
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

<https://books.google.com>

NYPL RESEARCH LIBRARIES

3 3433 00313871 0

A GENERAL
DICTIONARY,
Historical and Critical:

IN WHICH

A New and Accurate TRANSLATION of that of the Celebrated

Mr. BAYLE,

WITH THE

CORRECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS printed in the late Edition at Paris, is included; and interspersed with several thousand LIVES never before published.

The whole containing the History of the most illustrious Persons of all Ages and Nations, particularly those of Great Britain and Ireland, distinguished by their Rank, Actions, Learning and other Accomplishments.

With Reflections on such Passages of Mr. BAYLE, as seem to favour Scepticism and the Manichee System.

By the Reverend Mr. JOHN PETER BERNARD;
The Reverend Mr. THOMAS BIRCH, M.A. and F.R.S.
Mr. JOHN LOCKMAN;
And other HANDS.

VOLUME VI.

LONDON,

Printed by James Bettenham,

For G. STRAHAN, J. CLARKE, in Cornhill; J. GRAY in the Poultry; J. SHUCKBURGH, C. CORBET, G. HAWKINS in Fleetstreet; J. WILCOX, A. MILLAR in the Strand; T. OSBORNE in Grays-Inn; J. BRINDLEY in New-Bond-street; J. WOOD in Pater-Noster-Row; C. WARD and R. CHANDLER at the Ship without Temple Bar, and sold at their Shops in YORK-STREET in YORK, and at SCARBOROUGH-SPA; J. BETTENHAM near, and E. CAVE at St. John's Gate.

MDCCXXXVIII

20

r. 8. 13

THE PUBLIC
13937A
ADMINISTRATIVE REGISTRATION

T O

MARTIN FOLKES Esq;

V I C E - P R E S I D E N T

O F T H E

R O Y A L S O C I E T Y ,

This S I X T H V O L U M E of the

G E N E R A L D I C T I O N A R Y ,

H i s t o r i c a l a n d C r i t i c a l ,

Is dedicated by

His most obedient and

Most humble Servants,

The Authors.

1870

1871

1872

1873

1874

1875

1876

1877

1878

1879

DICTIONARY

Historical and Critical.

HALL (RICHARD) an English Divine of the Romish Communion, was, I think, one of those who retired out of England, because of the penal laws which were enacted under Queen Elizabeth against the Papists. He retired into the Spanish Low-Countries, and was Divinity Professor at Doway, and Canon of St. Omer's. He published amongst other works [A] a treatise of the origin of the wars of those countries. He was not proper to treat on such a subject. For his gratitude to the King of Spain, who furnished him with a safe retirement on the one hand, and on the other his resentment for his banishment, which exasperated him against all the Protestants, could not suffer him to examine with impartiality the conduct of those Provinces, which rebelled against Philip II. And it is certain, that he shewed himself very passionate in that work [B]. He died in the year 1604 (a).

(a) Witte, in Diar. Biograph.

[A] He published several Works. Here follow all that I know of his Writings: The Preface to John Giovanus's Book de Schismate seu Ecclesiastica Unionis divisione (of Schism or of breaking the ecclesiastical union) printed at Louvain in the year 1573, in 8vo. De tribus primariis causis Tumultuum Belgicorum, & contra coalitionem multarum Religionum, quam liberam Religionem vocant. i. e. Of the three chief causes of the "civil Wars in the Low-Countries, and against a "Coalition of several Religions, which they call a free "Religion." At Doway 1581. in 8vo. Pro Defensione Regiæ & Episcopalis Auctoritatis contra Rebelles. "A "Vindication of the Royal and Episcopal Authority "against the Rebels." At Doway, 1584. in 8°. De quinque partita conscientia Libri tres. "Three Books of "Conscience divided into five parts." In the same City, 1598, in 8vo. De proprietate & Vestiario Monachorum, aliisque ad hoc vitium extirpandum necessariis. "Of the Propriety and Apparel of the Monks, and "of other things necessary to extirpate that excess." In the same City, 1585 in 8vo.

[B] He shewed himself very passionate in that work. Particularly against the Prince of Orange: for he wrote whole Chapters to convict him of Tyranny, of endeavouring to make himself a King by tyrannical means like Absalom, of having the ten Qualities, which according to Bartholus are the Character of a Tyrant, &c. He compared him to Julian the Apostate, and wrote all kind of invectives against that Prince, and against his Party (1), with a design to exasperate the Roman Catholics and to persuade them not to grant the Liberty of Conscience, which the

(1) Consult Schellingius, Biblioth. Cathol. tom. 4. pag. 254.

Protestants demanded (2) A man who had so many (2) Idem, ibid. Reasons to be partial in favour of the King of Spain, and to be displeas'd with the Dutch, should not have pretended to write the causes of that civil War. An Historian ought to be perfectly unbiass'd, and as soon as a man has the least resentment against any nation, he ought to give over the writing of that nation's History, particularly if he cannot follow his ill humour ever so little without pleasing another nation, for whom he ought to have some complaisance and gratitude. Such a man, I say, is obliged to decline the task, as honest Judges do, when they are themselves some way concerned in a cause (3). History ought not to be treated but by undefiled hands; it must be left to those whose hands have not been imbrued with blood in a fight, either in a proper or in a figurative sense; one ought at least to wait, till time has purged the blots away, and consolidated the wounds. History must be revered like the household Goods of the ancients.

(3) See what I have observed in the remark [D] of the article REMOND, and in the remark [L] of the article TIMÆUS.

*Tu, genitor, cape sacra manu, patriosque penates.
Me bello e tanto digressum, & cæde recenti
Attrectare nefas: donec me flumine vivo
Abluero* (4).

(4) Virg. Æn. lib. 2. vers. 717.

That is,
"Our Country Gods, the Relicks, and the bands
"Hold you, my Father, in your guiltless hands:
"In me 'tis impious holy things to bear,
"Red as I am with slaughter, new from War,
"Till in some living stream I cleanse the guilt
"Of dire debate, and blood in battel spilt.

DRYDEN.

HALLE (PETER) Professor of Canon Law in the University of Paris was born at Bayeux in Normandy September the 8th 1611. He studied Philosophy, the Law, and Divinity during five years in the University of Caen. It must be added that he also applied himself with great care to Poetry, in which art his relation Anthony Hallié, one of the greatest Poets of his time, gave him very good instructions. He made such a progress under this eminent relation of his, that he gained the prizes in the poetical exercises, that are performed every year in these two cities (a). This gained him so great a reputation, that though he was still very young, he was chosen Teacher of Rhetoric in the University of Caen. Some time after, being Rector of the University, he made, at the head of the four Faculties, a speech to Monsieur Seguier Chancellor of France [A]. His Oration

(a) To the honour of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary.

[A] Monsieur Seguier Chancellor of France. He was gone into Normandy to suppress the popular insurrections, which had caused very great disorders in several places of the province of Normandy.

was very much approved, and procured him the esteem and protection of that head of the Law; so that he received the Doctor of Law's Cap from his hands in presence of the Great Council, March the 18th 1640, after he had held a public disputation in that illustrious Assembly (b). He attended Monsieur Seguer to Paris, and gained such reputation by some pieces he published, that they offered him the Mastership of five different Colleges, and he was in an unusual manner incorporated in the body of the University (c) August the 14th 1641. He chose to teach in the College of Harcourt rather than in any other, and had there a very great audience. He published now and then some Latin Poems, which increased his reputation, and gave his Mecenas an opportunity to raise him to the post of the King's Poet, and Reader of the Latin and Greek Tongues in the Royal College December the 18th 1646. His strong application to study having ruined his health, he was obliged to rest for two years, in order to recover it. When he enjoyed his health again, he resolved to raise the glory of the Faculty of the Law, which was sunk to a miserable condition, there remaining but one Professor of the Law [B]. In the year 1655, he obtained the post of Regius Professor of the Canon Law, and employed all his cares to restore the study of that Science, the privileges of which he asserted vigorously [C], without being discouraged by the difficulties he met in his way. It is to him chiefly that the Professors of Paris owe the privilege which they enjoy since the year 1679 [D]. He wrote very good books [E], and he had the satisfaction to reckon amongst his friends the most illustrious learned men, who were still more pleased with his virtue than with his learning. He died very well prepared [F] December the 27th 1689 (d).

Since the first edition of this Dictionary I have read a Latin Elogium, which one (e) of this Professor's pupils has consecrated to his memory. This piece is very well written, and printed at Amsterdam for Henry Boom, in the year 1692. The readers will find in it a particular account of Peter Hallé's life, which will please them.

HAMADRYADES

[B] The Faculty of the Law . . . was sunk to a miserable condition, there remaining but one Professor of the Law. This was Monsieur Doujat. The faculty had lost in a very short time Francis Florent, and John Dartis. In juridicam deinde scholam geminato Francisci Florentis, & Joannis Dartisii funere afflicta ac prope desertam cum Joanne Doujatio Collega primario extra ordinem accitus (1) anno 1655. Thus speaks Monsieur Pinsson des Riolles, in an Inscription which he published to our Halle's honour.

(1) Observe, that he obtained the Professorship without disputing it, which was a favour and a dispensation. Ab eo (suo Mecenate) Regii Consistorii placitum, quo Regii constitutionis antecessuras ad publici certaminis aleam ordinantis, remisso rigore, ad manus antecessorum promovebatur obtinuit. Vita Hallæi.

* That is to say, of pleading in an inferior Court of Judicature.

(2) Juris Canonici auditoribus postulandi munus. Hallæo patissimum procurante, restitutum est. Ibid.

(3) Vita Hallæi.

[C] He asserted the privileges of that Faculty vigorously. Monsieur Pinsson adds immediately, Quam quidem postea restitui, exornari, ac amplificari magis ac magis . . . procuravit. i. e. "which he afterwards took care to have restored, commended, and improved more and more." The Author of the Elogy gives us a more particular account. He asserts, that Halle obtained by his solicitations, that Pompon de Bellievre, first President in the Parliament of Paris, should restore to the Students of the common Law the privilege of *postulating, whence arose a great many disputes (2). Hinc obrotæ lites: vicina Juris Collegia in eos acriter insurrexerunt, & eos tum ad Senatum, tum ad Regis consistorium traduxerunt. Ut tot malis succurreret Hallæus, viginti quatuor viros pietate & doctrinâ commendatissimos, tanquam adjutores, in facultatem, recum suis Collegis prius communicata, adscrivit: facultate vix ab externo hoste quietâ, nonnulli ex Doctoribus honorariis, Collegiarum discordias in suum commodum amoventes, plurima Antecessorum Jura sibi arrogare tentabant. In hac temporum difficultate quâ facultas in partes scindi videbatur animum tantisper sustinuit, donec illa invidiæ tempestate feliciter pacatâ, & concordia facultati restituta, animum à negotio omni alieno revocans, sedulo summaque diligentia ad restauranda Juris studia totus incubuit (3). i. e. "Hence arose several Disputes:

"The neighbouring Colleges where the Law was taught, rose violently against them, and prosecuted them both before the Parliament, and before the King's Council. Hallé designing to provide against so many evils, aggregated twenty men eminent by their piety and learning, to the faculty that they might assist him, having first consulted his Collegues upon this matter. The faculty was hardly free from those external enemies, when some honorary Doctors, who found their account in fomenting the divisions of their Collegues, endeavoured to arrogate to themselves the Rights of the Law Professors. During these troublesome times, when the faculty seemed to be divided into parties, Hallé suspended his undertaking a little; but when this storm of envy was over, and a good understanding was restored in the fa"culty, he applied himself zealously, and with the utmost care to revive the study of the Law, neglecting all other Affairs that were foreign to this purpose."

[D] It is to him . . . the Professors of Paris owe the privilege they enjoy since the year 1679. They did not teach the Civil Law before that time. Ab eo præcipue docendi rectam rationem inchoatam à Rege probatam & confirmatam fuisse affirmaverim. Studiis enim latius efflorescentibus ab invicissimo Rege Ludovico Magno, promovente illustrissimo viro Michaele le Tellier Franciæ Cancellario, publica civili Jurisprudentiæ professori Parisiensi scholæ, quâ superiori sæculo male exciderat, restituta est, & asserta Antecessoribus Juris Civili interpretandi auctoritas mense Aprili 1679 (4), (4) Ibid. i. e. "I can assert, that the right method of teaching was chiefly begun by him, and was approved and confirmed by the King. For learning beginning to flourish more and more, the most invincible King Lewis the Great, by the advice of that very illustrious man Michael Le Tellier Chancellor of France, restored to the University of Paris the privilege of teaching the Civil Law publicly, which privilege that University had lost in the preceding century; and the Professors obtained in April 1679 the authority of reading Lectures on the Civil Law."

[E] He wrote very good books. Here follow the words of his elogy. In auditorum favorem præter Institutiones Canonicas, quas in lucem anno 1685 vixit in fama testamentum emiserat, varios ad Jus Canonicum & Civile tractatus de Conciliis, de summi Pontificis auctoritate, de Regalia, de Simonia, de Usuris, de Censuris, de Regularibus, de Beneficiis Ecclesiasticis, de Matrimonio, de Testamentis, & alia plura recondita doctrine monumenta exaravit. i. e. "Besides his Canonical Institutions, which he published in the year 1685 as a proof that he deserved his reputation, he wrote also for the use of his pupils several treatises upon the Civil and Canon Laws, as concerning Councils, the Pope's authority, the Regale, Simony, Usury, Censures, Regular Persons, Ecclesiastical Benefices, Matrimony, Last Wills and Testaments, and several other monuments of his deep learning." He published in the year 1655 in 8vo a Collection of Latin Poems and Orations.

[F] He died very well prepared. I refer to this the legacy he left to the Faculty of the Law. It is designed to have a mass said four times every year; all the Professors and all the Doctors, who are present at it, receive a certain sum of money (5).

(d) Taken from an Elogium written in Latin by John Hallé, Secretary to the K. of France; of which Elogium Mr. Pinsson des Riolles communicated a manuscript copy to me.

(e) Daniel Laet, Batavus, (a Dutchman.)

(5) Legata prima Juris utriusque Facultati ad sacrosanctum Missæ sacrificium statis diebus quater in anno celebrandum summâ, ab Antecessoribus & Doctoribus utriusque ordinis presentibus percipienda. Vita Hallæi.

HAMADRYADES. Thus some nymphs were called, whose fate depended on certain trees, with which they were born and died [A]. It was chiefly with the oaks that they had to near a relation (a). It is reported, that they were sometimes very thankful to those who preserved them from death [B], and that those, who paid no regard to the humble

(a) See the remark [A], quotation (3).

[A] Their fate depended on some trees, with whom they were born and died.] Let us see Servius the Grammarian's note on the 62d verse of Virgil's tenth Pastoral. Hamadryades, says he, Nymphæ quæ cum arboribus nascuntur et pereunt, à πο τῷ ἄμω κτ τῆς δρυὸς qualis fuit illa, quam Erychthon occidit: qui cum arborem incidisset, et vox inde erupit, et sanguis, sicut docet Ovidius. i. e. "Hamadryades are Nymphs, who are born at the same time with some trees, and die with them, from ἄμω with, and δρυὸς a tree; such was she, whom Erychthon killed, who when he was cutting a tree heard a voice come out of it, and saw some blood run from it, as Ovid relates." Ovid quoted by this Grammarian has elegantly described the lamentations and the misfortune of this Hamadryad whom the impious Erychthon murdered: she lived in an old oak prodigiously large, and which all the world revered (1). Erychthon's servants dared not to obey his command to cut that tree down, and he was forced to go himself to work about it.

(1) Stabat in his ingens œnoso robore quercus Una, nemus

mensuræque roboreis ulnis Quingentes ter impleret.
Ovid. Metam. lib. 8. ver. 749.
That is, "An ancient oak in the dark center stood."
"Full fifteen ell's it measured in the waste."
Mr. Vernon.

*Dixit, et obliquus dum telum librat in illic, Contremuit, gemitumque dedit Dodonia quercus:
Et pariter frondes, pariter pallsescere glandes
Cœpere, ac longi pallorem ducere rami.
Cujus ut in tranco fecit manus impia vulnus,
Haud aliter fluxit discusso cortice sanguis,
Quàm solet ante aras ingens ubi vitima taurus
Concidit, abrupta cruor è cervice profundi.*

*Editus è medio fons est cum robore talis:
Nympha sub hoc ego sum, Cereri gratissima, ligno:
Quæ tibi sacrorum pœnas instare tuorum
Vaticinor moriens, nostri solatia letbi (1).*

(2) Idem, ibid. ver. 763.

That is,
"He spoke, and as he pois'd a slanting stroke,
"Sighs heav'd, and tremblings shook the frighted oak;
"Its leaves look'd sickly, pale its acorns grew,
"And its long branches sweat a chilly dew.
"But when his impious hand a wound bestow'd,
"Blood from the mangled bark in currents flow'd.
"When a devoted bull of mighty size,
"A finning nation's grand atonement, dies,
"With such a plenty from the spouting veins
"A crimson stream the turfy altars stains.
"When from the groaning trunk a voice was heard,
"A Dryad I, by Ceres' love preferr'd, I
"Within the circle of this clasping rind
"Coeval grew, and now in ruin joyn'd;
"But instant vengeance shall thy sin pursue,
"And death is hear'd with this Prophetic view.

Mr. Vernon.

There are some Grammarians who separate what Servius unites. They pretend that the Hamadryades were so called, either because they were born, or because they died with some oaks. Ἠμαδρυάδες νύμφαι Μετσίμαχου φησὶ, διὰ τὸ ἄμω ταῖς δρυσὶ γαμῶσθαι. ἢ ἰσὸν διαῖσιν ἄμω ταῖς δρυσὶ φθίρεισθαι, νύμφαι Ἠμαδρυάδες λέγουσιν (3). This separation must be exploded, since the general opinion is, that the life of these Nymphs was exactly of the same length as the life of their trees. Hence it is, that Pindar said in a Poem which is left, ἰσοδρόμη τέχμηαι αἰώνι λαχῶσθα, I have obtained a life equal to that of my tree. Callimachus made use of the following expression, ἦλικον ἀσθμαίνουσα περι δρυός, figging for her coeval oak (4). When he mentioned the Hamadryas Melya. Apollonius has imitated him, when he introduced an Hamadryad praying that a certain tree might not be cut down.

(3) Scholiast. Apollon. Rhodii in lib. 2. ver. 479. pag. m. 192. See also Plutarch. de Oraculis. Doct. pag. 415. where he quotes Pindar's words.

(4) Callimach. Hymno in Delum. ver. 81.

*Ἢ μιν ὑπερμέτη ἔδωκε μελίσσι το μύθω,
Μὴ ταμίειν ἀρίμωσι δρυὸς ἦλικον, ἢ ἰπὶ σὺλλον
Αἰῶνα τρέσεισι διπλάκις (5).*

(5) Apollon. Rhod. lib. 2. ver. 430. pag. m. 193.

That is,
"Who flattering him with a lamenting voice prayed

"with tears, that he should not destroy her coeval tree, in which she had lived several ages."

Let us add to all these quotations another authority, namely, that of Homer. We read in one of his Hymns, that there are some trees, which are born at the same time with the Nymphs, and that these die when the trees dry and wither away.

Τῆσι δ' ἄπο τ' ἰλάται ἢ δρυὸς ὑψηλάρω
Γενομένησιν ἔφουσαν ἐπὶ χθονὶ βωτανίση.

Ἄλλ' ὅτι καὶ δὴ μοῖρα παλαιήν τε θανάτω,
Ἀχάϊαι μιν ἀρώσιν ἐπὶ χθονὶ δόδρα καλὰ
Φλαῖον δ' ἀμφιπεριβύθου, ἀπίπυσι δ' ἄπ' ὄζου,
Τῷ δ' ἄχ' ἄμω ψυχῇ λείπει φάσιν ἠελίου (6).

(6) Homer. Hymn. in Venet. pag. m. 853.

That is,
"With these Nymyhs some Fir-Trees, or lofty Oaks are born upon earth; . . . But when their fatal hour comes, these beautiful Trees begin to dry upon the earth, the bark that furrounds them, decays, their branches fall off, and at the same time the Nymphs lose the light of the sun."

Statius mentions a wood, which lasted longer than its Nymyhs and Fauns; but this is not inconsistent with the tradition, which relates particularly to the Hamadryades. And besides, who is there that knows that he regarded nothing in his poetical flights? It would not therefore be reasonable to mind what he says, as though it could make an objection against the general opinion. You will find his words in the remark [D]. Anfonius, who was farther distant than he from the origin of that antient tradition, has yet followed it better. Non fuit Hamadryadis fato, says he (7), cadit arborea trabs. i. e. "The Tree does not fall, but the Hamadryad dies at the same time."

(7) Aufon. Edyl. XII. pag. m. 483. Compare this with Balzac's Verbes, transcribed in the remark [K] of the article THOMAS (Paul).

Observe that Pausanias expresses himself in such a manner, as seems to prove that the Hamadryades were younger than their Trees. Τίθορια δὲ, says he (8), οἱ ἐπιχόρου κληθῆναι φασὶν ἀπὸ Τίθορίας νύμφης, οἷαι τῶ ἀρχαίω λόγῳ τῶν αὐσίῳ ἐφύθη ἀπὸ το ἄλλων δίδρασι, καὶ μάλιστα ἀπὸ τῶν δρυῶν. i. e. "The inhabitants say their country was called Tithoria, from the Nymph Tithorea, one of them, who, as the Poets pretend, were born of some Trees, and particularly of the Oak." This is representing the Trees as though they were the mothers of the Hamadryades: it is not true therefore that these Nymphs were born at the same time with their trees. But I do not think that we ought to lay too much stress upon Pausanias's expressions: it was not his business to give a very accurate account of those ancient fables. Let us therefore stick to this, namely, that the Poets have asserted, that those Nymphs and the Trees were born at the same time. Take notice that Pausanias observes that they were born chiefly of the Oak. I do not see that this can be refuted by Pnerenicus's authority, for his account does not relate to the Hamadryades properly speaking. He tells us (9), that the Fig-tree (9) Apud Athenas was called συκη, after the name of one of Oxylus's daughters; and that this Oxylus having lain with his sister Hamadryas, begot eight daughters, who were all named Hamadryad Nymphs; but each of them had a particular name, which was afterwards given to trees. Amongst these Nymphs, she who was called συκη, gave her name to the Fig tree. It seems to me that Hamadryas, Oxylus's sister, was not of the same kind with the Nymphs who are the subject of this article; let this be observed with an illustrious author's leave (10).

(8) Pausanias, lib. 10. cap. 32. pag. 879.

(9) Apud Athenas, lib. 3. pag. 78.

(10) See Spanheim. in Callim. Hymno in Delum. ver. 83. pag. 373.

[B] It is reported that they were sometimes very thankful to those who preserved them from death.] A certain man called Rhœcus, having observed an Oak that was ready to fall down, ordered his sons to prevent its falling, by hardening the ground about its roots, and by putting props to support it. The Nymph who would have perished, had the tree fell down, shewed herself to Rhœcus, gave him thanks for saving her life, and permitted him to ask what reward he pleased.

humble prayers which the Hamadryades made them to spare the trees on which their lives depended, were punished for it [C]. Amongst the mortal natures there were none that lived so long as this species of nymphs [D]. The Poets have sometimes mistaken pleased. He answered that he desired to enjoy her. The Nymph promised him that he should have in this respect all the satisfaction he could wish for, and commanded him to abstain from all other women. She added that a Bee would be the messenger between them. But the Bee coming whilst Rhæcus was playing, he gave her bad language, at which the Hamadryad was so exasperated, that he was mutilated (11). This is what Charon of Lampfacus related, if we may depend on the Scholiast on Apollonius. He told also another story, which ended better. Here it follows, as I find it in Natalis Comes, who does not quote the author from whom he borrowed it. Arcas, the son of Jupiter and Calisto, was hunting in a wood, when he met with an Hamadryad, who was in great danger of perishing; for the Tree with which she was born had suffered very much about its roots by the overflowing of a river. She desired Arcas to save that Tree. He granted her request by making the river run another way, and settling the earth about the root of the Tree. The Nymph was not ungrateful; she granted him what we call the last favour, and had two children by him. Her name was Prospelea (12). Pausanias tells us only, that Arcas was married with a Dryad Nymph, whose name was Erato, and by whom he had three sons (13). One might infer from thence, that though the Hamadryades could not survive their Oak or their Fir-tree, &c. yet they could sometimes leave it; and if this consequence were doubtful, we might confirm it by a passage from Homer, in which we read, that the same Nymphs, who were born and died with Trees, tasted the pleasures of love in agreeable caves with the Silens or Satyrs.

(11) Περὶ πρῶτου δὴ αὐτῆς. Schol. Apollon. in lib. 2. ver. 479.

(12) Taken from Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. 5. cap. 11. pag. m. 465, 466. He observes that Charon of Lampfacus wrote this; but all this Author's works being lost, Natalis Comes ought to have quoted the author who cited Charon of Lampfacus.

(13) Pausan. lib. 8. cap. 4. pag. 604.

(14) Homer. Hymn. in Peneus. pag. m. 852.

Τῆσι δὲ Σιληνοῖ τε καὶ Ἰσσυκῶν Ἀρσιφύλλης Μισσοῖσι' ἢ Φιλότῃσι μυχῶ σπείων ἑρσίῳσι (14).

[C] They, who paid no regard to the . . . prayers of the Hamadryades, . . . were punished for it.] Apollonius relates, that Peribœa's father drew a very heavy curse upon himself and upon his children, because he cut down a Tree, which a Nymph had begged him to spare. This Nymph had lived several ages in that tree. We have seen her prayer above; and we shall transcribe here the following part of the passage.

Αὐτὰρ ὁ τὴν γὰρ Ἀφραδίῳ ἔτμηξεν, ἀγνοομένη νύκτι. Τῶ δ' ἄρα νυκτὶ δὴ νύμφη πόρην οἴου ὀπίσσω Αὐτῶν καὶ τεκίεσσιν (15).

(15) Apollon. Rhod. lib. 2. ver. 482. p. 193.

That is, "Yet he cut it down inconsiderately thro' a youthful wantonness; for which the Nymph made him and his children pay dear afterwards."

[D] None . . lived so long as this species of Nymphs.] Autonius acquaints us with this in the verses which I am going to transcribe, and which are a translation of Hesiod's Greek verses.

Ter binos deciesque novem super exit in annos, Justa senescentum quos implet vita virorum. Hos novies superat vivendo garrula cornix: Et quater egreditur cornicis secula cervus: Alipedem cervum ter vincit corvus: Et illum Multiplicat novies Phœnix, reparabilis ales. Quam vos perpetuo decies prævertitis ævo Nymphae Hamadryades, quarum longissima vita est. Hi cobibent fines vivacia fata animantium. Cætera secreti novit deus arbiter ævi Tempora (16).

(16) Aufon. Edil. 18. pag. m. 533. The sense of these verses is given in the following passage.

Hesiod's Poem, in which this doctrine is to be read, is not extant; but we find a fragment of it in a treatise of Plutarch; a fragment, I say, which contains but five verses. Let us transcribe that passage of Plutarch, according to Amiot's translation: it will shew us, that there were some Heathens, who maintained that the Deities of the second rank were mortal. "Hesiod is "the first who distinguished exactly four kinds of reasonable Natures, Gods, Dæmons, or Genii, of which there are several, some good, some bad, Demi-Gods, and Men . . . He is of opinion, that even the Dæmons die after a certain revolution of years. For speaking in the character of a Naiad, he determines the time when they cease to be. The prating crow lives as long as nine men. The hart as long as four crows; the raven as long as three swift harts; the phœnix's life extends as far as that of nine ravens put together. But as for you, Hamadryades Nymphs, the royal progeny of Jove, the span of your life is as long as that of ten phœnixes that should live successively. Now they, who do not well understand what the Poet meant by the word Genea, that is to say, the life of a man, make that space of time amount to an immense number of years, whereas it is but one year; so that the sum total is but of nine thousand seven hundred and twenty years, which is the space of time allotted to the dæmon's life. Several Mathematicians make it shorter still. Even Pindar does not make it longer, when he asserts that the life of the Nymphs is equal to that of the Trees, and that it is for this reason they are called Hamadryades, because they are born and die with the Oaks (17)." Plutarch deserves to be censured, because he did not transcribe that verse, wherein Hesiod set down the space of man's life; for that was the ground of all the following calculations. I may very well suppose that Hesiod had set down that space; because his translator, Aufonius, begins with observing that the age of man contains 96 years. This measure being once set down, we may calculate how long the harts, the ravens, &c. live: and we find that the crow lives 864 years; the hart 3456; the raven 10368; the phœnix 93312; and the Hamadryad nine hundred thirty three thousand one hundred and twenty. All this is ridiculous; and Pliny is in the right to explode it as absolutely fabulous. De spatio atque longinquitate vitæ hominum, non locorum modo situs, verum exempla, ac sua cuique fors nascendi incertum fecere. Hesiodus, qui primus aliqua de hoc prodidit, fabulose (ut reor) multa de hominum ævo referens, cornici novem nostras attribuit ætates, quadruplum ejus cervus, id triplicatum corvus. Et reliqua fabulosus in phœnice, ac Nymphis (18). i. e. "The age of man, and the length of his life, is rendered uncertain, not only by the constitution of the countries they live in, but by the influences we have, and by every one's fate at his birth. Hesiod, who is the first that published something upon this subject, relates fabulously (in my opinion) several things concerning the length of man's life, ascribing nine times our age to the crows, four times the crows to the hart; three times this to the ravens. What he asserts concerning the phœnix and the Nymphs, is more fabulous still." Though we should reduce the thing to the lowest computation, which is that which ascribes but one year to the age of man (19), Hesiod's opinion concerning the Hamadryades would prove false: they could not live longer than their Trees; now there is no tree capable to live 9720 years. What Pliny relates of the long life of some trees (20), what others observe of the Oak of Mamre (21), a thousand other stories of the same kind, though they were as true as they are doubtful, would prove nothing against me.

(17) Plutarch. de Oraculor. deo. sic. lib. pag. 415.

(18) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 48. pag. m. 73.

(19) That is to say, supposing, as in the passage from Plutarch, that by the word Genea Hesiod meant but one year.

(20) Plin. lib. 16. cap. 44.

(21) See the remark [C] of the articles ABRAHAM and BARCO-CHEBAS.

Observe that the Poet Statius supposed, that the demi-gods, who are mortal, do not live so long as the Trees. He mentions a wood, which saw its Dryades and Fauns entirely changed, and which might be compared to those old castles, which were the dwelling places of the fathers, the sons, the grand-sons, &c.

Stat sacra senectæ Numine, nec solos hominum transgressa veterno Fertur ævos, Nymphas etiam mutasse superstes, Faunorumque greges (22).

(22) Statius, Tb. 6. lib. 6. ver. 93.

That is, "There stands a wood sacred by its old age, which, as is reported, did not only see the grand-fathers taken the Hamadryades for the Naiades [E]; they did not confine themselves so exactly to the definition of every kind, but they confounded and blended them together when they pleased.

“ pass off the stage, but even changed its Nymphs, and herds of Fauns, and subsists after them.”
He speaks somewhat differently in another place; for he supposes that the Tree died, when the Hamadryad ceased to live.

*Quid te, quæ mediis servata penatibus, arbor;
Tecta per & postes liquidas emergis in auras?
Quo non sub domino servas passura bipennes?
Et nunc ignaro forsitan vel lubrica Nais,
Vel non abruptis tibi demet Hamadryas annos (23).*

(23) Idem, Silva
3. lib. 1. ver. 59.
pag. m. 14, 15.

That is,
“ Why should you, a Tree, who have been preserved by the Gods that dwell in you, shew your head now over gates and roofs? under what master will you escape the cruel ax? and now some Naid out of ignorance or wantonness, or perhaps your Hamadryad will perhaps shorten those days which have been spared till this time.”

To conclude, it was easy for the Heathens to imagine, that there was such a kind of Nymphs; for they entertained a great sense of veneration and devotion for those Trees, which they imagined to be very old, and whose extraordinary largeness was a sign that they had lived very long (24). It was not a difficult step to pass from thence to a belief, that they were the dwelling place of some Deity. They made natural idols of them; I mean that they persuaded themselves that without the help of a consecration, which made the Deities come down into the Statues that were consecrated to them, some Nymph or some Deity had taken possession of those Trees. The Oak, which Erysichthon cut down, was venerated for its loftiness and antiquity: men used to adorn it as a sacred place, and hung upon it the memorials of the good success of their devotion, and the monuments of their prayers and vows that had been heard.

(24) Ennius sicut sacras vates late lucos advenas, in quibus grandia & antiqua robora jam non tantum habent speciem, quantum religionem. Quint. lib. 10. cap. 1. p. m. 471. That is,
“ Let us reverence Ennius as we do those woods, which their antiquity renders sacred;
“ where the lofty and antient oaks appear awful rather than agreeable to the eye.”

Stabat in his ingens annofo robore quercus Una, nemus: vitæ medium memoresque tabellæ, Sortaque cingebant, voti argumenta potentis (25).

(25) Ovid. Met.
lib. 8. ver. 746.

That is,
“ An antient Oak in the dark Center stood,
“ The Cover’s Glory, and itself a Wood,
“ Garlands embrac’d its shafts, and from the Boughs “ Hung Tablets, Monuments of prosp’rous Vows.
Mr. VERNON.

Must we wonder that it was taken for the dwelling-place of an Hamadryad?

[E] The Poets have sometimes mistaken the Hamadryades for the Naiades. This is what Propertius has done speaking of the Nymphs, who carried away Hercules’s darling (26); he calls them sometimes Hamadryades, and sometimes Dryades, and yet they were Nymphs that belonged to a Fountain. Ovid on the contrary calls some Nymphs Naiades, whose fate depended from a Tree.

(26) Propert.
lib. 20. lib. 1.

*Naida vulneribus succidit in arbore factis,
Illa perit: fatum Naiades arbor erat (27).*

(27) Ovid. Fag.
lib. 4. ver. 231.

That is,
“ The Tree being wounded the Naias fell down and died;
“ The Naiad’s Fate was connected with that Tree.”

HAMDEN or HAMPDEN (JOHN), descended of an antient family at Hamden in Buckinghamshire, was son of John Hamden Esq; by Elizabeth, sister of Sir Oliver Cromwell of Hinchinbroke in Huntingdonshire, Knight of the Bath. He was born at London (a) in the year 1594 [A], and entered a Commoner of Magdalen College in Oxford in 1609; but leaving the University without any degree, he removed to the Inns of Court, where he made a considerable progress in the study of the Law (b). He afterwards retired to his estate in Buckinghamshire, and was chosen to serve in the Parliament, which began at Westminster February the 5th 162½, and all the succeeding Parliaments during the reign of King Charles I. The Earl of Clarendon observes (c), that

(a) Lib. Metric.
Uvæ-Ox. P. pag.
104.

(b) Wood, Arb.
Oxon. vol. 2. col.
30. 24 edit. London 1721.

(c) History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, vol. 2. Part 1. B. 7. pag. 265. edit. Oxford 1707 in 8vo.

(1) Arb. Oxon.
vol. 2. col. 30.

[A] He was born at London in the year 1594. Mr. Wood tells us (1), that he was 15 years of age, when he became a Commoner of Magdalen College in 1609.

VOL. VI.

B

I shall observe occasionally, that it was still more common to take the Hamadryades and the Dryades for each other. There is a Scene in the Hercules Oeteus, in which the effects of Orpheus’s voice are described; it is asserted there amongst other things, that the Dryads left their Trees to run to him.

Et quercum fugiens suam Ad vatem properat Dryas (28).

(28) Senec. in Herc. Oeteo,
ver. 1051. pag. m. 122.

It is somewhat likely, that those Nymphs are meant here, who were born and died with a Tree, and who properly speaking, were called Hamadryades, and not Dryades. It was not a constant Tradition, that these Nymphs could never leave their Trees, not even for a few moments. Seneca might therefore suppose, that they left them to go and hear Orpheus’s Songs. Observe, that Servius was mistaken, who imagined that the Poet Statius meant the Hamadryades in the following Verses of the sixth Book of the Thebais.

*Linquunt stentes dilecta locorum
Otia, cana Pales, Silvanusque arbiter umbrae,
Semideumque pecus, migrantibus adgemit illis
Silva, nec amplexa dimittunt robora Nymphæ (29).*

(29) Statius, Theb. lib. 6. ver.
110. pag. m. 234.

That is, “ The gray-haired Pales, and Silvanus the God of the shady Woods, and all the Herd of the Demi-Gods, leave with tears in their Eyes the agreeable retirement of that place; the Wood sighs at their departure, and the nymphs cannot part with the Oaks they embrace.”

It is certain that the Nymphs mentioned here, are they who were properly called Dryades: So that Servius was in the wrong to apply those words, Nec amplexa dimittunt robora Nymphæ, to the Hamadryades, whom he had just been describing in these words, Hamadryades cum arboribus & nascuntur & pereunt, unde plurimumque, caesa arbore, sanguis emanat (30). i. e. “ The Hamadryades are born and perish with the Trees; whence it generally happens, that when the Tree is cut down, the blood runs from it.” Barthius has not observed this Grammatician’s mistake, and yet he quotes a passage which was very proper to discover it to him. Pulchra notatio in Commentario Antiquo, says he (31). Dimittunt] Non cum effectu intellige, dimittunt enim omnino, quamvis sero dimittant. Sed diuturnitatem manifestat amoris, non abscessisse Nymphas, nisi penitus prostratis arboribus. Sic solemus dicere: Ille modum non facit plorandi, non facit alius finem ridendi, cum diutius rideat aut fleat. i. e. “ There is a very good Observation in an antient Commentary upon this word Dimittunt, i. e. they do not part with. You must not take it as though they really did not part with the Trees; it serves only the long continuance of their love; the Nymphs did not leave the Wood till the Trees were quite cut down. Thus we use to say, that man cries without ceasing, the other laughs continually, when the one cries, and the other laughs a long while. Does it not appear very plainly from these words, that Statius does not speak of the same kind of Nymphs with those, of whom Servius has given a Description, and who could not escape Death when their Trees were cut down?

(30) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 3. ver. 34.

(31) Barth. in Statii Theb. lib. 6. ver. 113. pag. 389. tom. 3.

though “ in his entrance into the world he indulged to himself all the licence in sports and “ exercifes and company, which were used by men of the moft jolly converfation ; he “ afterwards retired to a more referved and melancholy fociety, yet preferving his own “ natural chearfulnefs and vivacity, and above all a flowing courtefy to all men. Tho’
 “ they who converfed nearly with him found him growing into a diflike of the Ecclefi“ aftical Government of the Church, yet moft believed it rather a diflike of fome Church“ men, and of fome introducements of theirs, which he apprehended might difquiet the “ public peace.” In 1636 he became univerfally known by his refusal to pay shipmoney, as an illegal tax. Upon this he was profecuted in the Exchequer, where he pleaded, and the Council demurring, the point in Law came to be argued for the King by his Council, and for Mr. Hamden by his Council ; and afterwards the Judges particularly argued the point at the Bench, and all of them, except Hutton and Croke, argued, and gave their judgments for the King (d). His carriage throughout this agitation was with that rare temper and modefty, that they who watched him narrowly to find fome advantage againft his perfon, to make him lefs refolute in his caufe, were compelled to give him a juft testimony (e). When the Long Parliament began, in which he was returned as Knight of the Shire for the County of Buckingham, “ the eyes of “ all men, fays the Earl of Clarendon (f), were fixed upon him, as their Pater “ Patriæ, and the Pilot, that muft fteer the vefel thro’ the tempefts and rocks, which “ threatened it. And I am perfuaded, his power and intereft at that time was greater to “ do good or hurt, than any man’s in the Kingdom, or than any man of his rank hath “ had in any time ; for his reputation of honefty was univerfal, and his affections feemed “ fo publicly guided, that no corrupt or private ends could biafs them.” In the beginning of this Parliament he was appointed one of the Committee to prepare a charge againft the Earl of Strafford, and to manage the evidence againft him at his trial (g).
 But before this trial there was faid to be a propofal for reftoring the Earl to his former favour and honour, on condition that his Majefty would promote Mr. Hamden to be Tutor to the Prince, and other eminent oppofers of the Court to the moft confiderable pofts (b) [B]. January the 3d 1641 the King ordered articles of high-treason and other misdemeanors to be prepared againft the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hamden, and four other Members of the Houfe of Commons, and went to that Houfe to feize them, but they were then retired ; and Mr. Hamden afterwards made a fpeech in the Houfe to clear himfelf of the charge againft him [C]. From this time “ he was much altered, fays “ Lord Clarendon (i), his nature and carriage feeming much fiercer than it did before.
 “ And

(d) Memorials of the Englifh Affairs. By Bulstrode Whitelocke Esq; pag. 25. edit. London 1732, in fol.

(e) Clarendon, ubi fupra.

(f) Ibid.

(g) Whitelocke, ubi fupra, pag. 39.

(b) Ibidem, ibid. pag. 41.

(i) Ubi fupra, pag. 266.

[B] A propofal for reftoring the Earl to his former Favour and Honour, on condition that his Majefty would promote Mr. Hamden to be Tutor to the Prince, and other eminent Oppofers of the Court to the moft confiderable Pofts. We fhall give Mr. Whitelocke’s words upon this occasion (2). There was a propofal (the fubject of much Difcourfe) to prevent all this trouble [about the trial of the Earl of Strafford] and to reftore the Earl to his former Favour and Honour, if the King would prefer fome of the Grandees to Offices at Court, whereby Strafford’s Enemies fhould become his Friends, and the King’s Defires be granted. It was that “ fhould be made Lord Treafurer ; the Lord Say, Master of the Wards, Mr. Pym, Chancellor of the Exchequer ; Mr. Hollis, Secretary of State ; and Mr. Hamden, Tutor to the Prince ; others to have other Places, in order whereunto the Bifhop of London refigned up his Treafurer’s Staff, the Lord Cottington his Place of Master of the Wards, and the reft were eafily to be voided. But whether upon the King’s Alteration of his mind, or by what other means is uncertain, thefe things were not effected ; and the great men baffled thereby became the more incensed and violent againft the Earl, joining with the Scots Commiffioners, who were implacable againft him.

[C] Made a fpeech in the Houfe to clear himfelf of the charge againft him. There was published at London 1641 in one fheet in 4to the following Speech under Mr. Hamden’s Name, “ Mr. Speaker, It is a true “ faying of the wife man, that all things happen alike
 “ to all men, as well to the good man as to the bad.
 “ There is no ftate or condition whatfoever, either of “ Profperty or Adverfity, but all men are fhared in “ the fame. No man can be difcerned truly by the “ outward appearance, whether he be a good fubject “ either to his God, his Prince, or his Country, un“ til he be tried by the Touchftone of Loyalty, “ Give me leave, I befeech you, to parallel the Lives
 “ of either fort, that we may in fome meafure difcern “ truth from falshood ; and in fpeaking I fhall fimilize “ their Lives. 1. In Religion towards God. 2. In “ Loyalty and due Subjection to their Sovereign ; in “ their Affection towards the fafety of their Country.
 “ 1. Concerning Religion, the beft means to difcern “ between the true and falfe Religion, is, by fearch-“ ing the facred writings of the old and new Testa“ ment, which is of itfelf pure, indited by the Spirit of “ God, and written by holy men, unspotted in their “ lives and converfations ; and by this facred Word we “ may prove, whether our Religion be of God or no ;

 “ and by looking in this Glafs we may difcern whe“ ther we are in the right way or no. And look“ ing into the fame, I find by this Truth of God,
 “ that there is but one God, one Chrift, one Faith,
 “ one Religion, which is the Gofpel of Chrift, and “ the Doctrines of the Prophets, and Apoftles. In “ thefe two Testaments are contained all things ne-“ ceflary to Salvation. If that our Religion doth “ hang upon this Doctrines, and no other fecondary “ means, then it is true ; to which comes neareft the “ Proteftant Religion which we profefs, as I really and “ verily believe ; and confequently that Religion, “ which joineth with the Doctrines of Chrift and his “ Apoftles the traditions and inventions of Men, Pray“ ers to the Virgin Mary, Angels, Saints, that are “ ufed in the exercife of their Religion, ftrange and “ fuperftitious worshipping, cringing, bowing, creep“ ing to the Altar, uing Pictures, Dirges, and fuch “ like, cannot be true, but erroneous, nay devilifh ;
 “ and all this is ufed and maintained in the Church
 “ of Rome as neceffary as the Scripture to Salvation ; “ therefore is a falfe and erroneous Church both in “ doctrine and difcipline ; and all other fefts and “ fchifms, that lean not only on the Scriptures, tho’
 “ never fo contrary to the Church of Rome,
 “ is a falfe worshipping of God, and not true Religion.
 “ And thus much concerning Religion, to difcern the “ truth and falshood thereof. I come now, Mr.
 “ Speaker, to the fecond thing intimated unto you,
 “ which was to difcern in a ftate between good fubjects “ and bad, by their loyalty and due fubjection to their “ lawful Sovereign ; in which I fhall, under favour, “ obferve two things. 1. Lawful fubjection to a King
 “ in his own Perfon, and the Commands, Edicts, and “ Proclamations of the Prince and his Privy Council.
 “ 2. Lawful obedience to the Laws, Statutes, and “ Ordinances made, enacted by the King and the “ Lords,

(2) Memorials of the Englifh Affairs, pag. 41.

“ And without question, when he first drew his sword, he threw away the scabbard ;
 “ for he passionately opposed the overture made by the King for a treaty from Notting“ ham, and as eminently all expedients, that might have produced any accommodation
 “ in this that was at Oxford, and was principally relied on to prevent any infusions, “ which might be made into the Earl of Essex towards peace, or to render them inef“ fectual, if they were made ; and was indeed much more relied on by that party than “ the General himself.” In the beginning of the wars he undertook the command of a regiment of foot, and performed the duty of a Colonel upon all occasions most punctually (k) ; and did good service to the Parliament at the battle of Edge-Hill. In the beginning of the year 1643, it was reported about the City of London that the Earl of Essex was to resign his post of General, and to be succeeded by Mr. Hamden (l). He received a mortal wound in an engagement with Prince Rupert in Chalgrave Field in Oxfordshire (m), and died June the 24th 1643, and was interred in the Church of Great Hamden. We shall give his character in the note [D]. His eldest son, Richard Hamden Esq; was chosen one of the five Knights for Buckinghamshire to serve in the Parliament called by the Protector to meet at Westminster September the 17th 1656.
 After

(k) Idem, ibid.

(l) Wood, Ab. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 30. 2d ed. 1721.

(m) Idem, ibid.

“ Lords, with the free consent of his great Council of “ State assembled in Parliament. For the first, to “ deny a willing and due obedience to a lawful Sove“ reign, and his Privy Council (for as Camden truly “ saith, The Commands of the Lords, Privy Counsellors, “ and the Edicts of the Prince are all one, for they “ are inseparable, the one never without the other,)
 “ either to defend his Royal Person and Kingdoms a“ gainst the enemies of the same, either publick or “ private ; or to defend the antient privileges and pre“ rogatives of the King, pertaining and belonging of “ right to his royal Crown, and the maintenance of “ his Honour and Dignity ; or to defend and main“ tain true Religion ; established in the Land, accord“ ing to the Truth of God, is one sign of an evil and “ bad subject. Secondly, to yield obedience to the “ Commands of a King, if against the true Religion, “ against the antient and fundamental Laws of the “ Land, is another sign of an ill subject. Thirdly,
 “ to resist the lawful Power of the King, to raise “ insurrection against the King, admit him adverse in “ his Religion to conspire against his sacred Person, or “ any ways to rebel, tho’ commanding things against “ our consciences in exercising Religion, or against “ the rights and privileges of the subject, is an abso“ lute sign of a disaffected and traitorous subject. And “ now having given the signs of discerning evil and “ disloyal subjects ; I shall only give you in a word “ or two the signs of discerning, which are loyal and “ good subjects, only by turning these three signs al“ ready shewed on the contrary side. 1. He that “ willingly and cheerfully endeavoureth himself to “ obey his Sovereign’s Commands for the defence of “ his own Person and Kingdoms, for the defence of “ true Religion, for the defence of the Laws of his “ Country, is a loyal and good subject. 2. To deny “ obedience to a King, commanding any thing against “ God’s true worship and religion, against the antient
 “ and fundamental Laws of the Land, in endeavour“ ing to perform the same, is a good subject. 3.
 “ Not to resist the lawful and royal power of the King,
 “ to raise Sedition or Insurrection against his person,
 “ or to set Division between the King and his good “ Subjects by Rebellion, although commanding things “ against Conscience in the exercise of Religion,
 “ or against the Rights and Privileges of the Subject,
 “ but patiently for the same to undergo his Prince’s “ Displeasure, whether it be to his Imprisonment, “ confiscation of Goods, Banishment, or any other Pu“ nishment whatsoever, without murmuring, grudging,
 “ or reviling against his Sovereign or his Proceed“ ings ; but submitting willingly and cheerfully him“ self, and his Cause to Almighty God, is the only “ sign of an obedient and loyal subject. I come now “ to the second means to know the difference between “ a good subject and a bad, by their obedience to the “ Laws, Statutes, and Ordinances, made by the King, “ with the whole consent of his Parliament. And in “ this I observe a twofold Subjection, in the particu“ lar Members thereof dissenting from the general “ Votes of the whole Parliament ; and secondly the “ whole state of the Kingdom in a full Parliament.
 “ First, I confess, if any particular Member of a Par“ liament, although his Judgment and Vote be con“ trary, do not willingly submit to the rest, he is “ an ill subject to the King and Country. Secondly, “ to resist the ordinance of the whole state of the “ Kingdom, either by stirring up a Dislike in “ the hearts of his Majesty’s Subjects of the pro“ ceedings of the Parliament ; to endeavour by le“ vying of arms to compel the King and Parli-“ ment to make such Laws, as seem best to them ;

 “ to deny the Power, Authority, and Privileges of “ Parliament ; to cast aspersions upon the same ; to “ procure the untimely Dissolution and breaking off
 “ the Parliament before all things be settled by the “ same, for the safety and tranquillity both of King
 “ and State ; is an apparent sign of a traitorous and “ disloyal subject against his King and Country. And “ thus having troubled your patience, in shewing
 “ the difference between true Protestants and false, “ loyal Subjects and Traytors, in a State or Kingdom,
 “ and the means how to discern them ; I humbly “ desire my actions may be compared with either, “ both as I am a Subject, Protestant, and Native in “ this Country, and as I am a Member of this pre“ sent and happy Parliament ; and as I shall be found “ guilty upon these Articles exhibited against myself
 “ and the other Gentlemen, either a bad or a good “ subject to my gracious Sovereign and native Coun“ try, to receive such sentence upon the same, as
 “ by this honourable house shall be conceived to a“ gree with Law and Justice.”

[D] We shall give his Character in the Note.] Mr.
 Whitelocke tells us (3), that he was a Gentleman of (3) Memorials, the antientest Extraction in Buckinghamshire, his Fortune pag. 70.
 large, his natural Abilities great ; and his affection to publick Liberty and Applause in his Country, exposed him to many difficulties and troubles, as in the Business of Ship-money, of the Loan, and now in Parliament, where he was a most active and leading Member.
 He spoke rationally and subtilly, and often proposed more doubts than he resolved. He was well beloved in his Country, where he had a great interest, as also in the House of Commons. He died lamented. The Earl of Clarendon has drawn his Character at large ; and observes (4), that “ he was of that rare Affability and (4) History of the “ Temper in debate, of that seeming Humility and Rebellion, vol. 2.
 “ Submission of Judgment, as if he brought no opi- Part 1. B. 7.
 “ nion of his own with him, but desire of Information pag. 265.
 “ and Instruction. Yet he had so subtle a way of “ interrogating, and under the notion of Doubts infi“ nuating his objections, that he infused his own o“ pinions into those, from whom he pretended to “ learn and receive them. And even with them, who “ were able to preserve themselves from his insinuations, “ and discerned those opinions to be fixed in him, with “ which they could not comply, he always left the “ Character of an ingenuous and conscientious Per“ son. He was indeed a very wise man, and of “ great parts, and possessed with the most absolute spi“ rit of popularity and the most absolute faculties to “ govern the people, of any man I ever knew. For “ the first year of the Parliament he seemed rather to “ moderate and soften the violent and distempered hu“ mours, than to inflame them. But wise and dis“ passion’d men plainly discerned, that that moderation “ proceeded from prudence and observation that the “ Season was not ripe, rather than that he approved
 “ of the moderation ; and that he begot many opinions
 “ and

After the Restoration he was constantly elected to serve in Parliament during the reign of Charles II, James II, and King William and Queen Mary. In April 1689 he was made one of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and in November 1690 Chancellor of the Exchequer, and about the same time one of the Privy Council. He was father to John Hamden Esq; who was one of the Knights of Buckinghamshire in the Parliament, which begun at Westminster October the 17th 1679, and one of the Burgeses for Wendover in that county in the Parliament, which began at Oxford March the 21st 1680. He was tried at the Court of King's Bench February 6, 1683 for a conspiracy to disturb the peace of the Realm, and fined forty thousand pounds; and he was afterwards tried for High-treason at the Old Baily in London December the 30th 1685, and condemned; but his life was saved.

“ and motions, the Education whereof he committed “ to other men; so far disguising his own designs, “ that he seemed seldom to wish more than was con“ cluded; and in many gross conclusions, which would “ hereafter contribute to designs] not yet set on foot,
 “ when he found them sufficiently backed by the ma“ jority of voices, he would withdraw himself before
 “ the Question, that he might seem not to consent to “ so much visible unreasonableness, which produced
 “ as great a doubt in some, as it [did approbation
 “ in others, of his Integrity. What Combination “ soever had been originally with the Scots for the “ Invasion of England, and what farther was enter“ ed into afterwards in favour of them, and to advance
 “ any alteration of the Government in Parliament, no “ man doubts was at least with the Privy of this Gen“ tleman. . . . In the first entrance into the troubles, he “ undertook the command of a Regiment of Foot, and “ performed the Duty of a Colonel upon all occasions

“ most punctually. He was very temperate in Diet,
 “ and a supreme Governor over all his Passions and Af“ fections, and had thereby a great power over other “ men's. He was of an Industry and Vigilance not “ to be tired out, or wearied by the most laborious;
 “ and of parts not to be imposed upon by the most “ subtle or sharp; and of a personal Courage e“ qual to his best parts; so that he was an enemy “ not to be wished wherever he might have been “ made a friend; and as much to be apprehended “ where he was so, as any man could deserve to be.
 “ And therefore his Death was no less pleasing to the “ one party, than it was condoled in the other. In a “ word, what was said of Cinna, might well be appli“ ed to him; he had a Head to contrive, and a tongue
 “ to persuade, and a hand to execute any Mischiefs. His “ Death therefore seemed to be a great Deliverance
 “ to the Nation.” T.

(a) Du Pin, Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Ecclesiast. tom.
 23. pag. 297.
 edit. Amsterd.
 1711 in 4to. and Fontenelle,
Eloge de Monf. du Hamel, printed in his Histoire du Renouveau de l'Academie Royale des Sciences en 1699, & les Eloges Historiques de tous les Acade-miciens &c. vol.
 1. pag. 148. edit.
 Amsterd. 1709.

(b) Fontenelle,
ibid. pag. 148,
 149, 150.

(1) Eloge de Monf. du Hamel, printed in his Histoire du Renouveau de l'Academie Royale des Sciences en 1699, & les Elo-ges Historiques de tous les Acade-miciens &c. vol. 1.
 pag. 149.

(a) Ibid., ibid.

✠ HAMEL (JOHN BAPTISTE DU), a very learned French Philosopher and Writer in the seventeenth Century, was son of Nicholas du Hamel, an Advocate, and was born at Vire in Lower Normandy in the year 1624 (a). He passed through his first studies at Caen, and his course of Rhetoric and Philosophy at Paris. At eighteen years of age he wrote a treatise in which he explained in a very simple manner, and by one or two figures, Theodosius's three books of Spherics; to which he added a tract upon Trigonometry extremely short and perspicuous, and designed as an introduction to Astronomy [A]. At nineteen years of age he entered himself into the Congregation of the Oratory, where he continued ten years, and left it in order to be Curate of Neuilli upon the Marne. During both these intervals he joined an intense application to his studies to the duties of his function. Natural Philosophy, as it was then taught, was only a collection of vague, knotty, and barren questions; when our author undertook to put it upon a right foot (b), and began his design by publishing his Astronomia Physica [B], and his book de Meteoris & Fossilibus [C]. In 1663 he quitted his Cure of Neuilli, after having held it ten years, and published at Paris his famous book De Consensu veteris & novæ Philosophiæ [D]. In 1666 Monsieur Colbert proposed to Lewis XIV a scheme, which was approved of by his Majesty, for establishing a Royal Academy of Sciences; and

[A] At eighteen years of age he wrote a treatise, in which he explained Theodosius's three books of Spherics; to which he added a tract upon Trigonometry, extremely short and perspicuous, and designed as an introduction to Astronomy.] In one of his latter works he observes, that he was prompted by the vanity natural to a young man, to publish this book. But as Monsieur de Fontenelle remarks (1), there are few persons of that age capable of such an instance of vanity. And his inclination for science must have been very general, to engage him in the study of the Mathematics, which were then little cultivated, especially in the place where he studied (2).

[B] His Astronomia Physica.] It was printed at Paris, 1659, in 4to. It is written in the form of a dialogue between Theophilus, a great zealot for the Antients, Menander, a warm Cartesian, and Simplicius, a Philosopher, who is indifferent between the two parties, who endeavours to reconcile them, and has a right from his character to embrace what he thinks proper on either side. Simplicius is designed to represent Monsieur du Hamel. He has been reproached with not being impartial enough towards Des Cartes; and in reality Theophilus treats that Philosopher with great severity. Monsieur du Hamel answered; that Theophilus, who does so, is a man extremely bigotted to the Antients, and absolutely averse to any Moderns; and that Simplicius never speaks of Des Cartes in reproachful terms. This is true; but as Monsieur de Fontenelle observes (3), it was Simplicius (3) Pag. 153. us who made Theophilus speak in that manner. This work of our Author is a collection of the principal sentiments of the antient and modern Philosophers upon light and colours, and the systems of the world. All that relates to the sphere, the theory of the planets, and the calculation of eclipses, is explained mathematically.

[C] His book De Meteoris & Fossilibus.] It was printed at Paris, 1659, in 4to, and is written in the method of dialogue between the same persons, who are introduced in his Astronomia Physica. It contains a collection of all that the authors of any reputation have said upon Meteors and Fossils; for Monsieur du Hamel did not confine himself to the reading of the most celebrated. In his dialogue upon Fossils he shews a very extensive knowledge of Natural History and Chemistry, though the latter was, at that time, covered with a mysterious jargon, scarce possible to be understood.

[D] His famous book De Consensu veteris & novæ Philosophiæ.] It was printed at Paris, 1663, in 4to, Oxford 1668, and Roan 1675. It contains an account of the first principles of Physics. It begins with the sublime but obscure Metaphysics of Plato concerning Ideas, Numbers, and archetypal Forms; and tho' Monf. du Hamel acknowledges this scheme of Metaphysics to be far from intelligible, yet he could not refuse it a place in his general Scheme of Philosophy. He shews the same indulgence to the notions of Privation, substantial Forms, and other Scholastic Principles. But when

(c) Idem, ibid.
pag. 150, 156.

and appointed our author Secretary of it (c). In 1667 he published at Paris in 12mo a Translation of a French piece, under the title of Reginæ Christianissimæ Jura in Ducatum Brabantiae & alios Ditionis Hispanicæ Principatus; and the year following he published in Latin and French at the request of Monsieur de Perefice, Archbishop of Paris, a Dissertation upon the rights of that Prelate in opposition to the pretended privileges of the Abbey of St. Germain des Prez. In 1668 he attended Monsieur Colbert de Croissy, Plenipotentiary for the peace at Aix-la-Chapelle. Upon the conclusion of the peace he accompanied him to England, where Monsieur Colbert de Croissy was Ambassador. Here he formed an acquaintance with the most eminent persons of this Nation, and particularly Mr. Boyle. Thence he went over to Holland, and so returned to France, having collected a great number of useful observations in his travels (d). In 1670 he published at Paris in 12mo his treatise, De Corporum affectionibus, cum manifestis, cum occultis; and, in 1672 his book De Mente Humana, Paris in 12mo, and the year following his treatise, De Corpore animato [E], Paris 1673 in 12mo. In 1678 his Philosophia vetus & nova ad usum Scholæ accommodata, in Regia Burgundia pertractata was printed at Paris in four tomes in 12mo [F]. In 1681 there was published at Nuremberg in four volumes in 4to, a Collection of his Philosophical and Astronomical Works. In 1691 his Theologia speculativa & practica juxta SS. Patrum dogmata pertractata, & ad usum Scholæ accommodata was printed at Paris in 7 vol. in 8vo; as his Theologiæ Clericorum Seminariis accommodatæ Summarium was at Paris in 1694 in 5 vol. in 12mo. In 1697 he resigned his place of Secretary of the Royal Academy of Sciences, which by his recommendation he procured for Monsieur de Fontenelle. The year following he published at Paris in 4to his Regiæ Scientiarum Academiæ Historia [G], and his Institutiones Biblicæ, seu Scripturæ sacræ

(d) Idem, ibid.
pag. 156, 157,
158.

when he comes to intelligible Principles, as those of the Laws of Motion, and those laid down by the Chemists, he shews his inclination that way, notwithstanding his endeavour to prove an universal agreement in Philosophy. He appears to enter with reluctance into general questions, the result of which is only words, which have no other merit than to have passed upon the world for a long time for things. His inclination and good sense always call him off immediately to Experimental Philosophy, and especially to Chemistry, for which he had a particular taste (4).

(4) Idem, ibid.
pag. 153, 154.

[E] His treatise De Corpore animato.] We may judge by the title, that Experimental Philosophy is employed in this work. Anatomy is very frequently made use of in it. Monsieur du Hamel had gained great skill in that science by the conferences of the Academy, and by a particular acquaintance with Monsieur Steno, and Monsieur du Verney. In this book he intimates that he had been reproached with not deciding of questions, and with being too undetermined between the different parties. He promised to correct this; but it must be owned, that he did not observe his promise exactly enough; though it is rare to meet with a Philosopher, who is accused of not being sufficiently decisive (5).

(5) Idem, ibid.
pag. 160.

[F] In 1678 his Philosophia vetus & nova, &c. was printed at Paris in four Tomes in 12mo.] It was enlarged and reprinted at Paris, 1681, in six Tomes in 12mo, and there again in 1684, in two Tomes in 4to. The fifth edition was printed at Amsterdam, 1700, in six Tomes in 12mo. This work contains a judicious assemblage of the antient and modern opinions in Philosophy. Several years after the publication of it the Missionaries, who carried it to the East-Indies, wrote, that they had taught this Philosophy there with great success, especially that part relating to Natural Philosophy, which of the four parts, into which the whole is divided, is that, in which the Moderns have the greatest share. It seems, that our Author was designed for the Philosopher of the East. For Father Bouvet the Jesuit, a famous Missionary in China, wrote into Europe, that when his brethren and himself engaged in drawing up a system of Philosophy in the Tartarian language for the Emperor of China, one of the chief sources, which they made use of, was Monsieur du Hamel's Philosophia vetus & nova (6).

(6) Idem, ibid.
pag. 162, 163.

[G] His Regiæ Scientiarum Academiæ Historia.] It was reprinted with improvements at Paris, 1701, in 4to, under the following title: Regiæ Scientiarum Academiæ Historia, in qua præter ipsius Academiæ Originem & Progressus, variasque Dissertationes & Observationes per triginta quatuor annos factas, quam plurima Experimenta & Inventa, cum Physicæ tum Mathematicæ, in certum Ordinem digeruntur. Secunda Editio prioris longè auctior. The former edition contained four books, this includes a fifth and sixth. In the first book he gives an account of the foundation of the Royal Academy of Sciences and its transactions, from 1666 to 1675. The second continues the History to 1684, the third to 1692; the fourth to 1696; the fifth to 1698; and sixth to 1700 inclusively. As to the foundation of it, he tells us, that peace being concluded between France and Spain in 1659, Lewis IV thought proper to add the splendor of learning and sciences to the glory of his Empire enlarged by so many victories. To this end he judged it the best way, that men eminent for learning should form themselves into a society by the consent of the public authority, and confer and debate together upon their inventions; which he perceived would be more advantageous, than if they laboured singly in the promoting of any one science. He therefore ordered Monsieur Colbert to execute this design, which himself had projected. Monsieur Colbert having consulted with men of good sense and learning, resolved, that the society should be formed of men well skilled in Natural Philosophy and Mathematics, being of opinion, that those Sciences were so strictly united, that it was scarce possible for any person to excel in the former, who was not conversant in the latter. Others persuaded him, that besides Mathematicians and Natural Philosophers, he should adopt into the society other learned men, who had applied themselves to polite literature, and especially those, who were good masters of History. This advice being approved, he appointed that the Mathematicians and Natural Philosophers should meet separately on Wednesdays, and together on Saturdays, in that part of the Royal Library, which contained the books of those Sciences. He ordered those, who applied themselves to History, to meet on Mondays and Thursdays in that part of the King's Library, which contained historical books; and that those who studied Polite Literature, should meet together on Tuesdays and Fridays. He then appointed, that on the first Thursday of every month all these societies should meet together; at which general meeting every one should be permitted to desire a solution extempore of those things, which seemed difficult to him, but with this caution, that if the difficulties were greater than could be solved immediately, the objections and answers should be given in writing, that the time of the meeting might not be spent in unprofitable dispute. But this first constitution of the Academy did not continue long; for at the very beginning, the society of those, who met for the illustration of History, was dissolved for certain reasons; for since History, and especially that of the church, hath a strict connection with questions in Divinity, and particularly with those relating to the government of the church, and since from matters of fact frequently matters of right are deduced, it was apprehended lest this society might offend those, whom it was not safe to provoke. Monsieur du Hamel then gives an account how the sacra Prolegomena, una cum selectis Annotationibus in Pentateuchum [H], Paris, two volumes in 12mo. In 1701 he published in 12mo at Paris and Roan, In Psalmos Commentarii cum Textu; and in 1703, In Libros Salomonis & Ecclesiasticum Annotationes cum Textu, Paris and Roan in 12mo. His last work was Biblia sacra Vulgatæ Editionis, unâ cum selectis ex optimis quibusque Interpretibus notis, Prolegomenis, novis tabulis Chronologicis & Geographicis. Paris 1706 in fol. He died at Paris August the 6th 1706, without any sickness, and of mere old age, being almost eighty three years old. He went every year to visit his old flock at Neuilli; and the day, which he spent there, was kept as an holy day by the whole village. While he was in England, the English Roman Catholics, who went to mass at the French Ambassador's chapel, used to say, Let us go to hear mass said by the holy Priest, such reverence had his excellent character gained even among strangers, Cardinal Anthony Barberini, grand Almoner of France, made him Chaplain to the King in 1656. He was highly esteemed by the most eminent Prelates of France, though he enjoyed but very small preferments (e). He was Regius Professor of Philosophy, in which post he was succeeded by Monsieur Varignon. He was a man of great modesty, affability, piety, and integrity; he was disinterested and averse to all contests, and exempt from jealousy and affectation. He wrote Latin with prodigious purity and elegance (f).

(e) Idem, ibid. pag. 169, 170, 171.

(f) Du Pin, ubi supra, pag. 299.

the society of Polite Literature was likewise separated from that of Sciences. Most of the members of the former being also members of the French Academy, and perceiving that Academy now to decline exceedingly, they desired Monsieur Colbert to shew the same favour to it, as he did to the new one, and represented, that there was no occasion for different societies for the same purposes, especially since the same persons did in a manner compose both Academies. This advice not being disliked by Monsieur Colbert, he granted their request, and exerted great zeal in restoring and maintaining this Academy, and became one of the members of it, and honoured it with his presence. The Society of Polite Literature being thus separated from its own body, and incorporated with the French Academy, the Academy of Natural Philosophy and Mathematics only stood, and never lost any part of its first splendor. In June 1666 about six or seven Mathematicians only began to meet, viz. Monsieur Carcavi, Huygens, Roberval, Frenicle, Auzout, Picart, and Buet; but it being proposed at first, that this Academy should likewise apply themselves to the cultivation of Natural Philosophy, Monsieur Colbert took care to choose men well skilled in Philosophy, and who were not devoted to any particular scheme of it, but took pleasure in all the several Sciences. Besides the Mathematicians abovementioned there were added to the Academy Monsieur de la Chambre, Physician in ordinary to the King, Monsieur Perrault, a man of general learning, Monsieur du Clos, and Bourdelin, excellent Chemists, Monsieur Pecquet and Gayen, skillful Anatomists, and Monsieur Marchant, an eminent Botanist; and Monsieur du Hamel was some months before appointed Secretary. On the 22d of December 1666 these two Societies met in the hall of the King's Library, where they debated, whether it was best, that the Natural Philosophers and Mathematicians should meet together, and form one Society; or whether they should meet apart. But because of the strict alliance between Natural Philosophy and Mathematics they unanimously agreed, that they should not be separated, being encouraged by the examples of several great men, who by their skill in the Mathematics, contributed much more to the improvement of Natural Philosophy, than those other Philosophers, who were not skilled in the Mathematics. They determined therefore, that both the Mathematicians and Natural Philosophers should meet twice every week, upon the Mathematics on Wednesdays, and Natural Philosophy on Saturdays; and that the acts of the Academy should not be published without their own order. The King erected an Observatory for their use in the suburb of St. James at Paris; this Observatory is eighty foot high, and the foundations are dug as deep, because almost the whole suburb, and the field adjoining to it, are made hollow underneath, stones being daily dug from those caves either to build or repair houses; by which means the descent of the Observatory into the subterranean cave is equal to the height. There is a large well, which reaches from the bottom of this Observatory to the top. It is built of such hewn stones, that there was no need of mortar to fasten them. This Observatory began to be inhabited by Monsieur Cassini, and to be furnished with all sorts of instruments in September 1671.

[H] His Institutiones Biblicæ, &c.] This work is divided into four dissertations; in the first of which he treats of the Scriptures themselves, their inspiration, and authors. In the second, of the authority and antiquity of the Hebrew Text, and the Greek and Latin Versions. In the third, of the style and manner of writing of the Scriptures: In the fourth he explains briefly the Chronology and Geography of them.

T.

(a) The Life of the most learned, reverend and pious Dr. H. Hammond. Written by John Fell, D. D. Dean of Christ Church in Oxford, pag. 2. 2d edit. London 1662.

(b) Ibid. pag. 1. (c) Historia & Antiquit. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 202. and Atben. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 245. 2d edit. London 1721.

(1) Life of the most learned, reverend, and pious Dr. H. Hammond, pag. 5, 6.

(2) Atben. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 245.

HAMMOND (HENRY), one of the most learned English Divines in the seventeenth Century, was youngest son of Dr. John Hammond, Physician to Prince Henry, and by the mother's side descended from Dr. Alexander Nowell Dean of St. Paul's in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (a). He was born at Chertsey in Surrey August the 18th, according to Dr. Fell (b), or the 26th, according to Mr. Wood (c), in the year 1605. From Eton-school, where he was educated in Grammar-learning, and greatly improved in the Greek tongue by Mr. Thomas Allen, Fellow of that College (d), he was removed to Magdalen College in Oxford [A], where on the 30th of July 1622 he was made a Demy (e), and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts on the 11th of December following (f). June the 30th 1625 he took the degree of Master of Arts (g), and on the 26th of July the same year was elected Fellow of his College (h), having been before chosen Reader of the Natural Philosophy Lecture in the College (i). After he had taken his degree he applied himself to the study of Divinity [B]; and in 1629 entered into holy

(d) Fell, pag. 4. (e) Wood, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(f) Idem, Fassi Oxon. vol. 1. col. 222.

(g) Idem, ibid. col. 231.

(h) Idem, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(i) Dr. Fell, pag. 6.

Orders,

[A] Removed to Magdalen College in Oxford.] Dr. John Fell tells us (1), that "at thirteen years old he was thought, and (what is much more rare) was indeed ripe for the university, and accordingly sent to Magdalen-College, where not long after he was chosen Demy." In this passage there is a mistake; for Mr. Wood assures us (2), that he was made Demy of that College on the 30th of August 1622, that is not till he was seventeen years of age; whereas Dr. Fell, who observes that he was sent thither at thirteen years of age, affirms in the words above-cited, that not long after he was chosen Demy.

[B] Applied himself to the study of Divinity.] At first he bought a system of Divinity, with a design to apply

(k) Wood, Festus
Oxon. vol. 1.
col. 257.

Orders, and on the 28th of Jan. 1633 took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (k) [C]. August the 22d following he was inducted into the Rectory of Penhurst in Kent, conferred on him by the Earl of Leicester, who a little before had been deeply affected with a sermon of his at Court, which he preached there in the room of Dr. Frewen, then President of his College, and afterwards Archbishop of York, who gave him the honour of supplying one of his Courses at Court (l). Upon this he retired from the University, and applied himself to the discharge of his ministerial functions with great vigour and success [D].

(l) Fell, pag. 9.

(m) Wood, Festus
Oxon. vol. 1.
col. 276.

March the 7th 1638 he proceeded Doctor of Divinity (m); and in 1640 became a Member of the Convocation called with the short Parliament in April 1640 (n). In 1643 he had the Archdeaconry of Chichester conferred upon him by Dr. Brian Duppa, Bishop of that See (o); and the same year was nominated one of the Assembly of Divines; but he did not fit among them (p). In July that year he was obliged to quit his Living, and retired to Oxford [E], where he published his Practical Catechism in (n) Dr. Fell, pag. 25.

(o) Idem, pag. 23. and Wood, Aben. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 245.
(p) Wood, ibid. and Dr. Fell, pag. 23.
1644,

(3) Fell, pag. 7.

apply himself immediately to that study; but upon second thoughts he returned to human Learning, and afterwards, when he resumed his purpose for Theology, took a quite different course of reading from the other too much usual, beginning that Science at the upper end, as conceiving it most reasonable to search for truth in the primitive writers, and not to suffer his understanding to be prepossessed by contrived and interested Schemes of modern, and withal obnoxious Writers (3). During the whole time of his abode in the university, he generally spent thirteen hours of the day in study; by which assiduity, besides an exact Dispatch of the whole course of Philosophy, he read over in a manner all classic Authors that are extant; and upon the more considerable wrote, as he passed, Scholias and critical Emendations, and drew up Indexes for his private use at the beginning and end of each book (4).

(4) Ibid. pag. 8, 9.

(5) Festus Oxon.
vol. 1. col. 257.

[C] On the 28th of January 1633 took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (5); and therefore Dr. Fell, who observes (6), that our Author, in 1629, being twenty four years of age, entered into holy orders, must be mistaken in asserting, that not long after he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity.

(6) Ubi supra,
pag. 7, 8.

(7) Pag. 10, &
119.

[D] Applied himself to the discharge of his ministerial Functions with great Vigour and Success.] He satisfied not himself in diligent and constant preaching only, but much more conceived himself obliged, says Dr. Fell (7), to the offering up the solemn daily sacrifices of Prayer for his people, administering the Sacraments, relieving the poor, keeping hospitality, reconciling of differences amongst Neighbours, visiting the sick, catechising the youth. With regard to his preaching, it was not at the ordinary rate of the times, an unpremeditated indigested effusion of shallow and crude conceptions, but a rational and just discourse, that was to reach the Priest as well as the Lay hearer. His Method was, (which he likewise recommended to his Friends) after every Sermon, to resolve upon the ensuing Subject; that being done, to pursue the course of study, which he was then in hand with, reserving the close of the Week for the provision for the next Lord's Day; whereby not only a constant progress was made in Science, but materials unawares were gained unto the immediate future work; for he said, he the subjects never so distant; somewhat will infallibly fall in conducive unto the present purpose. As to the Administration of the sacrament, he reduced it to an Imitation, though a distant one, of primitive frequency to once a month, and therewith its antient inseparable Appendant, the offertory; wherein his instruction and happily insinuating example so far prevailed, that there was thenceforth little need of ever making any tax for the poor. Nay, in a short time a stock was raised to be always ready for the putting out apprentices young Children, whose Parents condition made the Provision for them an equal charity to both the Child and Parent. And after this there remained yet a surplusage for the assistance of the neighbouring Parishes. For the relief of the poor, besides the fore-mentioned expedient, wherein others were sharers with him, unto his private Charity, the dedicating the tenth of all Receipts, and the daily alms given at the Door, he constantly set apart over and above every Week a certain Rate in Money; and however rarely his own rent-days occurred, the indigent had two and fifty quarter days returning in his year. Yet further, another art of charity he had, the selling corn to his poor neighbours at a rate below the Market-price; which though, as he said, he had reason to do, gaining thereby the charge of Portage, was a great benefit to them, who besides the abatement of price, and possibly Forbearance, saved thereby a day's work. He farther obliged his Parishioners likewise in the setting of their Tithes and Dues belonging to him. For tho' he very well understood how prone Men are to give complaints in payment, and how little Obligation there is on him, that lets a Bargain, to consider the casual loss, who is sure never to share in a like surplusage of gain; yet herein he frequently departed from his right, so that having set the Tithes of a large Meadow, and upon agreement received part of the Money at the beginning of the Year, it happening that the Profits were afterwards spoiled and carried away by a Flood, he, when the Tenant came to make the last payment, not only refused it, but returned the former Sum, saying to the poor man, God forbid I should take the Tenth, where you have not the nine parts. He made peace among his Neighbours; and not only attained his purpose of uniting distant Parties unto each other, but, contrary to the usual Fate of Reconcilers, gained them to himself; there having been no person of his function any where better beloved than he when present, or lamented more when absent, by his Flock. Of this tender and very filial affection, we may take two Instances; the one, that he being driven away, and his Books plundered, one of his neighbours bought them in his behalf, and preserved them for him till the end of the war: the other that during his abode at Penhurst, he never had any law-dispute about his dues, but had his tithes fully paid, and not of the most refuse parts, but generally the very best (8).

(8) Idem, pag. 10-19.

[E] In July that year he was obliged to quit his living, and retired to Oxford.] At that time there was in his neighbourhood about Tunbridge an attempt in behalf of the King, "and his doctrine and example," says Dr. Fell (9), having had that good influence, as "it was supposed, to have made many more ready to the discharge of their duty;" but it being defeated, the Doctor (the malice of one, who designed to succeed in his Living, being withal assistant) was forced to secure himself by retirement; which he did, withdrawing himself to his old tutor Dr. Buckner, to whom he came about the 25th of July, early in the morning, in such an habit as that exigence made necessary for him; and whither, not many days before, his old friend and fellow-pupil Dr. Oliver came upon the same errand. Which accident, and the necessity to leave his flock, as the Doctor afterwards frequently acknowledged, was that which did most affect him of any, that he felt in his whole life; amidst which, though he was no valuer of trifles, he had so extraordinary a dream, that he could not then despise, nor ever after forget it. It was thus: He thought himself and a multitude of others to have been abroad in a bright and cheerful day; when on a sudden there seemed a separation to be made, and he with the far less number to be placed at a distance from the rest; and then the clouds gathering, a most tempestuous storm arose, with thunder and lightnings, with impetuous rain and wind, and whatever else might add to a scene of horror, particularly balls of fire, which shot themselves amongst the ranks of those, who stood in the lesser party: When a gentle whisper seemed to interrupt those other louder noises, saying, Be still,

1644 [F], and several other tracts [G]. The same year he went with the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Southampton, as Chaplain, to London, whither those Noblemen were sent to compose the unhappy differences in Church and State (q); and when the treaty of Uxbridge was appointed, he attended the King's Commissioners thither, and managed the dispute with Richard Vines the Presbyterian Minister [H]. In the beginning of 1645, he was made one of the Canons of Christ Church in Oxford, and Chaplain in ordinary

(9) Dr. Fell,
Pag. 37.

and ye shall receive no harm. Amidst these terrors the Doctor falling to his prayers, soon after the tempest ceased, and that known cathedral-anthem began, Come, Lord Jesus, come away; with which he awoke. The correspondent event of all which he found verified finally in the preservation both of himself and his friends, in doing their duties; which with much content he was used to mention. Besides, continues Dr. Fell (10), being himself taken to the quires of angels at the close of that land-hurricane of ours, whereof that dismal apparition was only a faint emblem, he gave thereby too literal a completion to his dream, and the unhappy credit of bordering upon prophecy. In this retirement the two Doctors remained about three weeks, till an alarm was brought, that a strict enquiry was made for Dr Hammond, and 100 l. promised as a reward for him, who should produce him. This suggestion though they easily apprehended to have a possibility of being false, yet they concluded a necessary ground for their removal. Upon this they resolved to be gone; and Dr. Oliver having an interest in Winchester, which was then in the King's quarters, they chose that as the next place of their retreat. But being on the way thither, Dr. Oliver, who had sent his servant before to make provision for them, was met and saluted with the news, that Dr. Frewen, President of Magdalen College, was made Bishop of Lichfield, and that the College had pitched upon him as successor. Upon this Dr. Oliver determined to go to Oxford, to which Dr. Hammond made much difficulty to assent, thinking that too public a place, and, what he more consider'd, too far from his living, whither he had hopes, when the present fury was allayed, to return again; and to that purpose had written to such friends of his as were in power, to use their interest for the procuring his security. But his Letters meeting a cold reception, and the company of his friend on one hand, and the appearance of deserting him on the other hand, engaging him to it, he was at last persuaded, and encompassing Hampshire with some difficulty came to Oxford, where procuring an apartment in his old College, he sought that peace in his retirement and study, which was no where else to be met withal; taking no other diversion than what the giving encouragement and instruction to ingenious young Students yielded him, (a thing wherein he peculiarly delighted) and the satisfaction, which he received from the conversation of learned men; who, besides the usual store, in great number at that time resorted thither for their security (11).

(10) Pag. 30.

(11) Idem, pag.
30, 31, 32, 33.

[F] Published his Practical Catechism in 1644.] It was printed there and at London 1646 in 4to; and there is an edition at Oxford 1645 in 12mo. Having drawn this up at first for his private use, he communicated it to Dr. Potter, Provost of Queen's College at Oxford, who importuned him to make it public, alleging in that lawless age the great use of supplanting the empty form of godliness, which so prevailed, by substituting of its real power and sober duties; of silencing profaneness, which then usurped the names of wit and gallantry, by enforcing the more eligible acts of the Christian's reasonable service, which was not any other way so happily to be done, as by beginning at the foundation by sound, and yet not trivial, catechetical institution. Dr. Hammond would not consent that the Book should be published, unless his name were concealed; and this Dr. Potter undertook, as well as the whole care and charge of the edition. Upon these terms, only with this difference, that Dr. Hammond would not suffer the Provost to be at the entire charge, but went an equal share with him, the Practical Catechism saw the light, and likewise the author remained in his desired obscurity (12). This book was attacked in 1646 by Mr. Francis Cheynell, B. D. in a Sermon at St. Mary's in Oxford, which occasioned several letters between him and Dr. Hammond, who published them under the title of A Copy of some Papers past at Oxford between the author of the Practical Catechism and Mr. Ch. London 1647 and 1650 in 4to. He wrote also in defence of this Treatise A View of some Exceptions to the Practical Catechism from the Censures affixt on them by the Ministers of London in a Book entitled, A Testimony to the truth of Jesus Christ, &c. London 1648 in 4to; and A Vindication of three passages in the Practical Catechism. London 1648 in 4to.

(12) Idem, pag.
33, 34, 35, 36.

[G] And several other Tracts.] Particularly Of Scandal, Oxford 1644 in 4to; Of Conscience, Oxford 1644 in 4to; Of resisting the lawful Magistrate under colour of religion, Oxford 1644, London 1647 in 4to; Of Will-Worship, Oxford 1644 in 4to; Considerations of present use concerning the danger resulting from the change of our Church-Government, Oxford 1644 and 1646 in 4to; Of Superstition, Oxford 1645, London 1650 in 4to; Of Sins of Weakness and Wilfulness, Oxford 1645 and 1650 in 4to; Explication of two difficult Texts Heb. vi. and Heb. x. printed with the preceding Tract; Of a late Death-bed Repentance, Oxford 1645 in 4to; A View of the Directory, and Vindication of the Liturgy, Oxford 1645, &c. in 4to; Of Idolatry, Oxford 1646, London 1650 in 4to; A View of the Exceptions, which have been made by a Romanist to the Lord Viscount Falkland's Discourse of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome, Oxford 1646 in 4to; The Power of the Keys: or of binding and loosing, London 1647, and 1651 in 4to; Of the word KPIMA; Of the Zealots among the Jews, and the Liberty taken by them; Of the taking up the Cross; Vindication of Christ's representing S. Peter from the exceptions of Mr. Stephen Marshall, London 1647 in 4to, joined with the second Edition of our Author's Book Of resisting the lawful Magistrate; Of fraternal Admonition and Correction, London 1647 and 1650 in 4to.

[H] Managed the dispute with Mr. Richard Vines, the Presbyterian Minister.] Dr. Fell tells us (13), that Mr. Vines, instead of tendering a scholastic disputation, read from a paper a long Divinity-Lecture, wherein were interwoven several little cavils and exceptions, which were meant for arguments. Dr. Hammond perceiving this drew forth his pen and ink, and as the other was reading, took notes of what was said, and then immediately returned in order an answer to the several suggestions, which were about forty in number; "which he did with that readiness and sufficiency, as at once gave testimony to his ability, and to the evidence of the truth he asserted; which amidst the disadvantage of ex tempore against premeditation, dispelled with ease and perfect clearness all the sophisms that had been brought against him (14)." It (14) Idem, pag. 39, 40. was afterwards reported indeed, that Mr. Vines utterly silenced the Doctor, so that he was obliged to use this unheard of stratagem to avoid his adversary's demonstration, to swear by God and the holy Angels, that tho' at present a solution did not occur to him, he could answer it. Concerning this we have the Doctor's own account in a letter dated Jan. 22d 1655, directed to a friend, who had acquainted him with this report. "I have formerly been told, says he (15), within these few years that there went about a story much to my disparagement concerning the dispute at Uxbridge, (for there it was, not at Holdenby) with Mr. Vines; but what it was I could never hear before. Now I do, I can, I think, truly affirm, that no one part of it hath any degree of truth, save only that Mr. Vines did dispute against, and I defend, Episcopacy. For as to the argument mentioned, I did neither then, nor at any time of my life, (that I can remember) ever hear it urged by any. And for my pretended answer, I am both sure that I never called God and his holy Angels to witness any thing in my life, nor ever swore one voluntary oath that I know of, (and sure there was then none imposed on me) and that I was not at that meeting conscious to myself of wanting ability to express my thoughts, or prett with ordinary to his Majesty, who was then in that City, and chosen public Orator of the University (r). But these new employments did not divert him from publishing several new tracts (s). In 1647 he attended the King in his confinement of Wooburn, Caveham, Hampton-Court, and the Isle of Wight, where he continued till Christmas that year, at which time his Majesty's attendants were again put from him, and Dr. Hammond among the rest. Upon this he returned to Oxford, where being chosen Sub-Dean (t), he continued there till the Parliamentary Visitors ejected him, and then imprisoned him for several weeks in a private house in Oxford (u). During this confinement he began his Annotations on the New Testament [I]. At last by the interposition of his brother-in-law, Sir John Temple, he had licence granted to be removed to his friend Sir Philip Warwick's house at Clapham in Bedfordshire (w). The trial of his Majesty now drawing on, he wrote an Address to the General and Council of War, and transmitted it to them [K]. His excessive grief for the King's death did not however interrupt his studies; for besides his fitting his Annotations for the press, and his Appendix or Answer to what was returned by the Apologist, London 1650 in 4to, and his little tract of the Reasonableness of the Christian Religion, printed at London 1650 in 12mo, he composed a Latin one against Blondel in defence of Episcopacy [L]. After several months confinement at Clapham, (r) Idem, pag. 44.

(s) See note [G].

(t) Idem, pag. 47, 48.

(u) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 246. Dr. Fell says, pag. 55. that he continued ten weeks in his restraint.

(w) Dr. Fell, pag. 55, 56.

“ with any considerable difficulty, or forced by any consideration to waive the answer of any thing objected. A story of that whole affair I am yet able to tell you; but I cannot think it necessary. Only this I may add, that after it I went to Mr. Marshall in my own and brethren's names to demand three things; 1. Whether any argument proposed by them remained unanswered, to which we might yield farther answer: 2. Whether they intended to make any report of the past disputation, offering, if they would, to join with them in it, and to perfect a conference by mutual consent, after the manner of that between Dr. Reynolds and Mr. Hart; both which being rejected, the 3d was, to promise each other, that nothing should be afterwards publish'd by either, without the consent or knowledge of the other party. And that last he promised for himself and his brethren, and so we parted.”

[I] During this confinement he began his Annotations on the New Testament.] This we are informed of by Dr. Fell (16), who likewise observes (17), that our Author having written in Latin two large volumes in 4to of the way of interpreting the New Testament; with reference to the customs of the Jews and of the first hereticks of the Christian Church, and of the Heathens, especially in the Grecian Games, and above all the importance of the Hellenistical Dialect, into which he had made the exactest search, (by which means in a manner he happened to take in all the difficulties of that sacred Book,) he began to consider that it might be useful to the English Reader, who was to be his immediate care, to write in our vulgar language, and set every observation in its natural order, according to the guidance of the text. And having some years before collated several Greek copies of the New Testament, he observed the variation of our English from the original, and made an entire translation of the whole for his private use; being thus prepared, he cast his work into that form in which it now appears. The reasons of it are set down by his own pen in the preface to his Annotations. This work was printed at London 1653 and 1659 in fol. A Review of it with some Additions and Alterations was printed in 1656 in 8vo. The reputation which our Author had gained by it in England, and the Fragments of his Annotations in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum, raised a great desire in many learned foreigners, that the whole might be translated into Latin. At last Monfr. le Clerc executed that task, and published his Translation at Amsterdam 1698 in two volumes in fol. under this title: Novum Testamentum Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ex editione Vulgatâ, cum Paraphrasi & Adnotationibus Henrici Hammondii. Ex Anglica Lingua in Latinam transfuit, suisque animadversionibus illustravit, castigavit, auxit J. Clericus. Monfr. le Clerc's Animadversions were afterwards printed by themselves in English at Lond. in 4°. He complains in his preface of the Doctor's rough style, useless synonyma's and unnecessary repetitions; on which account he thought fit to soften his harsh expressions, and retrench his superfluities, comparing his work to a thick and dark forest, where abundance of bushes and shrubs must be cut up to clear a passage. At the same time he declares, that he hath no where offered any violence to his author's meaning, but rather blames himself for not making use of a greater liberty. He intermixes a great many of his own animadversions, explaining those points, upon which Dr. Hammond had but slightly touched: and corrects many of his mistakes. And whereas some might object, that it was scarcely worth the pains to translate a Writer, who in so many things agrees with Grotius; he answers, that there are a variety of observations in Hammond, which neither Grotius nor any other Writer has mentioned; and that the Doctor has frequently enlarged what Grotius had said, and confirmed it by new arguments. He observes, that with respect to points in Divinity, Dr. Hammond follows the Remonstrants, especially as to the doctrine of Predestination and Grace; but for particular passages, mostly agrees with Grotius, tho' he recedes too much sometimes from his original. However Monfr. le Clerc allows him the second rank to Grotius, tho' he adds at the same time, that he falls very much short of him. He frequently criticizes upon the Doctor's sentiments, and examines his quotations by the originals; by which he hath discovered a great many typographical errors, especially in numbers, and not a few of the Doctor's mistakes in quoting upon the credit of others. He sometimes reprehends him for giving a particular sense to certain Greek words, contrary to the common use of those words in Greek Authors, wherein he thinks the Doctor was not very conversant, and that he learned his Greek rather in studying the Fathers to know their sentiments, than to obtain an exact skill in the language. Hence it is, says he, that the Doctor frequently mistakes in his grammatical discussions, in which he often engages; for his notes are generally rather critical than theological; and instead of consulting the meaning of those words, which cannot be well understood, except by a long and attentive reading of good Authors, he often consulted his own reason, and some ancient glossaries, which he did not understand well, and therefore sometimes corrupted them in attempting to correct them. Monfr. le Clerc remarks, that the Doctor was peculiarly fond of the hypothesis, that the writings of the Apostles every where allude to the doctrine of the Gnostics; to support which hypothesis he wrests many passages of Scripture.

[K] The Trial of his Majesty now drawing on, he wrote an Address to the General and Council of War, and transmitted it to them.] It was intitled, An humble Address to the Lord Fairfax and Council of War, 15th January 1648. London 1649 in 4to. It was answered afterwards by a person who stiled himself Eutatus Philodemius; whereupon he published, A Vindication of Dr. Hammond's Address &c. from the Exceptions of Eutatus Philodemius in two particulars &c. together with a brief Reply to Mr. John Goodwin's Obstructors of Justice, as far as it concerns Dr. Hammond. London 1649 in 4to. Mr. Goodwin in his book intitled, The Obstructors of Justice: or a Defence of the honourable sentence passed upon the late King by the High Court of Justice, London 1649 in 4to, answers, 1. The serious and faithful Representation and Vindication of some of the Ministers of London: 2. The humble Address of Dr. Hammond: 3. Mr. John Gere's Might overcoming Right.

[L] His Latin Treatise against Blondel in defence of Episcopacy.]

Clapham, he was set at liberty, and went to Sir John Packington's seat at Westwood in Worcester-shire, where he prosecuted his studies, and finished several of his writings, which have been printed [M]. When King Charles II came to Worcester, he waited upon his Majesty, whose defeat gave him the most exquisite sorrow (x), as did the Interdict of January 1655, which disabled the Loyal Clergy from performing any ministerial

(x) Idem, pag. 65.

[Episcopacy.] It is intitled, Dissertationes quatuor, quibus Episcopatus jura ex S. Scripturis & primæva antiquitate adstruuntur, contra sententiam D. Blondelli, &c. London 1651 in 4to. To which is prefixed Dissertatio de Antichristo, de Mysterio Iniquitatis, de Diotrephæ, & de Gnosticis sub Apostolorum ævo se prodentibus. Dr. Fell (18) informs us of the occasion of our Author's writing this Treatise against David Blondel, which was as follows. Archbishop Usher having received from Blondel a Letter of Exception against his Edition of Ignatius, he communicated it to Dr. Hammond, desiring his sense of several passages in it relating to the Valentinian Heresy, Episcopal and Cborepiscopal Power, and some emergent difficulties concerning them, from the Canons of several antient Eastern Councils. To all this the Doctor wrote a particular Answer, promising a fuller account, if it would be useful. Upon the receipt of which the Archbishop being highly satisfied, returned his thanks, and laid hold of the promise; which being accordingly discharged, became the provision, and gave the materials to a great part of the Dissertations. The Primate's Letter was in these words. "I have read with great delight and content your accurate answer to the objections made against the credit of Ignatius his Epistles, for which I do most heartily thank you, and am moved thereby farther to intreat you to publish to the world in Latin what you have already written in English against this objector, and that other *, who for your pains hath rudely requited you with the base appellation of Nebulo for the assertion of Episcopacy; to the end it may no longer be credited abroad, that these two have beaten down this calling, that the defence thereof is now deserted by all men, as by Lud. Capellus is intimated in his thesis of Church Government, at Sedan lately published, which I leave unto your serious consideration, and all your godly labours to the blessing of our good God, in whom I evermore rest.

(18) Pag. 60, 61.

* Salmastius.

Your very loving Friend and Brother,
Ja. Armachanus.
"Rygate in Surry,
"July 21, 1649.

The Archbishop was so concerned in this request, that he reinforced it by another letter of August 30, and congratulated the performance by a third of January 14; both which, says Dr. Fell (19), though very worthy to see the public light, are yet forborn, as several of the like kind from the reverend Fathers the Bishops of this and our sister-churches, as also from the most eminent for piety and learning of our own and the neighbouring nations; which course is taken not only in accordance to the desires and sentiments of the excellent Doctor, who hated every thing, that looked like ostentation; but likewise to avoid the very unpleasing choice, either to take the trouble of recounting all the Doctor's correspondencies, or bear the envy of omitting some."

(19) Pag. 63.

[M] Finished several of his writings, which have been printed.] I. A Letter of Resolution to fix Queries of present use in the Church of England, London 1653, in 8vo. The 1st. Of the way of resolving Controversies, which are not clearly stated and resolved in the Scriptures. The 2d Of marrying the Wife's Sister. The 3d Of Polygamy and Divorces. The 4th Of the Baptism of Infants. The 5th Of Imposition of Hands for Ordination. The 6th Of the Observation of Christ-mas-day, and other Festivals of the Church. II. Of Schism: or, a Defence of the Church of England against the Exceptions of the Romanists, London 1653, in 12mo. It was answered by Mr. Jo. Serjeant, in a book intitled, Schism Disarmed, &c. to which is an Appendix in answer to Dr. John Bramhall's Just Vindication of the Church of England, London, 1653, in small 8vo. III. Reply to a Catholic Gentleman's Answer to the most material parts of the Book of Schism, London, 1653, in 4to. IV. Account of H. T. his Appendix to his Manual of Controversies concerning the

Abbot of Bangor's Answer to Augustine, printed with the preceding Tract. V. Vindication of the Dissertations concerning Episcopacy, from the Exceptions of the London Ministers in their Jus Divinum Ministerii Evangelici, London, 1654, in 4to. VI. Of Fundamentals in a Notion referring to Practice, London, 1654, in 8vo. VII. Answer to the Animadversions on the Dissertations touching Ignatius's Epistles, and the Episcopacy in them asserted, London, 1654, in 4to. VIII. Account of Mr. Dan. Cawdrey's Triplex Diatriba, concerning Superstition, Will-Worship, and Christmas Festival. London 1655, in 4to. This Account was answered by Mr. Cawdrey, Minister of Billing Magna in Northamptonshire, in a book intitled, The Account audited and discounted, &c. London, 1658. IX. The Baptizing of Infants reviewed and defended against the Exceptions of Mr. Tombes in his three last Chapters of his Book intitled, Antipædobaptism. London 1655, in 4to. X. Defence of the learned Hugo Grotius, &c. London 1655, in 4to. XI. Second Defence of Hugo Grotius: or, a Vindication of the Digression concerning him. London 1656, in 4to. XII. The Disarmer's Dexterity examined; in a second Defence of the Treatise of Schism. London 1657, in 4°. Soon after this Mr. Serjeant published his Schism dispatch'd, &c. with an Appendix, London 1656, in a large 8vo, being a reply not only to Dr. Hammond, but also to Dr. John Bramhall. XIII. The Degrees of ardency in Christi's Prayer reconciled with his fulness of habitual Grace, in reply to [Mr. Henry Jeanes] the Author of a book intitled, A Mixture of Scholastical Divinity, &c. XIV. Parænesis, &c. A Discourse of Heresy in Defence of our Church against the Romanists. London 1656, in 8vo. XV. Continuation of the Defence of H. Grotius, in an answer to the Review of his Annotations. London 1657, in 4to. XVI. Reply to some Passages of the Reviewer, in his late Book of Schism concerning his Charge of Corruptions in the Primitive Church, and some other Particulars. Printed with the preceding Tract. XVII. The Grounds of Uniformity, from 1 Cor. xiv. 40. vindicated from Mr. Henry Jeanes's Exceptions in one Passage in the View of the Directory. London 1657, in 4to. XVIII. Paraphrase and Annotations on the Book of Psalms. London 1659, in Folio. These Annotations were remitted by Matthew Poole into the second Volume of his Synopsis Criticorum, London 1671, in Folio, with this Character, Doctissimus Hammondus, in quibus multa reperiet Lector acumine perquam plusquam vulgari, parique eruditione conscripta, nonnulla etiam singularia. Dr. James Duport likewise in the Preface to his Metaphrasus Psalmorum, highly commends this work of our Author. XIX. The Dispatcher dispatch'd: or, an Examination of the Romanist's Rejoynder to Dr. Hammond's Replies, wherein is inserted a View of their Profession and oral Tradition, in the way of Mr. White. London, 1659, in 4to. By this Mr. White is meant the famous Thomas de Albus. XX. Brief Account of a Suggestion against the Dispatcher dispatch'd. London 1660, in 4to. XXI. XAPIΣ KAI EIPHNH: Or, a Pacific Discourse of God's Grace and Decrees; in a Letter of full Accordance written to the Reverend and most Learned Dr. Robert Sanderson. By Henry Hammond, D. D. To which are annexed the Extracts of three Letters concerning God's Prescience reconciled with Liberty and Contingency. London, 1660, in 8vo. XXII. Two Prayers. London, 1660, in 8vo. XXIII. The daily Practice of Piety: also Devotions and Prayers in time of Captivity. London, 1660, in 8vo. XXIV. Spiritual Sacrifice: or, Devotions and Prayers fitted to the main uses, &c. XXV. His Last Words, printed in a loose sheet. XXVI. Solemn Petition and Advice to the Convocation, with his Directions to the Laity how to prolong their happiness. Cambridge, 1661, in 8vo. Published by Mr. Thomas Smith of Christ College in Cambridge, Author of The Rise and Growth of Quakerism. XXVII. De Confirmatione, sive Benedictione, post baptismum, solenni per impositionem manuum Episcopi celebrata, Commentarius ex sententiâ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ. XXVIII. Se-

(y) Idem, pag. 73. sterial act (y). He had undertaken a Commentary on the Old Testament, and had begun on the Book of Proverbs, and finished a third part of it (z); when the execution of his other excellent designs was prevented by his ill state of health, which at last put an end to his days. At the opening of the year 1660, when every thing visibly tended to the Restoration of the Royal Family, the Doctor was desired by the Bishops to repair to London, to assist there in the compofure of the breaches of the Church (aa), his station in which was designed to be the Bishopric of Worcester (bb); but on the 4th of April he was seized by a fit of the stone (cc), of which he died on the 25th of that month (dd), (ff) Wood, Atb Oxon. col. 249. in the fifty fifth year of his age (ee); and the next day was interred in the Chancel of Hampton-Church near Westwood (ff), where a monument is erected to his memory. (gg) Ibid. col. 246. Dr. Fell has drawn his character to great advantage [N]; and Mr. Wood tells us (gg), that "great were his natural abilities, greater his acquired; and in the whole circle of arts he was most accurate. He was also eloquent in the tongues, exact in antient and modern writers, was well versed in Philosophy, and better in Philology, most learned in School-Divinity, and a great master in Church-Antiquity." His stature was of just height and all proportionate dimensions; his face carried dignity and attractiveness in it, scarce ever clouded with a frown, or so much as darkened by reservedness. His complexion was clear and florid, so that, especially in his youth, he had the esteem of a very beautiful person, which was lessened only by the colour of his hair. His eye was brisk and sprightly; and his constitution firm and patient of severest toil and hardship. His sight was quick to an unusual degree, that if by chance he saw a company of men, a flock of sheep, or herd of cattle, being engaged in discourse, and not at all thinking of it, he would involuntarily cast up their number, which others after long delays could hardly reckon. His ear was accurate, so that having never learned to sing by book or study, he would exactly perform his part of many things to a Harpsicon or Theorbo; and frequently did so in his more vigorous years, after the toil and labour of the day, and before the remaining studies of the night. His elocution was free and graceful, prepared at once to charm and to command his audience; and when with preaching at his country charge he had in some degree lost the due management of his voice, King Charles I, by taking notice of the change, became his master of Music, and reduced him to his antient decent modulation (hh). He had a great esteem for the writings of Grotius [O], (bb) Fell, pag. 85-89. of XXVIII. Several Sermons, London, 1664, in Folio. They are in number thirty one, and some of them never before published. XXIX. Of Hell Torments, Oxford, 1664, in 12mo. Or, An Assertion of the Existence and Duration of Hell Torments, &c. Oxford, 1665, in 8vo. XXX. An Accordance of St. Paul with St. James in the great point of Faith and Works. Oxford, 1665, in 8vo. XXXI. Answer to Mr. Richard Smith's Letter concerning the Sense of that Article in the Creed, He descended into Hell; dated the 28th of April 1659. London, 1684, in 8vo. Mr. Smith's Letter was dated from Little Moor-fields near London, in the said Month 1659. XXXII. Paraphrase and Annotations upon the ten first Chapters of the Proverbs. London, 1683, in Folio. Besides these he published The Christian's Obligation to Peace and Charity, delivered in an Advent Sermon at Carisbrook-Castle, Ann. 1647, and now published with nine Sermons more. London, 1652, in 4to. The Second Edition. His works were published by Mr. William Fulman of Corpus Christi College in Oxford, in four Volumes in Folio, at London 1684, and to the latter end of the fourth Volume was annexed an Appendix to the second Volume.

[N] Dr. Fell has drawn his character to great advantage.] He tells us (20), that his invention was an unexhausted treasure, whose flowings were with that full torrent, that for several years, after his choice of subjects, which generally he had in prospect beforehand, a little meditation on the Saturday night made up his Sermon; but in the last twelve of his life, finding the recollection of his thoughts disturb his sleep, he remitted the particular care of the composition and method of his future discourse to the Sunday morning, wherein an hour's consideration fitted him to the office of that day. With the like swiftness he dispatched his writings, usually composing faster than his Amanuensis, though a very dextrous person, could transcribe after him. His Considerations of present Necessity concerning Episcopacy, were drawn up after ten a clock at night in a friend's chamber, who professed, that sitting by all the while, he remembered not that he took off his pen from the paper till he had done; and the very next morning, it being fully approved by Dr. Duppa, Bishop of Salisbury, he sent it to the press; to which work he could have no premeditation or second thoughts, he being that very night after supper employed by the Bishop on that task. So likewise he began his tract of Scandal at eleven at night, and finished it before he went to bed. Nor was this a peculiar or extraordinary thing with him, but most customary; five sheets having amidst his other diversions been several times his one day's work, adding to it so much of the night as he frequently borrowed from sleep and supper. His memory was serviceable, but not officious, faithful to things and business, but unwillingly retaining the contexture and punctualities of words; which defect he frequently lamented, it being harder with him to get one Sermon by heart, than to pen twenty. His way of speech and faculty of communicating notions was sufficiently happy, having only this best kind of defect, exuberance and surplussage of plenty, the tide and torrent of his matter being not easily confined by periods; whereby his stile, though round and comprehensive, was incumbered sometimes by parentheses, and became difficult to vulgar understandings. But by the use of writing, and his desire to accommodate himself to all capacities, he, in his latter years, had mastered that defect, which was so slight, that, notwithstanding it, King Charles I gave him the character of the most natural Orator he ever heard. His judgment was the most eminent among his natural endowments; it was clear and discerning, and that not only in scholastical affairs, and points of learning, but in the concerns and nature both of church and state; wherein his guess was usually as near to prophecy as any man's. His learning was universal. But the Scholar was less eminent in him than the Christian. He was chaste, temperate, devout, firm in his friendships, humane, dispassionate; an enemy to flattery, declaring always, that he delighted to be loved, not revered; charitable and patient under all afflictions, so that when he laboured under the Gout, he would give thanks that it was not the Stone or Cramp; when it was the Stone, that it was not so sharp as others felt.

[O] He had a great esteem for the writings of Grotius.] He appears to have been very solicitous for the defence of that great man from the charge of Socinianism, and to have employed his friends to collect every thing necessary for that purpose. The very learned Dr. Walter Jones, Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty, of which he made a great use in his own.

jefty, has communicated to us two original Letters, the former from Mr. Samf. Johnson to Dr. Hammond, and the other from Grotius to Mr. Johnson, which is imperfect, several words and lines being unfortunately defaced, fo as not to be legible.

“ Worthy Friend,

“ I fend you by Mr. Thruscrofs a fragment of a Letter from Grotius to me, long after that Crellius had putt forth his book againft his De Satisfactione, and when Ruarus was with him at Paris, upon whom he did gaine by conference, and brought him to an expreffion of his opinion about a kind of fatisfaction, which he does now acknowledge, and which I could have fend you, if the Mice had not been malicious, when I brought over my books, for they confumed about twenty of his to me. If I find any thing els to ferve you, you fhall have it from, Sir,

“ Your true Friend and Servant,
“ Westm. 4 “ both for your worth and “ Junii 1655. “ old acquaintance,
“ Samf. Johnson.

“ For the Socinian opinion, I know he was free ; and it was the malice of Rivett to bring him in question, as he did many others, out of pride and fupercilium unfitting fuch a Professor.”

Grotius's Letter is as follows.

“ Reverende Domine,

“ Si quid unquam pietati tuæ boni per me contigit, id certe non tibi quam mihi est : cum voluptate recordor tempus illud, cum mihi fermonibus tuis doctiffimis fan * * * * quales ego, in magna quamvis hic falutatorum copia, non parvo mihi emptos velim mihi esse, cum non datur, quod proximum est isti felicitati, per literas commercium. Quos mihi commendare, aut quovis modo notos facere volueris, ostendam, * * * pietatis amor apud me maneat, quantique faciam fummas tuas virtutes * * *. Accipit Gallia damni nonnihil ad S. Audomari urbem & ad * * * capta Rentiacum & Casteletum, tantum est de virili stirpe regi nata dolores facile extrudit.

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) Pliny, and Pomponius Mela quoted in the remark [A].

HANNO General of the Carthaginians was commanded to fail round Africa (a). He entered into the ocean by the Strait which we call of Gibraltar, and discovered several countries (b). He would have continued his navigation, had it not been for want of provisions. Some assert that he finished it [A] ; I mean that he failed to the very extremity of Arabia. He wrote an account of his voyage, which was often quoted ; but it was not much credited [B]. There is something of it extant [C]. The learned are not agreed

[A] He would have continued his navigation had it not been for want of provisions. Some assert that he finished it. Two passages, one from Pomponius Mela, and the other from Pliny, will serve us here for a Commentary. Hanno Carthaginienfis exploratum missus a suis, cum per Oceani ostium exisset, magnam partem ejus circumvectus, non se mare sed comæatum defecisse memorata retulerat (1). i. e. Hanno the

(1) Pomponius Mela, lib. 3. cap. 9. pag. 63. editio Isaaci Vossii.

(2) Plinius, lib. 2. cap. 67. pag. 220, 221.

(3) Salmafius, Exercit. Plin. pag. 1242, 1244.

(4) Isaac Vossius in Melam, lib. 3. cap. 20. pag. 305.

“ Carthaginian being sent by his countrymen to observe the coast of Africa, passed through the strait of Gibraltar, and did not finish his navigation, not because the sea, but because his provisions failed him, as he relates himself.” Let us see Pliny's words (2). Et Hanno, Carthaginiæ potentia florebat, circumvectus à Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, navigationem eam prodidit scripto. i. e. “When the affairs of Carthage were in a flourishing condition, Hanno failed from Cadix to the extremity of Arabia, and left an account of his navigation in writing.” Salmafius (3) supposes, that Pliny was mistaken, and that Hanno did not carry on his observations as far as the Red-sea, but only to the islands called Gorgades. Isaac Vossius is pretty near of the same opinion ; he imagines that the island, which is now called St. Ann's, was the end of this Carthaginian General's navigation (4).

[B] He wrote an account . . . which was not much credited. Pliny, who otherwise treats his authors

“ Vestri illi vicini spiritu aguntur tui gregis ; at nisi * * * illegitimum fœdus, magno metuo vulnus, non jam Episcopali, sed reg * * * quantum me pro summo erga gentem vestram studio hæc res sollicitum * * * vim habet ad furiandos homines rerum imperitos illud Knoxii, Bucha * * * præsertim cum in oculis sint felicitum defectionum exempla. D. Seldeni * * * ex Hebræorum scriptis deprompta : quare in animo illi esse noris, nos * * * gaudeo. De Synedrio pauca pro materiæ ubertate dedit nobis Cochii * * * Seldenus pro ista sua multijugi Lectione plurima scitu utilia * * * addere. Nec minus placet altera recondita eruditi * * * quale Hebræi colere. * * * Poteris autem, vir optime, omnibus, qui nos norunt, affirmare, me de iis quæ contra Socini admiratores defendi, non modo nihil discedere, & sed & illorum aliquos mea opera adductos ad meliorem sententiam : quo magis gratias tibi habeo pro edito nostro libello de Satisfactione Christi, in quo argumento illos a proprietate verborum tam multorum in sacris literis, & a manifestissimo antiquitatis consensu positionibus quibusdam inanibus abstractos non dubito. Patricium Junium amavi semper, amo nunc etiam quod post Catenam in Jobum & Theophylacti quædam, etiam Euthymium, boni judicii in sera ætate scriptorem, publici juris facit. Decartesii & Galilæi, eminentium Philosophorum opera, tibi visa gaudeo. Nescio an Mechanica Galilæi & de Motu * * * videris. Francisci Junii Librum de Picturâ Veterum non minus delectavit, quam ipsa picturæ talium studiosos solent. In Salmafii libro de Ufuris sunt multa minime protrita. Nunc ne quis eum putet nimium laxare habenas avaritiæ, addit alterum de modo usurarum. Inter ipsum & D. Heinsium tentatæ conciliaturæ successum non habuerunt. Itaque brevi ayûva aliquem habebimus. Bene compositum par. Ego ubi Heinsiana, & ut credo, Salmafiana ad Novum Testamentum videro, quid mihi de meis faciendum sit, constituam. Testardus & Amirautius nihil aliud quam mala dogmata pulchris verbis incrustant, & quicquid dare videntur manu, coacti scilicet scripturarum luce, id eripiunt altera. Maxima me voluptate perfundit Literarum tuarum pars postrema, quæ brevi te Hagam iturum et * * *.” T.

with great indulgence, as all the world knows, yet could not forbear observing, that this writer related a great many fabulous stories. Fuere, says he (5), (5) Plinius, lib. Hannonis Carthaginienfis ducis commentarii, Punicis 5. cap. 1. pag. m. rebus florentiffimis explorare ambitum Africa jussi : quem secuti plerique à Græcis nostrisque, & alia quædam fabulosa, & urbes multas ab eo conditas ibi prodidere, quarum nec memoria ulla nec vestigium existat. i. e. 523, 524.

“ There was also an account written by Hanno a General of the Carthaginians, who was sent by them to observe the coast of Africa, at a time when their affairs were in the most flourishing condition. Several, both Greek and Latin authors, who followed his account, have related some fabulous stories, and asserted that he built a great many cities, of which there is not the least memory nor figure left.” See also Athenæus (6).

[C] . . . There is something of it extant.] Sigismund Gelenius published it in Greek at Basil by Frobenius in the year 1533. There was a second Edition of it printed in the year 1559, with a Latin Translation, and some Notes of Conrad Gesner. And yet Salmafius observes, that it seems the Greeks were never acquainted with this work. Scriptum illud non videtur innotuisse. Etenim si venisset in notitiam ac manus Græcorum, totam eam meridiani Oceani oram minime reliquissent intactam (7). i. e. “It seems, that this Book was not known ; for if it had come to the agreed about the time when he lived [D], and there is not the least proof that the Carthaginians caused him to be put to death. He hung up in the temple of Juno the skins of "knowledge, and into the hands of the Greeks, they would not have left all that Southern Coast of the Ocean, without taking notice of it." He was not therefore acquainted with Pliny's words, which I have transcribed in the foregoing Remark, nor with a passage in the Book intituled, Wonders of the East, of wonderful bearfays, in which Hanno is quoted. This General's work is also mentioned in the Epitome of Artemidorus of Ephesus. These are instances which shew, that there are some things very easy to know and which yet escape the knowledge of men of the deepest learning, and most extensive memory. Isaac Vossius did not forgive Salmalius this mistake (8); nor did Father Hardouin pass it unobserved (9). Take notice, that what Gesner had published at Basil in the year 1559, was again published at London in the year 1674, I mean Hanno's Periplus (or Circumnavigation) with Gesner's Latin Translation and Notes, and with John de Leon's Africa. But Berkelius added to all this some Observations extracted from the second part of Bochart's Geographia Sacra. That same little work (19) of Hanno has been printed at Oxford in the year 1698, by Dr. Hudson's care, with several other pieces of the same kind in the first Volume of the Geographia veteris Scriptores Graeci minores, i. e. "The lesser Greek Authors upon ancient Geography." The dissertations, which Mr. Dodwell prefixed to this Volume, and which give us a full account of these ancient Greek Authors, abound with learning. That which relates to Hanno is not the least important of them all. Mr. Dodwell does not think that this Carthaginian General wrote the Periplus, which we have under his Name. He ascribes it to some Greek Author of Sicily, who was a strenuous assertor of the Glory of Carthage. He imagines also, that the Periplus, which is now extant under the name of Hanno, differs very much from that which the ancients had. See the Margin (11).

(6) Athen. lib. 3. pag. 83. on whose words see Vossius, de Hist. Græciæ, pag. 514.

(7) Salmaf. Exercit. Plin. pag. 1242.

[D] The learned are not agreed about the time when he lived. It was according to Pliny, when the affairs of the Carthaginians were in the most flourishing condition. This is a very indeterminate expression; and yet Vossius (12) finds in it sufficient ground to assert, that our Hanno is neither the person of whom Justin speaks in the xxth Book, nor he mentioned by Pliny in the sixteenth Chapter of his eighth Book, nor yet he who was the head of a party at Carthage during the second Punic-war (13); but he, who was sent against Agathocles, as Justin tells us in his xxiiid Book. The Hanno mentioned in Justin's xxth Book was sent into Sicily against the Tyrant Dionysius: The Gauls had then already taken the City of Rome (14), and they took it in the year 366 after its building. This Hanno was killed some time after with his whole Family, because he attempted to make himself master of Carthage. I do not know whether that City was not then in as flourishing a condition, as when another Hanno was sent against Agathocles (16): He lost his Life in a battle in the year 443 after the building of Rome. I cannot think therefore that there is any certainty in Vossius's Opinion. Observe that the passage which he quotes from Pliny relates to an Hanno, who was condemned because he had had the art to tame a lion. It was thought that the Liberty of the Country would not be secure in the hands of a man, who had found means to subdue the cruel temper of the most savage animals. Primus hominum leonem manu tractare ausus, & ostendit mansuetum, Hanno e clarissimis Pœnorum traditur; damnatusque illo argumento, quoniam nihil non persuasurus homo tam artificis ingenii videbatur; & male creditur libertas ei, cui in tantum cessisset etiam feritas (17). i. e. "It is reported that Hanno, one of the most famous men at Carthage, is the first who ventured to handle a Lyon, and to tame it: for which reason he was condemned; because it was imagined that a man of so artful a genius was capable to persuade any thing, and that it was not safe to trust him with the liberty of the People, to whom even the most savage and cruel animals had submitted." Vossius observes, that Plutarch mentions the same Hanno. And he asserts indeed, that the Carthaginians banished him, because they had seen that he had taught a Lyon to carry his baggage, which made them suspect that he aimed at kingly power (18). Neither Pliny nor Plutarch say any thing that can make us guess at what time this happened, and it is not an easy matter to know for what reason Vossius imagined they speak of an Hanno different from ours. Father Hardouin is of another opinion; for he thinks that the Traveller is the same with him, who was condemned for taming a Lyon; but he cannot alledge the least proof for it: one may easily conjecture that he is mistaken; for it is somewhat probable, that if the same Hanno who sailed round the Coast of Africa, was the person who tamed a Lyon, Pliny would have mentioned this particular. It is best not to determine any thing; let us not deny what Vossius denies; but let us not affirm what Father Hardouin affirms. Observe that he supposes that Pliny asserts, that Hanno was put to death (19); but it is better to give a more general sense to the word damnatus (condemned), since Plutarch asserts that Hanno was banished. One may make the following objection against Vossius. Aristotle in his Book de admirandis auditionibus (of wonderful hearings) quotes Hanno, whence it follows that this Carthaginian General lived before Agathocles. But Vossius answers (20), that Aristotle is not the Author of that Book. Solinus's Authority is of no weight, who asserts that Xenophon of Lampfacus has quoted Hanno; for besides that we do not know where this Xenophon lived, there are reasons to think that Solinus imposes upon us. Here follow his words (31). Hæc (Gorgades insulas) incoluerunt Gorgones monstræ, & semè usque nunc monstræ gens habitat. Distant à continente biduo navigatione. Prodidit denique Xenophon Lampfacenus Hanonem Pœnorum regem in eas permeavisse, & perieratque ibi faminas aliti pernicitate, atque ex omnibus quæ apparuerant, duas captas tam virto atque aspero corpore, ut ad argumentum spectanda rei dæarum cutes miraculi gratia inter donaria Junonis suspenderit; quæ duravere usque in tempora excidii Carthaginensis. i. e. "Some Monsters called Gorgons inhabited those Islands; and indeed a monstrous Nation does still live there. These Islands are two days sailing distant from the Continent. Lastly, Xenophon of Lampfacus relates that Hanno, the King of the Carthaginians came to these Islands, where he met with some women as swift as Eagles; and having taken two of them that appeared before him, whose body was so rough and hairy, that it was worthy to be seen, he caused their skins to be pulled off, which he hung up in the Temple of Juno amongst the other Gifts as wonderful sights; where they were to be seen till the Destruction of Carthage". It is plain that this passage is only an imitation of the following words. Contra hoc quoque promontorium Gorgades insule narrantur, Gorgonum quondam domus, biduo navigatione distantis à continente, ut tradit Xenophon Lampfacenus. Penetravit in eas Hanno Pœnorum Imperator, prodiditque birta feminarum corpora, viros pernicitate evasisse; duarumque Gorgonum cutes argumenti & miraculi gratia in Junonis templo posuit, spectatas usque ad Carthaginem captam (22). i. e. "It is reported, that over-against that Promontory are situated the Islands called Gorgades, formerly inhabited by the Gorgons, two days sailing distant from the continent, as Xenophon of Lampfacus relates. Hanno the General of the Carthaginians penetrated to these Islands, and reports that the women, whose body is very hairy, excell the men in swiftness: he hung up the skins of two Gorgons as a wonderful sight in the Temple of Juno, where they were to be seen, till the taking of Carthage." The Copy differs from the original in this, namely, that Pliny does not assert, as Solinus does, that Xenophon related that Hanno came as far as the Island called Gorgades, &c. Salmalius supposes that Solinus asserted this, in order to prove that Xenophon of Lampfacus lived after Hanno. Hoc obtinere vult Solinus, ut finis illi respondeat principii, & toto in cursu sibi consistet, Hanno vetustior Xenophonte Lampfaceno. Quomodo igitur hic de illo prodere potuit (22)? i. e. "Solinus aims at this, eritat Pliniana, that the end may answer the beginning, and his ac- count

(8) Isaac Vossius, in Museum, pag. 302.
(9) Hardouin, in Indice Autor. Plin. ni, pag. 113.
(10) It may very well be said thus, for it does not contain six half pages in the Oxford edition in 8vo, 1698.
(11) Observe, that it is not said in the preface to the Oxford edition, that Booclerus published Hanno with notes in the year 1661.
(12) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 513.
(13) Neque istum factionis Barchinæ, de quo Livius libro de bello Punico secundo. Idem, ibid. i. e. "Nor him of Hannibal's faction, whom Livy mentions in the book of the Punic war." There is great obscurity in these words; after Barchinæ he should have added inimicum (enemy to Hannibal's faction) and after Libro, he should have put 21. dum de (where he treats of) or summi like this.
(14) Justin, lib. 20. cap. ult.
(15) Idem, lib. 21. cap. 4.
(16) Idem, lib. 22. cap. 6.
(17) Plinius, lib. 8. cap. 16. pag. 161.
(18) Plut. in Præcept. de gerend. Republ. towards the beginning, pag. 799.
(19) De eo multa passim Plinius; de ejus præsertim obitu lib. 1. scilicet. Pliny mentions several things of him in a great many places, and speaks particularly of his death, in the 8th book, section the 21st. Hardouin, in Indice Autorum Plin. ni, pag. 113.
(20) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 514.
(21) Solinus, cap. ultimo.
(22) Plin. lib. 6. cap. 51. pag. 746.
(23) Salmalius. Ex illo prodere potuit (22)? i. e. "Solinus aims at this, eritat Pliniana, that the end may answer the beginning, and his ac- count of some savage women, who had been flayed by his command. See the last remark (c).

(c) Quotation (22).

"count be coherent through the whole. Hanno is more antient than Xenophon of Lampfacus; but then how could the latter mention the former? I confess that this is to me an inexplicable riddle: For I cannot imagine that it was in the least Solinus's interest to shew that Hanno lived before Xenophon, much less can I understand, that if Xenophon flourished after this Carthaginian, it was impossible for the former to quote the latter, as Salmasius supposes it in his Interrogation. I think it is very likely that Solinus through his wonted inaccuracy, reduced Pliny's two Quotations to one; but I would not assert that Xenophon of Lampfacus did not relate all that he ascribes to him. But if he had, you will say, Pliny would not have quoted two writers; he would have confined himself to Xenophon's Authority. I answer, you are mistaken; for with regard to those things, which one knows that Hanno related himself, it is proper to quote him, rather than those, who declare that he related them.

(24) Isaac Vossius, in Melam., pag. 302, 303.

(25) Strabo mentions it in his 1st book.

(26) De Magnitudine Carthagini, pag. 52.

Isaac Vossius has been very far from his father's opinion; for instead of asserting that our Hanno lived in the time of Agathocles (24), he makes him more ancient than Homer and Hesiod. He is not content with placing him at the head of the expedition which the Phœnicians made soon after the destruction of Troy (25): he found afterwards that this was not making him ancient enough. He supposed therefore in another work (26), that Hanno and Perseus were contemporaries. Mr. Dodwell has very learnedly and solidly refuted that opinion, and all the arguments by which Vossius endeavoured to prove it. He lays a great stress on a passage in Pliny's second Book, in which it is observed, that Himilco and Hanno undertook long voyages. Et Hanno. Carthagini potentia florente, circumvectus a Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, navigationem eam prodidit scripto; sicut ad extera Europæ noscenda missus eodem tempore Himilco (27). i. e. "When Carthage was in a flourishing condition, Hanno sailed from Cadiz to the extremity of Arabia, and has left an account of his voyage; as Himilco did, who at the same time was sent to view the extremity of Europe." We find that during the war between Agathocles and the Carthaginians, the latter had two Generals, the one called Hanno, and the other Himilco (28). It may besides be supposed with great probability, that this flourishing condition of the Carthaginians, mentioned by Pliny, preceded the first war in which they were engaged against the Romans; for it is not at all probable, that during that war they would have thought of discovering new countries; and it is well known that they did not end this war but by a great loss on their side. So that these two chronological characters, mentioned by Pliny, lead us to suppose that he speaks of an Hanno, who flourished in the time of Agathocles. You will find in Mr. Dodwell (29) a great many curious observations, which perhaps will persuade you that our Hanno must be placed between the 92d and the 129th Olympiads.

(27) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 67.

(28) See Diod. Sicul. ad Olymp. 118.

(29) Dodwell. Dissertat. de Periplusi Hamonis ætate, in limine Geographiæ veteris Scriptorum Græcorum minorum, tom. 1. edit. Oxon. 1693.

(a) And not Jodocus, as König calls him.

(b) Val. Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic., pag. 593.

HARCHIUS (JODOCUS) (a) a native of Mons in the Province of Hainault lived in the sixteenth Century. He practised Physic in his native city, and published some works that suited his profession (b) [A]. He went afterwards beyond his reach, pretending to meddle with Divinity, in which he had very ill success. He endeavoured to find out a medium in the doctrine of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, but he made himself ridiculous to both. The book he published upon that subject was refuted by Beza, who asserts, that it is a work so confused, so dark, so destitute of all order and method, that it is a very difficult task to guess what the author meant [B]. We shall

(1) Val. And. Biblioth. Belgic., pag. 593.

[A] He published some works that suited his profession. He published at Liege in the year 1563 a Book in 8vo, de Causis contemptæ Medicinæ; i. e. "The Reasons why Physick is despised." His Enchiridion Pharmacorum simplicium quæ in usu sunt; i. e. "A Manual of the simple Medicines that are in use" is written in verse, and was printed at Basil in the year 1573 in 8vo (1). This Author might therefore have been placed in the Catalogue of the Physicians who were also Poets. He is not the only Author wanting in that list.

(2) He is erroneously called Montensis in the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca, pag. m. 515.

(3) Hofpin. Hist. Sacrament. Parte altera.

[B] Beza asserts that Harchius's work is so confused . . . that it is a very difficult task to guess what the Author meant.] What he wrote against this Author is intitled de Cæna Domini adversus Jodoci Harchii Montensis (2) dogmata; i. e. "Of the Lord's Supper against the opinions of Jodocus Harchius of Mons;" and is inserted in the IIIrd volume of his Tractions Theologicæ (Theological Tracts) from page 148 to page 186 of the Geneva Edition 1582 in folio. Hospinianus (3) asserts that this work of Beza was printed in the year 1580, and that Jodocus Harchius's Book had been printed at Basil in the year 1573 with this title: De Eucharistiæ Mysterio ad sedandas controversias in Cæna Domini libri tres; i. e. "Three Books of the Mytery of the Eucharist, designed to suppress the disputes concerning the Lord's Supper." Beza declares that this Book of Jodocus Harchius had been printed seven years, when he began to read it. He adds that he did not know whether the place where it was printed was well set down; but that he judged it was not necessary to refute it, because no man would approve such strange opinions; but that finding however the contrary of what he expected, he followed the advice of his friends, who would have him write against that Author. Licet urgentibus nonnullis, ut falsissimo sane ipsius dogmati, utpote quo novæ potius controversiæ excitarentur, quam veteres tollerentur, re- futationem opponerem, silentio potius ejusmodi scripta esse obruenda respondi. Nullam enim fore arbitrabar, qui tam absurdis sententiis assentiretur: quæ spes cum me sefellerit, cogor amicorum precibus, quam hæc vana sint demonstrare, id est, penè cum ratione insanire. Adscribam autem primo loco ipsius Jodoci verba ex variis ejus libri paginis optima fide descripta, ut quæ sparsim & prorsus perturbate scripsit, adeo denique a seipso obscuræ, ut de industria texisse potius, quam aperit suum dogma spectandum proposuisse videatur, melius appareant: Et ne quam etiam, homini præsertim, ut audio, jam mortuo, injuriam in ipsius erratis annotandis, & refutandis, fecisse me quisquam suspicetur (4). i. e. "Those some persons pressed me to refute his false doctrine, which served rather to raise new controversies, than to suppress the old disputes, yet I thought that such writings ought to be buried in oblivion: for I did not imagine that any person could admit such absurd opinions: but being disappointed in this my expectation, I am forced, at my friends requests, to demonstrate how false and vain these things are, which is almost to be mad in sober sadness. I shall in the first place transcribe Jodocus's own words put together from several pages with the utmost faithfulness; that the Reader may the better understand, what is dispersed through his work, and wrote with the utmost confusion, so immethodically, and so obscurely, that one would think, he chose rather to conceal his opinion on purpose, than to declare it openly. This I shall also do, that I may not be suspected to have done the man any injury by ob- serving and refuting his errors, especially since, as I hear, he is now dead." Observe by the by that Harchius was dead when Beza refuted him. The extracts which Beza gives of his work render it more intelligible, than it would be by reading the work itself. Here follows what Beza observes after he has given those extracts. Et hæc quidem Harchius non minus ob- shall give a general notion of his opinion below [C].

(4) Theod. Beza, Oper. tom. 3. pag. 148.

scure quam perturbatè, ut qui ab una questione ad alteram desiliat, & plurimis ambiguis vocibus ac formulis utatur, adeo ut mihi sepius hæc omnia relegenda, considerata, perscrutanda fuerint, priusquam quid homo isto sibi vellet, intelligere, & in suos locos distinctè singula referre potuerim (5). That is to say, "This is what Harchius writes with no less obscurity than confusion: for he passes abruptly from one question to another, and makes use of a great many equivocal words and expressions; so that I was obliged to read the same things over and over, to meditate upon them, to examine them with the utmost care, before I could guess what this man meant; and to make sense of his words I was forced to place every thing in its proper place."

(5) Ibid.

(6) In pag. 515 of the Zurich edition, 1583.

Two other theological Books of Harchius are mentioned in the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliothèque (6). De Causis Hæresis, proque ejus exilio & concordia Contraversarum in Religione, Hæreticorum, Pontificiorum, & pœnitentium Oratio ad Deum Patrem. i. e. "Of the Causes of Heresy, and a Prayer of the Hereticks, Roman Catholics and Penitents to God the Father for its extirpation, and for an union and concord in religious controversies." at Basil, 1573, in 4to. Orthodoxorum Patrum Irenæi, Cyrilli, Hilarii, Augustini & reliquorum, de Eucharistia & Sacrificio universalis Ecclesie fides. i. e. "That the faith of the orthodox Fathers, Irenæus, Cyrillus, Hilarius, Augustin, and the rest, concerning the Eucharist, and Sacrifice is the faith of the Catholick Church," in 8vo. This last book was printed in the year 1577, according to Hospinian (7).

(7) Hospin. Hist. Sacrament. Parte altera.

[C] We shall give a general notion of his opinion below. I take it from a Letter which Andrew Rivet wrote to la Milletiere July the 29th 1642. "Your distinction of Matter and Mystery, of substantia and verbum, sensible and intelligible overthrows all that you pretend to establish, without shewing how one can eat with the mouth of the body a mystery which is destitute of matter, and how the matter of a body existing no more, the substance of it continues, yet to be; which I do not find to be explained in your treatise of rich conceptions. It is above thirty years since I read something like this in the work of [a certain Physician of the country of Juliers, named Tarchius (8), with whose heifer you seem to have ploughed. He pretended, that the Body, which the Church gives in the bread is the Body of the eternal Word, which coming in an admirable manner into the bread, turns it into the substance of that flesh, which had been raised up into heaven; that it was a flesh of the same nature with that, with which the substance of our flesh is nourished. He called it, as you do, a spiritual and intelligible flesh. He asserted that the flesh, which was daily created out of the bread and wine, and taken from the altar by the faithful, was as to its nature like Christ's flesh, vivifying in heaven, because of the Deity's mixing itself with the bread in a manner that cannot be expressed. He would have the Calvinists acknowledge on St. Augustin's authority, that the Sacraments have really the true flesh of Christ, which though it be spiritual, is yet after its own particular manner taken in the mouth with the bread, and some way digested in the heart. That is mysteriously called Christ's flesh, though it be neither nervous, nor muscous, nor animated. Upon the same foundation he pretended to establish, like you, a real and propitiatory sacrifice of the Body and Blood of Christ, and the adoration of the Sacrament. And though he imagined that by this method he could reconcile the contending parties, yet he was not approved either by the Papiist, or by the Lutheran, or by those of our Religion, none being disposed to take his idle fancies for sound doctrine; and his speculations vanished away, as yours will do (9)." La Milletiere answering that he did not know that Author, Rivet made him the following reply. "That Harchius I mentioned to him, and in whose work I found such foolish fancies as his are, should not have been more unknown to him than the Dialejicon (10), recommended by Grotius, and placed in the same rank with the Sieur de la Milletiere's Books. They are two pieces printed together in the year 1576, without the Printer's name, or that of the place where it was published; tho' in the title-page of the first edition of Harchius's book it be said, that it was printed at Worms (11)."

(8) This is an error of the press, instead of Harchius. I do not know why he is here made to be of the country of Juliers, for he was of Mons in Hainault. He did perhaps practise Physic in the country of Juliers; or Rivet imagined perhaps that Montensis signified the Duchy of Berg, which he mistook for that of Juliers, because of their proximity, and being under the same Prince.

(9) Rivet, Reponses à trois Lettres du Sieur de la Milletiere, pag. 62, &c.

(10) Concerning that book see below the article POINET.

(11) Rivet, Reponses à trois Lettres de la Milletiere, pag. 143, 144.

HARDENBERG (ALBERT) a Protestant Minister at Bremen in the sixteenth Century, was of the Augsburg Confession for eighteen years, after which he declared for Calvinism, and with such success, that he introduced it in the city, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of his colleagues and of the Magistrates. He had insinuated himself so deeply into the favour of the inhabitants [A], that he made them declare for him against Lutheranism; so that the Magistrates, who refused to forsake the Confession of Augsburg, were deprived and banished. They all died in their banishment (a). The author who acquaints me with these particulars, refers his readers to a work which Dithmar Renschelius, Burgomaster of Breme, composed since his banishment, and which is intitled, Brevis, dilucida, ac vera Narratio, de initiis & progressu Controversiæ, Bremæ à Doctore Alberto Hardenbergio motæ, opposita recenti Scripto ejusdem Hardenbergij de Ubiquitate & Cæna Domini. i. e. "A short, clear and true account of the beginning and progress of the Controversy, started at Bremen by Dr. Albert Hardenberg, being an answer to the late work of the said Hardenberg upon Ubiquity, and the Lord's Supper." Hardenberg did not enjoy his triumph long; for the Lutheran party becoming uppermost again, drove him out of the city as a seditious Sacramentarian (b). He wrote a Life of Weffelus, which has been printed.

(a) Taken from George Braun, in Catholicorum Tremmenensium Defensio, pag. 46, 49.

(b) Ex eodem, ibid., pag. 164.

HARDQUIN

[A] He had insinuated himself so deeply into the favour of the inhabitants. This is a proper method to change the situation of affairs: a Preacher supported by the people is capable to cause any revolution whatsoever. It is pretended that this Preacher made himself so popular, that he did not neglect to gain the affection even of the footmen, and maid-servants: after which he did not scruple to censure the Senators and Burgomasters, naming them expressly in his sermons, and to weaken their authority with the people. Calvini heresim, Senatu, & reliquis suis Lutheranis Collegiis

(1) Georg. Braunius, in Catholicorum Tremmenensium Defensio, pag. 46, 47.

Breme, against the consent of the Senate, and of all his Lutheran Collegues. And to compass his design the easier, &c."

[a] In the printed copy, to the word veneretur inclusive. I imagine that Mr. Bayle designed to quote the whole passage, of which he transcribes but a few words: and that to save himself the trouble of writing it down, he referred the Printer to the printed copy, from which the passage was to be taken; but the Printer mistaking Mr. Bayle's meaning, printed the references, instead of the passage to which it referred. As we could not meet with that work of Braunius, quoted by Mr. Bayle, it was impossible for us to supply his omission in this place. ADD. R. E. M.]

HARDOUIN (JOHN) a very learned French Jesuit in the latter end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth Century, was born at Kimper in Bretagne (a); and entering into the Society of Jesus, soon distinguished himself by his learned writings [A], in which he has advanced several very remarkable paradoxes, and particularly that all the works of the antient profane and ecclesiastical writers, except Cicero's works, Virgil's Georgics, Horace's Satyrs and Epistles, and Pliny's Natural History, are mere forgeries. Monsieur Francis de la Pillonniere observes (b), that some "learned men both Protestants and Papists have falsely imagined, that Father Hardouin's pre-"possession for medals, or his design to serve some political end of the society, had "given this strange turn to his thoughts. But it was not so. His blind submission to "the Church of Rome, and after that his religious infatuation for the tenets of the "schools, (which he takes to be, as the whole society does, the standards of Orthodoxy)
"are the two true springs of his exorbitances. For having found in the antient books "hardly any thing like the orthodox doctrines of the Church and of the Schools, or "rather having found the reverse; he infers very consistently, that these books never "came from the pen of pious men fainted by the Church, and who were, no doubt,
"orthodox. As for my part, whatever other people may think of his seeming crazy-
"ness, this is my notion of him, that F. Hardouin must be allowed a more competent
"judge

(a) Du Pin, Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, tom. 19. p. 109. edit. Amsterdam 1715 in 4to.

(b) An Answer to the Reverend Dr. Snape's Accusation. By Francis de la Pillonniere, formerly a Jesuit, now living with the Bishop of Bangor, 2d edit. London 1717 in 8vo, pag. 10, & seq. See likewise, Bibliothecae Raisonnée, tom. 1. Part 1.

[A] Distinguished himself by his learned writings.] In 1684 he published at Paris in 4to. Nummi Antiqui Populorum & Urbium illustrati: and Themistii Orationes XXXIII. cum Notis Dionysii Petavii & Joannis Harduini Jesuitarum, &c. Paris 1684, in Folio. The year following he published Caii Plinii Secundi Naturalis Historiæ Libri XXXVII. Interpretatione & Notis illustravit Joannes Harduinus Soc. Jes. jussu Regis Christianissimi Ludovici Magni in usum Serenissimi Delphini. Paris, in 4to. It was reprinted at Paris 1723, in 3 vol. in folio. In 1687 his Book intitled, De Baptismo Quæstio triplex, was printed at Paris in 4to. In 1689 he published Antirrheticus de Nummis antiquis Colonia-rum & Municipiorum, ad Joann. Foy-Vaillant Medicum. Paris, in 4to, and S. Joannis Chrysostomi Epistola ad Cæsarium Monachum. Joann. Harduinus Soc. Jesu Presbyter Notis illustravit ac Dissertatione de Sacramento Altaris. Paris, in 4to. Monsieur Le Clerc having made some reflections upon St. Chrysostom's Letter to Cæsarius in the Bibliothèque Universelle, Tom. XV. Father Hardouin replied in a piece, printed in 1690 in 4to, and intitled Defence de la Lettre de S. Jean Chrysostome, adressée à l'Auteur de la Bibliothèque Universelle, to which Mr. Le Clerc returned an answer in the XIXth Tome of that Bibliothèque. In this Letter Father Hardouin, writing in the character of a third person, gives an abstract of his Latin work. It is in this treatise, that he advances the paradoxes, which have astonished the world; viz. that he was convinced, "that Facundus, Liberatus, Marius Mercator, Victor "Turonensis, Cassiodorus, to whom so many works "are ascribed, (except the Formula, the treatise on "the Soul, and the Commentary on the Psalms,) Ido- "dorus, who is supposed to be the Author of the book "concerning the Ecclesiastical Writers; that all these "pretended African, Italian, and Spanish Writers, with "several others, were born in France, and are not "near so antient as they are believed to be." This is a bold assertion; but nothing in comparison of what he affirms afterwards, viz. that of all the writings, which bear the name of Justin Martyr, there is only the Dialogue against Trypho, which is genuine, all the rest being supposititious. That is, that the two Apologies of Justin cited with approbation by Eusebius, St. Jerom, and all the antients, are spurious. To support this, it must be maintained, that the works, in which those apologies are mentioned, are likewise supposititious. This is a necessary consequence, which Father Hardouin readily agrees to; but unfortunately for him, the Apology of Justin is mentioned in the Dialogue against Trypho, which he owns to be genuine; for with respect to the books of Tatian and Methodius, Eusebius's History, and St. Jerom's Treatise concerning the Ecclesiastical Writers, he makes no scruple to reject their authority as spurious. But he carried this notion much farther in a book of his printed at Paris in 1693, and intitled, Chronologia ex Nummis antiquis restituta Prolusio, de Nummis Herodiadum, in which he asserted, that "there was some ages since a set of "men, who took upon them to draw up the History "as we find it now, there being none at that time. "That he knew the time when they lived, and the "place where they executed their design. That "they made use of Cicero and Pliny, Virgil's Geor- "gics, and Horace's Sermones and Epistles, which are "the only genuine monuments of antiquity remaining, "except some few inscriptions and Fasces. That those, "who by the use of these remains of antiquity labour- "ed to draw up a body of History from all these dif- "ferent pieces, seemed to him to compose a new fable "out of several other fables. He adds, that these "Architects of Annals had for their whole assistance "a great number of ancient medals, which they had "collected with considerable labour, and were in "the hands of the first projector and chief manager "of this design." Upon this foot, not only Josephus's and Eusebius's Histories are ranked among these forgeries, but likewise all the profane Historians, Poets, and Orators, except those abovementioned; so that he absolutely rejects Cicero's Orations, Terence's Plays, Virgil's Æneid, Livy's History, and in short almost all the other ancient writings. This is one of the most amazing paradoxes, that ever entered into the head of any man of learning. However he appears to have seriously believed it himself, and was persuaded, that his reasons for it were clear and evident; though he would not publish them to the world, nor explain his system, notwithstanding he was frequently called upon to do it. This work was suppressed at Paris (1). He afterwards published A Letter upon three Samaritan Medals, which engaged him in a contest with Monsieur Toinard; an Essay towards the restoring Chronology by medals of Constantine's age; and a Chronology of the Old Testament conformable to the vulgar translation, illustrated by ancient medals. These books were likewise suppressed, on account of the paradoxes contained in them. However Father Hardouin continued still in his opinion; for in his Letters written to Monsieur Ballonfaux, and printed at Luxembourg in 1700, he speaks of an impious faction, which began a long time ago, which still subsists, and appears with the greatest insolence, and which by forging of an infinite number of writings, that seem to breath nothing but piety, seems to have no other design than to remove God out of the world, that is, out of the hearts of mankind, and to overturn all religion. Besides these treatises he published a Discourse concerning the last Supper of Christ, printed at Paris, 1693, in 4to. Mr. la Croze refuted his notion concerning the forgery of the ancient writings, in his Dissertationes Historiques sur divers Sujets, Rotterdam, 1707; and in his Vindiciæ Veterum Scriptorum contra Joannem Harduinum S. J. P. Additæ sunt Viri Eruditi [Alphon. des Vignoles] Observationes Chronologicae in Prolusionem & Historiam Veteris Testamenti. Rotterdam, 1708, in 8vo. Mr. la Croze imagined, that Father Hardouin advanced his notions in concert with the Society of the Jesuits, or at least with his Superiors, in order to set aside all the ancient Greek and Latin, sacred and profane writers. But Monsieur le Clerc (2) was of opinion, that there was no ground for this supposition of Monsieur la Croze. In 1709 there was published at Amsterdam a Volume in Folio intitled, Joannis Harduini à Societate Jesu Presbyteri Opera selecta, tum quæ jam pridem Parisiis edita

(1) Lettres de Mons. Bayle, tom. 1. pag. 488. edit. Amsterdam 1729.

(2) Biblioth. Cboise, tom. 16. pag. 412, 413, 414.

“ judge of the meaning of these books, than all the Jesuits besides, as being of greater “ sagacity, and incomparably more conversant with them, and more impartial too, as “ well as consistent with himself, in giving up such books, which are the great torment “ of his brethren, and which they compliment only out of decency; and in clearing his “ infallible Church of the great blunder of having fainted the genuine authors of such “ writings, as not only are not a shelter for it, but are weapons against it. But his un“ paralleled and unspeakable irregularities of opinion have made me since throughly “ sensible of the terrible havock, which may be occasioned even in a sagacious and in“ quisitive mind by an awful regard to doctrines, merely because they are settled, and by “ a determined attachment to the jargon of School-divinity. Error will lead you into “ still more and greater errors. It will do so the more, the more diligent and the more “ able you are. He is as great an instance as any the world ever was witness to, that “ when a man has been inured from his youth to a religious love of darkness and to the “ hatred of light, as an unquestionable first principle, nothing can be expected from “ him, but all the bad effects of the most extravagant fanaticism.” Mons. de la Pillonniere afterwards tells us (c), that upon his consulting Father Hardouin, the latter returned this answer: The Rogues mean only that the senses do not judge with certainty of the existence of matter, because else they would be judges of Truth (which is beyond their reach) it being a Truth that

(c) Ibid. pag.
15, 16.

edita nunc emendatiora & multo auctiora prodeunt, tum quæ nunc primum edita. This Volume made a great deal of noise, before it was published. The Author had corrected in those works of his, which had been before printed, what he thought proper; when they fell into the hands of a Bookseller, who undertook to print them faithfully from the copy which he had received.
 He began the impression with the Author's consent, and was considerably advanced in it, when the clamour raised against the paradoxes in those works, obliged Father Hardouin to write to the Bookseller to retrench those passages, which had been excepted to. But the Bookseller refused to do so; upon which Father Har-douin protested against his conduct; and the Bookseller wrote an answer to him, giving the reasons of his refusal. An extract of the papers of both are published in the Journal des Savans of Paris in 1708. Father Hardouin's Protestation is preceded by a Declaration of his Superiors in the Society of Jesus; and those pieces being curious, we shall present them to the reader.

The Declaration of the Father Provincial of the “ Jesuits, and of the Superiors of their Houses at “ Paris, concerning a new edition of some works of Fa“ ther John Hardouin of the same Society, which has “ been actually made contrary to their will by the Sieur “ de Lorm, Bookseller at Amsterdam.

“ Among the works contained in this new edition, “ there are some, which we could have wished had “ never seen the light, or had continued in oblivion.
 “ That which is intitled, De Nummis Herodiadum, “ and which serves as a foundation to others, was “ suppressed, as all the world knows, by the Superiors
 “ of the Society; and they destroyed all the copies of “ it, which they could find. With respect to the “ Chronology of the Old Testament, and the Medals of “ the age of Constantine, these Books were never sold,
 “ and would never have been printed, if the revisers, “ appointed to examine them; had perceived and in“ formed their Superiors, that there were things in “ these works tending to establish the System, on ac“ count of which the other work had been suppressed.
 “ There have been printed in foreign countries some “ tracts of the same Author, which tend likewise to “ the same scheme; but they never passed through “ the examination of the Society, any more than the “ others; which the Sieur de Lorm has declared to “ be first published in his edition. The Superiors
 “ here have written to him in as strong a manner “ as they could, to dissuade him from inserting these “ works; but all their efforts have been in vain, the “ present situation of affairs in Europe not permitting “ them to take any measures with the powers, whose “ subject that Bookseller is. The principal heads “ of the accusation urged against these works, and “ which we judge to be well grounded, are, 1. That “ the Author there advances facts, and establishes “ principles, from which one may conclude, that al“ most all the ancient monuments of the Church, and “ a great number of profane writings, have been “ forged. 2. That he even asserts there positively, “ that he doubts of the antiquity of many of the said writings, as well profane as ecclesiastical. 3. That “ he absolutely determines concerning the spuriousness “ of some of them. 4. That he seems not to be per“ suaded of the antiquity of the Greek text of the “ Scriptures. 5. That he has likewise advanced some “ other novelties, from which dangerous consequences

 “ may be drawn. This has given us occasion to pub“ lish the following declaration. 1. We reject as per“ nicious the paradox with regard to the spuriousness “ of the Greek text of the Scripture, the writings both “ of the Greek and Latin Fathers, and the other “ monuments of the Church, commonly receiv“ ed in the Church as true. 2. We consider like“ wise as an indefensible chimera, the notion of the “ forgery of the profane Authors, whose works,
 “ according to the common opinion of the ablest Cri“ tics, were written in the several ages, in which “ those Authors are usually placed. 3. We con“ demn still more this pretended forgery with re“ gard to those among the profane Authors, whose “ works have been cited by the antient Doctors of the “ Church, because this Opinion would infer the Forge“ ry even of the writings of those holy Doctors.
 “ 4. We declare all the Facts and Principles to be “ false, which shall be found in Father Hardouin's “ Books, whence any of the Paradoxes above mention“ ed can be justly drawn. 5. We disavow all other “ Notions to be found in those Books, which shall not “ agree with the common Doctrine of the Catholick “ Divines. 6. Lastly, we disown, for the reasons a“ bove mentioned, every edition made or to be made “ of those works; and that the Publick may not “ doubt, but that our Declaration contains the senti“ ments of our whole Society, we add, that there is “ nothing in what we have said, but what is autho“ rized by our Reverend Father General. The Publick “ will not any more doubt, but that these have been all “ along our sentiments, after they have seen in our Me“ moirs of Trevoux the System concerning the Spurious-“ ness of the antient Authors not only rejected as false
 “ and dangerous, but refuted by positive Proofs, long “ before a Protestant thought proper to represent it as “ a design concerted amongst the Superiors of the So“ ciety; which is a Paradox so contrary to good sense,
 “ that the person, who was not ashamed to affirm it “ seriously, found himself contradicted by those even “ of his own party, who have been least accustomed to “ spare the Jesuits.

“ MICHAEL LE TELLIER, Provincial.

“ GABRIEL DANIEL, superior of the Maison Pro-“ fesse.

“ HENRY CHARLES FORCET, Rector of the Col“ lege.

“ PAUL BODIN, Rector of the Noviciat.

“ I subscribe sincerely to every thing contained in the “ preceding Declaration; I heartily condemn in my “ writings what it condemns in them, and particularly “ what I have said concerning an impious faction, “ which had forged some ages ago the greatest part
 “ of

that matter exists. Now Truth being God, according to the Rogues, and the Senses being not able to know God, it follows that the Senses cannot know Truth. In opposition to that, the good Peripatetics, [that is in Father Hardouin's stile, the Orthodox] say, that the five Senses judge of Truth by the Sensorium Commune. After that he compared the modern Philosophers to the Quakers, who, said he, call in question every thing, even the existence of their bodies. He asserted, that the Rogues acknowledging no true God, could not possibly admit any creation properly called, and that they held matter eternal. "Read, said he, on that subject the 12th and 13th book of St. Augustin's Confessions, and understand them if you can." He died at Paris September the 3d 1729, in the eighty third year of his age.

"of the ecclesiastical or profane writings, which have hitherto been considered as ancient. I am extremely sorry that I did not open my Eyes before in this point. I think myself greatly obliged to my superiors in the society, who have assisted me in divesting myself of my prejudices: I promise never to advance in word or writing any thing directly or indirectly contrary to my present Retraction. And if hereafter I shall call in question the antiquity of any writing either ecclesiastical or profane, which no person before shall have charged as supposititious, I will only do it by proposing my reasons in a writing published under my name, with the permission of my superiors, and the approbation of the publick censors. In testimony of which I have signed, this 27th of December 1708.

"J. HARDOVIN, of the Society of Jesus."

His Opera Selecta contain his Nummi antiqui Populorum & urbium illustrati; his Three Questions concerning Baptism; his Edition of St. Chrysostom's Letter to Celsus, with a Dissertation de Sacramento Altaris; his Treatise de Nummi Herodiani; his Discourse on the last Passover, celebrated by our Saviour; and two little Tracts in French, one by way of Dialogue, and the other by way of Letter in Defense of the first; a Treatise in which he explains the Medals of the age of Constantine; his Chronology of the Old Testament adjusted by the Vulgate Translation, and illustrated by medals; several letters to Mons. de Bailonfeaux and some other pieces. He published likewise an Edition of the Councils at Paris in fol. and wrote a piece against Father Courayer's Defence of the English Ordinations. T

HARIOT or HARRIOT (THOMAS), an eminent English Mathematician in the beginning of the seventeenth Century, was born at Oxford in the year 1560, and having been instructed in Grammar-learning in that city, became a Butler or Commoner of St. Mary's Hall in that University (a), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts February 12, 1579 (b), and in the latter end of that year completed it by determination in Schoolstreet (c). Soon after he came to the knowledge of Sir Walter Raleigh on account of his admirable skill in the Mathematics, and was entertained by that Gentleman in his family (d), with the allowance of an annual pension (e) for instructing him in the Mathematics (f). In 1585 he was sent over by Sir Walter with his first colony to Virginia [A], where being settled, he was employed in the discovery and surveying of that country, and observing what commodities it produced, and the manners and customs of its inhabitants; and wrote an account of it [B]. Upon his return to England he was introduced by Sir Walter into the acquaintance of Henry Earl of Northumberland, who "finding him to be a Gentleman of an affable and peaceable nature, and well read in the obscure parts of learning (g)," allowed him a yearly pension of an hundred and twenty pounds, as he did likewise smaller pensions to Mr. Robert Hues, and Mr. Walter Warner, two other Mathematicians, who with our author were the Earl's constant companions [C], when he was committed to the Tower for life in 1606, and were usually called the Earl of Northumberland's three Magi (h). Mr. Wood accuses him of very loose notions with regard to Religion [D]. A manuscript of his intitled, Ephemeris Chyrometrica

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 459. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Ibidem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 218.

(c) Ibidem, Athen. Oxon. col. 459, 460.

(d) Ibidem, Ibid. col. 460.

(e) Præfat. R. Hakluyt ad Orbem Novum, scriptum per Petr. Martyr. Anglicum, edit. Paris 1587, in 8vo.

(f) Wood, Ath. Oxon. col. 460.

(g) Ibidem, Ibid.

(h) Ibidem, Ibid.

(1) Ath. Oxon. col. 1. col. 460.

(2) Vol. 3. fol. 266, & seq.

(3) Ubi supra.

(4) Wood, ubi supra.

(5) Ibid.

[A] In 1585 he was sent over by Sir Walter with his first Colony to Virginia. Mr. Wood tells us (1) that in 1584 he went with the said Knight and first Colony into Virginia. But this is a Mistake; for Mr. Hariot did not accompany Sir Walter, but went over with the first Colony sent to Virginia in 1585, under the conduct of Sir Richard Grenville and other Officers.

[B] Wrote an account of it. It is published under this Title, A brief and true Report of the New Found Land of Virginia, &c. written by Thomas Hariot, servant to Sir Walter Raleigh, and there employed in discovering a full twelve Month; in Hakluyt's Voyages (2). Mr. Wood tells us (3), that it was printed at London 1588 in 4to under the following Title, A brief and true Report of the Newfoundland of Virginia, the Commodities there found to be raised, &c. It was translated into Latin by C. C. A., and published and adorned with many Cuts by Theodorice de Bry of Liege, Francf. ad Mannum, 1590 in fol.

[C] Who with our Author were the Earl's constant Companions. They had a Table at the Earl's charge, and the Earl constantly conversed with them, either singly, or all together, as Sir Walter Raleigh then in the Tower likewise did (4).

[D] Mr. Wood accuses him of very loose Notions with regard to religion. He tells us (5), "that notwithstanding his great skill in Mathematics, he had strange thoughts of the Scripture, and always undervalued the old story of the Creation of the World, and could never believe that trite position, Ex nihilo nihil fit. He made a Philosophical Theology, wherein he cast off the Old Testament, so that consequently the New would have no Foundation. He was a Deist, and his Doctrine he did impart to the said Count (6), and to Sir Walter Raleigh (7), when he was compiling the History of the World, and would controvert the matter with eminent Divines of those times; who therefore having no good Opinion of him, did look on the matter of his Death (8), as a Judgment upon him for those matters, and for nullifying the Scripture." Mr. Wood mentions no Authority for this assertion; and we may observe that Mr. Hariot assures us himself (9), that when he was with the first Colony settled in Virginia, in every Town where he came, he explained to them the Contents of the Bible; declaring, says he, that therein was set forth the true and only God, and his mighty works; that therein was contained the true Doctrine of Salvation through Christ; with many particulars of Miracles and chief points of Religion, as I was able then to utter and thought fit for the time. And though I told them the Book, materially and of itself, was not of such Virtue as I thought they did conceive, but only the Doctrine therein contained; yet would

(6) The Earl of Northumberland.

(7) We shall examine the impatience of Scepticism cast upon that Gentleman in his article.

(8) See note [E].

(9) Brief and true Report of the new-found Land of Virginia, &c. in Hakluyt, vol. 3. pag. 277, 278.

Chyrometria is preserved in the Library of Sion-College at London, and his Artis Analytica Praxis was printed after his death at London 1631 [E] in a thin folio, and dedicated to Henry Earl of Northumberland. Mr. Hariot lived for some time in Sion-College, and died at London July the 2d 1621 (i). Dr. Alexander Rhead tells us (k), that his death was occasioned by a cancerous ulcer in the lip [F]. His body was interred in St. Christopher's Church in London, where a monument was erected for him by his noble Executors Sir Thomas Aylesbury, and Robert Sidney Viscount Lisle (l). He was universally esteemed on account of his learning [G]. Besides his works abovementioned, he wrote A Chronicle of Virginia, the particulars of which he mentions in his Brief and true Report of the new-found Land of Virginia (m).

(i) Ideam, col. 461. Camden places his death in July that year. See his Annals Regis Jacobi I. subjoined to G. Camdeni illustrum Viror. Epist. pag. 72. London 1601, in 4to.

(k) In his Works, printed at London 16:0. Treat. 1. Lett. 26.

(l) Wood, col. 460, 461.

(m) See Hakluyt's Voyages, vol. 3: fol. 230.

would many be glad to touch it, to embrace it, to kiss it, to hold it to their Breasts and Heads, and stroke over all their bodies with it, to show their hungry desires of that knowledge, which was spoken of. However notwithstanding his Sentiments were such at that time, it is not impossible that he might afterwards change them; but whether he actually did so, is a question. Mr. Wood is undoubtedly mistaken in saying that he infused his sceptical Notions into Sir Walter Raleigh, when he was compiling his History of the World, since that great man in many places of that History has given us the strongest Evidences of his Belief of the Christian Religion. To this we may add, that it is by no means probable, that Dr. Richard Corbet, an orthodox Divine, and successively Bishop of Oxford, and Norwich, sending a Poem to Sir Thomas Aylesbury, when the Comet appeared, dated December the 9th 1618, should speak of — deep Hariot's Misp,

In which there is no Dross (10),

if it had such Allay (11). Mr. George Chapman likewise (12) styles him his worthy and most learned friend, whose Judgment and Knowledge in all kinds, says he, I know to be incomparable and bottomless; yea to be admired as much as his most blameless Life, and the right sacred Expence of his time, is to be honoured and revered. Mr. Oldys observes (13), that it is not probable, that the Earl of Northumberland would have made such a man as our Author is represented by Mr. Wood, a domestic, and allowed him so handsome a salary, to have infected his Sons with Atheistical Principles; nor would Hariot's noble Executors, Sir Thomas Aylesbury, and Robert Sidney, Viscount Lisle, have bestowed on him a Monument in St. Christopher's Church in London, with an Inscription, which might have been contradicted by all the Town, if it had been false, beginning as follows: Omnis scientias calluit, et in annitur excellit; Mathematicis, Philosophicis, Theologicis, Veritatis Indicator, studiosissimus; Dei Triniunius cultor piissimus, &c.

(10) Corbet's Poems, pag. 56. edit. London 1672, in 8vo.

(11) See the Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, by W. Ill. Oldys Gen. pag. 72. note (e).

(12) Preface to his Translation of Homer's Iliad.

(13) Ubi supra.

[E] His Artis Analyticae was printed after his Death at London 1631. The title of it is, Artis Analyticae Praxis ad aequationes Algebraicas nova, expedita, et generali methodo resolvendas, Traictatus posthumus, &c. The substance of this Book falling into the hands of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Mr. Walter Warner (14) undertook to compleat and publish it, on condition that Algernon, eldest son of Henry Earl of Northumberland, would after his Father's decease, continue his Pension to him during his Life. This being obtained by the Interest of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Mr. Warner took a great deal of pains in it, and at length published it (15). Monsieur Des Cartes is said to have been obliged to this Book of Mr. Hariot for a great many of his Improvements in Algebra (16).

(14) He was born in Leicestershire and died at London in the latter end of the year 1640.

(15) Wood, col. 461.

(16) See the article of DES CARTES, note [DD] vol 4. pag. 148, 149.

[F] Dr. Alexander Rhead tells us, that his Death was occasioned by a cancerous Ulcer in the Lip. The Doctor's Words are as follow: Cancerous Ulcers seize on this part [the Lip]. This Grief hastened the end of that famous Mathematician Mr. Hariot, with whom I was acquainted but short time before his Death, whom at one time, together with Mr. Hues, who wrote of Globes, Mr. Warner, and Mr. Torperley, the noble Earl of Northumberland, the favourer of all good Learning, and Mecenas of learned Men, maintained whilst he was in the Tower, for their Worth and various Literature Mr. Wood in the passage cited in Note [D] observes, that the manner of his death was looked upon by some Divines as a Judgment upon him for his supposed Scepticism; but Mr. Oldys (17) remarks, that Dr. Rhead adds none of those scandalous Reflections, and seems not to have known whether the Cancer began in Mr. Hariot's Lip; "though possibly, continues Mr. Oldys, the brass Instruments, which Mathematicians are so familiar with, and for readiness often hold in their Mouths, might occasion such a Disease."

(17) Ubi supra.

(18) In Praefat. ad Orbem Novum Pet. Martyr. Angli.

(19) In Praefatione ad Diodes Calomarcas, &c. cap. 1602.

(20) Amelium Regni Regis Jacobi Apparatus, subjoined to G. Camdeni Illustrum Virorum Epistola, pag. 72. edit. London 1691, in 4to.

[G] He was universally esteemed on account of his Learning. When he was but a young man, he was styled by Mr. R. Hakluyt (18), Juvenis in illis Disciplinis [mathematicis] excellens; by Mr. Nath. Torperley (19) Homo natus ad Artes illustrandas; and by Camden (20) Mathematicus insignis.

HARPALYCE the most beautiful Maid at Argos. Her father Clymenus fell so deeply in love with her, that finding by experience that all his endeavours to conquer his passion served only to encrease it, he thought only how to find means to gratify it. He practised therefore upon his daughter's nurse, and by her assistance he enjoyed secretly the object of his love. Some little time after the person, to whom Harpalyce was betrothed, arrived. Magnificent preparations were immediately made for the nuptials; the marriage was consummated, and the bridegroom set out with his bride to return home. It was then that Clymenus repented he ever gave his consent to this match. His love transported him with such a rage, that he went after the new married couple, overtook them, and made away with his son-in-law before they were at their journey's end. He returned with his daughter to Argos, where he acted publicly as her husband. She considered at last what unworthy treatment she had received from her father, and to be revenged of him she killed her younger brother [A], and gave him to her father to eat; after which having prayed to the Gods that she might be taken out of this world, she was transformed into a bird [B]. Clymenus was so overwhelmed with grief at all these misfortunes,

(1) Hygin. cap. 206.

[A] She kills her younger brother. Hyginus (1) relates that she killed the very son she had had by Clymenus, and he adds, that she gave him to his father to eat, and that Clymenus coming to know this killed her. You must correct the word filium and read filium in that Author's cxxvith chapter, agreeably to what we read in the ccxxxvith, ccxxxixth, and ccxlvith chapters. Besides this difference I observe another between him and Parthenius. The latter asserts, that Harpalyce's father was the son of Teleus, and that he dwelt at Argos; the former makes him the son of Schœneus, and King of Arcadia (2); but as he makes him the son of Oeneus in chapter the ccxxxvith, we ought to be very certain, that we must read Oeneus instead of Schœneus in all the other passages: for Apollodorus (3) and Antoninus Liberalis (4) tell us that Oeneus had a son called Clymenus.

(2) Ideam, lib. and cap. 246. In chap. 148. these are Carnus, and not Schœneus.

(3) Lib. 2.

(4) Cap. 2.

[B] She was transformed into a bird. There are two fortunes, that he killed himself (a). We shall mention another Harpalice in the article (a) Taken from Euphorion, quoted by Parthenius, in the 13th chap. of his Erotica, or Love-Tales.

HARPALICUS.

FAULTS of the Mythologists.

two considerable defects in the fabulous stories of ancient Greek Mythologists: the one is, that there is not a sufficient variety in the capital circumstances of their fables; the other is, that there is not the least uniformity in their accounts of particulars. You will hardly meet with two Authors, who mentioning the same story agree together with regard to the qualities and names of the persons, and to the times and places. If by this method they pretended to shew that they had a fruitful imagination, they were mistaken; for a barrenness in the capital point of the stories is not easily supplied by a variety of circumstances that are only accessory. It seems at first that Parthenius's Euphorion presents us with something new; but if you consider it well, you will find that it is only the story Tereus acted upon another stage, with some alteration in the characters of the Actors.

(a) Hygin. cap. 193. Servius in Æn. lib. 1. ver. 317. calls them Amymonii.

HARPALICUS, King of the Amymneans (a) in Thrace, had a daughter named HARPALICE, who was nourished with the milk of a cow and of a mare [A], and whom he trained up very young in the use of arms. Thus he made a very warlike woman of her, which proved of great advantage to him; for had not his daughter come to his assistance, when Neoptolemus Achilles's son attacked [B] and wounded him, he would have been lost without retrieve; but Harpalice charged the enemy so seasonably that she routed him. Her father, whom she had so happily delivered in this war against strangers (b), perished soon after in a civil war. His subjects first dethroned, and at last killed him (c). Harpalice retired into the woods, and set about plundering the neighbouring countries; she run like lightning, and when men pursued her on horseback to take from her the cattle she had stolen, they could not overtake her. She could not be taken but in such nets as were spread as though it had been to catch stags. She was killed; but they who committed that fact, paid very dear for it; for there arose immediately a dispute in the neighbourhood, to know who was the proprietor of the cattle she had stolen; on which a battle ensued, in which several were killed on the spot on both sides. Since that time a custom was established, that they should meet now and then at this maiden's tomb, and celebrate tournaments there to atone for her death. There was one HARPALICE who was passionately in love with Iphiclus (d), and who died with grief to see that he despised her. It is after her name that a certain hymn was called Harpalyce.

(b) Hygin. ibid.

(c) Servius, ibid.

(d) Turneb. Adversar. lib. 10. cap. 11.

[A] His daughter . . . was nourished with the milk of a cow and of a mare. Servius (1) applies to her these words of the first Book of the Æneids.

(1) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 317.

Qualis equos Threïssa fatigat Harpalice, volucrumque fuga pervertitur Hebrum.

That is,

“ With such array Harpalice bestrode
“ Her Thracian courser, and outstrip'd the rapid “ flood. Dryden.

Servius adds, that she was nourished after the same manner as Virgil supposes Camilla was nourished by her father Metabus.

(2) Virgil. Æn. lib. 11. ver. 570.

*Hic natam in dumis interque horrentia lustra
Armentalis equæ mammis, & lacte ferino
Nutribat, teneris immulgens ubera labris (2).*

That is,
“ His daughter with the milk of mares he fed;
“ The dugs of bears, and ev'ry salvage beast,
“ He drew, and thro' her lips the liquor press'd.

Dryden.

[B] When Neoptolemus . . . attacked him. This maiden's father was already a prisoner then, according to Servius. Others assert that Harpalice delivered him out of the hands of the Getes. Quidam hujus patrem a Getis, ut alii volunt a Mirmidonibus captum, collecta multitudine afferunt liberasse celerius quam de sæminis credi potest (3). i. e. “ Some assert that her father was “ taken by the Getes, others by the Myrmidons, and “ that she having gathered together a multitude of “ persons delivered him quicker than can be believed “ of women.” I do not know where Charles Stephens, whom Lloyd and Hofman follow, read that our Harpalice's father was called Lycurgus, and that he was old when he was made a prisoner by the Getes.

(3) Servius, in Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 317.

HARPALUS, a Greek Astronomer, corrected Cleostratus's Cycle by another Cycle which also wanted to be corrected [A]. It was Meton who corrected Harpalus's new Cycle, the fourth year of the eighty sixth Olympiad (a). Cleostratus discovered the signs of the Zodiack, after Anaximander had discovered in the fifty eighth Olympiad the obliquity of that Circle (b). Judge by this at what time Harpalus lived. It is not true as Moreri asserts, that Diodorus Siculus mentions Harpalus.

(a) Diod. Sicul. lib. 12. num. 36.

(b) Plinius, lib. 2. cap. 8. pag. 148.

[A] He corrected Cleostratus's Cycle by another Cycle, which also wanted to be corrected. Cleostratus's Cycle was called Ochattis, because it consisted of a revolution of eight years, after which he pretended that the Sun and the Moon returned to the same point. Harpalus observing, that this did not happen, invented the Cycle of nine years.

*Nam quæ solem hiberna novem putat æthera volvi
Ut luna spatium redeat, velut Harpalus, ipsam
Ocius in sedem momentaque prisca reducit.
Illius ad numeros proluxa decennia rursum
Adjecisse Meton Cecropia dicitur arte.
Inseditque animis: tenuit rem Græcia solers
Protinus, & longos inventum misit in annos (1).*

(1) Festus Avienus, in Aratidis Prognosticis, pag. m. 65.

i. e. “ He, who like Harpalus imagines that after a revolution of nine years the sun and the moon return to the same point, brings them too soon to their former situation. To that number, Meton, who was skilled in the arts that flourished at Athens, is said to have added ten full years. And this Cycle (of nineteen years) has been constantly admitted since; the learned Greeks have kept it, and transmitted this invention to posterity through a long series of years.”

Meton finding that the Cycle of nine years did not answer the purpose better than the others, invented the Cycle of nineteen years. Men kept to this, as Festus Avienus observes in the verses I have quoted. This Cycle is still in use, and is called the Golden Number.

Vossius's account of all this abounds with inaccuracies and mistakes [B].

[B] Vossius's account of all this abounds with inaccuracies and mistakes.] I. Having said (2) in his Thesis that Meton published his Enneadeactris (or Cycle of nineteen years) the first year of the 87th Olympiad, he asserts in the Commentary on his Thesis that Diodorus Siculus mentions this under the third year of the 86th Olympiad. Is not this quoting a celebrated witness against his own calculation? Is this a prudent conduct? However it is dealing fairly, will some say: I own it, provided Diodorus Siculus did really follow this chronological account; but it is certain that he mentions the Cycle of nineteen years under the last year of the 86th Olympiad. II. He quotes Pliny, Book the II, Chapter the XIIth, concerning Cleostratus: he should have quoted the eighth chapter. III. He asserts, that Cleostratus's Octaeteris contained 2090 years and 22. It is plain that the Printer has committed a blunder in the figures of the number; but the word annorum (of years) is certainly a mistake of the Author. We must therefore alter and correct the following words, Intro-duxit Octaeterida, quæ erat annorum CIO CIO XC XXII, and write them thus, introduxit Octaeterida, quæ erat dierum CIO CIO CMXXII. i.e. "He introduced the Octaeteris which contained 2922 days;" for that Cycle did really contain 2922 days. IV. He quotes the XIIth Book of Diodorus Siculus concerning the Octaeteris; but I could not find that word there. V. This phrase, in hac Octaeteride deprehensum est vitium ab Harpalo commissum, is bad; it signifies quite the contrary of what it should signify; for there is no reader but will think, that Harpalus committed an error in the invention of that Cycle of eight years, and yet Vossius's design is to let us know that Harpalus discovered the error which the inventor of that Cycle had committed. VI. He ought not to have said that instead of Cleostratus's Octaeteris Harpalus's Octaeteris was made use of; for Avienus's verses, which Vossius quotes immediately after, shew very plainly, that Harpalus invented a Cycle of nine years.

(2) De Scient. Mathem. pag. 150, 151.

HARPALUS, a Macedonian Lord, and one of Alexander's Generals, ruined himself by his extravagant expences (a). He followed Alexander's party in the disputes which arose between that Prince and King Philip, whose favour he lost for that reason (b). But as soon as Philip was dead, Alexander called Harpalus to Court again, and shewed him a very particular friendship. I believe that he gave him the government of Cilicia [A]. As for that of Babylon, it is very certain that he gave it him, together with the post of High-Treasurer (c). Harpalus, who imagined that the King his master would never return from his Indian expeditions, oppressed the people a thousand different ways, that he might have wherewithal to support the excessive expences of his bed and table. He indulged himself in all kinds of voluptuousness, and refused nothing to satisfy his mistresses [B]. Several other Governors, who, like him, were persuaded that it would

(a) Athenæus, lib. 13, pag. 594. Pausanias, lib. 1, pag. 35.

(b) Plutarch. in Alexand. pag. 669, E.

(c) Diod. Sicul. lib. 17. cap. 108.

[A] I believe that Alexander gave him the government of Cilicia.] I ground this conjecture on the account which Athenæus (1) gives us. He relates that Harpalus having lost his mistress, sent for another from Athens, and lodged her in the royal palace of Tarsus. She was adored there by all the people, and stiled a Queen; and all those who crowned Harpalus, had orders to crown her also. This supposes that Harpalus lived at Tarsus, with a sovereign authority. Now Tarsus was the capital city of Cilicia (2). I do not mind a passage of Athenæus (3), in which we read that Harpalus set up a brass statue to his mistress Glycera at Tarsus a city of Syria, [in Tarsu] τῆς Συρίας. I do not doubt but this passage is corrupted; for besides that there was no royal nor considerable city called Tarsus in Syria, we see in Athenæus, page 586, that this statue of Glycera was set up at Rossus, in Ρωσσῶ. And we see in the margin of the page 595, over against the text, where in Tarsu is printed, that there is in Ρωσσῶ in other manuscripts. Athenæus quotes the same Author, namely Theopompus, in both these passages. The transcribers therefore must have mispelt the name of the city, in which this statue was set up.

Diodorus Siculus, after the example of those who write a general history, had not too much heaped up together particular events, and neglected too much to be accurate with regard to the time when they happened. The Authors quoted by Athenæus deserve more to be credited than Diodorus; for they designed purposely to describe Harpalus's luxurioufness: it is therefore probable, that they have given a more exact and particular account of them, than Diodorus could do, who mentioned Harpalus only in general, and only glanced upon the particular circumstances of his life. This is the method which is followed in a general history. Now, what do the Authors quoted by Athenæus relate? Here follows their account. After the death of Pythionice, with whom Harpalus had been passionately in love, he sent for Glycera, made her live in the royal palace, which was at Tarsus, and caused her to be adored by the people, and stiled a Queen. Ἡ δὲ ἐλάσσει οὐκ ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις τοῖς ἐν Ταρσῶ, καὶ προσκυνῶν ἀπὸ τῆς πολλῆς βασιλίσσης προσκυνομένη. At illo profectam in Regia, quæ Tarsus fuit collocasse, ut adorarent omnes ac Reginam saluarent, iussisse (4). If he had been Governor of Babylon when he sent for Glycera, he would have introduced her into the Palace of Babylon, it is at Babylon that he would have caused her to receive the honours of adoration, and to be stiled a Queen. But he did all this at Tarsus; he was therefore Governor of Cilicia when Pythionice died, and when Glycera succeeded her; whence it follows that Diodorus Siculus was mistaken as to the circumstance of the time, since he supposes that Harpalus's amours with Pythionice, and afterwards with Glycera, were posterior to the time, when Harpalus was made Governor of Babylon, and when Alexander set out for India. Let it not be objected, that Harpalus raised a monument to Pythionice at Babylon (5). For it does not follow from thence, that this woman died after he was made Governor of Babylon. I do not know whether one might place amongst the effects of this Governor's luxury, the care he took to send for all sorts of plants from Greece, to adorn the gardens and walks of Babylon: Ἀρπαλλοῦ δὲ τῆς χάρας ἀπολυφθεῖς ἐπιμιλητῆς, καὶ φιλοκαλῶν Ἑλληνικαῖς φυλαῖς διακοσμήσαι τὰ βασιλῆα καὶ τὰς περιπατεῖς, τῶν μὲν ἄλλων ἐκράτησεν, τοῖς δὲ κερτοῖς ἐκ ἐπέξει ἢ γῆ μῖνον, ἀλλ' αὐτὸν διεφθέρει, ἢ φέροντα τὴν κρᾶσιν. i. e. "Harpalus

(1) Lib. 13. pag. 586.

(2) Τὸν τῆς μεταπολίως ἐπίχουσα λόγῳ, i. e. "Was considered as the metropolis, i. e. capital city." Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 463.

(3) Lib. 13. pag. 595.

(4) Theopompus & Cleitarchus, apud Athen. lib. 13. pag. 586.

(5) Theopompus, apud Athen. lib. 13. pag. 595.

[B] He refused nothing to satisfy his mistresses.] If any thing could overthrow the conjecture I have advanced in the preceding remark, it would be Diodorus Siculus's description of the luxury, in which Harpalus indulged himself, whilst Alexander was in India: for Diodorus tells us, that Harpalus gave himself over to a debauched life with women, and to a lewdness, that was still more abominable; that he caused a large quantity of fishes to be brought from the Red Sea; that his daily expences were exorbitant; and that besides this he sent for a famous courtezan from Athens, whose name was Pythionice; that he made her presents of an immense price; and that when she died, he raised a stately monument to her; and sent at the same time for another celebrated courtezan named Glycera, with whom he lived in such an extravagant luxury as cannot be well described. All this happened, according to Diodorus Siculus, whilst Harpalus was Governor of Babylon, and High-Treasurer, and after Alexander was engaged in his Indian expedition. I was therefore in the wrong to mention the Government of Cilicia, will some say. This objection would be very strong, if we had not reasons to think, that would never be in Alexander's power to make them give an account of their extortions, had committed an infinite number of unjust actions. The first thing Alexander did on his return from India, was to punish some of these Governors very severely. This made Harpalus dread the same treatment, so that in order to escape it, he fled into Greece, with immense sums of money, which he took out of the King's treasure, with which he had been trusted. He also raised six thousand men, whom he landed at Tenarus in the territories of the Lacedaemonians, and he went to Athens with a design to persuade the Citizens to make war against Alexander (d). He bribed some Orators with large sums of money (e); for he knew very well that the tongue of those men is the most powerful instrument to disturb the public tranquillity, and to engage the people to rise up in arms. But if he knew the great influence they have on the people's mind, he was not ignorant also that a large sum of money has a great power with them. Finding himself therefore possessed of an immense treasure, he hoped to draw the city of Athens to his side. But he was disappointed: Phocion was not to be bribed [C]; and besides this, the letters of Antipater, Governor of Macedonia, and those of Olympias, Alexander's mother, kept the Athenians in awe (f). So that Harpalus was obliged to look for another sanctuary [D]. He returned to Tenarus where he had left his soldiers, and went

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Plutarch. in Phocione, p. 750. in Demosthenes, pag. 857.

(f) Diodorus Siculus, lib. 17. cap. 108.

"Harpalus being left Governor of the country, and desiring to adorn the palace and walks of Babylon with plants from Greece, succeeded with regard to several; but the soil would not bear the Ivy, which always perished there, the climate not being proper for it." For if we may depend upon Theophrastus (7), he did it only by Alexander's command. If Scaliger had inferred from thence, that Harpalus had the direction of the royal gardens and orchards at Babylon, he would have deserved to be censured for one mistake only: but he asserts that Plutarch ascribes that employment to Harpalus (8). He is guilty therefore of a double mistake. I. He did not remember that Harpalus was Governor of Babylon, and that therefore the direction of the gardens was not his chief employment, but only a very little dependency of it. II. It is false that Plutarch asserts, what he ascribes to him.

(7) Apud Plutarch. Symplociac. lib. 3. cap. 2. p. 648.

(8) Plutarchus in Symplociacis, qui inter alia scribit eum hortis regis & viridariis Babyloniensis praepositum fuisse. Scalig. Animadv. in Eusebium, num. 1692, pag. 127.

[C] Phocion was not to be bribed.] Harpalus endeavoured chiefly to gain him: he saw the other declaimers come to him, and he gave them but small sums of money; but he offered 700 talents to Phocion, and would leave the determination of his affairs entirely to him. Τῶν εὐθέτων ἀπὸ τῆ βίβραστο χρηματικῆς δόμοσ ἢ καὶ ἀμιλλα φθιρομένων πρὸς αὐτόν, τῆτοις μὲν ἀπὸ πολλῶν μικρὰ δίδασάν, προήκατο καὶ διέτριψεν, τῷ δὲ Φωκίῳ προσέπειρα διδῆς ἐπιπέσοισι τάλαλα. i. e. "Those who used to get money by their declarations, crowded to him, boasting what they could do; but he gave them very little sums of his great treasure, and only as a bait to catch them; but he sent persons to Phocion to offer him 700 talents (9)." Phocion refused his offers, and let him know, that he would make him repent of his undertaking, if he continued to bribe the inhabitants: this obliged Harpalus to act with more caution; he found by experience, that all those base and mercenary persons, whom he had bribed, spoke publicly against him, in order to remove the suspicions that were entertained against them, and that Phocion, who refused his money, was the person who opposed him least; this made him attempt again to bribe him, but he found him proof against all possible temptations. Charicles, Phocion's son-in-law, did not inherit this integrity; he made himself so much suspected, that his father-in-law would not assist him, when he was prosecuted according to law, for corresponding with Harpalus (10). As for Demosthenes he acted most unfairly; for he received large sums of money in order to speak for Harpalus; but the time being come when he was to harangue, he appeared in the court with his neck wrapped up in rags, and complained of a sore throat, that made him incapable to plead (11); this gave occasion to a jest, which alluded to the squinancy. Οἱ δὲ εὐφροῖς χλευάζοντες ἐχ' ὑπὸ συνάγκης ἰφραζον ἀλλ' ἀπ' ἀντιφάσσης ἰλιφθαί νύκτωρ τὸν δημοκράτον. i. e. "The men of wit said in jest, that the Orator had been taken in the night time, not with a natural squinancy, but with a silver squinancy (12)." He did not come off with being only rallied; for his correspondence with Harpalus was the cause of his banishment (13). Observe that Pausanias thinks he was not guilty (14). Harpalus, and Glycera his concubine,

(9) Plut. in Phocione, pag. 751, B.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Idem, in Demosthenes, pag. 857.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) Justin. lib. 12. cap. 5.

(14) See the remark [D] towards the end.

caused a great quantity of corn to be distributed amongst the people at Athens. This was one of the particulars for which he was ridiculed in a comedy which was acted on the banks of the Hydaspes, and of which some say that Alexander himself was the Author (15). It is very remarkable that after Harpalus's death, a girl he had had by Pythonice was received into Phocion's house, and educated with all possible care both by him, and by his son-in-law Charicles (16).

(15) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 586, 595.

(16) Plutarch. in Phoc. pag. 751.

[D] Harpalus was obliged to look for another sanctuary.] He was commanded to retire from Athens, as Plutarch (17) and Curtius (18) tell us. I imagine that his cause was pleaded with some solemnity; for Pollux quotes an Oration of Hyperides ὑπὲρ Ἀρπάλου, for Harpalus. I do not mention Dinarchus's Oration, which is intitled ὑπὲρ τῆ μη ἐκδέναι Ἀρπάλου Ἀλεξάνδρῳ. i. e. "That Harpalus ought not to be given up to Alexander." This Oration is thought to be spurious. Yet it is true that this Orator did really plead in that cause; there were five of his Orations extant in that cause; there were five of his Orations extant ὑπὲρ Ἀρπάλου (19). i. e. "Concerning the case of Harpalus." This cause was attended with very great consequences; for after it had been resolved at Athens to banish Harpalus, informations were made against those, who suffered themselves to be bribed by his presents. He would have been given up to Alexander, if all the Athenians had been proof against bribery (20). One of Alexander's friends endeavoured most powerfully to persuade the Athenians to deliver Harpalus to him; and as he could not persuade them to it, he declared to them some time after who they were to whom Harpalus had given money, and how much he gave to each of them. He found this among the papers of Harpalus's Steward (22).

(17) See Scaliger. Animadv. in Eusebium, num. 1691, pag. m. 127.

(20) Pausanias, lib. 1. pag. 35.

(21) Philoxenus a Macedonian. Pausan. lib. 2. pag. 76.

(22) Idem, ibid.

