.

(49) A native of Augsburg, and Rector of St. James's Parish in Hamburg. His book is a 4to, of 862 pages.

(b) Ex ejus Elo-
gii, pag. 30.

(c) See the Mercure Galant, for March 1678.

apartment (b) [K], as he had done for a long time once a week, and his Printer was brought into trouble [L]; but he bore those insults with great patience, and continued his writings for the public. It may be said that he died with his pen in his hand (c); there being not only a book of his in the press during his last sickness [M], but he himself correcting the proofs the day before he died. He was buried in the monastery of the Minims, as he had appointed by his will; but the epitaph which had been prepared for him, was not suffered to be engraved on his monument [N]. I forgot to observe that

(50) Elog. Lau-
noii, pag. 30.

[K] He was forbid holding assemblies in his apartment. These assemblies were perfectly innocent; the only violation was on learning and the sciences; and yet word was sent him, that the King desired they should be discontinued (50). It was thought that this was owing to the Archbishop of Paris, which made some people speak ill of him. But de Launoi did not take that liberty himself, and would not even suffer the Archbishop to be accused of it in his presence; yet he could not forbear saying, "that if he was justly accused, he must be guilty of the greatest ingratitude." His animorum motus utcumque sedabat Launoius, rursus acerbitatem, benigna ut poterat interpretatione lenibat. Absinebat ipse semper ab omni atrocitate verborum. Archiepiscopum nec incusabat ipse, nec incusari ab alio, corpore eorum se patiobatur. Sed tamen cum vir esset candidissimus pectoris, diffidit non poterat, quin si id praesentis Parisiensis praesul, laboraret vehementer ingrati animi vitio, quo caetera omnia facile continentur (51).

(51) Ibid. pag. 32.

[L] His Printer was brought into trouble. This was in 1675. He was printing his treatise on Simony, in which, among other particulars he writes against the Annates; and refutes Azorius the Jesuit, who, about the close of the sixteenth century, wrote a book to clear them from the charge of Simony. The copies of this work of Mr. Launoi were seized at the Printer's; all that could be found were carried off, and he was forbid to sell the rest; however this prohibition, on paying a fine of fifty livres, was taken off (52).

(52) Elog. pag. 28, & seq.

[M] There was a book of his in the press during his last sickness. It may be said that he died, in some measure, with his pen in his hand, since the day before he died, he corrected the proofs of a book he had writ in defence of the King's interest. It is by way of answer to an Italian writer, who, some time after, printed a treatise against the right of secular Princes, with regard to the impediments to matrimony. De Launoi had before asserted a quite contrary doctrine, in a book published in the year 1674, wherein the rights of the King, and at the same time of all secular Princes are established on so solid a foundation, that this work may be considered as one of the most useful to the State. It had been answered in Italy; and as this answer diverted secular Princes of their essential right, with regard to incapacitating or incapacitating their subjects to contract matrimony; this great man was not silent, and took care, as he was dying, of the impression of a work he had writ to refute the errors of the Italian author in question. Thus he spent all his days, either for the Church or for his Prince; and he may be called, not only Doctor or Vindicator of the King's rights, but also Defender of the just authority of Bishops, the Destroyer of false privileges, and Doctor or Assertor of the liberties of the Gallican Church. The author of the Elogium of Mr. de Launoi does not agree with the Mercure Galant, with regard to the book that was then in the press. It has not, according to him, an apology for the right of Princes over marriages, but a reply to father Alexander. He tells us that de Launoi began the treatise on this right of Princes, at the request of Cardinal Bentivoglio. De Launoi being in Rome, at the time that an enquiry was making in France, whether the marriage of the Duke of Orleans, brother to Lewis XIII, with the Princess of Lorraine, was valid, met with Cardinal Bentivoglio in the library of the Dominicans, and proposed this argument to him. If Princes have had the power to enact laws with regard to the impediments of marriage, they enjoy it still, in case they have not been divested of it. Now they have enjoyed it; and it cannot be proved that they have been deprived of it. Therefore, the Cardinal desired Mr. de Launoi to write on this subject, and to explain this argument. See the margin (54). The book was small at first: but it grew very voluminous before it was published in 1674. Dominic Galeusius, Bishop of Ruvo in the Kingdom of Naples, wrote against this book. De Launoi had no sooner seen this Prelate's work, but he took up his pen in order to refute it. Scarcely had he ended the refutation (55) but he set about making a reply to father Alexander. Qui Annatas à Simoniacis liberandas suscepit, et Summam Theologicam Thomae Aquinatis tanquam vero ejus auctori afferendam (56). His answer was very near finished, when he was seized by the sickness which carried him off in a few days; and this last work had been some time in the press. This shows that Mr. de Vifé and the author of the Elogium, are not agreed with respect to the book that de Launoi had in the press at the time of his death.

(53) Mercure Galant, for March 1678, pag. 116, 117. Dutch edit.

(54) One must conclude from thence, that Ancillon is mistaken, when he says, pag. 330. of tom. 2. of Melange, Critique de Littérature, that de Launoi wrote this book, by order of a superior power, involuntarily, and against his own opinion.

(55) Huic titulum esse voluit Indictis locupletissimi eratorum in libro scriptoris Itali contentorum. Elog. pag. 33.

[N] It is certain that the last book de Launoi was concerned in, and the proofs of which he corrected in his last sickness, was his answer to father Alexander concerning Annates. From the remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary.]

(56) Ibid. pag. 34. See, concerning this work of P. Alexander, the Journal des Savans of Nov. 18, 1675.

[N] The epitaph which was prepared for him was not suffered to be engraved on his monument. Launoi had made his will eleven years before he died; and he had intreated Mr. le Camus, first President in the Court of Aids, his old and very intimate friend, to be his executor. Mr. le Camus discharged his duty faithfully on this occasion; and got Mr. Clément, ancient Counsellor of the Court of Aids, to write an epitaph for the deceased (57). The Minims having read and examined it, shewed a letter from their General, signifying, that this epitaph could not be admitted, as it praised de Launoi for having always maintained orthodoxy; and some time after they declared that the two powers, the royal and ecclesiastical, had enjoined them not to admit any inscription in praise of de Launoi. Ubi illam (inscriptionem) expendunt, adhibent praepositi sui generalis litteras, quibus renunciabatur, nec probant nec recipi à se posse inscriptionem, quâ Launoi laus defensionis perpetuo venientis, et optime fœmæ, maximaque venerationis apud probos quaesita tribuatur. Postea vestitum sibi predicantur regia summi et sacra auctoritate, ne ullam apicem in capilla sua extare fœverent, quo Launoi nomen commendaretur (58). See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (59), and especially a letter from a Prebte of the Court of Rome, on the decree of the Inquisition of the 7th of December 1690. I will extract a passage from it, which may be of use in the history of our Doctor. The Abbot who wrote that letter, observes that the Court of Rome maintains its rights with more policy than the Court of France does here. He observes that the Court of Rome recompences in a most splendid manner, those who write in its favour; but that those who write, in France, in favour of the Gallican Church, are neglected: "However, says the author of this letter, if I might advise, posterity should be informed by some mark of honour, of the esteem in which their merit was held, and the gratitude which has been shewn to their labours. But you know how this was done with regard to one of your friends. There has not been a man more zealous for the doctrine of the Clergy of France; nor whose labours were more indefatigable, in order to illustrate and defend it, than the excellent Mr. de Launoi, who likewise had a soul abhorrent of every thing that was venal. What has been done to honour his memory, you very well know. They would not so much as suffer to be engraved on his tomb, the slender testimony which his friends paid to his merit, and to the services he had done the Church of France; they had even stopp'd as it were his mouth, some years before his death, by forbidding him to continue certain conferences that were

(57) It is in the Elogium, pag. 37. [See the remark [A] of the Additions to this article of Mr. Bayle.]

(58) Elog. Lau-
noii, pag. 38.

(59) For Sept.
1686, pag. 1039.

(d) Elog. pag. 37. He therefore was not born the 11th of December 1603, as Moreti affirms.

that he died in the Hotel d'Etrées [O], the 10th of March 1678, at above seventy seven years of age (d). The public has great obligations to him. Had he published no other work but his de Autoritate negantis Argumenti, he would have done very great service to the Republic of Letters; he having given a thousand fine hints in that book, for the distinguishing of truth from falshood in historical matters. He was engaged in controversy with many persons, and among others with Father Nicolai a Dominican [P], and Mr. Thiers (e).

He drew upon himself the indignation of the whole Order of St. Dominick, for attacking with too much freedom the reputation of Thomas Aquinas. The testimonies of respect, which prudence and gravity prompted him to intermix with his censures, did not prevent the resentment of the Dominicans; for after all, it could not be denied but that the angelical Doctor was faulty, in point of ignorance, or that he was very insincere, in the alledging of several passages designed for the refutation of heterodoxy. Father Baron endeavoured to justify Thomas Aquinas, but was not very successful in his attempt. This circumstance will give me an occasion of making several observations [Q].

(e) See what Mr. Sallio, Journal des Savans, of March 16, 1665, says concerning Mr. Thiers against Mr. de Launoi.

"were held at his apartment on those subjects, and where it may be said that more persons were taught to defend our liberties than in any other place. It may even be looked upon as near to a miracle, that we have those pieces he got printed during his life-time, in favour of the superiority of Councils, and against the infallibility of Popes, and so many other subjects of that kind; and we owe it to his particular contrivance, which was, the giving it us by smaller portions in the letters he wrote to his friends; avoiding, by this means, the intolerable slavery of the censure of certain Doctors of his time, without whose approbation no book could be licensed; and who seem hired to prevent the publication of all good books, and make authors run mad."

[O] He died in the Hotel d'Etrées. The Cardinal d'Etrée, when only Bishop of Laon, had engrossed, in some measure, Mr. de Launoi. See Mr. de Ma

(60) In pag. 159 of his Memoirs, printed in 1656, are these words: The esteem he has for Mr. de Launoi, Doctor of Divinity, one of the greatest men of the age for learning and probity, is a mark of his judgment. And indeed, he cannot be too careful of so great a man, who is an inestimable treasure.

(61) Journal des Savans of April 9, 1668.

(62) Ibid. of Dec. 10, 1668.

(63) Ibid. of June 17, 1675.

(64) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 173. Dutch edit.

(65) The 11th of Part 1.

(66) A pagina 119. usque ad paginam 134.

(67) The 9th of Part 5.

(68) The 12th of Part 6.

[P] He had a dispute ... with father Nicolai a Dominican. The Journal des Savans mentions three works of this author. I. His two dissertations De Concilio plenario, quod contra Donatistas Baptismi questionem definit (61). II. His two dissertations De Baptismi antiquo usu (62). III. His book De Jejunii Christiani & Christianorum Abstinentia vero ac legitimo ritu juxta veterem Ecclesie universalis usum (63). The first of these three pieces is levelled entirely at de Launoi, who declared that St. Austin hinted at the Council of Arles, when he said that the error of the Donatists, with regard to the invalidity of the baptism of heretics, was condemned in a general Council. De Launoi drew from thence a good number of consequences disadvantageous to the Ultramontans. The second piece of this Dominican does not relate to de Launoi; a work which the Protestants of France took advantage of, because therein is found an exprets condemnation of those who constrain infidels to be baptised. The third piece of this Dominican is against de Launoi. Here follows a short passage in the sequel to the Menagiana. "I one day said to Mr. de Launoi, that he had disgusted all the Dominicans in the tracts he had writ against father Nicolai, and that they would all draw their pens against him. But he answered me with a malicious air; I dread their penknives much more than I do their pens (64)."

[Q] Father Baron endeavoured to justify Thomas Aquinas, but was not very successful in his attempt. This circumstance will give me an occasion of making several observations. Unprejudiced persons would judge thus of the success of this dispute, though they even should only compare his first tract, with the first tract of his antagonist; but much more will they form this judgment, if they should compare de Launoi's first and second reply, with father Baron's answer. I shall only just mention several tracts belonging to this controversy. A letter of Mr. de Launoi to Mr. Faure (65) is that in which Thomas Aquinas is animadverted on. Father Baron's answer is contained in three paragraphs of Sect. II, Book I, of his apology for the Dominicans (66). Mr. de Launoi's answer is in a letter to Mr. Fortin (67). I have not seen father Baron's reply; but I know that his adversary refuted it, in a letter dated from Paris the 11th of August 1667 (68). I know not whether this dispute went any farther. To give my reader a small specimen of the judgment, which the Monks formed of the cast of mind of this Doctor of Sorbonne, I will quote some lines from father Baron. Quisquis hominem privatim, seu publicis scriptis intimus noverit, etiam ex amicissimis, non abnuet meum de illo judicium, aut verius votum. Optandum plane, ne mores ingenios corruptisset nimio suarum cogitationum amore, & alios jure, vel injuriâ carpendi, in naturam inducât consuetudine. Unde ad minus, ut cetera omittam, illud incommodi accidit, ut magnum potius, quam bonum nomen videatur ambire, & doctiores viros voluisse inumbrare, neque, ut conveniebat sapienti Theologo, satis cordi fuerit effatum illud medicorum, malum bene positum ne moveto. Plura enim ab heroicis Temporibus communi piorum opinione recepta, quæ nihil Fidei adversa, pietati etiam opportuna, ausus est, longe debilioribus, quam niterentur, Argumentis laceffere; nullo alio opere pretio, quam ex summâ morositate comparati sibi hominis, & justis possessoribus, saltem ex probabili opinione juris plerumque inique erepti (69). i. e. "Whosoever has been very familiar with his person or writings (though his greatest friend) cannot deny the judgment I have formed, or rather my desire concerning him. It were greatly to be wished, that an overfondness for his own thoughts, joined to a habit he had contracted of censuring others right or wrong, had not depraved his happy disposition: whence this mischief, to omit the rest, arose, that he seems to have thirsted after a great name, rather than a good one; and that he wanted to eclipse men of greater erudition; nor to have sufficiently observed, as a wise Divine should do, that maxim of the Physicians, remove not an evil that may prove advantageous. For he has been so bold as to attack many traditions, which ever since the primitive ages, had been unanimously received by the faithful; and without clashing with their belief, were of advantage to their piety; and this he has attempted with much weaker arguments than those on which they were grounded; and all this with no other view but to acquire a name by his great moroseness; and to deprive other people of theirs, which they are generally thought to have a better right to." In the next leaf he contrasts the character of Thomas Aquinas to that of our Sorbonne Doctor; and declares that Thomas Aquinas would have made a scruple of conscience, and been ashamed of those things, which de Launoi gloried in. The angelical Doctor, adds he, would not have disturbed the French in their belief, that St. Dionysius the Areopagite was their first Apostle; he would not have robbed the inhabitants of Provence, of the glory they claim of having had Mary Magdalen among them; nor the Carmelites of their descent from Elias, and the scapulary of Simon Stoch; nor the monasteries of their exemptions. He had better subjects to write upon; and even had he met with some doubts with regard to those things, and some improbability, he would not have meddled with them, but paid a reverence to traditions; which promote piety without prejudicing religion. Habebat meliora scribenda (Divus Thomas) & subodoratus etiam, ut erat emunctæ naris, aliquid incerti, aut minus verisimilis, ex medicorum præcepto, malum bene positum nolisset primus movere: atque ista longâ traditione rata & firma, quæ nihil obsunt fidei, præsumunt etiam pietati, in dispensationem revocare, credidisset pertinere ad illius generis questionem ab Apostolo damnatas, quæ lites generant.

(69) Vincentius Baronius, Apolog. Ordin. Prædicat. lib. 1. pag. 119.

(f) See Journal des Savans, of Nov. 12, 1675, pag. 264. Dutch edit.

Father Alexander laboured with much greater success to prove that Thomas Aquinas is the true author of the summary of Divinity ascribed to him (f). De Launoi had proposed some doubts on that head (g). Of all his antagonists none shewed less regard for him

(g) See Journal des Savans, of Aug. 12, 1675, pag. 226.

(70) Ibid., pag. 121.

non edificacionem (70). If all the circumstances set forth by this Dominican were true, there is no doubt but John de Launoi would deserve condemnation. He would be a man, who, to procure himself a name, and please his own peevish temper, had attacked general opinions, which had prevailed from time to time immemorial; were of service to the advancement of piety; no ways repugnant to religion, and grounded on proofs infinitely stronger than his objections. This last circumstance alone would be sufficient to make one condemn an author, who otherwise might be prompted by laudable motives; for it is beyond all dispute, that a long possession deserves so much reverence as to prevail with us to maintain it, all things else being equal on both sides. But if it be just to maintain it, when its titles are as valid as the pretensions of the innovator; how much must it be more so, to forbear all attempts to overthrow it, when they are much stronger than those of the adverse party? But this is not the case with our Sorbonne Doctor. The traditions which he opposes have no good title, and the arguments he objects to them are unanswerable. Now, in this case, it is plain that people have as just a right as possible to attack the most general and most ancient opinions; and especially when their falsity keeps up a criminal devotion. I would have my readers take notice, that the reasons alleged by our Doctor were so strong, that they undeceived numberless multitudes of people; but yet the abuses have not been removed; and things continue on the same foot in Provence and other places. They palm the same stories upon you, as they did on your ancestors, and you find the same worship and ceremonies there. This proves the difference there is between particular persons and the public. Periods come about, in which most people, in particular, are undeceived, and yet the public practice continues as before. Cicero affirms, that there was not so much as an old woman stupid enough to give credit to the stories, which had been antiently believed with regard to hell; and he employs this remark to prove that fabulous traditions vanish away by length of time; but that true doctrines, such as are grounded on the nature of things, are confirmed by age; and that it was to this circumstance we are to ascribe the long duration and increase of the worship of the Gods. Videmus ceteras opiniones falsas, atque vanas diuturnitate extabuisse. Quis enim Hippocentaurum fuisse, aut Chimæram putat? quæve anus tam excors inveniri potest, quæ illa, quæ quondam credebantur, apud inferos portenta extimescat? Opinionum enim commenta delet dies, nature judicia confirmat. Itaque & in nostro populo, & in cæteris, Deorum cultus, religionumque sanitates existunt in dies majores, atque meliores (71). Juvenal also complains, that the antient doctrine with regard to hell was no longer believed by any one.

(71) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 2. cap. 2.

*Esse aliquos Manis, & subterranea regna,
Et contum & Stygio vadus in gurgite nigra,
Atque una transire vadum tot millia cymba,
Nec pueri credunt, nisi qui mundum ære civantur.
Sed tu vera puta (72).*

(72) Juven. Sat. 2. ver. 149.

“ Ghosts, Stygian lakes, and frogs with croaking “ note,
“ And Charon wafting souls in leaky boat,
“ Are now thought fables, to fright fools conceiv’d,
“ Or children, and by children scarce believ’d,
“ Yet thou giv’st credit.”

TATE.

Thus we see a great change in the opinions of particular persons, and yet the publick worship had not changed, either in the time of Juvenal or Cicero: There were still the same festivals, the same processions and sacrifices, not only in honour of the celestial Gods, but also in honour of Pluto, Proserpine, and the rest of the infernal Deities. This like inconstancy on one hand, and constancy on the other, will be ever observed. Some Doctors (men of learning) of greater parts and more courageous than their brethren, will undeceive a numberless multitude of people, and yet cause no change in the publick ceremonies. The Ritual will last longer than the Faith or Religion on which it is grounded. Too many persons will find it their interest to maintain it, and will have influence enough for that purpose, though they can give no better reasons for it, than those urged to Cotta in the above-cited work of Cicero. They urged to him; and to prove the reality of these apparitions, they alleged the foundation of some Temples, a decree of the Senate, or a proverb . . . I expected reasons, replied he, and you bring only popular stories. Tum Lucilius: An tibi, inquit, fabellæ videntur? Nonne ab A. Posthumio ædam Castori & Polluci in foro dedicatam; nonne S. C. de Vatiens vides? Nam de Sagrâ, Græcorum etiam est vulgare proverbium: qui quæ affirmant, certiora esse dicunt, quàm illa quæ apud Sagram. His igitur auctoribus nonne debes moveri? Tum Cotta, Ramoribus, inquit, mecum pugnas, Balbe: ego autem à te rationes requiro (73). i. e. “ Then Lucilius: Do you look upon these things as fables? Do not you behold a temple in the forum, dedicated, by A. Posthumius, to Castor and Pollux, and a decree of the Senate with respect to Vatiens? With regard to Sagra, there is a common proverb among the Greeks, who, when they would affirm a thing, say it is more certain than any thing in Sagra. Ought you not therefore to be moved by these authorities? . . . Cotta answered; O Balbus, you combat me with popular tales, but I insist upon your giving me reasons.” Mr. de Launoi might have employed the like answer, and many others; but, as I observed before, too many people were concerned, in point of interest, to oppose the innovation and maintain the tradition. They seem to have well weighed the consequences of the principle, which one of the interlocutors in Cicero has laid down, I mean that they were sensible, that to prove a tradition true, one must shew that it stood the test of many ages. It is supposed, in Cicero, that no Doctrine which is ill grounded can last for any considerable time (74). Quid enim est hoc illo evidentius? quod nisi cognitum, comprehensumque animis haberemus, non tam stabilis opinio permaneret, nec confirmaretur diuturnitate temporis, nec una cum sæculis ætatibusque hominum inveterare potuisset. Etenim videmus ceteras opiniones, &c (75). i. e. “ For what can be more manifest than this? which, had we not known and comprehended could not have remained so long an established opinion, have been confirmed by length of time, nor have grown old with the several ages of men; for we see that other false opinions, &c.” Doubtless the Monks are prompted by some more weighty motive than what this argument supplies, to oppose John de Launoi and persons of his character. We may observe by the way, that the argument drawn from antiquity is employed in Cicero to prove a falsity; it being made use of to prove the reality and existence of the false Gods of the heathen system. This therefore is a principle which may lead one into error; and nevertheless the maxim, that time destroys false opinions, Opinionum commenta delet dies, might have been long since urged against the false worship of the ancient Greeks and Romans; since for many ages, there is no country, in which their Religion, their Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Neptune, &c. have been acknowledged and worshipped. Thus their cause falls to the ground, when once it is supposed that length of years destroys false Doctrines. It is to be observed, that this principle can never be admitted as good proof, unless we fix and determine the number of years sufficient to distinguish truth from error. In case a thousand years are sufficient, then every opinion which has lasted that term of years is true; but if no time be limited, it is to no purpose to conclude, that since a Doctrine has lasted four thousand years it must necessarily be true. No man knows what will come to pass, or whether the fifth millenary may not put a period to that which resisted the four preceding ones. A reflexion of Horace may be applied on this occasion;

(73) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. 2. cap. 5.

(74) Ibid., lib. 2. cap. 2.

(75) The rest is quoted above, at citation (71).

Scire

(b) Valefana, pag. m. 36.

(i) Confer quæ Sebastianus Kort-holtus, memorat. pag. 9. Dissertationis de Puellis Poëtiis.

(76) Horat. Ep. 1. ver. 35. lib. 2.

Scire velim, pretium chartis quotus arroget annus (76).
The sense is
"I'd know what time is necessary to give value
"To Poems. ———"

(77) See citation (44) of the article JOVIAN.

(78) See the remark [B] of the article JOVIAN.

(79) Of whom Statius, towards the close of the 10th book of the Tib-tais, says, Paulum si tardius artus Cessissent, potuit fumen meruisse secundum, i. e. "Who, had he lived but a very little longer, would have merited the thunder a second time, &c."

(80) See the remark [A] of the article BARBARA.

Du tonner dans l'air bravant les vains carreaux, Et nous parlant de Dieu du ton de Des-Barreaux (80).
The sense is
"Braving the thunder-bolts that play in air,
"And, with Des-Barreaux, still defying God.

(81) In his Dissertation on the worship of unknown Saints. See Balgaze, tom. 2. of his History of the Church, pag. 1038, 1039. and Histoire de l'Ouvr. des Savans, for August 1698, pag. 372, & seq.

(82) See the same works, ibid.

(83) For March 1700, pag. 356. and April 1700, pag. 382.

(84) See Pafquier, Recherche de la France, liv. 3. chap. 12.

(85) Moribus antiquis res stat Romana vitæque. Ennius apud Cicet. citatum ab August. de Civit. Dei, lib. 2. cap. 21. Vide etiam Volcatium Gallicanum, in Avidio Cassio, pag. 54. tom. 1.

(86) Quintil. lib. 1. cap. 6. pag. m. 39.

him than Father Theophilus Raynaud [R]. I will not omit observing (b), that he had expunged, from his Calendar, St. Catherine the Virgin and Martyr; and that he said that her life was a mere fiction; and to shew that he did not give any credit to it; he, every year, on the festival of this Saint, used to say a mass for souls departed (i). I must likewise observe, that his works written against the worship established in fabulous traditions have been of no service to the public (k). I shall present my readers with the judgment which de Vigneul-Marville formed of him [S]. This will give me occasion to mention a particular

(k) See the remark [R].

In our days, used a Sub-prior of St. Anthony to say, let us beware of innovations (87).

[R] Of all his antagonists, none showed less regard for him than father Theophilus Raynaud. We need but read his Hercules Comœdianus, which shows the utmost fire and passion. Those who will not take the pains to read it, and will only reflect on the following quotation, will be persuaded that our Doctor never met with more injurious treatment. Infronsis vir ingenii Joannes Launojus, cui nihil adeo sacrum fuit, quod non fœderis scriptione aliqua petulant no plisquam censoria, Caricibus ipsis non peperciit, imo haec non semel conscripsit Is cum in me quoque incursisset, argente quondam infamioso Marjya, qui sua deleria, imò aperta heretica commenta, contra extremam præpè digitis in eo Antemurali, agrè talis, ex persona amici ac civis nostri S. Theologia D. castigatus est; patescatis primum ejus fragoribus, quibus Hercules prætulit. Tam mendacis, calumniis, loquacitate, scurrilitate, aliisque famintui generis maculis, quibus satyra vocis quam scriptis ab eo in nos exarata, debonissimatur ita ut Comœdi exemplis, Hercules simul terrificus, & famina, non nisi pallacis ac dolis armata, apparere voluisse in ea lacubrationis videatur. Quæ causa fuit, cur Hercules Comœdiani appellatione visus sit insignitendus (88). i. e. "Of so silly and forward a turn of mind was John de Launoi, that nothing, how sacred soever, could escape the pollution of his petulant, and more than satyrical writings. He did not spare the Saints themselves, but even declared war against Heaven more than once. . . . When this man thought fit to attack me likewise, excited by a certain dreaming Marjyas, who was displeased at my just glancing, in that counter-scarp, on his chimerical and even openly heretical positions, he was chastised by a Doctor of Divinity, my friend and fellow Citizen; having first laid open and exposed all the idle storming, by which he endeavoured to pass for another Hercules, and then the lies, calumnies, garrulity, scurrility, and other wretched faults, which disgraced his book, or rather satyr, written against me; inasmuch that, after the example of Commodus, he seemed desirous of appearing, in that work as a terrible Hercules, and a woman armed only with flattery and falsehood. For this cause he was dubbed with the title of Commodus's Hercules." In another place this Jesuit compares him to Ishmael. Homo Israelita, cujus manus contra omnes, Joannes Launoy (89). [T. Raynaud published this piece under the name of Hortentus Leotardus. He never employed more Gall than on this occasion. It is a Satyr from beginning to end. The author, who had a very virulent pen, queried whether his adversary's birth were legitimate; in imitation of father Guefnay, who had raised the same doubt with regard to de Launoi, in his Triumph of Mary Magdalen.] Addit. by the Transl.

(87) See the Preface to the new editions of the Jesuits Catechism, written by Pafquier.

(88) Theoph. Raynaud. Synonym. de Libris propriis, num. 63. pag. 67. & sequenti.

[S] I shall present my Readers with the judgment which de Vigneul-Marville formed of him. "How much soever Mr. de Launoi may be esteemed, it must be confessed that he had the predominant fault of Criticks, which is, to observe no measure, and obstinately to defend the worst causes. His book of Extreme Unction, of Aristotle's Fortune, and some others, are good pieces; but it may be said in general, that in all this Doctor's compositions, there is much more erudition than judgment and just reasoning. He commonly does not treat the principal subject best; but he handles incidental matters admirably, and frequently deceives the unattentive reader by their means (90)."

(89) Ibid., tom. 72. pag. 70.

The author of the Journal des Savans has asserted (91), That nothing can, with less justice, be laid to Mr. de Launoi's charge, than his defending the worst causes with obstinacy. It was his particular character to love truth above all things; to seek for it without prepossession, and to communicate it freely when he had found it &c. De Vigneul-Marville answered (92), that (90) Vigneul-Marville, Mélanges & Hist. de Littérature, pag. 267.

(91) See tom. 3. of Vigneul-Marville, pag. 266. Roman edit.

(92) Ibid. pag. 267.

But in combating, in this manner, the Inquisitors, they will render themselves useless with regard to the reformation of publick abuses; their criticism, tho' much severer than it is, would, at most, serve only to the instruction of particular persons. The disease is past cure. Father Mabillon has laid down some very good rules with respect to the worship of certain Saints, and the judgment to be formed of relics (81); but what has he gained by this? It was answered, Physician cure thyself. Reform first the worship which is paid, in some Monasteries of their order, (St. Benedict's) to Saints as dubious as any. He was told of the injury he does to the Church, and the advantage he gives the Protestants (82). Is not this shutting the door, as it were, to all his good designs? Mr. Thiers takes up his pen against false relics, he enquires where the bodies of the Martyrs lie, he publishes dissertations on the holy tear of Vendôme, and on St. Firmin. Now all this is lost labour. The King's Council suppresses his book on St. Firmin, as the Bishop of Amiens had condemned a letter that had been published on the same question. See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (83), and the third part of the Bibliotheca volante. All the Saints of a discreet zeal are nipt in the bud. They build on this principle, that it is dangerous to annul old customs; that old boundaries must not be removed; and that, according to the old proverb, We should leave the minister where it stands (84). The prosperity of Christian Rome, like that of Pagan Rome, is grounded on the preservation of the old Rites (85). Consecrations must be complied with, and Religion will not suffer any innovation to be made in them. Sed illa mutari vetat religio, & consecratis utendum est (86).

(1) See towards the close of the remark [S].

a particular not very much known; and which does not well agree with the little friendship there was between this Doctor and the Jesuits, and with the affection he bore Mr. Arnauld. The fact is, that his opinion concerning grace was contrary to the doctrine of St. Augustin (b).

that there are two ways of loving truth; the one to love it for its own sake; and the other, to love it in regard to one's self. . . . That St. Austin loved it for its own sake . . . that it is not quite the same with respect to the generality of Criticks, who only love truth, either for the glory it gives to those who first discover it; or, which is often the case, from a peevish humour of domineering over others. "I will not say, continued he, that de Launoi was one of those rambles who go in quest of truth as Knight Errants formerly did after mighty achievements. But then it cannot be denied, that numbers of very learned people have sometimes looked upon him as a Critick who over-shot the mark, and did not always find the truth he idolized. This will appear, if we cast an eye on such literati as have attacked him, or wrote severe answers to him." One may have seen him quite covered with the dust of his daily combats, and with the bruises he had met with on those occasions (93). This author adds that, even in Mr. Arnauld's opinion, he had not always maintained orthodoxy; he had declared too much in favour of a divine inferior to St. Austin; and from which the Protestants, of the Arminian principles, pretended to gain great advantage. From this we may infer that he did not approve St. Austin's doctrine with regard to predestination; but we shall be much better informed of his sentiments concerning that doctrine, by the preface to a treatise which is not yet published. Mr. Simon has inserted it in one of his letters (94) and has shewn that Dr. de Launoi condemns the sentiments of St. Austin in this work. This letter is not very advantageous to the Doctor, and gives us a very mean idea of his erudition. See the Journal des Savans of November 14, 1701, pag. 722, Dutch Edition, and the Journal of Trevoux, of August 1703, pag. 1313. of the French edition. The Journal of Trevoux, for January 1704, Article I. speaks of a defence of St. Austin, by father Daniel, in opposition to the dissertation ascribed to de Launoi. ["The work Bayle speaks of, the preface whereof Mr. Simon had writ, was printed, probably under the direction of Mr. Simon, in 1702. it is a small 12mo. Many people are of opinion that it was not writ by Mr. de Launoi; but it is universally allowed, I believe, that it contains the real sentiments of that doctor. I read that book when it was first published; and did not perceive any particulars in it, which could make one judge that it was not writ by de Launoi. I since read (above twenty years ago) an Extract of a small discourse made by this Doctor at Sorbonne, in Mr. Arnauld's affair, in the year 1655; and I remember that it began in pretty near the following Terms (in Latin): "Every one knows that, on the Articles of Predestination and Grace, I am not of St. Austin's opinion; but adhere to what all the Greek and Latin fathers who preceded him, have taught on that subject. It was notorious that de Launoi persisted always in the same sentiments; but it is my opinion that he had not studied this subject sufficiently, in order to form a right judgment of it. And indeed this work published in 1702 is far from being a good one." De Launoi wrote a great deal, and did not think enough.] From the Remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

(94) It is the 21st of Lettres ecclésiastiques de Mr. Simon, printed in Trevoux in the year 1700.

It may be proper to add some few particulars to this article.

LAUNOI (JOHN DE) was born in Valdesie, a village of the Lower Normandy, in the diocese of Coutance, and not at Valagne, as some authors pretend. After going through his first studies in Coutance, where he was educated under the direction of William de Launoi, his uncle, he came to Paris, and pursued his studies during five or six years stay in that city (a). He afterwards received his Diploma, after which he was ordained Priest, and took his degree of Doctor in Divinity of the College of Navarre in 1634. He went the same year into Italy, and there contracted with several Literati a friendship, which he cultivated afterwards. At his return to Paris he devoted himself entirely to the study of the Fathers and Divines; and made great collections of passages from both, with which he afterwards interspersed his different works. About the year 1645, he was appointed Royal Censor of Books of Divinity; but it is not known how long he acted in that capacity (b). The approbation he gave in 1646 to a French History of the Hospital of the Holy Ghost of Montpellier, drew upon him the indignation of several of his brethren, who bore an animosity to him. They also accused him of saying in conversation before the Bachelors, that Clerks were not obliged, by any Canon Law, to repeat the Breviary. At last their artifices were so successful, that they caused him to be expelled the College of Navarre (c). It was then he retired to Abbot d'Estrées, who lived in Laon College (d). That Abbot having been made Bishop of Laon in 1653 was determined to serve his friend de Launoi; and thereupon gave him, at different times, two Canonries in his Cathedral; but he resigned them a little after, upon pretence that he had no voice, and consequently was not qualified for his employments. He refused other preferments, being void of all ambition, and contented with what he possessed. Below is his epitaph, which the Minims would not suffer to be engraved on his monument [A]. Du Pin gives the following character of this famous author [B].

(a) Nicéron, Hommes Illustres, tom. 32. pag. 84, 85. Paris 1735, 12mo. See also the remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

(b) Father Nicéron, pag. 85.

(c) Idem, ibid. pag. 86.

(d) Idem, ibid. Abbé Marolles declares this to have been in 1644. but it was in 1648.

[A] Below is his epitaph, which the Minims would not suffer to be engraved on his monument. They were offended at certain expressions in it, particularly the following, veritatis assertor perpetuus. The epitaph runs thus,

D. O. M.
Hic jacet Joannes Launoius Constantiensis, Parisiensis Theologus; qui veritatis assertor perpetuus, Furium Ecclesie & Regis acerrimus vindex, vitam innociam exegit: Opep neglexit, & quantulumcunque ut reliquus satis habuit: multa scripsit nulla spe, nullo timore: Optimam famam maximamque venerationem apud probos adeptus. Annum septimum & septuagesimum excessit; Animam Christo consignavit die 10 Martii anno 1678.

Hoc monumentum amico jucundissimo poni curavit Nicolaus le Camus, supremæ subsidiorum Curæ princeps (). [B] Du Pin gives the following character of this famous author. "The number of books he wrote, and the manner in which they are writ, shew sufficiently his great compass of reading and vast erudition, and the ease with which he wrote, as well as his prodigious application. His diction is neither elegant nor polite, he employing harsh and unusual terms. He expresses himself after a very peculiar () Nicéron, Hommes Illust. tom. 32. pag. 87, 88. Paris 1735, 12mo.

A very ample catalogue is given of all de Launoi's writings in Nicéron's Hommes Illustres, tom. 32. [C].

"liar manner, and gives a singular turn to the matters he treats of. He quite tires, not only his adversaries, but also his readers, with the tedious length of the passages which he transcribes entire, and repeats continually in his works. He exhaufts a subject when once he takes it in hand. He does not always reason justly; and he sometimes seems to have views very different from those which he proposes in his works. With regard to his morals, he was a person of great simplicity, was a good friend, disinterested, sober, laborious; an enemy to vice, void of ambition, charitable and beneficent; and ever observing the same tenor of life. But truth was especially his darling; nothing being more abhorrent to him than fables and forgeries. He has defended with resolution the rights of the Church and King; and boldly attacked the opposite maxims of the Italian divines of Rome. In a word, it cannot be doubted but that the literary world, the Gallican church, and the school of Paris are greatly obliged to him for his discoveries in many points of history and criticism; for the resolution with "which he asserted the authority of councils, the rights of Kings and Bishops; for his sagacity in discovering the falsity of the legends of some Saints, and the forgery of many prerogatives".

[C] A very ample catalogue is given of all de Launoi's writings.] The following edition was published, not long since, of all his works. Joannis Launoi Opera omnia, ad selectum ordinem revocata, ineditis opusculis aliquot, notis nonnullis Dogmaticis, Historicis & Criticis, Auctoris vita, variis Monumentis tum ad Launoi, tum ad scripta ipsius pertinentibus, Præfationibus cuicque volumini affixis, Indicibus locupletissimis, aucta & illustrata. Accessit tractatus de varia Launoi librorum fortuna. Coloniae Allobrogum 1731, 1732, five Vol. folio. The author's works are here digested according to the order of the subjects; and the prefaces and notes are curious and instructive. At the end of the second part of volume IV, is the life of the author, and the history of his works, under the title of Launoiiana. The editor has likewise inserted there, the various elogiums which have been made of du Launoi.

LAURENS (ANDREW) in Latin Laurentius, Professor of Physic in the University of Montpellier [A], Chancellor of the University (*), and first Physician to Henry IV, died the 16th of August 1609, as we are told by Guy Patin (a), who informs us of several other particulars, that have been transplanted into Moreri's Dictionary, and which I will not repeat. I shall content my self with supplying what is wanting in that Dictionary. No particular mention is there made of the writings of Andrew du Laurens; and therefore I shall observe that he published several which were highly esteemed, and particularly his Anatomy [B], which he dedicated to Henry IV in the year 1599, and has

(*) [He was Professor in 1583 and Chancellor in 1603.] From the Paris edit. to Bayle's Dictionary.

(a) Patin, Lettres 31. pag. m. 142. of tom. I. See also the 27th Letter, pag. 117.

[A] Professor of Physick in the University of Montpellier.] It is remarkable that before they would permit him to act as professor, they obliged him to pass again through all his exercises, in order to take his doctor's degree a second time. Cum Regio diplomate Monspelii Medicinam publice docendi munus obtinisset, admitti tamen non potuit, donec iterum factus fuisset primò Med Baccalaureus, deinde Licentiatus, tandemque doctor, & toties iterum de Medicina respondisset, quoties in Academia ex illius instituto opus fuit (1) i. e. "When he had obtained, by the royal diploma, the professorship of physick in Montpellier, he nevertheless could not be admitted, till he again was made, first Bachelor of Physick, next Licentiate, and at last Doctor; and had again gone through all the disputations, in Physick, as the statutes of that university required". Riolanus confirms this. The Sieur de Laurence, says he (2), being a doctor of Avignon, was obliged, in order to reside in Montpellier, and there read a lecture, to commence doctor in the university of the last mentioned city, as one but just admitted. Patin doubtless did not know this particular, which he otherwise would have joyned with the following remark:

Du Laurens came to court with countess de Tonerre, by whose recommendation he was made one of the King's Physicians, and Regius Professor in Montpellier, contrary to the laws and statutes of that university, by an arret of the privy council, which he had much ado to get recorded in Toulouse (3). I am to observe that he founded a physick garden near one of the gates of Montpellier, and there placed the following inscription, Argus esto, non Briareus (4). i. e. "Be an Argus, not a Briareus".

[B] He published several pieces which were highly esteemed, and particularly his anatomy.] It was reprinted at Paris in folio in the year 1600, and the same year at Frankfort in folio. These two editions were followed by three others at Frankfort, in 8vo, in the year 1602, 1615 and 1627. The work is intitled Historia Anatomica humani Corporis & singularum ejus partium, multis controversiis & observationibus novis illustrata (5). i. e. "An anatomical history of the human body and its several parts, illustrated with several new controversies and remarks". The word novis gives us to understand, that the Paris edition of 1600 was not the first; it having been preceded by that of Lyons 1593, in 8vo, which is but half as large.

I have seen two translations of the Paris edition the one by Francis Size, and printed at Paris in the year 1610 in 8vo, the other by Theophilus Gelée physician at Dieppe. It was printed at Paris in folio in the year 1613, with several other treatises of du Laurens (6) translated by the abovementioned Gelée, or which had been already published in French by du Laurens (7), or had been collected from his lectures, when he used to read publicly to the surgeons of the University of Montpellier, in 1587, 1588. These last treatises are upon the gout, the leprosy, and the venereal disease. All the french treatises I just now mentioned have also been published in Latin. They are inserted in Tom. II of Du Laurens's works, Frankfort edition of 1621 folio, with the Annotationes in Artem parvam Galeni, & Consilia Medica. The treatise on Crises had been printed separately in Latin at Frankfort, in the year 1596, and 1606 8vo, (8). No notice is taken in Lindeniis renovatus of the Latin edition of all du Laurens works, made at Paris in two volumes, 4to, 1627, by Gui Patin, who gave a Latin translation of some treatises which du Laurens had writ only in his mother tongue.

The French version of the history of Anatomy, printed in 8vo at Paris, in the year 1610, has no plates, but Gelée's translation in folio has. The Printer who omitted them gives the following reason, among others for it, that du Laurens added figures with no other view but to please certain people, not that he thought them very useful, but that they would serve to amuse rather than instruct students. Farther, he himself declares, that he let the printer of the Latin edition take the plates or figures from those to be found among the common Anatomists, such as those of the Sieurs Paré & Guillemeau, surgeons to our most Christian Kings, or of Charles Stephens, doctor of physick in this University: so that if there be any errors in the figures, he desires they may be laid to the charge of the printer and engraver; and says that he has explained himself sufficiently in his history, so as not to want any help from figures; nothing being required but a sight of the annual dissections, without which no person can attain to a perfect skill in anatomy (9). As these particulars relate to the history of this work, I imagined the reader would not be displeased to find them here.

I must add, that although this physician was a very skilful anatomist, he nevertheless gave occasion to cen-

(1) Paulus Freher, in Theatro, pag. 1323, ex II Parte Vitarum Virorum doctorum Jani Jacobi Boissardi.

(2) Riolan. Recherches des Eschol. de Medecine, pag. 8. See also pag. 167.

(3) Patin, Lettre 26. pag. m. 117. of tom. I.

(4) Paulus Freher, in Theatro, pag. 1323.

(5) See Lindeniis renovatus, pag. 47. The Lyons edition of 1623, in 8vo, has been omitted.

(6) That on Crises, divided into three books, with the general method relating to the prognostics and crises of distempers, and that on the King's Evil, divided into two Books, the first whereof treats of the wonderful vertue of curing the King's Evil by the touch, conferred by the Divine Power on the Kings of France only; and the second explains the nature of the King's Evil, &c.

(7) That on the preparation of the fight; on catarrhs, and on old age.

(8) Ex Lindeniis renovato, pag. 47.

(9) Advertisement to the reader, prefixed to the Anatomy translated by Francis Size.

has borne several editions. They are mistaken who assert that he reaped advantage by Aquapendente's conversation [C]. His native place has not been justly expressed in Lindenius renovatus [D]. ANTHONY DU LAURENS, his youngest brother, was an Advocate in the King's Council, and died in the year 1647, at eighty three years of age. He married Anne Robert, daughter of the Advocate Anne Robert, who was living in 1662 [E]. Mr. DU LAURENS, Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, was their son (b); and LOUISA DU LAURENS, wife to Mr. Baltazar Master of Requests, and Intendant of Justice in Languedoc, was their daughter (c). We are told in the Mercuré Galant, that PETER DU LAURENS Doctor of the Sorbonne, formerly Grand Prior and Vicar General of the Order of Clugni, died Bishop of Bellai the 17th of January 1705, aged fourscore and nine years; and that he was grandson of Andrew du Laurens, first Physician to King Henry IV (d).

(b) ExtraEct from Patin, Letter 251. pag. 389. and Letter 282. pag. 508. of tom. 2.

(c) Patin, Letter 356. pag. 59. of tom. 3.

(d) Mercuré Galant, for February, 1705, pag. 162.

sure. Peruse the following words. All that the Sieur du Laurens has wrote by way of question, is an anatomy that is merely physiological. In his anatomy he has committed great errors; not those which Collado and Laürembergius have pointed out, and which are in his questions; but in the text of his anatomical history; which is so plainly demonstrated, that any man, who is ever so little versed in anatomy, will confess that he is not to be defended (10).

"do not understand; now how will you do this? Not by your instruction, for you cannot give what you yourself have not; but by accident; like a hard and stupid bone, which, though blunt, can yet give an edge to steel. The perusal of your books will not make your readers more learned, but on the contrary more ignorant, if they should believe what you say; till by finding out the falsity of your doctrine, they become fired with a just zeal, and resolve to join with those who profess true and genuine physick; and gain the prize of excellent science, by radicating your most pernicious errors, out of their own minds and those of other people. You dwell too long on this subject, Colladon! those ought to be treated in a friendly manner, who labour for the publick good. If they have errors, a veil should be thrown over them. To err is human; but to attack errors with a virulent pen, and to raise a molehill to a mountain, is barbarous".

(10) Riolan. Recherches des E-scholus de Medicine, pag. 214. 215.

This Collado, or rather Colladon, has carried his censure much too far. He pretending that there was nothing good in du Laurens's anatomy. This very great prejudice and passion has been observed by John Sperlingen, professor of physick at Wittemberg. Hæc & plura ejusmodi Collado, says he, quæ non hic saltem, sed ubique contra Laurentium magno sermore scriptitat. Ubi ita se gerit, ut oculati videant omnes, non tam amore veritatis quam antiquitatis, cordato huic contradixisse viro. Sed non obijcienda nova omnia, alius & ipse hic Colladonis liber è medio tollendus & è bibliothecis foret exterminandus. Quem tamen multa bona, multa acutè excogitata continens, non imus inficias. Interim etiam non omnia in Laurentio falsa, sed plurima vera, plurima non absque insigni legentium commodo scripta sunt. Fallit Collado, cum inquit: Laurentii Anatomie tota mundis scætet, ut de ea verè Prophetæ querimoniam posses queri, omnis princeps ægrotat, à vertice ad plantam pedis, & non est in corpore toto sanitas; adeo omnes libri partes insulubilibus errorum maculis imbutæ sunt, ut nescio, quâ creta aut cimelia absterge purgarique possint. Fallit & cum scribit: Docere vis, quæ non intelligis, quomodo id præstabis? non per te sanè, non enim potes dare quod non habes, sed uti vulgè dicitur, instar duræ & stupidæ cotis, acutum reddere quæ ferrum valet, expers ipsa secandi. Non facies sanè tuorum librorum lectores doctiores, imò si tibi fidunt indoctiores: sed tam deprehensa doctrinæ tuæ falsitate justo percitū zelo, veræ & genuinæ medicinæ auxiliatrices munus asserent, præmium clarioris scientiæ eruncatis tuis ex suo aliorumque animis erroribus perniciosissimis metent. Ne quid nimis, Collado! Amicè tractandi publici boni causa qui laborant. Neque si habent, & tegendi & detegendi illi. Errare humanum sed errata stylo atrocita lingua virulenta notare, ac è musca elephantem facere, inhumanum (11). i. e. "These and more of the same sort, which Colladon writes with great heat and passion, not only there, but every where against du Laurens; on which occasion he so behaves, that all sagacious readers will see, that he contradicted this judicious man, not so much out of a love of truth, as of antiquity. But all new things are not to be rejected, for otherwise this very book of Colladon must be thrown away, and banished from libraries: which, we at the same time own, contains many valuable and sagacious particulars. With regard to the compositions of du Laurens, all he has wrote is not false, but many things are true, and may be of very great benefit to the reader. Colladon imposes upon us when he writes as follows: The anatomy of du Laurens is quite full of errors, so that we may justly apply to it the complaint made by the prophet, every prince is sick from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, and there is no health in any part of his body: every part of his work is polluted with spots, so very black, that no fuller's earth can possibly take them out. He likewise imposes upon us when he writes. You go about to teach, what you yourself

[C] They are mistaken who assert, that he reaped advantage by Aquapendente's conversation.] We will illustrate this by the following extract of a letter of Guy Patin. "Mr. Hofman . . . (12) observes somewhere, that du Laurens has published a certain anatomical truth or discovery, which would never have entered his mind, had he not heard it of Fabricio Aquapendente's, at whose table he eat for some years. Now this is absolutely false; the said Sieur du Laurens having never studied but at Paris under Lewis Duret, and that during seven years . . . So that he never studied in Padua; which I am very certain of, I having been, for these twenty three years past, Physician to the family of Messieurs de Laurens, who are two Counsellors and a Master of Requests, whose father, who was the younger brother of Andrew du Laurens, died but ten years since, of a quartan ague, aged fourscore and seven years; and who formerly gave me all the informations I could desire (13)."

(12) Gaspar Hofman, Professor of Physick in Altorf.

[D] His native place has not been justly expressed in Lindenius Renovatus.] The author of that book employs those words, Natus in Academia Montpelienfi (14). i. e. "Born in the University of Montpellier." This expression would have been improper, even though the mother of Andrew du Laurens had been delivered of him in a college at Montpellier. I am not certain that he was born in Montpellier, as the author (15) quoted in Freherus's Theatrum affirms. It is no conclusive argument to the contrary, that this Andrew had a brother (16) born at Arles; for it is no extraordinary thing for one man's children to be born in different towns. I therefore shall wait for a clearer proof of this point, as likewise of the following words in Lindenius renovatus, obit in patria, which signify that Andrew du Laurens died in Montpellier; but in the mean time shall be almost persuaded that he was born in Arles, since Guy Patin calls him Arelatenfis, in the title-page of the edition he published in 1627.

(13) Patin, Letter 27. pag. 127. of tom. 1. It is dated the 6th of Sept. 1649.

(14) Mercklin in Lindenius renovatus, pag. 47.

(15) Paris II Vi-tarum Virorum de Forum Jani Jacobi Boissardi apud Freher, in Teatro, pag. 1323.

(16) Honore or Honoratus du Laurent, Archbishop of Ambrun. See his article in Morecti.

[He certainly was born in Arles, but this is not asserted in Boissard's Lives of Learned Men, the very contrary being said, pag. 185. Patria ei fuit Mons Pessulanus &c.] From the remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary,

[E] He married Anne Robert . . . who was living in 1662.] Patin affirms, in a letter dated the 26th of December 1662 (17), that on this very day he had ordered extreme unction to be given her, she being fourscore and seven years of age; but he had said elsewhere (18), that she was but fourscore and one in 1661.

(17) The 281st, pag. 507. of tom. 2.

(18) In Letter 251. pag. 380. of the abovementioned volume.

(11) John Sperlingen. de Formatione Hominis in utero, pag. 123. edit. Witt. 1647. He cites Collado in Obs. cap. 34.

LAURENTIO (NICHOLAS) vulgarly called Cola de Rianzo, was, in the sixteenth Century, one of those men whom the providence of God employs from time to time, time, as a theatre or stage, on which men may behold the vicissitudes and caprices of human life [A]. He was son to a mean Vintner and a Laundress. His application to study in his youth, and the natural strength of his genius, made him very eminent. He became vastly eloquent; and could repeat by heart the finest passages in Cicero, Livy, Julius Cæsar, Valerius Maximus and Seneca. He was prodigiously fond of ancient inscriptions, and was very able to explain them. He got a Notary's place, which at that time was so honourable, that Gentlemen did not scruple to exercise it. The commissaries of the several divisions or districts of Rome having dispatched him to wait on Pope Clement VI, who kept his See at Avignon, he made so eloquent a speech, that he gained the esteem and benevolence of the Pontiff in question, and the admiration of that Court; which gave him the courage to declaim strongly against such great Lords in Rome as oppressed the citizens. Cardinal John Colonna was determined to make him suffer for this; but after considering the affair maturely, he discontinued the ill offices he was doing him with regard to the Pope. Laurentio grew more and more exasperated against these petty tyrants of Rome; and he one day made so bold a speech in the Capitol against them, that two boxes on the ear were given him when he had ended. The persons who struck him were a Lord of the Colonna family, at that time Chamberlain of Rome, and Thomaso Fortifiocca, Secretary of the Senate. Laurentio dissembled his resentment, and continued to deliver his speeches in the Capitol, and in various Churches; and to compose emblems, the whole in order to point out the evil administration of justice. The persons concerned looked upon all this as sport; and particularly when they observed that his speeches were blended with facetious sayings, and that he threatened some of them with capital punishment. In all probability they imagined, that, by reason of his wild extravagances, it would not be in his power to hurt them, but they were mistaken; for taking advantage of the absence of Stephen Colonna, who had marched out of Rome with his soldiers to fetch provisions, he got together the people, made a speech, enacted laws, drove all the great men out of the city, assumed the judiciary functions, and was declared Tribunus Augustus and deliverer of the people in 1346. The faction of the exiles were not powerful enough to make head against him, because of their divisions; whence he had an opportunity of managing things at pleasure, and saw himself at the head of a new Roman Commonwealth, in whose name he wrote to the other States, to the Emperor, and the Pope himself. The better to confirm his authority, he sentenced many persons to death; and, among others, he hanged Martin de Porto, one of the petty tyrants of Rome. He received embassies from several Princes and Commonwealths; and boldly summoned the Pope to come and reside in Rome with the College of Cardinals. He was so fortunate in the war he sustained against the faction of the Nobles, that he suppressed it entirely; but he then acted as most of those do, who take up arms upon the specious pretence of liberty; it is not the tyranny they hate, but the tyrants; they are vexed to see other people, and not themselves, exercise the supreme authority. Laurentio had no sooner crushed the tyranny of others, but he himself turned tyrant; upon which he was treated as he had treated others; he was forced to fly, and hanged in effigy at Rome as a traitor. After having been concealed some time, he presented himself before the Emperor, who gave him leave, but without advising him to it, to go and salute the Pope. He, at first, met with an unfavourable reception from him; but after having been imprisoned some months, he followed the Pope's Legate to Rome. He raised up his party again to so high a pitch, that he was enabled to renew the war against the Colonna's; but his rigorous treatment of the people, and his exactions, made him so odious, that they took up arms. He imagined that his eloquence would have the power to calm this storm, as it had done on so many other occasions, but was mistaken; and it was to no purpose that he shewed himself to the people, and harangued them from the windows; they setting fire to his palace. He endeavoured to fly in the disguise of a beggar; and was got almost out of danger, when he was discovered by a certain little man. Another thrust him thro' the belly with a sword; he was quite covered with wounds; his body was dragged through the streets, and hung up by the feet (a). It continued two years in that condition, after which the Jews burnt it in the fields (b). Some of his writings are still extant [B].

(a) Extracted from Prosper Mandozio's Biblioteca Romana, Cent. 2. num. 55.

(b) This was the 8th of Sept. 1353.

LAZZARELLI

Ludit in humanis divina potentia rebus (†).

(†) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 4. Elcg. 3.

“All human things are but the sport of heaven.”

The play which our Laurentio acted on the great stage of the world, had the same kind of catastrophe, a tragical one.

*Tolluntur in altum,
Us lapsu graviore ruant* (2).

(2) Claudian. in Ruffin. lib. 1. circa int.

“They're rais'd aloft,
“That they may lower fall.”

[A] As a theatre or stage, where men may behold the vicissitudes and caprices of human life. The heathens used to call this the play or sport of fortune; but they might have added, that this Play ends commonly like a Tragedy.

*Quales ex humili magna ad fastigia rerum
Extollit, quoties voluit fortuna jocari* (1).

(1) Juv. Sat. 3. ver. 39.

“Fortune——
“Who, for her pleasure, can her fools advance,
“And toss them topmost on the wheel of chance.”
DRYDEN.