Let us observe in this place the errors that are to be met with in Moreri's Philoxenus. The Author who wrote that article (23) asserts, that Philoxenus, a Macedonian General, took Harpalus in Candy, who had carried off Alexander's treasure . . . that he found out all those whom Harpalus had trusted with his treasure at Athens; that he sent a list of them to the Magistrates, in order to get the money back, and to have them punished; but that he would not name Demosthenes, though he had had some dispute with him, choosing to act on this occasion according to the great esteem he had for that Orator's eloquence, rather than to gratify his own resentment. Pausanias is quoted for this. I find five blunders in this account. I. It is false that Philoxenus took Harpalus either in Crete or in any other place; he took only his Steward, who had made his escape into the Island of Rhodes (24). The Author whom I censure does not mention it: This Omission will be his II. fault. III. Harpalus did not trust any person with his Treasure at Athens; he distributed money there to bribe some persons, that they might be favourable to him. IV. The List which Philoxenus sent to the Magistrates did not contain the names of those pretended Depositaries, but the names of those, to whom Harpalus gave money to bribe them. V. Pausanias (25), does not say, that Philoxenus designed to get that money back. VI. And he is so far from asserting that this Macedonian smothered his re-

BLUNDERS in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

(23) It is in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

(24) Pausanias, lib. 2. pag. 76.

(25) Idem, ibid.

(g) Idem, ibid.
(b) In the remark [D].

from thence into Crete. But he was not long secure in that island; one of his friends killed him perfidiously (g) [E]. The Supplement to Moreri is erroneous with regard to this particular, as I shall shew below (b). Alexander was so well persuaded that Harpalus was an honest man, that he ordered those to be put in irons as false accusers, who brought him the first news of that man's flight (i). The news he received of that traitor's being driven from Athens and killed, made him alter the resolution he had taken of re- turning into Europe to bring the Athenians back to their duty [F]. When he found that no books were to be met with in the Provinces distant from Greece, he employed Harpalus to procure him some [G]. The tomb which Harpalus erected to one of his mistresses was very magnificent [H]. I imagine that a certain complaint against Providence, sentment, because of the great esteem he had for Demosthenes's Eloquence, that on the contrary he supposes very plainly that this Orator would have been in Philoxenus's List, if his name had been found in the Papers of Harpalus's Steward. Pausanias reasons thus. If Harpalus had given money to Demosthenes, it would have been discovered by his Steward's Papers; and if it had been discovered, Philoxenus would have set his name down in the List he sent to the Athenians, for he had been engaged in a private Quarrel with Demosthenes, and he knew that Alexander was terribly exasperated against that famous Orator. Now he did not in the least mention Demosthenes, when he acquainted the Athenians with the names of those to whom Harpalus had given money, and let them know how much money he gave to every one of them. Whence we ought to infer, that Demosthenes did not receive any money from him. See now how much such compilers of Dictionaries ought to be depended upon. Or rather deplore the fate of an infinite number of Readers, who imagined innocently, that Pausanias gives us here an instance of very great generosity in the Character of a Man who was such an admirer of Demosthenes, though his Enemy, that he smothered his resentment against him, when he had a very good opportunity to be revenged of him. Such is the power of Eloquence, will young Orators cry out, who shall have looked for materials in this new Polyanthea (26).

(i) Ταῦτ' ἐπὶ τῷ πρῶτῳ τοῦ τῶν Ἀρπαλῶν φουρῆ καὶ ἀποδρά- νων ἀπαγγελῶν- τος ἔδωκεν Ἐπι- δάμαν καὶ Κισσοῦν οἱς καταψυδομή- νους τοῦ ἀνδρὸς. i. e. "He put Ephialtes and Citius in irons; who brought him the first news of Harpalus's escape and flight, as false accusers." Plut. in Alexand. pag. 689. B.

(26) That is to say in Moreri's Dictionary.

[E] One of his Friends killed him perfidiously.] Di- odorus Siculus tells us, that his name was Thimbron, and he was of Lacedemon, according to Arrian: He seized upon all Harpalus's effects. Others say that a Traveller committed that murder (27); others again charge Harpalus's Servants with it (28); and lastly some assert, that a certain Macedonian named Pausanias was guilty of it (29). Such different accounts tire the Readers patience, and are a disgrace to the Historians.

(27) Quint. Curtius, lib. 10. cap. 2.

(28) Pausanias, lib. 2. pag. 76.

(29) Idem, ibid.

[F] The news . . . that this Traitor had been driven from Athens . . . made Alexander alter his resolution . . . to bring the Athenians back to their duty.] Quintus Curtius acquaints us with this. His cognitis, says he, Rex Harpalo Atheniensibusque juxta infestus, classem parari jubet, Athenas protinus petiturus. Quod consilium dum agitat, clam litteras ei redduntur, Harpalum intrasse quidem Athenas, pecunia conciliasse sibi principum animos, mox concilio plebis habito, jussum urbe excedere, ad Græcos milites pervenisse, à quibus interruptum et trucidatum a quodam viatore per insidias. His lætus in Europam trajiciendi consilium omisit (30). i. e. "The King hearing this, was equally exasperated both against Harpalus and against the Athenians, and ordered his Fleet to be fitted out, being determined to sail immediately to Athens. But as he was making preparations to perform that design, he received secretly a Letter, which acquainted him, that Harpalus was indeed come to Athens, and had bribed the chief Citizens in his favour; but that the people meeting soon after in Council, he was ordered to depart from the City; and that being retired to his Greek Soldiers, he was taken by them, and treacherously killed by a certain Traveller. Alexander rejoicing at this, altered his Resolution of sailing into Europe."

(30) Quint. Curtius, lib. 10. cap. 2.

A man must be quite stupid, who does not observe that there must be a pretty large passage wanting between the first and second Chapter of Curtius's tenth Book. For is there any Historian so destitute of common sense as to speak of Harpalus in the manner as Curtius does in the passage we have transcribed, without telling his Readers first, who that Harpalus was, and in what undertaking he had been engaged. I need not to insist upon this. If any reader be not sensible of what I have just now observed, he would not be capable of understanding the reasons I might alledge.

[G] Alexander had employed Harpalus to procure him some Books.] Plutarch acquaints us with this particular: Read the following passage, you will find in it, that men did not think this Prince would be displeas'd, if they sent him Poems. Τῶν δὲ ἄλλων βιβλίων ἐκ ἰσοκράτους ἐν τοῖς αἰῶνι τόποις, Ἀρπαλῶν ἐκίλιον πέντε, καὶ κίλιον ἑπτακλίσιον αὐτῷ πρὸς τὸ Φιλίππου βίβλους, καὶ τῶν Ἐπιπιδῶν καὶ Σοφοκλέους καὶ Αἰσχύλου τραγῳδιῶν συγχρόνως, καὶ Τίλιου καὶ Φιλοξένου ὀδυράμβους (31). i. e. "As other Books could not easily be had in those remote Countries, he (Alexander) commanded Harpalus to send him some. Harpalus sent him the Books of Philistus, and a great number of Tragedies written by Euripides, Sophocles, and Æschylus; as also Telephus's Phyloxenus's Dithyrambicks."

[H] The Tomb which Harpalus erected to one of his Mistresses was very magnificent.] He had spent incredible Sums with Pythionice during her life, nor did he spend less for her burial. The funeral was attended with the most agreeable Symphony. All that could be performed in Music both with Voices and Instruments was made use of (32). He raised two stately Monuments to her, the one at Babylon, the other near Athens; they cost him above two hundred Talents. He consecrated a Temple and a grove to that woman under the name of Venus Pythionice, Ταυτὴς ἐτόλμησεν ὁ Φίλιππος οὗ Φάσανος ἱερὸν καὶ τίμασθαι ἰδρύσασθαι, καὶ προσεγυῖσθαι τὸν ναὸν καὶ τὸν βωμὸν Πυθιονικῆς Ἀφροδίτης. i. e. "He who glories that he is your friend, dared to consecrate a Temple and a Grove to her, which he called a Temple and a Grove of Venus Pythionice."

(32) Pofidonius, lib. 22. Historiarum, apud Athen. lib. 13. pag. 594.

(33) Theopompus, in Epist. ad Alexandrum, apud Athen. pag. 594.

(34) In Libris de Descensu in antram Troponium, apud Athen. pag. 594.

(35) Pausanias, lib. 1. pag. 36.

The Tomb he built to her in Attica on the road to Eleufis surpassed all those that were in the Neighbourhood. One would have taken it for the Tomb of one of the most eminent men that Athens ever produced. With what an astonishment must foreigners have been struck, when they were told that it was only the Tomb of a Courtesan? This is Dicaearchus's Reflexion (34). An Author, who was very well skilled in these matters, asserts, that the Tomb which was in the road to Eleufis, was the most beautiful of all the ancient Monuments that were to be seen in all Greece: ὅτι καὶ μνημῆα ἀποθανόντων ποιῆσαι πάντων ὀνόμα' Ἑλλήνων ἐστὶν ἀρχαῖα, βίας μάλιστα ἀξία. i. e. "He raised a Tomb to her after her Death, which is the best worth seeing of all the ancient Monuments of Greece (35)." It is even certain, that Harpalus's design was not faithfully executed; they did not spend the whole Sum which he intended for that Monument. Chericles, Phocion's Son-in-law, took upon him, at Harpalus's request, the direction of that work, and did not spend in it the thirty Talents with which he had been trusted for that purpose. He disgraced himself two ways; 1. by taking upon him the Direction of a Monument that was designed for a Prostitute; 2. by keeping for himself part of the money with which he had been trusted. Μνημῆον ἀπὸ χρημάτων πολλῶν ἐπιτελεῖσθαι θελήσας προστάζει τῷ Χαρικλῆϊ τὴν ἐπιμέλειαν. ὅσα δὲ τῆν ὑπερβίαν ταύτην, ἀγνήν προσκατήσχυνεν ὁ τάφος συντελεσθείς. διαμένει γὰρ ἔτι ἰὼν ἐν Ἐρμιῶν, ἢ βαδίζομαι ἐξ ἄσπεος εἰς Ἐλευσίαν, μηδὲν ἔχον τῶν τριῶντα ταλάντων ἀξίον, ὅσα τῷ Ἀρπαλῶ λογισθῆναι φασὶν εἰς τὸ ἔργον ὑπὸ τῷ Χαρικλῆϊ. i. e. "Harpalus designing to raise a most stately and rich Monument, committed the care of it to Charicles. This Task, which was disgraceful in itself, appeared still more so when the Tomb was finished, which is still to be seen near the Temple of Mercury in the road from Athens to Eleufis; it does not appear that this Monument which Tully has preserved, does not relate to our Harpalus [I]. If I am in the right father Lescapier's moral reflections are misapplied. There is a blunder in Eusebius, which I shall take notice of [K].

" Monument cost thirty Talents, which Sum Charicles is said to have reckoned to Harpalus." Pausanias owns that he knew nothing of Pythionice's Country, nor of her family, but only that she followed the trade of a Courtesan at Athens and Corinth. Athenæus was a little better acquainted with her. He tells us, that she had been a Servant to Bacchis, who used to play on the Flute, and that she entered afterwards into the Service of a Thracian Bawd, who lived at Egina, and followed her to Athens, whither that Bawd removed with her Brother; so that Pythionice was a threefold Slave, and a threefold Prostitute; ὡς τε γυναικαὶ μὴ μόνον τριδούλοσ, ἀλλὰ καὶ τριπαιρὸν αὐτῆν; Ut non solum ter mancipium, sed etiam ter scortum fuerit (37).

(37) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 595. ex Theopompo in Epist. ad Alexandrum.

(38) De Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 34.

(39) Lib. 6. in Diogen. num. 74.

(40) In Διογένη.

[I] I imagine that a certain complaint against Providence does not relate to our Harpalus.] Here follow Tully's words (38): Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere solebat, Harpalum, qui temporibus illis prædo felix habebatur, contra Deos testimonium dicere, quod in illa fortuna tam diu viveret. i. e. "Diogenes the Cynick used to say, that Harpalus, who passed at that time for a successful Pirate, bore witness against the Gods by continuing so long happy." I am of Monsieur Menage's opinion; the Harpalus of Cicero, the Hirpalus of Diogenes Laertius (39), and the Hirpalus of Suidas (40) seem to me to be but one and the same person. Now the Scirpalus of Diogenes Laertius, and the Scirtalus of Suidas was a notorious Pirate, who took Diogenes prisoner, and sold him. I believe therefore that Tully's Harpalus was a noted Pirate, and not one of Alexander the Great's Generals. The Character which Cicero gives of Harpalus cannot in the least be applied to Alexander's General. Cicero's Harpalus was a noted Robber, as famous for the Happiness that attended him in his plunders, as for the Robberies themselves. His continued prosperity was well known, as appears by the consequence, which Diogenes inferred from it; for a man would expose himself to ridicule, if he should argue, as Diogenes did, in a City, where a Pirate had but for three or four Years become famous by the considerable prizes he made. Add to this, that a man is never more inclined to reflect upon Providence for the Prosperity of the wicked, than when he suffers himself by that Prosperity, (41). If therefore there was any Robber, whose long continued Impunity could draw from Diogenes's Mouth the complaint related by Cicero, it was no doubt the Man, whose Slave Diogenes became; and as he became the Slave of a Pirate, and not of the Governor of Babylon, we ought to infer from thence, that the witness, he thought could be produced against the being of the Gods, was the very Pirate who took him.

(41) See above, the remark [C] of the article DIAGORAS the Atheist.

It is therefore to no purpose, that Father Lescapier (42) represents to his Readers, that Harpalus the Governor of Babylon did not continue long unpunished, after he had robbed the Treasure of the King his Master. It is to no purpose that he observes, this Robber suffered misfortunes upon misfortunes, and was miserably murdered at a year's end; he only argues against himself; the nearer he comes to his scope, the farther he recedes from the Subject he had in hand: for the Question is about a Robber who had been a long time happy; this is the objection; and you mention to us a Robber who was punished soon after he committed the fact; this is not answering; it is rather labouring, without being aware of it, to make of a trifling Difficulty a stumbling-block for weak men; it gives them offence to see, that you answer a free-thinker by altering quite the state of the question. And then, is not this conclusion of the Father Jesuit very edifying? Omitte Harpalum, sume Diogenem: ne querere quod regia pecunia prædo unum annum vivat in sua fortuna: querere quod prædo divine providentia in sua impietate longam vitam vivat: sed neque id certe conquerendum est, nam longa vita miserissimi canis omnibus infestis, omnibus exosi, longum supplicium fuit, longioris tamen supplicii breve præludium (43). i. e. "Do not mention Harpalus; speak of Diogenes; do not complain, that the Robber of the King's Treasure should enjoy his happiness for one year only; but complain that he who robbed God of his providence, should live a long while in his impiety, or rather do not complain even of this; for the long life of a most wretched Dog, hating all, and hated by all, was a long punishment, and yet but a short beginning of an eternal suffering."

(42) Lescapier, Commentar. in Ciceron. de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. pag. 683.

[K] There is a blunder in Eusebius, which I shall take notice of.] He observes under the third year of the 113th Olympiad, that Harpalus fled into Asia. Harpalus fugit in Asiam. Scaliger approves this Chronology; but he corrects Asiam into Atticam. And it is certain, that if Eusebius did not say Atticam, he ought to have said it. Bongars (44) had corrected it thus, fugit ex Asia, he fled out of Asia.

(43) Lescapier, in Cicer. de Nat. Deor. lib. 3. pag. 682.

(44) In Justin. lib. 12. cap. 5.

" HARAVAD (ISAAC BEN), a famous Rabbi towards the end of the twelfth Century. He wrote something, but it is not exactly known what it is. They ascribe two wonderful properties to him; for they assert, that he could know by people's faces, whether they had a soul that came from another body, or whether it began only to exist the moment it was united to theirs; and though he were blind, yet he could discover with certainty by his smell only, whether a person was alive or dead (a). Father Bartolucci's censure is somewhat unpolite on this occasion [A].

(a) Taken from Bartolucci's Bibliotheca Rabbinnica, tom. 5. pag. 888, 889.

[A] Father Bartolucci's censure is somewhat unpolite on this occasion.] Having quoted the following words from the Rabbi Rekanati, Et licet fuisset cæcus, sensibiliter percipiebat ex aere an iste fuisset vivus an verò mortuus, i. e. "and though he were blind, yet he could sensibly perceive by the air whether the man were dead or alive; he adds (1), cognoscere cadaver ex olfactu mira res apud Judeos; quia cum Judei male olentes inter se continuo versentur, illorum olfaciendi sensus videtur depravatus, ut inter cadaveris & latrinarum malum odorem distinguere nesciant, nisi prodigium fiat. i. e. "To discover a dead corps by the smell is a wonder amongst the Jews; for as all the Jews sink, it seems that by conversing together their sense of smelling is so depraved, that they cannot, without a miracle, distinguish the smell of a corps, from that of a house of office." This is a very silly joke, and if we will divest ourselves of all cavilling humour, we shall confess, that there was something very remarkable in the smell of that Rabbi, in case he did really make the distinction that is ascribed to him: for we ought not to imagine, that it is asserted he could smell whether a man, who had been dead for some days, was not alive; there is no blind person but could do this, the meaning is, that the alteration he perceived in the air as soon as a man was expired, made him know with certainty that the man was dead. Will it not be confessed that this alteration in the air is imperceptible? Father Bartolucci has found fault with another thing; he asks how this blind Rabbi could discover the age of the soul by looking a person in the face. But this censure falls to the ground, unless the same persons, who mentioned this quality of our Rabbi, had also expressly asserted that he was actually blind, when he look'd some men in the face. Now it does not appear that they made any such assertion. Pius ille Haravad conoscebat ex vultu, utrum animâ creatâ in ipso actu infusionis informaretur homo, an vero aliunde ex transmigratiõne animam haberet adventitiã (2). i. e. "That pious man Haravad could know by a person's face, whether the soul that animated him was created the moment it was united with the body, or whether it came from another place by transmigration." The words of the Rabbi Rekanati (3) indeed prove, that the other Rabbi knew by people's faces, whether their soul was

(1) Bartolucci, Bibliotheca Rabbinnica, tom. 3. pag. 889.

(2) R. Rekanati, apud Bartolucci, Biblioth. Rabbinnica, tom. 3. pag. 888.

(3) Gruter has inserted them into the 2d vol. of his Theophrastus Criticus.

HARRINGTON (JAMES), an eminent English writer in the seventeenth Century, was descended of an ancient family in Rutlandshire [A], and was eldest son of Sir Sapcote Harrington by Jane the daughter of Sir William Samuel of Upton in Northamptonshire (a). He was born at Upton the first Friday in January 1611 (b). In his very childhood he gave sure hopes of his future abilities, as well by his inclination and capacity to learn whatever was proposed to him, as by a kind of natural gravity; whence his parents and masters used to say, that he rather kept them in awe, than needed their correction. Yet when grown to a man, none could easily surpass him in quickness of wit, and a most facetious temper (c). He was entered a Gentleman Commoner of Trinity College in Oxford in the year 1629 (d) under the tuition of Mr. (e) William Chillingworth. He left the University before he took a degree, and travelled into Holland, France, Italy, Denmark and Germany [B], and learned the languages of those countries. Upon his return to England, he was admitted one of the Privy Chamber extraordinary to the King, whom he attended in that quality in his Majesty's first expedition against the Scots; and took care of the affairs of the Elector Palatine (f). In the beginning of the civil wars in 1642 he adhered to the interests of the Parliament, and endeavoured to get a seat in it, but in vain (g). In January 1647, attending out of curiosity on the Commissioners appointed by the Parliament to bring the King from Newcastle nearer London, he was by some of them named to wait on his Majesty, as a person known to him before, and engaged to no party or faction. The King approved the proposal; yet Mr. Harrington would never presume to come into his presence except in public, till he was particularly commanded by the King, and that he and Mr. Thomas Herbert (created a Baronet after the Restoration) were made Grooms of the Bed-Chamber at Holmby, together with Mr. James Maxwell and Mr. Patrick Maule (afterwards Earl of Penmure in Scotland), which two only remained of his old servants in that station (h). His Majesty loved his company, "and chose rather, says Mr. Wood, (finding him to be an ingenious man) to discourse with him than with others of this Chamber. They had often discourses concerning government; but when they happened to talk of a Commonwealth, the King seemed not to endure it." It is asserted from his sister's papers, cited by Mr. Toland, that at the King's command he translated into English Dr. Sanderfon's book concerning the obligation of oaths. But Mr. Wood tells us (i), that this Translation was made by his Majesty himself, and that he shewed it at different times to Mr. Harrington, Mr. Herbert, Bishop Juxon, Dr. Hammond, and Dr. Sheldon. He served the King with great fidelity [C], and made use of his interest with his friends in Parliament to procure matters to be accommodated with all parties (k). After the King was removed out of the Isle of Wight to Hurst-Castle in Hampshire, our author

(a) Life of James Harrington, pag. 13, prefixed to his Oceana and other Works, printed at London 1700, in fol.

(b) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 588. 2d edit. London 1588.

(c) Life of James Harrington, pag. 14.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

(e) Not Dr. as Mr. John Toland in his Life of James Harrington, pag. 14. files him.

(f) Life of Harrington, pag. 14; 15.

(g) Wood, ubi supra.

(h) Life of Harrington, pag. 16.

(i) Vols. 1. col. 321.

(k) Life of Harrington, pag. 16.

entirely new or not; but not, whether he knew it by looking into their face or by touching it. Now these two methods are equally wonderful; nay, the latter seems to be more difficult than the former. It will be objected in Bartolucci's behalf, that Rekanati speaking of the other propriety, observes that the Rabbi Harravad was blind. But I shall still ask, does he suppose, that when Harravad was blind, he was at the same time that wonderful Physiognomist, who could discover whether the soul was in its native place? For if he only meant that Harravad could discover this before he was blind, what will become of Bartolucci's raileries, exclamations and invectives? He was in the right to turn all those silly tales into ridicule, but he should have made use of other arguments to expose them. We ought to be accurate and exact, whomsoever we pretend to refute.

[A] Descended of an ancient Family in Rutlandshire. He was great grandson of Sir James Harrington; of whom it is observed by the Historian of that County (1), that there were sprung in his time eight Dukes, three Marquises, seventy Earls, twenty seven Viscounts, and thirty six Barons; of which number sixteen were Knights of the Garter. Our Author's father Sir Sapcote Harrington was younger brother to Sir Edward Harrington of Ridlington in Rutlandshire Bart. and son of Sir James Harrington Bart. younger brother to John Lord Harrington. Sir Sapcote by his first wife Jane the daughter of Sir William Samuel had children besides our Author; viz. William, a Merchant in London, Elizabeth married to Sir Ralph Ashton of Lancashire Bart; Anne, married to Arthur Evelyn Esq; By a second wife he had John, killed at sea; Edward, a Captain in the Army; Frances, married to John Bagshaw at Culworth in Northamptonshire Esq; and Dorothy, married to Allan Bellingham of Levens in Westmorland Esq; (2).

[B] Travelled into Holland, France, Italy, Denmark and Germany. He first went to Holland, then the principal school of martial discipline, and (what touched him more sensibly) a country wonderfully flourishing under the influence of liberty, which they had so lately asserted by breaking the yoke of the King of Spain. And here no doubt it was, that he began to make government the subject of his meditations; for he was often heard to say, that before he left England, he knew no more of Monarchy, Anarchy, Aristocracy, Democracy, Oligarchy, and the like, than as hard words, whereof he learned the signification in his Dictionary. For some months he listed himself in the Lord Craven's Regiment and Sir Robert Stone's; during which time being much at the Hague, he had the opportunity of further accomplishing himself in two Courts, that of the Prince of Orange, and that of the Queen of Bohemia, daughter of King James I. She entertained him with great civility and favour on account of his great uncle (3) John Lord Harrington, who had been her Governor; but particularly for his own merit. The Prince Elector likewise courted him into his service, and engaged him to attend him in a journey to the Court of Denmark. Thro' Flanders he passed into France, and thence into Italy.

[C] He served the King with great fidelity. Mr. Wood tells us (4), that he "finding his Majesty quite another person as to his parts, religion, morals, &c. than what were represented by the faction, who gained their ends by lies and scandals, he became passionately affected with him, and took all occasions to vindicate him in what company soever he happened to be." And Mr. Toland observes (5), that during the Treaty of the Isle of Wight he frequently warned the Divines of his acquaintance to take heed how far they pressed the King to insist upon any thing, which, however it concerned their dignity, was no essential point of Religion: and that such matters driven too far would infallibly ruin all the endeavours used for a peace; which prophecy was proved too true by the event.

(3) Not Uncle, as Mr. Toland says, ubi supra, pag. 14.

(4) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 588.

(5) Life of James Harrington, pag. 16.

(1) Wright in his Antiquities of the County of Rutland, pag. 52.

(2) Toland's Life of James Harrington, pag. 13.

author was forcibly turned out of the service, because he vindicated some of his Majesty's arguments against the Parliament-Commissioners of Newport, and thought his concessions not so unsatisfactory as some others did [D]. As they were taking the King to Windfor, he begged admittance to the boot of the coach, that he might bid his master farewell; which being granted, and he preparing to kneel, the King took him by the hand, and pulled him in to him. He was for three or four days permitted to stay; but because he would not take an oath against assisting or concealing the King's escape, he was not only discharged from his office, but also for some time detained in custody till Major General Ireton obtained his liberty. He afterwards found means to see the King at St. James's, and attended him on the scaffold, where, or a little before, he received a token of his Majesty's affection (I). After his Majesty's death he was observed to keep much in his Library, and to be more retired than usual; which was by his friends for a long time ascribed to melancholy or discontent. But he at last shewed them the manuscript of his Oceana, printed in 1656 [E], which he had been privately writing all that while.

(I) Ibid. pag. 17.

(6) Ubi supra, pag. 16, 17.

(7) Col. 588, 589.

[D] Was forcibly turned out of the service, because he vindicated some of his Majesty's arguments against the Parliament-Commissioners at Newport, and thought his concessions not so unsatisfactory as some others did.] This is the account of Mr. Toland (6). Mr. Wood relates the affair as follows (7). His Majesty being hurried away from Holmby to the Isle of Wight, and thence to Hurst-Castle in Hampshire on the 30th of November 1648, it happened, that Mr. Harrington one morning fell into discourse with the Governor of the Castle and some others of the Parliament-Officers there concerning the late Treaty of Newport, "wherein he magnified the King's wisdom in his arguments with the Commissioners upon the propositions for peace, and satisfaction the Parliament had in his concessions, and probability in a happy event, if this force in removing him to Hurst-Castle had not intervened and made an unhappy fracture, which created parties; enlarging also upon his Majesty's learned disputes with Mr. Richard Vines and other Presbyterian Divines with such moderation, as gained applause from all those that heard him argue. Which discourse, how inoffensive soever, and without exception at any other time or place, truth is not at all times seasonable or safe to be spoken, as by our Author's example was evidenced. For those captious persons, with whom he held discourse, being full of jealousy, and apt to wrest his words to the worst sense, they withdrew a little, and at their return they told him plainly they were dissatisfied with what he had said. He desired them to instance wherein: they replied in all particulars; which when he began to repeat for his own satisfaction and their better understanding, they interrupted him, and told him in plain terms, they could not suffer his attendance any longer about the King. Which proceeding and dismissal, without acquainting him with the occasion, was ill resented by the King, who had Harrington in good esteem, looking upon him as a Gentleman qualified with special parts; and having found him trusty, his service was the more acceptable, yet blamed him nevertheless for not being more wary amongst men, that were at such a time full of jealousies, and very little obliging to his Majesty."

[E] His Oceana printed in 1656.] It was published in a thin folio under the title of The Commonwealth or Oceana: to his Highness the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. When he shewed the manuscript of this work to his friends before the publication of it, he told them, that ever since he had begun to examine things seriously, he had principally applied himself to the study of Civil Government, as being of the highest importance to the peace and felicity of mankind; and that he succeeded, at least to his own satisfaction, being now convinced, that no Government is of so accidental and arbitrary an institution as people are wont to imagine, there being in societies natural causes producing their necessary effects as well as in the earth or the air. Hence he frequently argued, that the troubles of his time were not to be wholly attributed to willfulness or faction, neither to the misgovernment of the Prince, nor the stubbornness of the people; but to a change in the balance of property, which ever since Henry VIIIth's time was daily falling into the scale of the Commons from that of the King and Lords, as he shews in his Book. Not that hereby he approved either the breaches, which the King had made on the laws, or excused the severity, which some of the subjects exercised on the King; but to shew, that as long as the causes of these disorders remained, so long would the like effects unavoidably follow; while on the one hand a King would be always endeavouring to govern according to the example of his predecessors, when the best part of the national property was in their own hands, and consequently the greatest command of money and men; as one of a thousand pounds a year can entertain more servants, or influence more tenants, than another, that has but one hundred; out of which he cannot allow one valet. And on the other hand he said, that the people would be sure to struggle for preserving the property, whereof they were in possession, never failing to obtain more privileges, and to enlarge the basis of their liberty, as often as they met with any success (which they generally did) in quarrels of this kind. His chief aim therefore was to find out a method of preventing such distempers, or to apply the best remedies, when they happened to break out. But as long as the balance remained in this unequal state, he affirmed, that no King whatsoever could keep himself easy, let him never so much endeavour to please his people; and that though a good King might manage affairs tolerably well during his life, yet this did not prove the government to be good, since under a less prudent Prince it would fall to pieces again, while the orders of a well constituted State make wicked men virtuous, and fools to act wisely. He was the first who discovered, that Empire follows the balance of property, whether lodged in one, in a few, or in many hands; and he no sooner discoursed publicly of this new doctrine, being a man of universal acquaintance, but it engaged all sorts of people to busy themselves about it as they were variously affected. Some, because they understood him, despised it, alledging, that it was plain to every man's capacity; as if his highest merit did not consist in making it so. Others, and those in number the fewest, disputed with him about it, merely to be better informed. But a third sort out of pure envy strove to lessen or defame him; and one of them (since they could not find any precedent writer, out of whose works they might make him a plagiarist) endeavoured, after a very singular manner, to rob him of the glory of this discovery; for our author having freely lent him a part of his papers, the latter published a small piece to the same purpose intitled, A Letter from an Officer of the Army in Ireland, &c. Major Wildman was then reputed the author by some, and Henry Nevil Esq; by others; which latter, by reason of this thing, and his great intimacy with Mr. Harrington, was by his detractors reported to be the author of his works, or that at least he had a principal hand in composing them. Notwithstanding these provocations, so true was Mr. Harrington to the friendship, which he professed to Mr. Nevil and Major Wildman, that he avoided all harsh expressions or public censures on this occasion, contenting himself with the justice, which the world was soon obliged to yield to him by reason of his other writings, wherein no such assistances could reasonably be expected. But the publication of his book met with greater difficulties from the opposition of the several parties then set against one another, and all against him; but from none more than some of those, who pretended to be for a Commonwealth, while. This work of his was attacked by several writers, against whom he defended it.

Commonwealth, which was the specious name under which they covered the rankest tyranny in Cromwell. Our Author by shewing, that a Commonwealth was a government of Laws, and not of the sword, could not but detect the violent administration of the Protector by his Major Generals, which created him no small danger; while the Cavaliers on the other hand taxed him with ingratitude to the memory of the late King, and preferred the Monarchy even of an Usurper to the best ordered Commonwealth. To these he answered, that it was enough for him to forbear publishing his sentiments, during that King's life; but the Monarchy being now quite dissolved, and the Nation in a state of anarchy, or, what was worse, groaning under an horrid usurpation, he was not only at liberty, but even obliged as a good citizen to offer his assistance to his countrymen, and to shew them such a model of government, as he thought most conducing to their tranquillity, wealth, and power. That the cavaliers ought of all people to be best pleased with him, since if his model succeeded, they were sure to enjoy equal privileges with others, and so be delivered from their present oppression; for in a well constituted Commonwealth there can be no distinction of parties; the passage to preferment is open to merit in all persons, and no honest man can be uneasy. But that if the Prince should happen to be restored, his doctrine of the balance would be a light to shew him what and with whom he had to do, and so either to mend or avoid the miscarriages of his father; since all that is said of this doctrine may as well be accommodated to a Monarchy regulated by law, as to a Democracy or more popular form of Government. He used to add on such occasions another reason of writing this model, which was, that if it should ever be the fate of this nation to be like Italy of old, over-run by any barbarous people, or to have its Government and Records destroyed by the rage of some merciless conqueror, they might not be then left to their own invention in framing a new Government; for few people can be expected to succeed so happily as the Venetians have done in such a cause. In the mean time it was known to some of the Courtiers, that the book was printing; whereupon, after hunting it from one press to another, they seized it at last, and conveyed it to Whitehall. All the solicitations Mr. Harrington could make were not able to retrieve his papers, till he remembered that Oliver's favourite daughter, the Lady Claypole, acted the part of a Princess very naturally, obliging all persons with her civility, and frequently interceding for the unhappy. To this Lady, though an absolute stranger to him, he thought fit to make his application; and being led into her antichamber, he sent in his Name, with his request, that she would admit him to her presence. While he attended, some of her women coming into the room, were followed by her little daughter about three years old, who stayed behind them. He entertained the child so divertingly, that she suffered him to take her up in his arms till her mother came; whereupon he stepping towards her, and setting the child down at her feet, said, Madam, it is well you are come at this nick of time, or I had certainly stole this pretty little Lady. Stolen her! replied the mother, pray what to do with her? for she is too young to become your mistress. "Madam, said he, though her charms assure her of a more considerable conquest, yet I must confess, it is not love, but revenge that prompted me to commit this theft." Lord, answered the Lady again, what injury have I done you, that you should steal my child? "None at all," replied he, but that you might be induced to prevail with your father to do me justice, by restoring my child, that he has stolen." But she urging, that it was impossible, because her father had children enough of his own; he told her at last, that it was the issue of his brain, which was misrepresented to the Protector, and taken out of the press by his order. She immediately promised to procure it for him, if it contained nothing prejudicial to her father's government; and he assured her, that it was only a kind of Political Romance, so far from any treason against her father, that he hoped she would acquaint him, that he designed to dedicate it to him, and promised, that she herself should be presented with one of the first copies. The Lady was so well pleased with his manner of address, that he had his book speedily restored to him; and he accordingly inscribed it to Oliver Cromwell, who after the perusal of it, said, that "the Gentleman had like to trapan him out of his power; but that what he got by the sword, he would not quit for a little paper-shot; adding, that he approved the government of a single person as little as any of them, but that he was forced to take upon him the office of an High-Constable, to preserve the peace among the several parties in the nation, since he saw that being left to themselves, they would never agree to any certain form of Government, and would only spend their whole power in defeating the designs, or destroying the person of one another." We shall now proceed to give an account of the Book, which is written after the manner of a Romance, in imitation of Plato's Atlantic Story. By Oceana he means England; by Adoxus, King Jobn; by Convallium, Hampton-Court; by Coraanus, Henry VIII; by Dicoitome, K. Richard II; by Emporium, London; by Halcionia, the Thames; by Halo, Whitehall; by Hiera, Westminster; by Leviathan, Hobbes; by Marpesta, Scotland; by Morpheus, King James I; by Mount Celia, Windsor; by Neufrians, Normans; by Olphaus Megaletor, Oliver Cromwell; by Panopæa, Ireland; by Pantbeon, Westminster-Hall; by Panurgus, Henry VII; by Parthenia, Queen Elizabeth; by Scandians, Danes; by Teutons, Saxons; by Turbo, William the Conqueror; by Verulamius, Lord Bacon. The book consists of preliminaries divided into two parts, and a third section called the Council of Legislators. Then follows the model of the Commonwealth, or the body of the book; and lastly the corollary or conclusion. The Preliminary Discourses contain the principles, generation, and effects of all Governments, whether Monarchical, Aristocratical, or Popular, and their several corruptions, as tyranny, oligarchy, and anarchy, with all the good or bad mixtures, which naturally result from them. But the first part treats in a more particular manner of antient prudence, or that genius of Government, which most prevailed in the world since the time of Julius Cæsar. The second part of the Preliminaries treats of modern prudence, or that genius of Government which has most obtained in the world since the expiration of the Roman liberty, particularly the Gothic constitution, beginning with the inundation of the barbarous nations over the Roman empire. He gives a clear account of the English Government under the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, till the dissolution of it under Charles I. Next follows the Council of Legislators; for our author being about to give the most perfect model of Government, made himself master of all the antient and modern Politicians, that he might as well imitate whatever was excellent or practicable in them, as avoid all things, which were impracticable or inconvenient. To this end he introduces under feigned names nine Legislators, who perfectly understood the several Governments, which they were appointed to represent. The province of the first was the Commonwealth of Israel; that of the second, Athens; of the third, Sparta; of the fourth, Carthage; of the fifth, the Acæans, Æolians, and Lycians; of the sixth, Rome; of the seventh, Venice; of the eighth, Switzerland; and of the ninth, Holland; Out of the excellencies of all these, supplied with the fruits of his own invention, he formed the model of his Oceana. In the Model, he observes this method, to lay down his orders or laws in so many positive propositions, to each of which he subjoins an explanatory discourse; and, if there be occasion, adds a speech supposed to be delivered by the Lord Archon, or some of the Legislators. The Épitome of this model is as follows. The center or fundamental laws are, first, the Agrarian, proportioned at two thousand pounds a year in land, lying and being within the proper territory of Oceana, and stating property in land at such a balance, that the power can never swerve out of the hands of the many.

Secondly, The ballot conveying this equal sap from the root, by an unequal election or rotation, into the branches branches of magistracy or sovereign power.

The orbs of this Commonwealth being civil, military, or provincial, are, as it were, cast upon this mold or center by the divisions of the people: First, into citizens and servants: Secondly, into youth and elders: Thirdly, into such as have one hundred pounds a year in lands, goods, or monies, who are of the horse; and such as have under, who are of the foot: Fourthly, they are divided by their usual residence into parishes, hundreds, and tribes.

The civil orbs consist of the elders, and are thus created. Every Monday next ensuing the last of December, the elders in every parish elect the fifth man to be a Deputy; which is but half a day's work. Every Monday next ensuing the last of January, the Deputies meet at their respective hundred, and elect out of their number one Justice of the Peace, one Jurymen, one Coroner, and one High Constable of the foot; one day's work.

Every Monday next ensuing the last of February, the hundreds meet at their respective tribe, and there elect the Lord's High-Sheriff, Lieutenant, Custos Rotulorum, the Conductor, the two Censors out of the Horse, the Magistrates of the Tribe, and of the Hundreds, with the Jurymen constituting the Phylarch, and who assist in their respective offices at the Assizes, hold the Quarter-sessions, &c. The day following the Tribe elects the annual Galaxy, consisting of two Knights, and three Deputies out of the Horse, with four Deputies out of the Foot, thereby inducted with power, as Magistrates of the whole nation, for the term of three years. An officer chosen at the Hundred may not be elected a Magistrate of the Tribe; but a Magistrate or Officer either of the Hundred or of the Tribe, being elected into the Galaxy, may substitute any one of his own order to his Magistracy or Office in the Hundred or in the Tribe. This of the Muster is two days work. So the body of the people is annually at the charge of three days work and an half, in their own Tribes, for the perpetuation of their power, receiving over and above the Magistracies so divided among them.

Every Monday next ensuing the last of March, the Knights, being an hundred in all the Tribes, take their places in the Senate, and make the third region of the same, and the House proceeds to the Senatorian Elections. Senatorian Elections are annual, biennial, or emergent.

The annual is performed by the tropic.

The tropic is a schedule, consisting of two parts; the first, by which the Senatorian Magistrates are elected; and the second, by which the Senatorian Counsellors are perpetuated.

The first part is of this tenor. The Lord Strategus, the Lord Orator, the first Censor, and the second Censor, annual Magistrates, and therefore such as may be elected out of any region; the term of every region having at the tropic one year at least unexpired. The third Commissioner of the Seal, and the third Commissioner of the Treasury, triennial Magistrates, and therefore such as can be chosen out of the third region only, as that alone, which has the term of three years unexpired.

The Strategus and the Orator sitting are Consuls or Presidents of the Senate.

The Strategus marching is General of the Army, in which case a new Strategus is elected to sit in his room.

The Strategus sitting with the six Commissioners, being Counsellors of the nation, are the signory of the Commonwealth.

The Censors are Magistrates of the Ballot, Presidents of the Council for Religion, and Chancellors of the University.

The second part of the tropic perpetuates the Council of State by the election of five Knights out of the first region of the Senate, to be the first region of that Council, consisting of fifteen Knights, five in every region.

The like is done by the Election of four into the Council of Religion, and four into the Council of Trade, out of the same Region in the Senate; each of these Councils consisting of twelve Knights, four in every Region.

But the Council of War consisting of nine Knights, three in every Region, is elected by and out of the Council of State, as the other Councils are elected by and out of the Senate. And if the Senate add a Juncto of nine Knights more, elected out of their own number, for the term of three Months, the Council of War, by Vertue of that addition, is dictator of Oceana for the said Term.

For the Signory jointly or severally has a right of Session, and suffrage of every Senatorian Council, and to propose either to the Senate, or any of them. And every Region in a Council electing one weekly Provost, any two of those Provosts have power also to propose to their respective Council, as the proper and peculiar Proposers of the same; for which cause they hold an Academy, where any man, either by word of Mouth, or writing, may propose the Proposers.

Next to the Elections of the Tropic is the biennial Election of one Embassador in Ordinary, by the ballot of the House, to the Residence of France; at which time the Resident of France removes to Spain, he of Spain to Venice, he of Venice to Constantinople, and he of Constantinople returns. So the orb of Residents is wheeled about in eight years by the Election of one Embassador in Ordinary.

The last kind of Election is emergent. Emergent Elections are made by the scrutiny. Election by scrutiny is when a competitor being made by a Council, and brought into the Senate, the Senate chooses four more competitors to him; and putting all five to the ballot, he who has most above half the Suffrages, is the Magistrate. The Polemarchs or Field-Officers are chosen by the scrutiny of the Council of War; an Embassador Extraordinary by the scrutiny of the Council of State; the Judges and Serjeants at Law by the scrutiny of the Seal; and the Barons and prime Officers of the Exchequer by the scrutiny of the Treasury.

The opinion or opinions, that are legitimately proposed to any Council, must be debated by the same; and so many as are resolved upon the debate, are introduced into the Senate, where they are debated and resolved, or rejected by the whole House. That which is resolved by the Senate is a decree, which is good in matters of State, but no Law, except it be proposed to, and resolved by the Prerogative.

The Deputies of the Galaxy, being three Horse and four Foot in a Tribe, amount in all the Tribes to one hundred and fifty Horse, and two hundred Foot; which having entered the Prerogative, and chosen their Captains, Cornets, and Ensign (triennial Officers) make the third Class, consisting of one Troop and one Company; and so joining with the whole Prerogative, elect four annual Magistrates, called Tribunes, whereof two are of the Horse, and two of the Foot. These have the command of the Prerogative Sessions, and suffrage in the Council of War, and Sessions without Suffrage in the Senate.

The Senate having passed a decree, which they would propose to the people, cause it to be printed and published, or promulgated for the space of six Weeks; which being ordered, they choose their Proposers. The Proposers must be Magistrates, that is, the Commissioners of the Seal, those of the Treasury, or the Censors. These being chosen, desire the Musters of the Tribunes, and appoint the Day. The people being assembled at the Day appointed, and the decree proposed, that which is proposed by authority of the Senate, and commanded by the people, is the Law of Oceana, or an act of Parliament. So the Parliament of Oceana consists of the Senate proposing, and the people resolving.

The People or Prerogative are also the supreme Judiciary of this Nation, having power of hearing and determining all causes of Appeal from all Magistrates, or Courts provincial, or domestick; as also to question any Magistrate, the term of his Magistracy being expired, if the case be introduced by the Tribunes or any of them.

The military Orbs consist of the Youth, that is, such as are from eighteen to thirty Years of Age; and are created in the following manner.

Every Wednesday next ensuing the last of December, the Youth of every Parish assembling, elect the fifth of their number to be their Deputies. The Deputies of the Youth are called Stratiots; and this is the first Essay.

Every

it [F]. In 1659 he published an Abridgment of his Oceana under the title of The Art of Lawgiving [G]. Besides his endeavours to propagate his Republican notions by his writings, Every Wednesday next ensuing the last of January, the Stratiots assembling at the Hundred, elect their Captain and their Ensign, and fall to their Games and Sports.

Every Wednesday next ensuing the last of February, the Stratiots are received by the Lord Lieutenant their Commander in chief, with the Conductors and the Censors; and having been disciplined and entertained with other Games, are called to the Urns, where they elect the second Essay, consisting of two hundred Horse and six hundred Foot in a Tribe; that is, of ten thousand Horse, and thirty thousand Foot in all the Tribes, which is the standing Army of this Nation, to march at any warning. They also elect at the same time a part of the third Essay, by the mixture of Balls marked with the Letter M, and the Letter P. for Marpefia (6), and Panopea (7); they of either mark being ten Horse, and fifty Foot in a Tribe, that is, five hundred Horse, and two thousand five hundred Foot in all the Tribes, which are forthwith to march to their respective Provinces.

(6) Scotland.

(7) Ireland.

But the third Essay of this nation, more properly so called, is when the Strategus with the Polemarchs, (the Senate and the People, or the Dictator having decreed a War) receive in return of his Warrants the second Essay from the Conductors at the Rendezvous of Oceana; which army marching with all accommodations provided by the Council of War, the Senate elects a new Strategus, and the Lords Lieutenants a second Essay.

A Youth, except he be an only son, refusing any one of his three Essays, without sufficient cause shewn to the Phylarch or the Censors, is incapable of Magistracy, and is fined a fifth part of his yearly Rent, or of his Estate, for protection. In case of Invasion the Elders are obliged to like duty with the Youth, and upon their own charge.

The Provincial Orb consisting in part of the Elders, and in part of the Youth, is thus created.

Four Knights out of the first Region falling, are elected in the Senate to be the first Region of the Provincial Orb of Marpefia. These being triennial Magistrates, take their Places in the Provincial Council, consisting of twelve Knights, four in every Region, each Region choosing their weekly Provofts of their Council thus constituted. One Knight more chosen out of the same Region in the Senate, being an annual Magistrate, is President, with power to propose; and the Opinions proposed by the President, or any two of the Provofts, are debated by the Council; and if there be occasion of farther power or instruction than they yet have, transmitted to the Council of State, with which the Provincial is to hold Intelligence.

The President of this Council is also Strategus or General of the Provincial Army. Wherefore the Conductors, upon Notice of his election and appointment of his rendezvous, deliver to him the Stratiots of his Letter, which he takes with him into his Province; and the Provincial Army having received the new Strategus with the third Classis, the Council dismisses the old Strategus with the first Classis. The like is done for Panopea, or any other Province.

But whereas the Term of every other Magistracy or Election in this Commonwealth, whether annual or triennial, requires an equal Vacation, the Term of a Provincial Counsellor or Magistrate requires no Vacation at all. The Quorum of a Provincial, as also that of every other Council and Assembly, requires two thirds in a time of Health, and one third in a time of Sickness. [In the Corollary, which is the conclusion of the whole work, he shews how the last hand was to put his Commonwealth; and besides the Form of the Senate and Assemblies of the People, and the manner of waging war, and governing in peace, he treats of the discipline of a national religion, and the security of liberty of Conscience; a form of government for Scotland, Ireland, and the other Provinces of the Commonwealth; Governments for London and Westminster, proportionably to which the other Corporations of the Nation are to be modelled; Directions for the encouraging of Trade; Laws for regulating of Academies; Rules for the Education of the Youth, as well to the wars and to the Sea, to Manufactures or Husbandry, as to Law, Physick, or Divinity, and chiefly to the breeding and true figure of accomplished Gentlemen. He gives orders for reforming the Stage; the number, choice, and business of the Officers of State, and the revenue, with all sorts of Officers; and an exact account both of their salaries, and the ordinary yearly charge of the whole Commonwealth. Mr. Toland observes (8), that (8) Life of Harrington, pag. 23, 24

 " this Model gives a full answer to those, who imagine, " that there can be no distinctions or degrees, neither " Nobility nor Gentry, in a Democracy; being led in- " to this mistake, because they ignorantly think all " Commonwealths to be constituted alike; when, if " they were but never so little vers'd in History, they " might know, that no order of men now in the world " can come near the figure that was made, by the No- " blemen and Gentlemen of the Roman State: nor in " this respect, does the Commonwealth of Oceana. " come any thing behind them; for, as Harrington " says very truly, an Army may as well consist of Soldiers " without Officers, or of Officers without Soldiers, as a " Commonwealth (especially such a one as is capable of " greatness) consist of a people without a gentry, or of a " gentry without a people."

[F] This work of his was attacked by several Writers, against whom he defended it.] The first, who made exceptions to it, was Dr. Henry Ferne, afterwards Bishop of Chester. The Lady Ashton, Mr. Harrington's sister, presented him with one of the Books, and desired his opinion of it, which he quickly sent in such a manner as shewed, that he did not approve of the doctrine, tho' he treated the person and his learning with due respect. To this Letter a reply was made, and some queries sent along with it by Mr. Harrington; to every one of which a distinct answer was returned by the Doctor; which being again confuted by Mr. Harrington, he published the whole in 1656 under the title of Pian Piano, or an Intercourse between H. Ferne, Doctor in Divinity, and James Harrington Esq; upon occasion of the Doctor's censure of the Commonwealth of Oceana. The next, who wrote against Oceana, was Matthew Wren, son of Dr. Matthew Wren Bishop of Ely. His Book was intitled, Considerations on Mr. Harrington's Commonwealth of Oceana, restrained to the first part of the Preliminaries. London 1657 in 8vo. To this is prefixed a Letter to Dr. John Wilkins, Warden of Wadham College, who had desired Mr. Wren to give his judgment concerning Mr. Harrington's Book; who wrote an Answer to Mr. Wren in the first Book of his Prerogative of Popular Government: A political Discourse, in two Books, the former containing the first Preliminary of Oceana, enlarged, interpreted, and vindicated from all such mistakes or slanders, as have been alledged against it under the notion of objections. The second concerning Ordination, against Dr. Hammond, Dr. Lazarus Seaman, and the Authors they follow. In which two Books are contained the whole Commonwealth of the Hebrews or of Israel, Senate, People, and Magistracy, both as it stood in the Institution by Moses, and as it came to be formed after the Captivity. As also the different policies introduced into the Church of Christ during the time of the Apostles. London 1658 in 4to. As Mr. Wren was one of the Virtuosi, who met at Dr. Wilkins's lodgings at Oxford, (the Seminary of the Royal Society) Mr. Harrington observes, that the University Wits or good Company were good at two things, diminishing of a Commonwealth and the multiplying of a louse. Mr. Wren published a Rejoinder under the title of, Monarchy asserted: or the State of Monarchical and Popular Government in vindication of the Considerations on Mr. Harrington's Oceana. London 1659 in 8vo. In answer to which Mr. Harrington wrote his Politicafter, or a comical Discourse in answer to Mr. Wren's Book intitled, Monarchy asserted against Mr. Harrington's Oceana. London 1659. Mr. Baxter wrote against our Author his Holy Commonwealth: or Political Apborijms opening the true Principles of Government. London 1659 in 8vo.

[G] In 1659 he published an Abridgment of his Oceana under the title of The Art of Lawgiving.] It was writings, he instituted likewise for the same purpose a nightly meeting of several ingenious Gentlemen in the New-Palace Yard at Westminster; which club was called the Rota [H], and continued till about the 21st of February 1659, at which time the secluded Members of Parliament being restored by General Monk, all their models vanished (m). After the Restoration he lived in a retired manner. But December the 28th 1661 he, by order of the King, was committed to the Tower of London for treasonable designs and practices [I]; and, Chancellor Hyde, at a conference of the Lords and Commons, charged him with being concerned in a plot. But a committee of Lords and Commons, after several sittings, could make nothing of that pretended plot, and did not ever name our author in all their reports (n). At last he was conveyed to St. Nicholas Island opposite to Plymouth; from whence he was removed to Plymouth, where he fell into an uncommon disorder of imagination [K]. Having obtained his liberty by means of the Earl of Bath, he was printed at London in 8vo, and divided into three Books; the first shewing the foundations and superstructures of all the kinds of Governments; the second shewing the frames of the Commonwealths of Israel and the Jews; the third shewing a model fitted to the present state or balance of this Nation. To this Treatise is added a small Dissertation, intitled, A Word concerning a House of Peers.

(m) Wood, col. 591.

(n) Life, pag. 35.

[H] He instituted . . . a nightly meeting of several ingenious Gentlemen in the New Palace Yard at Westminster, which Club was called the Rota.] They met at the Turk's Head, called Miles's Coffee-House, next to the stairs where the people take water. "Their discourses, says Mr. Wood (9), about Government and of ordering of a Commonwealth were the most ingenious and smart that ever were heard; for the arguments in the Parliament-House were but flat to those. This gang had a balloting-box, and balloted how things should be carried by way of Tentamen; which being not used or known in England before upon this account, the room every evening was very full. Besides our Author and H. Nevil, who were the prime men of the Club, were Cyriack Skinner, a merchant's son in London, an ingenious young Gentleman, and scholar to Jo. Milton, which Skinner sometimes held the Chair; Major John Wildman; Charles Wolfeley of Staffordshire; Roger Coke; William Poultney, afterwards a Knight, who sometimes held the Chair; John Hoskyns; John Aubrey; Maximilian Pettie of Tettefworth in Oxfordshire, a very able man in these matters, and who had more than once turned the Council-Board of Oliver Cromwell; Mich. Mallet; Ph. Carteret of the Isle of Guernsey; Francis Cradock, a Merchant; Henry Ford; Major Venner, Nephew to Dr. Tob. Venner, the Physician; Tho. Marriett of Warwickshire; Henry Croone, a Physician; Edward Bagshaw of Christ-Church; and sometimes Rob. Wood of Lincoln College; and James Arden, then or soon after a Divine; with many others, besides antagonists and auditors of note. Dr. William Petty was a Rotaman, and would sometimes trouble Jo. Harrington in his Club; and one Stafford a Gentleman of Northamptonshire, who used to be an auditor, did with his gang come among them one evening very mellow from the tavern, and did much affront the Junto and tore in pieces their orders and minutes. The soldiers, who commonly were there, as auditors and spectators, would have kick'd them down stairs; but Harrington's moderation and persuasion hindered them. The doctrine was very taking, and the more, because as to human foresight there was no possibility of the King's return. The greatest of the Parliament-Men hated this design of Rotation and Balloting, as being against their power. Eight or ten were for it, of which number Henry Nevil was one, who proposed it to the House, and made it out to the Members thereof, that except they embraced that way of government, they would be ruined. The model of it was, that the third part of the Senate or House should rote out by ballot every year, so that every ninth year the said Senate would be wholly altered. No Magistrate was to continue above three years, and all to be chosen by ballot; than which choice nothing could be invented more fair and impartial, as it was then thought, though opposed by many for several reasons. This Club of Commonwealth's-Men lasted till about the 21st of February 1659; at which time the secluded Members being restored by General George

(9) Col. 591.

"Monke, all their models vanished."

[I] By order of the King committed to the Tower of London for treasonable designs and practices.] When he was seized, he was engaged in reducing his politics into short and easy Aphorisms, and had the written sheets of that piece lying loose upon the table before him. Finding that he was to be carried before the Council, he beg'd the favour, that he might stitch the sheets together, which was granted. He had no time given him to take leave of any body, but was immediately conveyed to the Tower, where none were allowed to come to his sight and speech. He was examined by the Earl of Lauderdale, Sir George Carteret, and Sir Edward Walker; and notwithstanding his apparent innocence, was still detained a close prisoner (10).

(10) Life of Harrington, pag. 30-34.

[K] Fall into an uncommon disorder of imagination.] Among the acquaintance he made at Plymouth, one was Dr. Dunstan, who advised him to take a preparation of Guaiacum in coffee, as a certain cure for the scurvy, with which he was then troubled. He drank of this liquor in great quantities every morning and evening. But after using it for some time, his sisters, to their no small amazement, received no more answers to their letters. At length advice was brought them from his Landlady, that his fancy was much disordered: Immediately one of them address'd herself to the Earl of Bath, then chief Governor of Plymouth, and informed him of his prisoner's sad condition. That Nobleman having procured a Warrant from the King for his release, the Lady Ashton and another of his sisters took their journey towards Plymouth, where they found their brother so changed in body and mind, that they scarce could persuade themselves, that it was the same person. He was reduced to a skeleton, not able to walk alone, slept very little, his imagination disturbed, often fainted when he took his drink, and yet so fond of it, that he would by no means be advised to forbear it. Dr. Prujean, and other eminent Physicians greatly blamed Dr. Dunstan's prescriptions, giving their opinions under their hands, that Guaiacum and the other drying things, which he had administered to his patient in coffee, were enough of themselves to beget melancholy or phrenzy, where there was no previous disposition to it. A rumour at Plymouth, that Mr. Harrington had taken some drink, which would make any man mad in a month, the surliness of his Physician, and something blab'd by a maid, who was put against his will to attend him, made his sister suspect, that he had foul play, lest he should write any more Oceanas. It is certain, that tho' his recovery was never perfect, he mended greatly as soon as he was persuaded to abstain from this liquor; and in less than a month he was able to bear the journey to London in a coach, where he was no sooner arrived, but Sir John Skelton, Deputy Governor of Plymouth, who was then in town, paid him a visit. The Lady Ashton complaining to him, that she had not timely notice of her brother's distemper, he protested, that he would have sent her word of it, had not Dr. Dunstan assured him, that he only counterfeited; and yet at the same time made him take strong doses of hellebore and other things. Mr. Harrington passed some time at Ashed in Surrey to drink the Epsom-waters, by which he found no benefit. At London he was put wholly under the care of Dr. Prujean, who with all his art could afford little help to the weakness of his body, and none at all to the disorder of his mind, to his dying day. He was allowed to discourse of most things as rationally as any man, except his own distemper, fancying strange things in the operation of his animal spirits, which he thought to transpire from him in the shape

he was carried to London, where he married the daughter of Sir Marmaduke Dorrel of Buckinghamshire. Towards the latter end of his life he was subject to the gout, and enjoyed little ease, but languishing for a good while, at last fell into a palsy, and died at Westminster September the 7th 1677, and was interred in St. Margaret's Church on the south-side of the altar, next to the grave of Sir Walter Raleigh, with an inscription over him. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote several others [L]. A new edition of all his political works is now in the press.

shape of birds, of flies, of bees, or the like. And those about him reported, that he talked much of good and evil spirits, and that he sometimes argued so strenuously, that this was no depraved imagination, that his Physician was often at a loss for an answer. He would on such occasions compare himself to Democritus, who for his admirable discoveries in Anatomy was reckoned distracted by his fellow-citizens, till Hippocrates removed their mistake. Mr. Toland found among his papers the beginning of a little Treatise written by himself, wherein he endeavours to prove those persons to be mad, who thought him so with respect to what he discoursed of nature, which he maintained to work mechanically or mathematically. It appears there, that his pretended visions of Angels and Devils were nothing else but good and bad animal spirits; and that his flies and bees were only similitudes, whereby he used to express the various figures and forms of those particles. I own, says Mr. Toland (11), that he might probably enough be much decayed in his understanding by reason of his great and long weakness of body; but I shall never be convinced, that he was delirious in that only instance, which they alledge; and to satisfy the learned in this point (which, in my opinion, is a memorable story, that concerns them all) I shall subjoin his own discourse to this History.

[L] Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote several others.] The Use and manner of Ballots: printed on one side of a sheet of paper; in the middle of which is a cut representing the fission of Magistrates belonging to a Commonwealth. Aporisms Political; London 1659, in 4to. in one sheet and an half. They are in number seventy six. But the second edition is in two sheets and an half, and the Aporisms are in number one hundred and twenty. Brief Directions shewing how a fit and perfect model of popular Government may be made, found, or understood: London 1659, in two parts. The first contains seven models, the second proposeth a model of a Commonwealth fitted to the present state of the nation, under five propositions or heads. Pour enclouer le Canon: or, the nailing of the Enemy's Artillery: London 1659, in one sheet in 8vo. A Discourse upon this Saying; The Spirit of the Nation is not yet to be trusted with Liberty, lest it introduce Monarchy, or invade the Liberty of Conscience. London, 1659, in two sheets in 4to. A Proposition in order to the proposing of a Commonwealth or Democracy: printed on one side of a sheet of paper. A Discourse shewing, that the Spirit of Parliaments, with a Council in the Intervals, is not to be trusted for a Settlement, lest it introduce Monarchy and Persecution for Conscience. London, 1659, in one sheet and an half. To this are subjoined Certain Maxims calculated unto the present State of England, written by our Author. A Parallel of the Spirit of the People with the Spirit of Mr. Rogers: And an Appeal thereupon unto the Reader, whether the Spirit of the People, or the Spirit of Men, like Mr. Rogers, be fitted to be trusted with the Government. London, 1659, in one sheet in 4to. This Mr. John Rogers was an Anabaptist, a seditious Enthusiast, and a Fifth-Monarchy-Man. There was an answer published to Mr. Harrington's Parallel, without a date, intitled, Mr. Harrington's Parallel unparallel'd, or a Demonstration upon it, and the Parable opened: in one sheet in 4to. Valerius and Publicola: or the true Form of a Popular Commonwealth extracted ex puris Naturalibus. London, 1659, in five sheets in 4to. Dated October 22, 1659. To this is added A sufficient Answer to Mr. Stubbe his Letter to an Officer concerning a select Senate, mentioned by them in their Proposals to the late Parliament. This Letter of Mr. Stubbe was printed at London, 1659, in 4to. These seven last pieces of Mr. Harrington, with his Aporisms Political, have been bound up together and published under the general title of Political Discourses tending to the Introduction of a free and equal Commonwealth in England: London, 1660, in 4°, with the Author's picture before it, etch'd by Hollar. The Stumbling-block of Disobedience and Rebellion cunningly imputed by P. H. unto Calvin, removed in a Letter to the said P. H. from J. H. This was reprinted and answered by Dr. Peter Heylin in the third Part of his Certamen Epistolare, printed at London 1659, in 8°; which third Part is intitled, A Decertation about Forms of Government, the Power of the Spartan Ephori, and the Jewish Sanhedrim; managed Letter-wise between Peter Heylin D. D. and J. H. of the City of Westminster, Esq. Dr. Heylin's letter is dated from Lacy's Court in Abingdon, Decemb. 24. 1658. The Dr. styles our author a generous and ingenious adversary, of whose society and friendship, says he, I should count it no crime to be ambitious. Mr. Harrington likewise wrote The Rota; or Model of a free State or equal Commonwealth, once proposed and debated in brief, and to be again more at large proposed to, and debated by a free and open Society of Gentlemen. London, 1660, in four sheets in 4to. It was published in the beginning of February 1660. In answer to this came out a ludicrous censure, pretended to be made by the Rota, printed in two sheets in the latter end of March 1660. And a little before there was a sheet printed in 4to intitled, Decrees and Orders of the Committee of Safety of the Commonwealth of Occana. He published also, The Ways and Means, whereby an equal and lasting Commonwealth may be suddenly introduced and perfectly founded, with the free Consent and actual Confirmation of the whole People of England. London, 1660, in one sheet in 4to. To this was added, The humble Petition of divers well affected Persons, delivered the sixth day of July, 1659. It was delivered by Mr. Henry Nevil. He translated from Latin into English two of Virgil's Eclogues, and two books of his Æneis, which he thus intitled, An Essay upon two of Virgil's Eclogues and two of his Æneis, towards the Translation of the whole. London, 1658, in 8vo; and in 1659 was printed, his translation of the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth books of the Æneis. T.

(a) A city of Germany on the river Mein.

HARTUNGUS (JOHN) born at Miltenberg (a) in the year 1505, studied first in his native place, and afterwards in the University of Heidelberg. He entered afterwards into the army, and served in Hungary against the Turks; but some time after he entered again into the agreeable service of the Muses, and was made Professor of the Greek Tongue in the University of Heidelberg. He acquitted himself with glory of that function during fifteen years; nor would he have left his post had not the Protestant Religion been established in the Palatinate in the year 1546. This alteration obliged him to look for another post: he obtained one at Friburg in the Brisgaw, and was so well satisfied with it, that he resigned it only with his last breath. He was honourably distinguished amongst the Professors of Friburg, and had a great many pupils. He read Lectures on Homer, and on some other Poets, and wrote pretty good books [A]. He

[A] He wrote pretty good books.] Prolegomena's and notes on the three first books of the Odyssea. Cibiades

locorum Homericorum: Decuria locorum quorundam memorabilium (1). He translated Apollonius's Poem on the

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philo- soph. Germanor. pag. 300, 301.

He died in the same city June the 16th 1579, after he had taught polite Literature there during thirty three years. It appears by the epitaph he composed for himself, that in teaching the youth he suffered a great deal, and learnt much (b) [B].

(2) Janus Rutgersius, Variarum Lection. lib. 6. cap. 6. p. 562.

the Argonauts into Latin. This translation is not much esteemed: Here follows the judgment, which a good Critic (2) passed upon it. *Miratus sum boni- nem eruditum, & in Græca præsertim lingua cum laude versatum ita transfuisse [Apollonium] ut non paucis fa- cilium sit Apollonium sua, hoc est Græca, lingua assidue, quam ea qua eum Hartungus loquentem fecit, Latina: i. e. "I wonder that a learned man, who had gained " some reputation, especially by his skill in the Greek " tongue, should have so translated Apollonius, " that it is much easier to understand him in his " own tongue, that is to say, in Greek, than in that, " which Hartungus made him speak, that is to say, " in Latin." Immediately after this he takes notice of some errors that are in this translation, and hints that he could point out a great many more. Infini- tum esset ea persequi, in quibus longissimè à sententia Apol- lonii aberravit (3). i. e. "It would be endless to point " out all the passages, in which he has entirely mis- " taken Apollonius's sense."*

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 566.

[B] The Epitaph he composed for himself shows that . . . he suffered . . . and learnt much.] It deserves to be transcribed.

Πολλὰ πάσαν, & πολλά μάθων ἐν παιδιότητι μου, ἔρως δὲ τῶν ἐν Θεῷ ἠρώχθη.

The Latin translation of it, which we meet with in Melchior Adam (4), is very indifferent; it does not in the least answer the Author's design, which was to declare that his Professorship was a very heavy burthen to him. I do not transcribe the other Greek Epitaph, which Hartungus made for himself; you may find it in Melchior Adam. I am persuaded that Lorenzo Crasso would have put him in his Catalogue of Greek Poets, if he had known what has been just now ob- served. This Italian's omission makes me remember, that Mr. Baillet has not given Hartungus a place amongst the Critics.

(4) It is as fol- lows. Multa tuli, didici, docui dum fata sinebant, Mortuus in summo nunc requiesco Deo. i. e. "I have " suffered, learnt, " and taught a " great deal, as " long as fate " would permit " me; and now I " rest with the " supreme God." It should be, I have suffered and learnt a great deal, whilst I was teaching the youth, &c.

☉ HARVEY (WILLIAM), an English Physician in the seventeenth Century, famous for the discovery of the circulation of the blood, was eldest son of Thomas Harvey (a) Gent. by Joan Halke his wife, and was born at Folkston in Kent April the 2d 1578. At ten years of age he was sent to a grammar school at Canterbury, from whence at fourteen he was removed to Gonvil and Caius College in Cambridge. At nineteen he travelled into France and Italy; and at twenty three he studied Physic at Padua under Eustac. Radius, John Tho. Minadous, and Hieron. Fabr. ab Aquapendente. At twenty four he became Doctor of Physic and Chirurgery in that University; and soon after returning into England (b), was incorporated Doctor of Physic in Cambridge, practised Physic in London, and married (c). In 1604 he was admitted Candidate of the College of Physicians in London; and three years after elected Fellow (d). Upon the death of Dr. Davies he was appointed Lecturer of Anatomy and Chirurgery in that College (e), and on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of April 1616 he read a course of Lectures in Anatomy there [A], in which he opened his discovery relating to the circulation of the blood; which after a variety of experiments publicly exhibited, he communicated to the world in his Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis & Sanguinis, printed at Francfort 1628 in 4to [B]. December the 3d 1627 he was chosen one of the Elects of the

(a) Dr. Charles Goodall's Epistle Dedicatory to his Historical Account of the College of Physicians Proceedings against Empyricks, &c. London 1684 in 4to.

(b) Wood, Fassii Oxon. vol. 2. col. 6. 2d edit. Lon- don 1721.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Goodall, ibid. supra.

(e) Idem, ibid.

[A] On the 16th, 17th, and 18th of April 1616, he read a course of Lectures in Anatomy there.] The original manuscript of those Lectures is extant in the valuable Musæum of Sir Hans Sloan, Bart. and President of the Royal Society, who favoured us with a sight of it. It is intitled, Prælectiones Anatom. univers. per me Gulielmum Harveium, Medicum Londinensem, Anato. & Chirurg. Professorem. An. Dom. 1616. Anno ætatis 37. Prælect. Apr. 16, 17, 18.

[B] His Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis & Sanguinis, printed at Frankfort 1628 in 4to.] It was dedicated to King Charles I, and there follows another Dedication to Dr. Argent, President, and to the rest of the College of Physicians London, in which he observes, that he had frequently before in his Anatomical Lectures declared his new opinion concerning the motion and use of the Heart, and the circulation of the Blood; and for above nine years had confirmed it before the College by ocular demonstra- tion, and illustrated it by reasons and arguments, and defended it from the objections of the most skillful Anatomists; and now thought proper to publish it to the world in a professed treatise upon that subject. Meam de motu & usu Cordis & Circuitu Sanguinis sen- tentiam antea sæpius in Prælectionibus meis Anatomicis aperui novam; sed jam per novem & amplius annos multis ocularibus demonstrationibus in conspectu vestro confirmatam, rationibus & argumentis illustratam, & ab ob- jectionibus doctissimorum & peritissimorum Anatomicorum liberatam, toties ab omnibus desideratam, à quibusdam efflagitatam, in lucem & conspectum omnium hoc libello produximus. He observes afterwards, that this book had been finished some years before: Libellum hunc per aliquid ab hinc retro annos perfectum. It was attacked by James Primerose in his Exercitationes & Animad- versiones in Librum de Motu Cordis & Circulatione San- guinis, contra Harveium, printed at London, 1639, in 4to; and by Æmilii Parisanus in his Refutatio Harvæi de Motu Cordis & Sanguinis in Animalis, printed at Leyden, 1639, in 4to. In answer to this last book, Dr. George Ent published at London, 1641, in 4to, Apologia pro Circulatione sanguinis contra Æmilium Parisanum. It has been asserted by some, that Father Paul the Venetian was the first discoverer of the circulation; and Honoratus Faber professed himself to be the author of that invention. But the pretences in favour of the first of these have been refuted by Dr. Walter Charlton, in his Anatomical Lectures read in the Theatre of the College of Physicians in 1683, and published in 1683. And Honoratus Faber has been confuted by Jo. Alph. Borelli, in his Historia & Metereologia Incendii Ætnæ, wherein he gives this short account about Faber's pretensions: Cum verò sit omnino incredibile & impossibile hominem nobilem, religio- sum, & pium, ea quæ vera non sunt, asserere voluisse, nil aliud in ejus excusationem dicendum restat, nisi quod cum ingenio velocissimo præditus sit, a celeritate ipsâ, quâ aliena legit, & propria scribit, multoties decipiatur. Quod alias ei contigisse non erit supervacaneum ostendere, ut inde pateat solenne ei esse Autores alicujus nominis furti infimulare, hæc solummodo de causa, quia cursim & oscitanter eorum opera legit. Si enim patienter & debitâ attentione dignatus fuisset legere ea, quæ spatio 38 annorum edita fuerant, & vulgatissima per universam Europam erant, proculdubio non scripsisset anno 1666 Lib. primo de Homine Prop. 2. se Circulationem sangui- nis invenisse & docuisse ab anno 1638, antequam Gul. Harveii Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis prodiret; quem pariter multa Fabri inventa in suis Exercita- tionibus inseruisse affirmat: omnes enim sciunt Harveium an. Dom. 1628 Francofurti typis Gual. Fitzzeri suam Ex- ercitationem primum edidisse; scilicet decem annos ante- quam Cl. Fabri sanguinis circulationem docuisset. Mr. () Atben. Oxon. Wood tells us (), that Dr. George Morley, Bishop vol. 1. col. 461.

(f) From the Register of the College.

(g) Wood, ubi supra.

(h) Goodal, ubi supra.

(i) Wood, Fashi Oxon. vol. 2. col. 6.

the College of Physicians; and December the 30th 1629 he resigned the place of Treasurer of the College (f). In 1632 (g) he was made Physician to King Charles I, as he had been before to King James I (h); and adhering to the Royal Cause upon the breaking out of the civil wars, attended his Majesty at the battle of Edge-Hill, and thence to Oxford, where he was incorporated Doctor of Physic December the 7th 1642 (i). In 1645 he was elected Warden of Merton College in that University (k) by virtue of the King's letters sent to the society of that house for that purpose; but the year following, when the garrison of Oxford surrendered to the Parliament, he left that office, and retired to London (l). In 1651 his book intituled, Exercitationes de Generatione Animalium;

(k) Idem, Hist. & Antiquitat. Universitat. Oxoniens. lib. 2. pag. 86.

(l) Idem, Fashi Oxon. ubi supra. quibus

(1) History of Physick, Part. 1. pag. 235. edit. London 1725.

(2) Reflections upon ancient and modern Learning, cap. 18. pag. 207. edit. London 1694 in 8vo.

(3) Ibid. pag. 211.

(4) Anat. lib. 7. pag. 325. edit. Paris.

of Winchester, and Dr. John Pell used to say, that Mr. Walter Warner, an eminent Mathematician, born in Leicestershire, who died in the latter end of the year 1640, "made it appear in a manuscript of his composition, that the blood in a body circulates, which he communicating to the immortal Harvey, he took his first hint thence concerning that matter, which he afterwards published as the first inventor." Dr. Freind (1) observes, that as the discovery of the circulation was entirely owing to our Author, "so he has explained it with all the clearness imaginable; and though much has been since written upon that subject, I may venture to say his own book is the shortest, the plainest, and the most convincing of any; as we may be satisfied, if we look into the many Apologies written in defence of the circulation, or have the patience to read the tedious un-instructive treatise of Raymond Vieusens de Sanguine & Corde. This new doctrine of the circulation, however proved beyond all doubt in a demonstrative way, met with great opposition; and the inventor of it was obliged to bear the attack of numberless adversaries, who generally in their answers shewed more a spirit of contradiction, than any force of reasoning." Dr. Wotton tells us (2), that "this discovery, first made perfectly intelligible by Dr. Harvey, is of so very great importance to shew the communication of all the humours of the body, each with other, that as soon as men were perfectly satisfied, that it was not to be contested, which they were in a few years, a great many put in for the prize, unwilling that Dr. Harvey should go away with all the glory. Vander Linden, who published a most exact edition of Hippocrates in Holland about thirty years ago, has taken a great deal of pains to prove, that Hippocrates knew the circulation of the blood, and that Dr. Harvey only revived it." Dr. Wotton then remarks (3), that the first step towards the discovery was the finding that the whole mass of blood passes through the lungs by the pulmonary artery and vein. The first, who appears to have had a distinct idea of this matter was Michael Servetus, a Spanish Physician, who was burnt for Arianism at Geneva. In his book intituled, Christiansmi Restitutio, printed in 1553, he clearly asserts, that the blood passes through the lungs from the left to the right ventricle of the heart, and not through the partition, which divides the two ventricles, as was at that time commonly believed. Servetus's words are as follow: Vitalis Spiritus in sinistro Cordis ventriculo suam Originem habet, juvenibus maxime pulmonibus ad ipsius generationem. Est spiritus tenuis, caloris vi elaboratus, flavo colore, ignea potentia, ut sit quasi ex puriore sanguine lucidus, vapor. Generatur ex facta in pulmone mixtione inspirati aeris cum elaborato subtili sanguine, quem dexter ventriculus sinistro communicat. Fit autem communicatio haec non per parietem cordis medium, ut vulgo creditur, sed magno artificio a dextro cordis ventriculo, longo per pulmones ductu, agitur sanguis subtilis; a pulmonibus preparatur; flavus ejecitur, & a venâ arteriosâ in arteriam venosam transfunditur; deinde in ipsâ arteriâ venosâ inspirato aeri miscetur, & expiratione à fuligine repurgatur; atque ita tandem à sinistro Cordis ventriculo totum mixtum per diafrasem attrahitur, apta supellex ut fiat spiritus vitalis. Realdus Columbus of Cremona was the next, who said any thing of it in his Anatomy printed at Venice 1559 in Folio, and at Paris 1572 in 8vo, and afterwards elsewhere. There (4) he asserts the same circulation through the lungs, that Servetus had done before; but says, that no man had ever taken notice of it before himself, or had written any thing about it; which shews, that he did not copy from Servetus; unless one should say, that he stole the notion without mentioning Servetus's name; which is injurious, since in these matters the same thing may be, and very often is observed by several persons, who never acquainted each other with their discoveries. But Columbus is much more particular; for he says (5), that the veins lodge the whole mass of blood in the vena cava, which carries it into the heart, whence it cannot return the same way that it went. From the right ventricle it is thrown into the lungs by the pulmonary artery, where the valves are so placed as to hinder its return that way into the heart; and so it is thrown into the left ventricle, and by the aorta again, when enlivened by the air, diffused through the whole body. Some years after appeared Andreas Cæsalpinus, who printed his Peripatetical Questions at Venice in 4to in 1571, and afterwards with his Medical Questions at the same place in 1593. He is rather more particular than Columbus, especially in examining how arteries and veins join at their extremities; which he supposes to be by opening their mouths into each other; and he uses the word circulation in his Peripatetical Questions, which had never been used in that sense before. He also takes notice, that the blood swells below the ligature in veins, and urges that in confirmation of his opinion. At last Dr. Harvey published his discourse De Motu Sanguinis. "This notion," says Dr. Wotton (6), had only been occasionally and slightly treated of by Columbus and Cæsalpinus, who themselves, in all probability, did not know the consequence of what they asserted; and therefore it was never applied to other purposes, either to shew the uses of the other viscera, or to explain the natures of diseases. Neither, for any thing that appears at this day, had they made any numbers of experiments, which were necessary to explain their doctrine, and to clear it from opposition. All this Dr. Harvey undertook to do, and with indefatigable pains traced the visible veins and arteries throughout the body in their whole journey from and to the heart, so as to demonstrate, even to the most incredulous, not only that the blood circulates through the lungs and heart, but the very manner how, and the time in which that great work is performed. When he had once proved, that the motion of the blood was so rapid as we now find it is, then he drew such consequences from it, as shewed that he thoroughly understood his arguments, and would leave little at least, as little as he could, to future industry to discover in that particular part of Anatomy. This gave him a just title to the honour of so noble a discovery, since what his predecessors had said before him was not enough understood to form just notions from their words." Dr. Wotton then remarks (7), that one may observe how gradually this discovery, as all abstruse truths of human disquisition, was explained to the world. Hippocrates first talked of the usual motion of the blood. Plato said, that the heart was the original of the veins and of the blood, that was carried about every member of the body. Aristotle also somewhere speaks of a recurrent motion of the blood. Still all this was only opinion and belief. It was rational, and became men of their genius's; but not having as yet been made evident by experiments, it might as easily be denied as affirmed. Servetus first saw, that the blood passes through the lungs. Columbus went further, and shewed the uses of the valves and trap-doors of the heart, which let the blood in and out of their respective vessels, but not the self same road. Thus the way was just open, when Dr. Harvey came, who built upon the first foundations.

(5) Ibid. p. 330. and lib. 11. pag. 411.

(6) Ubi supra, pag. 214.

(7) Pag. 215.

quibus accedunt quædam de Partu, de Membranis ac Humoribus Uteri, & de Conceptione, was printed at London in 4to [C]. In 1654 he, though absent, was chosen President of the College of Physicians, but refused that post on the 30th of September that year. July the 28th 1655 he settled his estate in Kent on that College (m), and died June the 3d 1657, in the eightieth year of his age. He was interred in the Church of Hempsted in Essex, where a monument is erected to his memory [D]. He designed to have published several treatises, particularly, I. "A Practice of Physick conformable to his Thesis of the Circulation of the Blood." II. Traëtatus de Pulmonum usu & motu; de ventilatione omni, aerisque necessitate & usu; de variis & differentibus organis hujus causâ in Animalibus factis. III. Traëtatus de quantitate sanguinis in unoquoque aut singulis pulsationibus protrusâ, & quando plus & quando minus, & quâ de causâ; iidem de Circuitûs causis, utilitatibus, & sanguinis Arcanis. IV. Observationes de usu Lienis. V. Exercitationes de Respirationis causis, organis, & usu. VI. Observationes de motivis Organis Animalium & de Musculorum Fabricâ. VII. Traëtatus de Animalium amore, libidine, & coitu. VIII. Observationes Medicinales de Herniæ carnosæ curatione, aliisque curationibus præter vulgi sententiam & methodum feliciter peractis. IX. De Nutritionis modo. X. Historia multorum Animalium, præsertim Insectorum, ab inconspicuis præ exiguitate principii & seminibus (quasi atomis in aere volitantibus) à ventis huc illuc sparsis ac disseminatis, ortorum. XI. Anatomia Medica ad Medicinæ usum maximè accommodata, ubi ex multis Dissectionibus corporum ægrotorum gravissimis & miris affectionibus confectorum; quomodo & qualiter partes interiores in situ, magnitudine, constitutione, figurâ, substantiâ, & reliquis accidentibus sensibilibus a naturali formâ & apparentiâ permutentur, & quam variis modis & miris afficiantur, enarrare susciperet. In a letter to Walter Moyle Esq; (n) we are informed the Physician, who, has a part

(m) From the Register of the College.

(n) Printed in the Account of Mr. Moyle and his Writings, pag. 26, 27. prefixed to The whole Works of Walter Moyle Esq; that were published by himself, edit. London 1727.

To make this work yet the easier, the valves of the veins, which were discovered by Father Paul the Venetian, had not long before been explained by Fabricius ab Aquapendente; whence the circulation was yet more clearly demonstrated. The very learned and ingenious Dr. Thomas Pellet, now President of the College of Physicians, London, in his Anniversary Oration before that College (8) observes, that by this discovery the most important service was done to the practice of Physic; and pays a compliment to our Author in very elegant verse, telling us, that he was the first, who taught,

(8) Oratio Anniversaria habita in Amphitheatro Collegii Regalis Medicorum Lond. in laudem Benemeritorum & benemerentium de Medicina, die xix Octobris anno 1719. edit. London in 4to.

*Quâ ratione cibi concocti lacteus humor
Declivis fertur, donec per cæca viarum
Labatur tacitis in stagna argentea vivis.
Inde per angustum tendens iter, ostia lævi
Pectoris evadit, venamque irrumpit apertam,
Sanguine miscendus, motuque rubescere discit.
Tum volvendo ruens per dextri limina Cordis
Pectoris irrigui gelidas adlabitur auras,
Floridus inde redit lento per devia passu
Exultatque fores cordis pulsare finitras.
Nec mora, per totum trepidat se didere corpus Extremosque artus, unde impetu fertur in Orbem, Rurpureos volvens sua per vestigia fluitus.
Quoque modo vitæ molecula prima capessit
Paulatim vires, hominisque adipiscitur auctus.*

[C] In 1651 his book, intituled, Exercitationes de Generatione Animalium &c. was printed at London in 4to.] It was dedicated by Dr. George Ent to the President and College of Physicians in London. There have been several editions of it; and it has been translated into English. In this work, after our author has given the anatomy of the parts serving for generation in the hen, he acquaints us with the formation and growth of the egg, and afterwards with the several parts whereof it consists. He then proceeds to give an account how the chick is formed, which he observed by a daily inspection of the eggs during the time of incubation; and was the first, who discovered, that the original of the chick was from the Cicatricula. He then gives an account in what order the several parts appear, and confutes a multitude of errors delivered by former writers, proving that the pancreum saliens is the heart; that the blood is not formed by the liver, because its Parenchyma is formed after, and of the blood, and grows to the blood-vessels; nor yet by the heart, because that is not in being till some time after the blood. He proves that all the Viscera at their first formation appear white; that the veins are the first conspicuous foundation, as it were, of the whole body; that the division of the parts into spermatial and sanguineous is ridiculous, since all come from the same original. He delivers an account of the parts serving for generation in deer, and how the Fœtus is formed. He acquaints us, that nothing is to be found in utero for a considerable time after coition; and how analagous conception is to an egg, and that it is some time in utero, before it is affixed to it. He takes notice of several memorable things concerning the generation of other animals, both oviparous and viviparous. In speaking of the formation of the human Fœtus, he delivers several curious observations made on abortions of several ages; as also instances of Superfecundation, Hermaphrodites, of a Fœtus found in Tuba Uteri, &c. When he treats de partu, he gives very memorable instances, to shew how much the Fœtus conduces to its own birth. Besides these, there are several remarkable observations scattered through the whole book; as de partu difficili, de gravidatione falsâ, de ulcere uteri, de uteri procliventiâ, &c. as also de uteri membranis, humoribus, placentâ, de conceptione, de calido innato, de humido primigenio, &c. and of his cure of a Sarcocœle of that bigness, that none durst undertake the cure either by cutting or otherwise; which he happily performed by tying the artery, and thereby depriving it of nourishment; by which means it was afterwards easily extirpated.

[D] Where a monument was erected to his memory.] Upon it is the following inscription.

" GULIELMUS HARVEIUS,
" Cui tam colendo Nomini assurgunt omnes Academix;
" Qui diuturnum sanguinis motum post tot annorum
" Millia primus invenit;
" Orbi salutem, sibi immortalitatem
" Consequutus.
" Qui ortum & generationem Animalium solus omnium
" A Pseudophilosophiâ liberavit.
" Cui debet
" Quod sibi innotuit humanum Genus, seipsam Medicina.
" Sereniss. Majestati. Jacobo & Carolo Britanniarum
" Monarchis Archiaterus & charissimus.
" Collegii Med. Lond. Anatomes & Chirurgiæ Professor
" Assiduus & felicissimus:
" Quibus illustrem construxit Bibliothecam,
" Suoque dotavit & ditavit Patrimonio.
" Tandem
" Post triumphales
" Contemplando, fanando, inveniando
" Sudores
" Varias domi forisque statuas,
" Quum totum circuit Microcosmum,
" Medicinæ Doctor & Medicorum,
" Improles obdormivit
" III Junii anno salutis MDCLVII, Ætat. LXXX.
" Annorum & Famæ satur. T.

(o) Pyramido-graphia: or a Description of the Pyramids in Egypt. pag. 101, 102. edit. London 1646, in 8vo.

part in the Dialogue in Mr. Henry Nevil's Plato Redivivus, was designed to represent Dr. Harvey, who relieved his abstruser studies by conversations in politics. Mr. John Greaves (o) relates a conversation between himself and our author, upon the subject of Mr. Greaves and his company's having continued three hours in the greatest of the Egyptian Pyramids; which Dr. Harvey was extremely surprized at, imagining there would be a difficulty of Respiration there.

HAY, a Scots family, which owes the first origin of its Nobility to a very illustrious action. It is reported that the Danes having invaded Scotland under the reign of Kenneth III, about the year 990, there was a battle fought between them and the Scots (a), in which the latter having been immediately routed, retired towards Perth. They were obliged to pass through a very narrow way between the mountains and the river Tay. A countryman, who happened to be there with his two sons, made himself master of that narrow passage, encouraged them that ran away to return again to the enemy, and stopt those that would continue their flight. He did more, for he armed himself with the first weapon he met, and accompanied by his two sons, both armed with a piece of their plough, he fell with so much fury upon the Danes, and by his example did so much raise the courage of those that were running away, that the Scots gained the victory. The enemy was routed in his turn, and Scotland prevented from the slavery to which the Danes designed to reduce it. This countryman, who was afterwards known under the name of Hay, is the founder of the family I speak of. He and his sons signalized themselves in the most extraordinary manner during the fight; they put the enemy under the most terrible consternation, and made a very great havock wherever they fought. This glorious action, by which they saved their country, was rewarded as it deserved [A], and since that time this family has been one of the most illustrious in the Kingdom. It has produced several branches [B], and several persons of very great merit [C]. The Earl of Errol is at present the head of it; he is married to Anne Drummond, the Earl of Perth's sister (b).

(a) The place where this battle was fought is called Licartias.

(b) Taken from some Memoirs communicated to the bookseller.

[A] This glorious action was rewarded as it deserved. Hay was conducted by the whole army to the King's palace, and in the assembly of the Parliament he was raised to the highest degree of Nobility; the King gave him a considerable part of the enemy's spoil, and granted him in land the whole flight of a falcon; that is to say, they let a falcon fly out, and observed the place where it rested; and all the lands where the falcon began his flight to the place where it rested, were given to Hay. That last place is still called Falcon's Stone (*). By this means Hay was possessed of all the fruitful lands in all Scotland, situated on the spot where the battle was fought, along the banks of the River Tay. King Kenneth gave him a coat of arms, which was Argent with three scutcheons gules; to intimate that the courage of three men had saved the Kingdom (1).

(*) Lelley observes, that in his time a stone called the Falcon was still to be seen near Dundee in Angushire. Lectures, De Moribus & Rebus, 898. Scotw. lib. 5. pag. m. 197.

(1) Taken from the same Memoirs.

(2) Mr. Peliffon, Histoire de l'Academie Françoise, pag. m. 246. says: Paul Hay, Sieur du Chatelet, was of the ancient family of the Hay's in Brittany, which boasts to be descended six hundred years ago from that of the Earls of Carlisle, one of the most illustrious families in Scotland.

(3) Taken from the same Memoirs.

[B] This family . . . has produced several branches. Which have spread not only through England and Scotland, but also in France, and particularly in Normandy (2). I mention only the branches of the Earls of Tweedale and Kinnoul, which do still subsist (3).

[C] . . . Several persons of very great merit. We can say nothing of the condition in which that family was from the reign of Kenneth III, to that of Robert Bruce: for Edward I King of England making an advantage of the divisions of Scotland, when Robert Bruce and John Baliol disputed with each other the Crown, invaded the Kingdom, and carried away not only all public Records, but also all the papers of private families. Those of the family of the Hay's were taken away as well as those of a great many others. During that civil war Robert Hay followed Robert Bruce's party with a perfect fidelity, and did him such great services, that he conferred upon him, as a reward, the office of hereditary High-Constable of Scotland in the year 1310: and that he might support his dignity with a suitable splendor the same Prince gave him several lands in the Shire of Aberdeen. This office has continued ever since in that family, and is now enjoyed by the Earl of Errol, who is reckoned the nineteenth of his family, who possessed that office. NICHOLAS Lord HAY was killed in the year 1332 with two hundred and eighty Gentlemen of his family, in the battle of Duplin, in King David Bruce's party against Edward Baliol. DAVID Lord HAY his successor accompanied King David Bruce in the war against the English, and was killed in the battle of Durham in the year 1344. THOMAS Lord HAY married King Robert II's daughter, with whom he had the Barony of Inchtuill in the Shire of Perth, about the year 1376. WILLIAM Lord HAY was chosen in the year 1423 with some other Noblemen, to consult how to restore King James I to his liberty, who was kept a prisoner in England. He succeeded in this affair, and was soon after created Earl of Errol. WILLIAM HAY Earl of Errol, Lord High-Constable of Scotland, and Sheriff of the Shire of Aberdeen, attended King James IV in the battle of Floudown in the year 1513, and was killed there with his Prince, and twenty seven Gentlemen of his name. FRANCIS HAY Earl of Errol having constantly followed Queen Mary's party, and continued in the Roman Catholick Religion, suffered great misfortunes. His houses were demolished, his estate plundered, and himself imprisoned. But he was in favour under King James VIth, Queen Mary's son. He was one of the Scots Lords who were sent into England in the year 1604, to settle the union of the two Crowns. His son assisted at Charles I's Coronation in Scotland in the year 1633. GILBERT HAY Earl of Errol had a great share in Charles I's favour, and made a great figure in the Parliament at Edinburgh at the Restoration of Charles II. JOHN HAY, Earl of Errol, now Lord High-Constable of Scotland, is his son (4).

(4) Taken from the same Memoirs.

(o) According to Southwell, Bibliotheca Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 459. for Father Alegambe says it was in the year 1562, and not in 1566.

HAY (JOHN) a Scots Jesuit, entered into the Society of the Jesuits in the year 1566 (a), and passed his Noviciate at Rome, where he also made the fourth vow. The place where he appeared chiefly was the College of Tournon, in which he taught Divinity, Mathematics, and the Hebrew tongue. He died May the 21st 1607 at Pontamousson, where he was Chancellor of the University. He applied himself very much to controversies, and wrote several books against the Protestants [A]. He had also a dispute

[A] He wrote several Books against the Protestants. A Collection of Questions to the Ministers. He composed this in the Scots language, according to Father Alegambe, who adds that it was translated into French by Michael Coyffard. A Vindication of these Questions. He composed it in French according to Father Alegambe: but it is a mistake, for John Hay asserts in his Preface, that he wrote it in Latin, and that it was translated dispute by word of mouth at Strasburg with Pappus, and with John Sturmius (b). Father Alegambe deserves to be a little censured (c). We ought not to take this John Hay for the Jesuit of that name who was banished by a decree of the Parliament of Paris [B]. They both pretended to be descended from the family of the HAYS (d), which I have mentioned in the foregoing article.

(b) Taken from Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, p. 248.

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) See the Defense des Demandes de Jean Hay.

translated into French by some of the Jesuits pupils. This Vindication was written against a Libel of James Pineton of Chambrun, a Preacher at Nismes, and printed at Lyons in the year 1586. It appears from the Dedication, dated July 2d 1585, that it was five years since the Author had begun to read public Lectures of Divinity at Tournon. Antimonium ad Responsum Bezae. "A vomit against Beza's Answer." Disputatio contra Ministrum anonymum Nemausensem. "A Disputation against an anonymous Minister of Nismes." His Helleborum Joanni Serrano "A Purge for John de Serres," which was found among his papers, is kept at Rome with the Records belonging to the Society (1). This is all that the Bibliographers of the Jesuits tell us: they did not know that John Hay had actually published a Book against de Serres, namely an Answer to the second Anti-Jesuit of that Minister (2). John Hay's other works are Scolia brevia in Bibliothecam sanctam Sixti Senensis: i. e. "Short Observations on Sixtus Senensis's sacred Library;" and a Latin Translation of some Letters of the Jesuits written from Japan and Peru. It was printed at Antwerp in the year 1605, in 8vo. See Father Alegambe.

[B] The Jesuit of that name who was banished by a Decree of the Parliament of Paris. His name was ALEXANDER HAY. "He was found guilty of speaking seditiously against the King, since the City of Paris had been forced to submit to his Majesty; he went so far as to declare that if the King ever passed "before their College (of the Jesuits) he would throw himself headlong out of the window upon him to break his neck by the fall." This is what we read in Mezerai's large History (3). The Author of the Anticoton will tell us the date of the Parliament's Decree. Informations were made against Alexander Hayes a Scots Jesuit, who had taught publicly, that men must dissemble, and obey the King for a time artfully, saying often these words, Jesuita est omnis homo: (a Jesuit is a man of all parties): This Jesuit was also charged with saying, that if the King happened to pass by their College, he wished he might fall out of the window to break the King's neck. For which reason a Decree was pronounced by the Court (of Parliament) January the 10th 1595, by which the said Hayes was banished for ever, and commanded to keep his banishment upon pain of being hanged and strangled, without any further trial (4). The Author of the Butter-women's Thanks says the same, and then adds (5), that this Jesuit, having since repeated and confirmed the same words at Prague, the greatest men in the Kingdom petitioned to have him sent into France; but it was answered, that he had swallowed a mess of water-gruel, which was not thoroughly boiled, and he was found dead as suddenly as the Provost of the Marshals of Pluviers . . . who was strangled in the Chatelet with the string of his drawers, that was not strong enough to bridle a fly. If we may believe Pasquier (6), Alexander Hayes taught the first form in the College of the Jesuits at Paris, during the civil war.

(3) Tom. 3. pag. 1135, 1136.

(4) Anti-Caton, pag. m. 38.

(5) Pag. 19. This Remerciaement des Beurrieres was printed in the year 1610.

(6) Catechisme des Jesuites, liv. 2. chap. 20. pag. m. 472.

HAYWARD (Sir JOHN), an eminent English Historian in the beginning of the seventeenth Century, was educated in the University of Cambridge, where he took the degree of Doctor of Laws. In 1599 he published at London in 4to, The first Part of the Life and Raigne of King Henrie the III. extending to the End of the first Yeare of his Raigne. Written by J. H. [A], dedicated to Robert Earl of Essex. Upon the account

[A] In 1599 he published at London in 4to, The first part of the Life and Raigne of King Henrie the III. extending to the end of the first yeare of his raigne. Written by J. H. In the preface he observes that "among all sortes of humane writers there is none that have done more profit, or deserved greater praye, then they who have committed to faithfull records of Histories eyther the government of mighty States, or the lives and actes of famous men. For by describing the order and passages of these two, and what events had followed what countailes, they have set foorth unto us not onely precepts, but lively patterns both for private directions and for affayres of State, whereby in shorte time younge men may be instructed, and old men more fullie furnished with experience, then the longest age of man can afford." He afterwards remarks that Cicero rightly calls History the Witness of Times, the Light of Truth, the Life of Memory, and the Messenger of Antiquity. Heereby, says our Author, wee are armed against all the rage and harshnesse of fortune; and heereby we may seeme (in regarde of the knowledge of thinges) to have travelled in all countries, and to have lived in all ages, and to have been conversant in all affayres. Neyther is that the least benefit of History, that it preserves eternally both the glory of good men, and shame of evill. He concludes his preface with observing, that it might not seem impertinent to write of the stile of an History, what beginning, what continuance, and what mean is to be used in all matter, what things to be suppressed, what lightly touched, and what to be treated at large, how credit may be won, and suspicion avoided; what is to be observed in the order of times and description of places and other such circumstances of weight, what liberty a Writer may use in framing speeches, and in declaring the causes, counsels, and events of things done; how far he must bend himself to profit, and when and how he may play upon pleasure; "but this, says he, were too large a field to enter into: therefore lest I should run into the fault of the Mindians, who made their gates wider then

"their towne, I will here close up, only wishing that all our English Histories were drawne out of the drosse of rude and barbarous English, that by pleasure in reading them, the profit in knowing them myght more easily be attayned." In this History our Author introduces a speech of Dr. Thomas Merks, Bishop of Carlisle, a man, says he, learned and wise, and one that alwayes used both libertie and constancie in a good cause; in which the Bishop is represented as declaring in Parliament against the settlement of the Crown on King Henry IV. The speech begins thus: "This question, Right honourable Lordes, concerneth a matter of great consequence and weight; the determining whereof will assuredly procure eyther safe quiet or dangerous disturbance, both to our particular consciences; and also to the common State. Therefore before you resolve upon it, I pray you, call to your consideration these two things: first, whether King Richard bee sufficiently deposed or no: secondly, whether King Henrie be with good judgement or justice chosen in his place. For the first point wee are first to examine whether a King being lawfully and fully intituted by any just title, may, upon imputation eyther of negligence or of tyrannie, be deposed by his subjects. Secondly, what King Richard hath omitted in the one, or committed in the other, for which he should deserve so heavie judgement." I will not speake what may be done in a popular State, or in a consular; in which, although one beareth the name and honour of a Prince, yet he hath not supreme power of Majestie; but in the one, the people have the highest Empire, in the other the Nobilitie and chiefe men of estate, in neyther the Prince (2). . . . In these and such like governments the Prince hath not regall rightes, but is himselfe subject to that power, which is greater than his, whether it be in the Nobility or in the common people. But if the Sovereigne Majesty be in the Prince, as it was in the three first Empires, and in the Kingdomes of Judea and Israell, and is now in the Kingdomes of England, Fraunce, Spaine, Scotland, Muscovia, Turkey, Tartaria, Persia, Æthiopia, and almost all of this book he suffered a tedious imprisonment (a) [B]. In 1603 he published at London in 4to, An Answer to the first Part of a certaine Conference concerning Succession, published not long since under the name of R. Doleman [C]. In 1610 he was appointed one all the Kingdomes of Asia and Africke; although for his vices be unprofitable to the subiectes, yea burisfull, yea intollerable; yet can they lawfully neither harme his person, nor bazzard his power, whether by judgement or els by force; for neither one nor all Magistrates haue any authority over the Prince, from whom all authority is derived, and whose onely presence doeth silence and suspend all inferiour jurisdiction and power. As for force, what subiect can attempt, or assist, or counsaile, or conceale violence against his Prince, and not incurre the big and heynous crime of treason (3)? . . . Not only our actions, but our speeches also, and our very thoughts are strictly charged with duty and obedience unto Princes, whether they be good or evil (4). . . God stirreth up the spirit even of wicked Princes to doe his will; and (as Jebozabab said to his rulers) they execute not the judgement of man, but of the Lord; in regard whereof David calleth them Gods, because they haue rule and authority immediately from God, which if they abuse, they are not to be adjudged by their subiects, for no power within their Dominions is superiour to theirs: but God reserveth them to the forest tryall. Horribly and so dainly (saith the wise man) will the Lord appeare unto them, and a harde judgement shall they have. The Law of God commandeth, that the childe should be put to death for any contumely done unto the parents. But what if the father be a robber? if a murderer? if for all excesse of villanyes, odious and execrable both to God and man? Surely he deserveth the highest degree of punishment; and yet must not the sonne lift up his hand against him, for no offence is so great as to be punished by parricide. But our country is deever unto us then our parentes; and the Prince is Pater Patriæ, the Father of our Country, and therefore more sacred and deere unto us then our parentes by nature, and must not be violated, how imperious, how impious so ever he bee (5). . . Neyther have we any custome, that the people at pleasure should elect their King; but they are always bound unto him, who by right of blood is right successor; much les can they confirme and make good that title, which is before by violence usurped; for nothing can there be freely doone, when liberty is once retrained by feare (6).” Dr. White Kennet, Dean of Peterborough, observes (7), that the first notice given to the world of any such speech by Bishop Merks, came from Mr. Edward Hall, who died about 150 years after the speaking, and yet pretends no manuscript copy; and that it was immediately caught up by Mr. Grafton, who cites Mr. Hall for it. Mr. John Stow in his Annals published in his own life-time takes no notice of any speech or opposition of this Bishop in this Parliament; nor has Mr. Edmund Howes inserted it. But Mr. Hollingshed and his friends, who were to be general collectors, took hold of it, but refer to Mr. Hall, and let it rest again singly upon his testimony. “But soon after, says Dr. Kennet (8), comes a bolder man, Sir John Hayward, L.L. D. to give an Essay upon Henry IV., and he not only supposes a speech to have been really delivered, but he gives a new and larger copy of it, i. e. he made a new speech, and dressed it up in arguments and language as unlike to Bishop Merks, as his own military sword was to that Prelate’s mitre. And yet he introduces it with great ceremony. The inheritance of the Kingdom, says he, being in this sort settled in King Henry and his line, it was moved in the Parliament, what should be done with King Richard. The Bishop of Caerleke, who was a man learned and wise, and one that always used both liberty and constancy in a good cause, in his secret judgment did never give allowance to these proceedings, yet dissembled his dislike until he might to some purpose declare it. Therefore now being in a place to be heard of all, and by order of the House to be interrupted by none, he rose up and with a bold and present uttered his mind as followeth &c. “All which, continues Dr. Kennet, is an imaginary entrance into an enchanted castle, or a mere fiction pleasant enough to any who love to be deceived. The Author, like other diverting Writers, would not bind himself up to relate what another said, but would make an exercise upon what might be new said upon that subject. This speech for Bishop Merks was not his first Essay of that kind: his Life and Reign of Henry IV. He made a fine speech for Archbishop Arundel to Duke Henry in France, which he calls a solemn Oration; and a pretty speech of the Duke in answer to it, with reply and rejoinder very agreeable. He makes a most be-moaning speech for King Richard, when his bitter-ness did in this manner break from him; and another Farewell-speech in the Tower, when he delivered up his crown and sceptre. In short he is a protest Speech-maker thro’ all his little History. The true occasion of his making that elaborate speech for Bishop Merks, seems to have been this. He was employed by the Earl of Essex to answer the Book of Titles, called Doleman, written by Father Parsons, and cautiously to recommend the Hereditary Right of the King of Scots; and upon that view he took a step out of the way, and put his own thoughts into the form of a speech for Bishop Merks in defence of Hereditary Right. For which he suffered in the jealous times of Queen Elizabeth, and was honourably rewarded by King James I, who knighted him, and made him Historiographer of Chelsea-College.”

(1) Pag. 100, § 177.

(2) Ibid. pag. 101.

(a) Camden's Annals of Elizabeth, ad ann. 1601.

[B] Upon the account of this Book he suffered a tedious imprisonment. We are informed in the Lord Bacon’s Apologues (9), that Queen Elizabeth being highly incensed at this Book, she asked Mr. Bacon, who was then one of her Council learned in the Law, Whether there was any treason contained in it? Mr. Bacon answered, “No, Madam; for treason, I cannot deliver opinion, that there is any, but very much fe-lony.” The Queen apprehending it gladly asked, How, and wherein? Mr. Bacon answered, “Because he had stolen many of his sentences and conceits out of Cornelius Tacitus.” Camden tells us (10), that this Book being dedicated to the Earl of Essex, when that Nobleman and his friends were tried, the lawyers urged, that “it was written on purpose as a copy and an encouragement for deposing the Queen;” and they particularly insisted upon those words in the Dedication, in which our Author stiles the Earl, Magnus & presentis judicio, & futuri temporis expectatione.

[C] In 1603 he published at London in 4to An Answer to the first part of a certaine Conference concerning Succession, published not long since under the name of R. Doleman. The Conference was written by Father Robert Parsons, the Jesuit, and printed in 1593, 1594 in 8vo, under the name of R. Doleman, and was known by the name of the Book of Titles. The first part was reprinted at London 1648 in ten sheets in 4to, by Robert Ibbotson in Smithfield, under this title, Several Speeches delivered at a Conference concerning the Power of Parliaments to proceed against their King for misgovernment. This pamphlet was licensed January 31st 1647, by Gilbert Mabbot. Dr. Thomas Barlow, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, wrote the following note in a blank leaf before the title of it. “This base and traitorous pamphlet is verbatim the first part of Francis Doleman (Parsons was the man under that name) touching Succession to the Crowne. These nine Speeches (as here they call them) are the nine chapters in Doleman. And this was printed at the charge of the Parliament, which cost 30 pounds, being paid by them to the Printer in perpetuam eorum infamiam. See the Collection of his Majesty’s most gracious Messages for peace, p. 125, 126. The said Messages were collected and printed with observations upon them by Mr. Symons. The said traitorous pamphlet [Several Speeches] was put out by Walker an Ironmonger, sometime a Cow-herd, who when the King came into London about the five Members, threw into his coach a traitorous pamphlet, To thy tents, O Israel. Vide Lambert Wood’s History. He the said Walker wrote the Perfect Occurrences, and now (1649) is made a Minister by the Presbyterians. Mr. Darby a Yorkshire and Parliament Man bought Doleman of Cornelius Bee at

(3) Ibid. pag. 102.

(4) Ibid. pag. 104.

Sap. 6.

(5) Ibid. pag. 104, 105.

(6) Ibid. pag. 107.

(7) Third Letter to the Lord Bishop of Carlisle, Lord Almoner to his Majesty, upon the subject of Bishop Merks, pag. 46, 1699. edit. London 1717, in 8vo.

(8) Ibid. p. 49.

(9) Works of Lord Bacon, edit. London 4 vol. in fol.

(10) Annals of Queen Elizabeth, ad ann. 1601.

of the Historiographers of Chelsea College near London [D]. In 1613 he published at London in 4to, The Lives of the Three Normans, Kings of England; William be First, William

“ the King's Arms in little Britain, and gave it to “ Walker. Doleman beforementioned was an honest “ secular Priest, who hated traitorous doctrines; and “ Father Parsons hated him, and, to make him odious, “ did use his name, as if Doleman had been the author, “ when Parsons indeed made the Book.” The titles of the chapters of the first part of the Conference are as follow:
 I. That succession to Governement by neceress of bloude is not by lawe of nature or divine, but only by humane and positive lawes of every particular Commonwealth: and consequently, that it may upon just causes be altered by the same. II. Of the particular Forme of Monarchies and Kingdomes, and the different Lawes whereby they are to be obtained, bolden, and governed in divers countries, according as each Commonwealth hath chosen and establisshed. III. Of the great reverence and respect due to Kings, and yet how divers of them have been lawfully chastised by their Commonwealthes for their misgo-vernment; and of the good and prosperous successe that God commonly hath given to the same, and much more to the putting back of an unworthie pretender. IV.
Wherein consisteth principally the lawfulnessse of proceeding against Princes, which in the former chapter is mencioned: What interest Princes have in their subjects goods or lives: How oathes doe binde or may be broken of subjects towards Princes; and finally the difference betweene a good King and a Tyrant. V. Of the Coronation of Princes and Maner of admitting to their authoritye, and the Oathes which they do make in the same unto the Commonwealth for their good government. VI. “ What is “ due to onely succession by birth; and what interest “ or right an heire apparent hath to the Crowne, be“ fore he is crowned or admitted by the Common“ wealth; and how justly he may be put backe, if “ he hath not the partes requisite. VII. How the “ next in succession by propinquity of bloud have of“ tentimes bin put backe by the Commonwealth, “ and others further off admitted in their places even “ in those Kingdoms where succession prevaileth; with “ many examples of the kingdome of Israel and Spain; “ VIII. Of divers other examples out of the State of “ France and England for proof, that the next in “ bloud are sometimes put backe from Succession, and “ how God hath approved the same with good suc“ cesse. IX. What are the principall points, which a “ Commonwealth ought to respect, in admitting or “ excluding any Prince; wherein is handled largely “ also of the diversitie of Religions and other such “ Cases.” The second part of this Conference was designed to prove, that the Infanta of Spain was the legal heir to the Crown of England. As soon as this Book was published, the Parliament enacted in the 35th of Q. Elizabeth, that whoever should be found to have it in his house, should be guilty of high treason. This Conference was reprinted at London 1681 in 8vo, which occasioned the publication of a piece intitled, The apostate Protestant, in a Letter to a Friend, occasioned by the late reprinting of Doleman. London 1682 in eight sheets in 4to, said to be written by Edward Pelling, Rector of St. Martin's Ludgate in London. Our Author Hayward's Answer to the first part of the Conference, which was likewise reprinted at London 1683 in 8vo, is dedicated to King James I, and in the Dedication he styles it a Defence both of the present Authoritie of Princes, and of Succession according to proximitie of blood; wherco, says he, is maintained, that the people have no lawfull power to remove the one, or repell the other. In which two points I have heretofore also declared my opinion, by publishing the tragicall events; which ensued the deposition of King Richard, and usurpation of King Henrie the fourth. Both these labours were undertaken with particular respect to your Majesty's just title of Succession in this Realme. In the Epistle to R.
 Doleman our Author observes, that the reason of his not answering the Conference sooner was, partly from contempt, and partly from fear. “ The fear, says he, “ was occasioned by the nimble ear, which lately was “ borne to the touche of this string: for which cause
 “ our English fugitives did stand in some advantage,
 “ in that they had free scope to publish whatsoever
 “ was agreeable to their pleasure, knowing right well, “ that their bookes could not be suppressed, and might “ not be answered. It may be you will question, “ wherefore I have not answered your second part. It “ is ready for you, but I have not now thought fit “ to divulge the same; partly because it hath been “ dealt in by some others; but principally because I “ know not how convenient it may seeme to discusse “ such particulars, as with generall both liking and “ applause are now determined. I forbore to ex“ presse your true name; I have reserved that to my “ answer to some cast pamphlet, which I expect you “ will cast forth against mee.”

[D] In 1610 he was appointed one of the Historiographers of Chelsea College near London] This College was intended, says Fuller (11), for a spiritual garrison, ^{(11) Church} with a magazine of all books for that purpose, where ^{History of Bri-} learned Divines should study and write in mainte- ^{tain, B. 10. pag.}
 nance of all controversies against the Papists. Indeed the Romanists herein may rise up, and condemn those of the Protestant Confession. For as Solomon used ^{(a) 2 Chron.} not his military men for any servile work, in build- ^{viii. 9.}
 ing the Temple, whereof the text assigneth this reason, for they were men of war; so the Romish Church doth not burden their Professors with preaching or any parochial incumbrances, but reserves them only for Polemical studies. Whereas in England the same man reads, preacheth, catechiseth, disputes, delivers sacraments, &c. So that were it not for God's marvellous blessing in our studies, and the infinite odds of truth on our side, it were impossible in human probability, that we should hold “ up the bucklers against them.” Besides the divines, at least two able Historians were to be maintained in the College, to record and publish to posterity all memorable passages in the Church and State. In pursuance of this design King James I incorporated the said foundation by the name of King James's College in Chelsey, and by Letters Patents bestowed on it the reversion of lands in Chelsea, then in possession of Charles Earl of Nottingham; and made it capable of receiving any lands of his subjects not exceeding in the whole the yearly value of three thousand pounds. Dr. Matthew Sutcliffe, Dean of Exeter, bestowed likewise on this College several farms in Devonshire worth about three hundred pounds per Ann. and by his will, dated November 1. 1628, bequeathed to Dr. John Prideaux, and Dr. Clifford, as Feoffees, in trust to settle the same on the College, the benefit of the extent on a statue of four thousand pounds, acknowledged by Sir Lewis Steuklie. In the Parliament which met at Westminster, February 19, 1609, there was an act past to enable the Provost and Fellows of Chelsea College to dig a trench out of the river Lee, to erect engines, waterworks, &c. to convey and carry water in close pipes under ground unto the city of London and the suburbs thereof, for the perpetual maintenance and sustentation of the Provost and Fellows of that College, and their successors by the rent to be made of the said waters so conveyed.
 The fabric of this College was begun on a piece of ground called Thamesbot, containing about six acres, and then in possession of Charles Earl of Nottingham, who granted a lease of his term therein to the said Provost at the yearly rent of seven pounds ten shillings.
 King James laid the first stone of it, and gave all the tember necessary to it out of Windfor Forest. “ And “ yet, says Fuller (12), that long range of building, ^{(12) Ubi supra,}
 “ which alone is extant, scarce finished at this day, ^{pag. 52.}
 “ thus made, though not of free-stone, of free timber,
 “ as I am informed, cost full three thousand pound.
 “ But alas! what is this piece (not an eighth part) to “ a double quadrant, besides wings on each side, which “ was intended?” The names of the first Provost and Fellows settled by the King, May 8, 1610, are as follow. Dr. Matthew Sutcliffe, Dean of Exeter, Provost: Dr. John Overal, Dean of St. Paul's; Dr.
 Thomas Morton, Dean of Winchester; Dr. Richard Field, Dean of Gloucester; Dr. Robert Abbot; Dr.
 John Spenser; Dr. Miles Smith; Dr. William Covitt;
 Dr. John Howson; Dr. John Layfield; Dr. Benjamin
 Charrier; Dr. Martin Fotherbie; Dr. John Boys;
 Dr. Richard Brett; Dr. Peter Lilie; Dr. Francis Burley; William Hillier, Arch-deacon of Barstable; and John White, Fellow of Manchester College. The two

William the Second, Henric the First. Written by J. H. [E], and dedicated to Charles Prince of Wales. In 1619 he received the honour of Knighthood from his Majesty at Whitehall (b). In 1624 he published a discourse intituled, Of Supremacie in Affaires of Religion. By Sir John Hayward, Knt. Doctor of Lawe [F], London in 4to, dedicated to two Historians were William Camden, Clarenceaux, and John Hayward, L. L. D. None, who were actually Bishops, were capable of places in this College; and when some were afterwards advanced to Bishoprics, or died, the King by his Letters Patents November 14, 1622, substituted others in their room; among whom Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, though only Dean of Windsor in England, was most remarkable. In 1616 his Majesty sent his letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury to excite the clergy of his province to contribute to so pious a work; yet for all these endeavours and collections in all the parishes of England, the sums of money brought in were slow and small. Many of them, says Fuller (13), were scattered out in the gathering them up, the charges of the collectors consuming the profit thereof. And the same writer observes, that it was vehemently suspected, that some part of these collections had been detained by private persons. Various were the conjectures concerning what obstructed the proceedings with regard to the College. Some ascribed it to the untimely death of Prince Henry; but Mr. Fuller, upon a strict perusal of the records of the College, could not find so much as mention of the name of the Prince as in any degree visibly contributing to it. Others ascribed it "to the large, loose, and lax nature thereof, no one prime person (Sutcliffe) excepted, whose shoulders sunk under the weight thereof) zealously engaging therein; King James's maintenance amounting to little more than countenance of the work (14)." Others imputed it to the failure of the project for making a new river; others to the remissness of the greatest prelates, who though seemingly forward to the utmost, were suspicious, that these controversial Divines would be considered as the principal champions for religion, and more serviceable in the church than themselves, and perhaps might acquire principles prejudicial to their episcopal jurisdictions. Others imagined, that it was obstructed by the jealousy of the Universities; or by the suspicion of some patriots and commoners in Parliament, "that this College would be, says Fuller (15), too much courtier; and that the Divinity, but especially the History thereof, would ἰεροσολίτις, propend too much in favour of King James, and report all things to the disadvantage of the subject. Wherefore though the said patriots in Parliament countenanced the Act, as counting it no policy publickly to cross the project of King James, especially as it was made popular with so pious a plausibility; yet when returned home, by their suspicious items and private instructions they beat off and retarded people's charities thereunto. The same conceived this foundation superfluous, to keep men to confute Popish opinions by writings, whilst the maintainers of them were every where connived at, and countenanced, and the penal laws not put in any effectual execution against them." Others remarked, that this design was begun in a bad time, when the world swarmed with projectors, and necessitous courtiers, contriving all ways to get money; and it was the misfortune of it to appear in a time, when so many monopolies were on foot. Some great Churchmen were more backward, because the design was conducted by Dr. Sutcliffe, who was known to be a rigid Anti-Remonstrant, and when old, very severe in his writings against the Remonstrants.

(b) Wood, Fests. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 203. 2d edit. London 1721.

(13) Pag. 53.

(14) Idem, ibid. pag. 53, 54.

(15) Pag. 34.

[E] In 1613 he published at London in 4to, The Lives of the three Normans, Kings of England. In the Epistle Dedicatory to Prince Charles he observes, that he published this work at the desire of Prince Henry, who had sent for him a few months before his Highness's death, and complained much of the Histories of England, and that the English, who were inferior to none in honourable actions, should be surpassed by all in leaving the memory of them to posterity. Our Author answered, that he conceived these to be the causes hereof; One, that men of sufficiency were otherwise employed, either in publick affaires, or in wrestling with the world, for maintenance or increase of their private estates. Another is, for that men might safely write of others in maner of a tale, but in maner of a History safely they could not, because, albeit they should write of men long since dead, and whose posteritie is cleane worne out, yet some alive finding themselves foule in those vices, which they see observed, reprov'd, condemned in others; their guiltinesse maketh them apt to conceite, that whatsoever the words are, the finger pointeth only at them. The last is, for that the argument of our English History hath bene so soiled heretofore by some unworthie writers, that men of qualitie may esteeme themselves discredited by dealing in it. The Prince asked our author, whether he had written any part of our English History besides what had been published, which at that time he had in his hands. "I answered, says he, that I had wrote of certaine of our English Kings by way of a brieve description of their lives: but for Historie, I did principally bend and binde myselfe to the times, wherein I should live, in which my owne observations might somewhat direct me. But as well in the one as in the other, I had at that time perfected nothing." The Prince replied, that in regard of the honour of the time, he liked well of the last, but for his own instruction he more desired the first; and directed our author, that against his Highness's return from his progres then at hand, he would perfect somewhat of both sorts for him, which he promised amply to requite. This engaged Dr. Hayward to finish the Lives of the three Kings of the Norman Race, and certain years of Queen Elizabeth's reign. At the Prince's return from the progres to his house at St. James's these pieces were delivered unto him; but because the Lives of the Three Normans, Kings of England seemed perfect, he expressed a desire, that they should be published; but he soon after died.

[F] In 1624 he published a discourse intituled, Of Supremacie in affaires of Religion. By Sir John Hayward Knight and Doctor of Law. It contains eighty eight pages in 4to. It is written in the manner of a conversation held at the table of Dr. Toby Matthews, Bishop of Durham, in the time of the Parliament in the year 1605. The proposition of it is, that supreme power in ecclesiastical affairs is a right of sovereignty. In the discussion of this, it is shewn, that sovereign or majestical power must be perpetual and absolute. That affairs of the greatest importance are annexed to the sovereign Majesty. That nothing in a State is of so great importance as Religion. That affairs of Religion are to be managed by those, who bear the Sovereignty. That it is dangerous for others to be depended upon in regard of Religion. That two policies were antiently observed for avoiding these dangers, to exclude external ceremonies, and to commit the ordering of matters in Religion to the sovereign authority within the State. With regard to the first, it is observed (16), "that the Jews would not converse or accompany a man, who was not of their owne Religion. Among the Grecians, Socrates and Protagoras were condemned, Anaxagoras and Aristotle were accused, for holding opinions contrary to their received Religion. Josephus writeth (17) that the Athenians had a severe Law against any man, who should speake a word in Religion against that which was established by Law. The Scythians put Anacharsis to death for performing the rites of Bacchus after the manner of the Grecians. Livie writeth, that among the Romans the Aediles received in part of their charge (18) that no externall Religion or Ceremony should be brought in. And to the same purpose M. Aemilius recited a decree (19), that no man should sacrifice in a publick or sacred place after a newe or externall rite. How often, saith the same Livie (20), have our Fathers and Ancestors given charge to the Magistrates, that externall ceremonies should be forbidden? Mecenas in Dio (21) gave this exhortation and advice to Augustus (22). Observe Religion after the fashion of your country, and compell others to doe the like; but those, who bring in strange and forraigne rites, hate and correct, because they perswade many to worke alterations, from whence conspiracies and seditions

(16) Sect. 10. pag. 20, 21. De Irenis variis & peregrinis non sine abduci. Heb. l. 13. 19.
(17) Joseph. Lib. 2. contra Apion. ἵσταντο τοῦ μόνου ὀδοῦ μόνου τῆς θείας ἀποστασίας.
(18) No qui nisi Romani dii neve alio more quam patrio colerentur.
(19) Liv. lib. 15. No quis in publico sacro loco novo aut externo ritu sacrificaret.
(20) Lib. 39. Quoties patrum avorumque atate negotium magister, ut sacra externa fieri veterant?
(21) Dio, lib. 53.
(22) Τὸ μὲν θεῶν πατρῶν ἱερῶν ἡμεῶν, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἑξωτῆς ἢ ἑσθῶν, ἔτι καὶ ἀλλοτρίων, ἀποστασίας καὶ ἀνομιῶν.

to Prince Charles. He died at his house in the parish of Great St. Bartholomew London on Wednesday June the 27th 1627, and was interred in the Church belonging to that parish. He wrote likewise The Life and Reign of King Edward VI [G], and several theological works, particularly The strong Helper, or bow in all our Troubles to cast our Burden upon God. London 1614 in 8vo. The Sanctuary of a troubled Soul. London 1616 in 8vo. Christ's Prayer on the Cross for his Enemies. London 1623 in 8vo. David's Tears; or an Exposition of the Penitential Psalms. London 1625 in 4to. Mr. Wood tells us (c), "that he was accounted a learned and godly man, and one better read in theological authors than in those belonging to his own profession;" and that with regard to his Histories, "the phrase and words in them were in their time esteemed very good; only some have wished, that in his History of Henry IV he had not called Sir Hugh Lynne by so light a word as Mad-Cap, though he were such; and that he had not changed his Historical Style into a Dramatical, where he induceth a mother uttering a woman's passion in the case of her son." Archdeacon Nicholson (d) observes, that he had the repute in his time of a good clean pen and smooth style. Mr. John Strype (e) says, that our author "must be read with caution; that his style and language is good, and so is his fancy; but that he makes too much use of it for an Historian, which puts him on sometimes to make speeches for others, which they never spake, and to relate matters, which perhaps they never thought on."

(c) Folio Oxon, ubi supra.

(d) English Historical Library, Part 1. pag. 216. edit. London 1696, in 8vo.

(e) Preface to Sir John Hayward's Life and Reign of King Edward VI, printed in the 2d volume of the Complete History of England.

"ditions are oftentimes occasioned." With respect to the second point, viz. to commit the ordering of matters in Religion to the sovereign authority within the State, this is shewn to have been practised by the Jews, Egyptians, and divers other people, in the Empires of Assyria and Persia, in the States of Greece, in the Empire of Rome under the Government of Kings, in the popular State, and under the Heathen and first Christian Emperors. It is shewn likewise, that matters of external or accidental form in the Church depended altogether upon the first Christian Emperors, by whose direction and authority matters of faith and essential form were also ordered. That the eight General Councils were called and confirmed by Emperors. That there was a contest between the Bishops of Rome and Constantinople for superiority, the latter being favoured by divers Emperors. That by giving this prerogative to the Bishops of Rome the Eastern Empire was dismember'd. That the absolute power of the Bishops of Rome in Ecclesiastical affairs reduced the Western Empire, not only to a feeble State, but to be held in a vassalage to the See of Rome. That by the same power the Bishops of Rome claimed Sovereignty also over divers principal Kingdoms in Europe, and generally over all States in the world; by which means divers distresses were occasioned.

[G] He wrote likewise, The Life and Reign of King Edward VI. It was printed at London 1630 in 4to, and there was another edition of it in 1636 in 24mo, under this title; The Life and Raigne of King Edward the Sixth. With the beginning of the Raigne of Queene Elizabeth. Both written by Sir John Hayward, Knight, Doctor of Lawe. To this is prefixed the author's picture. T

HEARNE (THOMAS), eminent for his Writings and Editions of Books and Manuscripts [A], was son of George Hearne, Parish-Clerk of White Waltham in Berkshire, by Edith his wife, daughter of Thomas Wife of Shottesbrooke in the said county. He was born at Littlefield Green in the parish of White Waltham in the year 1680, and received no other instruction than from his father, (who kept a writing-school in

[A] Eminent for his Writings and Editions of Books and Manuscripts. They are as follow. I. Reliquiæ Bodleianæ: or some genuine remains of Sir Thomas Bodley. Containing his life, the first draught of the Statutes of the publick Library at Oxford, (in English) and a collection of letters to Dr. James, &c. Published from the originals in the said Library. London 1703 in 8vo. II. C. Plinii Cæciliæ secundi Epistolæ & Panegyricus, cum variis lectionibus & annotationibus. Accedit Vita Plinii ordine chronologico digesta. Oxford 1703 in 8vo. III. Eutropii Breviarium Historiæ Romanæ, cum Pæanii Metaphrasi Græcâ. Messala Corvinus de Augusti Progenie. Julius Obsequens de Prodigiiis. Anonymi Oratio funebri Gr. Lat. in Imp. Fl. Constantinum Constantini M. fil. Cum variis lectionibus & annotationibus. Oxford 1703 in 8vo. IV. Ductor Historicus: Or a short System of universal History, or an Introduction to the study of it. Volume the first, in three Books, containing, 1. A Chronology of all the most celebrated persons and actions from the Creation to this time. To which is prefixed an Explication of Terms and other Præcognita. 2. An Introduction to History. Wherein an account is given of the writings of the ancient Historians Greek and Roman, with the judgment of the best Criticks upon them. Together with an ample collection of English Historians. 3. A compendious History of all the ancient Monarchies and States from the Creation to the Birth of Christ. London 1705 in 8vo, second Edition. It was printed again in 1714 and 1724 without our Author's knowledge. With regard to the first Edition, it is to be ascribed to another person; and the two first books in the second, third, and fourth Edition are by another hand, who wrote likewise the Preface. But Mr. Hearne wrote the third Book himself. V. Ductor Historicus: Or a short System of universal Hi- story. Volume the second. Containing a compendious account of the most considerable transactions in the world, from the Birth of Christ to the final Decay of the Roman Monarchy, and the Establishment of the German Empire by Charles the Great. In three Books, viz. 1. A Series of the Succession, and a History of the Reigns of all the Emperors, from the Birth of Christ to the removal of the Imperial Seat to Constantinople. 2. The Succession of the Emperors, continued from the Translation of the Empire to the reign of Charlemagne. 3. The History of Persia under Parthian Kings, and the Persian Race restored, to the Destruction of that Monarchy by the Saracens. The several Kingdoms erected in Europe by the Franks, Saxons, Goths, Vandals, &c. and their respective successions. The Life of Mahomet, and the Succession of the Saracen Caliphs. Together with an account of the Foundation of the most considerable Cities, &c. for 800 years after Christ, with other miscellaneous things not mentioned in the course of the History. Oxford 1704 in 8vo. It was printed three times at London without our Author's knowledge, who declared in the Preface his design to publish a third volume, for which he had made great collections out of the best Authors. But he laid aside this design upon the publication of the English Translation of Puffendorf's Introduction, which begins where the second volume of the Ductor Historicus ends, and continues the History to the present times. VI. M. Juniani Justinii Historiarum ex Trogo Pompeio Libri XLIV. MSS. Codicum collatione recogniti, annotationibusque illustrati. Oxford 1705 in 8vo. VII. T. Livii Patavinii Historiarum ab Urbe condita Libri qui supersunt, MSS. Codicum collatione recogniti, annotationibusque illustrati. Oxford 1708 in six volumes in 8vo. VIII. A Letter containing an account of some Antiquities between Windsor and Oxford, with a List of the in the Vicarage House of White Waltham, being permitted to live there by the Minister on condition that he taught ten boys yearly,) till the year 1693; when the learned and pious Francis Cherry of Shottesbrooke Esq; put him to the Free-school of Bray in Berks on purpose to learn the Latin tongue. In this school he presently became remarkable for his industry and application, and soon made a very surprising progress; of which Mr. Cherry being fully satisfied, resolved, by the advice of Mr. Dodwel, who then lived at Shottesbrooke; the several Pictures in the School-Gallery adjoining to the Bodleian Library. Printed in 1708 in The monthly Miscellany, or Memoirs for the Curious. This Letter is reprinted at the end of the fifth volume of our Author's Edition of Leland's Itinerary, with additions and corrections, but without the List of Pictures. But this Catalogue being greatly sought for by men of learning, he reprinted an hundred copies of the whole Tract revised (for the London was very incorrect) in 1725 in 8vo. IX. The Life of Ælfred the Great by Sir John Spelman, Knt. Published from the original MS. in the Bodleian Library. To which are added many historical Remarks, and a Discourse upon an old Roman Inscription lately found near Bath. Oxford 1710 in 8vo. X. The Itinerary of John Leland the Antiquary, in IX volumes 8vo. Published from the original MSS. and other authentic copies. Oxford 1710, 1711, 1712. This work, which is very scarce, there having been only an hundred and twenty copies printed, viz. 12 in fine, and 108 in ordinary paper, is adorned with divers curious discourses and observations, partly written by the editor, and partly by others. XI. Henrici Dodwelli de Parmæ Equestri Woodwardianâ Dissertatio. Accedit Thomæ Neli Dialogus inter Reginam Elizabetham & Robertum Dudleyum, Comitum Leycestriæ & Academiæ Oxoniensis Cancellarium, in quo de Academiæ Edificiis præclarè agitur. Oxford 1713 in 8vo. XII. Johannis Lelandi Antiquarii de Rebus Britannicis Collectanea. Oxford 1715 in six volumes in 8vo. There were but an hundred and fifty six copies printed. XIII. Acta Apostolorum Græco-Latinæ, literis majusculis. E Codice Laudiano, characteribus uncialibus exarato, & in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ adseruato, descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius. Qui Symbolum etiam Apostolorum ex eodem Codice subjunxit. Oxford 1715 in 8vo. There were but an hundred and twenty copies printed. XIV. Joannis Rossi Antiquarii Warwicenses Historia Regum Angliæ. E Codice MS. in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ descripsit, notisque & indice adornavit Tho. Hearnius. Accedit Joannis Lelandi Antiquarii Nania in mortem Henrici Duddelegi Equitis; cui præfigitur Testimonium de Lelando amplum & præclarum, hætenus ineditum. Oxford 1716 in 8vo. There were only sixty copies printed. XV. Titi Livii Foro-Julienfis Vita Henrici quinti, Regis Angliæ. Accedit Sylloge Epistolarum à variis Angliæ Principibus scriptarum. E codicibus calamo exaratis descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius: Qui Appendicem etiam Notasque subjecit. Oxford 1716 in 8vo. XVI. Aluredi Beverlacenfis Annales, sive Historia de Gestis Regum Britannicæ, Libris IX. E codice pervetusto, calamo exarato, in Bibliotheca Viri clarissimi Thomæ Rawlinsoni, Armigeri, descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius. Qui & Præfatione, Notis, atque Indice illustravit. Oxford 1716 in 8vo. There were but one hundred and forty eight copies printed. XVII. Gulielmi Roperi Vita D. Thomæ Mori Equitis avari, Linguâ Anglicanâ contexta. Accedunt Mori Epistola de scholasticis quibusdam Trojanis sese appellantis; Academiæ Oxoniensis Epistole & Orationes aliquamultæ; Anonymi Chronicon Godstovianum, & fenestrarum depictarum Ecclesiæ Parochialis de Fairford in Agro Gloucestriensî Explicatio. E Codicibus vetustis descripsit ediditque, Notisque etiam adornavit Tho. Hearnius. Oxford 1716 in 8vo. There were but an hundred and forty eight copies printed. XVIII. Gulielmi Camdeni Annales Rerum Anglicarum & Hibernicarum regnante Elizabetha. Tribus Voluminibus comprehensî. E Codice præclaro Smithiano, propria Auctoris manu correcto, multisque magni momenti Additionibus locupletato, eruit ediditque Tho. Hearnius, aliumque insuper Codicem à Bibliotheca Rawlinsoniana addidit. Oxford 1717 in 8vo. XIX. Gulielmi Neubrigenfis Historia sive Chronica Rerum Anglicarum, libris quinque. E Codice manuscripto pervetusto in Bibliotheca prænobilis Domini Domini Thomæ Sebrigbt Baronetti, uberrimis additionibus locupletata, longèque emendatius quam antehac edita. Studio & opera Tho. Hearnii, qui & præter Joannis Picardi Annotationes, suas etiam Notas qualescunque & Spicilegium subjecit. Accedunt Homiliæ tres eidem Gulielmo à Viris eruditissimis adscriptæ, partim à Codice præclaro antedicto, partim à Codice antiquo Lambethano nunc primum editæ. Oxford, 1719, in 8vo. XX. Thomæ Sproti Chronica à Codice antiquo MS^o in Bibliothecâ prænobilis Adolescentis Dⁿⁱ Edwardi Dering de Surrenden Dering in Agro Cantiano Baronetti, descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius: qui & alia quædam Opuscula e Codicibus MSS^{is} authenticis a seipso itidem descripta subjecit. Oxford, 1719, in 8vo. XXI. A Collection of curious Discourses, written by eminent Antiquaries upon several Heads in our English Antiquities, and now first published chiefly for the Use and Service of the young Nobility and Gentry of England. Oxford, 1720, in 8vo. XX. Textus Rossensis, Accedunt Professionum antiquorum Angliæ Episcoporum Formulæ de canonicâ obedientiâ Archiepiscopis Cantuariensibus præstandâ, & Leonardi Hutteni Dissertatio Anglicè conscripta de Antiquitatibus Oxoniensibus. E Codicibus MSS. descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius. Oxford, 1720, in 8vo. XXIII. Roberti de Avesbury Historia de Mirabilibus Gestis Edwardi tertii. Accedunt, 1. Libri Saxonici, qui ad manus Joannis Foscelini venerunt. 2. Nomina eorum, qui scripserunt historiam gentis Anglorum, & ubi exstant, per Joannem Foscelinum. E Codicibus MSS. descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius. Appendicem etiam subnexuit, in quâ, inter alia, continentur, Letters of King Henry VIII to Anne Bolen. Oxford, 1720, in 8vo. XXIV. Johannes de Fordun Scotchchronicon genuinum, una cum ejusdem Supplemento ac Continuatione. E Codicibus MSS. eruit ediditque, Appendicem etiam subjunxit, totumque Opus (in quinque Volumina distinctum) Præfatione atque Indicibus adornavit Tho. Hearnius. Oxford, 1722, in 8vo. XXV. The History and Antiquities of Glastonbury. To which are added, 1. The Endowment and Orders of Sberington's Chantry founded in St. Paul's Church, London. 2. Dr. Plot's Letter to the Earl of Arlington concerning Tbesford. To all which pieces (never before printed) a Preface is prefixed, and an Appendix subjoined. Oxford, 1722, in 8vo. XXVI. Hemingi Cbartularium Ecclesiæ Wigorniensis. E Codice MSS. penes Richardum Graves de Mickleton in Agro Gloucestriensî Armigerum, descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius; qui & eam partem Libri de Domelday, quæ ad Ecclesiâ pertinet Wigorniensis, aliaque ad Operis (duobus Voluminibus comprehensî) nitorem facientia subnexuit. Oxford, 1723, in 8vo. XXVII. Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle. Transcribed, and now first published from a MS. in the Harleyan Library. To which is added, besides a Glossary and other Improvements, a Continuation (by the Author himself) of this Chronicle from a MS. in the Cottonian Library. In two Volumes. Oxford, 1724, in 8vo. XXVIII. Peter Langtoft's Chronicle, (as illustrated and improved by Robert of Brunne) from the Death of Cadwalader to the end of King Edward the First's reign. Transcribed, and now first published from a MS. in the Inner-Temple Library. To which are added, besides a Glossary, and other curious Papers, 1. A Roll concerning Glastonbury Abby, being a Survey of all the Estates belonging to that House at the Dissolution, taken by King Henry the Eighth's order, and for his use. 2. An Account of the Hospital of St. Mary Magdalen near Scroby in Nottinghamshire, by John Slacke, Master of that Hospital. 3. Two Tracts by an anonymous Author; the first relating to Conquest in Somersetshire; the second concerning Stone-henge. Oxford, 1725; in two Volumes in 8vo. XXIX. Johannes, Confratris & Monachi Glastoniensis, Chronica, sive Historia de Rebus Glastoniensibus. E Codice MS. membranæ antiquo descripsit ediditque Tho. Hearnius. E quo Codice & Historiolam de antiquitate & augmentatione vetustæ Ecclesiæ S. Mariæ Glastoniensis præmisit, multaque excerpta e Richardi Beere (Abbatis Glastoniensî) Terrario bujus cænobii subjecit. Accedunt quædam eadem spectantia, ex

Snottesbrooke, to take him into his own house, which accordingly he did about Easter 1695, and provided for him as if he had been his own son, and instructed him in Religion and Classical Learning every day, when at home hearing him read himself, and when absent taking care that he should read to Mr. Dodwel, when both the one and the other explained to him the difficult places, and always illustrated them with curious and useful observations. December the 4th 1695 Mr. Cherry had him entered a Butler of Edmund Hall in Oxford, where he was matriculated the day following, and then returned to Mr. Cherry's, by whose order he went again daily to school at Bray four miles distant from Mr. Cherry's, till Easter Term 1696, when Mr. Cherry went himself with him to Oxford, provided a chamber and all necessaries for him, and saw him fully settled before he returned. Here Mr. Hearne followed his studies so closely as to be soon taken considerable notice of by Dr. Mill, Principal of Edmund Hall, who being then busy about the Appendix to his edition of the New Testament, and finding this young man to be versed in manuscripts, got him to compare for him some manuscripts, which are used in the said Appendix. At three years standing he went at Dr. Mills's request to Eton, to compare a manuscript of Tatian and Athenagoras (for both authors are comprehended in the same manuscript) in that Library. The variations were afterwards made use of by Mr. Worth in his edition of Tatian, and by Mr. De Chaire in his edition of Athenagoras, but without any mention made by either Editor of him, who collated the manuscripts. The book, in which Mr. Hearne wrote the Variations, is now in the Bodleian Library. He was likewise very assistant to Dr. Grabe, at that time Resident in egregio MS. communicato ab amicis eruditis Cantabrigienses, ut & Appendix, in qua, inter alia, de S. Ignatii Epistolarum Codice Mediceo, & de Johannis Dee, Mathematici celeberrimi, vita atque scriptis agitur. Oxford, 1726, in 8vo. XXX. Adami de Domesham Historiæ de Rebus gestis Glastonienfibus. E Codice MS. perantiquo, in Bibliothecâ Collegii S. Trinitatis Cantabrigiæ, descripsit primusque in lucem protulit Tho. Hearnius, qui & (præter alia, in quibus Dissertatio de Inscriptione per veteri Romanâ Ciceriæ nuper repertâ) Guilielmi Malmesburienfis Librum de Antiquitate Ecclesiæ Glastonienfis, & Edmundi Acberii Excerpta aliquam-multa satis egregia de Registris Wellensibus, præmisit. Oxford, 1727, in 2 Volumes in 8vo. XXXI. Thomæ de Elmham Vita & Gesta Henrici quinti, Anglorum Regis. E Codicibus MSS. Vetustis descripsit, & primus luci publicæ dedit Tho. Hearnius. Oxford, 1727, in 8°. XXXII. Liber Niger Scaccarii. E Codice, calamo exarato & a Richardo Gravesio Mickletonienfi donato, descripsit & nunc primus edidit Tho. Hearnius; qui & cum duobus aliis codicibus MSS. Contulit, Wilbelmiquæ etiam Worcesterii Annales rerum Anglicarum (ante hæc itidem incditos) subjecit. Oxford, 1728. In Two Volumes in 8vo. XXXIII. Historia Vitæ & Regni Richardi II. Angliæ Regis, a Monacho quodam de Evesham consignata. Accesserunt, præter alia Joannis Rossi Historiola de Comitibus Warwicensibus; Joannis Bereblici Commentarii de rebus gestis Oxoniæ, ibidem commemorante Elizabethâ Regina; & D. Ricardi Wynne Baronetti Narratio historica de Caroli, Walliæ Principis, Famulorum in Hispaniam Itinere A. D. MDCXXIII. E Codicibus MSS. nunc primus edidit Tho. Hearnius. Oxford, 1729, in 8vo. XXXIV. Joannis de Trokelowe Annales Edwardi II. Henrici de Blanesforde Chronica, & Edwardi II. Vita a Monacho quodam Malmesburienfi suæ enarrata. E Codicibus MSS. nunc primus divulgavit Tho. Hearnius. Qui &, præter Appendicem (in qua, inter alia, Ordinationes Collegii Orielenfis) monumenta quædam vetera, ab Edmundo Archerio communicata, subjunxit. Oxford, 1729, in 8vo. XXXV. Thomæ Cæii (Collegii Universitatis regnante Elizabethâ Magistri) Vindicæ antiquitatis Academiæ Oxoniensis contra Joannem Caium, Cantabrigiensem. In lucem ex Autographo emisit Tho. Hearnius: Qui porro non tantum Antonii Woodi Vitam à se ipso conscriptam, & Humpredi Humpreys (Episcopi nuper Herefordienfis) de viris claris Cambro-Britannicis Observationes, sed & reliquias quasdam ad Familiam religiosissimam Ferrariorum de Gidding Parva in agro Huntingdoniensis pertinentes subnexuit. Oxford, 1730, in two Volumes in 8vo. XXXVI. Walteri Hemingforde, Canonici de Giffesburne, Historia de rebus gestis Edwardi I. Edwardi II. & Edwardi III. Accedunt, inter alia, Edwardi III. Historia per anonymum; Narratio de Processu contra Reginaldum Peacockium, auctore Joanne Wbethamstedio; Excerpta historica de Thomæ Gascoignii Dictionario Theologico; Libellus de Caroli I. ab urbe Oxoniensi fugâ sive discessu, Notitiæque Domorum Religiosarum in Diocesi Basbo-Wellens. E Codicibus MSS. nunc primus publicavit Tho. Hearnius, Oxford, 1731, in two Volumes in 8vo. XXXVII. Duo rerum Anglicarum Scriptores veteres, viz. Thomas Otterbourne & Johannes Wbethamstede, ab origine gentis Britannicæ usque ad Edwardum IV. E Codicibus MSS. antiquis nunc primus eruit Tho. Hearnius. Accedunt, inter alia, Liber de Vitâ & Miraculis Henrici VI. per Johannem Blackmannum; Statuta Hospitalis de Ewelme in Agro Oxoniensi; Literæ per plures de rebus gestis in partibus nostris Septentrionalibus A. D. M. D. XXIII. & M. D. XXIV. in quibus Epistolæ autographæ per paucæ Margaretæ, Sctorum Regina, Henrici nostri VII. filie natu majoris; Francisci Godwyni Catalogus, basenus ineditus, Episcoporum Bathoniensium & Wellensium, Humpredique Humpreys Commentariolus de Decanis Bangoriensibus & Asaphensibus. Oxford, 1733, in two Volumes in 8vo. XXXVIII. Chronicon sive Annales Prioratûs de Dunstable, una cum Excerptis de Chartulario ejusdem Prioratûs. E Codicibus MSS. in Bibliothecâ Harleianâ descripsit primusque divulgavit Tho. Hearnius. Oxford, 1733, in 8vo. XXXIX. Benedicte, Abbas Petroburgensis, de Vitâ & Gestis Henrici II. & Ricardi I. E Codice MS. in Bibliothecâ Harleianâ descripsit, & nunc primus edidit Tho. Hearnius. Accesserunt alia. Oxford, 1735, in two vol. in 8vo. At the end of this work he published proposals for printing from an ancient MS. in the Harleyan Library, Joannis Beveri, Monachi Westmonasteriensis, Chronicon a Bruti primi Regis introitu in hanc Insulam usque ad annum Domini 1306. To which was to be added from an old MS. in the same Library, Joannis Merylinch, Monachi Glastonienfis, Rerum (in Angliâ speciatim ac Hiberniâ) sub novem primis annis Joannis XXII^{di}, Pontificis Romani, gestarum, Descriptio. This work was to have been printed in two Volumes in 8vo; but our Author did not live to finish the edition. He wrote likewise a piece printed in 1731 in 8vo, under the title of, A Vindication of those who take the Oath of Allegiance to his present Majesty from Prejudice, Injustice, and Disloyalty, charged upon them by such as are against it. Wherein is evidently shewed, that the common good of a Nation is what is primarily and principally respected in an Oath, and therefore when the Oath is inconsistent with that, the Persons who have taken it, are absolved from it. In proving of which the Case of Maud and King Stephen is particularly considered. In a Letter to a Nonjuror. It is addressed to Mr. Cherry, from whom it came, with many other MSS, expressly by will to the Bodleian Library. It is dated from Edmund Hall in Oxford, June 11, 1700. It was published without Mr. Hearne's knowledge or consent. In the Preface there is some account of him and his writings. Our Author made the Index to Sir Roger L'Estrange's Translation of Josephus into English, London, 1702, in Folio. Three Indexes to Cyrelli Hierosolymitani Opera, Oxford, 1703, in Folio; the Index to the four parts of Dr. Edwards's Preservative against Socinianism, Oxford, 1704, in 4to; and that to the Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, Oxford, 1704, in Folio.

in Edmund Hall, for whom he collated many manuscripts, and made considerable collections. In A&T Term 1699 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and determined in the schools the Lent following. Soon after this he was offered very advantageous terms to go a missionary to Mary-Land, and was wrote to for that purpose by Dr. White Kennet, at the instance of Dr. Bray Commissary to the Bishop of London for the care of the Western Plantations. But being unwilling to leave Oxford and the valuable acquaintance, which he had contracted there, he chose to decline the offer. Having taken his degree he became a constant Student in the Bodleian Library, and was so remarkable on this account, that Dr. Hudson, soon after he was elected Library-Keeper, took him in for his Assistant, having first obtained leave of the Curators for that purpose. In this place he did very considerable service to the Library. At the public A&T in A&T Term 1703 he took the degree of Master of Arts. Upon the death of Mr. Emanuel Pritchard, Janitor of the public Library, that place was conferred on Mr. Hearne, to whom afterwards were offered two Chaplainships successively of Corpus Christi and All Souls Colleges by the respective Heads of those houses, both of which he was obliged to decline, as he could not hold either of them with the office of Janitor, which he chose not to give up. In 1712 he became second Library-Keeper of the Bodleian Library on the death of Mr. Jo. Crabb. January the 19th 1714 he was elected Superior or Esquire Beadle in the Civil Law of the University of Oxford, which he held till the 8th of November following with his place of Under-Librarian; but then finding that they were not tenable together, he gave up the Beadleship, and very soon after relinquished the other place also, upon the account of the oaths, with which he could not comply. In this opinion he continued to the last, having several times refused the offer of such preferments, as would have been of great advantage and very agreeable to him (a). He died [B] June 10, 1735, aged fifty five years, and lies interred in the south-side of the Church-yard of St. Peter's in the East at Oxford, where there is a tomb erected for him with an inscription written by himself [C].

(a) These particulars were extracted from a life of our author written by himself, and communicated to me by the learned and ingenious Dr. William Bedford, to whom Mr. Hearne left his manuscripts.

[B] He died.] Some particulars of his death are contained in the following Letter dated at Oxford June 13th 1735. "Last night at my return home I found Mr. Hearne dead. He died on Tuesday in the evening. This morning I made it my business to gain the best account of his affairs, and found his will in the hands of the Apothecary, who attended him in his illness, which was of his own hand-writing, and in it are the following paragraphs. Imprimis, I give and bequeath to Mr. William Bedford of London, son of my late Friend Helkiah Bedford, all the MSS. and other Books, that Dr. Thomas Smith left me. Item, I give and bequeath to the said Mr. William Bedford all the MSS. of my own collection and writing, and all printed Books by me collated with MSS. or that have MS. Notes upon them, and all MSS. whatsoever now in my possession. Item, I give and bequeath to the said Mr. William Bedford my box or cabinet of coins, medals, and other things contained therein. And my desire is, that whatsoever hands they may hereafter fall into, they may be kept together, and never be exposed but to persons, that understand them. This is the sense, and pretty near the words of that part " of the Will, Upon a paper found with his Will is his Epitaph of his own hand-writing, In the beginning of his illness he was obstinate; but as it increased, and he grew weaker, he was more willing to comply with the directions given him. But this, I believe, will not be much talked of, nor known to the world. He refused to have any of his relations sent for, and suffered but few people to see him; nor any to sit up with him all night, till the night before he died, though he had suffered for want of help in the night by tumbling out of bed, &c. His poor relations have already found eight or nine hundred pounds in cash among the books and papers in his chambers; and when the whole comes to be turned over, expect to find more (*)"

[C] An Inscription written by himself.] It is as follows: Here lyeth the body of Thomas Hearne, M. A. who studied and preserved Antiquities. He dyed June 10. 1735. aged 55 years. Deut. xxxii. 7. Remember the days of old; consider the years of many generations, ask thy father, and he will shew thee, thy Elders, and they will tell thee. Job viii. 8, 9, 10. Enquire, I pray thee.

(*) They found in all about thirteen hundred pounds.

HEBEDJESU, Patriarch of the Nestorians who were reconciled to the Church of Rome under Pius IV, in the year 1562. I have mentioned him already under another name (a), by which several authors have called him; but I thought that what I have still to say of him deserved to be related in this place. Since the article of ABDISSI was printed, I have read in a very curious work (b), that after the death of Simon Julacha [A], a Monk of St. Pachomius's Order, whom Pope Julius III had made Patriarch of the Nestorians, "Abdjefu, or Hebedjesu, if you will pronounce his name after the manner of the Chaldeans, was chosen Patriarch in his stead. Abraham Ecchellenfis,

(a) Under the name of Abdissi; see that article.

[A] Simon Julacha.] He should have said Sulacha; as Aubertus Miræus has done (1). We ought not to wonder that the Criticks are able to collect an infinite number of various readings from manuscripts, since even printed Books are not without them. The Siquir de Moni names Caremit that city in Mesopotamia, which Aubertus Miræus calls Charemet. The latter calls that person Donba Simon, whom the former calls Donba Simon. They both wrote after the same Author, namely Peter Strozza in his book de Chaldeorum Dogmatibus (of the opinions of the Chaldeans); why then did they not spell the same words after the same manner? Is it easier to write Sulacha than Julacha,

(1) Polit. Eccles. pag. 216.

Donba than Denba? Monsieur Arnauld, who follows the same Author, asserts (2), that Simon Sulacha settled his residence at Caramit. Monsieur Claude (3) makes use of the name of Sulak. Father Paul in the beginning of his Vth Book (4) says one Simon Sulakam; and Monsieur Amelot does not correct this in his French Translation. These are mere trifles, I own it; but such trifles have often occasioned very real and very considerable controversies. Hæ nuxa seria ry of the Council ducunt in mala, i. e., "These trifles lead to real evils." of Trent. It would be better for the Republick of Letters, if writers would make it their duty to avoid even the most insignificant errors.

(b) The title of it is, Histoire Critique de la Creance & des Costumes des Nations du Levant, Published by the Sieur de Moni, at Frankfurt, for Frederic Arnauld, (or rather at Rotterdam for Reiner Leers) 1684. It is thought that Father Simon is the author of that History.

(2) Perpet. Defens. liv. 5. chap. 10.
(3) Reposte à la Perpet. Défendus, liv. 4. chap. 5.
(4) Of the History of the Council of Trent.

“ Ecchellenfis, who has published a small treatise of Abdjesu in the Syriac tongue [B]; “ stiles him Metropolitan of Soba, in the preface which he has prefixed to that work.
 “ He observes that this Hebedjesu composed several works in defence of Nestorius’s “ Religion, but that being come to Rome under Pope Julius III, he abjured Nestori“ anism. It is he that is mentioned in the Life of Pius IV, under whose Pontificate he “ took a second journey to Rome [C], with a design to be confirmed in his Patriarchate, “ and he was present at the Council of Trent [D]. As he was a man of parts, he had “ the art to persuade a great number of Nestorians to enter into the pale of the Church “ of Rome. But his successors, who wanted his skill and ability, could not keep them
 “ in that obedience. Ahathalla, who was also a Monk of St. Pachomius’s Order, suc“ ceeded Hebedjesu; but dying soon after, he was succeeded by Denha Simon, who “ had been before Archbishop of Gelu. This last was obliged to leave Caremit [E],
 “ and to retire into the Province of Zeinalbech situated at the extremity of Persia, “ having been forced to yield to the power of the Patriarch of Babylon. His successor, “ who was also called Simon, resided in the same place, which lessened very much the “ authority of this second Patriarch.” This is what I read in that book (c). When I (c) Page 85.
 “ drew up the article of Abdissi, I imagined that we might depend on Father Paul’s ac“ count; but I must not omit what I have since observed in Father Pallavicini; namely, “ that it is not true that this Patriarch wrote letters to the Council. You will find in the “ notes below what has been censured in Father Paul’s account [F].

[B] Abbr. Ecchellenfis has published a small Treatise of Abdjesu in the Syriac Tongue. I imagine it to be the same Treatise, which Monsieur Arnaud mentions, when he quotes (5) the Notes of Abraham Ecchellenfis the Maronite upon a Catalogue of Chaldean Books written by Abdjesu or Hebedjesu, a Nestorian Bishop, who was reconciled to the Church of Rome. Some pages lower (6) he mentions some circumstances relating to Hebedjesu, which deserve to have a place here; for they serve to let us know what sort of a man our Hebedjesu was. “ He had been formerly one of the most passionate Nestorians, says Monsieur Arnaud, and wrote several Books, whilst he laboured himself under their errors, and he gives us a list of those Books in the Catalogue he has made of the Chaldean Books composed by him, which Catalogue has been translated into Latin by Ecchellenfis. It appears from that Catalogue, that the Book intitled Margaritarum (of Pearls) was written by him, whilst he was still a Nestorian.” It is observed in the Supplement (7) in the article to Moreri’s Dictionary (7), that the Catalogue of Syrian Writers (it is no doubt that of which Hebedjesu is the Author) was printed at Rome in the Syriac Language in the year 1653, with Abraham Ecchellenfis’s Latin Translation and Notes; that this Catalogue mentions several works composed in Syriac by Hebedjesu; that there are lodged in the Library of the Vatican two Poems composed in the Syriac tongue, and written with his own hand, in which he gives an account of his re-union, &c. Aubertus Miræus (8), that this Patriarch’s picture was placed in the Palace of the Vatican amongst those of Cardinals and Prelates, who attended Pope Alexander III, when he received the Emperor Frederic’s submissions at Venice.

[C] He took a second journey to Rome. I wonder that neither Father Paul, nor his Censurer Cardinal Pallavicini, nor any of the several Authors I have consulted concerning Hebedjesu, should mention his journey to Rome under Pope Julius III. This particular would have been neither superfluous nor useless; and I am persuaded that they would not have omitted it, had they known it.

[D] He was present at the Council of Trent. I have confused this falsity in another place. It will be sufficient to observe here, that there is never such a

[E] Denha Simon . . . was obliged to leave Caremit. This happened at the time when Leonard Abel Bishop of Sidon went into the Levant in the character of Apostolick Nuncio (10). He was a native of Malta, and understood perfectly well the Arabick Tongue, which is in a manner the mother-tongue in that Island. He died at Rome in the year 1605, or 1606. He wrote a work concerning the Condition of the Christians in the East, out of which work Aubertus Miræus, from whom I borrow this whole remark, confesses, that he extracted a great many things, which are to be read in his Notitia Episcopatum (Account of Bishopricks.) He adds that this work of Leonard Abel is in manuscript in the Library of the late Cardinal Ascanio Colonna, Protector of the Churches in the East, and that this Library has been wonderfully improved by the addition of Cardinal William Sirlet’s books.

[F] You will find in the Notes below what has been censured in Father Paul’s account. This Author relates, that they read the Letters of Cardinal Amulius, “ who being Protector in the Churches of the East acquainted the Council with the news of Abdissi’s arrival. . . He asserted, that the Nations subject to this Prelate had been instructed in the Faith by the Apostles St. Thomas and St. Thaddæus, &c (11). The Historian adds, that they read afterwards this Patriarch’s Confession of Faith, and lastly the Letters, which he wrote to the Council, desiring to be excused from going thither, which was impossible for him, &c (12). Cardinal Pallavicini (13) relates this more fully and more accurately, not blending together what Amulius said by the Pope’s Command, with the consequences he drew himself from the Nestorian Prelate’s account. It does not appear that Father Paul made this distinction. But his chief blunder is his asserting that they read the Letter, which Abdissi had written to the Council. Pallavicini maintains that such a Letter never existed but in Father Paul’s imagination (14).

pitiful Writer but may sometimes mislead the most eminent Authors. Peter Strozza, Secretary to Pope Paul V, was probably imposed upon by some sorry Chronicler, and it is no doubt upon that Secretary’s credit, that the Sieur de Moni and Mr. Arnaud (9) before him have asserted, that Hebedjesu was present at that Council.

[A] He was one of those Rhodians . . . that staked at dice the honour of the women. The Abbot Lan- celot of Perugia had here a very good opportunity to put the Hoggidiani to a non-plus; for I do not think that there has been in this age in any Country of Europe such a licentiousness as that of the Rhodians was.

I have

(5) Perpetuité de la Foy Défendue, liv. 5. chap. 5.

(6) In chap. 10.

(7) In the article to EBED-JESU.

(8) Polit. Ecclesiast. pag. 217.

(a) See Libanius, in Argum. Orat. Demosth. pro Rhod. Libertate.

(9) Perpetuité de la Foy Défendue, liv. 5. chap. 10.

(10) See Aubertus Miræus, pag. 218, &c. of his Status Politia Ecclesiastica, printed at Lyons in the year 1600.

(11) Fra-Paolo, Hist. du Concile de Trente, liv. 6. pag. 557. of Amelot’s Translation.

(12) See the article of ABDISSI. Cardinal Pallavicini (13) relates this more fully and more accurately, not blending together what Amulius said by the Pope’s Command, with the consequences he drew himself from the Nestorian Prelate’s account. It does not appear that Father Paul made this distinction. But his chief blunder is his asserting that they read the Letter, which Abdissi had written to the Council. Pallavicini maintains that such a Letter never existed but in Father Paul’s imagination (14).

(13) Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. 18. cap. 9. num. 5.

(14) Sed hæc Epistola non in alia pagina, nisi in Suariviana imaginatione fuit exarata. Idem, ibid. num. 8.

(c) Ταύτην τὴν κυβερῶν ἱκανῶς
καὶ τῶν ἄλλων Ῥωδίων τοῖς ἐπιμαρτυροῦσιν δὲ καὶ πλαστικῶς αὐτὸς
ὁ Ἡγεσίλοχος.
Athen. lib. 10.
cap. 12. ex
Theopompo, pag.
445. (instead of piffime i. e. oftner
there is seuiffime, most cruelly, in the edition of Lyons, 1657.

obliged to procure to the winner the Lady who had been played for, and should employ all possible means and artifices to bring her into his arms. They suffered no foul play; persuasions and violence were to succeed each other, and either to precede or to follow each other according as it was found necessary, till the full and actual payment of what had been staked. Hegesilochus was the person who played at this new game most often and most shamefully (c). His drunkenness and other excesses rendered him so incapable of managing public affairs, that he lost his dignity, and his very friends looked upon him as an infamous wretch. He ought not to be mistaken for another HEGESILOCHUS who was sent Ambassador to Rome by the Rhodians [B], after he had been raised to the highest office in the State [C]. The latter lived in the time of Perseus King of Macedon, and the former in the time of Philip Alexander the Great's father.

I have been told, indeed, that the footmen of a certain great Minister of State, who has not been long dead, used to play for Captains Commissions at dice or at cards; but, besides that this story is very uncertain, it was nothing very material; namely, that every one of these footmen was promised, for a Christmas-box, at the year's end, that a certain number of companies would be given to the persons recommended by him: after which they played this fund between them; and when any of them lost a company, it was not at his recommendation, but at the winner's, that the company was given. Notwithstanding this disorder, it was an easy matter to prevent Commissions from being given unless to persons proper to serve in the armies; and therefore this was by no means to be compared with the dissoluteness of those little tyrants of Rhodes, who played for maidenheads, and for horns to be planted on the heads of the most eminent men, and who would not give the loser any rest, till he had delivered them their prey. It was not enough for them to venture the honour of the most beautiful women (inseparable from that of their husbands, since men would have it so) but they exposed also their own reputation; for the loser was to do the office of a pimp. This was enough to make a man cry out, o tempora! o mores! Oh the wicked age and corrupt morals.

[B] Another HEGESILOCHUS was sent Ambassador to Rome by the Rhodians. Polybius acquaints us with this (1). There was Gesilochus in the manuscripts: (1) Excerpt. ex Legat. cap. 64. but Fulvius Ursinus (2) having observed in Livy (3), that this same Rhodian was called Hegesilus, corrected (2) Notis in ea these two Authors by each other, and wrote Hegesilochus in both.

[C] He was raised to the highest office in the State. (3) Titus Livius, lib. 42. It was called πρυτανία (4), and the functions of it were expressed by the verb πρυτανεύω. The Latins have called them who enjoyed that dignity Prytanes. Quadra. de Rhodo, pag. 65. ginta navibus, auctore Hegesilocho, comparatis, says Livy (5), qui cum in summo Magistratu esset (Prytanis ipsi (5) Tit. Livius, lib. 42. vocant). i. e. "They fitted out forty ships by Hegesilochus's command, who being then in the highest office, which they call Prytanis, &c."

HEIDANUS (ABRAHAM) Professor of Divinity at Leyden, was born at Frankenthal in the Palatinate August the 10th 1597. He went through his course of polite Literature at Amsterdam, where his father Jasper Heidanus had been chosen a Minister in the year 1608. An Englishman called Matthew Sladus (or Slade) who was then Rector (or Principal) of the College at Amsterdam took a particular care of Abraham Heidanus, whom he found to be a very hopeful youth. Daniel Colonius did not apply himself with less zeal to improve his pupil, when he was committed to his care in the Walloon College at Leyden. Colonius being none of those hot-brained Divines, who would have things carried to extremes, when the Arminian controversies broke out, was suspected to incline that way [A]; so that several persons took it very ill, that Jasper Heidanus should suffer his son to study under such a master. But these rash slanders produced a quite contrary effect to what those zealots intended. The Minister of Amsterdam left his son under the tutorship of Colonius, his ancient friend, with whose Orthodoxy he was perfectly well acquainted. He left, I say, his son with him, to give his friend

[A] Colonius being none of those hot-brained Divines... was suspected of Arminianism. This is one of the most disagreeable inconveniencies that attend religious controversies. They who by their natural disposition or from an exact knowledge of the true interest of the Church, endeavour to reconcile the minds of the people, and do not speak of cutting off the unfound members, become suspected of heterodoxy. The hot-tempered, angry, and passionate zealots, who are always crying out principiis obsta, and are continually repeating this maxim, the evil must be nipped in the bud, expose those that are moderate, and draw the people's hatred upon them. Hence it happens, that some persons, who otherwise are not of a passionate temper, do yet give up the outward appearance of moderation; and choose rather to act against their own inclination, and even against their conscience, than to be look'd upon as persons who basely betray the good cause. The zealots know perfectly well, that this will be the effect of their slanders, and therefore they spread them to the utmost of their power, and without the least scruple, privately from house to house, and publicly from the pulpit. This happened in the beginning of the Arminian Controversy, if we may believe Wittichius. Vigebat illo tempore ob discrepantes de predestinationis sententias, non tantum inter dissentientes magna contentio, quæ animos a se invicem alienabat & dijungebat, sed etiam inter ipse ipsos & idem de controversia illa senti- entes obscura quedam diffidentia, qua locus dabatur suspicionibus, quibus alii alios tanquam bonæ causæ minus addictos differebant. Qui enim ferventioris erant ingenii, & omnia summa tentanda in initiis putabant, ut in herbâ opprimeretur malum, quoscunque videbant moderatius & lentius agere, ac de reconciliationis animorum potius laborare, si vulnus forte posset consolidari, ac scibisma, quod ad opera carnis pertinet, evitari, eos tanquam prævaricatores bonæ causæ apud plebem criminabantur (1). i. e. "The different opinions about Predestination occasioned at that time not only a great dispute between those who differed in their opinions, which alienated and divided them from each other; but it created even amongst those, who had the same thought and opinion of that controversy, a secret and hidden mistrust, which gave rise to suspicions, by which some represented the others as persons little affected to the good cause. For they that were of a hot temper, and imagined that the severest course was to be taken in the beginning, to nip the evil in the bud, traduced those as traitors, who acted with more moderation and meekness, and were of opinion that it was proper to endeavour a reconciliation between the two parties, if it were possible to heal the wound by that means, and to prevent a schism, which belongs to the works of the flesh." This is a very natural description. Such disputes occasion a violent war without; and produce within bad seeds friend by that means an authentic testimony that they both agreed in their opinions. The pupil made a great progress under Colonius, and did not follow the example of most of the other students, who only filled their heads with the controversy concerning the five articles of the Remonstrants (a). He learnt this, and also all that was proper for him to know. He was admitted a Proponent by the Synod of the Walloon Churches in the year 1618, and preached in several French Churches with great applause of the audience; he preached also in some Dutch Churches with the same success. He travelled during two years, and visited part of Germany, Switzerland, France, and England. Soon after his return into Holland he was promoted to the office of a Minister of the Gospel, and exercised the functions of it at Naerden till the year 1627, when he accepted the offers of the Consistory of Leyden. He was betrothed to the daughter of one of the most eminent Merchants of Amsterdam, when he took possession of that new living, and soon after he celebrated his nuptials. He was a very good preacher, and this together with several good qualities of his heart and mind gained him a very great reputation. He was fifty years old when the Province of Guelderland being determined to found an University at Harderwyk offered him the Professorship of Divinity upon very advantageous terms. The Church of Leyden being willing to keep him, offered him either the like advantages, or in general wherewithall to make him amends abundantly for what he refused. The Governors of the University found out a better method still to prevent his going into Guelderland; they conferred upon him the Professorship of Divinity, which happened to be vacant by the death of Constantine L'Empereur. He was so well pleased with his situation at Leyden, that he would not accept the offers which the Elector Palatine made him, though that Prince endeavoured most earnestly to persuade him to it. Notwithstanding his refusal the Elector gave him a very honourable and kind reception [B], when he passed through Heidelberg in the year 1656, in the journey he took to Strasburg with his family. Professor Smidius, who invited him to a public disputation, and desired him to propose his objections, did not get off with honour [C]. But Heidanus's victory on this occasion was not so visible as that which he gained in the College of the Jesuits at Cologne [D]. This learned man died at Leyden, with

(a) Studijs juvenes in partes distracti, & quæstionibus illis quotidianis agitati, sæpe quo se verterent nescirent, & neglecto pietatis studio ille doctissimus haberetur, qui de quinque istis articulis argutè differere, & adversarium argumentis irritare posset, securi de reliquis fidei articulis cognoscendis, quasi in hoc solo omnis eruditionis culmen positum esset. Wittichius, in Orat. Fun. Heidani.

(2) See the article FERRIER, (Jeremy) remark [D] towards the end, and remark [L].

(3) Juvenal, Sat. 10. ver. 140.

seeds of suspicions, which are wonderfully fruitful. It produced, amongst other things, as I observed just now, a great alteration in those, whom right reason inspired with a spirit of moderation. They are rendered odious like hidden traitors (2), and there happen to be some, who do not choose to be reasonable at that rate, and imagine that justice and equity would cost them too dear, if it made them lose their reputation; they do therefore set up for persecutors, in order to refute the slanderers;

Tanto major famæ sitis est quam virtutis (3).
That is,

“ So much the thirst of honour fires the blood,
“ So many would be great, so few be good.”
Dryden.

This is what was done in France by several Roman Catholics, who had not approved the severity that was used against the Protestants, under Francis I and Henry II.

[B] The Elector gave him a very honourable and kind reception. They who may find it strange that I should give an account of this, will thereby censure Mr. Wittichius rather than me: For it is more reasonable to transcribe such particulars in a Dictionary that contains two volumes (*) in folio, when one meets with them in a funeral Oration, than to expatiate upon them in funeral Orations, when one only transcribes them from a manuscript. However it be, Wittichius tells us, that a messenger was sent every day to Abraham Heidanus to invite him to dinner, nor does he forget to mention the presents which Heidanus received. Dum Heidelbergam appulit, nihil omisit serenissimus Elector quod non ferventissimum erga ipsum spiraret affectum. Ad mensam quotidie, novis semper missis nunciis, invitabat, in colloquiis benevole complectebatur, donabat medio cervo, & aliquot leporibus, nunciato banc omnem esse prædam, quam illo die cepisset; quæcumque in diversorio cum familia consumpsisset, liberalissima solvit, & cum Bacheracum rediisset, ad suos Leidenses reverurus, magno dolio optimi & generosissimi vini Bacheracensis voluit donatum. i. e. “ When he was arrived at Heidelberg, the most serene Elector omitted nothing that was capable of testifying the great affection he had for Heidanus; he sent every day new messengers to invite him to dinner; and when in his company he treated him most kindly, he made him a present of half a buck, and some hares, telling “ him it was all they had taken in hunting that day; “ the Elector also paid all that Heidanus had spent “ with his family at his inn. And when he was come “ again to Bacrach (†) on his return to Leiden, the “ Prince would give him a large cask of the best wine “ of Bacrach.”

(*) Mr. Bayle's Dictionary contained but two volumes in the first edition.

[C] Professor Smidius, who . . . desired him to propose his objections in a public disputation, did not get off with honour. Heidanus having several times desired to be excused from entering the list, was at last prevailed upon by Smidius's repeated civilities; he proposed his objections against universal Grace, which the Lutherans maintain; the whole audience heard him with a very great attention, and the success was very glorious for Heidanus. Smidius ipsum palam non semel, sed quia declinabat noster, iteratis vicibus ad opponendum invitavit, quod, cum non videretur sibi salvo honore suo posse detestare, ea soliditate, ea efficacia Gratiam, quam Lutherani urgent, Universalem ita oppugnavit, ut omnium oculos in se converterit, & apud omnes præsentem magnam admirationem suæ consummate eruditionis excitaverit, disputationis vero præses multorum judicio parum honorificè ex illa disputatione discesserit (4). i. e. “ Smidius invited him more than once to propose his objections in a public disputation; and as he declined “ it, he entreated him so earnestly to it, that he thought “ at last, he could not refuse it without exposing his “ reputation; he made such solid and strong objections against universal Grace, which the Lutherans “ maintain, that he drew the attention of the whole audience upon himself, and filled them with admiration “ of his consummate learning; and in the opinion of “ several, the Moderator at this disputation (†) did “ not come off very honourably.”

(†) A town of the Lower Palatinate of the Rhine, famous for its excellent wine.

(4) Wittichius, in Oratione funebri Heidani.

(†) It was Smidius himself.

[D] Heidanus's victory . . . was not so visible, as that which he gained in the College of the Jesuits at Cologne. If this last victory could more easily be observed than the former, yet it was less glorious, for it consisted only in the making of a joke, to which the Jesuit, who had shewed him all that was worth to be seen, in the College of the Jesuits, and who was perhaps but a lay-brother, had not one word to answer. Heidanus asked that Jesuit, whether Jesus Christ had done and suffered all that was necessary for our salvation: Yes, answered the Jesuit; to which Heidanus replied, you Jesuits are not then his associates. The Jesuit loaded with shame and astonishment had nothing to answer. Malincrot, Dean of Munster, who heard that discourse, and who was become acquainted with Heidanus, with a great sense of devotion, October the 15th 1678, having finished his eighty first year, which is reckoned to be the most dangerous of all the climacteric years, and not without reason. He left four children, two sons and two daughters, thirteen grandsons, and three great grandsons. He had a great share in Des Cartes friendship; and compleated by that means the design he had begun under Jachæus Profeffor of Philosophy at Leyden, and one of the most subtle Peripatetics who were then living. This Jachæus rendered the controversy about substantial forms famous [E] in the Univerfity. Young Heidanus, being stirred up by the noise it made, examined the objections thoroughly, and compared them with Jachæus's answers. He found, that as long as men would argue upon fuch principles, they would only lose their time; and he hoped that a safer road would one day or other be discovered (b). He pretended to have found it in the writings and conversations of Des Cartes. But if this road were more proper to lead him to the knowledge of truth, it was not the safest with regard to his temporal interest; for it exposed him to a thousand vexations, and to a thousand prosecutions [F], of which his

(5) Dom Colonia inuito itineris aliquot dies subsistit, in drosforio incidit in familiaritatem Malincrotii. . . viri elegantissimi ingenii, qui inter literatos primatum jure merebatur, bominis Pontificie quidem religioni addicti, sed moderati, qui etiam nunquam cum Heida-uo de religione sermonem voluit cadere. Idem, Sic.

Heidanus (5), wished him joy for this victory, which you gained, said he, over my enemies. Wittichius, who did also hear this conversation, relates it thus. Accidit ut postquam Collegium lustraveramus Jesuitarum, & jam in arca eramus constituti ut patribus valere diceremus, conversus Heidanus ad Jesuitam qui nos ducebat, ex ipso rogaverit, annon Jesus omnia illa quæ ad salutem essent necessaria egisset & passus fuisset? Ac Jesuita nihil sinistri metuens, respondisset, Omnino: Heidanus regeffit: Ergo vos non estis Socii Jesu; atque sic illo in ruborem dato & attonito ut ne verbum quidem respondere posset, discessit noster & nos cum ipso, atque patribus valere dixit. Quod Malincrotium tanto affectu gaudio, ut hoc nomine gratias solennes illi egerit, quod sic suos hostes (ita vocabat Jesuitas) ad incitias ex improviso redegit. i. e. "It happened that after we had viewed the College of the Jesuits, and when we were already in the court to take our leave of the Fathers, Heidanus turning himself to the Jesuit, who had conducted us, asked him whether Jesus had not done and suffered all that was necessary for our Salvation? Upon which the Jesuit, who apprehended no trap in that question, answered innocently, By all means; upon which Heidanus replied, you Jesuits are not then his associates; at which the Jesuit blushed with shame, and was so surprized, that he could not answer one single word; so that Heidanus, and we with him, retired, having bid the Fathers farewell. Malincrot was so well pleased with this, that he returned Heidanus thanks, for reducing his enemies (thus he called the Jesuits) so unawares to a non-plus." I confess that I have hitherto vainly endeavoured to find where the jest lies in the consequence which Heidanus drew (a); I cannot guess what he hinted at, nor by what Logical rules he argued.

(a) To stile one's self a person's associate, is, strictly speaking, to pretend to be in all respects like him; now the Jesuit confessed, that the members of his Society were not Christ's associates in the work of our redemption; whence it follows, that it is without reason they call themselves the associates or companions of Jesus Christ. Such was Heidanus's argument, to which the Jesuit having nothing to reply, Malincrot looked upon it a victory gained by his friend Heidanus. CRIT. REM.]

[E] Jachæus rendered the controversy about substantial forms famous. There is no question in Natural Philosophy that shews more evidently than this, how great the power of prejudice is. It darkens men's minds with regard to the plainest notions; for there are a great many persons that think a substance cannot be drawn from matter, unless it be there beforehand, or unless it be produced by a true creation. The Peripatetics tell you faintly, or rather they assert in a passionate manner, that the forms do not exist in their subject, and yet that they are produced out of it by an action, which must not be called a creation, but an eduction (6). This doctrine would be the greatest of monsters, were it not a more monstrous prodigy to see, that some very learned and ingenious men do still maintain at this time the doctrine of substantial forms. Wittichius could not better prepare his audience to meet with a disciple of Des Cartes in the person of Heidanus, than by observing to them, that this same Heidanus, when he was still but a student, conceived an ill opinion of the Schoolmen's doctrine, by the unexplicable difficulties in which Jachæus intangled himself. Fervebat in Academia quaestio de formis substantialibus, earumque ex potentia materiae productione, quæ mirifice non tantum Auditores, sed & ipsum defensorem earum acerrimum Jachæum vexabat & torquebat. Quam cum universa distinctionum suarum panopliâ expedire non posset, & ad liquidum ostendere quænam illæ formæ substantiales essent, à materia realiter distinctæ & tamen materiales, quænam illa potentia materiae, in pars ejus quædam conversa in formam, an vero ejus cum producitur tantum sustentaculum, an autem, ut ex asserere figura scammii educitur, ita eodem modo præ-existeret in materia forma; cumque aliæ plurimæ superesset difficultates, nec ullum suppeditaretur flum ex hoc labyrintho emergendi, factum est ut auditores & perspicaciores discipuli, inter quos Heidanus primas obtinebat, de tota hac philosophandi ratione quam intelligendo assidue non posse viuebant, plane desperarent (7). i. e. "The question concerning substantial forms, and their production from the power of matter, was at that time very much debated in the Univerfity; and did wonderfully puzzle, and perplex not only the audience, but even the most strenuous assertor of these forms, I mean Jachæus, who notwithstanding his great store of distinctions was not able to extricate himself, or to explain in a clear manner, what these substantial forms are, how they are really distinct from matter, and yet material; what that power of matter is; whether some part of matter be changed into a form, or whether matter be only the form's support when it is produced: whether the form pre-existed in matter after the same manner as the figure of a bench in a piece of wood, out of which it is carved. As there were a great many more difficulties besides these, and no thread could be found to get out of that labyrinth, it happened that the audience, and the most ingenious scholars, amongst whom Heidanus was the most eminent, gave that Philosophy entirely over, finding it was absolutely impossible to make sense of it."

[F] Des Cartes's method exposed him to a thousand vexations, and to a thousand persecutions. I do not know the particulars of this, but I remember a passage in his Considerations, in which he relates, that he raised a great many enemies against himself, and was exposed to horrid slanders, because he was always averfe from too severe maxims. He had not declared war against Protestant Canons; he had not thundred from the pulpit against Periwigs; it had not been his opinion, that the Remonstrants who returned into the bosom of their antient mother, ought to be rigorously examined. Hereupon he was traduced as an enemy of the new Reformation, which some would establish; all his other opinions were strictly examined; he was charged with being addicted to Des Cartes's sentiments, and with despising the sabbath-day. Ætatem illam meam ancipitem duxi, modo tempestates, hinc expertus balcyonia, intra & extra nos passus adversarios, hinc hostes, inde fratres, nec nunquam mordacis linguæ exceptus flagellis. Fuit, cum scissam in partes charissimam hanc nostram Ecclesiam metu prævidimus: tum nobis sed eam sapientiam simul largitus est Deus, ut quidvis pati totius, quam idipsum permittere, maluerimus. Hinc jam Moderatores, per contemptum (ac si probrosum hoc nomen foret) audivimus; jam ut Cartesii plus satis additi Philosophiæ; hinc Sabbathi contemptores; inde novæ quam urgebant quidam Reformationis hostes traducti his Panegyrist Wittichius, from whom I borrow this article; thought it proper to say nothing. Heidanus was of a good family [G]. I shall mention his works below.

(6) A Jesuit called John Guilleminot, Doctor of Divinity in the Univerfity of Pont-a-Mousson, published at Paris in the year 1679 two Dissertations De Principiis invisibilis rerum corporearum, i. e. "Of the internal Principles of corporeal things," in which he racks his brains to prove against F. Maignan, that the production of the forms is not a real creation. Vain endeavours!

(7) See the article GORLÆUS (David), remark [A].

traducti sumus: quod seneratoribus trapeziticis plusculum illis concedere visi, nec Canonicis bellum indicere, neque de suggestis in comas detonare, neque Ecclesie disciplinam stritius, nec Remonstrantes ad nos transeuntes rigidius examinare, & quae sunt id genus alia (8). i. e.

(8) Heidanus, Considerationes ad res quasdam nuper gestas in Academia Batava, pag. 40. i. e. "Reflections upon some late transactions in the University of Leyden."

"My life has been a scene of various accidents; sometimes I was in a storm, and then enjoyed happy days again: I met with several adversaries both at home and abroad, some amongst the enemies, and some amongst my brethren; nor was I ever free from the slanders of an evil tongue. It was when our dear Church being divided into parties, I foresaw, out of fear, the evils that might befall her; but then, God vouchsafed that prudence to me, rather to undergo any thing, than to suffer those evils to happen by my fault. Hence I was called, by way of contempt, a Moderator, as though such a man was a reproach. I was traduced as a man too much addicted to Des Cartes's opinions; and as a despiser of the sabbath-day; hence as I was calumniated as an enemy to the new Reformation, which some would introduce, because I was a little more indulgent than others, to those that lend money upon interest; because I did not declare war against the Canons; because I did not thunder from the pulpit against periwigs; because I would not have the Ecclesiastical discipline exercised with too much rigour, nor those Remonstrants examined too severely who returned to us; and for other reasons of the same nature." Things were carried to such a length, that he was deposed from his Professorship for the following reason. The Governors of the University of Leyden made a decree January the 16th 1676, by which the Professors were prohibited to treat, in what manner soever it might be, of some propositions (9), which of late were very much controverted, and of Des Cartes's Metaphysics. Heidanus acted against this decree almost in the same manner as the Janfenists did against the Archbishop of Paris's charge, by which he prohibited the reading of the French Translation of the New Testament printed at Mons. Heidanus criticised upon that decree; he pretended to find irregularities or errors in it which rendered it void; he asserted that the twenty propositions which had been condemned, had not been controverted in the University of Leyden, as the Governors declared; he complained that these Gentlemen suffered themselves to be imposed upon by unfair extracts. He made an odious parallel between those that furnished those extracts, and the Jesuits, who caused some propositions to be condemned at Rome as if they were maintained by Janfenius, though they were no where to be met with in Janfenius's works. He made use also of another comparison; for he quoted a Lutheran writer, named Giles Hunnius, who pretended to convict John Calvin of Judaism by some extracts artfully transcribed from his works.

(9) They mentioned twenty propositions, some of which were Theological, and the others philosophical.

(10) I make use of the Latin translation printed at Hamburg, 8vo, 1678.

Lastly, he explained the propositions that were condemned, and endeavoured to shew that they were orthodox in the sense of the authors, from whose works they were extracted. This work of Heidanus was first printed in Dutch, and afterwards in Latin (10). The Governors of the University were so exasperated at it, that they deposed this Professor. Heidanus's friends pretend, that this was the happiest event that could befall him, because his old age could not suffer him to acquire a new reputation by his Lectures, nor even to keep that fame up, which he had already gained; they added also, that his deprivation endeared him more and more to his party, and rendered him more venerable to them (11), and was proper to make the other party more odious.

(11) Florus, lib. 4. cap. 4. expresses this by these words, injuria favorabilis, i. e. "a favourable injury; and Tacitus, Annal. lib. 3. cap. 75. by Commendatio ex injuria; i. e. "an injury which becomes a commendation."

[G] Heidanus was of a good family.] Gerard Vander Heyden, his great grandfather was of Mechlin) (12), and of an antient and honourable family. (12) Proavus illi His grandfather Jasper Vander Heyden was of the fame city; but he was expelled his father's house, because he had embraced the reformed Religion. He was chosen a Minister at Antwerp, whence the persecution obliged him to retire to Francfort, where he met with several Refugees, whom the strict Lutherans would not suffer to live in that city; which obliged them to petition Frederic II Elector Palatine for a place where they might live secure. Peter Dathenus was at their head. The Elector granted them the Monastery of Frankenthal, whence the Monks were commanded to retire. These Refugees performed their religious exercises there in the Dutch tongue, and converted that monastery by degrees into a town. Dathenus being called to Heidelberg, our Jasper Vander Heyden was chosen Pastor of that church in his stead. He was desired to be present at the National Synod held at Embden in the year 1571, and was chosen President or Moderator of that Assembly, in which the Canons of the Church-discipline were drawn up. Soon after his return into the Palatinate, the Elector commanded him to attend his son, whom he sent with an army to succour the reformed in the Low-Countries: these troops being routed, Vander Heyden retired into Holland, and was President in the National Synod which met at Dort in the year 1574. He was for some time Minister of the church at Middleburg, and thinking himself afterwards secure by the pacification concluded at Ghent, he returned to his former flock at Antwerp. This city being taken by the Spaniards, he returned into the Palatinate, and was made Superintendent of the Churches about Bacrach. He was upon the point to resign this employment in order to satisfy the desire of the Church of Frankenthal, who desired his ministry again, when he died, leaving only one son, named Jasper, like him who was born in the year 1566. This son was first Minister at Volmersheim, then at Frankenthal, and lastly at Amsterdam, where he died in the year 1626. He married Clara Vander Borne, daughter of the High Bailiff of Frankenthal, and had six sons and eight daughters by her. Our Abraham Heidanus was one of his sons (13).

(13) Taken from Wittichius's Funeral Oration on Heidanus.

[I] I shall mention his works below.] He published Orations upon several subjects; an Examination of the Catechism of the Remonstrants; a book in 4to, De Origine Erroris (Of the Origin of Error) and a book in Dutch in which he asserts the cause of God against the Pelagians, and Semi-Pelagians, with so much strength, that no body could answer him, Evolvo solidissimum & nunquam satis laudandum Commentarium de Causa Dei Belgice ante plures annos conscriptum. (qui dignissimus videtur ut in Latinam linguam transferatur, ut ab exteris legi possit) in quo adeo nervose, adeo eloquenter partes Dei defendit contra hominem, ut Pelagiani nihil in hunc usque diem potuerint restaurare (14). i. e. "Read his solid Commentary concerning the cause of God, which work can never be sufficiently commended; it was written in Dutch several years ago, and deserves to be translated into Latin, that foreigners may read it. The author asserts in that book the cause of God against man with so much strength and eloquence, that the Pelagians could not till this day find any thing to re-establish their system, which he has entirely ruined and overthrown." As to his Corpus Theologiae Christianae in quindecim locos digestum; i. e. "Body of Christian Divinity reduced to fifteen topics" it was printed after his death in two volumes in 4to in the year 1686, by the care of Mr. Crucius his grandson. See the Newvelles de la Republique des Lettres (15).

(14) Wittichius, ibid.

(15) For June 1686, in the Catalogue of New Books, num. 7. pag. 729.

HELENA, daughter of Tyndarus King of Lacedemon, was the most beautiful woman of her age [A]; but otherwise without the least honour or virtue, and her whole life

[A] She was the most beautiful woman of her age.] There are some authors (1), who have given a particular description of the beauty of Helena. The Writer,

(1) Dares Phrygius, Cedrenus.

who is most ample on the subject, is Constantine Manasses: he has introduced into eleven Greek verses a considerable number of epithets, which represent the natural life was full of unhappy adventures. There are some authors who have given so particular an account of the perfections of her body [B], that they cannot be excused, even when they say in exprefs terms, that they only did it by way of amufement. She was fought natural perfections of this Lady. He has not forgot to mention, that her beauty owed nothing to artifice, and that her complexion, without having occasion for wafhes, had a noble luftre (2). They have afcribed to her legs well made, a little mouth (3), a long neck and very white (4), large eyes, and fine breasts (5). Brantome furnifhes me with a paffage relating to this laft particular. " Helena, Jays be (6), being de- firous one day to prefent to the Temple of Diana " an handsome cup in confequence of a vow, and em- ploying a Goldfmith to make it, ordered him " to take the model from one of her handsome breasts, " and he made the cup of white gold, in fuch a man- ner, that one could not tell whether to admire moft, " the cup, or the refemblance of the breaft, which he " had taken for his model, and which appeared fo " pretty, and fo like, that the artificial one could not " but create a defire for the natural. Pliny relates " this with great admiration, and is very particular, " where he afferts that there is white gold, which is " very ftrange, and that this cup was made of white " gold. . . . Whoever fhould make gold cups from the " large duggs of fome women, muft furnifh the Gold- fmith with a great deal of gold, and would not ef- cape afterwards the laughter of the world when it " fhould be faid, See, there are cups modelled after the " breasts of fuch and fuch Ladies. Thefe cups would " not refemble cups, but round wooden pails, which " the hogs are ferved with, and the nipple would re- " femble a rotten cherry." Brantome is miftaken in two points; for Helena did not dedicate this cup in the Temple of Diana; and it is not true, that Pliny afferts it to have been made of white gold. Minervæ templum habet Lindos infula Rhodiorum in quo Helena facravit calicem ex elethro. Adjicit hiftoria mammae fuae menfura. i. e. " There is a temple of Minerva " at Lindos an Ifland of the Rhodians, in which " Helena dedicated a cup of Elethrum. Hiftory adds, " that it was of the fame proportion of her breaft." Here is what Pliny fays in the IVth chapter of the XXXIIIrd Book.

To return to Helena, I obferve, that the descriptions, which have been made of her beauty, do not give us an idea of it equal to what we form from reading a paffage in the Iliad, which have nothing of a description in them. Homer only introduces the Counfellors of Priam, who faw Helena coming while they were deliberating upon the affairs of State with their Prince, faying, that neither the Greeks nor Trojans were to be blamed for fuffering fo many evils for fo divine a beauty.

Οὐδέ τις Τρῶας ἢ ἰωνήμιδας Ἀχαιῶν
Τοιοῦτ' ἀμφὶ γυναικὶ ποδῶν χρόνον ἄλγιστα πάσχωσιν
Αἰὶός αἰθρῶν τῶσι θεῶς τις ἦεν ἴσταν ἴσταν.

(7) Homer. Iliad. lib. 3. ver. 156. See Athenæus, lib. 5. pag. 188. and Quintil. lib. 1. cap. 4. pag. m. 398.

" They cried, no wonder fuch celestial charms " For nine long years have fet the world in arms; " What winning graces! what celestial mien; " She moves a Goddess, and ſhe walks a Queen!" Pope.

[B] There are ſome Authors, who have given ſo particular an account of the perfections of her body.] A Spaniſh Monk remarks, that the beauty of this woman was a prodigy of nature, and for a great many ages it was uſual to ſay, when a perſon deſigned to pay the higheſt compliment to a beauty, ſhe is an Helena. He adds, that John Nevizan ſaid, that of thirty things, which are neceſſary to make a woman perfectly handſome (a), there was not one, which ſhe wanted. Nacio eſta tan aventajada, y enriquecida de bermofura, que fue un portento, un prodigio, y milagro de naturaleza, quedando deſde aquel tiempo à eſte, y aun para muchos ſiglos, en proverbio. ſu belleza, y gallardia: de tal fuerite, que quando queremos ponderar, y encaecer la bermofura de una muger, dezimos que es una Helena: y en tal lugar la pone, el Nivernienſe (8), Natal Comite, Bartolomeo Caſaneo, Juan Nevizano (9); el qual pone las treynta coſas, que ſe requieren para que

(a) See Brant. tom. 2. pag. 330. of his Dames Galantes. CRIT. REM.

(8) That is to ſay, Rowiſius Teſtor.

(9) He ought to ſay, Nevizano.

una muger ſea perfeçiffima en ſu bermofura: y dixez que las tenia todas ſin ſaltar ninguna, la bermofa Helena (10). I believe, that he had not ſeen the work (10) Baſtaſar de of John Nevizan, and that he ſpoke merely upon the Victoria, Prædicador de San Francisco de Salamanca, Theatro de los Dioses de la Gentilidad, lib. 2. cap. 9. pag. 181. edit. de Salamanca, 1620. Difficile eſt cuſtodire quam plurimi amant, it is Caſſaneuve who ſpeaks (11), ut ſatis colligitur ex dictis Jo. Nevizani Aſtenſis in ſua Sylva nuptiali, in ampliacione 7. in verb. quæro juxta prædicta, ſi ſint duo, ubi ponit, quid operetur pulchritudo mulieris. Et ibi dicit, quod debet habere triginta quatuor, ad hoc, ut ſit pulchra, quæ his verſibus ibi poſitis continentur: i. e. Part. 2. Con. 20. pag. m. 168. " It is difficult to ſecure a woman, who is the object of many perſons love, as ſufficiently appears from a paſſage in John Nevizan's Sylva nuptialis, where he lays down the effects of a woman's beauty; and ſays, that ſhe ought to have thirty four things, in order to be handſome, which things are contained in the following verſes introduced there:

*Triginta hæc habeat, quæ vult formoſa vocari
Fæmina, ſic Helenam fama fuiſſe referit.
Alba tria, & totidem nigra, & tria rubra puella:
Tres habeat longas res, totidemque breves.
Tres craſſas, totidem graciles: tria ſtriſſa, tot ampla
Sint itidem huic formæ: ſint quoque parva tria.
Alba cutis, nigri dentes, albique capilli,
Nigri oculi &c.*

That is,

" Let her, who would be accounted beautiful, have " theſe thirty things, for which Helena is reported " to have been eminent; three things white, three " black, and three red; three long, and three ſhort; " three thick, three ſlender; three narrow, three " wide, and three ſmall. A white ſkin, white teeth, " and white hair, black eyes, &c."

I ſuppreſs the reſt of this little Latin Poem (12), tho' (12) It contains Caſſaneuve, who was firſt Preſident of the Parliament of Aix, made no ſcruple to inſert it intire in his Book. He makes this addition: Non aliter hic inſiſto circa talia, cum ſatis, & ultra quam decens ſit, ponatur in dicta Sylva nuptiali. i. e. " I ſhall not inſiſt farther " upon theſe points, ſince enough and more than is " decent is laid down in the ſaid Sylva nuptialis." I may maintain with reaſon, that thoſe, who thus quote John Nevizan, are not exact, ſince he himſelf copies from other writers, and cites them by their names. The ſource, to which he had recourſe, is a French writer, whoſe Book is intitled De la Louange & Beauté des Dames. The eighteen Latin verſes, which he cites, and which Caſſaneuve has quoted after him, were a Tranſlation from the French by Francis Corniger. He ſays that it was not then printed, but that there was an Italian Verſion in a Book published by Vincent Calmeta. Et triginta requiſita, ſays he (13), enume- rantur per Gallicum in libr. de la louange & beauté des dames circa fin, quas Latinas fecit Franciſc. Corniger, quem nunc refero, quia non eſt impreſſus: ſed bene Vincentius Calmeta idem ponens in carm. vulgari. incip. dolce Flaminia, & ecloga proxima ſeq. incip. per dare riſpoſta Lege ergo verſus Cornigeri. i. e. " And thirty quali- fications are reckoned up by a French Author in his Book de la Louange & Beauté des Dames towards the end, which are tranſlated into Latin by Francis Corniger, whoſe tranſlation I quote, becauſe it is not printed. But Vincent Calmeta has properly introduced theſe verſes in an Italian Poem beginning Dolce Flaminia, and the following Eclogue beginning per dare Riſpoſta. Read Corniger's Verſes:"

Triginta hæc habeat &c.

If you conſult the Book intitled Les neuf Matinées du Seigneur de Chobierres, you will find there a Sonnet (14), which begins thus, (14) Pag. 167. of the Paris editi- on, printed by John Richer, 1585 in 8vo.

(a) Apollodorus, lib. 3. See also Pausanias, lib. 3. pag. 103. who remarks, that they swore upon the entrails (according to Amasæus's translation, the testicles) of an Horse, who was sacrificed and afterwards buried there. See like-wise Socrates in Enchiridion Heleneæ.

(b) Clytemnestra, Wife of Agamemnon.

(c) The child whom Helena brought forth was the famous Iphigenia.

(d) See remark [D].

(e) See remark [D].

fought for in marriage by a great number of Princes; and as her father knew not how to act, being fearful of exasperating those to whom he should refuse her, he learned an excellent expedient of Ulysses (a). It was to engage all the rivals to swear, that they would approve the choice he should make of a son-in-law, and be ready to assist him against those, who should endeavour to disturb Helena's marriage. Upon this Tyndarus married her to Menelaus [C]. She had before been stolen away by Theseus; but she was believed upon her word, that she escaped with her virginity [D]. However there was nothing less true. Theseus had not sent her back without having a child by her, of which she was brought to bed at her sister's (b). The affair continued a secret, because her sister made the child (c) pass for her own (d). The usual fate of young women when they are carried away, is to change their condition, whether they own it or not. The more beautiful they are, the more probable it is, that they have submitted to this Law. Our romance writers have not attended to this [E]; or they have preferred a scene

*Celle qui veut paroître des belles la plus belle Ces dix fois trois beautés, trois longs, trois courts, trois blancs,
Trois rouges, & trois noirs, trois petits, & trois grands,
Trois estroits & trois gros, trois menus soient en elle.*

and ends with these words, levres, doigts & cheveux menus, tell fut Helene. The conclusion is no less impertinent than all the preceding verses; for to know that Helena was so made, it would not have been sufficient to have seen her, while she was performing her exercises at Lacedemon (15); it was necessary to have been Paris or Menelaus, or some other of those men, who had been her husbands, or gallants.

(15) Inter quos Helene nudis capere arma papillis fertur, nec fratres erubuisse deos. Propert. Eleg. 13. lib. 3. See the article LYCURGUS, remark [B].

(16) Hygin. cap. 78.

(17) Biblioth. lib. 3.

(18) Hygin. cap. 78.

(19) Plutarch. in Theseo, pag. 15.

(20) Her name was Ætbra.

(21) Proserpina, daughter of Aidoneus, King of the Molossians.

(22) Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 77. ascribes this to the Decelians, a Tribe of Athens, or at least to Decelus himself.

(23) See the article ACAMAS, remark [A].

(24) Plutarch. in Theseo, pag. 15.

(25) Apud Plutarch. ibid. pag. 14.

(26) Apud Tzetzen in Lycophron.

(27) Cited by Meziriac sur les Epiques d'Ovide, pag. 482.

(28) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 65.

(29) Idem, ibid.

[C] Tyndarus married her to Menelaus. Some say (16), that he did not himself choose Menelaus for his son-in-law, but that he permitted Helena to choose among her lovers, whom she pleased, and that she preferred Menelaus to the rest. Apollodorus (17) asserts, that Tyndarus resigned his Kingdom to his son-in-law; but others tell us (18), that he only appointed him his successor. Helena therefore was a noble fortune, since with so accomplished a person she brought a crown to the man, whom she married.

[D] She had before been stolen away by Theseus; but she was believed upon her word, that she escaped with her maidenhead. According to Plutarch, she was not of a marriageable age, when Theseus stole her from the Temple of Diana, where she was dancing (19). He put her under the care of his mother (20), and placed them both under the protection of one of his good friends at Aphidnæ, and went upon another adventure to seize a Lady (21) with his friend Perithous. Castor and Pollux, Helena's brothers, lost no time; they entered Attica with an armed force to demand their sister. The Athenians protested, that they knew not where she was. This answer was not satisfactory; hostilities were ready to begin, when one Academus informing Helena's brothers that she was at Aphidnæ (22), they went to attack that city, and carried it by assault. The gates of Athens were opened; they entered the city without committing the least disorder; they demanded only to be initiated in the mysteries. They carried Helena back to Lacedemon: it is said likewise that they carried away Theseus's mother, and this Lady attended Helena (23) to Troy (24).

Hellanicus makes Theseus fifty years old (25), and Helena seven (26), at the time she was carried away, and does not scruple to say, that Theseus lay with her. Duris the Samian affirms (27), that Helena was with child of Iphigenia, when she was rescued from the hands of her ravisher. Pausanias says the same thing, and adds, that she was brought to bed at Argos at the house of her sister Clytemnestra, wife of Agamemnon, and that she committed the care of her daughter's Education to her (28). He says, that Euphorion, Alexander Pleuronius, and Stesichorus had asserted in their Poems, that Iphigenia was the daughter of Theseus and Helena. The Argians were so much persuaded of this, that they believed, that Helena, after her child-birth, built the Temple of Lucina, which was to be seen in their city (29). A great many persons were deceived on this occasion. Agamemnon thought that Iphigenia was his daughter; for his wife assured him so. Castor and Pollux were persuaded, that their sister returned a virgin; for when they asked her upon this tender point, she answered that she had never never been touched. Ορισίως η Έλένης τής Διός εγένετο θυγάτηρ Ίφιγένεια, η αὐτήν ἐξήτριφεν ἡ πηδ Έλένης ἀδελφή Κλυταιμνήστρα πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἀγαμέμνονα ἔπειν αὐτὴ τεκεῖν. Ἐλένη γὰρ πρὸς Δαναομένη τῶν ἀδελφῶν, ἔφη κόρη παρὰ Θεσπίως ἀπελθῆν (30). What shall we say of Menelaus, who married her some time after? He thought, that himself was the first, who had opened the breach, and yet he had married one, who had been a mother.

When I said that Helena was questioned by her brothers, I followed the learned Monf. Meziriac (31), who thus understands the Greek passage, which I quote: but others, with more reason perhaps, tell us, that Castor and Pollux advised their sister to boast that she had her virginity still. It was a very prudent piece of advice, and which might well have been spared to Helena, young as she was; she would have boasted of this advantage without the suggestion of any person. She affirms in Ovid, that Theseus only forced some kisses from her, and that she came off clear, abating only her fear.

*Non tamen è faclo fructum tulit ille petitum,
Excepto redii passa timore nihil:
Oscula luctanti tantummodo pauca protervus
Abtulit: ulterius nil habet ille mei (32).*

She owns however, that Theseus was very young (33): Ovid has observed decorum in representing her as speaking in this manner, but he does not observe it less, when he introduces another woman, who believes Helena to assert a falsehood:

*Illam de patria Theseus, (nisi nomine fallor)
Nescio quis Theseus, abstulit ante juâ.
A juvene & cupido credatur reddita virgo.
Unde hoc compererim tam bene, quæris? amo.
Vim licet appelles, & culpam nomine veles,
Quæ toties rapta est, præbuit ipsa rapti (34).*

The following remark will serve as a supplement to this.

[E] Our Romance-writers have not attended to this.] A REFLECTION upon the rapes of Heroines in romance. It is certain, that Monfr. or Mademoiselle de Scudery, and other Romance-writers their contemporaries, have greatly shocked probability, when they have represented their Heroines to be stolen away, without allowing us to suppose that they granted, voluntarily or by force, any favour to their lovers. I know, that they would be infinitely more inexcusable, if they did not suppose, as they do, that the Ladies were carried away without consenting in any measure. There are some countries, where those are not punished who steal young women, who consent to it. This impunity is the reason why such thefts are very frequent; and no body imagines that the ravishers use the least delay to enjoy them. The first lodging they come to is the utmost; and most people even suppose that enjoyment preceded the escape. However that be, this kind of rape is almost always followed by marriage, since if the parents should not consent to the marriage, they would find themselves burthened with a daughter, disgraced, according to the opinion of the world, and who would not meet with an husband, except any one should be content to take up with the leavings of another. We must confess therefore, that the Romance-writers secure themselves from the greatest part of the ridicule, by the care which they take in supposing, that the Heroine opposes, as much as possible, her being carried scene of adventures to probability. All the world knows that Helena was stolen away by Paris the son of Priam, and that all the Greeks interested themselves in the injury done to Menelaus. Hence sprung the Trojan war so much spoken of by all the Poets. Paris having lost his life the last year of that war, his brother Deiphobus supplied his place with Helena. The Greeks killed him in a cruel manner the night in which Troy was taken: they were favoured in this by Helena as much as they could wish [F].

Menelaus

fied off: however they cannot extricate themselves out of the affair; they overthrow the common notions, and form a system diametrically opposite to the judgment of the public, and to good sense. What is the motive of their Heroes, when they steal a mistress? Would they declare to her, that they die for love of her, and that her rigours reduce them to despair? They have told her this I know not how often, and they have not recourse to this violent method till they find her determin'd to make some other man happy, and to be for ever indifferent to them. Do they hope, that their sighs, which have been so ineffectual before they provok'd her, will move her amidst the resentments, with which she is fir'd against her ravisher? Probability contradicts this: they must therefore propose to take advantage of the State, which reduces her to their mercy, and to put her upon such terms as shall oblige her to speak of matrimony first. This is really one of the views of those, who steal away a young Lady without her consent: They persuade themselves, that after she has been some months in their power, her reputation at least will suffer greatly, and cannot be restored but by the nuptial benediction. Besides we see, that if others marry such women, they are vehemently suspected of possessing only the leavings of a ravisher: they are extremely raillied, and are considered as men of no delicacy. This is a new stroke against our Romance-writers, whose Heroes are ambitious of marrying mistresses, who have been more than once stolen away by their rivals. You will find a critique upon all this in the Parnass reformé. Cyrus complains there, that he has not a mistress given him, "who is of an irreproachable character. You judge well enough without doubt from this discourse, says he (35), that I am not satisfied with Mandana; and indeed what would you have me think of her, after she has been stolen away so often? Ought I to believe, that she escaped untouched from the hands of four ravishers? And can those who are the least clear-sighted in these mysteries doubt, but that you have bestowed on me the leavings of others? I think, you should have put her modesty to other sort of proofs. These are a little too strong for so brittle a thing, and Mandana was not a fort capable of resisting so many assaults. Perhaps she might have escaped well enough from the first attack: I am willing to believe, that she had virtue enough not to submit at once, and her honour might be preserved without a miracle from this exigence. But relapses are mortal in these affairs: a second carrying off overthrows every thing, and an Heroine, who has only the remains of a shaken resolution, or perhaps not so much, makes but a very useless effort in her defence." Apollo had regard to this complaint, and pronounced this decree. "We declare, that we do not acknowledge for Heroes all those, who are Cuckolds, nor for Heroines all those Ladies, who shall have been stolen away above once (36)." The Ballad of Sarrafin upon the carrying off of Mademoiselle de Bouteville by Monsieur de Coligny (37), is another sentence of condemnation; for here is the judgment of that man of wit:

*Ce gentil joli jeu d'amours
Chacun le pratique à sa guise,
Qui par Rondeaux & beaux Discours,
Chapeau de fleurs, gente coiffure,
Tournoy, bal, festin, ou devise Pense les belles captiver;
Mais je pense, quoy qu'on en dise,
Qu'il n'est rien tel que d'enlever.
C'est bien des plus merveilleux tours
La passeroute & la maistrise:
Au mal d'aimer, c'est bien toujours
Une prompte & soufve crise,
C'est au gasteau de friandise
De Venus la sève trouver.
L'Amant est fol qui ne s'avise*

*Qu'il n'est rien tel que d'enlever.
Je sçay bien que les premiers jours
Que Becasse est bridée & prise,
Elle invoque Dieu au secours
Et ses parens à barbe grise:
Mais si l'Amant qui l'a conquise
Sçait bien la Rose cultiver,
Elle chante en face d'Eglise
Qu'il n'est rien tel que d'enlever (38).*

(38) Sarrafin,
Poësies, pag. 59.
60.

That is,
"Let every one practise this elegant scheme of gallantry, in his own manner, who by Rondeaux, and polite discourſes, chaplets of flowers, neatness of dress, tournaments, balls, feasts, or devises, thinks to captivate fair Ladies. But I am of opinion, whatever is said to the contrary, that there is nothing like stealing them away. This is the right way for the lover to gain his point, the best remedy for the pains of love. That lover is a very silly one, who does not consider, that there is nothing like stealing her away. I know well enough that the first day a mistress is carried away, she calls upon God to assist her, and upon her aged parents. But if the lover, who has gained her, knows how to manage his point, she sings before the whole church, that there is nothing like stealing a Lady away."

[F] The Greeks massacred . . . Deiphobus . . . being favoured by Helena as much as they could have wished. See in Virgil the shocking treatment of Deiphobus's body, and in what manner his wife betrayed him.

*Atque hic Priamiden laniatum corpore toto Deiphobum vidit, lacerum crudeliter ora:
Ora manūque ambas, populataque tempora raptis
Auribus, & truncas inhoneſto vulnere nares (39).*

(39) Virg. Æn.
lib. 6. ver. 495.

"Here Priam's son, Deiphobus, he found,
Whose face and limbs were one continu'd wound;
Dishonest, with lopp'd arms, the youth appears,
Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears."

*Sed me fata mea, & scelus exitiale Læonæ,
His merſere malis: illa hæc monumenta reliquit (40).* (40) Ibid. ver. 511.

"These are the monuments of Helen's love,
The shame I bear below, the marks I bore above."

*Flammam media ipsa tenebat
Ingentem, & summâ Danaos ex arce vocabat.
Tum me confectum curis, somnoque gravatum
Infelix habuit thalamus; preſtitque jacentem,
Dulcis & alta quies, placidæque ſimillima mortis.
Egregia interea conjux arma omnia telis
Emovet; & fidum capiti ſubduxerat enſem:
Intra teſta vocat Menelaum, & limina pandit.
Scilicet id magnum ſperans fore munus amanti,
Et famam exſtingui veterum ſic poſſe malorum (41).*

(41) Ibid. ver. 518.

"Then waving high her torch the signal made
Which rais'd the Grecians from their ambuscade.
With watching overworn, with cares oppress'd,
Unhappy I had lain me down to rest,
And heavy sleep my weary limbs possess'd,
Mean time my worthy wife our arms mislaid,
And from beneath my head my sword convey'd,
The door unlatch'd, and with repeated calls,
Invites her former Lord within my walls.
Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
And with new treasons would redeem the past."
DRYDEN.

She thought that this barbarous sacrifice was necessary to appease the resentment of Menelaus: she would have judged better of things, if she had attended less to the enormity of her crime, than to the good nature of the Greek Prince.

(35) Parnasse,
Reformé, pag.
265. Dutch edition.

(36) Ibid. pag.
287.

(37) Not he, who fought with the Duke of Guise, as the author of the Galanteries des Rois de France
asserts, tom. 2.
pag. 223. but his younger brother.

Menelaus acted like a good-natured man; he was reconciled without much difficulty to his wife, and took her home to him very generously [G]. After his death she was obliged to retire into the Isle of Rhodes, where she died unfortunately [H]; for she was hanged on a tree. The scandalous irregularities of her life [I] did not prevent her from having divine

[G] Menelaus was reconciled without much difficulty to his wife, and took her home to him very generously.] This poor cuckold was so simple, that he imagined, that his wife consumed herself with grief in Priam's house; and this was the chief motive, that urged him to the conquest of Troy.

Μάλας δ' ἴσ' ὅσον θυμῷ τίσασθαι
Ἐλῆος ἰερήματα τε τρυχᾶς τε (42).

(42) Homer. II. l. 2. v. 26. See the Penses sur les Cometes, num. 237. pag. 717.

There were very good grounds to reproach him, that his conjugal flame, which was almost extinct, was revived when Helena abandoned him for another man:

*Acrius Hermonen idem dilexit Orestes,
Esse quod alterius ceperat illa viri.
Quid Menelae doles? ibus sine conjuge Creten,
Et poterat nupta letus abesse tua:
Ut Paris hanc rapuit, tum demum uxore carere
Non potes, alterius crevit amore tuus.*

“ Orestes loved Hermione the more, because she began to be possessed by another man. Why, Menelaus, do you grieve? You went to Crete without your wife, and was able to bear cheerfully her absence. But when Paris carried her away, then at last you begin to be incapable of supporting the loss of her; your love was increased by that of another man.”

Antiquity must have been very strongly convinced of the good humour of cuckolds, since it represents the God Vulcan so easy towards his wife. “ The Deity of our Poet, when he surprizes with his wife one of her galants, is content with exposing them and suffers himself to be worked upon by the soft caresses, which she offers him, complaining that she entertained a distrust of his love.

(*) Virgil. Æn. lib. 8. ver. 395.

“ (*) Quid causas petis ex alto? fiducia cessit Quo tibi, Diva, mei?”

“ Why seek you reasons for a cause so just,
Or your own beauty, or my love distrust?”

DRYDEN.

(†) Ibid. ver. 383.

“ She makes a request to him for a bastard of her's: (†) Arma rogo genetrix nato, which is readily granted him; and Vulcan speaks of Æneas with respect: (†) Arma acri facienda viro, with a generosity indeed more than human. This excess of goodness I consent to be left to the Gods: (†) Nec divos homines componer æquum est (43).” These words of Montagne are too ingenious to displease men of taste here. But not to dissemble any thing, I must observe, that there are some persons officious enough to do Menelaus the honour of arming him with resentment against the infidelity of Helena. In the Troades of Euripides he threatens to kill her; and she is obliged to make use of all kinds of excuses to obtain her pardon. She says among other things, that after the death of Paris, she had several times endeavoured to leave Troy, and retire into the camp of the Greeks, and that centinels surprized her, when she was attempting to descend from the walls by a rope. She adds, that Deiphobus married her by force. Pausanias mentions a statue of Menelaus pursuing Helena sword in hand, to kill her when Troy was taken (44). But others suppose, that he threw away his sword, when he saw the throat of Helena, and suffered himself to be killed by this traitorous bitch, and caressed her:

(†) Ibid. ver. 441.

(†) Cat. ad Mal.

(43) Montagne, Essais, lib. 3. cap. 5. pag. m. 138.

“ *Ελῆος δὲ Τροίαν, εἴμι γὰρ καὶ ταῦθ' αἶσι,
Οὐκ ἔκλειες γυναῖκα χερῶν λαβόν.
Ἄλλ' ὡς ἰσθίδος μαστῶν, ἐκβαλὼν εἴφθ'
Φίλην ἰδέω, ἀφροδῖτιν αἰκαλλῶν κίνα* (45).”

(44) Pausan. lib. 5. pag. 166.

(45) Eurip. in Androm. ver. 627. pag. m. 520.

[H] She died unfortunately.] Nicostratus and Megapenthus, Menelaus's natural sons, had driven her from Lacedemon. She retired to Polyxo her relation, the widow of Tlepolemus King of Rhodes, and Regent of the Kingdom during her son's minority. Polyxo remembering that her husband died at the siege of Troy, and that she could not but consider Helena as the cause of her being a widow, she resolved upon revenge; for which purpose while Helena was in the bath, she sent women thither dressed like Furies, who hanged her upon a tree. The Rhodians being desirous to perpetuate this accident, built a Temple, which they called the Temple of Helena Dendritis. It is Pausanias, who informs me of this (46). The Author of ancient and modern Athens is in the right to say (47), that a thousand people speak of the beautiful Helena, who do not know, that she was hanged. It is an error in Moreri's Dictionary to say, that one of the companions of Helena occasioned her death. You will find in Photius, that she strangled herself, and that near the oak, where she hung herself, there grew an herb named Helencion, which rendered those, who eat it, quarrelsome (48). Pliny ascribes quite different qualities to this herb: it made women beautiful, and those gay, who put it in their wine (49). He remarks (50), that it was said to have sprung from the tears of Helena. You will find in the same Photius (51), that Thetis destroyed Helena during the return of the Greeks; and according to others, that she went with Menelaus into Chersonesus Tauricus to seek Orestes, and that they were both sacrificed there by Iphigenia. I have read in Vigenere (52), that Herodotus relates that Nicostratus and Megapenthus banished Helena, and that she retired to Rhodes to Polyxo the widow of King Tlepolemus, and that the maids of Polyxo hated Helena, because she had been the occasion of the death of their late Lord, one day as she was gone to divert herself in an orchard without their mistress, hang'd her upon one of the trees. I have not found any particular of this account in Herodotus.

(46) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 102.

(47) Pag. m. 63.

(48) Photius, pag. 479. or Ptolem. Hephestione.

(49) Plin. lib. 21. cap. 21.

(50) Ibid. cap. 10.

(51) Photius, pag. 479.

(52) Sur le Protesilas de Pbiloftrate, folio 235 verso, edit. in 450.

The Spanish Monk, whom I have quoted above, has been grossly mistaken with regard to the causes of Helena's death. He says (53), that she retiring to Rhodes to Polyxena wife of Ptolemo, King of that Island, behaved ill, as she had always done from her earliest youth, and fell in love with her host, and abandoned herself to him. Polyxena being enraged with jealousy, caused her to be hanged on a tree. Pausanias, continues he, assures us, that because she had committed adultery with Ptolemo during the siege of Troy, Polyxena put her to death. Judge by this whether this Spanish Author is faithful or judicious in his quotations.

(53) Baltasar de Victoria, Teatro de los Dioses de la Genitividad, lib. 2. cap. 19. pag. 189.

[I] The scandalous irregularities of her life.] Several Authors (54) have blamed her for lasciviousness; but especially Lycophron in his Cassandra, where he calls her πεντάκυρος, that is, the woman of five husbands (55). Euripides in his Tragedy of Andromache represents Hermione daughter of Helena thus reproached with her mother's fault:

Μὴ τῆν τεύξασαι τῆ φιλαυθία γέναι
Ζήτας παρ' ἄνδρῶν.

That is,

“ Do not endeavour to surpass your mother in this lust after men.

. . . . Ptolemy Hephestion in Photius relates a very remarkable story, which gives credit to the wantonness of Helena. The fact is, that a certain Arcadian named Peritamus, meeting with Paris Alexander in the country of Arcadia, had an affair with her. But Paris by way of punishment for this adultery cut off his parts of Generation. Hence it came that in Arcadia those, who are thus punished, are called Peritanes. Lycophron has done worse than calling her the woman with five husbands: it is said, that he has stiled her a dove on account of her lasciviousness, and a bitch on account of her impudence, or because she lay promiscuously with a great many men (56). I do not find, that those, who endeavour to excuse Helena alledge any other reason phron.

(54) Namely, Theocritus, Menelaus, Paris, Deiphobus, and Achilles.

(56) See Canterus and Meursius upon the 87th verse of Lycophron.

divine honours paid her after her death, nor from having miracles ascribed to her [K]. It is not at all probable that Paris waited to enjoy her till they landed in an Isle [L]. However it is said, that he ordered a monument of his first enjoyment to be built in that Isle. It is added that Menelaus did not destroy this monument [M], and that he only signified, there, (57) See Homer in the 23d book of the Odyssey, and Euripides in the Troades, and in the Andromache, cited by Meziriac upon Ovid's Epistles, pag. 486, 487.

(58) See the remark [X].

(59) In XXIII Lib. Odys. quoted by Meziriac upon Ovid's Epistles, pag. 487.

(60) See the Reflexions of the Critick upon Maimbourg with regard to the Alcmena, Nouv. Lettres, pag. 284. See also pag. 277, 278.

(61) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 96.

(62) Idem, ibid. pag. 102.

(63) Suidas in Στασίχορος, & ante ipsum Isocrates in Helena Encomio.

(64) Herod. lib. 6. cap. 61.

(65) Isocrat. in Helena Encomio, pag. m. 320.

(66) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 102.

son than this, that it was (57) the Gods who forced her to go away with Paris (58). There is no crime, which such an apology is not capable of justifying; but I own, that by giving the affair the turn, which the Scholiast of Homer has done, we may make a good apology for her. See here what he says (59). "Alexander the son of Priam went from Asia to Lacedemon, where he formed a design to carry away Helena, who had entertained him in her palace. But she, who had been well educated, and was extremely fond of her husband, would not consent to it, declaring that she preferred a lawful marriage to a shameful adultery, and that she chose much rather to live with Menelaus. Paris not being able therefore to gain his point, it is said that Venus made use of a stratagem, which was to change the person of Alexander into the resemblance of Menelaus, and deceived Helena by this means; for she imagining that he was the true Menelaus, made no scruple to follow him to the ships, where Paris obliging her to go aboard immediately set sail. Eustathius likewise upon the same Book of Homer, touches upon this story, and remarks, that Penelope acted much more prudently; for tho' she thought she knew Ulysses again, yet she did not care for him at all, and would not lie with him, till he had acquainted her with a great many particulars, and given her several signs to assure her, that he was really her husband, and that she could not be deceived (60)."

[K] . . . Did not prevent her from having divine honours paid her after her death, nor from having miracles ascribed to her.] I have already spoken of the Temple, which the Rhodians dedicated to her. Pausanias mentions that erected in the country of Lacedemon (61). With regard to her miracles, it is sufficient to remark, that she deprived Stesichorus of his sight, who had ventured to treat her memory ill in his Poems (62), and restored it to him, when he had made a palinody or recantation (63). She gave an extraordinary share of beauty to a very ugly young woman, who was brought into her Temple every day (64). See the article ACHILLEA, where we have observed, that she was the wife of Achilles in the other world, and that she knew how to make herself considerable there. See likewise Isocrates in his Panegyric upon Helena: you will find there, that she gained not only immortality, but also a divine power, which she made use of to raise her brothers and husband to the number of the Gods; so that if Calitor and Pollux were capable of assisting those, who prayed to them in storms, it was because their sister invested them with this power, in order to shew the whole world the metamorphosis, which she had made in them. They were in the grave, when she conferred Divinity upon them. What is most commendable is, that having granted the same favour to Menelaus, she was desirous of living eternally with him. Τὸς ἀδελφῶς ἢ δὴ κατεχομένους ὑπὸ τῆς περιμήνης, εἰς Διὸς ἀνήγαγε· βυλομένη ἢ κιστὴ ποιῆσαι τὴν μεταβολὴν, ἣτως αὐτοῖς τὰς τιμὰς ἰσαγνῆς ἔδωκεν, ὅσθ' ὀφειμῆς ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν τῇ θαλάτῃ κινδυνεύοντων σώζειν, οἷ τινος ἀν' ἑσθῶς αὐτὸς ἐπικαλέσεται. μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα Μετῆλας τῶσαυτην χάρις ἀπέδωκεν . . . ὅστις . . . ἔμνον . . . ἀλλὰ καὶ θεῶν ἀντὶ θνητῶ ποιήσασα συνοικεῖ αὐτῇ καὶ παρέδωκεν εἰς ἅπαντα τὸν αἰῶνα κατισήσατο (65). Isocrates alleges in proof of this the practice of the Lacedemonians, who offered sacrifices to Menelaus and Helena, not as to Heroes, but as Gods. It was at Therapne that they paid them divine honours, as the same Author observes. But Pausanias says not, that there was a Temple of Helena in that city; he only says, that Menelaus's Temple was there, and that it was believed that Menelaus and Helena were interred there (66).

I should have been glad that Theodoret had depended upon the authority of Isocrates, and not of Euripides, in reproaching the Pagans, because Helena so famous for her adulteries was ranked among the Deities; for tho' Euripides has feigned, that she never died, but was raised to heaven by the favour of the Gods, and invested with immortality, it does not follow, that this was the opinion of the Pagans. The Episodes of a Tragedy were so far in the Poet's hands, that unless we otherwise know them to be real, they are taken merely for the particular fiction of the Author of the Tragedy. I shall quote Theodoret's own words. Καὶ τὴν Ἑλένην δὲ, μετὰ τῆν πολυβρύλλητον καὶ παραπόλλην μυκησίαν, τῷ Μενέλαω χορῆσασις, εἰς τὸν ἕρμιον, ἢ Φριῶν Ἐυριπίδης, ἀνήγαγον (67).

[L] It is not at all probable, that Paris waited to enjoy her till they landed in an Isle.] Homer, who represents him as master of this patience, did not do him any honour, according to the principles of men of gallantry (68). See now upon what occasion he relates this circumstance of the place. Paris being overcome by Menelaus suffered a thousand reproaches from Helena. He desired her not to insult him, but go to bed to him, pretending that he had never found himself possessed with so strong a flame of love, not even when he had first enjoyed her in the Isle of Craneae. Upon this he rose from his seat to go to bed, and was followed by Helena without the least reluctance.

Οὐ γὰρ πῶ ποτὶ μὲν ὠδὲ ἔρωσ φρένας ἀμφοικάλυψεν, Οὐδ' ὅτι σε πρότερον Λακεδαίμωνι ἐξ ἑρατιῆς Ἐπλεον ἀρπάζας ἐν πολιοπόροισι εἰσσι, Νῆσα δ' ἐν Κραναιῇ ἐμίγη φιλόστητι καὶ ἰούῃ. Ὅς σέο τῶν ἑραμῶν, καὶ με γλυκύς ἴμισθ' αἰετῖ. Ἡ ῥα, καὶ ἄρχε λίχθ' δὲ κίων, ἄμμα σ' εἴπειτ' ἀκοιτις.

"Not thus I lov'd thee, when from Sparta's shore My forc'd, my willing heav'nly prize I bore; When first intranc'd in Craneae's Isle I lay, Mix'd with thy soul, and all dissolv'd away! Thus having spoke, th' enamour'd Phrygian boy Rush'd to the bed, impatient for the joy. Him Helen follow'd flow with bashful charms, And clasp'd the blooming Hero in her arms." Pope.

Jafon had a more extraordinary degree of patience ascribed to him than Paris; and this makes it difficult to conceive where the judgment of Romance-Writers was employed. Ought not they above all things to have confined themselves to probability? And did not they violate it, when they suppose on the one hand, that Medea was so fond of Jafon, that by her love for him she was led to commit the greatest crimes; and on the other, that she spent several months with him without consummating the marriage? We may observe likewise, that it would not have been consummated so soon, if some advice had not been given to Jafon. Quem cum interrogaret Arete, quidnam esset judicaturus, respondit Alcinoüs, Si virgo fuerit Medea, parenti redditurum: sin autem mulier, conjugii. Hoc cum audivit Arete à conjugè, mittit nuntium ad Jafonem; Et is Medeam noctu in antro devirginavit. i. e. "When Arete asked him, what he determined to do; Alcinoüs answered, that if Medea was a virgin, he would restore her to her father; but if a woman, to her husband. Arete hearing her husband declare this, sends a message to Jafon, who in the night lay with Helena in a cave."

[M] Menelaus did not destroy this monument.] Here is a thing, which would justify Homer, if it were true. It is pretended, that upon the bank of the continent opposite to the Isle of Craneae there was a Temple of Venus, which Paris had built after this agreeable conquest . . . to shew his exceeding joy and gratitude. He gave to this Venus the epithet of Mignonitis, and called this territory Mignonion, from a word, which signified the amorous mystery, which had been performed there. Menelaus, the unhappy husband of this Princess, eighteen years after she had been stolen away from him, came to visit this Temple, the territory of which had been witness to his misfortune, and the infidelity of his wife. He did not destroy it; he only placed on each side of the statue of Venus the statues of two other Goddesses, that of Thetis, and that of Praxidice, which signifies the Goddesses of Punishments, to shew that he would not suffer the injury to pass

(67) Theodor. Therapeut. Sermon. 3.

(68) See Nouv. de la Republic. des Lettres, Jan. 1687, pag. 68.

(69) Homer. Iliad. lib. 3. vers. 4. 2. See above the quotation (45) of the article of the 3d Duke of GUISE.

(70) Hygin. cap. 23. pag. m. 60.

there, that he had had satisfaction given him for the injury. A modern author does not seem to have well comprehended the meaning of Menelaus (e). Some authors say, that Paris did not long preserve his prize [N]. A great many fables have been related concerning the birth of Helena [O]; I mean, concerning the egg, whence it is pretended she was hatched.

(71) Guillet, Albenes ancienne & nouvelle, pag. 63. Observe that we make use of his words, both because he writes well, and because they furnish an occasion for criticism. The facts, which he relates, are taken from Pausanias, lib. 3. pag. 105.

(72) Nouv. de la Republique des Lettres, Janv. 1687, pag. 67.

(73) Ovid. Epist. Helena ad Parisidem. Coluthus, de Raptu Helena.

(74) Ovid. Epist. Parisid. ad Helen. ver. 297.

(75) Idem, in Epist. Helena ad Parisid. ver. 29.

(76) Ptolemæus Hephæst. apud Pharium, pag. 480.

(77) See Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. 6. cap. 27. pag. m. 638. He should have quoted Herodotus, and have observed, that a storm obliged Paris to put into Egypt.

(78) Quam deportavit in Ægyptum, atque ibi primum cum illa congressus sit. Idem, ibid.

(79) Helena denies it in the Prologue to Euripid. s's Tragedy, intitled, Helena; but her testimony is of no weight in this point.

(80) Herod. lib. 2. cap. 120.

(81) Idem, ibid. cap. 118.

Sed tibi (74) & hoc suadet rebus, non voce, maritus: Neve sui furcis hospitibus obset, abest. Non habuit tempus, quo Cræsis regna videret, Aptius: ô mirâ calliditate virum! &c.

He did not want courage among the Ladies. Helena owns, that he was not so reserv'd as her Theseus, who only kiss'd her.

Quæ tua nequitia est, non his contenta fuisset. Di melius! similis non fuit ille tui, Reddidit intactam (75).

Paris preserv'd her so one day, that she betook her self to flight; she lost one of her shoes then. The place where she lost it, was at Sparta, and was named Sandalion, on account of this shoe (76).

(N) Some authors say, Paris did not long preserve his prey] It is said, that he failed towards Egypt, and landed at the mouth of the Nile call'd Canopus, where there was a Temple of Hercules, which serv'd for an asylum to fugitive slaves. Some of Paris's slaves having fled thither, inform'd the Priests of what their Master had done; upon which, Proteus the King ordered him to be seized, and reproach'd him in a very severe manner, and afterwards commanded him to retire immediately; but he kept Helena, with all the other things, which had been stolen from Menelaus (77). It is added, that Paris did not enjoy that Lady till after his arrival in Egypt (78). This is a story already confuted. I cannot tell how Proteus behaved, or whether before he restor'd Helena to the Person, to whom she belong'd, he did not obtain the last favour from her (79). I only know that Herodotus thinks it very probable, that she was not carried to Troy, for he cannot persuade himself that Priam would have been so infatuated as to choose to retain her, rather than to avoid the fatal consequences of a refusal (80). He believes therefore that the Trojans answered sincerely to the Embassadors of the Greeks, that Helena was not at Troy, and that they must look for her in Egypt, where King Proteus kept her (81). The Greeks taking this answer for a severe piece of raillery, applied themselves to the war against the Trojans; but when they had taken the city without finding Helena any where, they imagined that she was at the court of King Proteus; upon which Menelaus failed thither, and recovered his wife (82). There is such an enormous variety of accounts among the Mythological writers, that I am not surprized, that Servius should relate (83), I. That Theseus having stoln Helena, gave her to Proteus, King of Egypt, and that Menelaus recovered her from Proteus after the Trojan war; so that this war was not occasioned by Helena's being stolen away by Paris, but by the injury, which the Trojans did to Hercules, in refusing to receive him when he was seeking for Hylas. II. That Helena was recovered from Proteus, to whom Theseus had intrusted the care of her, and was restored to Menelaus, from whom Paris stole her.

I forgot to observe, that Proteus did not fend away Paris without leaving him some kind of consolation; for he restor'd to him the picture of Helena (84). One of the Commentators upon Lycophron very erroneously applies to this what Helena says in Euripides, that Juno, to punish Paris for not giving her the triumph of beauty, procured, that instead of Helena he had only the living image of that beautiful Lady, which image was formed in the air

Ἦρα δὲ μεμφθεῖσ', ἔπει' εἰ καὶ θεῶς,
Ἐξέριμωσ' ἐμὴν Ἀλιεάνδρην λίχην.
Διδῶσι δ' ἐκ ἔμ', ἀλλ' ὁμοίωσασ' ἔμοι
Εἰδῶλον ἔμωπιον, ἕρανῦ ζουθεῖσ' ὑπό.
Πριάμῳ τυράνῳ παιδί. ἢ δόκῳ μ' ἔχῳ
Κεῖνῃ δόκῳσι ἐκ ἔχῳσι (85).

Every one sees, that the difference between these two things does not consist, as Canterus would have it, in this, that Proteus is the agent in one case, and Juno in the other. We see likewise, that Juno forgot the spirit of revenge upon this occasion. Paris was as happy with a living image of Helena, as he would have been with Helena herself. I remember to have read, that Stesichorus said, that the Trojans not knowing the true Helena, disputed among themselves about her picture. Ὅσπερ τὸ τῆς Ἑλένης εἰδῶλον ὑπὸ τῆ ἐν Τροίᾳ Σπείρχεσθ' φασὶ γνίσθαι περιμάχῳσι ἀγνοίᾳ τῆ ἀληθείας (86). This, according to the opinion of some Free-thinkers, is a representation of the disputes about religion.

[O] A great many fables have been related concerning the birth of Helena.] They are not contented to say, that she was born of an egg, but they add that this egg fell from heaven out of the moon, and that the women of that country bring forth eggs, whence spring men fifteen times larger than those, who inhabit the earth. We learn this from Athenæus (87), who tells us, upon the authority of Herodorus of Heraclea, that Neocles 2. of Crotona had published this in one of his works. 57. Here follow some false quotations concerning this Chimera. Cælius Rhodiginus (88), instead of Herodorus, writes Herodotus. This error has been copied by Sal-muth (89). Who can forbear laughing, when he considers these words of a Spanish Physician? Nonne admirabilius adhuc in tota naturæ majestate rarissimum, quod mulieres quasdam produxerit, quæ non more aliarum fetus, sed ova edant ac incubent, ex quibus homines nascantur, qui ad giganteam proceritatem excrescant? Et tamen hoc in Selenitidis mulieribus accidere referunt ex Lycosthene Ravisius Textor, & ex Herodoto Hera-cleotes, ut quoque testatur Rhodiginus lib. 27. cap. 17. licet pro mera fabula hoc habeat Adrianus Junius, lib. 1. animad. cap. 15, citatus apud Pancirolum part. 2. memorab. titulo 2. histor. tamen cum iconè exhibet (90). Caspar à Reies, in Elyfio jucundarum Quæst. Campo, Quæst. 47. num. 14. pag. m. 581.

(82) Idem, ibid. and cap. 119.

(83) Servius in hæc verba Virg. Æneid. lib. 11. ver. 262.

(84) See Canterus & Meurhus upon Lycophron, ver. 113.

(85) Eurip. in Prologo Helena, ver. 31. pag. m. 308.

(86) Plato, de Republica, lib. 9. pag. m. 738.

(87) Athen. lib. 2. cap. 16. pag. 57.

(88) Antiq. Leç. lib. 27. cap. 17. in fine.

(89) Salmuth. Comment. in Pansicirulum de novis repertis, pag. 93.

(90) Caspar à Reies, in Elyfio jucundarum Quæst. Campo, Quæst. 47. num. 14. pag. m. 581.

hatched. The inventions ascribed to her most faithful maid-servant are a brand of infamy [P]. If the authors who have spoken so much of her had been good Chronologers, her beauty “ Animadvers. cap. 15. quoted by Pancirollus, part 2. “ memorab. titulo 2 Hist. treats this as a mere fable, “ yet he gives us the history with a picture.” Is not this a good manner of beginning his quotations to produce first Lycosthenes, who lived in the XVIth Century? Is it not a strange mistake to place Ravifius Textor after Lycosthenes, the latter being posterior to the former, and an abridger of him? What a leap is it to rise all at once to Herodotus? What confusion to take Herodorus for Herodotus? What fiction to give us one Heracleotes, who quotes Herodotus? Is not this finding two authors, where the writer, whom he quotes, gives us but one? for Cœlius Rhodiginus says expressly Herodotus Heracleotes. What kind of reasoning is this: though Hadrian Junius treats it as a mere fable, Lycosthenes, Ravifius Textor, Herodotus, Heracleotes, Rhodiginus, have not scrupled to relate it? How could this Junius’s authority have laid any restraint upon the rest, when he lived after all of them except Lycosthenes? But let us return to Helena.

Some ancient Poets have said, that she was the daughter of Jupiter and Nemesis, and that Nemesis, in order to secure herself from the warm addresses of Jupiter, fled by sea and land, and disguised herself in all shapes; but at last Jupiter by a superior force got her with child, first of Castor and Pollux, and afterwards of Helena:

Τὴν ποῖε καλλίκομῳ Νέμεσις φολότῃ μυσίῳ Ζεὺς Διὸν βασιλῆι, τίκνυ κραιπνῆς ὑπ’ ἀναγκῆς (91).

“ The fair-hair’d Nemesis o’erpower’d by Jove
“ Brought Helen forth.”

We read in Pausanias (92), that according to the common opinion Helena was the daughter of Jupiter and Nemesis, and that Leda was only her nurse. Phidias conforming himself to this tradition, represented Leda in such an attitude upon the Base of the statue of Nemesis, that she seemed to bring Helena to that Goddess. Some say (93), that Nemesis being impregnated by Jupiter, laid an egg, and that Leda finding this egg fat on it, and hatched Castor and Pollux, and Helena. Others say (94), that Jupiter not being able to succeed with Nemesis, made Venus assume the form of an eagle, and changed himself into a swan, which fled before that eagle. He rested himself in the lap of Nemesis, and was received very kindly: the fair Lady embraced him, and fell asleep. The counterfeit swan taking advantage of this sleep, enjoyed her; and because he did so in the shape of a bird, order required that Nemesis should lay an egg. Mercury took this egg, and carried it to Lacedemon, where he threw it into the lap of Leda. Thus sprung the beauteous Helena; and this was the reason why Leda took her for her daughter. Nemesis autem, ut quæ avium generi esset juncta, mensibus actis ovum procreavit, quod Mercurius auferens detulit Spartam, & Leda sedenti in gremio projecit, ex quo nascitur Helena, cæteras corporis specie præstans, quam Leda suam filiam nominavit (95). Antonius (96) has followed the distinction, which has been made between Nemesis and Leda.

Istos tergemino (97) nasci quos cernis ab ovo Patribus ambiguus & matribus asserere natos. Hos genuit Nemesis: sed Leda puerpera forvit: Tyndareus pater his, & Jupiter. Hic putat bic scit.

That is,
“ These whom you see spring from the tripple egg,
“ were born of doubtful fathers and mothers. Nemesis
“ was their mother, but Leda was their nurse: Tyn“ dareus and Jupiter were their fathers: the one of “ them thinks so, the other knows it.”

Here is a good number of authors for this opinion; but there are as many, who affirm, that Leda was the true mother of Helena. The same Hyginus, whom I have quoted, having said, that there was also a tradition, that Jupiter, being turned into a swan, lay with Leda, adds, that he had nothing to determine in that point; de quo in medio relinquitur (98). This was because he saw as many reasons on one side as the other. Theon of Alexandria remarks, that Jupiter in the shape of a swan lay with Nemesis, according to some, and with Leda, according to others; and that Helena, Castor, and Pollux were born of the egg, which Leda laid (99). Pausanias, who, as we have seen, reports the tradition concerning Nemesis, relates in another place (100) that concerning Leda, and observes also, that a monument was to be seen in the temple at Lacedemon (101); for there hung from the roof of it an egg by a ribbon, which passed for that of Leda. He acknowledges the two metamorphoses of Jupiter into a swan, the one with regard to Nemesis, the other with regard to Leda. Κύκλῳ γινόμενῶν τῆς Νεμίσως κόλπος κατέφυσε τὴν δὲ πάλιν ἐρωσθεὶς Λέδαν ἐνύμφευσεν (102). This being the case, there is no doubt but that he supposed, that Helena proceeded from this second metamorphosis. Euripides, in the tragedy of Orestes, expressly asserts, that Leda was the mother of Helena, and he gives the latter the epithets of ὀρθόγυος and κικλόπυρος, which declare the metamorphosis of Jupiter into a swan. I do not make use of the authority of Plutarch; for by the egg of Tyndarus he might understand that which Mercury cast into Leda’s lap. In reality he observes, that this egg fell down from heaven (103). So that Hadrian Junius ought not to have alledged Plutarch in defence of this second opinion. Ovid has been cited, since he introduces Leda lying under the wings of a swan. Ovidius quoque Ledam recubantem facit sub olorinis alis (104). Lucian (105), and the Scholiast on Homer (106), might have been cited. This Scholiast mentions a thing omitted by many others; which is, that the egg, which Leda laid, and which she put in a chest, produced there, Castor, Pollux, and Helena, without being hatched.

To reconcile these two opinions Junius supposes, that Nemesis and Leda are the same person, and he quotes for this purpose Lactantius (107) and the Scholiast of Euripides, and Germanicus. The words of the last mentioned writers are very express. Cygnum dicunt inter aspra constitutum eo quod Jupiter in Cygnum transfiguratus evolaverit in Rhamnum Atticæ regionis, ibique compresserit Nemese quæ & Leda dicitur, ut refert Crates tragædiarum scriptor, quæ enixa est ovum, unde nata est Helena (108). i. e. “ They say that the “ swan was ranked among the stars, because Jupiter “ being changed into a swan, flew into Rhamnus “ in Attica, and there compressed Nemesis, who is “ also called Leda, according to Crates the Tragic “ Writer; and this Lady laid an egg, whence sprung “ Helena.”

I shall not conclude this remark without observing, that Jupiter, who owned for his sons a great many boys, who were born from his commerce with women, acknowledged only Helena for his daughter. I mean the daughters which sprung from his amours with women. It is Isocrates who tells us this (109). I pass over those, who pretend that Helena was the daughter of Venus, or of the Sun and Leda (110).

[P] The inventions ascribed to her most faithful maid-servant are a brand of infamy on her.] It is said, that she invented I know not what postures, and that she even wrote upon this subject. I shall express my self more clearly in Latin in the words of Leonicus Thomæus. Aftyanassa quædam nomine, says he (111), inter Helene ministras & famulas fuisse commemoratur, quæ dominam à Theseo primum, postea à Paride raptam semper prosequuta est: banc in Venerea palestra primam complures reperisse figurarum modos omnis perhibet antiquitas. Voluminibus quinetiam quibusdam editis de variis concubitus generibus perscripsisse narratur, quam postmodum Pbilenis & Elephantis pervulgatissimæ mulieres sunt insequuta, quæ bujusmodi de rebus non minus accurate, quam turpiter conscripta commentaria reliquerat. If this be true, it reflects a great deal of ignominy upon the memory of Helena; for it is probable, that if the servant gave lectures to her mistress, the latter informed her of their effect, and that by this means Helena and Aftyanassa united their endeavours to perfect these shocking inventions. I have read in Photius (112), that Aftyanassa stole an embroidered girdle,

(99) Theon, Alexandrin. in Arateis commentariis, apud Hadr. Junium, Animadv. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(100) Lib. 3. pag. 97.

(101) Hadrian Junius thinks, without grounds, that Pausanias places this temple in the city of Amyclæ.

(102) Socrat. in Helena Encomio.

(103) Τὸ Τυδάειον οὐκ εἰς πρῶταις ἀγασσῆσι οὐρανοποιεῖται ἀναρῶνται. Plutarch. Sym- quoque Ledam recubantem facit sub olorinis alis (104). Lucian (105), and the Scholiast on Homer (106), might have been cited. This Scholiast mentions a thing omitted by many others; which is, that the egg, which Leda laid, and which she put in a chest, produced there, Castor, Pollux, and Helena, without being hatched.

(104) Hadr. Junius, Animadv. lib. 1. cap. 15. Here are Ovid’s words: Fecit olorinis Ledam recubare sub alis Metam. lib. 6. ver. 109.

(105) In Dearum Judicio, pag. m. 170. tom. 1.

(106) In Odyss. lib. 7.

(107) Infit. lib. 1. cap. 21.

(108) German. Cæsar, in Arateis Phenomenis, pag. m. 116.

(109) In Encomio Helene.

(110) Ptol. Hephaest. apud Photium, pag. 480.

(111) Nicolaus Leonicus Thomæus, de Noværia Historia, lib. 3. cap. 31. He likewise cites Suidas.

(112) Photius, ex Ptolem. Hephaest. pag. 480.

(91) Tarsifius for Statinus, in Carmine de Rebus Cypriacis, apud Hadrianum Junium, Animadv. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(92) Pausanias, lib. 1. pag. 32.

(93) Interpretes Callimachi apud Hadrianum Junium, Animadv. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(94) Hygin. Astronom. lib. 2. cap. 8.

(95) Hygin. lib. 1. pag. 56.

(97) This word shows that Antonius speaks also of Helena, and that we ought not to say as Hadrian Junius has done, Anim. lib. 1. cap. 15. Consentit & Antonius Poeta de Castore & Polluce loquens.

(98) Hygin. Astronom. lib. 2. cap. 8.

beauty must have lasted a prodigious time [2]; and it must be said, that the Greeks and Trojans fought with each other ten years for the possession of an old woman. This would make them very ridiculous; but they would not fail to be so, though we suppose her dle, which Juno had obtained of Venus to give it to Helena; but that Venus took it away from that servant.

[2] If the authors . . . had been good Chronologers, her beauty must have lasted a prodigious time.] It is said, that Helena and Castor sprung from the same egg. We may therefore reasonably suppose, that Helena was a woman grown when the Argonauts went to Colchos; for her two brothers Castor and Pollux distinguished themselves in this famous expedition. Let us suppose her twenty years old at least; that is not too much. Let us not take advantage of the mistake of Eusebius; I shall speak of it below. Let us take the most exact Chronology. There are reckoned about thirty years between this expedition and that of Troy: Helena was therefore fifty years old, more or less, when Paris stole her away. The siege of Troy continued ten years, and it was in the last year of that siege that Agamemnon and Achilles quarrelled. We must fix in the time succeeding this quarrel, the admiration with which the Counsellors of Priam (113) were struck at her divine beauty. Here is Helena therefore at sixty years of age forcing by her extraordinary lustre of beauty a whole Senate to confess, that she deserved, that two powerful Nations should ravage each other for ten years' out of regard to her. Is not this very wonderful? Paris being killed some time after, there arose a very warm contest between his brothers, who should marry his widow. Priam ordered them to try the issue by a combat, and promised her to him who should gain the victory. Deiphobus fought the best of all, and had Helena given him. Ἀλεξάνδρου τοῦ ἐπιφανέως ὑπὸ Φιλοκλήτους, Πρίαμου τὸν Ἑλένης γάμον ἰσαθλοῦ Ἰθάκης τῷ ἀριστιύσαντι κατὰ τὴν μάχην. Διφροβῶ δὲ γενναῖον ἀγωνισάμενον Ἰθήμεν αὐτῇ. ἡ ἱστορία παρὰ Λυκόφρονος (114).

(113) I have already mentioned what they said, remark [A] citation (7).

(114) Scholiastes Homeri in Iliad. lib. 2. ult. ver. 251.

(115) His name was Helenus. See Photius's Bibliotheca in the Extracts of Coson, pag. 441.

(116) Lucian. in Gallo, Oper. tom. 2. pag. m. 251.

(117) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 14.

(118) Τὴν μὲν φάσι ἐμμεν ἀγέρον. Quintus Calaber, lib. 10. ver. 312.

(119) In Father le Moine's Peintures Morales.

(120) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter 114. pag. 14 tom. 12.

(21) He speaks of an ugly old woman, who was become beautiful.

(122) Ovid. Met. lib. 15. ver. 232.

One of his brothers (115) was so enraged at being excluded, that he left Troy, and contributed his utmost efforts to the ruin of his country. Does not this prove, that at the age of sixty Helena was still a prodigy of beauty? Lucian proves, that at the time of the siege of Troy she was an old woman, and almost as old as Hecuba. Εἶδον γὰρ Λευκὴν μὲν τινα καὶ ἐπιμήκη τὸν τράχηλον ὡς εἰκάζειν κύνου θυγατέρα εἶναι. τὰλλα δὲ πάλιν ἠλικιωτέην σχεδὸν τῆς Ἑκάβης (116). "neck, so that one might have conjectured her to be born of a swan; but she was an old woman, and almost as aged as Hecuba." She would have been much older than Hecuba, if it were true, as is said (117), that Hercules was the last child of Jupiter. Our astonishment at so aged a beauty would cease, if we could believe what is related, that Helena by a peculiar prerogative was exempt from the severe necessity of growing old (118): but this is not generally allowed. "It is said, that Helena, towards the end of her life, as often as she saw herself in her glass, fought for herself there with amazement, and complained of time, which had been her third ravisher, and had stolen Helena even from Helena herself." I have read this in the book of a Jesuit, whose style is very affected (119). Another modern author relates this almost in the same manner (120). "She, whom you speak of, deserves to be regarded with such an eye as yours. You will soon see there another change very opposite to that (121), which has given you so much admiration. A few years will make you remark this; the same that made Helena weep at her glass, and obliged her to call Time her third or fourth ravisher, for the number is not certain. A strange kind of rape, in which we see Helena stolen from Helena herself; and her, whom three parts of the world, which were the whole at that time, acknowledged for the most beautiful woman of the age, seeking her face in a glass, which represented to her nothing but what was frightful." This thought is very like that in two verses of Ovid, Flet quoque ut in speculo rugas conspexit aniles Tyndaris, & secum cur sit bis rapta, requirit (122).

I ought to remark, that if we follow the Chronology of Eusebius, we shall find that Helena had lived above a Century, when Paris stole her away; for, according to Eusebius, the expedition of the Argonauts was eighty nine years before the taking of Troy. He saw plainly the miscomputation of the Greek writers; upon which he proposes this objection to them: Si inter Argonautas fuerunt Castor & Pollux, quomodo potest eorum soror Helena credi, quæ post multos annos virgo rapitur à Theseo (123)? i. e. "If Castor and Pollux were among the Argonauts, how can Helena be thought to be their sister, who many years after being a virgin was stolen away by Theseus?" Consider well the remark of Scaliger upon this Latin passage. In Græcis, says he (124), ἡ μήτηρ μὲν πολλὰ ἔτη παρθένος ἀπαύζεται. Sive culpa librariorum, sive quod verosimilius, Hieronymi proferantia accidit, ut negatio in latina interpretatione expressa non sit, omnino ridicula sententia efficitur. Nam quo remotior fuerit raptus Helenæ eo credibilior erit. Contra quo propior his temporibus eo remotior à Trojæ excidio, ideoque minus credibile Helenæ tempus in hujus sæculi tractum incidisse. i. e. "In the Greek it is thus: who not many years after being a virgin was taken away. By the error of the Transcribers, or more probably by the hurry of St. Jerom it has happened, that the negative is not expressed in the Latin Translation, and the sentence is rendered absolutely ridiculous. For the more remote the rape of Helena was, the more credible. On the other hand the nearer it was to those times, so much the more remote from the siege of Troy; and therefore it is less credible, that the age of Helena fell into this period of time." This criticism appears to me to be very erroneous; and the more I examine it, the more I am surprized. I do not deny, but that the negative particle, the suppression of which is an error of St. Jerom, according to Scaliger, may make good sense; but I cannot comprehend, that the sense would be ridiculous by suppressing the negative; on the contrary Eusebius's objection seems more intelligible to all sorts of readers without the negative particle, than with it. Eusebius's design is to prove, that those who have asserted that Castor and Pollux, the brothers of Helena, were in the Argonautic expedition, and that Theseus stole away Helena when she was young, have been inconsistent in their Chronology. If Castor and Pollux, says he, were of the number of the Argonauts, how is it possible to suppose, that they were brothers of Helena, who was stolen away young by Theseus many years after? The most stupid readers perceive the force of this objection without having occasion to reason much, and without being obliged to have recourse to any thing but the words of Eusebius. But if we suppose with Scaliger, that Eusebius expresses himself in this manner; If Castor and Pollux were of the number of the Argonauts, how can we persuade ourselves, that they were the brothers of Helena, who was stolen away young by Theseus a few years after? Every one sees, that in order to discover it to be an objection, we ought to remove from before our eyes the words, which contain it, and to have recourse to the reasonings and calculations which we find in the subsequent pages; for if we consider only Eusebius's expressions, we should imagine that he reasoned ill, and what he urges for proof, infers the contrary to his design.

(123) Euseb. in Chronic. num. 756.

(124) Animadv. in Eusebium, num. 756. pag. m. 47.

FAULTS of Scaliger.

Here are some other words of Scaliger, which do not appear to me just. Ab hoc tempore (125), says he, (125) That is, from the number of Eusebius; but I am surprized, that Scaliger did not observe that Eusebius had before spoken of the Argonautic expedition under the number 746. (126), ad excidium Ilii, anni sunt LXXIX. ut Helenam admodum anam fuisse oportuerit, si Argonautica hoc tempore contigerunt. Nam adultis Castoribus, Helenam quoque maturam viro fuisse necesse est. Quod si Argonautica hic collocentur, tempore excidii Iliaci Helena fuerit major annorum CXX. Hoc est quod objicit Eusebius & merito. i. e. "From this time to the destruction of Troy there are seventy nine years, so that Helena must have been a very old woman, if the Argonautic expedition happened at this time. For if Castor and Pollux were of adult age, Helena must have been fit for marriage. If the Argonautic expedition be fixed here, at the destruction of Troy, Helena (125) That is, from the number 756. of Eusebius; but I am surprized, that Scaliger did not observe that Eusebius had before spoken of the Argonautic expedition under the number 746.

(126) Animadv. in Eusebium, pag. 46.

her mistress of all the beauty ascribed to her by the Poets. See in Herodotus the value which ought to be set upon a woman who suffered herself to be run away with [R]. There are very different opinions concerning the children of Helena. Some say, that she had only daughters (f); others affirm, that Menelaus had four sons by her (g). They speak likewise of a son whom she had by Achilles (b). She had by Menelaus the fair Hermione, and by Paris a daughter, who was named Helena, and whom Hecuba put to death. The father would have had her named Alexandra; but upon the mother's opposing it, they were obliged to cast lots, who should give her the name. Helena won, and gave her daughter her own name (k). Helena's necklace has been much talked of [S],

(b) See the article of ACHILLEA, citation (c).

(i) Ptol. Hephaest. apud Photium, pag. 480.

(k) Idem, ibid. as

(f) Stephanus, Voc. Aἰγύς.
(g) Scholiast. Homeri, & Eurathius in Iliad. lib. 3.

“ Helena must have been above a hundred and twenty years old. This is what Eusebius objects, and that justly.” If there were seventy nine years, says Scaliger, between the Argonautic expedition and the destruction of Troy, Helena must have been above a hundred and twenty years old at the taking of that city. What consequence is this! Is it worthy of the great Scaliger? Is it necessary, that a woman should be above forty years old, that we may say with propriety, she is fit for marriage, matura viro? This is the expression of the author, whom I am confuting.

He has succeeded much better in his Criticism upon Eusebius's Calculations; for it is not true, that the Argonautic expedition and that of Troy were so distant from each other as Eusebius imagines. But it is certain, that Eusebius has followed very eminent writers; and consequently I might maintain, that if the antient authors, who speak of Helena, had been good Chronologers, her beauty must have lasted a prodigious while, even beyond a Century. Let us consider a little the computation which Clemens Alexandrinus borrowed from Apollodorus and some other celebrated Historians. In one place (127) he tells us, that there were thirty eight years from the time when Hercules began to reign at Argos, after the expedition of the Argonauts, to his deification; and that Castor and Pollux were deified fifty three years after Hercules, about the time of the taking of Troy. This is reckoning ninety one years between the Argonautic expedition and the destruction of Troy, and making Helena an hundred years old, more or less, at the time when Paris stole her away as a perfect beauty. In another place (128) the same father makes a computation, by which there are sixty eight years between the rape of Helena by Paris and the Argonautic expedition.

(127) Clemens Alexandr. lib. 1. Stromat. pag. 322, ex Apollodoro.

(128) Ibid. pag. 356.

[R] See in Herodotus the value which ought to be set on a woman, who suffered herself to be carried away.]

Herodotus in tracing up the first origin of the wars, which had continued so long between Europe and Asia, acknowledges the Asiatics to have been the aggressors, because they had carried away Io the daughter of Inachus King of Argos (129). The Europeans (130), who stole the daughter of the King of Tyre, did it only by way of reprisals. They did not stop there; they undertook another rape, that of Medea the daughter of the King of Colchos. This Prince demanded satisfaction for the injury; but he was answered, that they would not give him any, since they had never received any on account of Io. The rape of Helena was undertaken by way of reprisals; and when the Greeks demanded her to be returned, they were answered that they were treated in the same way as they had used the Asiatics, when they had demanded Medea. They were not satisfied with this answer; they raised a great army, and went to destroy the Kingdom of Priam. This is what the Persians urged to justify their wars; they pretended, that the expedition against Troy gave them a right to consider the Europeans as enemies, and treat them as such. They disapproved the violence of those, who stole a woman; but they reckoned those as fools, who gave themselves the trouble of recovering her, and as wise men those, who despised her, on condition that no women were taken away but those who were willing. As for us, said they, we never troubled ourselves about those Women, who were stolen out of Asia; the Greeks began the war on the account of a Woman of Lacedemon. Τὸ μὲν γὰρ ἀρκάζειν γυναικάς, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἀδικεῖν ἕνεκα νεμεζίνου εἶναι, τὸ δὲ ἀρκάζειν σπυρδὴν ποιήσασθαι τιμωρίαν, ἀποστῆναι, τὸ δὲ μηδὲμίαν ὄνην ἔχειν ἀρκασθῆναι, σαφρότητα. διὰ τὸ δὲ ὅτι οὐ μὴ αὐταὶ ἰβουλίατο, ἢ καὶ ἂν ἠπάροστο. σφίσι μὲν δὲ τὰς ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίας λέγουσι Πέρσαι ἀρκάζειν τῶν γυναικῶν λόγῳ ἕνεκα ποιήσασθαι (131). It will be proper to place here the following observation of Isocrates; the Trojan War, says he, was of prodigious use to Greece; a great many things were invented in it; they began to render Europe superior to Asia. Before this war the Barbarians made conquests upon the Greeks. Helena was the cause, that things took another turn; for after that war the Greeks took cities and provinces from the Barbarians (132).

(129) Herodot. lib. 1. iust.

(130) They were Cretans.

(131) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 4.

We must not omit the Passage of Euripides, where Peleus speaks so many Truths to Menelaus. He reproaches him chiefly with two gross faults; the first, in having treated his wife, as if she had been honest; the second, in having raised troops to recover her. You left her, says he, to her own conduct, and without giving orders to have your doors shut, and leaving servants to look after her, and went away just as if Helena, who was the most vicious of her sex, had been the most chaste.

(132) Isocrat. in Encomio Helenae, sub fin.

Ἄλλος ἄδολα δόμοσ' ἰσῆς λιπὸν,
Ὡς δὲ γυναικὰ σάφρον' εἰς δόμοις ἔχον,
Πατρῶν κακίστω (133).

(133) Eurip. in Andromacha, ver. 593. pag. 518.

She went away with a young stranger, and you, for love of her, cause all Greece to take arms: you ought on the contrary, after having experienced the infidelity of your wife, to have left her where she was, and even to have paid a tribute to prevent her ever setting her foot within your house.

Ἦν χρεὶν σ' ἀποστῆσαι, μὴ καὶ ἄλλο
Κακῶν ἰσορροπῆσαι, ἀλλ' ἰὼν αὐτῇ μόνω,
Μισθόν τε δόντα, μὴ ποτ' εἰς οἶκον λαβῆν (134).

(134) Idem, ibid. ver. 607.

Menelaus answers very mildly, that his wife's adventures had been involuntary, and the work of Heaven (135), and that from thence had arisen great advantage to the Greeks (136), who had begun to learn the art of war at the siege of Troy. He confirms the observation of Isocrates.

(135) See the beginning of the remark [T].

[S] Helena's Necklace has been much talk'd of.] Menelaus preparing for the Expedition against Troy, was at Delphi with Ulysses to consult the Oracle, and dedicated Helena's necklace there. Τότε δὲ Μενέλαος μὲν τῇ προοίᾳ (137) Ἀθηναῖοι, τὸν τῆς Ἑλλάδος ὄρον ἀνίστηεν ἐν Δελφοῖς (138). The Oracle commanded him to do so, and promised by this means revenge upon the ravisher. Athenæus (139) has preserved the Oracle's answer: it consists but of three verses, and informs us, that this necklace was of massy Gold, and that Venus gave it to Helena. When the Phocæans plundered the Temple of Delphi in the 106 Olympiad, this necklace was part of their booty; but it produc'd a strange effect; the Lady, who got it, became an infamous prostitute (140). She left her house to run over the World with a young Epirot, whom she was fond of (141). It was a very active contagion, or a manner of punishment very unworthy of the Gods, to whom Menelaus had dedicated it. It would have been proper to have punished with a natural, and not with a moral Evil, the presumption of that Woman, in seizing the spoils of so sacred a Place. See the Remark [C] of the Article ÆGIALEA.

(136) Eurip. in Andromacha, ver. 681. pag. 522.

(137) Meursius instead of προοίᾳ would have it read προοίᾳ protemplari. See his treatise de Regno Laconico, pag. 22. where he refers to his Lectiones Asiaticæ, lib. 2. cap. 17. concerning the true Epithets of Minerva προοία & προοία.

(138) Eustathius ad Odyss. lib. 3.

(139) Athen. lib. 6. pag. 232.

(140) Diod. Sic. lib. 16. cap. 65.

(141) Athen. lib. 6. pag. 233.

Observe, that some say, that the Lady, who had this necklace, was already a Woman of loose Character. It is said, that the wives of those, who plunder'd the Temple, disputed who should have the necklace of Helena, and that of Eriphyle, and that they were obliged to decide the Contest by Lot. Eriphyle's necklace fell to a woman of cruel disposition, who afterwards kill'd her Husband: the other fell to a Woman of great beauty, but very lascivious (142).

(142) Idem, ibid.

as likewise her Crater, and the Nepenthes, which she gave Telemachus, the son of Ulysses, to drink [T]. It is said also, that being upon the point of being sacrificed,

[9] . . . as likewise her Crater, and the Nepenthes which she gave Telemachus the Son of Ulysses to drink.] The Crater was a work of Vulcan : it was a Marriage-present, for when Pelops was married, Vulcan gave him it. Menelaus being descended from Pelops received this as part of his inheritance, and lost it when Paris stole away Helena together with the jewels and moveables of his host. But it is said, that Helena threw this beautiful present into the sea near the Isle of Cos, and that it being taken up in the net of some Fishermen, there arose a dispute, which was at last determined by dedicating it to Apollo. According to the Author, who informs me of this, it was a Tripos

(143) Diog. Laertius, in Tbalette, lib. 1. num. 32.

(144) Menag. in Laert. ibid. Meursius in Lycopbr. pag. 272.

(145) In Callandra, ver. 854.

(146) Apolog. pag. m. 294.

(143) ; however the Commentators (144) pretend that Lycophron, Diogenes Laertius, Apuleius (145) and Philostratus have meant the same thing. Now Lycophron calls it ταμώσιον κρατήρα ; and here are the words of Apuleius (146) : Nunquam apud eum (Homerum) marino aliquo & pisculeno medicavit nec Proteus faciem, nec Ulysses scrobem, nec Æolus follem, nec Helena CRATEREM, nec Circe poculum, nec Venus cingulum. i. e. " In Homer we never find, that Proteus used any " thing from the sea or of fishes to enchant his face, " or Ulysses the ditch, or Æolus the bellows, or Helena the Crater, or Circe the cup, or Venus the girdle." As for Philostratus, here is what he says in the Epistle dedicatory to his Lives of the Sophists. Τὸ δὲ φρόνημα τῦτο ἀμεινὸν ὑπέστην, καὶ τὰ ἀφ' οὗ σοὶ κομισί τῆς γιάμης, ὅστις ὁ κρατήρ τῆς Ἑλλάδος τοῖς Αἰγυπτίοις Φαρμακοῖς. It does not appear to me, that either he or Apuleius speak of a particular Vessel, which belong'd to Helena as an exquisite piece of workmanship. It is plain, that they allude to what Homer relates in the IVth Book of the Odyssey, concerning the Nepenthes ; it is, that Helena, in order to make Telemachus the Son of Ulysses, and the other Guests merry, and to prevent them from thinking of their misfortunes, mixed with their wine a little Nepenthes, which was I know not what, endowed with an excellent vertue.

Ἐρὶ δ' αὖθις ἄλλ' ἴσησ' Ἑλίην Διὸς ἐκφυγαῖαν.
Αὐτίκ' ἄρ' εἰς οἶνον βάλε Φάρμακον, ἵδην ἵπνον, Νηπενθίς τ' ἀχολῆν τε, κικλῶν ἐπιλαθῶν ἀπάλην.
Ὅς τὸ καταβροχθεῖεν ἵπην κρητῆρι μίγξι (147).

(147) Homer. Odys. lib. 4. ver. 219.

Helena had brought this wonderful remedy from Egypt. Polydamna the wife of Theon had taught it her. Homer says nothing about the vessel, which contained this mixt wine ; and therefore Apuleius and Philostratus consider only the vertue of Nepenthes, and consequently do not speak of the beautiful vessel mentioned by Diogenes Laertius, I mean the marriage-present, which Pelops received of Vulcan, &c. You may recollect here what I said in the first remark, where I mention a cup, which Helena offered to Minerva ; and if you would know why I made use of the barbarous term Crater, I shall tell you, that it was because the words glass, cup, bowl, goblet, do not express what was meant by Crater in Homer's time. Crater was a large vessel not to drink out of, but only to mix water with wine in it . . . and from this vessel the wine thus mixed was poured into pots, and then into drinking-cups (148). Observe, that the vessel mentioned by Diogenes Laertius was thrown into the sea before the Siege of Troy ; and that mentioned by the other Writers was in Menelaus's possession during that war.

(148) Meziriac jur Ovide, pag. 286. where he proves this, and censures Amiot and Vigenere, who have translated Crater by vase or coupe.

An instance of the effects of the spirit of digression.

I ought not to omit, that some learned men have chosen the Nepenthes of the Odyssey for the subject of their lucubrations and meditations. They have made a great many conjectures, and raised a great many hypotheses. See Peter Petir's Dissertation intitled Homeri Nepenthes, printed at Utrecht 1689 in 8vo. We find in it both genius and learning. The Author mentions a Civilian of Naples, who has treated of the same subject, and abandoned himself to all the excesses of a spirit of digression. I shall cite this description, because it represents very clearly the affectation of amassing together all that a man has read, and because we may see in it a great many crude imaginations relating to Nepenthes. Non morabor hic studiosos variis questionibus, ut Petrus la Sena, an Nepenthes ex eorum numero esset *medicamentorum quæ chimica arte parantur, an simplex quid & solius naturæ proprietate efficax. Ut scilicet habeat occasionem, quæ de artis ejus origine & antiquitate legerat, effundendi : qua in disputatione plures onerat paginas, abutiturque patientia lectorum. Nec minus inanis & superflua operæ arguendus, cum tam sollicitè de gemmarum viribus disserit, ceu non satis ex Homeri descriptione constaret Nepenthes plantis esse annumerandum, quod ipse postea fatetur. Cum etiam professus non esse hominis frugis, tempus tereve investigando, an forte hæc Helenæ potio (verba ejus refero) μωγικῶς, hujusmodi curatationis efficaciam retinuerit, multa nibilo secius subjungit de Magia Ægyptiorum, veterumque Medicorum incantationibus, locaque Homeri profert ex Odyssea, quæ ad magiam pertinere existimantur, eorum scilicet testimonio, qui, ut Plinius lib. 30. cap. 50 refert, Proteæ & Sirenium cantus apud Homerum non aliter intelligi voluerunt. Tum multa interponit de cratere Helenæ, captata occasione sermonis ex quodam Cælii Rhodigini loco. Et quid magis ἀπωροδιόωρον, quam de Clematide Ægyptia dicere, quo scommate Zenonem Cittizæum solitum peti, quod procerò gracilique & fusco corpore esset, tradit Laertius ? His igitur (inquam) quæ nihil ad rem attinent, prætermittis, aio Nepenthes fuisse unum e terra nascentibus ; quoddam scilicet herbæ aut virgulti genus (149). (149) Petrus Petrus in Homeri Nepenthes, cap. 3. init. pag. 6.*

i. e. " I shall not amuse the studios here with various questions, as Peter la Sena has done, whether " Nepenthes be one of those medicines, which are " prepared by Chemistry, or whether it is a simple " medicine, and operates merely by the property of " its own nature. This he has done merely that he " might have an occasion of throwing out what he had " read concerning that art and the antiquity of it, in " which disputation he loads a great many pages, and " abuses the patience of his readers. Nor is he guilty " of a less impertinent and superfluous labour, when " he examines so carefully into the virtues of gems, " as if it were not sufficiently clear from Homer's " description, that Nepenthes is to be ranked among " the plants, as he afterwards owns. Besides after he " has declared, that it is wrong to spend one's time " in enquiring, whether perhaps this potion of Helena " retained its efficacy by magic, he notwithstanding " treats of the magic of the Egyptians, and the incantations of the old Physicians, and produces passages out of Homer's Odyssey, which are supposed " to relate to magic, that is, in the opinion of those, " who, as Pliny observes B. XXX. C. 50. would " have the story of Proteus and the Syrens Songs in Homer understood in that manner. He introduces likewise a great many things concerning Helena's Crater, upon occasion of a passage in Cælius Rhodiginus. And what is more impertinent than to speak " of the Egyptian Clematis, which was a jest, that, " according to Laertius, was commonly cast upon Zenon Cittizæus, because he was a tall thin man of a " brown complexion ? To pass by these observations, " I say, which are nothing to the purpose, I assert " that Nepenthes was a production of the earth, either a kind of herb or sprig." The Chevalier de Meré imagines, that Nepenthes is nothing else but the charms of Helena's conversation. Here is the manner in which he expresses himself in a discourse addressed to a Lady. " Tho' Homer does not expatiate upon Helena's eloquence, notwithstanding he " speaks so largely of that of Ulysses and Nestor ; " yet he gives us to understand by a mystery of Poetry, that it was a pleasure to hear her speak ; and " here is in a few words what led me to think in that " way. Ulysses was a long time after the taking of " Troy unable to return to his Island of Ithaca. His " son Telemachus was in great anxiety ; and in order " to know whether he was living or not, he went to " visit Nestor, who could not inform him what was " become of his father. Upon this the youth went " from thence to Menelaus, where he saw Helena, " and supped with her. He being very melancholy, " that Princess pitied him, and made use of a charm " to make him forget all his uneasiness. This charm, " says Homer, was a liquor, which she poured into " the wine before it was brought to the table, and this " mixture was so potent, that after having tasted it, " it ficed, a miracle saved her [U]; and they have endeavoured to excuse her adulteries, by alledging, that the Gods forced her to them [X]. The Pagans have employed such suppositions upon so many occasions, that it will not be impertinent to enquire what might serve them as a motive to reason in that manner. This is what I design a remark for [Y]. Some say, that when she cut off her hair upon an occasion of mourning,

“ it was impossible for a person to shed a tear all that day. She had likewise an admirable secret, which she received from the graces. You know, Madam, that there is no Lady, that can imitate the sound of your words; but if she had observed you, she would have assumed so perfectly your voice and manner, that she would have been taken for you (150).”

(150) Cheval. de Meré, Discours des Agremens, pag. 140. edit. de Hollande.

[U] A miracle saved her.] It was this. A severe pestilence ravaged the city of Lacedemon. The Gods declared, that health should be restored, provided that a young Lady of quality was sacrificed every year. The lot fell upon the beautiful Helena; but as she was led to the altar, an eagle came, and took away the knife; and laid it upon an heifer. This was the occasion of Helena's life being spared (151).

(151) Plutarch. in Parallelis, pag. 314.

[X] They have endeavoured to excuse her adulteries, by alledging, that the Gods urged her to them.] I have already touched this point (152); but there is something wanting. If some say, that Venus managed the affair of stealing her away, to shew her gratitude to the judge, who had given her the prize in the contest about beauty; others affirm, that she did it to revenge an affront. Menelaus had promised her an hecatomb in case she should obtain Helena; but having gained his wish, he did fulfill his vow. Venus was provoked; and to punish him, procured his wife to be carried away (153). Others carry the affair much higher: they pretend (154), that Tyndarus forgot Venus in a sacrifice, which he offered to all the Gods, and that as a punishment for this contempt, Venus procured that the daughters of this Prince should be twice or thrice married, and leave their husbands. What is pleasant is, that the same Goddess, who had precipitated Tyndarus's daughters into these disorders, reproached him with their adulteries. It is said, that these reproaches affected him so much, that in revenge he ordered fetters to be put upon her feet. Pausanias cannot be induced to believe, that Tyndarus would be so ridiculous, to imagine, that he could revenge himself upon Venus by ordering a statue to be made, which he called by her name, and binding the feet of it with chains. But in this point the Historian did not understand his own religion. He did not know that upon many occasions the Pagans discharged their resentments upon the temples and statues of the Gods, whom they thought to be the authors of their ill success (155). And in reality is it not an affront to a Prince, to abuse his pictures and statues? Remember Theodosius's indignation against the city of Antioch; nothing was more provoking to him than the outrage done to the statue of the Emperors during the sedition. See the history of him written by Monfr. Flechier (156). For the rest, I shall remark, that when I spake of the reproaches cast upon Tyndarus by Venus, I only related the sentiments of some Moderns, who have been misled by the translation of Pausanias: it is certain that the Greek text does not intimate that this Goddess reproached Tyndarus in that manner. Those, who understand Greek, will see that I am not mistaken. Τὸ γὰρ δι' ἴτερον λόγον, ὡς τῆν Θεὸν αἰδέαις ἐτιμωρῶτο ὁ Τυνδαρίωνος γυνήσθαι ταῖς δυσχερασίαι ἐξ Ἀφροδίτης ἡγεμῶν τὰ ἰουδὴν, τῆτοι δὲ ἐδὴ τὴν ἀρχὴν περισημαί: ἢ γὰρ δι' ἀνάλασσιν ἰνθῆς, κίθου ποιησάμενοι ζῶδιον κ' ὄνομα Ἀφροδίτην διμῶσι, ἐπιτίξιν ἀμυνίσθαι τὴν Θεόν. That is, according to Amasius's translation, Nam Deam ulcisci voluisse compedibus (sunt enim qui hoc etiam memoriae prodiderint) exprobrantem (157) illi filiarum adulteria, ut credam, adduci non possum. Quam enim ridiculum, si putasset ab effigie, quam à cedro fecisset Veneris nomine, injectis compedibus pœnas expeti posse (158).

(152) In the remark [I].

(153) Ptol. Hæphæst. apud Photium, pag. 480.

(154) See the article ÆGIALEA, quotation (10).

(155) See Penfessur les Cometes, num. 132.

(156) Pag. 341, 342. ad ann. 387. Dutch edit.

(157) These equivocal words, but which signify more evidently the reproaches made by Venus, than those made to Venus, have misled some authors.

(158) Here is the manner in which it ought to be translated, according to Sylburgius, Nam profecto solidum omnino foret, facto à cedro simulacro, & Veneris nomine ei indito, putare se hoc ratione ulcisci.

(159) Euripid. in Androm. ver. 680. pag. 522.

[Y] This is what I design a remark for.] Menelaus answering the severe reproaches of Peleus, declared, that Helena's will was not the cause of the adventures which she had undergone, but that we ought to have recourse to the will of the Gods.

Ελῆν δ' ἰμύχθησ' ὑχ' ἰπῶσ' ἀλλ' ἐκ Θεῶν (159).

This was a language very common among the Pagans. They ascribed to Fortune, that is to the Deity, not only their ill success, but even their faults. This excuse, or this wretched consolation, seemed always ready; they had immediate recourse to it. Plutarch informs us of this, when he cites some verses, which contain a thing, said by a father to a son, and the son's answer:

Souvent mon fils les habitans des cieux Font trebucher les hommes foucieux.

That is,

“ The inhabitants of heaven, my son, frequently make “ anxious men fall.”

The answer was:

Il n'y a rien pour sa faute excuser Si à la main que les Dieux accuser.

That is,

“ He has nothing to do in order to excuse his faults, “ but to accuse the Gods.”

I make use of Amiot's version, and shall remark by the by, that the epithet foucieux, which he has inserted in the second verse is a word, which the necessity of the rhyme extorted from him, and which has no foundation in the original. Compare a little the Greek with the French translation; you will see that I am in the right.

Πολλ' ὃ τίκων σφάλουσιν ἀνθρώπους Θεοί. Τὸ πᾶσον ἰπᾶς, αἰτιώσασθαι Θεός (160).

(160) Plutarch. de audiendis Poetis, pag. 20, D.

You will imagine, perhaps, that the great facility, with which complaints were formed against the Gods, led men to make use of this subterfuge without examination and reflection, and that it was one of these first motions, which rise in our minds before we have had time to prepare ourselves for judging of things. But it is certain, that upon many occasions we speak thus after mature deliberation. Those who do not examine to the bottom what passes within themselves, are easily persuaded, that they are free, and that if their will is inclined to evil, it is their own fault, it is thro' a choice, of which they are masters. Those who form another judgment are persons, who have carefully studied the springs and circumstances of their actions, and have well reflected upon the progress of the motions of their mind. These persons generally doubt of their free-will, and come even to persuade themselves, that their reason and mind are slaves, which cannot resist the force that hurries them whither they are unwilling to go. Now it was principally this sort of people, who ascribed to the Gods the cause of their ill actions. They remembered, that they had well considered, that they were in a way pernicious to their fortune, and scandalous to their character, and that they had made many efforts to subdue the passion, which led them into it; but they were still more sensible, that all these efforts were ineffectual, and that reason, though a thousand times called upon, and vows and prayers had been a very weak assistance. They concluded therefore, that a secret cause and a superior force pushed them on, and hurried them away; that the Gods in short, were the cause, both of the passions, which they felt, and of the pernicious and criminal consequences of these passions. Here is the unravelling of the knot: there is something divine here, said they, just as there is in the diseases of the body, which baffle the skill and experience of the most able Physicians. We know what ought to be done, what would be of most advantage to us, most convenient, and most honourable; and yet we follow the contrary course. This comes from the Gods. It is to Jupiter, that Persius the Poet addresses himself to desire his assistance, that tyrants may own the power of virtue, and feel the shocking remorse of not having followed it.

Magne

*Magnus pater divum, sevos punire tyrannos
Haud alia ratione velis, cum dira libido
Moverit ingenium ferventi sincla veneno :*
Virtutem videant, intabescantque relicta (161).

(161) Perf. Sat.
3. ver. 35.

Plutarch mentions a poetical sentence, which shews that they reasoned in this manner : those who know what is right, do not perform it; the Gods therefore are the cause of it. I shall give the Greek in the margin (162), and here follows Amiot's translation.

(162) Αἱ εἰ τὸ δὴ
ἴδῃ θεῶν ἀνθρώποις κακόν, ὅτι ταῦτ' οὐκ ἴδῃ τὰ γαθόν, χρεῖται
δὲ μὴ. Plutarch.
de audiend. Poe-tis, pag. 33, E.

*Làs! c'est un mal envoyé des hauts Dieux,
Quand l'homme fait & void devant ses yeux
Le bien, & fait néantmoins le contraire.*

Medea reasoned in this manner, when she found, that she could not resist the passion, which she had conceived for Jason; that she could not, I say, resist it, tho' she saw plainly the shameful and criminal consequences of her conduct, and though her reason condemned them.

*Concipit interea validos Ætias ignes,
Et luctata diu, postquam ratione furorem
Vincere non poterat; Frustra Medea repugnas, Nescio quis deus obstat, ait (163).*

(163) Ovid. Me-
tam. lib. 7. ver. 9.

*Excute virgineo conceptas pectore flammæ,
Si potes, infelix. Si possem, sanior essem;
Sed trahit invitam nova vis: aliudque Cupido,
Mens aliud suadet. Video meliora, proboque Deteriora sequor (164).*

(164) Idem, ibid.
ver. 17.

" Mean while Ætias fries in secret fires,
" Who struggling long with over-strong desires,
" When reason could not such a rage restrain,
" She said, Medea, thou resist'st in vain:
" Some God, unknown, withstands.

" These furies from thy virgin breast repel,
" Wretch, if thou canst. Could I, I should be " well.
" A new-felt force my striving pow'rs invades;
" Affection this, discretion that persuades.
" I see the better, I approve it too;
" The worse I follow."

SANDYS.

She says to herself all that could cure her of this passion: she represents to herself the enormity of the crime, which she should commit; and there were some moments, in which these ideas of her duty were ready to gain the superiority; but the sight of Jason easily suppressed all that they had done.

*Conjugiumne putas? Speciosaque nomina culpæ Imponis, Medea, tuæ? Quin aspice quantum
Aggrediare nefas; & dum licet, effuge crimen.
Dixit, & ante oculos rectum pietasque pudorque
Consulerant, & victa aibat jam terga Cupido.
Ibat ad antiquas Hecates Perfidios aras,
Quas nemus umbrosus, secretaque sylvæ tegebat:
Et jam fractus erat, pulsusque resederat ador,
Cum videt Æsoniden, extinctaque flamma reluxit (165).*

(165) Idem, ibid.
ver. 69.

*Sic jam lentus amor, quem jam languere putares,
Ut videt juvenem, specie præsentis inarsit (166).*

(166) Idem, ibid.
ver. 82.

" Call'st thou him husband? wilt thou then thy " blame,
" Medea, varnish with an honest name?
" Consider well what thou intend'st to do;
" And while thou maist, so foul a crime eschew.
" Thus she; when honour, piety, and right
" Before her stood, and Cupid put to flight.
" Then goes where Hecate's old altar stood,
" O'ershadow'd by a dark and secret wood.
" Her broken ardor she had now reclaim'd;
" Which Jason's presence forthwith reinflam'd.

" So sickly love, which late appear'd to die,
" New life assum'd from his inflaming eye."

SANDYS.

An infinite number of persons of both sexes, who are not mentioned in History, have been in the same case. Love has made them commit a thousand disorders, of which they so evidently saw the scandal and inconvenience, that they endeavoured to prevent them, by calling in reason to their aid, and putting up a thousand wishes to be freed from love. It was natural that they should conclude, that they were not the cause of their ill conduct, since they had a reasonable mind, a soul that was free and mistress of its will. This first conclusion led them to another, that an external cause superiour to all their powers urged them on: the second conclusion led them on to a third, that a deity was the external and necessitating cause. Here is the original of the pretending divinity of Venus and Cupid; and because men find that jealousy, envy, avarice, drunkennes, desire of revenge, and many other passions make them commit a thousand things, which reason condemns, and which are even contrary to the true interests of self-love, and which one would not wish, it was believed, that the Gods were the instigators of these things. The blame was not therefore cast upon them for want of reflection, but because men reflected very carefully upon what passes in the mind. If the Pagans had had the just notions of God, which we have, and which represent him to us as a being perfectly holy, they would have been preserved from this rash judgment; but as they ascribed to the Gods the same faults, to which mankind are obnoxious, there was nothing to hinder them from thinking, that the Gods forced men into evil, and render'd ineffectual all the lights of their reason, sometimes by a previous flattering view of pleasure which necessitated the will, at other times by importunate pain, which was attended with the same consequence. Paris pleased Helena: Jason pleased Medea. They did not think of an union with those objects without feeling beforehand an incredible satisfaction; they could not consider themselves as separated from them without feeling before hand an exquisite dissatisfaction. These impressions did not depend upon their liberty, and were no more subject to them than the agreeable or disagreeable sensation, which we have in tasting honey or gall. All that these two women could do was to oppose to these two fore-tastes reason and duty, weak arms, if Paris and Jason continued to excite the same ideas and impressions; since in that case they would sooner or later captivate the will, and force its consent, however desirous it might be not to submit, and to pass from love to indifference. Useless are the wishes, weak the velleities, in the presence of those fore-tastes, which I have spoke of, and the cause of which arises not from ourselves. Whence comes it then? The Pagans in vain fought for it on the right hand and on the left; they could not find it on earth, and for that reason ascribed it to the Gods. They might do this two ways, either by supposing a Cupid, who wounded the heart, or that the author of the human body had adjusted the parts of it with such art, that the body of Jason, for instance, would excite in Medea's heart and head those motions of the spirits, upon which love mechanically and inevitably depends. According to this latter principle, if Helena or Medea became amorous, it was to be ascribed to him, who formed and arranged the parts of their bodies, just as if a chamber smokes, when the wind blows, it must be imputed, not to the wind, but to the Mason, who built the chimney.

This was an abyss, which the Pagans could not How involuntary most of the passions and their consequences are. extricate themselves out of, and they unavoidably fell into it, as often as they endeavoured to account for the contrariety to be met with between what we do, and what we know; and consequently they must fall into it very frequently; for human life is scarce any thing but a continual contest between the passions and the conscience, in which the latter is almost always overcome. What is most strange and odd in this contest is, that Victory declares very often for the side, which shocks at once the ideas, which men have of right, and their knowledge of their temporal interest. I am willing to think, that there are some people of such a brutal stupidity, that they do not see, that their life would be more happy, if they did not nourish in their breasts mourning [Z], this did not lessen her beauty. A French author pretends, that she had a great deal of wit and eloquence, and was as much beloved for these qualifications as for her beauty (l) [AA].

(1) See citation (150).

HELIODORUS

breasts the passions, which they indulge there; but I cannot comprehend, but that most of the jealous and envious must be well convinced, that an exemption from jealousy and envy would be an incomparable advantage to them in this world, and worthy to be purchased with its weight in gold. A woman jealous of her husband or her gallant, a man jealous of his wife or mistress, are extremely sensible of their misfortune, and passionately wish to be delivered from that torment. They do all they can to expel their fury, which persecutes them: they employ, in order to undeceive or to deceive themselves, all the reasons which their mind is able to suggest; but in spite of all these efforts jealousy subsists. They find themselves, to their great regret, more ingenious to invent what foment it, than what would weaken it. We may say almost the very same of the envious. They know well enough, that their self-love would find its account incomparably better in being content with their condition, and seeing with pleasure the prosperity of another, than in afflicting themselves at the success of a neighbour, who grows richer than themselves; and yet in spite of this conviction they chagrin themselves, and pine away, when they see the good fortune of others (167); and instead of rejoicing, as they ought to do for their own sake, are reduced to seek some remedy in the meanest treachery. They impede by calumny and perfidy the affairs of their neighbour: by these methods they endeavour to abate the malignant fever, which preys upon them. What could a Pagan Philosopher say upon this point? Would not he be obliged to acknowledge a superior cause within, and to rank all these persons among the fanatics, engurgement, enthusiasts, and those in general, who were thought to be agitated by a divine fury (168)? Observe, that Ovid supposes, that the jealousy, which Aglaura, the daughter of Cecrops, King of Athens, conceived against his sister, was infused into her by a deity (169). The Christian system is the only one, which can resolve these difficulties. It informs us, that since the first man fell from the state of innocence, all his descendants have been subject to such a corruption, that without supernatural grace they are necessarily slaves to sin, inclined to do evil, useless with respect to every thing that is good (170). Reason, Philosophy, the ideas of right, the knowledge of the true interests of self-love, all these are incapable of resisting the passions. The government which was given to the superior part of the soul over the inferior, has been taken away from mankind, since the fall of Adam. It is in this manner that divines explain the change produced by sin: but as most metaphors ought not to be stretched beyond a certain point, we must not abuse this; for it would not be reasonable to say, that in the state of innocence the inferior part was in the same condition, as it is at present, but that no disorder could arise, since the superior part could always restrain it in time. This would be supposing, that the human machine, when it came out of the hands of its Creator, would have been actually determined towards sensuality and criminal passions; and this would be doing injustice to the perfections of the supreme being.

[Z] She cut off her hair upon an occasion of mourning.] What I have to say upon this text was communicated to me by a Professor of Geneva (171). I shall make use of his words. "The subject of the first letter in the collection of John Michael Brutus is diverting. Victorius, who writes to John della Casa, pretends that Helens, in order to shew her sorrow for the death of Clytemnestra her sister, cut off her hair to the roots, but that this did not prevent her continuing very beautiful still. And Monsignor della Casa is of opinion, that she cut off only the ends, as is done sometimes to hinder them from branching; and there are produced upon this subject some verses of an ingenious poem of that Archbishop, addressed to Count Galeazzo de Florimont, in which that prelate frankly owns, that he had not quitted the world but very superficially; and that he had thus imitated Helena, who sacrificed to the sorrow of " her sister's death only the extremities of her locks.

" The Poetry is noble.

" Ut captâ rediens Helena cum conjuge Troiâ
" Lento homine, atque animi lenis, nimiumque remissi,
" Incidit in cædem ipsam, & funus prope sororis,
" Quam præceps miseri virtus jugularat Orestis,
" Succisam de more comam misera sepulto
" Germanæ cineri, fertur dempsisse capillo
" Vix tandem è summo paulum, ne forte placeret
" Tonsa minus metuens Spartanis improba mæchis.
" Haud aliter, Galatæe, malis erroribus uelut
" Nuper ego, & Phrygiis nautas Paridemque secutas
" Aufugi longè, atque idem, rediit tamen ut mens
" Ad sese, peregrè nimium remorata protervæ
" Ornamenta fugæ sensum lenteque repono, &c.

" When Helena from ruin'd Troy return'd
" With Menelaus to their native home,
" Hearing the fate of poor Electra, slain
" By mad Orestes, and by custom forc'd
" Her hair to offer at her sister's grave,
" She clipt the ends alone, lest thorn too close,
" The Spartan debauchees should like her less:
" So I, O Galeazzo, lately lost
" In mazy errors, following Paris' crew,
" When reason reasum'd her power, repent at last,
" By slow degrees correcting what's amiss."

The fashions of head-dresses might be diversified in such a manner, that the charms of the face might not suffer any diminution by the loss of the hair. But in general it is certain, that this loss is reckoned an accident very formidable to Beauty. See the Remark [G] of the Article of ANACREON.

[AA] A French Author pretends, that she had a great deal of wit and eloquence, and was as much beloved for these Qualifications as for her beauty.] This French Author is the Chevalier de Meré. He proves by two eminent instances, that women ought not to depend too much on their beauty, or men on their good mien; and that it is the address and turn of wit, which do almost every thing, provided that the person have nothing shocking (172). Cleopatra furnishes him with the first instance. She had no great share of beauty, says he (173), "and as the world spoke of her, she was not so beautiful as to surprize one at first; but when one came to consider her, there was a charm in her; and it was by her delicate behaviour that she held Cesar three or four years enchanted. . . . As a certain proof that it was on the account of her wit, that this Princess was so much admired, we may observe that Anthony, who knew how to choose as well as Cesar, never saw her till she was of an age, when few women continue beautiful, and became so deeply in love with her, that he chose rather to renounce the Empire of the world, than to lose the sight of her." Here is his second instance.

" Helene par même voye
" Aux rares beautez de son corps
" Ajoustant de l'esprit les aimables thresors,
" Causa l'embracement de Troye.
" Si son esprit n'eust eu des charmes
" Ce peuple n'eust jamais voulu,
" Contre le droit des gens d'un pouvoir absolu,
" Pour la garder prendre les armes.
" La Grece aussi l'est oubliée
" Entre les bras de son amant,
" Mais elle se souvint de son esprit charmant,
" Et la guerre fut publiée.

" Helen, whose charms of mind improv'd her beauty,
" To Troy prov'd fatal. Had her wit been less,
" The Trojans ne'er had fought to keep her with them,
" And Greece had left her in her lover's arms.
" But as her mind was beauteous as her body,
" Her country thought her worth a tea years war."
" There

(167) Videt ingratus, intabescitque videndo Successus hominum; carpitque & carpitur una; Suppliciumque suum est. Ovid. Metam. lib. 2. ver. 2. 782. He speaks of envy.

(168) Est Deus in nobis; agitante lascivus illo. Impetus hic sacra semina mentis habet. Ovid. Pastor. lib. 6. circa init. He speaks of Poets.

(169) Ovid. Met. lib. 2. Fab. 12.

(170) See the Prayers of the Liturgy of Geneva.

(171) Mr Miantoli, whom I have already mentioned in the remarks [L] and [M] of the article of EPICURUS.

(172) Chevalier de Meré, Discours des Agrémens, pag. 138. Dutch edition.
(173) Ibid. See above remark [A] of the article DELLIUS.

(a) Heliod. Rom. lib. 10, sub fin.
 (b) In Theſſaly.
 HELIODORUS a native of Emeſſa in Phœnicia (a), is better known by the Romance he compoſed in his youth [A], than by the Biſhopric of Trica (b), to which he was afterwards promoted. There are but few perſons that believe he was depoſed by a Synod, becauſe he would not conſent to the ſuppreſſing of that Romance [B]. Nicephorus is the only author who aſſerts it. Socrates (c) relates that Heliodorus introduced the

“ There is great probability, Madam, that her beauty was not alone, ſince all the Gods intereſted themſelves to give her to thoſe who were their favourites; and if ſhe had only had a good face, and a fine ſhape, ſhe would have been but a very indifferent preſent for them. I imagine, that what they valued in her was of more importance; it was her art of pleaſing, and gaining the affections by her converſation (174).” Add to this the words of the ſame author, which I have cited in ſpeaking of Nepentheſ (175).

(174) Chevalier de Meré, Discours des Agrémens, pag. 139.

(175) In the remark [T] at the end.

(176) See upon this point the remark [A] of the article DÉLLIUS, and the Nouvelles Lettres contre l'Hiſtoire du Calvinisme de Maimbourg, pag. 591, & 774.

I do not examine whether he is in the right in the particular fact relating to Helena; but it ſeems to me in general, that his maxim is true (176). Beauty without the charms of wit and converſation is of no great force; and if it make conqueſts, it does ſo in the manner of thoſe brave Generals, who immediately ſubdue a Province, but know not how to keep it. The Empire of the Fair is maintained at leaſt as much by the charms of wit as by thoſe of the face. There are two kinds of graces, which ſtand in need of each other, and render one another mutual good offices. Abſurd and ridiculous diſcourſes diſguſt extremely, if the beauty of the perſon did not lend them I know not what charms. Certain beauties of the body would make no impreſſion, if the charms of wit were not ſpread over them. Here are mutual aſſiſtances given. But as wit is almoſt always the principal inſtrument in maintaining the conqueſt, and frequently in making it, it may be affirmed to be that which contributes moſt to eſtabliſh the power of beauty. The Poet, who aſſures us that there wants no leſs ſtrength to keep than to gain, (177) Ovid. de Arte amandi, lib. 2. ver. 13.

Non minor eſt virtus, quam quærere, parva tueri: Caſus inſeſt illis; hic erit artis opus (177).

(178) Idem, ibid. ver. 15.

(179) Plus eſt Provinciam retinere, quam facere. Flor. lib. 2. cap. 17. Facilius eſt quædam vincere quam tueri. Q. Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 11. See Freinſhemius's Commentarii upon theſe two paſſages.

is one of the great Legiſlators in the Empire of Love; and he applies this ſentence to the affair treated of in this place. He goes ſtill further; he lets us know, that the acquisition is leſs difficult than the conſecration:

Nunc mihi, ſi quando, Puer & Cytheræa, ſavete: Nunc Erato: nam tu nomen amoris habes. Magna paro: quas poſſit Amor remanere per artes Dicere, tam vaſto pervagus orbe puer (178).

This is likewiſe the opinion of ſeveral Hiſtorians with regard to the progreſs of arms (179).

[A] By the Romance he compoſed in his youth.] It is intitled Αἰθιοπικὰ Ἔθιοπικὰ, and relates the amours of Theogenes and Chariclea. There is an extract of it in Photius (1). Monſieur Huet is of opinion that Heliodorus was with regard to the Romance-writers, what Homer was with regard to the Poets; that is to ſay, that this Biſhop's work has been the ſpring and the model of an infinite number of romances. Eum ſibi ſequentium temporum fabulatores Romanenſes tanquam exemplum propoſuerant ad imitandum, & tam verè omnes dici poſſunt ex hoc fonte, quam Poætæ ex Homericis

(1) Num. 73. pag. 157. & ſeq.

(2) Huet, de Origin. Fabul. Roman. pag. 38.

(3) See Geſner's Biblioth. fol. 301.

(4) Sorel, Remarques ſur le XIII Livre du Berger extravagant, pag. 685.

ſuas, ſic ut dicam, aquas hauſſiſſe (2). The firſt edition of this Romance is, I think, that of Baſil, printed in the year 1534 (a). Optopæus, who dedicated it to the Senate of Nuremberg, aſſerts that a ſoldier preſerved the manuſcript of it, when the Library of Buda was plundered (3). Stanislaus Warſzewicki a Poſiſh Knight is the author of the Latin Tranſlation which was printed with the Greek at Baſil in the year 1551. Amiot began his French Tranſlation with that of this work. Melin de St. Gelais Biſhop of Angoulême (ſ) has turned a great part of it in French Verſe (4). John Bourdelot's Notes upon this Romance are very learned; they were printed at Paris in the year 1619, with Heliodorus's Greek original, and with the Poſiſh Knight's Tranſlation.

[a] The firſt Edition . . . was printed in 1534.] Mr.

Bayle is miſtaken; it was printed in 1533. He is alſo in the wrong when he aſſerts, that Amiot began his French Tranſlations with that of this Romance. For he began with tranſlating ſome of Euripides's Tragedies into French verſe (*). ADD. REM.]

[ſ] If Sorel aſſerted, what Mr. Bayle ſeems to make him ſay here, namely, that Melin de Sr. Gelais was Biſhop of Angoulême, he had conſulted neither Sammarthanus's Elogies, nor the Gallia Chriſtiana; Bayle's Dictionnaire for it was Octavianus de St. Gelais, Melin's natural father, who was Biſhop of that city. He flouriſhed under the Kings Charles VIII and Lewis XII; ſeveral of this Biſhop's Poems are inſerted in the Collection printed in a black letter in 4to, with this title, Verger d'honneur, i. e. “ The Orchard of Honour.”

(*) From the Critical Remarks printed at the end of the Paris edition of Mr. Sammarthanus's Elogies, nor the Gallia Chriſtiana; Bayle's Dictionnaire for it was Octavianus de St. Gelais, Melin's natural father, who was Biſhop of that city.

It is ſurprizing that Mr. Bayle did not obſerve this blunder: it could happen only by ſuch an abſence of mind, to which the moſt learned men are ſometimes ſubject. When he tranſcribed Sorel (†), from whom he borrowed this particular, he did not take notice that this Author was miſtaken; otherwiſe he would have given notice of it, as it is his cuſtom. This was perhaps alſo only an overſight of Sorel; but it is nevertheless a great fault; for it miſſed not only Mr. Bayle, and the Author of the Eſſais de Littérature §, but alſo the celebrated Mr. Fabricius †. Inſtead of Melin de St. Gelais, Sorel ought to have ſaid, Octavianus de St. Gelais, Melin's father, who had really been Biſhop of Angoulême , and who is the perſon meant here. Neither du Verdier ††, nor la Croix du Maine §§, nor any other Author that I know of, mention this Tranſlation in verſe, of part of the Romance of Theagenes and Chariclea, and Sorel is perhaps the only Author who ſpoke of it.

(†) Remarques ſur le Berger Extravagant, liv. 13. pag. 477.

§ Tom. 2. pag. 304. 305. of the Dutch edition.

† Biblioth. Græcæ, tom 6. pag. 787.

 Sammarth. Elogior. pag. 39.

†† Biblioth. François. p. 925.

I ſhall obſerve by the by, that in Beughem's Incunabula Typographiæ (the Infancy of the Art of Printing) p. 176, they have changed this Octavianus de St. Gelais into Octavianus de St. Gervais; which is a ſtrange corruption of names. CRIT. REM.]

[B] There are but few perſons who believe he was depoſed by a Synod, becauſe he would not conſent to the ſuppreſſing of that Romance.] Nicephorus relates, that a Synod having obliged Heliodorus to chooſe, either to burn his Romance, or to reſign his Biſhoprick, the Author choſe rather not to be a Biſhop any longer, than to commit his work to the flames (5). This ſeems to be entirely fabulous; ſuch a ſtrange particular would have been related by ſeveral Hiſtorians; and would not have been tranſmitted down to us only by Nicephorus, a very credulous and injudicious Writer. Quæ omnia eò me facile reducunt, ut diffidam iis maxime quæ addit Nicephorus, ſcriptor credulus, ſapientiæ & fidei non ſatis ſpectata, Synodum ſcilicet provincialem cognito periculo, in quod lætio fabulæ hujus, cui autoris ſus dignitas tantum ponderis & auctoritatis dabat, juvenes ſuaſte natura ad id propenſos & quaſi natantes impelleret, eam ſibi conditionem obtuliſſe, ut aut opus ſuum flammis aboleret, aut ſua dignitate cederet; eumque quod ultimum erat, prætuliffiſſe (6). i. e. “ All this inclines me to queſtion chiefly what Nicephorus adds, a credulous Writer, whoſe judgment and veracity are not much to be depended on: he aſſerts, that a provincial Synod, being ſenſible how dangerous the reading of Heliodorus's Romance was, to which the Author's Rank added a great weight, which was proper to draw in the youth already ſo much inclined and naturally diſpoſed to the peruſing of love-tales, required of the Biſhop, either to burn his book, or to reſign his dignity; which laſt he choſe.”

(5) Nicephorus. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 34.

(6) Huetius, de Orig. Fabul. Roman. pag. 36.

Could Socrates have omitted ſuch a circumſtance in the paſſage, where he obſerves, that Heliodorus wrote a love-tale in his youth; which he intitled Ἔθιοπικὰ. Ὁν λέγουται ποιήματα ἱρωτικά βιβλία, ἀ πρὸς ὧν ἔταξε ἡ Αἰθιοπικὰ προσηγόρευσε: Cujus nomine circumferuntur amatorii libri, quos ille dum juvenis eſſet compoſuit, & Ἔθιοπικος inſcripſit (7). Valeſius does not only explode Nicephorus's account as a mere ſtory, but he does not even believe that this Romance was written by the Biſhop

(7) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 5. cap. 22.

the custom of deposing those Ministers who lay with their wives after their ordination ; which is a probable argument in favour of this Prelate's chastity. It even appears from his Romance that he loved this virtue ; for the hero of his story is so modest, that it gave occasion to some very smart jests [C]. Photius's Translator has not well expressed the praises that are bestowed on the amours of Theagenes and Chariclea ; for the Translation gives us to understand that Heliodorus wrote a Romance of the amours of an husband and his wife [D], which would be very absurd. There is an author who has asserted

Bishop Heliodorus. See his notes on that passage of Socrates. Let us see what the Sieur Sorel said. I cannot believe, that Heliodorus was a Bishop, nor that he was so silly as to choose rather to lose his Bishoprick than to burn his Book, according to the choice that was proposed to him. This is only a mere story ; for if his Book were so scandalous, that they would not give him leave to publish it, they would entirely have prohibited it nevertheless, though he had resigned his dignity : so that he would have been disappointed in his expectation (8).

(8) Sorel, Romans sur le Berger Extravagant, liv. 13, pag. 685.

Sorel had done better to give his opinion without supporting it with any argument ; for that which he alleges has not the least strength. A Book is not read the less for being condemned by a Synod ; it becomes publick notwithstanding such a condemnation, and is commended as it deserves ; so that Heliodorus would not have been disappointed in his expectation, though the Bishops, who put the choice to him, had condemned his Book. Father Vavasseur reasoned better, when he observed, that it was no longer in Heliodorus's power to suppress his work, whence it must be inferred, that the Bishops did not propose to him the conditions we have mentioned. For of what consequence could it be with regard to people's morals ? Neutrum, quantum opinio mea est, vere dicitur. Neque lata Episcopo conditio tam preposterata tamque gravis ; neque ab illo accepta, aut repudiata quoquo modo ; quod ipse, qui narrat, abunde narratione sua refellit. An vero fuit in potestate Heliodori, ut aboleret igni, ac perderet opus suum, aut omnino suppressum teneret, quod jam exisset in vulgus, & manibus omnium evolveretur, quodque juvenum periculo aliquo, damnoque morum, ut vult Nicephorus, legenculo contrivisset (9) ? i. e. " In my opinion neither of these two particulars are true : I cannot believe, that such a preposterous and difficult condition was proposed to him, nor that he accepted it ; as Nicephorus relates, though his very account refutes itself. Was it then in Heliodorus's power to burn his Book, or to destroy it so, as to suppress it entirely, when it was already publick, and in all the world's hands, and the youth had already undergone the danger of reading it to the corruption of their morals, as Nicephorus pretends ?" He adds that Father Petavius did not think this account of Nicephorus deserved any credit.

(9) Vavasseur, de do Ludicra Dictione, pag. 150.

[C] The Hero of his story is so modest, that it gave occasion to some very smart jests. Read the following passage from the Parnasse Reformé ; it is Theagenes that speaks. " If things had been related faithfully, and as they happened, I should have no reason to complain, and would let my Romancer alone. But he gives me the character of an insensible man ; he ascribes to me that kind of modesty, which takes offence at the least freedom, and he will have me give my mistress a slap on the face, rather than suffer her to kiss me. I, said Chariclea, have reasons to complain of that slap on the face you mention ; if it were a shame to give it, it was a greater shame still to receive it ; and the satisfaction you might claim from the Historian, relates to me alone."

Here follows Heliodorus's answer : The slap on the face, at which you are so much vexed, is a proof of your modesty, says he, looking on Theagenes ; it is the effect of such a modesty as is honourable to you ; and by this I have preserved that decency, which the dignity of my character required of me. It is true, replied Theagenes, that as a Bishop (10) you have acted your part very well in that passage ; but you would have kept up your character much better, if you had burnt your Romance, or if you had never had the thought of writing it. Lovers have nothing to do with the episcopal virtues, and a Bishop's gravity does not well agree with the freedom of lovers. A Vestal's chastity does not become Heroes, and their love ought to be free from those scrupulous formalities, which put a damp upon their agreeable raptures and extasies. It must be observed, that it is supposed the Author had nothing to answer against Chariclea's complaint. And indeed, what could he say against so well-grounded an objection ? Is not a romantick Heroine, who designing to kiss her lover, receives a slap on the face from him, a very ridiculous character ?

(10) It is not true that Heliodorus was a Bishop, when he composed this Romance ; he wrote it in his youth, as Socrates asserts.

Thus I finished this remark in the first edition of this Dictionary : I supposed that Monsieur Gueret having shewn a great deal of wit and taste in his Parnasse Reformé, would not have taken a downright falsity of his own invention for the ground of his jokes ; nothing being more inconsistent than this with the rules of criticism and satire (11). Thinking therefore that he could not be guilty of such a fault, I did not in the least doubt but the fact was really as he related it ; for which reason I did not take the pains to examine the original. But as soon as Monsieur Du Rondel had read the remark [C] of this Article, he wrote to me, that the thing did not happen as Monsieur Gueret relates ; he acquainted me with the circumstances of this action, and shewed me, that Theagenes did not deserve the least censure. I have just now read the passage in which Heliodorus relates this story, and have convinced myself with my own eyes, that Monsieur Du Rondel is in the right, and that the Author of the Parnasse Reformé imposed upon the publick, and took the liberty to cast such jests, as deserve rather to be called impostures. Theagenes and Chariclea being separated from each other by such odd strokes of fortune, as are often to be met with in Romances, came about the same time near Memphis. They had not communicated their design to each other ; they did not come the same way ; it happened by chance that Chariclea arrived near the city, when Theagenes was walking about the walls, on a solemn occasion, which afforded the inhabitants a very grand spectacle. She knew him again at a great distance ; for as Heliodorus observes, lovers have a very sharp sight. Ὅθεν γὰρ τὴν πρὸς ἐπίγνωσιν ἰσχυρὰν ὄψιν καὶ κίνημα πολλὰς καὶ ἄγλαυμα μύθων, καὶ ἀπόρρητον ἢ καὶ ἐκ νότον τῆς ὁμοιότητος τῆν φαντασίαν παρίσταν (12). i. e. " Lovers have a very strong sharp sight, the very motion and very air makes them know each other, even at a distance, or when they see one another only behind." She was so moved with seeing that object, that, as though she had been stung by a wasp, she ran in transport to Theagenes, and embraced him round the neck without speaking a word. She was very indifferently dressed, and her face was all dawbed ; so that Theagenes took her for a prostitute, and thrust her back, and as he could not get rid of her, he gave her at last a slap on the face. Χαρικλῆα . . . πέρρωθεν ἀπαγορεύσασα τὸν Θεαγένην . . . ὡπὴρ ὁστρηθεῖσα ὑπὸ τῆς ὄψεως, ἐμμανὲς ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἵεται ; καὶ περιφύσα τῆ ἀύχην ἀποῖξ ἔρχετο καὶ ἐξήρητο, καὶ γυροῖς τισὶ κατασπάξτε θρήνοις ὁ δὲ, ὡς ἴκος, ὄψιν τε ῥυπώσαν καὶ πρὸς τὸ ἀγχιότερον ἐπιτεθυμμένη [ιδῶν] καὶ ἰδῶτα τετύχημένην καὶ κατηργημένην, ὡσπερ τινὰ τῶν ἀγνησῶν, καὶ ἀλιδῶς ἀλητῆν, διωδιῖτο καὶ παρηγωνίζετο καὶ τέλος ἐπιθεῖ εἰς τοῖς ὡς ἐνοχλῶσαν καὶ τῇ θεῖα τῶν ἀμοφί Κωλάσῃν ἐμποδῶν ἱσαμένην, καὶ διηράπιζεν (13). But as soon as he found it was his dear Chariclea, he embraced her tenderly (14). It is plain from all this, the Reformer of Parnassus had altered the very substance of the fact, by which all his jests and raileries became insipid and absurd. Chariclea received indeed a slap on the face, but it cannot in justice be asserted that Theagenes gave Chariclea a slap on the face ; he imagined he was only slapping one of those women, whom we stile Gipsies. You may apply to all this what the Civilians and Casuists observe concerning that sort of ignorance or error, which is innocent.

(11) Compare this with what is observed above, in the remark [C] of the article COLOMIES.

(12) Heliodorus lib. 7, pag. 317, edit. Paris. 1699.

(13) Heliodorus lib. 7, pag. 311, edit. Paris. 1619.

(14) Idem, ibid. pag. 312.

[D] The Translation gives us to understand, that Heliodorus wrote a Romance of the Amours of an Husband and his wife. Here follow the Translator's words. Dramatis hujus argumentum Auctori præbuere Theagenes & Chariclea caste inter se ac pudice amantes, cum ultro citroque jactati errarunt, & capti etiam identidem, fidentem asserted that Heliodorus was not a Christian; but his assertion seems to be grounded on very weak arguments [E]. Monsieur Huet (d) does not in the least doubt but the author of this Romance was the Bishop of Trica who lived under the Emperor Theodosius; but he thinks it cannot be proved that the Bishop Heliodorus, to whom St. Jerom wrote some letters, was this Bishop of Trica; yet he thinks also, that it would not be an easy matter to refute those who should assert it. If it were true that Heliodorus was deprived, we should have here a remarkable instance of an author's affection for his works. There is a modern writer who is acquainted with some persons, that would have done, what the Bishop of Trica is said to have done [F].

(d) De Origine fabularum Romanensium.

dem tamen CONJUGALEM constanter seroaurunt. i. e. "The subject of the story is taken from Theagenes and Chariclea, who loved each other chaitly and modestly, and who wandering up and down the world, and being sometimes taken prisoners, yet kept the CONJUGAL faith constantly to each other." There is in these words a tamen, yet, which is wrong, and an addition of the Translator. Photius did not argue so ill as to say, that though Theagenes's and Chariclea's misfortunes made them wander through several Countries, and caused them sometimes to be taken prisoners, yet they did not engage in new amours. It is easy to understand that such an unsettled life, with the unhappinefs of being sometimes in prison, is rather a reason why the Hero should not forsake his mistress, nor the Heroine her lover, than a reason why they should fall in love with some other object. Infidelity in love is much less surprizing in persons that lead an easy and quiet and happy life. But the greatest blunder of the Translator is his saying, that they kept constantly the conjugal faith to each other. How can that be, since they were not married? It is not the custom for lovers in Romances to marry but at the end of the Book; and thus Heliodorus's Romance ends. See in the margin a true Translation of Photius's words (15). It was a great while since Oplorpæus had made the blunder I have mentioned. CONJUGALIS amoris ac fidei & constantiæ pulcherrimum exemplar in Theagene & Chariclea adumbravit (16). i. e. "He has given us a noble instance of conjugal love and fidelity, and of constancy, in the characters of Theagenes and Chariclea."

(15) Ἐστὶν αὐτῷ ἢ τοῦ δράματος ὑποθέσει Χαρι- κλεία καὶ Θεα- γένης, εὐφροσύνη ἀλλήλων ἰρασταί, καὶ πάλιν τού- τω, καὶ ἀρχιμα- λασία παντοδραμῆ καὶ φουλακῆ τῆς σωφροσύνης. Sum ipsi argu- mentum dramatis Theagenes & Chariclea pudice inter se amantes, & eorum errores, ac captivitas om- nimoda, & custo- dia castitatis. Photius, num. 73. pag. 157.

(16) Oplorpæus, Epist. Dedicat. apud Gesner, Biblioth. folio 301.

(17) Sorel, Re- marques sur le Livre XIII du Berger Extrava- gant, pag. 685.

(18) See a Dis- sertation of Bal- zac at the end of his Socrate Chré- tien. You will see there amongst other things, that St. Jerom makes St. Paul to be descended from Agamemnon, and that Synesius boasted he was descended from Hercules.

lieve that his family was really descended from the Sun, but he might imagine, that he must distinguish it by that mark. This was a title by which his family had been known a long time, and which was honourable to him. And though the principle was false, yet one might infer from it some consequences favourable to his family with regard to its antiquity. Such a mo- tive might engage a Christian thus to distinguish the nobility of his extraction. Add to this that Heliodorus was not yet a Bishop when he wrote his Romance. He was still in all the mettle of youth; and as he did not put his name to his work, he might with more liberty make his descent known by the ancient tradition of his family.

[F] A modern writer was acquainted with some per- sons, who would have done what the Bishop of Trica is said to have done.] The modern writer I mean is Father Va- vassieur. He does not believe what Nicephorus relates; it appears childish to him, either with regard to those who put such a choice to Heliodorus, or with regard to the choice itself, which that prelate is said to have made. Lepida vero optio data præfati, utrum saluum vellet, jacularemne librum, quem scripsisset olim, an amplissimum sacerdotium, cui tum præcesset. Lepidius etiam judicium & electio episcopi, sacrae dignitatis jactura com- mune & pervagatum scriptoris nomen redimentis (19). Yet (19) Vavassior, he asserts that he knows some persons, who are so de Ludicra di- cti- onis, pag. 149- much in love with their own works, that they would choose rather to lose the best livings in the kingdom, than to renounce the reputation which they imagine they deserve by their works. Cujus tamen factum ne magnopere vituperetur, aut ne reprehendatur ex toto, nonnulli obstant, quos ego scio, si isto loco essent, feretque potestas eligendi; hoc idem & amplius facturos; talesque partus ingenii, qualia Heliodori Æthiopica sunt, non Thraciæ modo, sed optimis Galliæ sacerdotiis omnibus anteposuros, & loco graduque, & quavis dignitate ces- suros potius, quam laboris, & industriæ, & bonæ exist- imationis fructum hunc qualemcumque amitterent (20). (20) Ibid. pag. 150. i. e. "Yet this action of his ought not to be too much despised, nor absolutely condemned; for I knew some persons who would do the same, and even more still: it was thus in their power to choose; they would prefer such an ingenious work, as Heliodorus's Æthiopicks are, I do not say, be- fore any benefices of Thrace, but before all the best livings in France; they would resign their places, posts, and dignities, rather than lose this fruit, whatever it be of their labour, and study, I mean their reputation."

HELOISE, the concubine, and afterwards wife of Peter Abelard; a Nun, and after- wards Priores of Argenteuil; and lastly, Abbess of the Paraclete, has made so much noise, that she deserves an article of some length in this Dictionary. She had an uncle, by the mother's side, named Fulbert [A], who was a Canon of Paris, and had a tender affection

[A] She had an uncle, by the mother's side, called Fulbert.] This is the only very certain particular I have found, with regard to the genealogy of Heloise; I therefore did not say, that she was related, in a legitimate way, to the ancient family of Montmorenci. I have indeed read this in the apologetical Preface of Francis d'Amboise (1); but as he does not cite any author on this occasion, and as Andrew du Chesne (2) makes no mention of it, I look upon the truth of it to be very doubtful; particularly as Heloise owns, in her Letters, that her family had been greatly honoured by her marriage with Abelard, and that this last had married very much beneath himself. Quanto amplius te pro me humiliando satisfecerat, & me pariter & totum genus meum sublimaverat, tanto te minus tam apud Deum, quam apud illos proditores obnoxium pœnæ reddide- ras (3). Papyrius Masso (4) asserts, that Heloise was (3) Pag. 51. the natural daughter of one John, Canon of Paris. Andrew du Chesne has reason not to lay any stress on this, (4) Annal. lib. 3. since the author does say whence he borrowed that cu- rious circumstance; but then he has no reason to op- pose to this Annalist, the Calendar of the Paraclet, in which the following words are found: VII Cal. Ja- nuar. obiit Hubertus (5) Canonicus Dominae Heloise (5) This must be Fulbertus. "twenty sixth of December:" for what can be easier than to reconcile Papyrius Masso and this Calendar? May not a young woman be bastard to one Canon, and niece to another Canon? But once again, he who says that Heloise was the natural daughter of one Ca- non, affection for her. He took the utmost care of her education ; and as she had a very fine genius, she soon made so great a progress, that her reputation flew to all parts of the Kingdom [B]. She also was pretty handsome [C]. There was at that time in Paris a famous Doctor, who read public Lectures with prodigious reputation. This was Peter Abelard, the most subtle Logician of his age, and who began to bring Philosophy and scholastic Divinity in vogue. He enjoyed all the fame and splendor which a person of his profession could wish for or desire ; he had a vast number of pupils ; he was thought to be a very great master ; he got a great deal of money ; but did not make love to any woman, which he thought was a great flaw in his fortune. In order therefore to complete his felicity, he thought that he should entertain a fond passion, and he made choice of Heloise for his mistress. We gave elsewhere (a), the reasons which prompted him to make this choice ; and in what manner he got into the Canon's house, as tutor to Heloise. Honest Fulbert had flattered himself with the hopes that his niece, under so great a master, would make a wonderful progress in the Sciences ; but she learnt nothing non, John, without quoting any author for it, will not deserve credit. If there is reason to suspect any Canon on this occasion, it should be Fulbert rather than any other ; for the fondness which Abelard declares he had for Heloise, is so little found in uncles (6), and resembles so very exactly the affection of the fondest fathers ; that there is some room to imagine, that Fulbert acted like a multitude of others, who cannot be fathers according to the Canons ; they conceal that nearer relation under the title of uncle, and accordingly bring up their own children under the name of nephews. This is what one might suspect ; but yet it ought not to regulate the stile, nor hinder us from giving persons the names and titles under which they were known to the public. Fulbert, in a book, ought never to be mentioned under any character but that of uncle. It is to be observed, that according to Papyrius Masso, the Canon who brought up Heloise, and caused Abelard to be castrated, was named John. This Historian therefore does not pretend, that Heloise was niece to a Canon, and natural daughter of another Canon. He pretends that the Canon, whom all other authors call Fulbert, and whom they consider as Heloise's uncle, was her father, and named John. Joannes Canonicus Parisius Heloisam naturalem filiam habebat præstanti ingenio formaque (7).

(1) Ad Oper. Abelardi. (2) Notis, ad Hist. Calamitat. Abelardi.

(a) In the article ABELARD.

(6) See the testimonies cited by Lambinus on these words of Ode 12. of Book 3. of Horace, Mituentis patrum in verba lingua.

(7) Papyr. Masso, Annal. lib. 3. pag. m. 256.

[B] She made so great a progress, that her reputation flew to all parts of the Kingdom. Let us hear Abelard. Qui (Fulbertus) eam quanto diligentius diligebat, tanto diligentius in omnem quam poterat scientiam literarum promoveri studuerat. Quæ eam per faciem non esset infima, per abundantiam literarum erat suprema. Nam quo bonius hoc, literariorum scilicet scientiæ, in mulieribus est rarius, eo amplius puellam commendabat, et in toto regno nominatissimam facerat (8). i. e. "As Fulbert loved her most affectionately, he took care to have her instructed in all kinds of literature. And as she was not the lowest among her sex with regard to beauty, she was the highest with respect to learning. For as erudition is very rarely found among women, it added to the glory of Heloise, and made her very famous all over the Kingdom." In that age, a young maiden, with a very small share of erudition, might pass for a miracle. This the reader must observe, in order not to amplify the idea that is formed of our Heloise ; and yet it must be looked upon as certain, that she deserves a glorious place among the very learned women. She was skilled, not only in the Latin tongue, but also in Greek and Hebrew. Abelard declares this also, in the Letter which he wrote to the Nuns of the Paraclet. Magisterium habetis in matre, quod ad omnia vobis sufficere tam ad exemplum scilicet virtutum, quam ad doctrinam literarum potest, quæ non solum Latina, verum etiam tam Hebraicæ quam Græcæ non experti literaturæ, sola hoc tempore illam trium linguarum adeptam peritiam videtur, quæ ab omnibus in beato Hieronymo tanquam singularis gratia prædicatur (9). Francis d'Amboise relates (10), that Heloise satisfied in a very subtle manner St. Bernard, who asked her, why the Nuns of the monastery of the Paraclet, in their repeating the Lord's Prayer, did not say, panem nostrum quotidianum, but panem nostrum supersubstantialem. Heloise gave him a reason for this, taken from the originals, and observed to him, that they must follow the Greek version of the Gospel, which St. Matthew had wrote in Hebrew. I know not whether such an answer would have

(8) Abelard's Oper. pag. 10.

(9) Ibid. pag. 200.

(10) Præfat. Apologæ.

pleased St. Bernard ; however I do not doubt but it might have puzzled him, and obliged him to quit the dispute. I could wish with all my heart, that this incident were true ; for it would be an instance of a woman's puzzling a great author, on a controversial point, by quoting the Greek text. I therefore was very sorry, I confess, when, on consulting the Letter (11) cited by Francis d'Amboise, I found that Heloise had no hand in it ; and that the whole remark is Abelard's, who wrote on that account to St. Bernard, after Heloise had informed him of the exceptions, which were made to the panem supersubstantialem. However, be this said without prejudice to the learning of that Abbess. If any one should imagine, that she did not acquire learning till after she had confined herself to a cloyster, I would refer them to a Letter of Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Clugni, which declares that she had made a very great progress in literature before she embraced a monastic life. *Nequid, says he to her (12), metas adolescentiæ excesseram, necdum in juveniles annos evaseram, quando nomen non quidem adhuc religionis tuæ, sed honestorum tamen et laudabilium studiorum mihi fama innotuit. Audiebam tunc temporis mulierem, licet necdum sæculi nexibus expeditam, literariorum scientiæ et studio secularis sapientiæ summam operam dare, quo efferendo studio tuo et mulieres omnes evicisti, et pene viros universos superasti. i. e. "When I was but a lad, the fame, not indeed as yet of your sanctity, but of your polite and laudable studies, reached me. I was informed that a woman, although not withdrawn from the avocations of the world, did nevertheless apply herself in the most intense manner to Letters, and to the study of human literature ; by which vigorous pursuit you not only surpassed all your own sex, but almost all ours." The Monk of Auxerre affirms, that she was well skilled in Latin and Hebrew ; and the Calendar of the Paraclet says of her : Heloise mere et premiere Abbessé de ceans, de doctrine et religion très-resplendissante (13). i. e. "Heloise, mother and Abbess of this Monastery, most illustrious for her erudition and piety."*

(11) It is the 5th of lib. 2.

[C] She was pretty handsome. I find that a great number of authors declare Heloise to have been a miracle in beauty ; but ought they to be credited rather than Abelard, who, having more reason to amplify rather than lessen the perfections of Heloise, contents himself with saying, that she was not the last of her sex in beauty, but was the first in erudition ; cum per faciem non esset infima, per abundantiam literarum erat suprema ? Would a person express himself in this manner, when he was speaking of a finished beauty ? Could a lover, whose business it is to justify his choice, and the violence of his passion, employ such a rhetorical figure ? Some (14) observe, that Heloise was eighteen years of age when Abelard debauched her ; but I have not found this circumstance in any antient author. It is true indeed that the word adolescens, which Abelard employs (15), may very well suit the age of eighteen. That of juvenula which Heloise made use of (16), agrees also with the same age ; but nothing can be concluded from such a proof. It is a chimæra to assert, that Abelard, in his romance of the rose, drew Heloise's picture under the name of Beauty (17) ; that romance not being writ till after his death.

(12) Vide Oper. Abelardi, pag. 337.

(13) See Andrew du Chefne's Notes, on Abelard's Letter de Hist. Calamitat. pag. 1137.

(14) Histoire abrégée d'Elouise et d'Abelard, Hague 1693.

(15) Operum, pag. 10.

(16) Ibid. p. 47.

(17) The author of the Histoire Abrégée, above cited, says thus.

nate, that it extinguished all sensations of honour in her mind [I]; it took such deep root, and distracted her to such a degree, that she could never erase it [K]. It was to no

I say nothing of the filth and perpetual ill smells, which are inseparable from young children. Quis facris vel philosophicis meditationibus intentus pueriles vagitus, nutricum quæ hos mitigant nœnias, tumultuosam familiæ tam in viris quam in fœminis turbam sustinere poterit? Quis etiam in bonis illas parvulorum sordes

(36) Oper. Abelardi, pag. 14.

secure themselves from these several inconveniencies, by the diversity of apartments they have in their houses; the expences and cares of each returning day cannot give them any uneasiness; but it is not so with Philosophers; and whosoever is desirous of heaping up riches, and employs himself in worldly employments, makes himself incapable of discharging the duties of the Philosopher and Divine. Observe the conduct of the ancient Sages, as well under the Pagan System, as among the Jews; and if Heathens and laymen have preferred a single life to marriage, would it not be a great shame for a Clergyman and Canon as you are, to prefer sensual reasons to divine offices? But tho' you should have no great regard to the prerogative of the ecclesiastical character, at least maintain the dignity and character of a Philosopher. Heloise concluded her sermon with saying, that it would reflect greater honour on him, and be more delightful to her, for Abelard to be her gallant rather than her husband. That she would be united to him, not by the necessity of the conjugal tie, but by the sole affection of her heart; and that their pleasures would be infinitely more exquisite, should they see one another but now, and then. We shall expatiate on this last reason in the remark [U]. In the mean time here follows Paquier's reflection on Heloise's words, I will not, says he (37), represent to you all the arguments she employed to bring him over to her opinion; but this I can affirm, that I never read, in any Orator, so many elegant expressions and persuasive sentences, in order to gain a point, as were employed by Heloise. I must inform my readers, that I have very much curtailed the remonstrance of our fair-one; and was surprized that she did not employ some reason, from her lover's being in Orders (38). Does not this seem to prove, that it was not yet believed, that Ecclesiastics were bound to lead a single life?

(37) Recberch. de la France, liv. 6. cap. 17.

(38) I mean, that she did not allege, that persons in orders are forbid marrying.

[I] The passion with which she was fired, . . . extinguished all sensations of honour in her mind. The passion of love will very often stifle or surmount the sensations of conscience; but it is very rarely observed to suppress a sense of honour; and, if we except a small number of persons of low-birth, who, for the most part, have not even had a common education bestowed upon them; all young girls, who yield to Cupid, generally put one of the four strings following to their bow: They hope, either that they shall not be got with child; or otherwise, to procure a miscarriage by some medicament; to lie in unknown to every one; or to prevail with their spark to marry them; and this shews, that if love is sometimes the strongest tyrant in their hearts, it is yet such a tyrant as leaves honour in possession of its rights. See the famous Sonnet de l'Avorton (on the untimely Birth) the author of which has so strongly represented the power of honour and the power of love, alternately conquerors and conquered. Our Heloise's love raged to that excess, that she no longer valued honour or reputation; for in the first place, she was overjoyed to find herself with child; Non multo autem post puella se concepisse comperit, & cum summa exultatione mihi super hoc illico scripsit, consulens quid de hoc ipse faciendum deliberarem (39); and secondly, she did all that lay in her power, to prevent the marrying the man who had got her with child; two things, which are not only more rarely found than the most dreadful monsters, when they are joined together; but also, the first of them, singly, is never seen but in such cases in which love has little share; and wherein a woman has no other view, but to make sure of a very advantageous match, which she despaired of obtaining, without the noise and bustle of a big belly. How many young women had rather have a husband forced upon them by an Arret of Parliament, than to live with an everlasting stain of reputation? They are firmly persuaded that their future husband will revenge himself with a high interest; and that they will pay very dearly for the Arret; however they are resolved not to value this, provided the title of husband repairs the breach made in their honour. Our Heloise was far from entertaining any scruples of that kind. See the following remark, and especially the remark [U].

(39) Abelard, pag. 13.

[K] . . . Could never erase it. Is it erasing the passion of love, or the being cured of it, for a woman to say, several years after she had quitted the world, and embraced a cloystered life, That she would rather be Abelard's whore, than lawful wife to the Emperor of the whole earth? Now this our Heloise, when she was Abbess of the Paraclet, declared; and to this she called God as witness. Deum testem invoco, si me Augustus universo præsidens mundo matrimonii honore dignaretur, totumque mihi orbem confirmaret in perpetuo præsidendum, charius mihi & dignius mihi videretur TUA DICI MERETRIX, quam illius Imperatrix (40). (40) Pag. 15.

How can it be said, that Heloise's passion had quitted her in the Abbey of Paraclet, since she there writes such an ingenuous confession of the ill state of her soul, as shews that the fire of love pierced to her very bones? I dare not express in French the several accusations she brings against herself. She confesses that the pleasures she had enjoyed in Abelard's arms, had enchanted her to such a degree, that she reflected on them day and night, sleeping and waking, and even during the solemnization of mass. She regretted the loss of them perpetually; and, for want of a substantial way, repeated them in imagination. Those who understand Latin, will perceive with what strength of eloquence Heloise could express the sensations of her soul. In tantum verò illæ quas pariter exercuimus amantium voluptates, dulces mihi fuerunt, ut nec displicere mihi, nec vix à memoria labi possint. Quocunque loco me vertam semper se oculis meis cum suis ingerunt desiderii. Nec etiam dormienti suis illusionibus parcunt. Inter ipsa missarum solemnia, ubi purior esse debet oratio, obscena earum voluptatum fantasmatia ita sibi penitus miserrimam captivant animam, ut turpitudinibus illis magis quam orationi vacem. Quæ cum ingemiscere debeam de commissis, suspiro potius de amissis. Nec solum quæ egimus, sed loca pariter & tempora, in quibus hæc egimus, ita tecum nostro infixæ sunt animo, ut in ipsis omnia tecum agam, nec dormiens etiam ab his quiescam. Numquam & ipso motu corporis animi mei cogitationes deprehendantur, nec à verbis temperant improvisis (41). (41) Pag. 59.

This forced her to cry out with St. Paul (42). O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Would to God, continued she, that I could truly add, the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. That grace, says she to her Abelard, has prevented you, my dear, in delivering you from all the incentives of lust, by that single stroke of a knife whereby you were made an eunuch. . . . But my youth, and the experience I have had of past pleasures, light up in the strongest manner those fires in my soul; and the weaker I am by nature, the more I sink under those violent attacks. Hæc te gratia, charissime, prævenit, & ab his tibi stimulis una corporis plaga medendo multas in anima sanavit. . . . hos autem in me stimulos carnis, hæc incentiva libidinis ipse juvenilis fervor ætatis & jucundissimarum experientia voluptatum plurimum accendunt, & tanto amplius sua me impugnatione opprimunt, quanto infirmior est natura quam oppugnant (43). Lastly, she recommends her (43) Pag. 60.

self to his prayers, with so much the more earnestness, as that is the only remedy which her incontinence can find in him. Time obsecro semper de me potius quam confidas, ut tua semper sollicitudine adjuver. Nunc verò præcipue timendum (44). Those who slandered Abelard for going so often to the Paraclet (45), were doubtless rash in their judgment, since they did not know the internal disposition of Heloise; but had they known it, they ought to have endeavoured to get those visits prohibited; they having reason to fear, that it would be impossible, but that this woman, humanly speaking, must commit impure acts with Abelard. The Fathers of the Church never trusted to mutilations; they comparing an eunuch to an ox whose horns are cut off, notwithstanding which he

(45) See the article ABELARD, remark [7].

no purpose that they emasculated poor Abelard [L]; that she herself assumed a religious habit; for she still retained some tincture of this frenzy [M]: and the Lettres Portugaises did not first shew, that it belongs to Nuns only to talk of love-matters; Heloise's Letters having long before proved the truth of this assertion. However this be, this fond creature, employed, to no purpose, all her wit and all her eloquence, to dissuade Abelard from this marriage. They were secretly married; but Heloise always denied in the most solemn manner that she was his wife (c). For this behaviour she was ill used by her uncle, who, to throw a veil over the dishonour which had been brought on his family, published the marriage in all places, though he had promised Abelard never to mention it. The ill treatment which Heloise met with at Fulbert's, made her husband resolve to remove her from his house, and to send her to the Nuns of Argenteuil, where she had been brought up. This second elopement put her relations out of all patience. They harboured a most odd kind of vengeance against him, and put it in execution by bribing Abelard's valet. This wretch opened the door in the dead of night to the villains, who were to perpetrate the horrid deed. They surprized him in his sleep, and cut off certain parts which must be nameless (d). This action made a great noise [N]; and the next morning people went, as in procession, to Abelard's apartment. His pupils made still greater moan than any. The women were distinguished by the bitterness of their complaints [O]. Some very curious letters were wrote to Abelard, to console him for his misfortune [P]. The Magistrates punished the wretches who had perpetrated this action with great severity [Q]; notwithstanding which, Abelard was so much ashamed, and seized with such despair, that he went and immured himself in the convent of St. Denys, after ordering Heloise to take the veil in Argenteuil. We have taken notice elsewhere of his transaction after he had assumed a religious habit; and of his being sentenced to throw, with his own hands, a book he had written into the flames, &c. He was more grieved for the loss of this book than for that of his virility [R]; and yet, when one loses a book, another may be recovered, but the loss in the

(c) Arunculus ipse atque domesticus ignominia sua plerumque quadrupes, in dno matrimonium dirivare & fides mihi super hoc datum violare caperunt. Ita enim à contra anathematizare & jurare, quia falsissimum est. Abelard. Histor. Colembarum, pag. 17.

(d) Crudelissima & pudensissima ultione punierunt, & quam summa admiratione mundus exceptit, eis videlicet corporis mei partibus amputatis, quibus id quod plangebant commiseram. Ibid.

(46) Citation (6).

But as appearances are sometimes deceitful, I should not approve that those, who, know the true state of Heloise's soul, should imagine that she transgressed the rules, which she and her husband met together, and that she sometimes had occasion to write to him: Si libidinosa essem, quererem decepta; nunc etiam languori tuo gratias ago: in umbra voluportalis diutius lasi. (47).

(47) Circet Polyano, apud Patrocinium.

[L] It was to no purpose that they emasculated poor Abelard. This was a love-remedy, which was very capable of operating, if we may believe certain verses of Cyrano Bergerac (48). They are addressed to a man, to whom he had spoke as follows:

(48) See the Play of Cyrano Bergerac (48). They are addressed to a man, to whom he had spoke as follows: dem jué.

*T'entens que le diminatif
Qu'on fit de vrai trop excessif
Sur votre flasque genitif
Vous prohibe le conjonctif.*

After which he adds

*O visage! ô portrait naïf!
O souverain expeditif
Pour guerir tout sexe lascif
D'amour naissant, ou effectif!
Genre neutre, genre metif,
Qui n'êtes homme qu'abstractif,
Grâce à votre copulatif,
Qu'a rendu fort imperfectif
Le cruel tranchant d'un canif.*

But as no rule is so general, as not to admit of some exception, Heloise's passion was proof against this violent remedy. This she had in common with Queen Stratonice already mentioned (49).

(49) In the article COMBARBUS.

[M] She still retained some tincture of this frenzy. This is plain from the passages I cited in the remark [K]. They prove, not only that poor Heloise was governed by a carnal appetite, but also that her brain was a little turned; for a woman in her right senses would never have spoke in the manner she did. It is manifest that study had begun to distract her, and that love greatly increased her disorder. A vast number of marks of a crazy imagination are seen in her writings; something so wild, incoherent and inconsistent, that Heloise is a part of Seneca's maxim, Nullum magnum ingenium sine mixtura demetia (50). i. e. "All mighty wits have still a dash of madness."

(50) See the citation (78) of the article CAR-DAN.

[N] This action made a great noise. Here follows what Abelard says of this matter (51): Mane autem facta tota ad me civitas congregata quanta superci admiratione, quanta se affigeret lamentatione, quanto me clamore vexarent, quanto planctu perturbarent, difficile imo impossibile est exprimi. Maxime vero Clerici, ac precipue Scholares nostri, intolerabilibus me lamentis & ejulatibus cruciabant. See the article to which I refer in the following remark.

(51) Opera, pag. 17.

[O] The women were distinguished by the bitterness of their complaints. Abelard does not take notice of that circumstance; but we learn it from one of his friends who wrote a letter of consolation to him. See the article FOULQUES (52).

(52) Remark [I].

[P] Some very curious letters were wrote to Abelard, to console him for his misfortune. Foulques, Prior of Deuil, wrote one to him, which was inserted in the edition of Abelard's works. We take notice of it in the article of this Prior; and we transplant thither a great many particulars that belong to Heloise and her husband; and which would make their articles too long, were they not separated, and transferred to another place. Those who declare, that they had rather have all the particulars relating to a person in one place, have not duly weighed that matter.

[Q] The Magistrates punished the wretches who had perpetrated this action with great severity. See the article FOULQUES (53), to which I refer for the two preceding remarks.

(53) Remark [M].

[R] He was more grieved for the loss of this book, than for that of his virility. Authors have been greatly rallied, on account of the excessive tenderness they entertain for their own compositions; and, among other examples, that of Heliodorus the Bishop has been cited; a man who chose to resign his Bishoprick, rather than condemn his romance of Theagines (54). What Sarrafin makes Voiture say has been alluded.

(54) See in the remark [B] of the article HELIODORUS, how far this ought to be credited.

*Un auteur, qui dans son écrit,
Comme moi reçoit une offense,
Souffre plus que Job ne souffrit,
Bien qu'il eût d'extrêmes souffrances* (55).
The sense is,

(55) Poesies, p. 87.

"An author who, in his compositions, receives like me an affront, suffers more than Job did, although his sufferings were extreme."

But I don't know that Abelard has been cited on this occasion; nevertheless, there is something still stronger in the other case is irreparable [S]. With regard to Heloise, she became Prioress of the Nuns of Argenteuil; but as the Nuns in this monastery led very ill lives [T], the Abbot of St. Denys, who pretended to be master of it, expelled the Nuns from it, whereby Heloise had great occasion for her husband. He had built an Oratory or Chapel near Troies, which he called Paraclet (e), and had afterwards accepted of an Abbey in Brittany. Hearing that Heloise was in want of an habitation ever since her being expelled from Argenteuil, he gave her this Oratory with all its dependencies; which donation was confirmed by Pope Innocent II. Behold her therefore first Abbess of the Paraclet. Here she gained such universal esteem, that numberless benefits were heaped upon her in a short time. The Bishops loved her as though she had been their daughter, the Abbots as their sister, and the Laity as their mother (f). Notwithstanding this she was greatly discontented at Providence (g); and murmured much more than Job. She carried on a correspondence, by letter, with Abelard [U], and desired him to send her some rules

(e) See the article PARACLET.

(f) All this is extracted from Abelard's Letter intitled, Historia Calamitatum, a few particulars excepted, the proofs of which I cite separately.

(g) See the article FOULQUES remark [K].

in his example, for Job was restored to his former flourishing condition, and begat sons and daughters; and it is certain that Voiture would have chose to be as Job for some time, rather than as Abelard to his grave; and that he would have thrown all his books and his muses into the fire, had he been reduced to the necessity of burning them, or of losing his virility. Where should we find a Prelate, who would, not be prevailed upon to sign the resignation of his Bishopric, in case a man, with an uplifted razor, should threaten to . . . in case he refused to sign? Had Heliodorus been put to that sad option, he doubtless would have consented to the condemnation of his romance. But here we find a man declaring, that he considers the loss of his pudenda as trifling, in comparison of the loss of a book, which he was forced to throw into the flames. But to judge impartially in this case, we must not ascribe all Abelard's grief to the paternal affection, which he, as an author, must naturally have for his work. Another circumstance gave him still greater uneasiness, and this was, that by his being forced to burn his book, he thereby was branded with the stigma of heresy, a punishment which answers to that of the hot iron. His murmurs against God's providence are another mark of his concern. Here follow his words, which it will be proper for me to cite, to prevent my being suspected of amplifying matters, merely to divert my readers. Deus, qui judicis æquitate quanto tunc animi felle, quanta mentis amaritudine teipsum infamis arguebam, te furibundus accusabam, sæpius repetens illam beati Antonii (56) conquestionem, Jesu bone ubi eras? Quanto autem dolore æstuavem, quanta erubescencia confunderer, quanta desperatione perturbarer sentire tunc potui, proferre non possum. Conferebam cum his quæ in corpore passus olim fueram, quanta nunc sustinerem, & omnium me æstimabam miserimum. PARVAM illam ducebam proditionem in COMPARATIONE hujus injuriæ, & longè amplius famam quam corporis detrimentum plangebam (57). i. e. "O God who judgest righteously, with what madness and bitterness of spirit did I, wretch that I am, accuse thee; frequently repeating the complaint of St. Anthony, Sweet Jesus, where wast thou? The grief with which I then was agitated, the shame with which I was confounded, and the despair with which I was tortured, I could not then feel, but cannot now describe. I compared with the evils which I formerly had suffered in my body, those I now suffered, and concluded my self to be the most miserable of all men. I looked upon that treachery I formerly met with to be trifling in comparison of this, and bewailed much more the prejudice done to my fame and reputation, than that done to my body."

(56) Apud S. Hieronymum. in ejus vita.

(57) Abelardi Oper. pag. 25.

[S] But the loss in the other case is irreparable.] Again see the article FOULQUES, remark [F].

[T] The Nuns in this Monastery led very ill lives.] Suggest, Abbot of St. Denys, took advantage of the disorderly lives of the Nuns of Argenteuil, in order to re-instate himself in the possession of that Monastery. He sent his titles to Rome, and received a favourable answer from thence. Let us hear what he says of this matter, in the history of his own life, written under the year 1127. Nuntios nostros & chartas antiquas foundationis & donationis, & confirmationum privilegia bone memoriæ Papæ Honorio Romam delegavimus, postulantes ut justitiam nostram canonico investigaret & resisteret scrutinio. Qui, ut erat vir concilii & justitiæ amator, tam pro nostra justitia, quam pro enormitate Mo-

nacharum ibidem male viventium, eundem nobis locum cum appendiciis suis, ut reformaremur ibi religionis ordo, restituit. i. e. "I sent, to Rome, messengers with the ancient charters of foundation, donation, and confirmation of privileges, in order for them to be laid before Pope Honorius of blessed memory; humbly intreating him to search into the justice of my claim, and to restore what rightfully appertained to me, Accordingly, as this Pope was a wise and just man, he restored that place to me, with its several dependencies and privileges; not only in justice to me, but also because of the disorderly lives of the Nuns who then resided there, that a religious order might be again established in that place." He says the same in the Life of Lewis the Corpulent (58). Those who are inclined to judge ill of their neighbour, will certainly, on the perusal of this passage, entertain a strong suspicion of Heloise's conduct. She confesses that she was strongly enflamed by the fire of incontinence (59); and it is often found, that the Abbess of a Monastery does not conduct herself well, when lewdness is prevalent in it (60). From these two principles, those who are prone to scandal, may easily draw the following consequence, that the Prioress of Argenteuil was no better than her Nuns; but as I myself have not read, that she was expressly included in the scandal which her Monastery gave, I shall be far from censuring her on that account. We ought to imitate our Lord, and make use of his maxim (61). Has. no man condemned or accused thee? Neither do I condemn or accuse thee. And it is very certain that inferiors imitate the bad, and not the good life of their superiors. The court of France was not more chaste under Lewis XIII, than under Henry IV.

[U] She carried on a correspondence, by letter, with Abelard.] This correspondence began but late; and was occasioned by a fortuitous circumstance, which was as follows, Abelard had writ, to a friend, a long relation of his misfortunes, which relation happened to fall into the hands of Heloise, who was then Abbess of Paraclet. After perusing it, Heloise wrote to him all the reflections she had made on it; and most earnestly besought him to write to her, in order that she might no longer be deprived of the consolation, which his Letters could give her in his absence. She represents to him the great disinterestedness of her love; and that she had not sought either the honour of marriage, the advantages of a dowry, nor her own pleasure; but the single satisfaction of possessing her dear Abelard. She tells him, that although the name of wife seems more holy and of greater dignity, she yet was always better pleased with that of his mistress, his concubine, and even strumpet: Etsi uxoris nomen sanctius ac validius videtur, dulcius mihi semper extitit amicæ vocabulum, aut si non indigneris, concubinæ vel scorti (62). She adds, that he had given but part of the reasons she had represented to him, in order to divert him from marriage; but that he had suppressed almost all those which were taken from the preference which she gave to love, before the conjugal knot; and to liberty before necessity or bonds. Rationes nonnullas quibus te à conjugio nostro infaustis thalamis revocare conabar exponere non es dedignatus, sed plerisque tacitis quibus amorum conjugio, libertatem vinculo præferebam (63). I know not what idea our Heloise formed to herself of this matter; but we here have one of the most mysterious refinements in love. It has been the notion for these many ages, that marriage destroys the chief poignancy of this species of salt; and that when a person does a thing

(58) Papa Honorius vir gravis, & severus, justitiam nostram de Monasterio Argenteulensi puellarum miseram conversatione infamato, &c.

(59) See above, remark [K], citations (41) and (43).

(60) People have to say on this occasion, Regis ad exemplum rectus componitur orbis; & sequitur troster filia matris. i. e. "People imitate the example which their King sets them; and a daughter is apt to tread in her mother's steps."

(61) St. John chap. viii. ver. 10.

THE character of mistress more agreeable to Heloise than that of wife.

(62) Abelardi Opera, pag. 45.

(63) Idem, ibid.

for the use of her Nuns, and also the solution of various problems. He answered all her demands. I do not find that her hopes of seeing him made a Bishop occasioned the reluctance she had to be his wife [X]. When he died a Monk of Clugni Heloise besought the Abbot to deliver her Abelard's body; and having obtained it she buried it in the Paraclet, and desired to be interred in the same grave (b). A very surprising miracle is related, when the grave was opened, in order for depositing Heloise's body in it, viz. that Abelard stretched out his arms to receive her, and clasped her in a strict embrace [Y]. He nevertheless had been dead above twenty years; but this is no great matter; it is pretended that there are examples of the like incidents [Z]. She died the 17th of May 1163. The Letters which she wrote to her husband are found in an edition of Abelard's works. But what Moreri asserts is not true, viz. that Andrew du Chesne had wrote Remarks on those Letters, and on Abelard's Answers. He made none thing by engagement, by duty and necessity, as a task and drudgery, he no longer finds the natural charms in it; so that, according to such as set up for the most delicate and greatest judges, a man takes a wife ad honorem, and not ad delicias. "On the side of marriage is profit, justice, honour and constancy; an insipid, but more universal pleasure: But love is founded wholly on pleasure, which indeed is more rapturous, sprightly, and poignant; a pleasure heightened by difficulty, there must be a relish and smartness in it: Love is no longer love, if it be without arrows and fire. The fair are too liberal of their sweets in marriage, a circumstance that blunts the edge of affection and desire (64)." Patere me, used a Roman Emperor (65) to say to his wife, per aliam exercere cupiditates meas, nam uxor nomen est dignitatis, non voluptatis (66). i. e. "Permit me, to facilitate my warm desires with others, for wife is a title of dignity, not of pleasure." A very ill turn might therefore be given to the resolution which Heloise had formed, viz. never to be the wife of Abelard, but always his dear mistress; she might be suspected of fearing, that marriage would be the grave of love; and prevent her tasting, as deliciously as before, the fond caresses of her gallant. The author who has paraphrased some passages in our Historical Letters (67), ascribes, in the main, that genius and view, although the expressions are touched with delicacy. That author makes her say (68), "that she found nothing but what was vastly insipid in those public engagements, which form such ties as death can only dissolve, and make a sad necessity of life and love; that it cannot be called love (69) to search for wealth and dignities in the lukewarm embraces of an indolent husband; that she will never believe, that persons can taste in this manner the sensible pleasures of an agreeable union; nor that they feel those secret and charming emotions of two hearts, which have long sought for each other, in order to be united; and that (70) she is persuaded, that if there be any appearance of happiness here below, it is found only in the assemblage of two persons, who love with liberty, whom a secret inclination has joined, and a reciprocal merit has rendered contented." We shall now see, that another cause has been supposed, with regard to the design which Heloise had, not to marry Abelard.

(b) See the remark [Y] of the article ABELARD.

(64) Montagne, Essais, liv. 3. chap. 5. pag. m. 120.

(65) Ælius Vetus apud Spartian. in eius Vita, pag. m. 235.

(66) See several remarks of this nature in the 9th Letter of the Critique de Calvinisme de Maimbourg; and in the Letters 21 and 22 of the Sequel of that Critique.

(67) See the book intitled, Histoire d'Eloise & d'Abelard, Hague 1693.

(68) Pag. 51.

(69) Pag. 53.

(70) Pag. 54.

[X] I do not find that her hopes of seeing him made a Bishop, occasioned the reluctance she had to be his wife.] The Sieur d'Amboise (71) mentions an ancient French Poet, who, having exhorted men not to subject themselves to the slavery of marriage, confirms his sentiment by that of our Heloise, who, says he, begged and conjured her lover in the most ardent manner, never to marry her; she found it more to her advantage to be the mistress of a man, who would one day be possessed of a rich Bishop's See. Satis esse dicentis si illa intimo pectoris amorem mutuum servans, illum viderit mitra & infulis Pontificalibus, quibus dignus erat ornatum. i. e. "She saying often, that it would be enough for her, whilst she cherished their reciprocal flame in the inmost recesses of her heart, to see him adorned with the mitre and the pontifical vestments, of which he was so worthy." D'Amboise observes, I. That this poet gives another turn to it, viz. that Heloise intimated, that the embraces of married persons are not heightened with so exquisite and delicious a pleasure, as those embraces which are unlawful. Sed poëta in alium sensum hoc detorquet, quasi illa impure voluerit saniores esse amantium, quam legibus conubialibus nexorum amplexus (72). II. That we must not think that Heloise preferred the licentiousness of concubinage, before the quality or condition of a wife; but that the love and respect she owed her gallant, prompted her to take the veil, rather than to prevent, by her marrying Abelard, his being rewarded suitably to his genius and erudition, as for instance, with a Cardinal's hat. Potius quam obice & interventu suarum nuptiarum, impedimento esse ne Abelardus factus uxorius frustraretur præmio excellentis ingenii admirabilisque doctrinæ, puta purpura & galero (73). But I have not found the least marks of this in Heloise's Letters, and for this reason made it the sixth error committed by Moreri in the article of ABELARD. The circumstance which gives rise to this kind of fallshood is, the liberty which authors take, of putting into the mouths of people such expressions as appear to him suitable to their present condition. It is frequently more advantageous for a woman, to suffer her young gallant to rise in the church, than to stop his career by marrying him. But are we therefore to suppose, that Heloise had any such views? Here follows a well-known tale. A man who enjoyed a prebend, quitted it purely for the sake of marrying. The day after the wedding he spoke thus to his wife: It is plain, my dear, says he, that I have the utmost affection for you, since I left my prebend, merely for the sake of enjoying you. You acted very foolishly, replied his bride, for you might have kept your prebend, and possessed me too [Y] A very surprising miracle is related, . . . viz. Mogen de Parvobat Abelard stretched out his arms to receive her, and she clasped her in a strict embrace.] This pretty miracle is related in a manuscript Chronicle of Tours (75). Hæc (Heloissa) sicut dicitur in ægritudine ultima posita præcepit, ut mortua intra mariti tumulum poneretur, & sic eadem defuncta ad tumulum apertum deportata, maritus ejus qui multis diebus ante eam defunctus fuerat, elevatis brachiis illam recipit, & ita eam amplexatus brachia sua strinxit. i. e. "Heloise, as it is related, being upon her death-bed, gave orders for her being buried in the same grave with her husband; and accordingly, dying, and being carried to his grave, her husband, who died a long time before her, lifting up his arms, received her, and folded her in a strict embrace." But why then are they not in the same sepulchre? Francis d'Amboise who declares that he had seen, at the Paraclet, the sepulchres of the founder and foundress standing near one another; contigua fundatoris & fundatricis sepulchra, ought to have solved this small difficulty.

(71) Præfat. Apolog. ad Oper. Abelardi.

[Z] It is pretended that there are examples of the like incident.] See what Gregory of Tours relates concerning two married persons, who lived ever in a state of continence, with regard to one another; and were called by the inhabitants of the country (77) the two Lovers. The wife died first; and the husband, as her corps was letting down into the grave, used the following prayer: I thank thee, O my Lord and my God, in that I return thee this treasure as pure and undefiled, as when thou first intrustedst me with it. The wife smiling, cried, Why do you speak of a thing which no one asks any questions about? The husband died a little after, and was buried over against his wife; but the next day both bodies were found together in the same grave. This blunt query might make some of the profane conclude, that the virgin-wife did not care the world should know her husband had been so cold. She confined herself barely to the merits of continence, and did not care to be exposed to the opinions, which might be entertained to the prejudice of her charms. But the

(72) Ibid.

(73) Ibid.

(74) See the book intitled, La

Mogen de Parvobat, wrote by a Canon of Tours, as it is said in the Menagians, pag. 366. ad Dutch edit.

(75) Apud Andream Quercetanum, Notis ad Histor. Calamitat. Abel. & apud Franc. Ambos. Præfat. Apolog.

(76) Hist. des François, liv. 3. chap. 42.

(77) Clermont en Auvergne.

none, except on that Letter in which Abelard communicates the history of his misfortunes to a friend. John de Meun had translated into French the Letters which Abelard and Heloise had wrote to one another (i). There was published, not long since, a little book (k), intitled, The History of Eloise and Abelard, with the passionate letter which she wrote to him, translated from the Latin. This pretended Translation is only a few particulars extracted at pleasure from Heloise's Letters, which the compiler has thrown into such a dress as he thought proper, by expressing what did not suit, and adding such particulars as he judged most suitable.

(i) See the President Fauchet, chap. 126. of the Old French Poets.

(k) Printed at the Hague, for John Alberts, 1693.

Count de Buffi Rabutin translated some of Abelard and Heloise's Letters into French. This version has been inserted in the second volume of his Letters, published after his death. I never, says he (h), read finer Latin, especially that of the Nun, nor any pieces more amorous and ingenious than her's. Had the Count been as well acquainted with the style of the Roman tongue as with that of the French, he would not have bestowed such an eulogium on Heloise's Latin diction.

(l) Buffi, Lettres 15. tom. 2. pag. 49. Dutch edit. 1697.

the trust or depositum in question ought not to be kept in this manner; it is not restoring it in a proper manner, to return it untouched, and exactly the same as when we received it; it is not for this that God instituted marriage, non hoc questum munus in usus. A person may therefore not desire that the world should surmise, that he had not sufficiently pleased the depository. But the Historian will remedy this inconvenience, if we consult chapter XXXII of the Glory of Confessors, where a something better turn is given to the words of a dead wife. He relates, ten chapters after, that a Senator of Dijon, Hilarius by name (78), who had been buried a year, lifted up his arm in order to clasp his wife round the neck, as her corpse was letting down into the same grave.

(78) See Abbot de Marolles's Notes on Gregory of Tours, tom. 2. pag. 283.

HELVICUS (CHRISTOPHER) Professor of Divinity, Greek, and the Eastern Tongues, in the University of Giessen, was born the 26th of December 1581, at Spredlingen (a), where his father was a Minister [A]. He was not one of those tardy genius's, which do not display themselves till late; he being capable, before he was twenty years of age, to teach Greek, Hebrew, and even Philosophy; and he had composed a prodigious number of Greek verses at fifteen or sixteen years of age. He went through his course of studies in Marburg, where he took his Master of Arts degree in 1599. He might have taken it sooner, had he thought proper, he being received Bachelor at fourteen years of age (b). The Hebrew language became so extremely familiar to him, that he spoke it as fluently as his native language. He studied thoroughly a numberless multitude of Greek authors; and even studied Physic for some time, though he had devoted himself to the Ministry. In fine, he gave so many proofs of his capacity, that he was chosen, anno 1605, to teach Greek and Hebrew in the College which the Landgrave had lately established in Giessen (c). The next year the Emperor made this College an University, investing it with the privileges belonging to it as such. Helvicus having discharged, during five years, the several duties of his employment with great reputation, was appointed Divinity-Professor in 1610. He married that year. I know not whether Helvicus continued a Bachelor till he was thus raised in the world, in order that he might have an opportunity of marrying a woman with a greater fortune; or whether other motives prompted him to lead a single life till the abovementioned date; the author I shall quote saying nothing of that matter; but he observes that Helvicus, after his marriage, continued as assiduous as ever in the duties of his profession (d). A church was offered him in Moravia anno 1611, and a Professorship at Hamburg, with a considerable stipend; however, he refused both those offers. He took his Doctor's degree of Divinity anno 1613. This the Landgrave obliged him to take, and would make him go to Frankfort, in order to view the Library of the Jews, who had been lately drove away by popular tumults. Helvicus, who was very fond of reading the Rabbins, bought several of their books on that occasion. He died in the flower of his age, the 10th of September 1617, he having projected the writing a great number of books [B]; and

(a) A little town within half a league of Frankfort.

(b) XIV ætatis anno, Ferraro exemplo Baccalaureatus gradum consecutus. Christoph. Scheiblerus in Programmate de funere Helvici. The Baccalaureat in Germany must be different from what it is in other countries.

(c) König is mistaken; he makes him Professor at Marburg.

(d) Negle vero into matrimonio fuit. Christianus Helvici habita à Joanne Wynckelmanno. Wynckelmannus ubi infra.

[A] Where his father was Minister.] His Christian name was, like that of his son, CHRISTOPHER. In his younger days he had been, for two years, Director of the College in Geraw; after which he studied Divinity in Tübingen, and was Minister of the Church of Grithcim; but Prince George, Landgrave of Hesse, placed him a little afterwards at Spredlingen. Helvicus was Minister of that Church till his death, and met with a great many misfortunes. Multa propter sinceram confessionem perpassus, tandem ibidem vitam hanc terrestrem cum caelesti commutavit. He was son to QUIRINUS HELVICUS, who signalized himself in the defence of Darmstat during the war of Schmalcalde. The Reader will find in Sleidan and in Thuanus, the judgment which Count de Buren formed of him. Finding there was no likelihood of his being succoured, he went upon the ramparts in order to capitulate; but being shot thro' the right arm, the city was taken by storm. The enemy were for hanging him; and he perhaps would have been hanged, had he not been saved by the ransom which was promised for him. He had attended upon the Landgrave Philip in most of his expeditions (1).

[B] He died in the flower of his age, . . . having projected the writing a great number of Books.] He had published several Grammars, a Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac (2); but they were only abridgments. His Hebrew Lexicon, and his Latin Lexicon were only by way of essay, calculated for youth. He was desirous of improving all those Grammars, and to compile Lexicons for the use of the learned; and he besought God to indulge him length of years sufficient for him to complete those works. He likewise begged for time enough to rank, in their proper order, the Church Histories; and to criticize the Old and New Testament drawn up by Piscator, and that Author's Commentaries on the Scriptures. He thought it would also be requisite to make a new Edition of Luther's Bible, with a good Apology and the necessary Explanations. The Edition of that Bible, which Paulus Fossarius had lately procured, with marginal Notes containing the opinions of Calvin, had inspired Hel-

(1) En Oratione funeb. Christoph. Helvici habita à Joanne Wynckelmanno.

(2) He first published a general Grammar: Grammatica universalis, continens va quæ omnibus Linguis sunt communia. Those who have it by them will do well to compare it with that of Mr. Arnauld.

(e) Extracted from his Funeral Oration preached by John Wynckelmannus, Professor of Divinity in Gießen.

and being reputed to have the most skilful and methodical way of teaching languages (e) [C]. He was not only a good Grammarian, but also an able Chronologer. His chronological Tables [D] have been greatly esteemed, though not quite free from errors [E]. It is plain, by the books extant of his composing [F], that had he lived threescore vicus with that thought; and, at the same time, an ardent desire to execute this project (3). Cum ante biennium Paulus Toffanus, Heidelbergensis Doctor, versionem Biblicam B. Lutheri Germanicam in lucem edidisset, non solum variis mutationibus marginalibus (quæ quales hinc inde sint, viri cordati judicabunt) conspersam, sed etiam erroribus, Calvinianorum contra ipsius Lutheri mentem & voluntatem proterva temeritate & impudentia contaminatam, judicabat operæ pretium esse, si opus illud Biblicum Lutheri, cum solida ubi opus esset apologia, necessariis explicationibus, & macularum quas Pontificii & Calviniani illi asperserunt, abstersione in lucem prodiret. Ubi animadverti in ipso singulare hoc ipsum præstandi desiderium, si Domino ita visum esset (4). i. e. "Paul Toffanus, a Doctor of Heidelberg, having two years since published the German Translation of the Bible made by Luther; not only with a great number of marginal Notes, of the goodness of which let the sagacious and judicious judge, but also corrupted it in the most rash and impudent manner, contrary to the doctrine and design of Luther, with several Calvinistical errors; Helvicus presumed it would be doing the world a service, to publish that Bible of Luther, with a solid apology wherever it might be necessary, together with such explications as may be requisite; and purged from all those errors which Papists and Calvinists had foisted into it. I took notice, that he had a strong desire, with God's leave, to have executed this design."

(3) Wynckelm. in Orat. fun. Helvici.

(4) Ibid.

[C] . . . being reputed to have the most skilful and methodical way of teaching languages.] Helvicus sought after a shorter method than that commonly made use of in Schools, for the educating of youth. He was not disheartened, because of the obstacles which were raised against his new method, firmly persuaded that he should save Scholars a great deal of time and pains; and excited by the love which men have for their own inventions, he exerted himself to the utmost, in order to get his method introduced in Schools. He had put things in a fair way, when endeavours were used to make him an object of ridicule; he was wrangled with, and slander'd; and Helvicus was obliged to defend himself, and repulse those severe attacks (5). I fancy that, as Helvicus died before his inventions prevailed, this gave the partisans of the old method an opportunity to maintain, or re-establish themselves. However this be, it was declared in Helvicus's epitaph, that he had been the inventor of a new art of teaching, novæ Didacticæ auctor & informator felicissimus. It was worthy of being taken notice of on that occasion, titulo res digna sepulchri, and deserved to have been copied more exactly than it was by Freherus, who, instead of Didacticæ has wrote Dialecticæ. One would imagine that Helvicus had some notion of a project, in which we are told that a very learned man is employed, viz. to reduce languages to common principles, in order that they may be acquired, very easily, all together; one would, I say, imagine this, were we to trust to the following title of one of his books: Libri didactici Grammaticæ universalis Latine, Græcæ, Hebraicæ, Chaldaicæ (6); but it is plain from his funeral Oration, that a comma must be placed there after Universalis. See the citation above (2).

(5) See Spizellus in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 50.

(6) Spizellus, ibid. pag. 52. quotes the title in this manner.

[D] His chronological Tables have been greatly esteemed.] I speak of the work entitled by him, Theatrum Historicum, sive Chronologia Systema novum. He published it anno 1609. Sethus Calvisius, who had so consummate a knowledge in History and Chronology, approved very much of this work, and look'd upon it as quite new, with regard to the invention and method, since things were found in it at one glance; Utpote in quibus exemplo antebac non viso omnia uno intuitu lectorum oculis subjiciantur. Wynckelman observes, that this approbation is found in the Letter which Sethus Calvisius wrote to Helvicus, the 7th of September 1609. He adds, the work, corrected and improved by the Author, is now reprinting. Jam secundum emendatius & ex ipsius auctoritate auctius editur. We must therefore say, that the first edition of this work is of 1609, and the second of 1618. John Steuber, Professor at Gießen, had the direction of the latter; and dedicated it to a Danish Nobleman (7), a patron of men of letters, and who had honoured Helvicus with his affection. Twenty years after a new edition was made of this work, under the direction of John Balthazar Schuppius, son-in-law to the Author, and Professor of Eloquence in Marburg. He observes in his Preface, that he will not take any notice of the edition printed in England. This chronological Theatrum has been reprinted several times since that time. Vossius has not justly expressed the date of the first edition; and declared that to be the second which was not so. Anno 1100 DCXII, says he (8), Christophorus Helvicus edidit Systema Chronologicum, equalibus denariorum, quinquagenariorum, & centenariorum, intervallis. Id postea continuavit & recensuit Joannes Balthazar Scoppius. Emisit anno 1100 DCXXXVIII. i. e. "Anno 1612, Christopher Helvicus published a System of Chronology, with equal intervals of tens, fiftens, and hundreds. This work was afterwards continued and revised by John Balthazar Scoppius, who published it in 1638." It cannot be objected to me in favour of Vossius, that it is very certain that Helvicus composed a book of Chronology in 1612, which was augmented by Scoppius in 1638; for this work is not that, of which Vossius speaks. It is intitled, Chronologia universalis ab origine mundi per quatuor summa imperia, quas Monarchias appellant, ad annum usque MDCXII deducta, cum præcipuis synchronismis virorum illustrium, eventuum, & politiarum cæterarum (9). Every thing is suited there to the prophecy of the 2d and 7th chapter of Daniel. This is a characteristic, that does not agree with the Theatrum Historicum. On the other side, that title and characteristic by which Vossius denotes the book he has spoke of, suits perfectly the Theatrum Historicum, sive Chronologia Systema novum, where one sees nothing but divisions of tens, of fifties, and of hundreds, which do not exceed or pass one another. Lastly, John Justus Winckelmannus, son to him who pronounced the funeral Oration, remarks very expressly (10), that Schuppius published, with the Continuations till the year 1639, two works of Helvicus his father-in-law: the one is, Theatrum Historicum, in folio; the other Chronologia universalis, in 4to. I forbear observing, that Helvicus did not himself publish the Chronology which he had continued till anno 1612, it being Steuber, his colleague, who published it anno 1618.

[E] Tho' not quite free from errors.] According to Tanaquil Faber, of Saumur, he is not exact, with respect to the periods in which the Poets, Philosophers, and other learned personages flourished. Primum hoc mihi . . . credas velim, Helvicum non satis locupletis esse fidei in hac chronologia parte, quæ virorum scriptis illustrium ætatem signat: dein hoc quoque habet Helvicus, quod fere plerumque recentiores scriptores sequatur, elogarios, bibliothecarios, &c. quale aliquid quoque in Calvisio improbat Scaliger, quemadmodum ex Epistolis ejus apparet; quamvis Calvisii opus, ex quo totus est Helvicus, mirifice laudaret. Sed quod dico, allatis infra exemplis plenius constabit (11). i. e. "I must beg you, in the first place, to take notice, that Helvicus is not quite exact in that part of Chronology, which relates to the several periods in which famous Authors flourished. Farther, he generally follows modern authors, as epitomizers, writers of Bibliothèques &c. Scaliger censures much the same fault in Calvisius also, as is plain from his Letters, tho' he highly applauds that work of Calvisius, from which Helvicus took his. But what I now advance, will be more evident from the examples, which I shall deduce below." The examples he promises there, and gives afterwards, relate to errors which Helvicus has committed on Athenæus, Lucian, Justin, and Hermogenes.

[F] The books extant of his composing.] I have already

(7) Oliger Roscrantz. Steuber's Dedication is dated the 18th of March 1618.

(8) De Scient. Mathe. pag. 404.

(9) See M. Eusebium Bohemum, in Epitome Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ pag. 72, & seq. apud Joh. Justum Wynckelmannum, in Cippo memoriali Christophoro Helvico referato, pag. 10.

(10) Wynckelm. ibid.

(11) T. Faber. Epist. lib. 1. pag. 211.

threescore years, his works might have made several volumes in folio. Helvicus was irreproachable as to his manners; he loved to live in peace with all men, and had never quarrelled, either with his colleagues or any other persons: Concordiam colebat cum omnibus; nullo enim unquam tempore cum ullo sive collega sive extraneo in discordia vixit (f). This was a very rare circumstance: Rara avis in terris. He was greatly respected by several German Princes, who sent him the kindest and most polite letters. Anna Dorothea, Duchess of Saxony, did Helvicus the honour to write pretty often to him. His loss was bewailed after a very peculiar manner. All the German Poets of the Augsburg Confession composed Elegies, to bewail his immature death. A collection was made of his Poems, which were printed with his funeral Sermon, and some other pieces, under the title of Cippus Memorialis, by the care and direction of Wynckelman, colleague to Helvicus. The son of this Wynckelman reprinted the Cippus in 1650.

(f) Wynckelm. in Orat. fun. Helvici.

ready taken notice of some, and here follow others. He published chronological Dissertations on the four Monarchies, on the seventy Weeks of Daniel, on Cyrus, on the other Kings of Persia, &c. He refuted, in so solid a manner, the opinions of Angelocrator, that no reply could be made to him. Contra absurdas Danielis Angleocratoris opiniones, ut eas insignis Chronologus Sethus Calvinus in literis ad Helvicum datis indigitat, quem ita errorem convicit, ut ne contra quidem bisicere potuerit (12). And yet Angleocrator pretended to inspiration; he declaring, at the beginning of his work, that he had wrote it Deo illuminante (13). This subtracts very much from the glory of those who have refuted him; for it certainly cannot be a matter of difficulty, to point out a thousand chimæras in the writings of those pretended inspired. Though they even should not be actually fanaticks, and should have no other view but to stir up the passions; they would shew, by their boasting of such a thing against their consciences, such a distraction of mind, as would not suffer them to escape the meanest Critic. Helvicus composed treatises de Dialectis Græcis, de ratione Carmina Græca conscribendi, de Paraphrasi Bibliorum Chaldaica, an Ars Poetica in Latin; Desiderium Evæ, cum aliorum doctorum Bibliorum à depravationibus Judæorum, Calvinianorum, & Photinianorum erroribus annexa vindicatione; Synopsis Historiæ Universalis. He had put to press an Hebrew Poetick, and had wrote the

(12) Wynckelm. in Orat. funebri.

(13) Apud Voffium, de Scient. Matbem. p. 402.

Dedication to it, but afterwards suppressed it for certain reasons. Quam tamen post certis de causis prælo subduxit (14). See Witte in his Diarium Biographi- (14) Wynckelm. cum; but see especially Paul Freherus's Theatrum (15), in Orat. funebri. and Spigelius's Templum Honoris, where a pretty ample, and I believe exact, catalogue is found of Helvicus's works. The greatest part are in Latin, and the rest in German. Correct, in Freherus, at the epitaph XXXVI (16) and IX; and put XXXV and IIX. It is very strange that those who corrected this voluminous work, did not perceive that a man who was born the 26th of December 1581 (17), and died the 10th of September 1617 (18), did not live to the age of thirty six years, nine months and a half. It is XXXV years and IIX months in the epitaph produced by Wynckelman (19), who has also committed this error, in the funeral Oration, viz. in saying that Helvicus died in the thirty seventh year of his age, anno ætatis suæ trigesimo septimo; he expressing all this in words at length, and not in figures. He writes, after the same manner, the day of Helvicus's birth, and that of his death; the former, according to him, is the 26th of December 1581; and the latter, the 10th of September 1617: how then could Helvicus be thirty seven years old? As he might so easily have avoided these errors, he consequently is the more to be blamed for committing them.

(14) Wynckelm. in Orat. funebri.

(15) Pag. 394.

(16) Magir. in Eponymol. puts also XXXVI.

(17) This is what P. Freherus asserts, pag. 393.

(18) It is so dated in the epitaph apud Freherum, pag. eadem & 394.

(19) In Cippo memoriali, pag. m. 16.