(*) Plautus in Captivo. Proli. ver. 22.

Di quasi pilas homines habent (*).
“The Deities make tennis-balls of men.”

[B] Some of his writings are still extant. The letter he wrote to the people of Viterbo is in a book entitled LAZZARELLI (N.) a native of Gubio in Italy, was a very good Poet. He was for some time Auditor or Judge in the Rota of Macerata, after which he devoted himself to the Church, and was a Priest, and Provost or President of Mirandola. He died in 1694, at above fourscore years of age. He published a work intitled, La Cicceide, which is of a very singular kind [A]. It is a collection of Sonnets, and some other kinds of Poems, in which he inveighs with the utmost severity against Senior Arrighini (a), a native of Lucca, who had been his colleague in the Rota of Macerata. He describes him as a man wholly made up of genitals (b). His versification is extremely easy, natural and flowing. His Poems discover a surprizing fruitfulness of imagination, and lively and ingenious thoughts; but they all turn on a subject that is so very obscene; and the whole is animated with so vindictive, and sometimes so profane a spirit, that the readers of them may be justly offended. There are some apologies or excuses in the preface to his book, which I shall take some notice of [B].

(a) Author of some works, and particularly of a volume of Configli criminali, to which he prefixed a print of himself. See pag. 204. of the Cicceide.

(b) It is an expression of Balzac. See the Chevrance, pag. 276. of Part 2. Dutch edit.

LEE

(3) Ad ann.
1347.

(4) Ex Biblioteca Romana Prop. Mandesii, Cent. 2. num.
55.

(1) Mr. Silvestro, Doctor of Physic, lent me a copy of it at his return from Italy in July 1700; and informed me of the particulars relating to the author mentioned in this article.

entitled Prose antiche di Dante, Petrarca, Boccaccio, & altri nobili virtuosissimi ingegni. There likewise are inserted the speeches which Pandolfo Franco, and Francesco Baroncelli, his Envoys to the Commonwealth of Florence, made to the Senate of Florence. Some letters written by him to Charles, King of the Romans, and to the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, are in Tom. XIV of Bzovius's Annals (3). Petrarch wrote a fine Italian Poem in praise of Laurentio (4).

[A] He published a work entitled la Cicceide, which is of a very singular kind. I have seen only the second edition of it (1), which is of 1692, and the complete title of it is as follows: La Cicceide legitima: in questa seconda impressione ordinatamente disposta, notabilmente accresciuta, e fedelmente rincontrata con gli Originali dell' Autore. i. e. "The Genuine Edition of the Cicceide, properly digested, greatly enlarged, and faithfully compared with the Author's Originals. The "Second Edition." This book is divided into two parts; the title of the first being le Testicolate, and of the second le Sgbinaccate. The person abused in this work is shadowed under the name of Don Ciccio. I am to observe, that Ciccio is, by the Neapolitans, made use of to signify Francesco, (Francis) and the Romans, instead of Ciccio, say Cecco. The chief design of the author is to prove that Don Ciccio is a Coglione, which is the burthen, if I may so call it, of all the 318 sonnets, which compose the first part of the Cicceide. This is the center of the sphere of its activity; and I believe that the second part will make up the complement to the number 360, which is the most usual division of a circle. Nothing is wanting in this sphere of slander; it has all its degrees, and they all terminate in the same point. Signior Lazarelli, in what manner soever he may begin, always ends with the coglioneria of Don Ciccio. It is the burthen of all his sonnets. This is going very far. It would not have been possible for Voiture to write any thing like this in honour of the great Prince, to whom he wrote as follows, You who are a true Cæsar in genius and learning, a Cæsar in diligence, in vigilance, in courage, & per omnes casus Cæsar, you have deceived the opinion &c. (2). Our Poet turns his Ciccio on every side, and exhibits him in every light,

Per varios casus, per tot discrimina rerum (3), and makes a Coglione of him per omnes casus. He follows him from the instant of his conception, to his death; and goes still farther, he jesting on his coffin, his burial, his epitaph &c; he pursues him to Charon's boat, wherein he places him, and declares that he shall be ferried over gratis; and he even says that he has no occasion of being wasted over. He supposes that Charon speaks as follows to him:

*E' privilegio a pari tuoi concesso
Il poter senza imbarco, e pagamento
Havere a l'altro margine l'accesso;
Mentre un tondo C... gonfio di vento
Galleggiando leggier, può da sè stesso
Andar di là dal fiume a salvamento* (4).

i. e. "Such as you, are allowed to pass to the opposite shore without going on board, or paying any thing; for Testicles, when swelled with wind, are able to waft themselves over the Styx."

He retrenched, in the second edition, such sonnets as were thought the most profane, and had occasioned the putting his book into the Index Expurgatorius. They related to the baptism, confirmation, and extreme unction of Ciccio, and some other ticklish subjects. A manuscript copy of them has been put into my hands, and I have been advised to insert at least one of them; in order that those who cannot procure a sight of the Cicceide, a work little known out of Italy, may form to themselves an idea of Lazarelli's genius. I have made choice of the sonnet which relates to extreme unction.

L'oglio santo:

*Da la febre, da l'asma, e da l'uscita,
Don Ciccio ritrovavasi ammalato
E già ridotto in sì cattivo stato
Che l' sear vicino all' ultima partita.
Quando, tal nuova il poverello udita,
Dimandò l'oglio santo, e gli sù dato
Rimanendo così fortificato
Per suo franco passaggio a l'altra vita.
Ma fatta il Parochian la sua funzione
Per la mente uno scrupolo gli corse
D'aver fallato nell' operazione.
Però che in vece d'applicar l'unzione
Sù i cinque sentimenti egli s'accorse
Ch' applicata l'havea sopra un coglione.*

Here follows some other verses (5).

*Io l'en prego, Don Ciccio, instantamente
Che a me non lice far queste funzioni
Se tu medesimo non vi sei presente,
Stante che le Canoniche Sanzioni
Prohibiscono a tutti espressamente
L'uso di celebrar senza coglione.*

i. e. "I conjure you, Don Ciccio, not to fail of being present, at the time of my solemnizing Mass; for you know that the Canons expressly forbid all persons, who have not their testicles, to celebrate on that occasion."

[B] There are some apologies or excuses, in the preface of his book, which I shall take some notice of. It seems to have been wrote by one of the author's friends, who protests, that he was extremely grieved on account of the first edition of his work; and that it was with reluctance he consented to the second, though it was in a better condition. His scruples were founded on certain allusions to the ceremonies of the Church; and on the opposition that might be found between the duties of Charity, and a book that was grounded on slander. He adds that this work is only a collection of sallies of wit, and poetical vein, notwithstanding which the author's sentiments are perfectly orthodox; that he submits all those pieces to the censure of his superiors, and detests whatever they shall judge worthy of being condemned; that he hopes the reader will be so equitable, as to make a just distinction between what are merely witty conceits, and a design of offending; and in fine, that although he wrote with some licentiousness, his actions were nevertheless pure. This is only a rude extract of his apology, and therefore I will set down the author's own words (6). E' à dire il vero à l'uno, e l'altro degli accennati

(5) These are from the Sonnet, the six last in which he desired him to assist at his first mass.

(2) Voiture, Lettre au Duc d'Enghien après la bataille de Rocroi in 1643. It is Voiture's 141st Letter.

(3) Virgil. Æn.
lib. 1. ver. 204.

(4) Cicceide, pag.
290.

(6) Preface to the Cicceide.

LEE (NATHANIEL), an eminent English Poet, was son of a Clergyman of the Church of England, and was educated at Westminster School under Dr. Richard Busby, from whence he was sent to Trinity College in the University of Cambridge. He wrote eleven Plays [A], which were acted with great applause. He became distracted in his senses, and was some years confined in the Hospital of Bethlem; and after he was dismissed from thence, was never perfectly recovered, but died in the street in the night-time (a). Mr. Addison tells us (b), that "among our modern English Poets, there is none who was better turned for tragedy than our author; if instead of favouring the impetuosity of his genius, he had restrained it, and kept it within proper bounds. His thoughts are wonderfully suited to tragedy, but frequently lost in such a cloud of words, that it is hard to see the beauty of them. There is an infinite fire in his works, but so involved in smoke, that it does appear in half its lustre. He frequently succeeds in the passionate parts of the tragedy, but more particularly where he slackens his efforts, and eases the stile of those epithets and metaphors, in which he so much abounds."

(a) Langbaine's Account of the English Dramatic Poets, pag. 320. 8^{vo} 1691, and Gilson's Continuation of Langbaine, pag. 85.

(b) Spectator, num. 39. vol. 1.

*cennati motivi son degni di un animo, che professa esat-tamente i dettami del Cristianesimo, nel quale si pregi-a l'Autore di vivere, protestando, che questi suoi componimenti sono un mero sfogo di Poetico capriccio affatto discordanti dalla pietà dell'animo suo, imbevuto de Sa-grofanti Dogmi della Cattolica verità, come sarà pientissimo sempre a testificare col sangue stesso, e che gli sottopone intieramente alla Censura de' Superiori, detestando adesso per all'ora tutto quello, che dal giudizio loro in-fallibile sarà stimato per degno d'esser dannato. E riflettendo, che questi sono più tosto scherzi di una penna, per trastullarsi, che sentimenti d'un Cuore intento all'
offesa d'altri, ti piego a credere, ch'egli non mi ha-rebbe permessa mai la libertà di rimandarli alle stampe, se non si fidasse dell'ingenuità del tuo Cuore, che saprà trastullarsi coll'ingegno senza trascorrere colla volontà a denigrare nè pur col pensiero la fama incorrotta del suo decentato Protagonista. Vivi dunque felice, mentr'io lasciar non voglio di ricordarti in difesa dell'Amico, che se bene scrive con qualche licenza, può però dir di se stesso:
Lasciva est nobis pagina, Vita proba est.*

[A] He wrote eleven Plays.] They are as follow.
I. Nero Emperor of Rome, a Tragedy acted at the Theatre Royal in 1675. Dedicated to the Earl of Rochester. II. Sopponiba, or Hannibal's Overthrow; a Tragedy acted at the Theatre Royal 1676. Dedicated to the Dukes of Portsmouth. The Earl of Rochester, in his allusion to Horace's tenth Satyr of the first book, writes thus of this Tragedy:

"When Lee makes temperate Scipio fret and rave,
And Hannibal a whining am'rous slave,
I laugh, and with the hot-brain'd fustian fool
In Busby's hands; to be well lash'd at School.

III. Gloriana, the Court of Augustus: a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1676. Dedicated to the Dukes of Portsmouth. The Earl of Rochester, in a Satyr of his in imitation of Sir John Suckling's Session of the Poets, writes thus of this Play.

"Nat. Lee slept in next, in hopes of a prize;
Apollo remember'd he had hit once in thrice:
By the Rubies in's face he could not deny,
But he had as much wit as Wine could supply;
Confess'd, that indeed he had a musical note,
But sometimes strain'd so hard, that it rattled i'th' throat.
Yet own'd he had sense; t'encourage him for't,
He made him his Ovid in Augustus's Court."

IV. The Rival Queens: or, the Death of Alexander the Great: a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1677. Dedicated to the Earl of Mulgrave. Mr. Dryden has a copy of commendatory Verses upon this Play prefixed to it. V. Mitridates King of Pontus, A Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1678. Dedicated to the Earl of Dorset. VI. Theodosius, or, The Force of Love; a Tragedy acted at the Duke of York's Theatre. Dedicated to the Dukes of Richmond. VII. Cæsar Borgia; a Tragedy, acted at the Duke of York's Theatre 1680. Dedicated to the Earl of Pembroke. VIII. Lucius Junius Brutus, father of his Country; a Tragedy, acted at the Duke's Theatre 1681. Dedicated to the Earl of Dorset. IX. Constantine the Great; a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1684. X. The Princess of Cleve, a Tragic-Comedy, acted at the Queen's Theatre in Dorset-Garden 1689. Dedicated to the Earl of Dorset. XI. The Massacre of Paris; a Tragedy acted at the Theatre Royal 1690. Our Author joined with Mr. Dryden in writing the Tragedy of the Duke of Guise, and that of Oedipus. H.

LEIBNITZ (GODEFROY-WILLIAM DE), an eminent Mathematician and Philosopher in the seventeenth Century, was born at Leipzig in Saxony June the 23d 1646, and son of Frederic Leibnitz Professor of Ethics, and Secretary of the University of Leipzig, by Catherine Schmuck, third daughter of a Doctor and Professor of Law. He lost his father (a) at six years of age; but his mother took a particular care of his education. He soon made a prodigious progress in polite Literature [A]; and at the age of fifteen years he applied himself to the study of Philosophy and Mathematics at Leipzig and Jena; and upon his return to Leipzig in 1663 maintained a thesis de Principiis Individuationis. The year following he was admitted Master of Arts. About this time he read with great attention the Greek Philosophers, and endeavoured to reconcile Plato with Aristotle, as he afterwards did Aristotle with Des Cartes. He was so intent on these studies, that he spent whole days in meditation in a forest near Leipzig. But the study of the Law was his principal view; in which Faculty he was admitted Bachelor in 1665. The year following he would have taken the degree of Doctor, but was refused it on pretence that he was too young, being but twenty years of age, but it is thought that he had raised himself several enemies by rejecting the principles of Aristotle and the Schoolmen. Upon this he went to Altorf, where he maintained a thesis de Casibus

Perplexis,

[A] He soon made a prodigious progress in polite Literature.] He did not shew any particular inclination to one kind of study more than another, but applied himself to all with equal vigour. And as his father had left him a considerable and well chosen library, he began, when he was master enough of the Latin and Greek languages, to read them all in order, as the Poets, Orators, Historians, Civilians, Philosophers, Mathematicians, and Divines. He had a particular taste and talent for Poetry. He knew all the Poets by heart, and even in his old age he could have repeated Virgil almost word for word. He composed in one day a Poem of three hundred Latin Verses without any Elision (1).

(1) Fontenelle, Histoire de Renouveau de l'Academie Royale des Sciences in M. DC. XCIX. & des Eloges Historiques de tous les Academiciens, tom. 2. pag. 274. 275. 276. edit. Amst. 1720.

(a) He died Sept. 5, 1652.

Perplexis [B], with such applause, that he had the degree of Doctor conferred on him, and was offered a Professorship extraordinary in Law, which he refused. Thence he went to Nuremberg, in order to visit the learned men there, and was introduced into the acquaintance of several persons engaged in the pursuit of the Philosopher's stone [C]. The Baron de Boinebourg, first Minister of the Elector of Mentz, passing at that time thro' Nuremberg, and meeting Mr. Leibnitz at an entertainment, conceived so high an opinion of his abilities, that he advised him to apply himself particularly to the study of Law and History, and promised to engage the Elector John Philip de Schonborn to send for him to his Court. Upon this Mr. Leibnitz removed to Francfort upon the Mein in the neighbourhood of Mentz. In 1668 he wrote a treatise, to induce the Poles to choose the Elector Palatine their King [D]; which so highly pleased that Elector, that he invited the author to his Court. But he was prevented from accepting this invitation by the Baron Boinebourg, who procured the Elector of Mentz to appoint him Counsellor of the Chamber of Review in his Chancery. Mr. Leibnitz was then but twenty two years of age. In 1672 he went to Paris to manage some affairs of the Baron; and in that city contracted a friendship with the learned men there, and applied himself with vigour to the study of the Mathematics. Having observed some defects in the Arithmetical Machine of Monsieur Pascal, he invented a new one, the design of which he explained to Monsieur Colbert; and it was approved of by him and the Academy of Sciences, which offered him the place of Pensionary-Member. He might have settled to great advantage at Paris; but as it would have been necessary to embrace the Roman Catholic Religion, Mr. Leibnitz, who was born a Lutheran, refused all offers. In 1673, upon the death of the Baron de Boinebourg, he went to England, where he became acquainted with Mr. Oldenburg Secretary of the Royal Society, and Mr. John Collins Fellow of that Society [E]. Soon after this he received an account of the death of the Elector of Mentz, by which he lost his pension. Upon this he returned to France, whence he wrote a letter to the Duke of Brunwick-Lunenbug, to inform him of his circumstances. That Prince returned him a very kind answer, and as a pledge of his future favour appointed him Counsellor of his Court with a stipend, and gave him leave to continue at Paris till his Arithmetical Machine should be compleated. In 1676 he returned to England, and thence went to Holland, in order to proceed to Hanover, where he proposed to settle. Upon his arrival there, he applied himself to enrich the Prince's Library with the best books of all kinds. The Duke of Brunwick-Lunenbug dying in 1679, his successor Ernest Augustus, then Bishop of Osnabrug, shewed our author the same favour as his predecessor had done, and ordered him to write the History of the House of Brunwick. Mr. Leibnitz undertook it, and travelled over Germany and Italy, in order to collect materials; and returned to Hanover in 1690. In 1700 he was admitted a Member of the Royal Academy at Paris. The Elector of Brandenburg, afterwards King of Prussia, founded an Academy the same year at Berlin by the advice of Mr. Leibnitz, who was appointed perpetual President, though his affairs would not permit him to reside constantly at Berlin. However he furnished their Memoirs with several curious pieces in Geometry, polite Literature, Natural Philosophy, and even Physic. He projected another Academy of the same kind at Dresden, and communicated the plan to the King of Poland in 1703. This design would have been executed, if it had not been prevented by the confusions in Poland. He was engaged likewise in a scheme for an universal language [F]. His writings had long [B] Maintained a Thesis de Casibus perplexis.] It was printed at Leipzick with two other Theses maintained by him, under the following title: Specimina Juris. 1. Specimen difficultatis in Jure, seu Dissertatio de Casibus perplexis. 2. Specimen Encyclopaediae in Jure, seu Quaestiones Philosophicae amantiores ex Jure collectae. 3. Specimen certitudinis seu Demonstrationum in Jure, exhibitum in Doctrina Conditionum.

[C] Introduced into the acquaintance of several persons engaged in the pursuit of the Philosopher's Stone.] Being desirous to be initiated in their mysteries, he selected out of books of Chemistry several dark terms and expressions, from which he formed a Letter, which was unintelligible to himself, and addressed to the Director of that society; requesting to be admitted into it upon the proofs which he gave of his great learning. They not doubting, but that the writer of that letter was an Adept or very near one, admitted him with great honour into their Laboratory, and desired him to perform the office of Secretary, offering him a pension (2).

[D] In 1668 he wrote a Treatise to induce the Poles to choose the Elector Palatine their King.] This Treatise was published at Francfort upon the Mein under the following title: Specimen Demonstrationum politicarum pro eligendo Rege Polonorum, novo scribendi genere ad claram Certitudinem exactum. Auctore Georgio Uli-covio, Lituano.

[E] Applied himself with vigour to the study of the Mathematicks.] He owns, that he principally owed the progress which he made in that study, to the writings of Pascal, and Gregory St. Vincent, and especially to the excellent book of Huygens de Horologio oscillatorio.

[F] In 1673 . . . he went to England, where he became acquainted with Mr. Oldenburg, Secretary of the Royal Society, and Mr. John Collins, Fellow of that Society.] It was by the communication and correspondence of these Gentlemen, that he received the first hints of the invention of the method of Fluxions from Mr. Isaac Newton's letters, who had discovered that method about the year 1664 or 1665. As there arose afterwards a dispute concerning the right to that invention, we shall give the reader the following account of it (3). The method of Fluxions and the Calculus Differentialis are the same method of Analysis under two different names. Sir Isaac Newton, and the English Mathematicians after him, call it the Method of Fluxions; but Leibnitz gave it the name of Calculus differentialis, in which he has been followed by almost all the Mathematicians abroad. The Marquis de l'Hospital published the elements of it under the title of Analyse, des infiniment petits, i. e. the Analysis of infinitely small quantities. Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophiae Naturalis principia mathematica, printed at London 1687, in 4to. is almost wholly founded upon the method of Fluxions; though he has not made use of that method to demonstrate the great and sur-

(3) See Mr. Des Maizeaux's Pre-cueil de diverses Pieces sur la Philosophie Naturelle, &c. par Mr. Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, & autres Auteurs celebres, edit. Amsterdam 1720.

(2) Ibid. pag. 291, 292.

prizing Theorems, which he has exhibited in that work. However we find there the principles of Fluxions in the second Lemma of the second book, where those principles are demonstrated, but always in a synthetical manner. He adds to that Lemma the following Scholium: In literis, quæ mihi cum Geometrà peritissimo G. G. Leibnitio annis abhinc decem intercedebant, cum significarem me compotem esse methodi determinandi maximas & minimas, ducendi Tangentes, & similia peragendi; quæ in terminis juris æquæ ac in rationalibus procederet, & literis transpositis banc sententiam involventibus [Data æquatione quotcunque fluentes quantitates involvente, Fluxiones invenire, & vice versa] eandem celarem: rescriptis Vir clarissimus se quoque ejusmodi methodum incidisse, & methodum suam communicavisse à meâ vix abscondentem præterquam in verborum & notarum formulis. Utriusque fundamentum continetur in hoc Lemmate. By this passage Sir Isaac Newton gives us to understand, that in the Letters, which he wrote to Leibnitz ten years before, that is, June 13th and October 24th 1676 (†), he had informed him of his method, before Leibnitz had mentioned his own; which he did not do till eight months after, viz. June 21st 1677 (‡). Besides, as it appears from Sir Isaac Newton's letter of October 24th 1676, that he had been engaged five years before (§), that is, in 1671, in writing a Treatise, in which the method of Fluxions and that of Series were joined together; by referring to this letter, he gives us to understand, that the method of Fluxions was known to him at least in 1671, six years before Leibnitz had discovered his method (*). Thus he asserted his right to the first invention of this method, and appealed in a manner to the judgment of Leibnitz himself, to whom these particulars were very well known, and who had nothing to object upon this occasion in the letter, which he wrote to Sir Isaac Newton in 1693, wherein he complimented him upon his Principia. He says in it, that it appeared from this work, that Sir Isaac had a method of Analysis much superior to the common Analysis; and only adds, that himself had also an Analysis, which was applied to the higher Geometry with great success. Mirificè ampliavimas Geometriam tuis seribus, sed edito Principiorum opere ostendisti parere tibi, quæ Analysis receptæ non subsunt. Conatus sum ego quoque, Notis commodis adhibitis, quæ Differentias & summas exhibent, Geometriam illam, quam transcendentem appello, Analysis quodammodo subijcere, nec res male processit. He claims to himself the invention of the Calculus Differentialis, but without any prejudice to the right, which Sir Isaac Newton had to the method of Fluxions. Leibnitz had published in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipsick for the year 1684 (¶), the elements of the Calculus Differentialis, that is, the Algorithm of that Calculus, which contained the application of it to Addition and Subtraction, to Multiplication and Division, to powers and roots under this title: Novæ methodus pro Maximis & Minimis, itemque Tangentibus, quæ nec fractas nec irrationales quantitates moratur, & singularæ pro illis Calculi genus, per G. G. L. The Brothers Bernoulli, famous Mathematicians, having afterwards observed the use, which Leibnitz made of this method, for the resolving of the most difficult Problems, applied themselves to the discovery of the secret, and by the Encouragement of Leibnitz himself arrived at it (†); so that this new Calculus was already famous in 1695. At this time Dr. John Wallis, who had published in the second tome of his Mathematical works, extracts of the letters of Sir Isaac Newton of June 13th and October 24th 1676, wrote to him, that he had been informed from Holland, that his method of Fluxions was received there with applause under the name of Leibnitz's Calculus Differentialis; and urged him to publish those two letters intire. He represents to him, that it would be neglecting too much his own reputation and that of the English nation, to bury in his study pieces of such importance, and to wait till others seized an honour, which was his right. He adds, that when he had received the account abovementioned, he had endeavoured to do him justice in an addition to the preface to the first Tome of his Mathematical works. The addition is as follows: In secundo Volumine . . . habetur Newtoni Methodus de Fluxionibus (ut ille loquitur) consimilis naturæ cum Leibnitii (ut hic loquitur) Calculo differentiali (quod qui utramque methodum contulerit, satis animadvertat, ut ut sub loquendi formulis diversis) quam ego descripsi

Algebrae cap. 91. &c. præsertim cap. 95. ex binis Newtoni literis (aut earum alteris) Junii 13, & Octob. 24. 1676. ad Oldenburgum datis, cum Leibnitio communicandis, iisdem serè verbis, saltem leviter mutatis, quæ in illis Literis habentur, ubi Methodum hanc Leibnitio exponit, tum ante decem annos, nulum plures, ab ipso excogitatum. Quod moneo, ne quis causetur, de hoc Calculo differentiali nihil a nobis dictum esse. The writers of the Acta Eruditorum of Leipsic gave an extract of the two first Tomes of Dr. Wallis's Mathematical works in their journal of June 1696 (†), and insinuated that he treated in a very free manner the foreign Mathematicians; but they did not object to what he had said, that Sir Isaac Newton "had explained to Leibnitz in 1676 the method of Fluxions, which he had invented ten years before, or even earlier still," that is, in 1665 or 1666. They only remarked, that Dr. Wallis should have been more ample upon the Calculus differentialis, and have observed, that Leibnitz had that Calculus for above twenty years before, that is, in 1676 or 1677, when Sir Isaac Newton and he held a correspondence by means of Mr. Oldenburg; and that this was a fact acknowledged by Sir Isaac himself. Cæterum ipse Newtonus non minus candore quam præclaris in rem Mathematicam meritis insignis, publice & privatim agnovit, Leibnitium tum cum (interveniens celeberrimo Viro Henrico Oldenburgio Bremensi, Societatis Regiæ Anglicanæ tunc Secretario) inter ipsos, ejusdem jam tum Societatis socios, commercium intercederet, id est, jam serè ante annos viginti & amplius, Calculum suum differentialem seriesque infinitas, & pro iis quoque Methodos generales habuisse; quod Wallisus, in Præfatione operum factæ inter eos communicationis mentionem faciens, præterit, quoniam de eo fortasse non satis ipsi constabat. They observe afterwards, that Dr. Wallis would undoubtedly have done more justice to the German Mathematicians, if he had known them better, &c. The Doctor had no sooner seen this article in the Acta Eruditorum, but he wrote to Leibnitz (‡), to assure him, that if he had not treated at large of his Calculus Differentialis, it was really because he knew nothing of it before, and had not even heard of the name of it, when one of his friends wrote to him from Holland, that this Calculus made a great deal of noise there, and that it was very near the same with Newton's method of fluxions, which gave him occasion just to mention it in his Preface. Leibnitz wrote to him a very civil answer (§), and assures him, that he was extremely well satisfied with him. De te autem queri, says he, nunquam mihi in mentem venit, quem facile apparet nostra in Actis Lipsiensibus prædita non satis vidisse. Dr. Wallis wrote him a letter of thanks (*), at the close of which he says, that though the Method of Fluxions and that the Differential method appear to him to be the same, yet this ought not to lessen the honour due to those, who were the inventors. Et ni fallor, (sic saltem mihi nuntiatum est) Newtoni doctrina fluxionum, res eadem (vel quam simillima) quæ vobis dicitur Calculus differentialis; quod tamen neutri præjudicio esse debet. Leibnitz did not deny this in his answer (). Methodum Fluxionum profundissimi Newtoni, says he, cognatum esse Methodo meæ Differentiali, non tantum animadverti, postquam opus ejus & tuum prædidi, sed etiam professus sum in Actis Eruditorum, & alias quoque monui. Id enim Caudori meo convenire judicavi, non minus quam ipsus merito. Itaque communi nomine designare soleo, Analyseos Infinitesimalis, quæ latius quam Methodus Tetragonistica patet. Interim quemadmodum & Vietæ & Cartesiana Methodus Analyseos speciosior nomine venit, discrimina tamen nonnulla supersunt; ita fortasse & Newtoniana & mea differunt in nonnullis. He afterwards mentions the reflexions, which had led him by degrees to the invention of his method; but does not take notice in what respect it differed from that of Sir Isaac Newton. This was what Dr. Wallis was extremely desirous of knowing, as appears from a letter, which he wrote soon after to Leibnitz (†). Optaverim, says he, ut tibi vacet tuum Calculum Differentialem, & Newtono suam Fluxionum Methodum, justo ordine exponere, ut quid sit utriusque commune, & quid intersit discriminis, & utrumque distinctius intelligamus. Leibnitz wrote an answer to Dr. Wallis; and there passed several letters between those Gentlemen, but without touching upon that point. Dr. Wallis published all these letters in 1699 in the third volume of his Mathematical works; and inserted among them, with the consent (†) See Dr. Wallis's Mathematical Works, vol. 1. pag. 622, and 634.

(‡) See Mr. Leibnitz's Letter, Ibid. pag. 648.

(§) Ibid. pag. 636.

(*) See Sir Isaac Newton's Remarks, in Mr. Des Maizeaux's Recueil, tom. 2. pag. 87, 88.

(¶) Pag. 467, & seq.

(†) Leibnitz informs us how these Gentlemen attained it, in a Memoire, inserted in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Nov. 1706, pag. 521. and in the Memoires de Trevoux, March 1707, pag. 540. See likewise those Memoires March 1708, pag. 491.

(†) Pag. 249, & seq.

(‡) December 7, 1696. See the 3d tome of Dr. Wallis's Mathematical Works, pag. 653, 654.

(§) Dated March 29. 1697. Ibid. pag. 673.

(*) Dated April the 9th. Ibid. pag. 675.

() Dated May the 28th. Ibid. pag. 678.

(†) Dated July the 30th. Ibid. pag. 681.

of Sir Isaac Newton and Leibnitz, the letters which they had written to each other by means of Mr. Oldenburg, and among the rest those above cited. Though Dr. Wallis had given the world to understand, that Sir Isaac Newton had invented his method in 1665 or 1666, he would not determine the time when Leibnitz invented his, nor inquire which of them two was the first inventor. But Mr. Nicholas Facio Duillier proceeded further; for in his Lineæ brevissimi descensus Investigatio Geometrica duplex: cui addita est Investigatio Geometrica solidi rotundi, in quo minima fiat resistentia, printed at London in 1699, he declares Sir Isaac Newton to have been the first inventor, and insinuates that Leibnitz whom he calls the second inventor, had made use of the lights of Sir Isaac Newton. Newtonum primum, says he (*), at pluribus annis vetustissimum hujus calculi Inventorem, ipsa veri evidentia coactus, agnosco; à quo utrum quicquam mutuatus sit, Leibnitius secundus ejus Inventor, malo eorum quam meum sit judicium, quibus visæ fuerint Newtoni Literæ aliique ejusdem manuscripti codices. Leibnitz thought, that he ought not to leave unanswered this assertion, which detracted so much from his reputation. He wrote against Mr. Facio a memoir inserted in the Acta Eruditorum for the year 1700; in which he affirms, that he had not taken his Calculus from Sir Isaac Newton, and appeals even to the testimony of Sir Isaac himself. Certè, says he (†), vir egregius aliquoties locutus amicis meis semper de me bene sentire visus est, neque unquam, quod sciam, querelas jecit; publicè autem ita mecum egit, ut iniquus sim, si querar. Ego vero libenter ejus ingentia merita oblati Occasionibus prædicavi, & ipse scit unus omnium optimè satisque indicavit publicè, cum sua Mathematicæ Naturæ principia publicaret anno 1687, nova quædam inventura Geometrica, quæ ipsi communia mecum fuere, neutrum luci ab altero acceptæ, sed meditationibus quemque suis debere, & a me jam decennio ante exposita fuisse. Certè, adds he, cum Elementa Calculi mea edidi anno 1684, ne constabat quidem mihi aliud de inventis ejus in hoc genere, quam quod ipse olim significaverat literis, posse se Tangentes invenire non sublatis irrationalibus; quod Hugenius quoque se posse mihi significavit postea, etsi cæterorum istius calculi adhibere experts. Sed majora multo consecutus Newtonum, viso demum libro Principiorum ejus, satis intellexi. Calculum tamen differentialem tam similem ab eo exerceri, non ante didicimus, quam cum non ita pridem magni Geometræ Johannis Wallisii operum volumina primum & secundum prodire, Hugeniusque curiositati meæ favens locum inde descriptam ad Newtonum pertinentem mihi maturè transmisit. Leibnitz would not determine the question, whether Sir Isaac Newton or himself was the first or second Inventor of this method: he only asserts equally the invention to both. Quam, says he afterwards (§), ante Dominum Newtonum & me nullus, quod sciam, Geometra habuit; uti ante hunc maximi nominis Geometram nemo specimine publicè dato se habere probavit; ante Dominos Bernoullios & me nullus communicavit. Mr. Facio did not stop here; he sent to the authors of the Acta Eruditorum his reply, with a defence of his treatise of the Lineæ brevissimi descensus Investigatio against Mr. John Bernoulli; but those authors suppressed what related to Leibnitz, and only remarked in general, that the aversion they had for disputes among Men of Letters, had induced them to retrench what was personal in Mr. Facio's memoir (†). This put an end to the contest; and it is probable, that there would not have been any more dispute upon this point, if a passage of the authors of the Acta Eruditorum had not given occasion to that, which rose at first between Mr. John Keill and Leibnitz, and afterwards between Leibnitz and Sir Isaac Newton himself. It was as follows. In 1704 Sir Isaac Newton published at the end of his Optics a treatise of the Quadrature of Curves, which he had written several years before. As this treatise is founded upon the method of Fluxions, Sir Isaac accompanied it with an introduction, in which he explains that method, and adds, that he had invented it in 1665 and 1666. Considerando igitur, says he, quod quantitates æqualibus temporibus crescentes & crescendo genitæ, pro velocitate majori vel minori, qua crescunt ac generantur, evadunt majores vel minores; methodum querebam determinandi quantitates ex velocitatibus motuum vel incrementorum quibus generantur; & has motuum vel incrementorum velocitates nominando Fluxiones & quantitates genitas nominando Fluents, incidi paulatim annis 1665 & 1666 in Methodum Fluxionum, quâ hic usus sum in Quadraturâ Curvarum. The authors of the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig gave an account of this book of Sir Isaac Newton in their Journal of January 1705 (3); and having taken occasion to explain (3) Pag. 30, & the differential method of Mr. Leibnitz, they compared it with Sir Isaac's method of Fluxions: Ingeniosissimus deinde Autor, say they, antequam ad Quadraturas Curvarum (vel potius Figurarum Curvilinearum) veniat, præmittit brevem Ifagoram. Quæ ut melius intelligatur, sciendum est, cum magnitudo aliqua continuè crescit, veluti Linea (exempli gratia) crescit fluxu puncti, quod eam describit, incrementa illa momentaneâ appellari differentias, nempe, inter magnitudinem, quæ antea erat, & quæ per mutationem momentaneam est producta, atque hinc natum esse Calculum differentialem, eique reciprocorum Summatorum; cujus Elementa ab Inventore Dn. Godefrido Gulielmo Leibnitio in his Actis sunt tradita, variique usus tum ab ipso, tum à Dn. Fratribus Bernoulliis, tum & Dn. Marchione Hospitalio (cujus nuper extincti immaturam mortem omnes magnoperè dolere debent qui profundioris Doctrinæ profectum amant) sunt ostensi. Pro differentiis igitur Leibnitianis D. Newtonus adhibet semperque adhibuit, Fluxiones, quæ sint quam proxime ut fluentium augmenta æqualibus temporis particulis quam minimis genita; iisque tum in suis Principiis Naturæ Mathematicis, tum in aliis postea editis eleganter est usus; quemadmodum & Honoratus Faber in sua Synopsi Geometricæ motuum progressus Cavallerianæ Methodo substituit. It was this comparison that occasioned the dispute. For as it is undoubted that Father Fabri is not the inventor of his method, but that he took it from Cavalieri, only changing the expressions; it was thought that the authors of the Acta Eruditorum designed to intimate, that Sir Isaac Newton was not the inventor of the method of Fluxions, but that he took it from Mr. Leibnitz. Mr. John Keill, being persuaded that the authors of the Acta Eruditorum had this design, undertook Sir Isaac Newton's defence; and in a piece, which he wrote de Legibus Virium Centripetarum, addressed to Dr. Edmund Halley, and published in the Philosophical Transactions for September and October 1708 (4), asserted, (4) Pag. 174, & not only that Sir Isaac had first invented the method of Fluxions, as appeared by his letters published by Dr. Wallis; but that Mr. Leibnitz had taken this method from him, only changing the name and notation. Hæc omniaque sequuntur, says he, ex celebratissimâ nunc dierum Fluxionum Arithmeticâ, quam sine dubio primus invenit Dominus Newtonus; ut cuilibet ejus Epistolæ à Wallisio editas legenti facile constabit. Eadem tamen Arithmetica postea mutatis nomine & notationis modo, à Domino Leibnitio in Actis Eruditorum edita est. Leibnitz wrote a letter to Dr. Hans Sloane, then Secretary of the Royal Society, dated March the 4th 1711, in which he required in effect, that Mr. Keill should make him satisfaction for the injury, which, he said, had been done to him. He protested, that "he was so far from assuming to himself the method of Sir Isaac Newton, after having only changed the name and notation, that he was absolutely ignorant of the name of the Method of Fluxions, and the notation used by Sir Isaac, till they appeared in the mathematical works of Dr. Wallis." He desired therefore the Royal Society to oblige Mr. Keill to disown publicly the bad sense, which his words might bear. This letter was communicated to the Royal Society; and Mr. Keill, to justify himself to Sir Isaac Newton, shewed him the extract of his book of the Quadratures of Curves in the Acta Eruditorum. He desired the Society at the same time not to condemn him without hearing him, and to give him leave to explain and defend what he had advanced. This was the more readily granted him, as Sir Isaac and several other members of the Society found the same sense as he had done in the comparison of the Acta Eruditorum. Upon this Mr. Keill wrote to Dr. Sloane a letter, in which he observed, "that when he had asserted, that Mr. Leibnitz had published as his own Sir Isaac Newton's method, after having changed the name and notation, he did not mean, that the name, which Sir Isaac had given to his method, or the notation, which he made use of, were then known to Mr. Leibnitz; but only that Sir Isaac was the first inventor of the method of Fluxions or differential (*) Lineæ Brevissimi Descensus &c. pag. 3.

(†) G. G. L. Responsio ad Dn. Nic. Fatii Duillierii Imputationes. See Acta Eruditorum, Martii 1700, pag. 203.

(§) Ibid. pag. 206.

(†) Acta Eruditorum, Martii 1701, pag. 134.

“rential method; and that the letters, which he had written to Mr. Oldenburg, and which had been sent to Mr. Leibnitz, furnished light enough to a man of Mr. Leibnitz’s penetration, to discover the principles of that method. But that not having found the name, which Sir Isaac Newton gave his method, and the notation used by him, it was natural for him to invent a new name and a new manner of notation.” Mr. Keill added, “that the authors of the Acta Eruditorum had obliged him to publish what he had asserted, by their having affirmed in the extract of the book of Quadratures, that Mr. Leibnitz had invented the differential method, in the room of which Sir Isaac Newton had substituted his Fluxions. That he acknowledged with pleasure the great obligations, which the learned world had to Mr. Leibnitz, and his profound skill in the mathematics; but that as he had so great a fund of his own, there was no occasion to adorn him with the spoils of others. And that having observed, that Mr. Leibnitz’s countrymen gave him commendations, which did not belong to him, he thought that it would not be an instance of mistaken zeal for the English nation, if he endeavoured to maintain Sir Isaac Newton’s right.” He then entered upon the subject, and undertook to shew from divers writings of Sir Isaac, “that he was the first and true inventor of the method of Fluxions or the differential method; and that the two letters of Sir Isaac, which Mr. Leibnitz received from Mr. Oldenburg, contained hints of that method clear enough to enable him to discover it.” He concluded with saying, “that among the great services, which Mr. Leibnitz had done with regard to mathematics, his having first published this method was one; and that all lovers of that science were obliged to him, because he had been unwilling, that so useful an invention should be longer concealed. And he did not doubt, but that what he had written would justify his zeal for his country, and furnish a convincing proof, that he had not asserted rashly or out of a spirit of calumny in the Philosophical Transactions, what he now had demonstrated with so much clearness and evidence.” This letter having been read to the Royal Society May the 24th 1711, they ordered a copy of it to be sent to Mr. Leibnitz, who found new matter of complaint in it; and in a second letter, which he wrote to Dr. Sloane, dated at Hanover December the 29th 1711, he represented, that Mr. Keill had attacked his candour and sincerity more openly than before; adding, that it was not suitable to a man of his age and experience to engage in a contest with an upstart, who was unacquainted with what had passed so long before, and acted without any authority from Sir Isaac Newton, who was the party concerned. That it was in vain for Mr. Keill to pretend to justify his proceeding by the example of the Acta Eruditorum, since in that Journal no injustice had been done to any man, but every one had received what was his due. That “himself and his friends had several times shewn, that they considered Sir Isaac Newton as the inventor of Fluxions; but that himself had no less right to the invention of the differential method, as Mr. Huygens, a most able and impartial judge, had publicly declared. That however he had not hastened to assert it as his own; and that after the discovery, it was a long time before he published it, in order that no person might complain, that he had anticipated them.” He concluded with desiring, that the Royal Society would enjoin Mr. Keill silence, not doubting but that what he had written was disapproved by Sir Isaac Newton himself, who was well acquainted with what had passed formerly, and to whose judgment he was ready to submit. Mr. Keill seeing himself treated as an upstart, who was not informed of what had passed formerly, appealed to the registers of the Royal Society, and affirmed, that they would find there convincing proofs of what he had advanced. Sir Isaac Newton likewise being displeased at the comparison in the Acta Eruditorum, and that Mr. Leibnitz should have said, that in that Journal every one had received what was due to him, left the Society to act as they should think proper; who granted therefore to Mr. Keill what he desired. They appointed a certain number of their members, as well Foreigners as English, to examine the registers, and especially the papers of Mr. John Collins, who had a correspondence with the most eminent mathematicians of his time, both in England and abroad. As soon as one of his correspondents had imparted to him any discovery, he communicated it to others. In short he was the Merfennus of England. The Society ordered the Committee to lay before them all the papers relating to the point in dispute, and subjoin to them their own judgment; which was at last given in these words: “We have consulted the letters and letter-books in the custody of the Royal Society, and those found among the papers of Mr. John Collins, dated between the years 1669 and 1677 inclusive; and shewed them to such, as knew and avouched the hands of Mr. Barrow, Mr. Collins, Mr. Oldenburg, and Mr. Leibnitz; and compared those of Mr. Gregory with one another, and with copies of some of them taken in the hand of Mr. Collins; and have extracted from them what relates to the matter referred to us; all which extracts herewith delivered to you, we believe to be genuine and authentic; and by these letters and papers we find,

“I. That Mr. Leibnitz was in London in the beginning of the year 1673, and went thence in or about March to Paris, where he kept a correspondence with Mr. Collins by means of Mr. Oldenburg, till about September 1676, and then returned by London and Amsterdam to Hanover. And that Mr. Collins was very free in communicating to able Mathematicians what he received from Mr. Newton and Mr. Gregory.

“II. That when Mr. Leibnitz was the first time in London, he contended for the invention of another Differential Method properly so called; and notwithstanding that he was shewn by Dr. Pell, that it was Mouton’s (*) method, persisted in maintaining it to be his own invention, by reason that he had found it by himself, without knowing what Mouton had done before, and had much improved it. And we find no mention of his having any other Differential Method than Mouton’s, before his letter of the 21st of June 1677, which was a year after a copy of Mr. Newton’s letter of the 10th of December 1672 had been sent to Paris to be communicated to him, and above four years after Mr. Collins began to communicate that letter to his correspondents, in which letter the method of Fluxions was sufficiently described to any intelligent person.

“III. That by Mr. Newton’s letter of the 13th of June 1676 it appears, that he had the method of Fluxions above five years before the writing of that letter. And by his Analysis per Equations numeros Terminorum infinitas, communicated by Dr. Barrow to Mr. Collins in July 1669, we find that he had invented the method before that time.

“IV. That the Differential Method is one and the same with the Method of Fluxions, excepting the name and mode of notation; Mr. Leibnitz calling those quantities Differences, which Mr. Newton calls Moments or Fluxions; and marking them with the letter d, a mark not used by Mr. Newton. And therefore we take the proper question to be, not who invented this or that method, but who was the first inventor of the Method. And we believe, that those, who have reputed Mr. Leibnitz the first inventor, knew little or nothing of his correspondence with Mr. Collins and Mr. Oldenburg long before; nor of Mr. Newton’s having that method above fifteen years before Mr. Leibnitz began to publish it in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipsick.

“For which reasons we reckon Mr. Newton the first inventor; and are of opinion that Mr. Keill, in asserting the same, has been no ways injurious to Mr. Leibnitz. And we submit to the judgment of the Society, whether the extract and papers now presented to you, together with what is extant to the same purpose in Dr. Wallis’s third volume, may not deserve to be made public.”

These Papers were presented to the royal society April 24th 1712, which ordered them to be printed, with the report of the committee, and every thing that could be found in the Acta Eruditorum, which might serve to give light into the history of this dispute. This collection appeared at the end of December under the title of Commercium Epistolicum D. Johannis Collins & aliorum de Analysis promotâ: jussu Societatis Regiæ in lucem editum. in 4to pagg. 112. It was never sold at booksellers shops, and only a certain number number of copies was printed off, in order for presents. An extract of it was given in the Philosophical transactions, which was afterwards translated into French, and printed at London under this title; Extrait du Livre intitulé, Commercio Epistolicum Collinii & aliorum de Analyfi promoti; publié par ordre de la Société Royale, à l'occasion de la Dispute élevée entre M. Leibnitz & D. Keill, sur le Droit d'Invention à la Methode des Fluxions, par quelques-uns appellés, Methode Differentielle. In 8vo, pagg. 38. This extract is inserted in the VII Tome of the Journal Littéraire. Mr. Leibnitz was at Vienna, when he heard of the publication of the Commercium Epistolicum. "I was at Vienna, says he (5), when I was informed of the publication of the book; but being assured, that it must contain malicious falsities, I did not think proper to send for it by the post, but wrote to Mr. Bernoulli, a Gentleman, who perhaps in all Europe has succeeded best in the knowledge and use of this Calculus, and who was absolutely neuter, to give me his sentiments. Mr. Bernoulli wrote me a letter dated at Basil June 7th, 1713, in which he said, that it appeared probable, that Sir Isaac Newton had formed his Calculus after having seen mine, since he had frequent occasion in his works, to make use of this Calculus, though there appears no trace of it; and that he had even committed some errors, which seemed incompatible with a true knowledge of that Calculus. One of my friends published this letter with reflections; and as I had enough of other affairs to employ me, I was unwilling to enter farther into this, especially as Sr. Isaac Newton had not said any thing himself. I thought it sufficient therefore to have opposed to the clamours of his adherents the judgment of a person of Mr. Bernoulli's learning and impartiality". These two Latin pieces were published in Germany in a loose sheet, dated July 29th 1713. And it is remarkable, that the writer of the letter, which Mr. Leibnitz ascribes above to Mr. Bernoulli, speaks here of Mr. Bernoulli in the third person, and cites him with a compliment: quemadmodum, says he, ab eminente quodam Mathematico dudum notatum est; which might make it suspected, that it was not written by Mr. Bernoulli. Mr. Leibnitz suppressed the citation, when he published this letter in French under Mr. Bernoulli's name in the Nouvelles Littéraires of December 28 1715. A friend of Mr. Leibnitz sent from Germany these two pieces to the authors of the Journal Littéraire, with Remarks of his writing upon the dispute between Mr. Leibnitz and Sir Isaac Newton. A letter written from London, and inserted in the first Tome of that Journal, gave occasion to those remarks; the author of which Remarks objects to the letter, as not giving an exact account of the dispute between Mr. Leibnitz and Sir Isaac Newton, and undertakes to give a true relation of what had passed. He asserts, that when Sir Isaac Newton published his Philosophiæ naturalis Principia Mathematica in 1687, he did not understand the true Differential Method (6); and pretends, that he took it from Mr. Leibnitz. Dr. John Keill opposed to all these pieces an answer printed at London in French, intitled, Réponse de M. Keill, M. D. Professeur d'Astronomie Savilien, aux Auteurs des Remarques sur le Different entre M. de Leibnitz et M. Newton, publiées dans le Journal Littéraire de la Haye de Novembre & Decembre M. DCC. XIII. There was but a few copies of this printed; but it was afterwards inserted in the IV Tome of the Journal Littéraire. Mr. Chamberlayne made an attempt about this time to reconcile Mr. Leibnitz and Sir Isaac Newton; for which purpose he intimated his design to the former, who was then at Vienna. Mr. Leibnitz thanked him for his obliging offer in a letter dated April 28th 1714 (7), in which he declares, that he had not given occasion to this dispute, and complains, that the Royal Society and Sir Isaac Newton himself had taken Dr. Keill's part against him; and without consulting him, had made themselves Judges, and condemned him by a pretended sentence of the society. Sir Isaac Newton, says he, has procured a book to be published, which was written purposely to discredit me, and sent it into Germany, France, and Italy, as in the name of the Society. He adds, that learned men among the French, Italians, and other nations extremely disapproved of this manner of proceeding, and were amazed at it; and that he hoped, that in the Society itself every one would not approve of it.

(*) See the book intitled, Observationes Diamentorum Solis & Lunæ apparentium, &c. Auctore Gabriele Mouton, Lugdunensi, Sacerdote in Ecclesiâ Collegiâ S. Pauli, Lyonæ 1670 in 4to.

For my self, continues he, I have always acted in the most civil manner towards Sir Isaac Newton; and though it appears now, that there was great reason to doubt, whether he knew my invention before he had it of me, I had spoken, as if he had discovered of himself something like my method, But being abused by some ill advised flatterers, he has suffered himself to be engaged in attacking me in a very sensible manner. Judge now, Sir, from which side the steps necessary to put an end to this contest ought first to be made. Mr. Chamberlayne communicated this letter to Sir Isaac Newton, who answered in a few words (8), that he had no share in what Mr. Facio had written against Mr. Leibnitz; that Mr. Leibnitz had attacked his reputation in 1705, by intimating in the extract of the treatise of Quadratures, that he had borrowed from Mr. Leibnitz the method of Fluxions; that Dr. Keill had only defended him; and that the passage of the Acta Eruditorum was not known to him, till the coming of Mr. Leibnitz's first letter against Dr. Keill, in which Mr. Leibnitz demanded, in effect, that he should retract what he had published in the introduction to the treatise of Quadratures, viz. that he had invented the Method of Fluxions in 1665 and 1666: and lastly, that if Mr. Chamberlayne could point out to him any thing, in which he had injured Mr. Leibnitz, he would endeavour to give him satisfaction, but that he would not retract things, which he knew to be true; and that he believed likewise, that the Committee of the Royal Society had done no injustice to Mr. Leibnitz in the affair of the Commercium Epistolicum. The Royal Society being informed, that Mr. Leibnitz complained of having been condemned without being heard, though they had not taken any party in this contest, and being willing to prevent the disputes, which might arise upon it, declared on the 20th of May 1714, that they did not pretend, that the report of their committee should pass for a decision of the society, and ordered this declaration to be inserted in their journal. Mr. Chamberlayne sent a copy of it to Mr. Leibnitz with Sir Isaac Newton's letter, and Dr. Keill's answer to the pieces inserted in the Journal Littéraire. Mr. Leibnitz having seen the declaration of the Royal Society, assured Mr. Chamberlayne (9), that he was very well satisfied with the Society's conduct with regard to him, but thought, that Sir Isaac Newton's was written in no very civil manner; and he seemed to make little account of Dr. Keill's piece. As to the Letter, says he, *which you sent me a copy of, and which is written with very little civility, I consider it pro non scripta, as well as the piece printed in French. I am not of an humour to put myself in a passion against such people. Since it seems, that there are still other letters relating to me among those of Mr. Oldenburg and Mr. Collins, which have not been published, I could wish, that the Royal Society would order them to be communicated to me. When I shall return to Hannover, I shall be able to publish also a Commercium Epistolicum, which may be of service to the history of learning. I shall be ready to publish as well those letters, which may be urged against me, as those which favour me, and I shall leave the judgment of them to the publick*. This letter having been read to the Royal Society, Sir Isaac Newton observed, that the last words, which we have transcribed, were injurious to the Committee, since they supposed, that they had not made a disinterested choice of the papers, which the Society had ordered them to collect. He added, that as he had no share in the Commercium Epistolicum, but had left the Committee perfectly free to collect and print what they thought proper, he did not think it right for Mr. Leibnitz to publish himself a Commercium Epistolicum. Upon this he produced two letters, which had been written to him; one by Mr. Leibnitz in 1693, and the other by Dr. Wallis in 1695; and said, that though these letters were very favourable to him, he had waved the communicating of them to the Committee, that he might not seem to become himself a witness in his own cause. These two letters having been examined before the Society by Members of the Society, who knew the hands of the writers of the letters, they were read and deposited among the archives of the Society (10). Sir Isaac Newton remarked also the danger of sending to Mr. Leibnitz the originals even of the letters of Mr. Oldenburg and Mr. Collins, which he seemed to desire; but said that attested copies might be sent to him. He said, that if Mr. Leibnitz had letters to produce in his favour, and would send the originals to some of his friends in England,

(5) In the Postscript of a Letter to Count Balthazar Sec Des Maizeux's Recueil de diverses Pièces, tom. 2. pag. 44, 45.

(6) Journal Littéraire, tom. 2. pag. 447.

(7) Des Maizeux, Recueil, tom. 2. pag. 116, 117.

(8) Ibid. pag. 121, 122.

(9) Ibid. pag. 123, 124.