HEMELAR (JOHN) a Canon of Antwerp, and born in the Hague (a), was a very learned man. He applied himself much more to the study of polite literature and the science of medals [A], than to Theological disputes. He was a Poet and Orator. He wrote, in Rome, a Panegyric on Clement VIII, with such great success, that he was offered the post of Librarian to the Vatican, or a very good benefice (b); but he contented

(a) Valer. Andreas, Bibliob. Belgic. pag. 514.

(b) Joh. Fridericus Gronov. in Orat. fun. Jacobi Golii, pag. 7.

[A] He applied himself . . . to the study of polite literature, and the science of medals.] He wrote a book on that science, and gave it to be printed, but on condition that his name should not be put to it. Auctor est Expositionis Numismatum Imperatorum Romanorum à Jul. Cæsare ad Heraclium, quam operi suo Jac. Bizæus adjecit, tacito, ut stipulatus erat, nomine, Antwerp. apud Verduf. 1614. 4 (1). This is what we find in Valerius Andreas: but what follows is more circumstantial, In Numismata Regum & Imp. Romanorum à C. Julio Cæsare usque ad Fl. Justinianum ex Caroli Arschotani reguli & Nic. Rocoxii consularis viri armariis deprompta, commentarios edidit bonæ frugis plenos, in quibus quicquid in auro, argento, ære, stato, percusso in urbe æterna, exquisitum, elegans, historiæ temporum & genio principum conveniens, per notas, figurat, ambages breves & serpos verborum significator, acutissime paucis & planissime explicat, pene quoddam nummarie antiquitatis: & quo opere aliquis arrogantior superis se misceri posset arbitrari, in eo nomen suum dissimulavit (2). i. e. "He published extremely useful commentaries upon the medals of the Roman Emperors, from the time of Julius Cæsar down to Justinian, taken from the cabinets of Charles Arschot and Nicholas Rocoxius. Wherein he concisely and accurately explains, by marks, figures, &c. whatsoever is exquisite, elegant, and suitable or agreeable to the history of those times, and the genius of Monarchs; whether the medals in question be of gold, silver, or brass; whether cast or struck in that immortal city. It is a kind of storehouse of medals; and nevertheless in this work, from which any other person would have expected prodigious reputation, our author has been so modest

1) Valer. And. Bibliob. Belg. pag. 514.

(2) Gronov. in Orat. funeb. Jac. Golii, pag. 7, 8.

as to conceal his name." The words which precede these in Gronovius's oration, are so beautiful, that I cannot forbear quoting them. Mater (Golii) omni sexus laude prædita . . . vel unica Johannis Hemelarii fratris imagine sat nobilis est, viri & in veterum literarum tractatione cum primis exercitati, & poëta disertis, & probitate ac tranquillitate vitæ suæque honorum & negotiorum T. aliquem Pompeium Allicum referentis. Panegyricum dixit votis tertiorum quinquennialium Clementis VIII. tam illustri gratia exceptum, ut Vaticanæ bibliothecæ præfaturam, aut optimum sacerdotium (Canonicatum vocant) optare jussus sit: sacerdotio Antverpiæ contentus fuit. i. e. "His mother (Golius's) adorned with all the virtues of her sex . . . sufficiently illustrious by her resemblance to her excellent brother John Hemelar, a man perfectly well skilled in ancient literature; a fine Poet; and comparable to the Roman Atticus for his probity, tranquillity of life, and absolute disregard of honours and public employments. He made a panegyric on Pope Clement VIII, which met with so gracious a reception, that it being left to his opinion, either to accept of the office of Librarian to the Vatican, or (3) Melanges, Hist. pag. 78. a rich benefice (called a canonry) he was satisfied with only a benefice in Antwerp." Colomæsius (3) (4) The 2d is of ann. 1627 in 4to, and the 3d of ann. 1654, in folio; and both printed in Antwerp. See Father Labbe, Bibliob. Nummar. p. 262.

(c) Idem, ibid. tented himself with being a Canon in the Cathedral at Antwerp (c). Justus Lipsius, his Professor, had a great esteem and friendship for him, as appears from the letters which (d) Idem, pag. 8. Lipsius wrote to him (d), and by the testimonies he gave him in 1600 (e). Hemelar (e) It is filled with Elogiums. You will find it in Swertius, Atb. Belgic. pag. 436. was then preparing for his journey to Italy. He spent six years at Rome, in the palace of Cardinal Cesi (f). He was Grotius's friend, and published verses to congratulate him on his delivery from his confinement. Grotio arcam & angelum custodem luculento carmine gratulatus est (g). He was brother to the mother of James Golius, that learned Professor at Leyden, who has gained so vast a reputation, by his profound knowledge in the Oriental Languages. He doubtless would willingly have won over this nephew of his to the Romish Communion, as he won Peter Golius brother to James; but it would not have been possible for him to succeed in that design. James Golius was a zealous Protestant, who entertained all his life-time a great deal of rancour against his uncle, because of his brother's changing his Religion. Unum in eo non sine gemitu solebat accusare nosfer, quod fratrem Petrum revocasset ad religiones parentibus ejuratas (h). Moreri who in GOLIUS's article, declares that he speaks elsewhere of our John Hemelar, forgot himself on that occasion. I will not imitate him with regard to the promise I made in the same article, viz. to make some mention of PETER GOLIUS [B].

[B] I shall make some mention of Peter GOLIUS.] He had the same inclination as his brother, to travel into the Levant, and to cultivate the oriental tongues. He entered among the bare-footed Carmelites, and assumed the name of Celestin de St. Leduine. He lived several years on Mount Libanus, and was Professor of the Oriental Tongues in Rome. He translated, Thomas à Kempis into Arabic; and undertook, at the age of seventy four years, a voyage on the coast of Malabar, there to labour at the conversion of the Infidels. Notwithstanding the different way of life, as well as of religion, of the two brothers, they yet had a tender affection for each other. Peter told James by writing, that he was obliged to him for the kind treatment he had met with in Asia. Frater Ascetes à familia discalceatorum cum per vestigia fratris in Oriente decurreret, scripsit ad nostrum diu reducem omnia sibi evenire præter expectationem: parasse se ad vincula, carceres, verbera, cruces, invenire amplexus, gratulationes, studia, gratias potentium ob nomen Golium: eam memoriæ, id desiderium sui reliquerat: ita gratiam ab- senti referebant (5). i. e. "When his brother the Friar " was travelling into those countries in the east where " James had been; he informed him by letter, that " all things had happened to him beyond his expecta- " tions; that he had been prepared for chains, im- " prisonment, stripes, and crosses, but instead of these " had met with embraces, civilities, and favours from " persons of distinction, for the sake of his name, " Golius: so grateful a remembrance had he left of " himself in those countries, and so much affection " did they discover for him, though absent." Thus we find that the name of Golius was in such esteem since the voyages of James, that a great deal of honour was done it in the person of Peter. By the way, we are not to suppose, that Hemelar had need of much genius and industry, in order to win over his nephew to the Romish communion, for he made a convert of him when a child; Peter Golius having been brought up at his house from eight years of age. I shall quote the words of Gronovius, on which the present assertion is founded; whereby the reader will see that this child was extremely forward for his years. Unum in eo (Hemelario) non sine gemitu solebat accusare nosfer, quod fratrem Petrum revocasset ad religiones parentibus ejuratas; virum alioquin egregium, & fraterno secum animo, nec minus gnarum rerum & linguarum Orientis, diuque in partibus iisdem versatum, & Arabicæ linguæ Romæ Professore: qui quam præcoqui fuerit indole, testis est Oratio, quam Christiano Michælio Abbati Præmonstratensi ab Hemelario scriptam gratulandi causa, puer octo annorum constanter, & quasi fecisset, memoriter promittavit. i. e. "Our Golius used to charge Hemelar, not without fighting, with one thing, viz. " with drawing his brother Peter over to the Romish " religion; a man, in all other respects, very extra- " ordinary, and for whom he ever retained a fraternal affection, who was no less versed in the affairs " and languages of the east, where he had resided " for many years, and was professor of the Arabic " language in Rome. That Peter Golius had an " early genius, is manifest from a gratulatory oration " written by Hemelar to Christian Michaelis, Abbot " of the Præmonstrants, which Golius, when but a " boy of eight years old, spoke with as much ease as " if it had been a composition of his own."

(5) Gronov. in Orat. funebri. Colli. pag. 19.

(a) It belongs to the King of Denmark.

HEMMINGIUS (NICHOLAS) Professor of Divinity in Copenhagen, was born anno 1513, in the isle of Laland (a). He could not reap great benefit from the first part of his education, since it was directed by a Blacksmith, his father's brother. He nevertheless made some progress in literature, and afterwards went to Wittenberg, where during five years, he was one of Melanchthon's most assiduous auditors. As he was obliged to labour for his subsistence, either by teaching, or by writing for his pupils, it is more surprising that he should attain so much knowledge. He returned to Denmark; and, by Melanchthon's recommendation, was received in a Gentleman's family, to teach his daughters. He afterwards was appointed Minister of the Church of the Holy Ghost in Copenhagen, and then Hebrew Professor. He took his Doctor's degree of Divinity anno 1557, and immediately obtained a Professorship in that Faculty at Copenhagen. He discharged the functions of it admirably well, till the year 1579, when he was declared Emeritus, and made Canon in the Church of Roschild. He enjoyed this benefice very happily till his death, that is, till the 25th of May 1600. He was blind during the latter part of his life (b); a circumstance that is no ways surprising, since he was always extremely studious, and lived fourscore and seven years. I am to observe, that Hemmingius was not only very far from being a very rigid Lutheran [A], but it is probable that had he been let alone, he would have shewn himself a zealous Calvinist.

(b) Extracted from Paul. Freher. Theatr. Viror. Illustr. pag. 312, 313.

[A] Hemmingius . . . was not a very rigid Lutheran.] I need but alledge the following proof of this. The formulary of Concord, which the divines of Saxony and their partizans endeavoured to establish in every part of the Lutheran world, was rejected in Denmark, with the utmost indignation. King Frederick II forbid all his subjects to sign it; and threatened to banish all those who should infringe this prohibition, or should bring copies of it into his dominions (1). See the re-gressu Libri mark [E]. Now Hemmingius was the chief promoter of this affair (2), as Hospinian observes, who, on that article, has not been contradicted by Hutter.

Hemmingio, & aulico concionatore, &c. Idem, ibid.

His inclination for the opinions of Geneva was taken notice of, upon which he was obliged to explain, and even retract his tenets [B]. He wrote a Lutheran Confession of Faith; and nevertheless a Divine has lately endeavoured to shew, that it agrees with that of the Reformed [C]. Hemmingius published a great number of books. Simon Goulart was so well pleased with his Tracts on Divinity, that he reprinted them at Geneva in 1586 [D]. I am

[B] He was obliged to retract his tenets.]

(3) Idem, Hist. Sacrament. Part. 2. pag. 595.

(4) Samuel Andreas, in Epist. ad Antonium Horneck qua Daniæ Orthodoxie fidelis & pacificæ Auctori respondetur, pag. 62. edit. Marburg. 1690.

(5) Ap. 6, 1576.

(6) Hemmingius, in Syntagma Institutionum Christianarum, Loco de Deo, num. 38. apud Samuelem Andr. ubi supra, pag. 63.

(7) See Samuel Andreas, pag. 65, 66.

(8) Apud Sam. Andream. ibid. pag. 67.

(9) Ibid.

Hospinian (3) relates that Hemmingius, in his Syntagma Institutionum Christianarum, published anno 1574, explained himself, with regard to the real presence, as a Calvinist would have done. Masius does not deny this; but adds that Hemmingius, being admonished of his error, retracted it solemnly (4). "Non dissimulandum esse ait (Masius) Calvini sententia de S. Cœna aliquandiu indulsisse (Hemmingium) sed monitum à cæteris Theologis ad meliorem mentem reversum deposito errore palinodiam cecinisse. "Quam in rem ejus confessionem, ipsius manu scriptam (5), sibi quæ à Viro Illustri D. Engberg Conciliario Regis & Judice Provinciali Seelandiæ dono dategit, tam, subjungit." The author from whom I borrow these words, shews, from some passages of the Syntagma, that Hemmingius combatted the Principles of the Ubiquarians; and applauded Calvin for impeaching Servetus, and praised the magistrates of Geneva for putting Servetus to death. Cum his hæresiaribus damnamus etiam impium nebulonem Michaellem Servetum, qui rabiose contemptis sanctorum Patrum Conciliis, Arii & aliorum fanaticorum hominum damnatas hæreses revocare conatus est, quem jussu accusatum à D. Johanne Calvino, merito Genevates affecere supplicio (6). i. e. "We also condemn, with these heresiarchs, that impious wretch Michael Servetus, who madly despising the Councils of the holy Fathers, endeavoured to revive the Heresies already condemned, of Arius and other Fanatics; whom John Calvin justly impeaching, was justly put to death by the Magistrates of Geneva."

[C] A Divine has lately endeavoured to shew, that Hemmingius's Confession agrees with that of the Reformed.] Masius, Professor of Divinity at Copenhagen, has communicated to the public the confession which was required from Hemmingius. It declares, that he firmly believes, that Christ Jesus, entire God and Man, is substantially present in the Lord's Supper, in all parts where it is solemnized according to its institution; and that Christ Jesus brings and delivers to all communicants, as well unworthy as worthy, his real body, and the true blood which he shed for us, for the remission of sins; and that this body and this blood are truly and really taken with the bread and wine by the communicants; so that it is a true meat and a true drink, with which man is fed, refreshed, and vivified to life eternal. Se statuere & firmiter credere totum Christum Deum & hominem substantialiter adesse presentem in Cœna sua, ubicunque celebratur juxta ipsius ordinationem, ipsumque adferre & exhibere omnibus communicantibus dignis & indignis suum verum corpus & verum sanguinem, quem effudit pro nobis in remissionem peccatorum, & hoc corpus & hunc sanguinem vere & realiter cum pane & vino à communicantibus sumi, ita ut verus sit cibus & potus, quo homo pascitur, reficitur & vivificatur ad vitam æternam (7). By the way, Hemmingius acknowledges, that his confession agrees with that of Ausburg, with Luther's short Catechism, and with the system of the doctrine of the Saxon Churches; and he declares, that he retracts all he has said in his Syntagma, which may have offended the churches, and which is conformable to the opinion of Calvin with regard to the last supper, or does not agree with the present confession. Cum jam abster in Syntagmate suo scripserit juxta sententiam Calvini de re sacramentaria quo Ecclesiæ offensæ sint, & quod cum hac sua præsentis Confessione pugnet, id quicquid sit in universum revocare, & hoc suo scripto revocatum velle

(8). He begs pardon of the King and of all those whom his Syntagma had offended (9). It is manifest that there is Lutheranism in his confession; and we may be persuaded that those Doctors, who obliged Hemmingius to retract, dictated to him such expressions as they imagined would be best adapted to take off all equivocation; and to denote, in the most express and exact manner, his orthodoxy and the abjuration of his error. Nevertheless, the reader would never imagine what efforts the Divine, quoted by me, made, in order to prove that Hemmingius did not make a recantation. The parentheses and Nota Bene, with which he divides or interrupts the words of the confession, in order to elude Masius's consequences and pretensions, appear, to him, so solid, that he is not afraid to assert, that Hemmingius retracted but very few things; and that good Calvinists ought, agreeably to the dictates of their consciences, to sign this confession explained and understood according to its true sense. Videt itaque rursum vir clarissimus, quantillum id sit quod hac confessione sua Hemmingius revocavit, cui & nos dummodo dextre intelligantur & recte explicentur possumus adstipulari; & quam procul ille adhuc absuerit tum cum collegis à fide synovis Lutherana (10). From hence let us conclude, that it is difficult to draw up such a formulary, as may take away all occasion for dispute. A person may imagine that he has anticipated or prevented every thing that has the air of equivocation; but he afterwards shall find that an adversary invents a thousand evasions; and would persuade him that his thoughts and ideas were very different from what he knew them to be. In certain cases this is attempting, what Pericles attempted, and in which he succeeded. Whenever he received a fall in wrestling, he would persuade the spectators that he did not fall (11). The reader will perhaps here call to mind a malicious observation he may have read in the History of the Variations (12). "Lutherans assert, in their Book de Concordia, that Luther break-

"was prompted to employ that expression (13) by the subtleties of the Sacramentarians, who found means to adapt to their present moral presence, what Luther said strongest and clearest, in favour of the real and substantial presence; whereby, by the way, we once again see, that we are not to wonder if the defenders of the figurative sense find means to draw over the fathers to their side; since Luther himself, living and speaking, he who knew their subtleties, and who attempted to combat them, could scarce find out any terms but they would bring them to their sense by the manner in which they interpreted them; tired out with their subtleties, he wanted to search out some expression, which it would be impossible for them to change, and he drew up the article of Smalcalde in the form we have seen." The Bishop of Meaux might have found a strong example of all this in the Church of Rome. The Bull of Innocent X against the tenets of Janſenius, did not hinder the Janſenists from finding means to dispute. They intrenched themselves within a great number of subtleties, and a thousand distinctions. To force them thence, Alexander VII was made to speak in a clearer manner; and every thing was inserted in this Bull, that appeared adapted to destroy the distinctions and subtleties of Port-Royal. But all this was to no purpose; for the Janſenists continued to assert, that the doctrine of Janſenius had not been condemned: Arnauld displayed an hundred observations, borrowed from the most subtle Logic (14). The Pope would have been greatly astonished at the perusal of such a writing; he would have seen the vanity of his precautions; he would have perceived, that it would have been proved to him, that he did not mean what he knew very well he really meant. I find, he might have said, that you know my own thoughts better than myself do. What a fine thing was the Connotatum of Cardinal Laurea (15)! And when we reflect on the endless distinctions that must be made, in order to distinguish clearly, between what the Bulls do, and do not ordain (16); we plainly perceive that the infallibility of St. Peter's Chair is of no use, unless we suppose, either that every particular man is thoroughly acquainted with the subtlest rules of Logic, or that every Parish Priest is infallible.

[D] Simon Goulart was so well pleased with his Tracts on Divinity, that he reprinted them at Geneva in 1586.] See the epistle dedicatory to the edition he

1 am

(10) Sam. And. Epist. ad Anton. Horneck, pag. 67.

(11) See the article PERICLES remark [D], before the first

(12) Mr. de Meaux, Hist. des Variations, liv. 4. num. 37. pag. m. 181.

(13) Viz. that the bread was the true body.

(14) See the Writings which have been published, pag. 240, & seq. of tom. 4. of Tradition de l'Eglise Romaine sur la Grace, printed at Liege, 1696.

(15) See tom. 4. of Tradition de l'Eglise Romaine sur la Grace, pag. 131, & seq.

(16) See what is cited of Melchior Canus, in the same tom. 4. of Tradition, pag. 120, & seq. procured

(c) Lud. d. Gerard à Renesse, Not. in Apolog. Belg. Eccles. pag. 114.

(d) Ibidem, ibid.

(e) Ibidem, ibid. pag. 111.

I am to add, that when he was seventy years old, he wrote a book intitled, Immanuel, which seems calculated chiefly to oppose James Andreas, the grand fautor of Ubiquitism (c). This work, which is greatly applauded (d), was not printed till after the author's death. It was published at Frankfort anno 1615 (e), with a preface, which will furnish us with a supplement, on what we said concerning the vigour with which the book of Concord was rejected by the King of Denmark [E].

procured of them. By the way, he informs the readers, that he has illustrated certain things which Hemmingius had not sufficiently explained, and which offended many persons.

[E] Here follows . . . a supplement, on what we said (17) concerning the vigour with which the . . . Liber Concordiæ was rejected by the King of Denmark.]

(17) In the remark [A].

(18) He is called, at first, Robert Alenon, in the Notes which I shall cite below; but he afterwards is called always Robinson.

(19) Præfatio Libri Hemmingii, cui titulus Immanuel, apud Ludovicum Gerardum à Renesse, Not. in Apolog. Reformatarum in Belgio Ecclesiarum Episcopalam, ad, & contra Auctores Libri Bergensis, dicti, Concordiæ, pag. 111.

An Englishman (18), who drew up the preface to this posthumous work of Hemmingius, informs us (19), that Queen Elizabeth used her utmost endeavours, in order to make the King of Denmark reject it. He relates a great many particulars concerning the indignation with which this Prince was fired; and, among others, the following, viz. that the Liber Concordiæ, which had been sent to him, covered with silk and adorned with jewels, was nevertheless thrown into the fire; imo, quod memorabile imprimis est, à pietissimo Danorum Rege Frederico 2. ab aula Electorali Saxoniam, ut ut missus, holserice obductus, auro, gemisque pretiosis affabre ornatus magno & pio Zelo Vulcano traditus est, annexâ gravissimâ pœnâ & inspectione ejus rei universi Regni Episcopis demandata sub confiscatione, in regnum ne importaretur, ibidemque distraheretur, neve sub exilio certissimo ab ullo possideretur, eo quod in illo nova, & in istis regionibus antè inaudita, ac (prout habet ipsum diploma Regium in librum Concordiæ vibratum, à doctis viris mihi non semel in Dania explicatum) inusitata comprehenderentur dogmata: recepta verò ibi ex adverso sunt cum Lutberi, Philippi quoque scripta, inter hæc cum primis CORPUS DOCTRINÆ, tributivæque illæ, ac declamatoriæ conclusiones S. Cathedralis pulvæ (20). i. e. "Nay, the most remarkable circumstance is, that it was cast into the flames, with a holy zeal, by that most pious Monarch, Frederic II King of Denmark, notwithstanding that it had been sent him from the Elector of Saxony's court; it being covered entirely with silk, and very richly and skilfully adorned with gold and precious stones. He also prohibited, under a very severe penalty, the importing or distributing it in his dominions; and the inspection of that affair was committed to all the Bishops of the Kingdom, upon the penalty of confiscation; and that no person should pretend to keep it by them, upon pain of certain banishment: because it contained many new and strange doctrines, and such as were unheard of in those parts (these are the express words of the royal edict, enacted against the book of Concord, as frequently explained to me by a learned man in Denmark.) On the contrary, the books of Luther and Philip Melancthon are received here, and particularly the CORPUS DOCTRINÆ; whilst most seditious and declamatory sermons are drove from the pulpit." He observes that Hutterus has greatly condemned this conduct of his Danish Majesty: Heroicum istud Regis Frederici factum vocat (Hutterus in libro quem appellat CONCORDIA CONCORS) durum nimis & Rhadamantheum plane, Regemque & quidem Christianum haud decens, sed cum enormi, tantoque Rege indignâ prorsus animi impotentia, & nimia affectuum vehementia conjunctum, quod tanti Regis dignitatem, prudentiam, & existimationes haud leviter, omnibus, qui saltem aliquid judicare possunt, suspectas reddi. i. e. "Hutterus, in the book intitled by him CONCORDIA CONCORS, calls this heroic action of King Frederic, too severe, and altogether Rhadamanthean; no ways becoming a Monarch and a Christian; that it was attended with such a weakness and heat of passion, as was quite unworthy so great a Prince: and that it gives persons of any judgment reason to call in question his dignity, prudence, and reputation." But that it has been exceedingly applauded by Christopher Knobius, in the Funeral Oration of this Monarch, I shall cite the passage. It will shew the ardent zeal of this Prince, who used often to say, that this dispute of the Lutherans had given rise to more evils, than the Turks had occasioned by the plunder of the provinces in which it had taken birth. Christophorus Knobius Aulicus illius (Regis) Concionator in Concione funebri in exequiis Regis habita anno 1588. 5 Junii sic de illo loquitur: Sollicitus erat ne sui quoque Doctores in abyssum hujus periculosa & nocentissima disputationis abriperentur, ideoque noluit isti negotio immisceri: etiam querebatur, damnum quod Christiana Ecclesia ex hac disputatione sentiebat, non posse tali Concordiæ Bergensis formula sanari: & sciunt complures honestissimi viri, quanto cum affectu id factum doleret, quinimo illum sæpius dixisse, si Turca illas regiones, in quibus hæc certamina nata sunt, & adoleverunt, depopulatus fuisset, non tantum damni potuisse inferri, quantum hæc disputatio intulit, nec finem posse videri hujus certaminis (21). Q. Elizabeth employ- ed the same comparison in her letter to that Prince (22), "Your country, says she, has suffered more havock by this pretended concord, than if the Turks had laid all waste with fire and sword. The author (23) who relates this particular, observes that the Ministers of Holland prevailed with this Queen, to use her endeavours to engage Frederic II, King of Denmark, to reject the Liber Concordiæ. It appears by the preface to Hemmingius's work, that the successor to this King of Denmark continued to reject the book in question, for which the author of the preface applauds him greatly. Robinson pag. 10. ejusdem ad Lectorem præfationis sic concludit. Deus qui nunquam deest Ecclesiæ suæ, irrequietorum talium hominum conatus, ut olim pios Magistratus, in Dania præsertim, mirè impedivit; ita etiam nunc per optimi patris optimum filium, re & nomine verè Christianum, paternis vestigiis severè insistentem, pietate, & justitiâ regna sua firmantem, Pontificiorum, Ubiquitariorum, & aliorum schismaticorum ac turbulentorum hominum studia maturè, & prudenter ita ipsâ herbâ reprimentem, benignè retardavit (24). i. e. "Robinson, in page 10 of his preface, concludes as follows. As God, who never abandons his church, checked, in a wonderful manner, the attempts of those restless spirits, as formerly, by pious magistrates, particularly in Denmark; so likewise has he, in our days, graciously curbed them, by the excellent son of a most excellent father; a Christian not less in reality than in name; a Prince who treads exactly in his father's steps; establishing his Kingdom in piety and justice, and wisely restraining, in their infancy, the designs of Papiists, Ubiquitarians, and other schismatical and factious persons."

(20) Præf. eadem, ex L. G. à Renesse, pag. 111.

I will be so frank as to own here, that I do not draw from the fountain-head, and that I have no other original but the notes of Lawis Gerard à Renesse, on a letter which he caused to be reprinted at Breda in 1651 (25); and which had been first published, anno 1579, in Latin, in Flemish, and in German. It is the entitled Apologética Reformatarum in Belgio Ecclesiarum Episcopala, ad, & contra Auctores Libri Bergensis, dicti, Concordiæ. Gerard à Renesse does not know the author of it; but I know that it has been ascribed to the Prince of Orange. Anno 1579, Petrus Villerius Gailus concionator aulicus Principis Auriaci, Polypragmaticus, sub ministrorum Belgicorum nomine Epistolam criminatipriam contra Auctores libri Concordiæ publicavit (27). i. e. "In the year 1579, Peter Villiers, a native of France, Chaplain to the Prince of Orange, and a very pragmatic man, published an epistle, in the reproachful strain, under the names of the Dutch Ministers, against the authors of the book of Concord."

(21) Lud. Gerardus à Renesse, Not. in Epist. Apolog. Eccles. Reformatarum in Belgio, pag. 113.

(22) Scribens ad Augustum Electorem sic inter alia, si Turca totam tuam dittonem, ferro flammaque vastasset, tanta non dedisset damna quanta ex concordia diicordia negotio accipit. Idem, ibid. pag. 114. ex Joh. Lampadii Epist. Dedic. Centuræ Ubiquitatis.

(23) Joh. Lam-padii, ibid.

(24) Lud. Gerardus à Renesse, ibid.

(25) He was a Minister, and Professor of Divinity.

(26) See in the remark [S] of the article CHARLES V, the passage of Grotius's Annals, in which the Prince of Orange is ascribed to this Peter de Villiers.

(27) Schyffelsberg, lib. 2. Theol. Calviniana, cap. 7. apud Schulting. Biblioth. Catbol. tom. 1. pag. 23.

HENAULT (N.), a French Poet of the seventeenth Century; "author of the Sonnet"

VOL. VI.

X

"net

net on Mademoiselle de Guerchi [A]; and Madam des Houliere's master, had a considerable reputation at Paris during his life-time, and it still subsists, though he has been dead fourteen years (a). Indeed, as his merit was not printed [B], to speak after Menage, his reputation could not be spread like that of many others, who never enjoyed, in Paris, so great a reputation as Henault did. He was a man of genius and erudition; loving to refine on pleasures, and to debauch with art and delicacy. But he was most strangely wrong-headed in one respect, he professing Atheism, and priding himself in his opinion with a most detestable affectation and fury. He had drawn up three different systems with regard to the mortality of the soul [C], and

[A] Author of the sonnet on Mademoiselle de Guerchi. Before I published, in the remark [G] of the article SPINOZA, the extract of the letter which contains these particulars, I had already observed (1), that he was taught that the sonnet de l'Avorton (of the immature child) had been composed by Henault, and wrote on occasion of Mademoiselle de Guerchi. But the instant my Dictionary had reached London, a learned English Gentleman did me the honour to inform me by letter, I. That he knew from the first hand, that this sonnet had been published two or three years before Mademoiselle de Guerchi's death. II. That persons who pretend to be perfectly well acquainted with this affair, declared that it was wrote by Subligni, author of the Fausse Clélie. I shewed this to the learned Gentleman, who had favoured me with the letter, an extract whereof I inserted in the article of Spinoza. He answered, "that Mr. Lucas had declared to him, that the sonnet on the immature birth, was wrote twenty years before the accident which befell Mademoiselle de Guerchi; but that all the other Poets whom he had consulted, declared, that it was made on a miscarriage of that beautiful Lady, but different from that which cost her life. Twenty of my friends, added he, who have lived with Henault, assured me, that this sonnet was certainly wrote by him, and that he owned himself to be the author of it. Subligni (*) was but a school-boy when that piece appeared; his widow and daughter confirmed to me, that it was not written by him." We may lay it down as an undoubted fact, viz. that the sonnet in question was composed by our Henault; for we shall find below, that it was inserted in the collection of that Poet's works: but we have strong reason to doubt, whether it was made one Mademoiselle de Guerchi. It is looked upon, though not written according to the rules (2), to be a master-piece, and though there is a barbarism in it (3).

[B] His merit was not printed. This has been found a false assertion: "Mr. d'Henault himself, in his life-time, printed a small collection of his works at Paris, which was sold by Barbin, anno 1670, in 12mo, and intitled, Oeuvres diverses . . . par le Sieur D. H. (Miscellanies . . . by Mr. D. H.) It is dedicated to Monsieur Doort without any other title. It contains prose and verse, with Letters in prose and verse a Sapho, which very probably was Madam des Houlieres. The Sonnet on the immature birth (l'Avorton) is inserted in it. . . I must not omit taking notice of the first piece in this work, intitled, De la Consolation, à Olympe. It will furnish me with two critical Observations; first, that the compilers of St. Evremont's works, misled perhaps by some person, or by a supposed conformity in the style; have inserted that whole letter, which is a very long one, among the works of St. Evremont; and many people who look upon themselves as judges, supposed that he was really author of this piece. This is an example you may add to those you have collected, concerning the errors, into which critics are daily led by this conformity of style. The second observation falls directly on a new Censor . . . who has attempted a judgment on Mr. de St. Evremont's works (†) . . . This writer has, throughout, fallen into the snare laid by the compilers beforementioned. He attacks the consolatory letter à Olympe, with regard to the style, the thoughts, and sentiments; and employs a quarter of his book in this fine sort of criticism." This I have found in a collection of remarks, with which a young Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris was pleased to favour me, anno 1698; remarks that prove the author of them is a man of incomparable sense, and is thoroughly acquainted with a vast number of curious particulars which are perfectly well suited to this Dictionary (4) (2).

§ (2) Mr. Bayle does not mention in this remark the following verses, which are inserted in his Oeuvres diverses &c.

(4) See the end of the remark [2] of the article of the third Duke of GUISE.

E Senecæ Thieste, Actus II. Chorus.

*Illi mors gravis incubat,
Qui notus nimis omnibus,
Ignotus moritur sibi.*

Imitation of the Latin lines above.

*Heureux est l'inconnu, qui s'est bien su connaître;
Il ne voit pas de mal à mourir plus qu'à naître;
Il s'en va comme il est venu:
Mais hélas! que la Mort fait une horreur extrême
À qui meurt de tous trop connu,
Et trop peu connu de soy-même!*

REM. CRIT.

The sense is,
"Happy is the obscure man, who has well known himself. To him dying appears no more fatal than the being born: He leaves the world in the same manner as he came into it. But alas! how dreadful must death appear to that man, who dies too much known to the world, and too little to himself!"

[C] He had drawn up three different systems with regard to the mortality of the soul. I shall give another passage from the Collection of Remarks just mentioned. "Henault says in his dedication, You know that I am a man wholly internal; that I do not place any felicity in the opinion of others; and that my maxims and errors differ pretty much from those of the rest of the world. He here begins to discover what he was. Several of his verses are imitations of Seneca's Chorus's, and among others of Act II of the Troades, where the mortality of the soul is laid down as a principle; this was a subject that hit his taste.

*Comme se perd en un moment
Cette portion d'air dans les corps enfermée,
Que le plus actif élément
Développe & pousse en fumée;
Comme au souffle des aquilons
On voit bien-tôt évanouïe
Une grosse nuée ou de grêle ou de pluie,
Qui d'un déluge affreux menace les valons;
Ainsi s'épand cette ame vaine
Qui meurt tous les ressorts de la machine humaine.
Tout meurt en nous quand nous mourons;
La mort ne laisse rien, & n'est rien elle-même,
Du peu de tems que nous durons
Ce n'est que le moment extrême, &c.*

The sense is,
"As is lost, in an instant, that portion of air, pent up in bodies, which the most active element causes to evaporate in smoke; as, by the blast of furious winds, we see soon dispersed a thick cloud of hail or rain, which threatened the vallies with a dreadful deluge: In like manner that vain soul, which moves the several springs of the human machine is evaporated * * * Death does not leave any thing, and is nothing itself. Of the short space that we live, it is but the last moment &c."

"I am surprized that this should be printed with the King's

(1) In the article PATIN, pag. 744. Letter (d). I have suppressed that in this 2d edition.

(*) He was esteemed in the Law-Courts. He wrote some Plays, and the Critique of Andromaque.

(2) See Amitiez Amours & Amourtes de Mr. le Puy, liv. 3. Letter 4.

(3) See Father Bouhours, Manière de bien penser, pag. 373. Dutch edit.

(†) Dissertation sur les Oeuvres de St. Evremont, 1698, in 12mo, Paris, by the Sieur Dumonti. This is a mistake. It is ascribed to Mr. Cotolendi, author of the Arlequiniana; some imagine that Mr. Erard, a famous Counsellor, had a considerable share in it.

“ went to Holland, purposely to visit Spinoza, who nevertheless did not much esteem his erudition. But things wore a quite different face at his death; he being a convert, and was then for carrying matters to the other extreme; for his Confessor was forced to prevent his receiving the Viaticum or Sacrament with a halter about his neck, in the middle of his bed-chamber. D’Henault was not well descended, his father being a baker; and he himself had been at first Receiver of the Taxes at Forès, but was not successful in that employment. He instructed Madam des Houlières in all he knew, or imagined to know; and it is pretended that this is evident from the works of that Lady [D].” Here follows the extract of a letter which a learned man did me the honour to write to me, the 27th of April 1696. He wrote me another letter dated the 19th of July 1697, by which he informed me, that d’Henault drew up a case or plea for Mr. de Clodorè, Governor of Martinico, against Mr. de la Barre, Governor of the American Islands; and a manifesto of Mr. de Gadagne, with regard to the affair of Gigeri. An elegy (b) and an eclogue (c) of this author are published in the Furetieriana. To this elegy this encomium is prefixed; Monseigneur d’Henault was universally esteemed . . . he was a man of the biggest civility, and of an amorous complexion. He wrote a Sonnet, which gave Mr. Colbert an opportunity to perform a fine action [E]. He was married, and

(b) Pag. 77. of the Dutch edit.

(c) Pag. 238.

“ King’s privilege. Henault’s heart was of a tender cast, he using to say to his mistress;

“ *Sappho fit des vers comme vous,
Faites l’amour comme elle?*

The sense is,

“ Sappho, like you, was a Poetess: Do you make love as she did?”

“ He will have her renounce all thoughts of fame and glory.

“ *Pour moi je ne suis point le dupe de la gloire;
Je vous quitte ma place au Temple de memoire,
Et je ne conçois point que la loi du trespas
Doive épargner mon nom & ne m’épargner pas.
Je me mets au dessus de cette erreur commune,
On meurt, & sans ressource & sans reserve aucune.
S’il est apres ma mort quelque reste de moi,
Ce reste un peu plus tard suivra la même loi,
Fera place à son tour à de nouvelles choses,
Et se replongera dans le sein de ses causes.*

(†) Mais les gens de delà les Monts Aurent bientôt pleuré cet homme, Car il descend les Jeannetons, chose très-necessaire à Rome. i. e. “ But the Italians will soon have bewailed that man; for he will not suffer any whores, which are so very necessary in Rome.”

“ With regard to my self, I am not the dupe of glory; I resign to you my seat in the Temple of Fame; and I cannot conceive that the law of death should exempt my name and not spare me. I soar above that vulgar error  If, after my death, any part of me should survive, that part will, not long after, follow the same law; will make way, in its turn, for new things, and plunge again into the abyfs of its causes.

La Fontaine, Oeuv. Posth. speaking of Innocent XI. Quand l’objet en mon cœur a place, Et qu’à mes yeux il est joli, Dono mmen quod libet illi (β). Idem, ibid.

“ This is not a translation, but an original; and in this manner Henault scattered the seeds of his errors up and down his works. In the two pieces inserted in the Furetieriana, are found the same tenets, which he endeavoured to introduce on all occasions. His Compositions are filled, not only with impious ideas, but likewise with images of an obscene kind. Some are found in a piece intitled, Le Bail d’un cœur à Cloris, inserted in this collection; and this Cloris might certainly be one of the Jeannetons mentioned by la Fontaine (†). These verses are more obscene than all the tales, and deserve more to be condemned by the civil Magistrate.”

(β) This Latin ought to form a verse of the same measure with the two preceding, which consist but of six syllables. Read therefore Do nomen in La Fontaine’s Oeuvres posthumes. REM. CRIT.

[D] It is pretended that this is evident from the works of that Lady.] The reader may have seen, in pag. 1088, vol. 2. of the first edition of this Dictionary, that the Gentleman to whom the words of this text belong, adds immediately, I have seen people among other verses, remark the following in the Idyllium of the Rivulet ()*.

(*) It is in page 164 of tom. 1. of Poesies de Madame des Houlières. It is inserted also in the Courier Galant for May 1693, pag. 532.

“ *Courez, ruisseau, courez, fuyez & reportez
Vos ondes dans le sein des mers dont vous sortez:
Tandis que pour remplir la dure destinée
Où nous sommes assujettis
Nous irons reporter la vie infortunée
Dans le sein du neans d’où nous sommes sortis.*

The sense is,

“ Glide on, stream, fly, and convey back your waters into the bosom of the sea whence you arise:

“ whilst, to complete the severe fate to which we are subjected, we shall go and carry back ill-fated life, into the abyfs of Non-entity whence we sprung.”

It is certain that a person who should express himself after this manner dogmatically, would deny the immortality of the soul; but let us, for the honour of Madam des Houlières, conclude that she only followed some poetical ideas whence no consequence is to be drawn. Thus, in imitation of the ancient Poets, she has said in another place (5), that our souls, after death, wander on the shores of hell. But this, had Henault intilled his impious tenets into her, would not have been her belief. We must not form a judgment of her from her poetical phrases; not but that a Poet may conceal the most licentious ideas, by means of the privileges of versification. The Counsellor already mentioned has made a note on that passage. “ You quoted, says he to me in his letter, some verses of Madame des Houlières, which are suspected of being too licentious; but you have been made to omit others (†), that are equally licentious, and which are published in her volume of Poems. But we must be impartial and speak the truth: there are a great number of other moral, and even Christian and holy pieces, scattered up and down her works, which correct this single one. However, endeavours were used to make her pass for a Libertine; she complaining of this in her epistle to Father de la Chaîse on false devotees or hypocrites. Madam des Houlières was a woman of wonderful fine genius, the honour of her sex, and the shame of ours.

(5) See the article PLOTINUS, remark [A].

(†) Nous irons reporter la vie infortunée, QUE LE HAZARD NOUS A DONNÉE, Dans le sein du neant d’où nous sommes sortis.

I am to observe that no one could assert that Madam des Houlières, upon pretence of her advancing that we sprung from Nothing; believed the creation; for Henault shews pretty evidently (6), that by the word neant (nothing or non-entity) he does not mean the privation of existence, but a privation (simply) of life, in which sense he did not admit of the creation.

[E] He wrote a Sonnet, which gave Mr. Colbert an opportunity of doing a fine action.] The collection of remarks above cited, furnishes me with another good Commentary. “ To return to d’Henault, it is of him that Boileau speaks in two places in Satyr 9.

Je le declare donc Haynault () est un Virgile (α).*
“ I here declare that Haynault is a Virgil.”

(*) He spelt his name in that manner purposely to disguise him.

“ But Mr. . . . (†) himself told me, that he thought him a pretty good Poet; and that his best piece, not with respect to the subject, but the manner in which he had treated it, was a Sonnet levelled at Mr. Colbert, and which began thus,

(†) Boileau is here understood.

“ Ministre avare & lascie, esclave malheureux.

“ Base, griping Minister, detested slave.”

“ Mr. Colbert did a very noble action on this occasion. Being told of this Sonnet which made a vast noise at that time, he asked whether there were no satyrical and left a daughter who is Boarder in a monastery at Paris. The notes on this article include a great number of particulars that have been communicated to me. The reader may have recourse to them.

“ satyrical strokes in it against the King ; being told that there were none, he then declared that he would not mind it, nor shew the least resentment against the author. Is not this still finer than the Sonnet ?”

§ (a) In the Amsterdam edit. of 1695 it is Quinaut, both in this place, and above, in the same Satyr ; and Hainault is not mentioned in any part of it. REM. CRIT.

[In the Amsterdam edition of 1717, with the excellent Notes of Mr. Brossette, our Hainault (whose name is there spelt Hainaut) is thus mentioned in verse 97. of Satyr 9.

Que vous ont fait Perrin, Bardin, Pradon, Hainaut ?

“ What ill have you received from Perrin, Bardin, Pradon and Hainaut ?”

But with regard to the verse abovementioned, cited from Boileau, our Hainault is not there named, but only Quinaut, in manner following :

Je le déclare donc ; Quinaut est un Virgil.

“ I here declare, that Quinaut is a Virgil.” Rem. by the Translator.

HENICHIUS (JOHN) Professor of Divinity in the University of Rintel, in the country of Hesse, was son to a Minister of Winhusen, and was born in January 1616. He went through the School-Classics at Zell and Lunenburg, and then was sent to Helmstadt anno 1634, and after having studied there four years, was received Doctor in Philosophy in that place. Having afterwards read some Lectures, and presided in public disputations, he gained the friendship in an especial manner of Doctor Calixtus and Doctor Horneius, two famous Divines. He went to Hildesheim near the close of the year 1639, and lived about three years there, in the house of a Gentleman of merit (a). He afterwards went and travelled towards the Rhine, and then resided some time with James Lampadius in Hanover. He was appointed Professor of Metaphysics and of Hebrew, in the University of Rintel, anno 1643 ; and a year and a half after this, he was invited to Bardewik, to be Superintendent. He discharged the duties of that employment during five years, and with so much care and diligence, that Duke Augustus of Brunswick would have appointed him sole inspector of the diocese of Wolfenbuttel, but he did not accept of it. He even quitted his employment, because the fatigues it had brought upon him, had thrown him into a long fit of sickness. He returned to Rintel in 1651, in order to be Professor of Divinity in that city. He received, in a solemn manner, the honours of a Doctor's degree in the same Faculty ; and it was not long before a seat was given him in the Ecclesiastical Consistory ; and he was also made Inspector of the Churches in the Earldom of Schauenburg (b). He gave a proof of his erudition, by the considerable number of books which he published [A]. He was a man of great candor and moderation, and ardently wished that there might be an union between the Lutherans and Calvinists [B] ; and

(a) Ad nobiliss. atque præbrenu-um Virum D. Fredericum Wilhelmum GAN-STRUM se contulit, apud quem triennium fere satis commode exegit. Apud Witte, Memor. Theologor. Decad. 13. pag. 1716.

(b) The city of Rintel is in the Earldom.

[A] The considerable number of books which he published. Here follows the catalogue of them as given by de Witte (1). Dissertatio de Majestate civili : Rintel. 1653, in 4to. De Cultu creaturarum & imaginum Dissert. ibid. 1653, in 4to. De libertate Arbitrii, imprimis de concursu cause secundæ cum primis : ibid. 1645, in 4to. De Officio boni Principis pique Subditi : ibid. 1661, in 12mo. Dissertatio de Pœnitentia lapsorum : ibid. 1659, in 4to. De Gratia & Prædestinatione Dissertatio : ibid. 1663, in 4to. Compendium S. Theologiæ : ibid. 1657, 1671, in 8vo. De Veritate Religionis Christianæ : ibid. 1667, in 12mo. Institutiones Theologicæ : Brunsvigæ, 1665, in 4to. Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ & Civilis Pars I, Rintel. 1669, Pars II, 1670, Pars III, 1674, in 4to. Disputationes aliquot emisse publicæ habuit, ex quibus est ; de Mysterio S. S. Trinitatis : De Confessione Augustini, de Fide & operibus, &c.

I have some little observations to make with regard to the work de Veritate Religionis Christianæ, in the catalogue above. It is an excellent supplement to that which Grotius has wrote on the same subject ; for Henichius lays open, clears up, and proves in a more ample manner, the reasons which Grotius had employed. This he observes in his title, which is as follows : quo ea, quæ vir illustris HUGO GROTIUS de hac materia commentatus est aliquanto uberius exponuntur. I am to observe by the way, that Grotius has been accused of being a plagiarist ; and I will insert an addition that was published at the end of the first volume of the first edition of this Dictionary, and which the Printer did not put in its proper place in the second edition. The words are as follow. “ In my opinion nothing was ever more false, than what was told Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Spon, viz. that Grotius had stole all the chief arguments for his book entitled “ Of the Truth of the Christian Religion from an Arabic author ; and particularly from the works of “ an excellent man whom the Latins considered as an “ arch-heretic, but whom the Copts hold for a saint ; “ who has wrote an excellent book against the Turks “ and against the Jews, for the truth of the Christian “ Religion (2).”

Note, that the three Volumes of Ecclesiastical History of our John Henichius, extend but to the end of the Vth Century ; and that notwithstanding the title premises the civil, as well as church history, yet the author has the latter chiefly in view. The first volume comprehends the three first centuries ; the second, the fourth century, and the third, the fifth century. Bosius who had said in his Schediasma de comparanda Notitia Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, that Henichius's work contained the six first centuries, was answered too roughly on that account. He acknowledged his error, and corrected it, with his own hand, in his copy of that work. It is very just to point out such errors ; but then this ought to be done without bitterness or an insulting air, remembering that such errors may be very easily committed. Aberrationem agnovit, ac manu sua in exemplari privato correxit : ut adeo acrem illam Clarissimi Sluteri censuram non videatur meruisse. Et quam facilis in his talibus sit lapsus, unusquisque intelligit (3). The author, who writes thus, observes, that Henichius, after giving the substance of the testimonies of ancient authors, then sets down the passages from them at full length. It was very justly observed, that this would be a recommendation of the work. Ceterum Henichianum opus vel eo etiam nomine meretur commendari, quod integra Auctorum veterum testimonia adscribat, quorum summam prius attulerat (4).

[B] He . . . ardently wished that there might be an union between the Lutherans and Calvinists.] He is applauded for this in his funeral programma (5) : Pacis & concordie perpetuus studiosus, nihilque magis in votis habebat, quam ut schisma inter Evangelicos funditus tolleretur, & togata prælia in suggestibus & Caedris cum salutaribus, DEO & hominibus gratâ pace, fausto

(1) Witte, Memoriar. Theolog. Dec. 13. pag. 1720.

(2) Wheeler's Voyage into Dalmatia, &c. lib. 2. pag. 163. Dutch edit. of 1639.

(3) In Propylæo Historiæ Christianæ, pag. 26.

(4) Caspar Sagitta Introduc. in Hist. Eccles. pag. 340.

(5) Idem, Sagitta ibid.

(6) Witte, Memoriar. Theolog. Dec. 13. pag. 1718.

(c) Extracted from his Funeral Program inserted by Mr. Witte in the 13th Decad Memor. Theolog. no. 1716, & pag. 1719.

and this perhaps was the cause of the many invectives that were vented against him. He married, in 1645, a very virtuous maiden, who was far from being barren, she bringing him thirteen children. He died at Rintel the 27th of June 1671 (c). Gerhard Wolter Molan made a very beautiful epitaph in his honour. It is inserted in page 338 and 339 of a work of Gaspar Sagittarius (d).

(d) Intituled, Introductio in Historiam Ecclesiasticam, and printed anno 1694.

sausto omine, commutarentur: qua de causa immortalem nominis gloriam apud omnes bonos adeptus est. i. e. "For ever desirous of peace and concord, there was nothing he more earnestly wished, than to have the schisms which were found among Protestants entirely taken away: and that instead of those debates and quarrels which break out among Divines, in their pulpits as well as chairs, we might be made happy in peace, which is so grateful both to God and man; and for that reason his name will be forever remembered with honour by all persons of virtue and goodness." The author of the Programma says a little after (6): Equidem invidia & malignitas, ut sunt virtutis fata, non unum in eum jaculata sunt fulmen; sed & illa, quae viventi gravis fuit, mortui fama, credo, saevabit, suamque vel imperitiam vel livorem tandem profitebitur. i. e. "Envy and malice, as is the fate of virtuous men, throw indeed their darts at him; but those, who grieved him while living, will, I am persuaded, increase his reputation now he is dead; and at last confess their ignorance or malice." He does not specify the causes of that malicious envy which persecuted Henichius; but I am of opinion, that the pacific disposition of this Professor furnished people with a pretence for slandering him.

(6) Ibid. pag. 1719.

HENRY VI, Emperor of Germany, and son of Frederic Barbarossa, was crowned by Pope Celestin III [A], the 15th of April 1191. He was marching, at the head of a powerful army, to possess the inheritance of Naples and Sicily, which belonged to the Empress Constantia his wife, after the death of young William King of Sicily (a). He was so much opposed in his endeavours to invest himself with the two Kingdoms abovementioned, that we may almost say, he obtained them by conquest. He was so much dreaded, that the Emperor Alexis, surnamed the Angel, could not obtain a peace but upon condition of paying him a tribute (b). Had Henry done this only, his valour would be applauded; but all the encomiums he may have deserved on that account are overbalanced by the perfidy and cruelty he shewed, in his extirpating, on false pretences, all such as survived of the posterity of those brave Normans, who had conquered that part of Italy which the Empress his consort, who was heiress to their dominions, gave him a right to possess (c). It is related that this Princess, to punish him for the guilt abovementioned, made him swallow the poison of which he died at Messina, anno 1198, at thirty two years of age (d). He left a son, who was afterwards the Emperor Frederic II. Constantia was so far advanced in years when she was delivered of this son, that, in order to avoid all suspicion of his being supposititious, she was delivered in public [B]: however, notwithstanding these precautions, it was yet said this was a spurious child [C]. Some authors assert, that Constantia was neither a Nun, nor very far advanced in years, when she married Henry VI [D].

(a) See Maimbourg, Dicad. de l'Empire, liv. 5. pag. m. 476.

(b) Maimbourg, ibid.

(c) Ibid. pag. 477.

(d) Maimbourg, Dicad. de l'Empire, liv. 5. pag. 477. citing the Abbot of Ursperg.

HENRY

[A] He was crowned by Pope Celestin III. The following circumstance is related of his coronation. As the Emperor "was at his feet, Celestin, who set the crown on his head, lifted up his foot, and kicked the crown down, to shew that he could bestow, and take it away. Baronius applauds this action; but things, in my opinion, have changed their aspect since; and not a single Prince would subscribe very sincerely to this Cardinal's opinion (1)." I cite the author who delivers himself in this manner.

(1) Chevreau, Hist. du Monde, liv. 5. ch. 2. pag. 75. of tom. 3. Dutch edit. of 1687.

[B] To avoid all suspicion of the child's being supposititious, she was delivered in public. Here follows a passage from Brantome, that deserves our perusal. "Constantia, Queen of Sicily, who, from her youth, and during her whole life, had never stirred from a cloyster, but there led a vestal life; quite forsaking the convent at fifty years of age, tho' not handsome and very decrepit, yet would taste the sweets of the flesh; and marrying, had a child when fifty two years old, of which she resolved to lie-in publickly in the plains and meads of Palermo; she having caused a tent and pavilion to be erected there for that purpose, in order that the world might not suspect that her child was supposititious; and this was one of the greatest miracles that had been seen since the time of St. Elizabeth. It is nevertheless said in the History of Naples, that the child was looked upon as spurious; however, he became a great man; but most bastards are valiant, as a great man told me one day (2)." [C] However, notwithstanding these precautions, it was yet said that this was a spurious child. Brantome has just now informed us of this; but here follows an author who will point out the proofs of it better. "It has been found, says he (3), that women of fifty years old and upwards, had been delivered

(2) Brantome, Dames galantes, tom. 2. p. 207.

(3) Camerac. Meditat. Histor. vol. 2. liv. 4. ch. 7. pag. 296.

of children. Of this we have an example in that renowned Nun, Constantia by name, mother to Frederic II, who being taken out of a convent, was the only heiress and Queen of Sicily. This Princess being with child at fifty two years of age complete, to remove all suspicion, caused a pavilion to be set up, in a public place of a certain city of Sicily, and, in presence of the greatest Ladies of the Country would lie-in publickly. However, many disputed the reality of this incident, and among others the Marquis of Ancona, Marquardus by name, who offered to prove, that the child in question was not the issue of Henry and Constantia, but was supposititious, as is asserted by Pandolfo Colenuccio (4). If it can be said, that the most subtle precautions are of no use against love, it may be said that they are of no use against ambition. Do whatever lies in your power to convince the world, that such and such a delivery was not imaginary and chimerical, but very real, still people will have always answers ready to make. The expedient which cured St. Thomas's incredulity, is almost the only one that can be proof against those cavils; unless I put my finger, &c. will it be objected, as that Apostle did, I will not believe (4). Nay, I know not whether, after feeling, such persons will not say, I indeed have seen and felt how the child came out, but not how it got in. Had your husband abilities sufficient to beget it?

(4) Liv. 4. de Hist. de Naples.

[D] Some authors assert that Constantia was neither a Nun, nor very far advanced in years when she married Henry VI. It is generally thought that she was taken out of a convent, and that a dispensation was granted her, in order that she might marry the Emperor Henry VI; and that she was with child at about fifty five years of age. But some Historians deny this. Here follows the sequel of the abovesaid passage of Camerarius (5): "Perhaps John Michael Brutus

(4) St. John chap. xx. ver. 25.

(5) Camerac. Meditat. Hist. vol. 2. liv. 4. pag. 296.

HENRY II King of France succeeded Francis I his father, the last day of March 1547. One of the first things he did was, to act in direct opposition to the order which his father gave him in his expiring moments; I mean that, soon after his accession to the throne, he recalled the Constable of Mommorenci [A], whom Francis I had banished, for very good reasons (a). He paid dear for this his disobedience [B]; for it may be affirmed, that the most unhappy events which brought an odium on his reign, are owing to this Constable. To the ill conduct of this last mentioned, was owing the loss of the famous battle of St. Quentin (b); after which this Constable occasioned the concluding a treaty of peace (c), that reflected much greater ignominy on the French monarchy [C], than the loss of the abovementioned battle. He perhaps would not have prevailed

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) The 10th of Aug. 1557.

(c) That of Cateau in Cambresis, concluded in 1559.

(6) Lib. 2. de Institutiones Ital. Thus Camerarius quotes him in the Latin edit. of Frankfurt 1658, pag. 276.

Brutus (6) took occasion from this story, flatly to deny that Constantia had ever been a Nun or Abbess; or that Pope Celestine had dispensed with her marriage; forasmuch as, according to his calculation, she must then have been threescore. On the contrary, he quotes Hugo Falcandus the Historian, who says, that she was then in the flower of her age; and married to Henry, in the reign of William surnamed the Good, when Frederic Barbarossa was still living; but that this mistake was owing to the confusion of times. I am of opinion, says he, that she was brought from the royal palace to a convent of Nuns, when that the people mutinying, imprisoned King William surnamed the Bad; and that no place could be found more convenient to secure her, during those storms. When they were entirely abated, that Princess, who was at liberty, and had neither made the vows nor taken the veil, continued among the Nuns till such time as she married Henry."

[A] He recalled the Constable of Mommorenci. His father had seriously advised him, to make use of Annebaut as his chief minister, he having found him a person of great experience, wisdom, and zeal, and free from the least stain of avarice or ambition; but that he should particularly take care, if he had the happiness of his country at heart, not to recall the Constable of Montmorency Nevertheless, although he had shewn his royal father the most respectful obedience during his lifetime, yet he did not pay the least deference to his commands after his death. He divested Annebaut and Cardinal de Tournon of the administration of all affairs, to put Montmorency at the head of them (1). We shall now see that this most respectful obedience had such exceptions, as will not permit us to think, that Mezerai had reason to give it so good a character as he has done. "The precaution of King Francis was so great, that he expressly forbid the Dauphin his eldest son, afterwards Henry II, to have the least correspondence with the Constable. But all he obtained of his son was, for him to conceal, for seven years together, the friendship he had for the Constable. However, he did not conceal it with so much artifice, but that the whole Court knew, that a day did not pass without their receiving letters one from the other. But Francis I did not take the pains to break off this correspondence; whether it were that the Dauphin and Constable had been equally successful in concealing it from him; or that, having no other son but the Dauphin, he was afraid of disgusting him (2)."

These are Varillas's words, and they may very justly be criticized, for I had the Dauphin concealed his friendship seven years, he would not have been so often urgent with his father to recall the Constable; and yet Varillas asserts this last circumstance (3). II. How shall we reconcile this author's alternative, with what Mezerai relates (4), that the King was greatly displeased, because the Dauphin, notwithstanding his orders to the contrary, held a correspondence with the Constable of Montmorency?

[B] He paid dear for his disobedience.] Varillas will furnish me with a Commentary on this text. I will not cite him barely with regard to the reign of Henry II, but shall take his words something higher.

"The disgraces, says he (5), of the Constable of Montmorency, of Admiral Chabot, and of Chancellor Poyet, are told in such a manner in the ninth book, as will not surprize those who shall have read in Bodin's Republic, that Francis I, grew more peevish and four-tempered in proportion as he advanced in years: That he had been convinced, by his own experience, that he could not have made choice of two men, less proper for the intrigues of the Cabinet, than Montmorency and Chabot; and that, tho' he would not charge Poyet with the same defect, yet this Chancellor had one equally great, viz. his carrying things too far: That to these things were owing all the misfortunes which had befallen his Majesty; and that, should he continue to make use of the same Ministers, he must not expect to be more successful. The event proved, that the three Ministers who succeeded those that had been disgraced, were better qualified; and that if Henry II had not afterwards restored the Constable of Montmorency, he would not have been constrained, in order to recover him, to give up one hundred and ninety eight towns or strong-holds; and a country almost as large as the third part of France."

[C] The Constable occasioned the concluding a treaty of peace, that reflected much greater ignominy on the French Monarchy.] Mezerai, though, of all the French Historians, he most openly favours the subjects against the Court, nevertheless blames the people for discovering so much joy at that peace. "The people, says he (6), who always desire peace at any rate, rejoiced greatly at this. But the party of the Guises, the wise politicians, and all the nobility, censured it openly, as a palpable fraud, which lost France 198 strong-holds; for three only which were restored to her, viz. Ham, Catelet, and St. Quentin."

He expresses himself in still stronger terms in his larger History (7); for in deducing the articles of that peace, he afterwards inserts these words, that to unite more strongly the hearts of Princes, the following parenthesis

(but rather to cover, with some honourable pretence, the shame and loss which France sustained by this unfortunate treaty); and towards the close of the same page he says as follows. "These articles being brought to the King, and communicated by his Majesty to the Princes and greatest men of his realm, there were few people but judged them entirely disadvantageous and shameful to France; and indeed all the French condemned them universally by their murmurs. Brissac having had advice of this, although the articles had been disguised to him, dispatched Boyvin-Villars, who has left us Memoirs concerning the wars of Piedmont, to Court, with instructions to lay before the King his most humble remonstrances, and divert him from concluding so disadvantageous a peace. Concluding, that if his Majesty was resolved to give up what he possessed in Italy, which was worth the best Province in his Kingdom, and might bring in, clear, a revenue of 300000 crowns into his Exchequer, the only reward he desired, for all his good services, was, that his Majesty would please to banish him, together with all the forces which were in Italy, as rebels; and that he would be able to preserve the strong-holds which he held at the expence of the Milanese, and the Republic of Genoa; or at least that he should die gloriously in a country, where the forces of all Europe had not been able to make him lose an inch of ground, during the ten years that the defence of it had been committed to him. The King declared that he was highly pleased with his zeal; however, as his mind was wholly bent upon peace, he answered, that although he should conclude it upon the conditions which were proposed to him, he should retain the possession of strong-holds, &c. sufficient, to make himself be dreaded (8). Upon this Guise, prompted by his own interest, or

(6) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 715.

(7) Hist. de France, tom. 2. pag. 113.

(8) This recalls to my memory the following words of Trebellius Pollio; Pauci numerare inter hac tempora quum ista gereretur, que sepe Galliam malo generis humani quasi per jocum dixerit. Nam quum ei nuntiatum esset, Egyptum delivisse, dixisse fortur, Quid? sine lino Egypto esse non possimus? Quum autem vastatam Asiam & elementorum concursionibus & Scytharum incursionibus compersisset, Quid, inquit, sine aphonitria esse non possimus? Perdita Gallia arrisisset ac Non sine Atrabaticis sigis tota Resp. est? Sic denique de omnibus partibus nunti, quum eas amitteret, quasi darimentorum ministerium videtur affari, jocabatur. Trebell. Pollio, in Gallienis duobus, caps. 6. pag. m. 200.

(1) Mezerai, in the beginning of the History of Henry II, pag. 1057. of vol. 2. of the History of France.

(2) Varillas, Hist. de Henry II. liv. 1. pag. 6.

(3) Hist. de François I. liv. 12. pag. 295.

(4) Abrégé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 635.

(5) Preface to the Hist. of François I.

prevailed so easily with Henry II to consent to this disadvantageous peace, had that Prince not been fired with a spirit of persecution [D]. The Constable also merits great censure, for not giving his Sovereign good counsel, with respect to the Duchess of Valentinois, who, though of an age disproportionate to that of Henry II, did nevertheless keep

“ by the impulses of honour and conscience, interrupting him boldly, said, Your Majesty will pardon me if I tell you, that this is not the right way to effect it; and that though fortune should be as much your enemy, during twenty five years, as she was last year, you yet could not lose as much during that time, as what you are required to give up in one single day. It did not cost the late King, when overthrown and a prisoner, &c.” I omit all the arguments employed by the Duke of Guise, but not what follows them in the Historian. “ He said a great many other things in so vehement a tone of voice, that he often made the King change colour, but could not alter his resolution: the dye was cast, and whosoever was the cause of it, whether his favourites or his natural disposition, his courage was so greatly damped, that he was not able to continue the war any longer. He therefore raised the treaty, and peace was proclaimed the 10th of April. . . . All the French authors who have written concerning that period, call that peace the unfortunate and accursed. Brisac being told that it was concluded, cried out several times, Wretched France; how many calamities! . . . He continued Governor of the five cities, and of the eight castles which the King retained, with 8000 foot, and 450 horse, and restored the other places; but he first demolished the greatest part of them, and sold the ammunition according to the King's order; not without much difficulty to procure the money, and the necessary orders from the Court; because that the Constable, favouring the Duke of Savoy, did all that lay in his power to put the strong-holds entire into his hands, and even those which the King had reserved to himself (9).”

We shall see below (10), that the Court of France was so weak, as to be prevailed upon to evacuate, under Charles IX and Henry III, the few strong holds it had reserved; and there is no doubt but that the Constable, under Charles IX, had a great share in that mismanagement. When we reflect on the immense possessions he amassed, we must not say of him, as of so many others, that at the same time he managed the affairs of his Sovereign well, he managed his own extremely well; but we must say, that in managing his own affairs extremely well, he managed those of his Sovereign extremely ill. Did not he, under Charles IX, enter into a league with the Guises; and was not he the cause of the prodigious power they rose to; a power that was so fatal to the monarchy, and which had like to have given to France, a fourth race of Kings? When Francis I disgraced the Constable, he charged him with ignorance in the two principal duties of his employment, viz. war and politics (11). See the character which the adherents of the Guises give of him in Mezerai (12).

Some critics will perhaps say, that Mezerai extenuates too much the advantages which were granted Henry II by the treaty of Cateau. Why does he content himself with mentioning the three cities which were restored to France? Why does he suppress the conquest of Calais, Metz, Toul and Verdun? But this would be a very false criticism; for these four strong holds were not given up to Henry II by the treaty of Cateau. It left the Empire at full liberty to demand back the restitution of the three last; and bound France, by the most solemn engagement, to restore Calais to England in eight years. This circumstance was not observed by the anonymous Historian who spoke as follows (13). “ The King of France restored to the Spanish Monarch, whatever he had dispossessed him of, on both sides the Alps. Item, to the Prince of Piedmont, la Bresse, Savoy, Piedmont, four cities excepted: to the Genoese, the island of Corfica; Sienna to the Duke of Florence; and reserved nothing but Calais, without gaining even a foot of any other land, during that long and pernicious war, which had laid waste so many Provinces; sacked, burnt, and ruined so many cities, towns, villages, and country seats; and had occasioned the death of so many Princes, Lords, Gentlemen, Captains, Soldiers, Citizens and Peasants; caused so many rapes of wives and maidens; in a word, which had thrown all Europe topsy turvy. The King restored upwards of two hundred, others say almost twice that number, towns or strong holds, in conquering of which an ocean of his subjects blood had been spilt, the treasures of the Kingdom exhausted, his own demesnes mortgaged, and himself indebted to every one.” This Historian supposes, that Henry II saw his dominions enlarged, at least, by the giving up of Calais; but this is a falsity. All the rest of his assertions are solid; and as it is certain that one might have represented to the King of Spain, what Hannibal represented to the Roman General (14), what thunder must not be darted, by the assertions above, on the head of Henry II? The King of Spain might have been told, that the countries, of which he divested France by that treaty of peace, were not worth the immense sums which the war had cost him, nor the great number of soldiers and officers he had lost. If this was capable of diminishing the joy, which the advantageous peace he had obtained, must naturally make him feel, how greatly must it afflict the Monarch to whom it was disadvantageous? To return empty-handed from a long war, is shameful and ignominious, says Homer (15); but he would have expressed himself in much stronger terms in an affair like that in question.

[D] That Prince . . . was fired . . . with a spirit of persecution.] Henry II treated the French Protestants with very great severity; and put them to death without mercy, notwithstanding which they increased greatly under his reign. If they were not grieved at the extreme consternation, with which the Court of France, as well as the City of Paris, was seized, after the battle of St. Quentin, they therein acted but agreeably to the inspirations and suggestions of Nature. Every sect that meets with severe treatment, and which cannot expect any cessation from it, except the Court should be perplexed, will rejoice at the progress of the enemy, and be very glad to see its persecutors so much employed in foreign affairs, as to be scarce able to know how to turn themselves. Among all the sects of Christians, none is more inclined to behave after that manner, than the Romanists. People therefore should not be surprized, if what Maimbourg asserts (16) should be found true, viz. that the Protestants took advantage of the public affliction which had overspread the Kingdom after the battle of St. Quentin . . . and venture to hold their assemblies in open daylight, in the most public streets of Paris; and to appear even in public; and meet in the day time in great bodies, in the Pré-aux-Cheres, there to sing aloud the Psalms of Clement Marot. This ought to inform Princes, that proclamations enacting persecution render them obnoxious to great inconveniencies; thence it is, that their bonfires grieve one part of their subjects, and the victories of their enemies fill them with consolation. If they complain, that some of their subjects are wicked, this answer ought to be made them, it is you who make them such (17); for to require that a persecuted party shall grieve for those public calamities to which their tranquillity is owing, and the foundation of a very plausible hope of prosperity, is to require a return of the primitive ages of Christianity now those times do not return twice. It is to expect men resembling those of the Millennium, if it should ever come. But to return to Henry II; the instant he saw that the Protestants were meditating how to take advantage of the loss which had been sustained in the battle of St. Quentin, he published a new proclamation, forbidding all the Judges to mitigate the sentence of death, and confiscation of goods and chattels, against all those who should be not only found guilty of heresy, but likewise of having brought into France books printed in Geneva, contrary to the doctrine of the Catholic Church. Thus the Calvinists were treated more rigorously than before (18). But as this did not prevent their increasing, nor even several persons of the first quality from

(9) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 2. pag. 1734.

(10) In the remarks [C] and [E], in which more mourning will be seen against the peace of 1559.

(11) Vauillas, Hist. de France I. liv. 9. p. 397. Dutch edit. of 1690, ad ann. 1540.

(12) Hist. de France, tom. 2. pag. 1135.

(13) Histoire des choses mémorables venues en France depuis l'an 1547 jusqu'au commencement de l'an 1597, pag. 61.

(14) See Penides diversas sur les Cometes, num. 113. pag. 658.

(15) Aiχρηβη τον δεινον το παρον, ανωοι το νηοδαο Iliad, lib. 2. vers. 298.

(16) Maimbourg, Hist. du Calvinisme, liv. 2. pag. 96.

(17) Apply here the following saying of Seneca, against those who complain of ungrateful people, Multos experimus ingratos, plures facimus. i. e. “ We meet here with many ingrates, but make more to our selves.” Seneca, de Benef. lib. 1. cap. 1.

(18) Maimbourg, Hist. du Calvinisme, liv. 2. pag. 100.

engaging

keep him in her chains, and make a most unjust abuse of the slavery in which she held him. But the Constable, so far from fortifying the mind of this Prince against the snares of that woman, engaged in intrigues for her, and devoted himself to her faction (d). It is pity that the reign of Henry II should have been so much sullied; for, in other respects, it was conspicuous for glorious actions, and most shining successes, which were the greatest mortification to the Emperor Charles V. It cannot be denied but that Henry II, was a courageous Prince; and it is related that Elizabeth, Queen of England admitted him greatly on that account [E]. But after all, what follows will be an everlasting proof of his weakness, and of the ascendant which his favourites had over him, viz. his signing, in opposition to the opinion of the most sage persons in his Kingdom, the treaty of peace of Cateau in Cambresis; a peace, no less inglorious to France, than that which the Emperor Jovian concluded with the King of Persia, against which antiquity has so loudly inveighed (e); a peace which, by a single dash of the pen, lost, in an instant, the toils and conquests of many years, and an extent of country equal to a third part of the Kingdom (f). No power reaped so much benefit by this ignominy of France, as the Duke of Savoy; for, besides his being restored to his dominions, he married the sister of Henry II, a Princess of exalted merit [F], and who imposed very artfully on the Court of France, in order to promote her husband's interest [G]. That

(d) See the article POITIERS.

(e) Pasquier's Letters, liv. 15. tom. 2. pag. 221. See also liv. 4. tom. 1. pag. 471.

(f) Menloc, Mem. liv. 4. pag. m. 789.

Lady

engaging in their party; the King found that, in order to extirpate them, he must be forced to conclude a peace with the House of Austria; and this doubtless was one of the chief motives which prompted him to overlook the happy condition to which he had restored his affairs (19). He had checked the career of his enemies, and had even dispossessed them of several very strong towns. But all this was nothing; he chose rather to acquiesce with all their demands, than not to have his arms at liberty, in order to extirpate the Protestants out of his Kingdom. Thus we have seen the same Court lose the most favourable opportunities of aggrandizing itself in 1684, in order to devote itself wholly to the suppression of the edict of Nantz. Those who suffer themselves to be possessed with this spirit, must renounce the title of Conqueror. Had Henry II lived long after the ignominious peace which he accepted, he would have spent the remainder of his reign in tournaments and persecutions; but he died a little after the signing of it. Maimbourg is an exceptionable witness, with regard to the joy which, he says, the heretics felt on that account. Here follow his words (20): "Accordingly he was bewailed with very sincere tears, and infinitely regretted by all his subjects, except the Protestants alone, who fancying themselves delivered, by his death, from what they used to call the persecution of the Church; expressed, in a most shameful manner, by their words, their actions, and scandalous writings, the prodigious joy which it gave them."

(19) See the words of Cardinal de Lorraine, in the remark [M].

(20) Hist. du Calvinisme, liv. 2. pag. 114.

(21) See the remark [P] of the article FRANCIS I.

(22) The King resolved to devote himself to the utmost of his power, to the great affair of Religion, for which he was extremely zealous, and from which he never departed during the whole course of his reign; not even when he formed alliances for interests purely political, with the Protestant Princes of Germany, against the Emperor Charles V. Maimbourg, Hist. du Calvinisme, liv. 2. pag. 110.

(23) See the remark [AA].

(24) See the article of Queen ELIZABETH, remarks [G] and [R].

(25) Addit. aux Mem. de Castelnau, tom. 2. pag. 577.

(26) Pag. 78, & seq.

(27) Grot. Epist. 157. Part. 1. pag. 60.

The same remark which was made with regard to Francis I (21), may be made with respect to Henry II. He attacked the party, weakly, on one side, and made it stronger on the other. He put to death, in France, some private persons; and at the same time concluded an alliance with the Protestants of Germany, against Charles V, &c. (22); and was pleased with the title of Protector of the Germanic Liberties; i. e. at that time, the protector of the Protestants (23). The other Romish Princes conducted themselves after the same manner (24). The following words of Le Laboureur appear to me remarkable. "To pluck away the tares from among the wheat, says he (25), God will choose such Princes only as are innocent and of a good life; and will not make use of politic hands, such as were those of the Counsellors of all the Catholic Crowns of that age, who weeded their own fields, with no other design but to cast the darnel into those of their neighbours; and who persecuted Heresy only as a faction repugnant or contrary to authority." Charles V, and the Kings of Spain his successors, favoured the Protestants both of Germany and France on several occasions. See the proofs of this in Tom. I. (26) of Mr. Arnauld's Apology for the Roman Catholics. The Spanish Ambassador was solliciting succours in England for the Duke of Rohan. What Grotius wrote on this subject is remarkable. Validus est rumor, Gombomerum, & qui in aula Anglica Hispanica sunt factionis, aperte profiteri, non debere à Rege Britanniarum deferri religionis consortes in Gallia, ne si quando vetera jura repetere ipsi sit animus, desint, qui partes Anglicas sequantur (27).

i. e. "There is a strong report, that Gandamor, and such as are of the Spanish faction in the English Court, publicly declare, that the British King ought not to abandon those of his own religion in France; in order that, if ever he should think proper to assert his ancient claim to that Crown, he might not fail of their assistance." See in the Political Testament of Marquis de Louvois (28), some reflections on the violences exercised in Hungary against the Protestants, by order of that very Court which, a little after, did such great services to the Protestants both of Great Britain and Holland, whom Lewis XIV and James II relolved, as we are told, to oppress.

[E] It is related, that Elizabeth Queen of England admired him greatly for his bravery. Brantome gives us some particulars on this head. "I have heard, says he (29), the present Queen of England say, that there was no King she so much desired to see; on account of the great character she had heard of him, and because of his exalted fame which was spread into all countries. . . . Sitting at table, and discoursing familiarly with those Noblemen, she said as follows, after having highly applauded the King, there was no Prince in the world I ever desired so much to see; and I had already sent him word that I would soon make him a visit, for which purpose I had ordered my gallies to be splendidly equipped, (these were her very words), to cross into France, purposely to see him." See the same relation in the Memoires des Dames Galantes, where it is expressly declared, that this Queen was desirous of seeing Henry II, because he was brave, valiant, generous, and extremely martial (30).

[F] The Duke of Savoy . . . married the sister of Henry II, a Princess of exalted merit. Her name, as that of her aunt the Queen of Navarre, was Margaret; and, like that Princess, she was very fond of study, and a great Patroness of the learned. She was suspected to have imbibed the new opinions, those of the Protestants, and to have instilled them, in some measure, into Catherine de Medicis (31). See her elogium in Brantome (32), and in Le Laboureur, the latter of whom informs us of a particular that deserves to be known. "Margaret of France, says he (33), was married at forty six years old (34); and as she was thought too old to bear children, it was believed that the report of her pregnancy was merely an artifice, to oblige the King to restore to her, the more willingly, the strong-holds he detained. It was on this account that the Sieur Huraut of Bois-Taille, Ambassador of Venice, wrote a letter dated the 27th of July, 1561, to Bernardin Bochetel, Bishop of Rennes, Ambassador of France in Germany, in which were the following words; It is said that the Duchess of Savoy is big with child, but I am of opinion, that this is reported ad aliquid. But that report was verified by the birth of Charles Emanuel, grandfather to the present Duke of Savoy (35). [G] . . . and who imposed very artfully on the Court of France, in order to promote her husband's interest.] It was stipulated by the treaty of Cateau, that the rights

(28) Pag. 367. Cologne edit. 1695.

(29) Brantome, Disc. de Henri II. tom. 2. of his Memoirs, pag. 60, 61.

(30) Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 261.

(31) See Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Castelnau, tom. 2. pag. 750.

(32) Mem. des Dames illust.

(33) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Castelnau, tom. 1. pag. 752.

(34) He is mentioned taken; she was born the 5th of June 1523, and married in 1559.

(35) Le Laboureur published his book in 1659.

Lady was not young when she married ; and thence it was that the murmurs against the peace extended even to her [H]. A modern author had no reason to attempt a justification of the conduct of Henry III [I], who so dearly paid for the favour which that Princess shewed him. There are other monuments of the great weakness and simplicity of Henry which the King claimed to the territories of the Duke of Savoy, should be examined and settled by commissions on both sides (36). King Francis II and the Duke had nominated Deputies for that purpose in 1560. The King's Deputies made six very considerable demands ; but, instead of being gratified in any of them, the Court of France gave up all the towns it had reserved. It enacted, by Letters Patents dated the 8th of August, 1561, that there should be restored to the Duke Turin, Cibras, Quiers, and Villa Neuve d'Aste, the artillery and ammunition excepted, in exchange for Pignerol, Savillan, and Perussa, with their dependencies. Imbert de la Platiere Bourdillon, the King's Lieutenant in Italy, raised a great many difficulties ; sent strong remonstrances to the Council, to prevent the execution of this order ; and would not obey till orders had been thrice sent him, and he was discharged in the most solemn manner. The Duchefs played her part well in this negotiation ; her prudence was applauded, in having conquered, by her art, and skill, those strong-holds which still remained undelivered ; and which the King's Commissioners could not defend against the soft method she had, viz. to win the hearts of men, and force such places as were almost impregnable. These are Le Laboureur's words (37). Brantome relates this whole affair very circumstantially ; the various sentiments of the Ministers, the oppositions raised by Bourdillon, and the manner in which he suffered himself to be wrought upon. This cost the Duke and Duchefs of Savoy a great number of presents (38). The French were still possessed of three towns in Piedmont, viz. Pignerol, Savillan, and Perussa. The Duchefs seconded her husband admirably well, in the recovering of them, at the time that Henry III passed by Turin in his return from Poland. I will employ the words of Varillas. " The Duke and Duchefs of Savoy, who proposed to effect what Spain had not been able to bring about when in its most flourishing condition, that is, to send the French back, over the Alps, into their own country ; employed for this purpose a new artifice, viz. that of diversions, and feasts, which accordingly came so fast one upon the other, that there was scarce time for sleep. Some very authentic relations speak of a grand collation which cost an hundred thousand crowns. The Duke and Duchefs had put themselves to this expence ; and to reimburse themselves, they were urgent with Henry III to restore to them Pignerol, Savillan, and Perussa (39)." Henry III promised that they should have satisfaction, and was as good as his word ; for holding a Council on that affair in Lyons, to evacuate those three towns, it was resolved, in spite of the strong reasons of the Gentleman who commanded there. This was the Duke of Nevers (a). " He was allowed the liberty to speak whatever he thought fit ; and this satisfaction, viz. that the Memorial which he presented, to enforce his speech, though very long, was nevertheless read in presence of Henry III ; but the giving up of the three towns in question was yet no less resolved upon ; and his Majesty gave him orders, by word of mouth, to evacuate them. The Duke should have stopped here, since every one did him the justice to believe, that he had satisfied his conscience and his honour ; but he employed other precautions which made him obnoxious to the Court, and hindered him a long time from being restored to his seat in the Council of State. He obstinately insisted, that the order which he then received from the King's mouth, should also be wrote with the King's own hand ; that it should be signed by the Queen-Mother, and the Princes of the blood, and the Crown-officers ; that it should be registred in the Parliaments, after the memorial he had drawn up, in order to get himself dispensed from doing it ; and that it should be inserted in the archives of the chief cities of the Kingdom. Most of these things were granted him, but he at the same time was reproached, viz. with

" affecting to signalize himself at his Sovereign's expence ; and that he ought to imitate the conduct of Marshal de Brissac, who, on a like occasion, was contented to repeat his most humble remonstrances, and to desire that a successor should be sent him (40)." § (*) See the Memoirs, Tom. I. to page 68. REM. 84+ CRIT.]

[H] . . . the murmurs against the peace extended even to her.] Brantome, who lived at that time, informs us very bluntly of some circumstances of these murmurings. " This marriage . . . cost France very dear, as being obliged to give up in an hour, all that had been conquered and preserved in Piedmont and Savoy during thirty years : for King Henry was so ardently desirous of peace, and had so strong an affection for his sister, that he would not spare any thing in the world to marry her advantageously ; nevertheless, the greatest part of France and Piedmont murmured at it, and said it was a little too much. Others thought it very odd, and others again altogether incredible, till such time as they had seen it with their own eyes ; and even foreigners laughed at us ; and those who bore the greatest love to France, and were most solicitous for its prosperity, moan'd and wept on that account, and particularly the people of Piedmont, who would not return to their first maker. Can the Dukes of Savoy justly stile themselves sovereigns and Lords of Piedmont, since the Kings of France were formerly, and are still, rightful Lords, titulars and masters of it, as justly appertaining to them ? As Soldiers, &c. who had been so long used to garrisons ; to the ease and delicate sustenance of that country ; there will be no need to ask what they said of it ; in what manner they inveighed against, and lamented on that account ; and what fine speeches they made on this occasion, not only Gascoons but others. Hey-day, said these people, must so many fine and spacious tracts of land be given up, for a little bit of flesh lying between that woman's thighs ? Others cried, she had done mighty well to keep her fine maidenhead forty five years (41), to lose it at last for the ruin of France. Had the people, in that age, been as disorderly, rebellious, and seditious as we have since seen them during our civil wars ; be assured that every one would have joined in it, and have seized on towns and strong holds, whence it had been very difficult to dislodge them (42)." Is it not very strange that Le Laboureur, who had read those words but a little before, should nevertheless observe, " That only certain Politicians found fault with her being married

" at so dear a rate ; but that ALL THE REST were very glad that she carried with herself a recompense suitable to her merit ; and that she had got for her dowry, the territories of which her husband had been dispossessed (43)." This is exactly in the stile and language of a Panegyrist ; such a man, without being invested with the least authority, undertakes notwithstanding, in the name of the public, to make all the steps necessary to a Panegyric ; not once enquiring whether the incident be refuted by authors of the greatest credit. Mezerai who wrote an History and not a Panegyric, conforms much better to the testimony of Brantome than Le Laboureur (44). I cannot read the following words, " and even foreigners laugh'd at us (45)," without crying out, what a fine time was this for the writers of the Low-Countries, and, for any others who bore no good will to France ? What insults had they not a fair opportunity of throwing out upon it ? and what rhodomontades had they not room to publish ? I imagine that their humours differed very little from the people of the present age.

[I] A modern author had no reason to attempt a justification of the conduct of Henry III.] This modern is Coltar's antagonist. The latter was offended (46) that

(36) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 41.

(37) Addit. à Castelnau, tom. 1. pag. 751.

(38) See in the Addit. aux Mem. de Castelnau, tom. 1. pag. 347, & seq ; what Brantome says on all this matter, in the Elogium of Imbert de la Platiere, Lord of Bourdillon.

(39) Varillas, Hist. de Henry III, liv. 3. pag. 74.

(40) Ibid. pag. 84+

CRIT.]

(41) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 722, says, that she was in her 37th year. He is in the right, for she was born the 5th of June 1523. See the citation (34) above.

(42) Brantome, Mem. des Femmes illustres, pag. m. 325.

(43) Addit. aux Mem. de Castelnau, tom. 1. pag. 751.

(44) Remark [C] citation (7) above.

(45) Brantome, Mem. des Femmes illustres, tom. 1. pag. 315.

(46) Suite de la Défense de Voiture, pag. 172.

Henry II, besides the peace of Cateau. Another monument is, his suffering his favourites to go unpunished after their having amassed prodigious estates by the most unjust methods [K]. He died of the wound he had received in a tournament (g), a strange accident, and still more extraordinary than fatal; for I believe that no other Monarch ever lost his life on such an occasion. It would have been infinitely more glorious for him to have lost it in battle, than in those mock-fights, or peaceful combats, wherein he, besides, behaved in a manner no ways suitable to his dignity; and more like a private young Gentleman, than agreeable to kingly majesty [L]. His unhappy end occasioned many reflections [M].

He

(g) He was wounded the 30th of June 1559, and died the 10th of July of that year.

Voiture was censured for having said somewhere, by way of raillery, that he valued a good soup, more than Pliny's Panegyric, and the longest Oration of Isocrates. Mr. de Girac, continues he, imagines that Mr. de Voiture is as stupid as that wretch, who sold his birth-right for a mess of pottage, and that Prince of ours, who gave up Pignerol for a good meal. To what lengths will not people go, when they are heated by a quarrel? The slightest faults which escape an antagonist are made crimes. Girac, who, with regard to another man, would very probably have contented himself with representing, that the word fool was too strong to be employed to express the fault of a Prince, charges Costar, his enemy, as guilty of high treason. Let us duly weigh all his words (47).

(47) Replique à Costar, Sect. 1. pag. 8.

(†) Pag. 173.

(1.) See Valer. Maxim. lib. 4. esp. 8. Livy, lib. 30, &c. Plut. of the Fortune of Alexand. Disc. 2.

“ attempt that deserves the severest punishment, to dart his venom and malice against the sacred person of our Kings. Does not he compare (†) the liberality of Henry III to Esau's folly, who gave up his birth-right for a mess of pottage? Does not he call that great Prince a fool, for yielding up Pignerol to the Duke of Savoy, who had the honour to be his uncle; and from whom he expected great success, in the urgent necessity of his affairs? Was Lewis XII ever taken for a fool, he who presented the King of Navarre with the Principality of Bearne, and who curtailed his dominions of so important a territory? Did any one accuse the Romans (‡) of folly, though they often made donations of whole Provinces and Kingdoms to various Kings their friends? And if Alexander, as Plutarch tells us, would willingly have given up the island of Cyprus, by way of reward for some verses which had been wrote in his praise; shall a King of France be looked upon as a madman by persons who have the least glimmering of sense, for having given up a town to a relation of his, who had given him a costly and most magnificent reception in his dominions? ” A little after he asks, if Costar is not afraid of being punished, in the reign of a Prince, so nearly related to Henry, who had not been dead so great a number of years? and he cites what Guicciardine and Paulus Jovius observes, concerning the prodigious veneration which the French have for their Monarch. He often repeats the same accusation (48); but this we must ascribe to the symptoms of a kind of fever, which seizes writers when they are on replies or rejoinders.

(48) See pag. 91. where he insinuates that Costar deserved to have been imprisoned in the Bastille, for calling Henry III fool. See also pag. 190.

(19) So long as she lived, she always persuaded, and prevailed with the Duke of Savoy her husband, to continue in peace; and that he, who was a Spaniard, should not engage in any manner against France, as he did after her death. Brantôme, Femmes illustres, pag. 328.

Though he had given us a catalogue of all the Monarchs, who, from the beginning of the world, have given away Cities, Provinces, or even Kingdoms; he never would have been able to persuade men of sense and experienced Politicians, that such presents were ever made, in circumstances, like to those of Henry III, without the donor's being guilty of folly. The last mentioned King gave up Pignerol in favour of a Prince who owed his glorious re-establishment to the Spaniards; and who, in his heart, was a Spaniard to all intents and purposes (49); that is, was always ready to favour the most formidable enemy which France had at that time. It was to such a Duke of Savoy that a town was delivered up, which opened a way into the Kingdom, to the enemy; and which kept the said Duke in awe, and prevented his joining in alliance with Spain. But, will it be said, the Duke had been so extremely courteous to Henry III, and spent such vast sums in regaling him at Turin; therefore ought he not to have been looked upon as a good and constant friend? I answer that he ought not. None but ignorant people would rely on the constancy of friendship between Sovereigns. To see the presents which they bestow on one another, and their intercourse of letters in time of peace, one would swear that they are most sincere friends, and will love one another as long as they live; but it is very often true, that they are negotiating at the same time a treaty in order to a rupture; and intend to serve one another no longer, till they shall have an opportunity of taking advantage of some hostility. This was never verified so much, as in the time that Henry III was so prodigiously cherished at the Duke of Savoy's court. The Duke was entirely disposed to take advantage of the confusions which he saw in France, and to call in the aid of the Spaniard for that purpose; and he left a son who inherited this passion, and who not only possessed himself of the Marquisate of Saluces; but also projected conspiracies, the design of which was to dismember France, and totally ruin the Monarchy (50). Can we therefore enough blame this blunder of Henry III? See the remark [F] of this article.

(50) See the article of GONTAUT (Charles) remark [D].

[K] His favourites . . . amassed prodigious estates by the most unjust methods. For fear lest I should be accused of exaggerating matters, I shall employ Mezerai's words. “ The expences which those who disposed of his favour and affairs put him to, and a considerable part whereof they turned to their own profit, were so prodigious, that he oppressed the Kingdom with grievous taxes, and run above forty millions of livres in debt. Farther, they also ruined a great number of families by their avarice. The invention of farmings and monopolies not being at that time so common, they made use of another method which was no less pernicious, viz. their impeaching the most wealthy persons upon pretence of their being guilty of hereby and other crimes; and to search out for, or make delinquents, in order to have the fleecing of them, or to search out for, or obtain their pardon by their intercession (51). ” This Historian had just before observed, that Henry II is not accused of any other fault, than of being too easy, and more liable to be governed than to govern himself. This is one of the greatest imperfections a King can have, because generally those who govern him, when he is in the condition in question, do more mischief than he himself would commit, were he to govern them.

(51) Hist. de France, tom. 2. pag. 1138.

[L] He behaved in a manner no ways suitable to his dignity; and more like a private young Gentleman, than agreeable to kingly majesty. This was the judgment of prudent and sagacious persons, as we are told by a contemporary author (52). “ A tournament was been ordered to be solemnized in St. Anthony's Street before the Tournelles, with all imaginable pomp and magnificence; and this because the King was to be one of the combatants, followed by the Dukes of Ferrara, Guise and Nemours; a circumstance which appeared strange to several persons of good sense, saying, that it became the majesty of Kings to be the judge of combats, and not to enter the lists. Even, in old romances, Kings, on such occasions, never attempted acts of common Knights; but, either disguised themselves, in case they were desirous of entering the lists; or kept away entirely from those diversions: however, such was the King's ill fate, that he was determined to have the honour of running first in the tournament; and I believe the motive which prompted him to this, was, to shew foreigners how dexterous he was in the handling of arms, and the management of a horse; so that those who were near him did not dare to divert him from that enterprize; a circumstance which afterwards exhibited a wretched spectacle to the French Nation.

(52) Pasquier, Lettres, liv. 4. tom. 1. pag. 172, 173.

[M] His unhappy end occasioned many reflections. I will not produce the testimony of Protestant writers; it is plain that that of Pasquier will be more efficacious (53). “ In this manner our good King Henry (53) came to his end; and as the common people naturally keep their eyes fixed on the actions of their King; so King Henry's death was not suffered to “ pass

He never spoke after his wound [N]; so that all the sayings, which have been ascribed to him, are mere fictions. The sincerity and frankness with which the French Historians have owned the errors of that Monarch, and the ignominy he brought upon the Nation, in preferring the counsels of the Constable, to the remonstrances of the Duke of Guise [O], is not much found in other Historians. The Protestants imagined that his death would be of great advantage to them; but they were treated with still greater severity under Francis II; and, humanly speaking, had Francis II lived two years longer, they would have been extirpated from France [P]. They are accused of discovering too insolent a joy, when news was brought of Henry's tragical end [Q]; but “ pass without the commentaries and interpretations of “ some people; for to inform you, in an ample man“ ner, of the several transactions which happened in “ France; as soon as the peace was concluded, the “ Cardinal of Lorraine, who had been one of the chief “ mediators of it, declared in open Parliament, that “ it was the King's opinion it should be made on any “ terms, in order that he might from that time be “ more at liberty, to attend to the banishment and “ extirpation of Calvin's heresy. And indeed, he “ came in person, the 10th of June, into Parliament, “ there to take the opinion of every Counsellor or “ Member, with respect to the punishment of heret“ ics. Many gave theirs with pretty great freedom;

 “ some thinking that he should suspend the punish“ ment of them, till the decision should be made in “ a general Council, which they said was necessary.
 “ Upon this the King, being fired with a great and “ just passion, immediately commanded Montgom“ mery to seize some of the Assembly, who had de“ livered their opinions more freely than was agree“ able to him, and these were immediately carried “ prisoners to the Bastille: wherefore, said these new “ Commentators, this evil befel the King, by a just “ judgment of God, as a vengeance upon him for “ unjustly imprisoning the persons abovementioned:
 “ that opinions ought to be free, and not founded by “ a King, in order, after he has heard them, to com“ mit the Counsellors or Members close prisoners:
 “ that God had chastised him by the hand of that Mi“ nister, whom he had employed to imprison the “ Counsellors in question. Likewise, that in the same “ manner as, on the 10th of June, he had brought “ that ignominy on the Parliament; so, on the 10th of “ July following, day for day, he lost his life. Thus “ did some of the people discourse concerning his “ death, accordingly as they were prompted by their se“ veral passions; not knowing that the mysteries of God
 “ are entirely concealed from us; and such as, by reason “ of the weakness of our senses, we oftner refer to “ our own opinions than to truth.” Anne du Bourg
 “ was one of those whom the King caused to be impris“ oned in the Bastille, and against whom he was most “ exasperated; “ for he declared, among other ex“ pressions, that both his eyes should see him burnt
 “ (54).” Fra-Paolo observes, that the Queen-mother “ was furiously enraged at the Lutherans, for publish“ ing in their manifestos, that the wound which the “ King her husband had received in the eye, was a “ punishment sent from God, for his threatening Anne “ du Bourg, that he would see him burnt (55).” [N] He never spoke after his wound. Most Historians say, that a splinter of Montgomery's lance flew into King Henry's eye, and wounded him mortally; but what Mezerai says on that subject is more probable. “ It happened, says he (56), that Montgomery having broke his lance in the breast-plate, “ could not keep back his arm; so that he gave him
 “ a thrust in the right eye, with the stump of it which “ was left in his hand, with so much violence, that a “ splinter of it forced itself quite to the back part of “ his head.” In this manner Montgomery might appear infinitely more criminal, although he had not, in reality, perpetrated this action voluntarily. The Historian adds: “ It was not certainly known, even “ at that time, whether the King spoke or not, after “ he had received the wound; the truth being dis“ guised by the persons who were about him, or ren“ dered doubtful by the different reports which were “ spread concerning it, by those who had different “ interests. Some relate certain fine remonstrances he “ made to his son; others even add, that when he “ was carried out of the Lists, he looked towards the “ Bastille, where the prisoners of Parliament were con“ fined; and said, with a deep sigh, that he was a“ fraid he had wrongfully punished innocent men;

 “ but that Cardinal de Lorraine correcting him im“ mediately, exhorted him to reject that thought, as “ being suggested by the tempter. Others assert,
 “ that he lost his speech and all his senses the instant “ he was struck (57), a circumstance that is confirm“ ed by the arguments of many Physicians, who de“ clare, that a man must necessarily be struck dumb,
 “ when his brain is wounded or very violently shaken.”
 After this, what man would credit the stories which are spread, concerning the last words of dying persons (58)?

[O] He preferred the counsels of the Constable, to the remonstrances of the Duke of Guise. The Constable, who had been prisoner ever since the battle of St. Quentin, resolved to recover his liberty at any rate. The Guises made too much advantage of his absence; and thence it was that he negotiated a treaty of peace, in which he granted all the demands required by the Spaniards; and he knew so well the foible of the King his master, that he easily prevailed with him to consent to this treaty. It was to no purpose that the Duke of Guise employed a thousand demonstrative reasons (59), to make the King reject a peace which sacrificed the glory of the French name to the Spaniards; and more strong-holds in one day, than they could have conquered in one century; for the King was deaf to all this. I must introduce a remark of Brantome (60). He pretends that Henry II, wearied out, and disgusted at the insolence of the Guises, resolved to send them home; but that, in order to effect this, he wanted to get back his Constable and put an end to the war; he therefore wrote to him, and to Marshal de St. Andre (61), to negotiate a peace, which they did to our disadvantage. We must not omit the other artifice: these two prisoners and the Dukes of Valentinois enriched themselves with the confiscated estates of the heretics; who doubts that, in order to obtain peace, they obliged the King to accept of any conditions, in order to have an opportunity of carrying on, at full ease, the affairs of the inquisition? It is certain (62) that the intrigues and cabals of the Dukes in question, seconded by the artifices of the Constable, dragged the King to that precipice.

[P] Had Francis II lived two years longer, the Protestants would have been extirpated from France. This is the opinion of Beza; for having displayed all the reasons which promised them more happy times after King Henry's death, he adds (63): “ But God “ had ordered it quite otherwise, being resolved to “ have the honour which belongs to him, of re-esta“ blishing his church by his single arm and strength “ alone, which is so much the more wonderful, as “ the resistance of the greatest men had been most “ furious and frantic against it. It was therefore un“ der the reign of Francis II, successor to Henry, that “ Satan's rage rose to an extreme height; so that one “ might say of this reign, which lasted but seventeen “ months, what Jesus Christ says in St. Matthew, “ viz. that unless those days had been shortened, no “ man could be saved; but that for the elects sake “ they were shortened.” A particular account of the measures which had been taken to ruin the party entirely, is seen in a few pages in Maimbourg (64).
 Take particular notice of the words which he prefixes to this detail (65):

[Q] They are accused of discovering too insolent a joy, when news was brought of Henry's tragical end. I have already cited (66) Maimbourg upon this; and here follow Mezerai's words (67). “ As he was

(57) Mezerai, in his Abregé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 721. is fixed in this opinion. The blow, says he, was so violent, that it threw him on the ground, and deprived him of his senses and speech, which he never recovered after. This proves the falsity of the different speeches which men, according to their several interests and passions, put into his mouth.

(58) See the remark [F] of FRANCIS DUKÉ of Guise.

(59) Mezerai relates them at large. See above, the remark [C] between the citations (8) and (9).

(60) Eloge de Henri II, tom. 2. pag. 52.

(61) He was a prisoner as well as the Constable.

(62) See Belcastus, lib. 28. num. 17. & seq.

(63) Hist. Eccles. des Eglises Réformées, liv. 3. pag. 212.

(64) Hist. du Calvinisme, liv. 2. pag. 157, 158, 159.

(65) All things were then (i. e. when Francis II died) so disposed for the entire ruin of Calvinism in France, that it seemed quite inevitable. Ibid. pag. 157.

(66) In the remark [D].

(67) Hist. of France, tom. 2. pag. 1139.

(54) La Place, Comment. de l'Etat de la Religion & Republique, folio m. 19.

(55) Fra-Paolo, Hist. du Concile de Trente, liv. 5.

(56) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 2. p. 1138.

2

but no one could have expressed himself with greater modesty on this subject, than Beza (b). I forgot to observe that this Prince, when but Dauphin of France, lived in such a misunderstanding with the Duke of Orleans his brother, as cost France dear [R], and would have proved much more fatal to it, had not this Duke died. Who knows whether he would not have disputed the Crown with him [S]? The Ladies had been so bold, as to spread about such horoscopes, as could not but foment the jealousy of these two brothers. They had shewn these pretended astrological predictions to Francis I. They were refuted by Castellan [T], but were refuted still better by the event. It is related by several authors, that an Astrologer, famous for calculating nativities, had foretold that Henry II should be killed in a duel [U]. This prediction is told so variously, that

"very good Prince, he was bewailed by all his people, those of the new sect excepted, who imagined that his death would be their liberty and advancement. They rejoiced so much at this, that they made songs upon it, and thanksgivings to God; or rather blasphemies, they presuming to say, that the Almighty had stricken him under the walls of the Bastille, where he kept the innocent imprisoned." It must not be thought strange, that a few indiscreet people should be found, among a great number of people; but the Historian of the reformed Churches deserves great applause, for observing the moderation which is seen in the following words. There remained nothing, in all probability, but a most horrid spectacle of extreme desolation, when the Lord prevented it: for King Henry, in the midst of his peaceful triumphs, joined with marriage, . . . tilting in the Lists, . . . was struck with the counter-stroke of a lance . . . and died the 10th of July following. Strange things were observed in the so-much-unexpected death of this Prince, who was naturally gracious and kind, but neither saw or heard, but by the eyes and ears of those, who engrossed and governed him at pleasure (68).

(68) Theod. de Beza, Hist. Eccles. des Eglises reformées, liv. 2. pag. 195.

(69) In the remark [R] of the article FRANCIS I. See also the remark [E] of the article ETAMPES.

[R] He lived in such a misunderstanding with the Duke of Orleans his brother, as cost France dear.] The Dauphin's faction was headed by Diana of Poitiers, mistress to that Prince. This was the reason why the Duchess d'Etampes sided with the Duke of Orleans. I have spoke elsewhere (69) of the prejudice, which the intrigues of that Duchess did to the affairs of Francis I.

[S] Who knows whether the Duke of Orleans would not have disputed the Crown with him? Tavanés, who was in his service, and had an insatiable desire to raise himself in the world, conceived great hopes from the ambition of this Prince, "who hoped to make himself Sovereign in the life-time of the Dauphin his elder brother. Indeed the Emperor Charles V had flattered him with such strong hopes of this, as greatly raised his courage; and therefore being near expiring at Farenmonstier, where he had rashly defied death, in a house infected with the plague, whither he went purposely on that account; Tavanés, his confident, coming to tell him of the exploit he had performed on the garrison of Calais, whercof he had killed eight hundred men, and taken four hundred prisoners, he spoke as follows to him, Friend, I am a dead man; all our designs are defeated; my great sorrow is, that it is not in my power to reward your desert" (70).

(70) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Castellan, tom. 2. pag. 572.

[T] The Ladies . . . had shewn these pretended Astrological predictions to Francis I. They were refuted by Castellan.] About two years before this Prince died, certain ladies, who had a great share in his friendship, told him that the stars promised the Duke of Orleans great conquests; and foretold, that the Dauphin would not perform any action worthy a King of France. They talked in this manner, because they knew Francis I had a particular affection for this Duke, and they flattered themselves with the hopes of enriching themselves, by the interest and credit of this young Prince. They used to applaud him; praise him to the skies, and exclaim against the Dauphin as having a dull, heavy genius, and born under the most ill-fated planet possible. Animo lento & sopito, infelici quodam siderum positu natum (71). But Castellan could not bear either their flatteries or their calumnies; he turned to those Ladies, when frowning upon them, he told them, that it was difficult to learn Astrology, and more so, to adapt it to human events. He added, that the vanity and impudence of Astrologers rendered them unworthy of all belief; that he himself had formerly studied those things under Turreau (72), and had made as much progress in them (72) See the remark [C] of the article CASTELLAN. as any other person; that by way of amusement, and to satisfy the curious, he had calculated, with the utmost accuracy, the nativity of the Dauphin, and that of the Duke of Orleans; and that, according to the rules of that Science of the Stars, he had found that the Duke would have a good, a great, and martial soul; would be supported by the strength and friendship of the Great; and attain to a very exalted pitch of power (73): That the Dauphin would not be inferior to him, either in military virtue, or any other of the virtues worthy of a Prince; that he would enjoy a very happy reign, and triumph over all his enemies (74): but that as all these ways of foretelling things were vain and doubtful, the surest way would be to ground one's conjectures, with regard to the future fortune of both those Princes, on their genius and morals. The King gave a favourable attention to all this; but the flatterers of both sexes were exasperated at it. The Dauphin being informed what Castellan had said, was extremely well pleased; not at his having been applauded, but because his innocence had been spoke in favour of, before Francis I, to whom he was afraid of being made odious (75), apud quem ne in suspicionem aut odium traheretur metuebat (76). Ye cursed peits of courts! who can detest you sufficient-ly! How malicious was it to cherish and foment, by so many artifices, the jealousy of two brothers! I must not omit, that Castellan's Astrology proved false with regard to the Duke of Orleans. He died a little after; and yet it had prefaged his rising to very exalted power, which Castellan had considered as a thing to come; and he could not consider it otherwise at that time; for this Prince died nineteen months or thereabouts before his father, and was not then twenty four years of age.

(71) Gallandius, in Vita Castellani, pag. 73.

(72) See the remark [C] of the article CASTELLAN.

(73) Valde potentem futurum. Galland. in Vita Castellani, pag. 73.

(74) Suorum hostium late victricem felicissimum regnatuum commiserit. Idem, ibid.

(75) Extracted from the Life of Peter Castellan, written by Gallandius, chap. 44. pag. 72, & seq.

(76) Idem, ibid. pag. 74.

[U] It is related by several authors, that an Astrologer famous for calculating nativities, had foretold that Henry II should be killed in a duel.] Let us see what Brantome says of this matter (77). "I have heard, and know it from good hands, that some years before he died, some say certain days, a Soothfayer calculated his nativity, and presented him with it, and that it informed him, he would die in a duel and single combat. The Constable was there present, to whom the King said; see, friend, what death it is prophesied I shall come to. Sir! replied the Constable, can you credit these scoundrels, who are only liars and braggadochios? Throw that prediction into the fire. Friend, replied the King, for what reason? they sometimes tell the truth; I do not care whether I die that death or another; nay I should rather choose it, and to die by the hand of any man soever, provided he be true and valiant, and glory may thereby accrue to me; and therefore, without regarding what the Constable had said, he gave the prediction in question to Mr. de l'Aubespine, ordering him to lay it by, till such time as he should ask for it . . . (78). Now the King was no sooner wounded, dressed and carried to his chamber, but the Constable calling to mind this prophecy, called Mr. de l'Aubespine, and ordered him to fetch it, which he did; and the instant he saw and read it, the tears started from his eyes. Alas! said he, this is the duel and single combat by which he was to die; it is done, and he is dead. The Soothfayer could not possibly have spoke better and clearer than he has done; although such men, either from their natural disposition, or by the inspiration of their familiar spirit, are always ambiguous and dubious; and thus they always that this circumstance alone would make one doubt whether it was made by Astrologers [X]. He had ten legitimate, and two natural children. Some pretty remarkable particulars

(77) Brant. Disc. du Henry II, in tom. 2. of his Memoirs, pag. 50.

(78) Idem, pag. 52.

“ ways speak ambiguously ; but the Soothfayer spoke very plainly in the prophecy. Cursed be the Soothfayer who prophesied so truly and fatally.” Thuanus does not, like Brantome, omit the Soothfayer’s name : He calls him Luke Gauric ; and adds, that the nativity in question was calculated at the request of Catherine of Medicis ; and that it was laughed at, till the King had been wounded in the manner above described. Thuanus mentions this prophecy as a certain truth (79) ; Genus ac tempus mortis à Luca Gaurico Mathematico Pauli Tertii per familiari prædictum constat, cum Catharina uxor futuri anxia femina eum super viri ac filiorum fata consuleret, fore nimirum ut in duello caderet, vulnere in oculo accepto: quod irrisum à multis ac pro tempore neglectum fuit, quasi regis conditio supra duellum posita esset (79) ; but those who cite Luke Gauric’s own words, taken from the horoscope of Henry II, deserve more credit. Now it is certain, by these words, that the Soothfayer promised this Monarch a long life, and did not threaten him with a fatal duel. Gassendi did not fail to cite this great example ; and adds, that Cardan was no less mistaken in the horoscope of the Prince in question, than Gauric (80). Constat ex Historiis Henricum II Gallie nos.

(79) Thuan. lib. 22. sub fin.

(80) Gassend. Sect. 2. Physica, lib. 6. pag. 745. tom. 1. Oper.

traè Regem obiisse anno ætatis quadragesimo completo, ex oculari vulnere. En autem de eo Gaurici Vaticinium in Prognostico anni MDLVI. Quoniam in sui natalis penè divini schemate habuit Solem sub gradibus suæ altitudinis Veneri ferè partiliter alligatum ; quin & Lunam atque Venerem sub Arietis Asterismo, per Horoscopum progredientem ; vivet felicissimus annos LXX, deductis duobus mensibus ; si nutu divino superaverit annos insalubres LXIII, LXIV, & semper vivet in terris pientissimus. Paria sunt quæ idem Gauricus antea ediderat, quæque à Sixto (81) referuntur. En & vaticinium Cardani, cum de eodem Henrico loquens, Erit certe, inquit, senecta tanto felicior etiam plura fuerit expertus, &c. i. e. “ It is manifest from History, that

(81) He speaks of Sixtus ab Heminga, who has shewn, from the example of thirty famous horoscopes that the event befell them.

“ Henry II, King of France, died of a wound he had received in his eye, when he was just turned of forty : Now here follows Gauric’s prophecy concerning him, in his prognostic for the year 1556.

*Because, in the scheme of his almost divine nativity, he had the sun very near in partile aspect with Venus, and the Moon and Venus in the constellation of Aries, proceeding through his Horoscope, he shall live seventy years, wanting two months, in a most happy manner, provided that, by the divine favour, he lives beyond the critical years 63 and 64, and shall be conspicuous for his sanctity. Gauric had published the same things before, as they are related by Sixtus ab Heminga. Here follows likewise a prediction of Cardan, speaking of Henry II in question. His old age, says he, shall be so much the more happy, as he shall have experienced, &c.” This is a matter of so much importance, that it deserves a second testimony : The person I mean is not one who depends upon hearsay, he relating what he has read in the very writings of Gauric, where he saw the most happy predictions that could be to Henry II. *Et memini in Italia quasdam Ephemerides annuas Luca Gaurici vidisse, in quibus cum pro libertate scribendi quæ tunc vigeat, singulis Principibus Europæis maximas felicitates, aut gravissima damna minaretur, nihil postea perinde cecidit, ac ipse futurum prædixerat. Atque utinam Henricus secundus, quem ille extrema tantum senectute, & morbo placidissimo satis concessurum dixerat, non ætate potius florenti, & tam acerbo, præcipitque fato nobis ereptus fuisset (82). i. e.

(82) Naudæus, in Judicio de Cardano.

“ I remember to have seen, in Italy, certain annual Ephemerides of Luke Gauric, wherein, according to the great liberty which writers took in those times, he had prophesied, to all the Princes of Europe, either very great happiness or grievous calamities, but nothing came to pass of what he had foretold. And would to heavens that Henry II, who, according to this Diviner, was to live to an extreme old age, and to die of a very easy and most gentle distemper, had not on the contrary been snatched away in the flower of his age, and by so sudden and cruel a death.”

[X] This prediction is told so variously, that this circumstance alone would make one doubt whether it was made by Astrologers.] Let us see Stephen Pasquier’s relation ; we there do not find so much as Gauric’s name, the whole relating to other persons and circumstances. “ And indeed one would imagine that long before this disaster had been privately prognosticated, to the King, by Jerom Cardan, who, in a scheme which he erected of his nativity, declared, that all things would be smooth and easy in the beginning of his reign ; but assured him that, in the decline of his life, he would come to a fatal end ; and such as, for the grandeur of a King, he thought himself obliged to conceal. A report was likewise spread at Court, that at the return of the Cardinal of Lorraine from his last journey to Italy, a letter was presented him, sent from a Jew in Rome, greatly skilled and practised in those fantastical predictions and divinations, which strenuously exhorted him to beware of a single combat. The King having heard these letters read, disregarded them as fictitious ; never imagining that, considering his exalted station, it would be possible for him to be ever engaged in a duel. These letters, as we are told, were then laid up by Mr. de l’Aubespine, who, after the King’s death, shewed them to several Lords, as it is related. Besides it is added (but I will not assert it as fact) that the Queen remembering these Letters, and the time which had been prognosticated, besought him several times, that since the two preceding days had been past to his honour and satisfaction, he would be pleased, the third day, not to enter the lists, in order to avoid any inconvenience that might happen, and appoint some other person in his stead. The King however would not consent to this ; and on the very day he was wounded, the Queen having sent a Gentleman from her seat purposely to intreat him, in her name, to be satisfied with what he had already performed ; he sent word, that he would run but once more, in which, as ill fortune would have it, he was wounded (83).” It must be particularly observed, that Pasquier relates these particulars only upon a very random hearsay, of the truth whereof he himself was not persuaded. But observe still further, that it is not said that Cardan published this pretended horoscope after the death of Henry II. He nevertheless was vain enough, and sufficiently bigotted to Astrology (84), to have taken to himself the glory of so surprizing a discovery. Nothing could have ennobled his art so much as this. He could have called upon the testimony of the Constable of Mommorenci, Catherine of Medicis, l’Aubespine, and some other persons of the highest rank. Whence could it be, that he should have neglected the interests of his glory and those of his purse (85) to so great a degree ?

(83) Pasquier’s Letters, lib. 4. tom. 1. pag. 179.

(84) Confer quæ supra, remark [E] of the article CARDAN.

The reader has seen in the preceding remark, what Gauric promised Henry II in 1556 ; let us now see what he had foretold him for four years before : Inclitissimus Gallorum Rex, (this is what he has put at the foot of the scheme of that King’s nativity, in the Venice edition of 1552, printed by Curtius Trojanus Navo.) Henricus Christianissimus, erit Regum quorundam Imperator, ante supremos cineres ad rerum culmina perveniet, felicissimamque ac viridem senectam, uti colligitur ex Sole, Venere & Luna horoscopantibus, & potissimum Sole in suo trono partiliter supputato. In civitatibus Arieti subiectis maximum sortietur dominium, si forte superaverit suæ ætatis annos 56, 63, 64, ad annos 69 Menses 10 dies 12 facili ac felici tramite perducetur (86). i. e. “ The most renowned King of

(85) He would have been paid much more largely for his predictions, had it been known that he had found out by Astrology, that a King of France should be killed in a duel.

France, the most Christian King Henry, shall be Monarch over certain Kings ; shall attain the highest pitch of power ; and live to a vigorous old age, as is manifest from the Sun, Venus, and the Moon arising at his nativity, and especially from the Sun being in his exaltation, in a partile aspect. He shall obtain very great dominion in the cities subject to Aries, if he does but live beyond the 56th, 63, 64th year, he shall attain to the 69th year, 10 months, and 12 days of his age, and shall enjoy very great happiness.”

(86) Lucas Gauricus, in Tractatu Astrologico in quo agitur de prædictionibus multorum bonorum accidentibus per proprias eorum genituras ad unguem exacte natis, fol. 42 verso.

particulars are told concerning the mothers of the latter [Y]. Henry II was born at St. Germain en Laie, the 31st of March 1519. He was Duke of Orleans when he married, at Marfeilles, Catherine de Medicis, the 28th of October 1533. He was then but fourteen years and a few months old; a circumstance which made Pope Clement VII, Catherine's uncle, fear that the marriage was not consummated on the wedding night; and authors pretend, that being curious to enquire into that affair himself, he found such proofs as set his mind at ease in this particular [Z]. This young husband's elder brother dying, he became Dauphin the 10th of August 1536. We have related in another place (i), that his consort was barren many years, and afterwards brought him several children. He persecuted such of his subjects as were of the Protestant Religion with the utmost rigour; and nevertheless he himself forged those weapons, which enabled the Protestants most especially to maintain their cause [AA]; for, by his means, the Protestants of Ger-

(i) In the article FERNEL, remark [K].

[Y] Some pretty remarkable particulars are told concerning the mothers of the two natural children.] Read what follows, which is copied from Brantome (87).

(87) Mem. des Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 372.

Henry II, "who was of a pretty amorous complexion, whenever he went to visit any Lady, went in the most private manner he could, in order to prevent their virtue from being suspected; and if any of them happened to be discovered, it was not his fault, nor by his consent, but was rather owing to the Lady; as I have been told of a Lady of a good family, Madam Flamin by name, a Scots woman, who being with child by the King, was far from mincing the matter, but said boldly in her Scots-French, I have exerted myself so well, that I at last am so happy as to be with child by the King, which I think a very great honour and felicity. Methinks there is something sweeter and more delicate in the royal blood than in any other, so well I find myself after what I have done; not to mention the fine presents that are always got on those occasions. The son she then had by the King was the late Grand Prior of France, who was killed not long since in Marfeilles (88), which was a very great pity, for he was a most courteous, brave and valiant nobleman." What I have to say concerning the other mistress is a singularity of another kind. The Dauphin (afterwards King Henry II) being

(88) Father Anselme, Hist. Génealog. de la Maison de France, pag. 144. says, that he was son to N... de Levisston, a Scotch Lady; and was killed at Aix in Provence by Philip Altoviti, Baron of Castellanes, the 2d June 1586.

(89) Father Anselme, ibid. says, that her name was Philippa des Ducs; that she was living the 1st of July 1572, and did not assume a religious habit, as Peter Matthew thought

(90) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Castellau, tom. 2. pag. 447.

(91) Anselme, Hist. Geneal. de la Maison de France, pag. 144.

(92) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Castellau, tom. 2. pag. 418.

(93) Henry III gave her the Dukedoms of Engoulême and of Chatelleraut, the Earldom of Ponthieu, and the Government of Limosin. Le Laboureur, ibid.

(94) Extracted from the Addit. de Monf. Le Laboureur, ibid.

(95) Varillas, Preface of tom. 5. de l'Hist. de l'Herésie, fol. 3. Dutch edit.

"smit with a young Lady of Cony in Piedmont (89), in the journey he made thither with the Constable of Montmorency, his servants set fire to her house in the night, and the danger it was in of being burnt down, giving every one access to it, people flocked to it in crowds, crying salva la Donna (save the Lady) and having seized her, carried her to the Dauphin (90)." He had a Daughter by her named Diana, who was first married to Horazio Farneze Duke of Castro, and afterwards to Francis Duke of Montmorency, eldest son to the Constable. The second marriage was solemnized the 5th of May, 1557 (91), and ended by the death of the first husband the 6th of May 1579 (92). The only son which sprung from it died before his father. The widow lived till the 3d of January 1619, and was then above fourscore. She brought about a reconciliation between Henry III and Henry IV; and had a tender friendship for Charles de Valois her Nephew, natural son of Charles IX. She saved his life, when Henry IV would have involved him in the affair of the Duke of Biron; she represented to that Prince, that it was greatly his interest, to render sacred and inviolable the heads of the illegitimate children of Kings, and carefully to avoid establishing a fatal example against them. She married this nephew to Charlotte de Montmorency, her husband's niece, and left his children heirs of all her possessions, and of the palace of Engoulême (93) belonging to her in Paris (94).

[Z] Some authors pretend, that Pope Clement VII being curious to enquire into that affair himself, found such proofs as set his mind at ease in that particular.] I have read this no where but in Varillas. The interview between his Holiness, says he (95), and his Majesty, was at Marfeilles, and the nuptials of the Duke of Orleans and Catherine were solemnized there with great magnificence. As the Bridegroom was but sixteen years of age, and the bride thirteen, the King, who would not hazard his son's health, would have the consummation of the marriage suspended for two or three years. But this did not suit the Pope in any manner, who was afraid, in case he should happen to die before the marriage with his niece was consummated, she should be sent back into Italy; and indeed, says Paul Jovius, he was not satisfied till after he had seen certain marks that the marriage had been consummated. If Paul Jovius has mentioned such a circumstance, it is not in that part of his history where he speaks of that interview between the Pope and Francis I. This nevertheless was the most proper place, and the most natural occasion of touching on that particular, especially as the author did not omit to take notice of the tender age of the Duke of Orleans, to make several other observations, and even to say that the marriage was consummated the first night. Augebant suspitionem maturatæ nuptiæ, quæ impares regio sanguini viderentur. Siquidem nobilissimus adolescens Henricus, quauquam ætate tenerior, Catharinam celebratis insigni ceremonia nuptiis, ex virgine mulierem prima nocte reddiderat (96). i. e. "A circumstance that increased the suspicion was, the halting of the marriage, which did not seem suitable to the royal blood. For the most noble Henry, though of a tender age, after his nuptials had been solemnized with great magnificence, made Catherine a woman the very first night." I confess then, that Varillas might be suspected of falsely citing the testimony of Paulus Jovius, His saying that the bridegroom was sixteen years of age, and the bride thirteen, is not just; for it is certain that Henry II, was born the 31st of March 1519, and married Catherine of Medicis the 28th of October 1533 (97). Father Anselme, who fixes his birth to the 31st of March 1518, adds, that it was before Easter; and consequently that year is 1519, according to the new style. He also says that Catherine was born the 13th of April, 1519. Hist. Gen. Gauric sets down the same day and year in the scheme of that nativity. There therefore was but the space of a fortnight between the age of the Bridegroom and Bride. Spondanus is very near as much mistaken as Varillas, since he asserts that Catherine was but thirteen, and Henry but fifteen years and seven months (98).

(96) Jov. Hist. lib. 31. fol. 2304 edit. Basil. 1554

(97) See the Fastes of Father du Londe, pag. 23 and 34; and Father Anselme, Hist. Gen. pag. 137 and 139.

(98) Spondan. ad ann. 1533, num.

[AA] He himself forged those weapons, which enabled the Protestants most effectually to maintain their cause.] See what I have said on this matter, in the remark [D], and add to it the following passage from Stephen Pasquier (99). "We saw the Emperor Charles V make war upon the Germans, his vassals, for imbibing and professing heresy. . . . His affairs went on successfully, which obliged them to implore our assistance. Could any thing be more plausible, in point of State-affairs, as courtiers judge of them, than to take their cause in hand, in order to prevent a mighty Prince from increasing his power still more at our gates, by the ruin of all the Princes of Germany? But, on the other hand, what would be more unjust than to assist a subject against his lawful Sovereign? and especially to join with a heretic, against a Catholic Emperor, who fought only for the honour of God and his Church? Our Prince was a Catholic, as were likewise the Noblemen who had the greatest share in his favour; but notwithstanding this, we take upon our selves to protect the German heretics; and the King, in open Parliament, caused himself to be proclaimed by the most pompous title of Protector of the German Liberty, that is to say, of the German heresy; and as such caused money to be coined, bearing that inscription. Under that specious title he undertook that expedition at the head of a power"ful

many put their affairs in so happy a posture, that it was easy for them to send great succours to the Calvinists of France. The comparison which has been made between his reign, and the latter part of that of Francis I, shews, that a Monarch who is too much inclined to liberality, does more prejudice to a State than a Monarch who is too niggardly [BB]. Henry the II's fault was, the ill management of his revenues, whereby he perverted the administration of them, and got prodigiously in debt [CC]. The evil which ful army. This gave such success to our enterprise, that, at the bare news of it, as we were going to cross the Rhine, the Emperor was forced to adjust matters amicably with his subjects, and grant them many privileges, against the honour of God and of his conscience, which he otherwise would not have tolerated. As to my self, my opinion is, that God was resolved afterwards to chastize us with the same rods, which we had made use of against the Emperor, having permitted, after Henry's death, his children (minors) to be warred upon by their subjects, for the support of an opinion more violent than that of Luther; and that they should be aided, by the German Princes, against them. And when God was determined to exercise his vengeance upon us, it was impossible for any human methods to ward it off, so that all the remedies which we thought to apply to it, turned to our destruction." Pasquier makes another remark which I don't take to be a good one. At our return, says he (100), from that fine expedition into Germany, Calvin began to solicit, on all sides, by letters; and the persons thus addressed were easily over-reached, thinking, as we may suppose, that since the King and his Council had taken the Lutherans under their protection, they themselves were, in their hearts, of the same Religion. Thus did the seeds of the new Religion, by insensible degrees, spread in France, which reached, at last, the noble or vital parts, I mean the Princes and great Lords. The author here commits two errors; he supposing that Calvin did not begin to solicit the French by letters till towards the close of the year 1552. Now this is false, for he had never ceased to do it since the year 1536; and besides, it is not true, that the French could believe that Henry II and his Council were Lutherans in their hearts. The contrary could not be doubted, since this Prince was seen to persecute, with fire and sword, those who professed the new Religion, throughout all parts of his Kingdom. The protection which he granted, and the good offices he did the Protestants of Germany, were of no service to elude this proof of his aversion for their sect; the only thing hereby shewn was, that he sacrificed the interest of his Religion, to the political interest of his Government. In this manner Kings generally act: though they sometimes take another course, in order to sacrifice, to a spirit of perfection, not only the conquests they might achieve, but also those they have gained, and the most solid advantages of their Government. Henry II was an instance of this, when he accepted the peace of Cateau.

[BB] A Prince, who is too much inclined to liberality, does more prejudice to a State than a Prince who is too niggardly.] A French Civilian (101) has asserted that "those are in a great error, who applaud and adore universally the goodness of a gentle, gracious, courteous and simple Prince; for such a simplicity, unaccompanied with prudence, is very dangerous, and pernicious in a King; and productive of much worse consequences than the cruelty of a severe, peevish, rough, covetous and inaccessible Prince. And in my opinion our forefathers have not used the following proverb without a cause, a bad man makes a good King; a sentence that may seem strange to delicate ears, and which have not been accustomed to weigh the reasons on both sides. By the indulgence and silly simplicity of too good natured a Prince, it comes to pass that flatterers, parasites, and the most wicked men, obtain all offices, employments, benefices and grants, exhausting the treasures of a Kingdom: and by this means the miserable people are preyed upon to their very bones, and cruelly enslaved by the Great; so that, for one tyrant, there are ten thousand &c." Desirous afterwards to confirm this position by examples, he goes on as follows (103): this Kingdom "has been seen as great, rich and flourishing in Arms as in Laws, towards the close of the reign of Francis I, when he grew peevish and inaccessible, and no one dared to approach him, to sue for the least favour and honour; and pensions were so retrenched, that there was found in his treasury, at his death, a million of gold, and seven hundred thousand crowns, and the March-quarter to receive; and nothing owing, except a very small matter to the Lords of the Grisons, and to the Bank of Lyons, which it was judged not proper to pay, in order to keep them to their duty: Peace was settled with all the Potentates in the world; the frontiers extended as far as the gates of Milan; the Kingdom abounding with great captains and the most learned men in the world. It was afterwards seen, during the twelve years reign of Henry II, whose goodness was so great, as not to be parallel'd by any Prince of his age, that the Government was very near changed; for being gentle, gracious and good-natured, he could not deny any person; by which means his father's treasures, being exhausted in a few months, places of trust are more exposed to sale than ever; benefices bestowed without the least regard had to merit; civil offices sold to the best bidder, and consequently to the most unworthy. Taxes were higher than ever they had been before; and yet, when he died, his Exchequer was found indebted forty two millions, after having lost Piedmont, Savoy, the island of Corsica, and the frontiers of the Netherlands: although these losses were inconsiderable, in comparison of fame and honour. Had the gentleness of this great King been accompanied with severity, his goodness mixed with rigour, his easiness with austerity; all things would not have been so easily extorted from him." This learned man's opinion seems a paradox at first sight; but when it is closely examined, we find it to be justly grounded.

[CC] He perverted the administration of his treasures, and got prodigiously in debt.] "There was an ordinance of Francis I, confirmed by his successor, importing that there should be four keys to the Exchequer chest, one of which the King should keep, and the other three be in the hands of Commissioners appointed by him; and monies were to be disbursed by the King's command, in presence of the Treasurer and Comptroller of the Exchequer. But King Henry II, by an () Edict granted some time after, () In 1556. indulged the Commissioners and Officers of the Treasury so far, as not to allow any person to call them to account hereafter; nay, one of the Commissioners had at one time, as a free gift, an hundred thousand crowns, a great sum at that time, if the report then spread of it was true (104)." It is Bodin (104) Bodin, Of, makes this remark, who adds a little after (105), a Republic, lib. 6. that Francis I did not bestow so many benefactions cap. 2. pag. 904. during a reign of thirty two years, as his successor (105) Ibid. pag. did in two years. Francis I had scarce closed his 1055. of the Latin edit. of 1601, eyes, but the tilletage, or money given for the renewing of Commissions, which at that time was an immense sum, was given to a single person (106)." Let (106) Ibid. pag. us see how this has been expressed in the Latin trans- 905. of the French edit. of 1608, 3vo. lation. Nondum justa parenti fecerat (Henricus secundus) cum hirudo quedam Palatina pecunie vim infinitam, quam officiarum accepta confirmatione regibus initiatis fisco dependere solent, uno absorbit & eodem hiansu (107). (107) Ibid. pag. This Prince's profuseness and prodigality doubtless 1055. made him lay new taxes on his subjects; not remembering the promises he made, when he gave orders for those taxations. Weigh well the following words of Bodin (108). "When the taillon or tax was laid on the (108) Ibid. pag. subjects in the year one thousand five hundred and forty 896. nine, the King promised not to appropriate or employ the monies to any other use but the payment of his Gendarmerie, without confounding or blending them with the monies arising from the other revenues;

(100) Pasquier's return, says he (100), from that fine expedition into Germany, Calvin began to solicit, on all sides, by letters; and the persons thus addressed were easily over-reached, thinking, as we may suppose, that since the King and his Council had taken the Lutherans under their protection, they themselves were, in their hearts, of the same Religion. Thus did the seeds of the new Religion, by insensible degrees, spread in France, which reached, at last, the noble or vital parts, I mean the Princes and great Lords. The author here commits two errors; he supposing that Calvin did not begin to solicit the French by letters till towards the close of the year 1552. Now this is false, for he had never ceased to do it since the year 1536; and besides, it is not true, that the French could believe that Henry II and his Council were Lutherans in their hearts. The contrary could not be doubted, since this Prince was seen to persecute, with fire and sword, those who professed the new Religion, throughout all parts of his Kingdom. The protection which he granted, and the good offices he did the Protestants of Germany, were of no service to elude this proof of his aversion for their sect; the only thing hereby shewn was, that he sacrificed the interest of his Religion, to the political interest of his Government. In this manner Kings generally act: though they sometimes take another course, in order to sacrifice, to a spirit of perfection, not only the conquests they might achieve, but also those they have gained, and the most solid advantages of their Government. Henry II was an instance of this, when he accepted the peace of Cateau.

(101) Bodin of a Republic, lib. 2. cap. 4. towards the end, pag. m. 295. See also liv. 6. chap. 2. pag. 395.

(102) It is to be observed that he does not take this word in its whole extent; he taking it only in the signification of austere and rigorous. See the end of that chapter of Bodin's second book.

(103) Ibid. pag. 296.

(k) See the remark (l) of the article GARASSE, at the first break.

(l) See the remark [H] of the article PIENE.

which the Poets caused (k) has been ranked among the disorders of his reign. Polygamy, in the preceding reigns, was not a capital crime; it was Henry II who first made it such [DD]. The reader will see in other parts of this Dictionary, what he enacted against clandestine marriages (l), and against mothers who destroy their children (m).

I shall add a particular which I found in a letter of Bodin. Pope Julius III cited this Prince to appear in the presence of God, to answer for the injury he did him, in keeping Mirandula. The King answered, that he would appear; but was sure that the Pope could not (n).

“revenues; which was likewise promised, when the tax for payment of fifty thousand foot was laid or imposed in the time of Francis I, which tax was to be raised only in such walled towns and suburbs, as did not suffer by the numberfulness of the soldiers: Nevertheless it was since extended to cities, towns, villages great or small, in one thousand five hundred and fifty five, by which the poor peasants have been doubly aggrieved, they paying and being plundered on all sides.” The bad oeconomy of the King in question, occasioned another disorder, viz. the borrowing many great sums at a high interest. When King Henry was in want of money, he would borrow at ten, twelve, or sixteen per Cent. as he did in 1554, of the Caponi, the Albici, and the partners in Germany: and the interest was paid on that occasion at the four fairs, or added to the principal. The Emperor did the like; but he gave indeed but ten or twelve per Cent. at most; and the same year the King of England borrowed of the German Merchants an hundred thousand crowns at twelve per Cent. And whereas King Henry thought, by giving greater interest than the Emperor and the King of England, to command greater sums, he began to lose his credit by it; for the most prudent oeconomists concluded, that he at last would not be able to pay either interest or principal; inasmuch as the interest of sixteen per Cent. amounted, at least, to eighteen per Cent. by means of his not being able to pay the interest (109). I am to observe that he was not the inventor of this practice, it having begun under the King his father. This was likewise a project brought into France anno 1543 by Cardinal de Tournon, when he was in favour with King Francis I, whom he persuaded, by the advice of some Italians, that there was no other way of drawing monies into France from all parts, and making a fund for the time to come, to frustrate the enemies of it, but by setting up a Bank at Lyons, and taking in money from all hands, paying eight per Cent. interest; but the truth was, the Cardinal wanted to secure an hundred thousand crowns which he had in his coffers, and get as high an interest as he could for that sum. The

(109) Ibid. pag. 893, 894.

“Letters Patent having past the seals, and the Bank opened in the manner above related, every one strove who should first get thither from France, Germany, and Italy; so that Francis I, when he died, was indebted, to the Bank at Lyons, five hundred thousand crowns, which he had in his coffers, and four times that sum; and he had settled a peace with all the Potentates of the earth (110).” Bodin (111) condemns this invention suggested to Francis I. He is of opinion that it destroys the very foundation of the Finances, and proved the source of a thousand calamities. I shall cite him once more (112). And with regard to the Treasury or Finances, they were so ill managed, that in less than twelve years that Henry II reigned, he owed (113) more interest than all his predecessors, during forty years before, had levied for all their expences.

(m) See the remark [C] of the article PATIN. (n) Bodin, in a letter dated from Laon, the 27th of March 1593, and quoted by Menage, Remarques sur la Vie d'Ayraud, pag. 258.

(110) Ibid. pag. 893.

(111) Ibid. pag. 896.

(112) Ibid. pag. 895.

(113) See the preceding remark of citation (103).

I am persuaded that these citations of Bodin, will not be displeasing to those who desire the aeras of imposts or taxes, and the origin of customs in general.

[DD] Henry II... first made... Polygamy... a capital crime. This I have read in Bodin. Imperatores, says he (114), perpetua lege polygamiam infamiae poena subiecta veterunt (+): nostris vero legib. poena capitalis Henrici II principatu irrogari cepit. i. e. 793.

(114) Bodin, de Republic. lib. 5. cap. 1. pag. m. 793.

The Emperors, by a perpetual Law, forbid Polygamy, upon pain of being rendered infamous; but it was first made a capital crime, by our Laws, under Henry II. The author of Mélanges d'Hist. toire & de Littérature was, in all probability, ignorant of this particular, he expressing himself as follows. But now we are talking of marriage and the Laws of the Kingdom, some Parliaments in France, sentence to death all such as are found guilty of Polygamy, because it is supposed to be a Law of the Kingdom. It is asked where that Law is found? It is the business of our French Civilians to inform us of that particular. It is of such consequence as well to deserve the trouble. As to my self, it is my opinion that those men are not sent to the galls for Polygamy, but for the knavish artifices they employ, in order to over-reach such women as they marry in this deceitful manner (115).

(1) L. neminem de incestis, Cod.

(115) Vignuel Marville, Mélang. d'Hist. de Littérat. pag. 175.

HENRY III, King of France, son to Henry II and Catherine of Medicis, had gained so much renown before he was raised to the throne, and before he was twenty, that the Poles judged him worthy of their Crown, but they soon had cause to repent their having elected him. The manner of his flight from Cracow was ignominious to the last degree. The motive of his stealing from Poland was, to succeed Charles IX in the throne of France. He accordingly reigned after that Prince, and in such a manner, that the Poles had no reason to regret him. The same may be said of him as of Galba, viz. that he would have seemed worthy of the Crown had he never wore it [A]. His life was so much divided between debauchery and devotion, that never was a more strange mixture seen. He suffered himself to be so completely governed by his favourites,

[A] The same may be said of him, as of Galba, viz. that he would have seemed worthy of the Crown had he never worn it. Every one has taken notice of the following saying of Tacitus: Major privato visus (Galba) dum privatus fuit, & omnium consensu capax imperii, nisi imperasset (1). i. e. Galba was thought to be more than a private man or subject whilst he was one; and, would have been judged, by universal consent, capable of governing the Empire, had he never been raised to it. Suetonius says the same thing in other words. Majore adè & favore & summa potuerit adipisci, judicetur tamen ab omnibus plus mereri (2). i. e. He got the Empire with more good will and authority than he governed it. The like judgment was formed of the Emperor Jovian (3): but the reverse was said of Marius. Marius in potestatibus eo modo agitavit, ut ampliore quam gerebat, dignus haberetur (4). i. e. Marius behaved so well in all employments, that he was ever judged worthy of an higher station than that which he possessed. Henry III verified, to his cost, the judicious maxim following, Magistratus virum prodit (5): he shewed by wearing a Crown, that those were mistaken who judged him worthy of it. The following words of Cassiodorus cannot be justly applied to him. Hic est probata conscientiae gratissimus fructus, ut omnivis summa potuerit adipisci, judicetur tamen ab omnibus plus mereri (6). Much less could it be said of him; magna enim praecesserat fama, qua major inventus est (7).

(1) Tacit. Hist. lib. 1. cap. 49.

(2) Sueton. in Galba, cap. 14.

(3) Decessus suscepto clarior apice auctoritate adeptus est quam gessit imperium (2). i. e. Cluverus, Epist. Histor. Mundi, pag. m. 308.

(4) Salust. in Balbo Jugurth.

(5) See Aristot. de Morib. lib. 5. cap. 3. pag. m. 44. [G].

(6) Cassiodor. lib. 5. Epist. 4.

(7) Plin. Epist. 3. lib. 2.

rites; that the whole Kingdom was offended at it; especially as the prodigious expences which he put himself to on their account [B], was burthensome and grievous to the poor people. He incurred the hatred of the Ladies, a circumstance that was greatly prejudicial to him [C]. The Duchefs of Montpensier took a dreadful revenge, on account of some things he had spoke to her disadvantage [D]. The Duke of Guise, by this concurrence of circumstances, and the troubles occasioned about Religion, growing much bolder than he would otherwise have been, to pave his way to the throne, found, by experience, that the weakest Princes can at last form a vigorous resolution. He was murdered by the command of Henry III. I have taken notice elsewhere (a) of the consequences

(a) In the article of GUISE (Henry).

(8) Mezerai, Hist. de France, vol. 3. pag. 499.

(9) The Dukes of Joyeuse and Epemon.

[B] The prodigious expences he put himself to on account of his favourites (8). "As the chief employment, and the greatest pleasure this King took was to please two favourites (9), he declared that he should not be easy and satisfied, till he had made them as great as himself; and raised them to so exalted a pitch of power, that neither envy nor fortune should be able to destroy them. He was determined therefore, as he himself had no daughters, to marry them with, to give them in marriage to his wife's sisters, viz. Margaret and Christierne, though they were already betrothed to two other heiresses.. but in order to honour them with some title which might qualify them for so exalted an alliance for his, he resolved to create them both Duke and Peer . . . In the mean time the Duke of Lorraine brought his nieces with as great a train, and in as magnificent a manner, as if they had been to be espoused to Kings. As to Christierne, being as yet too young, she was only betrothed to Duke d'Epemon; however, she did not marry him, and chose rather to take the veil. As to Margaret, being betrothed at the Louvre, in the Queen's chamber, the nuptials were solemnized a week after in the church of St. Germain de l'Auxerrois. It would be needless to describe to you the masquerades, balls, tournaments, festivals, concerts, and other pomps, which luxury invented for the setting off of this wedding; in a word, it lasted near six weeks; and Paris, the Theatre of Wonders, had never seen any thing like it. The King, dressed in the same manner as his favourite, led the bride to Church. . . After the solemnization of the marriage, he ordered seventeen entertainments, which were made, according to rank, by the Princes and Lords who were related to the bride; the least of them cost above an hundred thousand crowns; at all which the guests had such rich and sumptuous changes of dresses, that gold and silver could make no figure there. Some suits cost ten thousand crowns only for the making. To conclude, the expence was so prodigious, that the King, barely for his part, spent no less than four millions of livres, besides four hundred thousand crowns which he promised to pay to the bridegroom in two years, as his wife's portion; and when it was remonstrated to him, that his excessive profusions would ruin him, he answered, that he would grow prudent and wife after he should have married his two children, by whom he meant Joyeuse and d'Epemon." The Swiss Embassadors being come to Paris, to ask for monies that were owing them; and the Treasurers having answered, that the King had none, and therefore that they must be patient and wait; they replied, agreeably to the usual liberty of their Nation, that it was not probable so wife and discreet a Prince, should have spent twelve hundred thousand crowns, merely for his pleasure, at a Gentleman's wedding, unless he had much more in his coffers, for the necessary affairs of his Kingdom (10).

(10) Mezerai, tom. 3. pag. 500.

(11) Ibid. pag. 451. ad ann. 1578.

(12) Maugiron was killed on the spot; and Quelus, who received 19 wounds, lived 33 days after.

(13) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue.

(14) Henry III, since the Princess of Conde's death, entertained the little affection for women; his adventure at Venice having turned his passion another way. Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 251, ad ann. 1581.

[C] He incurred the hatred of the Ladies, a circumstance that was greatly prejudicial to him. "The Ladies, to whom the minions revealed every thing, discovered to the Duke of Guise all the secrets of the cabinet, out of revenge to the King, whom they hated for certain reasons which are not told (13)." These words are borrowed from Maimbourg; who shews manifestly enough, that the Ladies greatly prejudiced the King's affairs; however, the motives of their hatred are explained intelligibly enough by several Historians. See Mezerai's words in the margin (14).

The reflection mentioned by the author of Novvelles de la Republique des Lettres is a mere cavil. "Some Censors, says he (15), have found fault with Maimbourg for saying, that the Ladies to whom the Minions used to reveal every thing &c. They say that these words are highly unpolite with regard to the fair-sex, because it is thereby insinuated, that women contract an aversion to such men, as are determined to disregard for ever their charms. Now, say they, in case they are chaste, what do they value their being neglected by the men? if it is not indifferent to them, it is a manifest sign that they are resolved not to live chastly. But I think it incumbent on me to take Mr. Maimbourg's part against such unjust Censors. I say therefore that he speaks only of those Ladies who shared in the Duke of Guise's intrigues (16); and that we are not to doubt, but that women of that character entertain a strong hatred, when they are prompted by the reasons which are understood here. People may infer as much as they please, that this would be indifferent to them if they were chaste; such persons may, if they please, infer that this inference is unpolite: Maimbourg has guarded, in his preface, against such subtilties; he there declaring, that he searches after truth, and not for such things as may please and oblige people; and that if any one finds fault with this, they must blame those that first laid down the laws of history, which require incidents to be related as they are, and not as they ought to be."

(15) For April 1684, Art. 3. pag. 135.

(16) It is certain that he means the Ladies in general.

There is too much subtilty in this reflection: it is natural for all persons to wish, that such talents as ingratiate them with the world, may not be despised; this, I say, is natural, though they don't intend to make an ill use of such qualities. The authors of the Journey of Mefs. de la Chapelle and Bachaumont, have carried the raillery a little too far, with regard to the anger with which the women of Montpellier are there said to be fired against the unhappy Dassoucy.

[D] The Duchefs of Montpensier (17) took a dreadful revenge, on account of some things he had spoke to her disadvantage. "It was told the King, that the League designed him no less mischief than the making him a Monk; and that the Duchefs of Montpensier used to shew the scissars with which she intended to clip off his hair. The reason of the indignation of this widow was, he had offended her, by holding some discouries wherein were discovered certain secret defects of her's; an insult which women will much less excuse, than an affront that is put upon their honour (18)." That affront must have made a very deep impression on this Duchefs's heart, if we judge of it from the great endeavours she employed to ruin Henry III. "She brought a considerable part of the materials, of the invention of her happy wit, and of the labour of her body, to build the said League; so that after it was strongly built, playing one day at cards at Primero, (for she was very fond of play,) and one saying to her, that she should shuffle the cards well, she replied before a great number of people; I have shuffled them so well, that it is impossible for them to be better shuffled or unshuffled. This would have been well, had not her relations been killed, the death of whom, without being in the least dejected, she endeavoured to revenge; and as soon as she heard the news of this in Paris, she, without immuring herself in her chamber, and bemoaning on that account like other women, came out of her palace, leading her brother's children, when she carries them up and down the city; breaks into lamentations before the people; exhorts them consequences of this affair; but I did not observe that this Monarch, had he not been assisted by the Protestants, would have been overpowered at Tours, where he was attacked by those of the League (b), some months after he had caused the Duke and Cardinal of Guise to be killed. Having extricated himself there, he marched and besieged Paris; and in all probability would have soon made himself master of that seditious city, had he not been assassinated by James Clement, a Dominican Friar. He died the 2d of August 1589, the day after he was wounded (c). I have observed in another article (d), that this King is justly blamed for giving up some cities to the Duke of Savoy, who had accompanied him to Beauvoisin Bridge, in September 1574 [E]. He had cause to repent his yielding those cities; it encouraging that Duke's son to form several enterprizes against France [F].

(17) She was sister to the Duke of Guise, killed at Blois.

(18) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. pag. 315. ad ann. 1588. See the Critique Générale du Calvinisme de Maimbourg, Let. tom. 3. pag. 44.

Few Princes have been governed by a more capricious star than Henry III. Fortune was so fantastical to him, that his fate resembled very much that of those children, who are first brought up by a very tender mother, and afterwards by a cruel step-mother. His youth was very glorious, and his fame procured him the Kingdom of Poland in the most conspicuous and honourable manner; but this strong and shining light was soon eclipsed. He abdicated, not long after, that crown in a more ignominious manner, than his election had been glorious; for can any thing be stranger or more shameful, than for a King to fly in the night, and withdraw with the utmost speed out of his dominions, like a criminal, who sees the officers of justice in pursuit of him? In that manner did Henry III leave Poland (e). If we could excuse this elopement, on the strong reasons he had to make the utmost dispatch, in order to possess himself of a crown which was much more valuable than that he wore; we yet might say that he was born under an unhappy planet, and Diis iratis, since he was reduced to such extremities, that he could not succeed the King his brother on any other condition: it would be always

“them all with tears, cries, and moving words, to take up arms; to rise up in a furious manner; to fall upon the King's palace and insult the King's picture, as has been seen, and as I hope to relate in his life; to renounce their allegiance, and enter into rebellion against him, which was followed soon after by his murder; from whence we may guess who are those, of both sexes, who advised, and perpetrated it (19).” It was she who chiefly excited James Clement to kill the King; she not scrupling any thing, as we are told, not even the last favour to effect it (20).

[E] In September 1574.] The King arrived the fifth of September 1574 at Beauvoisin Bridge, and not the 21st of September 1575, as is asserted by two or three Historians (21), whom John Aymes de Chavigny censures in pag. 224. of the first face of his French Janus, for thus he entitles his explication of Nostradamus.

[F] To form several enterprizes against France.] The author of the first Savoisienne (22) relates (23), that Henry III returning from Poland, and passing Savoy, was asked, in return for a collation which had been given him, for the cities of Pignerol and Savilian; and that this Prince, whose only defect was an excess of good nature, gave them up: that the Duke of Savoy, son to him who had received so noble a present (24), took advantage of the confusions of France anno 1588; for observing that Henry III was out of his capital, he invaded the Marquisate of Saluces: that after having sent an Ambassador to the King, with a promise to give up all things into his hands, he on a sudden removed all the officers of his Majesty, and established others by his ducal authority . . . and at the same time, to display in all places the trophies of his victory, he caused a pompous medal to be struck, wherein was the figure of a centaur, trampling upon a crown reversed, with the following motto, Oportune, alluding to his having taken a proper opportunity (25). We see by the second Savoisienne, that after Henry III's murder, the Duke took several towns in Provence; and that Henry IV was obliged, before he could bring him to reason, to possess himself of Savoy. It is to be observed that, in return for the above-mentioned medal (26), the King caused another to be struck, wherein was a Hercules armed after the antique manner, trampling a centaur under foot, over whom he lifts a club with his right hand, and with his left a crown which he seems to have taken up; and the motto Oportunus; to shew that he knew better than the Duke to take his opportunity, and that in a more honourable way, since he (the French King) had employed force of arms instead of artifices and stratagems, which the Duke had put in practice very ungratefully (27). This compensated for the evil, which the giving up of Pignerol had occasioned; but yet this did not in any manner extenuate the fault of Henry III.

The author of a piece that is highly injurious to the present (28) Duke of Savoy, has spoke of this (28) I write this affair, but not without some errors. Henry III, says, in October 1697. he (29), being engaged in war against a powerful (29) Memoirs of Leagué, Charles Emmanuel, grandfather (30) to his Mr. D. F. L. Royal Highness, acted much the same part that has with regard to been now acted. That Duke flattered himself that he Italy, between should gain prodigiously, in case he embraced that oppor- *Victor Amadeus tunity of declaring war against France, and accordingly II Duke of Savoy, be, in 1588, joined his arms to those of Henry the III's, and the most Christian enemies: and after forming a powerful party of which King, pag. he declared himself the chief, he marched into Provence; was published took the cities of Marseille and Arles by stratagem; and anno 1696. grew so haughty by these conquests, that he caused a medal to be struck, which was to serve as a medal to immortalize his memory. He had caused himself to be represented, under the figure of a centaur &c. The author adds, that Henry IV having carried the war into Italy in 1600, possessed himself of almost all Savoy and Piedmont, and caused a medal to be struck in his turn &c. This relation is not accurate. The Duke of Savoy did not join his arms to those of the enemies of Henry III in 1588: nor was it that year, but in 1590, that he marched into Provence. He did not cause the medal of the centaur to be struck, after he had taken Marcellles, but after he had invaded the Marquisate of Saluces. Henry IV did not carry his arms into Italy anno 1600, nor make any conquests in Piedmont. The author is perhaps more judicious in his political reflections, than accurate in relating facts. Henry IV, says he (31), (31) *Memoirs of after the conquest of Savoy and Piedmont, suffered him- Mr. D. F. L. &c. self to be at last wrought upon by the intreaties of Pope Clement VIII, who endeavoured to reconcile the poor Duke with the Monarch in question; although it was the opinion of all the politicians of that age, that Henry IV ought to keep Savoy and Piedmont, to chastise the rashness of that imprudent Prince; and by that means preserve a free passage into Italy, whenever he should have a mind to enter it. This was the advice of Cardinal d'Offat, one of the greatest Politicians of his age: but Henry, on this occasion, discovered more generosity than policy, and restored Charles Emmanuel to all his possessions. What would Cardinal d'Offat have said of the imprudent conduct of Henry III, in divesting himself of Pignerol, since he blames Henry IV for giving back Savoy, at a time when he was an hundred times abler to resist his neighbours, than his predecessor was? France would have been very unhappy, had it not been possessed of Pignerol, when the Duke of Savoy made a league with the House of Austria, England, and Holland in 1690. France was obliged to give it up six years after, which is no inconsiderable loss.

(b) In May 1589.

(c) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 355.

(d) In the article HENRY III. remark [C].

(e) See Thuanus, Book 58, last.

(19) Brantome, Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 316.

(20) See Thuanus, cited by the author of the Critique generale, Letter 3. pag. 43.

(21) Milles Piquere, John le Frere, and the author of the appendix to the Annales de France.

(22) A piece published at the time that Henry IV obliged the Duke of Savoy to do him justice with regard to the Marquisate of Saluces.

(23) The first Savoisienne, pag. m. 16.

(24) Ibid. pag. 17. & seq.

(25) See the second Savoisienne, pag. 109.

(26) Ibid. pag. 132.

(27) See, with relation to the two inscriptions, Oportune, Oportunus, Paquier's Letters, liv. 19. tom. 2. pag. 450. & seq.

(30) It should be great grandfather.

(31) Memoirs of Mr. D. F. L. &c. pag. 148, 149.

ways a mark, that fortune had led him maliciously through toilsome and perplexing roads. After his return to France he was sought for, as it were, in himself, but could not be found; that Duke of Anjou, who had acquired so exalted a reputation (f), no longer appeared in the person of Henry III. He at first discovered only the churlish temper of a man-hater [G]: Here follow some other instances of the capriciousness of this Monarch's fortune. He had a brother who was a great burthen to him: death freed Henry from him, and he was overjoyed at this deliverance, which very circumstance ought to be looked upon as a misfortune; for what can be more odd, than for a person to be forced to rejoice at the death of an only brother? However, it would be a kind of benefit, if a series of lasting advantages would accrue from it; but it did not prove such to Henry III; he finding very soon that the Duke of Alençon's death, how advantageous soever it might be to him, was yet more prejudicial than beneficial [H], since it furnished a handle for caballing; and fomented that dangerous faction, which mortified the King to such a degree, and at last crushed him. The joy he felt at getting rid of the Duke of Guise was of the same kind, it being of short duration; he experienced, during the first days, that this great party blow, which he had thought absolutely necessary to his repose and safety, plunged him into new perplexities, and deadly disquietudes [I]. It must be confessed that this King surpassed himself, in executing the project

(f) See the article MARIANA remark [O].

[G] He at first discovered only the churlish temper of a man-hater.] "At his return from Poland he was almost inaccessible, except to three or four; and would always eat in private, contrary to the custom of our Kings: but this not being approved of, remonstrances were made to him on that subject; wherefore being forced, as it were, by custom, to eat in public, he caused great rails to be fixed round his table, which are still in the Hall of the Louvre at Paris; and the following verses were written on that occasion, and fixed up in different parts of the Louvre.

"Puis qu'Henry Roy des François
 "N'en ayme que quatre ou trois,
 "Il faut que ces trois ou quatre,
 "Allent ses ennemis combattre.

The sense is,

"Since Henry King of France loves but three or four of his subjects, those three or four must advance, in order to fight his enemies.

"He commanded that no person should come into his bed-chamber without having a cap or bonnet on (32)." I imagine that the reason of his making that order was, because he himself wore a certain little bonnet like that of a child, having a roll cut with slashes across, and upon it a plume of feathers before, with a fine stone crossbet, and a large peruke; and he never uncovered himself, though he were at Church, because his head was shaven (33). There was something fantastical in all this. The words above will make the reader understand the following passage. Even his turbant represented sufficiently his infidelity, he being always covered after the Turkish fashion; and he never took off that turbant to do honour to Jesus Christ (34). In this manner is Henry III reproached, by the author of the book intitled, The Martyrdom of the two brothers.

(32) Du Verdier, Propriétés, tom. 3. p. 2558.

(33) Ibid. tom. 3. pag. 2560.

(34) Martyrs des Chrétiens, folio by the author of the book intitled, The Martyrdom of the two brothers.

[H] The Duke of Alençon's death, how advantageous soever it might be to him, was yet more prejudicial than beneficial.] I study, not only to say nothing but what I can bring proofs for, but always to bring, whenever I have an opportunity for it, the testimony of contemporary authors; the reader therefore may be persuaded, that it is with pleasure I here make use of Stephen Pasquier's words (35). "He still had (36) a thorn in his foot, which in the midst of that peace (37), seemed to check the career of his satisfaction. For although, in outward appearance, he was not in any misunderstanding with the Duke his brother; he yet was second King, having his court and his favourites apart, sometimes in the city of Tours, or else in other cities dependent on him, or of his appennage. That Duke's way of thinking and opinions were so opposite to those of the King, that he never would suffer himself, or any belonging to him, to be honoured with the Order of the Holy Ghost. Besides, his appennage was so great, that it swallowed up a considerable part of France. He had his Chamber of Account in Tours, and his Exchequer at Alençon, which judged, without appeal, of the causes of that Dukedom both civil and criminal. Farther, this Prince preferred to the Bishopricks and Abbeyes of his Appennage whomsoever he pleased, in order for their being nominated to the Pope by the King, according to the Concordate: all these were grands seigneurs like those of a King, which might inspire his soul with jealousy, but he prudently dissembled it. Now it happened, in 1583, that the Duke died; and by his death his Appennage was united to the Crown. Those who governed the King rejoiced exceedingly in their hearts; and he himself discovered sufficiently, how much he imagined his grandeur was thereby increased, when he wrote with his own hand the regulations of it; ordaining that his Chancellor, sitting in Council, should be clothed in a gown and long robe of crimson velvet; his Countellor of State in purple sattin; and that his Gentlemen Ushers and Valets de Chambre should have velvet doublets, and upon them a massy chain of gold hanging at their necks; then, a long range of rooms for people to pass through before he could be come at; and a long train of Lords who were to walk before him, whenever he went to Church. Indeed the abovemention'd Duke's death, at first fight, promised him a long tranquillity; and nevertheless, it proved the completion of his misery, and that of all France; for had the Duke lived, the contrivers of the League would not have been favoured with a single pretence. . . . But the instant he was dead, in 1584, the Princes of the League were not afraid to display the disgusts they had been hatching, covered with the cloak of the Catholic, Apostolic and Romish Religion." It is to be observed, that love intrigues had sowed the seeds of discord between these two brothers. They happened to be rivals in love: one of their hearts would dislodge or supplant the other; and not being able to bear partners in love, any more than in authority, they changed a fraternal affection, into implacable hatred and spite (38). I now leave the reader to judge whether this double jealousy, the one of love and the other of ambition, between two brothers (39), the one a King and the other presumptive heir to the Crown, and whose turn of mind and inclinations were depraved, would not be apt to inspire them with a prodigious antipathy (40).

(35) Pasquier's Lettres, liv. 14. tom. 2. p. 140, & seq.

(36) L. c. Henry III.

(37) That which was concluded anno 1577.

[I] He finding . . . that the death of the Duke of Guise, . . . plunged him into new perplexities and deadly disquietudes.] Pasquier shall again be the Commentator on this occasion. "Immediately, says he (41), after the Duke of Guise's death, no King was ever so highly satisfied as ours; he crying aloud and plainly to every one, that he now had got rid of a companion, and consequently of a master; and the next day, the death of the Cardinal completed all his wishes. He enjoyed for some days this tranquillity of mind; dispatching letters on all sides, to shew the motives of his conduct, but with little advantage to himself. About eight or ten days after, as he received no news from Paris, he began to reflect, and think of his conscience, which lessened

(38) Matthieu, cited by Marcel, Hist. of France, tom. 4. pag. 602.

(39) See in the remark [B] of the article DRUSILLA, what is there said concerning the hatred of brothers. See also citation (20) of the article DRUSUS, son of Germanicus.

(40) It was so great, that Henry III one day ordered the King of Navarre to kill the Duke of Alençon. See Péréfixe in the History of Henry the Great, pag. m. 42, ad ann. 1575.

(41) Pasquier, Lettres, liv. 13. tom. 2. pag. 60, & seq.

15907A

project relating to the putting to death the Duke of Guise [K]. He discovered a great deal of prudence, and much more resolution than on other occasions, when he had behaved in such a manner as made the Pope despise him [L]. One of the oddest circumstances of his fate was, that he was equally hated by Papists and Protestants. These two parties, though quite opposites and counterparts in all things, as well spiritual as temporal, agreed in entertaining an aversion for this Prince. This was a center for persons to join or unite, who, on all other occasions, were divided. Humanly speaking, the Protestants in France had great reason to hate him; for he persecuted them with the utmost severity and virulence, and was looked upon as one of the great promoters of the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, and even boasted his having been such (g); this circumstance, added to his love and attachment to the most monastic devotions, should naturally have gained him the esteem of the Popish Ecclesiastics, and the greatest bigots among the Roman Catholics; and nevertheless he was more hated by them than one would imagine. This was a very strange caprice in his ruling planet, and here follows another; whatever he had been fondest of, proved at last pernicious to him. Ei fatale erat, ut quicquid ardentius dilexerat, id illi postremo perniciem adferret (b). What I observed (i), with regard to the irregularities and disorders which the prodigality of Henry II occasioned, may be applied with still greater propriety to the reign of Henry III, a Prince infinitely more profuse than his father. Accordingly, there were seen in his

(g) Thuan. lib. 90. pag. 301.

(b) Idem, lib. 90. sub fin. pag. m. 193.

(i) Remark [BB] of the article HENRY II.

“ the excess of his joy : and afterwards hearing of “ that general revolt, he earnestly wished, that what “ he had done were still to do . . . The King grew “ insensibly to be displeas'd at every thing, even “ with himself: this I can affirm and write to you,
 “ as having been an eye-witness of it. He now “ grew more distrustful than ever, as you shall soon “ hear.” Pasquier then gives four or five examples, which plainly shew the dreadful perplexity this Prince was in. He wanted to convey, to d'Amboise Castle, some persons he had caused to be seized after the death of Messieurs de Guise, “ and found no body he could “ trust but himself. I will tell you frankly, adds “ Pasquier, that most of us who were in Blois, almost burst with indignation, to see the King's af“ fairs reduced to so low an ebb, that he himself was “ forced to superintend and guard his own prisoners.
 “ Scarce was he gone, but advice was brought us,
 “ that Marshal d'Aumont having abandoned the ci“ tadel, and raised the siege of Orleans, upon the march “ of the Sieur de Mayenne, was retired with his “ forces to Baugency. Many of his soldiers came “ wounded to Blois. Upon this we all believed, that “ the conducting of these prisoners was a refined pre“ tence studiously sought for by the King, in order “ that he might quit the city with less dishonour.
 “ And this I can assure you, that had the Sieur de “ Mayenne then fallen upon us, the terror was so “ great and so general, that he would not have met with “ the least resistance; and being once master of Blois,
 “ all the river Loire had been his; especially as all “ the towns were wavering; and the King would “ have been prodigiously at a loss, to find a “ place whither he might retire. God was pleas'd “ to deliver us from that evil (42).” The author adds (43), that Lognac, who “ first prompted the “ King to give orders for the perpetrating of that “ murder, which had proved so unsuccessful,” quite lost his favour. Some Historians relate that this brave Gentleman, not thinking himself safe at Court, sued to the King for some place whither he might retire to, in order to secure himself from the resentment of those of the League (44). This was intimating to the King the bad state to which it was believed his affairs were reduced; and the answer which we are told he made to Lognac, is not unworthy of a great King. I mention this elsewhere (45).
 [K] This King surpassed himself, in executing the project relating to the putting to death the Duke of Guise.]
 His heart had failed him at the battle of the Barricades; he had given up the day to his rival; had fled from Paris, and there left the Duke of Guise all the glory of a triumph: but his courage revived in Blois, and he there humbled that proud enemy. The following words from the Æneid may be applied on this occasion:

(42) Ibid. pag. 64.

(43) Ibid. pag. 65.

(44) See the ar- ticle LOGNAC, remark [F].

(45) In the same article.

(46) Virgil. Æn. lib. 2, ver. 307.

Quondam etiam victis reat in præcordia virtus, Victoreque cadunt (46).

That is,

“ The vanquish'd triumph in their turn, and the “ victor's mourn.
 Dryden.

Then was verified the truth of a sentence in Homer, I mean of the remonstrance which Calchas made to Achilles, viz. that a King who is angry with an inferior, gets the better of him one time or other,

Κρίσσαν γὰρ βασιλεὺς ὅτι χόσται ἀπὸ χίρῳ, εἴπω γὰρ τι χίλοι γι καὶ αὐτῆρας καταπέψῃ,
 Ἄλλὰ γι καὶ μετόπισθε ἔχει κόποι δ' ἄρα τελέσσῃ,
 Ἐν ἐσθίσῳ ἰούσι (47).

(47) Homer, Iliad. lib. 1. ver. 10. See also Nestor's Remonstrance to Achilles, ibid. ver. 275.

“ Bold is the task, when subjects grown too wise, “ Instruct a Monarch where his error lies:
 “ For tho' we deem the short-liv'd fury past,
 “ 'Tis sure, the mighty will revenge at last.

Pope.

I have read the account of this exploit of Henry III in several authors; but I have not seen any relation where the particulars are better connected and professed, than in that which Marcel has inserted in the 4th tome (48) of his History of France. There the reader may see all the exactness of the measures which were taken to give success to that mighty blow. The King there discovers the greatest vigilance and resolution, and a soul that is so far master of itself, as carefully to take notice of the most inconsiderable things that might be prejudicial (49). Consider well how greatly he encouraged the Secretary of State, who was to inform the Duke of Guise that the King wanted him. “ Upon this the King hearing that the Duke “ of Guise was in the Council, said to Monsieur de “ Revol the Secretary of State; Revol, go and tell “ the Duke of Guise, that he must come and speak with “ me in my old closet. The Sieur de Nambu having “ refused to admit him, he returned to the closet with “ a frighted countenance. He was a great, but fear“ ful man. *Good God, said the King, Revol, what “ ails you? what's the matter? How pale you are?
 “ You'll spoil all! rub your cheeks, Revol. . . There's “ no harm, Sir, said he; only Mr. de Nambu will not “ open the door, unless your Majesty should command it.*
 “ The King orders him from the door of his closet,
 “ to let him come in again, and the Duke of Guise
 “ also (50).” I will take notice, on this occasion, of a particular which I have read in the Journal des Savans. What happened at Blois with regard to the proposal made to the States, not to suffer any other Religion in France, except the Catholic . . . shews sufficiently that Henry III was more politic than the generality of the world imagines (51).

(48) Pag. 626, 627.

(49) What the author of the relation says of the disquietudes with which the King was seized, does not disagree with this; for they did not hinder either his application or vigilance.

(50) Marcel, Hist. de France, tom. 4. pag. 631.

(51) Journ. des Savans, of the 25th of January 1666, p. 83, 84. In the Extract of Memoires du Duc de Nevers.

[L] He behaved in such a manner, as had made the Pope despise him.] See the Critique generale of Maimbourg's Calvinism, and you will there meet with (52) two exclamations of Sixtus V; the one relating to the rashness which he ascribed to the Duke of Guise, and the other to the simplicity, which he ascribed to Henry III. He spoke with great freedom and bluntness on that occasion. Some authors (53) relate of this Pope, that, reflecting on the conduct of that Monarch, he said, I have done all that lies in my power to extricate myself from the Monkish condition, and he does what ever he can to get into it.

(52) Letter 3. num. 2. pag. 38. of the 3d edit.

(53) See Naudé, chap. 1. of his Coups d'Etat, pag. m. 22.

reign, more taxes ; a greater number of edicts were published for levying of money, and the public treasure was more profusely squandered, than ever had been known in the Kingdom. The evil would have been still greater, could that Prince have obtained leave to alienate the royal demesnes ; but this the States General of France would never consent to [M]. It is to be observed that Henry III, who with regard to his favourites, was not jealous of authority, and did not aspire to independence, had a passionate desire to increase the regal power [N]. I shall take some notice of his devotions [O] ; will not

[M] The States General of France would never consent to . . . alienate the royal demesnes.]

(54) Remark [I].

(55) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 433.

(56) President of Bourdeaux, one of the Deputies to the States of Blois, in 1576.

Besides what I have said upon this in the article of BODIN (54), I will here quote a passage from Mezerai (55). " With regard to the alienation of the crown-lands . . . Emar (56), by order of the assembly, answered Bellievre, whom the King had sent thither ; that such an alienation was absolutely forbid, by the common and fundamental Law of the State ; that the King's demesnes or crown-lands were like a woman's jointure, which cannot be sold or appropriated to any other use by her husband : that they were still more sacred than those of the Church, because they cannot be alienated for any cause whatsoever, even with solemnity ; and indeed it was never known that recourse had been had to this expedient, even when France was in the greatest necessity, and had been in greater danger than it was at that time, as in the reign of King John, for whose deliverance the French were obliged to give so much money, so many cities and provinces ; that in a word, they were one of the strongest pillars of the throne, and on which the portions, dowries, and appennages were founded ; and therefore, that the royal demesnes ought to be strengthened rather weakened, and raised higher rather than lowered : and that the reason why the third estate so strongly remonstrated the consequences of that alienation, was, because whatever should be taken from the crown-lands, must be made good at their expence ; and that the whole loss would fall on them alone, and not on the other two estates, which, on that very account, consented more easily to it." If the reader is desirous of seeing the limitations of the royal authority in that respect, let him read what follows. " By the edict enacted anno 1565 at Moulins, where all the Princes and great Lords were assembled, with a numberless multitude of Presidents and Counsellors of the supreme Courts, it is expressly decreed, that all alienations made, or to be made, of the crown-lands, should be void except in two cases, viz. for making a provision for the younger children of our Kings ; and for mortgages necessary to raise sums sufficient for the exigencies of the war ; and that in these two cases, letters patents should be passed and published in the Courts of Parliament ; it being very expressly forbid them, to pay any regard to such letters, for any other cause or time whatsoever, although it should be but for one year (57)."

(57) Pasquier, Lettres, liv. 6. tom. 1. pag. 341.

[N] Henry III, who, with regard to his favourites . . . did not aspire to independence, had a passionate desire to increase the regal power.]

(58) When he made his entry into Roan, as Governor of Normandy.

These are two points. The first I prove by a remark that was made on the great credit and interest of Duke d'Epéron ; and on a Fortune, made of silver gilt, which the city of Roan presented him with (58). That Goddess held him in a strict embrace, and below was the following Italian words ; E per non lasciarti. i. e. " Will not abandon thee." A motto taken from the ambiguous and equivocal turn in his name ; to show that his grandeur could never be destroyed ; as indeed the King having an excessive favour for him, had before protested to him, that he would make him so great in the midst of his friends, that it should not be in his power to lessen him, though he should afterwards desire to do it. This is a circumstance we have since learnt from Duke d'Epéron, by a fine letter which he wrote, during his disgrace, to the King (59). Those persons who say that Kings never love any body, and who look upon that as a great fault, are in a double error ; for most Monarchs are apt to give into such an excess of friendship, as occasions more disorders than could arise from an indifferent and insensible heart. See, above, the comparison which Bodin has made between the last years of the reign of Francis I, and Henry II's reign. See likewise the remark [B] of this article. It were perhaps to be wished, that Kings resembled the wise men of the Stoics, viz. were without love or hatred. It is at least very certain, that the too kind, too tender, too beneficent, and too profuse disposition of our Henry, gave rise to a multitude of Calamities. I now proceed to the second point.

(59) Pasquier, Lettres, liv. 13. tom. 2. pag. 72.

The States of the Kingdom in 1576, had resolved to nominate twelve Deputies to assist in the King's council, when the papers which the three Estates were to present to his Majesty, should be examined there. This resolution did not please Henry III, he fearing that those State-Deputies would prevent his disposing of his affairs in such a manner as to increase his power ; but when he was made sensible, that his authority would thereby be very much increased, he was greatly pleased that the States had taken such measures ; was angry that they had changed their minds, and was very much disgusted at Bodin, who had caused that change (60). It will be very proper to hear Thuanus. Cum Bodinus tertium ordinem, si ulterius pergerent, intercessurum diceret, sacer ordo, ac max nobilitas acquievit, ac commune suffragiorum votum fuit, ne ulli delegati, qui cum regis consiliariis de postulatis decernerent, ab Ordinibus eligerentur. contrarium cum initio placuisset, eaque re non mediocriter Rex animo commotus esset, ut supra ostendimus, postea mutaverat, à Lugdunensi Archiepiscopo, ut putatur, induit, qui principi POTENTIAE SUAE AMPLIFICATIONIS SUPRA MODUM CUPIDO, ex quo Majestati regiae decrementum metuebat, ex to incrementum accessurum artificiose persuaserat (61). i. e.

(60) See above, the remark [I] of the article BODIN.

Bodin having declared, that the third Estate would oppose that affair, if it should be carried any farther ; the Clergy, and presently after the Nobility, acquiesced ; and it was unanimously voted, that no Deputies should be elected by the Estates, to debate with his Majesty's Council, with relation to petitions, though the very reverse had formerly been resolved upon by them, where by they had greatly disgusted the King, as was shewn above. But his Majesty afterwards changed his opinion with regard to this affair ; induced, as it is thought, by the Archbishop of Lyons, who artfully suggested to the King, who had a prodigious desire to increase the royal power, that instead of decreasing it, as he imagined, this would increase it."

(61) Thuan. lib. 63. pag. 187.

The Archbishop of Lyons acted the subtle Politician on this occasion.

[O] I shall take some notice of his devotions] I shall borrow the words of Verdier Vau Privas : " He performed several extraordinary devotions, going sometimes at ten o'clock at night to the Carthusian Monastery, to hear mattins. He instituted the brotherhood of the White Penitents, and the Annunciation of our Lady at the Augustines in Paris ; and used to go in procession like others, with his sackcloth and whip at his girdle. . . . He would likewise institute several other societies or societies, as that of St. Jerom, called the Blue Penitents in Marmoutier College ; that of the Crucifix and of Black Penitents, in St. Michael's College ; and that of the Grey Penitents of St. Francis, at St. Eloy. He brought Feuillants, who are certain reformed Monks of the order of Cistercians, from the Abbey of Feuilliance near Thoulouse, and fixed them in the suburb called Saint Honoré, whither he used often to go and perform his devotions. He had built a house near the Monastery of the Capuchins, where people likewise used to go on certain days, and perform spiritual exercises. Every one was door-keeper, and performed the other offices in his turn ; and he there went by the name of brother Henry ;" and not omit that he was eloquent; had a love for the Sciences; and took a great delight in hearing the conversation of learned men; but he was charged with doing this unfeasonably, as also with regard to the pains he took to study the Latin tongue [P]. Two very curious Memoirs have been sent me, the one relating to the propofal which this King had been prevailed upon to approve, viz. to recognize the Duke of Lorraine's eldest son for

"and if any person wanted to speak with him, he was obliged to ask for brother Henry, as when any Courier arrived there, or any other affair happened, whilst he was in that conclave. He founded another fraternity or brotherhood of Hieronymitans in Vincennes, and at St. Mary de vie faine. He caused a great and noble house to be built in the Horse-Market, after a fantastical manner, with certain small cells, in order to go and spend some days there in a Monkish way. . . . (62). He used to wear . . . at his girdle a pair of beads containing ten Ave Maria's (63)." This Author had great reason to say, that many people used to look upon all this as grimace (64); for the writers of the League, and others also, have slandered him very much on that account. I shall content myself with citing a passage which I met with in a libel of the Leaguers. "The cells built by that hypocrite, were only to serve as a cover to his impurities, and wicked, filthy, and Sodomitical practices: John d'Esperson knows something of this, and cannot give me the lie on that occasion. Men of the greatest wisdom have justly observed, that this was only to amuse fools, and that they were cages designed for other sorts of birds; and not a religious simplicity, which has ever been the real motive for all Princes and men of honour to sequester themselves, who were not, (like that specious Hermit) struck intimately with a spirit of hypocrisy (65)." Du Verdier observes, that the Preachers, and among others Maurice Poncet, cried aloud against these brotherhoods and processions made by the King. This Poncet seems to have been the most furious of them all. I here quote what Pierre Matthieu says on this subject, whereby the reader will find, that all these acts of outward devotion were more outward grimace, without any inward amendment. "On Sunday the 24th of March 1583, the King imprisoned Poncet the Friar, who preached in Lent at Notre Dame, for having preached with too much freedom, the foregoing Saturday, against that new brotherhood (66), calling it the brotherhood of Hypocrites and Atheists; and to prove this (I repeat his very words) I was informed from very good hands, that yesterday evening, which was the Friday of their procession, the spit was turning for the supper of those corpulent Penitents; and that, after having devoured the fat capon, they had, for their night-collations, young girls, that were got ready for them. . . . Ye wretched hypocrites, you there mock God under a mask, and carry a whip at your girdle merely out of shew. But heaven knows you ought not to carry it there; but it ought to be laid on your backs and shoulders, till such times as you have been very heartily threshed with it; for there is not one among you but richly deserves it. For these words the King, without desiring otherwise to speak to him, saying that he was an old fool, caused him to be conducted in his coach, by the Captain of the watch, to his Abbey of St. Pere at Melun, without doing him any other harm, than the fear he was under had put him in, as he was going away, viz. that they would throw him into the river (67)."

[P] He was eloquent, had a love for the sciences, . . . but he was charged with doing this unfeasonably, as also with regard to the pains he took in learning the Latin tongue.] Mezerai gives the substance of the speech which that Prince made to the States of Blois, in 1576, and adds (68), "This beautiful speech delivered by the mouth of a King, with a truly royal action, and a wonderful grace, was unanimously applauded by the assembly. However, the wisest in it grieved, that that Prince, who was admired for the great number of outward qualities he possessed, should not have had an education suitable to his birth; and they could not forbear, at the same time that they applauded the natural beauty of his genius, detesting those who had so wickedly corrupted him." He also gives the substance of the harangue which the Prince in question spoke at the opening of the States of Blois in 1576, and he prepares the reader for it by the following words (69): "He made a fine speech to them, wherein he observed so much moderation, as to declare, that he was willing to assure them, that he had forgot all past injuries; but it was upon condition that, all factions being suppressed, his authority should be restored in all its force. He expatiated on this with so much art and politeness, that had the only question been, whether he was a good Orator, he would have gained his point." I shall confirm this elo- gium by a letter, which one of the Deputies (70) wrote to the States of Blois. "It was the most beautiful and most learned speech ever heard, not only from a King, but from one of the best Orators in the world. He delivered it with such grace, such assurance, such gravity and sweetness, that he drew tears from many, from which number I cannot exempt myself: for I felt such an emotion in my soul, as that Prince spake, that I was forced, in spite of myself, to discover it by my tears. He represented in so compassionate a light, the miseries of this Kingdom; set forth, in such strong colours, the sorrow this filled him with, compared the felicity, &c. (71)." It would be to no purpose to object, that his speeches were made for him; for this would not hinder his being considered as very eloquent, considering the manner in which he spoke. Those who fill the first seats in the Parliaments, merit sometimes the title of good Orators, tho' they get others to compose the speeches which they deliver at the opening of the sessions; and how many excellent Preachers are not Authors of the sermons which they deliver? I will not stop here, but will quote another passage from Mezerai, to shew that this Monarch spoke exceedingly well off-hand (72). "He became so eloquent, by the natural disposition he had for it, that if it were possible for there to be any excess in so charming an accomplishment, we might have reason to say that he was too great a master of it. And indeed, he was greatly delighted with numerous assemblies, and such things wherein outward splendor was concerned, where it was found, that his speech was always the finest; and that even the extempore answers which he used to make to the Deputies and Embassadors, were better than the speeches which they had prepared with great art and pains (73)." I know not whether this great Historian ever insinuated, that the speeches of this Monarch had been wrote by another. I know Thuanus relates, that it was thought Morvillicr was Author of that which the King spoke to the States of Blois in 1576 (74); but I am certain that if this Prince did not compose these speeches, he at least examined and corrected them. This I am persuaded of from what I am going to say.

He was passionately desirous of acquiring a perfect knowledge of the French tongue, and of speaking it politely and correctly. The pains he took for this purpose, was crowned with the utmost success. Noster Gallia Rex Henricus III, elegantiae sermonis sui studiosus (aliquot praesertim ante obitum annis, quo tempore plura regia quam multi credunt, babeat) baud infelici & inutili studio, fuit. In eo enim tandem excelluit: & ita quidem ut non minus castigatum quam ornatum esse cuperet (75). i. e. "Our Henry III, King of France, was vastly curious with regard to the elegance of his diction (particularly some years before his death, at which time he possessed more royal qualities than is generally imagined) and was no ways unsuccessful in that study; for at last he excelled in it, and endeavoured as much to be accurate, as he did to be elegant." He would guess the Author of a book by the title in which it was wrote. Hence it was that he supposed Henry Stephens had wrote a certain anonymous book (76), and he was not mistaken in his conjectures. He was vastly zealous for the improvement of his native tongue; and having (62) Du Verdier, Profopogr. tom. 3. pag. 2559.

(63) Ibid. pag. 2560.

(64) Ibid. pag. 2559.

(65) Martyre des deux Freres, fol. c. edit. of 1589, 8vo.

(66) That of the Penitents.

(67) Pierre Matthieu, Hist. des derniers Troubles, pag. m. 15.

(68) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 422. See also pag. 481.

(69) Idem, ibid. pag. 714.

(70) In 1583.

(71) Marcel, Hist. de France, tom. 4. pag. 602.

(72) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 799.

(73) See Mezerai, Hist. de France, pag. 481.

(74) Thuan. lib. 63. pag. 179.

(75) Henri. Stephan. Epist. Dedicat. Traictatus de Lipsii Latinitate, pag. 11.

(76) Idem, ibid.

for his successor [Q]; and the other relates to what the Deputy of the League was ordered to represent to the Pope, after James Clement the Dominican had assassinated this King [R]. This execrable murder was perpetrated in the town of St. Clou. Some Protestant having commanded Henry Stephens to show the advantages and excellency of it, he was so very urgent with him to draw up such a work, that he was forced to bring him a printed copy of it very soon. Ita ergo dicitur fuerit, ut intra breve temporis spatium non solum compositum sed excusum etiam afferre ad illum oportuerit (77). I have observed in another place (78), that he wanted that learned man to make a parallel between the Ciceronians of Italy and those of France.

(77) Idem, ibid.

(78) Citation (3) above of the article BUNEL (Peter.)

(79) Citat. (27) of the article BODIN.

(80) La Caille, Hist. de l'Impri-merie, pag. 135.

(81) That is, at the time of the civil war, which the Duke of Alençon and the King of Navarre caused in the beginning of his reign.

I also said (79), that he had an affection for Bodin, because of the learned discourses he heard him pronounce. He was very fond of the conversation of a great many other learned men. I am to observe that, in 1579, he gave 3000 livres to Henry Stephens, together with a yearly pension of 300 livres (80).

It remains for me to prove, that it was thought he spent, in those things, a part of his time which he ought to have devoted to more urgent affairs. "If our Prince had reason to fear, it was at that time (81); nevertheless this new King, as though he had enjoyed a profound peace, instead of arming himself for the field, applied himself to learn, on one side, Grammar and the Latin tongue under Doron, (who he afterwards created Counsellor of the great Council) and on the other hand formed a kind of Academy with Pibrac, Ronfard, and other wits, on certain days, where every one discoursed on some subject, as had before been agreed upon. This was a truly noble and laudable exercise, but no ways proper, considering the affairs that King then had upon his hands. The grammatical lessons he used to take in this manner, made me display my anger in the six Latin verses following:

*Gallia dum passim civilibus occidit armis,
Et cinere obruitur semisepulta suo,
Grammaticam exercet media Rex noster in aula,
Dicere jamque potest vir generosus, Amo.
Declinare cupit, verè declinat & ille,
Rex bis qui fuerat, fit modo Grammaticus* (82).

(82) Pasquier's Lettres, liv. 19. tom. 2. pag. 482.

"Whilst France is still laid waste with civil wars,
And lies half buried deep beneath its ashes,
Our Pedant-Monarch studies Grammar rules,
And now he conjugates, and now declines.
Decline! yet that he does, who twice a King,
Is now, a what? a mere Grammaticaster.

(83) Idem, ibid. pag. 483.

(84) A young, and very promising Counsellor. Pasquier's Lettres, tom. 2. pag. 483.

(85) Ibid. pag. 484.

(86) Idem, ibid.

(87) It was communicated to me by Mr. Marais, who was mentioned at the end of the remark [Q] of the 3d Duke of GUISE, Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris; to which he has added the following note: In an instruction which Henry III gave the Sieur de la Cayette at his setting out for Florence, Mr. de Schomberg is called Counsellor to his Majesty in his Council of State, and Marshal of his German Sol-diers.

Pibrac having said once to Pasquier (83), that he had heard that Marillac (84) was Author of that epigram, added, that if he was sure of it, he would make him atone for what he had done; for it does not become a subject to ridicule in that manner the manners and behaviour of his King (85). This would be just, replied Pasquier (86), "in any person's mouth but yours, who ought to think, that if a King, who is exposed to the view of all his subjects, does not put some restraint upon his actions, it will be extremely difficult for him to prevent the discontent of those who revere him. He added, that such kind of verses were wrote, not by one who was an enemy to his Majesty, but who rather idolized him; and therefore was sorry to see him, on that account, become the contempt of all his people; and that we ought all to wish, as the case then stood, that this epigram might fall into the King's hands, to be a lesson to him, not of Latin Grammar, but of the manner in which he ought to conduct himself."

[Q] The proposal this King had been prevailed upon to approve, viz. to recognize the Duke of Lorraine's eldest son for his successor.] Monsieur de Schomberg prevented this. I am possessed of the copy (87) of the memorial he drew up on this subject, and which I thought very worthy of being inserted here at length.

"Memoir of the Sieur du Schomberg.

"Sometime after the death of Messieurs de Guise, which happened at Blois, Cardinal de . . . proposed, in his Holiness's name, that in case his Majesty would declare the Marquis du Pont, his nephew, heir to the crown, and get him recognized as such with the usual solemnities; his Holiness was certain, that the King of Spain would give the Infanta in marriage to the said Marquis, which would put an end to all the troubles in France. The King went to agree to this, at the solicitation of some persons about him, Mr. de Schomberg diverted this design by employing the following reasons: that this would be inverting the order established in France; abolishing the fundamental Laws; and transmitting to posterity a certain monument of its meanness and cowardice, for which his Majesty would be justly blamed by Historians; and his servants and subjects branded with perfidy and disloyalty, with which vice he himself was resolved not to be infected. That this war was between Frenchmen against Frenchmen, who, at first, discover great heat and vigour; but afterwards return, of themselves, to a rational way of thinking. That his Majesty should be follicitous only of living, of gaining time, and standing upon his guard against any resolute villain, who, in his first fury, might attack his person; and that his Majesty would give order for a waistcoat of mail to be made, for his usual wear. This was justly resolved upon, but not put in execution. The Sieur Schomberg having prevailed with the King to change his resolution, by the remonstrance above-mentioned, his Majesty commanded that Gentleman to tell him, by what methods he thought it would be possible for him to quell those tumults. The Sieur de Schomberg having immediately complied with the King's command, he requested his Majesty not to follow the maxims he had hitherto made use of; and not to imagine that this affair could be terminated by his usual lenity and forbearance; and therefore, that he must resolve with himself to have recourse to arms, and appear with the greatest number of troops in the field. That for this purpose he should countermand Mr. de Nevers who was then before Garrache; and give a pledge to the King of Navarre, to march with all his forces to his assistance; send into Germany, Italy, England, Denmark, and to all other Potentates, to acquaint them with the justice of his cause, and the consequences of it; and desire them to enable him to raise a great army of foreign forces. This proposal was violently contested, and chiefly by Mr. de Nevers, who went such lengths as to say it was heretical; that neither the Pope nor any of the Catholics would be pleased to see the said King of Navarre so near his Majesty's person. On the contrary, Mr. de Schomberg continuing firm in his opinion, declared that this war did not relate to Religion, in any manner, but to the State; and that his Majesty could not so safely make use of any person as of the said King, as it was his interest to endeavour at the preservation of the Kingdom; which he enforced with a great many other strong reasons, and these proved so effectual, that from this instant the treaty with the said King began at Blois, and was afterwards executed at Tours, where the two Kings had their first interview. With great reason therefore the service, which the Sieur de Schomberg did then to France, in the two points in question, especially to the House of Bourbon, was greatly celebrated. The King then advised, that the said Sieur de Schomberg should write to the President Jeannin, to keep the Duke of Mayenne to his allegiance. But his Majesty having heard of the departure of the said Sieur de Mayenne from Lyons, and his coming this way, the said letter was never sent, and it is still among my papers in Germany, full of excellent reasons and persuasions, which have since contributed to the reduction of the said Duke of Mayenne."

[R] What the Deputy of the League was ordered to represent to the Pope, after James Clement, the Dominican, had assassinated the King.] Those pieces cannot Protestant authors have taken notice of this circumstance, and have found some mysteries in it. The incident they alledge will be looked upon as very doubtful till such times not be preserved with too much care, which are so many authentic proofs of the fury which seized the greatest part of the French under Henry III, and some years after his death. Many people will endeavour to darken the truth of these incidents; but we must anticipate their pernicious attempts, for the farther men are from an age in which things have been transacted, the greater opportunity they have to wrangle. Henry III had not been dead an hundred years when an anonymous writer dared to publish a treatise (88), to shew that James Clement did not kill that Monarch. This is swearing that it is night at noon day. The reader will find such circumstances as clearly convict that Monk, in a piece, a copy whereof has been sent to me (89), and which I shall insert here at length.

(88) Intituled, La Fatalité de St. Clow. It was printed in 1672. Maimbourg the Jesuit speaks of it, and refutes it in a few words, in L'Histoire de la Ligue, liv. 3. pag. m. 353.

(89) The same Mr. Marais communicated it to me.

(90) He had just before given an account of the murder of the Guises, and the revolutions with which it was attended.

(91) NOTA BENE.

(92) NOTA BENE.

“ Extract of what was represented to the Pope by the Commandeur de Diou, Ambassador for the union of Catholics at Rome.

“ It was then (90), most holy Father, that the evil appeared most violent; and that the prayers of both Clergy and People were continued with greater fervency than ever; and we ought truly to believe, that they have forced pity from the divine Majesty, who would not suffer so many good people, and so zealous for the holy cause, longer to doubt his goodness and mercy; but rather to free them from their languishing state, by so great, so wonderful an effect or event, that the more it is considered, the more it raises our thoughts to contemplate and admire his incomprehensible judgments. What I mean is the King's death, which came to pass in so strange a manner, that the truth of it, and the impossibility which was objected to it, were long contending for the priority! At last the news was confirmed by several concurrent advices; and tho' your Holiness has had particular advice of it from other hands, I yet flatter myself that you will not be tired with the relation I shall give you of it. A Friar of the Order of St. Dominic, of the Convent of Paris, named brother James Clement, twenty three or twenty four years of age, born in the village of Sorbonne in the diocese of Sens, and the last of three or four hundred who are in the said Convent, yet divinely elected and chosen for so generous an exploit as that which God has achieved by his hands, had often boasted (91) to his brethren, even after the defeat at Senlis, that he saw the affairs of the enemies prosper; that the King should never die but by his hands; at which the rest of the fraternity used to laugh, and call him, out of scorn, Captain Clement. However, this did not make him relinquish this thought, and the resolution he had formed; on the contrary, he confirmed himself so strongly in the desire he had of coming to the execution, as made him constant in his design; he now thinking of nothing but the manner by which he might most easily accomplish it. In making this attempt he must resolve upon death; but what kind of death, he could not pitch upon: but he was willing to suffer the most cruel that could be inflicted on him; a constancy so wonderful in a Monk, that the like is not found in this age. To come to the point: he found means to procure, very secretly, the letters of some Politicians; and concerted with them to give the King ample advice of what was transacting in the city, to the advantage of his affairs. He got some words, by way of credentials, from them; and obtained from Count de Brienne, prisoner in the Castle of the Louvre, a passport, in order that he might get a more favourable access to the enemy's army. Being now furnished with all things necessary for waiting upon the King, he set out from Paris the last day of July in order to go to St. Cloud, and took leave of the reit of the Friars (92), exhorting them to pray for him; saying, that he was going, for the service of God, to deliver the people from misery, without any hopes of returning back; and that he did not value whether he did or not, provided that God would be

“ so gracious as not to let him fail in his design, of the event which they should hear in twenty four hours. Arriving the said day at St. Cloud, he could not get an opportunity of speaking to the King; so passed the night there, which might have given him other counsel. The next day being the first of August, he waited upon the Sieur de la Guesle, the King's Attorney General in the Parliament of Paris, which he had left; and informing him that he had been intrusted with letters, and sent by some of the King's trusty servants, and had some credentials relating to matters of great importance to his Majesty; he therefore desired to be introduced by him, in discharge of his duty. The King being informed of this gave orders for the Monk to be brought in, when he withdrew into his closet, and there talked above a quarter of an hour with him; during which he gave him letters, one by one, till his Majesty had received the last; and the King asking him whether those were all, the Friar replied, I believe not, Sir, but think there must be some more. Upon this, putting his hand farther up into his sleeve, he drew forth the knife he had hid there; stabbing, in the ventricle or stomach, the King, who finding himself wounded, cried out, and seized the hand of the Jacobin, who still kept the knife in the wound, whereby he hurt himself very much, and with it stabbed the Friar in the face, who, that instant, received numberless stabs from those who came running in to the King; and whilst he was slaughtering in this manner, it is said that he spoke as follows: *I thank God that I die so easy a death; so I did not think to have quitted life in this manner, and to come off at so cheap a rate; upon which his dead body was cast into the street, and afterwards burnt, as was told to Mr. de Mayenne. Thus the King died at two a clock, the next morning after he had been stabbed. Your Holiness will please to take notice of some of the most remarkable circumstances in this incident; for it happened, on the day that the Church celebrates the feast of St. Peter in Vinculis, whom God delivered, miraculously, by his angel, out of Herod's hand, and those of the Jews to whom he was to be given up; and the Catholics may declare, that on the same day God delivered them out of the hands of the Heretics, and from the yoke of a Prince, who had a strong desire, in his heart, to fill all Christendom with desolation. On what day, most holy Father, could the monitory of your Holiness against an impenitent King, and a contemner of the holy apostolical See, be better authorized by the power of God? When twenty four hours after the assassination of the Duke of Guise, the said King caused to be inhumanly butchered, in cold blood, the late Cardinal his brother; it is observed that the watch-word given to the murderer was St. Clement. Whilst this execrable crime was committing, he was in his closet, making merry with his favourites and the accomplices of the said murder; and God suffered a Friar, named Clement (93), to kill him (93) in his closet, in the midst of a great army, which was not able to secure his detestable life. He was so much possessed by impiety, ever since hypocrisy had made way for it, that he abhorred those preachers who had publickly inveighed against his vices; and, for that reason, he thought of nothing but their ruin, and to take a cruel revenge on them, which he used often to declare and protest in his most private discourses, where every one had liberty to give his opinion, with respect to the punishment that should be inflicted on them; but his barbarous designs have been prevented by a Monk, of the Order of preaching Friars, who has inflicted on him the divine punishment which others had foretold him. These things, most holy Father, are in my opinion of so much consequence, that your Holiness will judge them worthy of consideration. Farther, it is manifest that this action is not the work of men. It is a very great remedy to our evils, which God has applied to them by the ministry of* times as they shall answer the observations of Peter Victor Cayet [S].

“ your

HENRY

“ your Holiness ; and it must be hoped that, by your “ kind interposition, he will add a perfect cure to “ it ; to effect which I shall make my most humble “ requests and supplications, as I am commanded to “ do both by the Duke de Mayenne, and the said “ Lords of the general Council, whom I hope your “ Holiness will honour so far as to accept of them.”

This instrument furnishes us not only with infallible proofs against all those who should deny that James Clement had perpetrated the murder, but likewise against all such as endeavour to justify his brethren the Jacobins of Paris. Varillas has expressly given the reasons or arguments of those poor apologists (94), but

(94) Varillas,
Hist. de Henri III.
liv. 11. p. 252.
Dutch edit.

has said nothing to refute them. He first lays down what is alledged in vindication of the Jacobins in general, after which he speaks as follows (95) : but one of them, named Father Bernard Guyart, printed a book, but did not dare to prefix his name to it. He therein pretends to justify the Order of St. Dominic, with regard to the murder of Henry III. The particle but at the beginning of the period, prepares all readers for the particular apology of James Clement ; no one can imagine that Bernard Guyart intended any thing else, and yet Varillas speaks only of the general justification of St. Dominic's Order. Let the Grammarians censure the Historian for so ill placing the particles called by them adversatives ; I leave that office to them, and shall content myself with animadverting on him upon another point. The treatise intitled, Fatalité de St. Cloud, is doubtless the same work which,

(95) Idem, pag.
253.

according to Varillas, was published by Bernard Guyart ; now the chief design of this treatise is, to shew that James Clement did not kill Henry III.
Varillas does therefore very wrong, not to consider this work under that idea, but under that of a general apology for the Dominicans. This fault appears to me more excusable, than that of omitting to say, that the book intitled, Fatalité de St. Cloud, should not hinder any person from adhering to the general opinion.

Maimbourg has writ as he ought to have done, in saying, that notwithstanding the book in question, it yet must be owned that James Clement was guilty of the murder ; and that it is the best way to agree sincerely with the public voice, of what profession soever a

(96) Maimbourg,
Hist. de la Ligue, just.
liv. 3. pag. m.
354.

man may be (96). What he adds to this is not so suffer any manner thereby in their honour. For, in fine, faults are personal ; and no man of good sense would ever take it into his head to reproach so holy an Order as that of St. Dominic, with the crime of a particular person. Now there is not the least solidity in those words. The crime perpetrated by James Clement is not a personal crime ; it is that of the monastery of the Dominicans or Jacobin Friars in Paris. These

(97) See, above, the Memoir of the Deputy of the League, to the Court of Rome.

knew his design (97), did not divert him from, but approved the execution of it. His Prior, after having been duly convicted by several witnesses of making the eulogium of this assassin, in the pulpit, was put to death (98) ; and as the city of Paris, and especially the preachers, bestowed numberless blessings and ap-plauses on the Friar who had killed the King ; and as all the other cities of the Kingdom which sided with the League and the Pope himself (99) applauded that infamous action ; it may be affirmed that the crime committed by James Clement was that of the whole League and of the Court of Rome ; for the authors, the advisers, and approvers of an action, are all thought to be under the same predicament, as I

(98) Thuan. lib.
98. pag. 346.

shall shew in some other place (100).

(99) Idem, lib.
95. pag. 302.

shall shew in some other place (100).

(100) In the article PROLUS.

[S] Till such time as they shall answer the observations of Peter Victor Cayet.] Weigh well the following

(101) Cayet,
Chronol. Nouv.
ad ann. 1589,
folio 224 verso.

words (101) : “ Huguenots say, Death has carried this “ King from our world into the other ; but, which is “ a remarkable circumstance, in that very room, where,
“ it is thought the counsel was taken, relating to “ the furious massacre on St. Bartholomew's day “ in the year 1572. These words are found in “ the additions to the Inventaire de l'Histoire de “ France, by Montliard. The book intitled, *Recueil
“ des 5 Rois*, printed at Geneva, makes the same af“ fertion in very near the same words ; and in the “ work called de l'Etat de l'Eglise, wrote by John

Taffin, a Protestant Minister, are the following words : *It has been observed, that, by the providence “ of God, this happened in that very room wherein,
“ anno 1573, the resolution had been taken, with re“ gard to the furious massacre on St. Bartholomew's “ day. Here we have remarkable circumstances, and “ observations with respect to the providence of God, “ lightly ; and I will presume to say, falsely publish“ ed. For at the time that the massacre on St. Bar“ tholomew's day was perpetrated, the place where “ the King was wounded belonged to one Chapellier,
“ a citizen of Paris ; and he possessed it two years
“ after that, and his Majesty had never entered it
“ when Duke of Anjou, nor did he come into it till a “ long time after his return from Poland. The “ Queen his mother did not purchase it till after the “ death of the late King Charles, with an intention “ to build there ; but finding there would not be room “ enough, she gave it, anno 1557, to the Sieur Jerom “ de Gondy's Lady, who pulled down the house, and “ quite new modelled it ; having adorned it with “ grottos and fountains, and so finely embellished it,
“ that it has been since resorted to by Princes and No“ blemen of high distinction, which it had never “ been before. Now the compiler of the aforesaid “ Recueil des cinq Rois, from which the said Montli-“ ard and Taffin have extracted what they had insert“ ed in their several books, for he wrote before them,
“ has the following words ; It is said that the consul“ tation for the massacres was held in that room &c.
“ Behold a Hearsay, invented by the author of the “ said Recueil or Collection, which hearsay was taken “ into the Memoires & petits Discours, printed at Ge“ neva in 79, with regard to what happened at the “ massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, in which it is “ said, that the resolutions of it was formed at St.
“ Clou and in the Tuilleries. . . . Now, to give “ some colour to this slander, the author of the said
“ Recueil, from the King's being killed in Gondy “ palace, draws the following conjecture ; and art“ fully foists in the following words . . . It is said “ that . . . in the very room &c. Montliard who wrote “ after him, goes still farther, and says, It is believed “ &c. ; yet this is not a hearsay, some persons, ac“ cording to him, believing it. But Taffin the Pro“ testant Minister who wrote after them all, is still “ more confident, asserts this, and says that it was “ by the providence of God. Now what a falsehood is “ this ! And indeed the Attorney General having “ complained, in court, against Montliard on that “ account, these words, with many others, were e“ razed from his book ; and he himself was greatly “ troubled, saying for his excuse, that it was only a “ hearsay ; but his book being afterwards reprinted
“ at Geneva, all this was inserted again, and is looked “ upon as a matter of fact, among persons of that “ party (102).” If the incidents which Cayet relates*

(102) Cayet,
Chronol. Nouv.
ad ann. 1589,
folio 225.

concerning the house where Henry III was assassinated, are true, we can no longer doubt but that the Protestant authors whom he refutes are greatly in the wrong ; and that the mysterious circumstances which they have taken the pains to point out, are meer illusions, and the vain chimeras of credulous minds. But if they could have proved that Cayet is mistaken ; it had been a commendable thing in them, to reprint in the Geneva edition, those particulars which Mont-liard had been forced to suppress. It is certain that, according to the maxims of order and regularity, the public ought to have been told, in the Geneva edition, why that passage was restored ; or in other words it ought to have been proved, in the most authentic manner, that the council relating to the massacre, had been held at St. Cloud, in the very room where the Jacobin killed Henry III. I have the Roan edition in 1612 (103) of the Inventaire of John de Serres, which contains the passage which the Attorney General caused to be suppressed. Mr. Mezerai supposes that the reflections made by the Huguenots, descended to a mere mysterious detail. They wrote, says he (104), that the King was wounded at the same hour, on the “ same day, in the same place, and in the very room, “ where he had concluded the massacre on St. Bartholomew's “ day.

(103) It is in the title, *Je vendent à Rouen chez Esfienne Vereul,
dans la Court du Palais.*

(104) Mezerai,
Hist. de France,
tom. 3. pag. m.
799.

HENRY IV, King of France, was one of the greatest Princes, mentioned by the Historians of these latter ages: and it may be affirmed, that had the love he bore to the fair sex suffered him to exert all his noble qualities [A] in all their strength and beauty, he would have surpassed or equalled such heroes as are most admired. Had this Monarch, the first time he debauched his neighbour's wife or daughter, met with the same punishment as was inflicted on Abelard, he would have been able to conquer all Europe [B], and would, perhaps, have eclipsed the day. He says nothing against it, he does not cite any author, and does not imitate Peter Cayet in any respect. This mysterious remark is urged still more strongly in a book intitled, Journal des choses mémorables advenues durant tout le Règne de Henry III Roy de France & de Pologne; and which has perhaps been printed above twenty times in Holland, with three or

(105) Le Divorce Satirique; les Amours du grand Alexandre; la Confession Catholique de Sanci; Discours merveilleux de la Vie de Catherine de Medicis.

(106) Journal de Henry III, pag. 316, 317. edit. of 1699.

(107) i. e. the death of Henry III.

(108) Pag. 129.

(109) Ibid.

(110) Anselme, Hist. des grands Officiers, pag. 375.

(111) On the backside of the title is the following words: Journal du Règne de Henry III, wrote by M. S. A. G. A. P. D. P. Now these initial letters are exactly filled up with the following words, by Mr. Servin, Avocat General au Parlement de Paris.

(112) Pellisson, Hist. de l'Académie Franc. pag. m. 330.

four satyrical pieces (105). The last edition is of 1699. The Journal is here inserted more at large than in the edition of 1693: now the words following are found at the end of the additions (106): The more we seek for observations and particulars in so astonishing an accident (107), the more wonders we find in it; so that posterity will look upon this King's death, as a wonder composed of numberless wonders, among which this has been observed, as very worthy of remark, and yet very true, viz. that in the returning from his affairs, as he did when he was killed, the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day was concluded on; the late King, who then was called Monsieur, presided in the Council, viz. in the town of St. Cloud in Gondy-House, the first of August 1572, in the same room, and at the same hour, which was eight in the morning; the breakfast, consisting of three spits of partridges, being ready, below, for the contrivers of that execrable action. It is to be observed that this addition was superfluous; for every thing considerable in it is found, in the very same words, in the Journal of Henry III, printed in 1693 (108), and 1699 (109); and I believe it is likewise in the preceding editions.

If one could be sure that the Journal in question as published by the Dutch Bookellers, was wrote by a Catholic; it would then be certain, that the reflections made by the Protestants on the circumstances of Henry III's death, are weaker than those of a writer of the other party. The three Protestant authors whom Victor Cayet refutes have improvidence on the other. The first contents himself with a 'Tis said: the second was not satisfied with so faint a word, he saying, 'tis believed; whilst the third expresses himself in a still more positive manner. This is generally the case in publishing of news; the last relation is generally the most decisive, and contains the greatest number of circumstances. It seems a kind of auction, where people are to bid higher than one another; because the goods are decreed to him who offers most. But however this be, the Journalist of Henry III outbids the three Protestant bidders. He relates the incident, not only as very worthy of remark, but also as very true. Father Anselme (110) ascribes this Journal to Mr. Servin; which agrees well enough with the initial letters that have been put in the editions of the book (111). But Pellisson asserts (112) that Mr. de l'Etoile, a member of the French Academy, was son to an Audencier or Usher in the Chancery at Paris, who "had collected a great number of particulars relating to his own times, from which one of his friends, to whom he had lent them, drew up the piece intitled, Journal de ce qui s'est passé sous Henry III." The question is to know, whether those who were possessed of the manuscript before it was first published, have not added, retrenched, or altered any thing in it. However, it is the business of those who rely on this part of the Journal, to answer the reasons urged by Peter Cayet.

[A] Had the love he bore to the fair sex, suffered him to exert all his noble qualities.] It cannot be said of this Henry, as of some great Commanders, who were very fond of pleasures (1), that he quitted the pursuit of them, when they interfered with his affairs; for he lost all the advantages which might have accrued to him by the victory of Coutras, merely to fly to a mistress. Hear Mezerai on that occasion (2). "The King of Navarre signalized himself, in that battle, much more by his valour, than by his conduct in reaping advantages from it; for, so far was he from marching directly towards the Queen's army, as the Prince of Conde would have done, promising, if troops should be given him, to go and seize on the passes of Saumur, that he suffered his victorious army to separate, being contented with taking an oath from the Captains, for them to come, on the 20th of November, to the confines of Angoumois and Perigord, in order to march towards the Reistres or German Horse. He kept but 500 horse; and taking Count de Soissons with him, made his way into Gascony, whither he was drawn, in a forcible manner, as it were, by the strong passion he had for the beautiful Countess of Guiche (3). One of the most troublesome affairs in which Henry IV was ever involved, was doubtless the siege of Amiens; and nevertheless he took the fair Gabrielle with him thither, and lodged her not far from him; and could he have followed his own impulse, he would have kept her there during all that dangerous expedition: "But he was soon after forced to remove this scandal from the sight of his soldiers; not only because of their murmurings which reached his ears, but also by reason of the reproaches of Marshal de Biron (4)."

The reflection I made at the beginning of this remark, viz. that there have been great Commanders, who were very fond of pleasures, and yet could quit the pursuit of them upon occasion, is not unknown to those who are acquainted with the character of Alcibiades and Sylla. See what Salust says of the latter. Sulla . . . animo ingenti, cupidus voluptatum, sed gloriae cupidior: otio luxurioso esse, tamen ab negotiis nunquam voluptas remorata (5). i. e. "Sylla . . . possessed a mighty soul; he was fond of pleasures, but still more so of glory: he passed his leisure hours luxuriously, and yet never suffered his pleasures to interrupt business." Here follows what is said of Alcibiades. Quum tempus posceret, laboriosus (Alcibiades) patiens, liberalis, splendidus non minus in vita, quam victu; affabilis, blandus, temporibus callidissime interveniens. Idem simul ac se remiserat, nec causa suberat, quare animi laborem perferret, luxuriosus, dissolutus, libidinosus, intemperans reperiebatur, ut omnes admirarentur in uno homine tantam inesse dissimilitudinem, tamque diversam naturam (6). i. e. "Alcibiades, upon occasion, was laborious, patient, generous; no less splendid in his equipage than in his table; affable, kind; and could suit himself, very artfully, to all circumstances. But whenever he had a mind to relax, and had no business upon his hands, he was luxurious, dissolute, lewd, and intemperate; so that every one was surprized to find, in the same man, such opposite manners and contrary characters." The reader will meet with other examples in the remark [A] of the article SURENA.

[B] Had this Monarch . . . met with the same punishment as was inflicted on Abelard, he would have been able to conquer all Europe.] On the contrary, will it be said, he would have grown sluggish and cowardly; for the same spirits which prompted him to the love of women, made him valiant; and most great Captains were leud. I answer, that though it is certain many great Commanders have been of a very amorous complexion, it yet does not follow that their courage and their lust resulted from the same principle in their constitution. These two qualities had their several causes; and all that can be said is, these two causes conspired to form the constitution of those persons: but one may easily prove, that there is no manner of affinity or relation between those two qualities. How many cowardly people and more fearful than hares (7), are prodigiously vigorous in affairs wherein Venus is concerned? What man was ever more brave, more intrepid, than Marshal de Gassion, who bore a mortal hatred to the fair sex (8)? Was not

(3) See the notes on Amours du grand Alexandre, num. 3. where book 101. of Thuanus is cited.

(4) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronolog. tom. 6. pag. 170. ad ann. 1595.

(5) Salust. in Bello Jugurth. pag. m. 362.

(6) Cornel. Nepos, in Alcibiade.

(7) This comparison makes me recollect, that no animals are more fearful and more lascivious than hares.

(8) See his Life, in tom. 4. pag. Count 329. & seq.

(1) See the end of this remark.

(2) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 308. ad ann. 1587.

the glory of Alexander and Cæsar. It would be to no purpose to object, that such a punishment would have quite enervated his courage [C]. It was his prodigious Count Tilli, who never knew woman in all his lifetime (9), one of the greatest Captains of the XVIIth Century? Did not Viscount de Turenne, though no debauchee in any manner, equal those thunderbolts of war, those famous Generals who were his contemporaries; and who were almost as remarkable for their leudness as for their triumphs? And to give still stronger proof, was not the brave Sigismund Battori, Prince of Transilvania, firnamed the Invincible (10), because of his mighty exploits, as impotent in the wars of Venus, as he was brave in those of Mars; and having confessed his impotence (11), his marriage with Maria Christina, daughter of Charles Archduke of Greys, was declared void? Some Eunuchs have been extremely brave Generals; for not to go so far back as the renowned Narfes, who lived under the Emperor Justin II, in the VIth Century; is it not known that one of the most valiant Generals of Soliman was an Eunuch? Erat Haliis Eunuchus, sed corporis defectum animo pensabat: de cetero statura brevi, sufflato corpore, colore duxeo, subtristi vultu, torvis oculis, & inter latos & eminentis humeros depresso capite, ac prominentibus ex ore duobus veluti aprugnis dentibus deformis (12). i. e.

(9) Veneris vinitate se fuisse jacuorat. Puffendorf, Res. Suecicar. lib. 4. pag. 64. col. 2. See also Blanc, Hist. de Baviere, tom. 4. pag. 381.

(10) Discours Historique & Politique sur les causes de la Guerre de Hongrie, printed at Colen 1666, pag. 264.

(11) Idem, ibid. pag. 166.

(12) Thuan. lib. 17. pag. 361.

(13) Idem, ibid.

(14) Idem, ibid.

(15) Justin. lib. 36. sub finem.

(16) Livius, lib. 26. sub fin. Val. Maxim. lib. 4. cap. 3. num. 1.

(17) See remark [B] of the article of the first ANTONIA.

injury for any person to make the least comparison between his valour and that of the lustful Proculus, who turned tyrant; a Latin letter of whom Flavius Vopiscus has preserved, which I would not offer to translate. Tacendam non est, quod & ipse gloriatur in quadam sua Epistola, quam ipsam melius est ponere quam de ea plurimum dicere. Proculus Metiano affini s. d. Centum ex Sarmatia virgines cepi. Ex his una nocte decem inivi: omnes tamen quod in me erat, mulieres intra dies xv reddidi. Gloriatur (ut videtis) rem ineptam, & satis libidinosam: atque inter fortes se haberi credit, si criminum densitate coalescat. Hic tamen quum etiam post honores militares se improbe & libidinoso, tamen fortiter ageret, . . . in imperium vocitatus est (18). We find that it is said in the passage above, that Proculus was a good soldier, but still his valour was not to be compared to that of Aurelian. What shall we say of Alexander the Great, who was fired by so extraordinary a courage? His chastity has been much more applauded than it deserved; but yet it must be owned, that by his natural disposition and constitution he had more indifference, in proportion, than inclination for the fair-sex; and this is sufficient to refute those, who suppose I know not what mechanical connexion between lust and valour. To the modern examples before quoted (19), I shall add that of an intrepid Knight who lived in the XVIth Century, and who merited the title of the stearless and blameless Knight. The reader will find by these characteristics that I mean Bayard. Love was never his master; and he proved, on several dangerous occasions, that he was master over it. See his life. What a long list I should give, were I to set down all those who have resembled Sardanapalus; creatures that were brave in no other place except in bed; but, in every other place, sluggish and cowardly. Were Caligula, Nero, and Heliogabalus, warriors? Did they not plunge, with the most infamous excess, into leud debaucheries? Was Domitian, who invented a new term (20) for those abominable exercises in which he signaled his strength, ever looked upon as a good soldier or a good Commander? Those sparks who were formerly called mignons de couchette, would sometimes make a campaign, in order to get rid of the contempt, to which the suspicion of their being cowards exposed them among brave men; but they behaved so ill on these occasions, that one might justly apply to them what Jupiter answered Venus, when she complained to him, upon her being wounded in her attempting to succour Æneas in a battle: Do not you concern yourself with war: it is not your province, which is that only of making love.

(18) Flavius Vopiscus, in Proculo, pag. m. 735. tom. 2.

(19) In the preceding remark.

(20) Libidinis nemiæ assiduitatem concubitus velut exercitationis genus clinopalen vocabat. Suet. in Domit. cap. 22.

(21) Hóm. Illiad. lib. 5. ver. 423.

Οὐ τοι τέκνοι ἐμὸν δίδωσι ἀλιμνῆα ἔργα· Ἄλλα σὺ γ' ἡμερῶντα μελέηχοιο ἔργα γάμοιο (21).

“Not those, O daughter, are thy proper cares,
“Thee milder arts besit, and softer wars;
“Sweet smiles are thine, and kind endearing “charms, &c.

POPE.

Helen gave Paris the like advice, as is seen in a remark where I refute Mezerai (22). This Historian imagines, that Ladies love brave men, from a supposition that they are as active and vigorous in love exercises, as in combats. But he does not form a right judgment of their motives; glory or vanity are the great springs of their prepossession in favour of brave men. Monluc observes that women would choose to be widows, rather than to see their husbands return from the field in health, but loaded with shame and dishonour. It is plain that lust has nothing to do in this; and since it furnishes a first proof against Mezerai, I will here quote Monluc's own words. He directs himself to the Governors of a town, and shews the prejudice they will do themselves in case they don't defend it bravely. “Not only your Sovereign, conatus be (23), the Princes and Lords will behold you, with an evil eye, but likewise women and children. But to go farther, your own wives, though they pretend to love you, will yet hate you, and

(22) Rem. [O] citation (47) of the article of the 3d Duke of GUISE.

(23) Monluc, Comment. liv. 3. pag. m. 500, 501.

digious incontinence [D], that prevented his rising to so great a height as he otherwise might have done; but notwithstanding that powerful obstacle, he nevertheless deserves very justly the surname he bears (a). To prove this, we need but consider the astonishing difficulties he surmounted, before he was settled on the throne; and the flourishing state he brought his Kingdom to, which, at his ascending the throne, was in a most calamitous condition. He inherited this crown in a very distant degree of consanguinity [E]. We in all probability should know, and should admire much more, the vast extent of his merit, had he lived five or six years longer; for he was just going to begin the execution of a mighty design (b), when he was murdered in his coach the 14th of May 1610, by one Ravailiac. Some Historians relate, that this had been foretold him the day before [F]; but those who have examined this matter thoroughly, find

(a) He is called Henry the Great. See citation (47) of the article BARCLAY (John).

(b) See at the year 1610 his History written by Hardouin de Perceux.

“and esteem you less in their hearts. For such is the nature of all women, that they bear a mortal hatred to cowards and poltroons, though ever so spruce; and love the bold and courageous, though ever so ugly and deformed. They partake in your grace. And though they are folded in your arms, in bed, pretending to be overjoyed at your return; they yet wish you had been strangled, or that a bullet had taken your head off. For in the same manner as we conclude, that the greatest disgrace that can accrue to a man, is to have his wife a whore; the women think on the other side, that the greatest shame they can meet with, is to have a cowardly husband. Thus, Governor, you see what a wretched chance you will stand, should you lose your town, since you will be cursed by your own wife.”

[D] His prodigious incontinence.] I need not scruple to give it that name, after the stories which Daubigné has published on that subject, especially after the following words of a very grave Historian. “If it was the business of history to make apologies, it might clear him from the greatest part of those reproaches, but not however from the frantic passion he had for gaming. . . . Much less could it excuse him, for his abandoning himself so immoderately to women, which had been so public and general from his youth to his death, that it cannot even be called love and gallantry (24).” The following particulars related by Mr. de Perceux are very strange. “It were to be wished, for the honour of his memory, that gaming had been his only fault. But the perpetual frailty which he had, with regard to beautiful women, was another fault, much more blameable in a Christian Prince, in a man of his years who was married, to whom God had been so gracious, and who revolved so many mighty enterprises in his mind. He sometimes was fired with only transient desires, and which captivated him but one night; but when he met with beauties who struck his heart, he loved to distraction; and, in these wild transports, he no ways seemed to be Henry the Great. It is related, in fabulous antiquity, that Hercules took up a distaff, and spun for love of the beautiful Omphale: now Henry did something more groveling for his mistresses. He one day assumed a peasant’s disguise, and took a truss of straw on his back, to get access to Madam Gabrielle; and it is said that the Marchioness de Verneuil has seen him more than once at her feet, “suffering her disdain and insults (25).” It must be a piercing sorrow to all good Huguenots, to see their chief lead so scandalous a life, even in Rochelle. He there debauched the daughter of a Gentleman of the long robe, and had a son by her. The Church had frequently told him of his crime, which he would confess ingenuously enough; but he could not be prevailed upon to acknowledge it publicly, till a little before the battle of Coutras (26). The detail of that is found in the Life of du Pleisis Mornai (27).

[E] He inherited the crown in a very distant degree of consanguinity.] “It was doubtless by an uncommon good fortune that the crown of France fell to him, there never being a more remote succession than that, in any hereditary Government; for there were about ten or eleven degrees of consanguinity between him and Henry III; and at his birth there were nine Princes of the blood before him, viz. Henry II and his five sons; Anthony King of Navarre, his father, and two sons of that Anthony, elder brothers of our Henry. All these Princes died, to make way for him to the crown (28).”

[F] Some Historians relate, that his death had been foretold him the day before.] We will begin this remark by the words of Peter Matthieu (29). “Upon this la Brosse, a learned Physician and Mathematician, said to the Duke of Vendosme, by way of sequel to a longer discourse, that provided the King could but avoid the accident with which he was menaced, he would live thirty years longer. No one cares to inform Kings of what may give them uneasiness; and therefore the Duke de Vendosme, thinking it more proper that la Brosse should be the messenger of his own news, besought the King to hear him, upon which the King asked what la Brosse wanted. Here the Duke of Vendosme said nothing; but his silence making the King still more desirous of knowing the motive of it, he pressed him; the Duke excuses himself; but at last as the King laid his absolute commands upon him, he informs him of what la Brosse had said to him. You are quite a simpleton, says the King to the Duke, to give credit to this. Sir, answered Vendôme, in these things credulity is a fault but not fear; the safety of your Majesty’s person obliges every individual, and me above any other person, not to despise the least information that may be given; and therefore I most humbly beseech your Majesty to hear him. However, the King would not consent to this, and even forbid his speaking about it. I can do no less, says the Duke, than inform the Queen of it. The King declared twice, that should he ever break it to her, he would never love him; and so la Brosse was sent away. I heard all this, word for word, from the Duke de Vendôme’s own mouth.” This is related in a very positive strain; but what follows, is no less so, though it quite overthrows Peter Matthieu’s relation: “So true it is, it is a Philosopher who speaks (30), that most Historians are credulous and liars; and that they thereby always confirm the credulity and falshood of prognostications, when they relate those stories without refuting them. But without going farther; why should not the antients have done it, since we often see it practised in our own time? Has not one of our Historians, speaking of the death of our great Henry IV, affirmed; that having been informed of it by a Prince still living, whom it is not necessary to name, the evening before the unfortunate stroke was given; his Majesty despising this advice, had answered, that la Brosse was an old fool of an Astrologer &c. I being desirous of hearing this from the mouth of the Prince in question (†), above thirty years since, in presence of a Princess (‡), of great worth, he did her the honour to say that it was all a falsity. And but two days since only, in order to be better informed of it, and that I might not publish any thing in writing of that consequence, without being first well assured of it; I had the honour to speak again to him about it before several persons of his family, and he confirmed the same thing to me; adding farther, that the Historian (†) had confounded times and things; and that la Brosse had indeed told him, after this unhappy accident, that he had foreseen it by calculating his Majesty’s horoscope, (as Astrologers always do, after things are come to pass) but not that he had given him notice of it the evening before, in order that he might inform his Majesty of it. Nevertheless this is related by a French author, who lived in that age. Who then, in times to come, will not give credit to him? Will it be thought that a man, appointed and paid to write History, durst say a thing of that importance, and

(29) Relation de la Mort de Henri IV, pag. m. 24.

(24) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 6. pag. 392.

(25) Perceux, Hist. de Henry le Grand, pag. m. 461, 462, ad ann. 1609.

(26) Vie du Pleisis Mornai, pag. 108.

(27) Pag. 108.

(28) Perceux, Hist. de Henry le Grand, pag. m. 514.

(30) Peter Petit, Surveyor of the Fortifications, Dissertation sur les Cometes, pag. 89.

(†) Mr. de Vendosme.

(‡) Madam de Chevreuse.

(§) Matthieu.

it to be false. He was of so generous a disposition, that it was no way probable he ever advised the Duke of Alençon to make away with Catherine de Medicis [G]; nevertheless, we find this asserted in some memoirs. He met with the fate common to great men, I mean that he was unhappy in his family. The two wives he married one after another, in the life time of both, brought a thousand vexations upon him [H]. But this he deserved, since he disregarded so much the sacred laws of marriage. His second wife was one of those Princesses against whom he had raised some objections, in examining with Roni what kind of wife would suit him (c). His notions with regard to marriage are very curious [I]; and few conversations are more solid and agreeable, than those

(c) See the remark [I].

“ even cite a living Prince who could witness it, in case it were not true? It is nevertheless as I say; and if any one doubts of this, he may inform himself about it, and I am not sorry that I have an opportunity to mention it in this place; as well to undeceive posterity, as to shew that a great many particulars are written of this kind, which do not deserve the least credit.”

It is to be observed that Mr. Petit does not relate this altogether as faithfully as he ought to have done. He supposes that the Historian said, that the King made the following answer, la Brosse is an old fool of an Astrologer; but the Historian does not say this; for, according to him, it was to the Duke of Vendome that the King said, you are a madman.

We will exhibit a second testimony, with the refutation of it. “ The evening of the same coronation, “ la Brosse, an excellent Physician and Mathematician, “ said to the Duke of Vendome, that if the King “ could but escape a dangerous accident, which “ threatened him immediately, he should live thirty “ years longer; and begged that he would introduce “ him to his Majesty: But the King being told the “ subject he intended to speak to him about, would “ not hear la Brosse (31).” Now this is refuted in the following words of Marshal de Bassompierre (32);

It is false to assert that la Brosse desired to be introduced to the King; but had he desired it, the answer invented by him (33) would have been true, viz. that he (34) would have scorned to speak to him, for he looked upon him as a madman. It is related in a discourse on the death of Henry IV, annexed to the Duke de Nevers's Memoirs, that the Duke of Vendome declared to several persons, that la Brosse never spoke to him about it.

[G] It is no way probable he ever advised the Duke of Alençon to make away with Catherine de Medicis. Le Laboureur relates that this Queen, seeing Charles IX draw near his end, was afraid “ that the Duke of “ Alençon would be advised to claim the regency, “ and even the crown, in prejudice of the King of “ Poland his brother. This made her form the design “ of a conspiracy, which might give her an opportunity of seizing upon his person, and that of the “ King of Navarre. She confined them, under a “ strong guard in the Bois de Vincennes, till the King's “ death, but without declaring them Prisoners. In “ the mean time she spread a report, in all places, “ of this conspiracy, for which she caused the Marshals of Montmorency and Cossé to be arrested; “ and, to remove all occasion of doubting this, she “ sacrificed la Molle and Coconnaz, two favourites “ of that Duke, to this state-intrigue. . . The Duke “ of Alençon (so great was his fear) himself betrayed his “ cause, and his domesticks; and he who best sustained “ the character of an oppressed Monarch, who was “ yet incapable of acting unsuitable to his dignity, “ was Henry IV, then King of Navarre. Not but “ that he was afraid he was ruined; and it was in “ this view that he was accused, as some memoirs “ inform me, of having advised Monsieur, the King “ of France's brother, to pretend to be sick, in order “ to oblige the Queen to come and visit him; and “ then, upon pretence of desiring to reveal something “ to her in private, to cause her retinue to withdraw, and then strangle her. His motives or pretences for it were, their safety, the opportunity of the King's death who was in his expiring moments, the credit and authority which time would give their friends; and that the same policy which made her renounce the laws or ties of blood and nature, dispensed them, out of a stronger consideration than that of reigning, from abhorring an action “ which would save to the state, two Princes, who “ were necessary to it, by the death of a woman who “ disturbed the tranquillity, and caused the ruin of “ it. He had not the courage to attempt it, nor “ the discretion to hold his tongue some time after; “ and this is the cause of that deadly and implacable “ hatred which Catherine of Medicis bore to the “ King of Navarre; and therefore she did not scruple to engage in the conspiracy against her own “ son, Henry III; and to disturb the government “ when she had no children, to prevent Henry IV “ from succeeding him; and to substitute, in his “ room, Henry Duke of Lorraine, her grandson by “ her daughter (35).” According to these memoirs, Henry IV intended to be one of the murderers of the Queen-Mother.

[H] His two wives brought a thousand vexations upon him. It is not necessary to prove this with respect to Margaret de Valois; we will therefore allege that proof which relates to Mary of Medicis. The high esteem and affection, which the French had for him (36), would not suffer them to be so much offended at his scandalous way of living; but the Queen his wife was greatly vexed at it; so that it occasioned perpetual disputes betwixt them, and made the Queen disdainful and ill-tempered. The discontent of these domestic quarrels, doubtless retarded the execution of the mighty design he had projected, for the happiness and perpetual repose of “ Christendom; and for the destruction, afterwards, “ of the Ottoman Power (37).”

[I] His notions with regard to marriage are very curious. I am going to cite a very long passage; nevertheless I am certain that it will appear short to curious Readers, it containing a kind of critique on a considerable number of Princesses; and a very solid argumentation of Henry IV, with respect to the choice of a wife. Here follows what he said to Mr. de Roni his favourite (38). “ So that nothing more seems “ wanting, for the accomplishment of this design, “ but to see whether I can get another wife whose “ qualifications may be so excellent, that I may not “ plunge into the greatest misfortune of this life, “ which, in my opinion, is to have an ugly ill-natured and worthless wife, instead of the ease, repose “ and satisfaction which I proposed to find in the “ marriage-state: that if wives could be got by wishing, in order that I might not repent of so hazardous a step, mine should be endowed, among “ other good qualities, with the seven following principal ones, viz. beauty in her person, chastity in “ her life, complaisance in her temper, ingenuity and “ skilfulness in her mind, fruitful with regard to issue, “ eminent with respect to extraction, and rich as to “ her possessions. But I fancy, my friend, that this “ woman is dead, or rather that she perhaps is not yet “ born, nor ready to come into the world; and nevertheless let us consider a little, what maidens or women, whom we have heard of, within or without “ the Kingdom, would be a fit wife for me. And “ forasmuch as I have, in my opinion, thought of it “ more than you have done; I will tell you briefly, “ that the Infanta of Spain, how old and ugly soever “ she may be, would do well enough for me, provided “ I could marry the Low-Countries with her, tho' it “ were upon condition of restoring to you the Earldom “ of Bethune. Neither could I refuse Princess Reibelle (39) of England, in case, as it is said publicly, “ that the Crown is justly hers, she had only been “ declared presumptive heirs of the Kingdom: but in “ I will not expect either the one or the other, the “ King of Spain, and the Queen of England being far “ from entertaining any such thoughts. I have sometimes been spoke to about certain Princesses of Ger-

(35) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Castellan, tom. 2. pag. 381.

(36) i. e. for Henry IV.

(37) Prefixe, Hist. de Henry le Grand, pag. m. 463, ad ann. 1609.

(38) Mem. de Sulli, tom. 2. pag. 112. edit. de Hollande, 12mo.

WHAT the King desired in a wife.

(39) I copy this word as I find it in my edition.

(31) Du Pleix, Hist. Henry IV, pag. 411.

(32) Remarques sur Du Pleix, pag. 172.

(33) i. e. Du Pleix.

(34) i. e. Henry IV.

this King had on that subject. It was very plainly seen, that Religion was nothing but a false pretence, both of the League and the King of Spain: it was known, I say, by the endeavours that were employed, to prevent the Pope from giving him absolution. I have taken notice in another place (d) of the facetious remarks made by d'Aubigné, on the strokes of the switch, which the proxies of this Prince received when he was absolved at Rome. I shall take some farther notice of it here [K].

(d) In the article BOTERO, remark [C].

Henry IV was born at Pau in Bearn the 13th of December 1553 (e). Anthony of Bourbon his father, and Joan d'Albret his mother, carried him to the Court of France when he was but five years old; but he staid there only a few months, and returned to Bearn (f). Anthony returned to Court, after the death of Henry II, and was appointed Lieutenant General of the Kingdom, after the death of Francis II. He sent for the Queen his wife, and the Prince his son, to him, and died of a wound which he had received at the siege of Roan in the year 1562; after which his wife, whom he had treated injuriously [L], returned to Bearn, where she openly embraced the principles of Calvin (g). She left her son at the Court of France, under the direction of la Gaucherie, a prudent Preceptor.

“ many, whose names I have forgot, but I don't like “ in any manner the women of that country, and “ fancy that had I married one of them, I must al“ ways have a hoghead of wine by my bed side;
 “ not to mention that it has been told me, that there “ was a Queen of France of that country, who al“ most ruined the French; which several considerati“ ons have given me a distaste to German women.
 “ One of Prince Maurice's sisters has also been pro“ posed to me, but besides their being all Huguenots,
 “ and that such an alliance might make me suspected
 “ at Rome, and among the zealous Catholics, that “ their mother was a Nun, and something else which “ I will tell you another time, make me averse to it.
 “ The Duke of Florence has likewise a niece who “ is said to be handsome enough; but he being one “ of the most inconsiderable families in Christendom
 “ that bears the title of Prince, it not being above “ threescore or fourscore years, that his predecessors
 “ were only ranked among the most illustrious citi“ zens of Florence; and of the same family with the “ Queen-mother, Catherine, who brought so many “ evils upon France, and particularly to my self, I “ am afraid of marrying into that House, lest it “ should prove prejudicial to myself, my friends and “ my kingdom. These, I believe, are all the fo“ reign Ladies I am to speak of. As to those within “ my own realm, my niece of Guise is one of those “ that would please me best, notwithstanding the ru“ mour which some malicious people have spread, “ viz. that she is a little wantonly inclined; for with “ regard to myself, besides that I believe it very “ false, I should choose rather to have a woman that “ was a little amorous, than one who should prove “ ill-tempered, which she is no ways suspected to be,
 “ but on the contrary, of a very soft, pleasant humour,
 “ and complaisant in her conversation; she also is of “ a good family, handsome, tall, and likely to have “ fine children soon. The only circumstance I fear, is,
 “ the too strong affection she discovers for her own “ family, and especially for her brothers, which might “ inspire her with a desire to aggrandize them to my “ prejudice, and still more to that of my children, in “ case she should ever enjoy the regency. There like“ wise are two daughters of the house of Maine,
 “ the eldest whereof, though so swarthy, would not “ displease me, she being prudent and well educated;
 “ but then they are too young. There are two in “ the House of Aumalle, and three in that of Lon“ gueville, whose persons are far from contemptible;
 “ but other reasons will not suffer me to apply
 “ my thoughts that way. So much for Princesses.
 “ You, besides, have one daughter in the house of “ Luxemburg, one in that of Guimené, my cousin
 “ Catherine of Rohan; but the last is a Huguenot,
 “ and I don't like the others: and next, the daughter
 “ of my cousin the Prince of Conti, of the house
 “ of Luce, who is a very beautiful, well-educated “ Princess; and indeed she would please me best,
 “ were she older. But though I should like them all,
 “ so far as I know them, who can assure me that I “ shall find in them, the three principal qualities united,
 “ which I require in a wife, and without which I “ would not marry? viz. that I should have issue by “ them, that they should be of a sweet and complai-“ sant humour, and sufficiently qualified to assist me

“ in affairs of a sedentary kind; and to govern my “ kingdom and my children well, in case I should die, “ before they were of age, sense, and judgment, to “ endeavour to imitate me; as very probably will be “ the case, should I marry in so advanced an age.
 “ But pray, Sir, answered you, what do you mean “ by so many affirmatives and negatives, from which “ I can infer nothing except this, viz. that you are “ very desirous to be married; but that no woman “ upon earth is fit or qualified to be your wife? So “ that, at this rate, we should implore the assistance “ of heaven, to restore the Queen of England to her “ bloom of life; and raise from the dead Margua-“ re of Flanders, Mademoiselle of Burgundy, Jane la “ Loca, Anne of Britany, Mary Stuart, all rich “ heiresses, in order for you to take your choice from “ among them; for, according to the temper you “ have discovered, speaking of Clara Eugenia, you “ would like some of those Ladies who were possessed “ of such extensive territories. But omitting all these “ impossibilities and idle notions, let us consider a “ little what is to be done &c.

[K] I shall take some farther notice on the strokes of the switch. I shall borrow the words of a Walloon Minister (40). “ The psalm Miserere was sung when Henry the Great was reconciled to the See of Rome, on which occasion du Perron and d'Ofiat, prostrate, and their faces turned to the east, respecting the King of France, in presence of the Roman Pontiff and the Consistory, received, in that King's name, his penance decreed by the holy See, which was, to adjust to every verse a stroke of a switch over his head, shoulders and back, down to the feet, from the beginning of that psalm to the end. Du Perron in his Letters, folio 172, gives us the verbal process of that King's absolution, by Pope Clement VIII, . . . D'Ofiat, his sharer or companion in the royal penance, shews how gentle it was.” In the instruction of the Inquisition was the following hyperbolic expression (41). When the choristers sung Miserere mei, the Pope, at every verse, verberabat et percutiebat humeros Procuratorum cujuslibet ipsorum virga quam in manibus tenebat. i. e. “ He beat the shoulders of each of the proxies with a rod which he held in his hand.” The blows were felt no more on that occasion, than if a fly had crept on their clothes.

[L] Joan d'Albret . . . who had been . . . treated injuriously . . . by her husband.] The lure employed to draw him off from the Protestant Religion, was, to promise him the Kingdom of Sardinia. He was so weak as to believe these promises; “ and he began to withdraw, by insensible degrees, from the Protestants; and to vex the Queen, his wife, all kinds of snares being spread for him, by which a man addicted, as he was, to women, could be overreached; thus forgetting every other thing by insensible degrees, he now thought of nothing but the Kingdom of Sardinia and women, among whom a certain maid of honour belonging to the Queen began to have a considerable share of his affection. In the mean time the Queen of Navarre, like a very prudent and virtuous Princess, endeavoured to reclaim him; enduring all things possible, and re- monstrating to him what he owed both to God and his subjects. But so greatly was he bewitched, that

(b) Ibid. pag. 42.

(i) Ibid. pag. 24.

(k) Ibid. pag. 25.

(l) Ibid. pag. 29.

Preceptor. She sent for him to Pau in 1566; and appointed Florent Chretien to be his Preceptor, in the room of la Gaucherie, who was dead (b). This Preceptor who was a zealous Protestant, educated that Prince in his own Religion. Joan d'Albret declared herself their protectress in 1569, and came for that purpose to Rochelle with her son, whom she devoted from that time to the defence of this new Religion. In this quality he was declared leader or head of the party; and his uncle the Prince of Conde his Lieutenant, with Admiral de Coligny (i). He was in the army when the battle of Moncontour was fought, and had a most ardent desire to engage in the combat; but this he was not allowed to do, for fear of hazarding his person too much (k). From that time he followed the army, till the peace was concluded, viz. the eleventh of August 1570, and then returned to Bearn. His marriage with Princess Margaret, sister to Charles IX, was solemnized at Paris in August 1572. His mother was come to Paris some months before, to prepare his nuptials, and died there whilst her son was upon the road. He began to assume the quality of King, when news was brought him, in Poictou, of her death (l). It is universally known that the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day was perpetrated a few days after the marriage of this new King; and that he being reduced to the necessity of going to mass, or losing his life, chose the former. The answers which certain authors put into his mouth, are mere chimeras of their brain [M], and only shew the desire they had to employ their reading. Henry was obliged, against his will, to spend some years in the Court of France. He there dissembled very artfully all his uneasinesses: he even repulsed, and frequently suppressed them, by some love-intrigue, to which he was strongly prompted by nature, and this was not a little heightened by the depravity and lustfulness of the Ladies. One of his principal mistresses (m) was the Lady de Sauves, wife to a Secretary of State. However, love did not so far engross all his time,

(m) Prefixe, Hist. de Henri le Grand, pag. 39.

" all this was to no purpose, which the Queen ob" serving, she had recourse only to tears and entrea-
 " ties, which melted every one to compassion, ex" cept the said King her husband. During these " transactions the Queen-mother endeavoured to per" suade her to bear with the King her husband, to " which she at last made the following answer, that
 " rather than ever go to mass, if she had the King" dom and her son in her hands, she would throw " them both to the bottom of the sea, that they " might be no obstacle to her; for which reason they " troubled her no more on that subject (42).

[M] The answers, which certain authors put into his mouth, are mere chimeras of their brain. During the massacre, Charles IX sent for, into his closet, the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde; and declared to them, that if they did not immediately renounce their heretical tenets, they should meet with the same fate as the Admiral. The King of Navarre, prodigiously surprized at these words which were uttered with a menacing tone of voice, and at the dreadful spectacle he had seen before his eyes, answered with great humility, and trembling at the same time; that he besought his Majesty to leave them free and undisturbed with regard to their lives and consciences, and that they were ready to pay obedience to him in all other respects (43).

Though I make use of Mezerai's words, the reader may be assured that it is the same thing as if I employed the very words of a Calvinist Historian; for d'Aubigné (44) relates the answer made by the King of Navarre, in the very same terms; and it is as follows in the Inventaire of John de Serres. "The King of Navarre beseeches his Majesty to call to mind his promise, the consanguinity he had so lately contracted, and not to do him any violence in the Religion he had imbibed from his infancy (45)." The author of the History des choses memorables does not say more; and the author of the Commentaries de statu Religionis & Reipublicæ in regno Gallie is not more full with regard to the sense, though he employs more words (46); and it is to be observed that he says expressly, that the answer was made with a trembling tone of voice (47). Thus we see four Protestant writers agree with Mezerai, and consequently we cannot suspect the latter's veracity. This being the case, may we not justly laugh at the Historian, who spins the answer in question to three or four pages? "Our Henry, says he (48), made such " as shewed, at that time, what the greatness of his " courage, the depth of his sense, and the great gen" tleness of his clemency, would be. He besought

 " his Majesty to call to mind the word of honour he " had given him; the near relation they bore to one " another, and the new alliance they had concluded
 " together; and not to offer any violence to the Re" ligion which he had sucked in, from his infancy,

" like his nurse's milk. He said it was a great mis" fortune that so august a King, whose soul possessed
 " the seeds of all the exalted virtues, should have been " so perniciously counselled, to force his subjects, by
 " murders and massacres, to worship and serve God
 " after his fancy and caprice. That nothing could " subdue a courageous people, and especially the " French, but the mildness of their Prince, whom " they worship almost as if he was God. That Fla" minius had employed this method, in order to make " the Romans masters of all Greece; so that, though " he was possessed of superior force in the city of " Thebes, he yet employed as much persuasion, in " order to gain the people, as an Orator would have " done from the rostrum; and that he ought to know, " that he was King over a people who cannot bear a " perfect liberty, nor an entire slavery; and that the " regal power was not a government over slaves, but " over fellow citizens. That he had often heard, that " those great Romans had commanded over all Na" tions, and made themselves masters of the world, to " shew that they were governed by reason, and did " not abandon themselves to revenge. . . (49). Your " Majesty is sensible, that one single example of hu" manity among the Romans, was more efficacious
 " towards subduing the Falisci, who were foreigners,
 " than all their military power had been; what there" fore might not your Majesty's mildness and cle" mency have effected with regard to Protestants?
 " A mighty King, like to your Majesty, should not " do all he can, but imitate the Sun who, the higher
 " he is in the horizon, the slower he moves. . . (50).
 " Those who have given you such evil counsel are " more to blame than you, and deserve to be punish" ed as much as those, who poison the public fountains
 " or aqueducts, and consequently kill all those " who drink of them." I have omitted most of the " particulars which this compiler of common places puts " into the King of Navarre's mouth; but I shall not " curtail, in any manner, the reply which he falsely as" cribes to Charles IX. "These are fine maxims, said the " King, which you learnt of Chretien your tutor; but " I know one much finer than any of them, viz. that " God has invested the King with the supreme com" mand, the springs of which it is not lawful for a " subject to touch; it is glory sufficient for him that " he obeys. Go, and obey what I command, upon " pain of death; and although I am not obliged to " give you an account of my actions, I yet will in" form you, that every illustrious example seems to " have something of injustice in it, which is compen" sated by the public utility (51)." I am to observe,
 " that this author supposes that the King sent for the " King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde separately;
 " but other Historians relate, that Charles IX sent for " those two Princes at the same time.

(42) Bete, Hist. Ecolef. liv. 4. pag. 622. ad ann. 1561.

(43) Mezerai, Hist. de France, tom. 3. pag. 257.

(44) D'Aubigné, tom. 2. liv. 1. chap. 4. pag. m. 347.

(45) Invent. de l'Hist. de France, tom. 2. pag. m. 704.

(46) Lib. 10. folio m. 35.

(47) Quæ tamen humilissimo animo & consensu ore ab illo dicebantur. Ibid.

(48) Julian Peleus, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, Hist. des Faits & de la Vie de Henry le Grand, tom. 1. pag. 328.

(49) Ibid. pag. 331.

(50) Ibid. pag. 332.

(51) Ibid. pag. 333.

time, but that he sometimes intermeddled with State-intrigues; he being concerned in those which were projected to remove the Queen-mother from the Administration, and drive the Guises from the Court (n); but the Queen having discovered these practices (o), caused him and the Duke of Alençon to be put under an arrest, set a guard over them, and ordered them to be examined on several heinous particulars (p) [N]. These two Princes were set at liberty by Henry III, to meet whom they had been conducted by Catherine of Medicis as far as Beauvoisin Bridge (q). The King of Navarre went, at last, secretly away, in the year 1576, and withdrew to Alençon (r). He then returned to the Huguenot party, and again professed his first Religion (s). The Rochellers opened their gates to him, and after residing some months in their city, he went and took possession of his Government of Guyenne (t). From that period, to the year 1589, his life was divided between battles, negotiations and amours. His wife was a great impediment to him; and nevertheless she sometimes was of advantage to him [O]. There were frequent ruptures and pacifications between him and the Court of France, but at last Henry III concluded a sincere alliance with him, to oppose the League, which, since the death of the Duke and Cardinal of Guise, was grown more furious than ever. The reconciliation and confederacy of these two Kings was concluded in April 1589; and their interview was in Tours, the 30th of the same month, and the greatest demonstrations of a reciprocal satisfaction were seen on that occasion. They some time after joined their troops together in order to besiege Paris. This they did in person, and were upon the point of taking that great city, and of punishing the inhabitants as they deserved, when the King of France was killed by James Clement, at St. Clou. The King of Navarre succeeded him in the throne the 2d of August 1589; but he did not obtain the crown without the utmost difficulties; he not being able to force the chiefs of the League to recognize him as King, till after he had renounced the Protestant Religion. The citizens of Paris persisted in their rebellion till the 22d of March 1594; I mean that the King did not make his entry into it till that day. The year after he declared war against the Spaniards, but had little reason to be satisfied with it; he losing much more than he gained by it; however, from a felicity unknown to all his predecessors, he concluded a treaty of peace by which he indemnified himself for his losses [P]. This treaty was concluded at Verbins the 2d of May 1598. From that time till the day of his death, the Kingdom was free

(n) Ibid. pag. 33.
 (o) In 1574.
 (p) Ibid. pag. 36.
 (q) Ibid. pag. 37, 38.
 (r) Ibid. p. 46.
 (s) Ibid. pag. 47.
 (t) Ibid. p. 48.

(52) Prefixe, Hist. de Henri le Grand, pag. m. 36, ad an. 1574.
 (53) See the remark [G] above.
 (54) Prefixe, Hist. de Henri le Grand, pag. 54.
 (55) Ibid. pag. 57.
 (56) Ibid.
 (57) Ibid. pag. 58.

[N] The Queen-mother . . . ordered him and the Duke of Alençon . . . to be examined on several heinous particulars.] “ (52) “The Chancellor would have examined the King of Navarre, but, although he was a prisoner and threatened, he yet would not derogate so much from his dignity as to answer: nevertheless, to satisfy the Queen-mother, he addressed a long speech to her, wherein he deduced a great many particulars relating to the present state of affairs; but then he did not accuse any person, which the Duke of Alençon had been so weak as to do (53).”
 [O] His wife was a great impediment to him, and nevertheless she sometimes was of advantage to him.] Catherine of Medicis had brought her to him in 1578 (54). He then kept his little court at Nerac. (55) Both the husband and wife were displeas'd at seeing one another again. “ (56) Margaret, who was fond of the great splendor of the Court of France where she swam, if I may employ the expression, in a full current of intrigues, looked upon her residing in Guyenne as a kind of banishment; and Henry, knowing her temper and conduct, would have had her at a distance from him rather than near. “ However, as he found that this was an evil, which could not be remedied, he resolv'd to suffer it, and left her at perfect liberty . . . (57); and suiting himself to the times, and the necessity of his affairs, he endeavoured to reap some advantage from her intrigues and interest. He gained a benefit, that was far from being inconsiderable, in the conference which himself and the deputies of the Huguenots had at Nerac with the Queen-mother. For whilst she fancied that she should enchant them, by the charms of the beautiful young Ladies she had with her, and by Pibrac's eloquence; Margaret opposed the same artifices to her; won over the Gentlemen who were in her mother's retinue by the charms of her own women; and employed her own so dextrously, that she strongly captivated poor Pibrac's mind and heart, insomuch that he was actuated entirely by her, and did every thing the very reverse of what the Queen-mother intended; for she, not imagining that so wise a man could have acted in so silly a manner, was deceived in many articles; and insensibly prevailed upon to yield much “ more to the Huguenots than she had resolv'd to do.”

 [P] From a felicity unknown to all his predecessors, he concluded a treaty of peace by which he indemnified himself for his losses.] Bodin (58) observes, that the Spaniards had not, for an hundred years, concluded any treaty with France, without having had the advantage in it. That author had reason to assert this, Henry IV being the first King of France who had reaped any benefit by concluding a peace with Spain. He recovered all the towns he had lost in Picardy, and likewise Blavet which the Spaniards were masters of. This peace did not pass uncensured; some people blaming the King of Spain, and others the King of France. We will cite Prefixe. “ Several of the French, who did not well know the wretched condition the King of Spain and his affairs were in, could not conceive how it had been possible for that Prince to purchase the peace at so dear a rate, as to give up six or seven good towns, and among them Calais and Blavet, which might be called the Keys of France. On the contrary the Spaniards, who saw that their King was in a languishing condition, his treasury exhausted, his Low-Countries tottering, Portugal and his territories in Italy upon the point of revolting, and the son that was to succeed him, a good Prince indeed, but who loved ease and tranquillity; were surprized that as the French had so bravely retaken Amiens, and joined all their forces together after the treaty of Mercoeur, they had not made an irruption into the Low-Countries, because they in all probability would have been conquered, either wholly or in part. The King answered, that if he had desired peace, it was not because he was tired out with the inconveniencies of war, but to give the Christian world an opportunity of breathing; that he knew very well, that such was the situation of things at this time, that he might have reaped great advantages; but that the hand of heaven frequently crushed Princes in the height of their prosperity; and that a wise man ought never, from the opinion he might entertain of some favourable event, to be averse to the concluding a good peace, nor rely too much on the appearance of a present happiness, which a thousand unforeseen accidents may change; it often happening, that a man overthrown and very

(58) Bodin, de la Republique, liv. 5. chap. 1. pag. m. 676.

wards of fifty Historians, and more than five hundred Panegyrist, either Poets or Orators, had spoke of this Monarch with applause. It is certain, on the other side, that many authors have maliciously endeavoured to throw a shade over his glory. Mr. de Sulli complains of this, refutes their calumnies, and asserts, among other particulars, that this Prince did not suffer his mistresses to fleece him at will [R]. However, I am of opinion, that had he not been happy in some faithful servants, who checked the rapaciousness of those

(72) Matthew, who have borne all the burthen and heat of the day (72). chap. xx. ver. 12. It was thought sufficient, in the parable, to equal the recompence of those who had laboured the whole day, to the reward of such as had worked but an hour, and had done no prejudice before. There certainly were many such murmurs, which doubtless could not have been appeased by the following answer of the master of a family, Is your eye evil, because I am good (73)?

(73) Ibid. ver. 15.

(74) Compare, with this, the remark [AA] of the article CHARLES V.

Res dura & regni novitas me talia cogunt Moliri (75).

(75) Virg. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 567.

Du Pleffis Mornai, in a letter he wrote to Morlas in 1594, whilst those who had followed the League were disengaging themselves from it on advantageous conditions, employs the remarkable words following: "We do not envy your killing the fatted calf for the prodigal son, provided you say with a sincere heart to the obedient son, thou knowest, my son, that all I have is thine; and that you, at least, do not sacrifice the obedient son, to make the better entertainment for the prodigal one. In fine, I am greatly pleased with whatever is done, provided it be advantageous; but I dread those bargains, in which things are given up, and nothing got but mere words; the words of those, who hitherto have had no words at all (76)."

(76) Memoires of du Pleffis Mornai, tom. 2. pag. 398. 399.

[R] Mr. de Sulli complains of this . . . and asserts, among other particulars, that this Prince did not suffer his mistresses to fleece him at will.] He speaks of certain Historiographers, who had bestowed their eulogiums and censures unjustly. They scarce saw one fault in those whose hirelings they were, and scarce one tolerable quality in Henry the Great, who had given them nothing. And "so far as much, says he (77), as they cannot deny him some praises, among a numberless multitude which are publicly bestowed upon him by the consent of all nations, they maliciously forget such as are most necessary to be known; disguise others; and extenuating them all as much as possible, they employed another kind of malice, filled with imposture, viz. to ascribe to him, impudently and falsely, desires, projects, designs, enterprizes, and resolutions, with regard to state-affairs; all of them the most absurd, silly, impertinent and ridiculous possible. On this occasion they give themselves airs; they talk as if they had been the King's greatest confidants, and been admitted into all his most secret thoughts and designs; or held intelligence with some of his most familiar servants both for peace or war, who had told them all these particulars. Afterwards proceeding to discourse on his private conversation, the state of his family, his behaviour in it, and especially on his recreations, diversions, sports, pleasures, pastimes and festivities; though they were for the most part ordinary, common and familiar to men in general, nay even to women; and all ways most general, universal, tolerated, lawful and permitted to all Kings, Potentates, Princes and great Lords, there being few to be found, even among the most prudent, virtuous, gracious, pious and holy, who were not delighted with them, and which their people and subjects have not cheerfully suffered, when, for such pleasures and pastimes, there has not been committed any injustice, rape, murder, violence, extortion or plundering. Nevertheless, when they come to discourse on the gaiety and mirth of this so clement and gracious a Prince, they exaggerate and misrepresent them to such a degree, by so many falsehoods and fallacious circumstances; by so many mischievous and pernicious consequences; charging him with so many vicious, shameful, infamous and even execrable and scandalous desires and passions; that one would imagine, in hearing them speak with so much audaciousness, impudence, boldness and rashness, that they were the searchers into the hearts and thoughts of men . . . or that they had been his Majesty's confessors and great penitentiaries . . . and they have especially been so rash, as to rank in the number of his mistresses, a Lady whose qualities, eminence, virtues and wisdom, should ever have cautioned him, even though he had thought of her, not to look upon her as such; and therefore these knavish writers deserve a most severe punishment for writing after this manner. These writers say in other places, that the woman had gained so great an ascendant over him, because vice was grown natural and habitual to him by long use and acquaintance with wicked people; and that he was so distractedly fond of some of those beauties, that he had no other will but theirs; and that this weakness was the cause that the most important affairs were transacted by their mediation, and that they were not refused any thing they desired. They so often add such a number of trifling, impertinent particulars, that all these rash falsehoods being too prolix to be refused by the present discourse, which was drawn up for another purpose, we shall refer those who are desirous of seeing their calumnies set in a full light, to all that will be said of them in the course of these memoirs, from which it will appear, how, and for what reasons, the King never intended to marry a Lady of gallantry; that the women had no manner of influence in state-affairs; and that he had servants, who, by his command, would tell them their faults, even in his presence; and divert them from, and refuse them such things as they might think to be unjust and prejudicial to the state, the affairs and revenues of the King, or to his people; and they were forced to submit to this." This shall be confirmed by some words extracted from a letter of Henry IV, wherein the reader will see the calumnies that were spread against him. "Some blame me as being too fond of edifices and costly works; others censure my hunting, hounds and hawks; some reproach me with cards, dice, and other kind of games; others blame me on account of women; some tax me with loving feasts, banquets, and dainties; whilst others find fault with me for being delighted with assemblies, plays, balls, dances, and running at the ring, in which (say they to reproach me) I am still seen with my grey beard, as much delighted, and being as proud of having run victoriously, entered twice or thrice, as they merrily express it, and carried off some fine Lady's ring, as I could have been in my youthful days, nay, as the most vain man in my Court. I will not deny but that there may be some truth in all these discourses; but I must observe at the same time, that as I do not act in an immodest manner on these occasions, this ought rather to be spoke in my commendation than as a fault; but be this as it will, I surely ought to be excused for delighting in such diversions, as they are not any way inconvenient or prejudicial to my people, by way of recompence for the frequent bitterness I have tasted; and for the many uneasinesses, disgusts, fatigues, perils and dangers, which I have past through from my childhood till the age of fifty . . . The scriptures do not absolutely command us to be free from sins and failings, so far as such infirmities are inseparable from the baseness and impetuosity of human nature; but only not to be enslaved from them, nor to suffer them to gain an empire over our wills; and this I have studied to do, not being able to do better: And you are very sensible, from many things which have past, with regard to my mistresses (all people thinking those harpies, and whose resistance he approved, they would have had a still more absolute ascendant over him, Henry did not often discover, though he did more than once, those snares which were laid for him by beautiful women [S]. Such persons as were of approved fidelity, might venture to give that Prince their advice without angering him; and we do not find that Villeroy displeased him, for having delivered himself with such a freedom to this Prince, as might have offended him or any other [T]. It cannot be denied but that this Monarch had a great fund of generosity, which made him abhor a numberless multitude of artifices, which are but too much seen in those who govern. We will here see, on this subject, the judgment he formed of the artifice, which a King of France had employed [U].

(77) See Memoires du Sulli, in the preliminary Epistle to tom. 3. folio m. e. ij.

HERACLEOTES

“ that love was the most predominant passion in me)
 “ whether I have not often asserted and maintained “ your opinions in opposition to their whims and “ chimeras, even so far as to tell them, when they “ pretended to give themselves airs and make a noise, “ that I had rather lose ten such mistresses as they,
 “ than one such servant as you, who were necessary “ to me for affairs of an honourable and useful na“ ture (78).”

(78) Mémoires de Sully, tom. 3. pag. 137, 138.

[S] There were some occasions in which Henry escaped those snares which were laid for him by beautiful women.] Catherine of Medicis asking him at the conference of St. Brix (79), “ What he would have? He answered, looking on the Ladies in her train, I am not for any thing there, Madam; as though he hinted thereby, that he would never more suffer himself to be ensnared by such lures.” But he had not shown the like prudence on other occasions; for some time after the massacre on St. Bartholomew’s day (80), “ he suffered himself to be captivated by the charms of certain Ladies of the Court, which it is said that Queen had employed, purposely to amuse the Princes and great Lords, and to discover all their thoughts (81).” What an abominable Queen was this! Every one knows what name is given to such a behaviour. Heavens! what a school was this for young Ladies of quality. Ladies who went by the name of Maids of Honour! And it is to be observed, that had this Queen desired to keep two or three hundred, she would have been supplied with them; so great was the corruption in those times, the use to which those Maids of Honour were employed being well known.

(79) A castle near Cognac.

(80) Perefice, Hist. de Henry le Grand, pag. 80. ed. ann. 1586.

(81) Ibid. pag. 33.

[T.] Villeroy delivered himself with such a freedom to this Prince, as might have offended him.] What people are they who do not know that it is a very rude advice, and which touches to the quick, to represent to a person, that he is not able to maintain his rank, but forgets the dignity of his character? Now Villeroy represented this to Henry IV. and he is applauded for it by Naude. One of the best Counsels, says he, (82), that Mr. de Villeroy ever gave to Henry the Great, who had led a Soldier’s life during the wars which had broke out at his accession to the Crown, was, when he told him, that a Prince who was regardless of the reverence due to his Majesty, suffered it to be contemned and affronted. That the Kings his Predecessors, in times of the greatest confusion, had always behaved as Kings, and that it was high time for him to speak, write, and command as a King.

(82) Naude, Coups d’Etat, chap. 1. pag. m.

[U.] We will here see the judgment he formed of the artifice which a King of France had employed.] He was “ a great observer of such things as relate to the preserving the reputation of Princes, wherein he chose rather to recede from his own right and power, than to give the least occasion for censuring his sincerity; he always blaming faithless and insidious Princes, not excepting even his predecessors, whenever the conversation fell on such of their Actions, in which they had been wanting with regard to prudence in their promises and publick faith, as he did one day, when the subject of discourse, in his presence, was on the weighty affairs of King Philip of Valois; and his great courage, which was so ill seconded by fortune.” He was a great Monarch, (said the King) but there were certain subtilties in his words, which would have become wheelers of little Children better than Kings, as was the following, which I no ways approve. He had concluded a treaty with the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and promised by the treaty, not to make war with the Empire, notwithstanding which, he levied both sea and land armies, with which he invaded the Low Countries, under the command of the Duke of Normandy his eldest son, who was defeated by sea at Sluys; and having laid siege to the City of Thim, the King his father was at that siege, as a soldier fighting under his son, being nevertheless one of his Counsellors; he thinking, by this captious equivocation, that no one could blame him for breaking the treaty which he had made as King of France; as tho’ it were not the same thing to attempt any enterprise on’s self, as by another (83). It is not long since that walking with a Doctor, he told me that Henry IV. having been told a fraud of the King of Spain, cried out, It must be owned, that Kings are great knaves. I immediately ask’d whether he had read this particular in any Book, to which he replied, that this was one of Henry IV’s smart sayings, (*), inserted in the collection which was published of them, at the end of his history written by the bishop of Rhodéz (84), preceptor to Lewis XIV. I very much doubt this, replied I; for I formerly read that work of Mr. de Perefice quite through, and I have not the least idea of what you now tell me; and yet these words are so very likely to make an impression, that they could not be easily forgot. I afterwards run over Perefice’s work, and found that they were not there, and accordingly I wrote word to the Doctor about this. He then sent me word, that upon recollection, he believed that this exclamation of Henry IV. is told in one of Howel’s Letters (in English). I relate this only by way of advice, viz. that we must not trust bear says; and that incidents vary greatly, by their passing from one writer to another. What a difference there is between the words of le Grain and those of Howell!

(83) Baptiste le Gruin, Décade du Roy Henry le Grand, liv. 8. pag. m. 781.

(84) Hardouin de Perefice.

(*) There is a collection of them, but two repar-tees are wanting which this Prince made when but fifteen years of age; and which his renowned mother, the illustrious Joan d’Albret, Queen of Navarre, has preserved. The Queen-mother, Catherine of Medicis, in concert with the Cardinal of Lorraine, had sent the Sieur de la Motte-Fenelon to the Queen of Navarre, to dissuade her from joining her forces with these, which under the command of the Prince of Conde, the Protestants were assembling in 1568, just before the civil war. As la Motte-Fenelon one day, directing himself privately to the Prince of Navarre, studiously affected to appear surprized, that he, being so young, should engage in a quarrel which properly concerned no one but his uncle the Prince of Conde, and those Huguenots who waged war against the King: I do so, answered the young Prince, because it being manifest, that upon pretence of rebellion with which my Uncle and the Huguenots are falsely charged here, our enemies have no less a design in view than to extirpate the whole royal branch of Bourbon, we are determined to die all together, to save the expences of mourning, which we otherwise should be obliged to wear for one another.

The same Gentleman directing himself, another time, to the Prince of Navarre, bewailed the miseries which, he said, the fire of this war would occasion throughout the whole Kingdom. Pugh, says the Prince; such a fire as this may be extinguished with a bucket of water. How could that be, said la Motte-Fenelon? by forcing, (continued the Prince) the Cardinal of Lorraine, the true and principal incendiary of France, to swallow down that water till he burst. It is the Queen of Navarre herself who, pag. 234, 235, of a collection printed in 12mo, Anno 1570, entitled, Histoire de notre temps, &c. relates this in a long, noble manifesto of her’s. By the way, I know not whether Henry IV. was not as much obliged, for this vivacity and fire, to his mother, as to his father Anthony of Bourbon, who is not represented, in our history, as possessed of very shining qualities; and a circumstance which

(a) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 166.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, num. 167.

HERACLEOTES (DIONYSIUS) so named because he was of Heraclea (a) a city of Pontus, studied under various masters, and at last attached himself to the founder of the Stoics (b). From him he learnt to assert, that pain is not an evil; that nothing but vice deserves this name, as nothing but virtue deserves the name of good; and that all other things are indifferent. He persevered in this doctrine so long as he was in health; but being afterwards afflicted with the sharpest pains, he abjured his opinions [A], and renounced the Sect of the Stoics; and, what is worse, embraced that of the Cyrenaics, who made the summum bonum, to consist in pleasure. He now entered without the least sense of shame, and in the most public manner, into the stews; and was willing that the whole world should know the pleasures in which he immersed himself (c). Some persons even say, that he was a debauchee from his youth [B]; and that recollecting as he passed which is pretty strong in the mother's favour, is a delicate raillery we find, page 236 and 237 of the manifesto in question, of that Princess, with regard to one Descars, a Limousin Gentleman, who had ridiculously boasted to the King and the Queen Mother, that he had the command of 4000 Gentlemen, who would be able to prevent so much as one single Huguenot from marching, to join the Prince of Conde's army. However, as the Queen of Navarre, and her forces, passed without opposition; not to mention that Descars was not considerable enough, to prevail with so great a number of the Gentry to follow him as Volunteers: In all probability, said she, by these 4000 Gentlemen, Descars understood Swine, who were called Gentlemen in his Village, because they are clothed in filk. The Reader may here observe the origin of the word Pourceaugrac. REM. CRIT.

[A] Being afterwards afflicted with the sharpest pains, he abjured his opinions.] On account of this change, he was called παραδιδυμος (1), which we may translate deserter. Some relate, that his having sore eyes was the occasion of Heracleotes's changing his opinion, but others ascribe it to the pains he felt in the gravel. Cicero gives us both these traditions (2). Nobis Heracleotes ille Dionysius flagitiose deservisse videtur à Stoicis propter oculorum dolorem. Quis vero hoc didicisset à Zenone, non dolere quum doleret? Illud audierat, nec tamen didicerat malum illud non esse, quia turpe non esset, & esset ferendum viro. Hic si Peripateticus fuisset, permansisset, credo, in sententia, quoniam dolorem dicunt malum esse, de asperitate autem ejus fortiter ferenda præcipiunt eadem quæ Stoici (3). "Dionysius Heracleotes seems to have left the Stoicks infamously, because of a pain in his eyes. For what man had been taught by Zeno, that what is really painful is not so? He had been told, but without understanding it, that pain was not an evil, because it does not reflect ignominy on men, and ought to be borne by them. Had Heracleotes been a Peripatetic, I fancy he would have continued as such, they maintaining that pain is an evil; but they inculcate, in like manner as the Stoicks, that men ought to bear it courageously." I have quoted more words than I needed to have done, to prove what I advanced, and yet I do not think my Labour lost; for I shew by the way, that the controversies between the Stoicks and Peripatetics, with respect to the nature of pain, was but a mere dispute about words. Both agreed that it ought to be borne courageously, but one part would not allow it to be called an evil, and the other asserted that it was. Did this deserve to have such a pother made about it? We dispute at this time, both in Divinity and Philosophy, about things wherein the misunderstanding is no less visible. Here follows another passage of Cicero; I will cite it at length, in order that the Reader may have a full view of the manner in which our Philosopher Heracleotes reasoned. He presumed greatly on the strength of Philosophy; he judging that as it was inferior to the force or violence of pain, pain must consequently be an evil. Homo sanè levis Heracleotes Dionysius, cum à Zenone fortis esse didicisset, à dolore deductus est. Nam cum ex renibus laboraret, ipso in ejulatu clamitabat, falsa esse illa, quæ antea de dolore ipse sensisset. Quem cum Cleanthes condiscipulus rogaret, quoniam ratio eum de sententia deduxisset, respondit, Quia cum tantum operæ Philosophiæ dedissem, dolorem tamen ferre non possem, satis esset argumenti, malum esse dolorem. Plurimos autem annos in Philosophia consumpsi, nec ferre possum: malum est igitur dolor. Tum Cleanthem, cum pede terram percussisset, versus ex Epigonis ferunt dixisse:

Audisne hæc Amphiaræ, sub terram abdite ?

Zenonem significabat: à quo illum degenerare dolebat (4). (4) Idem, Cicero, Tuscul. 2. cap. 25.

"Dionysius Heracleotes, being a fickle man, after Zeno had taught him strength and hardness, fell from it, being vanquished by pain; for being troubled with great pain in the kidneys, he cried aloud in the anguish he felt, that what he had formerly taught with regard to pain, was false. And when Cleanthes, his fellow disciple, asked him wherefore he had altered his opinion, he replied, since I have devoted so many years to Philosophy, and yet am not able to bear pain, this shews sufficiently that pain is an evil. Upon this Cleanthes, after stamping his foot on the ground, is said to have repeated the following Verse out of the Epigonæ,

"Amphiaræus now laid low in Earth,
"Hearst thou this ?

"He hinted at Zeno, from whom he was grieved
"that Heracleotes had degenerated."

[B] Some persons say that he was a debauchee even from his youth.] We have just now seen, that he had adhered many years to the severe maxims of the Stoicks, and this he himself asserts, if Cicero may be credited. What are we then to think of a story which we meet with in Athenæus? Shall we conclude that this author took a pleasure in collecting whatever scandalous stories he met with, whether true or false, in the most satyrical writers? I shall leave this to the decision of my readers; and will only insert Athenæus's Greek, with Dalecampius's translation (5) which it may be necessary to rectify by Casaubon's notes. Ην δὲ ὁ Διονύσιος ἔτι ἐν τῷ, ὡς φησὶ Νικίας ὁ Νικαῖος ἐν ταῖς διαδοχαῖς πρὸς τὰ Ἀφροδίσια ἱερῶν, καὶ πρὸς τὰς δημοσίας εὐχῆς παιδικῆς ἀδαφίρας· καὶ ὡς ἐπιτόμιμος μετὰ τινῶν γυναικῶν, ὡς ἐγένετο κατὰ τὸ παιδικόν εἰς ἃ τῆ προστηρία παρακληθὲς ἠφιλε καλλεῖς, ἔχων τότε κατὰ τύχην, ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα πάλιν ἰσχυρῶς ἀποδίδου. Fuit autem Dionysius ille, quod ait Niceas Nicæensis libro de Successionibus, jam ab adolescentia, tam immani furiosaque libidine percitus, ut sine discrimine cum plebeis ancillis ac pedissequis coiret & aliquando cum familiaribus inambulans, ubi ad ancillarum ædes venit, quas pridie ingressus aliquot obolos quas debebat non solverat, casu tum forte in loculis habens, distentâ manu coram omnibus numeraverit (5).

(5) Athen. lib. 10. pag. 437.

"It is related in Niceas Nicæensis's Book of Successions, that this Dionysius was, from his youth, fired with such lust, that he would lie indiscriminately with all the wenches who came in his way. And that walking one day with some friends, and going by the house of certain girls, with whom he had had an affair the day before, and to whom he owed a few pence, he happening to have some then in his pocket, stretched forth his hand, and paid his debt before every one." Those who shall well remember Athenæus's seventh book will easily join with Cicero; and will believe that Dionysius did not quit the Stoicks, till after he had spent a great number of years among them; for Athenæus calls him an old man at the time he deserted; and cites Timon the joker, who used to say that this man had begun to devote himself to pleasure, at a time when the season proper for it was over. But I had better quote the original, which is in Chapter VI, Book VII, Page 281 of Athenæus. Περὶ δὲ Διονυσίου τῷ Ἡρακλειῶτι τι δὲ καὶ λέγεται; ὡς ἄντικρυς ἀπαθὲς τὸν τῆς ἀρετῆς χιτῶνα ἀποδύνασθαι, καὶ μεταδύμενος καλῶν ἡμεῶν ἔχματα, καὶ τοὺς γυναικῶν ἀπορίας τὰν τῆς σοφῆς λόγων,

(1) That word signifies immutatus, and not transfusor, as Athenæus's translator renders it, book 10. pag. 437. See Vossius, De Hist. Græc. pag. 466. Casaubon, in Athenæum, pag. 733. had always observed that fault.

(2) Compare citation (3) with citation (4).

(3) Cicero, lib. 5. de Finib. cap. 31. Laert. num. 166. speaks only of his sore eyes.

passed by a brothel, that he had left it the day before without paying what he owed the strumpets, he put his hand into his pocket, and paid his debts regularly, in presence of every one. A puzzling objection was made to him [C], viz. his admitting, with all the Dogmatists, that there is a rule to discover truth from falsehood. He composed several philosophical works, and likewise some Poems (d). He imposed upon Heraclides by one of his Poems [D]. He lived to fourscore years of age, when being grown quite weary of life, he starved himself (e). He burnt with lascivious desires, even in an age when nature was not able to satiate them [E].

(d) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 167.

(e) Idem, ibid.

Moreri

λόγων, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν Ἐπίκουρον μεταπαύδοντας· ἀπὸ δὲ οὐκ ἐχρησίου ὁ Τίμων ἔφη, Ἦντα ἔχονθ' ἄνθρωπον, τὸν ἀρχέτας ἰδόντα. Ἦντα ἰσᾶν: ἄνθρωπος δὲ γαμῶν, ἄνθρωπος δὲ ἀποκαίσεσθαι.

Quid autem de Heraclote Dionysio attinet dicere? Aperte quidem et palam virtutis exuta veste, cum indignum mutasse et alienum sumpsisse criminarentur, gaudebat, quamvis jam natu grandis à Stoicorum schola defecisset, et transivisset ad Epicurum. De illo non invidiose Timon scripsit.

Ille voluptati se tradit jam moriturus. Tempus amandi, tempus habendæ conjugis, est quod Rebus ab his tandem moneat desistere tempus.

i. e. "What shall be said of Heraclotes Dionysius? who having divested himself publickly of the robe of virtue, and being accused for so shamefully changing his principles, only laughed at the reproach, though he was so far advanced in years when he abandoned the Stoics and went over to the Epicureans. Timon wrote pleasantly of Heraclotes as follows:

"He dedicates his ebbing life to pleasures. There is a time for love, a time for marriage; And there is a time we should abstain from both."

I shall add that Lucian observes, that Dionysius was extremely sober and prudent, when he left the Stoics (6). I dare not affirm, as Menage does (7), that he travelled into Asia in Alexander's retinue; and that he danced to the sound of flutes at this conqueror's nuptials. Athenæus indeed speaks this of one Dionysius Heraclotes; but how many persons does he mention of the same name, without distinguishing them by any characteristic?

(6) Ἄνθρωπος ἄσπετος. Lucian in his accusato, pag. 325. tom. 2.

(7) In Laert. lib. 7. pag. 334.

[C] A puzzling objection was made to him.] The person who made it was one Antiochus. He had gone over to the sect or principles of those who did not admit of any knowledge, that is, any proposition to be certainly true; and he afterwards had quitted that sect, after having long maintained incomprehensibility, and wrote subtilly in favour of it. Scripsit de his rebus acutissime, et idem hoc acrius accusavit in senectute quam antea defensiverat. Quamvis igitur fuerit acutus, ut fuit, tamen inconstantia elevatur auctoritas. Quis, inquam, etiam iste dies illuxerit, quæro, qui illi offenderit eam quam multos annos esse negavisset veri et

(8) Cicero, Acad. falsi notam (8)? i. e. "He wrote with great acuteness and subtilty on these subjects; and censured his former doctrine more vehemently than he had before defended it. Therefore, although he was a subtle and acute writer, yet his fickleness lessened his authority. For I would enquire of him when that propitious day would arise, which should reveal to him that criterion of truth and falsehood which he had denied during so many years." Now whilst he was opposing knowledge or certainty, he harassed our Heraclotes in a most dreadful manner; he believed for a long time, says he to him, that there was no other good but virtue; after which you asserted, that virtue is only an empty name, and that the supreme good consists in pleasure. You therefore ought to believe, that falsehood presents itself to our minds, and impresses itself there under the same characteristic or image under which truth exhibits itself; and consequently that this distinguishing characteristic of truth and falsehood, which you trust to in affirming or denying, is deceitful and illusive. The whole strength of the objection in question consisted in this, that Heraclotes had successively maintained two contradictory propositions. Antiochus felt the force of his own objection, when he had changed his opinion, he being defeated, with the same weapons which he had employed against Heraclotes. Here follows Cicero's Latin (9). Quoque solebat uti argumento

(9) Idem, ibid.

A SCEPTICAL OBJECTION.

Vol. VI.

tum, cum ei placebat, nihil posse percipi, cum quaereret, Dionysius ille Heraclotes, utrum comprehenderet certa illa nota quæ assentiri dicitis oportere, illudne, quod multos annos tenuisset, Zenonique magistro credidisset, bonum quod esset, id bonum solum esse; an quod postea defensivavisset, boni inane nomen esse, voluptatem esse summum bonum: qui ex illius commutata sententia docere vellet, nihil ita signari in animis nostris à vero posse, quod non eodem modo possit à falso, is curavit, quod argumentum ex Dionysio ipse sumpsisset, ex eo ceteri sumerent. i. e. "He employed this argument, whilst he thought that we could not arrive at any certainty of truth; which, said he, of those two opinions did Heraclotes find out, by that criterion, to which you declare that we ought to submit; whether the first which he had long maintained, and had been taught by Zeno his master, or that nothing is good but what is virtuous; or that which he afterwards defended, viz. that virtue is a vain and empty name, and that pleasure is the supreme good? he intending to shew, from Heraclotes's changing his opinion, that truth does not make any impression on the mind, but what it may likewise receive from falsehood. He took care, that others should draw the same argument from his inconstancy, as he had drawn from that of Heraclotes." This objection may puzzle such modern Protestants, as assert that the truths of the Gospel do not enter into our minds by the way of evidence, but by that of sense. What will they say should they be shewed some Christians who change their religion; and who in imitation of our Heraclotes, a long time espouse with incredible zeal and ardor, the very tenets which they afterwards reject with equal ardor? Does not the sensation of falsehood, will it be asked, impress or stamp itself on the mind, with all the same characteristics as the sense of truth?

[D] He imposed upon Heraclotes by one of his poems.] Having written a Poem intitled Παρθενόραον, he published it under Sophocles's name, as tho' he had been the author of that poem. Heraclides was so far imposed upon as to think it had really been writ by Sophocles, and quoted it as such in one of his works. Heraclotes then discovered the artifice, which Heraclides would not believe in any sophocles, he asserting that it certainly was writ by Sophocles; and even when Heraclotes sent him his manuscript, he still persisted in his opinion, and declared, that chance might make two poets form the very same composition (10); so displeasing it is to an author, to own that he has suffered himself to be imposed upon in such a manner. Scaliger, when imposed upon thus by Muretus, was not so obstinate, but then he was prodigiously vexed at it.

(10) Diog. Laert. lib. 5. num. 92, 93.

[E] He burnt with lascivious desires, even in an age when nature was not able to satiate them.] Upon a high festival, which he solemnized as agreeably as he could, he caused a courtesan to be brought, that nothing might be wanting to the festivities of the day; but old age had impaired his faculties to such a degree, that all his attempts were fruitless. He confessed his imbecillity, employing the words (11) which Homer puts into the mouth of one of Penelope's gal-lants, who not being able to bend Ulysses's bow, cried, let another take this bow, I am not able to bend it (12). Antigonon on Heraclotes declared in like manner, that since he was not able to engage with the courtesan, another man ought to take her. Ὅσοι τὸν Διονύσιον τῆς οὐκίτης συνιστάσθαι, ἐν τῇ τῶν Χίων ἱστῆ, καὶ μὴ δουλεύοντι διὰ τῆς γῆρας χρεῖσθαι ἢ ἀμελεῖσθαι ἰταίρα, ὑποσέφασιν εἶπαι πρὸς τὰς συνδιπλώσας, ὅτι δυναμὸν ταύσας, λαβεῖν δὲ καὶ ἄλλῳ. Tradit Dionysium cum domesticis, diebus festis congiurum, serias illas agentem, cum ob senectutem meretrice quam adduxerant uti non posset, ad convivas faceret, dixisse, Arrigeret nequeo, sumas alius (13). Antigonon Caryitius related those particulars in the life of our Heraclotes.

(11) He made some alterations in them by way of parody. See Calaubon on Athenæus, pag. 733. (12) Odyss. lib. 21. pag. m. 647. (13) Athen. lib. 10. pag. 437, &c. Antigonon Caryit. o.

G g

Moreri has made considerable blunders [F].

[F] Moreri has made considerable blunders. I. He says that Dionysius Heracleotes . . . having quitted Zeno's school, became a follower of the Cynics. Now he should have said the Cyrenaicks, which sect differed greatly from that of the Cynicks. The reader may judge of this, from the opposite characters that were found in Aristippus and Diogenes. There is not in the main, any great difference between Diogenes Laertius, who declares that our Heracleotes went over to the Cyrenaicks, and Athenæus who says that he went over to the Epicureans; for though Epicurus gave a more virtuous explication of the word pleasure, he agreed with the Cyrenaicks, that the ultimate end of man, the supreme good, the happiness of man, is pleasure. II. The following words, he did not scruple in any manner . . . to do publicly what might give him pleasure. are a consequence of his first error, and a new error. Had Heracleotes gone over to the Cynicks, he would not have been ashamed to lie with a woman in the middle of the streets; but as he did but go over to the school of Aristippus, who was an agreeable debauchee, a polite libertine, and who knew the world admirably well; and as the Cyrenaicks who were for indulging nature to the utmost of its wishes, were not nevertheless as barefaced and impudent as the Cynicks, it is wrong for any writer to assert that he had as little deference and respect, as Diogenes, for his neighbour's eye. I own, that he was willing to have people see him enter into the public brothels, and that it should be known he had lain with prostitutes (14); but every one knows that this does not signify, to know a woman publicly, and in the sight of every one, as the Cynicks used to do. III. It would be impossible for any one to represent in a more confused manner than Moreri has done, our Philosopher's deserting the Stoicks. Dionysius, says he, being extremely tortured with a dreadful pain in his eyes, would never say that pain was an indifferent thing. Is this a faithful description of the change of this philosopher? Would not the reader be apt to image to himself a man who is put on the rack, in order to force him to declare, that pain is an indifferent thing; and who persists obstinately in refusing to make such a confession? See in the passages above cited (15) from Cicero, the genuine state of this affair. IV. He should not have subtracted ten years (15) from Heracleotes's age; he starving himself at eighty years of age, and not at threescore and ten.

(14) Εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν χαλασθῆναι ὄντιον καὶ τὰ λα ἀπαρῶν
 οὐκ ἴδοντο.
 Lustra ingrediebatur ceterisque voluptatibus aperte operam dabat.
 Laertius, lib. 7.
 num. 167. The common version is express in too strong terms, and very probably misled Moreri.
 Palam lustra in-grediebatur, cæ-teraque sub omnium gerebat oculis
 quæ ad voluptatem pertinere.

HERACLIUS, Patriarch of Jerusalem in the twelfth Century, made his own fortune by his art and conduct. He was a native of Auvergne, without either friends or fortune; notwithstanding which he rose to be Archbishop of Cæsarea, and afterwards Patriarch of Jerusalem. His handsome air and artful conduct procured him the most intimate confidence of the King's mother; insomuch that the oppositions of the Archbishop of Tyre were of no effect, though founded on prophecies [A]. It was in vain that he protested against the election of Heraclius, appealed to the Pope on that account, and even went to Rome in order to get it revoked; he had not time sufficient to put an end to this affair. Heraclius caused him to be poisoned [B], and going afterwards to Rome, got himself confirmed by the Pope. He succeeded Almericus the Patriarch, who died in 1180. He led a very scandalous life with the wife of a Merchant of Napoli in Syria, whom he sent for to Jerusalem after her husband's death (a). The particulars of this incident are related below, in old French [C]. He must not be distinguished from

(a) See Histoire de la Conquête du Royaume de Jerusalem par Saladin, printed in Paris, anno 1679.

[A] Though founded on prophecies. He said, that it was threatened in the prophecies, that as the Cross was conquered by one Eraclius (Heraclius) it should be lost under another (1). I am of opinion that he would have spoke more conformably to History, had he said, that as the Infidels had taken the Cross under one Eraclius, i. e. under the Empire of Heraclius, they should re-take it under another Heraclius. I know very well that the Emperor Heraclius recovered, by a treaty of peace, the Cross which the Persians had carried off; but can we call this conquering the cross?

(1) Histoire de la Conquête de Jerusalem par Saladin. See the remark [C].

[B] The Archbishop of Tyre . . . had not time sufficient to put an end to this affair. Heraclius caused him to be poisoned. I found this particular in the preface which Bongars wrote to the Gesta Dei per Francos. He relates that William Archbishop of Tyre, the same who wrote the History of those times, declared, but in vain, to the Canons of the Holy Sepulchre, that it would not be proper for them, in any manner, to nominate Heraclius to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. He told them the prophecy related above; and, to prevent their entertaining a thought that he aspired to the vacant dignity, he conjured them not to nominate either Heraclius or himself. However, they nominated these two; and the King, pursuant to the promise he had made his mother, chose Heraclius, who immediately published his mandate, requiring obedience from the Archbishops and Bishops, subordinate to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. The Archbishop of Tyre was the only Prelate who refused to appear; he appealing to the Pope, and boasting he would prove that Heraclius was not worthy of the Patriarchat. He set out immediately for Rome, and met with a very gracious reception there; and settled matters on such a foot, that it was believed Heraclius would inevitably be deposed; but the new Patriarch warded off the blow, by bribing a Physician who poisoned William the Archbishop. Heraclius afterwards went to Rome, and was indulged by the Pope in all things he desired. Bongars met with these particulars in none but French Authors.

[C] The particulars of this incident betwixt, in old French. The Histoire de la Conquête de Jerusalem, abovecited, was published at Paris in 1679. The Editor had taken it from an old manuscript, which Mr. Cabart de Villermont had put into his hands. He publishes what follows in the very words and orthography of the original: Et celle (2) tenoit li Patriarche tout en apiert, & sans celée de gens, ainsi comme un homme fait sa femme, fors tant qu'elle ne manoit pas avec li, & quant li Patriarche alloit au Monstier, elle estoit aussi bien aornée de riches draps, comme se cou fut une Emperées ou une Reine, & ses serians devant li, & quant aucunes gens la veoient qui ne la connoissoient point, si demandoient qui cette Dame estoit, ainsi qu'on fait des gens qu'on ne connoit; & ceux qui la connoissoient disoient que cou estoit la Patriarchesse, la femme le Patriarche, & sachez qu'elle avoit nom Pasque de Riveri, & si avoit assez d'enfans du Patriarche. On come que ce Prelat assitant à un Conseil d'importance, un sal s'estant fourré dans la chambre, courut droit à lui, & lui dit, Sire Patriarche preparez moi une riche recompense, car je vous aporte de joyeuses nouvelles, vostre femme Pasque de Riveri est heureusement accouchée d'une belle fille (3). i. e. "The Patriarch kept her in the most public manner, as a man does his wife, except that he did not live with him. And whenever the Patriarch went to church, she was in as rich and splendid a habit as if she had been an Empress or Queen, having her domestics before her; and when any persons, who did not know her, used, when they met her, to ask who that Lady was, people would answer, the Patriarchess, wife to the Patriarch. The reader is to know that her name was Pasque de Riveri, and that she had several children by the Patriarch. It is related that this Prelate being in Council when affairs of an important nature were debating, a madman happening to get into the room, ran up to him and said, Lord Patriarch, " get

(2) i. e. the widow to the merchant of Napoli in Syria.

(3) I give this passage, according to the copy I took of it, a long time since. I fear I have not always followed the orthography according to the printed book; and I have it not by me at this time to compare them.

from the Patriarch Heraclius, mentioned in the history of the Crusades, and who discovered so much animosity against Henry II King of England [D], when he found that this Prince did not care to go and succour Jerusalem in person. He was the chief of the embassy which the Princes of the holy Land had sent into the West to ask for succours; and he had undertaken in Palestine, to bring thither the King of England, or one of the three Princes his sons (b).

(b) Maimbourg, Hist. des Croisades, liv. 4. tom. 2. pag. 65. Dutch edit.

"get ready a handsome reward for me, for I bring you joyful news, Pasque de Riveri, your wife, is happily brought to bed of a lovely girl."

(4) Bongars Præfat. Gestorum Dei per Francos.

Bongars tells the same story in Latin, and more at large (4); for he says that the French Author who relates it, observes that this conduct of the Patriarch served as a pattern or example to others; and that the Priests, the Clerks and Monks, were so immersed in lewdness and adultery, that scarce so much as one woman was chaste in Jerusalem; and that Jesus Christ, seeing these obscene actions in the city where he had shed his blood, to redeem his people, would no more suffer them than those of Sodom and Gomorrah. For this reason he repurged it so thoroughly of this filthy practice, that of all those who were living in Heraclius's time, only two persons escaped imprisonment, when that city was taken by Saladine. The same Bongars quotes Marinus Sanutus, and Paulus Æmilius, the first of whom says, that the people used to give the name of Patriarchessi to Heraclius's concubine. Cui (Almerico) successit, Heraclius tam perniciosi exempli, ut precedentem ornatissimam mulierem quam publicè tenebat vulgus Patriarchissam vocaret (5). Paulus Æmilius asserts, that this Patriarch and his clergy led a dissolute life. Sacerdotes fuisse flagitiis sceleribusque obrutos: atque adeo ipsum Patriarcham neque caste neque integrè vitam egisse (6).

(5) Marinus Sanutus, lib. 3. Part 4. cap. 24. apud Bongars, Præf. Gest. Dei per Francos.

(6) Paulus Æmilius, de Rebus gestis Francorum, lib. 5. sub finem, apud eandem, ibid.

(7) Maimbourg, Hist. des Croisades, liv. 4. tom. 2. pag. 57. Dutch edit.

(8) Ibid. pag. 58. ad ann. 1185.

(9) Ibid. pag. 59.
(12) Ibid. pag. 63.

[D] It was he . . . who discovered so much animosity against Henry II, King of England.] This Prince, to expiate the crime he had committed, by occasioning the assassins of St. Thomas (a Becket) Archbishop of Canterbury, to murder that Prelate in his own church, had submitted to a penance of the Pope, by which he had bound himself to convey, in person, in three years time, a considerable succour to the Holy Land. Above ten years were elapsed since the time fixed upon, and yet this King did not prepare to fulfill his promise (7). This made Heraclius hope that he should be successful in his negotiation. He made an extremely pathetic speech to that Monarch, after presenting him with the keys of Jerusalem, and those of the Holy Sepulchre (8). He was made to hope that his request should soon be indulged, but the King did not keep his word with him. Henry consulted his Clergy, in order to enquire, if, in the present posture of affairs, it was incumbent on him to fulfill his promise; and submit to that part of the penance which the Pope had enjoined him, and to which he had solemnly bound himself (9). Heraclius the Patriarch was present in this assembly where this case of conscience was examined. "All the Bishops and Abbots . . . concluded unanimously, that not only the King was not then obliged to go to Palestine, but that it would be much better for the salvation of his soul, to continue in his dominions; because that the promise he had made, in submitting to the penance, from which he might, and even ought, to be dispensed, could not prejudice or interfere with that which is absolutely indispensable, and which he had taken at his coronation, viz. to rule his subjects with goodness and justice; and to defend them from the insults of foes both foreign and domestic, which it would not be possible for him to do during his absence, considering the state of affairs at that time. They all added unanimously with the Lords, that as to one of the King's sons who was demanded in his stead, the assembly could not come to any determination on that head, since they were absent; and that the resolution they were to take depended absolutely on them (10)." The Patriarch, "who was a very passionate man, was so exasperated at this resolution, that he had like to have spoilt all, by quite neglecting the respect and veneration he owed the King; and by treating him in such a manner as cannot be excused, what attempts soever may be made to cover it with the name and specious appearance of zeal (11)." He answered the King, who offered fifty thousand marks of silver for this war (12), "That they did not want his money, but his person; that they had more gold and silver than they desired; and that the only motive of their coming so far was, to look for a man who wanted money, in order for carrying on a war, advantageously, against the Infidels; and not to search for money, which should want or require a man who had the art of applying it advantageously in this war. By the way, added he, with a most insulting air, you have hitherto reigned with great glory; but know that God, whose cause you abandon, will now forsake you. To be persuaded of the truth of this, you need but compare the mercies he has indulged you, with the horrid crimes you have committed, and with which you have so ungrately repaid him. You have broke the faith that you owed to the King of France your Sovereign; and you now alledge that the war, which you are afraid he will declare against you, as a pretence for your refusal. You have caused the holy Archbishop of Canterbury to be murdered, and you now refuse to go and defend the Holy Land, after having most solemnly engaged in it upon the holy Sacrament. The Patriarch observing that the King, changing colour, redned with anger and indignation: "Do not imagine, continued he stretching out his neck towards him, that I fear the effects of that fury, which the truth you are told, but cannot bear, lights up in your soul. Behold my head; treat me as you have done St. Thomas; I shall be as well satisfied to die by your hand in England, as by that of the Saracens in Syria; and indeed you are little better than a Saracen (13)." The King bore all these words patiently, and continued to treat the Patriarch with great civility, even so far as to conduct him to his own ship at Roan, from whence he conveyed him to the frontiers, in order that he might be present at the conference which he had there, during three days, King; and which, with King Philip, concerning the Holy War (14). Heraclius returned back, without obtaining what he desired, and even without the succour that was offered him, and which his passion made him foolishly slight, contrary to all the rules of prudence and good sense, and to the great prejudice of his Sovereign's affairs: so greatly it concerns Kings not to abandon their interest to the discretion of those who have very little; and who very often are deprived, by the strong passions with which they are fired, of the little they have.

(10) Ibid. p. 61.

(11) Maimbourg, Hist. des Croisades, liv. 4. tom. 2. pag. 62. Dutch edit.

(12) Ibid. pag. 63.

(13) Maimbourg tells us, pag. 64. that the Patriarch said some things still more injurious to the King; and which, He adds he, I will not repeat.

(14) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 65.

HERALDUS (DESIDERIUS) in French Herault, a Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, has given good proofs of his erudition, by several works he published [A]. He disguised himself under the name of David Leidbrefferus, to write a political Dissertation on the independence of Kings (a), some time after the death of Henry IV. He died in June 1649, and left children [B]. Salmasius and our

(a) It was refuted by Joannes Eusebion the Jesuit.

[A] He has given good proofs of his erudition, by several works he published.] His Adversaria appeared in 1599. This is a little book which, if the Scaligerana may be credited, he repented the having published. His Notes on Tertullian's Apology, on Minu-tius Felix, and on Arnobius, have been esteemed. He also wrote notes on Martial's Epigrams.

[B] He left children.] Mr. Daillé (1), speaking of such Proteftant writers as condemned the executing Charles I, King of England, quotes the Pacificque royal 21. pag. 127.

our Heraldus wrote against one another [C].

en deuil, by Mr. Heraud. This Author, son to our Desiderius Heraldus, was a Minister in Normandy, when he was called to the service of the Walloon Church of London, under King Charles I; and he was so zealous a Royalist, that he was forced to return to France, to escape the fury of the Commonwealth's Men, who were displeas'd at his exhorting them to submit to their lawful Prince. He returned to England after the Restoration, and resumed his antient employment in the Walloon Church at London; some time after which he obtained a Canonry in the Cathedral of Canterbury, and enjoyed it till his death. I was lately told this by a person who had opportunities of being acquainted with his history. See also the last page of Bochart's Letter to Dr. Morley.

[C] Salmasius and our Heraldus wrote against one another. "An old, and very learned Counsellor, named Mr. Heraut (Desiderius Heraldus) is dead here. He was engaged in a quarrel with Salmasius, who had wrote against him, about four years since, Observationes ad Jus Atticum & Romanum. Heraut, who found himself injuriously treated in that book,

"was writing an answer to it in folio; but as he was snatched away by death, I believe it must be sold as it is, and an end put to it where the author found his own. He seem'd to be three score and ten. . . . He was looked upon as a very learned man, both in the Civil-Law and in Po'ite Literature, and wrote with great facility on any subject he might pitch upon (2)." I am informed by a letter of Mr. Sarrau (3), that Heraldus, after being silent twenty seven years, having looked over his papers at the request of his friends, was going to publish the work intitled de Autoritate rerum judicatorum. The piece he had prepared against Salmasius was printed in 1650. It is a folio volume, and intitled Quaestiones quotidiane, & Observationes ad Jus Atticum ac Romanum. There are two books, in the Bodleian Catalogue, ascribed to Hier. Herbarius, which were certainly misplaced by the Printers. They ought to have been put a little higher, under Desid. Heraldus. Here follow the titles of them; De rerum judicatorum autoritate Libri II, Paris 1640. Observationum & Emendationum Liber unus, ibid.

(2) Patin, Lettre 29. pag. 121. of tom. 1. dated Nov. 3, 1649.

(3) It was written in the year 1639. See Sarrau, vii, Epist. pag. 16.

HERBELOT (BARTHOLOMEW D'), a French Writer, eminent for his skill in the Oriental Learning, was born at Paris December the 4th 1625 of a good family. When he had passed through a course of polite Literature and Philosophy, he applied himself to the study of the Eastern Languages, especially the Hebrew, in order to understand the original text of the Old Testament. After a continual application for several years he took a journey into Italy, being persuaded that the conversation of the Armenians and other Eastern people, who frequent that country, would perfect him in the knowledge of those Languages. At Rome he was particularly esteemed by the Cardinals Barberini and Grimaldi, and contracted a strict friendship with Lucas Holstenius and Leo Allatius, two of the most learned men of the last age. Upon his return from this journey, in which he spent a year and an half, Monsieur Fouquet, Procureur General of the Parliament of Paris, and Sur-intendant of the Finances, invited him to his house, and gave him a pension of fifteen hundred livres. Though that Minister was disgraced soon after, yet our author was preferred to the place of Interpreter for the Eastern Languages. Some years after he took a second journey into Italy, where he gained so great a reputation, that persons of the highest distinction for their learning or rank, were solicitous of his acquaintance. Ferdinand II Grand Duke of Tuscany gave him extraordinary marks of his esteem. It was at Leghorn that Monsieur d'Herbelot had the honour of seeing the Duke for the first time. He had frequent conversations there with his Highness and the Prince his son, and they were so highly pleas'd with him, that they engaged him to promise to visit them at Florence. He arrived there July the 2d 1666, and was received by the Secretary of State, who conducted him to an house prepared for him, where he was entertained with great magnificence, and had a chariot kept for him at the expence of the Grand Duke. A Library being at that time expos'd to sale at Florence, the Duke desired Monsieur d'Herbelot to see it, to examine the manuscripts in the Oriental Languages, to select the best of them, and to mark the price. When this was done, that generous Prince purchased and made them a present to our author. These distinguished favours confer'd upon him might seem a reproach to France for suffering itself to be deprived of a person of his merit. But Monsieur Colbert, who had a great affection for men of learning, invited him to return to Paris, with assurances that he should receive the most substantial proofs of his esteem for him. The Grand Duke would scarce permit him to depart, and refused to consent till he had seen the express order of the Minister for his return. When he came to France the King often did him the honour of conversing with him, and gave him a pension of fifteen hundred livres. During his stay in Italy he began his Bibliothèque Orientale [A], which he finished in France. Whatever could not be insert'd in this work was digested by him under the title

of

[A] His Bibliothèque Orientale. He wrote this work at first in Arabic; and Monsieur Colbert had a design to print it at the Louvre with a set of types cast on purpose. But after the death of that Minister this resolution was wav'd, and Monsieur d'Herbelot translated his work into French, in order to render it of more extensive use. He committed it to the press, but had not the satisfaction to see the impression finished, for he died in the course of it. It was printed at Paris 1697 in folio under this title, Bibliothèque Orientale, ou Dictionnaire universel contenant generalement tout ce qui regarde la Connoissance des Peuples de l'Orient. Leurs Histories & Traditions veritables ou fabuleuses. Leurs Religions, sectes & politique. Leurs Government, Loix, Coûtumes, Mœurs, Guerres, & les Révolutions de leurs Empires. Leurs Sciences & leur Arts. Leurs Théologie, Mythologie, Magie, Physique, Morale, Médecine, Mathématiques, Histoire naturelle, Chronologie, Géographie, Observations Astronomiques, Grammaire, & Rhétorique. Les vies & actions remarquables de tous leurs Saints, Docteurs, Philosophes, Hijoriens, Poëtes, Capitaines, & de tous ceux qui se sont rendus illustres parmi eux par leur Vertu, ou par leur Savoir. Des Jugemens critiques & des Extraits de tous leurs Ouvrages, de leurs Traitez, Traductions, Commentaires, Abreges, Recueils, de Tables, de Sentences, de Maximes, de Proverbes, de Contes, de bons Mots, & de tous leurs livres, écrits en Arabe, en Persan, ou en Turc, sur toutes sortes de sciences, d'Arts, of Antologie; but this was never published, any more than a Turkish, Persian, Arabian, and Latin Dictionary, to which he had given the last hand, and some other works. It was in consideration of his extraordinary talents that Monsieur de Pontchartrain procured him, upon the death of Monsieur d'Auvergne, the place of Royal Professor of the Syriac Language. He died December the 8th 1695, aged seventy years, after a sickness of ten or twelve days. He was no less conversant in the Greek and Latin Learning than in the Oriental Languages and History. He was indeed an universal scholar; but what was most valuable in him, was, that his modesty was equal to his erudition. He never spoke of what he was a great master of, without being called upon by his friends; he was not the least dogmatical, nor preferred his own sentiments to those of others: he heard their reasons with patience, and answered with the utmost civility. His uncommon abilities were accompanied with the utmost probity, piety, charity, and other Christian virtues, which he practised through the whole course of his life (a).

(a) See his Eloge par Monf. Cousin, prefixed to our Author's Bibliotèque Orientale; Perrault, Hommes illustres, qui ont paru en France pendant le XVII^e Siècle, tom. 2. pag. 154-158. edit. Paris 1701, and Journal des Savans du 3 Janvier 1696.

d'Arts, & de Professions. Par Monfr. D'Herbelot. This work is a proof of the author's profound knowledge of the Eastern learning. It contains the substance of a great number of Arabic, Persian, and Turkish Books, which he had read; and informs us of an infinite multitude of particulars unknown before in Europe.

T.

HERBERT (EDWARD) Lord Herbert of Cherbury in Shropshire, an eminent English writer in the seventeenth Century, was descended of an antient family, and son of Richard Herbert Esq; [A], by Magdalen youngest daughter of Sir Richard Newport [B], and sister to Sir Francis Newport of High-Houll in Shropshire Knt. grandfather to Francis Lord Newport, Comptroller of the Household to King Charles II (a). He was born at Montgomery-Castle in Wales (b) in 1581, and was entered a Gentleman-Commoner of University-College in Oxford in 1595 [C], where he was put under an eminent Tutor, and laid the foundation of that admirable learning, of which he was afterwards master. Thence he betook himself to travel, and applied himself to military exercises in foreign countries, by which he became a most accomplished Gentleman (c). After his return he was made Knight of the Bath, when Prince Henry was installed Knight of the Garter (d), which was on the 2d of July 1603 (e); or on the 23d of that month, when sixty one Knights of the Bath were created, being the day before King James's coronation (f). He was afterwards one of the Counsellors to that King for military affairs (g); and was sent Embassador to Lewis XIII King of France to mediate for the relief of the Protestants of that Realm then besieged in several parts; but was recalled in July 1621 on account of a dispute between him and the Constable de Luines [D], but at his return he justified his conduct so effectually, that he was immediately

(a) Life of Mr. George Herbert. By Isaac Walton, printed with the Lives of Dr. Donne &c. by Mr. Walton, pag. 262, 263. 4th edit. Lond. 1675.

(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 262.

(c) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 117. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Walton, ubi supra, pag. 263. and Wood, Hist. & Antiquit. Universit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 65.

(e) Camdeni Apparatus Annalium Regis Jacobi I. subjoined to G. Camdeni & illustrium Virorum Epistol. pag. 2. edit. London 1691 in 4to.

(f) Idem, ibid. (g) Wood, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

[A] Descended of an ancient Family, a Son of Richard Herbert, Esq;.] Richard Herbert was the son of Sir Edward Herbert, Knt. son of Sir Richard Herbert, Knt. son of the former Sir Richard Herbert of Colebrook in the County of Monmouth, who was youngest brother of William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke in the reign of King Edward IV (1).

[B] Magdalen, youngest daughter of Sir Richard Newport.] Lloyd erroneously calls her Susan (2) This Lady having continued a Widow above twelve years, after the death of her first Husband Mr. Herbert, married a noble Gentleman, the brother and heir of the Lord Danvers, Earl of Danby. She was eminent for the excellent accomplishments of her body and mind, and highly esteemed by Dr. John Donne the Poet (3), who had a long and intimate friendship with her, and left a character of her in one of his Poems intitled, The Autumnal (4), which begins thus:

No Spring nor Summer Beauty hath such Grace,
As I have seen in one Autumnal Face.
Young Beauties force our Love, and that's a Rape;
This doth but counsel, yet you cannot scape.
If 'twere a shame to love, here 'twere no shame,
Affections here take Reverence's Name.

In all her Words unto all Hearers fit,
You may at Revels, or at Counsels fit.

He sent her likewise with a Letter dated at Micham, July 11. 1607 (5), several holy Hymns and Sonnets, and a Poem intitled,

To the Lady Magdalen Herbert, of St. Mary Magdalen.

" Her of your Name, whose fair Inheritance
" Betwix was, and jointure Magdalo,

" An active Faith so highly did advance,
" That she once knew more than the Church did " know,
" The Resurrection; so much Good there is " Deliver'd of her, that some Fathers be
" Loth to believe one Woman could do this;
" But think these Magdalens were two or three.
" Increase their Number, Lady, and their Fame;
" To their Devotion add your Innocence,
" Take no matter of th' Example, as of Name,
" The fo' lurch half; and in some Recompence,
" That they did harbour Christ himself, a Guest,
" Harbour these Hymns, to his dear Name address."

She died in the year 1627; and Dr. Donne preached her funeral Sermon at Chelsea near London, where she lies interr'd.

[C] Was enter'd a Gentleman Commoner of University College in Oxford.] This we are assured of by Mr. Wood (6), whose authority in these points is unquestionable. And therefore Mr. Isaac Walton is mistaken in asserting (7), that he was entered in Queen's College; 1721. confounding him with another of the same name, an Esquire's son of Montgomery, who was matriculated in that University as a Member of Queen's College in the beginning of July 1608, aged 17 years, and who appears to be the same, who was afterwards a Knight and Attorney General in the reign of King Charles I. (8.)

[D] Recalled in July 1621, on account of a dispute between him and the Constable de Luines.] Camden informs us (9), that he had irreverently treated the Constable Edw. Herbertus revocatur e Gallia, quod Luinum Constabularium irreverenter tractasset. Mr. Isaac Walton observes (10), that Sir Edward, while he continued at the court of France, " could not subject himself to a compliance with the humours of the Duke de Luines; who was then the great and powerful

(6) Alben. Oxon vol. 2. col. 117. 2d edit. London 1721.

(7) Pag. 266.

(8) Wood, col. 118.

(9) Annalium Regni Jacobi I. Apparatus, subjoined to G. Camdeni & illustrium Virorum Epistol. pag. 73. edit. London 1691 in 4to.

(10) Pag. 263.

ately sent back on his embassy. In 1624 he published his book De Veritate [E]. In 1625 he was advanced to the dignity of a Baron of the Kingdom of Ireland by the title of Lord Herbert of Castle Island; and in 1631 to that of Lord Herbert of Cherbury in Shropshire. After the breaking out of the civil wars he adhered to the Parliament (b), and on the 25th of February 1644 had "an allowance granted him for his livelihood, and having been spoiled by the King's forces (i)." Besides his History of the Life and Reign of King Henry VIII [F], which is greatly admired, and his book De Religione Gentilium,^{(i) White Locke, pag. 134}

(b) White Locke's Memorials of the English Affairs, pag. 105. edit. London 1732 and Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 117.

erful favourite at Court; so that upon a complaint to our King, he was called back into England in some displeasure; but at his return he gave such an honourable account of his employment, and so justified his comportment to the Duke, and all the court, that he was suddenly sent back upon the same Embassy." Lloyd relates the Affair in the following manner (11): Sir Edward, while he was in France, had private instructions from England to mediate a Peace for the Protestants in France; and in case of refusal, to use certain menaces. Accordingly being referred to de Luines the constable and favourite, he delivers to him the message, reserving his threatnings till he saw how the matter was relished. De Luines had concealed behind the curtain a Gentleman of the reformed Religion, who being an Ear-witness of what passed, might relate to his friends what little expectations they ought to entertain of the King of England's intercession. De Luines was very haughty, and would needs know what our King had to do with this Affair. Sir Edward replied, "It is not to you, to whom the King my master oweth an account of his actions; and for me, it is enough that I obey him. In the mean time I must maintain, that my master hath more reason to do what he doth, than you to ask why he doth it? Nevertheless, if you desire me in a gentle fashion, I shall acquaint you farther." Upon this de Luines bowing a little, said, Very well. The Ambassador answered, that it was not on this occasion only, that the King of Great Britain had desired the peace and prosperity of France, but upon all other occasions, whenever any war was raised in that Country; and this he said was his first reason. The second was, that when a Peace was settled there, the King of France might be better disposed to assist the Palatinate in the Affairs of Germany. De Luines said, We will have none of your advices. The Ambassador replied, that he took that for an answer, and was sorry only, that the affection and good will of the King his master was not sufficiently understood; and that since it was rejected in that manner, he could do no less than say "That the King his master knew well enough what to do." De Luines answered, We are not afraid of you. The Ambassador smiling a little, replied, "If you had said, you had not loved us, I should have believed you, and given you another answer. In the mean time, all that I will tell you more, is, that we know very well what we have to do." De Luines upon this rising from his chair with a fashion and countenance a little discomposed, said, By God, if you were not Monsieur the Ambassador, I know very well how I would use you. Sir Edward Herbert rising also from his chair, said, "that as he was the King of Great Britain's Ambassador, so he was also a Gentleman; and that his sword, (whereon he laid his hand) should give him satisfaction, if he had taken any offence." After which de Luines making no reply, the Ambassador went on towards the door; and de Luines seeming to accompany him, Sir Edward told him, that there was no occasion to use such ceremony after such language; and so departed, expecting to hear further from him. But no message being brought from de Luines, he had in pursuance of his instructions a more civil audience of the King at Cognac, where the Marshal of St. Geran told him, that he had offended the Conitable, and was not in a place of security there; to which he answered, "that he thought himself to be in a place of security wheresoever he had his sword by him." De Luines resenting the affront, procured Cadinet his Brother, Duke of Chaun, with a Train of Officers, (of whom there was not one, as he told King James, but had killed his man) to go as an Ambassador extraordinary; who misrepresented the affair so much to the disadvantage of Sir Edward, that the Earl of Carlisle, who was sent to accommodate the misunderstanding, which might arise between the two Crowns,

(11) Pag. 1018, 1019, 1020.

got him recalled until the Gentleman who had stood behind the curtain, out of regard to truth and honour, related all circumstances so, as that it appeared, that tho' de Luines gave the first affront, yet Sir Edward had kept himself within the bounds of his instructions and honours. He afterwards fell on his knees to King James before the Duke of Buckingham, requesting, that a Trumpeter, if not an Herald, might be sent to de Luines, to tell him, that he had made a false relation of the passages abovementioned; and that Sir Edward Herbert would demand satisfaction of him sword in hand. The King answered, that he would take it into consideration; but de Luines died soon after, and Sir Edward was sent again Ambassador to France.

[E] In 1624 he published his Book De Veritate.]

It was printed at Paris, and reprinted there in 1633 in 4to, and at London 1645 in 4to under the following Title: De Veritate, prout distinguitur a Revelatione, à verisimili, à possibili, à falso. Cui Operi additi sunt duo alii tractatus; primus de Causis Errorum: alter de Religione Laici. Una cum Appendice ad Sacerdotes de Religionibus Laici, & quibusdam Poematibus. Autore Edwardo Barone Herbert de Cherbury in Angliâ, & Castri Insulæ de Kerry in Hiberniâ, & Pari utriusque Regni. The Treatise de Veritate was translated into French, and printed at Paris in 1639 in 4to under the following Title: De la Verité en tant qu'elle est distincte de la Revelation, du Vraisemblable, du Possible, & du Faux, par Edward Herbert de Cherbury: traduit du Latin & augmenté par lui-même. In this Book our author asserts the doctrine of innate principles, and in his chapter de Instinctu naturali lays down these six marks of his Notiæ Communes. 1. Prioritas. 2. Independencia. 3. Universalitas. 4. Certitudo. 5. Necessitas, i. e. as he explains it, faciunt ad hominis Conservationem. 6. Modus Conformationis, i. e. Assensus nullâ interpositâ morâ. At the latter end of his Tract de Religione Laici, he says thus of those innate principles, Adde ut non uniuscujusvis Religionis Confinio ardeantur quæ ubique vigent Veritates: sunt enim in ipsâ mente calitas descriptæ nullisq; traditionibus, sive scriptis, sive non scriptis, obnoxia. And Veritates nostræ Catholicæ, quæ tanquam indubia Dei effata in foro interiori descriptæ. Thus having given the marks of the innate principles or common notions, and asserted their being imprinted on the minds of men by the hand of God, he proceeds to set them down, and they are these; 1. That there is some supreme Deity. 2. That this Deity ought to be worshipped. 3. That Virtue joined with Piety is the best Method of divine Worship. 4. That sins ought to be repented of. 5. That there will be rewards and punishments after this Life. Mr. Locke (12) observes, that tho' he allows these to be clear truths, "and such as says he, as if rightly explained, a rational creature can hardly avoid giving his assent to, yet I think he is far from proving them innate impressions in Foro interiori descriptæ." To which purpose he makes several reflections. Gassendi wrote a confutation of our Author's De Veritate at the desire of Peyrescius and Elias Diodati, and finished it at Aix; but as he did not publish it, he retouched it in 1641; and the Lord Herbert paying him a visit in September 1647, Gassendi was surprized to find, that this piece had not been delivered to him, for he had sent him a copy; upon which he ordered another copy to be taken of it, which that Nobleman carried with him to England. Gassendus's Tract is entitled, Ad Librum D. Edwardi Herberti Angli de Veritate Epistola, and is imperfect, some Sheets of the original being lost (13). It was printed after Gassendus's death in the edition of his works at Lyons 1658 in fol. Gassendi, lib. 2. Mr. Richard Baxter in his More reasons for the Christian Religion has likewise some reflections upon our Author's Book. ^{(12) Essay concerning human Understanding, lib. 1. cap. 3. (13) Vie de Pierre Gassendi, pag. 137. edit. Paris 1737.}

[F] His History of the Life and Reign of King Henry VIII.] It was printed at London 1649, 1672,

Gentilium, Errorumque apud eos Causis [G], both printed after his death, he wrote in 1630 Expeditio Buckinghami Ducis in Ream Insulam, published by Timothy Baldwin LL.D. and Fellow of All-Souls College in Oxford, at London 1656 in 8vo; and Occasional and 1683 in fol. and reprinted in the second volume of Kenner's Compleat History of England. In the Dedication to the King he observes, that this work took its first beginning from his Majesty's particular and unexpressed commands; and the parts thereof, says he, as fast as I could finish them, were lustrated by your gracious eye, and consummated by your judicious animadversions... I am not yet ignorant, that the King, whose history I write, is subject to more obliquies, than any since the worst Roman Emperor's times. But I shall little care for censure, as long as the testimonies I use do assure and warrant me; since I pretend not to describe him otherwise, either good or bad, but as he really was. Only where he holds any doubtful part, I conceive it will be but just to give a favourable construction. Mr. Wood tells us (14), that our author was assisted in collecting the materials for this history by Mr. Thomas Master, Fellow of New College in Oxford. "Four thick volumes in folio of such materials, says that writer, I have lying by me, in every one of which I find his [Mr. Master's] hand-writing, either in interlining, adding, or correcting, and one of those four, which is intitled Collectaneorum Liber secundus, is mostly written by him, collected from Parliament Rolles, the Paper-Office at Whitehall, Vicar General's Office, books belonging to the Clerk of the Council, MSS in Cotton's Library, Books of Convocation of the Clergy, &c. printed authors, &c. And there is no doubt, that as he had an especial hand in composing the said Life of King Henry VIII, (which as some say, he turned mostly into Latin, but never printed) so had he a hand in Latinizing that Lord's book De Veritate, or others." Archdeacon Nicholson tells us (15), that in this History our Author acquitted himself with the like reputation as the Lord Chancellor Bacon gained by that of Henry the Seventh. For in the public and martial part this honourable Author has been admirably particular and exact from the best records that were extant; though as to the Ecclesiastical, he seems to have looked upon it as a thing out of his province, and an undertaking more proper for men of another profession.

[G] His book De Religione Gentilium Errorumque apud eos Causis.] The first part was printed at London 1645 in 8°, and the whole in 1663 in 4to, and reprinted there in 1700 in 8vo. In 1645 he sent the manuscript of this book to Gerard John Vossius, as appears from a letter of his Lordship to that learned man dated from his house near Westminster on the 15th or 25th of August that year (16), and from Vossius's Answer dated at Amsterdam 3 Kal. Jan. 1645. (17). An English translation of this work by Mr. William Lewis was published at London 1705 in 8vo under the following title: The antient Religion of the Gentiles and Causes of their Errors considered. The Mistakes and Failures of the Heathen Priests and wise Men, in their Notions of the Deity and Matters of Divine Worship, are examined with regard to their being destitute of Divine Revelation. With a compleat Index. By the learned and judicious Edward Lord Herbert of Chisbury, &c. In the first chapter our author mentions the Occasion of the whole Work, and tells us, that when for a long time he had employed his most serious thoughts in considering whether any common means for the obtaining eternal salvation were so proposed to all mankind, that from thence we might necessarily infer the certainty of an universal divine providence, he met with many doubts and difficulties not easy to be solved. He found, that many of the Fathers of the Church had not only a mean opinion of the antient religion of the Heathens, but also condemned it. The Divines of the last age also pronounce as severe a sentence against all those, who are without their pale; so that according to their opinions, the far greatest part of mankind must be inevitably sentenced to eternal punishment. This appearing to our author too rigid to be consistent with the attributes of God, he began to consult the writings of the Heathens themselves. But when from their own histories he found that their Gods were often not only mere men, but also some of them most vile, and when he had observed that their religious worship, rites and ceremonies, were ridiculous and extravagant; he was very much inclined to be of the common opinion against them. But then again when he considered, that this was altogether incompatible with the dignity of an universal divine providence, he began to make a diligent enquiry, whether they meant the same by God as we now do. Now by God we understand a perfect, immense, and eternal Being: And he found, that with them it sometimes signified nature, or a certain imperfect, finite, and transitory power; so that not only heaven, the planets, stars, ethereal and aerial spirits, but also men who had deserved well of mankind in general, or their country in particular, were unanimously translated into the number of their Deities. Their Emperors likewise, some of whom were the worst of men, were deified in their life-time; and even the fever, fear, and paleness were esteemed Gods and Goddesses by them: so that they ascribed divine honour to whatsoever was above the common rank of mankind, or exceeded the apprehension of the vulgar. But still it is very evident, that wherever we find the attributes of Summus, Optimus, Maximus, they meant the same God and common Father with us. So that the word God being explained, the doubts which arise in comparing our God with theirs, will soon be cleared. But yet neither their religious worship or rites could ever make our author have an ill opinion of the common people, they being the invention of the Priests only; and therefore this might solely be imputed to their great men, and not to the populace, who were only passive in this affair. Our author thinks, that it cannot be denied, that Priests have introduced superstition and idolatry, as well as frowny quarrels and dissensions wherever they came. This inclined him not to make so rash and peremptory a determination concerning the future state of the Heathen Laity, as some Divines have done; they being only culpable for totally devoting and subjecting themselves to the authority of their Priests. Their great defection from the pure worship of the supreme God being justly to be attributed to the sacerdotal order, this put him upon the enquiry, whether amongst those heaps of Heathen superstitions a thread of truth might be found, by the assistance of which it was possible for them to extricate themselves out of that labyrinth of error, in which they were involv'd. Upon this five undeniable propositions immediately occurred, which all mankind in general must acknowledge. I. That there is one supreme God. II. That he ought to be worshipped. III. That virtue and piety are the chief parts of divine worship. IV. That we ought to repent of our sins. V. That the Divine Goodness dispenses rewards and punishments both in this life and after it. Our author observes, that the modern Divines were more considerate in their determinations concerning the souls of the Heathens; The most rigid, such generally as are least acquainted with learning in general, and especially polite literature, expressing themselves to this purpose: "that after the fall of Adam all mankind was formed and produced out of a degenerate mass. Some of them out of the good pleasure of God, and through the intervention of Christ's death were elected to eternal glory; but the far greater part, nay even those, who never heard of the name of Christ, were reprobated and determined to everlasting perdition; and the most innocent and irreproachable lives, which the Heathens could lead, will avail nothing, in regard their works were merely moral, and upon that account altogether insignificant." Now when our author perceived that they resolved the causes of salvation or damnation only into the good pleasure of God on the death of Christ; he found that their opinion was grounded not on reason, but on some peremptory decrees, which no person pretended to know; and he could not think these Divines to pry into the secret councils of God, as to establish any thing for certain. He left them therefore, as entertaining mean and unworthy thoughts of the Deity and mankind in general. Then he met with some other Divines, who asserted, that Christ was revealed to such Heathens, as led pious and honest lives, at the very moment of their death,

(14) Athen. Ox. vol. 2. col. 40.

(15) English Historical Library, Part 1. pag. 226. edit. London 1696 in 8vo.

(16) Vide Clavium Virocum ad Vossium Epist. num. CDX. pag. 272, 273. edit. London 1690 in fol.

(17) G. J. Vossii Epist. num. DV. pag. 435, 436.

casional Verses, published 1665 in 8vo, by his son Henry Herbert [H], and dedicated to Edward Lord Herbert, grandson of our author. We have likewise other occasional Poems of his in the books of other Writers, and particularly in that of Mr. Joshua Silvester, intitled, Lacrymæ Lacrymarum: or the Spirit of Tears distilled for the untimely death of Prince Henry. London 1613 in 4to. He died at his house in Queenstreet in London August the 20th 1648, and was interred in the Chancel of the Church of St. Giles's in the Fields, with an inscription upon a flat marble stone over his grave [I]. Christian Kortholt has ranked him, on account of his book De Veritate, with Hobbes and Spinoza, in his Dissertation, intitled, De tribus Impostoribus magnis, Edwardo Herbert, Thomâ Hobbes, & Benedicto Spinozâ, Liber: printed at Kilon 1680 in 4to, and at Hamburg 1700 in 4to. Wood tells us (k), "that he was a person well studied in the Arts and Languages, a good Philosopher and Historian, and understood men as well as books." And Mr. Lock (l) styles him a man of great parts.

(k) Athen. Oxon.
vol. 2. col. 117.

(l) Essay concerning Human Understanding,
lib. 1. cap. 3. § 15.

deaths, and so they were conveyed to paradise. But their opinion being neither founded on history, tradition, or rational conjecture, it appeared to him very improbable, though these Divines shewed much greater tenderness towards mankind. At last he consulted the schoolmen, to see if their sentiments concerning the Heathens were more just and regular; but they skipping from faith to reason, and then immediately again from reason to faith with wonderful agility, and being so very nice and subtle in their distinctions, he could not receive the least satisfaction from them. Amongst other axioms he found this an established one amongst them; Facientibus quod in se est, non desit gratia salutaris. i. e. "Saving grace is never wanting to those, who do all that is in their power." He had recourse then to other authors, but especially Crellius, a very learned man, who hath written concerning the state of the souls of the Heathens, and quoted several excellent passages upon this subject out of the most antient Fathers; by which our author found they were of opinion, that some of the best amongst the Heathens, through the infinite mercy of God, might be capable of eternal salvation. He soon embraced their opinion, not seeing how the doctrine of an universal divine providence, could be solved otherwise, than that some means should be afforded unto all men, by which they might come to God. And seeing that nature or common providence supplies us here with all things necessary and convenient for food and raiment; he could not conceive how the same God either could or would leave any man quite destitute, either by nature or grace, of the means of obtaining a more happy state. And though the Heathens did not make to good use of them as they might have done, yet the Deity is not in the least to be charged with their miscarriage. He knew it to be a generally received opinion, that common providence doth not afford sufficient means without the concurrence of grace and particular providence. But his design is to make it evident, that an universal providence is extended to all mankind. Now since the Heathens, as the scriptures testify, and learned Divines acknowledge, worshipped the same God as we do, had the same abhorrence of sin, and believed the rewards and punishments after this life; he could not but think, that after they had led a good life, they were made partakers of the fulness of that divine grace, especially in regard they knew the most rational and clear parts of the true divine worship.

[H] Occasional Verses, published at London 1665 in 8vo by his son Henry Herbert.] They were published under this title: Occasional Verses of Edward Lord Herbert, Baron of Cberbury and Castle-Island, deceased in August 1648. The Dedication is dated March the 18th 1667.

[I] With an inscription upon a flat marble-stone over his grave.] The inscription is as follows. Heic inhumatur corpus Edwardi Herbert Equitis Balnei, Baronis de Cberbury & Castle-Island, Auctoris Libri, cui titulus est, De Veritate. Reddor ut herbae, vicissimo die Augusti anno Domini 1648. T.

HERBERT (GEORGE), brother of the preceding, was an eminent English Poet and Divine. He was born at Montgomery Castle in Wales April the 3d 1593 (a), and educated in Grammar Learning at Westminster School, where he was a King's Scholar; and about the year 1608 was elected into Trinity College in Cambridge (b). In 1611 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and March the 15th 1615 was chosen Major Fellow of his College, and the same year became Master of Arts (c). In 1619 he was chosen Orator of the University; which office he held eight years (d); and during that time had learned the Italian, Spanish, and French tongues very perfectly; hoping, that he might in time (as his predecessors Sir Robert Naunton, and Sir Francis Netherfoll had done) obtain the place of Secretary of State, he being at that time highly esteemed by the King and the most eminent of the Nobility. This and the love of a Court-Conversation, mixed with a laudable ambition to be somewhat more than he then was, drew him often from Cambridge to attend his Majesty, wherever the Court was, who gave him a Sine Cure, which Queen Elizabeth had formerly conferred on Sir Philip Sidney, worth about a hundred and twenty pounds per ann. (e). His hopes of preferment at Court failing upon the death of the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton, he entered into holy Orders, and on the 15th of July 1626 was collated to the Prebend of Layton Ecclesia in the diocese of Lincoln by the Bishop of that See (f). About the year 1630 he married Jane, the daughter of Charles Danvers of Bainton in Wiltshire Esq; a near kinsman to the Earl of Danby (g). April the 26th the same year he was inducted into the Rectory of Bemerton near Sarum, to which he was presented by the King, upon the advancement of Dr. Curle to the Bishopric of Bath and Wells (h). Here he discharged the duty of his function in the most exemplary manner. We have no certain account of the exact time of his death; but it happened between the years 1630 and 1640. His Poems, intitled, The Temple, were printed at London 1635 in 12mo, and his Priest to the Temple; or the Country Parson's Character and Rules of holy Life, was published by Mr. Barnabas Oley at London 1652, and the third edition in 1675. He was highly valued by the most eminent persons of that age. Dr. Donne inscribed to him a copy of Latin Verses; and the Lord Bacon dedicated to him his Translation of some Psalms into English metre.

(a) Walton's
Life of Mr.
George Herbert, printed with the Lives of Dr.
John Donne &c.
pag. 262. 4th
edit. London
1675.

(b) Ibid. pag.
265.

(c) Ibid. pag.
272.

(d) Ibid. pag.
273.

(e) Ibid. pag.
277, 278.

(f) Ibid. pag.
281.

(g) Ibid. pag.
290.

(h) Ibid. pag.
291, 292, 293.

HERBERT

HERBERT (THOMAS), son of Christopher Herbert, and grandson of Thomas Herbert Alderman of York, descended from Sir Richard Herbert of Colebrook in Monmouthshire Knt. was born in York, and admitted a Commoner of Jesus College in Oxford in 1621, under the tuition of Mr. Jenkin Lloyd his kinsman. But before he took a degree, his uncle Dr. Ambrose Aikroyd, Fellow of Trinity College in Cambridge, brother to his mother Jane, daughter of Jo. Aikroyd of Folkerthorpe in Yorkshire, invited him to that College. He made but a short stay there, and went up to London to wait upon William Earl of Pembroke, who owing him for his kinsman, and intending his advancement, sent him to travel in 1626 at his expence. He spent some years in his travels in Africa and Asia, an account of which he published [A], and upon his return waiting on the Earl, the latter invited him to dinner the next day at Baynard's Castle in London, but dying suddenly that night (a), Mr. Herbert's expectations of preferment from him were frustrated; upon which he left England a second time, and visited several parts of Europe. After his return he married, and settling himself in his native country, prosecuted his studies. Upon the breaking out of the civil wars, he adhered to the interest of the Parliament, and by the endeavours of Philip Earl of Pembroke was appointed one of the Commissioners of Parliament to reside in the army of Sir Thomas Fairfax, and a Commissioner to treat with those of the King's party for the surrender of the garrison of Oxford. He afterwards attended that Earl, especially in January 1646, when he with other Commissioners were sent from the Parliament to the King at Newcastle about peace, and to bring his Majesty nearer London. While the King was at Holdenby, about May 1647 Mr. Herbert and James Harrington Esq, author of the Oceana, were appointed Grooms of his Majesty's Bed-chamber [B]; and the former attended on the King to his death. Upon the Restoration he was advanced by letters patent dated July the 3d 1660, to the dignity of Baronet by the name of Thomas Herbert of Tinterne in Monmouthshire, because Little Tinterne about half a mile from Tinterne Abbey was his own estate, and the seat of his grandfather Thomas Herbert (b). Besides his Threnodia Carolina, containing an historical account of the two last years of the Life of King Charles I [C], he wrote an account of the last days of that King,

(a) He died April 10, 1630.

(b) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 690, 691, 692. 2d edit. London 1721.

[A] An account of which he published. It was printed under the title of A Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the great Asia, especially the Territories of the Persian Monarchy, and some parts of the Oriental Indies, and Isles adjacent. London, 1634, 1638, and 1677, in Folio. This last is the fourth impression, and has several additions. This book was translated by Mr. Wicquefort into French, with an account of the revolutions of Siam in the year 1647. Paris, 1663, in 4to.

[B] While the King was at Holdenby, about May 1647, Mr. Herbert and James Harrington, Esq; author of the Oceana, were appointed Grooms of his Majesty's Bedchamber. Mr. Wood tells us (1), that when the King was settled at Holdenby, the Parliament Commissioners, pursuant to instructions, addressed themselves all together to his Majesty, and desired him to dismiss such of his servants as were there, and had waited upon him at Oxford. "This their application was in no wise pleasing to the King, he having had long experience of the loyalty and good affection of those his servants, as appeared by his countenance and the answer he made ere he gave the Commissioners any answer. Howbeit after some expostulation and deliberation, he condescended to what they proposed, they not opposing the continuance of Mr. James Maxwell's and Mr. Pat. Maule's attendance upon his royal Person, as Grooms of his Majesty's Bedchamber, in which place they had several years served the King. Next day his Majesty's servants came, as at other times; into the Presence-Chamber, where all dinner-time they waited, but after his Majesty rose from dinner, he acquainted them with what passed betwixt him and the Commissioners, and thereupon they all knelt and kissed his Majesty's hand, and with great expression of grief for their dismissal, they poured forth their prayers for his Majesty's freedom and preservation, and so left Holdenby. All that afternoon the King withdrew himself into his bedchamber, having given order, that none should interrupt him in his privacy. Soon after this his Majesty purposing to send a message to the Parliament, he after dinner called Philip Earl of Pembroke to him, and told him, that he would have Mr. Herbert come into his chamber; which the Earl acquainting the Commissioners with, Mr. Thomas Herbert, our Author, was brought into the Bedchamber by Mr. Maxwell, and upon his knees desired to know the King's pleasure. He told him, he would send a message to the Parliament, and having none there, that he usually employed, and unwilling it should go under his own hand, called him for that purpose. Mr. Herbert having wrote as his Majesty dictated, was enjoined secrecy, and not to communicate it to any, untill made public by both Houses, if by them held meet; which he carefully observed. This errand was, as I conceive, his Majesty's message for peace, dated from Holdenby, the 12th of May, 1647." About a week after the King told the Commissioners, that since Mr. James Levington, Henry Moray, John Ashburnham, and William Legge, were for the present dismissed, he had taken notice of Mr. James Harrington and Mr. Thomas Herbert, who had followed the Court from Newcastle, and having received satisfaction concerning their sobriety and education, he was willing to receive them as Grooms of his Bedchamber, to wait upon his person with Mr. Maule and Mr. Maxwell; which the Commissioners approving, they were that night admitted. Being thus settled in that honourable office, and in good esteem with his Majesty, Mr. Herbert continued with him, when all the rest of the chamber were removed, till his Majesty was brought to the block. . . . His Majesty, though he found him to be Presbyterianly affected, yet withall he found him very observant and loving, and therefore intrusted him with many matters of moment.

[C] His Threnodia Carolina, containing an historical account of the two last years of the Life of King Charles I. This was written by him in 1678, on the following occasion. The Parliament having a little before taken into consideration the appointing of seventy thousand pounds for the funeral of that King, and for a monument to be erected over his grave, Sir William Dugdale, then Garter King of Arms, sent to our Author, then living at York, to know of him, whether the King had ever spoke in his hearing, where his body should be interred. To this Sir Thomas returned a large answer, with many observations concerning his Majesty; which Sir William Dugdale being pleased with, desired him by another letter, to write a treatise of the actions and sayings of the King, from his first confinement to his death; which he did accordingly.

(c) Vol. 2. col.
693, & 697.

King, published by Mr. Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienses (c) [D], and at the desire of his friend John de Laet of Leyden, translated some books of his India Occidentalis; but was prevented by business from perfecting them. He assisted also Sir William Dugdale in compiling the third volume of his Monasticon Anglicanum. He died at his house in York March the 1st 168 $\frac{1}{2}$, aged seventy six years, and was interred in St. Cross Church in Fossegatestreet in that City, where a monument was erected to his memory by his widow Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Gervas Cutler of Stainborough in Yorkshire. His first wife was Lucia daughter of Sir Walter Alexander, servant to King Charles I, by whom he had issue Philip, Henry heir to his father, Montgomery, Thomas, William, &c. A little before his death he gave several manuscripts to the public Library at Oxford, and others to that belonging to the Cathedral at York; and in the Asmolean Museum at Oxford there are several Collections of his, which he made from the Registers of the Archbishops of York, given to it by Sir William Dugdale.

[D] Wrote an account of the last days of that King, published by Mr. Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienses. Mr. Wood observes (2), that about the same time that Sir Thomas wrote his Tbreadia Carolina, himself "having occasion to write to him for information (3) of certain persons then or about that time (3) attending the King, he thereupon sent him several letters in answer to his queries, with divers other matters by way of digression; which letters contain, as it seems, the chief contents of Tbreadia Carolina, and are several times quoted in this work (4). . . . With the said letters, which Mr. Wood received from Sir Thomas, he received from him an account of the last days of King Charles I of ever blessed memory, with an earnest desire, that if he should have any occasion to make mention of that most pious and good King, he would by no means omit him for these reasons: 1. Because in the said account there are many things, that have not yet been divulged. 2. That he was grown old, and not in such a capacity, as he could wish, to publish it. And 3. That if he should leave it to his relations to do it, they, out of ignorance or partiality, may spoil it. Upon his desire, and these reasons given, he [Mr. Wood] did then promise him to find some place to receive it in a work that he was then compiling, viz. Athenæ Oxonienses." We shall add here a copy of a very remarkable letter from our author to Dr. Samways, by whom it was sent to Dr. Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, and referred to in col. 524, line 73, Vol. II. of the Athenæ Oxon. Edit. 1692, and in col. 701, line 39, of the same volume, Edit. 1721. This letter was found in a copy of that book lately in the hands of the Lord Viscount Preston, and was communicated to us by the very learned Richard Rawlinson, LL.D. and F.R.S. It is as follows.

" Sir,

" After his late Majesty's remove from Windsor to St. James's, albeit according to the duty of my place I lay in the next room to the Bedchamber, the King then commanded me to bring my pallace into his chamber, which I accordingly did the night before that sorrowful day. He ordered what cloaths he would wear, intending that day to be as neat as could be, it being (as he called it) his wedding-day. And having a great work to do (meaning his preparation to eternity) said, he would be stirring much earlier than he used. For some hours his Majesty slept very soundly. For my part, I was so full of anguish and grief, that I took little rest. The King some hours before day drew his bed-curtains to awake me, and could by the light of a wax-lamp perceive me troubled in my sleep. The King rose forthwith, and as I was making him ready, Herbert, said the King, I " would know why you were disquieted in your sleep. " I replied, May it please your Majesty, I was in a dream. What was your dream, said the King? " I would hear it. May it please your Majesty, said " I, I dreamed, that as you were making ready, one " knocked at the Bedchamber door, which your Majesty took no notice of, nor was I willing to acquaint you with it, apprehending it might be Colonel Hacker. But knocking the second time, your Majesty asked me, if I heard it not? I said, I did, but did not use to go without his order. Why then go, know who it is, and his business. Whereupon I opened the door, and perceived that it was the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Laud, in his pontifical habit, as worn at Court. I knew him, having seen him often. The Archbishop desired he might enter, having something to say to the King. I acquainted your Majesty with his desire; so you bid me let him in. Being in, he made his obeysance to your Majesty in the middle of the room, doing the like also when he came near your person; and falling on his knees, your Majesty gave him your hand to kiss, and took him aside to the window, where some discourse passed between your Majesty and him, and I kept a becoming distance, not hearing any thing that was said, yet could perceive your Majesty pensive by your looks, and that the Archbishop gave a sigh; who after a short stay again kissing your hand, returned, but with his face all the way towards your Majesty, and making his usual reverences, the third being so submissive, as he fell prostrate on his face on the ground, and I immediately slept to him to help him up, which I was then acting when your Majesty saw me troubled in my sleep. The impression was so lively, that I looked about, verily thinking that it was no dream. The King said, my dream was remarkable, but he is dead; yet had we conferred together during life, it is very likely, albeit I loved him well, I should have said something to him might have occasioned his sigh. " Soon after I had told my dream, Dr. Juxon, then Bishop of London, came to the King, as I relate in that narrative I sent Sir William Dugdale, which I have a transcript of here, nor know whether it rests with his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, or Sir William, or be disposed of in Sir John Cotton's Library near Westminster Hall; but wish you had the perusal of it, before you return into the North. And this being not communicated to any but yourself, you may shew it his Grace, and none else, as you promised.

" Sir,

" Y[ork], 28
" Aug. 80.

" Your very affectioned
" Friend and Servant,
Tho. Herbert.
T.

HERCULES. There have been several heroes of this name [A], but he of Thebes was the most renowned, because the Greeks ascribed to him the actions achieved by the

[A] There have been several Heroes of this Name.] Cicero reckons six. Quamquam quem potissimum Herculem colamus scire sane velim, plures enim tradunt nobis ii qui interiores scrutantur & reconditas literas: antiquissimum Jove natum, sed item Jove antiquissimo; nam Joves quoque plures in prisca Græcorum literis invenimus. Ex eo igitur & Lyfite est is Hercules, quem concertavisse cum Apolline de tripode accepimus. Alter tra-ditur Nilo natus Ægyptius, quem aiunt Phrygiæ literas conscripsisse. Tertius est ex Idæis Dactylis, cui inferias afferunt. Quartus Jovis est, & Asteriæ Latonæ sororis, quem Tyrii maxime colunt, cujus Cartbaginem filiam ferunt. Quintus in India, qui Belus dicitur. Sextus hic ex Alcumena, quem Jupiter genuit; sed tertius Jupiter: quoniam, ut jam docebo, plures Joves etiam accepimus (1). i. e. " I want very much to be informed, " which

(1) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 26.

the rest, and have studiously affected to speak concerning him, according to the fabulous genius of their Nation. I intend to write of that Hercules only. He was looked upon as the son of Jupiter and Alcmena. I observed in other articles (a), in what manner that Lady was imposed upon by this God; and will not repeat that, nor what is found in Moreri. Our Hercules exerted prodigious strength, as well in the combats of Mars, as in those of Venus [B]. He also was a prodigious eater [C], of which

(a) See the articles ALCMENE and AMPHITRYO.

“ which of the Hercules’s it is we chiefly worship, “ for those who peruse secret History, declare, that “ there were several of this Name; the most ancient “ of all having sprung from Jove, and the most ancient “ of the Jupiters; for we find several of the Jupiters in old Greek Authors. ’Twas this Hercules, the son of Jupiter and Lyfeto, who is related to have had a contest with Apollo concerning a tripod. Another Hercules, an Egyptian, Nilus’s son, whom we are told was the inventor of the Phrygian Letters. A third descended from the Idæi Daëyli, to whom infernal rights are offered. A fourth Hercules was the offspring of Jupiter and Asteria, Latona’s sister, who is chiefly worshipped by the Tyrians, and who is said to have a Daughter called Carthage. There was a fifth in India, and who is named Belus; and a sixth, the son of Alcmena by Jupiter, but a third Jupiter; because, as I shall soon show, we are told of several Jupiters.” According to this account, the Egyptian Hercules would be but the third; however, the Egyptians gave him the first place (2). Diodorus Siculus (3), who speaks of three Hercules’s, declares him of Egypt to have been the eldest; and owns that a similitude of name and inclinations, was the reason why the acts of the others have been ascribed to the Theban Hercules, who was the youngest of them all. ’Tis said, that Varro reckons forty-four Hercules’s.

(2) Inde proximum annis (Nili) ut dicitur Herculi, quem indigenæ ortum apud se antiquissimum præbent, eoque qui postea pari virtute fuerit in cognomentum ejus adscito. Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 60.

(3) Lib. 3. fol. 52.

(4) Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 556.

(5) Pausan. lib. 9. pag. 302.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Έπειθε δὲ οὐκ ἔστιν ὄνομα ἡρώου-μας κισσῶν. Ηρακλῆα ἰσχυροῦτον ὄντα ἀνδρῶν οἴλου θυγατρὶ ἀφικνοῦμαι. Idem, ibid.

(9) Liv. 4. cap. 29.

(10) The father of these fifty girls is called Thestius by some, and Thestius by others.

(11) Vigenere, for Philostratus, tom. 1. pag. 98. edit. in 4to.

(12) Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 9.

[B] Our Hercules exerted prodigious strength, in the combats of Venus.] Some relate (4) that Hercules, in seven days, crott the virgin Flower of the fifty Daughters of Thestius; others (5) declare, that this business took up but one night; and add, that he had got each of them with child of a Boy; and that two of them, the eldest and youngest brought him each twin sons. According to some writers (6), the youngest would never consent to lose her maidenhead; but to punish her for this, he sentenced her to perpetual virginity, and would have her serve him as priestesses; and for this reason, a priestesses who was to live for ever a maid, was to officiate in Hercules’s temple in Thestis (7). Pausanias could not think, that Hercules could have been so prodigiously exasperated with the Daughter of his good friend (8); he therefore considered the sentence, which Hercules was said to have pronounced on her, as a very severe punishment. What he relates of the friendship which Thestius had for Hercules, agrees very well with what we read in Diodorus Siculus (9), viz. that Thestius (10) being desirous that his daughters might give him posterity, of which Hercules might be the father, invited him to a grand banquet, and regaled him in a very magnificent manner, and then sent him his fifty Daughters one after the other. Vigenere has said pleasantly enough, that this was the stoutest battle in which Hercules was ever engaged in his life (11); and yet the antients have not ranked this in the catalogue of his labours. It has been observed, that because he made war, sometimes in one country, and at other times in another, and was very fond of the fair sex, he had dispersed or settled women in different parts of the world, in order that he might have some for his purpose wherever he came. Lactantius had just reason to laugh at the Heathens, who had ranked in the number of their Deities, a man who left works of his uncleanness in all parts of the earth. Hercules . . . nonne orbem terræ quem peragrasset ac purgasset narratur, stupris, libidinibus, adulteriis inquinavit? nec mirum, cum esset adulterio genitus, Alcmenæ. Quid tandem potuit in eo esse divini, qui suis ipse vitiiis mancipatus, & mares, & Fœminas, contra omnes leges infamia, dedecore, flagitio, afficit (12). i. e. “ Did not Hercules, who is said to “ have travelled through the whole earth, and to have “ purged it from Monsters, defile and pollute it with “ whoredoms, with leud and adulterous actions? “ but this we are not to wonder at, since he sprung “ from Alcmena’s Adultery. Now what could there

“ be divine in him, who being himself a slave to vice, “ in opposition to all Laws, brought infamy, shame, “ and guilt on both sexes.” Arnobius has ridiculed the Heathens very agreeably, for supposing that nine nights were required for Jupiter to get a child; and that Hercules in one night’s time got fifty women with child. Quis illum (Jovem) in Alcmena novem noctibus fecit pervigilasse continnis? non vos? . . . Et sane adjungitis beneficia non parva: siquidem vobis Deus Hercules natus est, qui in rebus hujusmodi patris sui transfret exuperaretque virtutes. Ille noctibus vix novem unam potuit prolem extundere, concinnare, compingere: at Hercules sanctus Deus natus quinquaginta de Thestio nocte una perdocuit, & nomen virginitatis exponere, & genitricum pondera sustinere (13). i. e. “ Who declared that this Jupiter lay nine whole nights with “ Alcmena? was it not you? and you really make noble “ advantages result upon it; and from this embrace “ your God Hercules sprung, who greatly surpassed “ his father in such kind of feats. Jupiter could scarce “ get one child in nine nights; but the holy God “ Hercules, in a single night, not only deflowered “ Thestius’s fifty Daughters, but got them all with “ child.” It is to be observed that Thestius was frightened at this vigour of Hercules (14).

[C] He was a prodigious eater.] He boasted that he could eat more than any other man, and therefore was extremely vexed to meet with one who equalled him in that particular. He disputed the prize of voraciousness with one Lepreus, but did not win it (15). Each sacrificed an Ox; and as Hercules eat all his at a single meal, his antagonist exerted himself no less speedily and vigorously with regard to his victim. Lepreus ought to have stopt here; but he was so insolent as to challenge Hercules to engage him in another kind of combat, in a true Duel, in which he lost his life. I shall expatiate farther on this dispute, at the end of this remark. Here follows another Story. Hercules travelling with his wife, and young Hylas his son; and finding that the child was very hungry, he addressed a husbandman, and desired some victuals; however he got nothing, upon which he took one of the Oxen from the plough, sacrificed it to the Gods, and eat it (16). This canine appetite did not abandon him, even in Heaven, whence it is, that Callimachus exhorts Diana not to catch hares, but wild boars and bulls; because Hercules had not lost now he was among the Gods, that faculty he had of eating prodigiously when among men.

(13) Arnobius, lib. 4. pag. 145.

(14) Qualemquid vixit post crimina noctis, Thestius obstupuit scias fecer. Stat. Silv. 1. lib. 3. ver. 42.

(15) Pausan. lib. 5. pag. 151.

(16) See Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. 7. pag. m. 693, 694. Apollonius, lib. 2. pag. 145. does not say so much, and has not the same circumstances; but he owns that Hercules killed and eat the ox. The Scholiast on Apollonius, lib. 1. ver. 1220, says the same as Natalis Comes.

(17) Callimachus in Hymno Diana, ver. 159. pag. m. 78.

Οὐ γὰρ ὄγῃ Φρυγίῃ περὶ ἰπὸ δουρὶ γυνὴ θυαλίς Παιδαρτ’ ἀδραρυίης ἔτι αὖ σαπρὸν νδὲς ἐκείνη Τῆσσι ἀρ’ ἀρ’ ἰσχυρῶν συνώλ’ ἐθ’ Θεοδάμας (17).

“ Tho’ now a God, he is not less voracious, “ Than, when a man, in Phrygia’s blooming plains, “ He loos’d from Theodamas’s plough, the ox, “ And eat it at a meal.

Athenæus cites some verses of Epicharmus, which express admirably well the voraciousness of this hero.

Πρώτον μὲν αἰὲν ἔσθοντ’ ἰδὸς ἡν, ἀποβάσεις, Βράμῃ μὲν ὁ φάρογξ ἴσθδ, ἀραβὸν δ’ ἂ γυάθ. Φοῦν δ’ ὁ γόμφου, τήληγ’ ὁ κινόδου, Σίξῃ δὲ ταῖς ῥίνεσσι, κινὸν δ’ ἔαλα, τῶν τετραπόδων ἰδὸν ἦτορ (18).

(18) Athen. lib. 10. init.

“ Should you behold his furious meals, you’d die; “ Hear his jaws crash, and his swollen cheeks resound; “ The thunder of his grinders, and the roar “ Of his wide nostrils, see his moving ears.

He cites some other Poets to prove his position, viz. that Hercules was a prodigious great eater, ὅτι ἦν ἡ ὁ Ηρακλῆς ἀδραρυίης; and does not omit Lepreus’s competitor on. Here follows all he says of it.

Lepreus

which I shall relate some extraordinary particulars; as also of his mighty quaffing [D], for which he was no less remarkable. He displayed the voraciousness of his appetite, on an occasion that gave rise to a very singular ceremony, viz. that opprobrious expressions were always vented against Hercules, all the time that the inhabitants of Lindus were offering up sacrifices to him [E]. Some, from the strong love which Hercules had for wine wine

Leprus challenged Hercules to a gluttonous contest, and was overcome. Εἰσαίσιμος δὲ ὁ Ἡρακλῆς ἐκ Λαρκῆϊ πρὸς πολυφωγίας ἐρίζων ἰκτείνω παρακαλεσάμενος, καὶ πωλιεύου (19). i. e. "Hercules is brought in contending with Leprus, who had challenged him, for the prize of gluttony, on which occasion Hercules came off victorious." Zenodotus relates, that Hercules had put in chains Leprus, grandson to Neptune, after having cleaned the Augean stables: He set him at liberty after he had ended his labours, and then had three contests with him. They play'd at Quoits, they strove who should pump water with the greatest vigour, and who should have the soonest devoured an ox. Hercules came off victorious on all these occasions. At last Leprus being intoxicated with liquour, challenged Hercules anew, and was killed by him. Others relate, that they did not dispute who should eat most, but who should drink most; and that Hercules was victorious over Leprus (20). Others pretend that their contest was, who should soonest eat up a bull, and who should drink most (21). I shall relate some other particulars in the remark [H].

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Matris in Herculis Laudatione. Caucalus, Rbor Cbius, frater Theopompi Historiographi in Herculis Laudatione, apud Ath. ibid.

(21) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 1. cap. 24.

(22) Status, Tbeb. lib. 6. ver. 531.

(23) Q. Curt. lib. 10. cap. 4. num. 18. edit. Freinshem. See also Plutarch in Alexandro, sub fin.

(24) Seneca, Epist. 83.

(25) Diod. Sic. lib. 17. cap. 117.

(26) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 5. cap. 21. See Dempsterus in Rosinum, lib. 5. cap. 30. pag. m. 856.

[D] His mighty quaffing.] To be convinced of this, we need but consider the prodigious size of his goblet, which required two men to carry it; but as to himself, he wanted but one hand, in order to lift it up, and drink it off.

Huic pretium palmæ gemini cratera ferebant Herculeum juvenes. Illum Tyrrinthius olim Ferru manu sola, spumantemque oris supino Vertens seu monstri victor, seu marte solebat (22).

"The prize, a mighty goblet, by two youths
"Aloft was held; and Hercules of old,
"With ease oft carried it, with but one hand;
"And, from the field or labours when return'd,
"Could drink it off, tho' running o'er the brim.

It appears by the History of Alexander the Great, that in feasts in which the guests quaffed in an extraordinary manner, they all drank off a mighty cup, called the cup of Hercules. It was reserved for the close, as may be inferred from Alexander's not having drunk it, when he was taken sick at table. Nondum Herculis Scypho epoto repente velut telo confixus ingemuit (23), during a feast in which he before had drunk very copiously. Others say he had drunk it, and that it proved his fatal dose. Alexandrum . . . intemperantia bibendi atque ille Herculeanus & fatalis scyphus condidit (24). Diodorus Siculus relates, that Alexander having quaffed a great quantity, at last emptied Hercules's cup, and immediately fell into a swoon (25). To reconcile these several variations, I believe it must be supposed that the Monarch in question was struck as he was drinking off this cup, and before he had drunk it off. The Historian in question observes, that this cup of Hercules was of a vast size. But what can be more express, with regard to this subject, than the following words of Macrobius? Scyphus Herculis poculum est, ita ut Liberi patris tantbarus: Herculem vero pictores veteres, non sine causa cum poculo fecerunt & nonnunquam casabundum & ebrium, non solum quod is heros bibax fuisse perhibetur, sed etiam quod antiqua historia est Herculem poculo tanquam navigio ventis immensa maria transisse. Sed de utraque re pauca ex Græcis antiquitatibus dicam, & multisibum Heros istum fuisse, ut taceam quæ vulgo nota sunt, illud non obscurum argumentum est, quod Ehippus in Busrude inducis Herculem sic loquentem, &c. (26). i. e. "Hercules's cup is the scyphus, as the cantharus is that of Bacchus. It was not without reason that the ancient Sculptors represented Hercules holding a cup, and sometimes reeling and drunk; not only because the hero in question is said to have been a quaffer, but also because we are told in ancient History, that Hercules failed over boundless seas in a cup, as though it had been a "ship. But I will present my readers with a few particulars concerning both, from the Greek antiquities. With regard to Hercules's being a mighty quaffer, not to mention what is commonly known, we have no ill proof of this, where Ehippus, in his Busris, introduces Hercules speaking as follows, &c." Athenæus seems to denote the capacity of this cup, he saying (27), that that which killed Alexander, held two congiarii or gallons. We learn a very remarkable particular from Stefichorus the Poet. He says that Pholus drunk a health to Hercules in a pitcher holding twenty four pints. Centaurorum & Lapitharum convivium describens (Stefichorus) ait Pholum (quem propterea hospitem Alcidae nuncupat Lucanus) implevisse Herculi craterem trium lagenarum capacem, quem prior ipse obbibisset: amplum autem fuisse oportuit, qui urnam, hoc est, quatuor & viginti sextarios caperet (28). He drank it off first, and was pledged a moment after by Hercules.

(27) Lib. 10. cap. 9. pag. 434.

(28) Hadrian, Junius, Animadvers. lib. 4. cap. 5. pag. m. 410.

Σκυφίον δὲ λατῶν δῖπας ἤμασιρον ὡς τριτάγωνον Πῦν ἐπισχόμενον, τὸ ρά οἱ παρῆθεν Φόλον κειράσας (29).

(29) Apud Hadrian, Junium, ibid.

Hercules (de eo enim loquitur) acceptum in manus scyphum plenum, trium lagenarum capacem, ori admoventes obbibit, quem Pholus ipsi infuderat.

"He took the mighty cup, which Pholus fill'd
"With three Lagenæ, and at once quaff'd off
"The glorious bumper."

Athenæus explains after a very probable manner, the reason, why the Poets feigned that Hercules crossed the sea in a cup. This fiction, says he, in all probability took its rise, from the pleasure this hero took in drinking out of large glasses, Μήσωςι μεγάλοις ἔχμασι πωλιεύου ὁ ἦρας, δια τὸ μέγιστον πωλιεύου οἱ ποιηταὶ ἐκ συγκραφίης ὡς αὐτὸν ἐν πωλιεῖω ἰμυβολόγησαν (30). Poculis fortasse, quia heros amplis gaudebat, per jocum scriptores, ac Poetæ, cum in poculo navigasse fabulati sunt; for he was a mighty drinker: Ὅλι δὲ εἰς ἦν ὁ Ἡρακλῆς τῶν πλῦτων πινόντων ποσειδέων (31). Bibacem inter alios Herculem fuisse antea nos memoravimus.

(30) Athen. lib. 11. pag. 496.

(31) Idem, ibid.

[E] Opprobrious expressions were always vented against Hercules, all the time that the inhabitants of Lindus were offering up sacrifices to him. I related above, that Hercules eat up an ox which he had taken from a peasant; but I shall add here, that the peasant, all the time he was devouring the animal, vented the most opprobrious expressions against him, which was only a diversion to Hercules; so that when an altar was erected to his honour, he would have this peasant to be his priest, and commanded him to repeat the same curses, every time that sacrifices should be offered up to him; for, did he use to say, I never in my life eat with a better appetite. Lactantius relates this incident at large. Apud Lindum, quod est oppidum Rhodi, Herculis sacra sunt, quorum à cæteris longo diversus est ritus. Si quidem non ὠφνημία, ut Græci appellant, sed maledictis, & execratione celebrantur, eaque pro violatis habent, si quando inter solemnes ritus vel imprudenti alicui exciderit bonum verbum. Cujus rei hæc ratio redditur, si tamen ulla esse ratio in rebus vanissimis potest. Hercules, cum eo delatus esset, famemque pateret, aratorem quendam aspexit operantem, ab eoque petere cepit, ut sibi unum bovem venderet. Ille negavit fieri posse, quia spes sua omnis colendæ terræ duobus illis jumentis niteretur. Hercules solita violentia usus, quia unum accipere non potuit, utrumque sustulit. At ille infelix, cum boves suos mactari videret, injuriam suam maledictis ultus est, quod homini eleganti & urbano gratissimum fuit. Nam dum comitibus suis epulas apparat, dumque alienos boves devorat, illum sibi amarissime conviciantem, cum risu, & cachinnis audiebat. Sed postquam Herculi divinos honores ob admirationem virtutis deferri placuit, à civibus ei ara posita est, quam de factis βοῦλεγον, id est bovis jugum nominavit; ad quem duo juncti boves immolarentur, sicut illi, quos abstulerat aratori, wine and women, have denied his atchieving the noble exploits ascribed to him [F]. A very particular circumstance is told concerning the greediness with which he devoured his victuals, it being said, that the motion on these occasions made his ears move (b). This is a very rare and uncommon thing [G]. I fancy it is a mistake to assert, that Hercules

(b) See the remark [C].

aratori, eumque ipsum sibi constituit Sacerdotem, ac praecepit, ut iisdem maledictis semper in celebrandis sacrificiis uteretur, quod negaret, se unquam epulatum esse jucundius (32). i. e. "In Lindus, a city of Rhodes, there are offered up, to Hercules, rites which differ greatly from those used in other places. For these rites are not performed with praises, but with curses; and they would be thought to be profaned, should a good or virtuous word slip inadvertently from any person who was present at the solemnity, for which the reason is given, if there can be any reason in such trifling practices. Hercules, as it is related, coming that way, was hungry, when seeing a countryman ploughing, he desired him to sell him an ox. The countryman replied, that he could not oblige him on that occasion, because those oxen were the only cattle he had to plough with. Hercules employing his usual violence, since he could not be favoured with one ox, took them both away. The unhappy peasant, seeing his oxen slaughtered, took his revenge by curses, which were exceedingly pleasing to the elegant and polite Hercules; for whilst he was preparing this entertainment for his companions, and was devouring the cattle which did not belong to him, he laughed at, and ridiculed the ill-fated owner, who was cursing him in a most bitter manner. But when it was afterwards judged proper, in admiration of the virtues which Hercules possessed, to pay him divine honours, the inhabitants of that city erected two altars to him, which he, from the action itself, called the yoke of oxen. Here two yoked oxen were to be offered, as were those which he forced from the peasant, whom he constituted his priest; and commanded him to employ always the same kind of curses in solemnizing the sacrifices, Hercules declaring that he had never in his life feasted with greater delight."

(32) Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 21. pag. m. 70. See also Conon, apud Photium, pag. 429.

[F] Some have denied his atchieving the noble exploits ascribed to him.] Megacles in Athenæus, censures the Poets who came after Homer and Hesiod, for their saying that Hercules had commanded armies and taken cities, since it is certain that he led a very voluptuous life, having several lawful wives, and getting a very great number of young-women with child clandestinely, Ὅς μὲν ἰδοῦντας πλείους τὸν μετ' ἀνδράπων βίον διτίλειται πλείους μὲν γυναικίας γήμας, ἐκ πλείων δὲ λάθρα παρδίνων αἰδοσαμένων. Cum maxime voluptariam inter homines vitam egerit, plurimarum uxorum maritus, & puellis quam multis compressis, è quibus suscepit liberos (33). Besides, he was a great lover of good eating and drinking; so that after his example, those who offered libations to him, quite emptied the glasses, and did not leave so much as a drop. Other proofs were brought (34) of his softness and effeminacy; and it was pretended that Stefichorus first armed him with a club, a bow, and a lyon's skin. We meet with one particular in Erasmus, which strongly opposes the tradition concerning Hercules's effeminacy. It is in the explication of the proverb, beware of the man with the black buttocks (35). Erasmus tells us, that a mother gave this caution to her two sons, who were unlucky rogues. They were for attacking Hercules as he was sleeping under a tree; but he awaked, and tied them to his club (36), and threw them over his shoulders with their heads downward. By this posture they discovered that Hercules's back was very hairy, and that the hair was very black and thick; a circumstance which made them call to mind their mother's caution, and forced a laugh from them. Hercules being told what they laughed at, gave them their liberty. The words of Erasmus which I am to cite are these: Melampygos Græcis significat eum qui nigro sit podice: quo quidem cognomento notatus est Hercules quod eam corporis partem, non Lydorum more vulsam, neque candidam (quemadmodum effæminati solent) sed nigris pilis hirsutam ac sylvosam haberet. Nam Græci quemadmodum molles & imbelles, fraetiosque delicias, πυργόγγυς ἢ λυκοπόγγυς appellant; itidem è diverso fortes ac strenuos,

(33) Athen. lib. 12. cap. 1. pag. 512.

(34) Idem, ibid.

(35) Μὴ τῷ μελαμπύγῳ πύργου. It is the 43d proverb of Century 1. of the second Chi-liad in Erasmus.

(36) See Moreri under the word Achemen.

μελαμπύγγος vocare consueverunt, ut auctor est Lycophronis interpres. i. e. "Melampygos signifies, among the Greeks, one who has black buttocks, which surname was given to Hercules, because that part of his body was rough and shaggy, with black hair, and not shaved after the manner of the Lydians, nor white as effeminate people are. For as the Greeks call'd the effeminate and weak, and such as immersed themselves in luxury white-breech'd: so, on the contrary, they commonly gave the name of black-breech'd to the valiant and strong, as we are told by the interpreter of Lycophon." See Suidas under the article μελαμπύγγος τυχούς, in Melampygon incidat. See also Apostolius, Zenobius, Diogenianus, in their collections of proverbs.

[G] This is a very rare and uncommon thing.] The Journal of the Academia Naturæ curiosorum (37) mention a maiden whose ears moved. The author of Nouvelles de la republique des Lettres, giving the extract of this Journal, observed (38) that there was no room to doubt of this singular particular, after what Abbé de Marolles attests concerning Crassot the Philosopher, pag. 32 of his Memoirs. "He very much resembled, says he, the portraits of those Cynical Philosophers, which are found in the cabinets of the curious, he being slovenly like them; having a long and bushy beard, and his hair neglected and uncombed. There was one thing very peculiar in him, which I never saw in any other person; and this was, he could move his ears up and down without touching them." Peter Messie relates in the 24th chapter of part I, that St. Austint had seen (39) a man, who not only mov'd his ears at pleasure, but also his hair, without making the least motion either with his hands or head. Give me leave to join to this some collections which bear a relation to it. I shall begin with a pretty long passage from Casaubon (40). Istud planè communi hominum naturæ contrarium est; quibus [solis (41) ex omnibus animalibus (nisi forte simias excipias)] dedit aureis ἢ πωλοπόκιλος τῷ ΘΕΟΥ σοφία moveri suapte sponte nescias. [Nam quod scribit Martialis, Cinnae cuidam natum filium auribus longis Quæ sic moventur ut solent Asellorum: poetica sine dubio licentia est, non rei veritas.] Narrat tamen Eustathius sacerdotem fuisse quendam aureis motantem. Accipimus etiam à viris fide dignis, visas manifeste aures movere viro cuidam eruditissimo (42) cum Allbrugum fides transiens, vivicomburii periculum sibi à magistratu imminere intellexisset, quod diceretur nefandi criminis reus Tolosa in Italiam fugere. i. e. "This interferences directly with the common nature of men, to whom only of all animals, unless apes ought to be excepted, Heaven has given ears which move of themselves. For what we find in Martial concerning the son of one Cinna, who had long ears which moved like those of asses, it is doubtless a poetical fiction, and not a true incident. Nevertheless Eustathius tells us that a certain Priest moved his ears. I have also been told by persons worthy of credit, that the ears of a certain man of learning were plainly seen to move, when travelling by the borders of Savoy, he found that he was in danger of being burnt alive by the magistrate, on its being reported that he was flying into Italy from Thouloufe, because he had perpetrated a heinous crime." Since Casaubon does not doubt the truth of Eustathius's report, nor what had been told him concerning the learned man who had fled from Thouloufe, why does he doubt what relates to Cinna's child, in the 39th epigram of the 6th book of Martial? He would have less doubted it had he taken notice, not only of what St. Austint relates in Chap. XXIV, Book XIV, De civitate Dei: sunt qui & aures moveant vel singulas vel ambas simul. i. e. "Some people move their ears either singly or together:" but also what is attested by Vesalius. This great anatomist affirms (43), that he saw, in Padua, two men whose ears moved. He explains the cause of this motion in another place. Interdum, says he (44), quibusdam raris fibris carnalis membrana quam carnosam vocamus supra aures augetur, & modice auri

(37) In the volume for anno 1685.

(38) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for September 1686, pag. 1021.

(39) St. Austint's words, cited below, do not denote that he had seen this, and therefore Father Hardouin in Plin. lib. 11. pag. 543. should not have said, quæ vidis Augustinus.

(40) Casaubon, in Athen. lib. 10. cap. 1. pag. 702.

(41) This is extracted from Aristotle, μέγρον ἀνθρώπου οὐς οὐ κινεῖται, says he, lib. 1. Hist. Animal. cap. 9. Pliny in like manner, Aures homini tantum immobiles, lib. 11. cap. 37.

(42) It is a little probable, that An honny Muretus is hinted at here.

(43) De humani Corporis Fabrica, lib. 2. cap. 13. apud Coquezum.

(44) Ibid. cap. 17. apud eundem Coquezum, ibid.

Hercules would be drawn in this attitude, in one of his most famous portraits [H]. It is false to assert, that his club was in a chapel at Rome [I], and that it drove away from thence auri proximam cutem, & ipsam quoque aurem motu agit arbitrio. i. e. "Sometimes by means of certain delicate fibres, the fleshy membrane, call'd by us Carnosa, is stretched above the ears, and gives the skin next the ear, and the ear itself, an arbitrary motion. Du Laurent affirms, that he had seen some persons, who gave motion to their ears (45). Valverdu saw a Spaniard do the same in Rome (46). Procopius compares Justinian "to an ass, not only on account of his dulness and stupidity, but likewise because of his self-moving ears, whence he was called, in a full theatre, γαυδων, that is to say, word for word, master-ass, by those of the green faction or Prasini, to which he was an enemy." I read these words in la Mothe le Vayer, pag. 134 of tom. 3 in 12mo. He cites pag. 36 of Procopius's secret History.

[H] It is asserted that Hercules would be drawn in this attitude in one of his most famous portraits. This is told by Costar, in his Dialogues. Here follows the sequel of what he there says concerning Hercules. In the Anthologia a peasant "highly applauds Mercury's moderation, for being satisfied with milk and fruits; and complains against Hercules, for requiring a considerable number of sheep and oxen in sacrifice. And being told; But this God preserves your flocks so well. What difference is there, replied he, whether my flocks are devoured by wolves, or by their keeper?"

--- Τι τὸ πλῆθος ἢ τὸ φυλακτὸν Ὀλλυται ὑπὸ λύκων ἢ ὑπὸ τῆ φυλακῆς (47).

(45) Laurent. lib. 11. Hist. Anat. cap. 12. apud eundem, ibid. I have verified this passage.

(46) Valverdu, lib. 2. Anatomie Corporis Humani, cap. 2. apud eundem, ibid. I correct Coquerus, who calls him Valvardus.

(47) Entretiens de Voiture & de Costar, pag. 32.

Voiture thus answers Costar. "It is true indeed that Hercules eat gladly of sheep, and devoured a great number of them. The Argonauts in their voyage to Colchos, put him ashore on an island. Many pleasant reasons are given for this: some say that it was because he broke all the oars as he rowed; others, because he was too weighty; some, because the Argonauts were afraid that he alone would carry away all the glory; and others again because he eat too much. I remember to have read in a Greek Poet (that is to say Greek and Latin) that he moved his ears as he eat, &c. (48)." Costar answering his friend, says to him that Hercules eat like a Devil, and that, according to Athenæus, . . . he had an ox at every meal. He cites Philostratus in his picture of Theodamas. We there find the following words according to Vigenere's version, page 906 of vol. I. "You perhaps found it in Pindar, where having fought in Coronus's hovel, he eat up an ox so compleatly, that he did not even think, that the bones ought to be left." Costar cites also Lactantius, in chapter 21 (50) of the Christian Institution. It is to inform his friend of the ceremony of the execrations which were vented by the Lyndians, when they offered up their sacrifices to Hercules. He tells him, that in this case Hercules was of the same humour with fortune, which is never had in so much honour as when she is reviled; and that she is accused of occasioning all the changes and disorders which happen in the world, cum convitiis colitur, this is an expression of Pliny's (51)." He adds that this "Beef-eater (for thus he was firnamed βεφαγῶ and βετῶν) was so renowned for his voraciousness, that the antients consecrated to him a bird call'd by them glutton; it is that which is called in French Foulque, in Latin Gavia or Furica, and in Greek λαίη. One might say of him, continues he, as Martial says of Tucca, viz. that he was not satisfied with being a glutton, but would have every one know, and speak of it.

Non est Tucca satis, quod es gulosus, Et dici cupis, & cupis videri (52).

(48) Ibid. pag. 38.

(49) Ibid. pag. 55.

(50) He should have added of book 1. Besides, this work of Lactantius is not intitled, Christian Institution, but Divine Institutions. Vigenere mistook Costar.

(51) These words of Pliny are in chap. 7. of book 2. but they do not signify, that Fortune is never so much honoured as when she is exclaimed against.

(52) Martial, lib. 12. Epig. 41.

And indeed, he once revealed himself to Parrhasius the painter, in the same state he was in, when his ears moved; and he would be painted in the same attitude in which Theodamas had seen him. He cites, with regard to this apparition, the twelfth book of Athenæus; and observes that in Pliny, lib. 35, cap. 10, one Demon, an Athenian painter, boasts his having painted Hercules in the city of Lindus, exactly as he had seen him in his slumbers. He carried this boasting so far, as to put it into the inscription of the picture Οἷος δ' ἰνὸν χιόν φαντάζετο πολλὰκι φοιτῶν Παρρῆσιω δὲ ὕπνῳ, τοῖσ' ὁ δ' εἰν ὄρῳ. Qualem noctu videntur se objiciebat dormienti Parrhasio, talem hic videre licet (53); but it does not follow from thence, that he ascribes to Hercules that self motion of the ears mentioned by Costar. is a strange boldness to affirm, 1st, that we find in Athenæus that Hercules appeared to Parrhasius in the same state he was in when his ears moved; 2dly, that Theodamas had seen Hercules in that very attitude; but these two errors are inconsiderable in comparison of the blunder I shall here take notice of. Here follow Pliny's words. Pinxit Demon Atheniensium, argumento quoque ingenioso. Volebat namque varium, iracundum, injustum, inconstantem; eundem exorabilem, clementem, misericordem, excelsum, gloriosum, humilem, ferocem, fugacemque, & omnia pariter ostendere. Idem pinxit Thesea, . . . & in una tabula quæ est Rhodi, Meleagram, Herculem, Persea (54). i. e. "He painted the people of Athens, and that after a very ingenious manner; for he drew them fickle, passionate, unjust, and inconstant; and, at the same time, exorable, merciful, haughty, humble, fierce and cowardly. The painter in question drew likewise Theseus, . . . and in one picture, which is in Rhodes, Meleager, Hercules, and Perseus." Pliny here enumerates the works of Parrhasius; the word Demon signifies the people of Athens, whose opposite passions Parrhasius had represented after an ingenious manner. Here Costar metamorphoses this picture of Parrhasius into a painter: and pretends that this chimerical painter ascribed to himself the picture of Hercules, where that hero moved his ears. But this is a new blunder; for supposing Demon to be a Painter, no other picture could be ascribed to him but that picture, which was at Rhodes, viz. the picture where Meleager, Hercules, and Perseus had been painted, and which Pliny distinguishes plainly from the Hercules that was in Lindus, which was exhibited agreeable to the painter's dream; & Herculem, qui est Lindi, talem à se pictum, qualem sæpe in quiete vidisset (55). But if we are for ascribing the Hercules of Lindus to the pretended Demon, we must also ascribe to him the greatest part of Parrhasius's pictures.

(53) Athen. lib. 11. pag. 544.

(54) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 10. pag. m. 202.

(55) Idem, ibid. pag. 204.