(10) They are published by Mr. Des Maizeux, Recueil, tom. 2. pag. 100 and 103.

land, to be shewn to the Royal Society, and examined by persons who knew the hands, the originals should be returned after authentic copies were taken, and that then these letters might be published in the Philosophical Transactions, or in Germany, as Mr. Leibnitz should think proper. The affair stood in this situation when the Abbé Conti, a noble Venetian, came to England in 1715. He had written against the Signior Nigrifoli, who endeavoured to revive the Hypothesis of Platonic Natures, and had imagined a certain Seminal Light, to which he ascribed the generation of living beings. The Abbé consulted Mr. Leibnitz concerning the opinions of his Antagonist, and Mr. Leibnitz wrote to him a Letter (*), in the Postscript to which, he congratulates him upon his arrival in England. "I am glad, says he (†), that you are in England; there are great advantages to be made there, and it must be owned, that there are Men of distinguished abilities in that country; but they are fond of passing for almost the only inventors in the world, and this is manifestly what they will not succeed in. It does not appear, that Sir Isaac Newton had before me the Infinitesimal Characteristic and Algorithmic, as Mr. Bernoulli has very rightly judged; though it would have been extremely easy to have attained to it, if he had turned his thoughts that way, as it would have been very easy for Apollonius to have attained to the Analysis of Des Cartes upon Curves, if he had turned his Thoughts that way. Those who have written against me having made no scruple to attack my Candor by forced and ill-grounded interpretations, they shall not have the pleasure of seeing me answer the slight reasons of people, who act in so ill a manner, and besides that deviate from the point. The question is concerning the differential method, and they turn it upon Series, in which Sir Isaac Newton preceded me without doubt; but I discovered at last a general method for Series; and after this I had no longer an occasion to have recourse to his Extractions. They would have done better to have published letters entire, as Dr. Wallis did with my consent; and he had not the least dispute with me, as these persons would persuade the world. My adversaries have published in the Commercium Epistolicum of Mr. Collins only what they thought capable of their false interpretations. I became acquainted with Mr. Collins in my second voyage to England; for in my first (which was but for a very short time, because I came with a publick minister) I had not the least knowledge of the improvements of Geometry, and had neither seen nor heard any thing of the correspondence between Mr. Collins and Mr. Gregory and Mr. Newton, as my letters exchanged with Mr. Oldenburg at that time and for some time after will sufficiently prove. But in my second voyage Mr. Collins shewed me part of his correspondence; and I observed, that Mr. Newton owned also his ignorance in several points, and said among other things, that he had not discovered any thing with regard to the dimension of the celebrated Curve-Lines, except the dimension of the Cissoïde. But all this has been suppressed. I am sorry, that I am able a man as Sir Isaac Newton has drawn upon him the censure of intelligent persons by having too much regard to the suggestions of some flatterers, who have been desirous of raising a contest between him and me." Mr. Leibnitz then attacks Sir Isaac Newton upon his Philosophy, especially his opinions about Gravity, Vacuum, the Intervention of God for the conservation of his creatures, &c. He accuses him of reviving the Occult Qualities of the Schools, or of supposing Miracles perpetually, &c. This Postscript was much talked of at Court, and some persons of distinction greatly solicited Sir Isaac Newton to write an answer. The Abbé Conti omitted nothing to engage him to it. But they could not prevail upon him to surmount his natural aversion to all kinds of disputes or personal contests. At last King George I. having one day asked, When Sir Isaac Newton's answer to Mr. Leibnitz was to appear? Sir Isaac could not excuse himself any longer. He addressed his answer dated February 26th old style to the Abbé Conti, when sent to Mr. Leibnitz, and wrote to him at the same time (†), that he had read with great attention and without the least prejudice

the Commercium Epistolicum, and the little piece, which contains the Extract; that he had also seen at the Royal Society the original papers of the Commercium Epistolicum, and some other original pieces relating to it. From all this, says he, I infer, that if all the digressions are cut off, the only point is, whether Sir Isaac Newton had the method of Fluxions or Infinitimals before you; or whether you had it before him. You published it first, it is true; but you have owned also, that Sir Isaac Newton had given many hints of it in his letters to Mr. Oldenburg and others. This is proved very largely in the Commercium and the extract of it. What answer do you give? This is still wanting to the publick, in order to form an exact judgment of the affair. He adds, that Mr. Leibnitz's own Friends waited for his answer with great impatience, and that they thought he could not dispense with answering, if not Dr. Keill, at least Sir Isaac Newton himself, who had given him a defiance in express terms, as he would see in Sir Isaac's Letter. He informed him at the same time, that the King had desired him to give him an Account of the whole affair. Mr. Leibnitz answered Sir Isaac Newton in a letter, which he addressed to the Abbé Conti; but at the time when the Abbé waited to receive that letter, he received a short letter (12), in which Mr. Leibnitz informed him, that he had sent it to Mr. Remond at Paris, who would take care that he should receive it. I have taken this way, says he, in order to have indifferent and intelligent witnesses, of our disputes; and Mr. Remond will communicate it to others. I have sent him at the same time a copy of your letter and of that of Sir Isaac Newton. After this you will be able to judge whether the unjust Cbicanery of some of your new friends perplexes me very much. Sir Isaac Newton thought it wrong, that Mr. Leibnitz should call in for witnesses of that dispute, persons, who probably had not read the Commercium Epistolicum. He thought, that London, as well as Paris, might furnish indifferent and intelligent witnesses. He resolved therefore to carry the dispute no further; and when Mr. Leibnitz's answer came from France, he refuted it by Remarks, which he communicated only to some of his friends. Mr. Leibnitz died six months after, that is, November 14th 1716; and as soon as Sir Isaac Newton heard of his death, he published at London the Postscript and Letter of Mr. Leibnitz to the Abbé Conti, with his own Letter to the Abbé, and the Remarks. To the Remarks was prefixed the following Advertisement, explaining the subject and occasion: Cum D. Leibnitius adduci non posset, ut vel Commercio Epistolico responderet, vel probaret quæ pro lubitu affirmabat, cumque præcedentes Epistolas in Galliam prius mitteret, quam earum tertiam in Angliam veniret, & prætenderet se hoc facere, ut testes haberet, & alias etiam adhiberet contumelias: Newtonus minimè rescripsit, sed observationes sequentes in Epistolam illam tertiam scriptas cum amicis solummodo communicavit. To these Pieces was added Mr. Raphson's History of Fluxions, as a kind of supplement. They were published in the same languages, in which they were written, viz. those of Mr. Leibnitz in French, and those of Sir Isaac Newton in English. The two last were translated into French, and printed also at London. Mr. Des Maizeaux has reprinted them in the second Tome of his Recueil, together with some other letters of Mr. Leibnitz upon the same subject. In 1720 Dr. John Keill published at London in 4to the following piece: Joannis Keill M. D. & R. S. S. in Academiâ Oxoniensi Astronomiæ Professoris Epistola ad Virum clarissimum Joannem Bernoulli in Academiâ Basiliensi Mathematicum Professore: in qua Dominum Newtonum & seipsum defendit contra Censuras à Cruo quodam objectas, & in Actis Lipsiensibus publicatas. Ubi etiam queritur de novâ calculandi methodo ab Autoribus Actorum Lipsiensium inventâ & usurpatâ, quâ in Indicibus suis probra & convitia in alios fundunt. In 1725 there was published at London in 8vo, a new Edition of the Commercium Epistolicum under the following title: Commercium Epistolicum de variâ Re Mathematicâ, inter celeberrimos præsentis seculi Mathematicos, viz. Isaacum Newtonum Equitem Auratum, Dominum Isaacum Barrow, Dominum Jacobum Gregorium, Dominum Johannem Wallisium, Dominum J. Keillium, Dominum J. Collinsium, Dominum Gulielmum Leibnitium, Dominum Henricum Oldenburgum, Dominum Franciscum Stursum, & alios. Jussu Societatis Regiæ in lucem editum; & jam una cum Re-

(*) Des Maizeaux, Recueil, tom. 2. pag. 337.

(†) Ibid. pag. 3, & seqq.

(12) Ibid. pag. 26.

(11) Ibid. pag. 12, & seqq.

long before made him famous over all Europe [H]. Besides the office of Privy Counsellor of Justice, which the Elector of Hanover had given him, the Emperor, at the desire of Anthony Ulric Duke of Brunswick, appointed him in 1712 Aulic Counsellor; and the Czar made him his Privy Counsellor of Justice with a pension of a thousand ducats, after a conversation with him at Torgaw at the time of the marriage of the Princess causam præmissâ insignis Controversiæ inter Leibnitium & Keillium de primo Inventore Methodi Fluxionum, & Judicio primarii, ut ferebatur, Mathematici subjuncto, iterum impressum. In the preface it is observed, that in the Elogium of Mr. Leibnitz published in the Acta Eruditorum for July 1717, his friends had declared, "that he had resolved to publish, in answer to the "English Commercium Epistolicum, one of his own, "larger than that; and that a few days before his "death he signified to Mr. Wolfius, that he would "really confute the English, who had attacked his "reputation; and that as soon as he was at leisure "from his Historical labours, he would give the world "something in Analysis, which was not expected, "nor had any affinity with the discoveries hitherto "published by Newton or any other person." But in the preface abovementioned, it is remarked, that it appears from Mr. Leibnitz's letters to the Abbé Conti, dated February 26th, 1712, and April 9th, 1716, that he had no Commercium Epistolicum to publish. And with respect to new inventions, which had no affinity with these, they were nothing to the point in question.

[G] He was engaged likewise in a Scheme for an universal Language. Dr. Wilkins Bishop of Chester, and Dalgarnie had been engaged in such a design; but our author when he was in England, had told Mr. Boyle and Mr. Oldenburg, that he did not believe, that these great men had come to the point. They might enable Nations, who did not understand each other, to correspond easily together; but they had not obtained the true real characters, which would be the best instrument of the human mind, and would extremely assist both the reason and memory, and the invention of things. These characters ought to resemble, as much as possible, those of Algebra, which are very simple and expressive, and are never superfluous or equivocal, but whose varieties are grounded on reason. Mr. Leibnitz speaks in some place of an Alphabet of human thoughts, which he was contriving: it is very probable, that this alphabet had relation to his universal language (13).

(13) Fontenelle, pag. 321.

[H] His writings had long before made him famous over all Europe. Besides those already mentioned he wrote the following. I. Nova Methodus discendi docendæque Jurisprudentiæ. Francfort 1668 in 12mo. II. Corporis Juris reconciliandi Ratio. Mentz 1668 in 12mo. III. Marii Nizolii de veris Principiis & verâ ratione Philosophandi contra Pseudophilosophos, cum Præfatione & Notis G. G. Leibnitii. Francfort 1670 in 4to. This work had been printed in 1553; but was entirely forgot, when Mr. Leibnitz thought proper to republish it, in order to expose the obstinacy of those, who were zealously attached to Aristotle, and whom Nizolius treats with great severity, and says, that the regard which had been for so long time paid to that Philosopher was only a proof of the multitude of Fools and the duration of Folly. Mr. Leibnitz has added critical notes, in which his only design is to seek the truth, without carrying his respect for Nizolius beyond what he deserves. And he has subjoined a letter to Thomasius, his former master, concerning the method of reuniting the new Philosophy with the old. IV. Sacrosancta Trinitas per nova inventa Logica defensa. 1671. Monsieur de Boinebourg having communicated to Mr. Leibnitz a letter of Willowatius Nephew of Faustus Socinus, in which he endeavoured to recommend the Socinian notions, our author answered in this tract the arguments urged in favour of them. V. Confessio Naturæ contra Atheos. Mr. Spitzelius inserted this piece in his treatise against the Atheists. VI. Nova Hypothesis Physica, qua Phænomenorum natura plerorumque causæ ab unico quodam universalis motu in globo nostro supposito repetuntur, seu Theoria motus concreti & abstracti. Mentz 1671. It was reprinted at London. He admitted in this work a Vacuum, and thought that matter was simple extension, absolutely indifferent to rest and motion; but he afterwards changed his opinion. Mr. Knoop de Rosenroth translated this book into German and joined it to his translation of Sir Thomas Brown's Pseudodoxia Epidemica printed at Nuremberg in 1680 in 4to, under the name of Christophorus Paganus. VII. Notitia Opticæ Promotæ. This piece, which he addressed to Spinoza, and in which he teaches a new method of polishing Telescope-Glasses, is published in the posthumous works of the latter. VIII. Cæsarini Furstuerii de jure Suprematûs ac Legationis Principum Germaniæ. 1677. in 12mo. The Plenipotentiaries of the crowned heads appointed to negotiate the peace at Nimegue having refused to treat the ministers of the Sovereign Princes of Germany, who were not Electors, in the same manner with the ministers of the sovereign Princes of Italy, Mr. Leibnitz wrote in favour of the former this work, in which he took the name of Cæsarius, to shew that he was in the Emperor's interests, and that of Furstuerus, to shew, that he was likewise in the interest of the Princes, Furst in High Dutch signifying Prince. This book did him great honour. IX. Entretiens de Philarete & d'Eugene sur la Question du temps agitée à Nimegue, touchant le droit d'Ambassade des Electeurs & des Princes d'Empire. in 12mo. This is an abridgment of the preceding work. X. De Arte combinatoria. Francfort 1690 in 4to. This was printed without his knowledge: he had written it when he was very young in 1665, and it had been already published at Leipsic in 1668. XI. De la Tolérance des Religions: Lettres de M. de Leibnitz, & Responses de M. Pellisson. Paris 1692 in 12mo. Mr. Leibnitz is for toleration in these Letters, and Mr. Pellisson in his answers is against it. XII. Codex Juris Gentium Diplomaticus, in quo Tabulae Authentice Actorum publicarum, pleraque inedita vel selecta continentur. Hanover 1693 in fol. This curious work, in which the several pieces are digested into order of time, begins with the year 1096 and ends in 1499. XIII. In 1693 he published a little treatise concerning the state of Germany, such as it might be supposed to have been before we have any account in History; and he gave it the name of Protogæa, a short Essay of which we have in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipsic for January 1693. This treatise was to precede the History of the House of Brunswick. XIV. Novissima Sinica Historiam nostri temporis illustrantia. 1697 in 8vo. He shews in this book the advantages which might be made from the missionaries being allowed to continue in China. XV. Lettre sur la connexion des maisons de Brunswick & d'Este. 1698. and translated into Italian by the Abbé Guidi. Mr. Leibnitz wrote this letter on occasion of the marriage of the Duke of Modena with the eldest daughter of John Frederick Duke of Brunswick-Lunenbourg. XVI. Accessiones Historiæ, quibus utilia superiorum Temporum Historiis illustrandis Scripta monumentaque nondum hactenus edita, inque iis scriptores diu desiderati continentur. Leipsic 1698 in 4to. XVII. Accessionum Historicarum Tom. 2. continens præcipuum Chronicon Alberici Monachi Triumfontium. Hanover 1698 in 4to. XVIII. Specimen Historiæ Arcanæ, seu Anecdota de Vita Alexandri VI. Papæ. Hanover, 1696 in 4to. This fragment, to which Mr. Leibnitz has written a preface, was extracted from an history of that Pope written by John Burchard his master of the Ceremonies. Our author had only this piece in his hands, when he published it; but he afterwards procured the intire life, and was preparing to publish it when he died. XIX. Mantissa Codicis Juris Gentium Diplomatici. Hanover 1700 in fol. XX. Scriptores Rerum Brunsvicensium illustrationi inservientes, antiqui omnes & Religionis Reformationis priores. Hanover in fol. three volumes; the first published in 1707, the second in 1710; and the third in 1711. XXI. Essais de Théodicée sur la Bonté de Dieu, la Liberté de l'Homme, & l'Origine du Mal. Amsterdam 1710 in 8vo. two volumes.

Princess of Wolfenbuttel with the son of that Prince. He undertook at the same time to establish at Vienna an Academy of Sciences; but his scheme was not executed. It is said that the plague was the occasion of it. However the Emperor, as a mark of his favour, settled on him a pension of two thousand florins, and promised him another of four thousand florins, if he would come and reside at Vienna. He would have complied with this offer, if he had not been prevented by death. Upon his return to Hanover in 1714 he found that the Elector, who was then raised to the throne of Great Britain, had appointed Mr. Eckhard for his colleague in writing the History of Brunfwick. This work was interrupted by others, which he wrote occasionally. The last affair he was engaged in was his

volumes. This work contains, 1. A long preface. 2. A Preliminary discourse concerning the agreement of Faith with Reason. 3. An essay upon the goodness of God, the free-will of Man, and the origin of Evil, divided in three parts. 4. A Latin piece entitled, Causa Dei asserta per Justitiam ejus, cum cæteris ejus perfectionibus cunctisque Actionibus conciliatam. 5. Some reflections upon a book of Mr. Hobbes concerning Free-will, Necessity and Chance. 6. Some remarks upon a book of Dr. William King, Archbishop of Dublin, de Origine Mali. In this work his design is to answer the objections urged by Mr. Bayle with regard to the goodness of God, the liberty of man, and the origin of evil. In the Discourse concerning the agreement of Faith with Reason, he has the following passage: "We want no revelation to know, that there is a sole principle of all things, infinitely good, and infinitely wise. Reason teaches us the existence of that principle by infallible demonstrations; and consequently all the objections taken from the usual course of things, wherein we observed several imperfections, are grounded only upon false appearances. For if we could understand the universal harmony of the world, we should see, that those things, which we are apt to blame, are connected with the wisest plan that could be chosen; in a word, we should see, and not believe only, that what God has done is the best. By seeing I mean here what is known a priori by the causes; and by believing what we judge only by the effects, though the one be as certainly known as the other. To which we may apply what St. Paul says (2 Cor. v. 7.) that we walk by Faith, and not by Sight. For the infinite Wisdom of God being known to us, we judge that he had good reasons to permit natural and moral Evil; and we judge so by the effects or à posteriori, that is, because it exists. Mr. Bayle owns this truth; and therefore he should have been contented with it, without pretending that there should be no false appearances against it. It is just as if one should require, that there should be no dreams, nor any deception in opticks." He then observes, that the passages of several authors, quoted by Mr. Bayle, do not prove that there are any unanswerable objections against any revealed doctrine. As for what concerns the Fathers, they did not absolutely reject the use of reason; on the contrary, in their disputes with the Heathens, they applied themselves to shew that Paganism was contrary to reason, and that Christianity had a great advantage over it even in that respect. In the Essay upon the goodness of God, the Free-will of Man, and the Origin of Evil, he undertakes to answer several difficulties, which concern not only revealed, but also natural Religion. God, says he, is the first reason of things; for things that are limited, (as every thing is, which we see and know by experience,) are contingent, and have nothing in them, that renders their existence necessary; it being manifest that time, space, and matter, which are uniform in themselves, might have received quite different motions and figures, and in a different order. We must therefore look for the reason of the existence of the world, which is the whole collection of contingent things, in that substance, which carries the reason of its existence along with it, and is consequently necessary and eternal. That cause must also be intelligent; for this world, which actually exists, being contingent, and an infinite number of other worlds being equally possible; the cause of the world must have considered all those possible worlds to pitch upon one; which could not be done but by an understanding, that has the ideas of all possible things. This intelligent cause must be infinite in all respects, and absolutely perfect in power, wisdom, and goodness, since it tends to every thing that is possible. And because all things are linked together, and connected together, there can be no reason to admit more than one first Cause. Its understanding is the source of Essences, and its will is the origin of Existences. This is our author's proof of one only God, with his perfections, and of the origin of things. That supreme wisdom, attended with an infinite goodness, could not but choose the best. If the works of God were not the best, something better might have been done; which is inconsistent with his infinite wisdom. If among all possible worlds, there was not one that is the best, God would have produced none. I call world the whole system and collection of things that exist; lest it should be said, that many worlds might exist at different times and in different places. For all of them must be accounted but one world, or, if you will, one Universe. And supposing that all places and times are filled up, it will be true still that they might have been filled up after an infinite manner of ways, and that there is an infinity of possible worlds, whereof God must needs have chosen the best, since he does nothing without acting according to the supreme reason. If it be said, that the world might have been without sin and misery, I deny that such a world would have been the best. For all things are linked together in each possible world: the universe, whatever it may be, is all of a piece, like an ocean: the least motion produces its effect to any distance, though that effect becomes less sensible in proportion to the distance. So that God has settled every thing beforehand, once for all, having foreseen prayers, good and evil actions, &c. and every thing ideally contributed before its existence to the resolution that was taken about the existence of all things; inasmuch that no alteration can be made in the universe (no more than in a number) without destroying its Essence, or, if you will, its numerical individuality. And therefore if the least evil that happens in the world, was wanting in it, it would not be this world, which, all things duly considered, was accounted the best by the wise Creator who chose it. It is true, one may imagine some possible worlds without sin and misery; but those worlds would be in other respects very much inferior to ours in Good. I cannot make you sensible of it by entering into particulars; for can I know and represent to you infinities? Can I compare them together? But you ought to believe so, as well as I, ab effectu, since God has chosen this world such as it is. Besides, we know that an Evil does frequently produce a good thing, which would not have happened, had it not been for that Evil. Nay, two evils have frequently occasioned a very good thing:

Et, si fata volunt, bina venena juvant.

A little acidity, acrimony, or bitterness is sometimes more pleasant than Sugar. Colours are heightened by shadows; and a dissonance well placed renders harmony more beautiful. We desire to be frighted by Rope-dancers, who are ready to fall; and to shed tears at the representation of a tragedy. Does any one sufficiently relish the happiness of health, who has never been sick? Is it not generally necessary, that a little Evil should render a Good more sensible, and consequently greater? It will be said, that evils are very great and numerous, if compared with good things. But it is a mistake. Want of attention is the only thing, that lessens our happiness; and it is necessary, that this attention should be raised by a mixture of evil. Let us supply by reflection what is wanting in our perception, to be more sensible of our happiness. Were it not for the knowledge of a future life, I believe his dispute with Dr. Samuel Clarke, which was put an end to by Mr. Leibnitz's death, which was occasioned by the gout and stone November the 14th 1716, he being then seventy years of age (b). He was of a moderate stature, and of a thin habit of body. He lieve most people would be willing at the point of death to begin a new life, upon condition, that they should enjoy as much good, and undergo as many evils, especially if they were of another kind. They could be contented with a change, without requiring a more happy condition. Whoever considers the weakness and frailty of human bodies, must needs admire the wisdom and goodness of the author of nature, who made them so lasting, and renders our lives so tolerable. It is no wonder if men are sometimes sick; but it is a wonder they are not always so. This consideration ought to raise in us a greater admiration for the mechanism of our bodies, which though frail and subject to corruption, are capable of maintaining themselves; for nature cures us rather than physic. But that very frailty is a consequence of the nature of things; unless any one should say, that this sort of creatures, which are endowed with reason, and clothed with flesh and bones, should not be in the world. But it would be an imperfection, which some ancient Philosophers would have called Vacuum Formarum, a Vacuum in the order of species. Those, who far from complaining of nature and fortune, appear well pleased with them, though their condition be none of the best, seem to me the wisest. For, not to say that such complaints are ill-grounded, it is an actual rebellion against Providence. No man ought to be very ready to join with the male-contents in the state wherein we live; and none ought to appear discontented in the city of God, since it cannot be done without great injustice. Those books, that treat of the misery of mankind, such as that of Pope Innocent III. are none of the most useful. We increase our evils by reflecting upon them, instead of considering the good things, which are far more numerous. Much less should we value a sort of books, like that of Abbé Esprit, concerning the falsity of human Virtues. Such a book is only proper to make us put an ill construction upon every thing, and to render men such as they are represented by that author. However it must be confessed that there are several disorders in this life, which particularly appear by the prosperity of many wicked persons; and the unhappiness of many good men. But it ought to be considered, that the wicked are frequently punished in this world, and that virtue will be for ever rewarded in another life. It will be objected, that even after this life, misery will prevail above happiness, since there are but few elect; which appears inconsistent with the goodness of the Supreme Being. In answer to this difficulty, granting that the number of those, who are to be tormented in hell, will be incomparably greater than that of the blessed, the evil will still appear like nothing, if compared with the good, considering the true extent of the works of the author of nature; and St. Augustin, for want of knowing the modern discoveries, was not a little perplexed, when he undertook to justify the prevalence of evil. It was in former times a common opinion, that the earth was the only part of the world furnished with inhabitants; nay, the antients were afraid of admitting any Antipodes. They believed, that the rest of the world did only consist of some shining globes and chrystalline spheres. But in our days it will be acknowledged that there is an innumerable multitude of globes, as large or larger than ours, which may be inhabited by rational creatures, though it does not follow that they are men. Our earth is only a planet, that is, one of the six principal satellites of our sun. And because all fixed stars are so many suns, it is plain, that the earth is a very inconsiderable part of the universe, since it is only an appendix of one sun. Perhaps all the suns are inhabited by happy creatures; at least we have no reason to believe that many of their inhabitants will be damned. Besides, considering that there is no reason to affirm, that there are stars every where, it may very well be, that there is a vast space beyond the region of the stars. Whether it be the Empyrean Heaven, or not, that immense space, which surrounds all that region, may be filled with glory and happiness. It may be conceived like an ocean, which receives the rivers of all happy creatures, when they have attained to their perfection in the system of the stars. What will then become of the consideration of our globe and its inhabitants? Will it not be a thing incomparably less than a Physical point, since our earth is like a point, with respect to the distance of some fixed stars? And therefore the proportion of that part of the universe, which we know, being left in a kind of nothingness, if compared to what is unknown to us; and all the evils, that can be objected, being only in that kind of nothingness; it may very well be, that all evils are almost nothing in comparison with all the good things, that are in the universe. Mr. Leibnitz proceeds to enquire into the cause of evil, that it is in the ideal nature of creatures, inasmuch as nature is comprehended in the eternal truths that are in the divine understanding, independently of the will of God. It must be considered, says he, that there is an Original Imperfection in Creatures before sin, because the creatures are essentially limited. Hence it is that they know not every thing, and may be mistaken, and commit other faults. The Region of Eternal Truths in the divine understanding ought to be placed in the room of Matter, when the question is to know the true cause of things. That region is the Ideal Cause of evil, (if one may say so) as well as of good; but properly speaking, the formal part of evil has no efficient cause; it consists in a Privation. Though natural Evil or misery, and moral Evil or sin be not necessary, yet they are possible by virtue of those eternal truths. And because that immense Region of truths contains all possibilities, there must be an infinite number of possible worlds; evil must come into many of them, and even the best of them all must contain some. This is what determined God to permit evil. That supreme Being could not be said to act according to his wisdom and goodness and all his perfections, if he did not choose what is absolutely the best, though moral evil be involved in it by the supreme necessity of eternal truths. Mr. Leibnitz's conclusion upon this head is, that God wills all manner of good antecedently, the best consequently as an End, and natural evil as a means; and that he only permits moral evil, as being connected and linked with what is best. And therefore the consequent Will of God is only permissive with respect to sin. In the next place Mr. Leibnitz answers the objections grounded upon the Physical Concurrence of God with the creatures, and those that concern the liberty of man. He places that liberty in spontaneity and choice, and not in an indetermination or Indifference of Equilibrium. Such an Equilibrium, says he, is impossible, and absolutely contrary to experience. Whoever examines himself, will find that there is some cause or reason that determines the will, though we are not always sensible of it, no more than we are sensible when we go out of a door, why we set the right foot before the left, or the left before the right. There is always a prevailing reason, that inclines the will, without necessitating it. The will is never moved but by the representation of a good, which prevails above the contrary representation. Every body owns it with respect to God, good Angels, and the blessed Souls, without pretending that they are not free. God does not fail to choose what is best, but he is not forced to it; and there is no necessity in the object of his choice, for another series of things is equally possible. His choice is free and independent upon necessity, because he chooses the best world among many that are possible, and his will is only determined by the prevailing goodness of the object. And therefore it is not an imperfection in God, nor in the Angels and blessed Souls. On the contrary, it would be a great imperfection, or rather a manifest absurdity, if it were otherwise,

(b) See Acta Eruditorum, ann. 1717, pag. 312. Fontenelle, Histoire de Renouveaulement de l'Academie Royale des Sciences en M. DC. XCIX. & les Eloges Historiques de tous les Academiciens morts depuis ce Renouveaulement, tom. 2. pag. 274, & seqq. edit. Amsterd. 1720. Europe sçavante, Novembre, 1718; Nouvelles Litteraires du 14. Aoust 1717; Memoires de Trevoux, Aoust 1721. and Nicron, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes illustres, tom. 2. pag. 64, & seqq.

He was short-sighted. In order to fix what he thought proper in his memory, he wrote it down, and never read it over again. His memory was so strong, that even in his old age he could repeat Virgil exactly. He was naturally of a very warm temper, which he generally took care to restrain in a proper manner. He was very sensible of the honour of being considered as one of the greatest men of Europe. He was solicitous to procure the otherwise, even in men, and if they could act without any reason inclining them to it. No instance can be given of such a liberty, and when any body resolves upon a thing out of humour, to shew that he is a free agent, the pleasure or the advantage, which he thinks to reap from that affectation, is one of the reasons that move him to it. Every thing is certain and determinate beforehand in man, as every where else; and an human soul is a kind of Spiritual Automaton; though contingent actions in general, and free actions in particular, are not necessary of an absolute necessity, which would be inconsistent with contingency. XXII. De Origine Francorum Disquisitio. Hanover 1715 in 8vo. In this work Mr. Leibnitz asserts that the Franks or French came from Pomerania and the banks of the river Oder. He was attacked in Germany by Mr. Grundlingis, Professor of the University of Hall, and in France by Father Tournemine, the Jesuit. XXIII. L'Anti-Jacobite. 1715. In this book he answers some pieces, which had attacked the Lutheran Religion, with a design to inspire the English with an aversion to their new King. XXIV. Réponse du Baron de la Hontan à la Lettre d'un particulier, opposée au Manifeste de S. M. le Roy de la Grande Bretagne, comme Electeur d'Hanovre, contra la Saxe. XXV. Collectanea Etymologica illustrationi Linguarum veteris Celticae, Germanicae, Gallicae, aliarumque inferviencia, cum Praefatione Jo. Georgii Ecardi. Hanover 1717 in 8vo. XXVI. A Collection of Papers, which passed between the late learned Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clarke, relating to the Principles of Natural Philosophy and Religion. London 1717 in 8vo. Translated into High Dutch, and printed at Francfort 1720 in 8vo. XXVII. Otium Hannoveranum, sive Miscellanea ex Ore & scribedis G. G. Leibnitzii quaedam notata & descripta, cum ipsi in colligendis & excerptis Rebus ad Historiam Brunsvicensis pertinentibus operam navaret Joachim Fredericus Fellerus. Leipzig 1718 in 8vo. XXVIII. Recueil de diverses Pieces sur la Philosophie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Histoire, les Mathématiques, &c. par M. de Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, & autres Auteurs celebres. Amsterdam 1720 in 8vo. three volumes. Two disputes, which Mr. Leibnitz had with the learned men of England, are the principal subject of this collection. One of these disputes is merely historical, and turns upon a question of fact, whether himself or Sir Isaac Newton was the true or at least the first inventor of Fluxions. The other dispute is concerning the Newtonian Philosophy, attacked by Mr. Leibnitz, and defended by Dr. Samuel Clarke. Mr. Des Maizeaux, the editor of this collection, has prefixed to it a long and curious preface containing a particular account of those disputes. In the Journal des Savans Mr. Leibnitz has the following pieces. 1. Extrait d'une Lettre touchant le Principe des Horloges portatives de son Invention. Printed in the Journal of March the 25th 1675. 2. Lettre écrite d'Hanovre le 18 Juin 1677 contenant la Relation & la Figure d'un Chevreuil coëffé d'une maniere fort extraordinaire. In the Journal of July the 5th 1677. 3. Observation nouvelle de la maniere d'esirayer si un nombre est primitif. In the Journal of February the 28th 1678. 4. Lettre touchant la quadrature d'un portion de la Roulette. In the Journal of May the 23d 1678. 5. Lettre sur la question, si l'Essence du Corps consiste dans l'Etendue. In the Journal of June 18th 1691, and January 5th 1693. 6. De la Chainette, ou Solution d'un Probleme fameux, proposé par Galilée, pour servir d'Essai d'une nouvelle Analyse des infinis avec son Usage pour les Logarithmes, & une Application à l'avancement de la Navigation. In the Journal of March 31 1692. 7. Lettre sur quelques Axiomes de Philosophie. In the Journal of June 2, 1692. 8. Nouvelles Remarques touchant l'Analyse des transcendentes differentes de celles de la Geometrie de M. Des Cartes. In the Journal of July 14th, 1692. 9. Conjectures sur l'Origine du mot Blason. In the Journal of July 28 1692. 10. Lettre à M. l'Abbé Nicaise sur la Philosophie de M. Des Cartes. In the Journal of April 13, 1692. 11. Lettre à M. Fou-

cher, Chanoins de Dijon. In the Journal of August 3. 1693. 12. Regle generale de la Composition des Mouvements. In the Journal of September 7. 1693. 13. Deux Problemes construits par M. de Leibnitz, en employant sa Règle generale de la Composition des Mouvements. In the Journal of September 14. 1693. 14. Lettre sur une Maniere de perfectionner la Medecine. In the Journal of July 26. 1694. 15. Considerations sur la Difference qu'il y a entre Analyse ordinaire, & le nouveau Calcul des transcendentes. In the Journal of August 23. 1694. 16. Système nouveau de la nature & communication des substances, aussi bien que la union qu'il y a entre l'ame & le Corps. In the Journal of June 27. and July 4. 1695. 17. Eclaircissement du nouveau Systeme de la communication des substances, pour servir de Réponse à ce qui en a été dit dans le Journal des Savans du 12 Septembre 1695. In the Journal of the 2d and 9th of April 1696. 18. Lettre sur la connexion des maisons de Brunswick & d'Este. In the Journal of March 12. 1696. 19. Lettre de M. de Leibnitz sur son Hypothese de Philosophie & sur le Probleme curieux, qu'un de ses amis propose aux Mathematiciens, avec une Remarque sur quelques points contestez entre l'Auteur de principes de Physique, & celui des Objections contre ces Principes. In the Journal of November 19 1696. 20. Lettre à M. l'Abbé Nicaise sur la Philosophie de Des Cartes, avec des Reflexions. In the Journal of June 17, 1697. 21. Réponse aux Réflexions precedentes touchant les consequences de quelques Endroits de la Philosophie de Des Cartes. In the Journal of August 19 and 26 1697. 22. Lettre à M. de Varignon, contenant l'Explication de ce qu'un a rapporté de lui sur le Calcul differentiel dans les Memoires de Trevoux Novembre 1701. In the Journal of March 20. 1702. 23. Remarque sur un Endroit des Elemens d'Algebre de M. Ozanam. In the Journal of June 11 1703. 24. Réponse aux objections que le P. Lamy, Benedictin, a faites contre le Systeme de l'Harmonie préétablie. In the supplement to the Journal of June 1709. In the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig he has the following pieces. 1. De verâ proportione Circuli ad Quadratum circumscriptum in numeris rationalibus. Ann. 1682. p. 41. 2. Unicum Opticæ, Catoptricæ, & Dioptricæ Principium. Ann. 1682. p. 185. 3. Meditatio de separatione Salis & Aquæ dulcis, novoque separationum Chymicarum genere. Ibid. p. 386. 4. Meditatio Juridico-Mathematica de Interferu simplicium. Ann. 1683. p. 425. 5. De dimensionibus figurarum invenientis. Ann. 1684. p. 233 and 585. 6. Demonstrationes novæ de resistentiâ solidorum. Ann. 1684. p. 319. 7. Nova Methodus pro Maximis & Minimis, itemque Tangentibus quæ nec fractas nec irrationales quantitates moratur, & singulare pro illis Calculi genus. Ibid. p. 467. 8. Meditationes de cognitione, veritate, & ideis. Ibid. p. 537. 9. Demonstratio Geometrica regulæ apud Staticos receptæ de momentis gravium in planis inclinatis, nuper in dubium vocatæ, & solutio casus elegantis de Globo duobus planis angulum rectum facientibus simul incumbente, quantum unumquodque planorum prematur determinans. Ann. 1685. p. 501. 10. Brevis Demonstratio Erroris memorabilis Cartesii & aliorum circa Legem Naturæ, secundam quam volunt à Deo eandem semper Quantitatem motûs conservari, qua & in re mechanicâ abutuntur. Ann. 1685. p. 161. 11. Meditatio nova de naturâ Anguli contactûs & osculi, horumque usu in practicâ Mathesi, ad figuras faciliores succedaneas difficilioribus substituedas. Ann. 1686. p. 289. 12. De Geometriâ reconditâ, & Analsi indivisibilium atque infinitorum. Ibid. p. 292. 13. De Lineis Opticis & alia. Ann. 1689. p. 36. 14. Schediasma de resistentiâ Medii, & motu projectorum gravium in medio resistentie. Ann. 1689. p. 88, and Ann. 1690. p. 177. 15. Tentamen de Motuum Cælestium Causis. Ann. 1689. p. 82. 16. De Lineâ Isochronâ in quâ grave sine acceleratione descendit, & de Controversiâ cum Dn. Abbate D. C. [de Caselan]. Ibid. p. 195. 17. De causâ Gravitatis, & Defensio sententiæ suæ de veris naturæ Legibus contra Cartesianos. Ann. 1690. p. 228. 18. Ad ea, quæ J. Bernoullius the favour of Princés, which he made use of for the advantage of learning as well as of himself. He was polite and obliging in conversation, and had an aversion to disputes. He was supposed to love money; and it is said, that though he left at his death sixty thousand crowns, he had put out between fifteen and twenty thousand crowns to interest; the rest was found in his chamber in corn-sacks. He professed the Lutheran Religion, but

- noullius de forte Alearum publicavit, responso. Ibid. p. 358. 19. Quadratura Arithmeticae communis sectionum Conicarum, quae Centrum habent, indeque ducta Trigonometria Canonica ad quantamcumque in numeris exactitudinem à Tabularum necessitate liberata, cum casu speciali ad lineam Rhomborum nauticam aptatumque illi Planisphaerium. Ibid. p. 178. 20. De Linea in quam flexile se pondere proprio curvet, ejusque usu insigni ad inveniendas quotcumque medias proportionales & Logarithmos. Ibid. p. 277. 21. De solutionibus Problematis Catarinarii vel funicularis à Dn. J. Bernoulli propositis. Ibid. p. 435. 22. De Legibus naturae & verâ estimatione virium motricium contra Cartesianos Responso ad Rationes à Dn. Papin propositas. Ibid. p. 439. 23. Additiuncula ad considerationes Ferdinandi Helfrici Liebscheid. Ibid. p. 500. 24. De Linea ex Lineis nympero infinitis ordinatim ductis inter se concurrentibus formata, easque omnes tangente, ac de novo in eâ re Analysis infinitorum usu. Ann. 1692. p. 168. 25. Solutio Problematis Florentini, seu Constructio Testudinis Quadrabilis Hemisphaericae. Ibid. p. 275. and Ann. 1693. p. 42. 26. Generalia de naturâ linearum Anguloque Contactus & Osculi, provolutionibus aliisque cognatis & eorum usibus nonnullis. Ann. 1692. p. 440. 27. Protogaea, Ann. 1693. p. 40. 28. Supplementum Geometriae practicae sese ad Problemata transcendentia extendens, opo novae Methodi generalissima per series infinitas. Ibid. p. 178. 29. De Problemate Bernoulliano. Ibid. p. 313. 30. Supplementum Geometriae dimensoriae, seu generalissima omnium Tetragonismorum effecto per motum; similiterque multiplex constructio Lineae ex datâ Tangentium conditione. Ibid. p. 385, 477. 527. 31. De prima Philosophiae emendatione, & de motione substantiae. Ann. 1694. p. 110. 32. Nova Calculi differentialis applicatio & usus, ad multiplicem Linearum constructionem, ex datâ tangentium conditione, Ibid. p. 311. 33. Constructio propria Problematis de curvâ Isochronâ paracentricâ. Ibid. p. 364. 34. Specimen Dynamicum pro admirandis naturae Legibus, circa Corporum vires & mutuas actiones detegendis, & ad suas causas revocandis. Ann. 1695. p. 145. 35. Notatiuncula ad constructiones Lineae, in quâ sacoma equilibrium cum pondere moto faciens incidere debet, datas à Marchione Hospitalio, & quaedam de quadraturis. Ibid. p. 184. 36. Responso ad nonnullas difficultates à Dn. Bernardo Nieuwentiit circa Methodum differentialem seu Infinitesimalem motus. Ibid. p. 310 and 369. 37. De novo usu centri Gravitatis ad dimensiones & speciatim pro arcibus inter curvas parallelas descriptas seu reÂngulis curvilineis, ubi & de parallelis in unumversum. Ibid. p. 493. 38. Relatio ad inclitam Societatem Leopoldinam naturae curiosorum de novo Antidysenterico Americano magnis successibus comprobato. Ibid. pag. 559. 39. Notatiuncula ad scriptum Jacobi Bernoulli. Ann. 1696. p. 145. 40. Communicatio suâ pariter duarumque alienarum ad edendum sibi primum a Dn. Jo. Bernoullio, deinde à Dn. Marchione Hospitalio communicatarum solutionem Problematis curvâe celerissimi Decensus à Dn. Joanne Bernoullio Geometris publicè propositis, una cum solutione suâ Problematis alterius ab eodem postea propositi. Ann. 1697. p. 201. 41. Epistola ad Aetorum Lipsensium Collectores. Ibid. p. 254. 42. De ipsa natura, sive de vi infinitâ actionibusque Creaturarum, pro Dynamicis suis confirmandis illustrandisque. An. 1698. p. 427. 43. Responso ad Dn. Nicolai Fatii Duellerii Imputationes. Accessit novae Artis Analyticae promotio specimine indicata, cum designatione per numeros assumptiis loco literarum Algebra ex combinatoriâ arte lucem capit. Ann. 1700. p. 198. 44. Specimen novum Analytico pro scientia infiniti circa summas & quadraturas. Ann. 1702. p. 210. & Ann. 1703. p. 19. 45. De Linea super Linea incessu, ejusque tribus speciebus, motu radente, motu provolutionis, & compositio ex ambobus. Ann. 1706. p. 10. 46. Epistola pro suâ Hypothese Physicâ motus Planetarii, Ann. 1706. p. 446. 47. Epistola de Hicchesii Thesauro Linguarum septentrionalium. Supplem. IV. p. 236. 48. Epistola ad Christianum Wolfium circa scientiam infiniti. Supplem. V. p. 264. 49. Observatio, quod Rationes sive Proportiones non habent Locum circa quantitates nibilo minores, & verò sensu methodi Infinitesimalis. Ann. 1712. p. 167. 50. Problema posthumum Augustini Thomae à S. Joseph solutioni commissum. Ann. 1717. p. 353. 51. Principia Philosophiae. Supp. VII. p. 500. In the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, he has the following pieces. 1. Demonstration courte d'une erreur considerable de M. Des Cartes & de quelques autres, touchant une Loy de la Nature, selon laquelle ils soutiennent que Dieu conserve toujours dans la matiere la même quantité de mouvement; de quoi ils abusent même dans la Méchanique, September 1686. p. 996. This demonstration, which is here followed by an answer, is translated from the Latin original printed in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig, Ann. 1686. p. 161. 2. Remarque sur l'Article V. des Nouvelles de la République des Lettres du mois de Février 1706. où il y a des Erreurs de fait qui le regardent. November 1706. p. 521. In the Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans he has the following pieces: 1. Remarques sur l'harmonie de l'Âme & du Corps. February 1696. p. 274. 2. Eclaircissement des Difficultez que M. Bayle a trouvées dans le système nouveau de l'union de l'ame & du Corps. July 1698. p. 329. Mr. Bayle answered him in the second Edition of his Dictionary in the article Rorarius. 3. Considerations sur les principes de vie & sur les natures Plastiques. May 1705. p. 222. In the Mémoires de Trevoux, he has the following pieces. 1. Lettre sur divers points de Littérature. January 1701: p. 177. 2. Lettre sur ce qu'il y a dans les Mémoires de Janvier & Février 1701 touchant la Generation de la Glace, & touchant la Demonstration Cartesienne de l'Existence de Dieu, par le P. Lamy, Benedictin. September 1701. p. 200. 3. Mémoire touchant son sentiment sur le calcul différentiel. November 1701. p. 270. 4. Lettre sur quelques Faits, qui le regardent, mal expliqués dans l'Eloge de M. Bernoulli prononcé à l'Académie des Sciences, March 1707. p. 540. 5. Remarques sur un endroit des Mémoires de Trevoux. March 1708. p. 488. 6. Trois Lettres à M. Hartsoeker sur la Dureté des Corps. 1712. March. p. 294. & April. p. 676. 7. Remarques sur la sixieme Lettre Philosophique imprimée à Trevoux en 1703. July 1712. p. 1235. 8. Lettre au P. Tournemine sur quelques points de Littérature. January 1715. p. 155. 9. Remarques sur les Horloges. March 1718. p. 531. In the Histoire Critique de la République des Lettres by M. Maïson he has the following pieces. 1. Lettre à M. Des Mailleux sur son Système de l'Harmonie préétablie. Tom. II. p. 72. 2. Réponse aux Reflexions contenues dans la seconde édition du Dictionnaire Critique de M. Bayle, Article Rorarius, sur le Système de la Harmonie préétablie. Ibid. p. 78. 3. Eloge Critique des Oeuvres de my Lord Shaftsbury. Tome X. p. 306. In the Europe sçavante he has the following piece. Principes de la Nature & de la Grace fondés en raison. Tom. VI. p. 101. In the Nouvelles Littéraires de la Haye, Tom. II. p. 289. he has a piece entitled, Remarques sur le premier Tome de ces Nouvelles. In the Histoire de l'Académie des Sciences he has a piece entitled, Explication de l'Arithmétique Binaire qui se sert des seuls caracteres O & I. avec des remarques sur son utilité, & sur ce qu'elle donne sens des anciennes Figures Chinoises de Fobry. Ann. 1703. In the Recueil de Littérature, de Philosophie, & d'Histoire, printed at Amsterdam 1730. in 12mo. he has these two pieces: 1. Lettre à l'Académie des Sciences du 26. Février 1700. sur la Correction du Calendrier Gregorien. p. 147. 2. Lettre sur les Phenomenes du Barometre, p. 152. In the Monumenta varia inedita of Joachim Frederic Fellerus he has the following pieces: 1. Lettre sur le Peché Originel. p. 1. 2. Brevis Disquisitio, utros incolarum Germaniae ceterioris aut Scandiae ex alterius initio profectos verisimilius sit judicandum. p. 132. 3. Epitre in vers à Madame de Scudery à la Louange du Roy Louis XIV. p. 63. 4. Trois Lettres sur différentes Matieres. p. 253, 254, 380. 5. Reflexions sur l'Esprit sectaire. p. 519. 6. Observa-

but never went to Sermons; and when he was upon his death-bed, his coachman, who was his favourite servant, desiring him to send for a Minister, he refused, saying, he had no occasion for one (c). He was never married. He had some thoughts of entering into that state when he was fifty years old; but the person whom he designed to marry desiring some time to consider of it, Mr. Leibnitz had an opportunity to do the same, and concluded, that marriage was very good, but that a man of sense ought to consider of it all his life (d). He had in his youth a natural son, who afterwards lived with him, and served him in a great many points, and had a considerable share in his confidence. He went by the name of William Dinniger, and extremely resembled Mr. Leibnitz. This particular we are informed of by the author of the Recueil de Litterature (e), who likewise asserts, that Mr. Leibnitz refused the place of Keeper of the Vatican Library offered him by Cardinal Casanata, while he was at Rome. Mr. Lœfserus, son of his sister by the mother's side, was his sole heir, whose wife died suddenly with joy at the sight of so much money left them by their uncle (f). Dr. Christopher Matthew Pfaffius affirms (g), that our author was of Mr. Bayle's opinion, though he seemed to attack it in this Theodicée; and that he confessed to him in a letter, that his own scheme would rather support than destroy Mr. Bayle. Mr. Le Clerc observes (b) that he had formed the same judgment of Mr. Leibnitz with Dr. Pfaff. But Father Tournemine the Jesuit assures us, that Dr. Pfaff and Mr. Le Clerc were mistaken, and that Mr. Leibnitz had written to him, that the Theodicée contained his real sentiments (i). Mr. William Molyneux in a letter to Mr. Locke dated at Dublin March the 16th 1697 speaking of our author's Reflections on Mr. Locke's Essay on human Understanding, writes thus: "He is certainly an extraordinary person, especially in Mathematics; but really, to speak freely of him, in relation to what he may have to say to you, I do not expect any great matters from him; for methinks (with all deference to his great name) he has given the world no extraordinary samples of his thoughts that way, as appears by two Discourses he has printed, both in the Acta Erudit. Lipsiæ, the first Anno 1694, pag. 110. de primæ Philosophiæ Emendatione, &c. the other Anno 1695, pag. 145. Specimen Dynamicum, which truly to me is, in many places, unintelligible." Mr. Locke in his answer to Mr. Molyneux, dated at Oates April the 10th 1697, writes thus: "To answer your great freedom with the like, I must confess to you, that Mr. L——'s great name had raised in me an expectation, which the sight of his paper did not answer; nor that discourse of his in the Acta Eruditorum, which he quotes, and I have since read, and had just the same thoughts of it, when I read it, as I found you have. From whence I only draw this inference, that even great parts will not master any subject without great thinking, and even the largest minds have but narrow swallows." And in another letter dated at Oates May the 3d 1697 Mr. Locke, having quoted a passage from a letter written to him from Holland concerning Mr. Leibnitz, proceeds thus: I see you and I and this Gentleman agree pretty well concerning the man; and this sort of siddling makes me hardly avoid thinking, that he is not that very great man as has been talked of him.

(c) Nicéron, ubi supra, pag. 75, 76.

(d) Idem, ibid. pag. 76, 77.

(e) Printed at Amsterdam in 1730.

(f) Nicéron, pag. 77.

(g) Dissertationes Anti-Bælianae, in quibus Petrus Bælius, Philosophus Rotodamensis, qui in Dictionario Historico & Critico, eo titulo, quo Pyrrhonem agit sentit Abbatis Sceptici Læwæ, dogmata Christiana de SS. Trinitate, &c. adertus fuerat refellitur, & confutatur. Dissert. 3. pag. 9. edit. Tubing. 1720 in 4to.

(b) Bibliothèque Ancienne & Moderne, tom. 15. pag. 179.

(i) Nicéron, tom. 10. Part. 1. pag. 77, 78.

LELAND

siones variæ de Linguis & Origine vocabulorum, necnon de continendo Dictionario & perpoliendâ Linguâ Germanicâ. p. 594. 7. Observatio de superstitionibus quibusdam Sclavorum. p. 693. 8. Observatio de variis Ludis. p. 642. 9. Excerpta ex Litteris Leibnitii. p. 111. In the Mémoires de Litterature of father Desmolets, Tome VIII. p. 211. we have a piece of our author entitled, Lettres à M. Arnaud, où il lui expose ses sentimens particuliers sur la Métaphysique & sur la Physique. His Reponse aux objections du P. Tournemine contre la Dissertation de M. Leibnitz sur l'Origine des Francois is published with his Dissertation de Origine Francorum at the end of a work of John George Ecard, entitled, Leges Francorum & Ripuariorum, cum additionibus Regum & Imperatorum variis, Francfort 1720 in fol. The additions to the dissertation of Mr. Leibnitz are by the Editor. Mr. Leibnitz had translated that work into French, and sent a MS. copy to Monsieur Remond to be presented to the Marquis de Torci, and even to King Lewis XIV. if that minister should think proper. This translation is printed in Mr. Des Maizeaux's Recueil des Pièces de Messieurs de Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, &c. printed at Amsterdam 1700 two Tomes in 8vo. The Reponse aux objections du P. Tournemine abovementioned is published likewise in the Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. VII. p. 13. He wrote also the History of Balaam, in which he endeavours to prove, that what is related of that Prophet did not happen really, but in a dream. Michael Gottlieb Hanschius has collected with care every thing, that Mr. Leibnitz had said in different passages of his works upon the principles of Philophy, and formed a complete System, under the title of, G. G. Leibnitii Principia Philosophiæ more Geometrico demonstrata cum excerptis & epistolis Philosophicis & scholasticis quibusdam ex Historiâ Philosophicâ. Francfort. 1728 in 4to. At the end of Mr. Toland's Posthumous works printed at London in 1726, we find a piece of Mr. Leibnitz, entitled, Annotatiuncula subitaneæ ad Librum de Christianismo mysteriis carente, conscriptæ 8. Augusti 1701. He wrote likewise in French reflexions upon Mr. Locke's Essay on Human Understanding, printed in the Familiar Letters of between Mr. Locke and several of his Friends, and in the third volume of Mr. Des Maizeaux's Recueil de diverses Pièces sur la Philosophie, la Religion Naturelle, &c. In 1734, and 1735, there was published a collection of his Letters by Mr. Christian Kortholt at Leipzig in two volumes in 8vo. under the following title; Vir illustris Godefridi Guil. Leibnitii Epistolæ ad diversos, Theologici, Juridici medici, Philosophici, Mathematici, Historici, & Philologica argumenti. E. MSS. Auctoris, cum Annotationibus suis primum divulgavit Christian. Kortholtus, A. M. Ordinis Philosophici in Academia Lipsiensis Affector, & Collegii minoris Principum Collegiatus. The Editor promises another volume at least, for he has in his hands a great many original Letters of Leibnitz, which he had obtained lately. Mr. John Bernoulli has promised to furnish him with some, which treat of very important subjects; and Mr. Nettelblatt, Professor of civil Law at Gryphswald, has engaged to recover those, which lie concealed in Sweden. He has hopes likewise of receiving others from divers parts of Germany, and also from England. T.

LELAND (JOHN) an Englishman, born in London, applied himself so assiduously to the search of English Antiquities, and was judged so well qualified to succeed in them, that Henry VIII honoured him with a very considerable pension and the title of Antiquary, an employment which began and ended in him. That he might well discharge the duties of it, he visited all the counties in England, examined all the remains of ancient monuments; perused the manuscripts of convents and colleges, and having spent six years in his perambulation, and collected all the materials he could possibly meet with, he undertook several considerable works [A]; but he had not time to finish, nor even to get them in any forwardness. The Court did not pay him his salary; and whether it were on this account, or for some other reasons, he fell into so deep a melancholy as deprived him of his senses [B], in which sad condition he died. His manuscripts are in the Bodleian Library. They consist of a huge heap of undigested materials [C], which at the same time shew the greatness of his capacity. This appears still more evidently, by a work which he completed [D], and which deserves to be printed (a). Camden was accused of having made a great use of Leland's manuscripts (b); a circumstance which was refuted by Dr. Smith.

(a) Extracted from Camden's Life, written by Dr. Thomas Smith, pag. 28, & seq.

(b) Ibid.

I must not omit that he studied at Paris under Sylvius; that he began in 1534 his perambulations in search after English Antiquities; that he abjured the Church of Rome some time before his death; and that he died the 18th of April 1552 (c).

(c) See Sir Thomas Pope Blount's Conf. Aurb. pag. 442.

[A] He undertook several considerable works. One book of the Topography of ancient Britain: de Topographia Britannia primæ, in quo vetustas etiam locorum quorum meminissent Scriptores Romani, appellationes spissa caligine obfusas in lucem a se revocaturus. Fifty books on the antiquities of Britain; de Antiquitate Britannica, sive de civilis Historia juxta comitatuum Angliæ & Walliæ, quæ tunc temporis obtinuerat, partitionem. Six books on the Islands lying about Britain; de Insulis Britannia adjacentibus. Three books on the British Nobility, de Nobilitate Britannica. This is what he promised in a petition he presented to Henry VIII, in the 37th year of his reign. This petition, entitled Strena, or new year's gift was published by Bale (1).

(1) Taken from Camden's Life, written by Dr. Thomas Smith, pag. 29.

[B] He fell into so deep a melancholy as deprived him of his senses. I will employ the nervous expressions of Dr. Smith. *Probris et rebus humanarum vitas! probris optimi deplorandam infelicissimamque sortem! Non enim multo postquam fidem quod susceperat præstandi quasi signatis tabulis obstrinxisset, sive apertis promissi difficultatibus deterritus, sive immensis laboribus fatigatus fractusque, sive dolore nimio & melancholiâ, quod fructum industriæ juxtaque expectationi parem nondum percepisset, forte oppressus, sive quacunque aliâ de causâ, abalienate mentis, nullis è Religione & Philosophiâ, nullis è Medicinâ patitis remediis ad pristinum sanumque statum revocandæ, ægritudinem perpessus est, vastâ interim observationum, quas in Adversaria suis ordine & præparato calamo, prout ipsi occurrissent, congesterat, male relicta (2).* i. e. "Oh deplorable vicissitude of human things! sad and most unhappy fate of a most excellent man! for, not long after he had engaged, under his hand writing as it were, to perform what he had undertaken, whether he was deterred by the difficulties of the promised work; or tired and broke with the immensity of his toils; or perhaps oppressed with excess of sorrow and melancholy, because he had not been recompensed in a manner any ways equal to his pains, and just expectation, or from what other cause, he ran melancholy mad; and could not be restored to his senses by any remedies borrowed from Religion, Philosophy or Physick, leaving behind him a prodigious heap of remarks, which he had thrown together in his Adversaria or notes, in a hasty, undigested manner, just as they came in his way."

(2) Tho. Smith, ibid.

[C] His Manuscripts . . . consist of a huge heap of indigested materials. This the reader may have known by the close of the passage just cited; here follows the sequel of it, which describes this much more particularly. Harum (Observationum) quatuor libros, ut loquuntur in folio, & septem minoris formæ, manu Lelandi plerâque ex parte descriptos, in perpetuam ipsius memoriam Bibliothecæ Bodl. Oxon. dono dedit V. Cl. Gulielmus Burtonus, famæ, ob editam Agri Leicestrensis descriptionem, apud Antiquarios nostras notissimæ. Repertur quoque aliud volumen Collectionum Lelandi () in* (*) Sub. Julio, C. 6.

Bibliothecâ Cottonianâ. Non irritabo Lelandi manes, si dixerò, totum opus, quod sæpè tractavi, mirè confusum, distractum, nulloque ordine digestum, limam ubique desiderari, & tanquam corpus exsuccum, exsanguè, animâque destitutum proflare (3). i. e. "The most learned William Burton, exceedingly well known to our Antiquaries, by the description he published of Leicestershire, to perpetuate the memory of Leland, gave to the Bodleian Library in Oxford, four folio volumes of remarks, and seven volumes in a smaller size, the greatest part of these eleven volumes being wrote in Leland's own hand. Another volume of Leland's collections is also found in the Cotton Library. I shall not offend Leland's manes, if I say that his whole work, which I have frequently perused, is greatly confused, and incoherent, and not digested into any order; that every part of it wants polishing; and is a kind of bloodless body, uninformed with a Soul." Here follows the judgment which Dr. Smith forms of Leland's vast design. Vir miris vauis & omni procul ostentatione proficitur, se multa & magna . . . quæ infinitam illius industriam, solertiamque, & excelsæ mentis, ad maxima quæque aspirantis, præclarissimas cogitationes conatusque abunde restantur, moliri (4). i. e. "This author, who was no ways vain, and abhorrent of all ostentation, declares that he had various and mighty undertakings in hand . . . which abundantly prove his prodigious industry, and application; and the excellent thoughts and efforts of his exalted mind, all aspiring to the noblest things."

(3) Thomas Smith, in Vita Camdeni, pag. 30.

(4) Idem, ibid. pag. 29.

[D] A work which he completed. Dr. Smith informs us of the substance of it, and its merit. Quantus verò fuerit Lelandus, se non ex editis opusculis Collectionis, saltem ex eximio opere (quod perfectum reliquit) de Scriptoribus illustribus Britannicis, quod in publicam lucem exeat, dignissimo, colligere licet (5). i. e. "How great an author Leland was, may be gathered, if not from his Notes or Collections which he published, at least from that excellent work, which he had completed before his death, concerning the eminent English authors; a book highly worthy of being published." And as a specimen of this work, he gives us Leland's collections with respect to Simon Stoch. Dr. Smith transcribed this Article, in order to send it to Papebroch the Jesuit, compiler of the Acta Sanctorum. We meet with the titles of some of Leland's printed works in the Bodleian Catalogue. Teiffier (6) should have informed the publick, that this work de illustribus Britannicis Scriptoribus; de Academicis Britannicis, de Typographia, &c. which he ascribes to John Leland, have not been printed. I fancy he has wrote Typographia instead of Topographia; which will give occasion to Leland's being ranked among the authors who have written on Printing.

(5) Idem, ibid. pag. 31.

(6) In Bibliotheca Bibliotecar. pag. 187.

LELAND or LEYLAND (JOHN). We shall add some particulars to Mr. Bayle's article of this learned writer [A]. He was born in London (a); but in what parish or year, appears not (b). In his younger years being deprived of his relations, he was taken into the protection of Mr. Thomas Myles, a great favourer of learning, who not only exhibited to his wants, but likewise took care to have him instructed in grammar under the famous William Lily, master of St. Paul's School at London (c); from whence he was sent to Christ's College in the University of Cambridge (d). He afterwards removed to Oxford, and spent several years in All-Souls College there (e). He went to Paris, where he made a great progress in learning under Budæus, Faber, Paulus Æmilius, Ruellus, and Francis Sylvius (f). Upon his return to England he entered into holy Orders, and became Chaplain and Antiquary to King Henry VIII (g), and Rector of Poppeling in the Marches of Calais. He was afterwards appointed Library-Keeper to his Majesty; and in 1533 had a Commission from him under the Broad Seal, whereby he was empowered to search after English Antiquities, and view the Libraries of all Cathedrals, Abbies, Priories, Colleges, &c. as also all places, wherein records, writings, and secrets of Antiquity were repositied. For this purpose having obtained in 1536 a dispensation for non-residence upon his Living of Poppeling, he spent above six years in travelling

(a) Balens, Script. illustr. Britann. Cent. 8. fol. 671.

(b) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 178.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Leland, de Scriptor. Britannicis, cap. 57.

(e) Guil. Burtoni Corollarium Vitæ Johanni Lelandi, prefixed to the first volume of Leland's Collectanea.

(f) Vita Joanni Lelandi, prefixed to Anthony Hall's edition of Leland. de Scriptoribus Britannicis, edit. Oxon. 1709.

(g) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 83.

[A] Learned writer.—His writings are as follow.

I. Næniæ in mortem Thomæ Viati Equitis incomparabilis. London 1542. It is a Latin poem of one sheet and an half in 4to. II. Genethliacon illustrissimi Eadwardi Principis Cambriæ, Ducis Cornitiæ, & Comitum Palatini, &c. Printed in 1543. It is a Latin Poem in four sheets in 4to. III. Syllabus & interpretatio antiquarum Dictionum, quæ passim per Libellum [prædictum] leetori occurrunt. Printed with the preceding piece. IV. Affertio inlyctissimi Arturii Regis Britannicæ. London 1544 in 4to. There is an English translation of this book, printed under this title: Ancient Order, Society and Untie laudable of Prince Arthur and his Knightly Armory of the Round Table; with a threefold Assertion &c. Englished from Leland by R. Robinson, 1583. V. Elenchus antiquorum Nominum. Printed with the Affertio abovementioned. VI. Cygnæ Cantio. London 1545. It is a Latin poem in about five sheets in 4to. It was reprinted at London 1658 in 8vo. VII. Commentarii in Cygnæam cantionem indices Britannicæ antiquitatis locupletissimi. Printed with the two editions of Cygnæ Cantio. VIII. Laudatio Pacis. London 1546. A Latin poem in two sheets in 4to. IX. A New Year's Gift to King Henry VIII. (37th year of his reign) concerning his laborious journey and search for England's Antiquities. London 1549 in 8vo. It was published with notes upon it by John Bale, who has added of his own, A Register of the Names of English Writers, whom the second part of his work de Scriptoribus Britannicæ, shall comprehend. X. Principum ac illustrium aliquot & eruditorum in Angliâ Virorum Encomia, Trophæa, Genethliaca, & Epithalamia, &c. London 1549 in 4to. Published by Thomas Newton of Cheshire. XI. Collectanea, Collections from various authors, viz. from Chronologies, ancient Charters, Leiger-books, Histories, Annals, publick and private Writings &c. written with Leland's own Hand, mostly in Latin, in folio. Mr. Wood tells us (1), "that

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 83.

(2) Præfatio in Lelandi Collectanea, Sect. 2. pag. 45.

"there are in this book many needless additions and illustrations put in by William Burton of Lindley, who hath written some part of the life of Leland before, and has made a useful Index to it." But Mr. Thomas Hearne (2) observes, that Mr. Wood's censure on Mr. Burton's additions is unjust, since they are taken from the best authors and monuments, and supply, correct, and illustrate Leland. "But this censure, says he, is not to be wondered at in Mr. Wood, who in other places passes rash judgments upon the writings of others." Quin & Burtono non tantum Vita Lelandi, e Baleo (antiquitatum Britannicarum diligentissimo perscrutatore) descripta, ejusque Corollarium à seipso Literis consignatum, verum etiam insignia illa è fenestris aliisque vetustatis reliquiis eruta, quæ cænobii aliquibus præfiguntur, adscribenda. Hæc omnia assumentia memoravit item Woodius in Athenis suis Oxoniensibus. In illo tamen cespitavit, quod flocci æstimanda esse subindicaverit. Ex optimis etenim auctoribus ac monumentis sunt desumpta, Lelandumque suppleant, corrigunt, & illustrant: sed hanc Woodii censuram non est cur miremur, quum alibi etiam minus considerate de aliorum scriptis pronuntiaverit. Mr. Hearne published these Collectanea in six volumes at Oxford 1715 in 8vo. under the following title: Joannis Landi Anti- quarii de Rebus Britannicis Collectanea. Ex autographis descriptis ediditque Tho. Hearne, A. M. Oxoniensis, qui & Appendicem subjecit, totumque opus (in VI Volumina distributum) Notis & Indice donavit. XII. Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis, auctore Joanne Lelando Londinate. Ex Autographo Lelandino nunc primus edidit Antonius Hall, A. M. Coll. Reg. Oxon. Socius. Oxford 1709 in two Tomes in 8vo. The Editor in his preface observes, that Leland designed to have written four Books concerning the illustrious men of Britain, but was prevented by death from finishing and publishing them. He informs us likewise, that Dr. Thomas Gale had an intention to have published this work, and to have illustrated it by the means of that of Boston of Bury. And the same design was undertaken by Dr. Thomas Tanner, the late Bishop of St. Asaph. XIII. An Itinerary throughout most parts of England: a manuscript in 4to. Mr. Harrison in page 63 of his second edition of his Description of Britain writes of this work thus: For so moth-eaten, mouldie, and rotten are those books of Leland, which I have, and beside that his Annotations are such and so confounded, as no man can (in a manner) pick out any sense from them by a leaf together. Wherefore I suppose, that he dispersed and made his Notes intricate of set purpose; or else he was such that anie man should easily come to that knowledge by reading, which he with his great charge and no less travell attained unto by experience.

But Mr. Hearne (3) remarks upon this passage: "This great Antiquary [Leland] was of a noble, generous, and publick spirit, and could not be guilty of any such pitiful, mean trick, as this, which is mentioned by Harrison, who methinks should have studiously avoided all unbecoming reflections upon so great a man, from whom he borrowed the most valuable and most judicious passages in his said Description of Britain, his own remarks being generally very mean and trivial. . . . Nor do I think, that Harrison would have spoke contemptuously of these papers, had it not been out of a design to advance the credit of his own observations; which is a crime that some of our modern writers have been guilty of, when they have had occasion to speak of Leland." Mr. Hearne published an edition of our author's Itinerary at Oxford in 9 volumes in 8vo. XIV. Codrui, sive Laus & Defensio Gallofridi Arturii Monumetensis contra Polydorum Vergilium: printed by Mr. Hearne in the fifth volume of Leland's Collectanea. XV. Ἐγκώμιον τῆς εἰρήνης, sive Laudatio Pacis; printed by Mr. Hearne in the fifth volume of the Collectanea. XVI. Bonia Gallo-Mastix in laudem victoria felicissimi Henrici VIII. Anglici, Francici, Scotici, &c. reprinted by Mr. Hearne in the sixth volume of the Collectanea. Bale and Pits mention other writings of our author; whose manuscripts and collections were, after his death, by order of King Edward VI, put into the hands of Sir John Cheke, Tutor to his Majesty, who not long after gave the four volumes of his Collectanea to Humphry Purefoy Esq; afterwards of the Privy Council to Queen Elizabeth in the North; whose son Thomas Purefoy of Barwell in Leicestershire Esq; giving them to Mr. Will. Burton of Lindley in the same County in 1612, they came many years travelling about England, and collecting Antiquities. At the time of the dissolution of the monasteries, he saw with great regret what havock was made of antient monuments of learning; and that, if no remedy should be taken, they would all perish. Upon this he wrote a letter to Secretary Cromwell dated July the 16th for his assistance in bringing to light many antient authors, and in sending them to the King's Library; adding, that "it would be a great profit to Students, and honour to this Realm; whereas now the Germans perceiving our desidiousness and negligency, do send daily young scholars hither, that spoileth them, and cutteth them out of Libraries, returning home, and putting them abroad as monuments of their own country." April the 3d 1542 he was presented to the Rectory of Hasely near Oxford; and in the beginning of April 1543 was preferred by the King to a Canonry of King's College, now Christ-Church in Oxford; and about the same time he was collated to the Prebend of East Knoll and West Knoll near Salisbury in Wiltshire. But he lost the Canonry in Christ Church in 1545, upon the surrender of that College to the King, and instead thereof had no pension allowed him, as the other Canons had, but preferment elsewhere. At last having made a vast collection of Antiquities, he retired to his house in the parish of St. Michael le Querne in London; "where spending about six years more in composing such books as he had promised to the King, he did at length (upon a foresight that he was not able to perform his promise, or, as the Roman Catholics say, that he had degenerated from the antient Religion) fall distracted and lost his senses." This his distemper being made known to the King and his Council, King Edward VI; by his Letters Patents dated March the 5th 1550, granted the custody of him by the name of John Laylond Junior of St. Michael's Parish in le Querne, Clerk, to his brother John Laylond Senior, and for his maintenance to receive the profits of Hasely, Poppeling, East Knoll and West Knoll abovementioned (b). He died April the 18th 1552 (i), and was interred in the Church of St. Michael le Querne (k). He was universally esteemed an excellent Orator and Poet, and was well skilled in the Greek, Latin, French, Italian, Spanish, British, Saxon, Welch, and Scottish tongues (l). His enemies, as Polydore Virgil, Dr. John Caius, &c. used to represent him as a vain-glorious person, who promised more than he was able to perform; and others said, that his poetical wit made him so conceited, that it was the chief cause of his pbrensy (m).

(3) Notes on Mr. Wood's Life of John Leland, prefixed to the 1st volume of his edition of Leland's Collectanea.

(b) Idem, ibid. col. 82, 83.

(i) Balzrus, ubi supra.

(k) Burtonus, ubi supra.

(l) Nicholson's English Hist. Library, Part 2. pag. 226.

(m) Wood, Art. Oxon. col. 83.

years after by his gift, when he had made use of them in compiling his Description of Leicestershire, into the Bodleian library at Oxford, together with the Itinerary. As for other of his collections, they came after the death of Sir John Cheke into the hands of William Lord Paget and Sir William Cecil, but to whom from them, does not appear. Perhaps among these collections were those, which came afterwards into Sir Robert Cotton's hands, and the Itinerary, which came into the possession of Mr. Burton. Camden made a considerable use of his collections in the writing of his Britannia (4); as Sir William Dugdale has likewise done in compiling his Antiquities of Warwickshire and his Baronage of England. John Bale was also greatly assisted in his book de Scriptoribus Britanniae by our author's work on the same subject. Mr. John Bagford in a letter to Mr. Hearne relating to the antiquities of London, and dated at the Charter-House, Feb. 1. 1713, and prefixed to the first Volume of Mr. Hearne's edition of Leland's Collectanea, observes, that what had been formerly done by Leland with respect to the antiquities of London, "seems now to be lost, though it must be owned, that many authors, that have written of the antiquities of England since his time, have made frequent use of his works, he alone laying the foundation of what hath since been discovered. For I do not in the least question, but that most of his writings, after his death, first came into the hands of Reginald Wolfe, the Printer, at whose house, I believe, Leland died, which was at that time situated in the Parish of St. Michael in the Querne, though afterwards he removed into the Parish of St. Faith's. I take this Wolfe to have been one of the first builders of a house in St. Paul's Church-yard, and to have been not only the first projector of the two Tomes of the Chronicles of England (which commonly go under the name of Raphael Hollinshead and William Harrison) out of Leland; but also to have been the first designer of a large map of England by the sketches he had taken from Leland's New year's gift; though nothing of the like nature was afterwards done till the time of

(4) See Ralph Brook's Discovery of Errors in Camden's Britannia.

Saxton in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The second edition of Hollinshead is continued by John Stow; and I must be so free in my thoughts to tell you, that (to say nothing of what Camden borrowed from him) it is my opinion, that Stow had in his possession Leland's antiquities of London, and for want of Learning most grievously mangled the work on purpose to make it his own. This hint I have taken partly from the benefit of your last conversation, when you was pleased to read to me what Leland has upon the same subject; and partly from my own reflection upon the Qualifications of Stow, who certainly was not capable of making such a collection; and therefore I cannot but conclude that he must have been beholden to Leland; which I think is likewise confirmed from hence, that in his Survey of London he makes very little mention of Leland, although in his Annals he often takes notice of him. I had formerly, continues Mr. Bagford, a much greater veneration for Stow, before you acquainted me, that Leland had wrote the antiquities of this city, (of which he was a native) under the Britains, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, and so down to the time himself lived in; by which work we might have seen what discoveries he had made from antient authors, most of which are since lost, and might likewise have had the benefit of divers useful remarks, grounded upon his own observations on the antient buildings of the Romans in this famous City; which remarks could not be expected from Mr. Stow, who was little acquainted with the Coins and other antiquities of the Romans. The best account we have from him is that relating to Monumental inscriptions in Churches; which brings to my mind a folio Manuscript, I have seen, of those in Christ-church (formerly the Gray-Friars) within New-Gate, which were not inserted in the first impression of the Survey. I gather from the hand, that this very book was collected by Leland; and it happened therefore very luckily, that the inscriptions in it were afterwards added in the edition set out by Stow.

T

LEMNIUS (LÆVINUS) a famous Physician, was born at Ziric-Zee in Zekand, the 20th of May 1505. One of his chief works is that de occultis Naturæ

(a) See the Epist. Dedicat. to de occultis Naturæ Miraculis of the second, and succeeding editions.

tura Miraculis [A]. WILLIAM LEMNIUS his son practised Physic successfully, for which reason Eric King of Sweden sent for him to his Court, and appointed him his first Physician (a). He adhered with so much fidelity to this Prince, that he was thrown into prison, and was put to death in 1568 when Eric was dethroned (b).

(b) Melchior Adam. in Vit. Medicor. p. 100.

(1) That which I make use of is of Frankfort 1593 in 8vo, ap. Job. Wechel. It is enlarg'd with some chapters; and there is annexed to the treatise de Vita cum

[A] One of his chief works is that De occultis Naturæ Miraculis. It has borne several impressions. Several editions (1) of it are mentioned in Lindenijs renovatus; but no notice is there taken of the first, which was that of Antwerp apud Gulielmum Simonem 1559 8vo. The work consisted then but of two books; and was dedicated, by the author, to Matthias animi & corporis incolumitate recte instituenda, then first published.

Gallomontanus ab Heeswuijk, apud Metellburgum Antistes. The second edition, printed by Plantin, at Antwerp in the year 1564, in 8vo, contains four books; and was dedicated, by the author, to Eric King of Sweden. We are told in the preface, that Lemnius intended to add two books more to the four in question.

LEMNOS, an island in the Ægean Sea, near Thrace, and Mount Athos [A], was famous on many accounts. It was so called from the great Goddess named Lemnos, and to whom young maidens were sacrificed (a). The Sinti, a people of Thrace, were the first who inhabited it (b). There were but two cities in it, the one called Hephæstia, and the other Myrina (c). Its labyrinth was one of the four edifices of that kind, mentioned by the ancients [B]. The inhabitants of Lemnos were the first who forged weapons of war (d); which doubtless was one of the reasons which obliged the Poets to feign that Vulcan, being precipitated from heaven to earth, fell into this island, where he met with a very kind reception, and set up a forge (e) [C]. The place where he fell was remarkable [F].

(a) Steph. Byzant. Vocæ Ἀστυνοσ.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Plinius, lib. 4. pag. m. 461.

(d) Hellenicus, apud Scholiast. Apollonius in lib. 1. ver. 608. & Scholiastes Homeri in Iliad. lib. 2. ver. 594.

(e) See the close of the remark [F].

(1) Plin. lib. 4. pag. m. 161. juxta editionem Harduini.

(2) Solin. cap. 11. pag. 31.

(3) Belon, Observat. de pluribus singularibus, lib. 1. chap. 26. pag. 58, 59.

(4) Our Geographers generally assign 2500 paces to a common French league.

(5) Plut. de facie in orbe Luna, pag. 935, F. Note, Mr. Bayle made use of Amyot's version on this occasion.

(6) Salmf. in Solinum, pag. m. 184.

[A] Near . . . mount Athos. A great number of authors have observed, that the shadow of this mountain extends as far as the island of Lemnos. Lemnos ab Atho LXXXVII. mill. passuum. Circuitu patet CXII. M. D. pass. Oppida habet, Hephæstiam & Myrinam, in cujus forum solstitio Athos ejaculatur umbram (1). i. e. "Lemnos is fourscore and seven miles from Athos, and an hundred and twelve miles in circumference. Hephæstia and Myrina are its towns, into whose Forum Athos projects its shadow, at the "Solstice." We find by these words of Pliny, that mount Athos was 87 miles from the island of Lemnos, and Solinus supposes it but a mile less (2). However, this does not agree with the observations of Belon, an eye-witness, and consequently more worthy of credit than Pliny. I will copy his words. "The island is "more extended in length than in breadth, from "East to West; so that when the sun sets, the shadow "of mount Athos, which stands above eight leagues "from thence, falls on the harbour, and over a point "of the island, on the left side of Lemnos, a circum- "stance we observed the 2d of June: for mount Athos "is so high, that though the sun was not very low, "nevertheless the shadow touched the left angle of the "island (3)." Here is a testimony that ought to persuade us, that the ancients had reason to extend the shadow of this mountain, as far as the island of Lemnos, but that they were not well acquainted with the measure of that extent. The distance would be about thirty five French leagues (4), were we to compute according to the eighty seven miles of Pliny. But how great a subtraction must we make, since Belon speaks of only a little above eight leagues? We will here quote a passage which will shew that Plutarch had committed the same mistake as Pliny. I am sensible that neither of us has been in the isle of Lemnos; yet both of us have frequently heard the following verses:

Mount Athos shall project its mighty shade,
And screen the ox, in Lemnos's island fix'd.

For the shadow of this mountain reaches to the statue of a brazen ox standing in Lemnos, extending itself over the sea no less than seven hundred stadia; not that the mountain which projects the shadow is of that height as to cause it; but because the distance of the light makes the shadow of bodies many times greater than the bodies themselves (5). Plutarch's 700 stadia make 87500 paces; he consequently makes the interval or distance greater than either Pliny or Solinus. According to Apollonius, it was equal to the space that a ship can sail from day-break to noon. Salmasius proves that, according to the usual computation of the ancient Geographers, this signifies two hundred and fifty stadia (6); whence we may infer, that Apollonius lessened, by more than one half, which the other authors compleat between mount Athos and the island of Lemnos, and that he yet supposes it much greater than Belon found it; eight French leagues containing but one hundred and sixty stadia. Note Apollonius observes, that the shadow of mount Athos extended as far as the city of Myrina.

Ἡμεῖς δὲ νοσημένωσι κ' ἴδω ἀνιέλλοι καλῶν
Θρηκίῃ, ἢ τόσσον ἀπέσπερον ἄλλοι ἴδωσι,
Ὅσσοι ἐς ἴσθμον καὶ ἰὺς ἄλῃ δὲλας ἀνίσταται,
Ἀερετάτη κορυφῇ σκιάει, π' ἰσάχη μυρίνης (7).

(7) Apoll. Argon. lib. 1. ver. 601. pag. m. 61.

"Then, as they sail'd, by the still doubtful light,
"They spied the Thracian Athos, which projects
"A shade quite to Myrina, in fam'd Lemnos,
"Whose shores the swiftest ship can scarce attain,
"E're mighty Sol has run through half his course.

Salmasius (8) quotes Stephanus Byzantinus (9) to shew, that according to Pliny and Solinus, the shadow of mount Athos could not have extended as far as the island of Lemnos. He objects to them that, according to this writer, the shadow did not extend above 300 stadia; but he might have refuted them in a more solid manner, as well as many others, by the testimony of Peter Belon.

(8) Salmf. in Solin. pag. 184.

(9) Steph. Byzant. Vocæ Ἀστυνοσ.

[B] Its labyrinth was one of the four edifices of that kind, mentioned by the ancients. The three others were, that of Egypt, that of the island of Crete, and that which King Porfenna built in Tuscany (10). De Ægyptio & Cretico labyrinthis, satis dictum est. Lemnius similis illis, columnis tantum centum quinquaginta mirabilior fuit: quarum in officina turbines ita librati pependunt, ut puero circumagente tornarentur. Architecti illum facere Zmilus & Rholus, & Theodorus indigena. Exstantque adhuc reliquæ ejus, cum Cretici Italique nulla vestigia essent. i. e. According to Pined's version; "So much for the labyrinths of Egypt "and Candy (Crete). That of Stalimene (*) was the "same, except that it had an hundred and fifty marble columns more than the rest, which had been so "artfully turned, that a child used to turn the wheel "which formed them; so finely polished were the "irons and axes that supported them. By the way, "it is said that Zmilus, Rholus, and Theodorus, all "natives of the said island, built the labyrinth in "question, of which some footsteps are still remaining; and yet not the least traces of that of Candy "or of Tuscany are found." This translator supposes, that the three architects who raised this labyrinth were Lemnians; but the original affirms this only of Theodorus, who perhaps is the same who wrote a book concerning a Temple of Juno. Est is fortassis quem de æde Dorica Junonis quæ est Sami, commentarium condidisse Vitruvius prodidit in præfatione libri 7. pag. 124 (11).

(10) Plin. lib. 36. cap. 13. pag. m. 305.

(*) Lemnos inf.

[C] Vulcan . . . fell into this island . . . and set up a forge. Some authors relate that Jupiter threw him headlong; and that had not the Lemnians held out their arms to him, whilst he was coming down through the

(11) Harduin. in Plinium, lib. 34. cap. 13. pag. m. 305.

remarkable for a kind of earth that was endued with great virtues; and it cured Philoctetes when bit by a serpent [D]. The Poets have very much sung the displeasing stay he made

(12) Lucian, do Sacrific. pag. 354. tom. 1.

(13) Homer, Iliad. lib. 18. ver. 396. pag. m. 556.

(14) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. ver. 591.

the air, he would have been killed (12). But he himself says in Homer, that Juno precipitated him, and that Eurynome and Thetis, the daughters of Oceanus, caught him, and saved his life (13). He declares in another part of the Iliad (14), that Jupiter took him by the foot, and threw him out of heaven; and that having taken up a whole day in falling, he fell into the island of Lemnos at sun-set; that he was almost dead, and that the inhabitants took him up. Homer, it will be objected, should have been a little more careful not to contradict himself; but what he says does not imply a contradiction, he only relating two different adventures. Valerius Flaccus supposes that Vulcan fell on the shore of Lemnos; that the inhabitants ran the instant they heard his voice, and furnished him with every thing he wanted, so that he retained, from that time, a great affection for this island.

Jam summis Vulcania surgit Lemnos aquis, tibi per varios defleta labores Ignipotens; nec te Furiis & crimine matrum Terra, fugæ meritique piget meminisse prioris. Tempore quo primum fremidus insurgere operios Cœlicolium, & regni sensit novitate tumentes Jupiter, ætheriæ nec stare silentia pænis: Junonem volucris primam suspendit Olympo. Horrendum chaos ostendens, pernamque baratri. Mox etiam pavida tentantem vincula matris Solvere, prærupti Vulcanum vertice cæli Devolvit: ruit ille polo, noctemque diemque Turbinis in morem; Lemni cum litore tandem Insouit: vox inde repens ut perculit urbem, Acclivem scopulo inveniunt, miserentique sœventque Alternos agro cunctantem poplite gressus. Hinc reduci, superas postquam pater amovit arces, Lemnos cara deo; nec fama notior Ætnæ Aut Lipares domus (15).

(15) Valer. Flaccus, Argon. lib. 2. ver. 78. pag. m. 91.

“ High above th’ abyss Vulcanian Lemnos rises,
“ By thee, great God of fire, thro’ various toils
“ Full long deplor’d; nor grieves it thee, O land,
“ To call to mind his flight, and wonted merit,
“ When secret murmurs rose, and the Gods arm’d;
“ When fierce rebellion brav’d almighty Jove;
“ Shook his bright throne, and broke the peace of “ Heaven.
“ Jove first suspended Juno from Olympus,
“ And, to her aching eye, disclos’d dread Chaos
“ And all the tortures of the infernal shades.
“ Then Vulcan, who strove to unbind the chains
“ Of his affrighted mother, next he seiz’d,
“ And hurl’d him from the skies; swift round and “ round
“ He fell, both night and day, till down he dropt
“ On Lemnos isle; and when his mournful voice
“ Had reach’d the neighbouring town, the gazing “ crouds
“ Reclin’d against a rock, when mov’d to pity,
“ They soon consol’d him, lam’d by the dread fall.
“ Vulcan restor’d to Heaven, and recollecting
“ The courtesies the Lemnians had indulg’d him,
“ Their isle he favours; Lemnos not inferior
“ To Lipare, or Ætna.”

Homer affirms, that no country in the world was so dear to Vulcan as Lemnos.

Εἶσαρ Ἴριον ἐς Λήμνον ἐκκλίμασεν ἀπολιθῶρον,
Ἡ οἱ γυναικῶν πρὸς Φιλιάτῃ ἐστὶν ἀπασιών (16).

(16) Homer. Odyss. lib. 8. ver. 283. pag. m. 230.

Simulabat se iterum in Lemnum pulchrè fabricatum oppidum,
Quod illi terrarum multè charissimum est omnium.

We will now mention a circumstance, which shews the long duration of the most fabulous traditions. Belon who travelled in Turkey in the year 1548, says, “ that there is no inhabitant of Lemnos but knows something relating to Vulcan. And in like manner as the little children of the island of Corfula will relate the history of the Dolphin, as though it “ happened but a little before; so every body in the island of Lemnos relates the adventures of Vulcan, “ but differently; for some say that he and his horse “ broke their thighs by a fall; and that he was speedily cured by the virtue of the earth on which he “ fell (17).”

[D] The place where he fell was remarkable for a kind of earth that was endued with great virtues, and it cured Philoctetes when bit by a serpent.] Philostratus relates an incident that differs greatly from the common tradition. He says that Philoctetes did not suffer in Lemnos the bitter pains which have been so much spoke of. This brave man, adds he (18), “ was “ instantly cured by the Lemnian earth, which is taken “ from the very spot where Vulcan fell antiently from “ heaven; for that earth has the virtue to soothe and “ heal all kinds of violent and furious diseases, and to “ stop all bloody fluxes; but it does not cure the bite “ of serpents except that of the hydra.” Here follow some particulars which I extract from the observations of Peter Belon, who travelled into that country about the middle of the sixteenth century. “ The antients, “ says he (19), had a kind of earth that was accounted an “ excellent remedy for many diseases, and is at this “ day as much used as ever. The Latins call it Terra “ Lemnia, or Terra sigillata, and the French Terre “ sellée. This earth is so great a rarity, that those “ Embassadors who return from Turkey, generally “ bring some of it away, in order to make presents of “ it to persons of high distinction; it being good, “ among other properties, against the plague and “ defluxions of every kind. Druggists indeed sell “ what is called Terra sigillata, but it is generally “ adulterated; the island of Lemnos being the only “ country where it is to be found.” He gives (20)

(17) Belon, Observat. lib. 1. chap. 29. pag. 68.

(18) Philostrat. in Heroicis. N. B. Mr. Bayle makes use of Vigenere’s translation, tom. 2. folio 253. edit. 4to.

(19) Belon, Observat. lib. 1. chap. 22. p. 51.

(20) Ibid.

the figure of several seals which are employed to mark that earth, and adds (21), “ that the whole crew of “ a ship which was come from Lemnos to Constanti- “ nople, assured him, that it was impossible to get any “ except by the Under-Bashaw of the island; and that “ those who were desirous of seeing it in its natural “ state must go thither, the inhabitants being forbid “ to export any, on pain of losing their heads. They “ declared farther, that if any of the inhabitants “ should sell only a small cake of it, or any was found “ in his house unknown to the Governor, he was fined “ a large sum of money; for no person is allowed to “ distribute or give any except the Under-Bashaw in “ question, who farms the island, and pays a tribute “ for it to the Grand Signior.” Belon got himself “ conducted to the place whence that earth is taken, and “ saw nothing but an oblique hole (22), that was stopped; “ and it was impossible for him to get it opened, that “ being done but once a year, the 6th of August, on “ which occasion great ceremonies are observed and prepa- “ rations made. “ This earth, continues Belon (23), “ shews how greatly ceremonies inhanse the value of “ things that are mean, and inconsiderable in them- “ selves; for notwithstanding that the earth in question “ is endued with such great virtue, yet was it so common “ that any person might go and procure any of it, it “ would be despised, were it not for the great cere- “ monies I speak of: so that if any other vein of earth, “ like that of Cochino, had been found in another “ part of the island in question, I do not doubt but “ that the Greeks would scruple to use it, unless the “ () Caloyers had been present at the digging it, and () Greek “ performed the usual ceremonies; and though they “ had got some from Cochino abovementioned, they “ yet would scruple to use, or give it to other people, “ had it not been dug the sixth of August: they ima- “ gining that part of its virtue proceeds from the cere- “ monies which are practised by men on those occa- “ sions; and would even think that it had no virtue, “ unless they themselves saw it dug up.” Nothing can “ be more judicious than these observations of Be- “ lon, who gives the two examples following. “ There “ are great quantities of the Iris’s growing on the “ mountains of Macedonia, and were to be sold at a “ dear price; yet it was thought that no persons “ should be allowed to gather it but such as were “ chaite

(21) Ibid. chap. 23. pag. 54.

(22) Ibid. chap. 28. pag. 63.

(23) Ibid. chap. 29. pag. 65.

(*) Greek Monks.

made in the island of Lemnos [E], whilst the Greeks were besieging Troy. Some other reasons gave rise to the fiction I related concerning Vulcan; for it was said, that in antient times strong flames used often to issue from the ground in the island of Lemnos [F], and particularly on the summit of Mount Moschylus. Two massacres were perpetrated in that island, which gave occasion to some proverbs (f). The first of those massacres is that which I mentioned under the article HYPPIPYLE; and this country would in a certain time have been quite depopulated, had not the Argonauts prevented it. The women had murdered all the men, and did not intend to give a reception to the first comers; for hearing that a vessel was come to their island, they ran armed to the shore, fully determined to oppose the invasion (g); but when they found these were not

(f) See Erasmus's Civil. Cent. 9. num. 27. and Civil. 2. Cent. 10. num. 44.

(g) Apollon. Agon. lib. 1. ver. 633.

" chaste; and that the earth must be sprinkled, three months before with holy-water, in order to pacify it. And several other ceremonies, which Theophrastus has described, were to be practised (24)." He then takes some notice of the antient ceremonies relating to the earth of Lemnos. "As early as Dioscorides, who wrote before Galen, it was a custom to mix he-goat's blood with earth, in order to make cakes of it. The reader is to know, that some ceremonies used to be performed in killing the he-goats consecrated to Venus, who, as the fables relate, makes the Lemnian women smell rank like goats; and their husbands having expressed a disgust at them, they all, with one common consent, killed all the men in that island. For this reason, the Priests used to seal those cakes with a seal on which was the image of a goat, whence they took their Greek name Spragida egos, which signifies a goat's seal... Galen being desirous to know the truth of what was related concerning this earth, as he returned from Troy, called then Alexandria, a colony inhabited by the Romans, in his way to Rome, he past by Lemnos, and enquired whether they still had the custom of mixing goat's blood with earth before it was sealed. But he being on the very spot in question, in Lemnos, found that this custom had been laid aside. He gives an account of what was performed when he was there; and relates that a Priestess threw, here and there, some wheat and barley on the ground, and practised certain other ceremonies according to the custom of that country; after which she filled a waggon with this earth, and had it carried with her into the city of Hephæstia. Galen relates this, and much more, which we will not relate for brevity sake (25)." With regard to the modern ceremonies, he tells us, what had been confirmed to him by above six hundred men, who had seen them solemnized all their life-time. "The chief persons both Greeks and Turks, with their Priests and Friars, meet together. The Greeks then go to the little chapel called Sotira, and there solemnizing Mass, after the Grecian manner, accompanied with prayers, they all go together accompanied by the Turks, and ascend the hill which is but two bow-shot from the chapel; and cause the earth to be dug up, by fifty or threecore men, till they have found out the vein, and are come to it; and when they are got to the earth, the Greek Monks fill small bags with it made of beast's skins, and these they give to the Under-Bashaw or Vayvod; and when they have taken enough for that time, the diggers immediately close or shut up the earth; after which the Under-Bashaw sends the greatest part of the earth that was taken up to the Grand Signior at Constantinople, and sells the rest to Merchants... Those who are present when the earth is drawn out of its vein, may every one take a little for their respective uses, but dare not sell it. The Turks are less scrupulous than the Greeks and many other nations. They suffer the Greek Christians to say their prayers on the sealed earth in their presence, and they themselves joy with them. And if what the oldest inhabitants relate be true, the custom of selecting one day only in the year, was introduced at the time that the Venetians were possessed of Lemnos, and the islands of the Ægean sea (26)." Stephen Albaricus, whom Busbequius sent purposely into the island of Lemnos, in order that he might inform himself of all those particulars, was more fortunate than Belon, he assisting in the ceremonies. See the relation he wrote of it to that illustrious Ambassador. See also the Egea rediviva, à sua Chorographia dell' Archipelago of

(24) Ibid. pag. 66.

(25) Ibid.

(26) Belon, Observat. liv. 1. chap. 29. pag. 67.

Francis Placentia, Professor of Geography at Modena (27).

Pliny (28) gives a long account of the virtues of the Terra sigillata of Lemnos, but he takes it to be a kind of vermilion, and confounds it with a red chalk which was dug in the same island. See Salmastius (29). The reader will meet with many particulars in Chapter III, Book III, Tom. II, of Lewis Guyon, [E] The Poets have very much sung the displeasing stay he made in the island of Lemnos. Some relate that the Greeks sent him thither, because Vulcan's Priests could cure the bite of serpents. Neque multo post Philocteta cum paucis ubi curaretur in Lemnum insulam mittitur, namque in ea sacri Vulcani antistes inhabitare ab accolis dicebantur solim mederi adversum venena hujusmodi (30). He was left there till the end of the siege of Troy, and he bore with extreme impatience the rigours of his condition.

(27) This work is mentioned in the Acta Erudit. for Oct. 1688, pag. 521.

(28) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 6.

(29) Salmast. in Solin. pag. 1157.

(30) Diogenes Cretensis, lib. 2. pag. m. 171. See also Eustathius in Book 2. Iliad.

*Non te, Pœantia proles,
Expositum Lemnos nostro cum crimine haberet,
Qui nunc (ut memorant) sylvæstribus abditus antris,
Saxa movet gemitu, Lærtiadeque precaris
Quæ meruit, quæ (si dii sunt) non vana precaris.
Et nunc ille eadem nobis juratus in arma,
(Heu!) pars una ducum, quo successore sagittæ
Herculis utuntur, fractus morboque fameque
Venaturque aliturque avibus, volucresque petendo
Debita Trojanis excurret spicula satis* (31).

(31) Ovid. Mæs. lib. 13. ver. 45.

" Nor Philoctetes had been left inclos'd
" In a bare isle, to wants and pains expos'd,
" Where to the rocks with solitary groans,
" His sufferings and our baseness he bemoans;
" And wishes (so may Heaven his wish fulfill)
" The due reward to him who caus'd his ill.
" Now he, with us to Troy's destruction sworn,
" Our brother of the war, by whom are borne
" Alcides's arrows pent in narrow bounds,
" With cold and hunger pinch'd, and pain'd with
" wounds,
" To find him food and cloathing, must employ
" Against the birds the shafts due to the fate of
" Troy." DRYDEN.

The Tragic Poets displayed all their eloquence on this occasion. Read the following words from Tully (32). Turpe putandum est non dico dolere (nam id quidem est interdum necesse) sed saxum illud Lemnium clamore Philoctetes funestare.

(32) Cicero, lib. 2. de finib. cap. 29.

Quod ejulatu, questu, gemitu, fremitibus Resonando mutum flebiles voces refert.

i. e. " It ought to be looked upon as shameful, I do not say to grieve, this being indeed necessary sometimes, but to be for ever wailing like Philoctetes's Lemnian rock;

" Which, with deep wailings, bitter sighs and groans
" Loud echoing, utters mournful sounds, tho' mute."

See also Sophocles's Tragedy entitled Philoctetes.

[F] Strong flames used often to issue from the ground in the island of Lemnos. Eustathius mentions this as the reason why it was feigned that Vulcan fell into that island. "Οτι ωπ' εν τω νηδου ανηδωτο πορε αυουμαρω (33). i. e. " Because antiently fire used to issue spontaneously from the ground in that island." The Scholiast on Lycophron, quoting Hellanicus's book of the foundation of Chios, relates, that the invention

(33) Eustat. in lib. 1. Iliad.

the Thracians their enemies coming to attack them, and that the vessel in question belonged to the Argonauts, they shewed them all manner of kindness; and told those brave men that they should have leave to come on shore, provided they would promise, upon oath, to lie with them [G]. The Argonauts accepted of the condition, and fulfilled it in so delightful a manner, that one would have concluded they had laid aside all thoughts of fire and arms, was owing to the falling of lightning on a tree, in the island of Lemnos. This he says on some words of Lycophron, where the fire is called Lemnian (34). Almost the same things have been related of mount Mosychlus as of Ætna. See Hesychius and Nicander and the Scholiast on the latter, with the verses he quotes from Antimachus (35), and do not forget the following of Seneca.

(34) Ἰνσουλῶν γαῖα λημνίων πυρῆ. Comburens artus ignis Lemnio. Lycophr. ver. 227.

(35) They are in Bochart. Geog. Sacr. lib. I. cap. 12. pag. m. 432.

(36) Seneca in Hercule Octavo, ver. 1360.

Quæ tanta nubes flamma Sicilian bibit?
Quæ Lemnos ardens? quæ plaga igniferi palmi
Vetans flagranti currere in zona diem (36).

“ What are these flames that drink Sicilian clouds?
“ Say, is this fiery Lemnos? What burning clime
“ In heav’n’s high arch, not suffering the day
“ To run its course around the flaming zone.

At this rate it might well be said that Vulcan had forged in the island of Lemnos. Ἐν τῇ λῆμνῳ τὰ εὖ ἠφαισὺν ἰργασίην (37). In Lemno Vulcani fabriles Officina

(37) Schol. Sophocl. in Philoet. ver. 1000.

[G] Provided they would promise, upon oath, to lie with them. As this circumstance is contrary to the decorum which Poets commonly observe in their relations, it will be proper for me to produce a proof for it, in the words of the original. The Greek passage therefore is as follows: Αἰσχρόν ἐστιν ἡλικίᾳ ἐν ὄπλοις φρεσὶ αὐτῆς ἀποδιδόναι χερμαζομένοις τοῖς Ἀργοναύταις, μέχρις ἢ ὄρου ἰθαλοῦ παρ’ αὐτῶν ἀποδοῦναι μνηστῆρας αὐτῆς. Σοφκλῆς δὲ ἐν Ἀημιῶνι καὶ μάχῃ ἰσχυρῶν αὐτῆς συνέψαι φρεσὶ (38). These words signify, that the Lemnian women took up arms; and would not leave off threatening the Argonauts buffeted by the storm, till they had sworn that they would lie with them. Euripides even says, that they really fought with great vigour. This incident cannot appear probable to any but those who well weigh the circumstances; but if we consider, on one hand, that these women in question had destroyed all the males who were in the island; and, on the other, that they resolved on such a massacre, merely because their husbands, unable to bear with their ill smells, had got concubines (39), the thing will appear extremely probable. One cannot wonder that the Lemnian women should have been so indiscreetly forward in their advances, and that the Argonauts should have discovered so little tenderness and gallantry. The military dress and warlike air of these women, was far from being alluring objects. The reflexion on the massacre they had just before perpetrated on their fathers, husbands, sons, and brothers, was adapted to inspire no other passion but horror. Besides, the consideration of the motive of this slaughter, must necessarily have proved an obstacle to the love, with which the Argonauts might otherwise have been fired for them; and this motive was no other but the distaste of the Lemnians, arising from the ill smell of the Lemnians, which proceeded from their breath; but some are of opinion, that it came from their armpits, which was commonly call, to smell rank; and the antients, to smell like a be-goat. Laërtius, on the fifth book of Statius’s Thebaid, follows this opinion; he calling the smell of the Lamniades, hircinum odorem, a goatish smell. Dion Chrysostom says also to the same purpose, in his 33d oration, Ἀημιῶν τῆς γυναικὸς τὸ Ἀφροδίτῃ ἰργασίῃσιν ἄγλυτοι ἀποδιδόναι τοῖς μνηστῆρας. As he related that Venus, being exasperated against

(38) Scholiast. Apollon. in lib. I. ver. 773. pag. m. 79.

(39) See the remark [A] of the article HYPSPYLE.

(40) Meziriac on Ovid’s Epistles, pag. 557, 558.

the wives of the Lemnians, infected their arm-pits (40). All things duly weighed, one may easily perceive that the antients did not transgress the laws of verisimilitude, in supposing that it was with reluctance, Jason’s companions could be prevailed upon to promise, upon the Lemnian shoar, what they would have asked for, and offered, in other places. The women who parleyed with them, deserved to be told what was said by Catullus against one Rufus, who was surprized to meet with none but cruel fair-ones.

Noli admirari, quare tibi fœmina nulla
Rufe, velit tenerum supposuisse femur:
Non illam raris labefactis munere vestis,
Aut perluciduli deliciis lapidis.
Lædis te quædam mala fabula, qua tibi fertur
Valle sub alarum trux habitare caper.
Hunc metuant omnes: neque mirum, nam mala valde est
Bestia, nec quicum bella puella cubet.
Quare aut crudelem vasorum interfice pestem:
Aut admirari desine, quæ fugiunt (41).

(41) Catul. Epig. 70. pag. m. 157.

The sense is
“ O Rufus, wonder not, if all the fair
“ Refuse to listen to thy fond Devoirs:
“ They are not won with the gay charms of dress,
“ Nor with the diamond’s ever-sparkling Rays.
“ A certain evil rumour says that Thou “ Beneath thy Arm-pits hid’st a cruel Goat;
“ This frightens every one; and who can wonder
“ That each bright Nymph should constantly refuse “ To take so foul a Beast to her embraces.
“ Therefore, or kill the stench that so offends them,
“ Or cease to wonder why they ever fly thee.

Ovid said

Quam sæpe admonui ne trux caper iret in alas,
Neve forent duris aspera crura pilis! (*)

(*) Ovid. de Arte Amandi, lib. 3. ver. 193.

That is

“ I need not warn you of too powerful smells,
“ Which, sometimes health, or kindly heat expels:
“ Nor, from your tender legs to pluck with care
“ The casual growth of all unseemly hair.

CONGREVE.

Horace gave the like reason to a woman, who complained of the contempt with which he treated her.

Quid tibi vis mulier nigris dignissima barris?
Munera cur mihi, quidve tabellas
Mittis, nec firmo juveni, neque naris obesa?
Namque sagacius unus odoror,
Polypus, an gravis hirsutis cubet hircus in alis,
Quàm canis acer ubi lateat sus:
Quis sudor vietis, et quàm malus undique membris
Crescit odor, cum Et (42).

(42) Horat. 9 Epod. Od. 12.

The sense is

“ Thou Hag, whom only Elephants thou’d clasp, “ Why pester me with Billet doux and Presents?
“ I am too weak, and of so fine a smell,
“ That never Hound discovered a boar’s Haunts
“ Sooner than I a lustful female’s stench.
“ How flows the sweat from her falacious limbs
“ When! &c.

i. e. According to the translation of Robert and Anthony le Chevallier d’Agneaux.

Que me demandes-tu, femme sur toute digne
D’elephans noirs? pour quelle cause à moy
Ny roide jeunesseau, ny d’épesse navine,
Fais-tu de dons Et de Lettres envoy?
Car plus subtilement, que la bauge, où se cèle
Le porc sanglier, le chien n’odore fin;
Je sen s’au nez le poulpe, ou si dessous l’aisselle
Au rouge poil loge un stair de bouquin.
Quelle senteur luy croist combien luy croist mauvaist
Es membres stacs un odeur, lors qu’étant Et.

There are some people who, by considering too attentively these circumstances, will perhaps be of opinion, that the rules of probability would have been better followed, if the same conduct had been ascribed to the Argonauts which Augustus observed, when Fulvia proposing peace or war to him (43), he made choice of the latter. But it is certain that verisimilitude has been sufficiently observed in the episode of Lemnos; the choice the Argonauts made being the most natural. Their ship lay in the road, and was buffeted by a storm; of the expedition to Colchos; but Hercules, who had remained in the ship, reprimanded them for giving a loose to pleasure in the manner they had done, and obliged them to return on board [H]. According to some writers, they passed two or three years with the women of Lemnos, and the island was repopled by this means. The other massacre was, when all the children which the Lemnians had by their Athenian concubines were slain [I]. I shall speak of this in a remark. This island was very much infested by storm: they had occasion for a port in Lemnos, and it was highly necessary for them to land there: but this they could not do without coming to a battle, and they had already experienced the valour of the Lemnian women; they having fought with very great bravery, and had not been conquered. It was necessary, either to renew the attack, or retire, or take an oath to indulge all the wanton wishes of the women in question. To retreat would be ignominious, whether before the decision of a second battle; or, after fresh attempts as unsuccessful as the former. Could any success be hoped for (would all Greece say) from the expedition of Colchos since our Heroes have fallen in the island of Lemnos, where they were repulsed by silly women, and obliged to fly? The storm defeated all their hopes with regard to success, in case of a new battle. The only thing that remained then was, to submit to the necessity of the oath which was required. And perhaps they imagined that the cause of the occasion of the Lemnians was over, or in a great measure abated; and that, whatever might happen, they might soon be able to free themselves from the ungrateful yoke, since nothing particular was enjoined them, either as to time or other circumstances. Such might be the considerations which obliged them to take an oath; and we are not to believe that they once thought of equivocations or mental reservations, or the right or privilege which dispenses those persons from the observance of an oath, extorted by force, and metu cadente in constantem virum. The reader will find, by the following remark, that they were very true to their promise.

(43) See the remark [C] of the article of the first GLAPHYRA; and the remark [F] of the article LYCORIS.

[H] Hercules, who had remained in the ship, reprimanded them, . . . and obliged them to return on board.] One may justly wonder that Hercules, loving the fair so passionately as he did, should not have diverted himself, in the isle of Lemnos, after the same manner as his companions; for altho' the Lemnian women, for the reasons already mentioned, could not be very tempting, yet one sees no reason why he should be more delicate than the rest of the Greeks who were with him. It will be answered, that the oath they required carried some suspicion along with it; and that since they did not look upon a bare promise as a sufficient tie, he concluded that they must be extremely diffident of the power of their charms; that here was something concealed; and that it was not worth their while to go on shore. But once again, how came Hercules, (than whom no one could be more lustful) to be more scrupulous than his companions? I will own that I know not how to answer this difficulty, and must therefore take up with the bare matter of fact. Apollonius declares, "that Hercules could never be prevailed upon to go ashore on the Island, but kept constantly on board the ship Argo, that he might have a just title to censure his companions, who gave too great a loose in the pleasures they took with the Lemnian women, and laid aside all thoughts of their enterprize; which he did with so much the greater freedom, as he himself was not liable to the censure in question (44)." According to Valerius Flaccus, our young heroes were so entirely devoted to the administering consolation to these Lemnian widows, that they thought no more of returning on board their ship. They quite forget themselves in the island; they are delighted with the game; Hercules must be obliged to drag them thence by dint of reproaches; and to address himself, in very severe terms, to Jason, the Chieftain of the enterprize.

*Urbe sedent læti Minyæ, viduisque vacantes
Indulgent thalms; nimboſque educere luxu:
Nec jam velle vias: Zephyroſque audire vocantes
Diſſimulant; donec refides Tyrinthius Heros
Non tulit; ipſe rati invigilians atque integer, urbis
Invidiſſe deos tantum maris æquor adortis, Deſertaſque domos, fraudataque tempore Jegni*

(44) Meziriac, in Ovid's Epistles pag. 583, 586.

*Vota patrum: quid & ipſe viris cunctantibus aſſit?
O miſeri, &c (45).*

The ſenſe is
"With joy Minyans in the city ſtay,
"And wanton in the widow'd Lemnians arms:
"All thoughts of parting, now, are laid aſide,
"And they don't hear the winds that chide their ſtay;
"But Hercules was griev'd at their ſupinenefs,
"Himſelf unhurt, and watching o'er his ſhip;
"Then ſtrives t'inspire 'em with the pleaſing thoughts
"Of their own country; their deſerted houſes;
"Their parents wiſhes for their ſafe return;
"Next cries, O wretched men, &c."

(45) Valer. Flaccus, lib. 2. ver. 370. pag. m. 101.

I obſerved elſewhere (46), that the beſt prize fell to Jaſon's ſhare; the Queen of the iſland falling in love with him, and indulging him the fondeſt marks of her tendernes and paſſion. The remonſtrances of Hercules awakened the heroes; they returned on board, without once regarding the complaints and lamentations of the Lemnian women (47). Ovid (48) ſuppoſes that they continued two years with them; but Apollonius informs us that they made a much ſhorter ſtay, which ſeems more probable; for had they ſpent two years in thoſe delights, there had been no need of ſounding Orpheus's Lyre to draw them thence; that lyre whole power was to great, that even ſtones obeyed its harmony (49). Now it was neceſſary to have recourſe to the machine; for otherwiſe they could never have tore themſelves from the Lemnian women.

(46) In the article HYPSPYLYE.

(47) See Valer. Flaccus, lib. 2. ver. 393. & ſeq.

(48) Ovid. in Epifl. Hypſip.

(49) Ovid. Met. lib. 11. ver. 2 & 42.

*Ἄλλα δ' ἄλλοι ἔμικτο, καὶ ἐκλεάθειτο πορῆς,
Ἐὶ μὴ ἀποσπρωχθεὶς ἰσσωαῖς θελήσειεν θυμῷ
Ἥμισίην θελήσειεν ἔβαν ποτὶ νῆα μέλαιναν,
Ἐἰς ἴον πεδῖοντες, ἰσπεμνίσαντο δὲ μόχθῳ.
Aliæque alius commiſcebatur, & obliſi fuiſſent itineris ſui.
Niſi quidem revocatoriis monitiſ, ſuaſive cantu
Noſtro perſuaſi, deſcendiſſent ad navem nigram, Remigationem deſiderantes, recordatiſque fuiſſent labo-ris (50).*

The ſenſe is,
"So thrilling were their joys, they'd now forgot
"The expedition, had not I recall'd
"Their roving thoughts, by the enticing ſounds
"Of my harmonious Lyre; and thus prevail'd
"With them to re-aſcend the mighty ſhip;
"Sail on, and re-aſſume their promis'd labours."

(50) Orpheus in Argonauticis, ver. 478. pag. m. 34.

I will here take notice of an error in Barthius. He ſays that Ovid makes the Argonauts continue three years in that iſland, and proves it thus (51): Sic enim ipſum penes Jaſoni ſcribit bona noſtra Hypſipyla.

(51) Barth. in Statium, tom. 3. pag. 228.

*Tertia meſſis erat, cum tu dare vela coactus,
Impleſti lacrymis talia verba tuis.*

That is,
"Our Hypſipyle writes to Jaſon as follows,
" 'Twas the third harveſt, when oblig'd to go,
" You thus addreſt me (weeping as you ſpoke)."

Had he taken notice of the preceding verſe (52), he would have ſaid only two years; and this is an inſtance to ſhew, how incumbent it is on writers not to go on too faſt; but to examine with patience the words before and after the paſſages they intend to quote. Three harveſts do not make three years, but are included pretty nearly in two years, as three ſundays in the compaſs of two weeks.

(52) Hic tibi biſque aſſas, biſque concurrat biems.

[I] The other maſſacre was, when all the children, which the Lemnians had by their Athenian concubines, were ſlain.] To give a juſt illuſtration of the words, I muſt obſerve (53), that the Athenians, having drove the Pelasgi out of Attica, gave them the tract of land which lies under the mountain Hymettus for an habitation (54). This was to reward the Pelasgi, for the pains they had taken, in building the wall of the citadel

(53) Herodot. lib. 6. cap. 137. & ſeq.

(54) Thus Herodotus calls it; others ſay Hymettus.

by grasshoppers; on which account every inhabitant was commanded, by way of tax, to kill a certain number of them; and those birds were worshipped which destroyed them [K]. Bacchus tadel of Athens. They were so laborious in cultivating the country which was given them, that the soil which before was extremely ungrateful, was by them rendered extremely fruitful, for which reason the Athenians drove them from it. This is the only reason that Hecataeus the historian assigns for it; but they themselves would not own this injustice. They asserted that their children of both sexes (55) going to fetch water from the nine fountains, had met with very ignominious treatment from the Pelasgi, who, not contented with that insult, prepared to make an inroad, and were convicted of it. The Athenians asserted, that it was at their option to put them to death; and that they had shewn a great deal of clemency, in only driving them out of the country. The Pelasgi withdrew to different places, and particularly to the isle of Lemnos. They sought for opportunities to revenge themselves; and knowing the times on which the Athenians solemnized their festivals, they lay in ambush for those Athenian women, who were celebrating the festival of Diana in Brauron, and carried off a great number whom they made their concubines. They had a great many children by them, and taught them the language and manners of the Athenians. These children grew proud, and disdained to associate with those who were born of Lemnian mothers; and if any among them happened to fight with a child, who was a Pelasgian both by father and mother, they all ran to his assistance, and affected a superiority in every respect. The Pelasgi observing this, concluded that as these bastards might, from their infancy, unite together against legitimate children, and pretend to command over them, they would one day grow very formidable: they therefore put them all to death, and afterwards killed their Athenian concubines. This was followed by a remarkable sterility, which extended itself to their wives, their fields and their flocks. They then applied themselves to the oracle for some relief, when Apollo commanded them, to make the Athenians all the satisfaction that should be demanded. They went to Athens, and declared that this was their intention; but when a country was demanded of them, resembling a table that was spread in the Prytaneum, and covered with dainties of every kind, they replied, we will comply, when a ship shall come, in twenty four hours, from your country to ours, by a north wind. These imagined they had not bound themselves by any promise, considering the situation of Athens with respect to Lemnos. Miltiades, several years after, seized upon the Thracian Chersonesus, whence he set sail towards Lemnos; and declared to the inhabitants, that the condition contained in their promise was fulfilled, and consequently that they must quit the country. The Hephæstians obeyed, but the Myrinians made a resistance, alledging that the Chersonesus was not Attica; but Miltiades besieged them, and forced them to surrender; this is what we are told by Herodotus (56). This relation is not exactly like, in all respects, to that of Cornelius Nepos, with regard to the conquest of the island of Lemnos; for this last historian (57) supposes that Miltiades, before he subdued the Chersonesus, directed himself to the Lemnians, to summon them to retire voluntarily elsewhere, and that they made him the abovementioned answer; that having conquered the Chersonesus, he returned to Lemnos, and demanded the performance of what had been stipulated; and that the Lemnians not having dared to resist, gave up the island to him. Cornelius Nepos calls them Carians, and not Pelasgi. It appears from several passages of Thucydides, that the inhabitants of Lemnos sided with the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war. They at that time spoke the same language, and governed by the same laws as the Athenians (58).