[I] It is false to assert, that his club was in a chapel at Rome. A famous protestant divine has writ as follows (56). You shall frequently hear in our Temples Atheism and Error combatted and trampled on: Those villon des Maximepests are drove from them by the odour of the word of God, which is there preached in its purity; as anti-main des Provinces ently, in Rome, Hercules's Club used to drive out Dogs and Flies from the chapel where it was. He quotes the second chapter of Solinus, where nothing like this is found; but here follows what he says in Chapter I. Hoc sacellum Herculi in boario foro est, in quo argumenta & convivii & majestatis ipsius remanent. Nam divinitus illo neque canibus neque muscis ingressus est. Etenim cum viscerationem sacrificolis daret, Myiagram deum dicitur imprecatum, clavam vero in aditu reliquisse, cujus olfactum refugerint canes: id usque nunc durat: i. e. "This little Temple dedicated to Hercules, stands in the Forum Boarium, and proofs still exist in it both of the sacrifices and majesty of the God; for by his divine power neither dogs nor flies enter it, and when he gave the bowels to the priest, it is said that he prayed to the God Myiagrus, and left in the entry his Club, the smell whereof drove away Dogs; and this continues to this present time." It is plain Solinus does not affirm that Hercules's Club was still there; he saying only, that Hercules had left it in the entry of that place, where he gave the priests an entertainment after the sacrifice; and that the smell of this Club drove away Dogs. Such was the effect the Club had; but as to the Flies, they were not repulsed by the Club, but by the prayers which Hercules offered up to the God Myiagrus. What was observed on this occasion, viz. that the Flies and Dogs kept at a distance from that place, continued in the whole series of succeeding ages. This is what Solinus says; but it was not necessary that the Club should be preserved in the chapel, nor does Solinus say so. If the incident abovementioned related by the protestant Minister had been true, this Club might have been ranked among the Talismans; and be compared thence dogs and flies; and it is a still falser assertion to maintain, that he set up pillars at the Cape called Finesterre [K], and there lodged a mirror or looking-glass which had an astonishing property [L]. Some writers say, that he lived but till fifty years of age; and that he then consumed himself in the flames, because he no longer had strength to bend his bow [M]. He was the last child that Jupiter had by any mortal woman [N].

It

compared to the Fly, which we are told, is engraved on the Door of the Shambles in Toledo, and which keeps flies at a distance from them. Since we are upon this subject, I shall relate a particular which I read in a modern writer (57), viz. that in Misitra, dogs never go into the Turkish Mosques, nor the Churches of the Christians. This the Turks explain by a miracle with regard to themselves, and by a natural reason with respect to the Greeks. Guillet's words are as follow :

(57) Guillet, Lacedaemone ancienne & nouvelle, pag. 232. Dutch edit.

Dogs that never go into Churches.

" The Turks speak of the discretion of these dogs, as of something miraculous. These animals sometimes slip into private houses, when they find the doors of them open; but as to the Mosques, they need not be shut at all, for the dogs never enter them. The Turks take an occasion from hence to make a wonder of it; and call that a miraculous respect, which is only an imitation of the young Dogs, who have ever seen the oldest keep at a distance from the doors of Mosques, where, in all probability, they had been heartily drubbed by the first Turkish inhabitants to make them keep away from them for ever. Neither are Dogs to be seen in the Churches of the Greeks; but this is not looked upon as strange by the Turks, who give a reason for it, which, to me, appears probable enough. I before observed, that when the Greek Schismatics go into their Churches, they make so profound a bow, that their hands touch the Ground. The Turks say, that the Dogs seeing them stoop their hands so low, imagine that it is in order to take up stones, and to throw at their heads; and that the fear of this keeps them at a distance from the Churches."

To return to Hercules's Club, I say that a great miracle was related concerning it, viz. that being fixed in the Ground, it had taken root, and shot up into a tree. Πρὸς τὴν τῆ ἀγάλματι τὸ ῥόπαλον θύει φασὶν Ἡρακλῆος καὶ (ἢ γὰρ κατ'αὐτὸν) τὴν μὴ (ὄτρω πικρὰ) ἐκίθη τῆ γῆ καὶ ἀνιθλάσθησιν αὐτῆς. Ei clavam ab Hercule dedicatam perhibent, factam ex oleastro. Quod adjiciunt miraculum, haud scio an cuiquam fide dignum videri possit, eam clavam radicibus aëris regerminasse (58). I add, that 'twas the Troezenians who related this incident. They had the statue of Mercurius Polygius, to which Hercules had consecrated his Club. It is universally known that it was of the wood of the olive-tree; and Pausanias says, that this tree, whence it was taken, was still shewn, which Hercules found near the fen called Saronis (59). Here is an article proper for a writer who would undertake a collection of historical parallels, with respect to certain stories told by Heathens as well as Christians; for we find by travellers, that at the gate of the old fortress of Smyrna, there is a great wild cherry-tree, which the Greeks of that country declare to have been the staff of St. Polycarp, first bishop of Smyrna, which the instant after it was fixed in the ground, shot forth branches (60).

(58) Pausan. lib. 2. pag. 74.

(59) Ibid.

(60) Spon, Voyage de Grèce, tom. 1. pag. 232. Dutch edit.

(K) . . . nor that he set up Pillars at the cape called Finesterre.] The fiction with regard to the foundation of Corrunna, which I shall speak of in the following remark, has made some learned men conclude, that Hercules had set up pillars in that place. Paul Jovius fell into this error, for which he was censured as follows by Ludovicus Nonnius. Ab hac fabula persuasi nonnulli, credere arcem Herculis fuisse, & alteras columnas ab illo hic fixas, non secus ac circa Gades, dictamque urbem hanc Corrunna tanquam columnam: quod egregium etymon apud Paulum Jovium, virum aliàs gravem & doctum, tantum valuit, ut ab imperito aliquo Hispaniæ antiquitatis persuasus, huic opinioni etiam subscriberet, cum in vita Gonfalvi Ferdinandi d'Aguiar, agens de adventu Regis Philippi I. in Hispaniam, ita scriberet: Nec diu Philippus amicorum suorum studia, vota que frustratus, ut sua regna ex arbitrio administranda susciperet, in Cantabriam Oceano devectus, pervenit in portum, qui vocatur ad Columnas, fortasse quòd ibi quoque alteræ Herculis columnæ, sicuti Gadibus, positæ fuerunt, quum eo externo litore terræ Hispanicæ finis. Sed opinio hæc infirmiori tibicine sulca quàm ut rationibus convelli mereatur (61). i. e. " This fiction made some people imagine, that it was a castle which had been built by Hercules; that he set up pillars there, as he did near Cales; and that this city was called Corunna, as it were, Columna or Pillar. This fine etymology was thought so good by Paul Jovius, in other respects a man of learning and judgment, that being misled by some writer who was ignorant of the antiquities of Spain, he has given into it, he writing as follows in the Life of Gonfalvo Ferdinando d'Aguiar, where he speaks of the arrival of Philip I. in Spain: Nor did Philip long baulk the desires and wishes of his friends, viz. that he would take the reins of Government into his own hands. Being arrived in the Bay of Biscay, he went on shore in the harbour of Columna, which perhaps had that name, because certain pillars were set up there as at Cales, this being the utmost limits of Spain. But this opinion is so weakly grounded, that it does not deserve a confutation."

(61) Ludov. Nonnius, in Hispania, cap. 54. pag. m. 170.

[L] . . . nor that he there lodged a mirror or looking-glass, which had an astonishing property.] Ludovicus Nonnius, after saying that the Flavium Brigantium of the antients is the present Corunna, adds that the inhabitants inscribe the foundation of it to Hercules; and say, that he built a tower there, wherein he fixed a mirror, that brought the most distant Ships in sight. Incole ab Hercule conditam referunt, turrimque hic esse ab eodem exstructam, in qua speculum arcana arte fabricatum erat, unde naves vel longissimo spatio distantes contemplari liceret (62). The origin of this fiction is almost as ridiculous as the fiction itself. In tam ridiculam opinionem vocum ignorantia & antiquitatis imperitia ita lapsi sunt, nam cum turris illa specula dicitur, speculum illud mirandum sine opifice ullo confinxere (63.) i. e. (63) Idem, ibid.

" They fell into this ridiculous opinion from their unskilfulness in language and antiquity; for that tower being called specula in Latin, they raised this astonishing mirror or speculum without the assistance of any artist."

[M] He then consumed himself in the flames, because he no longer had strength to bend his bow.] 'Ως καὶ αὐτὸν ἀνίλα μὴ δύμεις τὸ δικαῖον ἐπιτύχαι τὸ ἐν πικρῆς γυρόματος. Ut igne vitam sibi abstulerit, quod arcum suum intendere non posset annos jam natus quinquaginta (64), i. e. " That he burnt himself to death, because he could not bend his bow, at fifty years of age." Some persons who trifle away their leisure in searching after allegories, imagine that under these words the following meaning is shadowed, viz. that Hercules finding himself no longer able to dally with the fair-sex, was so struck with this dreadful change, that it threw him into the deepest melancholy, and made him resolve to dispatch himself. He would have been more impatient than Milo the wrestler (65), who (65) See the article ACHILLES citation (128).

cause he could not bend his bow, at fifty years of age." Some persons who trifle away their leisure in searching after allegories, imagine that under these words the following meaning is shadowed, viz. that Hercules finding himself no longer able to dally with the fair-sex, was so struck with this dreadful change, that it threw him into the deepest melancholy, and made him resolve to dispatch himself. He would have been more impatient than Milo the wrestler (65), who (65) See the article ACHILLES citation (128). I shall speak of these hunters after allegories; for they explain in the same manner, nemo meo melius arcum tendebat Ulyse. i. e. " No man could bend his bow better than my Ulysses."

[N] He was the last child that Jupiter had by any mortal woman.] Diodorus Siculus makes this remark, in order to heighten the glory of Hercules. He supposes, that Jupiter left off all commerce with the fair sex, because he would not have his last Productions inferior to the preceding ones. In hac ipsa (Alcmena) tandem desit, nec cum ulla deinceps mortali rem habere sobolemque procreare voluit, ne præstantioribus scilicet deteriora substitueret (66). He therefore was afraid, that the children he should get after Hercules would not come up to him. The younger Pliny says a thing (67) which recalls that thought to my memory. It turns on Nerva's dying a little after he adopted Trajan. I have read in Lactantius, a strong railery, with regard to the greatest of the Gods ceasing to beget children. Cum verò dicantur aliqui (Dii) ex aliquibus nati, consequens est, ut semper nascantur siquidem aliquando sunt nati; vel si aliquando nasci desierunt, tale faceret. Plin. scire nos convenit, cur, aut quando desierint. Non illepe in Panagyr. Trøj. Seneca

(62) Idem, ibid. pag. 196.

(63) Idem, ibid.

(64) Prol. He-phæst. apud Phostium, Cod. 190. pag. 472.

(65) See the article ACHILLES citation (128).

(66) Diod. Sicul. lib. 4. cap. 14. See the remark [C] of the article ALCMENA.

(67) Hunc (Nervam) Di i caelo vindicaverunt, ne quid post illud divinum & immortale factum mortale faceret. Plin. in Panagyr. Trøj. Seneca

It was said that he had been three days in a whales's belly [O], and got safe and found out of it, with the loss only of his hair. He was adopted, after his death, by Juno ; but it is said that he refused to be incorporated in the College of the twelve greater Deities [P]. I must take some notice of the Hercules of Gaul [Q].

One

Seneca in libris moralibus Philosophiæ. QUID ergo est (inquit) quare apud Poetas salacissimus Jupiter deseruit liberos tollere? Utrum sexagenarius factus est, & illi lex Papia sibi imposuit? an impetravit jus trium liberorum? An tandem illi venit in mentem, Ab alio expectes alteri quod feceris ?

(68) Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 16. pag. m. 51, 52.

Et timet, ne quis sibi faciat quod ipse Saturno (68) ? i. e. " Since some Deities are said to spring from others, it follows, that they should always continue to be born in case they are once so ; or if at any time they left off being born, it is proper we should be informed, why, or when they did this. Seneca says, pleasantly, in his Ethics; Wherefore do the Poets relate that Jupiter, who was so very lustful, has ceased to procreate children? Is it because being now threescore, the Lex Papia has check'd his Prowess? Or has he obtained the privileges enjoyed by the fathers of three children? Or does the following proverb occur to him?

Expect to be treated yourself as you've treated others?

" and so is afraid, lest any one should serve him as he did Saturn."

[O] 'Twas said that he had been three Days in a whale's Belly. I will borrow the words of Philostratus's commentator, to describe that adventure, and the circumstance that gave occasion to it. " The Gods having once upon a time formed a conspiracy in order to imprison Jupiter their sovereign, he being privately told this by Themis, frustrated their plot, and punished them after a different manner. As to Neptune and Apollo, he sent them in his indignation, to serve the masons who were building the walls of Ilion ; where, having hired themselves to Laomedon, after the work was completed, he indeed rewarded Apollo with a great number of sacrifices and offerings, but did not offer to satisfy Neptune. The God being exasperated at this, sent an enormously large whale, which disgorging great floods of water on the country, quite drowned it ; and Laomedon, by the command of the Oracle, to free himself from that calamity, was forced to expose his daughter Hefione, dressed in her royal robes, to this monster, in order to be devoured by him. Hercules happening to pass that way, and being moved with pity, offered Hefione's father to deliver her, upon condition that he would give him the horses sprung from an immortal race, which he had had from Jupiter, for Ganymede, whom he forced away to Heaven, to serve him as cup-bearer. The terms being approved of, Hercules, armed cap-a-pee, plunged headlong down the monster's throat ; whence descending to his belly, he remained shut up three days there, all which he spent in hacking and hewing, till such time as he had chopt it to pieces. Laomedon refusing after this to perform the contract, Hercules returned to Troy with six ships filled with soldiers, and sacked that city ; put Laomedon to death ; carried off Hefione prisoner, and presented her to Telamon, the father of Ajax, for his having first mounted the wall (69)." It is pity that Vigenere should not have cited any author. To supply this defect, I will quote a passage from Tzetzes, which Mr. Drelincourt communicated to me (70). Τρεῖς ἡμέρας γὰρ τῆ Ἡρακλείας καλεῖ δια τὸ ἐν τῷ κοίτι τρεῖς ἡμέρας εἶναι ὡς ἰσπέρας καλεῖ Λυκέφρον δια τὸ ἀφοτίσθαι καὶ σκολεῖν εἶναι τὴν γαστέρα τῆ Ἰφιτα (71). The Scholiast on Homer (72) relates most of the particulars, which I have cited from the Commentator on Philostratus ; and informs us that this story was found in Hellenicus. By the way, Hercules did not come out the same way as he went in ; he issuing at the breach, I mean by the whale's belly. I have not been able to verify whether Natalis Comes has justly related what he cites from Andrætas of Tenedos, with respect to the loss of Hercules's hair (73). Ubi vero

(69) Vigenere, in the Summary of Perseus in Pbilistratus, tom. 1. pag. m. 466.

(70) With several other particulars relating to the text of this remark.

(71) Tzetzes ad Lycophronem, pag. 13.

(72) In Iliad. lib. 19. ver. 145.

(73) Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. 8. cap. 3. pag. m. 821.

cetus accessisset, bians in ejus os Hercules irruit, ubi cum per triduum fuisset, ceto disrupto exiit omnibus amissis capillis capitis, ut scriptum reliquit Andrætas Tenedius in navigatione Propontidis (74). i. e. " When the whale (74) Vossius, de Hystor. Græcis, pag. 321. says, that this work of Andrætas is cited by the Scholiast, upon Apollonius in lib. 2. " approached with open jaws to Hercules, he rushed " down his throat, where, when he had staid three " days, the whale bursting, he issued out, having " lost all the hair off his head, as we find it related " by Andrætas of Tenedos, in his voyage to the Pro- " pontis." Lycophron insinuates plainly, that the heat of the whale's belly occasioned Hercules's hair to fall off.

Ἐμπυς δὲ δαιτρός ἡπάταν Φλοιδάμειον, Τυθῶ λέγει αἰφλόγους ἐπ' ἰσχάραις, Σμήρηνας ἰσάλαξ κωθίας πίδα (75).

(75) Lycophron. ver. 35.

Vivus autem dissector intestinorum ambustus, In calido campo, in ollæ facis non ignitis, Jubas capitis desillarvit.

[P] He was adopted, after his death, by Juno, but it is said that he refused to be incorporated in the College of the twelve greater Deities. Juno, who had persecuted him with so much violence in his life-time, was greatly inclined to love him when he was dead. This verifies the following lines of Horace.

Diram qui contudit Hydram, Notaque fatali portenta labore subegit, Comperit invidiam supremo sine domari (76).

(76) Horat. Ep. 1. lib. 2. ver. 10.

" He that kill'd Hydra, he design'd by fate " To quell the monsters rais'd by Juno's hate ; " Tho' he, the mighty he, had always try'd, " Found envy could be vanquish'd only when he " dy'd.

CREECH.

Here follows what we find related by Diodorus Siculus. After that Hercules had been ranked among the Gods, he was adopted by Juno, who was afterwards a kind mother to him. The ceremony of this adoption was as follows. Juno went to bed ; when, to imitate a true delivery, she placed Hercules in such a manner, that he fell to the earth from under her petticoats. The barbarians likewise observed this ceremony in their adoptions, in Diodorus Siculus's time. Hercules was afterwards married to Hebe ; but he refused the honour which Jupiter would have done him, viz. to associate him into the College of the twelve greater Deities ; and he gave this reason for his refusal, viz. that as there was no vacancy in that College, he ought not to enter it ; and that it would be very unjust to degrade any other Deity, to make room for him (77). Juno had for a long time begun to act as a mother with regard to Hercules ; but it was without knowing him. The affair was this. Alcmena, dread- ing the jealousy of that Goddess, did not dare to own herself to be Hercules's mother, and therefore exposed him in the middle of a field as soon as he was born. Minerva and Juno soon came that way ; and as Minerva was gazing upon this child with admiring eyes, she advised Juno to suckle it. Juno did so ; but the child bit her nipple to such a degree, that she felt an intolerable pain, and laid down the child. Minerva then took it up, and carried it to Alcmena, as to a nurse she would recommend him to (78). A parallel might here be drawn between Moses and Hercules. (77) Ex Diod. Sicul. lib. 4. cap. 40. (78) Ex eodem, ibid. cap. 9.

[Q] I must take some notice of the Hercules of Gaul.]

A modern Author (79) has imitated the Greeks whilst he refused them : He has transferred to this Hercules most of the actions performed by the other ; and has left the Grecian Hercules none but moral conquests, that is to say, only triumphs over his passions. According to this author, the Gallic Hercules built the city Alise or Alexia in Gaul (80). He was attacked by Albion King of Great Britain, and by Bergiona, both sons to Neptune. He defeated them in Provence, by

(79) Audigier, Origine des François, & de leur Empire, Part 1. pag. 225, & seq.

(80) Idem, ibid.

ibc

One of the most celebrated Athenian Orators observes, that writers took an extreme delight in celebrating the combats and bravery of Hercules; but did not make the least mention of his other qualities, which yet might have furnished them with a very noble field. He declares, that that part of the exalted character of Hercules, which they had neglected so much, would require an excellent Orator; and that had he thought of drawing it in his youth, he would have shewn that this hero had surpassed all other men, in prudence, in knowledge, and in justice, more than in bodily strength. Old age, adds he, does not suffer me to attempt this panegyric in that respect; I find myself too weak to undertake so important and copious a subject (c). This Orator's remark may make us reflect on the depraved taste of the mind of man [R]. We may confirm what this great Rhetorician

(c) ExtraBod
from Isocrates, Orat. ad Philip-ppum, p. m. 152.

the succour which he received from his father Jupiter, who observing that the army of his son was unprovided with arrows, discharged such a volley of stones on the enemy, as quite overpowered them (81). In quo (lapideo campo) Herculem contra Albionem & Bergionem Neptuni liberis dimicantem cum tela descissent, ab invocato Jove adjutum imbre lapidum ferunt, credas pluisse, adeo multi passim, & late jacent (82). He was the first among the Gauls who went into Italy by the way of the Alps (83). "He there made Umbria habitable, having formed the river Arno out of its marshes. He led the Gallic colonies on the other side of the Pyrenees, where Gerion, King of Spain, was vanquished . . . He died during this expedition into Spain, where he was honoured with a magnificent temple which the Tyrians dedicated to him in the city of Gades, where his bones still existed in the time of Pomponius Mela, who affirms this particular (84)." His accoutrements were as follow: a quiver hanging at his back, a club in his right hand, and a bow in his left; with the face of a bald, wrinkled, swarthy old man, whose aspect was yet venerable; drawing after him a crowd of people, who were bound with little chains of gold and silver, hanging from his tongue; and though these chains were vastly slender, yet none of these captives endeavoured to break them; and all, on the contrary, discovered by their air and countenance, that it would have been a grief to them to be delivered from so delightful a captivity, as being vanquished, much more by the eloquence of the Gallic Hercules, than by the strength of his arms. Such is the description which Lucian has given us of him (85)." This description agrees little with what Menage read in some book, viz. that our ancient Gauls had a great veneration for Hercules, because he was of a MIGHTY STATURE AND STRONG; and having declared, on their being converted to Christianity, that it would be one of their greatest troubles not to see his image any more; they were comforted in being told, that the Christians had a saint, who was six times as TALL and as STRONG as Hercules (86). (a).

(81) Ibid. pag. 231.

(82) Pomponius Mela, lib. 2. cap. 5. pag. m. 38, 39.

(83) Audigier, Origine des Français, Part 1. pag. 230.

(84) Lib. 3. cap. 6. but Pomponius speaks of the Egyptian Hercules.

(85) Audigier, Origine des Français, Part 1. pag. 229.

(86) Suite de Managiana, pag. 225. Dutch edit.

"His accoutrements were as follow: a quiver hanging at his back, a club in his right hand, and a bow in his left; with the face of a bald, wrinkled, swarthy old man, whose aspect was yet venerable; drawing after him a crowd of people, who were bound with little chains of gold and silver, hanging from his tongue; and though these chains were vastly slender, yet none of these captives endeavoured to break them; and all, on the contrary, discovered by their air and countenance, that it would have been a grief to them to be delivered from so delightful a captivity, as being vanquished, much more by the eloquence of the Gallic Hercules, than by the strength of his arms. Such is the description which Lucian has given us of him (85)." This description agrees little with what Menage read in some book, viz. that our ancient Gauls had a great veneration for Hercules, because he was of a MIGHTY STATURE AND STRONG; and having declared, on their being converted to Christianity, that it would be one of their greatest troubles not to see his image any more; they were comforted in being told, that the Christians had a saint, who was six times as TALL and as STRONG as Hercules (86). (a).

§ (a) That is, six Hercules Alexicaci, in which sense St. Christopher is the Hercules of the French, and in general of all the Roman Catholics, witness the fine verses following, quoted by St. Aldégonde, in his Tableau des differens de la Religion, Tom. II. fol. 136, printed in 1605.

Christophori sancti faciem quicumque tustur, Illa nempe die mala morte non morietur.

"Whoe'er shall see St. Christopher's bright face,
The stroke of death, that day, he need not fear."

(87) Audigier does not cite Diodorus's Work; it is in chap. 24. of Book 5. Hanov. 1611, in 8vo.

(88) Compare with Diodorus Siculus these words of Ammianus, Marcellinus, Book 15. cap. 9. Celtas nomine Regis amabilis, & matris ejus vocabulo Galates dictos.

Audigier applies to his hypothesis, as well as he can, a story related by Diodorus Siculus; viz. that the daughter of a King of Celtæ, proud of her extraordinary stature, and her exquisite beauty, despised all the suitors who addressed her in marriage; but when she had seen Hercules, she had a violent desire to have an affair with him, with her father's consent. Her passion was indulged. Hercules had a son by her, named Galates (87). The Historian does not name this daughter, but others pretend that she was called Galatea (88). This story is related differently in the Erotica of Parthenius. We there find, that Hercules, when he was driving Gerion's oxen from Erythia, went through Gaul; and came to the house of Bretau-nus, father to Celtina, who fell so violently in love with this hero, that stealing Gerion's oxen from him, she could not be prevailed with to restore them, but upon condition that he should lie with her. Hercules, as well to recover his oxen, as on account of Celtina's beauty, went in to her, and got a boy, who was called Celtus, and gave his name to the Celtæ. Herodotus (89) relates, that Hercules being in Scythia, laid himself on the ground on his lion's skin, and fell asleep. At his waking, he did not see his mares; upon which he sought for them every where; and when he was arrived in Hyleus's country he entered into a cave, where he met with a maid, who had nothing of the human shape, but from the head to the girdle; the remainder resembling a serpent. Have you seen my mares, says he to her? Yes, replied she, I have them in my custody, but will not return them unless you will lie with me. Hercules was willing to recover them on that condition; but when the sport was ended, the girl postponed as long as she could the restoring him the mares; she having a strong desire to begin again. At last, when she could no longer detain Hercules, he being very desirous of leaving that place with his mares, she spoke thus to him: I kept them for you, and you have rewarded me; for I am now big with three boys, by you. Τὴν δὲ Φάναι ἰαυτὴν ἔχειν, καὶ ἐκ ἀποδοῦσιν ἕκαστην αὐτῇ οἱ μυχθῆσαι, τὴν δὲ Ἡρακλῆα μυχθῆσαι ἐπὶ τῷ μισθῷ τῆς τέτης. κείνη τε δὲ ἰσχυραῖα τῆν ἀποδοῦσιν ἔϊππον, βυλομένω ὡς ἀλάστον χρόνον συνίαι τῷ Ἡρακλῆϊ. Illamque respondisse, se quidem illas habere: sed non prius reddituram ei quam cum ipsa colisset: Herculem pro ea mercede cum sæmina concubuisse. Sed quum illa differret reddere equas, cupida diutissime cum Hercule concumbendi, &c. (90).

(89) Herod. lib. 4. cap. 9.

(90) Herodot. Ibid. pag. m. 227, 228.

Audigier pretends (91) that the Celtic Jupiter, the most ancient of the Jupiters, is the father of our Gallic Hercules; and that all the greater Deities of Greece (91) were first known in Gaul (92). This is a very strange pretension, but not so chimerical as that of the learned Rudbeck (93).

(91) See Novo. de la République des Lettres, Feb. 1685. pag. 140.

[R] A remark of Isocrates may make us reflect on the depraved taste of the mind of man.] The prudence of Hercules, his philofophy, his justice, were qualities of an infinitely more valuable kind than his bodily strength. Καὶ τῆ φρονήσεως καὶ τῆ φιλοσοφίας καὶ τῆ δικαιοσύνης, ὧν ἅπαντα διεισπύειν ἀνάσσει τῶν προσισημαίων, ἢ τῆ βίον τῆ τῷ σώματι. Et prudentia, & literis, & justitia plus antecelluisse (Herculem) superiorum temporum hominibus omnibus, quam robore corporis (94). And yet the Orators and Poets applauded him only for those actions, which strength had enabled him to perform; and at the same time suffered the perfections of soul to be buried in oblivion. They did thus, as well because they themselves were more struck with glittering, than with solid things; as because they were persuaded that their auditors and readers would be more ready to applaud the relation of battles, than the description of such virtues as are exercised in times of peace. Horace has very well observed this, in supposing that the shades or ghosts listened favourably to the poetical compositions of Sappho and Alcæus; but that they were more delighted with the latter, because they treated of nothing but wars, state-revolutions, banishment, &c. (95).

(92) See Novo. de la République des Lettres, Feb. 1685. pag. 140.

(93) Dura novis, Dura fugæ mala, Dura belli. Hor. Od. 13. lib. 2.

*Utrumque sacro digna silentio
Mirantur Umbra dicere: sed MAGIS
Pugnas, & exactos tyrannos
Denjum humeris bibit aure vulgus* (96).

(96) Ibid.

"With

(d) See Pufferat on Propertius,
Eleg. 10. lib. 4.

Rhetorician has observed; with regard to the knowledge of this hero; it being well known, that the Antients declared, that there was a very intimate correspondence between the Muses and Hercules (d); thence it is that he was surnamed Musagetes, i. e. the companion and conductor of the Muses; and that those nine Deities were put under his protection, in the temple which Fulvius Nobilior built in his honour [S]. The thought

“ With silent reverence ghosts admire
“ The wondrous fury of his lyre :
“ The vulgar shades throng most to hear
“ Of Kings depos'd, of feats of war,
“ And drink them with a greedy ear.

CREECH.

It is to be further observed, that such subjects as tyrants overthrown, and monsters tamed, in a word, times of confusion and slaughter, give a writer a better opportunity of displaying his genius and eloquence, than a life or series of years, led after an uniform manner, and spent agreeably to the rules of virtue. An Historian who has no great events to describe, sleeps over his work, and makes his readers yawn; but a civil war, two or three conspiracies, and as many battles, the same leaders sometimes humbled, and at other times exalted; such subjects, I say, sharpen his pen, warm his imagination, and always keep his readers in a breath. I am really of opinion, that should he be commanded to write the history of a peaceable reign, such an one as was not chequered with variety; he would bewail himself much after the same manner as Caligula did, viz. because there did not happen some grievous calamities in his reign. Queri etiam palam de conditione temporum suorum solebat: quod nullis calamitatibus publicis insignirentur. Augusti principatum clade Variana: Tiberii, ruina spectaculorum apud Fidenas, memorabilem factum: sui oblivionem imminere profperitate rerum. Atque identidem exercituum cedes, famem, pestilentiam, incendia, biatum aliquem terræ optabat (97). i. e. “ He would often complain pub-

(97) Sueton. in Caligula, cap. 31.

“ licly of the state of the times in which he lived, “ because they were not made remarkable by some public calamities; saying that the defeat of Varius would transmit to posterity the remembrance of Augustus's reign; and the falling of the theatre in Fidenæ, the reign of Tiberius; but that he himself was in danger of being for ever forgot, because of the felicity of the times in which he lived. He would frequently wish for the slaughter of armies, for famine, pestilence, the burning of cities, and earthquakes.” Desolations and public calamities are of advantage to an Historian, and add a lustre to his writings. He pities, if he be a good man, the illustrious vestal who was buried alive, and abhors the tyrant who, to make his reign the more remarkable, caused that Vestal to be put to death: Cum Corneliam Vestalium maximam defodere vivam concupisset (Domitianus) ut qui illustrari seculum suum ejusmodi exemplo arbitraretur (98); but this melancholy incident is, at the same time, of advantage to his pen, it proving an ornament to his books. This work is a kind of ship that never sails better than during storms; a tempest is to him a kindly gale; a calm is as unpropitious to him as to a real ship; and when an Historian can begin as Tacitus does, Opus aggredior optimum casibus, atrox præliis, discors seditionibus, ipsâ etiam pace sævum. Quatuor Principes ferro interempti. Tria bella civilia, plura externa, ac plerumque permixta (99). i. e. “ I am

(98) Plin. Epist.
11. lib. 4.

(99) Tacit. Hist.
lib. 1. cap. 2.

“ going upon a work that is fruitful in mighty events, “ made cruel by wars, discordant by seditions, and “ dreadful even in peace. Four Monarchs slain, three “ intestine wars, more foreign, and these generally “ blended.” When, I say, he can begin thus, he prejudices his readers in his favour, and is very sensible that he has made choice of a favourable subject. But still it shews a bad taste, to prefer the relation of warlike actions before an account of such as are equitable; and to admire still more in a man his bodily strength, and the boldness whereby he is enabled to defeat a wild boar, or a bull, than that virtue which gives him the mastery over his passions, and prompts him to establish good and wholesome laws among his neighbours. This virtue, though it does not shine so much as the other, has much more of true grandeur in it; there is more reality in such of Hercules's qualities as writers had taken no notice of, than in those which they so pompously magnified. But what shall we say? they comply'd with the taste of the public. It is to be observed that young people take much greater pleasure in reading romances than true histories; and that after years have ripened them, and matured their judgment, they choose to peruse a Thuanus and a Mezerai, rather than a Calprenede and a Scuderi. But very few persons lose the taste of their younger years, with respect to the description of a calm and unruffled reign, and the history of a reign filled with troubles and mighty events.

[S] The Muses . . . were put under his protection in the temple. This temple was built by Fulvius Nobilior, who had vanquished the Ætolians in the year of Rome 565. He was Consul at that time. The name of their chief city was Ambracia, which he took; and having found therein the statutes of the nine muses, he carried them to Rome, where he consecrated them to the temple which he caused to be built in honour of Hercules, and put them under the protection of this God. I am of opinion that we should not have known these particulars, had they not been mentioned by an Orator who lived five or six centuries after. His words deserve to be quoted. Ædem Herculis Musarum in circo Flaminio Fulvius ille Nobilior ex pecunia Censoria fecit, non id modo secutus, quod ipse literis & summa Poetæ amicitia duceretur, sed quod in Græcia tum esset imperator, acceperat Herculem Musagetem esse, id est comitem ducentemque Musarum; idemque primus novem signa, hoc est annuum Camænarum, ex Ambraciensi oppido translata, sub tutela fortissimi numinis consecravit, ut res est, quæ mutuis operibus & præmiis juvenari ornarique deberent; Musarum quies defensione Herculis, & virtus Herculis voce Musarum (100). i. e. “ Fulvius Nobilior raised a temple in honour of Hercules and the Muses, in the Circus Flaminius, out of the monies he got amassed when Censor. He was prompted to this, not only because he was a great patron of letters and poetry; but because he had been informed, whilst he was Generalissimo in Greece, that Hercules was called Musagetes, that is, the companion and leader of the Muses. It was he also who first put the statues of the nine Muses, brought by him from the city of Ambracia, under the protection of this most powerful God. This was very proper, because they ought to help and adorn each other with reciprocal services and rewards. The Muses should owe their tranquillity to the bravery of Hercules, and Hercules's bravery be sung by the Muses. It is just in this orator to assert, that mighty warriors and the Muses want one another: it is the business of the former to procure tranquillity and security to the Muses; and it is the duty of these to immortalize the illustrious actions of heroes by their poems. One might, in consequence of this orator's notion, apply what follows to our Hercules, viz. that those who achieve actions worthy of being celebrated by the Poets, are themselves lovers of verse (101). It is to be observed that Hercules, according to Statius, was well skilled in Music.

(100) Eumenius;
in Oratione pro
scabulis infrauran-

(101) Carmen
amat quisquis carmine digna gerit.

(102) Statius,
Sylv. 1. lib. 3.
ver. 50.

*Dic age, Calliope, socius tibi grande sonabis
Alcides, tenoque modos imitabitur arcu* (102).

The sense is,

“ Tune, tune, Calliope, the heavenly lyre,
“ With thee, in concert, Hercules shall sing,
“ And add his twanging bow.

Others observe that he was skilled in astrology: Naudæus asserts this as certain; but, by his leave, he has discovered a little ignorance on this occasion. It is in that part of his Coup d'Etat, where he speaks of some persons who had employed fraud, in order to obtain the honour of deification. “ What Hercules perceived, says he (103), was much more ingenious; for being extremely well skilled in astrology, witness fables concerning his life, which suppose him to carry the heavens together with Atlas, he chose precisely at the time when a great comet made its appearance,

(103) Naudé,
Coups d'Etat,
chap. 2. pag. 128.
89.

thought, which Posidonius employed, to ridicule a passage in a tragedy of Æschylus, was not just; and Strabo who censured it, did not know wherein the real defect of it consisted [T]. This relates to a certain shower of stones which fell, in order to succour Hercules, whilst he was engaged in battle against the Ligurians.

“pearance, to lay himself on the burning pile, where he would die, in order that this new celestial fire might be present as a witness, and make mankind believe what the Romans would persuade, in after-ages, the world concerning their Emperors, by means of an eagle, which used to fly out of the midst of flames, as though it was going to waft the soul of the deceased Monarch into Jupiter’s arms.” Here we have an author who supposes that the appearance of comets may be foretold by astrology: but he is mistaken, and has been censured for it by his commentator (104).

criticks; for should one go about to dispute on predestination and providence, many things would be found both in morality and physicks, which might give people occasion to say, that they might have been better ordered in another manner: for instance, it would have been better for rain to have fallen in Egypt, than for it to be moistened by the waters of Ethiopia; it would have been better, had Paris been shipwrecked in his passage to Lacedæmonia, than to let him carry off Helen; and to punish him for it afterwards, to the great detriment of both Greeks and Trojans; a circumstance which Euripides ascribes to Jupiter. Καὶ τὸν Πάριον εἰς τὴν Σπάρτην πλύνει, ναυκλίω περιπυσθῆναι. ἄλλα μὴ τὴν Ἑλίην ἀρπάσαντα, δίκας τίσασαι τοῖς ἄδικηθῆσιν ἕτερον, ἢ ἵνα τοσοῦτον ἀπειργασατο φθόρον Ἑλλήνων καὶ βαρβάρων. ὅπερ Εὐριπίδης ἀτίμητον εἰς τὸν Δία, (104) See the Reflexions de Louis de Mai sur les Coups d’Estat de Naudé, pag. 144.

It is to be observed, that the temple, which Fulvius Nobilior had built in honour of Hercules, lay almost in ruins in Augustus’s time; but Lucius Martius Philippus (105) rebuilt it, and added a portico. See Ovid de Fastis, at the close of the 6th book; and epigram 51 of the 5th book of Martial.

Ζῆος γὰρ κακὰ μὲν Τροσὶ πῆμα δ’ Ἑλλάδι εἶλον γινώσθαι, τὰ δ’ ἐβούλευσεν πατήρ.

(105) This Philippus was second husband to Augustus’s mother.

[T] Strabo, who censured a thought of Posidonius, did not know wherein the real defect of it consisted. Æschylus supposes (106), that it was foretold Hercules, that in his combat against the Ligurians, he should be destitute of arrows, the fates having so ordained it, and this in a place where it would not be possible for him to get any stones; but that, when reduced to this extremity, he would excite the pity of Jupiter, who would waft a cloud filled with stones; and that, with these he should vanquish the Ligurians. Would it not have been infinitely better, said Posidonius, for Jupiter to hurl these stones at the Ligurians, and quite destroy them, than to reduce Hercules to such a necessity? ἢ τὸ σῶτον δοῦμαι ποιῆσαι λίθων τὸν Ἡρακλῆα. Quam ad tot lapidum indigentiam redigere Herculem (107). Strabo has answered this censure, and said two things; first, that a vast number of stones were required, because the enemy to be fought were very numerous, so that, in this respect, Æschylus’s thought is more probable than that of his Censor. Τὸ μὲν δὲ τοσοῦτον ἀνάγκαιος ἦν, εἴπερ πρὸς καὶ ὄχλον παραπληθῆ. ὥς τε ταύτη γινώσκοντες ὁ μὲν ὁμοῦ φησὶ τῷ ἀνασκυλάσει τὸν μῦθον. At verò tot lapidibus opus erat contra tantam multitudinem; ut hac quidem in parte fabulæ autor probabiliora dixerit, quam fabulæ reprehensor (108). Secondly, he adds, that as the Poet said expressly, that this was a thing ordained by fate, it ought to have stopped the mouths of all

Et Paridem cum Spartam peteret debuisse potius naufragium facere, quam rapta Helena postmodo sceleris dare, autorem tantæ cladis Græcorum ac Barbarorum: quam Euripides Jovi imputat:

(106) See Strabo, lib. 4. pag. m. 126.

Jupiter malum Troibus, & cladem Græcæ Volens contingere, ista decrevit pater (109).

(109) Strabo; lib. 4. pag. m. 127.

(107) Idem, ibid.

I am of opinion that Strabo used more artifice than sincerity. It is no ways probable that Posidonius grounded his raillery on Hercules’s having wanted so great a number of stones; but nevertheless as his words would bear that sense, Strabo took advantage of it. But still he has not animadverted on the real fault of the criticism. He should have answered Posidonius, that had Jupiter intended merely, and in general, to knock the Ligurians on the head, he had much better have showered down the stones on their heads, than round about Hercules; but that designing to make Hercules defeat that people, the stones were therefore to fall near him, and not on his enemies. The critic went upon a notion, which is an inexhaustible source of fallacious syllogisms; and did not consider that fate includes, at one and the same time, both the end and the means.

(108) Idem, ibid. pag. 127.

HERLICIUS (DAVID) a Philosopher, a Physician, and Astrologer, was born at Ceitz in Misnia, December the 28th 1557. He wanted the assistance of his mother’s relations to be educated at school, for his father’s estate was not sufficient to maintain him there. He learnt to write verses and to sing; by which means he got something on several occasions when necessity oppressed him [A]. He continued but a little while at the University of Wittemberg, because Peucer, whose Lectures he chiefly designed to hear, was put in prison. As he could not therefore improve himself under that learned Professor, he went to Leipzig, where he made a considerable progress in his studies. He went afterwards to Rostock, where the Professors gave him leave to read private Lectures. He acquitted himself so well of that function, that the Duke of Wittemberg made him Sub-Principal of the College of Guffraw. He continued two years in that post, and employed all the time he could spare in the practice of Physic, and in drawing Horoscopes (a). He spent the two following years (b) at Primislaw (α), where he taught natural Philosophy, and in the year 1513 he accepted the like employment at Anclam, where he also practised Physic. The next year he published an Almanack, which was extremely applauded [B].

(a) Quicquid temporis extrordinarii lucrari poterit, Astrologia studio, constructioni & judicio geniturarum tribuit, & insuper ad medicinam facitandam se applicuit. Eichstadius, ubi infra Quotation (d).

(b) In the Marquisate of Brandenburgh.

Since

[A] By which means he got something, when necessity oppressed them.] This is what his Friend Eichstadius ingeniously confesses. Sponte, says he, (1) ad Poësin & Musicam exercendam se dedit: à quo utroque studio etiam postea in Academiis, quoties aliquâ inopiâ laborabat, fructus non parviteros percepit, etque sibi viros bonos & homines doctos patronos atque amicos conciliavit; sicut & habuit duos alios fratres Stralsundi in Pomerania & Musica Instrumentali & Vocali (quorum unus Cantorem Scholæ, alter Musicum organicum in templo Nicolaitano inibi egit) celebres atque excellentes. i. e. “He applied himself of his own accord to the learning of Musick, from which he reaped afterwards considerable benefits in

“the universities, whenever he laboured under any want; and by his skill in that art he made himself Patrons and Friends of several honest and learned men. He had also two brothers famous at Stralsund in Pomerania, for their skill both in instrumental and vocal Musick, in which they excelled, one of whom was Chantor to a School there, and the other Organist of St. Nicholas’s Church.”

(α) The true name of that City, both in German and in French and English is Prenslaw. CRIT. REM.]

[B] He published an Almanack, which was extremely applauded.] Here follow Eichstadius’s words (2), Anno (2) Apud Witte, 1584. ibid. pag. 76.

(1) Eichstad. in Vita Davidis Herlicii, apud Henning. Witte, Memor. Medicorum, Decad. 1. pag. 74.

Since that time he made one constantly every year during fifty two years. In the year 1585 he was chosen to teach Mathematics in the University of Gripswald, and he continued thirteen years in that post, and published several works. He received the degree of Doctor of Physic in that University with great solemnity in the year 1597; and at a year's end he accepted the Professorship of Natural Philosophy, which was offered him at Stargard in Pomerania, whence he removed to Lubeck in the year 1606, where he had an employment of the same kind. He did also practise Physic there with great reputation (c); and yet, through I know not what inconstancy, he retired to Stargard, where he passed the remainder of his life. He died August the 15th 1636. He had had a very sad loss the preceding year; for his house and all his papers were burnt in the fire, which consumed the whole city of Stargard to ashes October the 7th 1635. Had it not been for this loss the public would have seen an infinite number of our Herlicius's Astrological Observations [C]; for he had very much studied that Science (d). He got money by drawing of Horoscopes [D], and as he did not want wit, he acted with all the caution he could, that he might not too much expose the uncertainty of his

(c) See the remark [E], quotation (12).

(d) Taken from a Letter of Laurence Eichstadius, inserted in Hennings Witte's Memorie Medicorum, Decad. II. pag. 73. &c. Art.

1584. primum suum Calendarium & Prognosticon de mutationibus auræ & tempestatum in hoc physiatu publicavit, quod magno hominum applausu statim exceptum fuit. i. e. "Whilst he was in the post of teacher of natural Philosophy, he published in the year 1584. "his first Almanack and Calendar of the changes of the wind and weather, which was immediately received with a great applause." This good success encouraged him to continue his work, and he had the pleasure to see that his Almanacks were translated into several Languages, and that upon this account he was considered as the ornament of Pomerania. Sed & Prognostica annua de statu aëris, quæ jam per quatuor ac decem annos conscripserat, maximo labore, summa fide, indefessisque observationibus, in usum Pomeraniæ & regionum regnorumque adjacentium quotannis per 52 annos continuavit. Qui labor progressu annorum in tantam lucem venit, ut non tantum à Germanis in suo idiomate expetitus, verum etiam ab exteris in Latinam, Bobemicam, Polonicam, Danicam, & denique Suevicam linguam translatus, mox hinc inde in vicina climata illatus, atque HERLIC IUS noster tam utili anniversario opere Decus & Ornamentam Pomeraniæ factus sit (3). i. e.

(3) Ibid. pag. 77.

"He had already published his annual Calendar of the constitution of the air during fourteen years, and continued with great labour, with the utmost exactness, and by unwearied observations, during fifty-two years to publish it yearly for the use of Pomerania, and the adjacent Countries and Kingdoms. This work in process of time gained such a reputation, that not only the Germans desired to have it in their own tongue, but it was also translated by foreigners into the Latin, Bohemian, Polish, Danish, and Swedish Languages, and thus it was dispersed thro' the neighbouring countries, and our Herlicius became by this useful annual work the glory and ornament of Pomerania." He loved this kind of labour to such a degree, that one of the reasons why he left Lubeck was, that he hoped to have at Stargard the leisure he wanted to finish a large work, of which Astrology was to be a considerable part (4). Ut defatigatus istis plurimis negotiis, curis, turbis, honestum sibi otium quæreret, & DEO, suis Musis atque affinis

(4) Ibid. pag. 77, 78.

(5) vacare commodius posset, rursus valedicens Lubecæ anno 1614; cum universa sua familia rebus compositis Stargardiam Pomeranorum se contulit, ubi majore tranquillitate literariâ ad absolvendum & expoliendum opus illud magnum, quod de triplici Calendario Ecclesiastico, Aitronomico, & Astrologico conscribere inceperat, sed ante annum (6), prob dolor, in communi Civitatis Stargardensis flamma unâ conflagravit, se frui posse sperabat. i. e. "Being disturbed there, at Lubeck, by a great deal of business, cares and troubles, he desired to live in a place where he might enjoy an honest leisure, and apply himself to his duty towards God, cultivate the Muses, and see his relations: he left therefore Lubeck again in the year 1614, and having settled his affairs he retired with his whole family to Stargard in Pomerania, where he hoped to live with a greater literary tranquillity, so that he might finish and polish that great work, which he had begun to write, of a threefold Calendar, namely, Ecclesiastical, Astronomical, and Astrological: but, oh, misfortune! it perished a year ago in the flames that burnt the whole city of Stargard." See the following Remark.

(6) That is to say in the year 1635.

[C] Had it not been for this loss the Publick would have seen an infinite number of our Herlicius's Astrological Observations.] That the reader may see how much this man applied himself to the minutest particulars of Astrology, I shall transcribe the following instances of it, as I find them in his life. Interea suas Observationes Astrologicas publici juris facere decreverat sæpe enim ad me scripsit, quod ultra mille & ducenta collegerit Themata, quæ suo tertio operi Calendariographico & Astrologico inserere, iisque veritatem aliquot Aphorismorum Astrologicorum probare nitetur: e. g. Quod Planetæ benefici, Jupiter & Venus conjuncti, imprimis in octava domo longam vitam & annos (ultra 70) diuturnos polliceantur. Item, quod Formabant, insignis stella asterismi Aquarii, in octava domo celebrem & gloriosum post mortem faciat. Item, quod Cauda Draconis in prima domo Cæli vel altero oculo carentem, vel gibbosum fore minetur. Ut complures alios taceam. At hæc cum reliqua sua instructissima Bibliotheca (cujus similem vix privatus alius tota nostra in Pomerania quoad Mathematicos, Historicos, & Medicos libros possedit) in communi Stargardensi excidio flammis conflagravit (7). i. e. "He designed in the mean time to publish his Astrological Observations; for he wrote to me often that he had collected above one thousand and two hundred Horoscopes, which he proposed to insert in his third Astrological and compleat Calendar, endeavouring to prove thereby the truth of some Astrological Aphorisms. As for instance, That the kind Planets Jupiter and Venus, being in a Conjunction, especially in the eighth house, promised a long life, and a great number of years (above threescore and ten). And also, that the bright Star Formabant in the Constellation of Aquarius, being in the eighth house, rendered a man celebrated and famous after his death: And also, that the Dragon's Tail in the first house of the Heavens threatened that a person should be born either blind of one eye, or crooked. Not to mention a great many other such maxims. But all this, together with his Library, which was so large that hardly any private person in all Pomerania was possessed of the like, especially with regard to Mathematical, Historical, and Physical Books, perished in the flames, that destroyed the City of Stargard."

(7) Witte, Memor. Medicorum, Decad. I. pag. 81.

[D] He got money by drawing of Horoscopes.] The Bohemians and Polanders were those that paid him most liberally. Diversæ sæpe nationes ad eum confluebant, & ob multa experimenta nominisque celebritatem judicium de suis genituris ab eo posebant Germani & exteri, præsertim Bohemi & Poloni, quorum liberalitatem præ reliquis prædicabat (8). i. e. "Several nations referred to him, and on account of his numerous experiments, and the reputation he had gained, the Germans and the Foreigners desired him to draw Horoscopes, but especially the Bohemians, and the Polanders, whose generosity he extolled above that of any other nations." And as he was one of those who make much of themselves, he spared his eyes that they might be of use to him in his old age, and therefore he made use of the assistance of his friend Eichstadius, who also meddled with Astrology: he gave him his Horoscopes to calculate, and asked him his advice of them. Et quia in sua ingravescente ætate parcere oculis, & ad plures annos eorum usum reservare volebat, haud raro a me petiit, ut sibi ad calculum geniturarum perficiendum, & aliquod breve judicium de iis ferendum subvenirem, cui lubens annui (9).

(9) Ibid.

Art [E]. The prediction he published against the Turks did not prove true in the event [F]. He [E] He acted with . . . caution . . . that he might not too much expose the uncertainty of his art.] He would never work for those that could not tell him exactly at what hour they were born, and he chose rather to lose what money he might have received from them, than to run the risk of exposing his reputation. Numquam illis γινώσκων suum adornare volebat, qui sine cognita nati-vitatis hora ad eum accedebant; maluitque dignitati Artis, quam pecuniæ turpique lucro consulere (10). What he wrote to Eichstadius, proves that he was sincere, and that he really imagined Astrology was a venerable science, the dignity of which ought to be kept up, though it would cost something. He did not like that people should ask him, of what colour cloaths or horses ought to be, in order to be lucky; he perceived very well that he was in danger of being mistaken, if he pretended to answer such questions. He was angry with several Astrologers, who for want of such a cautiousness, expose judicial Astrology to contempt and censure; and upon the whole he wished he were rich enough to have no occasion to get a livelihood by this despicable trade. Sobriè quoque hanc artem tractari volebat: hinc aliquando in suis literis ita ad me perscripsit: Utinam amicis fortuna me intueretur oculis, ut sine Astrologiciis gerris senectuti meæ (quæ mihi cæcitate minatur) prospicere possim, nunquam γινώσκων calculo inquirerem. Interim quomodo multi plura inquirunt, & scire desiderant, quam ars nostra fert, aut patitur, aut habet, aut explicat, malo juxta conscientiam agere, quam Sanctam Uraniam nostram deturpare & velut stuprare, eique nigrum salem vel atram notam aspergere: quum alias tot superstitionibus Chaldaicis nostra Ars scateat, quas multi ex nostratibus adhuc mordicus tenent. Multi ex me scire laborant, qui colores vestimentorum & equorum fortunati sibi sint futuri? Hæc & alia monstra questionum sæpè albis dentibus rideo, sæpè etiam detestor. Amo enim virginitatem nostræ Artis, nec patiar eam ita nefario suppro pollui, ne Misastrologi hoste abusus in contemptum Astronomiæ nobis objicere possint (11).

(10) Ibid.

(11) Eichstadius, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. pag. 76.

i. e. "He was of opinion that this art must be managed with caution, whence he wrote to me sometimes after this manner: O that fortune would look kindly upon me! that without meddling with those astrological trifles, I might make provision for old age, which threatens me with blindness; and I would never draw any horoscope. In the mean time, when a great many persons enquire for, and desire to know more things, than are within the compass of our art, or more than it can explain, I choose rather to act with conscience, than to disgrace, and, as it were, to defile our sacred Astrology, and to cast a blemish upon it. For our art abounds still with a great number of Chaldean superstitions, which several of our countrymen are still obstinately fond of. A great many ask me, what colour of cloaths and horses will be lucky to them? Sometimes I laugh heartily at these and other such absurd questions, but I do also often abhor them. For I am enamoured with the virgin state of our art, nor can I suffer that it should be so abominably defiled, as to give the enemies of Astrology an opportunity to object to us those abuses to the contempt of the art itself." One can hardly imagine why a man, who had so much business in the practice of physic (12), and who never had any children, should fear to want bread in his old age, unless he drew horoscopes. This may give some weight to the slanders that were spread abroad against him, and persuade us that he made extravagant expences in keeping mistresses.

(12) Idem, Ibid. pag. 77.

[F] The prediction he published against the Turks, did not prove true in the event.] Monsieur Thomasius delivered an oration at Leipzig, October the 15th, 1665, at a solemn thanksgiving for the peace which had been concluded between the Emperor and the Ottoman Port. The Millenarians were very much displeas'd with this peace, because they had foretold that the end of the Turkish Empire was near at hand. They grounded their predictions on some passages in the scripture, and on a number of presages, which they explained after their own fancy. Non aliis armis instructi prodierunt, qui per hos annos credi a nobis volebat, fore brevi, ut jam delatum Ottomanidarum imperium cerneremus: non levi, opinor, cum sacræ Scripturæ profanatione, quam & generis diversissimi prædictionibus sociarent, & sui cerebri somnia cogere interpretari (13). i. e. "The same arguments were made use of by those, who during these last years would have us believe, that we should soon see the Ottoman Empire destroyed; which, in my opinion, was a great profanation of the holy scripture, which they put in the same rank with predictions of a quite different nature, and by which they would absolutely explain the idle fancies of their own brains." This is their constant practice, which they renew daily. Thomasius wonders, that after so many false predictions, that had been published of the pretended approaching ruin of the Ottomans, men did not prophesy with more caution. One would think however, that the more persons there are, that have been mistaken in their prophecies, the less reason there is to fear a mistake for the future; for after all, the word of God, who cannot impose upon us, has promised us the overthrow of that powerful Monarchy. And this it is which makes the new Prophets the bolder. The Orator does not insist upon this reason only; he does also imagine, that these Gentlemen are misled by an eager desire of enjoying the golden age here upon earth. Sed fortasse curiositati huic nihil potentiorum stimulum admoveat, quam nescio cujus aurei seculi per mille duraturi annos persuasio, ubi prostrigatis ab omni latere hostibus Deo dilecta cohors in otio sit suavissimo victura. Trahimur omnes beatæ bis in terris vitæ cupiditate. Itaque si qua nobis eam fama polliceatur, et sitientissimas aures adjungimus, inque omnes articulos temporis, qui favore huic affectui videntur, enixè vigilamus (14). i. e. "But there is perhaps nothing that raises this eager desire of knowing futurity more, than a persuasion of-I know not what golden age that is to last a thousand years, during which God's enemies being every where destroyed, the chosen people is to live in the most delightful ease. So that if any report promises us the reproach of that age, we hearken to it most earnestly, and watch with the utmost attention every circumstance, that seems to favour this desire." He represents afterwards to his audience, that there never was, during the XVIIth Century, any considerable war against the enemies of the true church, but some predictions were spread abroad, promising the entire overthrow either of the Pope, or of the Turks, or of both. The glory of this overthrow was promised first to Frederick King of Bohemia, then to Gustavus Adolphus, and afterwards to Charles Gustavus. Tantæ victoriæ lauream erant qui superioris Germanici bellæ tempore Friderico Palatino, erant qui Gustavo Adolpho Suecorum Regi, erant qui Carolo Gustavo destinarent, cum is Poloniam ante hos novem annos infestaret (15). i. e. "During the war in Upper Germany, some designed the glory of this great victory to Frederic Elector Palatine; others to Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden; others again to Charles Gustavus, when he was making war in Poland about nine years ago." He speaks afterwards of our David Herlicius, who towards the latter end of the XVIth Century had promised that the Empire of the Turks would soon be destroyed. Plenus talium in primis est Davidis Herlicii, in aliis fortasse prædictionibus, quam in hac felicioris Astrologi, libellus, quem sub finem ævi superioris, miserè Pannoniam vexante Turcâ, vulgavit. Ibi Danielelem, Apocalypsin, dictum Eliæ, præfagia Joannis Hilteni, Antonii Torquati Ferrariensis, Turcarum ipsorum, cursus siderum, conjunctiones planetarum, quasi in exercitum unum conscribi video, quo in animis hominum ultimo prælio cum Turcâ decidatur (16). i. e. "Such things are above all to be met with in a little book of David Herlicius, who perhaps was a happier Astrologer in other predictions than he was in this. He published that book towards the latter end of the last century, when Hungary was miserably oppressed by the Turks. Daniel, the revelation of St. John, a saying of Elijah, the presages of John Hiltenus, of Anthony Torquatus of Ferrara, and of the Turks themselves, with the course of the stars, and the conjunctions of the planets, are collected together there, as it were into an army, by which in the people's opinion, the Turks were to be destroyed in a last and decisive battle."

(13) Thomasius in Orationib. pag. 397.

(14) Idem, Ibid. pag. 395.

(15) Idem, Ibid.

(16) Ibid.

He was twice married, and very unhappy with his first wife [G]. It was perhaps his fault; for he was charged with being one of those whore-masters, who go and make love abroad. His friend does not clear him well of that charge [H]. There are [G] He was very unhappy with his first wife. God knows for what reason, says the writer of his life. Anno 1593 honestissimam virginem Reginam Hungers primarii civis Primislavienfis filiam in matrimonium accepit, cum qua tamen non adeo concorditer (causam novit Deus) vixit, & sine fructu matrimonii per 17 annos (17). i. e. "In the year 1593 he married a very honest virgin named Regina Hungers, who was the daughter of one of the most eminent citizens of Primislav; but he did not live in great union with her (God knows why) and they had no children during seventeen years they were married." Seventeen years are a pretty long term for persons that are not well matched together. We seldom meet in those who write the lives of illustrious persons, with the ingenuity we have here. I have perused a great many eulogies and lives of learned men, since I am about this work, but I hardly read in any of them that they do not live well with their wives; it is almost always asserted, that their marriage was blessed with the most happy union that can be wished for; and yet the neighbours very often know the contrary. I remember a particular which deserves some attention.

(17) Eichstadius, in Vita Herlicii, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. pag. 76.

A learned Roman (18) who died in the year 1640, had his wife under so strict a confinement, that he suffered no body to see her, nor her to see any body. Uxorem adeo amplius quadraginta annos quibus cum ea vixit custodius suis domi subjeclam habuit, ut mortalium nemini fas fuerit aspicere (19). He would not even suffer that the Curate of the parish should come to his house in the Easter holy-days, to take an account of the persons that lived in his family, and to make the aspersions with holy water, as it is the custom at Rome. He used to say, that when the Pope went by his house, he gave his blessing to the whole family, and that this was sufficient: and if the Curate pretended to insist, he was ill used, and threatened with a stick. Parochis, quibus mos est quotannis, Paschaliibus feriis, suis in parochiis capita hominum recensere, ac singulorum domus aqua laustrali conspergere, verborum contumeliis, ac metu etiam fustis, si ausi essent accedere, domi suae foribus abigebat, quod diceret, Pontificem Max. cum illac iter faceret, bene domui suae dicere, proinde nihil opus esse cuiusquam ad eam rem opera. It happened one day, that he asked the Curate of his parish leave for his wife not to keep Lent, upon which the Curate answered, that he would not grant it, unless he saw with his own eyes, in what condition the patient was: the husband replied aloud, that the distemper was in the womb; do you please, added he, to see the place where the distemper is? Nicius Erythraeus was present at that conversation. Atque ipsemet adfuit, cum in sacrario S. Spiritus in Saxia Parocho, neganti, non aliter se uxori ejus potestatem facturum vespere carnis in quadagesima, nisi suis ipse oculis, quo morbo affecta esset, aspexisset, palam multis audientibus, dixit, Uxori meae morbus in matrice invenit, placetne morbi locum aspicere? It is an easy matter to judge, whether such a man could live forty five years with his wife without any dispute or quarrel whatsoever: And yet this is asserted in his epitaph, which is inserted in page 275 of Prosper Mandolio's Bibliotheca Romana. Sed quod raro contingit cum Claudia Sebastiani Tiburtina uxore sine querela conjunctissime vixit annis XLV. i. e. "But, what happens very seldom, he lived forty five years, without any dispute, and in the strictest union with his wife Claudia Tiburtina, Sebastian's daughter." We must depend neither upon epitaphs, nor eulogies.

(18) His name was Jasper Caesilius.

(19) Nicius Erythraeus, Pinacoth. 1. pag. 229.

(20) Idem, ibid.

[H] His friend does not clear him well of that charge. Some, says he, assert that Herlicius loved young girls; his stars would have it so; but if one pretended to infer from thence, that this occasioned the unhappiness of his first marriage, I would answer in his defence, that he had no children by either of his wives, and that he used to say, he sowed in a barren field; and consequently, he designed only to be beloved by the young girls, but not to enjoy them. Ferunt nonnulli eum, quum aetas ferret, non abhorruisse à puellarum amoribus, id quod in genesi ejus conjunctio Veneris cum Marte pra se ferre videtur. Quod si quis hinc eum fortè sa- lacem, & hinc multas turbas in priore matrimonio ortas esse dixerit, ille sciat, D. HERLICIUM ex utraque sua conjuge nullos liberos vel Herlicium suscepisse, sed illorum exortem fuisse, atque in sterili agro (ut dicere solebat) laborasse, & proinde animo juvenicularum mutuo potius, quàm coitu captum esse (21). And in order to add strength to this apology he quotes Cardan, who proved by the great number of his children, that he was very lascivious. Hieron. Cardanus quidem in judicio suae geniturae se lascivum fuisse multitudine procreatorum liberorum probat (20). There was never a more wretched apology; for in the first place, Herlicius did not boast of his continence and moderation in the pleasures of love, but only complained that he cultivated a barren ground. He had laboured therefore, and confessed it himself. What inference can you draw then from his having no children? Will you infer from thence, that if he endeavoured to gain the young maiden's affection, it was only for the bare pleasure of being beloved by them, without pretending to any thing besides? But such a conclusion can by no means be drawn from the premises. In the second place, barren marriages are no proofs at all of less incontinency, on the contrary, the Physicians assert, that too great a lasciviousness is one of the causes that hinders a conception; and that the reason why some marriages are fruitless the first year, is, that the young married couple are too lavish of their embraces, so that before their first heat is abated, nature being too often disturbed and interrupted, cannot well perform her functions. Read Aristotle quoted by Montagne (23). (23) Montagne, Essais, liv. 3. chap. 5. pag. m. 120. "A man, says Aristotle, must come to his wife prudently and sparingly, lest if he should tickle her too lasciviously, she should go beyond the rules of reason. What he asserts as a rule of conscience, the Physicians prescribe as a necessary precaution to preserve one's health: namely, that a pleasure excessively hot, voluptuous and frequent, spoils the seed, and prevents conception. They assert farther, that this being naturally a faint congression, a man ought to come to it seldom, and only after a considerable interval, in order to furnish it with a proper and fruitful heat.

(21) Eichstadius, in Vita Herlicii, apud Witte, Memor. pag. 78.

(22) Idem, ibid.

(23) Montagne, Essais, liv. 3. chap. 5. pag. m. 120.

Quo rapiat sciens Venerem, interiusque recondat.

"That the woman may long after the veneral pleasure, and receive the seed in its proper place."

Laurence Joubert a famous Physician, designed one of the chapters (24) in his book of the popular errors, to refute those, who never cease to embrace each other, in order to have children, and those who do it but seldom, for fear of having too many. The ignorant vulgar, says he (25), is mistaken two contrary ways, acting intirely against their own intention. Some who do earnestly wish to have children, never cease to embrace their wives as often as they can; and others spare them for fear of having too numerous a family: whereas it happens quite otherwise than they expect. For what could be performed by one good bit, may be destroyed by the next. And besides, when they come to it so often, without being prompted by nature, the seed has not time to be thoroughly ripened, and perfect. Whence it proves unfruitful, and useles like water.

(24) It is the 6th of the 2d book.

(25) Joubert, Erreurs populaires, liv. 2. chap. 6. pag. m. 74.

It is very justly observed, that it is better not to have one's cause pleaded, than to commit it to an indifferent Counsellor. Eichstadius deserves to be compared with that person, whom Scipio the Prætor recommended to one who had a law-suit. Ille Siculus, cui Prætor Scipio patronum causæ dabat hospitem suum, hominem nobilem, sed admodum stultum: Quæso, inquit Prætor, adversario meo da illum patronum, deinde mihi neminem dederis (26). i. e. "A Sicilian, to whom Scipio the Prætor recommended a Counsellor to plead his cause, a man who was his guest, and of a noble birth indeed, but very silly, told him, pray, Prætor, recommend that man to my adversary, and I shall be content to have no body to plead my cause."

(26) Cicero, de Orat. lib. 2. cap. 69.

ate a great many books of his extant [I]. I forgot to observe that he was a very good Lutheran.

[I] There are a great many books of his extant.] Most of them are in the German tongue: Those that are in Latin, are either Poems, Orations, or Philophical and Physical Treatises. Witte gives a catalogue of them (27). (27) Memoriae Medicor Decad. 1. pag. 87.

HERMANT (GODFREY) one of the most celebrated writers in the seventeenth Century, was born at Beauvais February the 7th 1617. "From his infancy he gave proofs of a lively genius, and a happy memory, which qualities he enjoyed to the end of his life. He learnt the Greek and Latin Tongues with a wonderful readiness, and in an age in which children can hardly read and write. He was but twelve years old when Messire Augustin Potier Bishop and Count of Beauvais sent him to study Rhetoric under the Jesuits at Paris. When he had finished his course of Philosophy in the College of Navarre, and of Divinity in the Sorbonne, this good Prelate, who loved him, made him return to Beauvais, to teach the Belles Lettres and Rhetoric there. In the year 1640 he sent him again to Paris, to be tutor to his nephew Monsieur d'Ocquerre. Notwithstanding this employment he taught Philosophy in the College of Beauvais, that he might be admitted a member of the Sorbonne. He was made a Bachelor in the year 1641, and Canon of the Cathedral Church of Beauvais in the year 1642. None but his friends were all this time acquainted with his merit. But the Jesuits having presented a petition to the King in the year 1643; desiring to be incorporated with the University of Paris, Monsieur Hermant was chosen to defend the cause of the University;" and he wrote three or four books which gained him great reputation. Monsieur le Camus Bishop of Bellai congratulated him upon it in such a manner as deserves to be related [A]. He represented to him, that the resentment of the Jesuits was to be dreaded. But as Monsieur Hermant lived without any ambition, he did not give them an opportunity to exert their credit to his prejudice. "He was made Prior of the Sorbonne in the year 1644, and Licentiate and Rector in 1646. In the second year of his Rectorship, there happened one of those fortuitous events; which make some persons think favourably of Judicial Astrology [B], and prevent them

[A] Monsieur le Camus . . . congratulated him in such a manner as deserves to be related.] Monsieur Hermant published four pieces on this occasion; 1. The Observations on the Petition of the Jesuits; 2. The first Apology for the University; 3. The Academical Truths; 4. The second Apology; this last is a reply to the Answer which the Jesuits published. His name was not put to any of these four pieces. "Monsieur le Camus Bishop of Bellai having found that Monsieur Hermant was the author of them, went to meet him at Albiac-Houffe, where he lodged, and embracing him told him that he blessed God for giving him in his younger days, not only so much wit and learning, but also courage and strength of mind enough, not to dread the hatred and revenge of so formidable a society, as that was, against which he wrote. And yet all the wrong the Jesuits ever could do him, came only to this, namely, that they did not love him, and never spoke of him with any esteem, though he had been their pupil. His modesty screened him against their most dreadful resentment, nor could they oppose him in the pursuit of the first ecclesiastical dignities, which were all at their disposal, because he was so far from hunting after them, that he even refused them, when they were offered him, and he was pressed to accept of them (1)." To have no ambition is very often a safe sanctuary.

[B] There happened during this Rectorship one of those fortuitous events, which make some persons think favourably of Judaical Astrology.] Here follow the words of the memoirs, that have been communicated to us (2). "Marcellus, Professor of Rhetoric in the college of Lisieux, had composed a Latin elogy of Monsieur the Marshal de Gassion, who was shot with a musquet at the siege of Lens. Marcellus was to deliver it in a public oration, when an old Doctor who made it his chief business to read all the bills that were posted up, and being surprized to see one, in which it was advertised, that Marcellus was to deliver his oration that day at two of the clock in the afternoon, ran immediately to complain of it to Monsieur Hermant, and representing to him that it was not to be suffered, that a funeral oration of a man, who died in the pretended reformed religion, should be delivered in a Catholic university, he desired him to appoint a meeting, to determine this affair. Monsieur Hermant could not refuse his request, so that the assembly met, and it was resolved by a majority of votes, that they should go immediately to Marcellus, to forbid him to deliver Monsieur de Gassion's panegyrick. The astrologers were exceedingly pleased with this, and made all the world observe, that in the almanac of the celebrated Larrivey, amongst other predictions for that same month, there was written in a large character, LATIN LOST." That the reader may be the better acquainted with the circumstances of the prohibition that was notified to the Marshal de Gassion's panegyrist, I shall transcribe here a passage from du Boulai (3). "Monsr. Will. Marcel, Professor of Rhetoric, in the college of Lisieux, having advertised, by bills posted up, that he would deliver a funeral oration on Marshal de Gassion, the Rector anbad him to do it, because the said Gassion died an Huguenot. Upon which Monsieur James Desperiers, Principal of the same college, went with the said Marcel, to complain to the Chancellor of France, who referred them to the Rector's sentence: as appears from the deed extracted from the records of the German nation. 22 Decemb. (an. 1647) Ampl. D. Rector habitis Comitibus ex consilio D. D. Decanorum, & 4 Procuratorum prohibuit D. Guill. Marcel. Eloquentia Professorum in Collegio Lexovico declamare laudes & praecordia demortui Marefchalli nomine Gassion, quod prolixo programme publico notum fecerat omnibus studiosis; sed quia res erat pessimi exempli, & contra Religionem laudare hominem in haeresi mortuum, noluit Academia acquiescere instantissimis precibus D. Marcelli, neque D. Desperiers Gymnasiarchae Lexovici, qui provocarunt ad D. Seguiet Franciae Cancellarium, qui eos auditos ad Amplif. D. Rectorem hujus rei Judicem remisit. Et sic silentium illis impostum est." i. e. "December the 22d, 1647; the Rector in a general assembly, and by the advice of the Deans and of four Procurators, has forbidden William Marcel Professor of Rhetoric in the college of Lisieux to deliver publicly an oration in the praise and commendation of the late Marshal de Gassion; which he had given notice of to all the students, in a long advertisement publicly posted up; but as it was of a very bad example, and against religion, to commend a man who died an heretic, the university would not yield to the earnest request of Marcel,

(1) Taken from Memoirs, communicated to the bookseller.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Cesar Egasse du Boulai, Remarques sur la Dignité, Présence, &c. du Recteur de L'Université de Paris pag. 91.

“ them from condemning it without restrictions.” I shall give a compleat catalogue of the works which Mr. Hermant published [C], and I shall give some account of his controversy with Father Maimbourg [D]. He died suddenly in the street at Paris July the “ Marcel, nor of Monsieur Desperiers Principal of the college of Lisieux, who appealed thereupon to Monsieur Seguier Chancellor of France, by whom they were referred to the Rector, who is the proper judge in this affair; and thus they were both silenced.”

A COLLECTION of passages relating to scruples of the Church of Rome about commending of heretics.

How many reflections could not one make upon that spirit of policy, or of mistaken devotion, which makes the Church of Rome refuse to heretics the praises they deserve? But waving all reflections, I shall only take notice of some facts, and I begin with a passage in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, taken from the extract of a book of Daniel Francus, intituled, de Papistarum Indicibus Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum. i. e. “Of the Papist’s expurgatory Indexes and those of books prohibited.” “The author “ relates the rules, which the Inquisitors are obliged to follow, by which it appears, amongst other things, that they have a positive order to blot out, without any mercy, all the praises that are bestowed upon a heretic. These are things which we must see with our own eyes in order to believe them; otherwise, we should never imagine that religion is capable of putting such a byass upon our minds. Bellarmine was so fully persuaded, that it was a part of an orthodox character never to praise an heretic, that the author ridicules him for asserting positively †, that we do not find the Catholics ever commended the doctrine or the actions of those heretics. And yet he

(†) De Notis Ecclief. c. 6. art. 1.

“ proves against Bellarmine that his touch-stone is not very much to be depended upon, as appears by the eulogies, which Cochleus, Æneas Sylvius, Poggius of Florence, Clavius the Jesuit, Monsieur de l’Aubespine Bishop of Orleans, and Caramuel have bestowed upon Hereticks. But yet this acquaints us with the true genius of the Inquisition. It is something very remarkable; for the Inquisitors give orders to erase from all sorts of books the prefaces, dedications, and absolutely all that can in the least be to the honour of persons who are separated from the Church of Rome, without excepting the Princes themselves. Hence it is, that it is commanded in the Expurgatorii Indexes, that if any Historian said, such a day was born Christopher, the illustrious Duke of Wittemberg, Præclarus Dux Wertenbergensis, the title illustrious, præclarus shall be erased, which yet is of so little consequence, that it is given in Latin to the meanest scholar. They command also, that all the capital letters, which are usually prefixed to proper names, signifying that an heretic is styled a Doctor, Mr. a celebrated Divine, vir clarissimus, vir reverendus, a famous man, a reverend man, be immediately

(4) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for July 1685, Art. 2. pag. 776, &c.

(5) Gazette de Paris, of March 14, 1633.

(6) Journal des Savans, for Jan. 19, 1665, in the account of the book, de Divina Pjesmodia.

(7) This is not true; it is a long time since Demiter did this in his Antiquities. See also the same in Nicholas Vignier’s Treatise de l’Antechrist, of the Geneva edition 1613, in 8vo.

(8) Balzac, Extrait d’une Lettre a Mr. le Marquis de Montausier. It is to be met with at the end of his Letters to Mr. Conrard, p. 416. of the Dutch edition 1659.

“ blotted out. The Jesuit Serrarius asserts in his Mirror, that the praises of a heretic in the book of a Catholic, are an abomination unto God, in the same manner as those abominable offerings, which are mentioned in the XXIIId chapter of Deuteronomy, verse the 18th (4).” I have read in the Paris Gazette, that in the year 1633, the master of the sacred palace published at Rome a prohibition to keep any prose, or verse, or image, or picture, or medal made to the memory of Gustavus Adolphus King of Sweden (5). Monfr.

Sallo has the following reflections in his account of a work of Father Bona. This writer, says he (6), is the first that ever gave a catalogue of the authors he quotes, with his opinion of every one of them (7). There are some things pretty curious in this Critique. But let us observe, that we ought not to think it strange, that this good father should speak so ill in this Critique of the Heterodox Authors even upon subjects in which faith is not at all concerned; for he writes at Rome, where it is a crime to approve the least thing in the book of an heretick. Let us add to this these words of Balzac (8).

“ Madam de Saumaise desired me, by Mr. Conrard’s means, to write a few lines to the memory of her husband to be engraved on his tomb. But I was very far from promising it to her, being in a condition in which I could not have kept my word, and labouring under pains, which never abating, left no room for poetical thoughts. And besides, funerals, and all that relates to funeral rites

“ belonging to religion, I was of opinion that the epitaph of a Huguenot could not be written by a Catholic. I say, such an epitaph as this, which is to be placed in a Protestant Church, which ought to be written in a Christian stile, and in which it would be very difficult, on account of some word, upon which a favourable construction might be put, that the deceased was passed from this life to a better. Now, you know, my Lord, that it is a sin in our Church to use such expressions, and that they have been condemned at Rome in the writings of the greatest men of this age.”

Take notice that this maxim of Rome is not always practised, for if you consult James Laurent in the IIId and VIth Chapters of his Prodiga Jesuitarum liberalitatis, i. e. “the prodigal liberality of the Jesuits,” you will find there some praises that were bestowed by Roman Catholic authors upon the morals and learning of the Heterodox. See the margin (9).

[C] I shall give a compleat catalogue of the works which Monsieur Hermant published.] I make no scruple to stile it thus, because I shall transcribe from the Memoirs, which have been communicated to me. In the year 1644 he published an apology for his friend Monsieur Arnaud against a libel of F. Nouët intituled, Remarques judicieuses sur le livre de la Frequentee communion. i. e. “Rational remarks upon the books concerning the frequent taking of the sacrament.” In the year 1651, “he wrote under the name of St. Julien against the fantastical notions of Labadie a renegado Jesuit; and under that of Hieronimus ab Angelo Forti three Latin letters to Monsieur de Saintebeuve against Monsieur des Marets a Minister at Groeningen, who had taken some advantage from a Catechism concerning Grace, printed by a pious Bishop’s orders. He published St. Chrysostom’s Life in 1664, that of Athanasius in 1671, St. Basil’s Asceticks in 1663, and the Lives of St. Basil and of St. Gregorius Nazianzenus in 1674. He published Devout Conversations on St. Matthew in 1690. And since his death they have published his Devout Conversations on St. Mark, and a small Treatise of Silence. A person of quality having desired him to give him the Extracts he had made from the Councils, trusted an unfaithful writer with them, who kept a copy of them, and printed it at L’Isle in the year 1693 with this title, Clavis Discipline Ecclesiasticae, seu Index universalis totius Juris Ecclesiastici. i. e. “A Key to the Church Discipline, or an universal Index to the whole Ecclesiastical Law.” His Extracts are disgraced in that edition by such additions as are unworthy of Monsieur Hermant, and which might injure his reputation if the public were not told that they are not his, and especially the collection of the letters falsely ascribed to our first Popes. God grant, that we may once have his Ecclesiastical and Civil History of Beauvais, and the territories belonging to it, and that it may not be lost in the hands of those, who seized upon it to the prejudice of one of his friends, whom he trusted with it, charging him in his last will with the care of publishing it (10).”

[D] I shall give some account of his controversy with Father Maimbourg.] This Jesuit “having transcribed

“ in his History of Arianism all that was most curious and remarkable in the life of St. Athanasius, imagined that if he did but disgrace the author of it in a wicked and malicious preface, it would be sufficient to hide his plagiarism, and that no man in the world would think that he would have deigned to extract the least thing from a book, of which he spake with so much contempt. He censures Monsieur Hermant, 1. For transcribing the passages of the authors he quotes. 2. For giving at the end of his work an explanation of the most difficult points. 3. For saying, that it is difficult to say any thing more of the order and rank in which the members of the Council of Nice sat, except only that they were regulated by the simplicity, modesty and civility of the members themselves; and that the arguments which are alledged to prove the contrary, “ how

(9) Lorenzo Craffo has inserted the Eulogies of several Protestants, and amongst others of Gustavus Adolphus and of Salmasius, amongst the Eulogies of the great Captains, and of the learned men, which he published in Italy.

(10) Taken from the Memoirs quoted above.

the 11th 1690, as will appear by his epitaph. I shall transcribe it at length, though it was not put upon his tomb [E], for his enemies had malice and power enough to prevent it (a).

(a) Taken from Memoirs sent to the bookseller.

“ how plausible soever they appear, are not extremely strong, nor proper to determine the question. Monsr. Hermant publishing in the year 1674 the Lives of St. Basil and of St. Gregorius Nazianzenus, answered in his Preface Father Maimbourg’s three objections or cavils, and finishes his reply thus. “ But some persons will perhaps find fault with me for dwelling too long upon the refutation of a charge which has no solid foundation, and indeed, I might have despised it intirely. For it is certain that an author exposes himself to the indignation of all equitable persons, when having made an advantage of another’s labours, and enriched and adorned himself with their spoils, all his gratitude terminates in loading him with injuries. This will excuse me from giving a particular answer to the writer who has acted thus with regard to me; and it is enough for me to know, that there is no rule more universally admitted in the world, than this maxim of the Canonists, namely, that we ought first of all to make a restitution to them we have robbed. Spoliatus ante omnia restituendus. I must make a better use of my time, than to examine his blunders, which are perhaps more numerous, than he imagines. What he censures in my History of St. Athanasius will stand by the unconquerable strength of truth; it is not necessary that I should support it with new arguments, &c. (11).”

(11) Taken from the Memoirs quoted above.

(12) Ibid.

[E] I shall transcribe his epitaph, though it was not put upon his tomb.] Let us make use of the very words in the Memoirs we have quoted (12). “ A Canon, who was his relation, had composed an epitaph for him, which had been approved by the Chapter; but some false brother having given the Jesuits notice of it, they caused it to be suppressed by an Order from the court, at the very time when in the fight of the whole city of Paris, and to the disgrace of the Church, they were prophaning a whole chapel by raising a monument to Lulli . . . Here follows the epitaph which was designed for Monsieur Hermant.

“ Heic resurrectionem expectat
 “ GODEFRIDUS HERMANT BELLOVACUS, “ Eruditione clarus, fama celebris, virtute præstantior, “ Rektor quondam Academiæ Parisiensis “ strenuusque defensor,

HERMESIANAX, an elegiac Poet, born at Colophon, was honoured with a statue erected to him in his native place (a). See the remark (b) of the article LEONTIUM.

(a) Pausanias in Eliacis, (and not Iliacis, as we read in Vossius, de Hist. Græc. pag. 374.) Sive lib. 6. pag. 194.
 (b) The remark [A].

HERMIAS, a Philosopher of Alexandria in the fifth Century, studied with Proclus under Syrianus. He had two sons, Ammonius and Heliodorus, who were of his profession, and the former of whom became much more celebrated than the latter. Hermias was a very honest and plain man, of a mild temper. He was as laborious as a man can be; but he had an indifferent genius, and could not invent those strong arguments, which one who pretends to philosophize has occasion for. He had an admirable memory, and could repeat to a wonder the Lectures of his Professor, and what he read in books; this was what he excelled in; for if he had the objections or difficulties of an opponent to answer, he soon discovered his weakness. His system of Morality was very sound [A]. It is asserted that he did not approve of those diminutive and endearing expressions, which mothers

[A] His system of morality was very sound. We may judge of it by the maxims he followed when he bought any thing. He asserted that one must never make an advantage of the seller’s ignorance, but that one ought to acquaint him with the true price of his wares, when he does not know it. They who acted otherwise were according to him guilty of a very great injustice. They did not rob after the manner of Highwaymen, and with danger of their lives, but they perverted the law, and corrupted justice. He did not like this axiom volenti non fit injuria. i. e. “ There is no injury done to a man that consents to “ Doctor & Socius Sorbonicus, “ Hujus Ecclesiæ Canonicus,

 “ Amans disciplinæ si quis unquam sanctioris
 “ Excessi vir ingenii, stupendæ doctrinæ, facundiæ mirabilis “ Debebantur majora.
 “ Oblata recusavit modestiâ singulari.
 “ Impendit
 “ Doctis elucidata illustrium Patrum gesta, “ Piis Sacras in Matthæum & Marcum exercitationes, “ Civibus urbis hujus & Diocesis historiam.
 “ Omnibus seipsum, verbo, conversatione, charitate.
 “ Super impendit “ Egenis sua omnia.
 “ Repentinâ morte ereptus non improvisâ
 “ Parisiis istu sanguinis exanimatus viâ publicâ
 “ A. R. S. MDCXC. xi. Julii. Æt. LXXIII.
 “ Ad sacelli hujus cancellos tumulum designavit sibi, “ Dignum cum Ambrosio ratus requiescere sacerdotem “ ubi offerre consueverat.”

i. e. “ Here waits for the resurrection GODFREY HERMANT of Beauvais, famous for his learning, celebrated for his reputation, but more eminent still for his virtue. Being formerly Rector of the University, he was a strenuous assertor of her rights. He was a Doctor and Fellow of the Sorbonne, and a Canon of this Church. He was as great a lover as any man in the world of the holy discipline; he had an exalted mind, wonderful learning, and an admirable eloquence. He deserved greater preferments; but his great modesty made him refuse those that were offered him. He bestowed upon the learned clear accounts of the lives of the most illustrious Fathers, upon the Pious his observations on St. Matthew and St. Mark, upon his fellow-citizens the history of this city and diocesis: he sacrificed himself for all in his words, conversation, and charity: lastly he left all that was his to the poor. He was snatched away by a sudden but not unexpected death, and died in the street at Paris of a bloody-flux in July 11, 1690, in the 73d year of his age. He chose his tomb here in the Chancel of this Chapel, thinking with St. Ambrose, that it was proper a Priest should rest in the same place where he used to officiate.”

“ it.” He pretended that besides the injuries that are committed by mere force, there are others that are done without acting against the consent of those that suffer them. He used himself to practise this noble theory; for as he observed one day, that a man who was selling him a book to him did not put the whole value upon it, he acquainted him with it, and paid for the book more than he was asked for it. He did the same several other times, and whenever there was occasion for it (1). Και ὅχι ἀπαξ τὴν δικαιοσύνην ταύτην, ἢ τοῖς ἄλλοις ὑδὲ τις ἐπιστροφή· ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλὰκις, ὅσα τις συνήκασεν ἀγνοῦν τὸν πικρὰς ποῖλα τὸ δίκαιον τίμημα ἐπαδίκουτο, (1) Taken from Photius, pag. 1044.

(a) Ὁ δὲ ἀκούσας ἠγαγκτῆσαι, καὶ ἰπτιμίσει τὸν παιδικὸν τούτου ὑποκαρμίν. Photius, Biblioth. pag. 1044. mothers and nurses are wont to use with regard to children, and that he reproved his wife severely (a) on that account (b). (b) Taken from Photius, in the Extract of Damascius, pag. m. 1044.

(2) Photius, in Damascio, Biblioth. pag. 1044. ἰπιδίμντο. i. e. "Nor did he practise this kind of fame are very scarce. "justice once only, which others do not in the least mind, but several times, and as often as the feller Rara avis in terris nigroque simillima cygno. "acquainted him with it." Can any thing be imagined more worthy a Philosopher? The Christians who do the "A black swan is not half so rare a bird." (3) Juven. Sat. 6. ver. 164. Dryden.

HERODIAN, an eminent Greek Historian, flourished under the reigns of Severus, Caracalla, Heliogabalus, Alexander, and Maximin (a). His History contains eight books, and begins from the death of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher, and ends with the death of Balbinus and Maximin, and the beginning of the reign of Gordian. It was translated into Latin with great elegance by Angelus Politianus, and passed thro' several editions. Julius Capitolinus (b) charges him with favouring Maximin out of prejudice against the Emperor Alexander. Photius (c) tells us, that his style is elegant and perspicuous, and that he is scarce inferior to any Historian in his manner of writing. Isaac Casaubon (d), and John Henry Boecler (e) incline to acquit him of the imputation of partiality against Alexander cast upon him by Capitolinus. (d) In Notis ad Capitolinum in Maximinis. (e) In Præfatione in Herodianum, edit. Argentorati 1644 in 8vo.

HERODOTUS, an antient Greek Historian, was born at Halicarnassus, according to Pamphila cited by Aulus Gellius (a), in the first year of the seventy fourth Olympiad, since he was fifty years old at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and but four years of age when Xerxes invaded Greece. The name of his father was Lyxus, and that of his mother Dryo (b). The city of Halicarnassus being at that time under the dominion of Lygdamis, grandson of Artemisia Queen of Caria, Herodotus quitted his country in search after the liberty which is necessary to learned men, and retired to Samos, from whence he travelled into Egypt, Italy, and through all Greece; and in his travels acquired the knowledge of the origin and history of Nations. He then begun his History [A], and after having laboured in that work in the Isle of Samos, he returned to [A] His History. His principal design in it was, to write an account of the Persian war against the Greeks, from the reign of Cyrus to that of Xerxes; but he also extended it to the History of other nations. Lucian informs us (1), That our Author having left Caria to go into Greece, employed his thoughts in contriving measures, by which in a small time, and without much trouble, he might gain great reputation. He foresaw, that it would be tedious to go through the respective places, and recite them to the Athenians, Corinthians, Argives, and Lacedemonians. He thought it most proper to take the opportunity of their assembling all together; and accordingly recited his work at the Olympic Games; which rendered him more famous than even those, who had obtained the prizes. None were ignorant of his name, nor was there a single person in Greece, who had not either seen him at the Olympic Games, or heard those speak of him, who came thence; so that wherever he came, the people pointed to him with their Finger, saying, "This is that Herodotus, who has written the Persian wars in the Ionick Dialect; this is he, who has celebrated our victories." His work is divided into nine Books, each of which are distinguished by the name of one of the Muses. His style has been admired by all antiquity, and the best Judges of the modern Ages. With regard to the truth of his History, he has been accused by several Authors as faulty in that respect. Ctesias suspected him in his Histories of the Medes and Assyrians. And Manetho censured his account of Egypt; and it is said, that Thucydides had him in his eye, when he blames those Histories, which were writ for no other end but to divert the Reader. But that Historian did not apply this to our Author, but says in general of all Histories of that character. Strabo particularly accuses Herodotus of this fault, and tells us, that he trifles very agreeably, interweaving extraordinary events with his narration by way of ornament. Juvenal likewise aims at him in that passage (2):

(1) Du Pin, Bibliothèque Univ. Hist.

(2) Satyr 10.

————— Creditor olim
Velificatus Athos, & quicquid Grecia mendax Audet in Historia.

But none have ventured to attack him with so much freedom as Plutarch, who conceived a warm resentment against him for casting an odium upon his countrymen the Thebans. This he owns to be the motives of his writing that little Treatise of the Malignity of Herodotus (3), in which he accuses that Historian of having maliciously taxed the Honour not only of the Thebans and Corinthians, but almost all the Greeks, out of partiality to the Medes, and in order to raise the glory of his country higher in the person of Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, whose heroick Actions in the battle of Salamis he so exaggerates, that this Princess alone takes up the greatest part of his Narration. Plutarch owns, that it is one of the best written and most agreeable pieces, which can be read; but adds, that amidst the charms of his Narrative he makes his Readers swallow the poison of Detraction; and compares the Malignity, which he imputes to him, to Cantharides covered with Roses. Some are of opinion, that Plutarch's criticism is written with so much heat, that he seems possessed of all that ill nature, which he ascribes to his Antagonist. But La Mothe le Vayer (4) observes, that if we consider in what manner Herodotus speaks in his Urania of Themistocles, whom he accuses of Rapine and carrying on a correspondence with the Persians, it is not easy to acquit him of the suspicions of what Plutarch charges him with. Dion Chrysostom likewise (5), introduces our Author among the Corinthians, expecting from them a reward for his History, in which they had a great share; and tells us, that he had not yet falsified them. But because the Corinthians declared, that they would not purchase honour with money, he changed the account of what passed in the Sea-fight at Salamis, accusing Adimantus the Corinthian General of flying in the beginning of the battle, and betraying by that means the common cause of Greece. Dion adds a little afterwards, that he could not allow of what Herodotus has written upon this subject, the publick Epitaphs and Inscriptions on Sepulchres, erected by the consent of all Greece in the Island of Salamis, testifying against him. And he recites part of the same Epigrams of Simonides the Poet, which Plutarch had cited to shew Herodotus guilty of Prevarication. However, our Author has not wanted persons to defend him. Aldus Manutius, Joachim Camerarius, and Henry Stephens have written Apologies for him. And the long Voyages to the North or South, and to the East Indies, which have been made in the later times, have greatly justified his writings, and shewn a prodigious number of things related by him upon the authority of others, tho' doubted by himself, to be true. T.

(3) Περὶ τῆς Ἡεροδοτοῦ κακοδοξίας.

(4) Jugemens de Historiens Grecs & Latins.

(5) Orat. 37.

to his own country, and expelled the tyrant, but afterwards finding himself exposed to the envy of his fellow-citizens went to Thurium in Italy, where he died, though some say it was at Pella (c). The only remaining work of him is his History abovementioned; besides which he promised in two places of his first book to write the History of Assyria; but this never appeared, being probably prevented by his death; for if it had ever been published, it is scarce credible that none of the Antients should mention it. Aristotle indeed (d) blames Herodotus for saying that an eagle drank during the siege of Antioch, because, as he affirms, that bird, as well as those who have forked claws, never drinks. And this fact not being mentioned in all our author's nine books yet extant, some writers have conjectured, that Aristotle meant the History of Assyria, to which the siege of Nineveh properly related. There is ascribed to Herodotus a Life of Homer, printed at the end of his works; but there is no probability that this was written by the ancient Herodotus. The author of that Life does not agree with him with respect to the time when that Poet lived; for, he says, that Homer flourished CLXVIII years after the Trojan war, and DCLXII years before Xerxes's expedition into Greece. But Herodotus in his Euterpe affirms, that Homer and Hesiod preceded him CD years; and consequently they flourished at a greater distance of time from the taking of Troy. Besides, the style of this piece is very different from that of Herodotus, and the author mentions several things of Homer, which do not at all agree with what the Antients have said of that Poet; and he treats of his subject more like a modern Grammarian than an ancient Historian. Suidas mentions an Abridgment of Herodotus's History by Theopompus of Chios. There is so much resemblance between our Author and Homer, that Longinus (e) assures us, that none but Herodotus perfectly imitated that Prince of Poets; and that he alone is Ὀμηροειδέτατος. Cicero (f) styles him the Father of History. It was a monstrous error of James Gaultier the Jesuit, in his Chronographical Tables printed at Cologne in 1616, to place our author under Constantine the Great and his children.

(c) Idem.

(d) De Animal. lib. 8. cap. 18.

(e) In his Treatise of the Sublime.

(f) De Legibus, lib. 1.

(g) Hence it is that he styles himself Acropolis, in his Philosophies.

HEROLD (BASIL JOHN) was born at Hochstad (a) on the Danube in Suabia, in the year 1511. He applied himself to polite Literature, and went to Basil in the year 1539, where he studied at the same time Divinity and History. He married there, and was appointed Minister to a village of that Canton; but as the booksellers had found him proper for their service, they prevailed upon him to return to Basil in the year 1546. He prepared works for them with an incredible application; and it was to reward his continued labours, that the Magistrates of Basil presented him with the freedom of their city in the year 1556 (b). I shall give the titles of most of his works [A]. Lezana, who wrote the Annals of the Carmelites, has committed a very gross blunder when he mentioned this author [B]. Konig has made two writers of John Herold, and Basil John (b) Taken from Martin Hancklius, de Scripturis Rerum Romanarum, tom. 2. pag. 142.

[A] I shall give the titles of most of his works.]

(1) In the remark [C] of the article ERASMUS.

I have mentioned in another place (1) his Philosophies, five Declamatio pro Desid. Erasmo Rot. contra Dialogum famosum Anonymi cujusdam Medici. i. e. "The lover of falsities, or a Declamation for Erasmus against an infamous Dialogue of a certain anonymous Physician. This piece was printed at Basil in the year 1541 (2). His six Books Belli sacri Historia continuata, a continuation of the History of the holy war, was printed by William of Tyre in folio in the year 1560; they begin with the year 1185, and end at the year 1521, as also his Principes juventutis sive Panegyricus Ferdinando Archiduci Austriae dicatus, cum Historia Turcici belli anno 1556 gesti; i. e. "The prince of the youths, or a Panegyric offered to Ferdinand Arch-duke of Austria, together with the History of the war waged against the Turks in the year 1556." He translated several works into the German Tongue, of which you will find a Catalogue in the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca. His Pannoniae Chronologia or Chronology of Hungary is generally printed with Bonfidius's Decads. His Treatise de Germaniae veteris verae quam primam vocant locis antiquissimis; item de Romanorum in Rhetia littoralis stationibus, & hinc ortorum ibidem vicorum atque municipiorum hodie superstitem originibus. i. e. "Of the most ancient place of old true Germany, which they now call the first, and of the stations of the Romans in Rhetia or the Banks of the Danube, and of the origin of the Towns and Cities which do still subsist, and owe their Foundation to these Nations." This Treatise, I say, has been inserted in the first vol. of Simon Scharidius's Collection de Scripturis rerum Germanicarum, i. e. "Of the writers of the Affairs of Germany." Christopher Lehman (3) has criticized upon it in the first Book of his Chronicle of Spires; but there has been a vindication of Heraldus published. How laborious the latter was, will appear to any one who consults the Preface (4), which he has

(2) Gesnerus, in Biblioth. folio 425 verso.

(3) See Zeiller, De Historicis, Part 2. pag. 74.

(4) Gesner, Biblioth. fol. 425 verso gives a passage of it.

prefixed to the first Volume of Eugyppius's Treasures: He promises there a collection of Stratagems, and I find in Gesner's Epitome, that he has published six Chiliads or Thousands of it. He made a funeral Oration on the death of the Emperor Ferdinand, which was printed at Francfort in the year 1564. We must not forget to observe, that he published (5) the writings of 76 Authors under the Title of Orthodoxographi. i. e. "Orthodox writers," and an Hæresologia seu Syntagma veterum Theologorum tam Græcorum quam Latinorum numero 18, qui grassatas in Ecclesia Hæreses confutarunt, & præcipua Theologiae capita tractarunt (6). (6) At Basil in the year 1556. "and Latin, who have refuted the Heresies, which have raged in the Church, and who have treated of the chief subjects in Divinity."

(5) At Basil in the year 1555.

(6) At Basil in the year 1556.

[B] Lezana . . . has committed a very gross blunder, when he mentioned this Author.] He observes under the year 1159, that St. Antoninus was in the wrong to transcribe word for word a passage from John Heroldus, without refuting him. This passage contains a description of the first dress of the Carmelites. The Jesuit Papebroch has censured this blunder, observing that St. Antoninus flourished a whole Century before John Herold; for, adds he, St. Antoninus died in the year 1459, and the Principes juventutis, which Herold dedicated to the Arch-duke Ferdinand, was printed in the year 1557 (7). There is not a full Century between them; for we have some Books of Heroldus, printed in the year 1540; but yet Lezana was greatly mistaken. Here follows a question, which this Jesuit proposed to a Carmelite, who wrote against him (8). (8) Papebroch. An Joannes Heroldus Hochstensis, continuator belli sacri, cujus Continuationis singulos libros Catholicis Prælatibus dedicavit, semper cum laude etiam de religiosis mendicantibus locutus, sed in solis Carmelitis explodens enormem quem fingebant sese in Syria habuisse, monasteriorum ac Fratrum numerum; an, inquam Heroldus iste indignus sit qui citetur, tanquam infelissimus sedis Apostolicæ

(7) See Daniel Papebroch, Respons. ad Exhibita. Errorum, p. 153.

(8) Papebroch. Synopsi Quæst. curioforum, Art. 24. pag. 43.

(c) See Cave, Script. Eccles. Hist. Literar. Part 2. pag. 314, 315, of the Geneva edit. 1699.

John Herold ; he should not have distinguished the one from the other. There was in the fifteenth Century a Dominican Friar named JOHN HEROLDUS, a German by nation ; he was an able Divine, and a very good Preacher. He composed several books, which have been printed in different places. There was an edition of his works published at Mentz in the year 1612 in three volumes in quarto (c).

licæ hostis: esto juvenis sub nomine Heroldi Acropolitani, scripserit Apologiam pro Erasmo, inter prohibitos relatam. i. e. "Whether John Herold of Hochstad, who continued the History of the holy war, every part of which continuation he dedicated to some Catholick Prelate, and who always spoke with praise, even of the mendicant Fryars, but only rejected that immense number of Monasteries and

"Brethren, which the Carmelites feigned they had in Syria, whether, I say, this Herold is unworthy to be quoted, as being a most bitter enemy of the Apostolick See? though, indeed, in his youth, he wrote under the name of Herold of Acropolita an Apology for Erasmus, which is ranked amongst the prohibited Books."

HERWART (JOHN (GEORGE) Chancellor of Bavaria towards the beginning of the seventeenth Century, gained a reputation by the Apology he wrote for the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria against the falsities of Bzovius, whom he also charged with several other blunders. Scaliger judged him an indifferent Chronologist (a).

(a) See the Scaligeriana, under the word Chancellor, pag. m. 48.

Our Herwart was descended from a Patrician family, which came originally from Augsburg ; I shall give the title of a Chronological work he composed, and that of a book which his son published [A], and which contains a very particular opinion concerning the first Gods of the Heathens ; for the author maintains, that the Winds, the Magnetical Needle, &c. were the first Gods of the Egyptians, and that they were worshipped under mysterious names. There is a branch of the family of the Herwarts settled at Paris, where they hold a considerable rank (b).

(b) Monf. Bachelier Des-Marets, whom I have already mentioned above, quotation (3) of the article EPENDORF, has communicated to me almost all that I observe in this addition, both in the Text and in the Commentary.

[A] I shall give the Title of a Chronological work he composed, and that of a Book which his son published.] Chronologia nova, vera, & ad calculum astronomicum revocata. i. e. "A new and true Chronology, calculated from Astronomical Observations," printed at Munich in the year 1612, in 4to ; Part prima. Part the first. The second part was printed in the year 1626. Part altera quæ est Chronologicorum seu emendatæ temporum rationis, adversus incredibiles aliorum errores. i. e. "Part the second, which contains the Chronology reformed from the incredible errors of others," in 4to. You will see his son's Christian name in the following title, which I promise to transcribe. Admiranda Ethnica Theologiae Mytheria propalata, ubi lapidem magnetem antiquissimis passim nationibus pro Deo cultum, & artem qua navigationes magneticæ per univversum orbem instituerentur à veterum sacerdotibus sub involucris deorum deorumque, & aliarum perinde fabularum cortice summo studio occultatam esse noviter demonstratur. Accessit exacta temporum ratio adversus incredibiles Chronologiae vulgaris errores. Opus diu desideratum. Jo. Fredericus Herwart ab Hohenburg in Schuwindeck S. E. Bavariæ, &c. à Consiliis ex incompletis optimi parentis P. M. eruit monumentis, atque ad finem perduxit. i. e. "The wonderful Mytheries of the Heathen Theology unfolded ; shewing that the Loadstone has been worshipped every where by the most antient nation, as a God, and that the art of navigating over the whole world by the help of the Loadstone was most carefully hid by the Priests of the antients under the mysterious names of the Gods and Goddesses, and under the veil of such other Fables. To which is added, an exact account of times, against the incredible errors of the vulgar Chronology. A work that has been a great while wanted. Joh. Frederick Herwart of Hohenburg in Schuwindeck, counsellor to the Elector of Bavaria, has extracted it from the imperfect manuscript of his late father, and completed it." At Munich, 1626, in 4to. There is a great deal of learning in this work ; we find an Index prefixed to it, intitled, Tabula nauticæ & hieroglyphicæ descriptionis totius mundi vetustissima, quæ Theologiam Chaldaeorum Babylonis Ierogrammaton Ægypti, & Orphei Phrygiæ, nec non Magiæ, Sophiæque Zoroastri & Magorum Persidis ostendit originem. i. e. "An Index containing a description of the most antient navigation, and of the Hieroglyphicks used in the whole world ; which shews the origin of the Theology of the Chaldeans of Babylon, of the holy scribes in Egypt, and of Orpheus in Phrygia ; as also of the Magic and Wisdom of Zoroaster, and of Magi or Wise-men in Persia." Vossius's silence with regard to the Books I have mentioned here, is to be wondered at. That learned man does not say a word of them, neither in his collection of Chronology, nor in his large work of the origin of Idolatry, where he has collected a great many particulars concerning the Loadstone, and where he did not forget to observe, that the winds were worshipped as Gods. Did not he in the least know, that the two Herwarts both the father and the son were Authors ? This would be strange in a man of such an extensive reading. Or did he not care to quote them, though he were acquainted with their works ? This would not be less strange in an author, who loved so much to make a shew of his reading.

HESHUSIUS (TILEMANNUS) a Divine of the Augsburg Confession, born at Wesel [A] in the year 1526, gained a very indifferent reputation by his restless and violent temper. He was still very young when two considerable posts were conferred upon him at Heidelberg, namely that of Divinity Professor, and that of Preacher in the Church of the Holy Ghost. He did not perform his functions without occasioning a great confusion ; for there arose a terrible dispute between him and William Clebitius concerning the doctrine of the Eucharist. The Elector Palatine Frederic III, being persuaded that Melanchthon's opinion would be of great weight to put an end to this controversy, consulted him upon that subject. His answer exasperated Heshusius, who would not swerve a jot from Luther's opinions ; and as there was no likelihood to see an end of the injuries with which the parties loaded each other [B], as long as Heshusius should live

(1) Quenstedt, de Patris Viror. Illust. pag. 208.

[A] Born at Wesel.] According to Moreri, he was born at Ober Wesel, upper Wesel, on the Rhine in the Diocess of Treves. But Quenstadt (8), who asserts it was at Wesel in the dutchy of Cleves, deserves, I think, more credit.

[B] There was no likelihood to see an end of the injuries live at Heidelberg, he was commanded to leave that City. He went into Saxony, and published some polemical writings in the University of Iena. Being called into Prussia he taught Divinity at Koningsberg, till he was banished in the year 1577 with the Ministers of his faction. He had a violent dispute with Wigandus upon subjects of very little importance (a) [C]. He retired with his family to Lubec, and thence to Helmstadt, where he was made Professor of Divinity. He died there September the 25th 1588. He did strongly oppose the doctrine of Ubiquity in the Conference of Quellenburg held in the year 1583 [D]. Melchior Adam, from whom I have borrowed what I have been relating, gives us but a very superficial account of this man's actions. I advise them, who have a mind to see them related more at length, to consult Heshusius's Life written by

(a) Ingens inter ipsum & Wigandum dissidium fuit, exortum propter abstracti usum. Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 622.

(2) Publice post mortem auctoris, contraque voluntatem ejus editum exstat in Consil. Tb. Part 2. pag. 378. Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theol. pag. 622.

(3) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 622.

(4) Calvin. in dilucida Explicat. Janae Doctrinae de vera participatione, pag. 840. Traſſat. Theolog.

(5) Intituled, Aſſertio contra Bezanianam Exceſſivam Sacramentorum.

(6) Micraelius, Synagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 267.

(7) Micraelius, ibid.

(8) Wigandus Episcopus Pomezaniensis. Idem, ibid.

juries with which the Parties loaded each other.] Melanchthon's answer was composed in the year 1559; they published it after his death, without any regard to his intention (2). Heshusius fell in a furious passion against him, and forgot the respect he owed to his great Master. Heshusius itaque cum Lutheri de caena sacra sententiam mordicus retineret ac propugnaret: à principe Electore, ut finis effet convivorum & insectationum in sua urbe, dimissus offensusque vehementer judicio Melanchthonis de se, acerbe respondit, ac ne moro tuo quidem & bene merito praeceptorum pepercit (3). i. e. "Heshusius, who maintained and defended Luther's opinion concerning the Lord's Supper obstinately, was banished from the Town by the Elector; and being extremely offended at Melanchthon's judgment of him, he answered him passionately, nor did he in the least spare his Master, though he was dead, and to whom he was very much obliged." Calvin reproves him for his passion against Melanchthon. Paulisper expendant lectores, says he (4), quam atrociter Philippum Melanchthonem suum praecceptorem cujus memoriam sancte revereri debuerat, fugillet ac laceret Probrosus elogiis Philippum ita digito monstrat, ut videri possit data opera materiam ejus traducendi in scribendo libro captasse. i. e. "Let the Readers consider a little, how grossly he defames and abuses Philip Melanchthon, who was his Master, and whose memory he ought to have religiously revered . . . He leads him with such opprobrious language, that he seems to have taken an opportunity of writing that Book on purpose to traduce him."

[C] He had a violent dispute with Wigandus upon subjects of very little importance.] The origin of this dispute was as follows: Heshusius asserted in a Book against Beza (5), that the Flesh of Jesus Christ is to be worshipped in abstracto (6). Non solum in concreto dici debere, filium Dei esse adorandum, omnipotentem, & vivificum, sed etiam in abstracto carnem Christi esse adorandam: quia majestas adorationis sit carni communicata. i. e. "We ought to say not only, that the almighty and vivifying son of God is to be worshipped in concreto, that is, the Godhead being considered united with the human nature, but also that Christ's flesh is to be adored in abstracto, that is, being considered without that union, because the majesty of adoration is communicated to the flesh." Great clamours were raised against him on this account; it was pretended that he asserted, Jesus Christ's flesh is adorable in itself, without considering the hypostatical union. Quod in abstracto & in sua essentia caro Christi, etiam extra unionem considerata, sit adoranda (7). He denied that this was his opinion, and he explained his meaning. But his adversaries were not satisfied with this. Bishop Wigandus (8) asserted, that this proposition, Humanitas Christi in abstracto est adoranda, omnipotens, vivifica. i. e. "Christ's human nature considered in itself is adorable, almighty, and vivifying," that this proposition, I say, was dangerous. Heshusius maintained that he never asserted it, and explained his meaning again; but to no purpose: A Synod was assembled, in which Heshusius's expression was rejected, and Wigandus would even oblige him to make a public recantation; which Heshusius refusing to do, he was banished the country, though he promised to alter and correct the improper expressions that dropped from his pen. All the Ministers who endeavoured to support him, received the same treatment. The administrator of Prussia consulted in the year 1578 the Divines, who were met at Hertzburg, to draw up articles of union and agreement, and having received from them an answer that was favourable to Heshusius, he commanded Wigandus not to put an end to this controversy. This was the eleventh schism that happened in the Lutheran church (9). It is more useful, than some persons may imagine, to be acquainted with such histories; we learn by them to know by what factious spirit the authors of such controversies are animated.

[D] He did . . . oppose the doctrine of Ubiquity in the conference of Quellenburg, held in the year 1583.] This conference was held January the 14th, and 16th, 1583 (10), between the divines of his Highness the Elector of Saxony, and those of Brunswick. Heshusius was at the head of the latter. The acts of this dispute and conference were published. In eo (Colloquio) praecipuae partes demandatae à Theologis Brunsvicensibus Heshusio fuerunt, qui diuipendit negavit dogma illud generalis Ubiquitatis . . . in sacrae scripturae canonie haberi, neque inde posse demonstrari (11). i. e. "In this conference the divines of Brunswick committed the chief part to Heshusius, who openly denied that the doctrine of a general Ubiquity . . . was to be found in the holy scripture, and asserted that it could not be proved from it." Quenstedt pretends that Heshusius did not know the true state of the question, ascribing to his adversaries a doctrine which they did not hold, and which was a mere invention of his own brains. This is often the case in such controversies. Let us transcribe Quenstedt's words: they are historical with regard to our Doctor. Vesalia inferior vulgo Unter Wesel . . . urbs Cliviae clarissima, . . . excepit in hanc lucem editum . . . Tilemannum Heshusium Theologum Lutheranum insignem, multisque scriptis Didacticis & Polemicis contra Calvinianos clarum, qui ante Librum Concordiae defendit Omnipraesentiam Carnis Christi, postmodum verò non tam ipsam in Libro Concordiae de Majestate Christi hominis doctrinam, quam praconceptum cerebri sui idolum impugnavit, talem scilicet omnipraesentiam, quã substantia Carnis Christi sit localiter, diffusivè & objectivè in omnibus creaturis, cum qua portentosa ubiquitate nostris Ecclesiis nihil quicquam fuit commercii. Vide Concord. Concord. Hutteri, cap. XLVI. (12). i. e. "Lower Wesel . . . a famous city in the Duchy of Cleves . . . gave birth . . . to Tilemann Heshusius, a very eminent Lutheran Divine, who asserted the omnipotence of Christ's flesh, before the book of concord was published. But afterwards, he refused not so much the doctrine concerning the Majesty of the Man Christ, which is asserted in the book of Concord, as a vain fancy of his own brains, namely such an omnipresence, by which the substance of Christ's flesh is locally, extensively, diffusively, and objectively in all the creatures, which monstrous ubiquity our churches never dreamt of. See Hutterus's Concord of Concord, chap. 46." Micraelius pretends that Heshusius disputed only out of spite against the doctrine of Ubiquity. There was an assembly held to consider of a vindication that was to be published of the book of Concord, in which assembly measures were taken which Heshusius did not approve of. This was enough to exasperate his contradicting spirit, and to make him take up arms against the Ubiquitarians. Contra Calvinianos ore & calamo omnipraesentiam carnis Christi fortiter usque ad annum Christi 1582 defendit. Tandem cum nonnulli theologorum ad conscribendam pro Formula concordiae apologiam convenissent: ille suum ad arbitrium non omnia agi indignatus, majestatem Christi, libro Concordiae insertam, quam ubiquitatem generalem vocant, oppugnare cepit, & cum Dan. Hoffinanno, collega, orthodoxis eam sententiam affinxit, ac si substantiam carnis Christi extensive ac localiter in omnibus creaturis esse

(9) Taken from Micraelius, ibid.

(10) According to Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 622. Micraelius places it under the year 1585. I cite him below quotation (14).

(11) Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 622.

(12) Quenstedt, de Patriis Viror. Illust. pag. 622.

by his son-in-law [E]. Heshufius was four times banished [F], and he took care, if we may believe Calvin (b), not to receive any detriment by it. He has published several books [G]. They who mention to us a sect of the Heshufians, and who charge them with the opinion of Arius, deserve the utmost contempt [H], and esse dicent. Sic igitur proprii cerebri commentum impugnans, loco omnipresens introductum multipresensiam (13). i. e. "He had vigorously defended Christ's omnipresence against the Calvinists, both in his discourses and in his writings, till the year 1582. But at last, when some Divines were agreed about an apology for the formulary of union, Heshufius being exasperated because every thing was not done according to his own will, began to attack Christ's Majesty, as it is asserted under the name of general Ubiquity in the book of Concord, and with his colleague Dan. Hoffman, he ascribed to the orthodox an opinion, as though they asserted that Christ's flesh is extensively and locally present in every creature. Thus, attacking a fancy of his own brains, he supposes a presence in several places, instead of an omnipresence." Daniel Hoffman assisted him vigorously, and would not yield one single point in the conference of Quellenburg (14).

(b) See the remark [F].

(13) Micrælius, Syntag. Eccles. Hist. pag. 758.

(14) Nec pertinacia ejus in Quadenburgensi Colloquio anno 1585, frangi voluit. Idem, ibid. pag. 759.

(15) Acta Eruditor. Lipsens. Mense Junio 1684, pag. 288.

(16) That is to say, in the book which is intitled, Historia Ecclesiastica seculi à Christo nato sexti decimi supplementum, celeberrimum ex illo ævo Theologorum Epistolis ad Joannem, Erasum, & Philippum Marbachios constant. editum à Jo. Fechtio.

[E] Melchior Adam . . . gives us but a very superficial account of this man . . . I advise . . . to consult Heshufius's life . . . by his son-in-law. The authors of the Journal intitled Acta Eruditorum, published at Leipsic, were in the right to observe it (15). Tilemanni Heshufii vitam concisam admodum & mancam ad nos transmisit Melchior Adam, Vit. Germ. Theolog. p. 621. seq. multo locupletiore, eamque carmine heroico exarantam, & Heshufii commentariis in Esaiam adjectam generis D. Jo. Olearii: ubi & quartum, quod sustinendum illi fuit, mentionem reperies exilii; cujus historiam illustrabunt egregie quæ (16) Parte II. sub anno 1565. p. 182. seqq. tum in ipsius Heshufii, tum in aliorum epistolis leguntur. i. e. "Melchior Adam has given us but a short and very imperfect account of Tilemannus Heshufius, in his lives of the German Divines, p. 621, &c. We have a much fuller account of him written in heroic verse by his son-in-law John Olearius, and added to Heshufius's Commentary on Isaiah; you will find there an account of his fourth banishment, the history of which is wonderfully cleared up by what we read of in the letters of Heshufius and others, in the second part, under the year 1565, pag. 182, &c."

[F] Heshufius was four times banished. You may have observed in the passage from the Journal of Leipsic, which I have just now quoted; here follows a distich, which confirms the same particular, and which is not very honourable to this Doctor's memory.

*Queritur, Heshufi, quarta cur pulsus ab urbe;
In promptu causa est, seditiosus eras* (17).

(17) See the article ACRONIUS in the text.

"They ask, Heshufius, why you was banished from a fourth city? The reason of it is plain; you was a quarrelsome man."

(18) Calvin. Tractat. Theolog. pag. 842. col. 1.

The character Calvin gives us (18) of Heshufius does wonderfully confirm what is asserted in this distich. Illuc (19) eum rapit naturæ intemperies, vel quod videt in moderata docendi ratione nullum sibi laudis gradum relinquere, qui tamen ambitione totus ad insaniam usque flagret. Certè in suo libello turbulenti se ingenii hominem, præcipitis etiam audaciæ & temeritatis esse prodit . . . Concionatur de ingentibus suis periculis, qui semper non minus securè, quam lautè, delicias suas coluit. Prædicat multiplices arumnas, qui cum largos thesauros habeat domi repositos, semper amplis stipendiis suas operas vendiderit, omnia tamen solus ingurgitat. Verum quidem est, quum multis locis tranquillum nidum figere voluerit, sæpius propria inquietudine fuisse excussum. Sic Glosario (20), Rostochio, Heidelbergæ, Brema pulsus, Magdeburgum nuper concessit. Ac laudi quidem danda essent exilia, si pro constanti veritatis confessione solum vertere sæpius coactus esset: sed quum homo inexplerabili ambitione plenus, contentionibus & rixis deditus, immani verò ferocia ubique fuerit intolerabilis, non est cur queratur aliorum injuria se fuisse vexatum, qui sua importunitate molestias homini delicato graves exhibuit. Interea tamen providè sibi cavuit, ne damnosæ essent migrationes: quin etiam divitiæ ipsum magis animosum reddunt. i. e. "His violent temper brought him to this, or his

(19) That is to say, ad Paradoxæ, & opinionum absurditatem, i. e. "To paradoxes, and absurd opinions."

(20) I think it ought to have been Gulario.

"knowing, that he could not get any reputation by a moderate way of teaching, though he be ambitious even to madnes. And indeed he shews himself in his little book a turbulent man, of a desperate audaciousness and temerity. He boasts of the great dangers to which he has been exposed, though he treats himself delicately, living with as much security as splendor. He mentions his numerous misfortunes, who having large sums of money at home, always sold his labours for a great price, and yet enjoys all by himself alone. It is true indeed, that as he designed to lead a quiet life in several places, he was often banished from them because of his restless temper. Thus being banished from Goslar, Rostoch, Heidelberg and Bremen, he removed lately to Magdeburg. These banishments might be honourable to him, had he been obliged to remove from place to place for his constant confession of the truth. But as this man through his insatiable ambition, quarrelsome temper, and excessivefulness, was every where unsufferable, he ought not to complain that he was unjustly vexed, since by his own outrageousness he drew upon him those vexations, which indeed were hard for a man of a tender constitution. However, he took care not to suffer any damage by these changings of habitation; nay, his very riches render him more outrageous." We might infer from this passage, that Heshufius was banished above four times; for it is not observed there that he was banished from Iena, and then from Prussia; nor could this be observed, since these facts happened after this book of Calvin was written (21). He was expelled from Iena in the year 1573 (22), and went into Prussia, where he was made Bishop of Samia in Morlinus's stead.

(21) It was written in the year 1561.

(22) Micrælius, Syntag. Hist. Eccles. pag. 758.

[G] He has published several books. A Commentary on the Psalms, on Isaiah, and on all St. Paul's Epistles. A Treatise of the Lord's Supper, and of Justification. Affertio Testamenti Jesu Christi contra blasphemias Calvinistarum. i. e. "A Vindication of Christ's Testament, against the blasphemies of the Calvinists." Antidotum contra impium dogma Math. Flacii Illyrici, quo adserit quod peccatum originis sit substantia. i. e. "An Antidote against Math. Flacius Illyricus's impious opinion, who asserts that original sin is a Substance." De seruo hominis arbitrio, & conversione ejus per Dei gratiam, contra Synergie assertores. i. e. "Of man's will being enslaved and of his conversion by God's grace, against those who assert, that a man co-operates in his conversion." De vera Ecclesia, ejusque auctoritate. i. e. "Of the true Church and of her Authority. . . &c."

[H] They who mention to us a sect of the Heshufians . . . deserve the utmost contempt. I have more than once (23) given my opinion of those wretched Compilers of Catalogues of Heretics. The only voucher they have on this occasion is a Dialogue of Lindanus, in which are the following words (24): Heshufii, a Tilemanno Heshufio quem Calvinus Servetianum infamat, Boquinus Arrianum, Wilhelmus Cleinwitzius vero præter peccatum plurimis de fidei capitibus accusat: quibus hoc anno (25) sua ref-

(23) See the article BEZANITES.

pondit defensione objecta inficiatus, nisi quod illud Trinitas est unitas negat se meminisse an dixerit in lectionibus: cum ita discrete doceat de præsentia Christi corporis in cæna Domini objectione quinta. i. e. "The Heshufians are thus called from Tilemannus Heshufius, whom Calvin represents as a disciple of Servetus; Boquinus as an Arian, and Will. Cleinwitzius, besides the crime of embezzling money, charges him also with errors in several points of the Christian Faith. He answered them this year (1564) by denying the charges, adding that he did not remember he ever asserted in his lectures that the Trinity is an Unity, whereas he asserts it expressly in his Treatise of the Presence of Christ's Body, in the Sacrament, Objection the fifth." There are three things to be censured in this passage. I. It is an impertinent piece of injustice to charge a man with the heresies, of which his adversaries accuse him in the heat of the controversy. Has not Hunnius a Lutheran author

(24) Lindanus, in Dubitat. Dial. 2. pag. 135.

(25) That is to say the year 1564, which is the date of Lindanus's dedication.

and yet Moreri followed their account.

wrote a pretty large book in which he boasts that he has convicted Calvin of Judaism? And therefore tho' Calvin, Boquinus, and other such adversaries of Heshufius, being exasperated by his opprobrious language, ascribe Arian opinions to him, no man of sense will think this a sufficient reason to stile him an Arian. He will think, that such imputations may very well be the fruit of too great a leisure, which a man misemploys in examining too scrupulously every word of his enemy, and in putting a false construction upon them, with a design to find them heretical by far-fetched consequences. II. The injustice, which would only be impertinent, if a man did not know Heshufius's answers-becomes absolutely criminal, when it is known that he publicly denied those things, with which his adversaries charged him. Now Lindanus himself tells us that he knew this. III. Though this Divine had taught some heresies, it does not follow from thence that there is a sect of Heshufians in Germany. A Professor who teaches particular doctrines does not always make profelytes to them, much less to his disciples always separate from the Church, which is necessary to deserve the name of a sect.

Prateolus, upon the bare credit of Lindanus, has put the Heshufians in the catalogue of heretics. Father Gaultier (26) has done the same on the bare credit of (26) In Tabula Chronographica.

O imitatores servum pecus, ut mihi saepe Bilem, saepe jocum, vestri movere tumultus (27)!

(27) Horat. Epist. 19. lib. 1. ver. 19.

"Base imitators, slaves to others wills,
"How oft you move my frowns, how oft my smiles?" Creech.

HEYLIN (PETER) an eminent English writer in the seventeenth Century, was descended from an ancient family of his name at Pentrie-Heylin in Montgomeryshire, and second son of Henry Heylin, Gentleman (a), by Elizabeth, daughter of Francis Clampard of Wrotham in Kent (b). He was born at Burford in Oxfordshire November the 29th 1600(c), and educated in Grammar-learning in the free-school there, where he distinguished himself by several exercises both in prose and verse, particularly a Tragic-Comedy upon the wars and destruction of Troy, and other exercises historical (d). In 1613 (e), he was admitted into Hart-Hall in Oxford; and the next year stood for a Demy's place in Magdalen-College, but being very young, and the Fellows already pre-engaged, he was then put by, but the year following elected (f). In 1616 he wrote an English Tragedy, called Spurius, which was so generally approved of by the society, that Dr. Langton the President ordered it to be acted in his lodgings (g), but it was never printed (h). Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts October the 17th 1617 (i), he read every long vacation, till he was Master of Arts, Lectures on Cosmography in the common Refectory of the College, of which the first being performed in the latter end of July 1618, it was so well approved, that he was chosen Probationer-Fellow, and Moderator of the Senior Form in the Hall; and on July the 19th 1619 was admitted perpetual Fellow (k). July the 1st 1620 he took the degree of Master of Arts (l). The year following he published his Microcosmus: A Description of the Great World [A]. In 1623 he was ordained Deacon and Priest by Dr. Howson, Bishop of Oxford, at St. Aldate's Church in that city (m). In 1625 he made a tour to France for about five or six weeks, the particulars of which he wrote an account of, which was printed about thirty years after [B]. April the 24th 1627 he answered pro forma, upon these two questions, 1. An Ecclesia unquam fuerit invisibilis? i. e. "Whether the Church was ever invisible?" 2. An Ecclesia possit errare? i. e. "Whether the Church can err?" both which he determined negatively; which gave great offence [C]. In February 1627 he

(b) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 279. 2d edit.

(i) Idem, Fest. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 203.

(k) Barnard, page 87.

(l) Wood, Fest. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 216.

(m) Idem, Hist. & Antiquit. ubi supra, and Barnard, page 93.

was

[A] The year following he published his Microcosmus.] It was printed at Oxford 1622, and 1624 in 4to, and enlarged afterwards to a great folio, intitled, Cosmography in four books, &c. London 1652, 1664, 1677, 1682. Dr. John Barnard informs us (1), that the first edition was published November the 7th 1621: and the first copy was presented to Prince Charles, to whom it was dedicated, who received the author very graciously, being introduced by Sir Robert Carr, one of the Gentlemen of the Prince's Bed-Chamber, and afterwards Earl of Ancram. The first edition being highly approved, it was reprinted and enlarged in the second edition in 1624, and presented again to the Prince. But the book being afterwards put into King James I's hands by Dr. John Young Dean of Winchester, his Majesty was greatly pleased with it, till he fell upon a passage, wherein Mr. Heylin gave precedence to the French King, and stiled France the more famous Kingdom, which so offended him, that he immediately ordered the Lord Keeper to call in the Book. Mr. Heylin, then at Oxford, was informed of this by Dr. Young, and advised by him to repair to Court, that by the Prince's patronage he might pacify the King's resentment; but not knowing whether the Prince himself might not also be offended, he staid at Oxford, and by the advice of the Lord Danvers sent up an apology to Dr. Young, which was an explanation of his meaning upon the words in question. He alledged, that the error in one passage (2) was not his own, but the Printer's, who had put is instead of was; and that when he mentioned the precedence of France before England, besides that he did not speak of England as it then stood augmented by Scotland, he had it from Camden in his Remains. The King was satisfied with his apology; and Mr. Heylin took care, that the whole clause, which gave so much offence, should be left out of all his books (3).

[B] In 1625 he made a tour to France for about five or six weeks, the particulars of which he wrote an account of, which was printed about thirty years after.] The original of this account he presented to the Lord Danvers (4); but a copy of it he kept by him, and to correct a false copy which had been printed, he published it at London in 1656 in 4to. under this title. A full relation of two Journies: the one into the main Land of France; the other into some of the adjacent Islands. In five Books. In this relation he treats the French nation with great contempt and ridicule.

[C] Both which he determined negatively, which gave great offence.] In stating of the first question he tells us (5), that he "fell upon a different way from that of Dr. Prideaux the Professor in his lecture de Visibilitate Ecclesiae, and other Tractates of and about that time, in which the visibility of the Protestant Church (and consequently of the renowned Church of England) was no otherwise proved than by looking into the scattered conventicles of the Berengarian in Italy, the Waldenses in France, the Wickliffists in England, and the Hussites in Bohemia; which manner of proceeding not being liked by the Respondent, as that which utterly discontinued that succession of the hierarchy, which the Church of England claims from the very Apostles and their immediate successors, he rather chose to find out a visible Church

(3) Barnard, ubi supra, page 94-101.

(4) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 276.

(5) Appendix to the Advertisements on Mr. Sanderson's History.

in

(a) Theologo-Historicus: or the true Life of the most reverend Divine and excellent Historian Peter Heylin, D. D. Sub-Dean of Westminster. Written by his son-in-law John Barnard, D. D. pag. 75. edit. London 1683.

(b) Ibid. pag. 80.

(c) Ibid. pag. 74.

(d) Ibid. pag. 81, 82.

(e) Wood, Hist. & Antiquit. Universit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 203.

(f) Barnard, ubi supra, pag. 84, 85.

(g) Idem, pag. 86.

(1) Theologo-Historicus: or the true Life of the most reverend Divine and excellent Historian, Peter Heylin, D. D. pag. 89.

(2) Microcosmus, pag. 441. Line 1. edit. 1624.

was recommended by the Earl of Danby to Dr. William Laud, then Bishop of Bath and Wells, for his advancement in the Church (n); and in the latter end of 1628 he attended the Earl as Chaplain into the Isle of Guernsey, of which his Lordship was Governor; where continuing about three weeks, upon his return, he wrote an account of that voyage [D]. June the 13th 1629 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (o), and was appointed one of the Chaplains in ordinary to his Majesty by the interest of the Earl of Danby (p). In 1630 he preached on Aet-Sunday before the University of Oxford at St. Mary's on Matth. xiii. 25. [E]; and the same year resigned his Fellowship, having been married almost two years before [F]. In 1631 he published his History of St. George [G]; and in October the same year was presented by the King to the Rectory of Hemingford in Huntingdonshire; and on the first of November following his Majesty gave him a Prebend of Westminster. In 1632 (q) the King bestowed on him the Rectory of Houghton in the Bishoprick of Durham, worth near four hundred pounds per ann.; which he afterwards exchanged with Dr. Marshall for the Rectory of Alresford in Hampshire; which exchange he was commanded by his Majesty to make, that he might live nearer the Court (r). April the 13th 1633 he took the degree of Doctor

(n) See Dr. Heylin's Cyprianus Anglicus; or the Life and Death of William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1b. 3. ad ann. 1627.

(o) Wood, Festus Oxon. vol. 1. col. 247.

(p) Idem, Atben. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 277. and Barnard, pag. 120, 121.

(q) Wood, ubi supra.

(r) Barnard, pag. 142, 143.

of

“ in Asia, Ethiopia, Greece, Italy, yea Rome itself, “ as also in all the Western Provinces, then subject to the “ power of the Roman Bishop when he was the chief “ Patriarch.” He observed likewise in his Disputation, that the writers of the Romish Church, even Bellarmin himself, had stood up as cordially in maintenance of some fundamental points of the Christian Faith, against Anti-Trinitarians, Anabaptists, and other heretics of these last ages, or other learned men of the Protestant Churches; which point Mr. Heylin closed up with these words; utinam quod ipse de Calvino, sic semper errasset nobilissimus Cardinalis. These words so exasperated the Professor, that he called our author Papicola, Bellarminianus, Pontificus (6). This raised a great clamour against Heylin for the present, which Dr. Prideaux increased the Monday after, when Mr. Heylin opposed Mr. William Hayes of Magdalen Hall, at which time he was again treated as a Papist by the Professor in the public school of Divinity. On the 5th of August following Mr. Edward Reynolds, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, preaching to the University in the Chapel of Merton College, of which he was a Fellow, touched upon the passages, which had happened between Dr. Prideaux and Mr. Heylin, in order to expose the latter to censure (7); who to clear himself from the suspicion of Popery, in November following preached before the King on John iv. 20, in which sermon he declared with great zeal against the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome (8).

(6) Barnard, pag. 108, 109.

(7) Wood, ubi supra, col. 276.

(8) Barnard, pag. 111.

[D] Upon his return he wrote an account of that voyage.] It was printed in his Full Relation of two Journeys abovementioned.

[E] In 1630 he preached on Aet-Sunday before the University of Oxford at St. Mary's on Matth. xiii. 25.] In this sermon, says Mr. Wood (9), “ he discovered “ the great mystery of iniquity, which lay hid under “ the specious project of the Feoffees for buying in of “ Impropriations, and was the first who gave notice “ of the danger of it to the undeceiving of the people. “ It made much noise, and brought to him more “ envy.” The Reader may consult Prynne's Canterbury's Doom. p. 386. and Dr. Heylin's History of the Life and Death of Archbishop Laud, L. III. p. 210.

(9) Col. 277.

[F] The same year he resigned his fellowship, having been married almost two years before.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (10); and Dr. John Barnard (11) owns this clandestine marriage, and tells us (12), that though “ it was performed upon St. Simon “ and St. Jude's day between ten and eleven of the “ clock in the morning in his own College Chapel, “ in the presence of a sufficient number of witnesses “ of both sexes, and the wedding dinner kept in his “ own chamber (13);” yet all this while it was a marriage clandestine, a marriage in masquerade, a marriage inognito to the College, because the President and Fellows neither knew nor believed there was a true solemnization of marriage in their Chapel; and though some of them were invited to the wedding-dinner, they took the invitation to a merriment and not to a marriage. Indeed it was not clandestine against the Laws of our Church and Realm, because the usual ceremonies and formalities of both were performed in the solemnization betwixt the parties; but such marriage was expressly against the Laws and Statutes of the College-Founder, and much more for a married Fellow to keep his Fellowship after. The young Gentlewoman was Letitia, third Daughter

(10) Ibid.

(11) Pag. 17.

(12) Pag. 18, 19.

(13) Life of Dr. P. Heylin, by George Peck, pag. 13.

of Thomas Highgate of Heys Esq; (4).

(14) Barnard, pag. 114.

[G] In 1631 he published his History of St. George. It was printed with this title, The History of that most famous Saint or Soldier of Jesus Christ St. George of Cappadocia, asserted from the fictions of the middle ages of the Church, and opposition of the present. London 1631 and 1633 in 4to. To this was subjoined The Institution of the most noble order of St. George, named the Garter, and A Catalogue of all the Knights of the Garter from the first institution to this present; as also of the principal Officers thereto belonging. At the end of the edition in 1633 is A Review of the whole work, consisting of additions and emendations. On the 2d of February 1633, the author was introduced by Dr. Laud, then Bishop of London, to the King at Whitehall, to whom he presented this History, which his Majesty graciously received. He afterwards presented several copies to all such Knights of the Garter and men of eminence, as were then in London, and was received by them all with great respect, except by Archbishop Abbot and William Earl of Exeter, the former disliking the argument, and the other treating him as a begging scholar (15). Soon after this History was attacked by a Discourse of Dr. George Hakewill, which, as our author says (16), was full of most base and malicious calumnies, both against the person and religion of the author. Whereupon his Majesty having received notice of it from Bishop Laud, (who had a copy of it sent to him from Oxford by Dr. William Smith the Vicechancellor, and he from Dr. Hakewill to be approved before it was sent to the press) commanded Mr. Heylin to consider of the matter, and withal sent him to Windsor to search into the records of the Order of the Garter there. The command he immediately obeyed, and accordingly published a second edition of the History in 1633, wherein he endeavoured to answer all Dr. Hakewill's objections. Upon the publishing of this, he heard no more of the Doctor till a second edition of that writer's Apology or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God in the Government of the World, wherein Mr. Heylin found a Retraction of the passages, which related to St. George. However, though the Doctor thought proper to continue silent rather than to reply, he about the same time acquainted his friends what his sentiments were of the Second Edition of the History of St. George, in several Letters; in one of which he writes thus (17). In the second impression of this book [The History of St. George] where he hath occasion to speak of the Roman writers, especially the legendaries, he magnifies them more, and when he mentions our men, he vilifies them more than he did in his first edition. But the matter is not much, what he saith of the one or of the other, the condition of the man being such, that his word hardly possesseth either for commendation or slander, &c. From this History of St. George is taken a little Pamphlet, intitled, The History of that most famous Saint and Soldier of St. George of Cappadocia, &c. London 1661 in 7 sheets in 4to. and another for the most part, intitled, The History of the Life and Martyrdom of St. George the titular Patron of England, &c. London 1644 in eight sheets in 4^o, written in verse by Thomas Lowick Gent. And many things are taken thence with due acknowledgment by Elias Ashmole Esq; in his Institution, Laws, and Ceremonies of the most noble Order of the Garter. London 1672 in fol.

(15) Barnard, pag. 124. and Wood, col. 279, 280.

(16) Appendix to the Advertisements on Sanderson's History.

(17) See Sanderson's Post haste. A Reply to Petrus's Appendix to his Treatise, intitled, Respondet Petrus, &c. London 1658 in 4to, pag. 13.

(1) Wood, Faſti of Divinity (s) [H].
Oxon. vol. 1.
col. 258.

(1) Barnard, pag.
172, 173, 174.

(2) Idem, pag.
174. and Wood,
Alben. Oxon.
vol. 2. col. 278.

In 1636 he published his History of the Sabbath [I], and his Answer to the Bishop of Lincoln's Letter to the Vicar of Grantham [K], and wrote two other Tracts [L]; and the year following published his Antidotum Lincolnienſe [M]. Upon the ſuſpenſion and imprifonment of Dr. John Williams Biſhop of Lincoln, and Dean of Weſtmiſter, he was choſen Treaſurer of the Church of Weſtmiſter; and preſented by his brethren the Prebendaries to the Rectory of Iſlip near Oxford, worth about two hundred pounds per ann. (t), which in 1638 he exchanged for that of South-Warnborough in Hampſhire (u); and the ſame year was put into the Commiſſion of the Peace for that County (w). In 1639 he was employed by Archbiſhop Laud to tranſlate (w) Wood, ib'd the Scots Liturgy into Latin; and on April the 10th 1640 he was choſen by the College of Weſtmiſter their Clerk to ſit in Convocation (x); but was ſoon after brought (x) Barnard, pag. 177. into trouble by his old antagoniſt Biſhop Williams, and William Prynne [N]. He re-tired

• Appendix to the 2d Part of his Examen Hiſtoricum.

† When Dr.
Heylin took his degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1627.

[H] Took the degree of Doctor of Divinity.] Upon this occaſion he maintained the affirmative of theſe three queſtions. I. An Eccleſia habeat auctoritatem in determinandis fidei controverſiſ? i. e. “Whether the Church hath authority in determining Controverſies of Faith?” II. An Eccleſia habeat auctoritatem interpretandi Scripturas ſacras? i. e. “Whether the Church hath authority of interpreting the holy Scriptures?” III. An Eccleſia habeat auctoritatem decernendi Ritus & Ceremonias? i. e. “Whether the Church hath authority of appointing Rites and Ceremonies?” Our author tells us * that Dr. Prideaux was as little pleaſed with theſe queſtions, and the reſpondent ſtating of them, as he was with the former †. And therefore to create the greater odium, he openly declared that the reſpondent had falſified the public doctrine of the Church, and charged the article with that ſentence, viz. Habet Eccleſia Ritus ſive Ceremonias, &c. which was not found in the whole body of it. And for proof thereof he read the article out of a book, which lay before him, beginning thus, Non licet Eccleſiæ quicquam inſtituere quod verbo Dei ſcripto adverſetur, &c. To which the reſpondent readily answered, that he perceived by the bigness of the book, which lay on the Doctor's cuſhion, that he had read that article out of the Harmony of Confessions, published at Geneva 1612, which therein followed the edition of the articles in the time of King Edward VI, anno 1552, in which that ſentence was not found; but that it was otherwiſe in the articles agreed on in the Convocation anno 1562, to which moſt of us had ſubſcribed in our ſeveral places. But the Doctor ſtill perſiſting upon that point, and the reſpondent ſeeing ſome unſatisfiedneſs in the greateſt part of the auditory, he called on one Mr. Weſtly, (who formerly had been his Chamberfellow in Magdalen College) to ſtep to the next Bookſeller's ſhop for a Book of Articles; which being obſerved by the Doctor, he declared himſelf very willing to decline any further proſecution of that particular, and to go on directly to the diſputation. But the reſpondent was reſolved to proceed no further, uſque dum liberaverat animam ſuam ab iſta calumnia, as his own words were, till he had freed himſelf from that odious calumny. But it was not long before the coming of the book had put an end to that controverſy, out of which the reſpondent read the article in the Engliſh tongue, in his verbis, viz. The Church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, and authority in controverſies of faith, &c. which done, he delivered the book to one of the ſtanders-by, who deſired it of him, the book paſſing from one hand to another till all men were ſatisfied.” But Mr. Anthony Collins remarks upon being complained of to the King by Bp. Laud, Chancellor of the University, Dr. Prideaux was obliged to ſend up a proteſtation with letters to the Biſhop (19), in Auguſt following, but was ſo exaſperated at Dr. Heylin upon this account, that at the ſame time (the King being then at Woodſtock) he cauſed a paper to be ſpread about the court, relating to the affair in the laſt act; it very much tending to Dr. Heylin's diſgrace, who reſenting it, in October following, when his Maſtey's declaration concerning lawful ſports was published, and raiſed a great clamour againſt the King and Biſhop Laud, tranſlated Dr. Prideaux's Lecture upon the Sabbath, to which he prefixed a Preface, and published it in Hilary-Term 1634; by which Lecture Dr. Prideaux loſt much of his character among the Puritans (20).

[I] In 1636 he published his History of the Sabbath. It was twice printed at London in 4to that year, and written to ſatisfy thoſe, who turned the obſervation of the Lord's Day into a Jewiſh Sabbath, not allowing themſelves or others the ordinary liberties, or works of neceſſity which the Jews never ſcrupled (21).

[K] His Answer to the Biſhop of Lincoln's Letter to the Vicar of Grantham.] Dr. John Williams, Biſhop of Lincoln having published A Letter to the Vicar of Grantham, againſt placing the Communion-Table in the manner of an Altar; our author wrote the tract above-mentioned under this title: A Coal from the Altar: or an Answer to the Biſhop of Lincoln's Letter to the Vicar of Grantham. London 1636 in 4to. To which the Biſhop in 1637 returned an answer under this title; The holy Table, Name, and Thing, &c. pretending that it had been written long ago by a Miniſter in Lincolnſhire, in answer to Dr. Cole, a Divine in Queen Mary's reign.

[L] Two other Tracts.] The one intitled, A brief Diſcourſe by way of Letter touching the Form of Prayer appointed to be uſed by Preachers before their Sermons, Can. 55. written at the requeſt of the Biſhop of Wincheſter in 1636, and afterwards printed in the firſt part of his Eccleſia vindicata. The other is intitled, A brief and moderate Answer to the ſeditious and ſcandalous Challenge of Hen. Burton, late of Friday-ſtreet, in two ſermons preached by him on the 5th of November 1636, and in the Apology ſet before them. London 1637 in 4to.

[M] His Antidotum Lincolnienſe.] The whole title is as follows: Antidotum Lincolnienſe: or an Answer to a book intitled, The holy Table, Name, and Thing, &c. ſaid to be written long ago by a Miniſter in Lincolnſhire, and printed for the Dioceſe of Lincoln, anno 1637. Written and inſcribed to the grave, learned, and religious Clergie of the Dioceſe of Lincoln. By Peter Heylin, Chaplain in Ordinary to his Maſtey. London 1637 in 4to. It is dedicated to the King. The Impri-matur is dated May the 7th 1637. Another Answer likewise came out againſt the Biſhop's Holy Table, &c. intitled Two Looks over Lincoln: or a View of his Holy Table, &c. London 1641 in four ſheets and a half, written by Richard Day, who ſtiles himſelf a Miniſter of the Goſpel, but appears to be an enemy to the Ceremonies of the Church. In this Tract Dr. Heylin's Coal from the Altar is ſometimes animadverted upon.

[N] Brought into trouble by his old antagoniſt Biſhop Williams, and William Prynne.] The Doctor preaching on his courſe at Weſtmiſter-Abby, and exhorting Chriſtians to moderation, love, and charity among themſelves, for the preſervation of the public peace, although § Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the thirty nine Articles of the Church of England, Introducti-on, pag. 23.

(18) Alb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 278. and Hiſt. & An-tiquit. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 340.

(19) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiq. ibid.

(20) Idem, ibid. and Alb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 278.

(21) Idem, Alb. Oxon. ibid.

tired first to his living of Ailresford, and afterwards to Oxford; upon which in the beginning of 1643 the House of Commons voted him a Delinquent, and made an order for the sequestration of all his estate, and his excellent Library was carried to Portsmouth (y). At Oxford he was employed, by the King's command, in writing the Mercurius Aulicus, begun by Sir John Berkenhead. In 1645 he left Oxford, and travelled in disguise from place to place, himself and his family being in the greatest necessity (z); and the same year settled with them for some time at Winchester, till that city was taken; and in 1648 removed to Minster-Lovel in Oxfordshire, the seat of his elder brother, which he farmed for six years of his nephew Colonel Heylin; and cleared his

(y) Barnard, pag. 202, 203, 204. and Wood, Atten. Oxon. col. 273.

(z) Barnard, pag. 205, & seq.

although they differed in some opinions, made use of these words: "Is it not that we are so affected with our own opinions, that we condemn whatsoever shall opine the contrary; and so far wedded to our own wills, that when we have espoused a quarrel, neither the love of God, nor the God of love shall divorce us from it? Instead of hearkening to the voice of the church, every man hearkens to himself, and cares not, if the whole miscarry, so that himself may bravely carry out his own devices. Upon which stubborn height of pride what quarrels have been raised? What schisms in every corner of this our church? (to enquire no further,) some rather putting all into open tumult, than that they would conform to the lawful government, derived from Christ and his Apostles to these very times." At the speaking of these words, the Bishop of Lincoln sitting in the great pew knocked aloud with his staff upon the pulpit, saying, no more of that point, no more of that point, Peter. To whom the Doctor readily answered, I have a little more to say, my Lord, and then I have done; which was as follows: "Others coming into close and dangerous factions, because some points of speculative Divinity are otherwise maintained by some than they would have them. Also regardless of the common Peace, that rather than be quiet, we will quarrel with our blessed peacemaker for seeking to compose the differences, tho' to the prejudice of neither party. Thus do we foolishly divide our Saviour, and rent his sacred body on the least occasion, rarely conceiving that a difference in a point of judgment must needs draw after it a disjoining of the affections also, and that conclude at last in an open schism. Whereas diversity of opinions, if wisely managed, would rather tend to the discovery of the truth, than the disturbance of the church, and rather whet our industry than excite our passions. It was St. Cyprian's resolution, Neminem, licet aliter senserit, a communione amovere, not to suspend any man from the communion of the church, although the matter then debated, was, I take it, of more weight than any of the points now controverted: which moderation if the present age had attained unto, we had not then so often torn the church in pieces, nor by our frequent broils offered that injury and inhumanity to our Saviour's body, which was not offered to his garments." After the sermon was ended, Dr. Heylin took his friend Sir Robert Filmer and some other Gentlemen of quality, who were his auditors, to his house, where he immediately sealed up the book, which contained this sermon, and other notes, to which they also set their seals, that so there might not be the least alteration made in the sermon, nor any ground to suspect it, which was presently after sent to the Bishop, who kept it in his hands for some days, and then returned it untouched. This is the account of

(22) Pag. 192-196.

(23) Extraneus Vapulus; or the Observer rescued from the violent but vaine Assaults of Hamon L'Estrange Esq; &c. pag. 58, & seq.

Dr. John Barnard (22); but Dr. Helyn himself relates the latter part of the story with some different circumstances (23), and tells us, that as soon as he was brought back to his stall, the Bishop calling on Dr. Wilton, another of the Prebendaries, to bear witness of what passed between them, required the Doctor to deliver a copy of the sermon, to which the Doctor cheerfully yielded, and presently gave his Lordship the whole book of sermons, which he had then with him. The same day, as they came from the evening service, the Bishop sent one of his gentlemen to desire the Sub-Dean, Dr. Wilton, and Dr. Heylin, to come to his lodging; to which it was answered openly, and in a full cloyster, by Dr. Heylin, that he would not go; that he would meet his Lordship in either of the houses of Parliament, or either of the courts of Westminster-Hall, or the public Chapter of the Church, and would there answer any thing that he would charge him with; but that he would never shuffle up the business in the Bishop's lodging, or take a private satisfaction for a public baffle. He had scarce put off his church-vestment, when his friends the Bishop of Peterborough, and Sir Robert Filmer, who had heard all that had passed before, came to spend an hour with him; and not long after comes the Sub-Dean from the Bishop of Lincoln with the book of sermons, assuring him, that the Bishop meant him nothing but well; that he had read none of the sermons, but that which had been preached that morning; that he professed himself much beholden to him for committing into his hands so great a trust; and lastly, that since the Doctor would not come to receive the book, he had sent it to him. To which the Doctor made reply, that since the book was taken from him in the sight of hundreds; he would not otherwise receive it, than in the same place, or a place more public; that therefore he should carry back the book to him that sent it, to the end that he might read over all the rest of the sermons, and pick out of them what he could to the Doctor's disadvantage; that as he did not court his favours, or expect any thing from him, so neither did he fear his frown, or any further mischief, which he could do to him equal to what he had done already; and lastly that he was more ashamed of the poorness of this prostitution than at the insolencies of the morning: which being the best answer that the Sub-Dean could at that time obtain from him, he threw the book into the room, and so went his way. The Doctor understanding what reports had been spread abroad upon the accident, some saying that the Bishop had interrupted him for preaching against the Scots, some of whose commissioners were then present, others for preaching in defence of Transubstantiation, and others for Arminianism, he gave an account thereof to the King, and then transcribed a copy of the whole passage, which had been and was to have been spoken, and sent it in a letter to Mr. John White, of the Temple, whom he observed to hear the sermon, desiring him to communicate it to the Committee, that when he was to appear before them the second time, they might be satisfied in all things touching that particular. This address took so good an effect, that Mr. White, though most eagerly bent against the Doctor at his first appearance, did the business for him, reading the whole passage to that Committee, and testified what he saw and noted when he was at the sermon; and thereupon it was declared by the unanimous voice of all then present, that there was nothing in that passage which did not become an honest man to speak, and a good Christian to hear; and not only so, but that the Bishop was transported beyond his bounds, and failed in his accustomed prudence. And this perhaps both smoothed the way unto the Doctor for his next appearance, where he found better entertainment than he did at the first; and drew the Bishop into gentler and more moderate counsels. About the same time he was summoned to appear before the Committee for the Court of Justice, on the complaint of Mr. Prynne, who had joined him in a petition with the Lord Archbishop, as the chief agents and contrivers of all his sufferings (24); but though it was resolved upon the question on Tuesday April the 20th, 1641, that the sentences against Mr. Prynne in the Star-Chamber were illegal, and it was ordered, that the charge against the Doctor should be transmitted to the Committee for religion, to be considered of with such other charges and complaints as were come against him; yet after that time the Doctor never heard more of this business, nor of any other, which did or might create any trouble to him from the houses of Parliament, or any of the Committees or Members (25).

(24) Barnard, pag. 192-196.

(25) Id. Extraneus Vapulus, p. 57, 58.

his temporal estate from sequestration by composition with the Commissioners at Goldsmith's Hall. Thence several years after he removed to Abingdon in Berkshire, where he bought an house called Lacies Court. In 1657 he suffered in his estate by decimation. In 1660, upon his Majesty's return to his Kingdoms, he was restored to his Spiritualities, but never rose higher than the place of Sub-Dean of Westminster [O]. His writings are very numerous [P]. He died May the 8th 1662, and was interred before the Sub-Dean's Stall within the Choir of St. Peter's Church at Westminster, where he had a monument erected to him. Mr. Wood tells us (aa), that he was "a person endowed with " singular

(aa) Atb. Oxon.
vol. 2. col. 279.

[O] Never rose higher than the place of Subdeacon of Westminster.] Mr. Wood observes (26), that this was a wonder to many, and a great discontent to him and his; but the reason, says that Historian, being manifest to those, that well know the temper of the person, I shall forbear to make mention of that matter any further.

Dr. Barnard tells us (27), that he happened to be present when Dr. Cosins, Bishop of Durham, came to see Dr. Heylin, and said, "I wonder, brother Heylin, thou art not a Bishop, for we all know thou hast deserved it." To which he answered, Much good may it do the new Bishops I do not envy them, but wish they may do more than I have done.

[P] His writings are very numerous.] Besides those already mentioned he wrote the following. I. Theomacchia, a Comedy, written in 1618, but never printed.

(28) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 273. and Hist. & Antiquit. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 204.
ed (28). II. An Essay called Augustus, printed in 1682, and since inserted in his Cosmography. III. An uniform Book of Articles to be used by all Bishops or Archdeacons in their Visitations, London 1640 in 4to. IV. De Jure Paritatis Episcoporum, a manuscript written in 1640, upon a proposition in the House of Lords, whether Bishops should be of the Committee for the preparatory Examinations in the cause of Thomas Earl of Strafford. It was afterwards printed and inserted in his Historical and miscellaneous Tracts, London 1681 in fol. V. Reply to Dr. Hakewill's Dissertation touching the sacrifice of the Eucharist, London 1641 in 4to. VI. An Help to English History: containing a Succession of all the Kings of England, and the English Saxons, the Kings and Princes of Wales, &c. As also of all the Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, Marquises, and Earls within the said Dominions, in three Tables, London 1641 in 8vo. Published under the Name of Robert Hall, Gent. Several Additions to this Book were made by Christ. Wilkinson, a Bookseller living against St. Dunstan's Church in Fleet-street, London; the first Edition of which Additions came out in 1670 in 8^o, with the name of Pet. Heylin put to the book, who made use of Dr. Francis Godwin's Commentary of the Bishops of England, in his succession of Archbishops and Bishops, and of Ralph Brook's and Augustin Vincent's Catalogue of the Succession of the Kings, Dukes, Marquises, Earls, &c. Mr. Wood observes (29) that our Author is said to have written and published in the same year 1641, a Book entitled, Persecutio Undecima, &c. London 1641, 1648 in 4to and 1681 in fol. but that finding no such thing in the Doctor's Diary, which he had several times perused, he cannot affirm him to have been the Author. VII. History of Episcopacy, in two parts, London 1642 in 4to. Published under the name of Theophilus Churchman. This makes the second part of his Ecclesia Vindicata, &c. London 1657 in 4to. VIII. Historical Narration of Liturgies, &c. written in 1642, and afterwards printed in the first part of his Ecclesia Vindicata. IX. A Relation of Lord Ralph Hopton's Victory near to Bodmin in Cornwall, on the 19th of Jan. 1642, Oxford 1642-3 in one sheet in 4to. X. A Brief Relation of the remarkable Occurrences in the Northern Parts, viz. the Landing of the Queen's Majesty in the Bay of Burlington from Holland, and of the Repulse given to the Rebels at the Town of Newark, Oxford 1642 in 2 sheets in 4to. XI. A View of the Proceedings in the West for a Pacification. XII. A Letter to a Gentleman in Leicestershire about the Treaty at Uxbridge, shewing that all the Overtures, which have been made for Peace and Accommodation, have proceeded from his Majesty only, printed in 1643 in 4 sheets in 4to. XIII. The Round-heads Remembrances: or true and particular Relation of the great Defeat given to the Rebels by his Majesty's Subjects of Cornwall, under the Command of Sir Ralph Hopton, on Tuesday 16th of May 1643, printed 1643 in one sheet in 4to. This Pamphlet is generally said to have been written by Dr. Heylin (30).

(29) Atb. Oxon.
vol. 2. col. 281.

(30) Idem, ibid.
col. 221.

XIV. A Relation of the Proceedings of Sir John Gell, printed 1643 in 4to in a sheet and an half. This is supposed by Mr. Wood (31) to be the same with a (31) Col. 282. Pamphlet; intitled, Thieves, Thieves; or a Relation of Sir Jo. Gell's Proceedings in Derbyshire, in gathering up the Rents of the Lords and Gentlemen of that County by pretended Authority from the two Houses of Parliament, printed 1643 in 4to. XV. The black + Cross; shewing that the Londoners were the cause of this present Rebellion. XVI. The Rebels Catechism, composed in an easy and familiar way to let them see the heinousness of their Offence, &c. printed in 1643, in 4 sheets in 4to. XVII. Discourse in answer to the common, but groundless Clamour of the Papists nicknaming the Religion of the Church of England by the name of a Parliament Religion: Written in 1644 at the request of George Ashwell of Magdalen College in Oxford. But when the Book was printed, it had the following title; Parliament Power in Law for Religion: or an answer to that old and groundless Calumny of the Papists nicknaming, &c. Oxford 1645 in 6 sheets in 4to. In another edition printed at London 1603, in 7 sheets in 4to, it hath this title; The way of Reformation of the Church of England declared and justified against the Clammours of our Adversaries, reproaching the Religion here by Law established by the name of a Parliament Religion, &c. This was afterwards printed in the first part of our Author's Ecclesia Vindicata: XVIII. A brief Relation of the Death and Sufferings of the most reverend and renowned Prelate the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; with a copy of his Speech, and other passages on the Scaffold, more perfect than hath been hitherto printed. Oxford 1644 in 4 sheets in 4to. XIX. Bibliotheca Regia: or, the Royal Library, &c. London 1649, 1650, and 1659 in 8vo. Our Author's name is not put to it; but it is generally known to be his Collection from some of the works of King Charles I. In this Book is inserted the Conference between that King and the Marquis of Worcester at Ragland. XX. Stumbling block of Disobedience, &c. in answer to an Examination of the two last Sections in Calvin's Institutions against Sovereign Monarchy. Written in 1644, and printed at London 1658 in 4to with this title; The Stumbling-block of Disobedience and Rebellion, cunningly laid by Calvin in the Subjects way, discovered, censured, and amended. XXI. The Promised Seed, written in English Verse. XXII. The undeceiving the People in point of the Tithes, &c. London 1648, 1651. Published under the name of Pb. Treleinie: which is an Anagram for Peter Heylin. It was reprinted at London 1657 in the first Part of his Ecclesia Vindicata. XXIII. Theologia Veterum: The Sum of Christian Theology contained in the Creed, according to the Greeks and Latins, &c. London 1654 and 1673 in fol. XXIV. Full Relation of two Journies. The one into the main Land of France; the other into some of the adjacent Islands, in 5 Books, London 1656 in 4to. To this is subjoined A Survey of the Estate of the two Islands of Guernsey and Jersey, with the Isles depending, &c. in one Book. London 1656 in 4to. Our Author published both the Books, because a little before one William Leak, a Bookseller, published a false copy of them under the title of France painted to the Life, fathered it upon Richard Bignall (32). XXV. Observations on the History of the Reign of King Charles, published by Hamon L'Estrange, Esq; for Illustration of the story, &c. London 1656 in 8vo. upon the publishing of which Observations Mr. L'Estrange printed another Edition of the said History at London 1654 in fol. and at the end added a piece, intitled, The Observer observed, or Animadversions upon the Observations on the History of King Charles, &c. In answer to which Dr. Heylin published, XXVI. Extraneous Vapulans; or the Observer rescued from the violent but vain Assaults of Hamon L'Estrange, Esq; and

(32) See Heylin's Preface to his Extraneous Vapulans.

(bb) Ibid.

“ singular gifts, of a sharp and pregnant wit, and solid and clear judgment . . . a bold and undaunted man among his friends and foes, (though of very mean port and presence) and therefore by some of them he was accounted too high and proud for the function he professed. On all occasions he was a constant assertor of the Church’s right and the King’s prerogative, either in their afflicted or prosperous estate, a severe and vigorous opposer of Rebels and Schismatics, a despiser of envy, and in mind not at all discouraged.” Mr. Wood likewise observes (bb), that in some things he was too much a party man to be an Historian, and equally (cc), an enemy to Popery and Puritanism. Dr. Barnard informs us (dd), that he was of a middle stature, his face oval, his complexion florid, his hair short and curling, his eyes quick and sparkling, before he lost his sight; that he had a prodigious memory, not usually taking notes, or making

(cc) See Dr. Edw. Stillingfleet’s Several Conferences between a Romish Priest, a Fanatic Chaplain, and a Divine of the Church of England, &c. in answer to Tbo. Godden’s Dialogues, London 1679, in 8vo.

(13) See H. Hickman’s Preface to his Justification of the Fathers and Schoolmen &c. and Dr. Barnard’s Life of Dr. Heylin, pag. 237.

(34) Col. 285.

the Back Blows of Dr. Barnard, an Irish Dean. By a well wisher to the Author of the Observations on the History of the Reign of King Charles, London 1656 in 8vo. The Preface signed by our Author is dated at Lacies Court in Abingdon June the 7th 1656. XXVII. Ecclesia Vindicata; or the Church of England justified, 1. In the way and manner of her Reformation, &c. 2. In officiating by a publick Liturgy. 3. In prescribing a set form of Prayer to be used by Preachers before their Sermons. 4. In her Right and Patrimony of Tithes. 5. In retaining the Episcopal Government, and therewithal the Canonical Ordination of Priests and Deacons, London 1657 in 4to, dedicated to Mr. Edward Davys, Vicar of Shilton in Berkshire, formerly his Master in the Free School of Burford in Oxfordshire. It contains the several pieces abovementioned. XXVIII. Respondet Petrus; or the Answer of Peter Heylin, D. D. to so much of Dr. Bernard’s Book entitled, the Judgment of the late Primate of Ireland, &c. as he is made a Party by the said Lord Primate in the point of the Sabbath, &c. London 1658 in 4to. It was not burnt as it had been reported (33). XXIX. An Appendix in answer to certain passages in Mr. Sanderfon’s History of the Life and Reign of King Charles, &c. printed with respondet Petrus. Whereupon Will. Sanderfon, Esq; published a Pamphlet, intituled, Post-haste, a Reply to Peter’s Appendix to his Treatise, intituled, Respondet Petrus 1658 in 8vo in three sheets in 4to. XXX. Short View of the Life and Reign of King Charles (the second Monarch of Great Britain) from his Birth to his Burial, London 1658 in 8vo. This Life Mr. Wood (34) supposes to be the same with that, which was printed with and prefixed to Reliquiæ sacræ Carolinæ, printed at the Hague 1649 in 8vo. XXXI. Examens Historicum; or a Discovery and Examination of the Mistakes and Defects in some modern Histories, viz. 1. In the Church History of Britain, by Tho. Fuller. To which is added, An Apology of Dr. Jo. Cofin, Dean of Peterborough, in answer to some passages in the Church History of Britain, in which he finds himself concerned. 2. In the History of Mary Queen of Scots, and of her son King James VI.; The History of King James I. of Great Britain; and the History of King Charles I. from his Cradle to his Grave, by Will. Sanderfon, Esq; London 1658 in a large 8vo. To this is added, An Appendix in an Answer to some passages in a scurrilous Pamphlet called A Post-haste Reply, &c. by Will. Sanderfon, Esq; Soon after Dr. Thomas Fuller published a thin folio, intituled, The Appeal for injured Innocence, which was commonly bound up with the remaining Copies of his Church History in Quires; and Mr. Sanderfon wrote a Pamphlet, intituled, Peter pursued; or Dr. Heylin overtaken, arrested, and arraigned upon his three Appendixes: 1. Respondet Petrus, (35). 2. Answer to Post-Haste Reply (36). 3. Advertisements on three Histories, viz. of Mary Queen of Scots, King James, and King Charles, 1658 in 8 sheets in 4to. XXXII. The Parable of the Tares, expounded and applied in ten sermons, with three other sermons by the same Author. London 1659 and 1661 in 4to. XXXIII. Certamen Epitolaræ: or the Letter-Combat, managed by Peter Heylin, D. D. with 1, Mr. Baxter of Kidderminster. 2. Dr. Barnard of Grays-Inne. 3. Mr. Hickman of Mag. C. Oxon. and 4. J. H. (37) of the city of Westminster Esq; With 5, An Appendix to the same, in answer to some passages in Mr. Fuller’s late Appeal. London 1650 in 8vo. The Epistle prefixed to it, and addressed to his dear brethren, the poor remainders of the old regular and conformable Clergy of the Church of England, is dated at Lacies-Court in Abingdon May the

(35) Mr. Sanderfon here means the Appendix to Respondet Petrus.

(36) This hath no Appendix, and therefore Mr. Sanderfon is mistaken, since it is itself an Appendix to Examens Historicum, or Advertisements on three Histories.

(37) James Harrington, Author of the Oceana.

2d 1659. XXXIV. Historia Quinqu-Articularis: or a Declaration of the Judgment of the Western Churches, and more particularly of the Church of England, in the five controverted Points, reproached in these last times by the name of Arminianism. Collected in the way of an Historiall Narration out of the public acts and monuments, and most approved Authors of those severall Churches. By Peter Heylin. London 1660 in 4to. The Preface is dated at Lacies-Court in Abingdon December the 26th 1659. To this book is added a Postscript to the Reader, concerning some particulars in a scurrilous Pamphlet intituled, A Review of the Certamen Epitolaræ, &c. dated at Lacies-Court December the 29th 1659. The same year was published a book, intituled, Fratres in malo: or the matchless Couple represented in the Writings of Mr. Edward Bagshaw, and Mr. Henry Hickman, in Vindication of Dr. Heylin and Mr. Thomas Pierce. London 1660 in 4to. In the title-page it is said to be written by M. O. Bachelor of Arts; but it was universally supposed at that time, that Dr. Heylin or Mr. Pierce, or both, had an hand in it (38). Mr. (38) Wood, col. 285. Hickman wrote Animadversions upon our Author’s Historia Quinqu-Articularis; the first edition of which was printed at London 1661, and the second in the same city in 1674, with the following title. Historia Quinqu-Articularis Exarticulata; or Animadversions on Dr. Heylin’s Quinquarticular History: in which, 1. The Aspersions cast on foreign reformers are wiped off. 2. The Doctor’s manifold Contradictions are manifested. 3. The Doctrine of the Arminians in the five points is proved to be contrary to the Doctrine of the Reformed Church of England. By Henry Hickman, B. D. The same Edition corrected and enlarged. XXXV. A Sermon preached in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter’s in Westminster on Wednesday the 29th of May 1661, on Psalm xxxi. 21. London 1661 in 4to. XXXVI. History of the Reformation of the Church of England from the first Preparations to it made by King Henry VIII, until the legal settling and establishing of it under Queen Elizabeth, &c. London 1661, 1670, and 1674 in folio. It was answered in a book intituled Plus Ultra: or England’s Reformation needing to be reformed. Being an Examination of Dr. Heylin’s History of the Reformation of the Church of England, &c. wherein by laying together all that is there said by the Doctor about the Reformation of the Church, and by many Testimonies of Reverend Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, and by several Observations made upon the whole, it doth evidently appear, that the present State of the Church of England is no way to be rested in, but ought to proceed to a farther degree of perfection. Written by way of Letter to Dr. Heylin by H. N. O. J. Oxon. in 7 sheets in 4to. XXXVII. Cyprianus Anglicus: or the History of the Life and Death of William [Laud] Archbishop of Canterbury &c. London 1668 and 1671 in folio. XXXVIII. Aerius Redivivus: or the History of the Presbyterians. Containing the Beginning, Progress, and Successes of that Sect. Their Oppositions to Monarchical and Episcopal Government. Their Innovations in the Church; and their Imbroylments of the Kingdoms and Estates of Christendom in the pursuit of their Designs. From the year 1536 to the year 1647. By Peter Heylin, D. D. &c. London 1670 and 1672 in folio. It is dedicated by his son Henry Heylin to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled. The Doctor assures us in his Preface, that he “ adventures upon nothing but what is warranted by the testimony of unquestioned authors, from whose sense, says he, I shall never vary, though I may find it sometimes necessary not to use their words. And by so doing, I shall keep myself unto the rules of a right making collections out of authors, but committing what he read to memory; and that he was of great generosity and charity.

“right Historian, in delivering nothing but the truth, without omitting any thing for fear, or speaking any thing in favour of the adverse party, but as I shall be justified by good authors.” XXXIX. Historical and Miscellaneous Tracts, London 1681 in folio. Several of these are mentioned before; as 1. Ecclesia Vindicata. 2. History of the Sabbath in two Parts. 3. Historia Quinq- Articularis. 4. Stumbling-Block, &c. 5. Traſtatus de Jure Paritatis, &c. Dr. Heylin's Life is prefixed to this volume, written by George Vernon, Rector of Bourton on the Water in Gloucestershire; which being altered and mangled, says Mr. Wood (†), before it went to the press, by the Bishop of Lincoln,

T. Barlow, and the Bookseller that printed it, Henry Heylin son of our author made a protestation against it; and Dr. John Barnard, who married Dr. Heylin's daughter, wrote his Life to correct that of Vernon, who likewise drew up another Life, which he published at London 1682 in 8vo. Dr. Heylin wrote also A Discourse of the African Schism: and in 1637 at Archbishop Laud's desire, drew up The Judgment of Writers on those Texts of Scripture, in which the Jesuits found the Popedom and the Authority of the Roman Church; both which Pieces the Archbishop intended as materials towards his large Answer to Fiber the Jesuit; which was printed 1639 in folio. T.

(†) Col. 285. See likewise, col. 1025.

HICKES (GEORGE), the second son of William Hickes, the youngest son of ——— Hickes of Nefse near Nunnington in the parish of Stangrave in the East Riding of Yorkshire, Gentleman. His mother was a daughter of the Reverend Mr. Kay or Key Rector of Topcliffe in Yorkshire. His parents settled upon a large farm at Newsham in the parish of Kirkby Wiske near Thrusk in the North Riding, called Moorhouse, where their son George was born on June the 20th 1642. He was educated in the grammar school at North Allerton under Mr. Thomas Smelt, a very loyal man as well as a good schoolmaster; and was admitted in April 1659 Batteler in St. John's College Oxford. Soon after the Restoration of King Charles II he removed to Magdalen College where Dr. Henry Yarborough was his Tutor, under whom he gave such proofs of his great parts and progress in learning, that he had certainly been chosen Demy if he had been of a statutable County. February 24th 1662 he proceeded Bachelor of Arts, and immediately removing to Magdalen Hall he completed that degree by determination. On the 23d of May 1664 he was unanimously chosen Fellow of Lincoln College against three competitors, and one of them a Gentleman of the Savil Family. December the 8th in the year following he was admitted Master of Arts. And that Cambridge may have some small share in the honour of so great a man, he was July the 8th 1668 incorporated in the same degree at that University. June the 10th 1666, he was ordained a Deacon, and on December the 23d next following he was ordained a Priest, by Dr. Walter Blandford Bishop of Oxford. He became an eminent Tutor soon after, taking his Master of Arts degree, and discharged this office with great diligence and reputation for seven years, till he endangered his health, and was thereupon advised to travel about the country for its recovery. Sir George Wheeler, who had been his Pupil and had always a filial affection for him, took this opportunity of inviting him to accompany him in his travels. They set out in October 1673 and made the grand tour of France; after which in the same month next year they parted, Mr. Hickes being obliged to return to take his Bachelor of Divinity's degree. At Paris where he staid a considerable time he became acquainted with Mr. Henry [A] Justell, who in confidence told him many secret affairs, particularly that of the intended persecution of the Huguenots in France, and of a design in Holland and England to extirpate the Royal Family of

[A] Justell.] Dr. Hickes has left behind him an account of these matters in a letter to a friend: “The very obliging manner in which Mr. Justell received me, and the particular respect he professed for those of our nation, encouraged me to wait upon him again, when I found him alone. He then talked with great freedom of his acquaintance in England, most of which were great men, and of that party which were accounted not well affected to the crown. . . . As I acquainted him with the rout I intended to take in making the tour of France, he would have persuaded me to wait upon the honourable Mr. Algernoon Sydney, and young Mr. Hambden, who lived both together some where in Guien or Languedoc, at a place, the name of which I have now forgot, and who since have been unfortunately signalized by their different fates. But knowing how different my principles were from theirs, I told him I had particular reasons why I thought it not proper for me to wait upon them, one of which was, because I was to travel in company with others. . . . After my return to Paris, I never failed to visit him once a week . . . It happened once that talking of the many temples or Protestant churches that I observed were demolished in several places, he told me most of them were such as had been irregularly erected since the Edict of Nantes; and that the King, though he had acted very severely in razing

“such temples, yet he had not much violated the privileges granted by that Edict, because, as his phrase was, those temples were mal fondex. Then he proceeded to tell me, . . . Alas, Sir, as I am wont to talk in confidence with you, so I will tell you a secret that almost none of us know besides myself: Our extirpation, meaning the Protestants, is decreed, we must all be banished our country or turn Papiſts: I tell it you, because I intend to come into England, where I have many friends, and that when I come to see you among the rest, you may remember that I told it you. Upon this I asked him how long it would be before this sad persecution would be put in execution; he answered within four or five years at most, and remember, saith he again, that I foretold the time . . . Among other things he told me how many and inveterate enemies the King and Monarchy of England had in Holland, where a secret design had been long managing with the disaffected party in England, to extirpate the Royal Family of the Stuarts; and when I expressed my surprize and unwillingness to believe so strange and wicked a design, he told me again, that it was not so strange and incredible as I thought it, and that I was young enough to see it brought to pass . . . It was about the time the Bill of Exclusion was thrown out of the House of Lords, and the King had overcome the difficulties in which of the Stuarts, and committed to him his father's manuscript of the Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Universalis to be presented in his name to the University of Oxford; and when he delivered it to him he made him this complement, that he had long waited for a person to entrust with one of the greatest treasures he had, and now had met with one according to his heart's desire. After his return home May the 14th 1675 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, being about that time Rector of S. Ebbe's Church in Oxford. Not long after he received a letter from Dr. Jane Chaplain to Dr. Compton Bishop of London to tell him the Duke of Lauderdale had asked the Bishop if he knew Mr. Hickes Fellow of Lincoln College, and if his Lordship thought he would accept of being his Grace's Chaplain. He was very cautious at first of complying with this offer, because the Duke was then loaded by his enemies with most heavy reproaches, and said to be guilty of the most enormous vices. But Dr. Fell Bishop of Oxford assured him those scandalous reports were only the lies and malice of the Presbyterian and Republican Party; and upon his advice he returned answer to Dr. Jane, that he waited for his Grace's commands when he should attend upon him, and accordingly he was made the Duke's Chaplain by letters under hand and seal dated September the 15th 1676. In May 1677, his Grace being to be made High-Commissioner of Scotland took his Chaplain with him into that Kingdom, where he was received by many of the Nobility, and particularly by the Bishops with the greatest respect. In April 1678 the Lord Commissioner sent Mr. Hickes up to Court with Dr. Burnet Archbishop of Glasgow to lay before the King the proceedings of the Faction in Scotland, which began then to be turbulent and audacious; as also to undeceive the Archbishop of Canterbury and the English Prelates as to the scandalous and false reports which the malice of the adverse party had raised against the Duke. In the latter end of the next month he returned with the Archbishop of Glasgow to Scotland, when he was desired by the worthy Dr. Sharp Archbishop of St. Andrews to accept the degree of Doctor of Divinity in that University as a testimony of his and his country's great esteem for him, and of the eminent and faithful service he had done to the Church. Which request of the Archbishop's the Duke approved so well, that Mr. Hickes was obliged to agree to it; and to do his Chaplain the more honour he sent his son-in-law and servants with him thither, where he was dignified with that title in a full Convocation. After which when Dr. Hickes was returning with his Patron into England, the Archbishop of St. Andrews in his own name and that of all his Brethren presented him with the eighteen volumes of Labbe's Councils as an acknowledgment of his services to that Church. December the 17th 1679 he was actually created Doctor of Divinity of the University of Oxford. A little before viz. September the 13th he married Mrs. Frances Marshal widow of Mr. John Marshal Citizen of London and daughter of Mr. Charles Mallory of Raynham in Essex. She was perfectly of his own principles as well as of her father's, who had been a great sufferer under Cromwell: and she had the happiness of a great both active and passive courage, which afterwards made her a very patient and cheerful fellow-sufferer with her husband. In March 1679 he was promoted by the King to a Prebend of Worcester, and was installed on the 11th of June; and in August following he was presented by Dr. Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury to the Vicarage of All-hallows Barkin near the Tower of London, which obliged him to leave his good Patron the Duke of Lauderdale to the great regret of his Grace, and with all that concern on his part which the best men are wont to express at parting with their dearest friends. He also resigned his Fellowship, being on December the 27th 1681 made Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty. In August 1683 the King advanced him to the [B] Deanery of Worcester upon the recommendations of the Commissioners for disposing of Ecclesiastical Preferments, in the place of Dr. William Thomas Bishop of St. David's, who kept that dignity in commendam with his Bishoprick till he was translated to Worcester; and on October the 13th he was installed.

The

" he was involved by his restless enemies, that Mr. Justell came into England, and after he had been some time in London, he came to visit me at my house on Tower-Hill, where presently after the common forms of congratulating one another, he said, Sir, do not you remember what I told you of the persecution we have since suffered, and of the time when it would begin, and now you see all has accordingly come to pass. When I had answered I was very sorry for it . . . I then put him in mind of another thing he had foretold, which I hoped would never happen, I mean, Sir, said I, the extirpation of the Royal Family of the Stuarts . . . But to this he replied nothing, but with a shrug said, Par Dieu, Monsieur, le Roy d'Angleterre c'est un tres grand Roy, and this was all the answer I could get from him."

[B] Deanery of Worcester.] Upon the vacancy the vogue of both town and country gave this Deanery to Dr. Hickes, but it was so far from his thoughts, that he went to the Archbishop of Canterbury to solicit for Dr. Cave, who gave him then no other answer, but that he believed it would be hard to bring that about. All the Commissioners were for Dr. Hickes, except the Earl of Halifax, who opposed it to the utmost, having been underhand set against him by Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Burnet, by whom his Lordship had been always much influenced. But when he found all opposition fruitless, his Lordship proposed that Dr. Hickes should be promoted to this dignity, on condition of quitting all his other preferments, which was done with design to get him out of London, where about two years past he had had a greater interest than even Dr. Tillotson himself. When the recommendation of the Commissioners was brought to the King, the Earl of Clarendon, with whom Dr. Hickes had not then the honour to be acquainted, standing by the King and over reading the paper in his Majesty's hand, observed that conditional clause in it, and said thereupon to his Majesty, Sir, by this clause the Commissioners take from the Doctor more than they give him. To which the King answered, I think so too; for which reason his patent passed the seals without taking notice of that additional clause.

3

The next year upon the death of Dr. Gulston Bishop of Bristol the Duke of Beaufort went to his Majesty to desire him to promote the Dean of Worcester to that See; but the King, in great respect to the Dean, said he would not offer him that small Bishoprick, though if he would accept of it he should hold his Deanery in commendam with it; and no doubt, if his Majesty had lived long enough, he would have conferred upon him one of the best [C] Bishopricks in the Church. In May 1686 he left the Vicarage of Barkin, and went to settle on his Deanery, the Bishop of Worcester having offered him the Rectory of All Church, but fourteen miles distant from that City. He was collated June the 24th and inducted two days after. Upon the Revolution, he with many other great and worthy men refusing to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary, fell under suspension August the 1st 1689, and was deprived February the 1st 1690; but continued in possession till the beginning of May following; when reading in the Gazette that the Deanery of Worcester was granted to Mr. William Talbot, since successively Bishop of Oxford, Salisbury, and Durham, immediately he drew up in his own hand writing a [D] claim of right to it directed to all the members of that Church, and May the 2d 1691 affixed it over the great entrance into the Choir, that none of them might plead ignorance in that particular. The Dean hereupon expecting the resentment of the Government privately withdrew to London, where and near it he absconded for many years; till on the 18th of May 1699 the Lord Somers, then Lord Chancellor, a Worcestershire man, and who had opportunities of being thoroughly acquainted with his great worth, procured, without his seeking, an Act of Council to order the Attorney General to cause a Noli prosequi to be entered to all proceedings against him. Soon after their deprivation the Archbishop of Canterbury Dr. William [E] Sancroft and his Collegues began to consider about continuing the Episcopal succession among those who adhered to them; and having resolved upon it, they sent Dr. Hickes over with a list of the deprived Clergy to confer with King James II about the matter. The Doctor set out May the 19th 1693, and going by the way of Holland, by reason of many difficulties made it six weeks e'er he arrived at St. Germain's. He had several audiences of King James, who readily complied with all that was desired, and taking his leave of the King on the latter end of July, he arrived at Rotterdam on the 7th of August, where he waited two months to return in a Fleet of Merchants; but when he should have gone on board he was seized with an ague and fever, which detained him till January 24th, on which day he went from Rotterdam, and going on board the Packet the 26th, arrived at Harwich the 29th. At length he came to London the 4th of February, and on the Eve of St. Matthias the consecrations were performed by Dr. William Lloyd Bishop of Norwich, Dr. Francis Turner Bishop of Ely, and Dr. Thomas White Bishop of Peterborough at the Bishop of Peterborough's lodgings at the Reverend Mr. Giffard's house in Southgate. Dr. Hickes * was consecrated Suffragan Bishop of Thetford, and Mr. Thomas Wagstaffe Suffragan of Ipswich; at which solemnity Henry Earl of Clarendon was present. The Dean had been recommended to the King by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Mr. Wagstaffe

* The instrument of his Consecration bears date 29 Feb. 1693.

[C] Best Bishoprics in the church.] A few months after he was made Dean, the Lord-Keeper North told him the King had commanded him to acquaint him, that he did not intend he should stay long at Worcester, and therefore desired he would apply himself to study the Parliament Rolls, because the Bishops, for want of more knowledge in that matter, were, since the Reformation, of the least influence of any Members in the House of Lords, whereas before that time they used to have the greatest sway there. Hereupon his Lordship presented the Dean with Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria, which is the first volume of the Rolls, and told him when he had read that, he should have the use of the rest in order from him. The Dean had read over the first and second volumes in MS. and half the third, when King Charles died, which made him give over that study, knowing he could not expect to be a favourite in the next reign.

[D] Claim of right.] The Earl of Nottingham, then Secretary of State, called it Dr. Hickes's Manifesto against the Government; Dr. Francis Lee has published it in the Appendix, No. iv. to his Life of Mr. Kettlewell, with this title, The Protestation of Dr. George Hickes, and Claim of Right fixed up in the Cathedral Church of Worcester.

[E] Sancroft and his collegues.] Not long after the Revolution there was a report spread about the town, and it was not only reported but printed in several pamphlets, that the Archbishop was one of the Lords Spiritual who wrote to the Prince of Orange to invite him over into England. Dr. Hickes acquainted the Archbishop with this report, who absolutely denied he had done any such thing, and said several things in his own justification. Last of all he said, Mr. Dean, do you know Dr. Stanley, I refer you to him to justify me from this false and groundless report. He being satisfied with what his Grace had told him, did not think it needful to trouble Dr. Stanley at that time. But afterwards, May 17, 1715, at the request of some friends he wrote to the Doctor, to desire the favour of him to give an account of the conferences between the Archbishop and him upon the subject of the invitation. In answer to which Dr. Stanley returned the following letter.

" Sir, " Amen-Corner, May 26.
" I do not remember that ever I heard, that the late good Archbishop Sancroft was thought to have invited the Prince of Orange over into England. If any one did charge him with it, I believe it was without ground. All that I can say as to the matter is, that in 1687, when I came into England out of Holland, I confess I did desire the Archbishop to write to the then Princess of Orange, on whom I had the honour to attend, to encourage her still to give countenance to the Church of England, but he was pleased not to write to her. And afterwards when we were come over into England, and a report being spread abroad that some of the Lords Spiritual as well as temporal had invited the Prince of Orange into England, in my discoursing with the Archbishop, I remember that he said to me, I am now glad that I did not write to the Princess as you desired, for if I had written to her, they would have said that I had sent to invite them over. This is true, and this is all that I can say of that affair.

" I am, Sir,
" 22d of Feb. " Your most faithful Friend,
" 1693. " and humble Servant,
Will. Stanley.

Wagstaffe by the Bishop of Norwich. It has been lately averred in print, that the Doctor was once in the mind to take the oaths and save his preferments; but this is so contrary to his character all his life-time, that few people will believe such a report, raised on purpose to asperse him after he had many years lain peaceably in his grave, where a generous adversary would scorn to insult him. Every body, I believe, will confess thus much of him, that he was a person of universal learning, and one of the greatest ornaments of the age he lived in, as his immortal [F] works will bear witness for him to all future generations.

[F] Works.] He hath written and published the following pieces. 1. A Letter sent from beyond the seas to one of the chief Ministers of the Nonconforming party, by way of reply to many particulars, which he sent to the author in a letter of news, useful for these distempred times. By a lover of the Established Government both of Church and State. Ann. 1674, in 4to. It was afterwards reprinted under the following title. The judgment of an anonymous writer concerning these following particulars. 1. A Law for disabling a Papist to inherit the Crown. 2. The execution of penal laws against Protestant Dissenters. 3. A Bill of comprehension, all briefly discussed in a Letter sent from beyond the Seas to a Dissenter ten years ago, the second edition, 1684. This Letter was in reality an answer to his elder brother Mr. John Hickes, a Dissenting Minister, bred up in Cromwell's time at the College of Dublin, and deeply infected with the principles of those times, whom the Doctor always endeavoured to convince of his errors, but without success, the said Mr. John Hickes persisting in them to his death, and at last, to the Doctor's great grief, suffering for his rebellion under the Duke of Monmouth; though upon the Doctor's unwearied application and petition, the King would have granted him his life, but that he had been falsely informed, that this Mr. Hickes was the person who advised the Duke of Monmouth to take upon him the title of King. Upon the Duke's landing the Dean knowing his brother's principles and inclinations, used the utmost diligence to get him secured by the Lieutenantcy, but he could not be found. 2. A Discourse to prove the strongest temptations conquerable by Christians in a Sermon on 1 Cor. x. 13, preached before Sir Thomas Davis, Lord Mayor of London, and Court of Aldermen, the 14th of January 1674, and dedicated to them, being printed at their desire, in 1677. It had a second edition, 1683 4to. 3. Ravillac Redivivus, being a narrative of the late trial of Mr. James Mitchel, a Conventicle Preacher, who was executed the 18th of January, 1677, for an attempt which he made on the sacred person of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, to which is annexed an account of the trial of that most wicked Pharisee Major Thomas Weir, who was executed for adultery, incest, and bestiality. It was first printed in 1680, in 4to, the MS. copy being transmitted by the Author to Dr. Simon Patrick, then Prebendary of Westminster, who sent it to the press. The second edition was in Folio, 1682, very much augmented and enlarged, and at the end there is added an Appendix, containing an exact relation of the proceedings before the Lords of the Articles against Charles Maitland of Halton, Treasurer-Depute, for perjury, having given a false testimony at the tryal of James Mitchel. The writing of this book was occasioned by his attending in quality of Domestic Chaplain upon the Duke of Lauderdale in Scotland, who to confute the many lies raised by the Fanatics about Mitchel's trial, desired him to write the true narrative of that trial, which he did from the Records of the Criminal Court. 4. The Spirit of Popery speaking out of the mouths of sanatical Protestants; or the last Speeches of Mr. John Kid, and Mr. John King, two Presbyterian Ministers, who were executed for high treason at Edenburg, on the 14th of August 1679. London 1680, Folio. To which is subjoined, A Narrative of the Murder of the Archbishop of St. Andrews from the records of the Privy Council. The Doctor was standing by his Patron, the Duke of Lauderdale, when he opened the Scotch packet which brought the news of that murder, the several relations of the barbarous manner whereof so affected him (the Doctor) that it made him ill for some time. The fact was so misrepresented by the faction in both Kingdoms, and particularly at London, by Dr. Gilbert Burnet, that Dr. Hickes desired leave of his Grace to write the true narrative of it from the records of the Privy Council, as they were sent up by order to his Grace. It was no sooner published but all those lying reports were silenced, though the dispersers of them were not ashamed. Ravillac and the Spirit of Popery were published privately, and under the disguise of a Scottish Gentleman, so that it was some time before the Author was known, though the King, to whom the Lord Chancellor Nottingham first shewed and recommended the book, enquired of the Bishop of London who was the Author of it: The Bishop then could not tell. Soon after his Majesty knowing it was Dr. Hickes, took a particular liking to him, and not long after made him Prebend of Worcester against the powerful solicitations of the Duke of York, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London, for another very deserving person. These two pieces are with several additions, and some alterations prepared by the Author for another impression. 5. A Narrative of a strange and sadden apparition of an Archangel at the Old-Baily, on Monday March the 7th 1680, English Style, betwixt the hours of three and five in the afternoon, to the great astonishment of the Court, and all that were present. Dedicated to all the Ministers and Church-Wardens of the whole Nation. By an eye-witness of the Apparition. Printed in the year 1681, one sheet Folio, and dated March 15 in the same year. The courage wherewith the Doctor preached against the disaffected, put them upon contriving to blast his reputation, which in confederacy with his two Church-Wardens, both of that party, more particularly one Sherman, and with Sheriff Bethel, they attempted in the following manner. They employed one Whitaker to indict the Doctor of Idolatry in worshipping St. Michael the Archangel, and to cover their design, they joined with him in the same indictment his two Church-Wardens and the Lecturer. The Church-Wardens pleaded guilty, and then one of them, Sherman, went and told the Doctor they had done so, and that it was the opinion of his best friends that he should do so too. To which the Doctor replied, for worshipping St. Michael, pray where? In your Church, saith he. How, Mr. Church-Warden? For bowing to him, saith he, as you go up to the Communion-Table. Why, replied the Doctor, is St. Michael there? No, says the other, but the figure of him stands over it. To which the Doctor replied, that though he had been resident about four months, he had never observed any such figure. This made him desire Sherman to describe it, who told him it was a graven wooden image, gilt over, as big as a man, with a trumpet at his mouth, and a label on his breast, with these words, Awake, ye dead, and come to judgment. This, replied the Doctor, is a symbol of the Resurrection, and not of St. Michael. But my brother and I, saith the Church-Warden, have pleaded guilty, and you had best do so too. To this the Doctor answered, I am a Doctor of Divinity; and a Minister of the Church of England, and will sooner plead guilty to an indictment of treason, than to one of idolatry. You may take your course, and I will take mine. Afterwards the Doctor enquired when this image was made, and upon what occasion; and he was informed it was first made and set up in Cromwell's time upon the Church clock, between the two figures of Time and Death, on the inside of the tower; whence how it came to be afterwards removed and placed over the Altar, is related in this Narrative. The Doctor having got a copy of the indictment, went next day to the Old-Baily to plead not guilty; but before he went into the Court, he was informed that all the party were there, and Mr. Sherman with the image, waiting till he came in, when they intended to set up a loud laugh, and put him out of countenance. But he disappointed them, and came to the Court the next day, attended with some of the chief of his parish, and he was there received with great respect, and pleaded not guilty, and desired time to traverse till the next generations. He was particularly remarkable for his skill in the old Northern languages, and has shewed how useful the knowledge of the Saxon tongue is both to Lawyers and Divines. And to use the words of that most excellent man his dear friend (a) Mr. Nelson, though he was admirably skilled in other parts of useful learning, yet he hath laboured

(a) In his Life of Bishop Bull, pag. 512. " with fections, which was granted. Here I must observe, that the party being disappointed the day before, did however carry St. Michael into the Court and set up a loud laugh; and Sheriff Bethel made some reflections upon the idol, as they called it, which occasioned the Doctor's writing this Narrative. At the first publication 1500 were sold one morning; and it so confounded the party, that when the Doctor came the next sessions, there was not one appeared to prosecute. But Bethel presuming again to inveigh against the idol, the Doctor begged leave to answer him, and was heard very patiently. After which Sir Job Charleton, one of the Judges, stood up, and said: Whether the image be an idol or not an idol, or whether the Doctor is guilty of idolatry or not, belongs to the Court Christian to judge, and is not of the cognifance of this Court. So the indictment was quashed.

6. The Spirit of Enthusiasm exorcised in a Sermon on 1 Cor. xii. 4. preached before the University of Oxford on All Sunday, July 11. 1680, printed in the same year, at the request of the then Vice-Chancellor Dr. Timothy Halton, and many others, who heard it preached, and dedicated to him. It had three editions in quarto, and a fourth in 8vo, 1709, much enlarged, before two other Discourses occasioned by the new Prophets, viz. the History of Montanism, wrote by Mr. Francis Lee, deprived Fellow of St. John's Oxon, and the new pretenders to Prophecy examined by Nat. Spinkes a deprived Clergyman. The plans of these two Discourses were first designed by the Dean himself, but being disabled by his infirmities, he prevailed upon the two learned Gentlemen already mentioned to write them for him; but he has prefixed a Dedication of his own to the whole Book to the Rev. Sir George Wheeler, D. D. and Prebendary of the Cathedral Church of Durham. The design of this discourse was to rescue the holy Scriptures from the abusive interpretations of Enthusiasts, and it was so acceptable to the world, at its first appearance, that the Dr. received the particular thanks of very learned men for it both by Letter and otherwise.

7. Peculium Dei: a discourse about the Jews as the peculiar people of God, in a Sermon on Rom. ix. 4, 5. preached before the Aldermen of London, February 6. 1680-81. printed at their desire soon after, and dedicated to Sir Patience Ward, Lord Mayor, and the Court of Aldermen. The design of this discourse was to confute the many dangerous doctrines and opinions ancient and modern, grounded upon the misunderstanding the Jewish Oeconomy and the Mosaic Law. The Doctor first preached it in his course at St. Mary's before the University of Oxford when he was only B. D. and Dr. Allestree then Regius Professor was so pleased with it, that he sent for him next day, and gave him particular thanks for it.

8. The true notion of persecution stated, in a Sermon on 2 Cor. iv. 9. preached at the time of the late contribution for the French Protestants. Published at the earnest request of many that heard it 1681. The Author endeavours in it to remove the prejudices many had then taken against the French Refugees, as people altogether of the same ill principles with our Dissenters both with respect to Church and State; and tho' it was the only Sermon preached in their favour upon that occasion, yet he never received the least thanks from any of them, which he could ascribe to no other cause more probable, than because about that time he had signalized himself against those who disturbed the peace of the Church and State.

9. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London upon Acts xvii. 7. at Bow Church on January 30. 1681-2, and then printed at their request with a Dedication to Sir John Moor, Lord Mayor, &c. At the preaching of it, a knot of Gentlemen standing in the middle Isle were heard to curse and threaten the Doctor, with which he was immediately after acquainted in the Vestry by some loyal Gentlemen, who thereupon offered him their service to conduct him home for fear of danger from those threats; but the Doctor thankfully refused to give them that trouble, or betray the least fear in a cause wherein God had given him the spirit of courage, which made him refuse the like offer from the Lord Mayor the same Evening. The printing of this Sermon, which had afterwards several editions, was much opposed in the Court of Aldermen by Sir Patience Ward, who said the Doctor had spoken many things in the pulpit concerning the principles of the Dissenters which he could not prove, and that was the occasion of his adding in the margin his proofs from their own writings. This Sermon did also so enrage the Party, that they employed Mr. Samuel Johnson to write against it; and the Doctor in a Book, intitled, Julian the Apostate, which the Doctor answered in his Jovian, whereof hereafter. 10. The moral Shechinah, or, a discourse of God's glory, in a Sermon on 1 Cor. x. 32. preached at the Yorkshire Feast in Bow Church, June 11. 1682, and printed at the request of the Stewards of that Feast, with a dedication to them. 11. A Discourse of the Sovereign Power, in a Sermon on Rom. xiii. 4. preached at St. Mary le Bow November 28. 1682, before the Artillery Company: published at their request, to whom and Sir William Prichard, Lord Mayor of London, it is dedicated.

12. Jovian, or, an Answer to Julian the Apostate; printed twice in 1683, 8vo. This excellent answer in defence of passive Obedience the Doctor wrote at the desire of Archbishop Sancroft, tho' many artful endeavours were used with him from other hands to prevent the writing of it: particularly by Dr. John Williams of the Poultry, since Bishop of Chichester, an enemy to the Doctrine of Non-resistance. Of Mr. S. Johnson's reply to this Book after the Revolution, and of the answer to that Reply by Dr. William Hopkins, Prebendary of Worcester. Dr. Hickes has given an account in his preface to Dr. Hopkins's Sermons. This Book with many large additions the Author had prepared for another impression. It is observable, that Dr. Kennet, tho' he mentions Julian in his complete History, takes no notice of this learned answer.

13. The case of Infant Baptism in five Questions 1683 in 4to. It is the fifth case in the second Volume of a Book, intitled, A Collection of Cases and other Discourses lately written to recover Dissenters to the Communion of the Church of England 1685 quarto. On this pious design the Clergy met several times at the Deanery of St. Paul's, Dr. Hickes being then Resident upon his Prebend at Worcester. At his return Dr. Edward Stillingfleet, Dean of St. Paul's, sent to desire to speak with him, and told him what had been done in his absence, and added smiling, they had left one case for him, that of infant Baptism, which several of them, and particularly Dr. Cave, had refused to undertake. To which Dr. Hickes replied, that then his was Hobson's choice, but however he would not refuse it.

14. A Sermon on Heb. xiii. 16. preached at the Church of St. Bridget on Easter Tuesday, being the first of April 1684, upon the subject of Alms-giving, before Sir Henry Tulle, Lord Mayor of London, and the Court of Aldermen, at whose desire it was printed, and to whom it is dedicated.

15. A Sermon on Psal. xiv. 7. preached in the Cathedral Church of Worcester upon the 29th of May 1684; published then at the joint request of the Mayor and Aldermen of that City, and dedicated to them.

16. The Harmony of Divinity and Law in a Discourse on Prov. XXX. 31. about not resisting of Sovereign Princes 1684 4to. This discourse was the subject of three Sermons preached on January 30. and the two preceding Sundays at Allhallows Barkin upon occasion of the dying Speech of Mr. Algernon Sydney, and of the prevailing opinion then spread abroad by some Lawyers, upon the impeachment of the Earl of Danby, that the King could not pardon any person impeached by the house of Commons before his trial, for that the impeachment of that House had the nature of an appeal of Murder, which is at the suit of the Party. Of which and many other particulars relating to that busy juncture, see more in the preface to this

(b) *Linguarum
Vet. Septentr.
Theſaurus.* 2 vol.
fol.

“ with great ſucceſs in (b) untrodden paths, a certain mark of a great genius, whereby
“ the utmoſt parts of Europe will have an occaſion to celebrate his profound erudition.
“ But he excelled in his own profeſſion, having built his ſtudy of Divinity upon the “ holy this Diſcourſe. 17. Speculum Beate Virginis, a Diſcourſe on Luke 1. 28, of the due praiſe and honour of the Virgin Mary, by a true Catholick of the Church of England 1686, and reprinted with additions the ſame year. This was the ſubſtance of ſome Sermons preached in his pariſh Church, for that he had found diſperſed amongſt his pariſhioners ſome popiſh papers which aſſerted, that when the Romaniſts prayed to the Saints in heaven, they did no more than when they deſired their Brethren on earth to pray for them in the name and through the mediation of Jeſus Chriſt. 18. An Apoſtologetical Vindication of the Church of England in answer to her Adverſaries, who reproach her with the Engliſh Hereſies and Schiſms, 1686. in 4to, reprinted with many additions, a large Preface and an Appendix of papers relating to the Schiſms of the Church of Rome, in 8vo 1706. This Diſcourſe was at firſt a Sermon preached in his Pariſh Church upon occaſion of his Maſteſty's printing King Charles II's papers: the preaching of which occaſioned much talk in the town. The Sunday following being deſired by Dr. Sherlock to preach for him at his Lecture in St. Dunſton's in the Weſt, the Dean preached the ſame Sermon there in a croud'd audience, which very much increaſed the town-talk, and was by ſome ſpy moſt odiouſly repreſented to the King; who thereupon commanded the Biſhop of Ely to bring the Dean to him at an hour appointed, and as ſoon as his Maſteſty had notice they were come, he came out and took them into his cloſet, where the Dean expecting ſome ſevere reproof from his Maſteſty, carried with him ſeveral Popiſh Pamphlets to produce for his vindication. But his Maſteſty only telling him he had been informed the Dean called King Charles's papers printed by his Maſteſty's order, a ſcandalous libel, with other reproachful expreſſions, he reply'd, he hoped his Maſteſty would not believe him capable of ſo treating any thing that came from his hands. Upon which the King immediately reply'd, that indeed he did not believe it: ſaying, Mr. Dean, perhaps you preached againſt thoſe papers becauſe you did not believe them to be my brother's: but to convince you they are, if you ſhould have any doubt of it, and that you may convince others, I will ſhew you the originals written and interlined with his own hand, to which you are no ſtranger; whereupon his Maſteſty immediately fetched the papers and gave them into the Dean's hands, who upon the ſight of them told his Maſteſty that he acknowledged that to be the late King his brother's hand. What his Maſteſty ſaid to him farther upon this occaſion was to this effect; that as he reſolved to protect the Clergy of the Church of England, ſo he hoped, that according to their profeſſed principles they would be dutiful and loyal to him. Soon after this the Dean being invited by the Biſhop of Worceſter to accept the Rectory of Allchurch, he left London, and was no ſooner ſettled in his Deanery, but the Papiſts there began in all public meetings to aſk the people tauntingly, where the Church of England was, and bid them go aſk their Biſhop and their Dean where to find it among ſo many ſects and ſchiſms. This news was brought daily to both their ears, which occaſioned the Dean at the requeſt of the Biſhop to enlarge the Sermon abovementioned into a juſt Diſcourſe upon that ſubject; after the firſt publication of which the adverſaries were never heard to mutter the leaſt word about the Engliſh Hereſies and Schiſms. 19. The celebrated ſtory of the Thebean Legion no fable: in answer to the objections of Dr. Gilbert Burnet's preface to his tranſlation of Lactantius de mortibus Perſecutorum, with ſome remarks on his diſcourſe of perſecution. This piece was written in the year 1687 but not published, till 1714 in 8vo. The reaſon why it was then published, and not when it was firſt wrote, is given by the very Reverend Mr. H. Bedford in his preface to this treatiſe. 20. Reflections upon a Letter out of the country to a member of this preſent Parliament, occaſioned by a Letter to a Member of the Houſe of Commons, concerning the Biſhops lately in the Tower, and now under ſuſpenſion, in 4to, ſubſcribed A. Z. Theſe reflections were written, as appears by the occaſion of them, in the year 1689 by the Dean then at Worceſter. The author of that letter to which they are an answer, was generally preſumed to be Dr. G. Burnet, who is that Butting Divine pointed at in the Reflections. Soon after the publication of them a paper came out, wherein it was aſſerted, that Dr. Burnet was neither the author of that letter, nor had any hand in it, which whether true or no, was yet generally diſbelieved. 21. Inſtitutiones Grammaticæ Anglo-Saxonicæ & Mæſo-Gotbicæ, Auctore G. Hickeſio Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Presbytero. Grammatica Iſlandicæ Runolphi, Ionæ, Catalogus librorum Septentrionalium. Accedit Edwardi Bernardi Etymologicum Britannicum. Oxoniæ 1689 in 4to. While the Dean was writing the preface to this book, there were great diſputes every where, and particularly in the Houſe of Commons, about the original contract, which occaſioned him to infer therein the ancient coronation-oath of our Saxon Kings, wherein there is not the leaſt foothold of any ſuch contract. A little before the book was published the Dean aſked leave of Archbiſhop Sancroft to dedicate it to him, when they were both under ſuſpenſion for not taking the new oath; and having the good Archbiſhop's leave, who had hitherto of his great modeſty reſuſed almoſt all the requeſts of this nature which had been made to him, the Dean wrote a dedication and ſent it from Worceſter to Dr. Mill Principal of Edmund Hall, who had the care of the impreſſion. But he to the Dean's great diſſatisfaction did in compliance with the times ſuppreſs that dedication, and inſtead of it only inſcribed the book to the Archbiſhop as it now ſtands in print. 22. A Letter to the author of a late paper, intitled, a Vindication of the Divines of the Church of England &c. in defence of the Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience. 1689 in 4to. The author of the Vindication was Dr. Edward Fowler, though his name was not to it. Before the Dean published this answer he ſhewed it to Dr. Sherlock, telling him he feared one paſſage in it was too ſharp upon their old friend. But the Doctor reply'd, it ſhall go, for he deſerves it. 23. A word to the wavering, in answer to Dr. Gilbert Burnet's Enquiry into the preſent State of Affairs. 1689 in 4to. 24. An Apology for the new Separation, in a Letter to Dr. John Sharp, Archbiſhop of York, occaſioned by his farewell Sermon preached at St. Giles's in the Fields June the 28th 1691. The Apology is dedicated to the Gentlemen of the Veſtry of St. Giles's, to whom the Archbiſhop had dedicated his Sermon. Printed 1691 in 4to. 25. A Vindication of ſome among ourſelves againſt the falſe principles of Dr. Sherlock, in a Letter to the Doctor, occaſioned by the Sermon which he preached at the Temple Church on the 29th of May 1692. In which Letter are alſo contained Reflections on ſome other of the Doctor's Sermons publiſhed ſince he took the oath. 1692 4to. The ſecond edition of this Vindication, with a large Preface, was ſeized in the preſs. This book was a great mortification to Dr. Sherlock, who in that Temple Sermon had preached againſt his old brethren under the phraſe of ſome among ourſelves, with great diſreſpect, which occaſioned the Dean to expoſe him in ſuch a manner as he thought he deſerved and could never answer. All he had to ſay for himſelf to his friends was, that the author had betrayed the ſecrets of private converſation, which occaſioned the Dean to ſend him a letter written in another hand, and without a name, to challenge him to ſhew any one particular paſſage in the Vindication relating to himſelf, which he had not before that ſaid in ſeveral companies, and to many other of his old friends as well as to the author of the Vindication: but he never thought fit to make any answer thereto. 26. Some Diſcourſes on Dr. Burnet and Dr. Tillotſon, occaſioned by the late funeral Sermon of the former upon the latter. 1695 in 4to. To this piece Biſhop Burnet wrote an answer, intitled, The Biſhop of Sarum's Vindication, whereto the Dean made a reply, as the learned Editor of the abovementioned Treatiſe, intitled: The celebrated ſtory of the Thebean Legion, no fable, informs us in his Preface, but for obvious reaſons never published it. 27. The Pretences of the Prince of Wales examined and rejected, in a Letter to a friend in the Country, dated November the 7th 1701. In this Treatiſe all the arguments againſt the birth are ridiculed

“ holy Scriptures, and the primitive Fathers of the Church, as the best Expositors of those sacred Writings,” and pointed out the way to his Brethren of the Clergy how to make themselves masters of the true Theology, by paying less regard to modern inconsistent

culed and confuted. 28. Antiqua Litteraturæ Septentrionalis Libri duo, quorum primus G. Hicessii S. T. P. Linguarum Vet. Septentrionalium Theaurum Grammatico-criticum & Archæologicum; Ejusdem de antiquæ Litteraturæ Septentrionalis utilitate dissertationem Epistolarem; & Andreae Fontaine Equitis Aurati Numismata Saxonica & Danico-Saxonica complectitur. Alter continet Humfredi Wanleii Librorum Vet. Septentrionalium, qui in Angliæ Bibliothecis extant, Catalogum Historico-criticum; necnon multorum Vet. Cod. Septentr. alibi extantium notitiam, cum totius operis sex Indicibus. Oxoniæ 1705 in folio. This most extraordinary laborious and splendid work is justly celebrated by those who have any relish for antiquities in all parts of the learned world, as may be shewn by numerous testimonies of both our own countrymen and foreigners who have declared their approbation of it. The Great Duke of Tuscany's Envoy sent a copy of it to his master, which his Highness looking into and finding full of strange characters, called a Council of the Dotti, and commanded them to peruse it, and give him an account of it. They did so, and told him it was an excellent work, worthy to be placed in his Highness's Library, and would be an ornament to it: and that they believed the author was un buono d'uno cervello particolare, i. e. “A man of a particular head.” This was the Envoy's compliment to the author when he went to him with a present from his master. 29. Several Letters which passed between Dr. G. Hicess and a Popish Priest, with an Appendix containing several remarkable papers. 1705 in 8vo. Reprinted 1715. The person on whose account this book was published, was the Lady Theophila Nelson wife of Robert Nelson Esq. 30. A second Collection of Controversial Letters relating to the Church of England and the Church of Rome, as they passed between Dr. G. Hicess and an honourable Lady. 1710 in 8vo. This Lady was the Lady Graciana Carew of Haccombe or Hadcombe in Devonshire near Exeter. Before this book there is a large Preface wherein he vindicates the doctrine of the Eucharist's being a sacrifice, and himself from the aspersions cast upon him by Dr. Kennet, Dr. Hancock and others upon account of that doctrine. 31. Two treatises, one of the Christian Priesthood, the other of the dignity of the Episcopal Order, written to obviate the erroneous opinions in a late book intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church with a large prefatory discourse in answer to the said book. With an Appendix whereto are added in this edition several new Tracts. The third edition enlarged in two vol. in 8vo. 1711. About the latter end of 1714 he published a Supplement of Additions to this learned work. The occasion of writing it was not only the general ignorance the author had observed among the laity of all sorts, of the nature of the Sacerdotal Powers, and their duty to their Bishops and Priests, but also a want of a due knowledge of these matters among too many of the Clergy themselves, for whose sake more especially he wrote these two Tracts. While the Doctor was writing the prefatory discourse in answer to the Rights &c. Dr. Thomas Turner President of Corpus Christi in Oxford, sent him notice in a Letter dated May the 5th 1707, that he was asked by every one he met whether the Dean was writing against the University or no; for they had all been informed of it, and were confident it was so. “I am therefore, says he, desired by some wise and good men, and very good friends of yours and mine, to lay the thing before you, to intreat you to consider what advantage you will give both to your enemies and ours. You will force the University to reply upon you, or to employ somebody to do so, to shew you we say no more than Mr. Hooker, Bishop Andrews, Mr. Thorndike and several others do, nay no more, as I am desired to tell you, though I cannot assert it upon my own knowledge, than you yourself say of the French Protestants in your Sermon about Persecution: to which it is added, I cannot tell certainly how truly, that you yourself communicated with them.” The Dean thanked the President May the 13th for his kind letter of advice, and thus proceeds. “To return you and my good friends an answer, I am not writing against the University, nor intend to write against it. In my answer to the Rights I have been forced by my undertaking to say things which do not agree with your letter to the Genevenses, but without reflection, or couching any reflection upon the University, or on the Bishop of London, whose letter to the Church of Geneva I never saw till Friday last: And as I had finished my whole answer before I saw his Lordship's Letter, so I had finished that small part of it which relates to the other Protestant Churches, excepting a few queries to a certain person, before I saw the University's letter: and as the University's letter ought not to be called an answer to what I have written of the other Protestant Churches, so what I have written on that subject neither is nor ought to be esteemed as an answer to it. Mr. President, I was bred, I thank God for it, in the University, and I hope I love and honour it as much as any man that ever was bred in it, and will ever thankfully acknowledge that I have received great favours and kindnesses from it: and these considerations, and not all the others mentioned in your letter, had I a mind to write an answer to the University's letter, would effectually restrain me; and therefore depend upon it, I shall neither write such an answer, or any ways encourage such an answer to be written. As to the considerations in your letter which most nearly concern myself, I freely own that when I was in France 34 years ago I went to Charenton, and once there received the Sacrament, and afterwards at Blois; but when I came to Montpellier, I declined the Sacrament though I went to the Temple, having by reading and conferring about the mission of the French Protestant Ministers altered my opinion, I should have said my Irenicum opinion, for I had no other than Irenicum principles when I went into France, having not read so much as St. Ignatius's Epistles or any other father. We went from Montpellier to Lyons, where I was a month and never went to the Temple, thence we went to Geneva, where once out of curiosity I went to the great Church, and once to the Church at the bridge, upon invitation to hear their most celebrated Preacher, who preached one of Dr. Sanderfon's Sermons in French. There also I was invited to the Sacrament by Mr. Diodati, but not going, he told me he believed I absented as many English did who questioned their mission, and afterwards he grew cold and dry in his conversation with me. I believe the English he meant was my Lord Chancellor Clarendon and the English that were with him. I have now made a frank confession of my error, and I hope my friends will allow a man to alter his opinion upon better information once in 35 years. The great compassion I had for the French Protestants made me preach and publish my Sermon of Persecution 25 years since, in which I said all I could for them to remove a common objection against them that they were of the same principles with our Presbyterians, and as much enemies to the Church of England. In that Sermon I think I have said nothing contrary to my principle, or if any kind expression leans or seems to lean towards favouring or approving their Church and Ministry, though I think there is none such, it must in equity pass for an unguarded expression, which slipt from me while my eye was wholly directed to the design I had to do them good.” This satisfied Dr. Turner, who thanked him May the 26th for his great condescension, and says, “Indeed, Sir, I did not intend to call you to that account you give of yourself: after which I think it but just and reasonable you should be allowed to alter your opinion in so many years for the better, rather than as a great many others have done for the worse. If men may be thus allowed to differ from themselves, much more sure from others, especially if it be without offence to them, as I hear your book is.” 32. A seasonable and modest Apology in behalf of the reverend Dr. G. Hicess, and other Nonjurors, in a Letter to Thomas Wise, D. D. 1710, 8vo. This seems as if wrote by some friend, but it was his own performance.

consistent systems, and more to the consentient suffrage of the primitive Writers. And as no one better understood the Doctrine, Worship, Constitution and Discipline of the Catholick Church in the first and purest ages of Christianity, so no one has proved the Church

ance. In this he vindicates himself and his friends from the weak arguments Dr. Wile had urged against the Eucharistic Sacrifice, and from the calumny of their being inclined to Popery; which the said Doctor had raised against them. Dr. Wile made some trifling reflections upon this Apology, in his book, intitled, The Christian Eucharist rightly stated, which were refuted by a friend of the Dean's, or rather, as I guess from the title by the Dean himself, in a piece, intitled, 33. A Vindication of the Reverend Dr. G. Hickee; and the Author of the seasonable and modest Apology, &c. from the undeserved Reflections of the Reverend Dr. Thomas Wile, &c. 1712, in 8vo. 34. A Collection of Sermons formerly preached by Dr. Hickee, in two volumes, with a Preface by Mr. Spinckes, 1713, in 8vo. Of most of these Sermons I have given some account above; only I must add, they are dedicated by the Author to Dr. John Montague, the Dean and the Prebendaries of the Cathedral Church of Durham, wherein he expresses his great obligations to that Chapter: and that in the second volume there are from pag. 135, several Sermons never before published; viz. Sermons 11, 12, on John xv. 14. Shewing an universal obedience to the Divine Will, to be the only proper means of obtaining the favour of God. 13. Upon the third verse of the Epistle of St. Jude, entitled, Earnestness in contending for the Faith; preached at Worcester at the triennial Visitation of Dr. Thomas, Bishop of that Diocese. 14, 15, Upon James ii, 23. Explaining the Doctrine of Justification. 16. On Psalm viii. 5. preached upon the Feast of St. Michael the Archangel. 17. Upon Psalm lxxii. 8. preached before the Master, Wardens, &c. of the Trinity House of Deptford Strand. 35. A Letter in the Philosophical Transactions, N^o. 302, pag. 2076, entitled, Epistola Viri Reverendi D. G. Hickee S. T. P. ad D. Hans Sloane, M. D. & S. R. Secr. de varia lectione inscriptionis quæ in statua Tagis exaratur per quatuor alphabeta Hetrusca. 36. Two Letters to Robert Nelson, Esq; relating to Bishop Bull; the first dated Hamstead, August 5, 1712, and the other February 3, 1713, published in the Life of that Bishop, pag. 513, &c. 37. Some Queries proposed to Civil, Canon, and Common Lawyers, in half a sheet in Folio, 1712, printed after several editions with another title, in 8vo 1714, viz. Seasonable Queries relating to the Birth and Birth-right of a certain Person. There was an answer to them in 1713, which helped rather to spread than confute them. The Answerer by mistake supposes Mr. Lesley wrote them. 38. A Discourse wherein some account is given of Dr. Grabe and his MSS. prefixed to a short tract, found among his English MSS. and published by the Dean with this title, Some instances of the defects and omissions in Mr. Whiston's collection of testimonies from the Scriptures and from the Fathers, against the true Deity of the Son and the Holy Ghost, by Dr. Grabe, 1712, 8vo. 39. He likewise reprinted and published three short Treatises. 1. A Modest Plea for the Clergy, by Dr. Lancelot Addison. 2. A Sermon of the Sacerdotal Benediction, by Samuel Gibson. 3. A Discourse published to undeceive the people in the point of Tythes, by Dr. Heylin; and set a Preface before them in defence of the Priesthood and true Rights of the Church, 1709, 8vo. Since his decease were published the following pieces: 40. The Constitution of the Catholick Church, and the nature and consequences of Schism, set forth in a Collection of papers written by the late Right Reverend George Hickee, D. D. 1716, 8vo. The Book begins with Letters which passed in King William's time, between the Doctor and a Serjeant at Law, Mr. T. Geers, Brother to Mrs. Susanna Hopton, a Lady famous for her Piety and Charity. Two years before he died, or thereabouts, the Dean reviewed these Letters, and made several Alterations in them, as a man has a right to do with his own works: which is the reason of the difference between them as here printed, and the copy of them, which Dr. Nathaniel Marshal, who endeavoured to answer them, had the use of, in order to shew the variations of them. Next come 40 Propositions concerning the polity of the Church, and the nature of Schism, which were sent to the same Serjeant, who returned them with some objections; to answer which the author wrote a Vindication, dividing it into four parts, the two first of which were printed under the title of a discourse concerning the dignity of the Episcopal Order; the two last are inserted in this Book. The next paper is intitled, A Letter written for the use of a Gentleman (Robert Nelson, Esq;) who lived in the Communion of the Nonjurors till the Death of the Rev. Father in God Dr. William Lloyd, Lord Bishop of Norwich; but shortly after his Death, left it, and joined himself to the other opposite Communion of the Church of England before this Letter could be finished. On Thursday before Easter, April 6. 1710, Mr. Nelson being of opinion with Mr. Dodwell, that the Schism was at end by Bishop Lloyd's death, acquainted the Dean by Letter, that he found himself under an obligation of changing his practice, and that he thought he ought not to neglect those advantages which attend the approaching Festival, however he thought it proper to acquaint him with his Resolution, that if he had any thing farther to offer, he might consider it before Easter, and tho' he differed from him in this point, yet no body could have a greater value and esteem for him. The Dean's answer, dated Good-Friday, is in these words, "Honoured Sir, You may remember I came to you this day sennight in the Morning to tell you, that on the Wednesday before a friend of mine came to me to let me know, you had declared your resolution of going to church, and that it would be a reflection on me if I did not do something to prevent it if I possibly could. Upon this I told you I had begun the Thursday Morning following to put something in writing for your consideration, but that I was interrupted by a long visit, and discouraged to proceed, because I had heard you had declared your resolution of leaving our Communion for the other, and given a real proof of it by asking the benediction of one of their Bishops, which you did not deny nor ask me to go on; but on the contrary came to me the day following in the Evening to pray me not to give myself any farther trouble in writing upon your account, because you thought we had talked all we could say upon that subject; to which I replied, we had, I thought, talked but little, and seldom together of it, and however that talk was at best but talk, and had not the advantages of writing. This and what I often heard since of your declaring your resolution with all frankness in other places made me think no more of my papers till yesterday, when I resolved by God's assistance to finish them, because they may be of use to me in confirming other persons, who are undetermined: but upon reflection of what I have to write I fear it will take up some time with all my infirmities to finish it; indeed more than at first I thought it would. However, when it is finished and fit to be read, I will impart it to you, if you can prevail with your self in the mean time to forbear going to the publick; though if it should have no effect upon you after declaring yourself so often under an obligation of changing your practice, it would occasion such insulting reflections upon me by many, as you know are usually made in such cases upon successful endeavours to convince. Such at all times has been my behaviour towards you, since I had the honour of your acquaintance, and so much experience have I had of your candor, that I doubt not in the least of your continuing your esteem for me, of which I have had so many proofs. And I do assure you, that your change shall never alter or diminish that respect and honour for you, of which I have given the world publick Testimonies." On the same day Mr. Nelson returned an answer, and assured the Dean, "he had some difficulty to satisfy myself in a point which was not supported by his accurate judgment, and if he could have resigned himself implicitly to the determination of another, the great deference he had for him would quickly have influenced his choice. He tells him the frequent Conversations he had with him upon the subject, and the perusal of papers which he knew

Church of England to be perfectly conformable thereto in every thing of moment, with more solid and convincing arguments, and with greater clearness and vivacity of thought and expression, against all her adversaries, whether Infidel, Puritanical, or Popish. He was a person very strict in his principles of morality, and did not allow himself a liberty of breaking the laws of Christ for his own convenience, or of bending or misinterpreting them to serve any interest whatsoever. What he was convinced was his duty he closely adhered to, choosing to suffer any thing rather than violate his conscience. Tho' he wrote with some sharpness against such as he believed acted with a view to serve their own ambition and avarice; yet to others worthy of his acquaintance, though of different principles,

“ passed through his hands, together with several particulars discoursed over with him by Mr. Cherry, made him think it not necessary to trouble him upon this occasion, and he is confident none but the person who came to the Dean would have thought it any reflection upon him, if he had not given himself any farther trouble. But when the Dean had declared he had put pen to paper, in order to convince him the Schism was not at an end, he thought the respect which will always be paid him by him, obliged him, notwithstanding the convictions of his mind, not to change his practice till he had finished his thoughts, which he hoped he would have concluded this week. He declares he should be sorry to draw any reflections upon the Dean by his conduct, and let him determine which way soever, his much superior sense ought not to suffer, tho' many too frequently insult upon such occasions. Therefore, adds he, as you know the state of my mind at present, I desire you to judge whether or no I should defer going to the publick. If you require it, I will wait till you have finished your papers, tho' I must own to you, that the reasons of those who have already complied appear to me so convincing, that except you desire the contrary, I should think myself obliged to change my practice sooner. — The latter end of your Letter gives me great Satisfaction, for any coldness in your friendship would have been a load upon my mind, which would have oppressed me very much. I am sure it is a great Instance of your goodness that you have given me so many publick and private testimonies of your favour; and it will be still a farther proof of it, that the difference between us creates no diminution in your kindness, which I shall always endeavour to cultivate to the best of my power; and I shall reckon it as a happy circumstance of my life to be able to say of you, as some great man did of his friend: “ Ita dissenſi ab illo, ut in diſjunctione ſententiæ, conjuncti tamen amicitia maneremus.” The next day, Easter Eve, April 8, the Dean replied as follows: “ Honoured Sir, As you know I cannot in conscience advise you to go to Church, or in the least approve your going thither, so considering the declarations, I know you have made in several places, and I doubt not in several others, of which I have not heard, to go thither; I think I should be justly censured for great imprudence by my friends, and for great confidence and self-sufficiency by our enemies, should I take upon me, after so many signal manifestations of your resolution, by which you have raised the expectations of the other communion, to require or desire you to defer the putting of it in practice, when there are so little hopes of convincing you, who are so far gone towards the other side, and even ready to enter into the church, that were there no more than the expressions of your own letters, they are enough to make me think you are too much fixed to be reduced by any thing I can write; and if you were so far gone from us towards any other communion, I should think the same. I believe, Sir, you would judge so of me were you in my condition and I in yours; and therefore prudence obliges me in this, as in my former letter, to leave you wholly to the liberty of your own judgment, especially considering that should I desire you to forbear going to church to morrow, where I have reason to presume you are expected, it would give the expectants occasion to enquire why you did not come, and oblige you to tell the reason, which being known would soon become town-talk, and

“ raise the expectations both of friends and enemies; and at last when you went thither, extremely expose me and our communion, and bring upon us, in the condition and crisis we are, and are like to continue in, all the indignation, scorn and derision of the world, which you, I am sure, who understand the times so well, can better imagine than I can express: I wish, Sir, you had written the letter which you wrote to me on Thursday in the evening a month or six weeks ago, before you were so much determined, and had made yourself expected at the other side, then the controversy might have been managed with more privacy between us, and without those great inconveniencies and mighty prejudices, to which I believe you cannot but think it would now expose your most faithful, &c.” The next day Mr. Nelson went to church, and for this reason it is apparent the author never designed this letter for his view, although having begun it by way of letter to him, he still continued to address it to the same person. These two worthy men, notwithstanding their difference of sentiments, constantly maintained the strictest friendship, which was never interrupted till Mr. Nelson's death. 41. The Introduction and some part of Mr. Kettlewell's Life prefixed to his works in Folio 1719, which Life was about the same time printed alone in 8vo. 42. A volume of Posthumous Discourses published by Mr. Spinckes 1726. The titles and texts of the Sermons are, 1. What willingness of mind is accepted by God, upon 2 Cor. viii. 12. 2. Confirmation of Divine Original, upon Heb. vi. 2. 3. Upon Rev. xiii. 11, 12. The Episcopal Character the Ordinance of Christ. 4. Upon 2 Cor. iii. 1, 2, 3. That people should be tender of the reputation of their Pastors. 5. Upon St. Mark x. 14, 15. The necessity of becoming like little children before we can be the disciples of Christ. 6, 7. Upon Phil. iv. 7. Peaceableness the chief of virtues and a Preservative against Heresy. 8. Upon Rev. ii. 4, 5. Remissness in the love of God and decay of Zeal, preface the losing a light of the Gospel. 9. On Mat. v. 17. Christianity not the destruction, but the perfection of Judaism. 10, 11. Upon Luke xi. 42. Moral Laws to be preferred before positive, though the positive have a title to be observed. 12. On Jam. ii. 10. The whole Law ought to be obeyed. 13. Upon 1 John iii. 7. The same subject as the former. 43. Dr. Hicke's Determination of two Questions: 1. Whether there ought to be a true Sacrifice in the Church? 2. Whether there is any such thing in the Church of England, since the present Liturgy established at the Reformation? It is printed from p. 51, to p. 67, in a book intitled, Two Discourses, wherein it is proved that the Church of England bleſseth and offereth the Eucharistic Elements, &c. 1732, in 8vo. 44. Some Propositions concerning Separation, &c. seriously tendered by a Minister to the consideration of one of his Parishioners, who lived in full Communion with the Church by Law established, and with those who separate from it in Congregational Meetings, to which is annexed, an Answer to a Popish Letter: they are printed in a pamphlet entitled, Three short Treatises never before printed, the first and second by the late very Reverend Dr. George Hicke: the third, A Letter against a Protestant's marrying a Popish, by Mr. Kettlewell, 1732, in 8vo. Besides these works there are extant many excellent Prefaces and Recommendations wrote by him, at the earnest request of the Authors or Editors of other works. 1. A short recommendation to a serious and pathetic contemplation of the mercies of God, in several most devout and sublime thanksgivings, 1699, in 12mo. 2. A Preface to the Case of Sureties in Baptism, in which is shewn that Schismatics ought not to be admitted as Godfathers and Godmothers in the principles, he was remarkably affable and courteous; and he was much respected by men of all ranks and opinions, not only for his uncommon learning, but likewise for his agreeable and polite conversation. Some years before he died he was grievously tormented with the stone, a distemper to which the most studious are ever liable. At length his constitution, though naturally strong, being quite broke with age, and the frequent returns of racking pain, he gave way to nature December the 15th 1715, in the seventy fourth year of his age, and was on the 18th interred [G] in St. Margaret's Church-yard Westminster by his fellow-sufferer the very Reverend Mr. Nathaniel Spinckes.

the ministration of that holy Sacrament, by Dr. William Higden, 1701, in 4to. 3. Preface to Thomas à Kempis of the Imitation of Jesus Christ, volume the second 1707, and 1711, 8vo. 4. Dedication to Edward Hyde, Baron Clifton, of the Gentleman instructed in the conduct of a virtuous and happy Life. Third Edition, 1707, in 12mo. 5. Preface to a Latin Letter of Dr. Morley, late Bishop of Winchester, to the learned Janus Ulitius, made English by the Reverend Mr. James Hope, depriv'd Curate of Easington, under Dr. Denys Granville, depriv'd Dean and Archdeacon of Durham, 1707, in 4to. 6. Preface to two Discourses, viz. 1. Of the strict Observance of Ash-Wednesday. 2. A Defence of those who keep Lent, 1708, 12mo. 7. Dedication to the Duchess of Ormond, recommending the Education of a Daughter, by the Author of Telemachus, made English 1708, in 12mo. 8. Preface to The Divine Right of Episcopacy asserted, by — Tremellier, 1708, in 8vo. 9. Preface to seventeen Sermons of Dr. William Hopkins, published by the Dean, being an account of his Life and Works, 1708, in 8vo. 10. Preliminary discourse to Spinoza reviv'd, 1709, in 8vo. 11. Preface to the Invalidity of Lay-Baptism, in a Letter to the Author, by Mr. Roger Lawrence, 1709, in 8vo. 12. Recommendation to the very Reverend Mr. Hilckiah Bedford's translation of the Answer to Fontenelle's History of Oracles, 1709, in 8vo. 13. Preface to twelve Sermons of Mr. Cock, the depriv'd Vicar of St. Oswald's Durham, with some account of his Life, 1710, in 8vo. 14. Preface to Episcopal Ordination the only Apostolical Ordination, by Archdeacon Hamilton, 1713, in 8vo. 15. Letter before Groome's Dignity and Honour of the Clergy, 1710, in 8vo. 16. Preface to the Devotions in the antient way of Offices, published by the Dean four times; the last edition, 1712, in 8vo. A farther account of the Reformation and Reformer of this book, Mrs. Susanna Hopton, may be seen in the Preface to the second Collection of Controversial Letters. 17. A short Recommendation to Sir John Hayward's Passion Week. 18. Judgment prefixed to Mr. Archibald Campbell's book entitled, Some primitive Doctrines reviv'd, 1713, in 8vo, and reprinted in Folio, 1721. Besides the abovementioned Sermons, there are still several in MS. in a private hand, from whose accurate judgment and known impartiality, it is not to be doubted but the world and the Dean's memory will receive equal justice.

[G] Interred.] The Inscription on his Tomb-stone is, Depositum Georgii Hicke, S. T. P. non ita pridem Coll. Linc. Oxon. Socii, & Ecclesie Cathedralis Wigorniensis Decani qui obiit 15 die Decembris 1715: by his own direction, as appears from his Will, printed 1716, in 8vo.

(a) Steph. Byzant. Βραχυμῆτις & Ταρχυμία.

HIEROCLES, the author of a book intitled, Φιλίσοπος, The Lovers of History (a) had related a great many fabulous stories, if we may judge of his book by the passages which Tzetzes has quoted from it. He asserted that the torrid Zone is inhabited by men whose ears serve them for an umbrella, and by others whose feet served them for the same purpose when they lifted them up. He boasted that he had seen it; and that he heard it reported that there are some men who have no heads, and others who have ten heads, four hands and four feet (b). It is not known at what time he lived, but it is not in the least probable, that he is the same Hierocles, who from a Wrestler turned Philosopher, and who was a native of Hyllarima, a city of Caria (c).

(b) Tzetzes, Chil. 7. Histor. 146. ex Hierocle.

(c) Steph. Byzant. Φοε Τηλλάρμα.

HIEROCLES, a great persecutor of the Christians in the beginning of the fourth Century, was at first President of Bithynia, and afterwards Governor of Alexandria. He was the chief promoter of the bloody persecution, which the Christians suffered under the Emperor Dioclesian. It was not sufficient for him to crush them by the power he enjoyed by means of his employments, he would also destroy them with his pen; for which purpose he composed two writings which he addressed to them, and in which he endeavoured to prove, that the holy Scripture refutes itself by the inconsistencies with which it abounds, according to him. He railed against our Saviour, and against his Apostles, and he made a parallel between Jesus Christ's miracles, and those of Apollonius of Tyana, in order to shew that Apollonius was equal and even superior to Jesus Christ in that respect (a). Two Fathers of the Church have refuted him [A]. It is reported, that

(a) Taken from Lactantius, cap. 2. 3. Divin. Institutionum. See the remark [A].

[A] Two fathers of the Church have refuted him.] Namely, Lactantius and Eusebius. The former relates that at the time he was teaching rhetoric in Bithynia (1), and the Church of the Christians was pulled down there, two authors undertook to write with a design to insult the truth that was oppressed. One of these writers was a Philosopher, whose work was despised, and soon neglected. The other was one of the Judges, and handled this subject with more malice. Alius eandem materiam mordacius scripsit, qui erat tum è memero judicum, & qui auctor in primis faciendæ persecutionis fuit, quo scelere non contentus, etiam scriptis eos, quos affixerat, infecutus est. Composuit enim libellos duos non contra Christianos, ne inimicè insectari videretur, sed ad Christianos, ut humanè ac benignè consuleretur; in quibus ita falsitatem scripturæ sacræ arguere conatus est, tanquam sibi esset tota contraria; nam quedam capita, quæ repugnare sibi videbantur, exposuit, adeo multa, adeo intima enumerans, ut aliquando ex eadem disciplina fuisse videatur . . . præcipue

(1) Lactant. Divin. Institut. lib. 5. cap. 2.

tamen Paulum Petramque laceravit, cæterosque discipulos, tanquam fallaciæ seminarios, quos eisdem tamen rudes, & indoctos fuisse testatus est; nam quosdam eorum piscatorio artificio fecisse quæstum . . . (2). Ipsum autem Christum affirmavit à Judæis fugatum, collecta noningentorum hominum manu latrocinia fecisse. . . Item cum facta ejus mirabilia destrueret, nec tamen negaret, voluit ostendere Apollonium vel paria, vel etiam majora fecisse (3). (3) Idem, ibid. cap. 3. pag. 308.

i. e. "There was another who wrote upon the same subject more smartly: he was then one of the Judges, and had been the chief promoter of the persecution, which the Christians suffered; but not being satisfied with this crime, he attempted to abuse them in his writings, whom he had already vexed as a Judge. He wrote therefore two small books, not against the Christians, lest he should seem to inveigh against them as an enemy, but addressed to the Christians, that he might be thought to advise them kindly as a friend. In these books he endeavoured to prove that the holy Scripture is false, by shewing the holy martyr Ædeseus, being acted by a very great zeal, approached him whilst he was presiding at the trial of some Christians at Alexandria, and loaded him with shame both by words and deeds ; I mean that whilst Hierocles was upon his Tribunal, Ædeseus gave him a box on the ear, upbraiding him with his infamous cruelty [B]. I shall take notice of some blunders of Moreri and of Cardinal Baronius's [C].

HIEROCLES,

“ that it is inconsistent with itself; he insisted upon “ some points which seemed to contradict each other,
“ and he had collected so many secret particulars, that “ he appears to have been for some time a Christian “ himself. . . . He abused chiefly Peter and Paul,
“ and the other disciples, as though they had been “ the contrivers of the cheat, and yet he confessed
“ at the same time that they wanted skill and learning;
“ for some of them gained their bread by being fish“ ermen. . . He asserted also, that Christ himself be“ ing banished by the Jews, assembled nine hundred “ men, at whose head he robbed and plundered the “ country. . . And to evade the consequence of Christ's “ miracles, the truth of which he did not disown, he “ pretended to prove that Apollonius had performed
“ such or even greater wonders.”

We do not meet with that author's name in this passage ; but we do not doubt but Lactantius meant the same Judge whom he calls Hierocles in another book.

Incidisti . . . in Hieroclem ex Vicario præsidem, qui auctor & consiliarius ad faciendam persecutionem fuit (4). i. e.
“ You fell into the hands of Hierocles, who from “ a Lieutenant became a Magistrate, and was the “ chief author and adviser of the persecution.” In order to confirm this, we shall make two observations, the one concerning the title of the book which this great persecutor of the Christians wrote; the other concerning the name which Eusebius gives to the author of that book.

*Asus est libros suos nefarios, ac
Dei hostes φιλολατρίαις annotare. i. e.* “ He dared to in-“ title his abominable and impious books, The Lovers

(4) Lactant. De Mortib. Persecutorum. pag. 311. cap. 3. of Truth. These are Lactantius's words (5). Now Eusebius calls the author of the book intitled Φιλολατρίαις, Hierocles (6). It is therefore unquestionable, that the author whose name does not appear in Lactantius's

(6) Euseb. contra Hieroclem. pag. 511, 514. Vo- lum. de Demost. Evangel. 5th book, is the same who is called Hierocles in the treatise de Mortibus Persecutorum. i. e. “ Of the deaths of the Persecutors.” Observe that Eusebius in his refutation of this author confines himself to the parallel between Jesus Christ's miracles, and those of Apollonius of Tyanea. He does not attempt to answer the other objections, and only observes, that Origen had refuted them beforehand in his book against Celsus, and that Hierocles only borrowed the thoughts and expressions of another. Observe also with regard to this parallel, that Eusebius only cursorily runs over Apollonius's Life written by Philostratus, and makes a few critical remarks upon it. It is certain that Eusebius has not done wonders in that refutation. Here follows what Dr. Cave said of it. Posterioris hujus operis partem de comparatione Apollonii cum Christo refutandam in se suscepit Eusebius libro contra Hieroclem; quod & SATIS JUNGE præstitit, cum potius Philostrati libros de vita Apollonii in eo opusculo breviter percussit & refellit (7). i. e. “ Eusebius undertook to confute in his book

(7) Cave, Hist. Liter. Script. Ecclæs. Part 2. pag. m. 61.

“ against Hierocles the latter part of this work,
“ which contains a parallel between Apollonius and “ Jesus Christ : but he has done it very indifferently,
“ for he rather runs over and refutes Philostratus's
“ Life of Apollonius.” Observe lastly, that Lactantius did not design to make a particular answer to Hierocles ; for he is so far from following him closely, that he never answers directly any objection transcribed from the work of that enemy of Christ. His design was to establish the foundations of the Gospel, and to ruin those of Paganism : he thought that this would be answering at once all that the adversaries of Christianity had published, or would publish for the future. Li- tergo, de quibus dixi, cum præsentem me ac dolente, sacrilegas suas literas explicassent, & illorum superba impetate stimulatæ, & veritatis ipsius conscientia, & (ut ego arbitror) Deo, suscepti hoc manus, ut omnibus ingenii mei viribus accusatores justitiæ refutarem; non ut contra hos scriberem, qui paucis verbis obteri poteram, sed ut omnes, qui ubique idem operis efficiunt, aut effecerunt, uno semel impetu profugarem. Non dubito enim, quin & alii plurimi, & multis in locis, & non modo Græcis, sed etiam Latinis literis monumentum injustitiæ suæ firaverim, quibus singulis quoniam respondere non poteram, sic agendam mihi hanc causam putavi, ut & priores cum omnibus suis scriptis perverterem, & futuris omnium facultatem scribendi, aut respondendi amputarem (8). i. e. “ When “ therefore, they, whom I have mentioned, had ex“ plained before me and to my grief, their sacrilegious “ opinions, I being provoked at their haughty impiety,

“ and animated by the knowledge of truth, and, as I “ imagine, moved by God himself, have under“ taken to refute the enemies of religion, with all the “ strength I am capable of. I do not indeed design to “ write against them who can be answered in a few “ words, but to bear down with one stroke all those who “ any where undertake or have undertaken the same “ task. For I do not doubt, but several others, in a “ great many places have left monuments of their im“ piety not only in Greek, but also in Latin; and as “ I could not make a particular answer to every one “ of them, I thought it was proper thus to plead this “ cause, that I might overthrow the former authors
“ with all their mights, and at the same time put it “ out of the power of any future author both to write
“ any more (against our religion) and to answer me.”

[B] It is reported, that . . . Ædeseus gave Hierocles a box on the ear, upbraiding him with his infamous cruelty. Eusebius does not express himself clearly, but we ought to think that this circumstance is implicitly meant by the words he made use of. Λόγους τε & ἔργους τὸν δικαστὴν αἰχμήν & ἀτιμίαν περιβαλὼν. i. e. “ He “ loaded the Judge with shame and disgrace both by “ his words and deeds (9).” Here follows Valesius's note upon this passage (10). In hoc Eusebii loco, ἀτιμίαν quidem designat verbera, quibus iudex affectus est ab Ædeseo. αἰχμήν verò denotat convicia, quibus Ædeseus iudicem ipsum appetiit. Utrumque autem indicat Eusebius his verbis: λόγους τε & ἔργους τὸν δικαστὴν, &c. i. e. “ In this passage of Eusebius, the word ἀτιμία (dis“ grace) relates to the blows which Ædeseus gave the “ Judge ; and the word αἰχμήν (shame) signifies the re-“ proaches he loaded him with. Eusebius gives us “ both these particulars to understand in these words ;

“ By his words and deeds he loaded the Judge, &c.”

Eusebius does not tell us the name of the Judge who was treated thus ; it is from other writers that we learn his name was Hierocles. You will find this, with some other particulars, in the following words of Metaphrastes: you will find there, that he struck the Governor of all Egypt, that he threw him down on the ground, and repeated his blows. Post hanc calamitatem, incidit in Hieroclem, qui totam Ægyptum administrabat. Hunc cum in Dei martyres injuria ferventem animadvertisset, sanctasque Dei virgines iradentem nominibus, nec tantam indignitatem perferre posset, simile fratrem facinus aggreditur. Namque Divino repletus zelo procedit, & verbis ac factis Hieroclem confundit. Manu enim sua plagas illi in os infligit, humique supinum prosternit & cædit: ac mones, ne audeat contra naturæ leges Dei servos offendere (11). i. e. “ After this calamity he met with “ Hierocles, who was Governor of all Egypt. And “ observing that this man unjustly raged against God's “ Martyrs, and exposed God's holy Virgins to the “ panders, and not being able to suffer so great an in“ justice, he attempted an action like that of his bro“ ther; for being animated with a divine zeal, he “ loaded Hierocles with shame both by words and deeds :

“ for he struck him on the face with his hand, and “ throwing him down he continued to beat him, warn“ ing him, never to venture any more to vex God's “ servants against the laws of nature.” Valesius quotes the Meneum or Martyrology of the Greeks; in which it is asserted that Hierocles the Governor was struck by Ædeseus at Alexandria (12):

[C] I shall take notice of some blunders of Moreri and of Cardinal Baronius.] I. He styles our Hierocles a Platonic Philosopher, though he was not so much as a Philosopher, taking the word in a general sense. I have not met with any author among the ancients, that makes him of that profession; and I find that

Dr.

(8) Lactant. Divin. Instit. lib. 5. cap. 4. pag. 311.

(9) Euseb. de Martyr. Palestin. cap. 5. pag. m. 326.

(10) Valesius, Not. in Eusebium, ibid. pag. m. 177.

(11) Metaphrastes, apud Valecium, ibid.

(12) Αὐτοχρηστὸν τὸν ἀρχιερέα ἱεροκλῆν; i. e. “ his own brand.”

HIEROCLES, the son of that Alypius, who had commanded the Roman Army in England,

(13) Philosophus, an solum homo politicus, non liquet. i. e. "It is not certain whether he was a Philosopher, or only a Politician. Cave, Hist. Liter. Part 2. pag. m. 279. He styles him a Philosopher in Part 2. pag. 61. without telling us how his doubts were removed.

(14) Baron. ad an. 68. num. 31. pag. m. 654.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) This blunder has been corrected in the Dutch edition, and in that of Paris.

(17) Lactant. lib. 5. cap. 2, and 4.

(18) Taken from Lactant. ibid. cap. 2.

(19) Baronius, ad an. 302. num. 51. pag. m. 730.

(20) Ineptus, vanus, ridiculus apparuit. i. e. "He appeared to be impertinent, silly and ridiculous." Lactant. Divin. Institut. lib. 5. cap. 2. pag. 307.

(21) Idem, ibid.

Dr. Cave amongst the moderns, doubts whether we ought to call him a Philosopher (13). II. Moreri mentions another Hierocles an Heathen Philosopher, and one of the Judges of the Areopagus, who laboured to demonstrate that Apollonius of Tyanea was the same with Jesus Christ. Eusebius wrote against him, adds he. This is multiplying beings without any necessity. For that Hierocles, who was refuted by Eusebius, does not differ from him, whom Moreri had given an account of in the preceding article, and whom he had called a Platonic Philosopher.

III. We know of no Hierocles who was a Judge of the Areopagus. Cardinal Baronius who has misled Moreri in this particular, might very easily have avoided that mistake; for he grounded his assertion on Lactantius's authority, whose very words he transcribes (14). Now Lactantius tells us expressly, that the author who wrote against the Christians, was one of the Judges in Bithynia. Since therefore Baronius supposed very rightly, that the name of this adversary of the Christians was Hierocles, he should not have placed him among the Judges of the Areopagus. Take notice that he is in the right to observe, that Eusebius and Lactantius wrote against the same Hierocles; and yet Moreri, who only transcribes from Baronius, mentions two Hierocles's to us, the one refuted by Lactantius, the other by Eusebius. IV. Moreri did not understand these words of Baronius. Nil magis monstrare conatus est (Hierocles) quam Apollonium aequalem fuisse Christo (15). i. e. "The chief thing, which Hierocles laboured to prove is, that Apollonius was equal to Jesus Christ." Moreri imagined that these words signify, that Hierocles pretended to prove that Apollonius was the same with Jesus Christ (16). What I have still to observe is rather against Cardinal Baronius, than against Moreri. We have seen above, that Lactantius mentions two Heathen authors, who wrote against the Christians. Baronius pretends that our Hierocles is the second of these authors, and that Porphyry is the first. Moreri transcribes this without making any critical remark upon it. He declares indeed that in this particular he follows Baronius's opinion. Let us therefore level our remarks against this Cardinal, and observe to him, that he would not have found Porphyry's character in that passage of Lactantius, had he examined it narrowly. The former of these Heathen authors was at Nicomedia at the same time with Lactantius, and published his invective against the Christians in that very city (17). He was a man abandoned to all manner of vice; covetous, voluptuous, and excessively prodigal in his diet. He was very rich, and made his court very assiduously to the Judges, in order to enrich himself more and more; namely, by selling their verdicts, and stopping the proceedings that were carried on against him by his neighbours, whose estates he seized upon. The three books he published against the Christians were very silly and ridiculous; he knew nothing of the matter, and knew not what he said. The Christians laughed at him, and he miscarried most wretchedly in his design (18). Such is the character of this author and of his book, if we may credit Lactantius. How then could Baronius (19) imagine that Porphyry was hinted at in this description? Where did he find that Porphyry continued a great while at Nicomedia? A man cannot court the favour of the Judges in order to keep possession of the lands, on which he unjustly seizes about his country houses; a man, I say, cannot do this, when he is a travelling; it is such a conduct as requires a fixed abode, and a settled establishment. If therefore Baronius were in the right, it must be supposed that Porphyry was thus settled at Nicomedia; now this is a circumstance which no author ever mentioned. This Philosopher spent the greatest part of his life at Rome and in Sicily; and besides, he was never charged with indulging himself in sensual pleasures; and after all, he did not write in a silly manner against the Christians. They complained indeed of his cavils, of his malice, and of his slanders; but they did not assert, that he wanted wit, or that his books were impertinent and ridiculous (20), or that they exposed him to the censure of the heathens themselves, instead of the reputation he expected. Verum hic, pro sua inani contemptus est; qui gratiam, quam speravit, non est adeptus, et gloria, quam captavit, in culpam reprehensionis conversa est (21). i. e. "But this author was despised for his silliness; nor did he gain the favour of the heathens as he expected; and instead of the reputation he aimed at, he was only blamed." Porphyry had been a Christian, according to Baronius (22); he ought not therefore to have been so grossly ignorant of the subject he handled, as the person whom Lactantius mentions; for you must observe, that this father, having asserted, that that writer examined several things in particular, adds immediately, one would think that he had been formerly a Christian, ut aliquando ex eadem disciplina fuisse videatur (23). This observation ought to have been of some weight with Baronius, not to mistake Porphyry in the character, which Lactantius gives us of the Philosopher, who wrote ignorantly and impertinently against the persecuted Christians.

To conclude, let us observe that the preface which this Philosopher had prefixed to his Book, is proper to shew us how much the persecutions carried on by the Heathen were like those which the Christians carry on. A selfish and flattering Author never fails to write against the persecuted Party; he looks upon it as a fair opportunity to commend his Prince, and will be sure to improve it. He expatiates on the service that is done to God, and on the charity of the Teachers, who ought to make instruction go hand in hand with the authority of the laws, that they, who have the misfortune to err, being brought back to the knowledge of the truth, may thus escape the Punishment, which their obstinacy would otherwise draw upon them. This voluptuous Philosopher of Nicomedia omitted none of those common-place Topics; one would think that he was the model, which several French Authors copied after, who wrote whilst the Protestants were persecuted in France. You will find in the following passage, how he expressed himself. Professus ante omnia Philosophi officium esse, erroribus hominum subvenire; atque illos ad veram viam revocare, id est, ad cultus Deorum; quorum numine ac majestate (ut ille dicebat) mundus gubernetur: nec pati, homines imperitos quorundam fraudibus illici; ne simplicitas eorum praece ac pabulo sit hominibus astutis. Itaque se suscepisse hoc munus, philosophia dignum; ut praeferret non videntibus lumen sapientiae; non modo ut susceptis Deorum cultibus resanescant, sed etiam ut pertinaci obstinatione deposita, corporis cruciamenta devitent; neu saevae membrorum lacerationes frustra perpeti velint. Ut autem appareret, cujus rei gratia opus illud elaborasset, effusus est in principum laudes; quorum pietas, et providentia (ut quidem ipse dicebat) cum in ceteris rebus humanis, tum praecipue in defendendis Deorum religionibus claruisset; consultum esse tandem rebus humanis, ut cohibita impia et anili superstitione, universi homines legitimis sacris vacarent, ac propitios sibi Deos experirentur (24). i. e. "He declared first of all, that it is the Duty of a Philosopher to undeceive men in their Errors, and to lead them back into the road of truth, that is to say, to the worship of the Gods, by whose Providence and Power, as he pretended, this World is governed; and not to suffer that unskilful Persons be imposed upon by the artifice of others, lest their innocence should make them a prey to crafty men. That he therefore undertook this task, worthy of a Philosopher, in order to carry the light of wisdom before those that were blind; not only that they might come to their right sense again and worship the Gods, but also that by renouncing their obstinacy, they might avoid the cruel punishments that were designed for them, and not expose themselves any longer in vain, to have their members tortured and torn in pieces. And that it might appear with what design he wrote that book, he expatiated on the praises of the Princes, whose piety and wisdom, as he said, had been eminent not only in the government of civil affairs, but also chiefly in defending and promoting the worship of the Gods. That the welfare of human kind was at last provided for, by suppressing that impious and silly superstition, and bringing all men to a lawful worship, which would render the Gods kind and propitious to them." It is easier to recede from the method of the persecutor Dioclesian, than from that of his Panegyrist.

(22) Baron. ad an. 302. num. 53. ubi vocat Socrates, lib. 3. cap. 19. N. B. It is cap. 23. in Reading's edition, published at Cambridge 1720.

(23) Lactant. lib. 5. cap. 2.

(24) Idem, ibid. pag. 306.

England, and whom Julian the Apostate sent to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple, was impeached together with his father, under the Emperor Valens, and tormented so cruelly, that they did no longer know which of his members to torture again, in order to extort from him by the violence of the rack, what they would have him declare (a). Orders were at last given to carry him to the place of execution; but whilst he was going thither, the whole people addressed the Emperor in a body, and petitioned him so earnestly for that man, that they obtained his pardon. This is what may be inferred from a passage in Ammianus Marcellinus, compared with another in St. Chrysostom [A]. Our Hierocles was a disciple of Libanius, and had a great share in his esteem [B].

(a) Omni laniena excruciato, ut verba placencia Principis, vel potius arcessitori loqueretur, quocum pennis non latuerent membra, vivis exuisset. Amm. Marcell. lib. 29. cap. 14. pag. 556.

[A] He obtained his Pardon. This is what may be inferred from a passage in Ammianus Marcellinus, compared with St. Chrysostom. The passage in Marcellinus is as follows. Ipsē quoque Alypius, post multationem bonorum exulare præceptus, filium miserabiliter ductum ad mortem, casu quodam prospero revocatum excepit (1). i. e. "Alypius being ordered to go into banishment, his estate being forfeited, did also by a lucky event recover his Son who was unhappily going to be executed." The passage from St. Chrysostom is in the third Homily on the incomprehensible nature of God. This Father, in order to acquaint his audience with the powerful efficacy of a whole people's prayer, quoted to them an instance which they had seen ten years ago, when a certain malefactor, who was going to the place of execution with a gag in his mouth,

(1) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 29. pag. 557.

obtained his pardon at the request of the whole people of Antioch, who went in a body to petition the Emperor for him. Valesius (2) does not doubt but this Malefactor was Hierocles the son of Alypius.

(2) Hen. Valesius, in Marcellin. lib. 29. pag. 557.

[B] He had a great share in the esteem of Libanius. Libanius in a letter to Alypius (3) tells him, that his son being still but a Child, appeared wiser than grown persons, and that there were several fathers, who when they reproved their children, proposed to them the example of Alypius's son. Ammianus Marcellinus's character of him agrees upon the whole with that which Libanius gives him. Citatus est cum Hierocle filio adolescente indolis bonæ. i. e. "He was summoned with his son Hierocles, a youth of a virtuous disposition (4)."

(3) Lib. 4. Epist. 284. apud Valecium, ibid.

(4) Citatus est cum Hierocle filio, adolescente indolis bonæ. Amm. Marcell. ibid. pag. 556.

HIEROCLES, a Platonic Philosopher in the fifth Century, taught at Alexandria with great reputation, and was admired for the strength of his mind, and the beauty of his noble expressions (a). He wrote seven books upon Providence and Fate, and dedicated them to the Philosopher Olympiodorus, who by his embassies did the Roman Empire great services, under the Emperors Honorius and Theodosius the younger (b). These books are lost, and we know them only by the extracts which are to be met with in Photius. It appears from these extracts that Hierocles had shewed, that there is a perfect agreement between Plato's doctrine and that of Aristotle, and that they who denied it, did not well understand the opinions of these two great Philosophers (c). He racked his brains a thousand ways to remove the difficulties which occur in the doctrines of Providence, Fate, and Freewill; and he pretended that the ground or principle of all this consisted in the soul's passing from one body into another, and in the life which the souls had led before they entered into human bodies. He spent all his strength upon this subject, so that he had none left to think of strong arguments proper to establish the doctrine he undertook to prove (d); and therefore Photius observes, that all his great shew of reasoning came at last to nothing but trifles (e). We may observe something very singular in this Philosopher's doctrine; for he asserted that Plato taught, the world was made out of nothing [A].

(a) Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 242. pag. m. 1037.

(b) Idem, Cod. 214. pag. 549.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) *Εἰς ἄλλοι ἀπο τοῦ πολὺ μολοῦτον διαλύονται σπουδαίως. Ἰν πηγὰς οὐρεσὶ ἰλλὰ μακρινὰ ἀβίη. Idem, *ibid.

He

[A] He asserted that Plato taught, the world was made out of nothing. Hierocles (1) refused in a very strong manner the Platonick Philosophers, who asserted, that though God should operate eternally by his power and wisdom, he would yet be incapable of forming a world without the help of uncreated matter. These Philosophers maintained that God did not produce any thing but by co-operation of matter, the existence or being of which did not depend on him. Every thing, added they, was potentially contained in that matter; God only extracted things from it, and put them in order. Hierocles argued with a great deal of judgment against this Hypothesis; he asserted that such a work of God would be the effect of an unnecessary labour, rather than a proof of goodness. Ὁ δημιουργὸς μᾶλλον ἀνὲν ἀγαθότητος θεῶ. Quod supervacanea potius esset diligentia quam bonitatis Dei (2). For why should he labour to put that in order which he has not made? Is not a being that is from all eternity self-existent sufficiently regular? And is not every thing that happens to such a being against the nature of it? And is it not therefore a defect? Τὸ γὰρ δὴ μὴ εἶναι ἄ μὴ ὑπὸ θεοῦ διατάττειται πᾶσι, πάντως περὶ τῆς εὐταξίας αὐτοῦ ἐν τῇ ἀγνοίᾳ τῆς ἑαυτῶν φύσεως κειμένης; τὸ γὰρ ἀγνοίᾳ κατ' ἑαυτὸ ὑφίσταται ἢ τι προσλάβει, παρὰ φύσιν προσλήψεται. τὸ δὲ παρὰ φύσιν διατεθῆναι, κακὸν τῷ μετατρέποντι ὡς ἐκ ἀγαθοῦ τῇ λεγομένη ὕλη τὸ κοσμοῦσθαι, εἴπερ ἀγνοίᾳ εἶναι μὴ ἀπὸ χρόνου μοιοί, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ. i. e. "Why does he endeavour to put that into order, which he has not created, since things that are not created, are of their own na-

(1) Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 251. pag. 1380.

(2) Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 251. pag. 1380.

ture in a good order? For if any thing be added to what is uncreated and self-existent, it is added against nature; now what is added against nature is bad; so that it is not good to adorn the said matter, since it is uncreated, not only with regard to time, but also with regard to the cause of its existing (3). He infers from thence that God could not have begun his work but by an evil action (4), namely, by undertaking to deprive a substance uncreated like himself and his own sister, of her natural condition. These are such strong arguments (5), that whoever weighs them duly, and is concerned for Plato's reputation, will endeavour to prove, that he did not admit two collateral principles, both eternal and independent from each other, viz. God and matter. This is no doubt the reason why our Hierocles ascribed to him the doctrine of a Creation strictly so called. I am apt to think, that he had read it in the writings of the Christians, and that being sensible of the strength of the arguments, which shew the absurdity of an uncreated Matter, and adding to this the most exalted notions of a Creator, whose power and majesty are infinite, he supposed, for the glory of his sect, that its founder had known God under the notion of a being, who by a bare act of his will was capable of producing the universe. Ὅτι δημιουργὸν θεῶν, φησὶ, προφίσησιν ὁ Πλάτων ἰφιστάται πάσης ἐμφαντοῦς τε καὶ ἀφαντοῦς διακοσμήσεως, ἐκ μηδενος ἀπὸ προκειμένου γεννημένης. ἀρκῶν γὰρ τὸ ἐκείνου βούλησιν αἰς ὑπόστασιν τῶν ὄντων. i. e. "Plato, says he, supposed that God is the author of all, and that he has produced this whole universe with all that is visible"

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) *Τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς δημιουργίας ἀπὸ τινος κακοπρίας ἐνσπείρειται. i. e. "Beginning his creation with an evil action." Idem, *ibid.

(5) Compare this with what is observed in the remark [R] of the article EPICURUS.

He married only with a design to get children [B]. His wife became possessed with the Devil (f). In vain did he use the most civil expressions to deliver her from that Devil; the evil spirit had no regard to his compliments: but Theopsebius (g), without understanding Magic, exorcised her so effectually, that he forced the Devil to retire. Jonsius, who proves very strongly that our Hierocles lived after Eusebius, is however mistaken in other particulars [C], namely, in supposing that he was the author of an History of Apollonius of Tyana, and that the seven books concerning Providence were refuted by a writer named Eusebius, different from him who wrote the Church History, &c.

(f) Photius, Cod. 242. pag. m. 1037.

(g) He was a disciple of Hierocles.

(6) Photius, Bibliob. Cod. 251. pag. 1381.

(7) See there-mark [C] in the article HEMMINGIUS.

(8) Photius, Bibliob. Cod. 242. pag. 1037.

(9) Δακτύλιον ἁγιος καὶ παιδῶν τοῦ συμβιβασίου. i. e. "A ring rendering the union fruitful." Idem, ibid.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(a) Herodot. lib. 7. cap. 155, 156.

(b) Diod. Siculus, lib. 10. cap. 67. See also Plutarch. de Sera Numinis Provid. pag. 551, 552.

(c) Idem, Diod. ibid.

(d) Idem, ibid. cap. 48.

"visible and invisible in it out of nothing that existed before; because his will alone was sufficient to produce whatever exists (6)." But it would be very easy to shew that this is an officious lie, since Plato does very clearly suppose the being of an independent and uncreated matter. We may therefore assert, that Hierocles made use on this occasion of his skill as much as he had done in any other; I mean the skill of putting such a sense as one pleases upon an Author's words (7), or at least of finding two or three different systems in his works. He understood this practice perfectly well; for the two explications he gave of Plato's Gorgias, were intirely different, and yet they seemed to agree with the Platonick Doctrine. These are sports of wit, but which require a most fruitful imagination. Ἀντικαβαλῶν τὰ πρότερα καὶ τὰ ὕστερα ἕρου εἶναι τὸν αὐτὸν, ὡς ἔπος εἰπῆν· ἑκάτερον δὲ ὁμοίως, ὃ καὶ παράλογον ἀκούσθαι, τῆς Πλάτωνος ἐχόμενα, καθόσον οὐκ εἰς προαιρέσιον. τὸτο μὲν ἐν ἰσθμῶνται, τοῦ ἀνδρός ἡλικίῃ ἢ ἄρα τὸ τῶν φρονῶν πύλαος. i. e. "When his two explications were compared together, they appeared, if I may say so, very different; and yet, which looks like a Paradox, both his explications seemed to agree with Plato's Doctrine. Which shews how fruitful this man's genius was."

[B] He married only with a design to get children.] Damascius makes the same observation with regard to Theopsebius a Disciple of Hierocles, and this shews us that the most celebrated Platonick Philosophers were persuaded, that these were the true rules and real bounds of Matrimony, and that all that went beyond these limits, was a disorder, or at least a licentiousness, in which wise men ought not to indulge themselves. This Theopsebius finding that his wife was barren, made a ring of chastity, and gave it her. Formerly, said he to her, I made you a present of a ring of generation (9), but now I give you a ring of continence, which will help you to lead constantly a chaste life. Ἐπικερὸν σοὶ παρεσόμενον αἰεὶ τῆς σώφροσ· εἰ- κωρίας. i. e. "It will always be to you a help to chastity (10)." You may continue with me, if you please, and if you can contain yourself; but if you do not like this condition, you may marry another man; I consent to it, and the only favour I beg of you is, that we may part friends. She readily accepted the offer. Here my Author stops, and leaves us in the dark; for we do not know whether the woman accepted the former or the latter offer. The Author should not have left his account thus ambiguous.

[C] Jonsius, who proves that our Hierocles lived after Eusebius, is however mistaken in other particulars.] His first Argument is, that Hierocles mentioned Plutarch the Athenian, who lived after Jamblichus (11). Now the latter flourished under Julian the Apostate; we have still some letters, which this Emperor wrote to him. The second argument is, that Olympiodorus, to whom Hierocles's Books were dedicated, did not live before the reigns of Honorius and Theodosius the Younger; for he wrote an History which began with the seventh Consulship of Honorius, and the second of Theodosius the Younger, and he continued it to the reign of Valentinian, or to the year 425 (12). Jonsius is in the right on this foot to maintain, that the same Eusebius, who wrote the Church History, the Evangelical Preparation, &c. did not refute the writings of this Hierocles; but he is mistaken when he asserts that they have been refuted by another Eusebius. Here follows the cause of his blunder. He imagined that the same Hierocles, who composed the seven books upon Fate, wrote also the History of Apollonius of Tyanea, entitled, Philalethes, and of which there is a refutation amongst the works of Eusebius. This is mistaking Hierocles the Persecutor of Christians under the Emperor Dioclesian, for Hierocles a Philosopher of Alexandria under Theodosius the Younger. It is a little surprising that Jonsius, who had a very extensive and exact Knowledge of the Authors who had the same name, knew nothing of the President of Bithinya, and Governor of Alexandria, who vexed the Christians so much, who wrote against them, and whose name was Hierocles. Let us infer from all this, that this learned man was mistaken in believing that Eusebius refutes our Hierocles's opinions upon Fate. It is certain that Eusebius refuted only the opinion of Apollonius, such as he had read it in Philostratus (13).

(11) Jonsius, de Script. Hist. Phil. sep. pag. 303.

(12) Idem, ibid. pag. 324. He quotes Photius, Cod. 80.

(13) Observe, that Dr. Cave, Hist. Literar. Script. Eccl. Part 1. pag. 131. censures these two blunders of Jonsius.

HIERO I King of Syracuse was the son of Dinomenes and the brother of Gelon, who after he had invaded the sovereign power at Gela, was so happy as to see the city of Syracuse submit to him, when he had no other design but to restore some citizens of that City, whom the populace had banished. He was so well pleased with this new acquisition, that of his own accord he resigned Gela to his brother Hiero, and applied himself entirely to the government of Syracuse, employing all possible means to put that city in the most flourishing condition (a). His reign was glorious and happy; he acquired a great reputation by his victories, and gained the love of his subjects by his equity and moderation (b). Hiero, who succeeded him, did not follow his steps; he was covetous and passionate, and was very far from imitating Gelon's virtuous conduct; for which reason several persons had a mind to rebel against him; but the memory of his predecessor was so dear to them and so glorious, that it prevented their rebellion (c). He had a great mind to put his brother Polyzelus to death, whom the Syracusans loved very much, and whom he suspected to aim at the sovereign power. He designed to send him to assist the Sybarites, who were besieged by the Crotonians: he designed, I say, to send him thither, that he might be killed in battle; but Polyzelus, who perceived his wicked intention, refused the employment, and seeing that the King his brother was extremely exasperated at his refusal, retired to the Court of Theron, who reigned at Agrigentum. They were sometime after reconciled by Theron's mediation (d). The latter might have made an advantage of this misunderstanding, but he was an honest man (e), and would reward one kind office with another [A]. His son Thrasyldeus suc-

(e) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 53.

[A] Theron would reward one kind office with another.] Whilst Hiero was making preparations to attack Theron, to whose court his brother was retired, the inhabitants of Himera sent him Deputies ceeded him, and was unfortunate in the war in which he engaged against the Syracusans. Hiero invaded the country of the Agrigentines with a strong army, and gained a victory which made Thrasyldeus lose his crown (f). Observe here the difference there is between Poets and Historians. The same Hiero, who is represented as a very accomplished Prince in Pindar's Odes [B], appears to be a very bad King in Diodorus Siculus's History. I think, that if the Poet flatters him too much, the Historian does not treat him with a sufficient impartiality; for he does not relate all that is to his honour; I mean, that Hiero became more moderate, and was very much improved in his morals by conversing with some men of wit [C], whom he loved and loaded with favours. He died in the city of Catania the second year of the 78th Olympiad (g), after he had reigned near twelve years (h). It was a city which he had entirely changed, having driven the ancient inhabitants out of it, and settled there in their stead a Colony of Greeks from Peloponnesus, and from Syracuse (i). He changed its name of Catania into that of Ætna, and would himself be surnamed Ætneus, when he was proclaimed Conqueror at the Pythick Games (k). The solemnities of his burial were like those that used to be celebrated for heroes (l). His brother Thrasylbulus succeeded him, but his tyrannical actions forced the citizens of Syracuse to revolt, and they reduced him to such straits, that he was obliged to submit to very hard terms. He retired into Italy in the country of the Locri, where he past the remainder of his days in a private life. He reigned but one year. The citizens of Syracuse having restored the Republican Government, continued it till the time of Dionysius's tyranny. This was an interval of threescore years (m). We may observe, that it is surprising that Dinomenes, Hiero's son, did not succeed him.

(f) Diod. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 53.

(g) Idem, ibid. cap. 66.

(h) Idem, ibid. cap. 38. pag. m. 397.

(i) Idem, ibid. cap. 49.

(k) See Pindar. Pyth. Od. 1. & ibid. Commentar. Job. Benedicti.

(l) Diod. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 66. Observe that the ancient inhabitants of Catania settled again in that city, and destroyed the monument raised to Hiero. See Strabo, lib. 6. pag. 185.

(m) Diod. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 67, 68.

He

to offer him their assistance, and even to let him know that they were determined to live under his Government. Thrasyldeus, Theron's son, had been sent to command them, and had made himself odious to them by his outrages and by his pride. Hiero took hold of this opportunity, not to prosecute his design of continuing the war, but to procure a pacification. He gave the King of Agrigentum notice of what the inhabitants of Himera contrived. This notice made Theron take necessary measures to make their plot miscarry; and was the reason why he made peace with the King of Syracuse, and restored a good understanding between the two brothers (1). Moreri, quoting the Xith Book of Diodorus Siculus, asserts, that Hieron routed the tyrant of Agrigentum, who despised him. I could not find the least hint of this particular in Diodorus Siculus. Observe that the Historian Timæus had related, that Theron not being able to bear that his son-in-law Polyzelus should be abused by Hiero, declared war against this King of Syracuse; but it ended immediately, and before there was any act of hostility committed on either side (2). Let us observe by the by, that Demarata (3) Theron's daughter, was married to King Gelon, who on his death-bed ordered that she should marry Polyzelus (4).

(1) Diod. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 48.

(2) See Benedictus's Commentary on Pindar, Od. 2. Olymp. pag. 43.

(3) Concerning this woman, see Diod. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 26.

(4) See Benedictus's Commentary on Pindar, Od. 2. Olymp. pag. 43.

(5) See the 1st Ode of his Olympicks, and the 1st, 2d, and 3d of his Pythicks.

(6) See Pausanias, lib. 8. pag. 687.

(7) Jo. Benedictus, in Pindar. Od. 1. Olymp. pag. 2.

(8) Pindar. Od. 1. Olymp.

(9) Diod. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 38, 39.

[B] Hiero . . . is represented as a very accomplished Prince in Pindar's Odes.] He carried the prize of the horse-Race at the Olympick Games, and had the same advantage at the Pythick Games, and was also conqueror at the chariot-races. These Victories were celebrated in a lofty stile by the Poet Pindar (5); and you may be sure, that tho' his digressions fill up above three fourths of his Odes, yet he does not forget to observe, that Hiero had all the virtues of a good and brave King. Observe that the inscription of Hiero's ex Voto (6), (or the offering he had vowed) shews, that he carried the prize three times at the Olympick Games, twice at the horse-races, and once at the Chariot-races. John Benedictus (in French Benoist) who in his Commentary on Pindar asserts (7), that Hiero carried the prize of the horse-races at the Olympick Games celebrated in the 73d Olympiad, is mistaken; for Hiero was already King of Syracuse when he carried that prize (8), and he did not begin to reign at Syracuse till the 75th Olympiad (9). The same Commentator pretends that he died after he had gained such another victory in the 77th Olympiad, which is supposing that he reigned above sixteen years, and contradicting the best Historians without any reason.

[C] Hiero became much more moderate, and was very much improved in his morals by conversing with some men of wit.] He was one of the most ignorant men in the world, and as rustic as his brother Gelon; but having had a fit of sickness, he spent the leisure, which the weakness of his body gave him, in conversing with learned men, and became learned himself: and when he had entirely recovered his health, he continued to take a delight in those conversations, and often discoursed with Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchilides (10). The Author, who acquaints us with this, adds, that he was a great lover of literature; that he was very generous; that he had an exalted mind; that he lived with his three brothers without any mistrust; that he loved them tenderly, and was also thus beloved by them; and that his inclination to make considerable presents, determined Simonides, though he was then very old, to cross the sea, and to come to him (11). There are some Critics (12), who pretend that it is inconsistent with Chronology to suppose that Hieron had seen Simonides: but others shew that they are mistaken (13). All the ancient writers were fully persuaded of their meeting, and conversing together. Xenophon supposes a dialogue between them (14), which is a very good piece. Hiero speaks there as a man of wit, and of great judgment. The Historian Timæus had asserted, that Simonides was the mediator of the peace, that was concluded between Hiero and Theron (15). See also Athenæus (16) and Pausanias (17); and observe, that though there were not the least flattery in the praises which Pindar and Ælianus bestowed upon Hiero, yet one could not infer from thence, that Diodorus Siculus gave a false account of him: for what he has observed concerning Hiero's covetousness and passionate temper, might be true with regard to his conduct before he fell sick. I do not observe this with a design to excuse Diodorus in every respect: I still blame him for not mentioning Hiero's conversion, and for hinting but too plainly that he never mended his morals. Μία ἢ τὴν ἱέρωνος τολύμην παραλαβὼν τὴν ἀρχὴν Θρασυβούλου ἠ ἀδελφῆς ὑπεβίβασε τῇ κακίᾳ τὸν ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ βασιλεύσαντα (18). i. e. "Hiero being dead, Thrasylbulus his brother reigned in his stead, and exceeded in wickedness his predecessor." This seems absolutely false to me, and in my opinion we ought to give some credit to Ælian and to Plutarch (19), and to quote this Prince as an instance, which proves the truth of the following maxim of Horace:

(10) Ælian. D. v. Hist. lib. 4. cap. 15.

(11) Idem, ibid. lib. 9. cap. 1.

(12) Bisciola, tom. 2. Hor. sub. tit. lib. 2. cap. 19.

(13) See Kuhniius's Notes on Ælian. lib. 4. cap. 15.

(14) Intituled, ἱέρων, ἢ τολύμηνος. Hieron, sive Tyrannicus.

(15) See Benedictus's Commentary on Pindar, Ode 2. Olymp. pag. 43.

(16) Athen. lib. 14. pag. 656.

(17) Pausan. lib. 1. pag. 6.

(18) Diod. Sicul. lib. 19. cap. 67.

(19) Plutarch. de sera Numinis Vindicta, pag. 551. & in Apophthegm. pag. 175.

Nemo adeo ferus est, ut non miserecere possit, Si modo cultura patientem commodat aurem (20).

(20) Horat. Ep. 1. lib. 1. ver. 39.

"The rash, the lazy, lover, none's so wild,
"But may be tam'd and may be wisely mild;
"If they consult true virtue's rules with care,
"And lend to good advice a patient ear.

C R E C H.

Let us observe that the distemper which gave our Hiero an opportunity to use himself to learned conversations, was the Gravel. The Scholiast on Pindar (21), quotes upon this occasion a work of Aristotle which is lost. Moreri was grossly mistaken, when he ascribed to Hiero II what relates only to Hiero I. I mean that learning acquired in bed, &c.

(21) See Jo. Benedicti Commentar. in Pindar. pag. 260, 296.

(n) See Pausanias, lib. 8. cap. 42. pag. 687. & lib. 6. cap. 12. pag. 479. (o) See Athenæus, lib. 6. pag. 231, 232. (p) See Benedictus's Commentary on Pindar, Od. 1. Pyth. pag. 263. (q) Ibid.

He survived him, as appears by an inscription of the gifts which his father had vowed to Jupiter Olympius (n). The offerings which this King of Syracuse consecrated in the temple of Delphi were very splendid (o). He had no children by his first wife, who was the daughter of Anaxilaus King of Rhegium, and cousin of Theron (p). But by his second wife, who was Niocles's daughter, he had Dinomenes, whom I have mentioned above (q). It is pretended that he made him Governor of the city of Catana with the title of King of Ætna [D]. I cannot tell to which of his two wives we ought to ascribe the answer related by Plutarch (r).

(r) Plutarch. in Apophteg. pag. 175. See above. the remark [E] of the article DUELLIUS.

[D] It is pretended, that he made his son Governor of Catana, with the title of King of Ætna. They who pretend this, ground their opinion on the following (12) Pindar. Od. words of Pindar (22). 1. Pyth. pag. m. 262, 263.

Μοῦσα κ' ὡς Δεινομένει κλαδῆσαι πειθέο μοι ποίαν τιρίπταν, χάσμα δ' ἐκ ἀλλότριοι ν-καφρία παύειθ'.
 ἄγ' ἔπειτ' Αἴτνας βασιλεῖ
 φίλιον ἐξέταμιν ὕμνον.
 τῷ πόλις κείαν θεομά-
 τω σὺν ἰλευθήρια,
 Ἴλλιδ' ἑταβρίας ἴεων
 ἐν νόμοις ἐκίησσε.

i. e. "Assist me, Muse, to sing to Dinomenes the prize carried at the chariot-races, for it becomes a son to rejoice for his father's victory. Let us afterwards invent an hymn acceptable to the King of Ætna, for whom Hiero has built a city, the liberty of which is settled by the Gods, and in which Hiero published the Doric Laws." Benedictus's note upon this is as follows. Postquam Poeta laudavit Hieronem ab ἰουκία, & filium Dinomenem a studio in patrem: ad alias ejusdem Dinomenis laudes digreditur: quem Ætnæ regem appellat: nam illam a se conditam Hiero dedit filio administrandam: eumque duce[m] Ætæcorum constituit. i. e. "After the Poet has commended Hiero for his happiness in his children, and his son Dinomenes for his love and respect for his father, he proceeds in a digression to praise Dinomenes upon other accounts, and he styles him King of Ætna, because Hiero having founded that city, gave the government of it to his son, whom he made King or Commander of the Ætæneans." This makes us wonder the more to see that Thrafsybulus succeeded to Hiero. I am apt to think, that the Syracusans favoured the brother rather than the son, in order to do more honour to Gelon's memory. For Dinomenes, Hiero's son, was only Gelon's nephew; whereas Thrafsybulus was Gelon's brother. So that by raising them to the throne, who were Gelon's nearest relations, the Syracusans shewed very plainly, that they looked upon him as the chief foundation of any person's pretensions to the crown.

HIERO II, King of Syracuse, was descended from the family of Gelon, who had reigned in the same place; but his mother being a servant, his father Hierocles looked upon him as a child who was a disgrace to his family, and therefore he abandoned him to the care of fortune (a), that is to say, that he exposed him. The bees nursed him for several days; and the Soothsayers declaring that this was a sign that he would be a King, Hierocles had him brought home again, and took all possible care of his education. The child made a considerable progress, and distinguished himself several ways. He became a perfectly handsome and strong man, he spoke with a very good grace, and he fought very often with those who challenged him, and was always the conqueror. He received as a reward a great many military gifts from Pyrrhus (b). When Pyrrhus was gone, the Syracusans made him Prætor [A]; and as he acquitted himself of that office with a great deal of prudence, all the cities agree unanimously to choose him their Captain General against the Carthaginians, and they raised him afterwards to the Throne (c). Soon after he carried on a vigorous war against the Mamertines, whom he had already defeated on some occasions; and he proposed to drive them out of the city of Messana*, which they had seized against the Law of Nations. As they did not find themselves in a condition to resist him, they applied themselves, some to the Carthaginians, and others to the Romans. The question whether they should be assisted was strongly debated at Rome, and at last passed in the affirmative; and this was the beginning of the Punic War. The Consul Appius Claudius, who was sent to the assistance of the Mamertines, landed with his army in Sicily, in the year 490 after the building of Rome. The Mamertines gave their city up to him, and obliged the Carthaginian General, who commanded

(a) Ex Ancilla natus ac propterea à patre, velut debonissimum generis, expositus fuerat. Justin. lib. 23. cap. 4.

(b) A Pyrrho rege multis militaribus donis donatus est, Ibid. ibid.

(c) Justin. lib. 23. cap. 4. * Now Messina.

(1) Polybius, lib. 1. cap. 3.

[A] The Syracusans made him Prætor. I have been contented with following Justin's compendious expressions; but I shall give here a more particular account of this fact, which is imperfectly related by that Author. I observe then, that there was a misunderstanding between the Citizens of Syracuse, and their army; and that the army being encamped near Mergana, proceeded to the election of the Magistrates, and conferred that dignity on two Officers of the army, Artemidorus, and Hiero. The latter being introduced into the City by the secret intrigues of his friends, overcame all the oppositions of the contrary party, and behaved himself with such moderation and generosity, that the inhabitants consented to own him for Prætor, though they looked upon those assemblies as unlawful, in which the soldiers pretended to choose the Magistrates (1). Polybius, who is my voucher here, relates two instances of Hiero's policy. The first is, his putting a stop to a disorder which was very prejudicial to the State. The Syracusans, who continued in the City whilst the army and the Prætors were in the field, raised a thousand seditions, and laboured to make innovations in the Government: it was therefore necessary, that when the army was absent, some person should keep the Citizens in awe. Leptines was very proper for this design, for he had a great many clients in the City, and great credit with the people. Hiero therefore made lure of him, by marrying his daughter, and by this means he provided for the public tranquillity at Syracuse, whilst he should be abroad at the head of the army. His second stroke of policy was his getting rid of the old foreign soldiers, who were mutinous and dissolute. He took the field with a pretence of attacking the Mamertines (2); and when he came in sight of the enemy, he divided his army into two bodies, the one composed of the soldiers who were Syracusans, the other of the foreigners; he put himself at the head of the former, as though he designed to assault the enemy; and left the latter exposed to the fury of the Mamertines, who cut them in pieces. He raised other troops, and attacked the enemies so opportunely, that he gained a glorious victory over them. He was chosen King after this great action (3).

(2) This was the name which those soldiers took who made themselves masters of the city of Messana by artifice. See Polyb. lib. 1. cap. 7. (3) Taken from Polybius, lib. 1. cap. 8, 9.

commanded in their citadel to leave it. The Carthaginians besieged Messina, and entered into an alliance with Hiero, who joined his army with theirs. The Roman Consul resolved to give them battle, and attacked first the Syracusans; the fight was sharp; Hiero behaved himself with a great deal of courage; but he was routed, and thought fit to return to Syracuse. Appius Claudius having also gained a victory over the Carthaginians, was master of the country, and advanced to Syracuse, and besieged it. Hiero observing that all Sicily was under a consternation, and that the army of the Carthaginians was very much weakened, made some proposals of a peace to the Romans; his proposals were accepted, and from that time till his death he continued faithfully attached to the interest of the Romans (d), and gave them all possible proofs of the most sincere friendship [B]. If he had lived but five or six years, after he entered into an alliance with them, and if we should judge of things according to the practice of this age, we should

(d) Ex Polybio, lib. 1. cap. 10, & seq.

[B] He gave the Romans all possible proofs of the most sincere friendship.] I shall relate what he did, when the affairs of the Romans were in very great confusion after the battle, which Hannibal gained near the lake called Thrasymenus (4). This was the third battle they had lost in Italy, since Hannibal entered that country, that is to say, in one year only. This would be more than sufficient at this time, to make a Prince forsake his allies, and side with the conqueror; a Prince, I mean, whose dominions should be situated, as Syracuse was with regard to the Republic of Carthage. Yet Hiero followed only the rules of Generosity; he continued a constant friend to the Romans, and sent them a powerful supply. Read the following words of Livy (5). Per eosdem dies ab Hierone classis Hostium cum magno comœatu accessit. Legati Syracusani in senatum introducti nunciarunt, cœdem C. Flamini consulis exercitusque allatam adeo agrè tulisse regem Hieronem, ut nulla sua propria, regni que sui clade moveri magis potuerit. Itaque, quamquam probè sciat magnitudinem populi Romani admirabiliorem propè adversis rebus, quàm secundis, esse, missa tamen à se omnia, quibus à bonis fidelibusque sociis bella juvari soleant. Quæ ne accipere abnuant, magnoperè se p. c. orare, Jam omnium primum omnis causa victoriam auream pondo CCCXX. afferre sese; acciperent eam, tenerentque & haberent propriam & perpetuam. Advexisse etiam trecenta millia modium tritici, ducenta hordei, ne comœatus deessent. Et quantum præterea opus esset, & quò jussissent, subvevros. Milite atque equite scire nisi Romani Latini que nominis non uti populum Romanum: levium armorum auxilia etiam externa vidisse in castris Romanis. Itaque missæ mille sagittariorum ac funditorum aptam manum adversus Baleares ac Mauros, pugnaesque alias missili telo gentes. Ad ea dona consilium quoque addebant, ut prætor, cui provincia Sicilia evenisset, classem in Africam trajiceret, ut & Hostes in terra sua bellum haberent, minusque laxamenti daretur iis ad auxilia Annibali summittenda. Ab senatu ipsa responsum regi est, Virum bonum, egregiumque socium Hieronem esse, atque uno tenore, ex quo in amicitiam populi Romani venerit, fidem coluisse, ac rem Romanam omni tempore ac loco munificè adjuvisse: id, perinde ac deberet, pergratum populo Romano esse. Aurum & à civitatibus quibusdam allatum, gratia rei accepta, non accepisse populum Romanum: victoriam, omenque accipere: sedemque ei se divæ dare, dicare Capitolium, templum Jovis Optimi Maximi. In ea arce urbis Romæ sacratam, volentem propitiâque, firmam ac stabilem fore populo Romano. Funditores, sagittariique, & frumentum traditum consulibus. i. e. " At that time a fleet, sent by Hiero, landed at Ostia, laden with a great deal of provisions. The Embassadors of Syracuse being admitted into the Senate, declared that Hiero was so much grieved at the death of the Consul C. Flaminius, and at the slaughter of their army, that no misfortune of his own or of his Kingdom could afflict him more. And though he was sensible that the Majesty of the Romans was in a manner more wonderful in their adversity, than in their prosperity; yet he sent them all the assistance that is usually expected in war from good and faithful allies. And he earnestly desired the Fathers not to refuse that assistance. The Embassadors added, that they had brought with them, first of all, as a good omen, a golden statue of Victory, of three hundred and twenty pound weight, which they desired the Senate to accept, and to keep for

(4) In the year 537, since the building of Rome.

(5) Titus Livius, lib. 22. pag. 340, 341. See also Valerius Maximus, lib. 4. cap. 8. num. 1. in Extr.

ever as their own. That they had also brought three hundred thousand bushels of wheat, and two hundred thousand of barley, that they might not want provisions; and if they had occasion for more, it should be sent to whatever place they should order. That they knew the Romans never made use of any foot-soldiers or horsemen, but such as were natives of Rome, or at least of Latium: that Hiero had however sometimes observed, auxiliary troops lightly armed in the armies of the Romans, and even such auxiliaries as were foreigners; and therefore he sent them a good number of archers and slingers, whom they might oppose against the Balearians, Mauritanians, and other nations who sling offensive weapons from a distance. To these gifts they added a piece of advice, which was, that the Prætor, who was to command in Sicily, should sail with a fleet into Africa, that the enemy might have the war in their own country, and be thus less capable of sending Hannibal fresh supplies. The Senate's answer to the King was, that Hiero was a good and excellent ally to the Romans, who had constantly been faithful to them, from the time he became a friend to them, and had at all times and in all places generously assisted them: that the people of Rome acknowledged this with pleasure, as they ought to do; that when some cities sent them gold, they were thankful for the favour, but would not accept the gold. But yet they accepted the statue of Victory as a good omen, and would give it a seat in the Capital, which was the Temple of Jupiter the Great God. That being consecrated in that Temple of the city of Rome, the Goddess would for ever be kind and propitious to the Romans; lastly, that the slingers, the archers, and the provisions, should be committed to the care of the Consuls." One can hardly meet with such a generous behaviour in private men towards each other. Gelon, Hiero's son, was not capable of following this noble example; he left the vanquished party, without minding in the least how much his father would be grieved at it. You will find Livy's words in the following passage from Casaubon. Fides & vera & constantia ejusdem (Hieronis) in conservanda Po. Ro. majestate laudari satis pro merito non queat; quum præsertim ea mox & deinceps persepe secuta sint tempora, quæ ejus constantiam eximie probarent. Quot & quantas clades populus Ro. bello Punico primo, & secundi initio sit perpeffus, nemo necit. Solent adversa hominum voluntates & abdita mentium nudare. Hieronis propositum & constantiam in suscepta semel amicitia Romanorum, non Reguli calamitas, non Claudii naufragium, non Thrasymenus, non Trebia, postremo ne Cannensis quidem dies potuit labefactare. Mansit inconcussa illi fides, etiam tunc quum & in Italia & extra Italiam omnes Po. Ro. socii & amici ad Pænos fortunam secuti inclinabant. Ne domus quidem Hieronis tota (verba sunt Livii) ab defectione abstinuit. Namque Gelo maximus stirpis contempta simul senectute patris, simul post Cannensium cladem Romana societate ad Pænos defecit. Hiero tamen nibilo secius immotus stetit, ceu Marpesia quædam cautes, eique etiam tunc fides constitit: quam etiam ad extremum vitæ constantissime servavit (6). (6) Casaubon, Commentar. in Polyb. pag. 152, 152.

i. e. " One cannot sufficiently commend Hiero's industry and constancy in supporting the Majesty of the Romans; especially since there happened soon after, and in succeeding times, such exigences as put his constancy to great trial. All the world knows how many and what great misfortunes befell the Romans " in should have reasons to wonder at his constancy. What then ought not our admiration to be, when we consider that he lived near fifty years after he made that alliance? This long reign was very happy; for Hiero's conduct was attended with so much prudence, that he was safe amongst his subjects, and gained great reputation abroad, and all his affairs, both public and private, succeeded according to his wish. He cultivated the friendship of the Greeks, and was proud of having his share in the crowns they distributed (e). His sons erected an equestrian statue, and another on foot to him at Olympia (f). His subjects also raised statues to him in the same city (g). The money he gave to the Rhodians, and the presents he sent them, after that great earth-quake, which had done a very considerable damage in their island, and thrown their Colossus down, are a very eminent proof of his generosity and magnificence (b). He built a ship, which was one of the most famous vessels of antiquity. Archimedes (i) had the direction of that work. You will find a description of it in Athenæus (k), who quotes a book written on purpose upon this subject by a certain Moschian. The 16th Idyl of Theocritus is addressed to this King of Syracuse, and the author seems to complain that he praised him without receiving the least reward from him. Hiero wrote some books of Agriculture (l), and died at the age of fourscore and ten years [C], the second year of the 141st Olympiad, and the 539th (m) since the building of Rome. He survived his son Gelon (n), who had been married with Nereis the daughter of Pyrrhus (o), and who had a son by her called Hieronymus (p). He observed that this Hieronymus had a great deal of pride, and he was afraid, lest the good condition, in which he had settled his Kingdom, should soon be altered under such a Prince: he desired therefore to restore the Syracusans their liberty, but his daughters dissuaded him from it [D]; and in his old age, he had not that strength of mind which was necessary to resist the caresses and artifices of these two women, who were night and day about him. He was therefore obliged to leave his Kingdom to his grandson, under the guardianship

“ in the first Punic War, and in the beginning of the “ second. Adversity does generally discover men's “ true inclinations, and their most secret thoughts.
 “ But neither Regulus's unfortunate case, nor Claudi“ us's shipwreck, nor the battle of Thrasymenus, nor “ that of Trebia, nor even the slaughter of Cannæ “ were capable of shaking Hiero's constancy, or “ weakening in the least the friendship he once had for “ the Romans. His fidelity continued firm, even “ when all the allies and friends of the Romans, both “ within and without Italy, were ready to join with “ the Carthaginians, because fortune favoured them.
 “ Nay the very family of Hiero, as Livy tells us,
 “ was not intirely free from defection. For Gelon,
 “ the eldest of his children, in spite of his father's old “ age, abandoned the Romans, and joined with the “ Carthaginians, soon after the battle of Cannæ was “ lost. Yet Hiero stood unmoved, like a Marpesian “ rock, and even then he was faithful, and continued
 “ so most constantly to the end of his life.”

Let us add another observation; viz. that this Prince's fidelity for the Romans was sometimes very burthen-some to him; for it happened on some occasions, that the ships of the Carthaginians made great havock in his territories (7). Let us observe lastly, that on his death-bed he recommended to the guardians of his grandson, who was to succeed him, not to suffer any alteration to be made in the alliance, which he had so long and so faithfully kept with the Romans (8).

[C] Hiero... died at the age of fourscore and ten years.] Livy asserts it, as you will see in the following remark. Lucian quotes (9) Demetrius Callitianus, who wrote that Hiero died of sickness, aged fourscore and twelve years, after he had reigned threescore and ten years. But let us keep to the even number mentioned by Livy and by Valerius Maximus. Siciliæ rector Hiero ad nonagesimum annum pervenit (10). i. e. “ Hiero the Governor of Sicily lived to be ninety years old.” Let us take notice by the by of a little mistake of Father Hardouin. Hieron, Siciliae Rex, quem inter scriptores de agricultura memorant Varro, & Columella l. 1. c. 1. cum Attalo Philometore Pergami rege. Multa de eo præclara habet Valerius Max. l. 8. c. 13. p. 405 (11). i. e. “ Hiero King of Sicily, whom Varro and Columella (B. I. Ch. I.) mention among the writers on agriculture, with Attalus Philometor King of Pergamus. Valerius Maximus relates a great many honourable particulars of him.” Consult Valerius Maximus in the passage quoted by Father Hardouin; you will find nothing there concerning Hiero, but the seven words which I have transcribed; but you will find there a great many curious things concerning Massinissa King of Numidia. I am persuaded that a false glance of the eye was the occasion of Father Hardouin's being mistaken. Having skipped one line, he imagined that the whole page in Valerius Maximus related to Hiero: this skip made him overlook the word Massinissa, which is in the following line; such an overlooking is oftener the cause of mistakes, than some persons are apt to imagine. A writer who is to consult a great many authors, dwells as little as he can upon every thing in particular; his eyes run swiftly over the pages, they slide sometimes so nimbly over certain lines, that there is not the least notion of it preserved in the mind. In such a case a man connects together in his writings facts which should be separated.

To conclude, remember that Hiero did not reign threescore and ten years, as Lucian asserts; for he was Prætor during seven years, before he was proclaimed King (12).

[D] He desired to restore the Syracusans their liberty; but his daughters dissuaded him from it.] It was because they knew that they and their husbands would have the chief management of the affairs of the Kingdom. Livy describes this admirably well. In Sicilia, says he (13), Romanis omnia mutaverat mors Hieronis, regnumque ad Hieronymum nepotem ejus translatum, puerum vixdum libertatem, nedum dominationem modicè laturum. Lætè id ingenium tutores atque amici ad præcipitandum in omnia vitia acceperunt. Quæ ita futura cernens Hiero, ultima senectâ voluisse dicitur liberâ Syracusas relinquere, ne sub dominatu puerili per ludibrium bonis artibus partum firmatumque interiret regnum. Huic consilio ejus summa ope obistere filia: nomen regium penes puerum futurum ratæ, regimen rerum omnium penes se, virosque suos, Andronodorum, & Zoilum: nam ii tutorum primi relinquebantur. Non facile erat nonagesimum jam agentis annum, circumfesso dies noctesque muliebribus blanditiis liberare animum, & convertere ad publicam privatamque curam. Itaque tutores numero quindecim puero reliquit. i. e. “ Hiero's death had made a great alteration in the affairs of the Romans in Sicily; Hieronymus his son succeeding him, a child who would abuse liberty, and much more the sovereign power. His guardians and friends were very glad that this character of his gave them an opportunity to throw him headlong into all manner of vices. Hiero foreseeing this, had some design in his old age, they say, to restore the Syracusans to their liberty, lest the Kingdom, which had been established by wisdom and prudence, should again be imprudently ruined, under the government of a child. But his daughters

(e) See Polyb. lib. 1. cap. 12.

(f) Pausan. lib. 6. cap. 12. pag. 480.

(g) Idem, ibid. cap. 15. pag. 489. But observe that he asserts, pag. 480. that his sons raised two statues to him; and, pag. 489. that they raised but one, and the Syracusans two.

(b) See Polyb. lib. 5. cap. 88.

(i) Concerning the care which Hiero took to have Archimedes's Geometrical Speculations applied to mechanical uses. See Plutarch, in Vita Marcelli, pag. 305.

(7) See Tit. Liv. 22. pag. m. 349.

(8) Livius, lib. 24. pag. 381.

(9) Lucian. in Macrobis, pag. 635. tom. 2. Oper.

(10) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 13. num. 1. in Ext.

(11) Hardouin, in Ind. Autor. Plinii, pag. 115.

(k) Athen. lib. 6. pag. 206, &c. See the article ARCHIMEDUS.

(l) See the remark [C].

(m) And not 529, as Moreti says.

(n) Calvisius, ad ann. Rome 538. supposes the contrary, but he is mistaken.

(o) Pausan. lib. 6. cap. 12. pag. 479.

(p) Polybius, in Excerpt. Legat. cap. 1. T. Livius, lib. 24. pag. 382.

(12) See Casaubon, in Polyb. Librum 1. pag. m. 99, 100.

(13) Titus Livius lib. 24. pag. 381.

guardianship of fifteen persons. What the old man had foreseen and dreaded, came really to pass. Syracuse was in the utmost confusion after his death [E]. Pausanias, who asserts that Dinomenes killed him (q), is mistaken.

(q) Pausan. lib. 6. cap. 12. pag. 430.

“ did all that was in their power to persuade him from that design. They knew that the child would have the name of a King, but that all the power would be lodged with them, and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus. For these were named the first guardians to the young Prince. Nor was it an easy matter for a man, who was fourscore and ten years old, and night and day beset by the women, who cajoled him continually, to have his thoughts free, and apply them to public and private affairs. So that he left the child under the care of fifteen guardians.”

[E] Syracuse was in the utmost confusion after his death.] The first thing that was done was, that they acquainted the people with Hiero's last will, and shewed them Hieronymus their new King, who was then but about about fifteen years old. Some persons appointed on purpose to applaud, approved the last will; others were under the greatest uneasiness, and considered the Kingdom as an orphan who had lost his father. They proceeded afterwards to the King's funeral; and if he was interred in a solemn manner by the great number of persons who attended his burial, it ought to be ascribed to the people's affection for him, rather than to his family's care (14). It was afterwards seen that Andronodorus, the deceased's son-in-law, and one of Hieronymus's fifteen guardians, declared that the King was of age to govern the Kingdom, and that the guardianship was expired. By this means he got into his own hands and for himself alone the power of all the other guardians. A Kingly attendance was soon introduced; and whereas Hiero had always been dressed like the other citizens, his grandson appeared in public dressed in a purple habit, with a diadem on his head, and surrounded with a life-guard. Pride, cruelty, and dissoluteness were soon answerable to this pompous appearance, and one would have thought that Hieronymus made it his business, that his subjects might bewail the loss of his grandfather. The Syracusans had loved him to such a degree, that had his grandson been possessed of all the good qualities of the best Princes, they would hardly have been sufficient to satisfy them. How great therefore must their discontent have been, under a successor, who was so different from Hiero? I cannot sufficiently admire the noble expressions, which Livy makes use of to represent this. Vix quidem ulli bono moderatoque regi facilis erat favor apud Syracusanos, succedenti tantæ charitati Hieronis. Verum enim vero Hieronymus, velut suis vitiiis desiderabilem efficere vellet avum, primo statim conspectu omnia quàm disparia essent, ostendit. Nam qui per tot annos Hieronem, filiumque ejus Gelonem, nec vestis habitu, nec alio ullo insigni differentes à cæteris civibus viderent, conspexere purpuram, ac diadema ac satellites armatos: quadrigisque etiam alborum equorum interdum ex regia procedentem, more Dionysii tyranni. Hunc tam superbum apparatus habitumque convenientes sequebantur mores, contemptus omnium hominum, superba aures, contumeliosa dicta: aditus non alienis modo, sed tutoribus etiam difficiles: libidines novæ, inhumana crudelitas (15). i. e. “ It was hardly possible for any good and modest Prince to gain the people's favour, coming to the throne after Hiero, who had been so much beloved. But Hieronymus, as though he would have made his subjects wish again for his grandfather's reign, shewed by his first appearance in the world, the great difference there was in every respect between their characters. For they who for so many years had observed that Hiero and his son Gelon did not in the least differ from the other citizens in their dress, nor in any other mark of distinction, beheld now the Prince dressed in a purple habit with a diadem on his head, and attended by a numerous guard; and coming sometimes from his palace in a chariot drawn by four white horses, after the manner of Dionysius the

(14) Funus fit regi magis amore civium, & charitate, quam cura suorum celebrat. Tit. Livius, lib. 24. pag. 381.

(15) T. Livius, lib. 24. pag. 381.

“ Tyrant. His morals answered his haughty appearance and his dress; he scorned all men, heard them with pride, and gave them opprobrious language: it was difficult not only for strangers, but even for his guardians to have access to him; his licentiousness was unheard of, and his cruelty beyond expression.” This young King preferred the alliance of the Carthaginians before that of the Romans (16). But he had not time to do the former any service; there was a conspiracy against him, and he was killed (17). Andronodorus sheltered himself as well as he could in the strongest places of Syracuse, and yet notwithstanding the advice of Demarata (18) Hiero's daughter, he submitted to the new republican government, and was made Prætor. But new troubles arising, he endeavoured to make an advantage of them, being tired with the repeated instigations of his wife (19). He advised about his undertaking with Themistius, the husband of Harmonia Gelon's daughter, and trusted a player with his design, who betrayed him; so that he and Themistius were killed, as they were entering into the Senate-house (20). In order to justify this murder it was necessary to acquaint the people with the crime of these two men. The orator who was ordered to do it, observed amongst other things, that their wives had inspired them with ambition. Hereupon a great outcry was made in the assembly, the people declaring that these women must be put to death, with the whole family of the tyrants. Orders were given for it immediately, and the thing was done accordingly. Livy, who relates this story, adds to it a reflection concerning the capricious and changeable temper of the populace.

Sub hanc vocem ex omnibus partibus concionis clamor oritur, nullam earum vivere debere, nec quenquam superesse tyrannorum stirpis. Hæc natura multitudinis est: aut servit humiliter, aut superbe dominatur; libertatem, quæ media est, nec spernere modice, nec habere sciunt, & non ferme desunt irarum indulgentes ministri, qui avidos atque intemperantes plebeiorum animos ad sanguinem & cædes irriterent: sicut tum extemplo Prætoris rogationem promulgaverunt. Acceptaque penè prius quàm promulgata est, ut omnis regia stirps interficeretur. Missique à Prætoribus Demaratam Hieronis, & Harmoniam Gelonis filias, conjuges Andronodori & Themistii, interfecerunt (21). i. e. “ At this word the whole assembly cried out, that none of these women ought to live, and that whole family of the tyrants ought to be put to death. For such is the character of the multitude, they either obey slavishly, or proudly command. Liberty, which is a medium between both, they know not how to enjoy with moderation, nor how to use rightly; nor are there wanting some persons who make it their business to inflame the people's passion, and who provoke their eager and impatient minds to slaughter and bloodshed, as it happened on this occasion: for the Prætors put the question immediately, and it was carried in the affirmative almost before it was proposed, the whole people voting that all the royal family should be put to death. And the Officers sent by the Prætor killed Demarata Hiero's daughter and wife to Andronodorus, and Harmonia Gelon's daughter, and Themistius's wife.” There was another of Hiero's daughters named Heraclea. As soon as she knew that the Officers came to put her to death, she took sanctuary in the chapel of her house, and stayed with her household Gods, and employed the most moving supplications and the strongest arguments to save her life, or at least her daughters; but it was in vain; they dragged her out of the chapel, and cut her throat; her two daughters, who had made their escape out of the house, were killed in the streets (22). See the margin (23).

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. 381. See also Polyb. in Excerpt. Legat. cap. led (17).

(18) Livius, ibid.

(19) What she told him is related in the remark [F] of the article PERIANDER towards the end.

(20) Fessus tandem uxoris vocibus monentis, nunc illud esse tempus occupandi res, dum turbata omnia nova atque incognita libertate essent, dum regis stupidiis passus observaretur miles: dum &c. Livius, lib. 24. pag. 391.

(21) Idem, ibid.

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 392.

(23) I shall make some reflections upon this in the remark [C] of the article HOBBS.

HIERO, a great friend of Nicias, and the Chief or Leader of the Colony that restored Thurium (a), pretended to be the son of Dionysius surnamed Χαλκός [A], that is

(a) A city in Italy.

[A] The son of Dionysius, surnamed Χαλκός.] This Dionysius was a Poet, and some of his poems were still extant in Plutarch's time (1). His elegies have been quoted by Athenæus (2), and by Aristotle (3). He

(3) Aristot. Rhetor. lib. 3. cap. 2.

to say, made of Brass, Æneus. He had been educated at Nicias's house, who himself taught him polite Literature and Music; and Hiero, in return, had recourse to a great many artifices to support Nicias's interest (b). I have met with an error in Amiot, (c) See quotation and in some Dictionaries (c).

(b) Taken from Plut. in Vita Nicias.

He was also an orator; for he was surnamed Χαλκός being persuaded to it by his oration (4). See the margin (5).

(4) Callimachus, in Traçt. de Rbetoribus, apud Athen. lib. 15. pag. 669. (5) Observe that Amiot pretends that this Dionysius was at the Head of the Colony that settled at Thurium. But Plutarch ascribes this to Hiero. Observe also, that Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hoffman assert that the Poems which were extant in Plutarch's time, were written by Hiero, which is false.

HIEROPHILUS a Physician, of whom I can say nothing, but that he taught Physic to a certain Maiden called Agnodice. She was obliged to disguise herself in men's cloaths; for there was a Law amongst the Athenians, by which the women and the slaves were forbidden to study Physic (a). Agnodice, who set up for a midwife, was the occasion of the altering of that Law. This story is too curious not to be related in a note [A].

(a) Athenienfes couerant ne quis seruus aut fœmina artem Medicinam disceret. Hygin. cap. 274.

HILDEBERT

[A] This story is too curious, not to be related in a remark. Hyginus tells us, "that as there were no midwives amongst the ancients, a great many women died in labour, because they were ashamed to send for a Physician; and that there was a law amongst the Athenians, by which the women were forbidden to meddle with Physick. Wherefore a young maiden who had a strong inclination for that science, disguised herself in men's cloaths and studied it. She went afterwards to the women who were in labour, and to remove all their scruples, she shewed them first of what sex she was, and then delivered them. The Physicians observing that this made them lose their practice amongst the women, impeached Agnodice, and charged her with a criminal conversation with the women; they complained even of a certain collusion between them, as though the women pretended some indispositions in order to favour their gallant. In a word, they had her condemned by the Areopagites, but Agnodice gave in a full court such evident proofs of her innocence in that respect, that the Physicians were obliged to play another game; they pleaded the Law, by which all persons of her sex were forbidden to practise Physick. Hereupon the Athenian Ladies became parties in the cause, and at their request the Law was amended; so that it was afterwards lawful for the women to learn that art (1)." The author from whom I have borrowed this passage makes an observation against Hyginus. "These words of Hyginus, says he (2), are a little inaccurate; for one might infer from his discourse, that since Agnodice had begun to deliver the women, they did no longer send for Physicians, when they were in labour, which would prove against this author's own observation, that before that time they were wont to make use of the Physicians assistance. But if he wanted accuracy, we may however clear him from contradiction, by supposing his meaning was, that the women finding themselves eased in their labour by Agnodice, would no longer employ any other but her, in their other distempers, in which they had no reason to be ashamed to send for a Physician." This author makes another reflection concerning Hyginus's observing that before Agnodice practised the art of midwifery, several women died because they were ashamed to send for a Physician (3). "It must be confessed, says the author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (4), that modesty is not much less subject than other things to the whimsical changes of the fashion. There was a time when it was the fashion to be ashamed of sending for a man-midwife, and we read in a book of Louisa Bourgeois, a very understanding midwife, that Henry IV recommended her to do her duty so well in delivering Queen Mary de Medicis, that there might be no occasion to send for a man, which, added he, would make her modesty suffer too much. It is now the fashion not to have that modesty; our age is truly much more knowing than the former ages were." This raillery against our age is not well grounded; for if on the one hand there be less modesty now in some respects, than there was formerly, on the other hand impudence is not so great amongst us, as it was at Athens. Are there any honest women to be met with now-a-days, who in a full court would dare to lift up their shift in order to shew the Judges of what sex they are? And yet this is what Agnodice did in the Areopagus, the most grave and most venerable tribunal that was then in the world. Quod cum vidissent medici, se ad fœminas non admitti, Agnodicen accusare cœperunt, quod dicerent eum glabrum esse & corruptorem earum, & illas simulare imbecillitatem. Quo cum Areopagita consedisent, Agnodicen damnare cœperunt. Quibus Agnodice tunicam alleuavit, & se ostendit fœminam esse (5). i. e. "The Physicians seeing that they were no longer called by the women, began to impeach Agnodice, saying she was a man without a beard, who debauched the women; who pretended to have distempers, that they might have an opportunity to send for him. The Areopagite being met again to condemn her, Agnodice took her gown up, and shewed them she was a woman." Can one imagine greater impudence than this was? Had she not already given before this sufficient proofs of her want of shame? Could she not discover her sex in a more modest manner than that she made use of with the women? Quæ cum credere se nolisset, æstimans virum esse, illa tunica sublata ostendebat se fœminam esse (6). i. e. "A woman, in labour, refusing to trust herself in Agnodice's hands, the latter took up her gown to shew that she was a woman." Those Prelates, who in order to prove their innocence shewed their nakedness to whole Councils (7), were not by far so impudent as this Athenian Lady.

I have observed in another place, that Albertus Magnus pretended to midwifery, if we may depend upon scandalous reports (8). If it be so, it is a long while since the modesty of the Athenian Ladies is out of date. And as Albertus Magnus's reputation was very well established, who knows but there were some women who took a pride in being delivered by him? as the affected Ladies in Moliere would have every thing belonging to them, even to their very drawers, made by the best workmen.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary was printed, I have met with an observation in the Acta que factioibus Eruditorum of Leipzig, which will furnish me with a Supplement to this Article. It must be confessed, say the Authors of that Journal, that the French are more proper than any other nation, to teach us the method of assisting the women who are in labour. Not because the French have a more happy genius, but because they have often an opportunity to be present at a woman's delivery. It is now the fashion in France, that even new-married women are not at all ashamed to be seen and handled by the Chirurgeons without the least scruple, and women of all conditions desire that a Chirurgeon be with them, and assist them when they are near their time. There is a quite different custom amongst the other nations, for the women generally speaking, and especially those that have been but lately married, are so bashful and scrupulous, that they can hardly be persuaded to suffer themselves to be examined by their Midwives, or by their female friends; they are determined to it only in case of necessity, and when their pains are so violent that it overcomes their reluctance. As I have not translated

(1) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, 17 Jan. 1686, p. 28, 29.

(2) Ibid. pag. 30.

(3) Antiqui obfœtrices non baurant, unde mulieres verecundia ductæ interierant. Hygin. cap. 274.

(4) Jan. 1686, pag. 30.

(5) Hyginus, cap. 274. pag. 329.

(6) Ibid. pag. 328.

(7) Concerning Dionysius, Patriarch of Constantinople, see the Nouvelles Lettres contre Maimbourg, pag. 686. and add the following passage to it: Attendantibus Nicephoro & Zonara, quem Macedonius Episcopus Constantinopolitanus, sub Anastasio, falso attribuitur & Manichæorum ab adolescentulis, impura Veneris; & Metbodius Patriarcha, sub Manichele, stupri accusati essent; ambo ut convincerent mendacium, tunicâ sublata ostendisse, virilibus se carere: & exinde à criminibus illis liberos atque immunes fuisse pronuntiatos. Salmuth. in Pan-cirolum, Part 2. pag. 88.

(8) See his article remark [B].

HILDEBERT, Bishop of Mans, and afterwards Archbishop of Tours in the 12th Century, had led a very dissolute life before he was raised to the episcopal character [A]. It is to no purpose that some persons pretend to dispute it against the Annalist of the Church of Rome [B], and object to him the discoveries of a critic. Father Maimbourg successfully expatiated upon an action of this Prelate [C], with a design to abuse the few Bishops, the passage from the Journal of Leipzig word for word, I shall transcribe it here that the reader may see I have given the sense of it with all the fidelity that is requisite. Non est negandum, de adjuvandis parturientibus Gallos præ cæteris nationibus nos instruere posse, non ingenio, sed occasione, qua licet illis quam frequentissima partui adesse, feliciores. Ita enim moris apud ipsos esse, utposito pudore, etiam recens nuptæ ad tactum atque explorationem omnium chirurgo admittant faciles, & partus tempore præsentis atque adjuutores semine quelibet eos expectant. Quod longe fit aliter apud cæteras nationes, ubi plerumque vix persuaderi possunt uxorcule, imprimis nuper in matrimonium ductæ, ut obstetricibus propriique sexus amicis suis faciant copiam, nisi doloribus

(9) Abbr. Erud. ac necessitate vixitæ (9). Thus the Authors of the Journal of Leipzig speak in the beginning of their account of a Book published by a Chirurgeon of Paris (10) in the year 1694 with this title, La Pratique des Accouchemens. i. e. "The Practice of Midwifery." This Chirurgeon did not publish his Observations till after a long course of Experience; for he had been present at the delivery of four or five thousand women. Another chirurgeon of the same city (11) published the next year a Book entitled, Observations sur la Grossesse & l'Accouchement des Femmes. i. e. "Observations upon the women's pregnancy and delivery." This work contains seven hundred choice observations out of about three thousand more which the Author had made (12). This is sufficient to prove that it is very much the fashion at Paris to send for men-midwives instead of women. Time will come perhaps, when the same fashion will prevail almost through all Europe; shame and modesty will have the fate of a thousand other things, which are subject to the fantastical and inconstant laws of custom.

[A] He had led a very dissolute life before he was raised to the episcopal character. Even after he was promoted to the dignity of an Archdeacon, he took so many concubines that he had a very great number of bastard sons and daughters. This is what Ivo Bishop of Chartres wrote to him (1). Dicunt quidam de majoribus Cenomanensis Ecclesiæ, qui antea vitam tuam se nosse testantur, quod ultra modum laxaveris fræna pudicitie, in tantum ut post acceptum Archidiaconatum accubante lateribus tuis plebe muliercularum, multam genueris plebem puerorum & puellarum. i. e. "Some of the most ancient Persons of the Church of Mans, who declare that they are very well acquainted with your former way of living, assert, that you indulged yourself in sensual pleasures to that degree, that after you was made an Archdeacon, you used to lie with a whole tribe of Concubines, by whom you have got a vast number of boys and girls."

[B] It is to no purpose, that some persons pretend to dispute it against the Annalist of the Church of Rome. Juret (2) censures Baronius for asserting in his Annals upon the authority of this Letter of Ivo of Chartres, that Ildebert was given to women before he was a Bishop, and he pretends that this letter was written to one Aldebert, and not to Ildebert. Aldeberto Cenomanensis Ecclesiæ electo. i. e. "To Aldebert Bishop elect of Mans." Thus that letter is intitled at the end of the manuscript of Ivo of Chartres's Letters which is lodged in St. Victor's library. But father Sirmond has very well cleared Baronius, in his Notes upon Geoffrey de Vandôme. Here follow his words. Ildebertus, vir in Episcopatu eximius: ante illum vitæ solutiois, ut indicat Ivonis epistola 277. Quam quidem, qui de Ildeberto, de quo agimus, scriptam, pertinacius neget, is opinor, clausis oculis sibi credi velit. Ecquæ enim alia Ivonis tempore Cenomanensis Episcopi electio fuit, quàm Ildeberti? quem præterea scimus ex Archidiacono, quod Ivo notat, ad Episcopalem Cathedram evectum. Neque tamen hæc ita dissero, ut viri docti, qui contra sensit, nomini obtretem: sed quia immortalis memoriæ Cardinali Baronio me de-

(1) This letter is the 277th. See Menage, Hist. de Sablé, pag. 107.
(2) Natus in Ep. 277. Ivonis Cæsar. mensis.

bere judico, ut quæ rectè & verè ab eo dicta sunt, ea ut pro veris habeantur, enitar quoad possum (3). i. e. "Ildebert, a man eminent in his Episcopal functions, had led a dissolute life before he was made a Bishop, as appears from Ivo's 277th Letter. For they who obstinately deny that our Ildebert is mentioned in that letter, must pretend, in my opinion, that we should blindly believe them upon their word. For what other person was elected Bishop of Mans, in Ivo's time, but Ildebert? who, we know, was raised from an Archdeacon to the Bishop's see, which Ivo also observes. I do not observe this with a design to asperse the Author, who is of a contrary opinion, but only because I think I owe that justice to Cardinal Baronius of immortal memory, to prove, as much as lays in my power, that to be really true, which he has asserted with reason and truth." Monsieur Menage adds several very good observations to these Arguments of Father Sirmond. "Ildebertus, says he (4), is the same name with Aldebertus; and Ildebert, Bishop of Mans, calls himself Aldebertus in one of his Letters printed in the 13th Volume of the Spicilegium. Ranulpho, Dei gratia, Dunelmensis Episcopo, omni honore & gratia sublimando, Aldebertus humilis Cenomanorum Sacerdos. i. e. To Ranulphus, by the Grace of God, Bishop of Durham, worthy of all honour and grace, Aldebert, an humble Priest of Mans. Thus he is also called in a Record of the Abby of Etival, quoted by Monsieur Pavillon in his Notes on Arbrissel's Life. Aldeberto Episcopo Cenomanensi, for thus we ought to read his name in that passage, and not Alberto. Episcopo Cenomanensi, for there never was a Bishop of Mans named Albertus. In a Record of the Abby of Frontevaux, cited by Cosnier in his notes on Arbrissel's Life, he is also called Audebertus, which is the same as Aldebertus. Courvaisier in his Life of Ildebert support Ivo of Chartres's assertion by the following passage of the Necrologus † of St. Peter de la Cour du Mans. Tertio Idus Augusti, obiit Geruafius, Hildeberti Præsulis filius; matris Ecclesiæ canonicus, qui vivens ad bujus Ecclesiæ servitium quandam contulit Bibliothecam; cujus anima quiete fratur æterna. i. e. August the 11th died Gervase, Bishop Hildebert's son, and a Canon of our mother the Church; who in his life time bestowed a Library for the use of this Church. May his soul enjoy eternal rest. Courvaisier pretends that this Gervase was the Bishop's bastard; Bondonnet maintains that he was only his spiritual son. But this Prelate's delicta juventutis (i. e. The Sins of his Youth) are mentioned, in the Lives of the Bishops of Mans, published by Dom. Mabillon in the third volume of his Analeæ, which again confirms the account given in Ivo of Chartres's Letter." Monsieur Menage quotes in his additions (5) two records cited by Bather de la Mainferme (6), in which our Hildebert is called Aldebertus. So that Juret's censure (7) falls to the ground with all the commendations which Father Maimbourg bestows upon him. See the following Remark. [C] Father Maimbourg successfully expatiated upon an action of this Prelate. He first commended this Bishop; the blessed Hildebert, said he (8), Bishop of Mans, and afterwards Archbishop of Tours, has been one of the most holy and most learned Prelates the Gallican Church ever had. "We have some Letters and some other beautiful works of his in the collection of the Fathers. St. Bernard stiles him the excellent Pontiff and the chief support of the Church; whom the most celebrated writers mention with great elogium, and whose Holiness God himself was pleased to shew, and to honour by the miracles which were performed at his tomb. And on this occasion, I think that to do his memory the Justice it deserves, I am obliged to observe, that they, who on the credit of a letter of Ivo of Chartres, have asserted, that when Hildebert was made Bishop of Mans, he

(3) Menage, Hist. de Sablé, pag. 107, 108.
(4) Ibid. pag. 108.
(5) Ibid. pag. 108.
(6) Ibid. pag. 108.
(7) Ibid. pag. 108.
(8) Hist. du Libranisme, liv. 2. pag. 292.
† A catalogue of the dead, or bill of mortality.

shops, who still opposed the extension of the Regale. The remark I shall make upon this subject, will contain some particulars of our Hildebert's life. Illyricus has placed him amongst the witnesses of the truth, because he wrote a very smart letter against the Court of Rome [D]. He was not of a distinguished family [E].

" he led a very scandalous life, have mistaken him for another, being misled by the inscription of that letter, in which they found Hildeberto, instead of Aldeberto, which is in the ancient manuscripts, as Monsieur Juret, to whom we are obliged for this important observation, proves in his learned notes " on Ivo of Chartres's life." Father Maimbourg relates afterwards how Hildebert was translated from the Bishoprick of Mans to the Archbishoprick of Tours by Pope Honorius II. in the Year 1125; and he observes that this prelate finding that King Lewis the Big had given two Canonships in his diocese during the vacancy of that see, he went himself to court to make his humble representations to the King (9). His Majesty heard him, but as he would not be satisfied with the sentence that was given, and demanded a canonical judgment, all the income of his Archbishoprick was seized upon because of his obstinacy. This made him have recourse to the most humble petitions, and he recommended his case to a Bishop, for whom the King had a great esteem. I do not write to you, says he *, with a design to complain of the King's proceedings against me; nor to rouse you by my expostulation, nor to raise clamours, troubles, seditions, and storms against the Lord's anointed, nor to demand that the severity and censures of the Church be made use of against him. Far from it; I only beg of you, that by your kind and charitable offices, you would prevail upon his Majesty, not to exert the weapons of his anger and indignation against a poor Bishop, full of years, and who desires nothing but rest. Father Maimbourg does not omit to observe, that the King kept the upperhand, and had the full enjoyment of his right, and that Honorius a very holy Pope, and this Archbishop's great protector, did not find fault with it. Thus you see how this Historian found an opportunity to insert in his History of Lutheranism an episode concerning the affairs of the Regale, with a design to pay his court to the King, by rendering the conduct of the Bishop of Ponniers and that of Pope Innocent XI odious. He did the same with regard to all the affairs of his time, as it is objected to him in the fourth and fifth letter of the general censure of his history of Calvinism †.

[D] He wrote a very smart Letter against the Court of Rome.] The description he makes of the vices of that court is very lively, and I think it lost nothing of its strength in the French translation, which Monsieur Du Pleffis Mornai made of it (10). Hildebert was still but Bishop of Mans when he wrote that letter; but when he wrote another to Honorius II, complaining that all the causes were carried to Rome by way of appeal, he was Archbishop of Tours. He wrote a description of Rome in verse, which ends with these two lines.

Urbs felix, si vel dominis urbs illa careret, Vel dominis esset turpe carere fide.

" Happy city, if it had no Masters; or if its masters were ashamed to want faith."

HILTEN (JOHN) a German Cordelier, pretended to ground his predictions on the Prophet Daniel's Book in the year 1485 [A]. Melanchthon, who had seen the original of this work, relates, that the author foretold that the Pope's power would begin to decline in the year 1516, and that afterwards it would draw nearer and nearer to its ruin, and

[A] He pretended to ground his predictions on the Prophet Daniel's book in the year 1485.] I met with this date in a passage quoted by Melchior Adam, in which we see in what University this Cordelier studied. Ego olim juvenis, it is Hilten that speaks (1), almae matris Universitatis Erpburdensis alumnus, ardens philosophus: nunc senex exuli solitudini deditus ab anno Christi millesimo quadringentesimo septuagesimo primo, in hunc annum millesimum quadringentesimum octogesimum quintum ejusdem Domini Jesu Christi voluntate: qui & me instigavit ex suo libro cognoscere veritatem, contra vacuos errores de futuro tempore nunc volantes. Quam me solum scire amor Dei & proximi non finit, sed & aliis piis & benevolis impertiri admonet. i. e. " I who in my youth Coeffeteau (11) does not deny that the Letter to Honorius was written by Hildebert, but he has not the same opinion of the other. It is not at all probable, says he, that Hildebert wrote that letter, considering not only, that it is not to be found, either amongst those that are printed, or amongst those that are manuscript, which I got with several other scarce books from Messieurs Du Puy . . . but also because if we except the follies of this Prelate's youth, we find that he was always very modest, and had constantly a very great respect for the holy see, as we shall shew immediately (12). Let us observe further, that neither Vignier, nor Illyricus, nor du Pleffis tells us upon what subject that letter was written. They give us only a fragment of it without any title, or any other mark by which we may discover the true Author of it. It is reasonable to relate what was answered to this. " If this way of reasoning is good, we shall get a double advantage by it, and we shall infit with much more reason, and better vouchers, upon his party's base imposition in forging of new pieces, and falsifying the ancient writings. Illyricus having met with this letter amongst the others, published the very words of it, which appear very plainly not to be of his invention. If he, and the others after him, quote it without mentioning the title or subject of it, this ought not to appear new to those who have seen his printed Letters, amongst which there are a great many, concerning which it is impossible to guess to whom they were written, and to know particularly upon what subject (13)." Thus speaks Rivetus. He observes a little lower, that Gretter (14) cannot believe that the 82d Letter, which speaks of suppressing or regulating the appeals to Rome, came from Hildebert, though Coeffeteau asserts, " it is really his." The curious may consult Father Hommey's Supplementum Patrum, which contains several pieces of Hildebert, with notes on his Letters, and an addition of the name of the persons, to whom they were written (15).

[E] He was not of a distinguished family.] " There is near Montoire in the Province of Main a place called Lavardin, from which a very illustrious family of the Vandômois take their name . . . La Croix du Main asserts in his Bibliothèque, in the Article of James Lavardin, that Hildebert Bishop of Mans was of that family, which is not true. He was a native of the place called Lavardin, but not of the family of that name; he was a man of great learning and merit, but of a mean extraction (16)." Here follow la Croix du Maine's words (17). This family of the Lavardins (18) has usually produced learned men even from the remotest antiquity. For Hildebert, Bishop of Mans and afterwards Archbishop of Tours above five hundred years ago, was of that family, and was surnamed of Lavardin, and in his time he was reckoned the most learned Poet and Orator, as appears also from his Latin Epistles and Poems.

" have been educated in the University of Erford, and who was a zealous Philosopher, have now in my old age been confined to a solitary banishment from the year of our salvation 1471, to this year 1485 by Christ's will, who also has prompted me to study the truth from his book, against the idle errors, which are spread abroad concerning future events; nor does the love of God and of my neighbour suffer me to keep the truth to myself, but commands me to impart it to all pious and well-disposed persons." Notwithstanding this passage, Melchior Adam asserted a few lines before he transcribed it, that Hilten lived in the XIVth Century. This is a want of attention very common with writers.

(9) Ibid. pag. 193.

* Nec tamen lac loquor tanquam vobis clamorem super Christo Domino deponens, tanquam postulant Ecclesiasticae rigorem disciplinæ. Subvenire Ecclesiæ & mihi per vestrum deprecor interventum, & Regi ex charitate suggeri, ne sagittas suas in senem compleat sacerdotem. Hildebert. Epist. 6. apud Lucam Dacherium, tom. 13. Spicilegii.

† Critique générale du l'Histoire du Calvinisme, written by Mr. Bayle himself.

(10) In pag. 280, of his Mystère d'Iniquité.

(11) Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité, pag. 757.

(12) He observes in the next page, that Hildebert being persecuted by the King of England in the year 1107, went to implore Pope Paschal's advice and assistance, and that having held a Synod at Nantz under Honorius, he sent that Pope the acts of it.

(13) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité, Part 2. pag. 240.

(14) In Examine Mystérii Pleffisani, pag. 376.

(15) See the Alta Erud. Lips. 1685, pag. 465.

(16) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 107. of the Dutch edition.

(17) Biblioth. Française, p. 190.

(18) He speaks of the family of the Lavardins near Montoire in the Vandômois: which is different from that of Lavardin six leagues distant from Mans, the Lords of which family bore the surname of Beaumanoir, and are originally come from Brittany.

be never restored; and that about the year 1600 the Turks would reign in Italy and in Germany (a) [B]. Some relate (b), that he foretold that the world would see a very cruel man in the year 1600, and that Gog and Magog would reign over all Europe in the year 1606. After he had endeavoured with a great deal of labour to find when the world would end (c), he concluded at last that it would be in the year 1651 (d). Monsieur du Pleffis-Mornai extracted from these predictions only what served his purpose [C]. Hilten imagined that charity would not suffer him to conceal the knowledge of futurity, which God had communicated to him (e). It is said he died in the year 1502 (f).

(a) Taken from a Letter of Melancthon to Melancthon. It is the 6th of the 2d book, pag. 259. of the London edition 1642.

(b) See Freher. Theatrum, p. 97.

(c) Maltus fuit in inquirendo fine mundi. Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theol. pag. 5.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) See the remark [A].

(f) Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 97.

[B] He foretold that the Turks would reign in Italy and in Germany. He seemed to promise that the Turks would, by the means of a very great reformation, be the ruin of Popery: but those that had reformed themselves were afterwards to destroy Mahometism, and then the Emperor of the Romans was to resign his Crown to Jesus Christ, never to recover it any more.

Ita dixerit omnia Calchas (2).

“ Thus Calchas ordered every thing.

It appeared from the event, that John Hilten was not much better acquainted with futurity, than this Soothsayer of the Greek army. Let us transcribe his own words (3). Plures gloriantur Romanum Papam esse monarcham, quia Jesus omnia dedit Petro & ejus successoribus. Fateor, verum quamdiu sunt ejus vicarii. Sed legantur revelationes S. Brigittæ: & videbitur querela Christi de perverfione illius vicariatus. Quapropter Deus dedit gladium Mahometo: quo monarchiam illam à vicario ad ejus Dominum Jesum Christum compellit, vicarium & omnes Christianos reformando. Qui plenè reformati exurgent: & delebunt sectam Mahometi. Quo facto, ultimus Imperator Romanus resignabit cum effectu Jesu Christo coronam regalem, & omne jus Imperiale; non recepturus, ut Constantinus. i. e. “ Several persons “ boast that the Pope of Rome is a Monarch, because “ Christ gave Peter and his successors all power. I

(2) Virg. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 128.

(3) Apud Melancthon, in Vitis Theol. p. 4.

“ grant it is true, as long as they are really Christ’s Vicars. But read St. Briget’s Revelations, and you will see how Christ complains of the corruption of that Vicarship. For which reason God put a sword into Mahomet’s hand, who will restore that Monarchy from the Vicar to his Lord Jesus Christ, by reforming both the Vicar himself and all the Christians. Who being perfectly reformed will rise against Mahomet’s sect, and destroy it; [after which the last Roman Emperor will effectually resign to Jesus Christ his royal Crown, and all his imperial rights, not to recover them any more, as “ Constantine did.”

[C] Monsieur du Pleffis extracted from Hilten’s predictions only what served his purpose. “ John Hilten, “ a Monk of Henac in Thuringia, who notwithstanding all human foresight, was imprisoned because he “ had censured some monastical abuses, being very “ ill, called for the Keeper, and told him, I have (4) Du Pleffis “ not said much against the Monks, but there will Mornai, Mystere “ arise a person in the year 1516, who shall over- d’Iniquité, pag. “ throw them all, and whom they will not be a 573. He quotes “ ble to resist. And that same year Luther began Philip Melancthon, in Apolog. “ to preach (4).” He is mistaken in one year; for Cap. de Votis “ the Lutheran Æra begins only with the year 1517. I Monasticis. believe also that he does not write well the name of the place, and that he should have said Eisenac instead (5) See Micræli- “ of Henac. He ought also to have observed, that this Hist. Eccles. pag. “ happened about the year 1500, according to Me- 647. lancthon (5).

HIPPARCHIA, the Philosopher Crates’s wife, had been so charmed with this Cynic’s discourses, that she would absolutely marry him at any rate. She was courted by a great many lovers who were handsome men, and distinguished by their rank and riches; her relations pressed her to choose an husband amongst all these rivals, but nothing was capable to withdraw her affection from Crates. She declared that Crates was to her instead of every thing, and that if they would not marry her to him, she would stab herself. Upon this declaration her friends applied themselves to Crates, and desired him to exert all his eloquence, and to make use of all his authority with this maid, in order to cure her of her passion. He exerted all his skill, but she was so obstinate, that he lost his labour. At last, when he found that both his arguments and his advices proved ineffectual, he displayed his poverty before her [A], he shewed her his crooked back, his bag and his cloak, and told her: This is the man you will have; this is all the furniture you will meet with at his lodgings; consider of it seriously; you cannot become my

[A] Crates displayed his poverty before her.] There is no Author who gave a more accurate account of this than Apuleius: he asserts, that Hipparchia answered, she had sufficiently considered this affair, and was persuaded, it was impossible for her to find either a more handsome, or a richer husband than Crates was, and that he might lead her whithersoever he pleased. He led her to the portico, which was one of the most stately public buildings that could be seen at Athens, and where the greatest number of people continually resorted. There Crates consummated his marriage. All the world would have seen it, and the bride was determined to entertain them with that shew, but one of Crates’s friends spread his cloak about them, and made them thus a kind of curtains, which prevented the people from seeing them. That the reader may see I do not ascribe any thing to my author, but what he relates, I shall transcribe his own words. Adeoq; is (Crates) cupiebatur, ut virgo nobilis, spretis junioribus prociis, ultro eum sibi optaverit. Cumque interscapilium Crates retexisset, quod erat aucto gibbere, peramque cum baculo & pallium humi posuisset, eamque suppellectilem sibi esse puellæ profiteretur, eamque formam quam viderat: proinde sedulo consuleret, ne post querelæ causam caperet: enimverò Hipparche conditionem accipit. Jamdadum sibi provisum satis, & satis consultum respondit: neque ditiozem maritum, neque formoso- rem uspiam gentium posse invenire. Proinde ducet quo (1) Apuleius, in liberet. Ducit Cynicus in porticum. Ibidem, in loco ce- Florida. pag. m. lebræ, coram luce clarissimâ accubuit: coramque virginem 350. imminuisset, paratam pari constantiâ; ni Zeno provinciu (2) In Historia palliastri, à circumstantis coronæ obtutu magistrum in Mulierum Philo- secreto defendisset (1). Monsieur Menage (2) asserts, that Sopharum, ad cal- St. Clemens of Alexandria relates, that the nuptials of cem Diog. Laert. Crates and Hipparchia were celebrated in the Portico, pag. 497. which was surnamed Ποικίλη (variegated): but it is (3) Ἐρὶ τῆς καὶ τα κινωμένης ἐν certain that Clemens of Alexandria does not say this; τῆς ποικίλης ἐστὶν- it can only be inferred from these words of his: The- λισ. i. e. “ For “ whose sake Cynogamia, says he (3), were celebrated in the Poecile. (name) τῆς παρ- on Hipparchia’s account. The word Cynogamia signi- cibus) the Cy- fied, according to the same Monsieur Menage (4), a- “ nogamia were festival, which the Cynics celebrated to the honour and “ celebrated in “ the Poecile.” memory of Crates’s nuptials. He adds, that Monsieur Clem. Alexand. Petit the Physician had made a very beautiful poem Stromat. lib. 4. on the amours and wedding of this Cynic. This poem pag. 523. is intitled Cynogamia. Several readers will remember (4) In Laert. here a French verse transcribed by Furetiere (5): lib. 6. num. 96. (5) Under the word Reins; this verse is Reigner’s and relates to the fights of Lapithæ, a people of Thes- saly.

“ Voulurent chauds de reins faire noces de chiens.

“ Being full of lust they would make a Cynic wed- ding.”

my wife, without leaving such a life as our sect prescribes us. He had hardly done speaking, but she declared that she was infinitely pleased with the proposal. She took the habit of the Order; I mean the Cynic's dress, and she loved Crates to such a degree, that she rambled every where with him, went to entertainments with him [B], and did not even scruple to pay him conjugal duty in the open streets [C]. It was one of the tenets of this Sect, that we ought not to be ashamed of any bodily exercise which nature requires of us [D]. Hipparchia dining once at Lyfimachus's house with Theodore the [B] She went to entertainments with him.] This and her rambling up and down with Crates, were what the other Grecian Ladies never did. They were shut up in the inner rooms of the house, none were admitted to see them but their relations, nor did they ever go to any entertainment, but at their relations houses. Cornelius Nepos, who relates this, observes that the manners of the Romans were quite different from these. The women lived then at Rome, as they do now at Paris. The fashion of Italy has been very much changed since that time. It has been long ago like that of ancient Greece. Altri tempi, altri costumi. Other times, other fashions. Let us transcribe Cornelius Nepos's words (6). Quem Romanorum pudet uxorem ducere in convivium? aut cujus materfamilias non primum locum tenet ædium, atque in celebritate versatur? Quod multo fit aliter in Græcia. Nam neque in convivium adhibetur, nisi propinquorum: neque sedet nisi in interiore parte ædium, quæ γυναικῶν appellatur: quod nemo accedit nisi propinquâ cognatione conjunctus. i. e. "Who is there amongst the Romans, that is ashamed to lead his wife to an entertainment? Or is there a mother of a family, who does not reside in the best part of the house, and see a great deal of company? It is quite otherwise in Greece. The women are not suffered at an entertainment, except it be with their relations; and they keep in the inner-rooms of the house, which are called the women's apartment; and none are admitted to see them but their nearest relations."

(6) In Præfat.

[C] She did not scruple to pay him conjugal duty in the open streets.] The reader will not wonder that the Woman-Philosopher, Hipparchia, acted against the custom of her sex with regard to the two articles, which I have just now mentioned, since she was capable to trample under her feet the principles of decency and modesty with regard to this third particular. It is impossible to carry the contempt for custom farther. This was love's grand triumph; that virtue was made a sacrifice to it, which is the most natural to the fair sex; I mean, that shame, that bashfulness, which is a thousand times more deeply rooted in the women's hearts than even chastity itself. And what is more surprising still, Hipparchia was from the very first time fully prepared for this piece of impudence; there was no occasion to persuade her to it by little and little and by degrees. Juvenal observes that nothing is difficult for the women, when they have a mind to gratify their love. Must they embark with an husband, against whom they have taken a disgust; they cannot be persuaded to it; the inconveniencies of the sea are too great for them: but are they to follow a gallant on board a ship, they have the best stomach in the world; nothing is more agreeable than a sailor's life.

*Fortem animum præstant rebus quas turpiter audent,
Si jubeat conjux, durum est conscendere navim,
Tunc sentina gravis, tunc summus vertitur æer:
Quæ mæchum sequitur, stomacho valet. Illa maritum
Convomit, hæc inter nautas & prandet & errat
Per puppim, & duos gaudet tractare rudentes (7).*

(7) Juv. Sat. 6.
ver. 97.

"But womankind, in ill, is ever bold.
"Were she to follow her own Lord to sea,
"What doubts and scruples would she raise to stay?
"Her stomach sinks, and her head giddy grows;
"The tar and pitch are nauseous to her nose.
"But in love's voyage nothing can offend;
"Women are never sea-sick with a friend.
"Amidst the crew, she walks upon the board;
"She eats, she drinks, she handles every cord;
"And if she spews, 'tis thinking of her Lord."

DRYDEN.

Hipparchia proves the truth of this observation: she was excessively in love with Crates; his system was, that we ought to give up all manner of shame; non aliter hæc sacra constant, i. e. "these mysteries cannot otherwise be celebrated," he probably said to her; and she consented to it in order to please him. This particular is related by several authors. Sextus Empiricus (8), and Theodoret (9) assert it, and I have already quoted two other writers. But St. Augustin had a particular opinion concerning this subject. He imagined that the Cynics only used postures and fruitless endeavours. But the Latin tongue is much more proper to represent his opinion than our language. Illum (Diogenem) vel eos qui hoc fecisse referuntur, potius arbitror concumbentium motus dedisse oculis hominum nescientium quid sub pallio gereretur, quam humano premente conspectu potuisse illam peragi voluptatem. Ibi enim Philosophi non erubescerent videri se velle concumbere, ubi libido ipsa erubesceret surgere (10). i. e. "I should be apt to think that Diogenes and the others, who are said to have done this, did only expose some motions to men's view, who were ignorant of what was done under the cloak, rather than I could believe that such a pleasure can be tasted when other persons are lookers-on. For these Philosophers did not blush to seem to do what lust itself blushed to perform. A modern author has acted the Cato against this father of the Church, and censures him very severely for that reflection. "As for what he adds, that he cannot believe that Diogenes nor his followers, who, as it was reported, did every thing in public, found any true and real pleasure in it, imagining, that they only imitated under the Cynic cloak the motions of those who embrace each other, thus deceiving the spectators, though in reality they could not do any thing to the purpose before witnesses; this, I say, is what I am ashamed to relate, and which I desire you to read in his own words (11). . . . Is it possible that so great a man should suffer his imagination to dive into these Cynic mysteries, and that St. Augustin's hand did not scruple to lift up Diogenes's cloak, in order to shew us motions under it, which shame (though this Philosopher pretended to have none) made even him hide under his cloak (12)."

[D] That we ought not to be ashamed of any bodily exercise, which nature requires of us.] See what we have observed above in the remark [L] of the article DIOGENES. Some persons think that the Cynics were so called, because, after the example of the dogs, they lay with their wives in the open streets. Nam quid ego de Cynicis loquar; quibus in propatulo coire cum conjugibus mos fuit. Quid mirum si à canibus, quarum vitam imitantur, etiam vocabulum nomenque traxerunt (13). i. e. Why should I mention the Cynics, who are used to lye with their wives in the open streets. Why should we wonder that since they imitate the dogs, they should have their names from them." The Cynics pretended to have reason on their side. For, say they, if it be lawful to know one's wife, it is lawful therefore to know her in public. Hoc illi canini Philosophi, hoc est Cynici, non viderunt, proferentes contra humanam verecundiam, quid aliud quam caninam, hoc est immundam impudentemque sententiam, ut scilicet quoniam justum est quod fit in uxore, palam non pudeat id agere, nec in vico, nec in platea qualibet conjugalem concubitum devitare (14).

i. e. "The canine Philosophers, that is to say, the Cynics, did not see this; who asserted, against all human modesty, this obscene and impudent, and dog-like opinion, namely, that because what a man does with his wife is lawful, they must not be ashamed to do it publicly, nor to come to conjugal embraces even in the open streets." I have quoted elsewhere (15) an argument of Diogenes much like this. This is the pitiful sophism, a dicto secundum quid, ad dictum simpliciter, that is to say, "drawing a general and absolute inference from what is said with re-

(8) Pyrroniarum Hypopyrseon, lib. 1. cap. 14. pag. m. 31; & lib. 3. cap. 24. pag. 152.

(9) Sermon. 12. de Virtute Activa.

(10) August. de Civitate Dei, lib. 14. cap. 20.

(11) Here he transcribes the passage from St. Augustin.

(12) La Mothe le Vayer, in the Hexameron rustique, pag. 63, 64, 65.

(13) Laëtant. lib. 3. cap. 15. Divin. Institut.

(14) August. De Civit. Dei, lib. 14. cap. 20.

(15) Above, in the beginning of the remark [E] of the article DIOGENES the Cynic.

the Atheist, proposed him a subtle objection, to which he made no verbal answer, “gard to some particular case or circumstance.” It is, as though a man should argue thus. It is unwholesome to drink wine; it is therefore unwholesome to drink it when a person has a fit of the ague. These Philosophers did not know that there are several actions which are good only in some circumstances; so that the want of these circumstances is sufficient to make an action bad which otherwise had been good. To lend money to a friend, that he may pay his creditors, is a very commendable action; but to lend him money that he may get drunk, or that he may game, is a very ill action. There are some actions which are bad in their own nature; no circumstances in the world can ever render them good and lawful; but there are other actions which are sometimes good and sometimes bad, according to the times, places, and other circumstances, in which they are done. I confess that this is not sufficient to silence the Cynics; for they might urge their argument after this manner: when an action is good and lawful in its own nature; we ought not to be ashamed to commit it: now the conjugal duty is an action good and lawful in its own nature, we ought not therefore to be ashamed to perform it; it may therefore be lawfully performed in public: if any thing could make this public action unlawful, it would be only the want of shame and modesty in such circumstances, in which men ought to be bashful and modest. The whole difficulty would then be reduced to this single question. Must we be ashamed to perform the conjugal duty in the sight of the public? This is a fine question indeed, will some say, and who is there that doubts of it? I, would Diogenes answer, I doubt of it; and shew me that I am in the wrong. We might reply to him, that shame, with regard to those actions, is a natural sense, and therefore that the want of shame on those occasions is against nature. But, would Diogenes reply, if shame were a natural sense, the brutes, who follow the instinct of nature so exactly, would also choose secrecy and darkness, when they want to propagate their species. Now this is absolutely false; all men, at least, would in such a case look for the darkest and most hidden recesses, which again is false; for there are some nations in the Indies, who perform the act of generation in the sight of all them that happen to go by. This is what the famous Pyrrhonian Empiricus observes (16), in order to shew, that the ordinary practice is not grounded on an immutable and eternal law of nature, but only upon custom, and that is a mere effect of education. He might have alleged the custom of the MOSYNIANS of whom I shall give an article hereafter. A modern author has observed that certain nations used to make love in the very temples, and that they said, that if the Gods were displeas'd with this action, they would not suffer it in the other animals (17). He adds that there is a sect amongst the Mahometans, which still practise this, and that we found the inhabitants of the new world in this state of innocency. One might reply to Diogenes, that it is sufficient that the civilized nations are subject to shame, and that we ought not to mind the conduct of the barbarous nations; but he would reply in his turn, that the nations we style barbarous and wild, have much less swerved from the rules of nature, than those nations, who by their niceties and subtleties have so much multiplied the laws of decency and civility; and that after all, there being no prescription against the law of nature, every one has a right to claim it at any time and in any place whatsoever, without any regard to the arbitrary yoke of the customs and opinions of his countrymen.

Let this be observed in order to shew how much human reason is capable to mislead us. It has been given us with a design to direct us to the right way, but it is an uncertain, changeable and flexible instrument, which may be turned on every side like a weather-cock. See what use the Cynics made of it, in order to vindicate their abominable impudence. I may add for the honour and glory of the true religion, that she alone furnishes us with arms that are proof against all the sophisms and fallacious reasonings of these men; for though we could not meet in the Holy Scripture with a direct commandment concerning the secrecy with which the pleasures of the marriage-bed ought to be enjoyed, it is sufficient to observe in the first place, that the nature of the Gospel obliges us to avoid all that is capable to weaken the impressions of modesty and shame: secondly, that there are clear and positive passages, in which we are forbidden to do any thing inconsistent with decency, or which may give offence to our neighbours. I do not know whether any of those casuists, who have so much mispent their leisure hours in examining such cases of conscience, as are in a manner only metaphysical, ever thought of examining to what kind of crimes the impudence of a Crates and of a Diogenes ought to be referred. These Philosophers did not believe there was any divine law upon this subject, nor that men were obliged to conform to the customs of their country; they imagined that by not conforming to them, all the blame they could draw upon themselves was that of rusticity, and want of complaisance for a received custom. To be unpolite and rustical, and an ill observer of the customs and usages of one's country, is not a crime, or an evil action morally speaking. What could one therefore object against the Cynics, supposing they were not condemned by the revealed truth? I never read any thing whatsoever upon this subject, nor do I know that any person ever asserted, that a Cynic action would be criminal at present only for these reasons; 1. because of the offence given to one's neighbours: 2. because it is shewing a contempt for the customs of one's country: 3. because of the neglect in preserving the limits of chastity. I suppose here a man, who is persuaded that the action considered in itself has not been expressly forbidden in the Scripture, and that it is not against the law of nature. If it were against it, those sentences, by which the Judges appoint a congress, would be so many crimes, for which the Judges themselves would be answerable.

There are, no doubt, some casuists, who would think that self-pollution, which Diogenes committed in a full market (18), are greater crimes, than Crates's and Hipparchia's meeting. It is a strange and most scandalous thing, to see Chrysippus, that celebrated and severe Stoic, commend Diogenes's action. Ἐταμίῳ τὸ Διογένη τὸ εἰδῶν ἀποτιθέμενον ἐν Φωκίῳ, ἢ λέγουσα πρὸς τῆς αγοράς, εἶδε καὶ τὸν λαὸν ἕως ἀποτίθησθαι τῆς γαστέρος ἰδὼν ἄνθρωπον. Diogenem laudat, qui in publico masturbasset, dixissetque adstantibus, utinam liceret sic etiam famem attritis ventre pellerere (19). This Cynic could not have cleared himself by his sophism. It is lawful to perform the conjugal duty; it is therefore lawful to perform it in the street; for his action is bad both in private and in public. Sextus Empiricus confesses, that it was looked upon as abominable, though Zeno the founder of the Stoic sect had approved it, and several others had practised it as a very good action. Τὸ τοιαύτην ἰσχυρῶν ἰσχυρῶν ἐν ἀγορῇ ἢ ἐν ἄλλοις δὲ ὡς ἀγαθὴν τοῖς τότε χριστοῦ τοῦ κακῶ συνειδυόμεθα. Quum praeterea detestabile sit apud nos aischrotyon, Zeno approbat, & alios quosdam ut bono quodam hoc usos male accepimus (20). Diogenes had recourse to another sophism: he pretended that what some fishes do is a lesson of nature to us (21); but this sophism is not better than that, which might be borrowed from the practice of the Lydians. To conclude, though the Cynics endeavoured to find out arguments to palliate their abominable impudence, yet they dared to continue in that practice. The general indignation which it drew upon them, was probably a stronger curb on them than the notions of decency. St. Augustin observes that natural modesty got the ascendant at last even in these men. Vicit tamen pudor naturalis opinionem hujus erroris, nam etsi perhibent, hoc aliquando gloriabundum fecisse Diogenem, ita putantem sectam suam nobiliorem futuram, si in hominum memoriam insignior ejus impudentia figeretur, postea tamen à Cynicis fieri cessatum est; plusque valuit pudor, ut erubescerent homines hominibus, quam error, ut homines canibus esse similes affectarent (22). i. e. “Yet natural modesty got at last the advantage over this erroneous opinion; for though it be reported that Diogenes did it sometimes with boasting, imagining that his sect would thus gain a greater reputation, if his notorious impudence was deeply

(16) Τὸ δημόσιον γινώσκοντες μὴ γινώσκοντες καὶ οὐκ αἰσχροῦ ἕνεκα δεικνύοντες, ἵνα τῶν ἰσχυρῶν οὐκ αἰσχροῦ ἕνεκα μὴ γινώσκοντες οὐκ αἰσχροῦ ἕνεκα καὶ τῶν φιλοσόφων Κρότωνος ἀσκησάμεν. Sext. Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypo. lib. 3. cap. 24. pag. 152.

(17) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialog. d'Orasus Tubero, pag. m. 165. He quotes Herodotus, lib. 2.

A REFLECTION upon the weakness of human reason.

(18) See his article remark [L]. (19) Plutarch. de Stoicor. Repugnant. pag. 1044.

(20) Sext. Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypo. lib. 3. cap. 24. pag. 153. (21) See his article quotation (73).

(22) De Civit. Dei, lib. 14. cap. 20.

answer [E], but only made use of his hands; and whatever he could say of do afterwards, he found her so bold and resolute, that nothing could daunt her (a). She wrote some books which have not been transmitted down to us [F]. Moreri has committed some errors in this article [G], and Lorenzo Crasso

(a) Taken from Diogenes Laertius, in Hipparchia, lib. 6. num. 96, & seq.

“ deeply rooted in the memory of men; yet the Cynics have since left it off; and the shame which made men blush before men had a greater influence over them than that error, by which they would make men act like dogs.” But as the most general rules are always liable to some exceptions, we meet in Lucian with the Cynic Peregrinus, who begins again to imitate Diogenes's conduct. Ἐν πολλῷ δὲ τῶν ἀπειρημένων δὴ μὴ ἀνεφλῶν τὸ αἰδῆν, ἢ τὸ ἀδιάφορον δὲ τῶτο καλύμναι ἰ- ππάρχειας. Multa autem in corona populi pudenda con- strebat, & hac indifferentia vocans ostentabat (23).

(23) Lucian de Morte Peregr. pag. m. 767. tom. 1.

An observation designed for those who might take offence at what I have related.

Those who may think it strange that I should relate such horrid obscenities as these are, want to be told, that they do not sufficiently consider either the privileges or the duty of an Historian. Any man, who at this time writes the History either of an ancient Philosopher, or of some other person who gained some reputation in former ages, has a right to relate all that the books acquaint him with, whether they be commendable actions, or such as deserve the reader's horror and execration; if he collects only what is praiseworthy, he acquits himself very ill of the duties, which the nature of his work requires of him. One has more liberty in writing the Life of a modern person; for if he has committed some very obscene actions, which the public is not acquainted with, they may be omitted, if it be found necessary to obviate some inconveniences, which might arise from the publication of such things. But as to a fact related by an hundred authors, one is not free to use such a discretion; and if an Historian should choose to omit some particulars, he yields to a very insignificant and useless scruple; for the readers will easily find by other means, what is thus concealed from them. All the world is so well acquainted with Diogenes the Cynic's impudence, that there are even some sayings spread abroad concerning him, which are not related by any ancient writer whatsoever. Du Monsieur put me in mind of a book of the Orleans, intituled The Human Plant to the Queen; which is a ridiculous title: this made me remember Diogenes's saying: Planto hominem.

(24) Perroniana, under the word Orleans, pag. m. 225.

I plant a man (24). These are Cardinal Du Perron's words. There are numberless persons, who relate the same story in their private conversations: it is to be met with in several books, in which it is asserted, that Diogenes embracing a woman in the public streets, was asked what he was doing? and that he answered, φύτείν ἄνθρωπον: I plant a man. None of the ancients, as far as I know, have related this story, and Monsieur Du Rondel, whom I have consulted upon it, answered me, that he never met with it but in modern authors. Since therefore such an ill-grounded story has been spread abroad concerning this ancient Philosopher's impudence, it is impossible but the world must know what is really related by the authors whose words I quote. To what purpose should I then conceal or suppress those particulars? But then, you will say, I ought to have chosen such expressions, as might cover those obscenities with a thick veil. I reply, that this would have been a proper method to lessen the horror with which they ought to strike us; for those nice and dark expressions, which are used now about smutty subjects, do not disgust the reader so much, as a more natural and stronger style would do, which would so much the more fill the reader with indignation, as the author does not lose his time in inventing indirect expressions, which after all, and to speak the truth, are nothing but mere varnish. I add, that it is more useful and more important than people are apt think, thus to represent with ingenuity those wickednesses and abominations, which the Heathen Philosophers approved. This is proper to humble and mortify our reason, to convince us of the infinite depravation of man's heart, and to teach us a truth, which should never be out of our mind, namely that men wanted a light from heaven, a revelation, to supply the defects of the Philosophical light; for you see that the Stoics (25), who applied themselves more than any other Philosophers, to moral Philosophy and Ethics, approved Diogenes's impudent obscenities: so that we may apply to them particularly St. Paul's general assertion against the Heathens, professing them- selves to be wise, they become fools (26).

(25) Above, quotations (19), (20).

(26) Epistle to the Romans, ch. 1. ver. 22.

[E] Hipparchia . . . proposed an objection: . . . to which Theodorus the Atheist made no verbal answer.] It was a Sophism which might be easily solved, and urged against her. If I, said she to him, should commit the same action, which you had lawfully committed, I could not be charged with committing an unlawful action. Now if you should beat yourself, you would act lawfully; if therefore I should beat you, I could not be charged with committing an unlawful action. Theodorus did not lose his time in answering her like a Logician, but fell upon her and untied her gown. Considering the dress, and manner of speaking of this time, we should say, that he took up her petticoats. Thus Monsieur Menage explains these words of Diogenes Laertius; ἀνίσχυε δ' αὐτῆς θοματίω. This is a very merry and galant way of answering a woman. Hipparchia was not put out of countenance: and when Theodorus had repeated to her some verses from a Tragedy, which gave the Character of a woman, who left her spinning-wheel and her distaff, she replied, I know myself under that character, I am that woman, but do you think that I made a bad choice, in choosing to spend my time in philosophizing rather than in spinning? Let us see now what Theodorus might have answered, if he would have taken that trouble. To make a direct answer, he might have observed, that the action of Theodorus's beating himself, and the action of Hipparchia's beating Theodorus, were two different actions, and not actions of the same kind: so that there were four terms, or propositions in Hipparchia's syllogism. In order that two actions may be like each other, there must be the same relation between the agent and the patient in the one, as there is in the other. Now there was not such a relation in the actions mentioned in Hipparchia's supposition. If Theodorus had had a mind to turn the argument against Hipparchia, and to puzzle her, he might have argued thus: If I should commit the same action, which your husband may do lawfully, I could not be charged with committing an unlawful action. Now your husband acts lawfully when he kisses you, &c. Therefore, if I should kiss you, &c. I could not be charged with committing an unlawful action. One might have seen, whether Hipparchia, who was very impudent, would have dared to answer before witnesses, with a concedo totum: I grant the whole Argument.

[F] She wrote some Books which have not been transmitted down to us.] Suidas asserts, that she wrote Hypotheses Philosophicas: Epicheremata quedam, & questiones ad Theodorum cognomento Atheum. i. e. “Philosophical Hypotheses or Suppositions: some Reasonings, and Questions proposed to Theodorus sur- named the Atheist.” Monsieur Menage's conjecture is very probable; namely, that we must not read in Diogenes Laertius (28), Φίεται δὲ τῷ Κράτητος βιβλίον (28) In Hipparchia. i. e. “There is a Book of epistles to Crates extant;” but Φίεται δὲ πρὸς τὸν Κράτητα βιβ. 98. λίον ἰππάρχειας. i. e. There is a Book of epistles to Crates extant.” According to this conjecture, we may assert, that Hipparchia published Letters, which she wrote to her husband, and in which she philosophized nobly, and in a stile like that of Plato. We must say also that she wrote some Tragedies, in which she employed the lofty stile of Philosophy. It would be very strange that Diogenes Laertius, who wrote Crates's life, should have mentioned this Philosopher's writings in Hipparchia's Life. It is in order to clear him of this blemish and irregularity, that Monsieur Menage made the conjecture we have mentioned above.

[G] Moreri has committed some errors in this Article.] He ought not to have said, that Hipparchia's love for the sciences made her prefer Crates before all the other persons that courted her with a design to marry her. She loved Crates's person, and it was for his sake that she began to philosophize. It is true that she had been charmed with his beautiful and learned discourses; but this is not a sufficient ground for asserting that the reason why she chose this Philosopher rather

(b) Diog. Laert. in Hipparchia, lib. 6. num. 94, and 96. (c) A city in Thrace, which has also been called Hipparchia. Menag. Not. ad Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 96.

Crasso also [H]. I forgot to observe, that Hipparchia, and her brother Metrocles, who was a disciple of Crates (b), were born at Maronea (c). They flourished in the time of Alexander. From Hipparchia, and Crates's marriage, came a son named Pasicles (d).

(d) Diog. Laert. in Crates, lib. 6. num. 88.

(29) It is that of Mr. Menage, which I have mentioned in the foregoing remark.

rather than any other man was, that she loved the sciences. There have been maidens and women, who fell in love with some Ministers by hearing them preach; and who chose to marry them rather than any other men, though they might have made a more advantageous match. The learning and eloquence of these Ministers was indeed the cause of those Ladies falling in love with them, but it was not the love for the sciences or for books that made them marry those Gentlemen. If Moreri had mentioned the correction (29) of the Passage in Diogenes Laertius, he might have observed, that according to this Historian, Hipparchia's stile was very much like Plato's, and that she wrote Tragedies: but as he did not mention that correction, he could not reasonably assert the rest.

ogni altro per Crates vecchio, povero, et mal d'apparenza (30). i. e. " Though she being a rich and beautiful young lady was courted by a great many men, yet she refused them all, and chose Crates, an old, poor, and ill-looking Man. 3. That she dressed in men's clothes in order to follow Crates every where. 4. That having disputed with Theodorus, who denied a Providence, she convinced him by very strong proofs and unquestionable arguments. * Riusci cost dotta che in disputa convinsse con fedissime prove e incontrastabili ragioni, e con somma sua gloria Teodoro che negava la divina provvidenza (31). Read the text of this Article, and you will find that Lorenzo Crasso has mistaken the sense of Laertius's words. The riches, beauty, and nobility which Laertius mentions, belong only to Hipparchia's lovers. She did not dress in men's clothes in order to follow Crates, but because he declared to her, that he would not marry a woman but who would submit to the rules of the Cynic Sect. Lastly, you have seen that her dispute with Theodorus was not about Providence, nor about any point of religion. One cannot imagine how much Authors mislead their Readers.

(30) Lor. Crasso, Istoria di Paolo Crato, pag. 296.

(31) Idem, ibid.

(a) Suidas, pag. 2264.

* HIPPARCHUS a great Astronomer born at Nice in Bithynia (a), flourished between the 154th and the 163d Olympiads [A]. There is one of his works still extant, it is his Commentary on Aratus's Phaenomena [B]. Monsieur Rohault was very much mistaken [C], when he asserted that this Astronomer was not acquainted with the particular motion of the fixed stars from West to East; by which motion their Longitude changes. Pliny mentions Hipparchus pretty often, and with great commendations. He places

(1) Eight; one in the 2d book, and the seven others in the 3d. See Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 159.

[A] He flourished between the 154th and the 163d Olympiads.] The proof of this is as strong as can be desired, for it is taken from the astronomical observations he made in that space of time. Ptolemy has given us some of them (1). Vossius was in the right to place Hipparchus under the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, and under that of Ptolemy Evergetes, and to censure Suidas who only observes, that this Astronomer lived in the time of the Roman Consuls; he should have mentioned a more particular time; that of the third Punic War, and that of the War against the Numantines. Thus far Vossius is in the right: but when he asserts that he agrees with Suidas about the time when Hipparchus lived (2), he forgets himself, and asserts a falsity; for Suidas does not agree better with Vossius upon this point, than with an Author, who would have placed Hipparchus at the beginning of the fourth century of Rome, or at the end of the fifth. Calvisius (3) was in the wrong to assert, that Suidas places Hipparchus 130 years after the first Ptolemies. A French Author (4) is not less evidently mistaken, who asserts that Hipparchus lived in Plato's time. Moreri, who had no guide in this Article but Vossius, ought to have found in that Author a powerful preservative against all the blunders which he has committed. He places Hipparchus in the years of Rome 570 and 80 under the reigns of Ptolemy and Philometor Evergetes Kings of Egypt. Ought he not to have made the Olympiads mentioned by Vossius (5) agree with the time that passed from the year 589 since the building of Rome, to the year 625? Further, when one mentions Ptolemy without any addition to his name, it is a sign that one means the first King of that name who reigned in Egypt; and there are few accurate writers, who do not distinguish him more particularly. It is therefore a very gross blunder, to make use of the word Ptolemy absolutely and without any addition, when one does not intend to speak of the Prince, who had Egypt for his share after Alexander's death. Now it is plain that Moreri does not mean that Prince, or if he does, he is greatly mistaken; for a man, who lived in the Year 570 and 80 of Rome, could not flourish under the first Ptolemy, who died in the year 468 since the building of Rome. Moreri has been mistaken in another particular; he supposes that there was a King of Egypt, whose name was Philometer Evergetes.

taryon Aratus's Phaenomena.] It is properly a criticism on Aratus; for Hipparchus charges him with having plundered Eudoxus's Books, and transcribed even those observations in which Eudoxus was mistaken. He makes the same remarks against Aratus the Grammarian, who wrote a Commentary on Aratus. Peter Victorius is the first that published this Commentary of Hipparchus. Father Petavius gave afterwards a more correct edition of it, to which he added a Latin Translation which he made himself (6). Hipparchus's (6) other works were, de Constitutione Stellarum Inerrantium, & statione immota, deque mensura Luna motu secundum latitudinem, &c. (7). i. e. " Of the order and constant situation of the fixed Stars, as also of the Moon's monthly motion in longitude, &c." [C] Monsieur Rohault was very much mistaken [C] Such great Mathematicians as he was, have not, generally speaking, a very exact knowledge of facts; and they often commit unawares historical blunders (8). However it be, let us see what this learned Cartesian tells us, who by his very spelling of Hipparchus shewed that he did not understand Greek.

(6) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 160.

(7) Idem, pag. 159. et Suidas.

(8) Compare this with what is observed in the remark [R] of the article of the 3d Duke of GUISE.

(2) Convent de arate Suidas. Vossius, ibid.

(3) Ad annum Mundi 3665.

(4) Coustel, du Calcul Ecclesiastique, pag. 139.

(5) The 154th and 163d.

Hipparchus, says he (9), spent the greatest part of his life, without observing any thing else concerning the fixed Stars, but that they move from East to West, in circles, which seemed to him to be exactly parallel to the Equator, from which he inferred, that they are all fixed in the solid substance of the same heaven (which is called the Firmament,) and which he placed beyond all the Planets; and as he was of opinion, that it was not necessary this Heaven should borrow its motion, which is simple, from any other Heaven above it, he asserted, that this was the last of all the Heavens; that it was this which moved all the others the same way as it moved itself; and that it was thus the Primum Mobile, or First Mover. Hipparchus being therefore of opinion, that the fixed Stars did not change their place in the Heavens, he imagined that they might serve to determine the course of the Planets; just as one might make use of several rocks in the sea, to mark the course of the ships, which leave no tracks behind them as they sail along. With this view he exerted his skill in measuring the distance there is between every fixed Star, and the Ecliptic in which the Sun moves; and this he calls the latitude of a Star. He endeavoured afterwards to determine the number of degrees and minutes on the Ecliptic, which are reckoned from West to East, from the first points of Aries to the Point overagainst which each fixed Star

WHAT is meant by the Longitude and Latitude of the Stars.

[B] There is extant bis Commem-places him amongst those men of a sublime genius, who by foretelling the Eclipses taught mankind that they ought not to be frightened at these Phænomena [D], and that even the Gods

Star corresponds, which is called its longitude; but death having interrupted his design, it could not be carried on but by his successors. Ptolemy, who came about two hundred years after Hipparchus, designed to give an account of the motion of the Planets, and being curious to examine, whether his predecessor had exactly marked the longitude and latitude of the fixed Stars, he found that their latitude was indeed such as he had marked it, but that their longitude was increased two degrees. He inferred from thence, that the fixed Stars, besides their motion from East to West in twenty four hours, had also another motion from West to East in circles parallel to the Ecliptick; by which motions they were to finish a whole revolution in the space of thirty six thousand years, since they advanced two degrees in two hundred years. And as the Firmament could have but one motion proper to it, Ptolemy ascribed to it the motion from West to East in thirty six thousand years, and asserted that its diurnal motion from East to West was borrowed from another Heaven, which must be beyond it. And thus men began to believe that the Primum Mobile, or First Mover, is a Heaven, which contains no Stars, and surrounds the Firmament.

(10) Regis, Système de Philosophie, tom. 3. pag. 42, 43. of the Lyons editions 1691, in 12mo.

(11) Gadroys, Système du Monde, chap. 2. pag. 27.

Monsieur Regis (10), who is another very learned Cartesian, asserts the same thing in fewer words. But Monsieur Gadroys, an excellent Cartesian, very well knew, that the discovery of the particular motion of the fixed stars from west to east, must be ascribed to Hipparchus (11). He had probably considered with more attention than the others, a particular related by Gassendi, which is as follows. The Chaldeans, the Egyptians, and the Greeks, imagined that all the fixed stars were placed in the concavity of the last Heaven, and consequently of the first mover, and that therefore they moved only from east to west, on the poles of the equator. But at last Hipparchus found, 130 years before Christ, that this hypothesis could not be true: for having considered, that according to Timocharis's observation, made two hundred years before, there were eight degrees west between the Spica Virginis, and the point of the autumnal equinox, and that he could find but six degrees between that star, and that point of the firmament, he inferred from thence, that the fixed stars must have a proper motion from west to east on the poles of the ecliptic; and that if Timocharis's observation were exact, the progress of the fixed stars by this particular motion was one degree every hundred years. He wrote two treatises upon this new doctrine, the one intitled, Of the Motion of the Equinoxes and Solstices; and the other Of the length of the year. Quare & intellexit, si Timocharis quidem rite observasset, ac Stellæ moveri sic perseverarent, peragi hoc motu unum gradum intra annos proxime centum, Intellexit præterea debere hunc motum fieri secundum Zodiacum, seu super Eclipticæ Polis; idque prædixit tam in Tractatu, quem inscripsit de transgressu Æquinoctialium, Solstitialiumque punctorum, quam in eo, quem conscripsit, de Anni magnitudine, ut apud Ptolemæum habetur (12). Observe that Gassendi does not exactly set down the time when Timocharis lived, for this Astronomer flourished about the CXXIX Olympiad, and only 130 years before Hipparchus made the first observations, which Ptolemy mentions. But this error of Gassendi is much more pardonable than that of Monsieur Gadroys (13).

(12) Gassendus, Physica, Sect. 2. lib. 3. pag. m. 596. primi Volum. Operum, ex Ptolemæo 7. Almag. 2. & 3.

(13) He supposes but 200 years between Timocharis and Ptolemy the Astronomer. Syll. pag. 30. whereas there were above 400 years between them. Rohault, who puts but two centuries between Hipparchus and Ptolemy, tom. 2. Part 2. pag. 36. of his Physique, ought at least to have imitated Gassendi, who puts 260 years between these two Astronomers.

(14) Plinius, lib. 2. cap. 12.

(15) Idem, ibid.

[D] Pliny . . . places him amongst those . . . who by foretelling Eclipses taught mankind, that they ought not to be frightened at these Phænomena.] Thales was the first amongst the Greeks, who could discover when there was to be an eclipse. Sulpitius Gallus amongst the Romans began to succeed in this kind of predictions, and gave an essay of his skill that way very seasonably the day before the battle was fought, in which Perseus was vanquished (14). After these two Hipparchus improved that science very much; for he made Ephemerides, or Catalogues of Eclipses for six hundred years. Post eos utriusque sideris cursum in sexcentos annos præcivuit Hipparchus, mensis gentium, dieque & horas, ac situs locorum & visus populorum naturæ particeps (15). i. e. "After them came Hipparchus, who foretold the course of the sun and moon for six hundred years, calculated according to the different manner of reckoning the months, days, and hours used by several nations, and for the different situations of places and nations: the succeeding ages witness, that he seems to have been admitted in Nature's privy-council." Thus Pliny calls him upon this account Nature's Confident. The elogiums, which he on this occasion bestows upon the Astronomers, are, in my opinion, very well grounded. Viri ingentes supraque mortalium naturam, tantorum numinum lege deprebensa, & misera hominum mente absoluta in defectibus stellarum scelera, aut mortem aliquam fideram parvente . . . Macti ingenio esse cæli interpretes, rerumque naturæ capaces, argumenti repertores, quo Deos hominesque vicissis. Quis enim hæc cernens, & stator fiderum (quoniam ita placuit appellare) labores, non suæ necessitati mortalis genitus ignoscat (16) ? i. e. "Most eminent men, who are raised above the condition of mortals; you have discovered the laws, by which the great Gods rule this universe; and thus you have delivered the wretched minds of men from the terror under which they laboured at the sight of an eclipse, dreading either some great misfortune, or the death (if I may say so) of the sun or moon . . . Let the reputation of your great genius be spread more and more, O interpreters of Heaven, who understand the nature of things, and found means to explain it; by which you excell the Gods and men. Who, though born a mortal, would not excuse fate, when he considers these Phænomena, and reflects upon the regular returns of the labours (since men were pleased to call the eclipses thus) of the sun and moon."

This elogium in prose is full as good as the following one in verse.

*Felices animos, quibus hæc cognoscere primis,
Inque domos superas scandere cura fuit!
Credibile est illos pariter vitiiisque locisque
Altius humanis exseruisse caput.
Non Venus & vinum sublimia pectora fregit;
Officiumve fori, militiæque labor.
Nec levis ambitio, perfusæque gloria fuco;
Magnarumve fames sollicitavit opum.
Admovère oculis distantia sidera nostris;
Ætheraque ingenio supposuère suo.
Sic petitur cælum: non ut serat Offan Olympus;
Summaque Peliacus sidera tangat apex* (17).

(17) Ovid. Fast. lib. 1. ver. 297. & seq.

"Happy minds, who first endeavoured to know this, and who first attempted to ascend into Heaven, if I may say so. It is probable that they raised themselves higher than other men, above all human vices and pleasures: neither love nor wine subdued their lofty souls; nor was their time taken up in civil or military employments; vain ambition did not fill their hearts, nor were they fond of empty glory; nor was their breast possessed with an eager desire after riches. They brought the distant stars nearer to our view, and subjected the very sky to their inquiries. This is the way, that leads to Heaven; nor is it necessary to heap up mountains upon mountains to reach the sky."

Hipparchus had so carefully examined what relates to eclipses, that he had marked the proportion there is between the several intervals of time, at which they happen (18). He had observed that the eclipses of the moon might return after five months, and those of the sun after seven months, and that the sun may be eclipsed twice within the space of thirty days, with regard to different parts of the earth. Intra ducentos annos Hipparchi sagacitate compertum est, & lunæ decessum aliquando quinto mense à priore fieri, solis vero septimo: eundem bis in triginta diebus supra terras occultiari, sed ab aliis atque aliis hoc ceni. Some have misunderstood these words of Pliny; there is a very learned man, who imagined that by the words intra ducentos annos we must understand, that two centuries must be past, before one eclipse of the moon can succeed another at five month's distance (19); whereas

(18) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 13. (19) Neque vero sensus est, ut existimavit vir aliqui extra ingenii aleam positus, expectandos esse annos ducentos ut recurat Luna decessum Harduinus, in Plinium, lib. 2. cap. 13. pag. 159, 160.

Gods were bound by laws [E]. He admires him for making a review of all the stars, for reckoning them, and for acquainting us with the situation and bigness of every one of them; by which his descendants will be enabled to discover, not only whether they are born and die, but also whether they change their place, and whether they increase or decrease. We learn from this passage of Pliny, that Hipparchus ascribed a celestial origin to our souls [F]. Strabo (b) charges this Astronomer with loving too much to find fault, and to have pretty often criticised in such a manner, as favoured more of cavil, than of an accurate genius. Pliny judges more favourably of him (c).

(b) Lib. 1, 2. p. 57.

(c) Hipparchus in coarpuendo eo (Eratosthene) & in reliqua omni diligentia mirus. Plin. lib. 2. cap. 108.

Pliny's meaning is, that Hipparchus had discovered that proportion two hundred years ago. Pliny's Chronology is exact; there were two hundred years between him, and that famous Astronomer.