Note, Herodotus observes, that the Greeks gave the name, Lemnian action, to a heinous crime, because of the massacre of the Athenian concubines &c. and the barbarity with which the Lemnian women had dispatched their husbands, without even sparing King Thoas. This is the true sense of the words of this historian; and it is without reason that a learned Critic finds some faults in them (59). Verba Herodoti, ubi de Thoante sermo est, omnino mendosa sunt. Ἐνλαῶθα ἰδοξί σφισι κλέπειν τὰς παῖδας σὺς ἐκ τῶν Ἀττικῶν γυναικῶν. Ἄπο τῆς δὲ τῆ ἔργη καὶ τῆ προλήμ τῆς τὸ ἐργάσαντο αἱ γυναῖκες, τὰς ἀμα Θόαντι ἀνδρῶς σφίσις ἀποκτείνασαι, νομίσαι ἀπὸ τῆν ἰλλάδα τὰ σχήτλια ἔργη πάντα Λήμνια κατέσθαι (60). Nemo enim de Thoante hoc tradidit. Igitur due voces, ἀμα Θόαντι, aut glossemata sunt, aut corrupta est prior, & legendum: παρὰ Θόαντι. Barthius does not express his idea very clearly; for we do not know what he means by these words, Nemo de Thoante hoc tradidit. Does he mean, that no author has related that the Lemnian women, favoured or assisted by Thoas, dispatched their husbands? But this is not Herodotus's meaning. Does he mean that all authors are agreed, that Thoas was not killed; and therefore that there is an error in the passage of Herodotus, if it be pretended that Thoas is here included in the number of the Lemnians who were killed by the women? In that case he is mistaken; since some authors say, that the women having discovered that Hypsipyle had not killed her father Thoas, they made her narrow a search after her, that they found her, and appellantur.

Erasmus has committed some errors, in epitomizing Herodotus's relation. He says (62), in the first place, that the Lemnians carried off the Athenian women, during the celebration of a festival of Minerva at Brauron. He should have said Diana, and not Minerva. He adds, in the second place, that the Athenian concubines would not suffer their sons to marry the legitimate daughters of the Lemnians. Now Herodotus does not say this, but supposes that those bastards were killed before they had attained a marriageable age. Erasmus's third error is, his asserting that, after this massacre, the Lemnians were affected with barrenness, and many other evils. Herodotus mentions only the barrenness of the earth, and that of women Πυρόμενοι δὲ λιμῶν τε καὶ ἀπειθῆν. Pariter fame & liberorum orbitate vexati (63). Fourthly; Erasmus charges him most falsely with saying, that these evils partly gave rise to the proverb Lemnia mala. Fifthly; that the other circumstance which gave rise to this proverb was, that the Lemnian women, unable to bear the stench of their husbands, murdered them all, being assisted by Thoas. It is true indeed that Herodotus vouches occasionally, as one of the reasons of the proverb, the slaughter which the Lemnian women made; but he does not say that their husbands stunk; and affirms that Thoas met with the same unhappy fate as the rest. Benedict, in his paraphrase of Pindar, is grossly mistaken; for, instead of saying that the Lemnians were incommoded with the stench of their wives, he affirms that the latter were incommoded with the stench of their husbands. Quinetiam in Lemnium venerunt (Argonautæ) . . . & cum Lemniadibus mulieribus, quæ maritos omnes eorum graveolentia offensa occiderant, rem babuerunt (64). This error has not been corrected in the edition of Pindar, printed at Oxford in 1698. The Scholiast, from whom Benedict had taken a passage (65), not long before, might have kept him from falling into Erasmus's snare. Moreri falls into it headlong, though he did not copy all the errors of that learned man; and indeed he has only taken a very small number of incidents which he met with in his Adages. The Pelasgi, says he (66), carried off the Athenian women, and had children by them whom they afterwards killed, observing they had inclinations contrary to theirs. And they killed their husbands by the assistance of Thoas. It is plain to every one, that this is assigning in too indefinite and too unlikely a manner, the motive which prompted the Lemnians to murder their husbands. It is likewise plainly telling us, that the action of these women was after the massacre of the bastards; as extravagant a falsity as the pretended assistance of Thoas.

[K] Birds were worshipped . . . which . . . killed . . . Grasshoppers.] Here follows a very curious passage (67). In Cyrenæica regione lux etiam est ter anno debellandi cas, primo ova obtinendo, deinde scetum, postremo adultas: desertoris pœna in eum, qui cessaverit. Et in Lemno insula certa mensura præfinita est, quam singuli emecatarum ad magistratus referant. Graculos (68) quoque ob id colunt, adverso volatu occurrentes earum exitio. & 7.

(60) Here follows the Latin translation of this Greek, in the edition of Herodotus: Itaque placitum est ut eos filius è matribus Atticis suscepas necarent. . . . Ex hoc facinore, & illo superiore feminarum, quæ viros suos unacum Thoante interemerunt, usu receptum est per Græciam ut terribilissima quæque facinora Lemnia appellantur.

(61) See Mericac on Ovid's Epistles, pag. 561. See also pag. 558.

(62) Erasmus, Adag. Chil. Cent. 9. num. 27. pag. m. 302.

(63) Herod. lib. 6. cap. 139.

(64) Paraphr. Pindari, Od. 4. Pyth. pag. m. 371.

(65) Ad Stroph. 5. Od. 4. pag. 330.

(66) Moreri, under the word Lemnos.

(67) Plinius, lib. 11. cap. 29. pag. m. 528.

(68) Father Hardouin has a good remark here. Conicularum, says he, e genere avis est graculus veterum Latinarum; nos Choucas vocamus, ut restit Bellonius admodum, lib. 6. cap. 3.

(55) Herodotus observes, that neither the Athenians, nor the rest of the Greeks had slaves in those days.

(56) Herodotus, lib. 6. cap. 137. & 139.

(57) Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Miltiadis.

(58) Thucydides, lib. 7. pag. m. 436.

(59) Barth. in Statium Theb. lib. 5. ver. 328. pag. 167. tom. 3.

Bacchus and Diana were there had in great veneration; but not Venus [L], who, on the other hand, did not love that country. She had received a signal affront there, it being in the island of Lemnos that Vulcan exposed her linked with the God Mars (b); and gave all the Gods a fight of her, as caught in the amorous act; however Homer is not of that opinion; he supposing heaven to be the scene of this adventure (i). The Persians took this island in the reign of Darius son of Hyftaspes, and placed a Governor over it who treated the people with great inhumanity (k). It was subdued long after by Miltiades (l), on which occasion Herodotus tells us an incident which cannot be made to agree with that of Plutarch [M]. Ubbo Emmius affirms that the Amazons reigned in that island before it was inhabited by the descendants of the Argonauts (n). I should be glad to know in what good author he found that circumstance. I have read in Vitruvius, that the Romans gave the revenue of it to the Athenians (n). If what Strabo wrote concerning it had been preserved, I do not doubt but we should have met with some curious particulars in them; but this part of that excellent Geographer's work is lost; and

(b) See the Scholiast of Statius in Theb. lib. 5. ver. 59.

(i) Homer. Odys. lib. 8.

(k) Herodot. lib. 5. cap. 26, 27.

(l) Idem, lib. 6. cap. 140.

(m) Ubbo Emmius, lib. 7. de Vetri Gracia, pag. 141. I am to observe, that if he goes upon what Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 348. relates, viz. that the Amazons had built the city of Myrina, his foundation is quite bad, there being several cities called Myrina.

(n) Vitruv. lib. 7. cap. 7.

Moreri

i. e. "There is a law, in Cyrene for destroying them thrice a year; first by breaking their eggs, next their young, and lastly such as are full grown; and those persons who discontinued the slaughter were punished as deserters. And it is decreed in the island of Lemnos, that every man shall kill a certain number, and bring them to the magistrate. They also worship Jays, who fly forward when they go to destroy them." I will also quote Plutarch, though he differs from Pliny, with respect to the kind of bird which the Lemnians worshipped. The Egyptians, says he (69), honoured the Ox, the Sheep and Ichneumon, for the advantage and profit which they receive from them, as the inhabitants of Lemnos honoured Sky-larks, because they find out Grasshoppers eggs, and break them to pieces.

(69) Plut. de Iside & Osiride, pag. 380. N. B. Mr. Bayle made use of Amiot's version.

[L] Bacchus and Diana were there had in great veneration, but not Venus.] Thoas King of Lemnos, was the son of Bacchus and Ariadne (70); and therefore it is no wonder that the worship of Bacchus should be well established in this island. It was in the temple of this God that Hypsipyle concealed her father, the night of the massacre (71). Strabo informs us, that the mysteries of Samothrace and those of Lemnos resemble the ceremonies observed by the Bacchantes (72). Farther, this isle was so fruitful in wine, that this circumstance alone might make it be considered as a country consecrated to the God in question. Quintus Calaber calls it ἀμπελόιστος, abounding in wines (73), and travellers relate, that it very justly deserves this epithet to this day (74). With respect to the worship of Diana, I shall content myself with pointing out the place where Plutarch relates that the Lemnians, being drove from their island, carried with them wherever they went the image or statue of Diana, which they had carried off from Brauron (75). I likewise will observe that they stamped the figure of this Goddess on their Terra sigillata. See Salmastius in his Exercitationes Pliniana in Solinum, pag. 1156. All authors; who mention the brutal fury with which the Lemnian women were fired against their husbands, observe, that the stench which made them so distasteful, was owing to Venus's anger, at her being so much neglected and despised in that island! See Apollodorus (76), Hyginus (77), the Scholiast on Apollonius (78), &c. Barthius has committed another error. He is of opinion that the Lemnians, in process of time, consecrated an image of Venus, which was one of the most perfect statues of antiquity. Venerem etiam Lemniam, says he (79), inter pulcherrima simulacra cultam postea, discernimus ex Luciani Imaginibus. Item Lemniam Minervam, à Lemniis dedicatam, quod omnium fuerit Phidiae operum elaboratissimum, Pausaniae Atticis. i. e. "Lucian's images inform us, that the Venus of Lemnos was afterwards adored among the most beautiful statues: we learn also from Pausania's Atticks, that the inhabitants of Lemnos dedicated a Lemnian Minerva, which was the most elaborate of all Phidias's works." He has reason to say that the Minerva, which was Phidias's master-piece, was dedicated by the Lemnians. Pausania affirms that it was therefore firnamed the Lemnian. See the 28th chapter of his first book: but Barthius is in the wrong to distinguish it from the image mentioned by Lucian, and pretend that Lucian spoke of a Lemnian Venus. He has mentioned the Minerva of that name. This cannot be doubted, when we take notice of the re-

(70) Ovid. Epist. Hypsipyl. Apolloni, lib. 1. Argon. & multi alii apud Meziriac on Ovid's Epistles, pag. 532.

(71) Val. Flacc. lib. 2. ver. 254.

(72) Strabo, lib. 10. pag. 321.

(73) Quint. Calab. lib. 9. ver. 337.

(74) See Belon, Observations, lib. 1. chap. 25.

(75) Plutarch. de Virtutib. Mulier. pag. 247.

(76) Lib. 1. pag. m. 55.

(77) Cap. 5.

(78) In Lib. 1. ver. 209.

(79) Barth. in Statium, tom. 3. pag. 166, 167.

mark he has made, viz. that it was the most excellent work Phidias ever made, and to which he set his name (80).

[M] Herodotus tells us an incident, which cannot be made to agree with that of Plutarch.] This last mentioned author relates, that the Tyrrhenians having seized on the islands of Lemnos, and of Imbros, carried off the Athenian women from Brauron, and had children by them. This race was drove from those islands by the Athenians, who looked upon them as half barbarous. The race or people in question failed towards Peloponnesus, and went ashore at Tenarus, where they did good services to the Lacedemonians, in the war against the Heilotes, for which they were rewarded with their freedom, and liberty to marry into the Lacedemonian families; but not the privilege of serving publick offices, or being admitted into the council. This exclusion made the people in question be suspected of designing to embroil the state; upon which their persons were secured, and they were confined close prisoners, till such time as proofs should be got to prove them guilty of the plot. Now their wives having obtained leave to visit them, changed clothes with their husbands, by which means they got out of confinement, and left the wives in their room. Having possessed themselves of mount Taygetus, they joined the Heilotes, and became so formidable to the Lacedemonians, that it was thought proper to capitulate with them. Their wives were restored to them, they were furnished with money and ships; and a promise made, that they should be acknowledged as relations, and as a colony of Spartans, wherever they might settle. They accepted of these conditions, and part of them went and settled at Melos, and the rest in Crete. The latter, after fighting several battles, possessed themselves of Lyctus, with some other cities; and thence the inhabitants of Lyctus pretended, that they, by the mother's side, were related to the Athenians; and looked upon themselves as a Lacedemonian colony (81). This is Plutarch's relation. Those whom he calls Tyrrhenians, and a little lower Pelasgi, are the same people as those whom Herodotus calls Pelasgi. These two names belong to the same people (82); and we are not to imagine, that those authors who have said, that the isle of Lemnos was inhabited by the Tyrrhenians (83), differ from those who say it was possessed by the Pelasgi. Hitherto then there is no difference between Herodotus and Plutarch; but when the latter affirms, that the posterity of the Athenian women, carried off from Brauron by the Tyrrhenians, who had settled in the islands of Lemnos and Imbros; that this posterity, I say, were drove from those islands by the Athenians, he does not agree with Herodotus, who asserts, that the Lemnians themselves killed all the children which those Athenian women brought them. These two historians differ greatly with respect to the æra; one of them (84) declares that Miltiades drove out the Lemnians; and the other makes this expulsion to be of much more remote antiquity, or at least confounds what he ought to have separated. The history of these women, who procured liberty to their husbands, relates, in Herodotus, to a period that is much earlier than Miltiades, and has not the circumstances observed by Plutarch.

(80) Lucian. in Imagin. pag. 5. tom. 2.

(81) Extracted from Plutarch, de Virtut. Mulierum, pag. 247.

(82) See Cleverius in Italia Antiqua, lib. 2. cap. 1. and Strabo, lib. 5. pag. 153.

(83) Schol. Apollonii in lib. 1. ver. 608.

(84) i. e. Herodotus.

Herodotus's account is as follows (85). The inhabitants of Lemnos, descended from the Argonauts, (85) Herodotus. lib. 4. cap. 145 & seq.

(p) Under the word Lemnos.
 (q) See Vianoli, dell' Historia Veneta, tom. 1. pag. 724.
 (r) Under the word Stalimene.
 (s) Under the word Lemnos.
 (t) Vianoli, dell' Historia Veneta, tom. 1. pag. 138.

Moreri (v) cites him as an author who speaks pretty circumstantially of it. Lemnos is now called Stalimene. The Turks besieged it in 1475, but were forced to raise the siege. It was on this occasion that a maiden named Marulla (p) displayed her great courage; a circumstance which Moreri has mentioned (q), but he falsely supposes that she lived in the fourteenth Century. He adds (r) that Mahomet II dispossessed the Venetians of that island; but this is not expressing himself with accuracy, since he became master of it only by a treaty of peace in the year 1478 (s). The Venetians reconquered it in the year 1656; and the Turks recovered it the succeeding year, after a long siege. I forgot to mention the flower called Lychmis. See the margin.

(t) The flower Lychmis did not grow more beautiful in any country than in the island of Lemnos. It sprung from the water in which Venus washed herself after she had lain with Vulcan. See Arboreus, lib. 15. pag. 681. Compare with this the remark [DD] of the article JUNO.

nauts, were drove from that island by the Pelasgi who carried off the Athenian women from Brauron. They retired to the country of the Lacedemonians, and informed them, that they were the descendants of the Argonauts; and that having been drove from their country, they returned to their ancestors, and desired leave to live with them. The Lacedemonians calling to mind that Castor and Pollux had shared in Jason's expedition indulged a very gracious reception to these fugitives; gave them lands, and incorporated them into their tribes. These refugees married other wives, after yielding to other men those whom they had brought from the isle of Lemnos. They soon grew proud; would govern others, and commit very heinous actions, upon which they were cast into prison; and a resolution was taken to put them to death, but their wives saved them, by changing their clothes in the manner abovementioned. The design was still continued of putting them to death; but Theras, who was preparing to found a colony, interceded for them; and promised to take them along with him, and by that means prevent all fears of further dangers from them. His request was granted; most of these people dispersed themselves; and the rest followed Theras, who founded a colony in the island which went by his name (86). It is to be observed that he had been preceptor to Euristhenes and Procles, the sons of Aristodemus, one of the chiefs of the Heraclidæ, who returned to Peloponnesus (87); and conclude from thence, that he flourished six hundred years, or thereabouts, before Miltiades. It is also to be remarked that the Scholiast on Pindar (88) relates the incident very near the same as Herodotus; and that both observe that Battus sprung from one of the Lemnians of Theras's colony, founded the city of Cyrene. It would be unjust for any person to assert that this is foreign to my subject. Two reasons would refute this reproach; first, because, as a critic, I am bound to shew the variations between Herodotus and Plutarch; and secondly, as an historian, I am obliged to collect the adventures of the inhabitants of the island of Lemnos.

(86) The island of Thera.

(87) Herodot. lib. 4. cap. 147.

(88) Scholiastes Pindari in Od. 4. Pyth. ver. 88. pag. 218. edit. Oxon. 1698. He will have it that the prisoners were delivered by their mothers.

LENFANT (JAMES), a learned French writer in the eighteenth Century, was born at Bazoches in Beauvais April the 13th 1661. He was son of Paul Lenfant, Minister at Chatillon sur Loire, who died at Marbourg in June 1686, by Anne Dergnouvst of Preffinville, who died at Berlin December the 6th 1692. Our author studied Divinity at Saumur, where he lodged at the house of James Cappel, Professor of Hebrew, by whom he was always highly esteemed; and afterwards went to Geneva to continue his studies there. He left that city towards the end of the year 1683, and went to Heidelberg, where he received imposition of hands for the Ministry in August 1684. He discharged the duties of his function there with great reputation, as Chaplain of the Electress Dowager of Palatine, and Pastor in ordinary to the French Church. The descent of the French into the Palatinate obliged Mr. Lenfant to depart from Heidelberg in 1688. Two letters which he had written against the Jesuits, and which are inserted at the end of his Préservatif, would not permit him to continue at the mercy of a society, whose generosity is not very remarkable. He left the Palatinate therefore in October 1688 with the consent of his Church and Superiors, and arrived at Berlin in November following. Though the French Church of Berlin had already a sufficient number of Ministers, the Elector Frederick, afterwards King of Prussia, appointed Mr. Lenfant one of them, who began his functions there on Easter-day March the 21st 1689, and continued them in that Church thirty nine years and four months, distinguishing himself to great advantage by his writings [A]. In 1705 he married Emilia Gourgeaud de Venours, a young Lady of a good family in Poitou; but had no children by her. His merit was so

[A] His writings.] They are as follow. I. Considérations générales sur le Livre de Mr. Bruys. He wrote these considerations in the year 1683, when he was but between twenty two and twenty three years of age, and they were printed at Rotterdam the year following. II. Lettres choisies de St. Cyprien. Amsterdam 1688 in 8vo. III. L'innocence du Catechisme de Heidelberg. 1690 This little piece was reprinted in 1723 at the end of his Préservatif. IV. De inquirendâ Veritate. Geneva 1691 in 4to. It is a Latin translation of Father Malebranche's Recherche de la Verité. It appears from a letter of Mr. Lenfant to Mr. de Sauzet published in the Nouvelles Littéraires of February 15, 1716, that this Translation was finished in 1683; but that it was not printed till 1691 on account of some disorder, which happened in the affairs of the Bookseller, who had undertaken the impression. We find in the same Nouvelles Littéraires the letter, which Father Malebranche wrote to Mr. Lenfant upon his translation. V. Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne fidèlement tirée de Dissertation Latine de Mr. Spanheim, Professeur en Theologie à Leyde. Cologne, (that is, Amsterdam) 1694 in 8vo. The fourth part is by Mr. Des-Vignoles, who has added to it several articles in a second edition printed at the Hague in 1720. Mr. Lenfant had no share in that edition. See the bookseller's advertisement. VI. Remarques sur l'Édition Grecque du N. Testament par M. Mill, dated June the 5th 1708. This piece is published in the Bibliothèque choisie of Mr. Le Clerc, Tom. XVI. p. 275. VII. Lettre Latine sur le même sujet, dated December the 31st 1708. Printed in the same Bibliothèque. Tom. XVIII. pag. 209. VIII. Lettre Latine à Mr. Des-Vignoles sur l'Édition du N. Testament donnée par M. Kuster. Dated June the 17th 1710, and published in the same Bibliothèque, Tom. XXI. p. 97. IX. Réflexions & Remarques sur la Dispute du P. Martianay avec un Juif: Inserted in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres of May 1709, p. 479, and June, p. 599. X. Mémoire Historique touchant la Communion sous les deux Especes: Inserted in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres of September 1709, p. 243. XI. Critique des Remarques du P. Vavasseur sur les Réflexions du P. Rapin, touchant la Poétique: Inserted in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres of February 1710. p. 123, and March p. 253. XII. Réponse de M. Lenfant à M. Dartis au sujet du Socinianisme. Berlin. 1712 in 4to. Our author published another pamphlet at the same place in 1719, in which he replied to divers things advanced by Monsieur Dartis in a letter, which he so conspicuous, that he had all the marks of distinction shewn him suitable to his profession. He was Preacher to the late Queen of Prussia, Charlotta Sophia, who was eminent for her admirable sense and extensive knowledge. After her death he became Chaplain to the late King of Prussia. He was Counsellor of the Superior Consistory, and Member of the French Council, which were formed to direct the general affairs of that Nation. In 1710 he was chosen a Member of the Society for propagating the Gospel established in England; and March the 2d 1724 was elected Member of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin. In 1707 he took a journey to Holland and England, where he had the honour to preach before Queen Anne; and if he had thought proper to leave his Church at Berlin, for which he had a great respect, he might have had a settlement at London with the title of Chaplain to her Majesty. In 1712 he took a journey to Helmstad, in 1715 to Leipfick, and in 1725 to Breslaw. His design was to search for rare books and manuscripts necessary for the compiling the histories which he was writing. He was honoured with several from the Electress of Brunswic-Lunebourg Princess Palatine; the Princess of Wales, now Queen of Great Britain; the Count de Fleming; Monsieur Dagueffeau, he entitled, Lettre Pastorale. Our author did not think it worth his while to reply to several other pieces of Monsieur Dartis. XIII. Lettre sur le sens litteral des anciens Oracles, à l'occasion de Dissertation sur le Pseaume CX. published in the Histoire Critique de la Republique des Lettres, Tom. VI. p. 43. XIV. Lettre sur un Dispute avec le P. Vota Jesuite: Published in the Bibliothèque Choise, Tom. XXIII. p. 327. XV. Histoire du Concile de Constance, tirée principalement d'Auteurs, qui ont assisté au Concile. Enrichie de Portraits. Amsterdam 1714, two volumes in 4to. A new edition revised, corrected, and considerably enlarged, was printed at Amsterdam 1728 in two volumes in 4to. Father Niceron tells us (1), "that there are few Histories written so exactly and judiciously as this; and though compiled by a Protestant, it does not shew the least sign of partiality." Bishop Burnet in the preface to his third volume of the History of the Reformation gives the following character of it. "There is another History written in French, and which, I hope, is soon to appear in our own language, which I cannot recommend more than it deserves. It is Mr. Lefant's History of the Council of Constance, in which that excellent person has with great care, and a sincerity liable to no exception, given the world so true a view of the state of the Church and of Religion, in the age before the Reformation, that I know no book so proper to prepare a man for reading the History of the Reformation, as the attentive perusal of that noble work. He was indeed well furnished with a collection of excellent materials, gathered with great fidelity and industry by the learned Dr. Vander Hart, Professor of Divinity in the University of Helmstadt, and procured for him by the noble zeal and princely bounty of that most serene and pious Prince Rodolph August, the late Duke of Brunswic-Wolfembutte, who set himself with great care, and at a vast charge to procure from all places the copies of all papers and manuscripts, that could be found, to give light to the proceedings of that great assembly. That collection amounted to six volumes in folio. From these authentic vouchers the History of that Council is now happily compiled. And if that learned author can find materials to give us as full and as clear a History of the Council of Basle, as he has given of that Constance, I know no greater service can be done to the world. For by it Popery will appear in its true and native colours, free from those palliating disguises, which the progress of the Reformation, and the light, which by that has been given the world, has forced upon those of that communion. We have the celebrated History of the Council of Trent written with a true sublimity of judgment and an unbiassed sincerity. But how well and how justly soever the History, which Father Paul gave the world of that Council, is esteemed, I am not afraid to compare the late History of the Council of Constance even to that admired work, so far at least, as that if it will not be allowed to be quite equal to it, yet it may be well reckoned among the best of all that have written after that noble pattern, which the famous Venetian Friar has given to all the writers of Ecclesiastical History." It was translated into English by Mr. Stephen Whatley, and printed at London 1730 in 4to. XVI. Apologie pour l'Auteur de l'Histoire du Concile de Constance contre le Journal de Trevoux du Mois de Decembre 1714. Amsterdam 1716 in 4to. This apology is reprinted at the end of the second volume of the second edition of the Histoire du Concile de Constance. XVII. Discours prononcé à Berlin dans l'Eglise de Werder le 26 Decembre de l'année 1715 jour de Jubilé, sur les 15 premiers versets du Chapitre XLIV de l'Ecclesiastique: Berlin in 4to and reprinted more correctly in 12mo at Amsterdam 1716. XVIII. Traaduction du N. Testament avec des Remarques, & d'amples Préfaces. Our author made this translation of the New Testament in conjunction with Monsieur Beaufobre. It was printed at Amsterdam 1718 in two volumes in 4to. XIX. Le Poggiana, ou la Vie, le Caractere, les Sentences, & les bons mots de Pogge Florentin, avec l'Histoire de Florence écrite par le Pogge. Et un Supplement de diverses Pieces importantes. Amsterdam 1720 in 8vo. XX. Lettre à M. de la Motte, being a supplement to the Poggiana published in the Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. I. p. 112. XXI. Lettre à M. de la Crose, concerning some corrections of the Poggiana: Inserted in the Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. I. p. 240. XXII. Réponse aux Remarques de M. de la Monnoye sur le Poggiana: Inserted in the Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. IV. p. 70. XXIII. Lettre à M. Des Vignoles sur les Prieres des Payens, Ibid. p. 189. XXIV. Dissertation sur cette Question; Si Pythagore & Platon ont eu Connoissance des Livres de Moïse & de ceux des Prophètes: Inserted in the Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. II. p. 124. XXV. Eclaircissement sur ce qu'il avoit fait descendre Charles VI de Charlemagne: Ibid. p. 173. XXVI. Lettre sur les paroles inutiles; Matth. xii. 36. Inserted in the Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. III. p. 98. XXVII. Préservatif contre la réunion avec le Siege de Rome. ou Apologie de notre separation d'avec ce Siege. Amsterdam 1723 in 8vo five volumes, including L'Innocence du Catechisme de Heidelberg démontrée contre deux Libelles d'un Jesuite du Palatinat, ou l'on a joint des Discours sur les Catechismes, sur les Formulaires, & sur les Confessions de Foi. XXVIII. Histoire du Concile de Pise, & de ce qui s'est passé de plus memorable depuis ce Concile jusqu'au Concile de Constance. Enrichie de Portraits. Amsterdam 1724, two volumes in 4to. XXIX. Seize Sermons sur divers Textes; Amsterdam 1728 in 8vo. XXX. Une Preface generale sur l'Ancien & le Nouveau Testament: Prefixed to a French Bible, printed in 8vo at Hanover and Leipfick in 1728. XXXI. Remarks upon Father Gijbert's Treatise upon Christian Eloquence, published with the following title: L'Eloquence Chrétienne dans l'idée & dans la Pratique. Par le P. Gijbert, de la Comp. de Jesus. Nouvelle Edition, ou l'on a joint les Remarques de Mr. Lefant. Amsterdam 1728 in 12mo. XXXII. Histoire de la Guerre des Hussites & du Concile de Basle. Enrichie de Portraits. Utrecht 1731, two volumes in 4to. It is dedicated by his widow to the Prince Royal of Prussia. This was the last work, in which our author was engaged. He hastened the finishing it as much as possible, and as if he had foreseen his approaching death. He had revised the copy of the first volume, and was actually reading over that of the second, when he was seized with the apoplexy. If he had not been prevented by this, he would have continued his History to about the year 1460, whereas it concludes with the beginning of the year 1454. To this History is added Monsieur Beaufobre's Dissertation upon the Adamites of Bohemia. XXXIII. He left behind him remarks on several works, and some tracts.

T.

(1) Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes illustres, tom. 9. pag. 251.

Dagueffeau, Chancellor of France; and a great number of learned men, both Protestants and Papists, among [the latter of whom was the Abbé Bignon. It is not certain whether it was he, who first formed the design of the Bibliothèque Germanique, which began in 1720; or whether it was suggested to him by one of the society of learned men, which took the name of Anonymous. They ordinarily met at his house. When the King of Poland was at Berlin, in the end of May and beginning of June 1728, Mr. Lentant dreamt, that he was ordered to preach. He excused himself that he was not prepared; and not knowing what subject he should pitch upon, was directed to preach upon these words, Isaiah xxxviii. 1. Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live. He related this dream to some of his friends, but said nothing of it to his wife for fear of alarming her. It is not known whether this dream made any impression on him; for he was not at all credulous or superstitious; but it is certain, that he made the utmost haste to finish his History of the war of the Hussites and the Council of Basil. On Sunday July the 25th following he had preached in his turn at his Church upon Matth. vii. 24, 25. but on Thursday following, which was the 29th of the same month, he was surprized with a slight attack of the palsy; but on the 4th of August he was seized with a more violent fit of that distemper, of which he died on the 7th of that month, aged sixty seven years, four months, and six days. His body was interred at Berlin August the 9th at the foot of the pulpit of the French Church, called Werder-Church, from the quarter, where it is situated, in which Church our author ordinarily preached since the year 1715, when his Prussian Majesty appointed particular Ministers to every Church, [whereas before they were all served by the same Ministers in their turns. His stature was a little below the common height. His eye was very lively and penetrating. He did not talk much, but always extremely well. Whenever any dispute arose in conversation he spoke without any heat; a proper and delicate irony was the only weapon he made use of on such occasions. He loved company, and passed but few days without seeing some of his friends. But his writings lost nothing by this. He returned to his labour with new vigour, and never wrote better than when he had been enlivened with an agreeable conversation. He was a sincere friend, and an enemy to no man. He was remarkable for a disinterested and generous disposition. He had the reputation of an excellent Preacher, and was really so. His voice was good; his pronunciation distinct and varied; his style clear, grave, and elegant without affectation; and he entered into the true sense of a text with great force (a).

(a) See the Memoire Historique de la Vie, de la Mort, & des Ouvrages de Mr. Lentant, printed in the Biblioth. Germanique, tom. 26. pag. 115. and prefixed to his Histoire de la Guerre des Hussites & du Concile de Basle, edit. Utrecht 1731, in 4to.

LENTULUS (SCIPIO) was a Neapolitan, who quitted the Church of Rome, and embraced the Protestant Religion in the sixteenth Century. He was Minister at Chivavenne in the country of the Grisons; and employed his pen in defending an edict which the Grison Leagues published in 1570 against the Sectarists (a) [A]. These did not fail to attack this edict, with those arguments for toleration, which the Protestants themselves alledged against Roman Catholics, in countries where persecution was practised; but our Lentulus answered those arguments. He composed an Italian Grammar that was printed in Geneva in the year 1568 (b).

(a) Epitome Biblioth. Gesneri.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Pierre Gilles, Hist. Ecclesiast. de Valées de Piedm. pag. 110.

(d) Ibid. p. 105.

I add that he sometimes preached in Ferrara, before the Dutchess Renata of France (c); that he afterwards was Minister of St. John's Church in the Vale of Lucerne (d); that he made a reply to a work of Possévinus the Jesuit, who, in the year 1560 had been sent into that country to make converts [B]; that he suffered greatly by the caprices and injurious

[A] He . . . employed his pen in defending an edict . . . against the Sectarists.] In the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliothèque, this work of Lentulus is mentioned as a book which was not yet printed. Ejusdem liber de jure Magistratum in puniendis hæreticis, quo Sylvii cujusdam Epistolam hereticis patrocinantem refutat nondum editus. This is found in page 744 of that epitome, Zurich edition 1583. In fine, the work was printed at Geneva by John le Preux anno 1592 in 8vo. The title of it is this: Responsio orthodoxa pro Edicto Illustrissimorum D. D. trium sæderum Rheticiæ adversus hæreticos, & alios Ecclesiarum Rheticiarum perturbatores promulgato; in qua de Magistratus auctoritate & officio in coercendis hæreticis, ex verbo Dei disputatur. I know some people, who having read in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, that Lentulus's apology for the edict of the Grison leagues was printed in 1502, racked their imaginations to find out what this sect could be, which occasioned the enacting of this league among the Grisons, in the beginning of the XVI century. A great number of books were turned over; and even persons were consulted who had fine libraries, and who started a thousand conjectures. At last, the true date of the edition of the apology was discovered; and a fresh instance was given of the confusion, into which the errors of the prels throw authors on a thousand occasions. Voetius observes, that the sectarists, condemned by the edict of the Grison leagues were Arians, or worse than Arians; and that Lentulus gave the particulars of their blasphemous Tenets in his preface (1). He likewise observes (2), that Lentulus's orthodox answer pro Edicto &c. refuted the complaints, which an anonymous author had published in 1570 against the edict of the Grisons, and that it was published in 1573. This differs widely from what is found in the epitome of Gesner.

(1) Gilbert, Voetius, Polit. Eccles. tom. 2. pag. 539.

(2) Ibid. pag. 386.

[B] He made a reply to a work of Possévinus the Jesuit, who, in 1560, had been sent into that country to make converts]. Possévinus, but a few months before, had been made a Jesuit at twenty six years of age (3); and I therefore do not wonder that this title should not be given him, by the historian who furnishes me with the following passage. The Pope having signified to the Duke of Savoy, that it would be necessary to employ force, in order to convert the hereticks of the valleys of Piedmont, it was resolved, in his Highness's council, to comply with the Pope's advice; but that, to keep up some shew of a regularity in proceeding, some person, who was well qualified to point out, and convince the people in question of their errors, should be sent into the valleys; and that they should proceed to such measures as were needful, according to the success which this person should meet with; and, for the affair in question, they made choice of Anthony Poussévin, commander of St. Anthony de Fossano (4), a man of great reputation among them, but whose actions shewed he was not the man they took bim

(3) See Ale-gambe, pag. 42.

(4) Alegambe, pag. 41. observes that Cardinal Hercules de Gonzaga had given Possévin the Commandery of St. Anthony de Fossano. S. Antonii apud Fossanum, Præceptoria donatus.

rious treatment of Castrocara who commanded in the vallies of Piedmont; that he was obliged, on this account, to seek another dwelling in the year 1565, and that he retired to Chbiavenne in the country of the Grisons, and there continued the exercise of his ministerial functions till his death (e). No one ought to be surprized, upon pretence that Lentulus himself had been formerly persecuted, at his writing an apology for the edict which the Grisons had published against the Heretics; nothing being more common than to hear persons who fled for the sake of Religion, founding the alarm against Sectarists.

(e) Ibid. pag. 201.

bim for. His highness gave him his letters patents, dated the seventh of July, which declared him as sent to establish preachers of the Christian Doctrine in his dominions; and particularly in his vallies of Piedmont, with provisions necessary for their maintenance. Commanding, for this end, all persons bearing ecclesiastical or civil offices; all syndicks, communities, and in general all his subjects, to afford him all the assistance necessary for the execution of the said commission (5). This man having set out from Nice, where his Highness was, went directly to Courmayeur . . . and having assembled the people in the chief Church of the town, he went up into the pulpit; read the Letters of his commission, by way of text; explained them by enlarging and exaggerating on what he intended to do in the neighbouring vallies, viz. to convince and confound the ministers; to drive them away; to set up in their room persons who should preach up the Pope; to prove that the mass was good, to oblige all the inhabitants of those vallies to go to it; and to denounce extirpation with respect to all those who should refuse obedience to his commands (6). He went and did the same in Bubiano in the valley of Luferne, and in Luferne the capital of the valley, . . . and commanded the leaders of the Protestants to attend him, the 26th of July. He came into the assembly, together with a great number of the nobility, magistrates, and other principal men of the religion he professed, when he laid before them the reasons of his coming, and caused the letters of his commission to be read; he afterwards caused to be read the letters and petitions which the Protestants had writ to his royal Highness, and his council, which he had brought back with him, and demanded of them, Whether they owned the sending of such pieces or writings, and whether they would observe what they had promised in them. They answered yes (7). He then offered some reasons to prove the mass; when the protestant Ministers having proposed their difficulties to him, "he broke with the utmost fury into exclamations and abusive language; at which the persons who accompanied him seemed very much grieved and ashamed, to see that a man of so much reputation among them, had not been able to produce one single reason in defence of their religion; nor any thing to point out, to the other party, their errors; and besides, had behaved in so immoderate and abusive a manner. Coming a little to himself he said, that he was not come to dispute with the protestant clergymen, but to drive them away, and settle other preachers in their room, pursuant to the commission he had received for that purpose; and without hearing any thing, or making the least answer, he commanded Mr. Anthony Malingre, Notary of Bagnol, to draw up in form his command to the Syndicks of the several communities; and in their persons, to all the other inhabitants of the said places respectively, to drive away all the Lutheran Ministers who preached there, without hearing them any more either in public or private; and farther, to receive and hear the

(5) Peter Gilles, Hist. Ecclesiast. des Eglises Reformées des Vallées de Piedm. pag. 101. ad ann. 1560.

(6) Gilles, ibid. pag. 102.

(7) Gilles, ibid. pag. 103.

" preachers he should settle among them, as soon as the Protestant Ministers should be gone away; and to provide them with proper dwellings and maintenance, under the penalties contained in his Highness's edicts; ordering them to report to him the result of their deliberation in three days (8)." The Syndicks gave in their answer, to which he replied, "the fifth of August, by a long letter, informing them, that his commission implied a tacit authority to drive away the Protestant Ministers, since he was commanded to settle other preachers, which it would not be possible for him to do, so long as the Protestant Ministers should be there, who would be for ever contradicting what his preachers should say and do. This letter was filled with strong exhortations to the Protestants, to go over to the Church of Rome; with many promises to those persons who should do this spontaneously, and without constraint. He subjoined to this letter another writing, by which he endeavoured to repair part of the breach he had made in his reputation, in the assembly of the 27th of July; for he had collected some few passages of the holy Scriptures, and a few more from the Doctors of the ancient Church to prove some parts of the Mass, and likewise the practice of celibacy among the Clergy. But Scipio Lentulus, a Neapolitan, Pastor of St. John's Church, wrote a learned answer to him, which was printed a little after; and wherein he shews how greatly Poussévin was mistaken in the arguments produced by him; and how widely the new Romish Church had deviated, in such things, from the right way (9).

(8) Ibid. pag. 104.

(9) Ibid. pag. 105.

"The most reverend Poussévin (the greatest man of his party bestow this honourable title on him) perceiving that he could not repair the breaches made in his reputation, any more by his writings than his harangues; directing himself to those who were able to answer him, quite left them, and went and wreaked his indignation on such of the poor faithful (Protestants) as were scattered and dispersed among the Papists in the lowest part of the vallies, and particularly in Campillon and Fenil." He imprisoned the persons, and plundered the effects of the said scattered Protestants. . . . The greatest part of them fled, but such as were seized, met with ill treatment. Some, through infirmity, abjured the Protestant religion in the Church of Campillon, the 5th of August, in presence of all the aforesaid persons, who caused instruments thereon to be drawn up with great solemnity; they then set them at liberty, and restored to them their plundered possessions; however, the greatest part of them returned afterwards in the right way (10). . . . The greatest part of August was spent in these exactions. . . . Poussévin returned to the Duke's Court the beginning of September; and prevailed so far, by his odious and slanderous reports, that the resolution was confirmed, of proceeding against the Protestants of the vallies by force of arms (11). A strange way this of converting hereticks!

(10) Pierre Gilles, Histoire Ecclesiastique des Eglises Reformées des Vallées de Piedmont, pag. 106.

(11) Gilles, Hist. Eccles. des Vallées de Piedm. pag. 107.

LEO I, surnamed the Great, ascended the pontifical throne the 10th of May 440. He was a man of very great abilities; was very eloquent, courageous, and well skilled in affairs. He did not want for opportunities of displaying his exalted talents; he finding exercise enough for them in the heresies he was obliged to combat, and the wild havock committed in the Roman Empire. His zeal against the Manichees, the Priscillianists, the Pelagians, the Nestorians and Eutychians was wonderfully seconded by the penal Laws of the Emperors, which were severely executed. He did not disapprove of the extending them so far as the effusion of blood [A]: the deputation he sent to Atila was productive

[A] He did not disapprove of the extending them so far as the effusion of blood.] The reader will quickly have a proof of this, from a passage of Maimburg. It relates to the putting to death of Priscillian, and many of his followers, and the banishing several of them; which Sulpitius Severus greatly condemned, as a very pernicious example. "Because he thought that nothing like it had been seen before. With regard to the point of banishment, no one can deny but that he was in the wrong: for it is universally known that productive of very happy effects [B]; but the miracle which is added to it, is a mere fiction [C]. His eloquence had not the same success with respect to King Giseric; nor yet “ Constantine banished those Bishops who refused to subscribe to the condemnation of Arius, that he likewise punished with banishment, which the other Emperors did after him. With regard to putting to death, it is true indeed, that Hereticks had not yet been punished capitally; but this does not imply that they may not be prosecuted with that rigour, as has often been done since. And without mentioning those who have proved in their writings, that this was not only very lawful but also very expedient, we need but peruse what St. Leo has writ on this subject, when giving (as we shall soon see) the necessary orders for proceeding in Spain against the heresy of Priscilian, he applauds Maximus for that action, and says; that the rigour and severity of the Justice, he exercised against that heresiarch and his disciples, whom that Prince put to death, has been of very great service to the clemency of the Church. For though the Church contents itself with the lenity of Judgment, which the Bishops, pursuant to the Canons, pronounce against obstinate hereticks, and does not admit of any bloody executions; it is nevertheless greatly aided and supported by the severe ordinances of the Emperors, since the fear of so rigorous a punishment, sometimes prompts hereticks to have recourse to the spiritual remedy, to cure the mortal disease of their heresy, by a true conversion (1).” Profit diu ista districtio Ecclesiasticæ lenitati, quæ est sacerdotali contenta iudicio cruentas refugit ultiones: severis tamen Christianorum Principum constitutionibus adjuvatur, dum ad spirituale nonnunquam recurrunt remedia, qui timent corporale supplicium (2).

"Constantine

[B] The deputation he sent to Attila was productive of a very happy effect. As this is one of the finest passages in the life of this Pope, it will be proper to enlarge a little upon it in this place. Attila had taken Aquileia, and burnt it almost to the ground: He had destroyed whatever was in his way, during his march from Aquileia to Pavia and Milan; he had made himself master of those two great Cities, and treated them as he had done all the rest, viz. had laid them quite waste. . . . (2) So many calamitous expresses arriving upon one another's heels in Rome, threw the inhabitants of it into the utmost consternation (3). The Senate was called together in order to debate, whether the Emperor should abandon Italy as Ætius advised him to do. In short they did not know what course to take. To defend Rome, in the condition it was then, against a numberless multitude of Barbarians, seemed a direct impossibility; to forsake it and fly, in order to seek an asylum elsewhere; this would reflect the highest ignominy on an Emperor, who ought to die honourably, rather than survive so shameful an act of cowardice. What then could be done? A medium was found between these two extremes, viz. to send a solemn embassy to Attila, in order to obtain peace from him, on conditions that might not be intolerable. This being resolved, it was thought that no person was better qualified for that employment than the holy Pope Leo, to whom strength of mind, consummate prudence, his address in engaging the hearts of men, his virtue, knowledge and eloquence joined to his dignity of Sovereign Pontiff, which made him venerable to the whole world, had acquired universally the reputation of being indisputably the greatest man of his age. The Emperor therefore conjured him to accept of that employment, which he did very willingly to save the capital of the empire, and the holy see from the invasion of Barbarians. To honour the embassy, and the Pope who was at the head of it, there were associated to him two of the greatest men of the Empire, Avienus and Trigetius, one of whom had been Consul, and the other Prefect of Rome. Some Senators were added, among whom was the father of Cassiodorus, who swayed by filial affection in one of his epistles (4); where he speaks as an orator, in making his father's eulogium, ascribes to him the whole honour and effect of this important Embassy. But in his chronicle, where he speaks as a true historian, he unsays it, and ascribes the whole to St. Leo, in like “ manner as all other authors (4).” Attila gave a favourable reception to this Embassy, Tota legatione dignanter accepta, ita summi Sacerdotis presentia Rex gavivus est, ut bello abstinere præciperet (5); near Mantua, at a small distance from the place where the river Mincio discharges itself in the Po (6); and notwithstanding the fierce disposition of this Prince, he paid all kind of honours to the Pope; he listened favourably to his speech which he caused to be interpreted; and found it so beautiful, so judicious, so strong and so affecting; that Attila, this scourge of Heaven, that enemy to human nature, whose bare aspect struck the most intrepid souls with terror, and whose name alone made the earth to tremble, was softened on a sudden; grew gentle as a Lamb, he who before had been a ravenous Wolf, and immediately granted the peace he implored at his hands; and thus without exacting any grievous condition, promising to preserve it inviolably on his part; after which, turning back, he went on the other side of the Danube, whence he never returned (7).

[C] . . . but the miracle which is added to it is a mere fiction. Were I to quote a Protestant, I should startle all tender minds of the Romish Communion; and therefore I choose rather to cite a person who resided a long time among the Jesuits, and who is no ways disposed to favour those who are not of the Romish Communion. His words are as follow (8).

“ I know it is generally related, to make the incident more miraculous, that Attila's captains asking him why he had paid so much honour to this Pontiff, so far as to obey all his commands; that Pontiff answered trembling, that whilst Leo was addressing his speech to him, he saw near him a venerable old man, who holding a drawn sword, threatened to kill him in case he did not comply with all things the Pope desired. But I am obliged to say, that a person may scruple to believe any part of this, without being incredulous. And indeed this vision has not been inserted in the Paris breviary, since our learned Archbishop Francis de Harlay has restored it to its genuine state; having carefully expunged from it whatever was apocryphal or very doubtful; and substituted as the fathers of the Church, and such as are best adapted to the subject, and to the festival that is solemnized. I therefore will be so bold as to assert, that a person may, without being scruple, differ in opinion from those who give credit to this vision: for ancient authors, as Jornandes, Theophanes, Suidas, Count Marcellinus, Cassiodorus, Anastasius, and the rest who have written that embassy of St. Leo; not to mention St. Prosper who was then in Rome, and told us all the circumstances of it; and St. Leo himself who mentions it in one of his Sermons (9), take no notice of this vision, on which they however would not have been silent, had it been true. So far from it, instead of ascribing this condescension in Attila to the fear he was under from the vision and threatening sword we have spoke of, they all declare unanimously, that it was an effect of the majestic presence and powerful eloquence of St. Leo, which softened and mollified the heart of this Barbarian; and the holy Pope, who was far from glorying in it, said that it must be ascribed, not to the influence of the stars, as some of the profane would have it, but solely to the infinite mercy of God, who vouchsafed to soften and change the hearts of the Barbarians. Quorum precibus divina censure flexa sententia est. Non sicut opinantur impii, stellarum affectibus, sed ineffabilis Dei omnipotentis misericordie deputatus est (10). There is nothing here that intimates the vision in question. The circumstance which made it current of late years was, its being inserted in the history called Miscella, which is falsely ascribed to Paulus Diaconus. But besides its not being inserted in the ancient editions of that compiler, which shews that it was added at random without proof or authority; not to mention that a great many

(4) Maimbourg, Hist. du Pontificat de St. Leon, liv. 3. pag. 221.

(5) Prosper in Chron. à Duchesnois vulgato, cited by Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 222.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. pag. 224.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Miscell. lib. 15.

(1) Maimbourg, Hist. du Pontificat de St. Leon, liv. 3. pag. 55, 56. edit. Holland.

(2) S. Leo, Epist. 95. ad Turib.

(3) Ibid. lib. 3. pag. 279, ad ann. 452.

(4) Ibid. pag. 280.

(9) Variar. lib. 2. Epist. 4.

(a) Printed at Paris in 1675. See the Journal des Savans of February 17, 1676; and Du Pin's Biblioth. tom. 3. Pars. 2. pag. 264. Dutch edit.

yet was it wholly fruitless [D]. Those writers who affirm that Leo cut off his own hand [E], because he felt some irregular impulses whilst a woman was kissing it, and who add that he got it restored by the great fervency of his prayers, relate two falfities. The best edition of his works is that of Father Quesnel (a). Some of the books which are

 " more palpable falfities are included in this history ;
 " the vision in question is related there merely on a
 " doubtful report as follows, Ferunt post discessum Pontificis interrogatum esse Attilam à suis, &c. (i. e. It is related that, after the departure of the Pope, Attila was asked by his attendants, &c.) I therefore may justly say, that we are at liberty not to give credit to this vision; and that we are not to look for a greater miracle on this occasion than that which St. Leo wrought, in his mollifying, and changing to such a degree (merely by his eloquence) the heart of the fiercest and most formidable of men; that he obtained from him, on the spot, and without any conditions, a peace, and made him leave Italy. A very remarkable circumstance on this occasion is, that this great man, who softened the hearts of those barbarous infidels with so much ease, could not be able, by his Letters, to prevail as far over the hereticks." These last words furnish the historian with a happy transition.

[D] His eloquence had not the same success with respect to King Giseric, nor yet was it wholly fruitless. The Empress Eudoxia, widow to Valentinian, had been forced to marry Maximus, who had seized upon the throne after having caused Valentinian to be assassinated. This Maximus had the insolence to tell Eudoxia, that the passion he had to possess her, was the only motive which prompted him to murder the Emperor. Eudoxia being furiously exasperated at so horrid a declaration, . . . sent secretly to Carthage, one of her chief confidants to Giseric King of the Vandals, who had subdued Africa; conjuring him by all the most powerful motives she could suggest, (especially from the facility of the enterprize, every thing being in a defenseless state at Rome, as in a time of full peace) to come with all possible expedition, and revenge the death of Valentinian his ally; and rescue her from her oppression and tyranny of the most cruel and most wicked wretch living (9). This barbarous King, who at that time had a strong fleet in Carthage, did not let slip the opportunity; but embarked on board his ships, landed in Italy without resistance, advanced towards Rome, and, without drawing the sword, had the satisfaction to see that city surrender at discretion, all the gates being thrown open to him (10). "It was then that St. Leo, seeing his poor flock exposed to the fury of those wild beasts, like the good Shepherd who lays down his life to save his sheep, went in person, and addressed this Vandal and Arian King, whom he knew to be a mortal enemy to the Catholics and particularly to the Bishops, on whom he had discharged his fury in Africa, by treating them with greater cruelty and barbarity than any of the rest. Nevertheless this cruel tyrant, who was going to march into Rome, sully determined to destroy all things there with fire and sword, stopped on a sudden at the sight of that wonderful Pontiff; and, as if the august, the sacred majesty which shone on his face, had on a sudden changed his tyger-heart into that of a reasonable man, he paid him all the honour due to the head of the Church. He listened patiently to all he would say; and if his eloquence did not then work the same miracle as it had before done in the person of Attila, in causing him to return whence he came, yet it performed three very remarkable ones. In short his eloquence was so persuasive, that he made Attila promise, that neither the inhabitants should be put to the sword, the houses fired, nor the three chief Churches touched or prophaned, viz. the Constantian, that of St. Peter in the Vatican, and of St. Paul without the walls. He was as good as his word; and after giving up Rome to be plundered by the soldiers during fourteen days, he returned on board his ships loaded with plunder and rich captives, (in order that they might be ransomed) among whom were the Empress Eudoxia, with the Princesses Eudocia and Placidia her two daughters, all whom he treated with the utmost generosity.

[E] Some say that Leo cut off his own hand. It is said that a devout, beautiful woman being admitted to this Pontiff, on Easter-Sunday, according to custom, to kiss his hand, he felt I know not what emotions too like those of flesh and blood; and imagined that it was his duty to follow literally the precept of our Saviour; If thy hand offend thee cut it off. Fuerunt qui scriberent eum pie mulieris specie præstantis, osculo manui Pontificie religiose admoto percussum, muliere neque particeps neque conscius, cæni aliquid contraxisse (11). Cum ipso die Paschatis, pro more recepto, mulierculam ad figendum manui sue osculum admisset, humanum quippiam passus, manus illius abscissione se multavit: secutus illam Christi vocem: Si manus tua scandalizat, abscinde eam (*). But as he was rendered incapable, by his maiming himself in this manner, of saying Mass, there arose murmurs among the people, which made him beg earnestly of God that his hand might be restored to him, and it accordingly was so. From that time we are told, the custom of kissing the Pope's hand was changed to that of kissing his foot. Others relate that St. Leo cut off his own hand, because of his being stung with a remorse of conscience, for having conferred holy orders on a person undeserving of them. Cum autem sanctus Leo eam ob causam sacrificare desisset, idque in populo Romano murmur non leve excitaret, impetravit à Deo ardentissimis precibus, ut manus abscissa sibi restitueretur. Ex eo tamen tempore, abolito usu manibus Pontificis oscula figendi, inducitur est usus figendi osculum pedibus. Scribunt hæc de sancto Leone varii; ac nominatim Sabellicus lib. 5. Andreas Eboensis tit. de Castitate, ac Majorius lib. 1. de irregularit. cap. 14. n. 4. qui addit, aliquos asserere, contigisse ut sanctus Leo manum sibi abscideret, æt præcipitem indigni hominis initiationem (12). i. e. "But when St. Leo left off, on that account, celebrating Mass, and the inhabitants of Rome murmured very much at it, he obtained, by most fervent prayers, that his hand which had been cut off should be restored. The practice of kissing the hands of the Roman Pontiff being from that time abolished, the custom was brought in of kissing his feet. Many authors write these things of St. Leo, especially Sabellicus in his fifth book, Andrew Eboensis in his section concerning Chastity, and Majorius in his first book upon irregularity, chap. 14, n. 4, who adds, that it is affirmed by some writers, that St. Leo cut off his own hand; fired with an holy hatred against himself, because he had inadvertently and rashly conferred orders on a man unworthy of them." The author from whom I borrow this passage, looks upon this story as fabulous, and observes, that the custom of kissing the Pope's hand on Easter Sunday has been continued without interruption to either sex; and with respect to the scruple of orders rashly conferred, he relates the origin of it as follows (13): Quod ad eos attinet qui hanc narrationem referunt ad manus indigno appositas, videntur adducti ad hanc fabellam de sancto Leone confingendam, ex lectione revelationis ex Moscho descriptæ capite 149 Prati spiritualis. Quod scilicet sancto Leone pro peccatis suis ferventer precato, apparuerit ei B. Petrus, dicens exorasse se ei omnium errorum veniam, salva discussione peccatorum, si quæ fuissent ab eo admissa ob indignorum ordinationem. At aliud est quod hac revelatione continetur, aliud quod habet fabulosa calumnia quam retulimus. i. e. "With regard to those persons who refer this relation to his conferring orders on an unworthy person, they seem to have been led to this fiction related of St. Leo, by the perusal of the revelation described from Moschus, in the 149th chapter of his Spiritual Meadow; viz. that St. Leo having prayed with great fervency on account of his sins, St. Peter appeared to him, and said, that he had obtained for him the pardon of all his sins, those excepted which he might have been guilty of, by ordaining of unworthy persons. But the fabulous slander we have related, is different from what is contained in that revelation."