[E] . . . and that even the Gods were bound by laws.] There is no inconvenience in asserting that God loves and approves what is regular and good, by a necessary and indispensable law; for on the contrary, the being capable to act against this law would be an imperfection. But to be subject to an order, by which the exercise of our functions is stopped or weakened, is certainly a defect. So that they, who pretended that the stars are Gods, if they designed to reason coherently, ought to have said, that the Astronomers found out the blind side of the divine nature, her dependency on a very oppressive law, which submitted her to a kind of death, or to a fainting fit, or to slavery. It will be objected, that the sun is not less bright in itself during an eclipse, than either before or after it: but may not I answer, that a messenger, who is arrested, does not lose for all that, any thing of his strength and health? And yet this is a proof of his being subject to a burdensome law; in a word, it is a sign of weakness to see that he cannot continue his journey. Apply this to the sun, and you will find, that the eclipses are a proof of its imperfection: they prevent it from shining on the earth. The sun in this case is a Prince whose messengers are stopped, and whose functions are suspended. If Pliny had designed to reason, he would to please those, who do not like to turn from one book to another, in order to gratify their curiosity. Idem Hipparchus nunquam satis laudatus, ut quo nemo magis approbaverit cognitionem cum homine fiderum, animasque nostras partem esse cæli; novam stellam & aliam in ævo suo genitam deprehendit: ejusque motu, quia die fulsit, ad dubitationem est adductus, anno hoc sæpius ferret, moverenturque & eæ, quas putamus affixas. Idemque ausus, rem etiam Deo improbam, annumerare posteris stellas, ac sidera ad normam expandere (21), organa excogitatis, per quæ singularum loca, atque magnitudines signaret: ut facile discerni posset ex eo, non modo, an obirent, nascerenturque, sed an omnino aliqua transirent, moverenturque; item an crescerent, minuerenturque, cælo in hereditate cunctis relicto; si quisquam, qui rationem eam caperet, inventus esset (22). i. e. "The same (22) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 26. pag. 182, 183. "Hipparchus, who can never be sufficiently commended, since he shewed how nearly men are related to the celestial bodies, and that our souls are a part of Heaven; Hipparchus, I say, observed a new star, which first appeared in his time; the motion of which, the day it shined, made him doubt, whether such stars arose often, or whether even those stars, which are thought to be fixed, did also move. He also dared, which is a great work for the Gods themselves, to give posterity an account of the number of the stars, and of the situation of the celestial bodies, having contrived a machine, in which he marked their places, and their bigness; by this means it was easy to observe, not only whether any star perished, or whether there arose any new one, but also whether they changed their situation, and had any proper motion; and also whether they grew larger or smaller: thus he left the Heavens as a legacy to his successors, in case there should be any persons capable of understanding that science."

(20) This consideration would have more weight than that which Lucretius urges above quotation (8) of the article BAUTRU (William).

not have drawn from this phenomenon the consequence he mentions; he would not have said, that this phenomenon of eclipses ought to make us easy in this state of mortality (20); but he would have said that this proves the stars are not a divine nature.

[F] We learn from a passage in Pliny, that Hipparchus ascribed a celestial origin to our souls.] It is so beautiful, that by transcribing it at length, I am sure HIPPOMANES. There is in the plan of this Dictionary a long article upon the Hippomanes. I do not insert it in this place, because I have altered the design I had at first of giving indifferently real and personal articles. But I shall give it in the form of a dissertation at the end of this work.

HIPPONAX, a Greek Poet, born at Ephesus, lived, not in the 23d Olympiad, as Eusebius has asserted [A], but in the 60th, as Pliny testifies it (a). Being banished from Ephesus, by the tyrants Athenagoras and Comas (b), he settled at Clazomenæ [B]. He was deformed, short and thin (c). But his deformity has been accidentally the cause of his immortality; for he is little known but by the satirical verses, which he wrote against

(a) Plin. lib. 36. cap. 5.

(b) Suidas, in Ἰππωνάξ.

(c) Ælian. Div. Hist. lib. 10. cap. 7.

TWO

[A] He lived not in the XXIII^d Olympiad, as Eusebius asserted.] Scaliger (1) refutes him by a passage from Pliny; he thought therefore that Pliny was not mistaken. This is right: but then he adds that Eusebius followed Tatian, and he refers us to his Notes upon Number 908, in which Notes there is not a word relating to Hipponax. This is not being very exact. Eusebius may also be refuted by Proclus's authority (2), who asserts that Hipponax flourished under the reign of Darius. He means no doubt the son of Hytaspes, who began to reign in the LXIVth Olympiad.

(1) Pag. 79.

(2) Apud Photium, Biblioth. pag. 983.

[B] He settled at Clazomenæ.] Hence it is that the Poetess Sulpitia describes him after this manner:

Nec trimetro jambo, nec qui pede fractus eodem Fortiter irasci discis duce Clazomenio (3).

(3) De Editio Domitiani, Inter Cæsaribus Virgilio, edit. Lugd. Bat. 1617, pag. 247.

Neither he, who writes satires in Iambic verses of six feet, nor he, who being exasperated by the same kind of saures, learns to rail stoutly after the example of the Clazomenian."

If what Monsieur le Fevre relates be true, namely, that Hipponax lived at Ephesus when he revenged himself of those, who had insulted him on account of his deformity, it will follow from thence, either that he returned into his native country, or that his banishment was not occasioned by this story. I have not met with any thing in Pliny, that shews that Hipponax was or was not of Ephesus, or that he and the Statuaries whom he satirized, did or did not live in that city. And yet Monsieur Dacier (4) would persuade us that Pliny is of the same opinion with those who assert, that our Poet's verses obliged his enemies to retire from Ephesus. Lloyd and Hoffman say, that Bupalus lived at Clazomenæ (5). I imagine this is only an inference drawn from the following particulars. They have observed on the one hand, that Hipponax retired into that City, and on the other, that Bupalus made a ridiculous and comical statue to represent him; from these two facts they inferred, that Bupalus lived at Clazomenæ.

(4) Rem. sur Horace, tom. 5. pag. 151.

(5) Charles Stephens says the same under the word Bupalus.

two Statuaries [C], who had made the most ridiculous figure of him that was in their power (d). He sent out against them a thundering legion of iambic verses, which vexed them to such a degree, that it was reported they hanged themselves out of spite. Pliny maintains that this is false, and proves it so, by a great number of statues which they made since that time in the neighbouring islands. Some authors write, that they only left Ephesus where Hipponax lived (e). However it be, this author was, and is still very much distinguished by his satyrical humour and verses [D]. His slanders did not even spare those to whom he owed his life (f). Some writers pretend, that he was starved to death [E]. It is observed, that though he was short and thin, yet he was very strong, and could throw an empty vessel farther than any other man could do (g). He was not the first nor the only person, who by his invectives have been the cause of other people's death [F].

(d) Plinius, lib. 35. cap. 5.

(e) Apud Tanaq. Fabrum, Vie des Poetes Grecs.

(f) Ο καὶ τῶν τοῦ λαῖκῶν. i. e. "Who barked even at his own parents." Anthol. lib. 3. cap. 30. num. 22. pag. m. 655.

(g) Metrodor. Scepius, apud Athenæum, lib. 12. pag. 552.

HIRPINI,

[C] Against two Statuaries.] They were two brothers, the one called Bupalus, and the other Athenis; they were of the isle of Chios, and the sons of Anthermus, whose father was named Micciades, and his grandfather Malas. All these persons had practised Sculpture in that island from father to son, so that this art might be as antient there as the Olympiads. Si quis borum familiam ad proavum usque retroagat, inveniet artis ejus originem cum Olympiadum origine cepisse (6). i. e. "If you will trace this family up to the great-grandfather, you will find that this art began with the Olympiads." Pausanias (7), speaking of the statue of Fortune, and of that of the Graces, which were to be seen at Smyrna, and which Bupalus had made, commends him on that account. He makes him more antient than Pindar; two witnesses like Pausanias and Pliny, deserve more credit than the Scholiast on Horace (8), who asserts that Bupalus was a Painter, wherein he has been followed by Messieurs le Fevre (9) and Dacier (10), and by almost all the writers of Dictionaries (11). Suidas makes both the brothers Sculptors; and because he calls the latter Athenis, Father Hardouin imagined, that the passage in Pliny, where this Sculptor is named Antbermus, was corrupted; and therefore he put the word Athenis instead of that. See the remark [E], and the article BUPALUS. [D] He was distinguished by his satyrical humour and verses.] This gave rise to some proverbs, which we meet with in Cicero (12). Eum additum jam tum pato esse Calvi Licinii Hipponacteo praconio. i. e. "I take him to be already ruined in his reputation by Calvus Licinius's Hipponactean commendation of him." Horace joins Hipponax with Archilochus, as the two greatest patrons for slander:

(6) Plin. lib. 36. cap. 5.

(7) Pausan. lib. 4. pag. 140. and lib. 9. pag. 309.

(8) In VI Epod.

(9) Vie des Poetes Grecs.

(10) Remarques sur Horace, tom. 5. pag. 151.

(11) See the remark [A] of the article BUPALUS.

(12) Epist. 24. lib. 7. ad famil.

————— In malos asperrimus
Parata tollo cornua.
Qualis Lycambæ spretus infido gener,
Aut acer bovis Bupalus.

(13) Horat. 6. Epod. See also Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. 3.

————— "To rogues a deadly foe,
"I'm still prepar'd to strike the blow:
"As sharp as fierce Archilochus his song,
"Like Hipponax revenge a wrong.

CREECH.

Here follow Pliny's words: Hipponacti notabilis vultus fœditas erat: quamobrem imaginem ejus lascivia jocularum ii proposuere ridendum circulis. Quod Hipponax indignatus amaritudinem carminum distrixit in tantum, ut credatur aliquibus ad laqueum eos impulisse: quod falsum est. i. e. "Hipponax's face was remarkably ugly; wherefore these Statuaries made a figure of him out of joke, which they exposed to the laughter of a multitude of people. Hipponax was so exasperated at this, that he lashed them very severely in his verses, which vexed them to that degree, that some think they hanged themselves; but this is not true." There are three or four epigrams in the Anthology (14), in which Hipponax is represented as being still dreadful even after his death. The passengers are advised to run from his tomb, because it was a place where there fell a terrible hail. Θεῖος τὸν καλαζικῆν τάφον, τὸν Φηκίδος, fugæ grandinantem tumulum horrendum (15).

(14) Lib. 3. cap. 25.

(15) Ibid. num. 24. pag. m. 566.

[E] Some writers pretend, that he was starved to death.] I do not think there is any ground for this assertion but the two following lines.

(16) Ovid. in Ibid. ver. 525.

Uique parum stabili qui carmine læsit Athenas Invivis pereas, deficiente cibo (16).

i. e. "May you perish for want of bread, and hated by all, like him, who injured Athens (or Athenis) by his lame verses."

Some writers pretend, that Ovid did not write Athenas but Athenim, whence it would follow that he meant Hipponax here. Qui primus iambum claudicare fecit, & scazonta in Bupalum & Athenim composuit, ut est apud Suidam, ut recte Ovidius, parum stabile, id est claudam carmen ei tribuat. i. e. "Who first made lame Iambic verses, and wrote satyrs in that kind of verse against Bupalus and Athenis; whence Ovid ascribes to him an unsteady, that is a lame poem." Thus speaks Alciat in the XVIIIth Chapter of the fifth Book of his Parerga. Turnebus does not dislike this opinion. Videtur, says he (17), de Hipponacte hoc intelligi, qui claudicante & parum stabili versu, id est scazonte in Bupalum & Athenim invectus est Atheniensis: quo in carmine ne Athenis quidem pepercerat. Quid tamen si pro Athenas, Athenim scribamus, quæ ab eo probris oneratum accepimus? ne hanc quidem lectionem improbarem, etsi alteram delere non auserim. i. e. "It seems that this must be understood of Hipponax, who in his lame Iambic verses inveighed against Bupalus and Athenis two Athenians; in which poem he did not spare even the city of Athens: but what, if instead of Athenas we should write Athenim; for we are told that he loaded Athenis with injuries? I cannot disprove this reading, though I should not dare to expunge the other." Monsieur Boissieu (18), who transcribes these two passages, observes that Sanctius and Valerius approve them. And for his part, he admits that opinion with all his heart, and thinks it very probable, that Ovid should have mentioned the two inventors of the Iambic verse one after the other. Now, he had just mentioned Archilochus, and we know from Dionysius of Halicarnassus (19), from Clemens of Alexandria (20), from Rufinus (21), and from the Poetess Sulpitia (22), that Hipponax invented the Scazons. Monsieur Boissieu might have censured Turnebus for asserting, that Hipponax's two adversaries were of Athens: for Pliny expressly observes that they were of the isle of Chios, and that they were used to mark it upon their works. Quibus subjecerunt carmen non vitibus tantum cœnferi Chium, sed & operibus Antbermi filiorum (23). i. e. "On which (their works) they engraved an inscription, declaring that the isle of Chios was famous not only for her wine, but also for the works of Anthermus's sons." What Turnebus asserts, namely that Hipponax did not spare the city of Athens in his verses against those two Sculptors, is intirely groundless, and said at random. A German Minister (24), having applied the two verses in Ovid to Hipponax, continues thus. Ex Plinio nimirum compertum est Athenim vel Athenam sculptorem in Hipponactis scripta incurrisse, carmina ejus sustulisse maledica, autorem verò leibali inedia fuisse confectum. i. e. "For we know from Pliny, that Athenis or Athenas the Sculptor fell upon Hipponax's writings, and demolished his slandering verses; and that the author of them died for want." Pliny says no such thing.

(17) Adversus lib. 9. cap. 25.

(18) Comment. id Ibid. pag. 100; 101.

(19) Lib. de Is- andria (20).

(20) Stromat. lib. 1.

(21) De Mariis Comiciis.

(22) Hæc versos have been quoted in the remark [B].

(23) Plin. lib. 36. cap. 5.

(24) Spizelius, in Fel. Literat. pag. 718.

[F] He was not the first nor the only person, who by his invectives have been the cause of other people's death.] Before him, Archilochus had wrote satires, which obliged two or three persons to hang themselves (25). Polliagrus being abused in a Comedy hanged himself (26). We ought not to wonder that a satire should make a man desperate, since we find that a mere censure produced sometimes that fatal effect. Pythagoras having reproved one of his disciples somewhat severely before several

(25) See the article ARCHILOCHUS, remark [C].

(26) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 5. cap. 3.

HIRPINI, a Nation of Italy in the country of the Samnites. They were so called, because they had a wolf (a) for their leader, when they went to settle a colony. Some authors relate, that on a certain day, when they celebrated a great solemnity, they walked upon fire without burning themselves [A]; but it is probable that these authors ascribe to them, what belongs only to the Hirpii [B], who lived in another part of Italy. They were

(a) A Wolf was called Hirpus in the language of the Samnites. Strabo, lib. 6. pag. 173.

several persons, threw him into so dismal a melancholy, that it obliged him to strangle himself; and after that time this great Philosopher never reproved any person but privately. Πυθαγόρου δὲ τραχύτερος ἐν πολλοῖς γινώσκων προσερχόμενος, ἀπαγγέλλει τὸ μισθάζειν λέγουσιν. ἐκ τούτου δὲ μὴδέποτε τὸν Πυθαγόρου αὐδίζετο ἄλλω παρόντι ἄλλου νεοειρησάσθαι. Ferunt, adolescentulum quendam à Pythagora, cui operam dabat, multis presentibus compellatum asperius, suspendio vitam finisse, atque ab eo tempore Pythagoram numquam alio presente ququam corripuisse (27). Diodorus Cronus died with grief, being severely reproved by a King of Egypt, because he could not solve those difficulties in Logic, which Stilpo proposed to him at the King's table (28). There have been censures, which they did not occasion the death of the persons censured, yet vexed them to such a degree, that they made them attempt the reprover's life. Apollodorus the Architect lost his life, because he had made the Emperor Hadrian observe some defects in a temple which this Prince had ordered to be built (29). These latter ages afford us several instances of all these effects of censure. Muret had been acquainted with a man, whom some verses, that had been written against him, threw into so deep a melancholy, that it carried him to the grave. And hereupon that writer quotes Plato, who advises those, that are concerned for their reputation, to take care not to exasperate the Poets. Laceffiti (poetæ) ita se ulciscuntur, ut interdum eos à quibus offensi erant, ad mortem adegisse narrentur. Nam præter id quod de Archiloco accepimus, novi ego, qui hæc ætate tantum versibus suis inimico dolorem inusserit, ut ex eo ille sit mortuus... quocirca Plato in Minos præcipit iis, qui bonæ famæ studiosi sunt, ut diligenter caveant, ne cum poetis inimicitias suscipiant (30). i. e. "When the Poets are provoked, they know how to revenge themselves so, as

(27) Plutarch. de Discrim. Adu. lat. & Amici, pag. 70, F.

(28) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 112. See also Pliny, lib. 7. cap. 57.

(29) Xiphilin. in Hadriano, pag. m. 258.

(30) Muretus, Variar. Lect. lib. 2. cap. 1.

(31) Naude, Considerations sur les Coups d'Etat. See also Thuanus, lib. 90.

(32) In the article of GUARINI remark [B].

(33) Varillas, Histoire de Charles IX, tom. 2. pag. m. 18.

(34) Morale Pratique des Jésuites, tom. 3. pag. 122. where they correct an error of the first vol.

(35) Morale Pratique, tom. 1. pag. 268.

(36) Hist. de l'Acad. Française, pag. m. 322.

to force sometimes those that exasperate them to kill themselves. For besides what we read of Archilochus, I know a Poet, who at this time did by his verses give his enemy so much pain, that it proved his death... Wherefore Plato, in his Minos, advises those who are tender of their reputation, to take care not to draw upon them the resentment of the Poets." It is reported that George of Trebizonde died with grief, when he saw that the blunders, which he had made in his translation of Ptolemy, were censured by Regiomontanus, and that the sons of the deceased poisoned the Critic (31). I have observed in another place (32), that it was thought John Denores would have died with grief, at the reading of Guarini's Reply, had he lived long enough to see that work published. The zealous Calvinists... published so outrageous a libel against Quintin... that this Doctor, who was too easily vexed, went to bed after he had read that libel, and never got up any more (33). He had harangued in favour of the Clergy at the meeting of the States of the Kingdom in the year 1560: the criticism on his oration was the occasion of his death. Gregory of Valencia having read before Pope Clement VIII

(34), a passage from St. Augustin otherwise than he should have done, was convicted of a falsification; upon which the Pope told him (35). Is it thus you pretend to impose upon the Church of God? "These words were like a thunderbolt," which struck Valencia down: he swooned away in the Pope's presence, and died two days after." See in the article CERASI another stroke of the same Pope. "Monsieur de l'Étoile used to censure boldly, bluntly, and with the utmost severity all that he disliked in those things, upon which he was asked his opinion. He is charged with occasioning a young man to die with grief and sorrow, who came from Languedoc, bringing a Play with him, which he thought a masterpiece in its kind, and in which he was shewn very clearly a thousand faults." I borrow these words from Monsieur Pellisson (26). Philip II King of Spain did not censure in a less killing manner than the King of Egypt, whom I have mentioned above. "Cardinal Espinosa died, because he heard Philip II speak only these single words, by which he perceived that he had lost the King's favour. Cardinal yo joy el Presidente. Cardinal I am the President of the Council. And the same King, telling a Secretary, who had spilt ink instead of sand upon some writings. Este es el tintero, y eslotra (37) I imagine it should be esta era.

vadera; these few words went so deep to the poor Secretary's heart, that from the King's presence he retired to his bed, and died (38)." There are instances of some authors, who have murdered, or attempted to murder their Censors. Murtola being mad to see that the Cavalier Marino had ruined his reputation in a satire, let off a pistol at him in the streets of Turin; he missed him, though he had loaded his pistol with five balls, and had fired very near him; he confessed that his design was not to wound but to kill Marino (39). Here follows what we read in Monsieur Baillet (40). "Francis Robortel having criticized some words of Baptist Egnacio, a Venetian, was like to be killed with a bayonet, which this Egnacio stuck into his bowels, in answer to his critic." Baillet quotes Job. Imperial. Musæi histor. pag. 61, & Theoph. Spizel. de felic. literat. comment. 4. p. 485. Here follow Imperialis's words. Cum Alciato pariter, aliisque clarissimis ejus ævi luminibus, internecinas prope similitates exercuit (Robortellus) quo factum ut semel Venetiis Baptista Egnatius optimus ac doctissimus vir crebris ab eo laceffitus injuriis, educto senili gladiolo in eum impetum facere non dubitavit. i. e. "There was almost a mortal hatred between Robortel, and Alciat, and also between him and other most eminent men of his time; whence it happened, that Baptist Egnacio a very good and learned man, being provoked by Robortel's repeated injuries, did not scruple to fall upon him sword in hand."

Had I dispersed all this in several places throughout my work, I should have escaped the censure of those, who will style this remark an insignificant collection of commonplace topics. But as I mind my reader's convenience rather than my own, I am content to submit to that censure, if I save them the trouble of collecting, what I might have thus dispersed.

I shall add a new instance to the foregoing. A certain Poet having presented Pope Urban VIII with a work, the subject, disposition and verses of which were unworthy of a Christian, the Pope upbraided him so earnestly with his impudence, that the poor wretch died with grief and shame. You will find these words in the 3d page of a book, which Father Mençurier published at Paris in the year 1681, with this title, Des Représentations en Musique anciennes & modernes. i. e. "Of ancient and modern musical Acting upon a Stage."

[A] Some authors relate that they walked upon fire, without burning themselves. Varro, who exploded all kinds of superstitions as much as lay in his power, having mentioned a certain salve, adds immediately this observation, the Hirpini rubbed the soles of their feet with it, when they were to walk upon fire. Varro ubique expugnator religionis, ait, cum quoddam medicamentum describeret: eo uti solent Hirpini ambulaturi per ignem, medicamento plantas unguunt (1). These words do not give us the least hint concerning the situation of the Hirpini: so that we cannot determine, whether Varro spoke of a people, who were a part of the nation of the Samnites, or whether, like Servius, he gave the name of Hirpini to persons who lived near mount Soraçte in Etruria, and who were properly called Hirpii. Several persons imagine, that Varro meant that nation amongst the Samnites, which was called Hirpini. If this was really his meaning, it is very probable that he was misled by the resemblance of the names. They who walked upon fire were different from the Samnites, and lived pretty far from them. Their name was Hirpii and not Hirpini. Servius the Commentator was mistaken with regard to their name, and this mistake had led him into some others, concerning the situation of those who walked upon fire in the solemn festival of mount Soraçte, as we shall see in the following remark.

[B] ... What belongs only to the Hirpii. Virgil does

(37) I imagine it should be esta era.

(38) La Mothe le Vayer, Lettre 53. pag. 44. of the 10th vol.

(39) See the Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. num. 95.

(40) Jugemens des Savans, tom. 1. pag. 66.

(1) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 11. ver. 787.

were anciently other festivals, in which the same shew was to be seen [C].

HOBBS

does not name those who walked upon the fire, he only hints that they lived near mount Soraete.

*Summe Deum sancti custos Soraetis Apollo,
Quem primi colimus, cui pineus ardor aceruo
Pascitur, & medium freti pietate per ignem
Cultores multa premimus vestigia pruna.
Da, pater, hoc nostris aboleri dedecus armis (2)*

(2) Virgil. Æn.
lib. 11. ver. 785.

“ O Patron of Soraete's high abodes,
“ Phœbus the ruling pow'r among the Gods;
“ Whom first we serve, whole woods of unctuous pine
“ Are fell'd for thee, and to thy glory shine:
“ By thee protected, with our naked soles,
“ Thro' flames unting'd we march, and tread the “ kindled coals.”
“ Give me, propitious pow'r, to wash away
“ The stains of this dishonourable day.”

Dryden.

But Servius calls them Hirpini; Soraetis, says he in his Commentary on this passage of Virgil, mons est Hirpinorum in Flaminia collocatus. i. e. “ Soraete is a mountain of the Hirpini, situated in the road from Rome to Ariminum.” He adds, that this mountain is consecrated to the infernal Gods; and that as they were once offering a sacrifice to Plato there came some wolves which carried off from the fire the entrails of the Victim. The Shepherds pursued them, and entered into a cave, whence arose immediately a deadly vapour which occasioned a very great pestilence, of which an Oracle promised them that they would be delivered if they followed the example of the wolves; that is to say, if they lived upon plunder: They did it, and hence these people were called, Hirpini Sorani, that is to say, Pluto's Wolves; for Hirpus signifies a Wolf in the language of the Sabines, and Soranus is Pluto's name. Any person who consults Strabo and Pliny must be convinced that Servius has committed here an egregious blunder. He has blended together the names and histories of two different nations. Strabo (13) relates, that wolf having been the guide of a nation who came to settle a colony in the country of the Samnites, that nation was called Hirpini, Hirpus signifying a wolf in the language of the Samnites. As for Pliny, he asserts, that there is in the Country of Hirpini a place which is mortal to them that enter it. In Hirpinis Amfancti ad Memphitis ædem, locum quem qui intravere moriuntur (4). Virgil describes that cursed place more at large, and observes not only that there arose a dangerous steam or vapour from it, but also that it was an air-hole of Hell.

(3) Lib. 5. pag. 173.

(4) Plin. lib. 2.
cap. 93. pag. m.
240.

*Est locus Italiæ medio sub montibus altis,
Nobilis, & fama multis memoratus in oris,
Amfancti valles.*

*Hic specus horrendum, & sævi spiracula Diis
Monstrantur: ruptoque ingens Aëtheronte vorago Pestiferas aperit fauces (5).*

(5) Æn. lib. 7.
ver. 563.

“ In midst of Italy well known to Fame,
“ There lies a lake Amfanctus is the name.
“ Here Pluto pants for breath from out his cell,
“ And opens wide the grinning jaws of Hell.

DRYDEN.

There was nothing like this in mount Soraete. The vapour that arose from it was fatal only to birds. Pliny asserts it positively. Alibi volucris tantum ut Soraete vicino urbis tracta (6). It is therefore plain that when Servius called this mountain a place consecrated to Pluto, which he said was near a cave, which was mortal to men, he blended together what relates to the Hirpini, and what relates to the Hirpii. See Salmastus in Solinum, p. 85.

(6) Plin. lib. 2.
cap. 43. pag. 240.

If you have a mind to know what the antients say of the Hirpii you may soon be satisfied. The Hirpii were a few families that lived in the country of the Falisci near Rome, and who could walk upon fire without any hurt. This shew was seen every year on mount Soraete, the day when a solemn sacrifice was offered to Apollo. The Hirpii walked upon a pile set on fire without burning themselves, for which reason they were by a decree of the Senate dispensed from bearing arms, and from serving any burthenfome office. Haud procul Urbe Roma in Faliscorum agro familiae sunt paucae quæ vocantur Hirpi: hæc sacrificio annuo quod fit ad montem Soraetem Apollini, super ambustam ligni struem ambulantes non aduruntur, & ob id perpetuo Senatus consulto militiæ omniumque aliorum munerum vacationem habent (7). Solinus pretended to follow this account very exactly, and he did not take

(7) Plin. lib. 7.
cap. 2. pag. m.
10.

notice that he had altered a very considerable particular of it. He expressed himself so as to hint that the Hirpii passed through the Flames. Impune insulant ardentibus lignorum struibus, in honorem divinæ rei flammis parentibus (8). i. e. “ They leap upon the burning piles without any damage, the flames sparing them in honour of divine service.” And yet Pliny does not say this: he does even hint clearly enough, that they only walked over the burning coals. Nor can we doubt but this was all they did, since Varro pretended that they rubbed the soles of their feet with a certain salve. Consider also these words of Virgil, multa premimus vestigia pruna. i. e. “ We tread the kindled coals;” and the expressions of the Authors I am going to quote, and you will have no reason to doubt but Salmastus justly censured Solinus. Sed est Solinus: verba tantummodo curat, rerum securus, quas digerit, mira ubique ableptiæ incusandus (9). i. e. (9) Salmast. Excercitat. in Plin. pag. 86.

(8) Solin. cap. 2.

*Tum Soraete satum præstantem corpore & armis
Æquanim noscens, patrio cui ritus in arvo,
Cum pius arcitenens accensis gaudet aceruis,
Extæ ter innocuos late portare per ignes;
Sic in Apollinea semper vestigia pruna
Inviolata teras, victorque vaporis ad aras
Dona serenato referas solemnia Phæbo (10).*

(10) Silius Itali-
cus, lib. 5.

We have seen that the festival celebrated on mount Soraete, in which they who walked on the fire, acted their part so well, was sacred to Apollo; but we shall now see it consecrated to another Deity. Strabo observes (11) that there was at the foot of mount Soraete a city called Feronia. This was also the name of a Goddess, who was extremely revered in that place. There was an admirable sacrifice offered in the Lucus or Grove dedicated to this Goddess. Some men, whom the spirit of this Deity seized, walked bare footed on a heap of kindled coals, and did not receive the least hurt from it. Ἦς (Φερωνίας) τιμὸς ἴστυ ἐν τῷ τόπῳ θωρακιστὴν ἱεροποιῶν ἔχον· γυμνοὺς γὰρ ποσὶ διέ-ϊσταν ἀνδρακίων κ' σποδίων μεγάλῃν οἱ κατεχόμενοι ὑπὸ τῆς θεῖας τούτης ἀπαθείας. Ibi est lucus Feroniæ, in quo sacrificium perpetratur mirabile: correpti enim ejus numinis afflatus homines nudis pedibus prunarum ardentium struem illesi perambulant (12). There was every year a solemn meeting at that place, where the spectators were entertained with this shew. It is not much to the honour of the antients that they should be so little agreed amongst themselves, with regard to such particulars as could not but be publickly known.

(11) Strabo, lib.
5. pag. 156.

(12) Idem, ibid.

[C] There were anciently other festivals, on which the same shew was to be seen. There was at Caitabala in Cappadocia a Temple of Diana surnamed Parafisa. The Priestesses of this Temple walked bare-foot upon kindled coals without burning themselves. Strabo mentions it only upon an hear-tay. Ὅπου φασὶ τὰς ἱερίαις γυμνοὺς τοὺς ποσὶ δι' ἀνδρακίων βαδίζειν ἀπαθείας. Ubi ajunt sacrificas mulieres illesi pedibus per prunas ambulare (13). There have been Quacks in these latter ages who have done things much more surprising than all that is related of the Hirpii, and of these Priestesses. But to shew more evidently how much the antient abuses in religion agree with the modern, I shall relate what I heard the late Monsieur Fremont d'Ablandcourt say, who being a zealous Huguenot be-

(13) Idem, lib.
12. pag. 370.

(14) See the Journal des Savans, for the year 1677, pag. 54, and 222. of came, the Dutch edition.

HOBBS (THOMAS) one of the greatest genius's of the seventeenth Century, was born at Malmesbury in England, April the 5th 1588 [A]. He had made a great progress in the Languages [B], when he was sent at fourteen years of age to Oxford, where he studied for five years Aristotle's Philosophy. He afterwards went into the family of William Cavendish, who soon after had the title of Earl of Devonshire conferred upon him, and was Governor to his eldest son. He travelled into France and Italy with his pupil; and perceiving that he remembered little either of his Greek or Latin, and that the Philosophy of Aristotle, in which he had made a considerable progress, was despised by persons of the best sense, he applied himself intirely to polite literature upon his return to his own country. Thucydides appearing to him preferable to all the Greek Historians, he translated him into English, and published that translation in 1618, in order to shew the English, from the Athenian History, the disorders and confusions of a Democratical Government [C]. In 1629 he travelled into France as Governor to a young English Gentleman; came, during his stay at Lisbon, very well acquainted with the tricks which the Monks use to play. He told me that there is in Spain a certain convent (15), from whence there came every year a Monk who shut himself up in an hot oven, and continued there some hours with only a linnen garment about him. He comes out of the oven in the sight of a croud of people, who takes this for a very great miracle. It brings the Convent a very good income, so that it is worth their while to use a Monk little by little to endure the Heat. But I do not pretend to give an account of all the tricks there may be in this pretended miracle.

[A] Born at Malmesbury . . . April the 5th, 1588.] His mother being frighted at the rumours of the approach of the Spanish armada, was brought to bed of him before her time. It is very surprizing therefore, that he lived so long. Hobbes's father was a Minister (1).

[B] He had made a great progress in the languages.] Before he left Malmesbury school to go to the University of Oxford, he had translated into Latin verse the Medea of Euripides. Tantos autem jam adhuc in ludo literario degens in literatura tam Latina quam Græca progressus fecit, ut Euripidis Medeam simili metro Latinis versibus eleganter expresserit (2).

[C] The disorders and confusions of a Democratical Government.] I have known some men of parts, who were surprized, that in Kingdoms, in which the Prince's authority is unlimited, the instructors of youth are allowed to make use of the books of the antient Greeks and Romans, in which we find so many examples of the love of liberty, and so many anti-monarchical maxims. But this is not more surprizing than to see Republican States permit their Law-Professors to explain the Code and Digest, in which there are so many principles, which suppose the supreme and inviolable authority of the Emperor. Here we see two things, which seem equally surprizing, but in reality ought not to surprize any person; for omitting several reasons, which might be urged, may not we say, that the same books, which contain the poison with regard either to Monarchs, or Republics, contain likewise the antidote? If you see on one hand the great maxims of liberty, and the noble examples of courage, with which it has been maintained or recovered; you see on the other, faction, seditions, tumultuous humours, which have disturbed and at last ruined that infinite number of little States, which shewed themselves such zealous enemies of tyranny in antient Greece. Does not this picture seem to be a lesson very capable of disabusing those, who are terrified at the mere notion of a Monarchy? Hobbes thought so (3), since he published the translation of an Athenian Historian with this view. Turn the tables, and you will find, that this picture will be very proper to give an instruction different from the former, and to strengthen the horror against Monarchy: for whence comes it, will it be said, that the Greeks and Romans chose rather to be exposed to these confusions, than to live under a Monarchy? Did not this arise from the hard condition, to which tyrants had reduced them? And must not an evil be very grievous, insufferable, and deplorable, when people choose to deliver themselves from it at so dear a rate? It is certain, that the description, which History has left us of the conduct of several Monarchs, gives us horror, and makes our hair stand an end.

Do not object to me, that generally speaking more disorders have been occasioned by the conspiracies, which have put an end to tyranny, than there would have been by suffering it. Do not represent to me what I have said in the article of HIERO II (4). The Syracusians, who had enjoyed a prodigious happiness under the long reign of that Prince, immediately lost their patience under his successor, who governed in a tyrannical manner: They killed him in the very beginning of the second year of his reign; and soon after put to death the two daughters of Hiero, and his three grand-daughters. Of these five Ladies there were three, against whom no complaint had been made, and who had fled, as one may say, to the foot of the altar. Was not this removing one tyranny to establish a greater (5). Was Livy (6) in the wrong to remark upon this occasion, that the people are incapable of keeping within due bounds; humble even to baseness, when they obey, but insolent to the last degree, when they command? The massacre of these five Ladies was not the rash action of some private persons; it was commanded by the Senate and people of Syracuse, and this even while the memory of Hiero was still fresh among them; a Prince, whom they had loved so tenderly and justly. The injustice of their barbarous decree was so manifest, that they immediately perceived it; they revoked it; but this signified nothing; it was already executed. Tandem vulneribus confecta, cum omnia replerent sanguine, exanimis corruerunt, cædemque per se miserabilem, miserabiliorum casus fecit; quod paulo post nuntius venit, mutatis repente ad misericordiam animis, ne interficerentur. Ira deinde ex misericordia orta, quod adeo festinatum ad supplicium, neque locus penitendi aut regressus ab ira relictus esset. Itaque fremere multitudo (7). i. e. "At length being covered with wounds, and having filled all things near them with blood, they fell down dead; and this miserable slaughter was made much more miserable by this accident, that soon after a messenger came to stop the execution, the minds of the people being of a sudden changed to pity. Resentments afterwards arose from their pity, because the execution had been so much hastened, and no room had been left to prevent the effects of their passion. Upon this the multitude began to murmur." The factions were not extinguished by the intire extirpation of the Royal Family; they increased daily, and in a short time overturned the liberty and sovereignty of the country. They unseasonably exposed Syracuse to the resentments of the Romans, who besieged and subdued it. Silius Italicus describes very well the confusion, into which that city fell, after the tyrant Hieronymus and his relations were killed. It was a confusion from which the Romans knew how to draw a famous conquest. The discord of the city encouraged them to besiege it.

*Sævos namque pati fastus, juvenemque cruento
Flagramtem luxu, & miscentem turpia duris;
Haud ultra faciles, quos ira metusque coquebat
Jurati obruncant, nec jam modus ensibus, addunt
Fæmineam cædem, atque insontum raptâ sororum
Corpora prosternunt ferro, nova sævit in armis
Libertas, jacetque jugum; pars Punica castra,
Pars Italos & nota volunt: nec turba furentum
Desit, quæ neutri sociari fœdere malit* (8).

(8) Sil. Ital. lib. 14. pag. m. 589. i. e. "Not

(15) He told me the name of the place, but I have forgot it.

(1) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 32.

(2) Ibid. pag. 33.

(3) See the remark [O] of the article PERICLES.

(4) Remark [E].

(5) Ne tyrannos ulciscendo, quæ adissent scelera ipsi imitarentur. T. Livius, lib. 24. pag. 393. This is what Heracles, the daughter of Hiero represented to her murderers.

(6) See his words above citation (21) of the article of HIERO 11.

(7) T. Livius, lib. 24. cap. 26.

(a) His name was Gervas Clifton. The father of his former pupil died in 1626, and his pupil in 1628.

Gentleman (a); and applied himself to the study of the Mathematics during that journey [D]. In 1631 he was employed by the Countess of Devonshire (b), to be tutor to her son, who was then thirteen years old, and travelled with him three years after into France and Italy. During his stay at Paris he applied himself to the study of Natural Philosophy, and especially to the enquiry into the causes of the sensitive operations of Animals. He discoursed with Father Marfenne daily upon this point. He was recalled to England in 1637; but foreseeing the civil war, upon reflecting on what passed during the first session of the Parliament of 1640, he went to Paris to seek an agreeable retreat there, in order to philosophize quietly with Father Marfenne, Gassendi, and some other great men. He wrote there his book de Cive [E], of which he published but a few

(b) Widow of the Earl of Devonshire, the father of his former pupil.

f. e. "Not being any longer capable of bearing the haughty, cruel, and vitious conduct of the young King, and being inspired by indignation and fear, they kill him; and do not stop there, but put to death the innocent women of his family. Liberty, new to them, rages in arms, and shakes off the yoke. Part of the people incline to the Carthaginians, and part to the Romans, who were well known to them; while others, possessed with the rage of faction, are averse to the alliance of both nations."

Represent all this as long as you please, you will not persuade those, who are prejudiced against Monarchy: they will answer you, that from the very consideration, that the disorders of it cannot be remedied but by such shocking miseries, you ought to conclude, that it is a great evil.

[D] Applied himself to the Mathematics during that journey.] It is pity that he stayed so long before he applied himself to it (9): he was above forty years of age, when he began that study; and this was the reason why he could not perfect himself in it so much as was necessary to avoid giving an advantage to his Critics. His fate was like that of Scaliger. For the rest, he knew perfectly well why Mathematics ought to be studied: it was not to know the properties of angles, or numbers, or lines, or surfaces; but in order to habituate the mind to a solid method of reasoning and proving. Euclidi operam dare cepit, non tam demonstrationum materia allectus, quam perspicuitate, certitudine, & indivisa rationem serie delectatus. Non enim Mathematicas artes admiratus est, vir perspicacissimus, ob laterum & angulorum affectiones, aut numerorum, linearum, superficiem, corporumve mutuas inter se proportiones (de homogeneis intelligo quantitibus) subtiliter indicatas; quippe istiusmodi omnia à communi vita remotiora facile animadvertit; licet ad praxin relata usus non adeo contemnendi; sed quod metodo ipsis propria intellectus ad rerum cognitionem optime duceretur, atque difficilia inveniendi, vera afferendi, falsa redarguendi certissima ratione imbueretur (10). i. e. "He began to apply himself to Euclid, not so much induced to it by the subject of the demonstrations, as delighted with the perspicuity, certainty, and uninterrupted series of the reasoning. For this most sagacious man did not admire the science of Mathematics on account of the subtle demonstrations of the properties and mutual relations of sides and angles, or numbers, lines, surfaces, or bodies (I mean of homogeneous quantities) since he readily saw, that all these things were remote from the uses of common life, though when reduced to practice, of no small advantage; but because by the method peculiar to it the understanding is best led to the knowledge of things, and supplied with the most certain means of discovering difficult truths, proving what is true, and refuting what is false."

[E] He wrote at Paris his book De Cive.] He made one edition of a small number of copies at Paris 1642. He revised it soon after, and enlarged it in the manner, in which this book appeared in the Amsterdam edition of 1647. It was Sorbier, who procured this second edition. He did more than this, for he translated it into French, and published it in that language (11). Hobbes raised himself a great many enemies by this work; but he obliged the most intelligent persons to own, that no writer had ever penetrated so far into the grounds of politics. I do not doubt, but that he has carried many things too far; this is common with those, who write in order to attack a party, against which they have conceived a great aversion. Hobbes was exasperated against the principles of the Parliamentarians (12): their conduct was the reason of his living out of his own country, and he was informed every day in the place of his exile, that their rebellion triumphed over the royal authority. He went over to the contrary extreme; he taught, that the authority of Kings ought to be unlimited; and that in particular the externals of religion, as the most fruitful source of civil wars, ought to depend upon their will. There are some, who think, that if we consider only the theory, his system is very well connected, and very agreeable to the ideas, which may be formed of a state well secured against tumults. But because the most just notions are subject to a thousand inconveniences, when they come to be reduced to practice, that is, when they are set against an horrible mass of passions, which reign among mankind, it is not difficult to perceive clearly the defects of our author's political system. He might answer, that the opposite system includes, even in the theory, a necessary principle of confusion and rebellion. However that be, it is said, that the love of his country inspired him with the design of this book, and that his view was to rectify the false principles of the nation which produced there an horrible contempt of the regal authority. Grassante interim per Angliam civili bello, Hobbes pro summo in patriam amore, quod bonum & fidelem subditum maxime decuit; populares suos sanioribus quam quæ hactenus obtinuerant principiis imbueret, exacerbatos hominum animos ad pacis & concordie rationes revocare, & in summæ potestatis obsequium additiores præstare annis est. Quare reliquis posthabitis studiis, quantum ipsi suppetiit temporis Politicæ scientiæ impendens, Librum de Cive (cujus pauca duntaxat Exemplaria Parisiis 1642 evulgaverat) revisit, & notis utilibus adauxit, in quo subditorum contra summum imperatorem conjurationes rebellionisque, & immanes illas de principe regni vitæque exeundo opiniones penitus damnavit: potestati Civili Jura ab Ecclesiasticis caliginosorum temporum beneficio præcepta restituit, & diram secliariorum hydræ, effrænem nempe conscientiæ libertatem, heroico ausu perdomuit (15). i. e. "While the civil war was

(12) Tum pro suo in Regem officio atque obsequio, tum pro decumano quo semper in Democraticis odio laboravit, libellum scripsit juris regni afferendi gratia, qui postea in librum de Cive, & tandem in Leviathan extitit. Vita Hobbesii, pag. 45.

(9) Dolendum nonbile hoc ingenium eodem quo & magnum Scaligerum infortunio laborasse, quod Mathematicis studiis, serius paulo animum adiecit. Vita Hobbesii, pag. 40.

(10) Ibid. pag. 39.

(11) At Amsterdam 1679.

(13) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 45.
 "While the civil war was raging over England, Hobbes, out of the great regard to his country becoming a good and faithful subject, endeavoured to infuse into his countrymen sounder principles, than had before prevailed among them, to recall their minds, which had been sown and exasperated, to the methods of peace and concord, and to bring them to a greater submission to the supreme authority. Laying aside therefore other studies, he spent all his leisure hours in that of politics, and revised his book de Cive (of which he had published a few copies at Paris in 1642) and enlarged it with useful notes; in which book he condemned the conspiracies and rebellions of subjects against the supreme powers, and all these shocking opinions with regard to the deposing of Kings, and putting them to death; restoring to the civil power the rights taken from them by the Ecclesiastics in the dark ages, and heroically subduing that dreadful hydra of the sectaries, namely, a boundless liberty of conscience." The reader I am sure, will not be displeased to see the judgment of Des Cartes upon this work of Hobbes. "I am opinion, says he (14), that the author of the book de Cive is the same, who wrote the third objections against my his Letters, pag. 104. quoted by Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 174.
 "I think him a much greater master of morality than of Metaphysics or Natural Philosophy; though I can by no means approve of his principles or maxims, which are very bad and very dangerous, because they suppose all men to be wicked, or give them occasion to be so. His whole design is to write in favour of monarchy; which might

(14) Tom. 3 of his Letters, pag. 104. quoted by Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 174.

(15) He was not mistaken.

few copies in 1642. He taught Mathematics to the Prince of Wales, who had been obliged to retire to France, and spent all his leisure time in composing his Leviathan [F], which he caused to be published in England in 1651. He still resided at Paris. Tho' he had given proofs of his faith according to the rites of the Church of England [G], yet he was rendered obnoxious to the Episcopal party, and this was carried so far, that he was ordered not to come near the King any more (c). This was the reason of his returning to England, where he lived but in an obscure manner, considering his great merit, in the

(c) See the remark [F].

" might be done to more advantage than he has done; upon maxims more virtuous and solid. He wrote likewise greatly to the disadvantage of the Church and Roman Catholic religion; so that if he is not particularly supported by some powerful interest, I do not see how he can escape having his book censured." Des Cartes, was in the right to disapprove of the supposition that all men are wicked; and this puts me in mind, that Montagne, though he knew so well the defects of mankind, was displeas'd, that Guicciardini imputes to bad motives all the actions related in his History (16). It is certain, that there are some, who act upon the principles of virtue, and out of a desire of a good reputation; and that the greatest part of mankind are only moderately wicked. This mediocrity, I own, is sufficient to render the course of human affairs full of iniquity, and marked almost throughout with traces of the corruption of the human heart; but it would be much worse (17), if the greatest part of mankind were not capable of restraining upon many occasions their bad inclinations through fear of disgrace, or hope of praise. Now this is a proof that the corruption is not carried to the highest pitch. I do not consider here the good effects of true religion; I consider man in general.

(16) See the remark [E] of the article GUICCIARDINI.

(17) The reason why innocence is not oppressed upon many occasions, is the mediocrity, which I am speaking of. See the remark [A] of the article EDWARD IV towards the end.

POLITICAL ideas found to be defective in practice.

With regard to the inconveniences which may arise from the suppositions of Hobbes put in practice, I say again, that we must not attack them upon that foot; for has not the opposite system in practice many great inconveniences? Do what you please, raise systems better than Plato's republick, than Sir Thomas More's Utopia, or Campanella's Commonwealth of the Sun, &c. all these fine ideas will be found defective when they come to be reduced to practice. The passions of men, which spring from one another in a prodigious variety, will soon destroy the hopes which may be conceived from these beautiful Systems. See what happens when Mathematicians endeavour to apply to matter their speculations concerning points and lines. They do whatever they please with their lines and superficies; these are mere ideas of the mind, and suffer themselves to be divested as much as we think proper of their dimensions; and for this reason we can demonstrate the finest things in the world concerning the nature of a circle, and the infinite divisibility of matter. But all this fails when we apply it to matter which exists out of our minds, and is hard and impenetrable. Here is an image of the human passions, compared with the speculations of a man, who forms ideas of a perfect government. You will find a very strong criticism of Hobbes's Political System in the Author whom I quote (18).

(18) Galeottus Galatius Karlsruergius, apud Deckherum, de Scriptis Adversariis, pag. 328.

(19) Hobbius tanquam partibus regis minus adiectum, tum ut morum impiorumque in religione opinionum auctorem criminarentur. Vita Hobbesii, pag. 61.

(20) Ibid. pag. 62.

[F] He spent all his leisure hours in writing his Leviathan.] He means the body politic under the name of this beast. The Divines of the Church of England, who attended King Charles II in France, exclaimed vehemently against this Book, and said, that it contained a great many impious assertions, and that the Author was not of the Royal Party (19). Their complaints were regarded. Hobbes received orders not to come any more to court; and as he had extremely provoked the Papists, he thought it not safe to continue in France, since he was deprived of the King of England's protection. Hoc tanto presidio orbatus Hobbius, Romanæ Ecclesiæ, Spirituales Monarchiæ satellitum metu correptus est, quorum odium implacabile sese merito incurrisse senserat, ob detestatas in Leviathane Ecclesiasticorum technas, regni tenebrarum dolos, Pontificis Romani potestatem malis artibus occupatam, quæ in civilis Potestatis jura involando, quæ simplici ac imperitæ plebeculæ sanctis præstigiis illudendo; quare Parisiis se minus tutum judicans, mediâ Hyemis tempestate aufugiens, in patriam se contulit (20). i. e. "Hobbes being deprived of this important protection, began to grow fearful of the adherents to the Church of Rome, that spiritual monarchy, whose implacable hatred he knew that he had justly incurred, because in his Leviathan he had detected the Artifices of the Ecclesiasticks, and the frauds of the kingdom of darkness, and exposed the power of the Pope, which had been raised by unjust methods, by invading the rights of the civil power, and imposing upon the simple and ignorant multitude by pious frauds. Upon this account thinking himself not safe at Paris, in the midst of the winter he retired from thence into his own country." He translated his Leviathan into Latin, and published it with an Appendix in 1668 (21), ten years after it was printed in Low-Dutch. The substance of this book is, that without peace there is no security in a state, and that peace cannot subsist without command, nor command without arms; and that arms are of no use, if they are not put into the hands of one person; and that the terror of arms cannot incline to peace those persons who are urged to war by an evil more terrible than death itself, viz. dissensions concerning things necessary to salvation. Ejus autem summa hæc fuit, sine Pace impossibilem esse incolumitatem, sine imperio Pacem, sine Armis Imperium, sine opibus in unam manum collatis nihil valere Arma, neque metu Armorum quicquam ad pacem profici posse in illis, quos ad pugnandum concitat malum morte magis formidandum; nempe dum consensus non fit de iis rebus, quæ ad salutem æternam necessariae creduntur, pacem inter civis non posse esse diuturnam (22). The Leviathan has been very much written against, especially in England (23).

(21) At Amsterdam for John Bleauw, with his other Philosophical Works, in two volumes in 4to. He could not procure a permission in England to print them there. Ibid. pag. 70.

(22) The catalogue of the writings published against the Leviathan and other works of Hobbes, is to be met with at the end of his Life.

[G] He had given proofs of his faith according to the rites of the Church of England.] Being very sick near Paris, he had a visit from Father Marsenne, who had been advised not to suffer him to die out of the Pale of the Church. This good Father late by the sick man, and after the usual preambles of consolation, began to discourse upon the power of the Church of Rome to forgive Sins. Father, answered Mr. Hobbes, I have examined a long time ago all these points; I should be sorry to dispute now; you can entertain me in a more agreeable manner. When did you see Mr. Gassendi? The honest Monk saw well enough what he meant, and turned the conversation to other subjects (24). Dr. Cofins (25) a few days after offered to pray with Hobbes, who consented to it upon condition that he made use of the prayers of the Church of England (26). After prayers he received the Sacrament. Cum non amplius cuicumque religio est factum faciendi locus, eo momento se Religioni patriis legibus stabilitæ addidissimum ostendit, et precibus juxta ritum Anglicanæ ritus præmissis supremum Viaticum recepit (27). Upon his return to England in 1651, he found the Churches seized by the rebels, as he said, who had no Liturgy, and he was three months without knowing with whom to communicate. Concionantes quidem invenit in Ecclesiis, sed seditiosos; etiam preces extemporarias, et illas audaces, et nonnunquam blasphemias, Symbolum autem fidei nullum, Decalogum nullum; adeo ut per tres primos menses non inveniret quibuscum in sacris communicare potuerit (28). i. e. "He found Preachers indeed in the Churches, but rebels; and extempore prayers, but presumptuous and sometimes blasphemous; no creed nor decalogue; so that for the three first months he could not find with whom to communicate." But at the end of three months he was carried to an assembly, where the Sacrament was administered according to the Church of England, and he communicated there. The author of his life remarks, that it was an evidence of Hobbes's attachment to the Episcopal party and his sincere belief of the Christian religion, since at that time no person was obliged to adhere to any particular communion. Alterum signum erat non modo hominis partium Episcopatum, sed etiam Christiani sinceri; nam illo tempore ad Ecclesiam quamcumque legibus aut metu cogebatur non (29).

(24) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 20.

(25) He was afterwards Bishop of Durham.

(26) Obvult se precibus præventis reddidisset, ita (inquit) si præcibus præventis juxta ritum Ecclesiæ nostræ.

(27) Ibid. pag.

(28) Ibid. pag.

(29) Ibid.

the Earl of Devonshire's house [H]. He gained this advantage by his obscure condition, that he had more leisure to compose his book de Corpore, and some others [I]. He received great marks of respect from King Charles II at the Restoration in 1660 [K]. From that time till his death he applied himself to his studies, and to oppose the attacks of his adversaries, who were very numerous. He retained the use of his senses till his last sickness [L], tho' he was above ninety one years old. His long life was always that of a perfectly honest man. He was a lover of his country, he was faithful to his King, a good friend, charitable, and obliging. However he was reckoned an Atheist; but the writers of his life maintain, that he had very orthodox notions concerning the nature of God [M]. It was said likewise that he was fearful of spectres and demons.

[H] He lived in a very obscure manner at the Earl of Devonshire's house. It was not for want of powerful friends: but as he had great enemies, all that could be done for him was to secure him from being oppressed. So that his situation was the effect of an equilibrium between his friends and enemies (30). He spent the remainder of his life with the Earl of Devonshire.

(30) Stantem inter amicos & inimicos quasi in aequilibrio, fecerunt illi ne ob doctriam opprimeretur, bi ne augeretur. Vita Hobbesii, pag. 22.

[I] To compose his book de Corpore, and some others. This book was printed at London in 1655 under the title of Elementorum Philosophiæ sectio prima de Corpore. The year following Hobbes published Prælectiones sex ad Professores Savilianas. His book de Homine, sive Elementorum Philosophiæ sectio secunda, was printed at London in 1658. His Quæstiones de Libertate, Necessitate, & Casu, contra Doctorem Bramballum Episcopum Derriensem, were printed in the same city in 1656. He had a dispute upon the same subject with Dr. Benjamin Laney Bishop of Ely, which he did not publish till 1676 (31). Dr. Wallis, Professor of Mathematics at Oxford, having published his Elenchus Geometriæ Hobbianæ in 1655, it occasioned a dispute which lasted till Hobbes's death, and in which a great many reproachful terms were made use of. Diuturni illius belli Mathematici classicum cecinit, quod acerrimo Marte, adhibitis quadra & circino, intervolantibus nonnunquam acutissimis convitiarum telis, utrinque gestum, vicennium & amplius perduravit, nec tandem nisi Hobbianæ morte conquievit (32). i. e. "He sounded the charge to that long mathematical war, which was carried on on both sides with great resolution, with square and compass, and sometimes great volleys of the sharpest reproaches, and continued above ten years, and was not ended till the death of Hobbes." Sorbieri mentions this dispute (33).

(31) Ibid. pag. 59.

(32) Ibid. pag. 64, 65.

(33) Sorbieri, Relation d'Ang. pag. 78. edit. de Hollande.

(34) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 66.

(35) Ibid. pag. 28. and 103. See Sorbieri, Relation d'Anglet. pag. 79.

(36) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 53.

(37) Sorbieri, pag. 79.

(38) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 98, 99.

(39) Ibid. pag. 99.

[K] He received great marks of respect from King Charles II. Hobbes left the country, and came to London as soon as he heard of the King's arrival. His Majesty passed in his coach by the house where Hobbes lodged, saw him, and sent for him. He gave him his hand to kiss, and enquired of him concerning his condition and health. Some time after he gave him a particular audience, assured him of his affection, and promised him an easy access (34). He ordered an excellent painter to draw Hobbes's picture, which he placed in his own closet (35). But the most substantial mark of his affection was, that he gave Hobbes an annual pension (36) of an hundred Jacobus's (37).

[L] He retained his senses till his last sickness. He was able not only to prosecute the study of the Mathematics, after he was above eighty six years of age, but even to write long poems. Quod autem inter rara felicitatis exempla numerandum est, summo ingenii vigore & sensibus integris ad obitum usque in Philosophia & Mathesi se assidue exercitavit, & quod magis mirum, Poësin exercuit, quâ propriis animi conceptibus exprimendis, quâ aliorum transferendis (38). i. e. "But what is to be ranked among the rare instances of happiness, he enjoyed the utmost vigour of his mind, and his senses intire till his death, daily cultivating the study of Philosophy and Mathematics, and, what is more surprizing, exercised his talent in Poetry, both in expressing his own thoughts, and translating those of others." He translated into English verse some books of the Odyssey in 1674; and because this essay met with the approbation of the learned, he published a like version of the Iliad and the whole Odyssey not long after, with a Dissertation upon the Excellencies of Heroic Poetry (39).

[M] The writers of his life maintain, that he had very orthodox notions concerning the Nature of God.

Of all the moral virtues there was only that of religion, which was a point in dispute with regard to Hobbes. He was frank (40), civil, communicative of what he knew (41), a good friend, a good relation, charitable to the poor (42), a strict observer of justice (43), and never troubled himself about amassing of wealth (44). This last quality is a favourable prejudice for the goodness of his life; for there is no source of more bad actions than that of avarice. So that when persons knew Hobbes, they had no occasion to ask whether he esteemed and loved virtue; but one might have been tempted to ask him this question:

Hæus age, responde, minimum est quod scire laboro, De Jove quid sentis (45)?

"But pray answer me a small question; what are your sentiments concerning Jove?"

The answer which he might have made sincerely, if we believe the writers of this life, would have been, that there is but one God, who is the origin of all things, and that we ought not to circumscribe him within the compass of our narrow reason. Deum agnovit, cumque rerum omnium originem, intra angustos tamen humanæ rationis cancellos nullatenus circumscribendum (46). He would have added, that he embraced Christianity as he found it established in England by the Laws; Religionem Christianam quatenus in Ecclesiâ Anglicana, rejectis superstitionis ineptiis, regni legibus stabilitur, ex animo amplexus est (47); but that he had an aversion to the disputations of Divines; that he chiefly esteemed what tends to the practice of piety and good manners; and that he used to blame those Priests, who vitiated the simplicity of Religion by the mixture either of a superstitious worship, or a great many vain and profane speculations. Quicquid autem ad Pietatis exercitia, aut bonos mores conferret, plurimum fecit. Sanctius illi, & reverentius visum, de Deo credere quam scire. Sacerdotes interim inculpare solitus est, qui Christianam Religionem absolutam ac simplicem, vel superstitione macularent, vel inanibus interdum profanis speculationibus implicarent (48). They conclude, that those who accused him of Atheism, were notorious slanderers, who could not alledge any other pretence than this, that he had rejected a great many scholastic doctrines, according to which certain attributes were ascribed to God, the model of which is taken from our narrow genius. Quare fortiter calumniati sunt, qui ipsum Atheismi reum detulerunt; quod inde forsitan profectum quia Scholasticorum aliorumque iste de grege morem rejecerat, qui otiosi in Museis suis sedentes, juxta imbecilem ingenii sui captum, Naturæ Divinæ incomperita affingunt attributa (49). It is certain that there is no accusation which has been so much abused as that of atheism. An infinite number of little minds or malicious persons cast it upon all those who confine their assertions within the great and sublime truths of solid metaphysics, and the general doctrines of the Scriptures. They would oblige them moreover to adopt all the particular Articles which they are used to propose a thousand times to the people. All who dare leave this road are irreligious persons and free-thinkers, if we believe certain Divines. It was thus Monconys fell under this scandalous imputation. He disputed sometimes very freely against those, who lessened the Majesty of God by the conduct which they ascribed to him, and by the weak reasons which they made use of; and they did him the injustice to treat him as a Libertine, though he was possessed of the most sublime idea imaginable of God. Read the following passage. "That agreeable man-

(40) Ibid. pag. 108.

(41) Ibid. pag. 111.

(42) Ibid. pag. 108.

(43) Justitia erat cum scientissimus. Ibid. pag. 30.

(44) Cum esset pecunie negligensissimus. Ibid.

(45) Perfius, Sat. 2. ver. 17.

(46) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 105.

(47) Ibid. pag. 106.

(48) Ibid. pag. 107.

(49) Ibid.

(d) *Stato ad-hoc intra juventutis terminos constante (licet ve-rum fateri) nec
abstemius fuit,
nec purioroc.
Vita Hobbesii,
pag. 104.*

demons [N]. They assert this to be a fable. They own, that in his youth he was a little addicted to wine and women (d); but that however he chose to live a Bachelor, that he might not be diverted from the study of Philosophy. He had thought much more than he had read [O], and never troubled himself about a great Library. He died December the 4th 1679 at the Earl of Devonshire's house, after a sickness of six weeks (e).

(e) Taken from his L. f., printed in 1682.

ner, in which we see him sometimes contradict certain men of narrow minds, who weaken by their arguments the truths which they would establish, made such prejudiced people mistake this instance of his openness and candour for a criminal liberty. But his solid virtue and sincere piety shone every where, and left marks of them to be found in these voyages. In his last sickness he owned to one of his friends, that he had always preserved in his heart a profound submission and infinite regard towards the Deity, of whom he had an idea more sublime than any thing which mankind have conceived of him. When he was at Alexandria, at a time, when he seemed to refuse nothing to satisfy his curiosity, being one night alone upon the terrasses, which serve as a roof to the houses in the East, he found himself of a sudden so possessed with a sensible knowledge of the Deity, that he spent part of that night with inexpressible comfort in continued adorations of the Principle of all Beings (50).

[N] It is said likewise, that he was fearful of spectres and demons. His friends have treated this as a mere fable. Nec minus falso à nonnullis infimulatus est, tanquam solitudinem fugeret, spectra metuens & phantasmata, vana sultorum terroculamenta, quæ Philosophiæ suæ lumine dissipaverat (51). i. e. "Nor was he less falsely charged by some with avoiding to be alone, out of fear of spectres and apparitions, the vain terrors of the ignorant, but which he had driven away by the light of his Philosophy." But it seems they do not deny, that he durst not be alone; they only intimate that it was because he was apprehensive of assassins. If his Philosophy exempted him from the other fear, and not from this, it did not prevent him from being unhappy; one might apply to him a thought of Horace:

*Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula, sagas,
Nocturnos lemures, portentaque Theßala rides?*

Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una (52)?

"Do you laugh at dreams, the terrors of Magic, miracles, witches, nightly apparitions, and Theßalian portents? . . . What are you the better for being delivered from one thorn out of a great many?"

To remark this by the by, his philosophical principles were not at all proper to remove the fear of apparitions of spirits; for to reason consequentially, there are no Philosophers, who have a less right to reject Magic and Sorcery, than those, who deny the existence of God. But, it is said, Hobbes did not believe the existence of spirits. Say rather, that he did not believe any substances distinct from matter. Now as this did not hinder him from believing, that there were a great many substances, which design and do harm or good to others, he might and ought to believe that there are some beings in the air or elsewhere as capable of doing mischief, as the corpuscles, which, as he affirmed, form all our thoughts in the brain. How came these corpuscles to have more knowledge of the means of doing harm, than those other beings? And what reason is there to prove, that these other beings know not the manner of acting upon our brain, in order to make us see a spectre?

Let us view the point in another light. A man would be not only rash, but even very extravagant, if he were to attempt to maintain, that there was a man, who imagined, that he saw an apparition; and I do not believe that the most obstinate and extravagant unbeliever ever asserted this. All that they do is reduced to this, that those persons, who have thought that they saw the apparition of spirits, had their imaginations disturbed. It is confessed then that there are certain parts of the brain, which being affected in such or such a manner, excite the image of an object, which does not really exist without us, and occasion a man, whose brain is thus modified, to think he sees at two paces distance from him a frightful spectre, a fury, a phantom threatening. Such things happen in the head of the most incredulous, either while they sleep, or labour under a most violent fever. Will they venture to maintain after this, that it is impossible for a man, who is awake, and is not in a delirium, to receive in certain parts of the brain an impression very like that, which according to the laws of nature is connected with the appearance of a phantom? If they are obliged to own the possibility of this, they cannot promise that a spectre never will appear before them, that is to say, that when they are awake they shall think they see either a man or a beast, when they are alone in a chamber. Hobbes might therefore imagine, that a certain combination of atoms agitated in his brain, would expose him to such a vision, though he was persuaded that no angel nor soul of a dead person was concerned in it. He was extremely timorous, and consequently he had reason to distrust his imagination, when he was alone in a chamber in the night; for in spite of him, the remembrance of what he had read and heard concerning the apparitions of spirits, would revive, though he was not persuaded, that these things were real. These images, joined to his timorous disposition, might play him a bad trick. And it is very certain, that a man of the same incredulity with himself, but of greater courage, would be amazed, if he should think he saw any person, whom he knew to be dead, enter his chamber. These apparitions in a dream are frequent, whether we believe the immortality of the soul or not. Suppose, that they should happen once to an incredulous man awake, as they often do when he is asleep, we may conceive, that he would be afraid, though he should have a great deal of courage. For a much stronger reason therefore may we believe, that Hobbes would have been greatly terrified.

[O] He had thought much more than he read It is frankly owned in his Life, that for a man who had lived so long, his reading was very inconsiderable. He used to say, that if he had spent as much time in reading as other men of learning, he should have been as ignorant as they. Quin & illud sæpe dicere solitus est, quod si tantum libris incubisset, quantum alii à Literatis vulgo faciunt, eadem cum illis ignorantia laborasset (53). He considered also another thing, which led him not to regard much a large library; which was, that most books are but extracts and copies from others. Leßio ejus pro tanto ætatis decursu non magna; Authores versabat paucos, sed tamen optimos. Homerus. Virgilius, Thucydides, Euclides, illi in deliciis erant. Ingentem Librorum suppellestem, qua superbiunt Bibliothecæ, non magnificat, cum Mortales plerumque pecorum ritu antecedentium insistentes vestigiis, vix extra tritas calles, & semitas ab ipsis quorum Tutela & Regimini subsunt, præstitutas, evagari audeant (54). i. e. "His reading, for so long a life, was not considerable. He read few authors, but those the best. He was greatly delighted with Homer, Virgil, Thucydides, and Euclid. He did not value a vast number of books, which make a shew in libraries, since mankind, like cattle, commonly follow the steps of those, who go before, and scarce ever ventured to deviate from the beaten paths, which are chalked out to them by those, who are their guides."

(50) Preface to Voyages de Monsieur, pag. 7.

(51) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 106.

(52) Hor. Epist. 2. lib. 2. pag. 208.

(53) Vita Hobbesii, pag. 112.

(54) Idem, ibid.

☞ HOBBS (THOMAS). We shall add to Mr. Bayle's article of this Philosopher a catalogue

VOL. VI.

B b b

(a) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendish, p. 107, & seqq. subjoined to the Doctor's Funeral Sermon on William Duke of Devonshire, printed at London 1708 in fol.

a catalogue of his works [A], and some particulars omitted by that writer. Dr. White Kennet informs us (a), that while Mr. Hobbes lived in the Earl of Devonshire's family, his professed rule was to dedicate the morning to his health, and the afternoon to his studies. And therefore at his first rising he walked out and climbed any hill within his reach; or if the weather was not dry, he fatigued himself within doors by some exercise or other to be in a sweat, recommending that practice upon this opinion, that an old man had more moisture than heat, and therefore by such motion heat was to be acquired, and moisture expelled. After this he took a comfortable breakfast, and then went round the lodgings

[A] A catalogue of his Works.] They are as follow. I. He translated into English The History of the Grecian war by Thucydides, London 1628 and 1676 in fol. and since reprinted in two volumes in 8vo. II. De Mirabilibus Pecci, a Latin Poem printed at London 1636 in 8vo. Secunda editio, Londini 1666 in 4to. It was translated into English by a person of quality, and the Translation published with the original at London 1678 in 8vo. III. Elementa Philosophica seu Politica de Cive, id est, de Vita civili & politica prudenter instituenda: Paris 1642 in 4to. Mr. Hobbes printed but a few copies of this Book, and revised it afterwards, and made several additions to it, with which improvements it was printed by Elsevir at Amsterdam 1647 in 120, under the direction of Monsieur Sorbier, who published a French Translation of it under this title: Elemens Philosophiques du Citoyen. Traité de Politique, ou les Fondemens de la Societé Civile decouvert par Thomas Hobbes, & traduits en François par un de ses Amis, printed by Bleau at Amsterdam 1649 in 8vo. There have been since that time several editions of the Latin text. Dr. John Bramhall, Bishop of Derry in Ireland, informs us (1), that ten years before, he had given Mr. Hobbes "about sixty exceptions, one half of them political, the other half theological, to that book, and every exception justified by a number of reasons, to which he never yet vouchsafed any answer." Gassendus in a Letter to Sorbier tells us, that our Author's book de Cive deserves to be read by all, who would have a deep insight into the subject. Pufendorf (2) observes that he had been much obliged to Mr. Hobbes, whose Hypothesis in this book, though it favours a little of irreligion, is in other respects sufficiently ingenious and sound. Neque parum debere nos profiteri Thomæ Hobbes, cujus Hypothesis in Libro de Cive, est quid profani sapiat, tamen cætera satis arguta & sana. Conringius (3) accuses our Author of vanity for boasting, that civil Philosophy was not older than his book de Cive, whereas there is nothing good in it which was not always known; and he remarks, that the most absurd consequences must flow from his shocking principles that mankind are not naturally inclined to society, but to discord and war. Anglus Hobbes libro Elementorum Philosophicorum de Cive edito non dubitavit hinc verbis gloriari, Physica res novitia est, sed Philosophiæ Civilis multo adhuc magis, ut quæ antiquior non sit libro quem de Cive scripsit. Insano profecto fastu. Satis autem apertum est in illis quidem de Cive Elementis nihil esse bonum, quod non ob omni retro memoriâ fuerit notum. Ne quidem illud autem potuisset superesse, si præjudicii defectu vidisset Hobbes quam multum alia deduci debeant ex illo horribili principio, natura inter homines non societatem, sed discordiam institutam esse; & verò illo posito omnis societas humana contra naturæ fuerit institutum. Quo asserto nescio num quid excogitari possit absurdum magis & improbum. IV. An Answer to Sir William Davenant's Epistle or Preface to Gondibert, Paris 1650 in 12mo, and afterwards printed with Gondibert. Mr. Hobbes's answer is dated at Paris January 10th 1650. V. Humane Nature: or the fundamental Elements of Policy; being a discovery of the faculties, acts, and passions of the soul of man, from their original causes, according to such philosophical principles as are not commonly known or asserted. By Tho. Hobbes of Malmesbury, London 1650 in 12mo. In the Epistle Dedicatory of our Author to William Earl of Newcastle, dated May 9th 1640, he observes, that "from the principal parts of nature, reason and passion, have proceeded two kinds of learning, mathematical and dogmatical. The former is free from controversy and dispute, because it consisteth in comparing figure and motion only; in which things Truth and the Interest of Men oppose not each other. But in the other there is

(1) Preface to his book intitled, A Defence of true Liberty from antecessent and extrinsecall Necessity, edit. London 1655 in 8vo.

(2) In the Preface to his Elementa Jurisprudentiæ Universaliæ.

(3) De Civili Prudentiâ, cap. 14.

"nothing indisputable, because it compareth men, and meddleth with their right and profit; in which as oft as reason is against a man, so oft will a man be against reason. And from hence it cometh, that they who have written of justice and policy in general, do all invade each other and themselves with contradictions. To reduce this doctrine to the rules and infallibility of reason, there is no way, but first to put such principles down for a foundation, as passion not mistrusting may not seek to displace; and afterwards to build thereon the truth of cases in the law of nature, (which hitherto have been built in the air,) by degrees, till the whole have been inexpugnable. Now, my Lord, the principles fit for such a foundation are those which heretofore I have acquainted your Lordship withal in private discourse, and which by your command I have here put into a method. To examine cases thereby between Sovereign and Sovereign, or between Sovereign and Subject, I leave to them that shall find leisure and encouragement thereto. For my part, my Lord, I present this to your Lordship for the true and only foundation of such science. For the stile, it is therefore the worse, because, whilst I was writing, I consulted more with Logic than with Rhetoric: but for the doctrine, it is not slightly proved, and the conclusions thereof of such nature, as, for want of them, government and peace have been nothing else to this day but mutual fears; and it would be an incomparable benefit to the commonwealth, that every one held the opinion concerning Law and Policy here delivered." Next to the Dedication follows an Epistle to the Reader under the name of F. B. i. e. Francis Bowman the bookseller, but said to be written by Seth Ward, afterwards Bishop of Sarum (4). In this Epistle we are informed, that Mr. Hobbes had written a body of Philosophy upon such principles and in such order as are used by men conversant in demonstration. This he hath distinguished into three parts, De Corpore, De Homine, De Cive, each of the consequents beginning at the end of the antecedent, and insinuating thereupon, as the latter books of Euclid upon the former. The last of these he hath already published in Latin beyond the seas: The second is this now presented; and if these two receive justice in the world, there is hopes we may obtain the first. He, whose care it is and labour to satisfy the judgment and reason of mankind, will condescend so far, we hope, to satisfy the desire of those learned men, whom these shall either have found or made; which cannot be until they shall analytically have followed the grand phenomena of states and kingdoms thorough the passions of particular men into the elemental principles of natural and corporeal motions. The former work was published by the Author, and so is out of danger; this by a friend with leave from him. And to secure this, you are entreated to consider the relations wherein it stands, especially to the book de Cive. It was thought a piece of religion not to make any change without the Author's advice, which could not suddenly be obtained; and so it comes forth innocently, supposing nothing to have happened since the dedication of it; which, if it seem a solacism to some, it may to others give satisfaction in calling to mind those times and opportunities, to which we are indebted for those admirable compositions. In the second Chapter Mr. Hobbes endeavours to prove these points; that the subject wherein colour and image are inherent, is not the object or thing seen. That there is nothing without us really, which we call an image or colour. That the said image or colour is but an apparition unto us of the motion, agitation, or alteration, which the object worketh in the brain or spirits, or some internal substance of the head. And that as in conception of vision, so also in conceptions that arise from the other senses, the subject of their inherence is not the subject, but the Sentient.

(4) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 643. 2d edit. London 1721.

lodgings to wait upon the Earl, the Countess, and the children, and any considerable strangers, paying some short addresses to all of them. He kept these rounds till about twelve o' clock, when he had a little dinner provided for him, which he eat always by himself without ceremony. Soon after dinner, he retired into his study, and had his candle with ten or twelve pipes of tobacco laid by him; then shutting the door, he fell to smoking, and thinking, and writing for several hours. He retained a friend or two at court, and especially the Lord Ar—n, to protect him, if occasion should require. He used to say, “that it was lawful to make use of ill instruments to do ourselves good.

If

In the third chapter he defines Imagination to be conception remaining, and by little and little decaying from and after the act of sense; and sleep to be the privation of the act of sense, the power remaining; and dreams to be the imagination of them that sleep. He observes, that “the causes of dreams, if they be natural, are the actions or violence of the inward parts of a man upon his brain, by which the passages of sense by sleep benumbed, are restored to their motion.” With regard to remembrance, he remarks, that by the senses, which are numbered according to the organs to be five, we take notice of the objects without us, and that notice is our conception thereof; but we take notice also some way or other of our conceptions, for when the conception of the same thing cometh again, we take notice that it is again; that is to say, we have had the same conception before; which is as much as to imagine a thing past, which is impossible to the sense, which is only of things present. This therefore may be accounted a sixth sense, but internal (not external, as the rest), and is commonly called Remembrance. In the fourth chapter he tells, that “the succession of conceptions in the mind, series or consequence of one after another may be casual and incoherent, as in dreams for the most part; and it may be orderly, as when the former thought introduceth the latter; and this is the discourse of the mind. But because the word discourse is commonly taken for the coherence and consequence of Words, I will, says he, to avoid Equivocation, call it Discursion.” He remarks, that the cause of the coherence or consequence of one conception to another is their first coherence or consequence, when they are produced by sense. That the remembrance of succession of one thing to another, that is, of what was antecedent, and what consequent, and what concomitant, is called an Experiment, whether the same be made by us voluntarily, as when a man putting any thing into the fire to see what effect the fire will produce upon it; or not made by us, as when we remember a fair morning after a red evening. To have had many experiments is what we call experience, which is nothing else but remembrance of what antecedents have been followed by what consequents. In the sixth chapter he observes, that “there are two kinds of knowledge, whereof the one is nothing else but sense, or knowledge original, and remembrance of the same; the other is called Science, or knowledge of the Truth of Propositions, and how things are called; and is derived from understanding.” In the ninth chapter he remarks, “that the comparison of the life of man to a race, though it hold not in every part, yet it holdeth so well for this our purpose, that we may thereby both see and remember almost all the passions beforementioned. But this race we must suppose to have no other Goal nor other Garland, but being foremost and in it. To endeavour, is Appetite. To be remiss, is Sensuality. To consider them behind, is Glory. To consider them before, is Humility. To lose ground with looking back, Vain-Glory. To be holden, Hatred. To turn back, Repentance. To be in breath, Hope. To be weary, Despair. To endeavour to overtake the next, Emulation. To supplant or overthrow, Envy. To resolve to break through a stop foreseen, Courage. To break through a sudden stop, Anger. To break through with ease, magnanimity. To lose ground by little Hinderances, Pusillanimity. To fall on the sudden, is disposition to weep. To see another fall, is disposition to laugh. To see one out-gone, whom we would not, is Pity. To see one out-gone whom we would, is Indignation. To hold fast by another, is to love. To carry him on that so holdeth, is Charity. To hurt ones self for haste, is Shame. Continually to be out-gone, is Misery. Continually to out-go the next before, is Felicity. And to forsake the course, is to “die.” In the tenth chapter he tells us, that the difference of wits hath its original from the different passions, and from the ends to which the appetite leadeth them. That fancy consists in finding unexpected similitudes of things, otherwise much unlike, from whence proceed those grateful similes, metaphors, and other tropes, by which both Poets and Orators have in their power to make things please or displease, and shew well or ill to others as they like themselves; or else in discerning suddenly dissimilitude in things that otherwise appear the same. That “indocibility or difficulty of being taught arises from a false opinion that men know already the truth of that, which is called in question.” That a principal defect of the mind is that which men call madness, which appeareth to be nothing else but some imagination of some such predominancy above the rest, that we have no passion but from it. And this conception is nothing else but excessive vain-glory, or vain Dejection, which is most probable by these examples following, which proceed in appearance every one of them from pride or some dejection of mind. As first, we have had the example of one, that preached in Cheap-side from a cart there instead of a pulpit, that he himself was Christ, which was spiritual pride or madness. We have had also divers examples of learned madness, in which men have manifestly been distracted upon any occasion, that hath put them in remembrance of their own ability. Amongst the learned men may be remembered, I think, also those that determine of the time of the world's end, and other such points of prophecy. And gallant madness of Don Quixotte is nothing else but an expression of such height of vain-glory as reading of romance may produce in pusillanimous men. Also a rage and madness of love are but great indignations of them, in whose Brains is predominant the contempt of their enemies or their mistresses. And the pride taken in form and behaviour hath made divers men run mad, and to be so accounted under the name of Fantastick. And as these are the examples of extremities, so also are there examples too many of the degrees, which may therefore be well accounted follies. As it is a degree of the first, for a man without certain evidence to think himself inspired, or to have any other effect of God's holy Spirit than other godly men have. Of the second, for a man continually to speak his mind in a cento of other men's Greek or Latin sentences. Of the third, much of the present gallantry in love and duel. Of rage a degree is malice; and of fantastick madness, affectation. “As the former examples exhibit to us madness, and the degrees thereof, proceeding from the excess of self-opinion; so also there be other examples of madness, and the degrees thereof proceeding from too much vain fear and dejection; as in those melancholy men that have imagined themselves as brittle as glass, or have had some other like imagination; and degrees hereof are all those exorbitant and causeless fears, which we commonly observe in melancholy persons.” In the eleventh chapter he remarks, that as “God Almighty is incomprehensible, it followeth, that we can have no conception or image of the Deity, and consequently, all his attributes signify our inability and defect of power to conceive any thing concerning his nature, and not any conception of the same, excepting only this, that there is a God. For the effects we acknowledge naturally do include a power of their producing before they were produced; and that power presupposeth something existent that hath such power; and the thing to existing with power to produce, if it were not eternal, must needs have been produced by somewhat before it, and that again by something else before that, till we come to an eternal (that is to say the first) power, of all powers, “and “ If I were cast, said he, into a deep pit, and the Devil should put down his cloven foot, I would take hold of it to be drawn out by it.” Towards the end of his life he had very few books, and those he read but very little, thinking he was now only to digest what formerly he had fed upon. If company came to visit him, he would be free in discourse till he was pressed or contradicted; and then he had the infirmities of being short and peevish, and referring to his writings for better satisfaction. His friends, who had the liberty of introducing strangers to him, made these terms with them before their admission, that they should not dispute with the old man, nor contradict him. In October

“ and first cause of all causes; and this is it which all men conceive by the name of God, implying eternity, incomprehensibility, and omnipotency. And thus all that will consider, may know that God is, though not what he is; even as a man that is born blind, though it be not possible for him to have any imagination what kind of thing fire is, yet he cannot but know that somewhat there is that men call fire, because it warmeth him.” He observes, that “ by the name of Spirit we understand a body natural, but of such subtily, that it worketh not upon the senses, but that filleth up the place, which the image of a visible body might fill up. Our conception therefore of spirit consisteth of figure without colour; and in figure is understood dimension; and consequently to conceive a spirit is to conceive something that hath dimension. But Spirits supernatural commonly signify some substance without dimension, which two words do flatly contradict one another; and therefore when we attribute the name of spirit unto God, we attribute it not as a name of any thing we conceive, no more than we ascribe unto him sense and understanding; but, as a signification of our reverence we desire to abstract from him all corporeal grossness.” He tells us likewise, that “ since the knowledge we have of spirits is not natural knowledge, but faith from supernatural revelation given to the holy writers of scriptures, it followeth that of inspirations also, which is the operation of spirit in us, the knowledge which we have, must all proceed from scripture. That the knowledge we have of good and evil inspiration cometh not by vision of an angel that may teach it, nor by miracle that may seem to confirm it, but by conformity of doctrine with this article and fundamental point of Christian Faith, which also St. Paul faith is the sole foundation, That Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, 1 Cor. iii. 11.” That seeing our Faith, that “ the scriptures are the word of God, began from the confidence and trust we repose in the Church; there can be no doubt but that their interpretation of the same scriptures, when any doubt or controversy shall arise, by which this fundamental point, that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh may be called in question, is safer for any man to trust to, than his own whether reasoning or spirit, that is to say, his own opinion.” VI. De Corpore Politico; or, Of the Elements of the Law. London 1650 in 12mo. A French translation of this piece was printed at Amsterdam 1653 in 12mo. VII. Leviathan; or, The Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth. London 1651 in fol. reprinted again with the old date in 1680 in fol. A Latin version with an Appendix was published at Amsterdam 1668 in 4to. It was likewise translated into Low-Dutch, and printed at Amsterdam 1678 in 4to. To the English Editions is subjoined a Review of the Leviathan. Marchamont Needham (5) tells us, that Mr. Hobbes being at Paris when this Book was first published, he sent one of them as a present to the King of Scots (6), which he accepted in regard he had been his tutor in the mathematicks; but being afterwards informed by some of his Priests, that that Book did not only contain many principles of atheism and gross impiety (for so they call every thing that squares not with the Clergy-Interest) but also such that were prejudicial to the Church, and reflected dangerously upon the majesty of sovereign Princes; therefore when Mr. Hobbes came to make a tender of his service to him in person, he was rejected, and word brought him by the Marquis of Ormond, that the King would not admit him, and withal told him the reason. By which means Mr. Hobbes declines in credit with his friends there of the royal stamp.” A great many Writers have animadverted upon the Leviathan, particularly Sir Robert Filmer in his Observations concerning the Original of Government, upon Mr. Hobbes's Leviathan, Mr. Milton against Salmasius, H. Grotius de Jure Belli. London 1652 in 4to. An Examination of the Political Part of Mr. Hobbes's Leviathan. By George Lawson, Rector of More in the County of Salop. London 1657 in 8vo. The Creed of Mr. Hobbes examined in a feigned Conference between him and a Student of Divinity. London 1670 in 8vo. This was written by Mr. Thomas Tenison, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; and who in the Dedication to the Earl of Manchester dated at Cambridge June the 4th 1670, observes, that Mr. Hobbes hath affirmed of God, that he is a bodily substance, though most refined, and forceth evil upon the very wills of men; framed a model of government pernicious in its consequence to all nations; subjected the Canon of Scripture to the Civil Powers, and taught them the way of turning the Alcoran into the Gospel; declared it lawful, not only to dissemble, but plainly to renounce our faith in Christ, in order to the avoidance of persecution; and even managed a quarrel against the very Elements of Euclid. “ He hath long ago, says Mr. Tenison, published his errors in Theology in the English tongue, insinuating himself by the hand of somnells of his style into the minds of such whose fancy leadeth their judgments; and to say truth of an enemy, he may with some reason pretend to mastery in that language.” In 1676 was printed the Earl of Clarendon's Brief View and Survey of the dangerous and pernicious Errors to Church and State in Mr. Hobbes's book, intitled, Leviathan. Oxford 1676 in 4to; the second impression of which was published the same year. The Imprimatur by Dr. Ralph Bathurst Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, was dated July the 1st 1676. The Dedication to the King is dated at Moulins May the 10th 1673. In the Introduction (7) the Earl observes, that Mr. Hobbes's Leviathan “ contains in it good learning of all kinds, (7) Pag. 2. 2d edit. Oxon 1676 “ politely extracted, and very wittily and cunningly in 4to. “ digested, in a very commendable, and in a vigorous “ and pleasant style;” and that Mr. Hobbes was “ a “ man of excellent parts, of great wit, some reading, “ and somewhat more thinking; one who has spent “ many years in foreign parts and observations, under- “ stands the learned as well as modern languages, hath “ long had the reputation of a great Philosopher and “ Mathematician, and in his age hath had conversation “ with very many worthy and extraordinary men; to “ which, it may be, if he had been more indulgent in “ the more vigorous part of his life, it might have “ had greater influence upon the temper of his mind, “ whereas age seldom submits to those questions, en- “ quires, and contradictions, which the laws and li- “ berty of conversation require. And it hath been “ always a lamentation among Mr. Hobbes's friends, “ that he spent too much time in thinking, and too “ little in exercising those thoughts in the company of “ other men of the same or of as good faculties; for “ want whereof his natural constitution with age con- “ tracted such a morosity, that doubting and contra- “ dicting men were never grateful to him. In a word, “ Mr. Hobbes is one of the most ancient acquaintance “ I have in the world, and of whom I have always “ had a great esteem, as a man, who besides his emi- “ nent parts of learning and knowledge, hath been “ always looked upon as a man of probity and a life “ free from scandal.” The Earl informs us (8), that (8) Pag. 6, 7. when Prince Charles, afterwards King Charles II, went first to Paris from the isle of Jersey, and the Lords Capel and Hopton stayed with himself at Jersey, he heard shortly after, that Mr. Hobbes, who was then at Paris, had printed his book de Cive there. The Earl wrote to Dr. Earle, who was then the Prince's Chaplain and Tutor, to remember him kindly to Mr. Hobbes,

(5) Mercurius Politicus, num. 34. from Jan. 8. to Jan. 15. ann. 1651-2.

(6) King Charles II.

October 1666, when complaint was made in Parliament against his books, and some proceedings against him were depending, with a Bill against Atheism and Profaneness, he was at Chatworth, and appeared extremely disturbed at the news of it, fearing that messengers would come for him, and the Earl of Devonshire would deliver him up, and the two Houses of Parliament commit him to the Bishops, and they decree him a Heretic, and return him to the Civil Magistrate for a writ de Heretico comburendo. This terror upon his spirits made him sink very much. He would be often confessing to those about him;

with whom the Earl was well acquainted, and to desire him to send him that book by the same token that Mr. Sydney Godolphin, who had been killed in the civil wars, had left Mr. Hobbes a legacy of two hundred pounds. The book was immediately sent to the Earl by Mr. Hobbes, with a desire that he would tell him, whether he was sure that there was such a legacy, or how he might take notice of it to receive it. The Earl sent Mr. Hobbes word that he might depend upon it for a truth, and that he believed, that if he found some way secretly (to the end there might be no public notice of it in regard of the Parliament) to demand it of Mr. Francis Godolphin, brother of Mr. Sidney Godolphin, (the former of whom had told the Earl of it,) he would pay it. This information was the ground of the dedication of the Leviathan to Mr. Francis Godolphin, whom Mr. Hobbes had never seen. When the Earl went some few years after from Holland with K. Charles II (after the murder of Charles I) to Paris, from whence he went shortly his Majesty's Ambassador to Spain, Mr. Hobbes visited him, and told him, that Mr. Godolphin confessed the legacy, and had paid 100 l. and promised to pay the other in a short time; for all which he thanked the Earl, and said he owed it to him, for he had never otherwise known of it. When the Earl returned from Spain by Paris, Mr. Hobbes frequently came to him, and told him, that his book, which he would call Leviathan, was then printing in England, and that he received every week a sheet to correct, of which he shewed the Earl one or two sheets, and thought it would be finished within little more than a month; and shewed him the Epistle to Mr. Godolphin, which he intended to set before it, and read it to him, and concluded, that he knew when the Earl read his book he would not like it, and thereupon mentioned some conclusions; upon which the Earl asked him, why he would publish such doctrine; to which, after a discourse between jest and earnest upon the subject, he said, The truth is, I have a mind to go home. Within a short time after I came, says the Earl (9), into Flanders, which was not much more than a month from the time that Mr. Hobbes had conferred with me, Leviathan was sent to me from London; which I read with much appetite and impatience. Yet I had scarce finished it, when Sir Charles Cavendish (the noble brother of the Duke of Newcastle who was then at Antwerp, and a Gentleman of all the accomplishments of mind that he wanted of body, being in all other respects a wonderful person) shewed me a letter he had then received from Mr. Hobbes, in which he desired he would let him know freely what my opinion was of his book. Upon which I wished he would tell him that I could not enough wonder, that a man who had so great a reverence for civil government, that he resolved all wisdom and religion itself into a simple obedience and submission to it, should publish a book, for which by the constitution of any government now established in Europe, whether monarchical or democratical, the author must be punished in the highest degree and with the most severe penalties. With which answer, which Sir Charles sent to him, he was not pleased, and found afterwards when I returned to the King to Paris, that I very much censured his book, which he had presented, engrossed in vellum in a marvellous fair hand, to the King, and likewise found my judgment so far confirmed, that a few days before I came thither, he was compelled secretly to fly out of Paris, the Justice having endeavoured to apprehend him, and soon after escaped into England, where he never received any disturbance. After the King's return he came frequently to the Court, where he had too many disciples, and once visited me. I received him very kindly, and invited him to see me often; but he heard from so many hands, that I had no good opinion of his book, that he came to me only that one time: and methinks I am in a degree indebted to him, to let him know some reason, why I look with so much prejudice upon his book, which hath gotten him so much credit and estimation with some other men." The Earl afterwards observes (10), (10) Pag. 317: that the "Review and Conclusion of the Leviathan is only an abridgment and contracting the most contagious poison, that runs thro' the book, into a less vessel or volume, lest they, who should, will not take the pains to read the book, or reading it may by inadvertency and incogitancy not be hurt enough by it, may here in less room, and more nakedly, swallow his choicest doctrine at one morsel; and is in truth a sly address to Cromwell, that being then out of the Kingdom, and so being neither conquered nor his subject, he might by his return submit to his government, and be bound to obey it: which being uncompelled by any necessity or want, but having as much to sustain him abroad as he had to live upon at home, could not but proceed from a sincere heart and uncorrupted. This Review and Conclusion he made short enough to hope, that Cromwell himself might read it; where he should not only receive the pawns of his new subject's allegiance, by declaring his own obligation and obedience, but by publishing such doctrine, as being diligently infused by such a master in the mystery of government, might secure the people of the Kingdom (over whom he had no right to command) to acquiesce and submit to his brutal power." The Leviathan was censured by the Parliament in October 1666, at which time a bill against atheism and profaneness was brought into the House; and the University of Oxford condemned this book and that de Civitate by a decree passed on the 21st of July 1683, and ordered them to be publicly burnt, with several other treatises, which were excepted against. VIII. A Compendium of Aristotle's Rhetoric, and Ramus's Logic. IX. A Letter about Liberty and Necessity. London 1654 in 12mo. The third edition was printed in 1684 in 8vo. Dr. Bernard Laney wrote Observations upon this piece of Mr. Hobbes, which were printed at London in 1676 in 12mo. Dr. Bramhall Bishop of Derry published likewise a A Defence of true Liberty from antecedent and extrinsecal Necessity, being an Answer to a late Book of Mr. Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury, intitled, A Treatise of Liberty and Necessity. Written by the Right Reverend John Bramhall, D. D. and Lord Bishop of Derry. London 1655 in 8vo. Dedicated to the Marquis of Newcastle. In the Preface Bishop Bramhall observes, that this "Treatise was not penned for the press, but privately undertaken, that by the ventilation of the question truth might be cleared from mistakes. The same was Mr. Hobbes's desire at that time, as appeareth by four passages in his book (), wherein he requesteth and beseecheth, () Pag. 18, 26, that it may be kept private. But either through forgetfulness or change of judgment he hath now caused or permitted it to be printed in England without either adjoining my first discourse, to which he wrote that answer, or so much as mentioning this reply, which he hath had in his hands now these eight years. So wide is the date of his letter in the year 1652 from truth, and his manner of dealing with me in this particular from ingenuity, if the edition were with his own consent. Howsoever here is all that passed between us upon this subject without any addition or the least variation from the original." The Bishop tells us (11), that the first (11) Pag. 2. day he read over Mr. Hobbes's Defence of the Necessity of all things, was April the 20th 1646; and that then, his occasions permitting him, and an advertisement from a friend awakening him, he set himself to a serious examination of it. Mr. Hobbes, in answer to an argument, which he represents as urged by the Bishop, "that if the concurrence of all the causes necessitate the effect, then it follows that Adam had him, that he meant no harm, and was no obstinate man, and was ready to make any satisfaction. For his prevailing principle, and his resolution upon it, was to suffer for no cause whatever. Under these apprehensions of danger he drew up in 1680 An Historical Narration of Heresy and the punishment thereof, labouring to prove, that there was no authority to determine Heresy, or to punish it, when he wrote the Leviathan; and that since the dissolving of the High Commission Court no other Courts have any power to decree any opinion to be heretical; and wonders, that since his Majesty had restored the Bishops, and pardoned the Presbyterians, both the one and the other should accuse in Parliament his Book of Heresy; and so runs into a complaint of the fierceness of Divines. Under the same apprehensions he framed An Apology for himself and his Writings, setting forth, that the exceptionable things in his Leviathan were not his opinions so much as his suppositions, humbly submitted to those who had the Ecclesiastical power, and never since dogmatically maintained by him either in writing or discourse. And it is much to be suspected, as Dr. Kennet observes (b), that upon this occasion he began to make a more open shew of Religion and Church Communion. He now frequented the chapel, joined

(9) Pag. 20.

" no

(b) Ibid. pag. 111, 112.

"no true liberty," had answered in these words: "I deny the consequence, for I make not only the effect, but also the election of that particular effect to be necessary, in as much as the will itself, and each propension of a man during his deliberation is as much necessitated, and depends on a sufficient cause, as any thing else whatsoever. As for example, it is no more necessary that fire should burn, than that a man or other creature, whose limbs be moved by fancy, should have election, that is, liberty to do what he has a fancy to, though it be not in his will or power to choose his fancy, or choose his election or will. This doctrine, because he says he hates, I doubt had better been suppressed, as it should have been, if both your Lordship and he had not pressed me to an answer." The Bishop in his reply writes thus (12). "My argument was this; if any of these, or all of these causes formerly recited, do take away true liberty, (that is, still intended from necessity) then Adam before his fall had no true liberty. But Adam before his fall had true liberty. He misrecites the argument, and denies the consequence, which is so clearly proved, that no man living can doubt of it. Because Adam was subjected to all the same causes, as well as we, the same decree, the same prescience, the same influences, the same concurrence of causes, the same efficacy of objects, the same dictates of reason. But it is only a mistake, for it appears plainly by his following discourse, that he intended to deny, not the consequence, but the assumption; for he makes Adam to have had no liberty from necessity before his fall; then he proceeds so far as to affirm, that all human wills, his and ours, and each propension of our wills, even during our deliberation, are as much necessitated as any thing else whatsoever; that we have no more power to forbear those actions which we do, than the fire hath power not to burn. Though I honour T. H. for his person and for his learning, yet I must confess ingenuously, I hate this doctrine from my heart. And I believe both I have reason so to do, and all others, who shall seriously ponder the horrid consequences which flow from it. It destroys liberty, and dishonours the nature of man. It makes the second causes and outward objects to be rackets, and men to be but the tennis-balls of destiny. It makes the first cause, that is, God Almighty, to be the introducer of all evil and sin into the world, as much as man, yea more than man, by as much as the motion of the watch is more from the artificer, who did make it and wind it up, than either from the spring or the wheels, or the thread, if God by his special influence into the second causes did necessitate them to operate as they did. . . . Excuse me, if I hate this doctrine with a perfect hatred, which is so dishonourable both to God and man, which makes men to blaspheme of necessity, to steal of necessity, to be hanged of necessity, and to be damned of necessity. And therefore I must say and say again, Quicquid ostendes mihi sic incredulus odi. It were better to be an Atheist, to believe no God; or to be a Manichee, to believe two Gods, a God of good, and a God of evil; or with the Heathens to believe thirty thousand Gods, than thus to charge the true God to be the proper cause and the true author of all the sins and evils,

(12) Pag. 59.

"which are in the world." X. The Questions concerning Liberty, and Necessity, and Chance, stated and debated between Mr. Hobbes and Dr. Bramhall, Bishop of London-Derry. London 1656, in 4to. XI. Elementorum Philosophiæ Sectio prima de Corpore. London, 1655, in 8vo. In English, London, 1656, in 4to. Sectio secunda, London 1657, in 4to. Amsterdam 1668, in 4to. XII. Six Lessons to the Professors of Mathematics of the Institution of Sir Henry Savile. London, 1656, in 4to. This is written against Mr. Seth Ward, and Dr. John Wallis. XIII. The marks of the absurd Geometry, rural Language, &c. of Dr. John Wallis. London, 1657, in 8vo. Dr. Wallis having published in 1655 his Elenchus Geometriæ Hobbianæ, it occasioned several books to be written by them against each other. XIV. Examinatio & Emendatio Mathematicæ bodiarnæ, sex Dialogis comprehensa. London, 1660, in 4to. Amsterdam, 1668, in 4to. XV. Dialogus Physicus, sive de Naturâ Aeris. London, 1661, in 4to. Amsterdam, 1668, in 4to. XVI. De Duplicatione Cubi. London, 1661, in 4to. Amsterdam, 1668, in 4to. XVII. Problemata Physica, una cum Magnitudine Circuli. London, 1652, in 4to. Amsterdam, 1688, in 4to. XVIII. De Principiis & Ratiocinatione Geometricarum, contra fastuosum Professore. London, 1666, in 4to. Amsterdam, 1668, in 4to. XIX. Quadratura Circuli, Cubatio Sphæræ, Duplicatio Cubi; unâ cum Responsione ad objectiones Geometriæ Professoris Savilianæ Oxoniæ editas anno 1669. London, 1669, in 4to. XX. Rostium Geometricum, sive Propositiones aliquot frustra antebac tentatæ, cum censurâ brevi Doctrinæ Wallisianæ de motu. London, 1671, in 4to. There is an account of this book in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 72, for the year 1671. XXI. Three Papers presented to the Royal Society against Dr. Wallis, with Considerations on Dr. Wallis's Answer to them. London, 1671, in 4to. XXII. Lux Mathematica, &c. Censura Doctrinæ Wallisianæ de Libris Rostium Hobbesii. London, 1672, in 4to. XXIII. Principia & Problemata aliquot Geometrica ante desperata, nunc breviter explicata & demonstrata. London, 1674, in 4to. XXIV. Epistola ad Dom. Anton. à Wood, Authorem Historiæ & Antiquitat. Universit. Oxon. Dated April the 20th, 1674, printed in half a sheet on one side. "It was written to Mr. Wood, says that Historian (13), upon (13) Art. Oxon. his complaint made to Mr. Hobbes of several de- vol. 2. col. 645. letions and additions made in and to his life and character (which he had written of him in that book) by the publisher (Dr. Jo. Fell) of the said Hist. & Antiq. to the great dishonour and disparagement of the said Mr. Hobbes. Whereupon, when that History was finished, came out a scurrilous Answer to the said Epistle, written by Dr. Fell, which is at the end of the said History." In this Answer Dr. Fell styles Mr. Hobbes, irritabile illud & vanissimum Malmbsburienie Animal; and tells us, that one Mr. J. A. had sent a magnificent elogium of Mr. Hobbes drawn up by him, or more probably by Hobbes himself, in order to be inserted in the Hist. & Antiq. Univers. Oxon. but the Editor finding in this elogium a great many things foreign to the design of that work, and far from truth, he suppressed what he thought proper. And whereas Mr. Hobbes had complained, that in the Historia & Antiq. only ingenium acre, but not subrium was ascribed to him, Dr. Fell observes, that he shall in the service, and was generally a partaker of the Sacrament. And whenever any strangers, in conversation with him, seemed to question his belief, he would always appeal to his conformity in Divine Service, and referred them to the Chaplain for a testimony of it. Others thought it a mere compliance with the orders of the family, and observed, that he never went to any Parish Church, and even in the Chapel upon Sundays he went out after prayers, and turned his back upon the sermon; and when any friend asked the reason of it, he gave no other answer but this, that they could teach him nothing but what he knew. He did not conceal his hatred to the Clergy; but it was visible, that the hatred was owing to his fear of their civil interest and power. He had often a jealousy that the Bishops would burn him; and of all the Bench he was most afraid of Dr. Seth Ward Bishop of Sarum, because he had most offended him. Dr. Kennet observes likewise (c), that his whole life was governed by his fears. In the first Parliament of 1640, while it seemed to favour the measures of the Court, he wrote a little Tract in English, wherein he demonstrated, as himself tells us (d), that "all the power and rights necessary for the peace of the Kingdom were inseparably annexed to the Sovereignty in the King's person." But in the second Parliament of that year, when they proceeded fiercely against those who had written or preached in defence of the Regal Power, he, doubting how they would use him, went over into France, the first of all that fled, and there continued eleven years (e). At Paris he wrote and published his Leviathan, a plea for

(c) Ibid. pag. 113.

(d) Considerations upon the Reputation, Loyalty, Manners and Religion of Thos. Hobbes, by way of Letter to a learned Person, pag. 5.

(e) Ibid. pag. 6.

shall not appeal to those, who were conversant with him and his writings, but to Mr. Hobbes himself, who in his book De Principiis Et Ratiocinatione Geometricarum says thus: In magno quidem periculo versari video Existimationem meam, qui a Geometris ferè omnibus dissentio, eorum enim, qui iisdem rebus mecum aliquid ediderunt, aut solus insanio ego, aut solus non insanio; tertium non est, nisi quod dicit forte aliquis, insaniamus omnes. Upon which Dr. Fell observes thus. "Si insanite eum contingat; non ab Editore injuria facta est; si alii omnes eruditi mente sua moti insanire illum censeant, non est quod furiosorum sententia illum moveat, nec queratur reperiri hominem unum, qui demens pariter cum fuerit, communi omnium suffragio calculum adjecerit." XXV. A Letter to William Duke of Newcastle, concerning the Controversy had with Dr. Laney, Bishop of Ely, about Liberty and Necessity. London, 1670, in 12mo. XXVI. Decameron Physiologicum: Or ten Dialogues of Natural Philosophy, &c. London, 1678, in 8vo. To this is added The Proportion of a straight Line to bold the Arch of a Quadrant. An account of this book is published in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 138, pag. 965. XXVII. His last words and dying Legacy. Printed on one side of a sheet of paper in December 1679, and published by Charles Blunt, Esq; from the Leviathan, in order to expose Mr. Hobbes's doctrine. XXVIII. His memorable Sayings in his Books and at the Table. Printed on one side of a broad sheet of paper, with his picture before them. XXIX. Behemoth: The History of the Civil Wars of England from 1640 to 1660. London, 1679, in 8vo. XXX. Vita Thomæ Hobbes. This is a Latin Poem written by himself, and printed at London in 4to, in the latter end of December 1679; and a fortnight after that, viz about the 10th of January, it was published in English verse by another hand, at London 1680, in five sheets in Folio. The Latin copy was reprinted and subjoined to Vita Hobbiana Auctarium. XXXI. Historical Narration of Heresy, and the Punishment thereof. London, 1680, in four sheets and an half in folio; and in 1682 in 8vo. This is chiefly extracted out of the second chapter De Heresi of his Appendix to the Leviathan. After he has reduced from our Saviour's time the different punishments by laws enacted against those, who were declared Heretics throughout the several ages of the church, he proceeds to an account of the laws in force in England against Heretics from the first proposition of Christianity, to the last civil wars; and observes that the High Commission had the sole power of declaring what was Heresy according to the sense of the first four General Councils, invested in them in Queen Elizabeth's reign; that after this Court was taken away at the beginning of the Civil Wars, no person stood empowered by lawful authority, either to declare what was Heresy, or to punish any one proved to be this way obnoxious. At this time, he tells us, his Leviathan was published, for the writing of which he could not be accounted heretical; and he gives the reasons, which induced him to write and publish that book. This treatise of our Author was animadverted upon by Mr. John Dowell, Vicar of Melton-Mowbray in Leicestershire, in a little tract, intitled, The Leviathan heretical: Or the charge exhibited in Parliament against Mr. Hobbes justified, &c. Oxford, 1683, in 12mo; in which book, pag. 137, the Author informs us, that Cromwell having gained the Protectorship, was so highly pleased with many of the principles laid down in the Leviathan, that he offered Mr. Hobbes the place of Secretary to him. XXXII. Vita Thomæ Hobbes, written by himself in prose, and printed at Caropolis, i. e. London, and prefixed to Vita Hobbiana Auctarium, 1681, in 8vo, and 1682, in 4to. XXXIII. A Brief of the Art of Rhetoric, containing in substance all that Aristotle hath written in his three books of that subject. Printed in 12mo, but without a date. It was afterwards published in two books. London, 1681, in 8vo, the first bearing the title of The Art of Rhetoric, and the other of The Art of Rhetoric plainly set forth; with pertinent examples for the more ready understanding and practice of the same. To which is added, XXXIV. A Dialogue between a Philosopher and a Student of the Common Laws of England. XXXV. An Answer to Archbishop Bramhall's book called, The catching of the Leviathan. London, 1682, in 8vo. XXXVI. Seven Philosophical Problems, and two Propositions of Geometry. London, 1682, in 8vo, dedicated to the King in 1662. XXXVII. An Apology for himself and his Writings. In this piece he observes, that those things, which he delivered in the Leviathan, were not his own opinions, but submitted to the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Power; and that he never maintained any of them afterwards either in writing or discourse; and that what is in it of Theology, contrary to the general sense of Divines, was not introduced as his own opinion, but propounded with full submission to those, who had the Ecclesiastical Power. XXXVIII. Historia Ecclesiastica carmine Elegiaco concinnata. Aug. Trinob. i. e. London, 1688, in 8vo. XXXIX. Traclatus Opticus, insertus in Merfennus's Cogitata Physico-Mathematica. Paris, 1644, in 4to. XL. Observationes in Cartesii de primâ Philosophiâ Meditationes. These objections, which are called the third, are published in all the editions of Des Cartes's Meditations. XLI. He translated into English verse, The Voyage of Ulysses; or Homer's Odyssey, book 9, 10, 11, 12. London, 1674, in 8vo. And XLII. Homer's Iliads and Odyssees. London, 1675 and 1677, in 12mo. To which is prefixed a Preface concerning Heroic Poetry. Mr. Pope in the Preface to his translation of Homer's Iliad tells us, that Mr. Hobbes in his Version "has given a correct explanation of the sense in general; but for particulars and circumstances lopps them, and often omits the most beautiful. As for its being esteemed a close translation, I doubt not many have been led into that error by the shortness of it, which proceeds not from the following the original line by line, but from the contractions abovementioned. He sometimes omits whole similes and sentences, and is now and then guilty of mistakes, into which no writer of his learning could have fallen, but through carelessness."

"His

for the absolute power of Princes, which seemed to be calculated for the new measures then laid for the Government of France, to obtain the easier protection from the Church. The same passion of fear that brought him into France, drove him back to England. For as soon as he was dismissed from his attendance on the King, to escape the resentments of those whom he thought his enemies, he made haste for England, and confessed,

(f) Ibid. pag. 8. that he came home, because he would not trust his safety with the French Clergy (f). He was not called in question by Cromwell, who had no reason to dislike his tenets; and in the other changes he was always safe. After the Restoration he watched all opportunities to ingratiate himself with the King and his prime Ministers; and looked upon his pension to be more valuable, as an earnest of favour and protection, than upon the other account. His following course of life was to be free from danger. He could not endure to be left in an empty house; whenever the Earl of Devonshire removed, he would go along with him, even to his last stage from Chatsworth to Hardwick, when in a weak condition he dared not be left behind, but made his way upon a feather-bed in a coach, though he survived the journey but a few days. He could not bear any discourse of death, and seemed to cast off all thoughts of it. He delighted to reckon upon longer life. The winter before he died he made a warm coat, which he said must last him three years, and then he would have such another. In his last sickness his frequent questions were, Whether his disease was curable? And when intimations were given that he might have ease, but no remedy, he used this expression, I shall be glad then to find a hole to creep out of the world at; which are reported to be his last sensible words; and his lying some days following in a silent stupefaction seemed to be owing to his mind more than to his body. The only thought of death, which he appeared to entertain in time of health, was to take care of some inscription on his grave. He would suffer some friends

(g) Kennet, ubi supra, pag. 113-117. Philosopher's stone (g).

"His Poetry, as well as Ogilby's, is too mean for criticism." He left likewise several MSS. among which was his Defence in the affair relating to Daniel Scargil, A. B. of C. C. College in Cambridge, written in one sheet; a copy of which Sir John Berkenhead had in his possession, upon whose decease it came into the hands of Henry Birkenhead (14). Mr. Francis Peck has published (15) two original letters of our Author. The first is dated at Paris October 3^d, 1634, wherein he resolves the following question; Why a man remembers less his own face, which he sees often in a glass, than the face of a friend, that he has not seen of a great time? "My opinion, says Mr. Hobbes, in general is, that a man remembers best those faces, whereof he has had the greatest impressions; and that the impressions are the greater for the oftener seeing them, and the longer staying upon the sight of them. Now you know, men look upon their own faces but for short fits, but upon their friends faces a long time together, whilft they discourse or converse together; so that a man may receive a greater impression from his friend's face in a day, than from his own in a year. And according to their impression the image will be fresher in his mind. Besides, the sight of one's friends two hours together is of greater force to imprint the image of it than the same quantity of time by intermissions. For the intermissions do easily deface that, which is but lightly imprinted. In general, I think that that lasteth longer in the memory, which hath been stronglier received by the sense." The other Letter is dated at Florence, April 8th 1636, addressed to his worthy friend Mr. Glen. In this he writes thus: "I long infinitely to see those bookes of the Sabbath [Dr. Heylin's History of the Sabbath, in two books, London 1636, in 4to.] and am of your mind, they will put such thoughts into the heads of vulgar people, as will conferre little to their good life. For when they see one of the Ten Commandments to be Jus humanum merely, (as it must be if the Church can alter it,) they will hope also, that the other nine may be so too. For every man hitherto did believe, that the Ten Commandments were the moral, that is, an eternal law." T.

(14) See Vita Hobbianae Auctarium, pag. 108, 109.
(15) Desiderata Curiosa, vol. 1. lib. 6. num. 10, 11. pag. 23, 24.

HOCHSTRAT (JAMES) in Latin Hochstratus or Hochstratanus, was thus called from the village in which he was born (a). He studied Philosophy at Louvain, and took his degree of Master of Arts there in the year 1485. He entered amongst the Dominican Friars, and was Prior of their Monastery at Cologne, Doctor and Professor of Divinity, and Inquisitor in the three Ecclesiastical Electorates (b). There never was a man who deserved more than him to be honoured with this last employment; for he had all the bad qualities, that are necessary for inquisitors and informers. He was passionate; he would impeach any man with the least pretence, and be at once both the judge and the accuser [A]; he used to make very unfaithful extracts from the books of his adversaries,

(a) Hoogstraten in Brabant, between Antwerp and Bergen-op-zoom.

(b) Val. Andreæ, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 412.

DISPUTES between Reuchlin and Hochstrat.

[A] He would be at once both the Judge and the accuser. This appeared very plainly in Reuchlin's affair. A Jew (1) lately converted to the Christian Religion, had slandered him in a book intitled, Manuale speculum. Reuchlin vindicated himself in a book intitled, Speculum oculare, in which he shewed that his enemies had published above thirty four Calumnies against him (2). Hochstrat, the chief supporter of the converted Jew, engaged the divines of Cologne in this controversy, and persuaded them to make extracts from the Speculum oculare, which were published with artful and malicious remarks, designed to defame Reuchlin over all the world as a favourer of Judaism. Has propositiones ubi vidit Reuchlinus pessime ac non sine crimine falsi ex Oculari Speculo excerptas rogat Theologos illos &c erupit tota Theologorum concio suppeticas Christi sacris recens initiato Judeo latura duce Tungro, qui articulos seu propositiones de Judaico favore nimis suspectas ex Speculo Oculari extruxit, adjectis annotationibus & animadversionibus: atque hoc omne non vernacula lingua, qua utrinque hactenus certatum fuit, adornat, sed Latina; eo haud dubie consilio, ut apud exteras gentes nationesque nomen Capionis invisum redderet, & cum multa ditorum citatione securius falleret (3). i. e. "When Reuchlin saw that these propositions were most un- fairly extracted from his Speculum oculare, and not without being falsified he desired those Divines, &c. The whole tribe of the Divines arose to support the newly converted Jew, having Hochstrat at their head, who extracted the propositions from the Speculum Oculare, which seemed to favour

(1) Named John Pfeffercorn.

(2) Dilucide, & quod dicimus, ad oculum ibi offendit, adversarios pluribus quam triginta quatuor mendacis ad sui contumeliam ulos esse. Jo. Henricus Majus, in Oratione de Vita Reuchlini, folio D 3 verso.

(3) Majus in Oratione de Vita Reuchlini, folio D 4.

(c) See the remark [A]. ries (c), and would never confess that he had been a slanderer; and he impudently asserted heresies in the very books, in which he pretended to refute the heretics [B]. They forced

“favour too much of Judaism, and added to them his own notes and observations, and published the whole, not in the German tongue, in which the controversy had till then been carried on, but in Latin, with a design no doubt to render Reuchlin odious to all nations, and the better to impose upon the world by a great number of quotations supposed to be from his own Book.” Reuchlin answered this work in a Latin apology directed to the Emperor, upon which he was prosecuted in form before the Elector of Mentz: as he could not appear himself on account of his old age, he sent an attorney thither, who in his name made very well grounded exceptions against our James Hochstrat, which yet were not admitted. Cum propter senium & imbecillitatem corporis tantum iter tam brevi temporis spacio conficere non possent, mittebat eò curatorem Petrum Staffellium Nuringensem, qui auctorem Hochstratum tanquam inimicum sibi infensissimum & merito suspectum recusabat, ob eas causas, quas publice allegabat . . . Tametsi vero nil obtineret Reuchlinus (4). i. e. “As Reuchlin could not undertake so great a journey in so short a time because of his old age and infirmities, he sent thither Peter Staffellius of Nuring to act for him as his attorney, who challenged the prosecutor Hochstrat as Reuchlin’s most bitter enemy, and a man justly suspected of partiality for such reasons as were then publickly alledged . . . Though Reuchlin could obtain nothing &c.” Hochstrat would not suffer himself to be accused (5); whereupon Reuchlin’s attorney appealed to the Court of Rome; notwithstanding which Hochstrat procured a sentence against Reuchlin, and without waiting till the fifteen days were past, before which it could not be lawfully proclaimed, as though he might already triumph, he ordered all the Curates of Mentz to give the people notice, that all they who had Reuchlin’s books should carry them immediately to the Commissaries upon pain of excommunication. Interea Hochstratus quasi jam acturus triumphum omnibus per Moguntiacum sacerdotibus mandat, ut publice populum sub proscriptionis pena monerent, si qui Oculare Speculum haberent, illud quantocyus eam in rem delegatis traderent (6). Reuchlin appeals to the Pope; Hochstrat does the same. George Elector Palatine and Bishop of Spire being appointed by Pope Leo X to try this cause (7), named judges who summoned the parties to appear before them. Hochstrat did not appear, and for his non-appearance was condemned to pay all the costs. He was also strictly forbidden to continue his proceedings, and the information of the Divines of Cologne was declared null and void. Hochstratus licet more consueto per intervalla citatus, tamen non comparuit. Causa nibilo factius discutitur & secundum Reuchlinum pronunciat; nullum errorem ab Ecclesia damnatum in libro sapius commemorato reperiri, nec plus eum favere Judæis, quam religio & jura sinant; injuste ergo ac præter veritatem eum delatum à Colonienfibus esse. Hochstratus autem contumaciæ criminis reus &c (8). i. e. “Though Hochstrat was summoned several times according to custom, he did not appear. However the cause was tried and determined in Reuchlin’s favour; the judges declared that they did not find in his Book any error condemned by the Church, and that he did not favour the Jews more than was consistent with religion and justice; that he was therefore unjustly and falsely accused by the Divines of Cologne. But Hochstrat being guilty of the crime of contumacy or non-appearance, &c.” However the Divines of Cologne ordered Reuchlin’s book to be burnt. Dum hæc aguntur Spiræ, Colonienfes nefario ausu librum Reuchlini damnant, citra tamen contumeliam, ut aiebant, & Februarii deinde mense anno supra millesimum quingentesimum decimo quarto exarunt, approbantibus factum Lovaniensf, Erphordenf, Moguntina, & Parisiensf Universitatibus (9). i. e. Whilst the cause was depending at Spire, the Divines of Cologne, by a most villainous attempt, condemned Reuchlin’s book, without pretending however to cast a brand upon him*, and burnt his book in February 1514, the Universities of Lovain, Erford, Mentz and Paris

“approving their conduct.” But I observe this only occasionally; the chief thing I am to prove is, that this Monk pretended to be at once both the Judge and the accuser. He is charged with this in a Poem intitled Triumphus Doctoris Reuchlini (10). i. e. “Doctor Reuchlin’s Triumph.”

Accusat Capionem & judicat idem Acer Hogstratus (11).

Sed neque perditior neque flagitiosior alter In Capiona fuit, tunc, cum tu perdit judex Leus, & abjurdis in litibus arbiter esses Idem accusator. Dic quo vesane pudorem Fert omnem tibi livor edax (12).

“The fierce Hochstrat impeaches, and at the same time pretends to judge Reuchlin . . . Nor was there ever a more wicked and profligate man than you, when you was chosen a Judge in these absurd controversies, being at the same time the accuser of Reuchlin. Tell me, outrageous man, what gnawing envy made you throw off all shame?”

[B] He impudently asserted Heresies in the very books in which he pretended to refute the Heretics.] We should see a catalogue of them, had we the book, with which Agrippa threatened the Dominicans (13): for here follows what he represents to the Magistrates of Cologne. Unum tamen illum excipio, Jacobum Hochstratum, tunc Prædicatorum ordinis hæreticorum Mogistrum, vulgo & veraciter dictum, qui taliter scripsit contra Lutheranas hæreses, ut ipse se proderit hæreticorum omnium pessilentissimum. Sed ne quis vestrum, illius olim amicus, aut illius hypocrisis excæcatus, vel aliter deceptus, me non favore veritatis, sed aut invidia, aut alia offensa ista dicere putet, rem ipsam digito monstrabo. Nam in libro suo contra Lutheranos, quem Reverendissimo Cardinali ac Illustri Principi & Episcopo Leodiensf dedicavit, in illius lib. 2. disp. 3. paulo ante finem. 1. cap. sic ait: Scimus enim consecratione super debitam materiam ritè facta, Christum esse in Sacramento, non autem quòd sub hæc vel illa determinata hostia Christus contineatur (). Neque tamen putetis, hæc solum articulum apud illum reperiri hæreticum, sed alii multi: quos cum his nimis longum, vobisque tædiosum foret referre, enumerabo alibi, in eo scilicet libro, quem de Fratrum Prædicatorum sceleribus* (14). i. e. “I except however one, namely, James Hochstrat, then commonly and with reason called the Master of the Order of the Predicant Heretics, who wrote against the Lutheran heresies in such a manner, as to shew himself the most dangerous of all Heretics. But lest any of you, who were formerly his friends, or might have been imposed upon by his hypocrisy, or otherwise deceived, should think that I speak this out of envy or resentment, I shall prove it most evidently. For in his book against Luther, which he dedicated to the most reverend Cardinal and illustrious Prince and Bishop of Liege, book 11. disp. 3, a little before the end of the first chapter, he speaks thus: We know that when a proper matter is duly consecrated, Christ is in the Sacrament: but yet we do not know that he is actually present in this or that particular Host. Do not imagine that this is the only heretical article to be met with in his works; there are a great many more, which it would be here too tedious to mention. But I shall give a particular account of them in another book of mine, which I have intitled, An History of the Crimes and Heresies of the Predicant Fryars.” See the following part of this passage in the remark [S] of the article AGRIPPA.

§ (*) Monsieur BAYLE has not observed all that, in Agrippa’s works, related to the Heresies, with which he charged his adversaries, and particularly Hochstrat. The same Agrippa, in the second chapter of his Apology against the Divines of Lovain, speaks thus. Jam vero etiam nostro seculo dogmatizarunt Colonienfes Theologi, Aristotelem sic esse præcursorem Christi in naturalibus, quemadmodum

(10) Mr. Major has inserted it in his Notes on Reuchlin’s Life, pag. 480, &c. The author of that Poem calls himself Eleutherius Byzerus.

(11) Annot. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 485.

(12) Ibid. pag. 493.

(13) See the article AGRIPPA remark [S].

(14) Agrippa, Epist. 26. lib. 7. pag. 10. 17. This Letter is dated Jan. 11, 1533.

(4) Idem, ibid. folio D 4 verso.

(5) Reuchlin. Epist. ad Wimpelingum, apud Majum, Not. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 391.

(6) Majus, in Vita Reuchlini, folio D 5.

(7) Causa ad Leonem X devotata, qui eam Spiritensf Episcopo, Georgio Palatino Duci penitus committit. Idem, ibid. folio D 5 verso. The author of the Bibliothecæ Universelle, tom. 8. pag. 501. imagined, that two persons were meant here, viz. the Bishop of Spire, and the Elector Palatine, whereas there is but one person.

(8) Majus in Vita Reuchlini, folio D 5.

(9) Idem, ibid.

* See the critical remark § β.

forced him once to give satisfaction to an honest man, whom he had calumniated ; but they could not oblige him to it, without making use of a very remarkable method ; which was, to deprive his whole convent of the benefit of begging [C]. He did not reap all the advantage which he expected from the action he brought in against Reuchlin ; he was obliged to go to Rome on account of this action ; and notwithstanding the large sums of money quemadmodum Joannes Baptista in gratuitis. Jacobus Hochstratus in suo de invocatione Sanctorum libello, hæreticum pronunciauit ad Scripturam confugere : & alius quidam Theologus palam concionari non erubuit, consuetudinem potius sequendam esse quam Scripturam Diuinam, adhuc prænominatus Hochstratus Hæreticorum (ut vocant) Magister in opere suo contra Lutheranos, inquit in hæc verba : " Scimus enim consecratione super debita materia facta Christum esse in Sacramento, non autem quod sub hac vel illa determinata hostia Christus contineatur, quia, ut subdit, hæreticum est fidem infallibilem & infusam ad talia particularia per certitudinem extendere ;" eademque ratione concludit, credendum esse remissionem peccatorum in generali, neminem autem in particulari sibi esse peccata dimissa. An non est hoc vere magistrum Hæreticorum esse ? i. e. " The Divines of Cologne have even in this age publickly taught, that Aristotle was Christ's forerunner in natural things, even as John the Baptist was in things relating to the Gospel. James Hochstrat asserts, in his little book of the Worship of Saints, that it is an heresy to have recourse to the Scripture ; and another Divine was not ashamed to preach publickly, that we ought to conform to what is established, rather than to the holy Scripture ; and the same Hochstrat, the Master of the Heretics as he is called, speaks thus in his book against Luther. We know that when a proper matter is duly consecrated, Christ is in the Sacrament ; but yet we do not know that he is actually present in this or that particular Host ; because, adds he, it is an heresy, to extend that infallible and infused faith to such determinate objects : By the same way of reasoning he asserts, that we ought to believe the remission of sins in general, but that no person ought to believe that his sins, in particular, are forgotten. Is not this, being the Master of Heretics with a witness ?" R E M. CRIT.

[C] The whole Convent was deprived of the benefit of begging. It is in Erasmus's Letters that we meet with this curious particular. Count Nevenar, a man of a distinguished character who was learned himself and a patron of the learned, resented very much the slanders which James Hochstrat had published against him ; he omitted nothing to oblige that Divine to give him satisfaction : he made use of the strongest arguments ; the had recourse to advices, to reproaches, to threatenings ; but all in vain. At last he and his relations forbade all their tenants, to give the Dominicans eggs and cheese. The Fryars imagined that these would be but idle threatenings, and continued to go and beg upon these Gentlemens estates ; but they were most terribly repulsed ; so that they were for a whole year deprived of the sustentance they used to receive from that quarter. At last they obliged Hochstrat to give the Count satisfaction, by a solemn retraction, several copies of which were dispersed abroad. Erasmus, who had one, found something very comical in that retraction : for the Monk repeating word for word the reproaches with which he had loaded the Count of Nevenar, did yet protest that he always had a very good opinion of the Count (3). The reader will not be displeased to meet here with the Latin passage from Erasmus (15). Hermannus Comes à Nova Aquila indigne tulerat se notatum ab Jacobo Hochstrato Dominicano. Is erat Rabinus, Prior Monasterii quod Colonie sanè quàm magnificum est & opulentum. Non potuit hominem comperere, donec illius cognati denuntiarint Dominicanis, ne posthac colligerent caseos in ulla ditone vel Comitibus cognatorum illius. Illi rati minas esse inanes, clam tentarunt solito more venire ad ova & caseos. Factus est in illos impetus terribilis. Hoc damno totum annum multati sunt ; itaque factum est, ut Jacobus à suis coactus pacis leges acceperit. Habeo illius palinodiam, in qua cum recitet verba plena contumelie quæ scripserat in Comitibus, tamen affirmat ac propemodum dejerat, se semper de Comite præclare sensisse (16). Bella palinodia, scurrâ quam Theologo dignior. Such a recantation became a buffoon rather than a Divine. Erasmus observes in another place, that it is to no purpose to argue with those, who persecute the Belles Lettres ; he meant chiefly the Monks and their favourers. These people, added he, are unconquerable, through the help of their factions, clamours, and artifices ; nothing but a stick and hunger can conquer them (17), and he quotes for an instance Count Nevenar's conduct with regard to James Hochstrat. *Isti numero, phalangibus, syncretismo, improbitate, clamoribus, adde si libet fucis ac malis artibus, prorsus inuicti sunt : Nec alia re quàm fustibus ac fame domari queunt. Sic vir clarissimus Hermannus à Novaquila Comes adegit Jacobum Hogestratum ad abjectionem & scurrilem palinodiam, cujus exemplar apud me est. Quibus, inquires, præsidii ? Non argumentis, non æquis rationibus, non monitis, non minis, non conviciis ; nihil enim eorum non frustra tentatum fuit. Sed quibus præsidii ? Caseis & ovis, quorum in ditone Comitibus colligendorum jus illis ademptum fuerat (18). i. e. " These men (the Monks) are unconquerable by their number, squadrons, union, wickedness, clamours, and, if you will, by their craft and artifices. Nor can they be turned but by blows and hunger. Thus the most eminent Herman, Count of Nevenar, forced James Hochstrat to make a mean and disgraceful recantation, a copy of which I have got. By what means, you will ask ? Not by arguments, nor good reasons, nor advices, nor threatenings, nor reproaches, though all this was tried, but to no purpose. By what means then ? By depriving the Convent of the right of going to beg for eggs and cheese in the Count's territories." Erasmus was in the right to observe that Count Nevenar had made use of reproaches. For can there be any thing stronger than these words ? *Unica, crede mihi, pestis est in Germania Jacobus Hochstratus, quam si restrinxeris isus wála malós. Homo præter ingentem suam audaciam insigniter impudens atque temerarius. Omnes interroga, si libet, per Germaniam doctos viros. Omnes lasti, omnibus æque infestus est (19). i. e. " Believe me, the only plague in Germany is James Hochstrat ; if you do but restrain him, all will be quiet ; for besides his excessive audaciousness, he is extremely impudent and indilcreet. Ask all the learned men in Germany many. He has abused them all, and is equally hated by all." This is what Count Nevenar represents to Charles V in an oration, in which he congratulates him, in the name of the Students in Germany, upon his accession to the Roman Crown ; that is, upon his being elected King of the Romans. He had exhorted him a little before to command the Monks not to meddle with any thing but the rules and ceremonies of their order. *Fraterculos quosdam magnis titulis insanientes, jube suorum Cœnobiorum curam gerere, jube domi Fratribus suis regendis operam impendere, sacris faciendis invigilare (20). i. e. " Bid those Monks, who grow mad through ambition, to take care of their Convent, to govern their brethren at home, and to apply themselves to their religious rites and ceremonies."

§ (3) We have seen above, in the quotation (9), that when the Divines of Cologne condemned a certain work of Reuchlin to the flames, they inserted the following clause in their sentence ; Citra tamen Autoris contumeliam. i. e. " Without pretending to cast a brand upon the Author." And here, one of these same Divines, giving satisfaction to Count Nevenar, whom he had slandered in several libels, declares that he is so much the readier to take this step, as he always infinitely honoured and esteemed the Count. According to the notions which the Divines of Cologne and Hochstrat had, the conduct of the latter is not more inconsistent than that of the former : For it is grounded on an ancient custom established in all the Courts of Judicature in Germany, in which when the clause Salvo honore, i. e. " without prejudice to his reputation ;" is inserted in the sentence by which a man is condemned to pay any fine whatsoever, such a fine is not in the least disgraceful. R E M. CRIT.]

(15) Erasmi. Epist. 29. lib. 19. pag. 841.

(16) There is a more complete account of this in the 31st Letter of the 22d book, pag. 1096.

(17) We ought not to say of this kind of devils, that they do not go out but by prayer and fasting : leave out the prayer and mention only fasting.

(18) Erasmi. Ep. 1. lib. 20. pag. 953.

(19) Hermannus Nevenarius d. ann. 1519. in Comitibus Francofurtensibus Carolo Austriaco electo Romanorum Regi, nomine studiorum Germaniæ adgratularetur, apud Valer. Andream, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 413.

(20) Apud eundem. Val. Andream, ibid.

money he had provided himself with, he had all the trouble imaginable to avoid being condemned [D]. He was even in danger of his life on his return [E]; for Reuchlin's friends began already to make use of violent means against him. He deserved perhaps that

[D] He was obliged to go to Rome on account of the action he brought in against Reuchlin; and notwithstanding large sums of money... he had all the trouble imaginable to avoid being condemned.] I have observed

(21) In the remark [A].

(22) July 20, 1516. Not. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 474.

(23) Majus, Not. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 474, 475.

(24) Ibid. pag. 478, & seq.

(25) Ibid. pag. 477.

(26) See the article FOULQUES, remark [L].

(27) Hermannus Buschius Paphilus, in Epist. ad Reuchlin, apud Majum, Not. in Vit. Reuchlini, pag. 404.

(28) In the Dialogue intitled, Hochstratus O-vans, he is introduced speaking thus; Necessè habui vulgatam incedere viam, egerè literis commendatitii, pecuniis niti & largitionibus immodicis, ut magnè sunt opes nobis mendacia struere contra insentem, quæ non insolens, neque imperite confixi, atque baud diffidenter credita sunt Romanensibus. Apud Majum, ibid. pag. 465.

(29) He was President or Chairman of the Commission.

se palam omnibus Ecclesiam esse diſtant, sine se in rebus fidei Papam nihil decernere nec posse, nec debere, conclamant. Nihil hercle fecius aut honorificentius de Summo Pontifice loquuntur, quam de puero sub ferula adhuc vivente, cui nihil nisi ad pædagogii sui nutum integrum sit aut liberum loqui (30). i. e. "Sometimes they except against Cardinal Grimani, as though he was an ignorant man; and sometimes they traduce him as though he had always been suspected of heresy. Besides, these most wicked men dare to boast openly, that if the cause be not determined at Rome on their side, they will separate from the Church and from the Pope. and raise a new schism. Others say, that whatever the Pope shall determine against them, will be void, and that he, who differs from them and from their opinion, is not to be held a Pope. Their blind and inconsiderate arrogance goes so far, that they are not ashamed to challenge the Pope himself as their enemy; they declare before all the world that they are the Church, and pretend that the Pope neither ought nor can determine any thing in matters of faith without their consent. Nay they speak as disrespectfully of the Pope, as of a school-boy, who is still under the rod, and who is not permitted nor free to speak any thing, but according to his master's will and pleasure."

[E] He was even in danger of his life on his return.] If he had not had notice beforehand of the ambuscade which the Reuchlinists had prepared for him, on the road from Nuremberg to Cologne, he would certainly have fallen into it; and even after he had notice of it, it would not have been in his power to escape the snare, had he not been provided with a safe conduct, which he obtained from the Marquess of Brandenburg. Mr. Majus confesses all this. Non tantum bonorum odium, says he (31), sed ingens præterea periculum sibi accessit, quod vix ac ne vix quidem evasit. Nam cum Roma discedens Noribergam iter fecisset, Coloniæ inde perreçturus, insidiæ ipsi à Reuchlinistis parabantur, quas, si præmonitus non fuisset, certe baud effugisset. Ac ne sic quidem excessisset, evasisset, nisi Marchionis Brandenburgensis salvo conductu à persequentibus tutus fuisset.

[F] It is not true that he met with the fate which Paul Jovius mentions.] He pretends that the satires which Reuchlin published against the barbarous stile of the Monks, vexed James Hochstrat to such a degree, that he died with grief; and that those satires obliged that Inquisitor's friends to apply, in their distress, to the Court of Rome, for a prohibition to sell and print those satires. Paul Jovius means the Obscurorum virorum Epistolæ: i. e. "The Letters of obscure men:" he pretends that Reuchlin is the author of them, and he gives us such a notion of them as is not very honourable to the Monks in general, and particularly to Reuchlin's persecutors. Admirabili facetiarum lepore conditæ, quibus ad excitandum risum, cucullatorum Theologorum ineptissimè, atque ideo ridiculè Latina lingua scribentium, stylum exprimitur. Ulciscatur enim insistanti nomini suo turbam, jactantissimo satyræ illudentis genere, quam maligna cucullatorum conspiratione tanquam Judæis parum æquus hostis, ac ex animo planè recutitus impietatis accusaretur (32). i. e. "These letters are written in the most humorous and pleasant manner; for in order to make the reader laugh, the author has imitated the stile of the Monkish Divines, who write most sillily, and ridiculously in Latin. Thus he revenged himself of that whole tribe, who hate him, by a most agreeable kind of satire; for he had been represented by a wicked conspiracy of the Monks, as a man who played booty when he pretended to write against the Jews, being himself a Jew in heart." The best method to prove that this Historian is mistaken is, by observing that James Hochstrat survived Leo X and Reuchlin. It is therefore false, 1. that the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum having made this Inquisitor die with grief, his friends and accomplices petitioned Leo X to condemn that work. 2. That Reuchlin, in order to evade Leo X's prohibition, composed a second volume of letters sharper than the former, and published them with another title. Here follow

(30) Idem Buschius, in Epist. ad Reuchlin, apud Majum, ibid.

(31) Annot. in Vit. Reuchlini, pag. 477.

(32) Jovius, in Elegiis, cap. 143, pag. m. 285.

that kind of death, which, according to Paul Jovius, carried him off; but it is not true that he met with that fate which this Historian mentions [F]. He did not die with grief for being ridiculed in the satyrs of his adversaries. He was one of the first that wrote against Luther [G], and one of Erasmus's persecutors [H]. In a word, if a man was but an enemy of the unintelligible jargon of the schools, this was sufficient to draw upon him Hochstrat's indignation and anger. He died at Cologne in the year 1527 (d). There are several works of his extant, most of which relate to his controversies with Reuchlin and Luther. There was a very severe epitaph made upon him [I].

He

follow these two falsities of Paul Jovius. Hic liber avide coemptus & vulgatus adeo graviter calumniatores ejus ordinis percussit, ut conjurationis princeps Hochstratus letali dolore faucibus interierit; & reliqui astuantes à Leone suppliciter impetrarunt, ut edito divendi, atque imprimi ceteretur; sed editi majestatem Reuchlinus falso ingenio ludificatus, secundum Epistoliarum volumen, tanquam ex titulo minime vetitum, altero quidem aculeatius impressoribus tradidit, ita ut cucullati miserè cum Hydra lucentes, animos in ea lite desponderint (33). It will perhaps be objected that notwithstanding these two chronological errors, it may still be true, that the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum were the occasion of James Hochstrat's death. I answer, that absolutely speaking it is false that they produced that effect; for they were published at least ten years before this Monk's death. He died in the year 1527, and I have read in a letter dated August the 16th 1517 that Erasmus did very much dislike those letters (34). One might carry these critical observations still further, for it is very probable that they were written by Hutten (v) (35)

(31) Valer. And. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 411. See the passage quoted from Erasmus in the remark [H].

(33) Idem, ibid.

(34) Marespere m. li. d. p. 10. Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum. Erasmi. Epist. ad Joann. Casarium, inserta Lamentationibus Obscurorum virorum, citante Majus, Notis in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 425.

(35) Jacob. Thomisius in Præfatione ad Pauli Manutii Epistolæ certâ fide explorata se habere asserit, Hutterum esse earum auctorem. i. e. James Thomisius asserts in his Preface to his Notes on Manutius's Epistles, that he knows certainly that these Letters were written by Hutten.

(36) Majus, in Vita Reuchlini.

(* This is inconsistent with what is asserted by Erasmus himself above, quotation (34).

(§) Bibliothecæ Germanicæ, tom. 3. pag. 302.

(37) Maimbourg, Hist. du Luthéran. liv. 1. pag. 30. under the year 1513. He quotes Luth. contra Jac. Hyst. tom. 1.

I am less surprized that Paul Jovius committed these blunders, than to see that Mr. Majus has inserted them as unquestionable facts in his life of Reuchlin, and that he did not perceive he contradicted himself. He supposes that when the Speculum Oculare had been burnt at Cologne, Reuchlin finding himself attacked in several satyres, published, in order to revenge himself, those Letters of obscure Men, which soon occasioned James Hochstrat's death. Hic liber adeo graviter calumniatores Colonienfes percussit, ut conjurationis caput Hochstratus PAULO POST letali dolore confectus faucibusque intumescere habere asserit (36). i. e. "The slanderers of Cologne were so vexed at this book, that James Hochstrat, the chief promoter of the conspiracy, died SOON AFTER with grief." Mr. Majus relates afterwards that Reuchlin appealed to the Pope, and that James Hochstrat went to Rome on that account, and was like to fall into his enemies ambush on his return to Cologne.

(v) The Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum were written by Hutten. We are persuaded that the reader will not be displeas'd to meet here with a passage, which will acquaint them with the chief and true author of those letters. "All the world is acquainted with the book intitled Epist. obs. Vir. but men are not agreed about the person or persons to whom we are indebted for that satyr. It is generally believed that Ulric Hutten is the author of it; and it is true that he had a considerable share in them. But nobody ever thought of JOHN CROTUS, who was contemporary with Luther and his friend, and who afterwards returned into the pale of the Church of Rome, being persuaded to it by the Cardinal and Archbishop Albert. Mr. John Christopher Olearius has met with and just published a letter to this John Crotus: it was written to him since his last changing his religion; which is objected to him in an ironical manner, by one of his intimate friends, whose name is unknown. He wonders that the author of the Epistolæ Obscurorum virorum should have turned a Courtier to Albert, and a Protector of the Monks; he puts him in mind of the love he always had for that work, and adds that Erasmus esteem'd it so much, that he learnt two letters of it by heart (*). Mr. Olearius promises to publish John Crotus's life with his letters (§)." ADD. REM.]

[G] He was one of the first that wrote against Luther. He followed a wrong method, if we may credit Father Maimbourg, who asserts, that "what rendered Luther's cause more plausible still was, that James Hochstraten, a Dominican Inquisitor, writing against him, exhorted the Pope not to make use any more against such a wicked man of any argument but fire and sword, to rid the world the sooner of him (37)." I shall now transcribe a passage from Valerius Andreas, which affords me at once both a proof of the assertion in my text, and a matter of censure. Primo inter in Lutherum calamum strinxit: ob id tum ab hæreticis quos in primis oderat, tum etiam ab aliis vitæ atque ingenii liberioris, ut tunc tempora ferebant, scriptis laceffit, & nominatim à Joan. Reuchlino sive Capnione Epistolis quas obscurorum virorum titulo vulgavit (38). i. e. "He is one of the first who exerted his pen against Luther; for which not only the heretics, whom he hated above any other men, but also some, whose life and genius was too free, as times went then, attacked him in their writings, and especially Reuchlin, in his Letters of Obscure Men." The war which the Monks carried on against Reuchlin began before Luther ever attacked the indulgences, and ended of itself, when Luther declared against Rome. Reuchlin continued united with the strongest party, and never meddled with the Lutheran controversy. It is therefore absolutely false, that he abused Hochstrat in several satirical pieces, to punish him for being one of the first that wrote against Luther. The Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum were published before the Protestant Reformation began. Whence it appears that Valerius Andreas is fully convicted of an anachronism. Let us observe that Hochstrat's exhortation to the Pope against Luther are a very evident proof of his passionate temper. Erasmus wrote a letter to him (39) in the year 1519, which abounds with very good advices concerning the inexcusable bitterness he met with in Hochstrat's writings against Reuchlin. Concerning Hochstrat's proceedings with regard to Luther, see Erasmus's letters (40).

[H] And one of Erasmus's persecutors. This is what we find in the following words (41). Aliquot ex hostium numero perierunt: Lovanii Egmondanus Carmelita vomitu profocatus... Colonia perit Jacobus Hochstratus coryphæus hujus tragædiæ, qui tamen in morte dicitur nonnullis verbis prodidisse parum sinceram conscientiam. i. e. "Some of my adversaries are dead. Egmondanus the Carmelite was choaked in vomiting... At Cologne died James Hochstrat, the ring-leader of this tragical plot, who yet is said to have discovered by some words which he spoke, when he was dying, that he was not very sincere in his religion." Erasmus complains in the letter, in which he gives this inquisitor such good advice, that he had been abused by him, on account of his opinion concerning the dissolving of marriages (42).

[I] There was a very severe epitaph made upon him. Paul Jovius transcribes it. Hochstrati autem tumulo, says he (43), hoc nobile carmen Capnionis puer affixit (v).

*Hic jacet Hochstratus, viventem ferre patique
Quem potuere mali, non potuere boni.
Crescite ab hoc taxi, crescant aconita sepulcro:
Ausus erat, sub eo qui jacet, omne nefas.*

i. e. "Capnion's footman put the following noble epitaph on Hochstrat's tomb. Here lyeth Hochstrat; when he was alive the wicked could bear with and suffer him, good men could not. Let Yew and Monksbane grow over his tomb: for he, who lyeth here, dared any wicked attempt."

§ (v) Reuchlin, as all the world knows, died in the year 1523. Now if the author of these verses, as it is here asserted, was actually Reuchlin's servant, when Reuchlin died, these verses could not be made upon Hochstrat's real death, which did not happen till the year 1527. But the truth of the matter with regard to this pretended epitaph is as follows. About the year 1515 was published in 4to the first volume of these famous Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum, containing only forty one letters. The second edition also in 4to does not contain any more. But the third edition,

(38) Val. And. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 412.

(39) It is the last of the 16th book.

(40) The 18th of the 26th book, pag. 1249.

(41) Erasmi. Epistol. lib. 19. pag. 829. It is dated in May 1527.

(42) See the pag. 740. of Erasmus's Letters, of the London edition.

(43) Jovius, in Elogiis, pag. 236.

He did not do the Divines of Paris much honour, when he published at Cologne the judgment they gave against Luther in the year 1521, concerning the false Dionysius Areopagita [K].

edition, which was also in 4to, and which, if we may judge of it by the letter it is printed in, was published soon after the two former, contains an Appendix of eight letters, the last of which, which is under the name of Hochstrat, and dated from Rome, contains four pasquils in the form of epitaphs made for himself; the first of four lines, the second and third of one distich each, and the fourth of four lines like the first. Now the pretended epitaph transcribed by Paul Jovius is nothing else but the second of these pasquils, to which are prefixed the two first lines of the fourth.

Some unknown persons, who, as Hochstrat relates in this epistle, met him one day in the streets of Rome, dropt a paper at his feet. He took it up, and found in it several fatyrical epitaphs upon his pretended death, from which epitaphs that, which Paul Jovius gives us, has been made up. So that it is so far from being true, that this epitaph was composed upon and after Hochstrat's death, that on the contrary it is only an imitation of the following one, which Politianus made against his enemy Mabilus Marullus:

*Fleat viator iter, sciet * nam patre Mabil Hac fovea corpus conditur atque animus.*

i. e. "Go another way, traveller, for the stinking

"and rotten corps of Mabilus lyeth here in this grave
"with his soul."

This epitaph of Mabilus, who yet survived Politianus, is to be found amongst the latter's poems; and the reason which Monsieur Bayle gives for it, is, that one may abuse a man so outrageously in an epitaph, and meet with such a fruitful field that way, that several Poets have falsely supposed their adversary's death, that they might make an advantage of this common topic. This reflexion, which Mr. Bayle makes in the remark [O] of the article POLITIANUS, gives us the key of this pretended epitaph, Hic jacet Hochstratus, &c. which as we have observed, was written ten years, more or less, before Hochstrat's death, and in the heat of his controversy with Reuchlin. CRIT. REM.]

[K] He published at Cologne the judgment of the Divines of Paris... concerning the false Dionysius Areopagita. It was in the year 1521. You will meet with this judgment in the second volume of Luther's works, of the Jena edition. You may also meet with other editions of it. Father Nourri was therefore in the wrong to imagine, that he published it for the first time, when he inserted it in his Apparatus ad Bibliothecam maximam veterum Patrum, in the year 1624 (44).

(44) See the Acta Eruditor. of Leipzig; the 2d vol. of the Suppl. pag. 737.

HODGES (NATHANIEL), an eminent English Physician in the seventeenth Century, was son of Dr. Thomas Hodges Vicar of Kensington near London, and Dean of Hereford [A]. He was educated at Westminster school, and became a Student of Christ Church in Oxford in the year 1648 by the favour of the Visitors (a). February the 13th 1651 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b); May the 31st 1654 that of Master of Arts (c); and June the 4th 1659, accumulated the Degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Physic (d). Upon his settling in London he gained a very considerable practice; and continued there during the plague in 1665; an account of which he published in Latin in 1672 [B]. April the 2d the same year he was chosen Fellow of the College of Physicians at London (e). Besides the treatise abovementioned he published at London 1660 in 8vo another intitled, Vindiciæ Medicinæ & Medicorum: An Apology for the Profession and Professors of Physick, &c. In the latter part of his Life he fell into very unfortunate circumstances, and was confined for debt in Ludgate-prison, where

[A] Son of Dr. Thomas Hodges Vicar of Kensington near London, and Dean of Hereford. This Dr. Hodges was a Preacher some time before the Long-Parliament, and was afterwards a Member of the Assembly of Divines, and took the Covenant (1). After the Restoration he became Vicar of St. Peter's Cornhill, and in 1661 Dean of Hereford in the room of Dr. Herbert Crofts, made Bishop of that Sec. He held this Deanery to his death, and was succeeded in it by Dr. George Benson, in 1672. He hath extant, I. A Glimpse of God's Glory, a sermon preached before the House of Commons at a solemn Fast, September 28, 1642, on Psal. cxliii. 5, 6. London, 1642, in 4to. II. The Growth and Spreading of Heresy, a fast Sermon before the House of Commons, March 10, 1646, on Pet. ii. 1. London, 1647, in 4to. III. Inaccessible Glory: or the Impossibility of seeing God's face whilst we are in the body; a Sermon preached at the funeral of Sir Theodore de Mayerne, in the Church of St. Martin's in the Fields, on Friday the 30th of March 1655, on Exod. xxxiii. 20. London, 1655, in 4to.

[B] An account of which he published in Latin, in 1672. It was printed at London in 8vo, under the title of ΔΟΙΜΟΛΟΓΙΑ; sive Pestis nuperæ apud Populum Londinensem grassantis Narratio Historica. Authore Nathanelio Hodges, M. D. & Colleg. Londin. London; 1672, in 8vo. The Dedication to Sir George Ent, President, Dr. Baldwin Hamsey, Dr. Francis Gliffon, Dr. Alexander Fraiser, Dr. Timothy Clerke, Dr. John Micklewait, Sir Charles Scarborough, and Dr. G. Bevoir, Fellows of the College of Physicians, is dated from his house in the parish of St. Stephen's Walbrook, January 1, 1672. There are prefixed to it commendatory Poems in Latin by Henry Bagshaw, D. D. John Lawson, M. D. and Adam Littleton, D. D. A translation of it into English was printed at London in 1720, in 8vo, under the following title: Loimologia: or an Historical Account of the Plague in London in 1665, with precautionary Directions against the like Contagion. By Nath. Hodges, M. D. and Fellow of the College of Physicians, who resided in the City all that time. To which is added an Essay on the different Causes of Pestilential Diseases, and how they become contagious. With Remarks on the Infection now in France, and the most probable Means to prevent its spreading here. By John Quincy, M. D. Dr. Quincy in the Preface observes, that this treatise of Dr. Hodges "contains the best account of the late visitation by the Plague here in England, of any hitherto extant; and though some readers may indeed observe, that the enthusiastic strain of the preceding times very much hurts his style and perspicuity; such an influence had the spirit of delusion, even over matters of science; however the affected peculiarities and luxuriations of that kind are here avoided. . . . As for what every person may do for his private safety, I have given several additional hints, either fuller or plainer than Dr. Hodges hath done. And because his antidotes and precautionary medicines are now obsolete, and not by much so elegant or easy to be procured, as the present practice and shops do supply, I have added some Formulae to be complied with or altered, as different exigencies and better judges may think fit." In a tract intitled, A Collection of very valuable and scarce Pieces relating to the last Plague in the year 1665, printed at London 1721, in 8vo, there is published An Account of the first Rise, Progress, Symptoms, and Cure of the Plague: being the Substance of a Letter from Dr. Hodges to a person of Quality: Dated from his house in Watlin-street, May 8, 1666.

H;

where he died in 1684. His body was interred in the Church of St. Stephen's Walbrook London, where a monument is erected to him. The Author of the Preface to A Collection of very valuable and scarce pieces relating to the last plague in the year 1665, printed at London 1721 in 8vo stiles our author a faithful Historian and diligent Physician, and tells us, that "he may be reckoned among the best observers in any age of Physic, and "has given us a true picture of the plague in his own time."

(a) Postea oribodoxa id sibi vindicavit Ecclesia, siquidem parentum cura frugis bonæ adolescens purioris aëris, hoc est fidei bauriendæ gratia, ad loca Evangelicæ ablegatus. Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 165.

HOE (MATTHIAS), a famous Lutheran Minister, was born at Vienna in the year 1580. He was sent so young to some Protestant College (a), that he found himself a Lutheran, before he had ever considered that he was born in the Church of Rome. He studied Divinity at Wittenberg, and as soon as the year 1602 he was called to the Court of Saxony to preach before the Elector. The next year they committed to his care the management of some churches in the Voigtländ; and after he had continued eight years in that post, he was sent to Prague in the year 1611, to be Superintendent of the German Churches there. Two years after he was again called to the Court of Saxony, and raised to the dignity of Ecclesiastical Counsellor and first Preacher to his Highness. He continued in these employments the remainder of his life, and died March the 4th 1645. He had taken his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Wittenberg in the year 1604. His marriage which lasted forty three years, and from which issued six sons and four daughters, made him full amends for all the vexations he might have from other quarters [A]. He was a Gentleman born (b); and his pen was so warlike, that it sufficiently shewed he did not degenerate. He published a great many books (c), some in Latin, the others in German. He would not in the least consent to a reunion of the Protestant Churches [B]. But it is laid to his charge, that for a sum of money he procured a reunion of some Princes of the Empire with the Emperor [C], to the great prejudice of the Protestants. What he published on the Revelation of St. John seems to be written by a man of a very turbulent spirit [D].

(b) Taken from Henning. Witte, Memor. Theol. renovat. pag. 1014, & seq.

(c) See the Catalogue of them apud eundem, pag. 1021.

I imagine that he was more sorry to see the Elector Palatine raised to the Throne of Bohemia,

[A] His marriage . . . made him full amends for all the vexations he might have from other quarters.] I have put the most favourable construction upon Witte's Latin words; for as they are a little dark, one might imagine his meaning was, that Matthias Hoe's marriage was so happy, that it afforded him more pleasures than vexations (1). This would be lessening the joys of that match. I choose therefore to follow the other interpretations, which is, that the advantages of it being put in the scale, with all the vexations to which the husband was otherwise exposed, the former would outweigh the latter: So that his dear spouse comforted him under all the vexations and all the troubles he had to encounter. He would therefore have deserved to be very much pitied, had he been a single man.

(1) Illius amore & convictu suavissimo totis visceribus nostris tribus & quadraginta annis, ut multo plura haberet de quibus gaudium quam dolorem conciperet. Henning, Witte, Memor. Theol. renovat. p. 1018.

[B] He would not in the least consent to a reunion of the Protestant churches.] Gustavus, a little before his death, had called together a number of Lutherans and Calvinists at Leipsic, in order to procure an agreement and reunion between them. The regard they paid to this Prince's authority made them separate in a friendly manner, and with great hopes of a peace; but his death made all their hopes vanish away. However Dury continued to use his best endeavours to procure the reunion, and went to Frankfort when the Protestants were met. But hereupon came a very passionate letter from Hoe against the Reformed, which did a great deal of harm. It is Grotius that acquaints us with this. *Rex Sueciæ magnus Gustavus . . . non multum ante mortem Lipsiæ conventum instituerat utriusque sententiæ Protestantium . . . Effecit sua auctoritate ut amice discederetur cum magna spe restituendæ unitatis. Sed tristis exitus tanti Regis sulubre hoc ceptum interfecit. Neque tamen defuit ejusdem negotii commendator ex Anglia Duræus, multorum Angliæ antistitum instructus literis, qui Francofurtum an Mænam venerat eo ipso tempore, cum ibi conventus Ordinum Protestantium haberetur. Sed rem per se difficilem implicatiorem etiam reddidit doctoris Hoi ex Aula Saxonica responsum immite in eos quos Calvinianor vocat (2). The Doctors of the Augsborg Confession infinitely extol the vigilance and care, with which he opposed the least innovation. They even assert that he exposed himself thereby to very great dangers. *In solis radiis pridem scriptum arbitror quos ille tuendæ fidei gratia pertulerit labores, quibus cum difficultatibus sit consuetatus, quæ subierit pericula, dum quidvis fatius censebat, quam ut quicquam in Germania de Evangelicæ Religionis integritate (quæ adversarum partium promachi contaminare sunt ausi) decederet ac minueretur (3). i. e. "I believe that all

(2) Grotius, Ep. 414. Part 1. pag. 165.

(3) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 165, 166. Henning, Witte, Memor. Theol. pag. 1016.

"the world has known this a great while, what pains he took to defend the faith, how many difficulties he had to struggle with, to what dangers he was exposed. for he would have done any thing rather than consent that the Evangelical Religion, which the ringleaders of the adversaries dared to defile, should suffer the least detriment in Germany."

[C] It is laid to his charge, that for a sum of money he procured a reunion of some Princes of the Empire with the Emperor.] In the year 1635 the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, made a treaty with the Emperor, and engaged in his party against the Crown of Sweden. This was the proper method to ruin all that Gustavus had done in Germany for the advantage of the Protestant Religion. It was thought, that the Emperor had sent a round sum of money to Dr. Hoe, to persuade him to remove all the difficulties and scruples, which such a peace might have raised in his mind. Puffendorf, whose words I quote, is my voucher. Arguebatur quoque Saxonicus Theologus Matthias Hoë decem uncialium millia à Casare accepisse, eximendis Principis sui animo serupulis, quos alias facile ista pax generare poterat (4).

(4) Puffendorf. Rer. Suecicar. lib. 7. pag. 123. See the Biblioth. Universelle, tom. 3. pag. 458.

[D] What he published on the Revelation of St. John seems to be written by a man of a very turbulent spirit.] We ought not in the least to doubt, considering what temper he was of, but his Commentaries on the Apocalyp were designed to raise a general war against the Church of Rome; that is to say, to lay all Europe under the most terrible distress that can befall it. However it be, the Bishop of Meaux () reckons him () Bossuet amongst those interpreters of the Apocalyp, who have no other design but to sound the trumpet of war. "The Lutherans, says he (5), were not more moderate than the Calvinists; and the chief Preacher at the Elector of Saxony's Court, named Matthias Hoe, published at Francfort (†) a book, the title of which was, The Condemnation and final Destruction of the prostitute, the Roman Babylon, or the Fifth book of a Commentary on the Revelations. The book itself does not betray less passion than the title; and "this is, what was dispersed through Germany, and "in the North." The Bishop of Meaux has extracted this from a letter written by an Arminian Minister, from which I shall transcribe a passage, because it contains several other particulars proper for this article. "I have the Catalogue of the books that were to be "sold at the last fair at Frankfort: it contains a great "many polemical books against Popery, and amongst "others one with this title: Judicium & excidium Meretricis

(5) In his Explication de l'Apocalypse, pag. 2. of the Advertisement, Dutch edition.

(†) It was printed at Leipsic.

Bohemia, than to see him a fugitive after the battle of Prague; for it appears from a letter he wrote to a Lord of that country, that he did not like the project of giving the Crown of Bohemia to that Elector, and that he looked upon Calvinism as a kind of Antichrist, not much better than the Popish Antichrist [E].

“ Meretricis Babylonæ Romanæ, seu Commentariorum in Apocalypsin S. Johannis liber sextus, auctore Matthia Hobe Doctore Theologo. Lipsiæ in 4to. This Hoe is the chief Preacher at the Elector of Saxony’s Court; he is of a noble family of Austria, and has been long ago suspected of being secretly a Papist. I wonder that at this time, and in the present situation of public affairs, he should think it proper to write against Popery in so smart and odious a stile, especially, since the Elector of Saxony always endeavoured to preserve the Emperor’s good will towards his house (6).” Hoe began his work on the Revelation in the year 1610 (7), and finished it in the year 1640. It contains eight books, which have been reprinted at Leipzig, in Folio, in the year 1671. One will never be able to prevent factions and turbulent men from making a wrong use of the dark and difficult passages in St. John’s Revelation, with a design to raise a war. They do not like peace; they long for war; in which they run not the least danger themselves, and find means to make themselves necessary. It is not improbable, but they, that are at the helm, find their account in such turbulent men; they look upon them as proper persons to rouse the people’s spirits and hopes, by putting sometimes one sense and then another upon the prophecies, according as the state of the public affairs requires it. Such turbulent men are indeed to be dreaded, and therefore their masters shew some regard for them.

[E] It appears from a letter he wrote . . . that he looked upon Calvinism as a kind of Antichrist, not much better than the Popish Antichrist.] This Letter has been printed. Read the following passage from the Memorabilia Ecclesiastica, or Remarkable Events in the Church, during the XVIIth Century. Cum in eo essent occupati Bohemæ Proceres, Legatis Moraviæ, Silesiæ & Lusatiæ præsentibus, ut Fridericum quintum, Electorem Palatinum, sacris Calvinianis addictum, in Regem suum eligerent, Mathias Hœ, t. i. Concionator Aulicus Dresdenfis, Epistolam sub 23. Aug. scripsit ad Joachimum Andream Slikium, qua (postmodum typis excusa) vir celeberrimus fidelissimè monuit, ut quid, præsertim intuitu religionis, Ordines isti facerent, facere saltem deberent, probe perpendant. Inter alia spiritum Calvinisticum appellans Anti-Christum Orientalem, atque componens cum Occidentali, ut non multò meliorem, allegante Hoornbeekio in Summa Controversiarum religionis, libro nono de Luberanis p. m. 699. i. e. “When the States of Bohemia were deliberating, before the Embassadors of Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia, about raising to the throne the Elector Palatine Frederic V, who was a zealous Calvinist, Matthias Hœ, at that time Preacher to the Court at Dresden, wrote about the 23d of August, a Letter to Joakim Andrew Slikius, which has since been printed; in this Letter that most celebrated man advised the States duly to weigh and consider whatever they should do, or at least ought to do, especially with regard to religion. Amongst other things, he called the Calvinistical spirit the Eastern Antichrist, and compared it with the Western Antichrist, as not being much better, as Hoornbeek relates, in his Sum of Religious Controversies, book the IXth, of the Lutherans, p. 699.” It is probable that the Author I quote did not see that Letter, since he mentions it only upon Hoornbeek’s credit.

(6) Charles de Nielles, in his Letter to Uytendogaerd, dated from the Castle of Louvestein, June the 3d 1628. It is the DCXXXVII in the folio edition of the Epistola Ecclsi. & Theol.

(7) He published then the 1st book; the last was printed in the year 1640. See Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 171.

(a) He is always called Hoelzlin in his Funeral Oration.

HOELZLIN (a) (JEREMY) Greek Professor in the University of Leyden, was born at Nuremberg. He applied himself with so good a success to the Greek and Latin Tongues at Augsburg, that he excelled all his school-fellows in both these Languages. He afterwards studied Philosophy in the University of Altorf. His method of studying, differed very much from that of the other students; he did not much mind what was read in the public Lectures; but as he understood the Greek tongue very well, he would read the original authors themselves, and the ancient interpreters of Aristotle, as Themistius, Alexander of Aphrodisium, Symplicius, Ammonius, &c. He did not study Aristotle only, he applied himself also to understand Plato, and was a great admirer of the Stoics. After he had spent eight years in this kind of study, he took his degree of Doctor of Philosophy, and applied himself to the study of Divinity, and of the Hebrew Tongue. He was afterwards Rector or Principal of a College at Amberg in the upper Palatinate. He was forced to leave that place, and to retire to Bremen, having been robbed of the best part of all he had in the world. Count Bentheim designed to make him Principal of his College at Rhede, but dying immediately, the City of Ham offered our Hoelzlin the like employment. But as the Emperor’s soldiers were committing very great disorders in that country, he would not expose himself to their outrages. He looked therefore for a more secure harbour, and found it in Holland. He retired to Leyden, where he published a Translation of the Psalms, which was judged to be accurate. The University did him the honour to retain him, when he was called to Middleburg and to the Brill [A]. They judged him worthy to appear on a greater stage, and raised him to the Professorship of the Greek Tongue, which Vossius had lately resigned. He undertook to translate Apollonius Rhodius [B], and notwithstanding his distempers he

[A] He was called . . . to the Brill.] He was actually Rector of the College of the Brill, if we may depend upon Vossius, whose words I am so much the more ready to transcribe, as they want to be corrected, since the surname of our author has been wretchedly corrupted, not without a very gross solecism. Vossius had just been observing, that Anthony Æmilius refused the Professorship of the Greek tongue, which the Curators of the University of Leiden had offered him; then he adds: Arbitror professionem eam deinceps offerendam Mag. Jeremia Hoelzlin quondam correctori Ambergensis Gymnasii Electoralis Collegæ Beckmani: nunc Brilana est Scholæ Rector. Vir est moribus simplex, sed trium linguarum & Philosophiæ admodum gnarus (1). i. e. “I believe that this Professorship ought next to be offered to Jeremy Hoelz (Hoelzlin), formerly Sub-Principal in the Electoral College at Amberg, and Beckman’s colleague; and now Rector of the College at the Brill; he is a very plain man in his way of living, but very well skilled in three languages and in Philosophy.”

[B] He undertook to translate Apollonius Rhodius.] The edition of this Poet, with Hoelzlin’s Translation and Commentary, was published at Leiden in the year 1641 by Elsevir, ex Officina Elseviriana. Mons. Menage gave it in a very indifferent character (2) He transcribes first these words of Monsieur Baillet. There are ancient scholia extant upon Apollonius . . . the new edition, which Jeremy Hoelzlin published of this Poet is esteemed by some; but others do not value it much more than

* It should have been Hoelzlin.

(1) Vossius, Ep. 148. ad Joann. Musonium, pag. 181. edit. Lond. 1693. This Letter is dated the 30th of August 1631.

(2) Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 389.

he completed it, having put the finishing hand to it six days before he died. He was dropical, and so weak, that he was not able to write any more; and yet he took this work so much to heart, that he dictated to another what he thought necessary to complete it. He died January the 25th 1641. He had been married a long while (b), but never had any children: upon which account they congratulate him in his funeral oration, because of the troubles and difficulties he met with, when the rage of the war forced him to leave his country (c).

(b) He married a Minister of Nuremberg's daughter.

(c) Taken from his Funeral Oration, delivered by Anthony Thyseus.

than several of those which are called Variorum. Monsieur Menage answers afterwards what relates to the Scholia or notes; and then he continues thus. "As for Jeremy Hotzlin, he is a wretched writer. He abounds with Hebraisms; he affects to make use of obsolete words, and invents new ones. I shall observe here by the by, that he mentions Conrad Ritterhusius as his patron. Conradus Ritterhusius, sanctissimus ille Juris interpret & vindex, idemque patronus olim meus, insigniter pius & constans animus (3). i. e. Conrad Ritterhusius, that most honest interpreter and asserter of the Law, formerly my patron, and my most affectionate and constant friend." He speaks thus in page 115. There are "at the end of his Apollonius some notes of Mr. Holstenius, which are very judicious." It is observed in Hoelzlin's Funeral Oration, that when he was at Altorf he had a great share in the friendship of Scipio Gentilis, Michael Picard, Conrad Ritterhusius, and Daniel Swenferus; and that as they wrote some Greek and Latin verses in his praise, he did the same in theirs; and that some of these verses have been printed. Cum quibus Græcis Latinisque carminibus certabat, quorum non pauca in lucem venerunt.

(3) It should be amicus.

HOESCHELIUS (DAVID) born at Augsburg April the 14th 1556, was a very learned man. The public is indebted to him for the editions of several ancient Greek authors [A]. He spent all his life-time in teaching the youth in the College of St. Ann, of which he was made Principal in the year 1593 by the Magistrates of Augsburg. They made him also their Library-keeper, and the care he took to enrich their Library cannot be sufficiently commended [B]. He was very well acquainted with the best manuscripts and with the best editions, and he took care that the manuscripts, which were bought for the ornament of that Library, should not lie buried there as a treasure hid under ground; he published the most scarce and curious of them, to which he added his own notes. He made very good scholars, and drew a great number of students to Augsburg (a) [C]. He died there in the year 1617. I shall relate what Scaliger said of him [D]. Monsieur Huet has commended our Hoeschelius, not only for the care he took

(a) Taken from Spizelius, in Templo honoris referato, pag. 328. and from Freher. Theatr. p. 1512, 1512.

[A] The public is indebted to him for the editions of several ancient Greek authors.] He published Origen's eight books against Celsus, in Greek and Latin, at Augsburg, in the year 1603 in 4to. The wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach, or the Ecclesiasticus, in Greek and Latin, with notes, at Antwerp in the year 1604. Photius's Bibliotheca in Greek with notes, at Augsburg, in the year 1601, in folio. Procopius's History in Greek, with notes, in the same City, in the year 1607, in folio. These two last had never been printed before. Geographica aliquot excellentissimorum Auctorum Marciani, Scylacis, Artemidori, Dicæarchi. i. e. "The Geographical Works of some of the most eminent Authors, as Marcianus, Scylax, Artemidorus, Dicæarchus;" at Augsburg, in the year 1600, in 4to. Three or four treatises of Philo. Eclogæ Legationum Dexippi Atheniensis, Eunapii, P. Patricii, Prisci Sophistæ, Malchi Philad. Menandri, cum excerptorum corollis à libris Diodori Siculi amissis. i. e. "A choice Collection of the Embassies of Dexippus the Athenian, Eunapius, P. Patricius, Priscus the Sophist, Malchus Philad. Menander; with some extracts from Diodorus Siculus's books which are lost." At Augsburg, in the year 1603, in 8vo. Some treatises of the ancient Fathers, &c.

[B] The care he took to enrich their library cannot be sufficiently commended.] Spizelius acquaints us with this in the following Latin passage; in which the reader will see, that Anthony Eparchus Bishop of Corfu had made a collection of excellent manuscripts, which fell into Hoeschelius's hands. Cum insuper celebratissimæ Bibliothecæ Augustanæ administratio ipsi esset demandata, omni virium nisu ejus procuravit incrementum, nec ulli parcens labori, libros excusos pariter ac manuscriptos, maxime Græcos, melioris item notæ auctores, ac librorum editiones acquisivit, sicque Bibliothecam Augustanam veluti publicum aliquod Ærarium instruxit ad omnium promiscue indigentiam sublevandam. Et cum rarissimorum Codicum MSS. Græcorum, magno ære ab Antonio Eparcho Episcopo Corcyrensi coemptorum copiam esset consecutus, maximam curam adhibuit, ne thesaurus iste librarius in arcanis Bibliothecæ hujus recessibus veluti in perpetuo quodam custodiretur carcere, sed in publicam etiam lucem magno cum totius Reipublicæ literariæ bono & comodo prodiret (1). i. e. "When besides this the most famous library of Augsburg was committed to his care,

(1) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 330.

"he did all that lay in his power to increase it; nor did he spare any labour to make a collection both of printed books and of manuscripts, especially in the Greek tongues, as also of the best authors and of the best editions; thus he made the library of Augsburg a kind of public treasury to assist all those that wanted to consult it. And when he had procured the collection of the most scarce Greek manuscripts, bought for a large sum of money by Anthony Eparchus Bishop of Corfu, he took a great deal of care that this treasure should not lie useless and buried in some corner of the library as in a perpetual prison, but be published for the good, benefit, and use of the learned." The catalogue of the Greek manuscripts in that library, composed by Hoeschelius, and published in the year 1595, is a masterpiece in its kind (2).

(2) See Colomies, Bibliob. Cboisic, pag. 194.

[C] He made very good scholars, and drew a great many students to Augsburg.] I shall again make use of Spizelius's expressions. Quam præclare, says he (3), quamque feliciter demandatæ sibi functioni satisfecerit, plurimi testari possunt viri eruditi qui à variis Germaniæ, Italiæ, Belgicæ civitatibus Hoeschelii gratia Augustam se contulerunt, quibus viri hujus institutione uti, inque Lingua Græca proficere curæ & cordi fuit. Vere de illo dici potest, quod

(3) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 329, 330.

Mille foro dedit juvenes, bis mille ministrum Adjecit numero purpureaque togæ.

i. e. "How nobly and successfully he acquitted himself of his functions, can be testified by those learned men, who for his sake came to Augsburg from several cities in Germany, Italy and the Low Countries, and who were willing and took care to improve by his lectures, and to learn the Greek tongue from him. So that we may truly say of him, that he provided the Bar with a thousand young men, and furnished the Church with two thousand."

The Sieur Colomies names some travellers, who were extremely well pleased with him (4).

(4) Biblioth. Cboisic, pag. 195.

[D] I shall relate what Scaliger said of him.] Hoeschelius, a Lutheran, but a learned man: if Velfer did not support him, they would by this time have deprived and banished him. He is a great pedant, took to discover old manuscripts, but also for his skill and ability in translating them (b).

(b) Huetius, de Claris Interpret. pag. 229. See also Colomiés, Bibliob. Cboisfe, pag. 194. of the 1st edition, and pag. 202. of the second edition.

“ pedant, but a very good man. Scaliger sent him his copy of Procopius; but he got a more compleat one from the Library of Bavaria. Hoefchelius has printed in his Procopius some parts of my letters, and one of those of Casaubon. He is about publishing Orogen . . . Hoefchelius non est magnus Græcus, sed diligentissimus (5). i. e. “ Hoefchelius is no great Grecian, but a very studious man.”

(5) In Scaligeran secundis, pag. the 112.

(a) He succeeded to Tilemannus Heshufius in the year 1588. Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 622.

HOFFMAN (DANIEL) Superintendent and Professor at Helmstädt (a), was the head of a Theological party [A], which occasioned some troubles towards the end of the sixteenth Century. He raised difficulties against the formulary of union, which was to be subscribed by all the Divines, and instead of concurring with Doctor John Andreas to support that formulary, he had recourse to captious distinctions. He would not admit the doctrine of Ubiquity, but only of Christ's presence in several places. This controversy, which did not last long, left people's minds inclined to a division [B]. So that there was sometime after a controversy carried on with very much heat, Hoffman still being at the head of a party. Amongst other questions, they disputed concerning the use of Philosophical principles in Divinity; and it is remarkable that the Professors of Philosophy declared for the party which was the most favourable to the Orthodox [C], Daniel

[A] He was the head of a theological party.] This was the thirteenth schism that rose in the Lutheran Church. Decimi tertii schismatis autores Helmstadienses, interque eos præcipui Heshufius & Hoffmannus, pessimo exemplo extiterunt. Formula enim concordie cum subscribendum, & Apologia conscribenda esset, illi, livore dicam an protervia, pium J. Andreæ conatum spernentes, cum Christum exaltatum omnibus rebus ob realem idioma-communicationem deberent dicere præsentem, multi-præsentiam ejus saltem defendebant (1). i. e. “ The seventeenth schism was occasioned by the Divines of Helmstädt, and especially by these two ringleaders, Heshufius and Hoffman: which was of very dangerous consequence. For when the formulary of union and concord was to be subscribed, and an apology for it published, they, either out of spite, or out of arrogance, making no account of John Andreas's pious endeavours, maintained only that Christ is present in several places, whereas they should have acknowledged, that Christ since his exaltation is present every where, because of the communication of the attributes and properties of his two natures.” The Jesuit Adam Contzen observes under the year 1584, that Hoffman's adversary was Henry Julius Duke of Brunswick's preacher (2), and that this Prince being Administrator of the Bishopic of Halberstädt, commanded both parties to be quiet. See also what he observes in the year 1592.

(1) Micrælius, Synagm. Histor. Eccles. lib. 3. Sect. 2. pag. 871. edit. 1679.

(2) Hinc factum ut Daniel Hoffmannus Superintendens & Professor Helmstadiensis, & Basilii Staterus Henrici Julii Ducis Brunsvicensis concionator aulicus, graviter inter se de hoc dogmate contenderent. Adamus Contzen, in Jubilæo Jubilarum, pag. 234. See also pag. 236.

[B] . . . This controversy . . . left people's minds inclined to a division.] The first author I have quoted in the following remark proceeds thus: Sed in cineribus suffocata est controversia, cui utinam fomes novus postea non esset questus! Sopita jaceat cum altera illa, qua de resurrectione impiorum quærebatur, an virtute meriti Christi futura sit, necne? ut & cum illa, qua quærebatur, an semper in forma syllogistica disputari debeat: & cum aliis questionibus vexatis, de philosophiæ usu & abusu (3). i. e. “ But this controversy was soon suppressed; and would to God, that new disputes had not been raised afterwards! With this controversy let that also rest, which arose concerning the resurrection of the wicked, whether or not it will happen by vertue of Christ's merit? And that other question, whether or not we must always argue in form, and by syllogism? And those thread-bare disputes concerning the use and abuse of Philosophy.”

(3) Micrælius, Synagm. Hist. Eccles. pag. 871.

[C] The Professors of Philosophy declared for the party, which was the most favourable to the Orthodox.] This is the character, which James Thomafius gives them in one of his Prefaces. Celebris est, says he (4), quæ parentum nostrorum memoria Juliam concussit Academiam, Hofmanniana controversia, finiente seculo proximè præterito cæpta, ineunte hoc nostro seculo non sine Philosophorum, qui tum ab ðððððius partibus stabant, laude sopita. De qua nihil addam, tum quod ob recentiorum memoriam nemini res est ignota . . . tum maxime, quod in persona Theologi unius alteriusve inconsiderati, sanctissime scientiæ parcendum esse omnino existimo. i. e. “ The

(4) Thomafius, Prefat. 42. pag. 244.

University of Helmstädt has been troubled in our father's time by the famous Hoffmannian controversy, which began in the latter end of the last century, and was happily suppressed in the beginning of this; the Professors of Philosophy gaining a great reputation by declaring for the Orthodox. I shall not say any thing more of this controversy, both because it is so modern, that all the world is sufficiently acquainted with it . . . and because I am of opinion that we ought to have that regard for the most sacred science, as not to expose it, in the person of two or three inconsiderate Divines.” He examines in this discourse whether the same proposition can be true in Philosophy, and false in Divinity, as some persons pretended; and he observes, that amongst those, who dared to assert such a paradox, some were driven to it by an excessive respect for Aristotle, and others by an immoderate hatred for that Philosopher; these last were the Divines. Ad Theologos venio, è diverso planè affectu idem dogma defensantes. Non enim amore, sed odio Aristotelis, non veneratione, sed dedignatione Philosophorum, in istam temeritatem, ne quid gravius dicam, præcipitanti junct (5). i. e. “ I come now to the Divines, who asserted the same doctrine, namely, that the same proposition may be true in Philosophy, and false in Divinity, but from a quite different principle. For they came to this rashness and inconsiderateness, not to say any thing worse, not through their love but their hatred to Aristotle, not out of veneration but out of scorn for the Philosophers.” That the reader may the better know what was our Daniel Hoffman's opinion, I shall transcribe here another passage from Thomafius; it contains a particular which alone deserves to be mentioned. (6) Nisi enim fallor, infelix ilud & scandalo plenum certamen, quod nostra memoria super Quæstione: sine DEUS peccati causa per accidens? certatum fuit, è sepultæ Hofmannianæ controversiæ cineribus aut propul- lularit, aut videri saltem voluit propullulasse. Non planè ablutere à vero quæ dixi, facile (opinor) perspiciet, gili: aperta equi C. L. Viri, Pauli Slevogti Pervigilium de diffidio nim ibi litis, Theologi & Philosophi in utriusque principiis fundato, (hoc enim libello nomen est,) per-volutaverit (). Enimvero hic inter primos fuit, qui quæstionem modò dictam in isthoc scripto, quod vigesimus tertius hujus seculi an- nus produxit in scenam, excitaret, hujusque negativam in Scholis Theologorum, affirmativam inter Philosophos veram esse (†) defenderet. Cui anno statim sequente Vir non minoris eruditionis laude clarus Andreas Kestlerus discursuum Theologorum quadigram (§) opposuit. i. e. “ If manniana constat*

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 245.

() Confirmant suspicionem, quæ leguntur in vestigi- bulo dicti Per-vigilii: aperta equi C. L. Viri, Pauli Slevogti Pervigilium de diffidio nim ibi litis, Theologi & Philosophi in utriusque principiis fundato, (hoc enim libello nomen est,) per-volutaverit (). Enimvero hic inter primos fuit, qui quæstionem modò dictam in isthoc scripto, quod vigesimus tertius hujus seculi an- nus produxit in scenam, excitaret, hujusque negativam in Scholis Theologorum, affirmativam inter Philosophos veram esse (†) defenderet. Cui anno statim sequente Vir non minoris eruditionis laude clarus Andreas Kestlerus discursuum Theologorum quadigram (§) opposuit. i. e. “ If manniana constat

“ I am not mistaken, that unhappy and scandalous controversy, which has been carried on in our day, about this question; whether GOD be accidentally the cause of sin: that controversy, I say, blazed out, or at least, would seem to blaze out, from the dead ashes of the Hoffmannian controversy. This will appear to be true to whoever peruses the most celebrated Paul Slevogt's Lucubrations, intituled, Dispute between the Divines and the Philosophers at Theologi con- grounded cordia.

(†) Vide ibi Discursum IV, pag. 64, D seq.

(§) Pro defenden- da (quod ipsum quoque legitur in titulo) Philosophi at Theologi con-

Daniel Hoffman and Beza wrote against each other upon the controversy about the Lord's Supper. See the remark in which I give the titles of some of Hoffman's works [D].

It was not only about the doctrine of Ubiquity that our Doctor disputed with the other Ministers; he was also engaged in a controversy upon the subjects relating to Predestination; for he censured Hunnius who had explained them differently from the sense of the Book of Concord. He even charged him with preaching from Luther's pulpit a doctrine more pernicious than that of the Papists. The Book of Concord, said he, teaches that the cause of election is entirely without us; but Hunnius and Mylius teach, that election is grounded on God's fore-knowledge of men's faith. Hunnius and Mylius caused Hoffman to be condemned in an assembly of Divines held in the year 1593, and threatened him with excommunication, if he would not subscribe to their opinion. The next year he published an apology against them (b). Hofpinian gives us a more accurate account of this. He tells us (c), that some Divines of Leipzig, Jena, and Wittemberg, having been at Samuel Haber's second wedding in the year 1593, met at Polycarp Lyserus's house, and that some of them were of opinion that they should declare in a public and authentic manner, that Daniel Hoffman was a Calvinist, and one of those Heretics that are to be rejected: but the majority voted that they should write to him, to entreat him to conform to their doctrine, which if he refused to do, he should be excommunicated. Hunnius wrote him a long letter to that purpose in the name of them all. It was against this letter that Hoffman published the next year an apology (d), in which he explained the reasons why he could not follow the opinions of the Divines of Wittemberg: he declared that he had met in their books with above an hundred errors inconsistent with the articles of the Christian faith (e).

(b) Taken from Henry Alting, Theolog. Histor. pag. 302.

(c) Hofpinian, de Origine & progressu Libri Concordiæ, cap. 51. pag. 429.

(d) Idem, ibid. pag. 431, & seq.

(e) Idem, ibid. pag. 434.

"grounded on their respective principles. For he was one of the first, that started this question in a work which he published the 23d year of this century, wherein he asserted that the negative was true amongst the Divines, and the affirmative amongst the Philosophers. The next year Andrew Kessler, a man famous for his learning, answered him in four theological dissertations."

To assert that what is true in Philosophy is false in Divinity, is a most pernicious error.

Thomasius was in the right to observe, that it is a very scandalous thing to see it asserted, that it is true in Philosophy, that God is the cause of sin by accident, but that it is not true in Divinity. He was very much in the right to approve of Calman, who asserted, that such a parting and dividing of the truth was a proper method to maintain the most impious doctrines (7). And indeed this is very proper to introduce scepticism; since by arguing thus, truth is reduced to the same condition with the properties of bodies. For as the same body appears small or big according as we see it with or without a convex glass, we have a right to conclude from thence, that we do not know whether it be small or big absolutely speaking; and that the absolute smallness or bigness of the bodies is unknown to us. If therefore the same proposition were true and false according as we consider it either as Divines, or as Philosophers, it would follow from thence by a necessary consequence, that we do not know the truth in itself, and that it only consists in a mutable relation to the disposition of our minds, as the goodness of meat consists only in a certain relation to the disposition of our tongue, which coming to be altered, the same food which pleased our palates, does not please it any longer. I shall now quote an author who tells us, that Hoffman and his followers maintained, that Philosophy must be banished from all Universities, as a most pernicious science, according to which several theological truths were false. The Ministers who opposed this faction were deprived, but at last this controversy was ended by the Prince's authority, and Hoffman was obliged to submit. Contendebant Hofmannus & ipse affectæ, Philosophiam pugnare cum Theologia: multa esse vera in Theologia quæ sint falsa in Philosophia & contra; exterminandam Christianis Academiis ut noxiam, ut toties etiam graviter ab antiqua Ecclesia damnatam. His se initio statim opposuerunt ejus Academiæ Philosophi, Duncanus Liddelius Scotus Med. D. Corn. Martini, Joh. Caselius & alii, rati ad se pertinere ejus defensionem cujus professores essent. Res contentione diu acta est, ita ut Hofmannus eos tandem à Ministerio excluderet qui contrarium sentirent. Habitæ sæpius disputationes & magni fluctus in illo simpulo excitati. Extant ejus tamen aliquamulta acta. Tandem his sopita est au-

(7) Non erubescere dicere, duplicem illam veritatem esse pseudarithmeticum figmentum ad omnes errores & Atreismos excusandos & defendendos. Calman. Cosmopoeia, cap. 1. Quæst. 6. apud Thomasi. Præfat. 42. pag. 243.

toritate Principis: restitutus bonos suos Philosophiæ ejusque Doctoribus est. Hoffmanniani cesserunt (8).

Henry Julius, Duke of Brunswick, ordered that Daniel Hoffman should acknowledge his error and retract it publicly. This order was executed March the 7th, 1601. See the Memorabilia Ecclesiastica seculi à nato Christo decimi septimi, p. 23, and 24 (9); and Græwerus in his book De unica Veritate. i. e. "That truth is single."

[D] I give the titles of some of Hoffman's works.] He published at Helmstad in the year 1583, Quæstionum & Responsonum in gravissima Controversia de sacramenta Cæna pars prima. i. e. "Part the first of Questions and answers relating to the most important Controversy about the Lord's Supper." in 8vo. Beza refuted it the next year; but soon after was published (10), Danielis Hoffmanni Apologia missa ad Theodorum Bezam, qua rō p̄tor̄ in verbis Cænae dominicæ im-motum, Bezae autem Demonstrationes falsissimæ demonstrantur. i. e. "An Apology for Daniel Hoffman sent to Beza, in which the literal sense of the Words of the Institution of the Sacrament is asserted, and Beza's Arguments proved to be false." In the year 1585 Beza published Responsonis pars altera contra Daniellem Hoffmannum. i. e. "The second Part of the Answer to Daniel Hoffman." And in the year 1586 Beza published Conspicillum ad Danielis Hoffmanni Demonstrationes &c. i. e. "A pair of Spectacles for Daniel Hoffman's Demonstrations &c." Here follow the titles of some other works of Hoffman. Responso ad rationes & signa Christophori Pezelii &c. quibus docuit veros sacramentarios agnoscere: i. e. "An Answer to Christopher Pezelius's means and signs, &c. by which he teaches to discover the true Sacramentarians." De XVII Erroribus crassioribus Jacobi Andreae. i. e. Of the seventeen most palpable Errors of James Andreas. These two books are in the German language. De usu & applicatione notionum Logicarum ad res Theologicas, & de inusitatarum præcationum reductione, contra Goclenium. i. e. "Of the use and application of