Some assert that the hand St. Leo had cut off, to (11) Theoph. Raynaud. Hypothec. Scilicet. 2. Serie 3. cap. 10. pag. m. 361.

(*) Idem, ibid. Serie 3. cap. 20. pag. 409.

(12) Idem, ibid. pag. 409.

(13) Ibid.

(9) Maimbourg, Hist. du Pontif. de St. Leon, liv. 4. pag. 246. ad ann. 435.

(10) Ibid. pag. 247.

are ascribed to him in that edition, are said, by other authors, to have been wrote by St. Prosper [F], which has given occasion to a learned dispute. A famous Protestant Minister was a little puzzled, by his fixing the æra of Antichrist under Pope Leo [G], who died in 461.

(14) Paulus de Angelis, ubi in- fra.

(15) Paulus de Angelis, in De- script. Basilicæ St. Mariæ Majoris de Urbe, a- pud Daniel. Pa- pebrochium, Resp. ad Exhib. Error. pag. 14.

(16) Papebroch. ibid.

(17) Printed at Paris in 4to, in the year 1689.

(18) See the Journal des Sa- vans 1689, pag. 290, 294, 301, 321. Dutch edit.

(19) Ibid. pag. 321.

(20) Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. 3. Part 2. pag. 157.

(21) Ibid. pag. 158.

(22) Pag. 150, & seq.

(23) In the re- mark [T].

(24) In the re- mark [N].

* Leo was born in Flo- rence in the year 1475, and was cre- ated Cardinal in 1489. From the Re- marks to the Pa- ris ed. (1734) of Bayle's Dic- tionary.

extinguish an unchaste fire, at libidinis ignem restringeret (14), was restored to him by the virtue or power of a picture of the Virgin Mary (15), and made by St. Luke. It is related by St. Antoninus and many others; and yet Baronius can scarce give credit to it (16).

[F] Some of the books which are ascribed to him... are said, by other authors, to have been wrote by St. Prosper. Father Quesnel declares, that the two books concerning the calling of the Gentiles, the letter to Demetrius, and the chapters concerning Grace and Free-will, were not wrote by St. Prosper as is commonly believed, but by St. Leo. See the book (17) entitled, De veris Operibus SS. Patrum Leonis Magni & Prosperi Aquitani, Dissertationes criticae, quibus Capitula de Gratia, &c. Epistolam ad Demetriadem, nec non duos de Vocatione omnium Gentium libros, Leoni nuper adscriptos abjudicat, & Prospero postliminio restituit Josephus Antelmius, Presbyter & Canonicus Ecclesie For- julienfis. Abbot Antelmi has strongly opposed this assertion; he even maintains that St. Prosper is certainly author of the sermons which are thought to be written by St. Leo. A remarkable circumstance in this dispute is, that both the combatants insist on the conformity of style; one to prove that St. Leo is author of the works in question; the other to prove that they are not so, but have St. Prosper for their author (18). The pains which Abbot Antelmi took on this occasion is very remarkable; he having made tables in two columns, wherein he compares several passages of St. Prosper, extracted from books which are confessedly his, and others which are disputed; and shews a great conformity between these passages respectively. These parallels or comparisons with regard to St. Leo's sermons, point out to us forms of speech so peculiar, expressions and turns so much studied and so composed, that it seems next to impossible that they should be made by different authors (19). Notwithstanding this Mr. du Pin says, that Abbot Antelmi's system with regard to the Sermons which go under St. Leo's name, appears to him chimerical; and that the Proofs he al- ludes for that purpose are extremely weak (20). What is much more, du Pin denies the conformity of style insisted upon by Antelmi, and the consequence he should draw from it. "Any person who should take the pains to compare the passages cited by him, would find that there is no conformity of style, between the passages of both authors, though the same words occur in both. And besides, though there should be some slight conformity of style between St. Prosper's writings and those of St. Leo, should we not have reason to say, that St. Prosper had imitated his master, whom he used to hear frequent- ly both speak and preach, whose Sermons he used to read, and perhaps copied, to preserve them in the archives of the Church of Rome, in scrinio Ro- manæ Ecclesie, supposing he had been Notary of the Church of Rome (21)?" Here we have an inci- dent which confirms the reflexions the reader may have seen in the Entretiens sur la Cabale ebimerique (22) See the Articles ERASMUS (23), and JULIUS II (24).

[I am of opinion, that those who ascribe the two books de Vocatione Gentium to St. Leo, have no proof for it; and that those have no better founda- tion who think they were wrote by St. Prosper. By the pieces which are extant of St. Prosper, we find that he was much more vehement in disputa-tion than the author of those books was. In my humble opinion it is safest to say, that we do not know the author of those books, who indeed was a learned man and of a very pacifick temper, and contemporary with St. Leo and St. Prosper.] Remark from the Paris Edition (1734) of Bayle's Dic- tionary.

[G] A famous Protestant Minister was a little puzzled, by his fixing the æra of Antichrist under Pope Leo.] "He will be drove much farther. According to him, in the age of St. Leo, idolatry was so considerable in the Church, as to form an Antichristian Church, and make St. Leo himself Antichrist; and yet the Minister in question writes as follows, in the thirteenth letter of this year. Whilst Antichrist was little, he did not destroy the essence of the Church. Leo... and a few of his successors were good men, so far as goodness and piety are consistent with a boundless ambition. It is likewise certain that the Church, in his time, was DEEPLY IMMERSSED IN THE IDOLATRY of the worship of the creatures, which is one of the characteristics of Antichristianity; and though these evils were not yet extreme, nor such as to DAMN the person of Leo, who otherwise was possessed of good qualities; they nevertheless were suffi- cient to form the beginning of Antichristianity. You see then that a man is not damned, though he is not only an idolater, but also deeply immersed in the idola- try of the worship of creatures. If a man be not of the number of the saints, and if we should be obliged to erase St. Leo from that catalogue, he may at least be of the number of good men; and the sin of idolatry is not so great that a person shall be damned on that account. To urge this matter farther: it has been proved in the Book of Variations, and in other places (*), by the express words of St. John (+), that the beast and Antichrist have blasphemed and been idolatrous from their birth, and during the whole extent of the 1260 days of their continuance. The Protestant Minister would fain have dissembled this, to prevent his being obliged to charge these crimes, on the time and person of St. Leo, St. Simplicius, St. Gelasius, and other holy Pontiffs of the fifth century; but he at last was forced to out with it (†). It is certain that all the characteristics of the beast began from that time. As early as the time of Leo the Great, the Gentiles or Heathens began to tread the Church under foot; for heathenism, which is the worship of the creatures, entered into it. From that period began the blasphemy against God and his Saints; for the taking from God his true worship, to make Saints partake of it, is blaspheming against God. Thus we have Antichristian blasphemy and idolatry established under St. Leo. He could not be free from it, since he himself was the Antichrist; and indeed, it is certain, that he paid as much ho- nour to relics, and implored the assistance of the prayers of the Saints, as the rest. Here then we find not only an idolater, but also the chief or head of Antichristian idolatry in the number of the elect; and that idolatry does not hinder salvation (25)." As this is a dispute between man and man, and not a controversy on the general doctrines of the two Com- munion, I may be allowed to observe, that the author who was puzzled took the best course he could, accord- ing to the maxims of human prudence: he held his peace; and would not even seem to know, that the public had been made sensible of his confusion.

(*) Var. 23. no. 21. Apocal. 2. vertiff. aux Prole- n. 27, 28. pag. 612, 613.

(†) Apocal. XI, XII, 6. 14. XIII, 5, 6.

(‡) Lett. XIII, pag. 99. 2. 6.

(25) Mt. 22. Meaux, III A- vertissement aux Protestans sur les Lettres du Mini- stre Furieu contre l'Hist. des Variats pag. 86. edit. de Hollande.

LEO X, created Pope the 11th of March 1513, was called John de Medicis. He had been honoured with a Cardinal's * Hat at fourteen years of age by Pope Innocent VIII, and a great many years after with the dignity of Legate by Pope Julius II. He was in that quality in the army which was defeated by the French near Ravenna in the year 1512; was taken prisoner there, and, during his captivity, he made a wonderful experiment of the ascendant which superstition has, even over the minds of soldiers [A]. It

[A] He made a wonderful experiment of the ascendant which superstition has, even over the minds of soldiers.]

The soldiers who had overcome him, shewed him such great veneration, that they humbly asked his pardon is pretended that no circumstance contributed more to the raising him to the Pontificate, than the wounds he had received in the battles of Venus [B]. He spent prodigious sums the day of his coronation [C]; and led such a life as was little suited to one who set up for their gaining the victory; besought him to give them absolution for it; and promised never to bear arms against the Pope. It is Cardinal Palavicino informs me of these particulars, after observing that, in contempt of the royal authority, the Milanese looked with horror on the Cardinals who were assembled at Pisa. In Milano con vilipensione dell' autorità Reale furono ricevuti non come Cardinali, Grado riveritissimo nella Christianità, ma come uomini pestiferi e scelerati, e comete di sciagura ne' paesi dove giungevano. Anzi, non ostante che i Francesi riportassero la memorabil vittoria di Ravenna, e conducessero prigione a Milano il Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici Legato dell' Esercito pontificio, che poi assunto al Pontificato prese il nome di Leon Decimo; non si temerò i soldati vincitori dall' andare con incredibile frequenza a venerar come Legato del Vicario di Christo il lor prigioniero; ricevendone l'assoluzione ch'egli aveva pedestra di dar loro per haver combattuto contro alla Chiesa, con promessa d'astenersi per innanzi (1).

[B] No circumstance contributed more to the raising him to the Pontificate, than the wounds he had received in the battles of Venus.] I have so frequently given the reason, why I choose to cite, on such occasions, Romish authors rather than Protestant ones, that without farther preamble I shall here quote the words of a French historian who is a great enemy to the Protestants (2). "Three months were not past since Cardinal de Medicis was returned to Florence, when the death of Pope Julius II obliged him to leave it, to go to Rome. He caused himself to be carried in a litter, because of an imposthume he had in those parts which modestly will not suffer me to name; and travelled so slowly, that the Pontiff's funeral was over, and the Conclave begun, by that time he arrived there (3). The Conclave had not ended so soon as it did, the young and old Cardinals persisting in contrary opinions with equal obstinacy, had not an odd accident brought them to agree. Cardinal de Medicis having hurried about prodigiously in the great number of visits he used to make every night to the Cardinals of his faction, his imposthume or ulcer broke, and the matter which ran from it exhaled so great a stench, that all the cells, which were separated only by thin partitions, were poisoned by it. The old Cardinals, whose constitutions were less able to resist the malignant influence of so corrupted an air, consulted the Physicians of the Conclave, to know what they must do; these Physicians, who visited Cardinal de Medicis, and formed a judgment of his constitution, by the ill humours that flowed from his body, rather than by the strength of nature which drove them out, answered, after having been bribed by the promises of Bibiana, that Cardinal de Medicis could not live a month longer. Their passing this sentence of death upon him occasioned his being chosen Pope; in that the old Cardinals, thinking to outwit the young ones, would indulge them a satisfaction which they imagined would not be of long duration. They therefore waited upon them, and told them that they yielded at last to their obstinacy, upon condition that the same should be done for them another time. Thus Cardinal de Medicis was elected Pope on a false information, he not being at that time quite thirty six years old; and as joy is the most sovereign of all remedies, he soon after recovered so perfect a state of health, that the old Cardinals had reason to repent their too great credulity." To conceal nothing, it is incumbent on me to inform my readers, that Paulus Jovius does not fix this ulcer in the same part as Varillas, but in the anus, which would not imply an ignominious origin. Propter innatum ab ima sede abscessum Romam medicis itineribus ad comitia contendit (4). Fuere qui existimarent vel ob id seniores ad ferenda suffragia facilius accessisse, quod pridie disrupto eo abscessu qui sedem occuparat, tanto factore ex profuente sanie totum comitium implevisset, ut tanquam à mortifera tabe infectus, non diu supervivendum esse vel medicorum testimonio crederetur (5). From the same principle of sincerity I add, that this Pope, at his accession to the throne, was in great reputation for his chastity, if Guicciardin may be credited (5); and was looked upon as very chaste from his youth, if Paulus Jovius may be believed. Constat tamen cum, quod à prima adolescentia opinione omnium summam continentia laudem fuisse adeptus, non importuna quadam pudicitia castissimisque gratia quaesivisse: quando nequaquam pristinae vitae more tam multis delicatisque obsequiis uteretur (6). One ought to conclude from hence, that the Pontificate proved the ruin of the morals of Leo X; and that he grew vicious where he ought to have grown virtuous. In fine, I observe, that it is only by consequences which are not absolutely necessary, that one may find in the words of Varillas, the sense in which I alledge them, and which Mr. de Sackendorf gives them (7). I submit them to the judgment of my readers.

[" Bayle has justly supposed, that every Protestant who first writes down an incident disadvantageous to the memory of a Pope, or does not give good proofs of it, may justly be excepted against. See his remark I. But then to act as a judicious and impartial critic, he ought to have supposed it as a truth, that among the Roman Catholics there are, and ever have been, authors, who have writ like open enemies against the Popes; and with as much fury as the Protestants, or the most passionate Heretics. Schisms, and the disputes of Kings and Princes with the Roman Pontiffs, were the cause and occasion of this. The jealousy, pride, or rage with which a writer has been fired, because a Pope would not gratify him in all he demanded, the itch of publishing a repartee, a pasquinade, or any other satire, and so many other passions, have also given rise to a numberless multitude of libels on the Popes. It is likewise very certain, that even among such historians as are less prejudiced against the See of Rome, many of them had not abilities sufficient for discussing incidents with great exactness; for making a judicious choice of the materials with which they were furnished; but are faulty in setting down one incident without good proofs, or of altering them &c. All this is indisputable. Consequently every critic who undertakes to speak of a Pope, and that pursuant to all the rules which a good historian ought ever to have before his eyes, and never deviate from, should be very much upon his guard, especially when he is to write of a Pope who was in such circumstances as obliged him, as it were, necessarily to be attacked by a numberless multitude of slanderers, and by whom it is certain that he has been prodigiously slandered."] From the remarks on the Paris edition (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary. The Popish author of these remarks makes some others which do not appear just.

[C] He spent prodigious sums the day of his coronation.] He would be crowned the same day he lost the battle of Ravenna and his liberty the year before, and he rode the Turkish horse he had mounted the day of that battle; for he had paid a ransom to the French for this horse; had a particular affection for it, and had it kept and pampered very carefully to an extreme old age. Vetus est etiam in pompa illo eodem equo Ibracio in quo ad Ravennam captus fuerat, quem ab hostibus pecunia redemptum ita adamavit, ut postea usque ad extremam senectutem summa cum indulgentia alendam curavit (8). And his imagination being filled with the magnificence of ancient Rome, and the triumphal days of the ancient Consuls, he endeavoured to revive those noble spectacles; and was so well seconded in his design, that ever since the irruption of the Goths, there had not been seen any sight more magnificent at Rome than his coronation. Read the description of it in Paulus Jovius (9), who says, with Guicciardin (10), that the expence of it amounted to an hundred thousand ducats. Gretser censures du Pleffis for saying it cost a million, nec mirum agit Pleffius cum Leone X, quem die coronationis suae decies centena aureorum millia, hoc est ut vulgo loquimur millionem consumpsisse scribit (11). This is found in the Latin edition which Father Gretser made use of; but in the French edition I use, du Pleffis Morvai mentions only the hundred thousand ducats of Guicciardin.

(5) See the remark [O].

(6) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 193.

(7) Hist. Litterar. lib. 1. pag. 190. col. 2. num. 3. & col. 20. lit. E.

(1) Palavic. Historia de Concilio di Trento, lib. 1. cap. 1. num. 2. pag. m. 47. See also Paulus Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, lib. 2. pag. m. 110.

(2) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, liv. 6. pag. 253.

(3) Ibid. pag. 257.

(4) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X. lib. 3. pag. 126.

(5) Ibid. pag. 128.

(8) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 129, 130.

(9) Ubi supra.

(10) Guicciardin. lib. 11. folio m. 326 verso.

(11) Gretser. in Exam. Myth. Pleffiani, pag. 561. citing pag. 618. of the Myth. libr.

(*) Among others, Peter Ægineta, a Greek, who explained Aristophanes in Bologna, and had taught him the Greek tongue. See Langius's Letters, pag. m. 473.

up for a successor of the Apostles; a life, I say, that was wholly voluptuous [D]. He took too much delight in hunting. It is related that his eye was surprizingly quick at this sport [E]. Having been educated by Preceptors (a), who had taught him perfectly the Belles Lettres, he loved and protected men of wit and learning. The Poets were chiefly happy in his munificence, which he sometimes indulged, without preserving the gravity

[D] He led . . . a life . . . that was wholly voluptuous. Paulus Jovius cannot be accused of having been too sparing of his encomiums on Leo X; but, on the other hand, it must be confessed that he expresses himself with so much plainness on the vices of this Pontiff, that he does not leave an intelligent reader in doubt or suspense. The pleasures, says he, in which he too frequently immersed himself, and the lewd actions objected to him, sullied the lustre of his virtues. He adds, that a disposition more easy and complacent than corrupt, threw him down the precipice; he having been surrounded only with a set of people, who, instead of admonishing him of his duty, were for ever proposing some party of pleasure. The original is more emphatical than the extract I give of it, for which reason I will here add the words of Paulus Jovius. Has præclaras liberalis excelsique animi virtutes, cum nimia sæpe vitæ luxuria, tum obiectæ libidines obscurabant: ita tamen, ut jucunditate blandæ facilisque naturæ potius, ac regia quadam licentia, quam certo depravati animi judicio in ea vitia prolabi videretur, quum frequenti blandientium turba cubiculi fores obfessæ paucos admitterent, qui aliqui docilis verecundique hominis solutos mores cobiberent, amicorum optimis ad ea coniventibus; ac libenter sese illecebrarum ministris immiscerentibus, ne gratiam apud summos principes in lubrico positam in discrimen adducerent, si ingratum auribus potentium reprehensionis officium honestatis atque benevolentia specie suscepissent. Verùm hominem hilaritati humanitate sensibus facile servientem mirum in modum incitabant plerique Cardinales opibus atateque florentes, qui illustri loco nati, ac liberaliter educati, regio luxu vitam in venationibus, conviviiis, atque spectaculis libentissime traducebant (12). He confesses a little after that this Pope was accused of Sodomy (13): Non caruit etiam infamia, quòd parum honeste nonnullos à cubiculariis (erant enim à tota Italia nobilissimi) adamare, & cum his tenerius atque liberè joculari videretur. Sed quis vel optimus atque sanctissimus princeps in hac maledicentissima aula lividorum aculeos vitavit? & quis ex adverso tam malignè improbus ac invidiæ tabe consumptus, ut vera demum posset obesse, noxiùm secreta scrutatus est? i. e. "He also was accused of being engaged in an ignominious commerce with some young Gentlemen of his bedchamber, who were of the noblest families in all Italy, and of sporting shamefully with them. But what Prince, though the worthiest and most pious, was exempt from the darts of envy in this very satyrical Court? And what person, on the other hand, was fired with so malignant and envious a spirit, as to pry into the secrets of the night, in order to get subjects for reproach?" I pass over what is related concerning the luxury of his table, and the buffonries acted at it. Mire quoque favit Pogio seni, Pogii historici filio, itemque Moro nobili à gula intemperantia, articularibus doloribus distorto, & Brandino equiti, Marianoque sannioni cucullato facetissimis belluonibus, & in omni genere popinalium deliciarum eruditissimis . . . Verum festivissimis eorum facetiis, falsisque & perurbanis scommatibus magis quam ullis palati lenociniis oblectabantur (14). I have made some mention of this in the article of HADRIAN VI (15), successor to Leo X, and who retrenched the luxury of that Pontiff, as the reader will now see. "The other day the grooms of the late Pope Leo deputed a person from among them, and sent him to the Pope, to speak in the name of all the rest. The Pontiff asked how many of them had been in the retinue of Leo; when the person deputed answered, an hundred. Adrian crossing himself, as astonished at so superfluous a number, answered, that four would be enough for him; but that he was content that twelve should be put upon the list, since some he must have, in order to exceed the number kept by the Cardinals. In a word, the common opinion is, that this Pope will be a good oconomist and treasurer for the Church; a thing that in reality is greatly wanted, considering his predecessor's prodigality." This passage is found in a letter of Jerom Niger (*), writ from Rome the 1st of September 1522. It is inserted in the collection of Ruscelli, translated by Belleforest. [N. B. Mr. Bayle tells us, that he had made use of the version and marginal note of the last mentioned translator.]

(*) The name of this Italian author, in his own tongue, was Negro, and not Niger; he always subscribing his letters in the former manner. REM. CRIT.]

[E] His eye was surprizingly quick at hunting. This I shall take notice of, after mentioning the prodigious passion which Leo X had for the sport in question. He took a wonderful delight in it; he knew and observed the laws of it, much better than those of the scripture; he could not bear that any one should disturb him in his sport; and gave no quarter to those persons who, through imprudence or otherwise, made him lose the prey they were in quest of. On these occasions he would revile such persons in the sharpest manner. He was always so much out of humour when he failed of sport, that his courtiers were sure never to ask any favours of him at such times; but whenever he met with a great deal of game, he would be so overjoyed on this account, that these would be the most propitious moments (16) for obtaining all that might be requested. Paulus Jovius relates this with very great elegance. Venationibus & aucupiiis nobilioribus adeo perditè studebat, ut spurcissimas sæpe teppestates insalubresque ventos, & frequentia mansionum ac itinerum incommoda obstinatè contemneret . . . (17). In venando autem scilicet præcepta artis ad normam exactioris disciplinae patientissime observare erat solitus, ita severitatem asperè admodum vir aliqui lenissimus semper exercuit; in eos præsertim, qui petulanti discursu aut vocibus temere editis improvisa feris effugia præbuisent: ita ut claros sæpe viros acerbissimis contumeliis oneraret. At si quando imperitia, vel fortuito errore hominum, aut feris subtiliore aliquo insperatæ fugæ compendio servatis, vel iis densò in nemore contumacius latentibus infeliciter venaretur, incredibile est quali vultus animique habitu dolorem iracundiamque præferret. Propterea amici familiares ea temporis momenta provocandæ liberalitati maximè adversa sedulo devitabant: quando aliàs secundum opimam venationem, ac præsertim vario ac insigni labore aliquo nobilem, maxima beneficia incredibili benignitate collocaret (18). i. e. "He was so excessively delighted with hunting and hawking, that he would often obstinately contemn the most foul storms, the most insalubrious winds, and the many inconveniences of travelling. . . . But in hunting, as he observed very strictly the laws of that exercise, so he was extremely severe, though otherwise of the most gentle disposition, on these occasions; particularly towards those persons, who, by their petulant discourse or noisy clamour, gave the Game an opportunity of escaping; inasmuch that he would inveigh bitterly against persons of quality. But whenever it happened, either through ignorance or mistake of the sportsmen; or that the game unexpectedly escaped, or could not be forced out of its haunts, that he thereby was unsuccessful in the chase, he would appear surprizingly grieved and exasperated. And therefore his intimate friends were prodigiously careful not to sue for any favour at this time. But, on the contrary, when he was successful in the chase, and it was distinguished by the greatness of the toil, he would bestow the most considerable favours with prodigious liberality." With regard to his figure, here follows a passage from the Bigarrures of the Sieur des Accords (19). "Pope Leo having caused the following numerical letters to be engraved on a table, to denote the year of his Pontificate, they were thus interpreted M. CCCCLX. [This passage from the Bigarrures, has a very gross error in it which escaped Mr. Bayle, where it is said, Pope Leo having caused the numerical letters MCCCCLX to be engraved . . . to denote the year of his Pontificate

(16) Mollis additus & quæ molissima fandi Tempora. Virgil. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 423, & 293.

(17) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 196.

(18) Idem, pag. 197.

(19) Des Accords, Bigarrures, chap. 12 folio m. 105 verso.

(12) Jovius in Vita Leonis X, pag. 188.

(13) Idem, ibid. pag. 192.

(14) Idem, ibid. pag. 191.

(15) Citat. (68).

(b) See the close of the remark [F].

gravity his character required [F]. This was visible on many occasions, and even in the privileges he granted to Ariosto's Poems (b). In short, it may be said, that men of learning

"Pontificate &c. These letters make 1460, and Leo was not born then." From the remarks to the Paris edition (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary.] "Multi Cardinales cæci creaverunt cæcum Leonem decimum. (Many blind Cardinals created the blind Leo X.) Now to speak it occasionally; I know not why he is called blind, since he could see in hunting, at the highest soar by the help of glasses, Hawks, Vultures, and Eagles. But then, on the other hand, whenever he read, he used to put the paper to his nose; and even then could not distinguish a letter, as Luke Gauricus informs us in fibematibus cælestibus. This puts me in mind of an honest sort of a Parson, who cannot read the large letters of the Church-books without spectacles; and yet shall distinguish the smallest dice that can be found, and cannot be imposed upon."

Paulus Jovius confirms but part of this; he asserting that Leo X could read the smallest character with great ease, when he brought the paper close to his eye. Subtraherent magna ex parte oris suavitatem obfæ malæ & oculi extantes convolutique & hebetes, verùm si ad pupillam inspicienda propius admoveret, supra fidem acutissimi: supplices enim libellos, vel minutissimis literis, & crebris sillabarum compendiis properanter exaratos celerrimè & distinctissimè lætitabat: admota autem cristallo concava, oculorum aciem in venationibus & aucupiiis adè latè extendere erat solitus, ut non modò spaciis & finibus, sed ipsa etiam discernendi felicitate cunctis anteiret (20). i. e. "A circumstance that very much lessened the sweetness of his aspect was, his bloated cheeks, and his eyes which were prominent, rowling, and dim-sighted; and nevertheless extremely sharp whenever he brought any thing near to the pupil; he reading with great quickness, and distinctly, petitions though in the minutest characters, and with many contractions; and, by using a concave glass, he would extend his sight to such a degree in hunting, that he surpassed every one, not only in space, but even in discerning acutely." I have just now consulted Luke Gauricus's book cited by Des Accords, and do not find he says that Leo X could not see at all when he put the paper to his nose. I will cite Gauricus, whose impertinence cannot fail of being wondered at, to find him ascribe to the planets, the various qualities of the two eyes of the Pope in question. Sol cum stellis nebulosis, oculi dextri aciem penitus hebetavit cum multis lineis transversis. Luna in sexta cæli statione sub Geminorum asterismo ad Martis tetragonam radiationem defluens, oculi quoque sinistri lucem impediabat, adeo quidem quod nec legere, neque aliquid intueri poterat absque conspicio magno cristallino, non autem illius aciem prorsus desiderabat, quoniam salutaris Stella Jovis, Lunam trigonica radiatione intuebatur, & ita Literas lætitabat naso proximiores & oculo, sed cum illo vitreo oculo suspiciebat Accipitres, Aquilas, Astures alius volitantes, & longe melius quam alii venatores, ibatque sæpius ad venationes Leporum, Caprearum silvestrium, & vulpium, illasque optime suspiciebat, quæ à canibus leporariis & molossis capiebantur (21). i. e.

"The Sun, with cloudy itars, quite dimmed (with a great number of transverse lines) the sight of his right eye. The moon, in the sixth house, in the constellation of Gemini, turning to the quartil of Mars, injured the sight of his left eye to such a degree, that he could not read at all without the help of a large crystal glass. However, the sight of it was not quite gone, because the salutary planet Jupiter was at that time in trine with the moon, and in this manner he read over letters by putting them near to his nose and eyes. But by the help of his glass, he could perceive Hawks and Eagles, when soaring aloft, much better than the other sportsmen; he often used to divert himself with hare-hunting, and that of wild goats and foxes; and had a perfect sight of them, when seized by the hounds and mastiffs."

[F] The Poets were chiefly happy in his munificence, which he sometimes indulged without preserving the gravity his character required.] The pleasures he sometimes used to indulge himself in with them, degenerated sometimes to buffoonry. Quernus, who had been crowned in a solemn manner, and raised to the honour of Poet Laureat, might be considered as a Merry-Andrew. He used to come where Pope Leo was at dinner; and eat, at the window, the morsels which were handed to him. He was allowed to quaff liberally of the Pope's wine, but it was on condition that he should make some ex tempore verses on any given subject. He was obliged to compose two lines at least; and in case of his failure, or if his verses were good for nothing, he was sentenced to drink a large quantity of water with his wine (22). Fuit diu inter instrumenta eruditæ voluptatis longè gratissimus, quum cæcante Leone porrectis de manu semefis obsoniis, stans in fenestra vesceretur, & de principis lagena perpotando, subitaria carmina factitaret: ea demum lege, ut præscripto argumento bina saltem carmina ad mensam, tributi nomine solverentur, & in pœnam sterili vel inepto longè diluissimè foret perbibendum (23). Some-

(22) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. 82.

(23) Idem, ibid. pag. 191.

times too the Pope would make ex tempore verses with his Poet-Laureat, at which the company would burst out a laughing. How ludicrous was all this! Ab hac autem opulentiâ hilarique sagina, vehementem incidit in podagram; sic ut bellissimè ad risum evenerit, quum de se canere jussus, in hunc hexametrum erupisset;

Archipoëta facit versus pro mille pœtis,

Et demum hæsitaret, inexpectatus Princeps hoc pentametro perargutè responderit;

Et pro mille aliis Archipoëta bibit.

Tum ærè astantibus obortus est risus, & demum multò maximus, quum Quernus stupens & interritus, hoc tertium non inepte carmen induxisset:

Porrige, quod faciat mihi carmina docta, Falernum.

Idque Leo repente mutuatus à Virgilio, subdiderit,

Hoc etiam enervat: debilitatque pedes (24).

(24) Ibid.

The sense is,

"The living in this luxurious manner brought a severe gout upon him; notwithstanding which he excited laughter, when being commanded to write some verses on himself, he broke into the following Hexameter.

"For just a thousand Bards the Laureat writes;

"And hesitating, the Pope unexpectedly added this very witty pentameter;

"The Laureat drinks for just a thousand more.

"This made the company fall a laughing; and they afterwards were ready to split their sides, when Quernus surprized, but undismayed, added this third pretty line;

"Give me Falernian wine to raise my Muse,

"To which Leo, instantly borrowing from Virgil, added;

"This likewise weakens and enerves the feet."

One day a Poet presenting to him some Latin verses, in rhyme, the Pope, for diversion sake, gave him no other reward but an extempore flight, containing the same number of verses, with the same rhymes. The Poet exasperated against Leo for not bestowing any recompence on him, let fly the following Distich;

*Si tibi pro numeris numeros fortunâ dedisset,
Non esset capiti tanta corona tuo.*

The sense is,

"Had fate thus given thee only verse for verse,
"So great a crown had not adorn'd thy head."

Upon this the Pope exerted his usual beneficence to him (25). By this it appears that our Pope did all that lay in his power to divert himself. But here follows

(25) Extracted from a book intitled, La sage folie, translated from the Italian of Antonio Maria Spelta, Historiographer to the King of Spain, and printed at Roan in 1635. Part. 2. pag. 103, 104.

(20) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 211.

(21) Lucas Gauricus, Gæpponenfis, Episcopus Civitatis in Tractatu Astrologico, in quo agitur de præteritis multorum hominum accidentibus per proprias eorum genituras ad unguem examinatis, folio 18 verso edit. Venetæ apud Curtium Trojanum Navo 1552 in 4to.

learning and buffoons shared equally his friendship [G]; but he had not the same affection for theological studies [H]. I would not take upon me to warrant the truth of a story which is related, viz. that he one day ridiculed the whole Christian doctrine as fabulous [I]. He had the address to ruin the Council, which the Emperor and King of France had opposed to Julius II, and made the Council of Lateran to triumph; he obtaining lows an incident, which plainly shews the buffooning spirit that then prevailed in this Pope's palace. A man having a favour to sue for from Leo X; and being trifled with several days by inconvenient delays, which put him out of all hopes of being introduced, he thought of the following artifice. He told Leo's great chamberlain, that he had some of the finest verses that were ever read to shew him. The chamberlain, in the utmost transports of joy, flies to the Pope, and tells him that he had met with the Prince of fools; one who would give him the greatest diversion. It was the custom of the courtiers of Leo X, to look out for persons that were half crazed, and to make them quite so for the diversion of the head of the Church (26). But they were over-reached by the pretended Poet in question; for the moment he was introduced to the Pope, he confessed the true reason which had prompted him to counterfeit a crack-brained Poet, and told him his business. But those who understand Latin, will read this with more satisfaction in the following words of Nicius Erythraeus. Hoc hominum ridicule insanientium genere non minimum delectabatur Leo X Pontifex Max. cujus Gnathones, quos circa se habebat, dabant operam, ut eos, quibus levis mens esset, ad insaniam adigerent, sequere eos esse, qui non essent, arbitrarentur. In quo mirabiliter lusus est à quodam, cui petenti aditum conveniendi non dabat: quicum multos dies expectasset, atque omnes ad Pontificem allegationes difficiles, omnes aditus arduos interclusosque videret, seducto Pontificii cubiculi praefecto in aurem dixit, se esse poetam, solum praeter ceteros, qui sua vellet carmina Pontifici tradere, quibus lectis obstupesceret, borretur, ad incredibilem admirationem efferretur. Quo ille auditum, ventis atque avibus oculis advolarit in Leonis cubiculum, atque hilaritate letitiaque redundans, Invenimus, inquit, perfectae insaniae hominem, qui tibi voluptati maxima erit. At ille sine mora intromissus, ex illis se integumentis simulationis evolavit, causam, cur insaniam simulasset, aperuit, negotium, quod volebat, exposuit. Itaque ille deridiculo eos habuit, quibus ludendus tradebatur (27). Was it observing the decorum which the dignity of Pontiff required, to issue out a Bull so favourable to Ariosto's poems? Cardinal Hyppolito di Este, to whom this Poet's Orlando Furioso was dedicated, formed a very true judgment of it, when he put the following question to the author, Messer Lodoico dove Diavolo havete pigliato tante coimerie. i. e. "Ariosto, whence, in the Devil's name, could you collect so much nonsense?" But Leo X was infinitely more gracious to this author. "Almost at the same time that he fulminated his anathemas against Martin Luther; he did not blush to publish a Bull in favour of Ariosto's profane poems; threatening to excommunicate those who should censure them, or any way impede the Printer's profit (28)." We shall see in another place (29), that he was a great admirer of pieces in a comic strain.

[G] Men of learning and buffoons shared equally his friendship.] Peter Matthieu the historian, having observed that Leo X had as great an affection for buffoons, as for the most learned men of Italy, and changed his humours from one extreme to another (30), quotes the following passage from Aretin. "E beato colui che e pazzo, ne la pazzia sua compiace ad altri e a se stesso. Certamente Leone hebbe una natura da' stremo à estremo, & non faria opra da ogniuno il giudicare chi piu gli dilettaffe, o la vertu de i dotti, o le ciancie de i buffoni, e di cio fa fede il suo hadato à l'una e à l'altra specie essaltando tanto questi quanto quegli." i. e. "Happy is that man who is a fool, and whose folly pleases others and himself too. Certainly the cast of Leo's disposition was for extremes; and it would be no easy matter to judge which gave him the greatest pleasure, the science of the Literati, or the jests of buffoons; and this is manifest by his favouring both these sorts of men, sometimes preferring the one, and sometimes the other." Peter Matthieu, who often cites our Aretin, took much more pains than Menage (31).

[H] He had not the same affection for theological studies.] Cardinal Palavicino could not deny this. He owns frankly that Leo X had a greater regard for persons who understood mythology, the Poets of antiquity, and profane learning, than for those who were conversant in divinity, and ecclesiastical history. Here follow his words, which are more frank and less insincere than usual. Gli oppone il Soave, ch'egli haveffe maggior notizia di lettere profane che sacre ed appartenenti alla religione: nel che io non gli contradico. Havendo Leone ricevuto da Dio un ingegno capacissimo e singularmente studioso; ed appena uscito dalla fanciullezza veggendosi tosto nel supremo Senato della Chiesa; mandò al suo debito con trascurar nella letteratura una parte non solamente la più nobile, mà la più proporzionata al suo Grado. E s'accrebbe tal mancamento quando in età di trentasett'anni costituito Presidente e Maestro della religione, non solo continuò di donarsi tutto alle curiosità degli studii profani; mà nella Reggia della medesima religione con maggior cura chiamò coloro à cui fosser note le favole della Grecia e le delizie de' Poeti, che l'istorie della Chiesa, et la dottrina de' Padri. Non lasciò ei veramente di remunerar la Scholastica Theologia, onorandola con la Porpora in Tommaso di Vio, in Egidio da Viterbo, e in Adriano Florenzio suo Successore, e coll' ufficio di Maestro del Sacro Palazzo in Silvestro da Prierio; le cui penne illustrarono immortalmente quella sacra disciplina. Mà nè co' Theologi usò di conversare come co' Poeti; ne promesse l'erudizione sacra come la profana; lasciando la Chiesa in quella scarsezza in cui la trovò di persone che dopo l'infelice ignoranza di molti secoli ravvivassero la prima, com' si ravvivava già la seconda (32). i. e. "Fra Paolo objects to him, that he was better skilled in profane Literature than in sacred or religious learning, which I do not deny. Heaven had bestowed on Leo a consummate genius, and a singular industry; and, though but young, seeing himself seated in the supreme Senate of the Church, he yet was wanting in his duty, in neglecting, the species of Literature, not only the noblest in its kind, but the most suitable to his station. And this neglect increased, when, being seven and thirty years old, and being set, at the head of all religious affairs, he not only continued to devote himself wholly to the curiosity of profane studies; but, for the regulating of religion, was more assiduous in inviting those who were conversant in the fables of Greece, and the compositions of Poets, than such as were acquainted with ecclesiastical history and the doctrine of the fathers. He nevertheless encouraged school Divinity; he raising to the purple, Thomas di Vio, Giles da Viterbo, and Adrian Florenzio his successor; and appointing Silvester da Prierio master of the sacred Palace, whose Pens will illustrate to latest posterity that sacred science. But he did not converse with the Divines as with the poets, nor so much encourage sacred erudition as he did profane; leaving the Church in the same want as he had found it, of learned men, who, after the unhappy ignorance of many centuries, should revive the former, as the latter was revived." It were to be wished that these two historians, had agreed together so well on all occasions.

[I] It is related... that he one day ridiculed the whole Christian doctrine as fabulous.] (3). The tradition is, that upon his secretary Bembo's quoting something from the Gospel, he answered, "It is well known of old how profitable this fable of Jesus Christ has been to us;" quantum omnibus nostrisque ea de Christo fabula profuerit, satis est omnibus seculis notum. This story is related in the Mystere d'Iniquité (33), and in a numberless multitude of other books, but without being supported by citations, or any other proof than the authority of Bale; so that the three or four hundred authors who, copying one another, have related this, ought to be reduced to a single testimony, and that is Bale; a testimony manifestly exceptionable, (31) See citation (46) of the article ARE-TIN (Peter).

(32) Palavicino's Historia del Concilio di Trento, lib. 1. cap. 2. num. 2. pag. 50.

(33) Cardinal Bembo his Secretary (these two titles do not agree well. Bembo not being a Cardinal under Leo X) quoting a passage to him out of the Gospel, he had the presumption to say, what great service has this fable of Christ done to us and to our whole College? Du Plestis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 584.

(26) See Paulus Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, lib. 4. pag. 189, 190. when he speaks of Tarascon the Musician, and Baraballus the Poet. See citation (58) and the following (*).

(27) Janus Nicius Erythraeus, Pinacub. 2. cap. 33. pag. 210.

(28) David Blondel, Examen de la Bulle d'Innocent X, pag. 3.

(29) In the remark [B] of the article MACHIAVEL.

(30) Matthieu, Hist. de Henri IV, liv. 3. tom. 2. pag. m. 716.

(c) See remark [G] of the article JULIUS II.

taining from Lewis XII all the submission he could desire from him (c). But he obtained from Francis I a much more solid advantage, by the Concordat concluded between them in the year 1515; which nevertheless did not incline him more to favour France. So far from receptionable, as he wrote in open war against the Pope, and the Church of Rome in general. No court of Judicature in the world would admit the depositions of such a witness, making oath that he has heard so or so; for when once the person appears to be an open enemy to the man he accuses, the challenges of the party impeached would be declared valid. As therefore controversial books are produced by the contending parties in a cause pleaded before the publick; it is certain that neither the testimony of a Protestant controversial writer, with regard to an incident which reflects on the Roman Pontiff, nor the testimony of a Popish controversial writer with respect to an incident that reflects on the Protestants, ought to be considered as any thing. The publick, who are the judges of such causes, ought to reject all such depositions, and pay no more regard to them than to things that never happened. Particular persons are allowed, if once fully persuaded of Bale's veracity and honour, to believe what he affirms; but then they ought to keep their belief to themselves; and not exhibit it to the publick as a judicial proof of one's pretensions against the adverse party. This, in my opinion, is a circumstance that is not sufficiently observed.

§. (8) It was in the Pontificate of Leo X that Ulric de Hutten published his dialogue entitled Trias Romana. Now that author says as follows, in this ingenious satyr of the court of Rome; Trias, VADISCVS ait, paucissimi Romæ credunt, animarum immortalitatem, communionem Sanctorum, & Infernorum Pœnas. ERNH. Persuasit. Existimo enim, si animam crederent immortalem, utique eam excoleret quisque, ejusque commodis inserviret, nunc corporis voluptatem in tantum sectantur, ut animam premant modis omnibus. Illam verò beatorum communionem si quid facerent, etiam ejus participes esse vellent. Porro de pœnis Infernorum vel verbum dicere inter præclaros hos Quirites pro anili est FABULA (*).

(*) Pasquillon. tom. des Elements. 1544, tom. 2. pag. 258.

"It is observed, that very few in Rome believe three things, the immortality of the Soul, the communion of Saints, and hell torments. For did they believe the first, they would adorn it to the utmost of their power, and do all things for its advantage; instead of which they indulge so much in bodily pleasures, that they oppress the soul by all methods possible. Then had they any value for the communion of Saints, they would be partakers of it. Lastly, to mention but a word of hell torments before these illustrious Romans, is looked upon as an old wife's FABLE." This very probably may be the original of this story. REM. CRIT.] Another story is related, which is liable to the same objections as the first. It is said that Leo hearing two men dispute, one whereof denied, and the other asserted the immortality of the Soul, pronounced that the affirmative seemed true to him, but that the negative was more proper to give a man a chearful countenance. Leonis X Papæ dictum refert (Lutherus) qui audita disputatione in qua unus immortalitatem animæ defendebat, alter oppugnabat, dixerit, tu quidem vera videris dicere, sed adversarii tui oratio facit bonum cultum, id est lætiores mentem (Ital. buona cera) ex Epicuri scilicet sententia.

(34) Commentar. In Caput XIX Genesios, ver. 13. folio 132. apud Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran. lib. 3. pag. 676. col. 1.

It is Luther says this (34). A person may, if he pleases, believe Luther; but then his testimony ought not to be admitted. He is a man who is engaged in open war with the Pope; he is an enemy persecuted and excommunicated; the practice of courts of Judicature requires that his testimony should be excepted against, and even that his oath should be refused; he ought to prove his assertions or say nothing. A famous professor of divinity in Zurick relates this incident on the authority of a book (35), that is as exceptionable as Luther himself. Qualis fuerit Leo . . . constabit . . . si de ejus . . . impietate & atheismo nonnihil attexuerimus. Ille scilicet opus Johannis XXIV. animam in corporis domicilio sic insinuatam statuentis, ut extra illum carcerem non duret; jussit aliquando (uti Recusat. Synod. Trid. par. 2. caui. 8. pag. 266. comprobant videre est) personatos Philosophos duos, ceu moriones ex adverso ad mensam assistere; quos animi gratia de immortalitate animæ disputantes audiret; alterum qui affirmaret, & qui impugnet, alterum. Cumque

(35) Intitled, Recusatio Synodi Tridentinae. See the article TUPPIUS.

finita disputatione judicium in arbitrium Pontificis bi rejicerent, ille sic definita sententia controversam diremit: Etsi tu, inquit ad affirmantem, pulchras & bonas rationes habeas; tamen ego sententiam hujus, negantis, approbo, ceu firmiorem, & quæ faciat bonum vultum (36). i. e. "It will appear what kind of man Leo was, if some particulars be added concerning his impiety and atheism. The Pontiff in question entertaining the same opinion with John XXIV. who supposed that the soul was so attached to the body that it could not exist separately from it, commanded one day (as is manifest from Recusat. Synod. Trid. par. 2. cauf. 8. pag. 166) two mimic Philosophers, like buffoons, to stand opposite to each other at a table; and to argue before him concerning the immortality of the Soul, the one to assert, and the other to deny it. The dispute being ended, and the decision of it referred to the Pontiff, he pronounced concerning this contest as follows: Notwithstanding that you, says he to the assertor, have offered fine and good reasons, I nevertheless approve the opinion of this man (the denier) as the more solid, and what gives a man a more chearful countenance." He afterwards relates the answer, which it is said he made Bembus; and as he was fully sensible that all things of this kind ought to be proved by the testimony of Roman Catholick authors, he orders the matter thus; he quotes the famous Count of Mirandola's nephew: Et ne ab hereticis hæc conficta clamitent ei & invidias, ejus rei auctoritas & auctoritas (37) testem damus, qui & scire debebat, & causam cur mentiretur non habebat, Johannis Pici, Mirandulani Comitiss nepotem ex fratre minime degenerem, qui in illo Pisani & Lateranensis Concilii consilio, quaestionem tractans, utrum Concilia vel Pontifices errare possint, inter alia de Leone hoc loquens: Meminimus, inquit, Pontificem creditum & adoratum, qui nullum Deum credens, omne infidelitatis (ἀθεϊσμοῦ) culmen excederet: pessimaque ejus opera in cœmendo Pontificatu, in omnigenis sceleribus exercendis, id ipsum testabatur: sed & pessima quoque dicta confirmabant. Namque factum eum affirmabatur domesticis quibusdam, nullum se Deum aliquando, etiam dum Pontificiam Sedem teneret, credidisse, quæ ejus verba libro de fide & ordine credendi, theorem. 4. pag. 259, 260. legere est (38).

(36) Heidegger. Hist. Popat. pag. 204, 205. He may have found all this very near word for word in Bernegerus's Tabularum, pag. 272, 273. edit. 1624.

(37) Nevertheless, what Heidegger advances, is not mentioned by John Picus's nephew as a thing which it was said a Pope had confessed. He does not say that he heard the Pope himself say so.

(38) Heidegger, Hist. Popatum, pag. 205.

"And to prevent our antagonists from crying aloud, that these things are only fictions invented by hereticks, I shall present you with an eye witness, as well as ear witness, to this thing; a witness who both ought to know, and had no inducement to tell an untruth; I mean the excellent nephew of John Picus, Count of Mirandola, who, in that consist of the council of Pisa and Lateran, arguing on the following question, viz. whether it be possible for Councils or Popes to err; among other particulars, says as follows of Leo: I remember a Roman Pontiff believed and worshipped, who himself not believing a God, exceeded the utmost limits of atheism. That this was true, is confirmed by his purchasing the Pontifical Throne; by his committing wickednesses of every kind; and even his abominable words. For it is affirmed, that he owned to some of his domesticks, even whilst he sat in the pontifical chair, that he did not believe the existence of a God, which words of this Pope you may find in the book de fide & ordine credendi, theorem. 4. pag. 259, 260." The reader will doubtless be pleased to see here more at large, and in English, John Picus's account. "Treating also the question, whether it be possible for Councils or Popes to err, which may be easily determined from his own notion, since he presupposes that they may swerve from the holy Scriptures, he tells us, that several councils have erred, and several Popes fallen into hereby; it often happening, that he who was looked upon as President or Head of the Church, either did not rightly preside, or was not capable of doing it: For, says he, History informs us, that a woman was looked upon as Pope; and I remember that in our age, a learned man, of applauded morals, and raised to honours in the order to which he belonged, declared, but not in public, that he who was from it, he concluded Leagues against that Kingdom; and took, as we are told, this affair so much to heart, that when news was brought of the ill success the French had met with, he died through excess of joy (d) [K]. Not but there are writers who affirm that he was poisoned. He did not always take such measures as were agreeable to the Emperor Maximilian [L]. The fordid traffic to which he reduced the distribution of indulgences, (d) In the beginning of December 1521.

" looked upon as Pope was not really such, because he had exercised the Pontifical office, before he had been elected by both parties of the Cardinals, in opposition to the laws of the Church, which decree, that such a man not only is not Pope; but that he also is absolutely unqualified and incapacitated for that office, as being under an anathema. II. We also remember another chosen and worshipped as Pope, whom nevertheless several great men thought was not, nor could be such, because he did not believe a God, and was arrived at the highest pitch of infidelity; which was evident from his most wicked works, he having purchased the Papal throne, and committing all kinds of vices in it; and even confirmed it by his most execrable discourses; for it is affirmed that he had owned to some of his domesticks, that even while he sat in the Pontifical chair, he did not believe the existence of a God. III. We have heard speak of another, who, when living, had declared to a particular friend of his, that he did not believe the immortality of the soul; but that when dead, he appeared to him, as he was awake; and declared that he experienced immortality, he being sentenced to everlasting fire by the just judgment of God (39)." Du Plessis was of opinion, that the first of these three things related to Julius II, and the second to Leo X. Coeffeteau (40); only answered, that du Plessis presuming to scrutinize the consciences of mankind in general, had made this application without proof or judgment; but Gretser made a better answer; he shewing that not one of these three things related to Leo X, because John Francis Picus's book was printed during the Pontificate of Julius II. Intolerabilis porro est plane diabolica calumnia est, cum scribit Plessius, ea quæ Theoremate quarto Joannis Francisci continentur, de quodam Pontifice, qui domesticis confessus fuerit, nullum se Deum aliquando, etiam cum cathedram Pontificiam teneret, credidisse, ad Leonem X, pertinere; nam Joannes Picus edidit Commentarium de Fide & ordine credendi ante Leonis Pontificatum; inscriptum enim Julio II. Quomodo igitur relatione illa seu historia seu fabelle Leonem X denotare potuit (41)? Rivet acquiesced in this censure, his words being as follow:

(39) Du Plessis Mornai, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 590.

(40) Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1233.

(41) Gretser in Examine Mystere Pless. pag. 573.

(42) History of Italy, liv. 1.

(43) Rivet, Remarques sur le Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, Part 2. pag. 646.

(44) See the remark [O].

(45) In the remarks [P] and [Q].

" As to the application made by our author to Julius II and Leo X, of what he said of some Popes, viz. that many great men did not look upon them as such, for the reasons he gives; it matters not in reality to whom this assertion is directed, provided it is certain that it is to Popes, of one of whom he says it was asserted, that he did not believe the existence of a God; that he exceeded the highest pitch of infidelity; and even declared, in his discourses, that he did not believe in God. If we will clear Leo X of this imputation, (he perhaps not speaking of him, because he dedicates his books to Julius, unless he enlarged them afterwards, as is often done,) we yet cannot deny it of Alexander VI." There was in him, says Guicciardin (*), neither truth, faith, nor religion. These are Rivet's words (42). I am to observe that, according to Guicciardin (43), we cannot charge Leo X with simony or purchasing of the Pontificate.

Had Heidegger, who was happy in a good memory, remembered this, he would not have believed that John Francis Picus had been a witness to the impieties of Leo X. His mistake may and ought to serve as a lesson to a great number of others. I will conclude with observing that a Judge cannot, without infringing his duty, pronounce against this Pope, unless he has more authentic depositions. The reader will see in other remarks (44), whether those who apologize for him argue justly.

[K] When news was brought of the ill success the French had met with, it was said, he died through excess of joy. Having lighted up anew the war between the Emperor Charles and the King of France, in order to drive the French out of Italy; advice was brought him at Magliano one of his country feats, of the dispossessing them of Milan and Parma, which gave him such an excess of joy, that he was seized that very night with a slight fever, and died of it a few days after (45)." These are du Plessis's words. It is agreed by all Historians that Leo X felt a prodigious satisfaction at hearing this good news; but I do not find many who affirm that this was the cause of his death; and though many had affirmed it, I would not believe it; for those who die through excess of joy, die suddenly, overpower'd, in all probability, by too great a flow of blood into the ventricles of the heart. If a person can withstand the first impressions of a rising joy, as the Pope did, he grows better afterward; so far from being seized with a dangerous fever, when other reasons do not occasion it. John Crespin's relation seems much more probable; for he supposes that Leo's death was sudden: but indeed not of that sudden kind occasioned by excess of joy. "Hearing that the French had been overcome at Milan by the Emperor's forces, and driven out of Italy, to which he indeed gave a helping hand; as he was carousing and indulging his appetite, and rejoicing in an extraordinary manner at the news, it is said that he suddenly gave up the ghost, he who always disbelieved a heaven and hell after this life (46)." The following distich (47),

*Sacra sub extrema si forte requiritis hora
Cur Leo non poterat sumere? vendiderat.*

" You ask why Leo in his dying moments Could not receive the Sacraments? He had sold 'em."

(45) Du Plessis Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 590.

(46) Jean Crespin, État de l'Église, ad ann. 1521, pag. m, 516.

(47) Of Sannazar.

this distich, I say, alledged by that author favours the supposition of sudden death; but it is nevertheless certain that the sickness of which Leo X died, was of some days continuance (48). Famianus Strada has given two accounts of the death of this Pontiff (49); the one in Livy's style and the other in Tacitus's manner, both which are beautiful and elaborate.

I must here take notice of a mistake of the translator of Guicciardin. "Advice, says he, was brought, that Pope Leo died suddenly the first of December. For having received, in his Villa of Magliano, whither he went often to divert himself, news of the taking of Milan, he fell into such an excess of joy, that he was seized with a slight fever, that very night; and being on this account carried to Rome the next day, although the Physicians made light of at first of his indisposition, he yet died in very few days, not without a great suspicion of his being poisoned, as it was said, by Barnabas Malespina his chamberlain, who was appointed to give him his drink (50)." How absurd is it to say, almost in the same period, that a person dies suddenly, and that he dies of a slight fever which the Physicians made light of at first? Guicciardin could not possibly have made such a blunder, he not saying that he died suddenly mori di morte inspetata (51); nor has he connected the great joy of this Pope with the fever, as the cause with its effect. Ricevutone incredibile piacere; sopra preso la notte medesima di picciola febbre, e fattosi il giorno seguente portare à Roma &c. (52). This connection is more than a poetical licence of the translator. It may be observed by the way, how closely the words of an original ought to be followed, when a person would translate faithfully.

[L] He did not always take such measures as were agreeable to the Emperor Maximilian. This Monarch had flattered himself that Leo X would have favoured him; but when he heard of this Pope's correspondence with the French, he cried; had not this Pope deceived me also, he would have been the only Pontiff whose honour and integrity I should have had reason to applaud. Nisi me hic quoque Papa fefellisset, ille unicus esset cujus bonam fidem laudare possem (53).

(48) See Paulus Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 209.

(49) Prolus. Academic. 2. lib. 2. pag. m. 247, & seq.

(50) Homodei, Translation of Guicciard. Book 14. chap. 14. folio 143. ad ann. 1521. [This Homodei is an error of the press; it should be Comedy, as it is written in some other places.] Remarks from the Paris edit. (1714) of Bayle's Dictionary.

(51) Guicc. lib. 14. folio m. 415 verso.

(52) Idem, ibid.

(53) See Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheram. lib. 1. pag. 43. col. 1. See also Heidegger, Hist. Papa, 10, pag. 201.

indulgences [M], proved the occasion of the reformation established by Luther, as is universally known. It is related by some writers, that he at first bestowed the highest elogiums on that great Reformer [N]. I do not find that Guicciardin lashes this Pontiff with so much severity as Varillas insinuates [O]; but the apology of Paulus Jovius appears

to

[M] The sordid traffic to which he reduced the distribution of indulgences.] A kind of monopoly was made of them; indulgences were let out to farm; and the Commissioners appointed to collect the monies, bought their employments of the Pope; and this done, they were extremely rigorous in their exactions, and had so little regard to decency, that the powers for releasing souls out of purgatory were played for in taverns, as Guicciardin affirms. Haveva sparso per tutto il mondo, senza distinzione di tempi e di luoghi, indulgentie amplissime, non solo per poter giovare conesse quelli, che ancora sono nella vita presente, ma con facultà di potere oltra questo liberare l'anime de defunti dalla pene del Purgatorio: lequali, percha era notorio che si concedevano solamente per estorquere danari da gli huomini; Et essendo essercitate imprudentemente da Commissarii deputati a questa esattione, la più parte de' quali comperavi dalla Corte la facultà di essercitare; haveva concitato in molti luoghi indignatione, e scandalo assai, e specialmente nella Germania, dove a molti de' ministri era veduto vendere per poco prezzo, ò giocarli sur la tavola la facultà del liberare l'anime d' morti dal Purgatorio (54). i. e. "He dispersed throughout the whole

(54) Guicci. lib. 13. fol. 395, verso. See also Fra Paolo, lib. 1.

"world, without any regard to times or places, very ample indulgences, not only for the advantage of the present life, but endued with a power to free the souls of the dead from the pains of purgatory; which, as it was notorious that they were granted in no other view but to draw money out of people's pockets, and were levied imprudently by Commissioners appointed for that purpose, most of whom bought their employments of the Court of Rome; they therefore occasioned in many places, great indignation and scandal, particularly in Germany, where they were sold for little or nothing; and the power of freeing the souls of the dead from purgatory, was played for in taverns." The discontent of the people increased, when it was known to what use these sums were applied; for most of the money levied in Germany was for the use of the Pope's filter.

[N] It is related by some writers, that he at first bestowed the highest elogiums on that great reformer.] This circumstance would have been little known, had not Colomiesius mentioned it. Mr. de Seckendorf (55) learnt it from him; he having been told by a counsellor of Spire, that it was in the Opuscula of Colomiesius. The passage is this. "Vossius having told me, that he remembered to have read, in the tragical histories of Bandelli, an elogium bestowed on Luther by Pope Leo X, I went immediately into his library, where turning over that author's histories, I met with the following words in the preface to the twenty fifth novel of the third part: Nel principio che la Setta Lutherana comincio à germogliare, essendo di brigata molti Gentiluomini, ne l'hora del meriggio, in casa del nostro virtuojo Signor L. Scipione Attellano, è di varie cose ragionandosi, furono alcuni che non poco biasmarono Leone X Pontefice, che ne i principii non si mettesse remedio, à l'hora che Frate Silvestro Prierio, Maestro del sacro Palazzo, gli mostrò alcuni punti d'heresia che Fra Martino Lutero haveva sparso per l'opera, la quale de le Indulgentie haveva intitolata; percioche imprudentemente rispose, che Fra Martino haveva un bellissimo ingegno, e che coteste erano invidie Fratresche." i. e. "When the sect of Luther began to make its appearance, several gentlemen being together, at noon, in the house of our excellent Signior L. Scipio Attellano, and discoursing upon various subjects; some of them greatly blamed Pope Leo X, for not taking care in time, when Silvester Prierio, master of the sacred palace, pointed out to him some heretical tenets which Friar Martin Luther had scattered up and down his treatise concerning indulgences; but he imprudently answered, that Friar Martin had a fine genius, and that these were mere surmises arising from the jealousy of the Monks." Sleidan would not have failed to prefix these words to his history, had he known them (56).

(56) Colomies. Recueil de Particularitez, pag. 3.

[O] I do not find that Guicciardin lashes this Pontiff with so much severity as Varillas insinuates.] This author wrote a great number of books against the house of Austria, which perhaps would have been printed, if Mr. Colbert had not represented, after the peace of the Pyrenees, that it would be no ways decent to disgust the Spaniards, by permitting the impression of so many volumes filled with such injurious particulars. The plan of this voluminous work has been seen in a piece entitled, La Politique de la Maison d'Autriche (the politics of the house of Austria.) The author sets out with a kind of apology, for the liberty he has taken to touch upon the vices of Princes. Only, says he (57), imitate the style, and copy the reverse of the picture which Livy drew of Hannibal () ; and I have fallen so short of it, that the reader will not meet with a person of what rank or quality soever, so injuriously treated in my work, as Pope Leo X is in the elogium which Guicciardin has made of him (†), and for which he was not any way reproved that I can find (‡).* It is plain

"that this elogium of Leo X is represented as a very satirical piece; otherwise it would be absurd to mention his example. Now it is certain that we do not meet with any thing in Guicciardin, which answers to this idea. The twelfth book cited by Varillas, is less to his purpose than the two following. It is in the thirteenth book that we have an account of the trade of indulgences, as has been already seen; and in the fourteenth a censure of this Pope for squandering such sums, and for being so fond of musick and farcical entertainments (58). Egli per natura dedito all' ocio, Et a' piaceri, Et hora per la troppa licenza, e grandezza alieno sopra modo dalle facende, immerso ad udire tutto' giorno musche, facette, e buffoni, inclinato ancora troppo più che l'onnesta a piaceri: pareva dovesse essere totalmente alieno dalle guerre. i. e. "Being naturally prone to idleness and fond of pleasure; and now, by the exalted height he had attained, being utterly averle to business; spending whole days in hearing musick, jests and buffoonries; and being too much devoted to his pleasures, it was judged that he would be tally averle to war." Quali sorte di buffonerie, e di facette piacesse a Papa Leone; si può raccogliere dal lib. 4. della vita di lui del Giovio: dove pone, che furono recitate Comedie, si fece professione di fare impazzire huomini, Et altre piacevolezze tali: onde il Tarascone si persuase d'essere gran Musico, il Baraballo fu laureato Poeta, e mandato su l'Elefante, Et i Parasiti furono sommamente favoriti. i. e. "What kind of buffoonries were most pleasing to Pope Leo X may be gathered from book IV of his life written by Paulus Jovius, who says, that they acted plays; that they made it their business to make some self-conceited men quite frantic, and such like extravagancies; whence Tarascone imagined himself to be a great musician; Baraballo was created Poet Laureat and rode upon the Elephant; and parasites were highly favoured."

In a word, we find in the XIV book a general judgment on the conduct of this Pope; but this is a composition of praises and censures; and cannot pass for satirical, nor even disrespectful. Guicciardin's words are as follow: Principe nel quale erano degne di laude, e di vituperio molte cose, e che ingannò assai l'espertatione, che quando fu assunto al Ponteficato s'haveva di lui: conciosa ch' criuscisse di maggior prudenza, ma di molto minore bontà di quello ch'era giudicato da tutti (59). i. e. "A Prince who possessed many good and many ill qualities; and who greatly deceived the expectation, which people entertained of him when he was raised to the Pontificate; he displaying more wisdom and much less goodness than the world had imagined." When this historian speaks of the election of Leo X, he does it in such a manner as is extremely glorious to this Pope. He owns that it was no way simoniacal, or bad; and that not the least objection could be made to the moral conduct of the cardinal elected. Senti di questa elezione quasi tutta la Christianità, grandissimo piacere, persuadendosi universalmente gli homini che haveva a essere rarissimo Pontefice, per la chiara memoria del valore paterno, e (57) Varillas, Politique de la Maison d'Autriche, pag. 73, 74. Hague edit. of 1688.

(*) In book 21. (†) In book 12. of his History.

(‡) Not even by de Beny.

(58) Lib. 14. folio 398, verso.

(59) Guicciard. lib. 14. folio 416.

to me very weak [P]; and occasioned its being made a question, whether he ought to be

per la fama che risonava per tutto della sua liberalità, e benignità, stimato casto e di perfetti costumi, e sperandosi che a esempio del padre dovesse a essere amatore de' letterati, e di tutti gli ingegni illustri: laquale aspettazione accresceva l'essere stata fatta l'elezione candidamente senza simonia, o sospetto di macula alcuna (60). i. e.

(60) Guicc. lib. 11. folio 326.

“ Almost the whole Christian world was highly pleased at this election; every one being persuaded that he would prove a most excellent Pontiff, from the great reputation of his father's valour, and the good opinion mankind in general entertained of his liberality, benignity, chastity and moral conduct; and hoping that, in imitation of his father, he would esteem and patronize learned men, and those who excelled in their talent: which expectation increased because his election was no ways simoniackal, and was quite exempt from the least suspicion of fraud!” See in the remark [R] a contradiction of Varillas.

[P] The apology of Paulus Jovius appears to me very weak. The methods this author takes to justify Leo X may be reduced to four, I. He says that it was not from a vicious nature, but from a soft, easy and generous temper that this Pope, surrounded with persons of a voluptuous turn, immersed himself a little too much in pleasures (61). This is but a poor excuse, and many common prostitutes might be justified from that way of reasoning. They are not naturally wicked, brutal or cruel, but their too great good nature, easy temper and complaisance, is the occasion of their falling into the tempter's snare. I will observe by the way, that Politian says wonders of Leo X, in a letter which he wrote to Pope Innocent VIII, when this youth was honoured with the purple. Ita natus & factus, ita altus atque educatus, ita denique eruditus atque infuitus hic est, ut nemini secundus ingenio, nec æqualibus industria, nec præceptoribus literatura, neque gravitate senibus concesserit. Nativus in eo probitas, & genuina: diligentia quoque parentis ita impense culta est, ut ex illius ore non modo non verbum dictu scædus, sed ne levius quidem unquam aut etiam licentius exciderit. Non actio, non gestus, non incessus, in illo notatus: non aliud postremo quod in deteriore parte conspiceretur. Sic in viridi ætate cana maturitas, ut qui loquentem senes audiant, prævitam in eo, nos paternam certe indolem agnoscamus. Cultum pietatis & religionis pene etiam cum lacte nutricis exsuxit: etiam tum ab incunabulis sacra meditata officia (29). i. e. “ This youth was fo

(61) See the words of Paulus Jovius, remark [D] citation (12) above.

(62) Politian. Epist. 5. lib. 8.

“ formed by nature and education, that not being inferior to any one in genius, he does not yield to his equals in industry; to his preceptors in erudition; nor to old men in gravity. He is naturally honest and sincere; and educated in so strict a manner by his father, that never drops a loose expression, or even a light one. No action, gesture or gait, or any other circumstance, distinguished him in such a manner, as might give an ill impression of him. His judgment appears so ripe and mature, though he be extremely young, that whenever old men hear him talk, they revere him as a parent. Together with his nurse's milk he sucked in piety and religion; preparing himself, even from his cradle, for the holy office.” Paulus Jovius says in the place, that Leo, if compared with his predecessors, will be found extremely chaste. Si aliqua ex parte eo nomine sugillari incluta virtus potuit, Leo certe cum superiorum principum fama comparatus æstimatione reatissima continentie laudem feret (63). This excuse is not much better than the other. III. He says that this Pontiff having been renowned for his continence, secured himself at last from the temptations of impurity, by discontinuing to indulge himself in high feeding, and by regular fastings, Constat tamen eum, quod à prima adolescentia opinione omnium summam continentie laudem fuisse adeptus, non importuna quædam pudicitie castitatis præsidia quæfuisse: quando nequaquam pristina vitæ more tam multis delicatisque obsoniis uteretur: Itemque animo verè pudico die mercurii carnes non edere, die autem Veneris nihil gustare præter legumen & olera, ac die demum Saturni cæna penitus abstinere, incorrupta lege insituisse (64). i. e. “ It is nevertheless certain, that

(63) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 192.

(64) Ibid. pag. 193.

“ having gained an universal good reputation for continence from his youth, he did not look out for any importunate guardians of his modesty and chastity,

“ since he no longer indulged himself in eating of such a variety of dainties as formerly: For he did not eat flesh on Wednesdays; on Fridays he fed on nothing but pulse and herbs, and on Saturdays he did not so much as break his fast; which course of life he never swerved from.” This exceeds all the rest. In fine, he says that a great difference ought to be made between the vices which belong to a sovereign as such, and those which belong to him as a man. And he instances the emperor Trajan, who was so dear to the people of Rome, that it was the height of their wishes, that the succeeding emperors should reign as well as he; and yet Trajan's drunkenness and sodomitical practices were well known. The meaning of this is, that the vices of Leo X were not repugnant to the qualities of a good Prince; but only to those of a good Christian; and therefore that we ought to pardon the irregularities of his youth, since they did not prevent his being a good Prince. Alia principis, alia hominis esse vitia quis nescit? hæc uni privata conditione quum noceant, etiam aliquibus fortasse profunt: illa verò ab dira potestate, & luctum & calamitatem universis mortalibus apportant: idque verissimum esse constat præclaro quondam populi Romani testimonio, qui neminem sibi principem Trajano meliorem exoptavit, quanquam eum illicitæ libidinis ac ebrietatis censura notasset. Sed demus ali- quid humanitati Leonis, uti in summa licentia fervida ætatis ac prosperæ valetudinis æstum ægerimè sustinenti, postquam in magnis salutaribusque virtutibus optimi atque benefici cognomentum facile meruerit (65).

(65) Ibid. pag. 192, 193.

Generally speaking, this author's maxim is true. It is very possible for a Prince to be a good, a worthy man, and at the same time a poor Monarch; that is a Monarch who is not able to cause the Laws to be executed with vigour, nor to heal the disorders and evils of the State. On the other hand, it is very possible for a Prince to deviate very much from the rules of morality, which prescribe the duties of persons; and nevertheless he may be a good Monarch; that is, a Monarch who maintains order in his Kingdom; and who enacts, with wisdom, rewards and punishments, without loading his people with taxes, and pecuniary edicts. But it is very rare that a voluptuous and prodigal Monarch, like Leo X, is a good Prince; to supply his expences he must load his subjects with taxes; and he generally dispenses his favours, according to the caprice of those who administer to his pleasures; and consequently to unworthy persons, whose evil conduct he has not time to punish, he being too much taken up with his pleasures, to allow the functions of his kingly dignity the application which it requires. One might easily prove, that the subjects of Leo X were greatly loaded. Farther, it ought to be considered that Leo's chief dignity was a sacred and ecclesiastical dignity. To know therefore whether he discharged his duty, the chief question is not whether he has done what his temporal dignity required; it will be impossible to justify him, but by shewing that he diligently discharged the duty of his other function, that is, observed the precepts of the Gospel, and did all that lay in his power to make others practise them. These are his chief functions, and here his apologist is obliged to forsake him. In his vero quæ rem divinam respicerent, nequaquam secunda fama prægravari est visus. Nam indulgentias vetera Pontificum ad parandam pecuniam instrumenta adeo plene atque affluenter provinciis dedit, ut fidem sacrosanctæ potestatis elevare videretur (66). i. e. “ He does not seem to have a good character as to divine matters; for he was to extremely profuse of indulgences (old instruments by which the Pontiffs raise money) that the credit of the sacred authority seems to have been lessened by him.”

(66) Jovius, in Vita Leon. pag. 193.

I will observe by the way, that this uniting of the temporal and spiritual authority in the same person, is generally the ruin of the evangelical spirit. The heathens had this mixture of characters,

A reflection on the uniting the temporal and spiritual authority in one person.

Rex Anius Rex idem hominum Phœbique sacerdos (67).

(67) Virgil. Æn. lib. 3. vers. 80.

That is,

“ Anius a King, and likewise Phœbus' Priest.”

This

(6) Voetius, Disputat. tom. 1.
pag. 204.

be considered as an Atheist (e); but the rest of the Apologists have not succeeded much better [Q]. Varillas alone is sufficient to refute himself. I will copy a long passage from his Anecdotes, which contain a pretty just character, though in a concise way, of Leo X [R], and whence I entreat my readers to supply, whatever may be wanting in the

This mixture was not unuseful to the temporal good of Religion, and it has remarkably served the same ends under the Christian dispensation; but then it has occasioned an extreme corruption of manners. The ecclesiastical character ought to prevail and be predominant, since the other dignity is only an adjunct; and nevertheless it is generally swallowed up by its colleague. The joining of these two offices together, is joining a dead to a living body, a fatal conjunction, where the carcass communicates its rottenness and stench to the living body, and receives vital influence from it.

*Mortua quietiam jungebat corpora vivis,
Componens manibusque manus, atque oribus ora,
Tormenti genus! Et sanie tabeque fluentes
Complexu in misero, longa sic morte necabat* (68).

(68) Idem, lib. 8.
ver. 485.

“The living, and the dead, at his command
“Were coupled, face to face, and hand to hand:
“Till choak'd with stench, in loath'd embraces ty'd,
“The lingring wretches pin'd away, and dy'd.

DRYDEN.

The world, the flesh, the weak part draws the resolutions and conclusions after it; the same as in a syllogism, the weakest of the two first propositions is the rule of the consequence or conclusion (69). The author of the Critique Generale (70) speaking of the distinction that has been invented between a Pope who pronounces ex Cathedra, and the same Pope who speaks in another manner, has given us the following smart jest of a peasant in the Electorate of Colen. I thought for a very long time that this jest had been preserved only traditionally, but I was mistaken, it having been printed above a century ago in books of a serious and grave character. Duaren has inserted it in one of his pieces (71), and copied it from Fulgofius (72). Here follows the whole story from old French. It is true indeed that an Elector of Colen is not expressly named. “There is a very merry story

(69) Conclusio sequitur debiliorem partem.

(70) Tom. 2.
pag. 161. 3d edito.

(71) De sacris Eccles. Minister.
lib. 1. cap. 4.

(72) Bapt. Fulgofius, Factor. & Dilect. Memorab.
lib. 6. cap. 2. folio m. 198.

“of a German peasant, who, being at work in a field of his, saw his Bishop pass by, with a long train more becoming a Prince, than one who called himself the successor or deputy of an Apostle. Being greatly scandalized at this, he could not forbear laughing, and laughed so loud, that Sir Reverend enquired the reason of it. The peasant answered “in his natural character, that is truly and simply; “I laugh when I think of St. Peter and St. Paul, and see Thee in this geer. How is that, says the Bishop? Do you ask how, says the rustic? It was very silly in them to trudge alone on foot through the world, as they were the head of the Christian Church, and deputies of Christ Jesus the King of Kings: whilst thou, who art no more than our Bishop, art so well mounted, and halt so long a train of bravoos, that thou resemblest a Prince more than a Pastor of the Church. Here Sir Reverend replied: But friend, thou dost not consider that I am a Count and Baron as well as thy Bishop. This made the clown laugh louder than before, when the Bishop asking him the reason of it, he answered; But, Zir; when this Count and Baron you are speaking of shall be in hell, where will the Bishop be? This so confounded the Right Reverend, that he rode away without speaking a word (73).”

(73) Peter Viel, Doctor of Sorbonne, in the Treatise of Simony, chap. 6.

(74) Reponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1227.

(75) In Vita Leonis X.

(76) Remarques sur la Reponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, Part 2.
pag. 640.

[Q] The rest of the Apologists have not succeeded much better. I will speak a word or two concerning the manner in which some authors have endeavoured to justify Leo X as to the article of impiety. Coeffeteau (74) produces no other apology but the following words of Onuphrius Panvinius (75): Erat rerum divinarum diligens observator. i. e. “He was a diligent observer of religious ceremonies, &c.” Rivet (76) answers thus: “There are many profane persons and atheists, who observe very exactly all the ceremonies of Religion, in order to conceal their impiety under this foliage, who, among friends, say they are ad morem, non ad rem; legibus justæ, non Diis gratæ. Sannazarius, who makes him die “without receiving the Sacraments, because he had sold them before, does not represent him in the “light which Onuphrius would do.” It is to be observed particularly, that Sannazarius does not say that Leo refused the Sacraments. If this Pope did not receive the Sacraments &c. upon his death-bed, it was because he was light-headed. James Gretser, besides the words of Panvinius, alledges Leo Xth's bull against Luther. Bulla qua Leo Lutheri errores damnat, immanem banc pseudologiam perspicue redarguit (77). i. e. “That bull in which Leo condemns Luther's “errors, evidently refutes this egregious false assertion.” But this is pitiful; for though this Pope had had no Religion, he yet would have followed the ordinary style in his bull; and have displayed great zeal against a heretick, who contested with him an authority on which all his temporal felicity depended. Palavicino (78) endeavouring to take off the reproach which Father Paul makes to this Pope, viz. of his having very little regard to religion and piety: Sarebbe stato un perfetto Pontefice, se con queste havesse congiunto qualche cognitione delle cose della religione, & alquanto piu d'inclinazione alla pietà: dell'una & dell'altra delle quali non mostrava haver gran cura (79). Palavicino, I say, in his endeavours to take off this reproach, does three things. He alledges, 1. The testimony of Politian (80); 2dly, that Pope's fasting; 3dly, the majesty and good grace with which Leo solemnized mass. The second of these three particulars, if the fact be really as Paulus Jovius has told it (81), is, in my opinion, a good proof of religion, when we weigh well the several circumstances of it. The first is nothing; for children, till they come to a certain age, are always persuaded of the truth of the lessons of their catechists, and raise no objections to them. If they become impious, it is when they are from under the tuition of their preceptors; and when they corrupt themselves, either by bad company, or by following a false philosophy. The last circumstance is rather a corporal talent, than an indication of the persuasion of the soul. Let us see what Paulus Jovius says on this occasion. Sacra confecit, singulaque ceremoniarum obivit munia singulari cum majesticate, ut non falso nemo superiorum Pontificum eo augustius & decentius sacrificasse diceretur (82). i. e. “He solemnized “the several religious ceremonies with so singular a “majesty, that it was justly said none of the Pontiffs “his predecessors celebrated them with greater.” It is very probable that Onuphrius means only this, when he says, fuit rerum divinarum diligens observator, & sacris ceremoniis deditus: this being such a proof of piety as is altogether ambiguous and equivocal.

(77) In Examine Mysteriorum Plessan.
an. pag. 563.

(78) Istor. del Concilio, lib. 1.
cap. 2.

(79) Fra Paolo, Istor. del Concilio,
lib. 1. pag. 5.

(80) See the remark [P], citation (62).

(81) See the remark [P], citation (64).

(82) Paul. Jovius, in Vita Leonis X., lib. 4.
pag. m. 212.

[R] I will copy a long passage from Varillas's Anecdotes, which contain a pretty just character, though in a concise way, of Leo X.] It is in the Preface to that work, and is as follows. “Guicciardin . . . exhibits this Pope to us (*), as a perfect model of “modern Politicks, and the greatest statesman of his “age. He makes him superiour to King Ferdinand “the Catholick; and causes him to triumph, in his “younger years, over the artifices of that old usurper. It is to him he ascribes the secret of causing “all his designs to be seconded by the council of Spain, “whether they would or no. After having established these wonderful principles, there are no shining “virtues but what heighten and illustrate the picture “of Leo X. He formed, at but twelve years of “age when he was created Cardinal, those vast projects which he afterwards put in execution, when “he was raised to the pontifical chair (†). He negotiated with the states of Venice to save the ruins “of his house, which had not been able to withstand “our Charles VIII. The seeing his brother drowned “as he was crossing a river, had not the power to “make him change his resolution. He thought of “nothing but the bringing up an only son, (in the cradle) whom this brother had left; and thereupon “he returns to Rome, where, by his intrigues, he “gains the favour of Pope Julius II, and they occasioned

(*) In the twelve first articles of his history.

(†) “[I do not doubt but that “the politics, “which Guicciardine ascribes “to Leo when “but 12 years “are a mere chimerical “Historian.”] From the Remarks to the Paris edit. (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary.

the text of this article. Varillas is also mistaken with regard to Paulus Jovius [S].
The Literati, of what Religion or Country they may be, ought to praise and blefs this Pope's memory, for the great zeal he shewed, in recovering the manuscripts of the Antients. He was not sparing of his care, nor of his money, in making the researches in question, and to procure very good editions. I have two Anecdote Letters that prove this [T], and “ signed his being appointed Legate in the army de“ signed to drive the French out of Italy. He is “ taken prisoner in the battle of Ravenna, but makes “ his escape in a happy juncture, Julius II. expiring “ just at that time. He goes into the Conclave, where “ he takes so much advantage of the caprice of the “ young Cardinals, who had flattered themselves with “ the hopes of electing a juvenile Pope, that he causes “ them to give their votes in his favour. He joins “ with the Spaniards; and is tender of their friend“ ship so long as it is of service to settle his house in

“ the chief employments of magistracy in Florence;
“ but the instant fortune frowns on them, and that he “ finds their council does not care to let him usurp
“ the dukedom of Urbino, in order to invest his “ nephew with it, he treats with the French on that “ condition; he draws up the famous concordate, in “ which he eludes the stratagems and long experience “ of Chancelour du Prat; he discovers the highest “ friendship for Francis I, so long as that Monarch “ is able to do him service; but the instant he has “ obtained his desires, he abandons him, in order to “ be reconciled to Charles V. He projects a league
“ with this Monarch, in order to establish the Sforza's
“ in the Dukedom of Milan. He succeeds in it sooner “ than he expected; and is fired with such an excess
“ of joy as kills him at receiving this News.”

[S] Varillas is also mistaken with regard to Paulus Jovius. This historian, if Varillas is to be credited, has not so much written a history as a satyr with regard to Leo X. “ Paulus Jovius, says he (83), presents him as a man of a violent spirit, and who would gain every thing by forcible methods. He declares him to have been fired with the same martial disposition as his predecessor Julius II. He makes him entertain, even before his exaltation, a disdainful contempt for all the rest of the sacred College, founded on an imaginary precedence of the house of Medicis over the rest of Italy. He brings in this contempt into all actions of splendor, and even the most august ceremonies; he looks upon it as the source and foundation of the obdurate war which was waged against the Duke of Urbino, and of the other quarrels which broke out in the whole course of his Pontificate; in a word he declares that vanity, but a haughty, distasteful vanity, was his predominant passion. If you were very desirous of knowing how it was possible for Paulus Jovius to pierce so far into Leo's mind, as to form so decisive a judgment of it, he himself answers before hand, that he had been this Pope's creature; that it was he who made him leave the study of physick, and the pretensions to a chair in Padua, to devote himself to an ecclesiastical life; who made him Bishop of Como; who chose him for his confidant, and to assist in those councils where the most important and most secret resolutions were taken; who engaged him to write the history of his own time; who employed his good offices for him in France and Spain, in order that such authentick pieces might be communicated to him, as he believed were necessary for improving his work; and who revealed his whole soul to him, in frequent and familiar conversations.” The reader has seen in the foregoing remarks, that Paulus Jovius does not conceal the faults of Leo X; but it is certain that the vice of which Varillas speaks is that, of all others, the least, which Paulus Jovius imputes to him. It is even certain that he declares him possessed of the opposite virtue. Pontifex, says he (84), cujus mite ingenium facilemque naturam in specimen ceterarum virtutum omnes illo tempore laudabant, clementius agendum sibi . . . existimavit. i. e. “ The Pope, whose gentle disposition and easy nature were applauded by all, as a specimen of the rest of the virtues he possessed, was of opinion that it was incumbent on him to shew a little clemency.” This author was never Bishop of Como; and was made a Bishop (85) by Clement VII. and not by Leo X. This intimate confidence and admission to the most secret councils are, in my opinion, a mere romantic fiction: and I have not found the least footsteps of them in the writings of Paulus Jovius.

[T] I have two anecdote letters which prove this. They were communicated to me by Mr. de Seidel, privy councillor to his Prussian Majesty. His father left him a fine library, which he has enlarged very considerably, and particularly with scarce books and manuscripts. He brought several from Greece, in a voyage he made thither. He is worthy in all respects of possessing such a treasure, he being a gentleman of profound erudition, and who takes great delight in favouring the sciences. The copy which he was so good as to send me of Leo the Xth's letter, is faithful and extremely accurate; and the originals, in Sadolet's own hand-writing, are still extant. It may be observed by the way, that there was printed in Nova literaria Maris Baltici & Septentrionis (86), for November 1699, a letter written, on a like account, to his Danish Majesty by Leo X. the 8th of November 1517. Mine are as follow:

Venerabili Fratri Alberto Moguntin. & Magdeburgen. Archiepiscopo, Administratori Halberstaten. Principi Electori ac Germaniæ Primati.

LEO PP. X.

Venerabilis Frater, Salutem & Apostolicam benedictionem. Mittimus dilectum filium Joannem Heymers de Zowelben, Clericum Leodiensis diocesis, nostrum & Apostolicæ sedis Commissarium ad inclitas Nationes, Germaniæ, Daniæ, Suetiæ, Norvegiæ, & Gothiæ, per inquirendis dignis & antiquis libris qui temporum injuria periere, in qua re nec sumptui nec impensæ alicui parcimus, solum ut sicut usque à nostri Pontificatus initio proposuimus, quòd Altissimo tantum sit honor & gloria, viros quovis virtutum genere insignitos, præsertim literatos, quantum cum Deo possumus, foveamus, extollamus ac juvemus. Accipimus autem penes Fraternalitatem Tuam, seu in locis sub illius ditione positus esse ex dictis antiquis libris, præsertim Romanarum Historiarum, non paucos qui nobis cordi non parum forent. Quare cum in animo nobis sit tales libros, quotquot ad manus venire potuerint in lucem redire curare pro communi omnium literatorum utilitate, Fraternalitatem Tuam eâ demum quâ possumus affectione hortamur, monemus, & enixius in Domino obtestamur, ut si rem gratam unquam facere animo proponit, vel eorundem librorum omnium exempla fideliter & accuratè scripta, vel quod magis exoptamus ipsosmet librorum antiquos ad nos transmitti quanto citius curet, illos statim receptura, cum exscripti hic fuerint, cuncta obligationem per Camera nostram Apostolicam factam, seu quam dictus Joannes Commissarius noster præsentium lator ad id mandatum sufficiens habens nomine dictæ Cameræ denuo duxerit faciendam. Et quia dictus Joannes promissit nobis se brevi daturum trigesimum tertium librum Titi Livii de bello Macedonico, illi commisimus ut eum ad manus Tuæ Fraternalitatis daret, ut ipsa quam primum posset per fidum nuntium ad nos vel dilecto Filio Philippo Beroaldo Bibliothecario Palatii nostri Apostolici mittat. Quoniam vero eidem Joanni certam summam pecuniarum hic in urbe enumerari fecimus pro expensis factis & fiendis, & certam quantitatem debemus, volumus, & ita Fraternalitati Tuæ committimus & mandamus, ut postquam acceperit prædictum librum Titi Livii ipsi Joanni solvat seu solvi faciat centum quadraginta septem ducatos auri de Camera ex pecuniis indulgentiarum concessarum per illius provincias in favorem fabricæ Basilicæ Principis Apostolorum de urbe; quam quidem pecuniarum summam in computis Tuæ Fraternalitatis cum Camera Apostolica admittimus, prout in præsentia per præsentem admittimus & admitti mandamus. Juvet præterea eundem Joannem salvis conductibus literis & auxiliis, & illi per Provincias suas assistat pro libris extrahendis, & pro illo etiam fide jubeat, si opus est, pro dictis libris intra certum tempus à nobis

(83) The 13th of January 1528, according to Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. tom. 7. pag. 744.

(86) Page 348.

(83) Preface to the Anecdotes of Florence. He cites Paulus Jovius, in his book, and the particular eulogium of Leo X. Both these are unexact citations; the general History of Paulus Jovius including several books; and he not having written a particular eulogium, but the Life of this Pope.

(84) Jovius, Historiar. lib. 11. sub fin. See him also in Vita Leonis X. pag. m. 309.

and which my readers will doubtless be well pleased to see here.

LEO

à nobis restituendis & ad sua loca remittendis. Quod si Fraternitas Tua fecerit, ut omnino nobis persuademus, & ingens nomen apud Viros literatos consequetur, & nobis rem gratissimam faciet. Datum Romæ apud S. Petrum sub annulo Piscatoris die XXVI. Novembris M. DXVII. Pontificatus nostri anno quinto.

JA. SADOLETUS.

“ To our venerable Brother Albert, Archbishop of “ Mentz and Magdeburg, Administrator of Hal-“ berstat, Electoral Prince and Primate of Ger“ many.

LEO X.

“ Venerable brother, health and apostolical blessing. We send our beloved son John Heytmers de Zonvelben, Clerk of the Diocese of Leige, our Commissary and that of the Apostolical See, to the renowned Nations of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway and Gothland; to search for such ancient books of value as were lost by the injury of time, wherein we are not sparing of expence, only that, as we purposed from the beginning of our Pontificate, solely with the view to promote the honour and glory of the most high, we by the assistance of heaven, may cherish, raise, and assist men who excell in any talent, particularly the learned. We have been told, that there are, either in your possession, or the places subject to you, a great number of such ancient books, and particularly relating to the Roman history, which would be very acceptable to us. As therefore we design to procure the publication of as many of the books in question as we can get, for the common benefit of the Literati in general; we therefore exhort you in the most affectionate manner, and beseech you in the Lord, that if you ever propose to yourself the performing of a grateful action, that you would send to us, with all imaginable speed, accurate and faithful copies of all those ancient books, or rather the books themselves, which shall be sent back to you as soon as copied here, pursuant to an instrument or obligation drawn up by our apostolical chamber; or such as the aforesaid John our Commissary, bearer of the present letters, who has ample instructions for that purpose, shall think proper to be drawn up in the name of the said chamber. And because the said John promised us to deliver, in a little time, the thirty third book of Livy, relating to the Macedonian war, we have ordered him to put it into your hands; in order that it may be sent as soon as possible, by a faithful messenger, either to us, or our beloved son Philip Beroaldus, library keeper of our apostolical palace. And because we have ordered that the said John should be paid a certain sum of money, in this city, and that we owe him a certain sum, for expences made and to be made; we will, commission and command you, after you shall have received the aforesaid book of Livy, to pay or cause to be paid, an hundred and forty seven gold Ducats of the chamber, from the monies arising out of indulgences granted in those provinces, for the Church of the Prince of Apollis; which sum of money we will admit or allow in the accounts between yourself and the apostolical chamber; as we now allow, and command to be allowed by these presents. Farther, you must favour the aforesaid John with safe conducts; and assist him, through your provinces, in discovering Books; and, if it be necessary, engage your word for him, that the books in question shall be restored by us at a certain limited time, and sent to the places to which they respectively belong. If you shall perform this, as we are entirely persuaded you will, you will thereby gain great fame among the learned, and do a thing that will be extremely agreeable to us. Given in Rome, at St. Peter's, under the Fisherman's ring, the 26th of November, 1517, in the fifth year of our Pontificate.

JA. SADOLET.

This is the first of the two letters in question, and here follows the second. From some particulars in it we may justly suppose that the whole history of Livy was then in being. Mr. de Seidel has been credibly informed, that it is thought that a canon of Magdeburg, at that time one of the ministers of state, to the Marquis Joachim Frederick, administrator of the Archbishoprick, took advantage, of the confusion things were then in; and stole from the publick library several manuscripts, and particularly Livy, in order to enrich his own. His heirs preserved it; but they concealed to the utmost of their power, such manuscripts as were put into it by unlawful means. At last, the whole was destroyed when the city was plundered in the year 1631.

Venerabili Fratri nostro Archiepiscopo Moguntin. Principi Electori & Germaniæ Primate.

LEO PP. X.

Dilecti filii (87), Salutem & Apostolicam benedictionem. Rettulit nobis dilectus filius Joannes Heytmers de Zonvelben Clericus Leodiensis diocesis, quem nuper pro inquirendis antiquis libris, qui desiderantur ad inclitas nationes Germaniæ, Daniæ, Norvegiæ, Suetiæ & Gotthiæ nostrum & Apostolicæ sedis specialem Nuncium & Commissarium destinavimus, à quodam, quem ipse ad id substituerat, accepisse literas, quibus ei significat in vestra Bibliotheca reperisse Codicem antiquum, in quo omnes Decades Titi Livii sunt descriptæ, impetrasseque à vobis illas posse exscribere, cum originale codicem habere fas non fuerit. Laudamus profecto vestram humanitatem & erga sedem Apostolicam obedientiam. Verum, dilecti filii, fuit nobis ab ipso usque Pontificatus nostri initio animus, Viros quovis generis exornatos, præsertim literatos, quantum cum DEO possumus, extollere ac juvare. Ea de causa hujuscemodi antiquos & desideratos libros, quotquot recipere possumus, prius per viros doctissimos, quorum copia DEI munere in nostrâ hodie est curiâ, corrigi facimus; deinde nostra impensa ad communem eruditorum utilitatem diligentissime imprimi curamus. Sed si ipsi originales libros non habeamus, nostra intentio non plane adimpletur, quia hi libri, visis tantum exemplis, correcti in lucem exire non possunt. Mandavimus in Camera nostra Apostolica sufficientem præstare cautionem de restituendis hujuscemodi libris integris & illesi eorum Dominis, quam primum hic erunt exscripti, & dilecti Joannes, quem iterum ad præmissa Commissarium deputavimus, habet ad eandem Camera sufficiens mandatum, illam obligandi ad restitutionem prædictam, modo & forma quibus ei videbitur. Tantum ad commodum & utilitatem Virorum eruditorum tendimus; de quo etiam dilecti filii Abbas & Conventus Monasterii Corvianensis Ordinis S. Benedicti Paderbornensis diocesis nostri locupletissimi possunt esse testes, ex quorum Bibliotheca cum primis quinque libri Historiæ Augustæ Cornelii Taciti qui desiderabantur, furto substracti fuissent, illique per multas manus ad nostras tandem pervenissent, nos recognitos prius eosdem quinque libros & correctos à Viris prædictis literatis in nostra Curia existentibus, cum aliis Cornelii prædicti operibus, quæ extabant, nostro sumptu imprimi fecimus. Deinde vero, re comperta, unum ex voluminibus dilecti Cornelii, ut præmittitur, correctum & impressum, ac etiam non inordinate ligatum, ad dilectum Abbatem & Conventum Monasterii Corvianensis remisimus, quod in eorum Bibliotheca loco substracti reponere possent. Et ut cognoscerent ex ea substructione potius est commodum quam incommodum ortum, misimus eisdem pro Ecclesia Monasterii eorum indulgentiam perpetuam. Quocirca vos & vestrum quemlibet, ea demum qua possumus affectione in virtute sanctæ obedientiæ monemus, hortamur, & sincera in Domino caritate requirimus, ut si nobis rem gratam facere unquam animo proponitis, eundem Joannem in dilectam vestram Bibliothecam intromittatis, & exinde tam dilectum codicem Livii, quam alios qui ei videbuntur per eum ad nos transmitti permittatis, illos eosdem omnino recepturi, reportanturque à Nobis præmia non vulgaria. Datum Romæ apud S. Petrum, sub annulo Piscatoris, die prima Decembris MDXVII. Pontificatus nostri anno quinto.

JA. SADOLETUS.

“ To our venerable brother Albert, Archbishop of “ Mentz, Electoral Prince, and Primate of Ger“ many.

“ LEO X.

“ Beloved sons, health and apostolical blessing. We “ have been informed by our beloved son John Heytmers, de Zonvelben, Clerk of the Diocese of Liege, “ whom

(87) Mr. de Seidel thinks that this letter was wrote to the Canons of Magdeburg; since Albert of Brandenburg was Archbishop of Magdeburg as well as of Mentz.

(a) Schottus,
Biblioth. Hispan.
pag. 266.

(b) Philippus
Elfius, Encomi-
as. Augustin.
pag. 443.

LEON (ALOSIO, or LEWIS DE) in Latin Legionensis, Professor of Divinity in the University of Salamanca (a), son of a Gentleman of Castile, entered into the Order of the Hermits of St. Austin, the 29th of January 1549 (b). He was well skilled in Greek and Hebrew, and explained the sacred Writings in his Lectures with great skill. In 1588 he drew up the rules of the discoloured Friars, who began then to appear under the name of Recollects. He was made Vicar-General of the Order and Provincial, the 22d of August 1591; and died the next day [A] at Madrid, aged sixty four years. He had been involved in a very troublesome affair before the tribunal of the inquisition; but had extricated himself honourably, after some years imprisonment (c) [B]. I do not doubt but this occasioned an explication he made of a verse in Solomon's Song [C]. This

(c) Extracted from Elfius, ubi
supra.

"whom we lately appointed, for the searching after "antient books, special Nuntio and Commissary from "us and the Apostolical See, to the renowned nations
"of Germany, Denmark, Sweden and Gothland;
"that letters had been sent him by a person whom he "had appointed for that purpose, by which he tells
"him, that he had found, in your library, an antient
"manuscript containing all Livy's Decads; and that "he had got your leave to copy them; not being per"mitted to have the original book. We applaud
"your condescension and obedience to the Apostolical
"See. But, beloved sons, it was our intention, from "our first accession to the Pontificate, to raise and pa"tronize, with the assistance of heaven, men who "excel in any talent, and particularly persons of eru"dition. In this view, we get as many as we can
"of these so much wanted antient books, which are "first corrected by men of vast erudition, of whom,
"God be praised, there are now great numbers in "our Court; and afterwards very carefully printed at "our expence, for the common advantage of the Liti-
"erati. But if we do not get the original books "themselves, our views will not be compleatly an"swered; because these books, if only copies of them "are inspected, cannot be published correctly. We "have ordered, in our Apostolical Chamber, that a "sufficient security be given, that such books shall "be returned whole and undamaged to their respective "owners, after they have been transcribed here; and "the said John, whom we have again deputed for the "aforementioned purpose, has a sufficient mandaté or "order to the same chamber, to oblige it to make the "said restitution, in such manner and form as he shall "judge proper. The sole object we aim at, is the "conveniency and advantage of learned men, of which
"our beloved sons, the Abbot and Friars of the mo"nastery of Corwey, of the order of St. Benedict of "the diocese of Padeborn, are ample witnesses; out
"of whose library, when the first five books of Cor"nelius Tacitus's Roman History were stolen, and
"after passing through many hands, came at last into
"ours, we caused those five books to be first revised "and corrected by the aforeaid Literati residing in our "Court; and had them printed, at our expence, with "the rest of the works of the said Tacitus. After "this, the affair being discovered, we sent a volume "of the said Cornelius Tacitus, corrected, printed,
"and neatly bound, to the said Abbot, and Friars of
"the monastery of Corwey, to be lodged in their li"brary in lieu of that which had been stole. And,
"that they might be sensible that this theft was rather
"of benefit than a loss to them, we transmitted to "them a perpetual indulgence for the Church of their "monastery. For this reason, with all imaginable
"affection, and by virtue of holy obedience, we ad-
"monish, exhort, and with sincere charity in the Lord
"require, you and any of you, that if you ever design
"to do any thing to oblige us, ye would suffer the "said John to have access to your library, and per"mit him to send us from thence the said book of
"Livy, as well as any other he shall judge proper,
"all which shall be safely sent back by us, with a con"siderable reward. Given in Rome, at St. Peter's,
"under the Fisherman's ring, the 1st of December,
"1517, in the fifth year of our Pontificate."

JA. SADOLET.

[A] He was made Vicar-General of the Order and Provincial, the 22d of August 1591, and died the day after.] It is nevertheless said that he governed his Province in a laudable manner, and gave rise to a stricter discipline. Vicarii Generalis officio, & Provin- cialis munere 1591. 22. Augusti honoratus, Provinciam laudabiliter rexit, arctiorisque vitæ initium fuit.... Obiit... altero ab electionis die in Provinciam (1). Who would imagine that an author could give such a relation as this? I know not whether Elfius did not mean, that Lewis de Leon had been some years Vicar-General of the Order, but that he was not appointed Provincial till the night before he died. By this we should know, that this Austin Friar had discharged an employment very worthily; but still Elfius's relation would be very defective.

[B] He had been involved in a very troublesome affair before the tribunal of the inquisition; but had extricated himself honourably, after some years imprisonment.] Let us cite an advocate for the Archbishop of Seville (2). "Fa- ther Aloysio de Leon, an Austin Friar, Scripture-Pro- fessor in Salamanca, was imprisoned near five years "in the Spanish Inquisition. But meeting at last with "an equitable Judge, he was cleared, was restored to "his employment and entered Salamanca in a trium- "phant manner, which filled his unjust censors with "confusion." According to Elfius, our Professor of Salamanca was imprisoned but two years; and this author takes a pleasure in relating the circumstances of his glorious re-exaltation. *Edidit Heroicum specimen præclaræ patientiæ, & magni animi indicium. Cum enim aliquorum invidia S. Inquisitioni delatus simulque confisus, ejusdem carceribus biennium integrum detentus fuisset, tandem infracti animi vir, publico triumpho, cum palma & laurea educitur, ac veste candida, in signum innocentiae amictus, præcone præeunte, deducitur, pristinisque honoribus, titulis, ac Professioni Theologica restituitur. Primam verò lesionem, post tenebras, ut auspiciabatur, pleno concessu ad novitatem evocato inquit: Dicebamus hesternæ die (3). i. e. "He gave an heroic "example of patience and strength of mind. For "being impeached, by the envy of some persons, to "the Inquisition, and imprisoned full two years in "it, this courageous man was brought out of it, "triumphing in a public manner; being dressed in a "white robe to denote his innocence, a Herald march- "ing before him; and was restored to his former ho- "nours, titles and his Professorship of Divinity. The "first lecture he read after his troubles, before a full "assembly, he began as follows, We said yesterday."*

[C] I do not doubt but his imprisonment occasioned an explication he made of a verse in Solomon's Song.] I speak of the verse where the spouse says, The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me (*). Aloysio de Leon says, that the spouse speaks thus in the person of such good Christians as are per- secuted by powerful Ecclesiastics (3). He observes, that such sort of vexations are trials of the hardest kind; such as are most difficult to be borne with, and which heaven often reserves for the most perfect. "It will, "says he, be thought surprising, that the spouse should "always meet with the watchman in her way, from "whom she not only does not receive the least suc- "cour, but even receives injurious language and evil "treatment. Could one believe that those who are "appointed to preside over the faithful, and who go- "vern the Churches of God, (for these are to guard "the city and the walls,) so far from giving them the "least succour, should often afflict and persecute good "people, and such as love God best? Nevertheless, "this we are obliged to believe, according to all that "follows of that divine song. And indeed, as no- "thing is better, nor more useful to salvation than "good Bishops who are faithful to the duties of their "sacred Ministry; on the contrary, unjust and wicked "Pastors, who make the authority they have re- "ceived

(1) Philippus
Elfius, in Encomi-
as. Augustin.
pag. 443.

(2) Sincere Advice to the Catholics of the United Provinces, on the decree of the Inquisition of Rome against the Archbishop of Seville,
pag. 22, 23. edit.
1704.

(3) Elfius in Encomiast. Augustin. pag. 443.

(*) Solomon's Song, chap. v.
ver. 7.

(4) See, Sincere Advice to the Catholics of the United Provinces,
pag. 6, 7.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Schottus
Bibliob. Hispan.
pag. 266.
(f) Idem, ibid.

This Latin Commentary on this book of Scripture, was printed in Salamanca in the year 1589 (d). He published it likewise in Spanish (e). We have some other works of his composing, [D], which have made it be wished that the rest of his works were published (f).

“ ceived, to govern God’s people, subservient to their designs and temporal interest, are pernicious to mankind in general; and particularly to persons of the greatest goodness, and to the greatest saints, and can only ruin them. There have been always a great number of such Pastors in the Church; and it is properly to them that the verse in Solomon’s Song, “ which I explain, is to be applied.” He says several more things in the same strain, and still more home; all which may be seen in French in the work I quote (5). I should be glad to know, if any commentator, who had been thoroughly satisfied with his Bishop, and had always been of the strongest party, has given the same explanation of these words of Solomon’s Song. Persecutions sharpen the understanding, and give a man a wonderful insight into the mystical sense.

(5) Ibid. pag. 8, 9.

[D] We have some other works of his composing.] A treatise printed at Salamanca in 1590, de utriusque agni typici ac veri immolationis legitimo tempore, wherein he asserts that the Paschal Lamb was slain the beginning of the 14th day of the moon (6), and that Jesus Christ, who conformed to this practice of celebrating the Passover, was crucified on that very day (7). A treatise de probæ matrisfamilias Officio; another de divinis Nominibus (8). A commentary on Psalm xxvi (9). It is to be observed that this author is one of those, who apply to Mahomet, the Prophecies of the Apostles relating to Antichrist (10).

(6) i. e. the evening of the day which we should call the 13th.

(7) Schottus, Bibliob. Hispan. pag. 266.

(8) Idem, ibid. (9) Printed at Salamanca, in 1580, and 1585. (10) See Heidegger, in Myfter. Babyl. Magnæ, pag. 70. tom. 1.

LEON (PETER CIECA DE.) author of a History of Peru. He left Spain, his native country, at thirteen years of age, in order to go into America, where he resided seventeen years (a); and observed so many remarkable things in it, that he resolved to commit them to writing. I will mention some of them, though it were only to shew the injustice of those who assert, that the Christians taught the Americans to be wicked [A]. Such an assertion cannot be true but with a great many restrictions. Possibly

(a) Cieca, in Proemin.

[A] I will mention some of them, though it were only to shew the injustice of those, who assert, that the Christians taught the Americans to be wicked.] He says that the great Lords of the valley of Nora, endeavoured to dispossess their enemies of as many of their women as they could possibly; that they lay with them, and that they sed the children they had by them in the most delicate manner; but that when they were twelve or thirteen years old, and were grown very fat, they killed and eat them, and that this was delicious food to the people in question (1). I will now speak of the manner in which the inhabitants of this country treated their prisoners of war. They made them slaves; obliged them to marry, and eat all the children sprung from these marriages, and afterwards eat the slaves themselves when they were no longer able to get children. Mangiavano i figliuoli de quei schiavi, & poi mangiavano gli istessi schiavi quando erano tanto vecchi che non potevano generare (2). The first time that the Spaniards entered this valley, a Lord named Nabonuco came to them in a very amicable way, accompanied by some women. Night being come, two of them laid themselves at full length on a carpet; another laid herself cross wife to serve as a pillow for Nabonuco, whilst the other two served him as a matress. He then laid himself down on these two, and took a fourth woman, who was very beautiful, by the hand; and being asked what he intended to do with her, he answered that he would eat her, and also to feed upon a child she had had (3). The author observes, that in the country of Quito, the women used to till the ground, and get the harvest in; and that the men were wholly employed in spinning, and affairs of the house (4). The Sun was worshipped in Peru, and one of the chief acts of adoration was to offer him six teeth, which the worshippers had pulled out of their heads (5). In many provinces of this country, the people had extinguished all the ideas of honour with respect to chastity. One of their diversions was to sing the illustrious actions of their ancestors; which was done by dancing to the sound of a Drum, and by drinking till they had quite intoxicated themselves, after which they singled out any woman they liked, and enjoyed her uncensured by any one. Alcuni pigliano quelle donne, che gli piacciono, & condottele in certe case, sfuocano con quelle la lor lussuria, non se lo recando à biasmo, perche non conoscono qual dona si conserva con la verecondia, ne tengono conto di bonore, e manco riguardano al mondo (6). This we should strongly observe to those, who speak so much in favour of the good morals of the Americans; and who pretend that we have taught those nations to be wicked, ever since we brought them the light of the Gospel. The greatest debauchees among the Spaniards had never seen in

(1) Pietro Cieca, Historia del Peru, cap. 12. folio m. 23.

(2) Idem, ibid. folio 23 verso.

(3) Idem, ibid. folio 24.

(4) Idem, ibid. cap. 40. folio 78 verso.

(5) Idem, cap. 49. folio 99.

(6) Idem, cap. 41. folio 82 verso.

their native country, what they saw in the new-discovered world; I mean the women run after them in furious transports of lust, and provided them with certain secrets or charms to heighten the pleasure. Here follows an Italian passage on that subject: Nell’ Isporie del l’Indie narra Amerigo Vespucci d’esser capitato ad una certa costa, dove trovò femmine di tanta libidine, che come spiritate correvano dietro a’ suoi marinari, perche usassero con esso loro: e dice, che havevano un sugo di non so che erba, col quale bagnando le parti genitali de gli buomini, non solo cagionano, ut citius, ac sæpius erigerent, sed etiam quod eorum penis in insolitam excresceret magnitudinem: il che piaceva loro mirabilmente (7).

What follows is much worse. The author relates that, in the province of Carthagea, the men, (if the women they are to marry have their maidenheads) consider this as a blemish; and for this reason they do not consummate the marriage till she has been well cleansed of this stain by her relations or friends. In some places this good office is done by the mother; but to prevent frauds, it must be done in presence of witnesses. In certe parti della provincia Cartagena, quando maritano le figliuole, e che la sposa dove andare à marito, la madre della giovane in presentia d’alcuni suoi parenti le toglie la virginità con le dita, si che riputavano, che fusse piu honore mandarla à marito così corotta, che non la sua virginità. Ma tra questi costumi usati da loro, era miglior di alcune terre, che i parenti, o amici, toglievano la virginità alla giovane, & con questa conditione la maritavano, & il marito la riceveva (8). Diodorus Siculus ascribes the same practice to the inhabitants of the islands we now call Majorca and Minorca (9). He affirms that, at their weddings, the bridegroom never enjoyed his bride till all the relations and friends, who were invited to the nuptials, had enjoyed her, each according to the precedency which his age gave him (10). It is very surprizing, that a nation so lascivious as this should have so little jealousy; for generally speaking, the more people are inclined to this brutal pleasure the more jealous they are. The Turks and Moors are a proof of this. The latter are far from having the same turn of mind with the Americans of the province of Carthagea. They require, above all things, a wife who has kept her virginity very scrupulously; and if they have not proofs of this the day after the wedding, they send her back to her relations. See an account of Morocco published by Mr. de St. Olon in 1694. Some nations have been found near the Red Sea, who are furiously jealous on this article; these would not be satisfied, had not certain measures been taken in the bride’s infancy, which would oblige the bridegroom to begin with a kind of Chirurgical operation. Cardinal Bembus’s Latin will let us into the meaning of this. Aliis post bos relictiis populis, mare rubrum

(7) Alessandro Tassoni, Pensieri diversi, lib. 5. cap. 30. pag. 145.

(8) Cieca, folio 99. cap. 49.

(9) Antiently called Balares.

(10) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 5. cap. 18.

(11) The inhabitants of the Balares were so lustful, that whenever a pyrate used to bring them women to sell, they gave three or four males for one female. Diod. Sicul. lib. 5. cap. 17.

Possibly in some countries of the newly-discovered world, the rustick and simple inhabitants might have followed, with plainness and frugality, the laws of nature; and that they learnt deceit and riotous excess by their frequenting the Christians; but, in general, the depravity of the Americans was so brutal and enormous, that we cannot enough detest it. The design of our Cieca was to write a complete history of Peru, in four parts (b); it is not known whether he completed them; the only circumstance we are informed of is, that the first part was printed at Sevil in the year 1553. He began it in 1541, and ended it in the year 1550 (c). He was at Lima, the Capital of the Kingdom of Peru, when he gave the finishing stroke to it, and was then thirty two years of age (d). The work in question was translated into Italian [B].

(b) See Nicholas Antonio, Bibliob. Script. Hist. tom. 2. pag. 146.

(c) Cieca in fine Operis.

(d) Idem, ibid.

brum ingressi, complures nigrorum item & bonorum hominum, ac bello fortium civitates adierunt: qui natis statim scemina naturam consuunt, quoad urinæ exitus ne impediatur, easque cum adoleverint, sic conjatas in matrimonium collocant; ut sponsi prima cura sit, conglutinatas atque coalitas puellæ oras ferro intersecindere: tanto in honore apud homines barbaros est non ambigua ducendis uxoris virginitas (12). i. e. "Leaving other nations after these, and entering the Red Sea, they landed at several places inhabited by blacks, who were good men, and valiant in war. These, the instant a female child is born among them, sew up certain parts, but in such a manner as not to prevent the urine from passing; and when their females grow up, they marry them sewed up in this manner. Therefore the bridegroom's first care is to open the closed passage with an instrument; so honourable is it esteemed among these Barbarians, not to marry a woman, whose virginity is doubtful." Strange that man can be subject to follies so diametrically opposite!

lum cum finitimis gerente occurrerunt: quorum scemina virum passæ nullam partem corporis, præter muliebria, virgines ne illam quidem tegebant (17). This is very surprizing, since that the laws which relate to decorum allow, in all countries, a greater latitude to married women than to maidens.

(17) Petrus Bembus, Hist. Venet. lib. 6. folio 127 verso.

To return to the Americans. Most of them remove themselves the evil, there would be in their marriage, in case the bride should be a virgin. One would conclude that they trust only to themselves; they leave nothing for the friends and relations to do; I mean, that before ever they speak of contracts or any thing of that kind, they do whatever they have a mind to do with those who are to be their brides. Si maritavano alla foggia de i lor vicini: & odo dire, che alcuni, ò la maggior parte, prima che si maritino, togliono la virginità à quelle, che s'havvamo da maritare, mescolandoli con quelle lussuriosamente (13). By the way, all the Americans in general do not condemn maidenheads in this manner. In several countries of America, all husbands require their brides to be virgins, but few find them such, they coming too late; La maggior parte de gli Indiani si maritano con le figliuole & sorelle d' altri, senza ordine, & pochi trovano le mogli vergini (14). What this author observes with regard to Sodomy is horrid, it being practised publicly: Non ostante ch' havvessino molte donne bellissime, tuttavia (si come da loro intesi) usavano pubblicamente il tristo vicio della sodomia, & anco se ne vantavano alla scoperta (15). And there were even temples in which it was practised as a pious act (16); an abomination unknown to the heathens of antient Greece, though it was very common for them to prostitute women in honour of the Gods. I have not observed in Cieca, that some nations in this new found world never used to cover their pudenda; but other travellers affirm this in the most positive terms, and with this very odd circumstance, that such females as had their virginity did not conceal their pudenda; and that those who had lost it, only hid those parts: Hispanis ulteriora tentantibus, terra est objecta, continens paulo minus decies centena millia passuum ab Hispaniola protensa meridiem versus: atque in ea populi sub rege bel-

It is to be observed that this horrid depravity, which had extinguished the laws of humanity and modesty; and which had immersed these nations in the cruelty and ferocity of man-eating, and the most monstrous lasciviousness, had not yet extinguished or stifled the ideas of religion. They believed the immortality of the soul, as appears from all their funeral ceremonies (18); they worshipped the Sun (19); believed a creator of all things (20); offered sacrifices to their idols, and did not even spare human blood in them (21). The author observes very often, that they serve the Devil; but they look upon him as a being exceedingly powerful; and who, notwithstanding his wickedness, does yet partake in some little measure of the divine nature. Indiani di Tacunga credono l'immortalità dell' anima, quanto intendiamo da loro, & che vi sia un Creatore del tutto. Considerando la grandezza del cielo, il movimento del Sole, della Luna, & altre cose maravigliose, quantunque acciecati dal Demonio, credono, che esso habbia possanza in ogni cosa. Benchè alcuni conoscendo le sue malvagità, & come è sempre buggiardo, & gli tratta pessimamente, lo hanno in odio, ma pur l'ubbidiscono per timore, credendo, che sia in lui qualche Deità (22). i. e. "The Indians of Tacunga, as they relate, believe the immortality of the soul, and that there is a creator of all things. Considering the wide extent of the heavens, the Sun's motion, and that of the moon, and other wonderful things, notwithstanding they are blinded by the Devil, they believe that he has power over all things. However, some being sensible of his malice, and knowing that he is always a liar, and treats them vastly ill, hate him; and yet they obey him through fear, believing that there is something of divinity in him." He observes that their priests lead a holy life, and are had in great honour (23).

(18) See Cieca, cap. 8. 48, 51, & passim alibi.

(19) Idem, cap. 43. folio 87; & cap. 49. folio 99.

(20) Idem, ibid.

(21) Idem, cap. 4. folio 8 verso; & cap. 20. folio 39.

[B] The work in question was translated into Italian. Nicholas Antonio (24) observes, that the Spanish edition of Seville, 1553 in folio, was followed the year after by that of Antwerp in 8vo, and by an Italian edition of Rome 1555 in 8vo. He says that the Italian version was by Augustin de Gravaliz. I add that it was printed at Venice appresso Giordano Ziletti in the year 1557, 8vo. I make use of this edition, and such is the printer's name in the title; but I find the following words in the last page: In Vinegia, appresso Domenico de' Farri, ad instantia di M. Andrea Arrivabene M. D. LVI. This edition was not known to Nicholas Antonio, who says that the other parts of this history were impatiently expected by the publick reliques valde ab omnibus desiderantur (25).

(22) Idem, cap. 41. folio 8a verso.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Nicol. Antonio, Bibliob. Script. Hist. tom. 2. pag. 146.

(25) Idem, ibid.

LEO (GONSALEZ PONTIUS DE) was a native of Seville, and lived in the sixteenth Century. He resided in Rome in the year 1585, and there published a Latin answer (a) to a book, which a German Protestant named Leonhart Waramund, had wrote in defence of Gebhard Truchses, Archbishop of Colen. He wrote with great passion in this Reply; and, according to the practice at that time, vented a numberless multitude of injurious expressions against his adversary. He does not write ill, in Latin, for a Spaniard [A], and had read a great deal.

(a) It is a volume in quarto, and contains 185 pages.

LEONCLAVIUS

[A] He does not write ill, in Latin, for a Spaniard. I will not say but that there are Spaniards, who have understood the Latin tongue extremely well, and have wrote it with great purity and elegance; my meaning LEONCLAVIUS (JOHN) one of the most learned men of the sixteenth Century, was a native of Westphalia, and a Gentleman by birth. He spent near two years at the Duke of Savoy's Court, on the affairs of Lazarus Suendius, or Swend (a); after which he travelled a long time in the retinue of Baron Zerotini; he also resided some years with the Baron de Kilts. He had been invited to Heidelberg to be Greek Professor in that City; but Prince Cassmir's death made this invitation of no effect (b). During his abode in Turkey, he collected excellent materials for composing the Ottoman History; and it is to him the publick is indebted for the best account we have of that Empire [A]. To the knowledge in the learned languages he had added that of the civil law; whereby he was extremely well qualified to translate the Basilica [B]. His other versions were esteemed, though

(a) He was a General.

(b) Extracted from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philosphorum, pag. 379.

(1) Intituled, Respetitio solemnis ad l. unic. C. de Classic. tit. 12. lib. 11.

(2) At Salamanca in 410.

ing is, that the writers of that country are generally too negligent in this particular. Some of them are careless even of the orthography, and write u instead of b, and y instead of i. Here follows an example of this. Cujus (rei maritimæ) itidem polytica tractatio, dispositio & Archigubernatio à Magno Philippo nostro Hispaniarum Rege . . . tue sollicitudini & prudentiæ emandata prædicatur. Thus writes the Licentiate Don John Baptiste de Urquiola & Elorriaga, in the preliminary epistle to a treatise on the civil Law (1) printed in 1663 (2), and dedicated to Don Francisco Ramos del Manzano. He always writes Lyppius instead of Lippius.

[A] It is to him the publick is indebted for the best account we have of the Ottoman empire.] Thuanus speaks of him as follows. Juris Romani Græcique consultissimo, & rerum Turcicarum apprime perito, ad quas linguæ ipsius Byzantina peregrinatione comparatam cognitionem, exactam ultimæ Historiæ Græcæ lectionem, & acce ac admirandum judicium attulit, quod non solum scriptis ab ipso dum viveret publicatis, sed in iis quæ post mortem ejus edita sunt, elucet. i. e. "He was extremely well skilled in the Greek and Roman laws, and in Turkish affairs; to the study whereof he brought the knowledge of the language itself which he learnt by travelling to Constantinople; a diligent perusal of the later history of Greece, and a subtle and admirable judgment; all which is manifest not only by his compositions published by himself, but likewise by those which appeared after his death." Leonclavius is author of Historiæ Muslimicæ Turcarum libri 18. [The complete title is, *Historiæ Muslimicæ Turcorum de Monumentis ipsorum exscriptæ libri XVII. Opus, quod Gentis originem, progressus, familias, & Principatus diversos, Res Osmaneas à Suleimano Schachæ ad Suleimanem II. memoriæ nostræ, cum aliis maximis, variis, & hæcenus ignotis continet. Accessere Commentarii duo, quibus fides Historiæ adstruitur, cum Onomastico gemino Vocabulorum Turcicorum, Arabicorum, Persicorum & aliorum. Francofurti 1591. fol. Addit. by the transl.] Apologetici duo, prior est libitinarium index Osmanidarum, posterior continet Epistolas de rebus Turcicis. Commonefactio de præsentibus rerum Turcicarum statu. Annales Turcici cum supplemento, & pandectis Historiæ Turcicæ (1). This last work is properly but a translation of a book written by the Turks themselves; I mean Turkish Annals which Jerom Beck of Leopoldsdorff, ambassador from Ferdinand, brought from Constantinople in 1551. Ferdinand caused them to be translated into German by John Spiegel (2); and Leonclavius translated them into Latin. Annales etiam Sultanorum Othmanidarum à Turcis sua lingua scriptos, & studio Hieronymi Beck à Leopoldsdorff Constantinopoli aduersos, jussuque Ferdinandi Cæsaris interprete Turcico J. Spiegel Germanice translatos, Leonclavius Latine redidit illustravit, & ad annum 1588 usque auxit (3). [Francofurti 1588 in 4to, It. Editio altera, Francofurti 1596 in folio. The Turkish Annals end at the year 1550, and Leonclavius had annexed to them the history of 37 years. He likewise added an ample commentary, containing several particulars relating to the state of Turkey, which he had very much studied during his abode in that country, and entitled it, Pandectæ Historiæ Turcicæ liber singularis ad illustrandos annales; and another work which had been published before in the collection of Simon Schardius, printed at Basil in 1574, and entitled, Historia Viennæ Austriacæ a Turcicis obsessæ, conversa dudum e lingua Germanica (*). There is also, "Apomafaris Apotelesmata, sive de significatis & eventis somniorum, ex Indorum, Persarum, Ægyptiorumque disciplina, à Græco Latine, Interprete Joanne Leonclavio. Francof. 1577, 8vo. Leonclavius found that he had mistook, in*

(1) Thuan. lib. 4. sub fin.

(2) Interpreter of the Turkish language to King Ferdinand.

(3) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philosphorum. pag. 380.

(*) Father Nicéron, ubi supra, pag. 297, 298.

"publishing this work under the false name of Apomafaris. Rigaltius who published it since, with the addition of some chapters which were wanting in Leonclavius's edition, has restored it to Achmet or Achamet, the son of Seirim, who flourished about the year 800, and had wrote it in Arabick, whence it was translated into Greek. The title of Rigaltius's edition is as follows: Artimedori & Achmetis Oneirocritica, seu de Divinatione per somnia; Astrophysici & Nicephori versus Oneirocritici; Græcæ & Latine ex versione Jani Cornari & Joannis Leonclavii, cum notis, Nic. Rigaltii. Paris 1603 in 4to." Addition by the translator.]

[B] He was extremely well qualified to translate the Basilica.] I mean the abridgment of the Basilica. This work is entitled Verfio & Notæ ad Synopsim LX Librorum Basilicon, seu universi Juris Romani, & ad Novellas Imperatorum. It was printed at Basil in 1575. Melchior Adam speaks thus of it (4); (4) Ibid. Evulgavit cum annotationibus sexaginta librorum Basilicon, hoc est universi juris Romani auctoritate principum Romanorum in Græcam linguam traducti, Eclogam sive synopsim ante non visam: item Novellarum antea non publicatarum librum. i. e. "He first published, with notes, an epitome of the sixty books of the Basilica, that is of the universal Roman law, translated into Greek by the authority of the Roman Emperors, likewise a book of Novellæ (ordinances) then first published." Mr. Teiffier will permit me to remark, that the manner of his expressing the title may mislead the reader. He has likewise published, says he (6), Sexaginta libros Basilicon, Eclogam sive synopsim, & Novellas cum Notis. This is specifying all the Basilica, and a second book entitled Ecloga sive synopsim, and consequently it is enlarging and confounding things. [The true title is as follows: Basilicon Librorum, id est universi Juris Romani Principum Romanorum auctoritate Græcæ traducti Ecloga sive synopsim; nec non Novellarum antebac non evulgatarum liber; Græcæ & Latine, ex versione & cum notis Joannis Leonclavii. Basilea 1575, folio (†). Addit. by the transl.] Teiffier, (†) Ibid. pag. 299.

quoting Melchior Adamus affirms, that Scaliger calls Leonclavius the most learned Civilian of his time, and even places him in a bigger rank than the great Cujas (6). Now Melchior Adam says nothing like this; and besides, the things said in Leonclavius's praise in the second Scaligerana are vastly beneath this Elogium. "Leonclavius is the best author who has wrote concerning the Turks." Leonclavius fuit Westphalus, sed non Barbarus: bene intellexit Græcæ Constantinopolitanæ & inferioris ævi: omnia ejus scripta sunt utilia, imo necessaria; Græcæ Jurisconsultorum intellexit, sed Autorum Veterum non intellexit, ut H. Stephanus, qui paulo ante obitum muli scripsit ad me contra Leonclavii editionem Xenophontis. Leonclavius habebat scorta secum. Clusius eum novit familiarissimè (7). i. e. "Leonclavius was a native of Westphalia, but not a Barbarian. He was well skilled in the Constantinopolitan Greek, and that of the last age of the empire. All his compositions are useful or rather necessary; he understood the Greek of the Civilians, but not that of the ancient authors, as Henry Stephens, who, a short time before he died, wrote to me, a great many things against Leonclavius's edition of Xenophon. Leonclavius kept harlots in his house. Clusius was vastly intimate with him." Thus speaks the second Scaligerana. Leonclavius's learning is more applauded there than his moral conduct, since it is affirmed that he kept prostitutes in his house. I must not omit his Jus Græco-Romanum (8) in two volumes folio, and his Notæ ad Paratitla seu ad Collectionem Constitutionum Ecclesiasticarum (†) Father Nicéron, pag. 294.

(5) Teiffier, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 2. pag. 187.

(†) Ibid. pag. 299.

(6) Teiffier, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 2. pag. 186.

(7) Scaligerana, pag. m. 129.

(8) Græcæ & Latine, Francofurti 1596.

(c) Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philosophor. pag. 379.

though the critics pretend to have found many faults in them [C]. The dialogues he published of Cæsarius greatly exasperated J. Billius [D]. He died at Vienna in Austria in June 1593 (c), being near threescore years old (d).

(d) Thuan. Hist. lib. 104, sub fin.

(g) At Frankfurt 1593.

clasticarum (g) in 8vo. [The complete title of the former is, Juris Græco-Romani tam Canonici quam Civilis tomus duo ex variis Monumentis Europæ & Asiæ erati, Græcè & Latine ex Versione Joan. Leonclavii; edente Marquardo Frebero, cum Auctuario, Chronologia Juris, & Præfatione, Francofurti 1596. 2 Vol. fol. Leonclavius dying before he had an opportunity of publishing this work himself, Freher undertook to supply what was wanting and to publish it (*). The full title of the other is Paratitulum libri tres antiqui de Græcis Latini facti, & Notatorum libri duo. Francofurti 1593, in 8vo. These Paratitles, which are of Theodore Balsamon, were reprinted under the title of Collectio Constitutionum Ecclesiasticarum, with Leonclavius's version corrected, in the second volume of Bibliotheca Juris Canonici Veteris, Guilielmi Voisili, & Henrici Juscelli. Paris, 1661, in folio (†). Note the reader will meet with an ample catalogue of our Leonclavius's works, in father Niceron (‡), there being several which are but just mentioned by Mr. Bayle. Addit. by the translator.]

very sharp criticism on the translation of Xenophon (11), and was exposed to very severe complaints from his adversary. Baillet mentions this dispute, and Melchior Adam speaks of it as follows. Litem tamen ei super ista interpretatione Xenophontea Criticam & Grammaticam movit Henricus Stephanus, vir & typographus clarissimus, edita in ejus errores insignes inquisitione autoscbediastica. Contra & Leonclavius de Stephano conqueritur, quod contra fidem datam, & præter officium viri boni Xenophontis a se latine redditi exemplar, sicut & Zozimi, detinuerit. Et fassus est Stephanus, accepisse se illam Xenophontis versionem ab annis circiter octodecim; post tredecim aut quatuordecim amplius annis sibi non visam, sed cum à sua supellectile liberaria, militum incuria, belli tempore aliquot libri incendio periissent, nescivisse, an in illorum numero Xenophon à Leonclavio versus, fuisset. Tandem, interjecto anni amplius spacio, librum inventum fuisse, situ oblitum, & membrana crassa, qua involutus erat, conservatum (12). i. e. "Henry Stephens, a most renowned printer, was engaged in a critical and grammatical contest with him, concerning that translation of Xenophon, and printed extemporary remarks on his flagrant errors. On the other side Leonclavius exclaims against Stephens, for detaining, contrary to the promise he had given, and the duty of a man of honour, the copy of his translation of Xenophon and likewise that of Zozimus. Stephens confessed that he had received that version of Xenophon about eighteen years before; that for thirteen or fourteen years he had not seen it; but that when some books in his library, during the war, perished in the flames through the carelessness of the soldiers, he did not know but that Leonclavius's version of Xenophon might be among them. That at last, in a little more than a year, the book was found, quite mouldy, and preserved by its thick parchment binding."

(11) See above citation (7) the passage of the Scaligerana.

(12) Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philosophor. pag. 380.

(*) Father Niceron, ut supra, pag. 299.

(†) Idem, ibid. pag. 300.

(‡) Tom. 26.

[C] His other versions were esteemed, though the Critics pretend to have found many faults in them. "He is one of the most celebrated translators that Germany ever gave birth to. He has given us a translation of Xenophon revised three times; of Zozimus; of the Annals of Constantine Manasses; of those of Michael Glycas; of the epitome of the sixty books of the Basilica; and of several works of St. Gregory Nazianzen. . . . He also corrected Xylander's translation of Dion, and that of Chalcondylas by Clauser (10)." Baillet, whose words I have here borrowed, has transcribed the eulogiums, which are extremely advantageous, that Huetius bestows on this translator. [Huetius says, "no German has translated with greater skill than Leonclavius; he has translated, in the most perfect manner, the thoughts and expressions of his authors, without any way curtailing them; his Latin often corresponds word for word with the Greek; he observes the same construction and order as are found in his originals, by which means he transcribes his authors, entire, into another language. He also writes with great politeness and clearness; his Latin has that exact purity, that easy air, so seldom in other versions (†)." Addition by the translator.] The notes on Zozimus, in the English edition of 1679, do not give so advantageous an idea of our Leonclavius's capacity. Henry Stephens wrote a [D] The dialogues he published of Cæsarius, greatly exasperated J. Billius. Leonclavius published four dialogues (13) of Cæsarius, brother to St. Gregory Nazianzen, which he had translated into Latin. It is disputed whether this work ought to be ascribed to Cæsarius. Father Labbe refers that enquiry to another opportunity. Plura, says he (14), adversus Leonclavium primum eorum (dialogorum) editorem declamavit Jacobus Billius Prunæus præfatione in decimam orationem sancti Nazianzeni, quæ alias expendimus accuratius. Lambecius (15) warmly defends Leonclavius against the invectives of James de Billi.

(13) De Quæstionibus & Responsionibus Philosoph. præcipue vero Theologic.

(14) De Scriptis Eccles. tom. 1. pag. 217.

(15) Lambecius, Biblioth. Cæsari. lib. 4. pag. 31, & seq.

(10) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. num. 833. pag. 457.

(†) Huet quoted in Father Niceron, ut supra, pag. 294, 295.

LEONICENUS (NICHOLAS) born at Vicenza in the year 1428, taught Physic in the University of Ferrara for above threescore years (a); he was not only a very able man in his profession, but also very well versed in polite Literature. He was the first who translated Galen's works into Latin (b). It is impossible to be more disengaged from all sensual pleasures than he was. He was distinguished in the most eminent manner by his temperance, chastity and extreme aversion for all kind of covetousness [A]; it was to this innocent life he ascribed that vigorous health [B], which he enjoyed even to a very

(a) Mercklinus, in Lindenio Revocato, pag. 837. See also Koniz. Biblioth. p. 468.

(b) Primum Græca Galeni volumina Latina interpretando studiosè perscrutatus, demonstravit. Jovius, Elog. cap. 70.

[A] He was distinguished in the most eminent manner by his temperance, chastity, and extreme aversion for all kind of covetousness. Had it not been for his cheerful temper and pleasant countenance, men would have took him for a perfect Stoic. He used to eat and to sleep very little, he abstained from wine and women; he did not much care whether they presented to him one kind of meat or another, he used without any choice the victuals that were offered him, and he cared so little for money, that he could not even distinguish one piece of coin from another. Cibi & vini maxime abstinent, somnique minimi, præsertim verò Veneris continentissimus, usque adeò mollioris vitæ voluptates abdicavit, ut pecunias, luxuriæ instrumenta, nec agnita quidem monetæ nota contemneret; oblatum, & nulla delectum cura cibum caperet; nec unquam de fortuna quereretur. . . . Eum bene perfectum Stoicum putasset, nisi honesto oris liberalis hilaritas affuisset (1).

heard him say this. Quum ego aliquando comiter ab eo peterem, ut ingenè proferret, quoniam arcano artis uteretur, ut tanto corporis atque animi vigore vitia senectutis eluderet: Vividum, inquit, ingenium perpetua, Jovii vitæ innocentia, salubre verò corpus hilaris frugalitatis præsidio facillè tuemur (2). i. e. "I desired him once civilly, to tell me with sincerity, what secret of his art he made use of, to avoid the infirmities of old age, and to enjoy such a strength of body and mind. Jovius, said he to me, we easily keep up a sprightly genius, by leading constantly an innocent life, and preserve the body in health, by a cheerful frugality." Jovius had observed just before (3), that Leonicenius at the age of fourscore and ten, had the perfect use of all his senses, and a very strong memory; that he walked without a stick, and that he did not stoop in the least, though he was very tall. Observe however, that an innocent life is not always attended with the happy consequences which Leonicenius ascribes to it. There are many persons,

(2) Ibid. pag. 163.

(3) Pervenit ad nonagesimum annum, integerrimis sensibus, vigetæque memoria, nec incurva quidem cervicè, quum esset statum celsioris, & sine scipione venerabilis. Idem, ibid.

(1) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 70. pag. m. 162.

[B] It was to this innocent life he ascribed his vigorous health. Paulus Jovius asserts that he very great age, for he lived fourscore and sixteen years [C]. His merit must certainly have been very great, since both the Scaligers commend him [D]. I cannot tell whether we ought to believe what one of them observes, namely that Leonicensus, being troubled in his youth with an epilepsy, was weary of his life, and almost determined to lay violent hands on himself [E]. This learned Physician composed several considerable works [F], and wrote verses very well [G]. He died in the year 1524. He had set up for persons, who might have disputed with him the crown of chastity and temperance, and whose conscience was not less clear than his, and whose days have nevertheless been few and evil; they did not live long, and were often out of order.

Let us quote another witness besides Paulus Jovius. I have read a particular in Melchior Adam, whence it seems we may infer, that Leonicensus told his disciple John Langius, that the chastity of his youth was, in his opinion, the cause of his long life. Audiuit in Italia (Joannes Langius) . . . Nicolaum Leonicenum, Dioscoridis illustratorem: qui annum ætatis attigit nonagesimum sextum, cum amplius sexaginta annos Ferrariz docuisset. Hic dixit, se viridi vegetaque uti senectâ, quia castam juventutem virili ætati tradidisset, ediditque opusculum, in quo omnibus ægris salutem & vitam restitui conciliarique posse docuit (4), i. e. "John Langius studied in Italy under Nicholas Leonicensus, who explained Dioscorides, and lived till he was fourscore and sixteen years old, having been above threescore years Professor at Ferrara. He said that he enjoyed a brisk and lively old age, because he came to the age of manhood having been very continent in his youth. He has published a work in which he maintains that it is possible to restore all sick persons to their health and life." You see in this passage, that he was the author of a book, made on purpose to prove that all sick persons may be restored to their health. He excepted doubtless those, who had no other distemper but old age, or at least he confessed that that distemper is incurable. He found it by his own experience; for here follows what Langius, an eye-witness, observes of him. Ferrariam igitur venimus, ubi Leonicenum, elegantioris medicinz illustratorem, edentulum fere, & jam ex senii, marasmo tabescentem, convenimus: quem, senile ætatis ejus reveriti, perplexis de erroribus Plinii problematibus obtundere volebamus (5). i. e. "We came to Ferrara, where we waited on Leonicensus, who illustrated the most polite part of Physic; he had lost almost all his teeth, and was quite spent with age. Out of respect for this worthy old man, we forbore to teize him with perplexing objections concerning Pliny's mistakes." The letter, where Langius speaks thus, is without any date; we cannot therefore judge from it, whether Paulus Jovius is not mistaken with regard to that vigour he ascribes to old Leonicensus.

[C] He lived fourscore and sixteen years. Naudé is very much mistaken, who makes him live above a whole century. I shall transcribe his own words because they contain some other particulars, which are very extraordinary. Hippocrates, Galenus, Avenzoar, Leonicensus, cogitate vos quantum tempore, loco, vivendi ratione inter se discrepantes, hoc uno vitæ termino plane conveniunt, quem omnes ultra centesimum annum protraxerunt (6). i. e. "Consider, that Hippocrates, Galen, Avenzoar, Leonicensus, how much soever they differed with regard to time, place, and their manner of living, yet met with the same fate in this, that they all lived above an hundred years."

[D] Both the Scaligers commend him. In these words (7). Leonicensus à patre semper imprimis commendatus, & Medicorum sui temporis facile princeps judicatus. i. e. "My father always very much commended Leonicensus, whom he judged to be the first Physician of his time." So much for the father: as for the son, he speaks thus. De eo viro non nisi honorifice prædicare debemus, vel eo nomine quod primus Philosophiam & Medicinam ipsam cum humanioribus literis conjunxit. Primus enim ille nos docuit, homines, qui sine bonis literis Medicinam tractant, esse similes iis qui in alieno foro litigant (8). i. e. "We ought not to speak of this man but in honourable terms, were it only for this, that he is the first who joined the study of polite literature, with Philosophy and even with Physic. He is the first who taught us, that they who pretend to treat of Physic without any skill

"in the Belles-Lettres, are like those, who plead in a foreign Court."

[E] . . . One of them observes, that Leonicensus being troubled in his youth with an epilepsy, was weary of his life, and almost determined to lay violent hands on himself. Mirum præterea, continet he, accipi de viro. A pueritia, imo à cunabulis ipsi ad 30 annum morbo comitiali adeo tentabatur, ut cum ad se redierat, pertæsus vitæ pene sibi manus afferret. Sed post trigesimum annum plane eo malo defunctus, omnibus membrorum ac sensuum officiis integer, nulla morbi suspicione ad 94 annum pervenit: Et si bene memini, triduo antequam decederet à vita, operam dederat lectioni. i. e. "What I have heard of this man is wonderful. From his childhood, nay even from his cradle, till he came to be thirty, he was so much troubled with the falling-sickness, that on his recovering from a fit, he was tired with his life, and ready to kill himself. But after the age of thirty, he was entirely free from that distemper, and had the perfect use of all his members and senses; and thus he lived in very good health, without feeling the least return of his former distemper, to the age of fourscore and fourteen years. And if my memory does not fail me, he had been reading but three days before he died." This was a fate worthy to be envied; not indeed, because Leonicensus lived fourscore and sixteen years; this would not be very considerable without the rest, nay, it would be a great evil rather than a happiness; but because in that very great age he had the use of his mind, of his memory, and of his senses, and because his last illness was very short (9).

[F] Leonicensus wrote several considerable works. He translated divers treatises of Galen into Latin, as also Hippocrates's Aphorisms, and Aristotle's first book De Partibus Animalium. Besides these, he wrote De Plinii & plurium aliorum Medicorum in Medicina Erroribus. i. e. "Of Errors committed in Physick by Pliny, and many other Physicians." De tribus Doctrinis ordinatis secundum Galeni sententiam. i. e. "Of the three well contrived Systems according to Galen's opinion." De formativa Virtute. i. e. "Of the Plastic Vertue." De Dyspædia & pluribus aliis Serpentinibus. i. e. "Of the Dipsas and several other Serpents." Quædam de Herbis & Frustribus, Animalibus, Metallis. i. e. "Some Observations on Herbs, Fruits, Animals, and Metals." De Morbo Gallico, sive Neapolitano. i. e. "Of the Venereal Disease." Contra suarum Translationum obtrectatores Apologia. i. e. "A Defense of himself against those who censured his Translations." A book intitled Antisophista, on which Paulus Jovius observes (10), that nemo errores Sophistarum importuna garrulitate cuncta sædantium eloquentius atque validius confutavit (11) quam Leonicensus. i. e. "None ever refuted the errors of the Sophists, who spoil every thing by their impertinent jargon, with more eloquence and strength of argument than Leonicensus." He translated Dion's History, and Lucian's Dialogues into Italian, to gratify Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who did not understand Latin (12). I forgot to mention his treatise De Vipera i. e. "Of the Viper", against which a learned man wrote, as Rhodiginus tells us (13). Nec me fallit ex eruditioribus quendam edito etiam libello Marasum à vipera desparasse, quo Nicolai Leoniceni viri undecunque scientissimi placita uberius de hujus animalis natura convellat. i. e. "I know that one of the most learned men distinguished the reptile called Marassus from the viper, in order the better to refute Nicolas Leonicensus's opinion, concerning the nature of that animal; of Leonicensus I say, a most learned man in every respect."

[G] . . . And wrote verses very well. Giraldi asserts it. Erat & Leonicensus merito inter Poetas collocandus, nam cum senex optimos versus faceret, & interdum à Græco in Latinum transferret, tum in juvenili sua ætate non modo meditato arguè & doctè composuit,

(9) I speak thus with regard to the passage quoted from Scaliger, and not to that quoted from Langius.

(10) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. 70. pag. 162.

(11) He says also, Imperatorum lastratibus publicatis summa eloquentia commentariis occurrerat. Ibid.

(12) Idem, ibid. pag. 163.

(13) Coetus Rhodigin. Antiq. lib. 6. cap. 16. pag. m. 298.

(14) He calls him nostri temporis plane Coryphaeus, lib. 26. cap. 30.

(4) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Medicor. pag. 140, 141.

(5) Joannes Langius, Epist. Medicin. II. lib. 2. pag. m. 472.

(6) Naudæus, in Pentade Quæst. Iutropbiol. pag. m. 41.

(7) Scaligerana Prima, pag. m. 97.

(8) Joseph Scaliger, Epist. 19. pag. 104.

for a great censurer of Pliny, at which his disciple Calcagninus was not very well pleased. I shall transcribe his words [H] which are very much to Leonicenus's honour.

He did not apply himself to the practice of Physic; and when he was asked the reason of it, he answered that he was more serviceable to the publick, by teaching all the Physicians, than if he had visited the sick. Idem mihi respondit Nicolaus Leonicenus Ferrariæ, demiranti cur artem medicandi, quam profitebatur ipse non exerceret, plus, inquit, ago docens omnes medicos (c).

(c) Erasm. A. popstbeg. lib. 3. pag. m. 163.

When I said that he was born at Vicenza I only followed the general opinion of the authors who mentioned him; but I ought to have acquainted the reader with their mistake. They did not understand the meaning of the epithet Vicentinus, which he takes; it signifies only that he was born in the Vicentine. His native place is called Lomigo in Italian (d), and Leonicum in Latin; hence it was that he surnamed himself Leonicenus.

(d) Leandro Alberti, Descrip. di tutta Italia, folio m. 470.

sed etiam ut sepe mihi memorare solitus fuit, ex tempore & impræmeditata carmina cecinit (15). i. e. "Leonicenus deserves to be ranked among the Poets. "For as in his old age he wrote verses very well, and "sometimes translated some poems out of Greek into "Latin; so in his youth he composed some very wittily "and learnedly, not only when he took time to study "them, but even as he often told me, he sung some "extempore and without any premeditation."

(15) Lilius Gregorius Gyraldus de Poët. suorum tempor. Dial. 2. pag. m. 564.

[H] He had set up for a great censurer of Pliny . . . I shall transcribe Calcagninus's words.] They are to be met with in a letter which he wrote to Erasmus July the 6th 1525. Leonicenus medicus, says he (16), jam mensis aliquot vitæ minimum absolvit, vir, ad æternitatem natus, quem ego ultimum heroum & auri seculi reliquias appellabam. Ex illa enim ætate quæ magnam habuit ingeniorum proventus, & Hermolaos, Politianos, Picos, Merulas, Domitios nobis tulit, hic ultimus decessit jam propè centenarius, integris, quod mirum videri possit, adhuc sensibus. Multa scripsit, multa vertit à Græcis, multa in Sylva medica jam conclamata nobis restituit, Adversus barbaros medicos perpetuas inimicitias exercuit: quin & Plinium, à quo proposito frustra hominum sepe deterrui, inclementer nimis semper insecta- us est. Denique quod paucis contigit, vivens posteritatem suam vidit: ejus obitum acerbe tuli, tum privato nomine, fuerat enim mihi præceptor, tum publico: videbam enim rem Latinam ejus morte insignem plagam accepisse. i. e. "Leonicenus the Physician died a few "months ago; he was a man born for eternity; and "I used to stile him the last hero, and the remains of "the golden age; for of all the great men, which "this age produced, as an Hermolaus, a Politian, "a Pius of Mirandola, a Merula, a Domitius, he was "the last; and he died being almost an hundred years "old, and, what is surprizing, having the use of all "his senses to the last. He wrote a great deal; he "translated many books out of Greek; he has re- "formed a great many things in Physic, with our ap- "plause; he opposed continually the ignorant Physi- "cians. Nay he even criticised Pliny too severely, "from which I often endeavoured to dissuade him, but "to no purpose. Lastly, what happens to very few, he "has seen his sect established in his life-time. His death "has grieved me very much, both on my own private account, for I studied under him, and on account of the public, being persuaded that his death "is a great loss to polite literature."

(16) Apud Erasm. in Epist. 54. lib. 20. pag. 3019. Pope Blount ascribes this to Erasmus.

LEONINUS (ELBERT, or ENGELBERT) in Dutch de Leeuw, born in the Isle of Bommel in Guelderland, was one of the best Civilians in the sixteenth Century, and very well skilled in State-affairs. He studied first in his own country, then at Utrecht, afterwards at Emmerick, and lastly at Louvain. He did not only apply himself to the Belles Lettres in that City, under the learned Peter Nannius; he also studied the Law, and took his degrees in that Faculty in the year 1547. He went afterwards to Arras to learn the French tongue there, and at a year's end returned to Louvain, where he married the daughter of the first Professor of Civil Law [A]. A chair of a Professor of Canon Law happening to become vacant the second day of his marriage he was chosen to fill it; he acquitted himself very worthily of that employment, and gained a great reputation both by his lectures, and by his answers to the law questions which were proposed to him from all parts of Europe. In the year 1560 he succeeded Gabriel Mudæus first Professor of Law; and from that time his reputation increased daily, so that the great Lords and Magistrates in the Low-Countries consulted him, having a very great esteem for him. Even they who were at variance trusted him with their most secret affairs, and with the subjects of their disputes, and did not even scruple to choose him for their arbiter; but such was the obstinacy of their hatred that he could not reconcile them together. He had the honour to be intimately beloved by the Prince of Orange; and this was one of the reasons which determined him never to go over to the King of Spain's party, after he had once declared for those Lords and for those Provinces, who were resolved to assert their liberty. I shall relate below the other reasons he had for [A] He married the daughter of the first Professor of Civil Law at Louvain.] Her name was Barba Van Haze (1). If her husband deserved to be surnamed Longulus, because he was very tall (2), she deserved also a particular surname on account of her long life. Valerius Andreas relates that she lived fifty two years with her husband, and continued thirty six years a widow. Vixit in primo atque unico matrimonio annos quinquaginta duos. Superstes vidua Bruxellam ad suos reversa annis xxxvi marito, supervixit (3). i. e. "He "lived fifty two years with his first and only wife. "His widow returned to her relations at Bruffels, and "survived him during thirty six years." She must have been twelve years old at least when she was married. Add all these sums together, and you will find a whole century; nor will there be an error in this calculation, as there is in Valerius Andreas's account. There was, according to him, a whole year at least, between the time when Leoninus took his degrees, and his nuptials. He took his degrees in the year 1547, whence it follows that he was married in the year 1548: now he died in the year 1598; how can it then be maintained that he lived fifty two years with his wife? I know that this is asserted in his epitaph (4); but we must infer from thence, that he married Barba van Haze in the year 1546, and that Valerius Andreas was in the wrong, not to observe that he was mistaken in his calculation.

(1) Val. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 197.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 199.

(4) *It is inserted in Swert's Atbe-ne Belgicæ, pag. 223, 226.*

for this conduct [B]. He was appointed Chancellor of Guelderland after the Archduke Matthias's departure in the year 1581. He was one of the Embassadors whom the States sent to the French King after the death of the Prince of Orange in the year 1584, and he was their speaker at the audience they had of Henry III (a), and in the Conferences that were held concerning the offer which was made him of the Sovereignty of the Low-Countries. He made a speech at the Hague in the name of the same States to the Earl of Leicester, whom Queen Elizabeth had appointed their Governor; he insinuated himself into this Earl's familiarity, and into that of the other English Lords, and advised them to use their authority with a great deal of moderation; but other advices prevailed. He died at Arnhem December the 4th (b) 1598 at the age of threescore and nineteen (c). He never professed the Protestant Religion, and even behaved himself a little too freely in that respect [C].

(a) See the substance of his Oration in Strada, de Bello Belgic. Dec. 2. lib. 5. pag. m. 333, 334.

(b) It is set down the 6th, in his Epitaph, transcribed by Swert. Arnem. Belgic. pag. 225.

(c) Taken from Valerius Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 179. &c.

There

[B] I shall relate below the other reasons he had for this conduct. We find in him an instance of a constancy which is very uncommon; for being engaged with the States, he continued in that engagement steadfastly till his death, though it was not a zeal for religion that prompted him to it. It is no extraordinary thing to see persons die in that party, which they declared for at the rising of a faction, or at the beginning of a revolution. But if such an undertaking was a long time carrying on; if it was attended with various consequences and events, sometimes favourable, sometimes disadvantageous; you will find, generally speaking, that the same persons forsake and join again with the same party three or four times; and if they end as they began, it is sometimes owing to mere chance: death surprises them when they are come to their first lodgings; a few years more would perhaps again have made them go over to the other side. The only means to be proof against all variations, is either to engage with the rebellious party, thro' a fervent zeal for religion; or to exasperate one's Prince to such a degree, that there can be no depending on a pardon, though never so solemnly promised. Leoninus's constancy was not owing to any of these causes; a constancy which continued a long while, and was never interrupted. What then could be his motives? They were as follow. The Prince of Orange had an entire confidence in, and an infinite friendship for him. This made him obnoxious to the Royalists, and to the King himself. They imagined that he was concerned in the rebellion, which yet, says he (5), was absolutely false; but he did not think it proper to serve persons who suspected him unjustly. But further, he was Counsellor of State to the new Commonwealth, he had been trusted with their most considerable affairs; and he thought it would have been a perfidiousness to discover them to their enemies, as he would have been obliged to do, had he gone over to them (6). Besides all this, he was determined to follow Solon's advice, which is, that in civil wars an honest man ought to declare himself for the weakest and most dangerous party. Sed & Solonis dictum, inquit, & consilium ob oculos habebam, quod bonus vir in civilibus dissensionibus partem eligere debeat inferiorem & magis periculosam (7). A man must be very much a Philosopher to give such advice, but he must be much more a Philosopher who follows it. But why did not Solon advise us to declare for the party which has right on its side? I imagine one might answer, that the different parties in a Commonwealth do all pretend to act from a public spirit for the good of the whole; and they all respectively assert their cause with such a shew of arguments, objections and answers, that it is a difficult matter for private persons to sift out the truth, and to find out who is in the right or in the wrong. And therefore what better course can they take but to declare themselves for the weakest party; nor is it such a difficult matter to discover which is the weakest, as it is to judge which is the most reasonable. The weakest ought to be preferred, both because it becomes a generous man to support the weak against the powerful, and because one is much more unavoidably engaged to commit unjust actions in that faction which has the greatest strength, than in that which is less powerful. It will be objected, that the latter would not be more moderate, if it were as powerful as the former. I am apt to believe it; but yet as long as its weakness puts it out of its power to oppress, you ought to join with it, that you may not be concerned in the violent measures of the other. If it gets the upper hand, forsake it

(5) Venisset in suspicionem apud Regios, atque etiam Regem ipsum alicujus molitionis contrariae, & quod deterius, seditionum consiliis consentire diceretur, quod à se scribit fuisse alienissimum. Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belgicæ, pag. 195.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Idem, ibid.

then, lest it should engage you to act the tyrant in your turn. Let this be observed by the way, with regard to Solon's maxim, and with the restriction I have added to it, namely, that it be not known which side is in the right or in the wrong.

[C] He behaved himself a little too freely with regard to religion. He would have it reduced to a great simplicity, and wished that all that is above the reach of human understanding were left to the judgment of God and his Angels. We ought rather, said he, to admire and revere the divine nature, than to define it. Ego simplicem religionem amplectendam semper prædicavi, & etiam nunc prædico, prorsus divina & humani ingenii captum excedentia, divinitati & secreto Dei atque Angelorum judicio relinquens: honorandam potius & admirandam divinitatem quam definiendam judicavi. Evixit laboravi, ut nimium subtiles disputationes à Republica ejicerentur, de quo memini in Oratione ad Ordines habita, quæ post primam Centuriam Consiliorum meorum impressa est (8). Sainte Aldegonde found nothing in him but what was lovely; except only his too great aversion for matters of Divinity. You keep close to your maxims, (said he, in a letter), to hurt no man, to live honestly, &c. But this, in my opinion, is making no account of the labour of the prophets and of the Apostles, and reckoning them almost useless. Eibertus Leoninus, Haggæus Albada, aliique inter Præceteros religioni reformatæ nunquam nomen dederant. Ille Honestate civili contentus religionem omnem sulsque de quo habebat: uti eam ipsi graphice descripsit Phil. Marnixus in select. Epist. Belgarum centur. 2. epist. 44. "Nil enim est in te quod non sit suavissimum, si hoc unum demas, quod nimium es atheologus. Dum enim tuis illis formulis, quid dico formulis? oraculis, Neminem lædere, honestè vivere, aliisque immo tanquam scopulis in hæresis, videris mihi Apostolorum omnium ac Prophetarum laborem omnem propè inanem ducere (9). i. e. Elbert Leoninus, Haggæ Albada and some other Lords never declared themselves Protestants: and Leoninus being contented with moral virtue despised all Religions; as Philip Marnix de Sainte Aldegonde very well describes him to himself, in a letter to him, which is the 44th of the 2d Century of the collection of choice letters from the Dutch, in which he speaks thus. There is nothing in you but what is lovely, except only that you are too averse to Divinity. For whilst you adhere too closely to your maxims, what do I say, maxims? to your Oracles; Hurt no man, live honestly, &c. you seem to reckon the labours of the Prophets and Apostles almost useless. The passage where Grocius mentions three illustrious men, who died in the Low-countries in the year 1598, deserves to be perused, The two first (10) began with being engaged in state affairs, and waxed old in a retirement from business; but the third, coming from the recess of his closet into publick business, spent the remainder of his days in great employments. He speaks of our Leoninus, and observes, that he was a man naturally possessed of that which the precepts of the Philosophers propose as the end we ought to aim at; I mean, that he had hardly any passion; he followed the republican party, not from a principle of self-interest, nor out of prepossession, but because he happened to be engaged in it. Eibertus Leoninus in umbra studiorum quondam educatus, & ante pacem Gandavensem regiarum partium minister, tunc summus Geldriæ juridicus consiliis publicis immorabatur, homo natura contentus, quo veterum magistrorum præcepta nituntur, ut affectu pene omni vacaret, adeo quidem, ut partes quoque non studio ullo, sed quia sic inventerat, sequeretur (11).

(8) Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belgicæ, pag. 199.

(9) Voetius, de Politia Ecclesiæ, tom. 2. pag. 458.

(10) Crunt de Cuylenburg, and Sainte Aldegonde.

(11) Grocius, Hist. de rebus Belgicis, lib. 7. pag. 506. edit. Amst. 1658, in 12mo.

There are several of his works extant [D].

[D] There are several of his works extant.] Most of them have been published after his death, as will appear from the dates added to the following titles. Centuria Consiliorum. i. e. "An hundred advices;" printed at Antwerp in the year 1584, in folio. We find at the end of this work Oratio habita in Conventu Ordinum Generalium, Antwerpice Anno 1579, tempore Colloquii Colonienfis, de bello, religione et pace per Belgium. i. e. "An oration delivered before the States General assembled at Antwerp in the year 1579, when the congress of Cologne was held, concerning the war, religion, and peace through the Low-countries." His seven books Emendationum sive observationum; i. e. "of corrections or observations;" were printed at Arnhem in the year 1610. in 4to. Praelectiones ad tit. Cod. de jure Emphyteutico. i. e. "Lectures on the law concerning the right of copy-holders;" at Franfort, 1606, in 8vo. ad Lib. 9 Cod. in quo Tituli & Leges omnes ad instar processus criminalis explicantur; i. e. "On the ninth book of the Code, in which all the titles and laws are explained after the manner of criminal processes;" at Cologne 1604 in 4to. Commentarius ad tit. D. de usufructu. i. e. "A commentary on the law concerning the use and profits of such things, the property of which still belongs to another;" at Lich, 1600, in 8vo. His dissertation de Trapezitis Belgii, vulgo Lombardis, was published by Boxhornius (12). I do not mention several books, which he designed to print (13), and which remained in the closet of his grandson (14) Elbert Zofius; a lawyer at Utrecht.

(12) Taken from Valerius Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 199.

(13) Valerius Andreas, ibid. gave the titles of them.

(14) E filia Nepos, idem, ibid. His grandson by his daughter.

LEONTIUM, an Athenian Courtezan, made her self famous, first by her lasciviousness, and afterwards by her application to the study of Philosophy. This last profession would have made amends for the disgrace of the former, had Leontium renounced all love-intrigues as soon as she took it into her head to philosophize; but it is pretended that she did not abate a jot of her former dissoluteness; and that when she studied under Epicurus, she prostituted herself to all this Philosopher's disciples. It is even asserted, that he himself took his share of her favours, and was not ashamed to own it (a). They who pretend that the slanders which have been spread against his character, are only malicious impostures of his enemies, will not confess that there passed any thing disgraceful between him and Leontium; they cannot however deny but he shewed in his letters, that he had a great friendship for her (b); however, they may grant this, since nothing can be inferred from it against Epicurus's reputation. Leontium was either the wife or the concubine of Metrodorus, by whom she had a son, whom Epicurus recommended to the executors of his last will and testament; and this affords us an argument against that letter, in which she is supposed to complain of the softer temper and loathsomeness of this old lover (c). Some imagine she is the same Leontium who was the Poet Hermesianax's mistress [A]. It is more certain that she applied her self seriously to Philosophy [B], and that she even set up for an authoress [C]. Observe that Metrodorus

(a) Taken from Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 588. I quote his words in the article EPICURUS, quotation (94).

(b) See Diogenes Laertius, lib. 10. num. 5.

(c) See the article EPICURUS, remark [I].

was

[A] Some imagine she is the same Leontium, who was ... Hermesianax's mistress.] Athenæus (1) mentions this mistress, and even transcribes a pretty large number of verses, extracted from the third book of the elegies which Hermesianax wrote in honour of Leontium. Monsieur Menage (2), is fully persuaded that this woman is the same with Epicurus's good friend; whereby he proves Vossius guilty of a mistake, for placing (3) Hermesianax amongst those poets, whose age is unknown. This Poet's verses, quoted by Athenæus, contain a long list of persons in love, and it is very probable that the whole work was upon that subject; for Antonius Liberalis (4) extracted a love-tale from the second book of those elegies. Parthenius transcribed from the same Poet the fifth and the twenty second of his histories. With regard to the twenty second he quotes Hermesianax in the general; but with respect to the fifth he quotes him thus, Ἐρμηνισίαξ Διόνη. It is plain that we must read Διόνη, and not Δίονη (5). Monsieur Menage adds, that Hermesianax wrote an excellent poem on the city of Colophon his native place, which Poem is mentioned by Pausanias (6). Monsieur Menage has undoubtedly been misled by these words of Vossius. Hermesianax Colophonius, Poeta Elegiacus de patria Colophone egregium carmen condidit, ut ex Pausania cognoscere est (7). Pausanias does not give us the least reason to ascribe this to him: He only says, that he does not believe Hermesianax was still living, when Lysimachus destroyed the City of Colophon: for, adds he, Hermesianax would certainly have lamented the ruin of that City. Ὡς Φόνικα ἰάμβων ποιητὴν, Κολοφώνιον, θρηνησάμενον τὴν ἀλωσιν. Ἐρμηνισίαξ δὲ ὁ τὰ ἰλιγγία γράψας ἐκ τῆς (ἡμετέρας) πόλεως περιῆν παρὰ τὴν πόλιν καὶ αὐτὸς ἐν τῇ ἀλίση Κολοφώνιον ᾠδοῦντο. Phoenix Colophonius iamphorum scriptor eam excisionem deploravit; nam Hermesianax qui elegas scripsit, ad illud usque tempus superstitem fuisse non crediderim, neque enim is in aliqua carminum suorum parte excisionem Colophonem non desisset (8). You see that he had just mentioned the Poet Phoenix, a writer of Iambicks, born at Colophon, who made his muse bemoan the ruin of that City. We may infer from this pas-

(1) Lib. 13. pag. 597.

(2) Menagius, Histor. Mulierum Philosoph. ad calcem Diogenis Laertii, pag. 498. num. 70.

(3) In Traject. de Poet. Græcis.

(4) Metamorph. cap. 39.

(5) See Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 374.

(6) Est autem Hermesianax ille, idem qui de patria Colophone egregium carmen condidit... Pausania memoratum. Menagius, Histor. Mulier. Philosopharum, pag. 498.

(7) Vossius, de Poetis Græcis, pag. 90.

(8) Pausan. lib. 1. pag. 8.

sage of Pausanias, that Hermesianax was contemporary with Epicurus, and therefore that their loving both the same Leontium is not inconsistent with chronology. Pausanias would not have expressed himself as he has done, had this writer of elegies flourished a great many years before Epicurus. Observe that Lysimachus, who destroyed the City of Colophon, was one of those, who shared Alexander's conquests among themselves.

[B] She applied herself seriously to Philosophy.] It was for this reason that Theodorus the painter drew her in a musing posture: Leontium Epicuri cogitantem (9).

[C] She set up for an authoress.] She wrote against Theophrastus, who was the strongest assertor of the Aristotelian Sect, and the ornament of his age. Cicero tells us that she wrote that work in a very polite style. Non modo Epicurus, says he (10), & Metrodorus, & Hermachus contra Pythagoram, Platonem, Empedoclemque dixerunt, sed meretricula etiam Leontium contra Theophrastum scribere ausa est, scito quidem illa sermone & Attico, sed tamen tantum Epicuri hortus habuerit licentia, & soletis queri. i. e. "Not only Epicurus, Metrodorus and Hermachus wrote against Pythagoras, Plato, and Empedocles, but even that little whore Leontium dared to write against Theophrastus, which she did indeed in a polite and elegant style: but yet such was the licentiousness that prevailed in Epicurus's school; and of which you are used to complain." The last words of this passage have given the critics a great deal of trouble, they construe them several ways; but I question whether it be well known how they ought to be construed: we may however know the author's meaning. He designed to exaggerate the licentiousness which prevailed in Epicurus's school: and the better to expose it, he instances in Leontium's boldness, who, being a prostitute, dared to write against Theophrastus. But how great a Rhetorician soever Cicero was, he did not succeed so well as Phiny, in giving us a strong notion of the indignity there was, according to him, in Leontium's attempt. Pliny tells us that this woman's audaciousness gave rise to a proverb, the sense of which

(9) Plinius, lib. 35. cap. 11. pag. m. 236.

(10) De Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 33.

was one of Epicurus's chief disciples. Leontium had a daughter, who led a very wicked life, and died a violent death, as you will see in the remark below [D].

I cannot tell where Ludovicus Vives met with the reason he assigns for her writing a book against Theophrastus. He pretends that she did it, because this Philosopher had published several good observations concerning marriage [E].

was, that men had no longer any thing to do, but to go and hang themselves, since the learned were exposed to such indignities. Ceu vero nesciam adversus Theophrastum, hominem in eloquentia tantum ut nomen divinum inde invenerit, scripsisse etiam feminam, & proverbium inde natum, suspendio arborem eligendi (11). i. e. "As though I did not know, that even a woman wrote against Theophrastus, who, for his eloquence, deserved the surname of divine: her writing against him gave birth to this proverb, choose a tree to hang yourself on."

[D] She had a daughter . . . who died a violent death, as you will see. . . This daughter's name was DANAE. She followed her mother's example with regard to gallantry, but I do not know whether she ever meddled with Philosophy. Athenæus does not say a word of it; and he is the only author who acquaints me with some particulars concerning this woman. He observes (12), that she followed the trade of a Courtesan, and became the Concubine of Sophron governor of Ephesus. She insinuated herself into Laodice's favour so far, that the latter used to ask her advice in every thing, and trusted her with all her secrets. Danae knowing that Laodice designed to put Sophron to death, made him a sign to withdraw himself; he took the hint, and understood the danger he was in; he made believe as though he had forgot something, which he must remember in order to answer upon the subject that was given him to examine. He had time granted him to recollect himself; but he did not appear any more, and made his escape to Corinth in the night time. As soon as Laodice found out that Danae had been the occasion of his escape, she sentenced her to be thrown down a precipice. Danae knowing the danger she was in, was so proud that she would not answer one word to Laodice's questions: but she was not dumb when she was going to the place of execution: so far from it; she made a very outrageous complaint against providence. It is with a great deal of reason, said she, that several persons despise the Gods; for all the reward they grant me for saving my husband's life, is that I shall now be precipitated, whilst Laodice, who killed her, enjoys the highest dignity. Ἀσυγομένη δὲ καὶ τὸν κρημὸν ἔπει, ὡς δικαίως οἱ πολλοὶ καταφρονεῖσι τῶ θεῶ, ὅτι ἰγὰ τὸν γινόμενον μοι ἄνθρω σῶσασα, τοιαύτων χάριτα παρὰ τῶ θεῶν λαμβάνω. Λαοδίκη δὲ τὸν ἴδιον ἀποκτείνουσα, ταλαιούτης τιμῆς ἀξιοῦται. Cum ad præcipitium duceretur, dixisse, à multis non injuria Deos contemni. Nam quod, inquit, virum meum servavi, hanc mihi gratiam Dii rependant: quod autem Laodice maritum suum interfecerit, in maximo honore est (13).

[E] Vives pretends that she wrote her book against Theophrastus, because this Philosopher had published several good observations concerning marriage. It is very probable that a woman who did not marry, and had gallants, could not like such writings; but yet this probability does not excuse Ludovicus Vives, if he gives us for matter of fact, as he does in the following passages, a particular, which he did not read in any credible author: Novum malis non est, odisse bene monentes: sed in hoc ipso materiae genere Theophrastus, quum de conjugio gravissima multa scripsisset, meretrices in se concitavit: & profliit Leontium, Metrodori concubina, quæ adversus tantum & facundia & sapientia virum, librum sine mente sine fronte evomeret (14). i. e. "It is no new thing for the wicked to hate those, who give them good advice: Thus Theophrastus, having wrote with great judgment concerning matrimony, raised the prostitutes against him; and Leontium, Metrodorus's concubine, rose up; and without sense or shame put out a volume against this man, who was so eminent for his eloquence and learning." This is a particular, which neither Cicero nor Pliny took notice of, when they mentioned the book, which Leontium wrote against Theophrastus (15): It should not therefore have been asserted, without a sufficient quotation to support the assertion. This is infinitely less necessary with regard to such particulars, as are to be met with every where. I shall observe by the by, that this passage and several others are omitted in the French translation of this work of Vives, made by Anthony Tiron, at Plantin's command, in the year 1579. I wonder at it; for I am apt to think, that these omissions are owing to Plantin's not making use of the editions, which Vives had revised, and to which he had made additions.

(11) Plinius, in Præfat.

(12) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 593.

(13) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 593. ex Phylarcho.

(14) Ludov. Vives, in Præfat. TraBatus de Fornica Christiana, pag. 22.

(15) See the remark [C].

The End of the SIXTH VOLUME.

ERRATA.

In the Article HICKES (GEORGE) p. 155. in the margin, instead of 29 Feb. read 23 Feb. Ibid. at the bottom of Dr. Stanley's Letter, for 22 Feb. 1693. r. May 26, 1715.

Signature 7 C for p. 557, 558, 559, 560, r. 561, 562, 563, 564. and for the r. I shall for the catch word in p. 564.

RA
25

FEB 7 - 1955

FEB 7 - 1955

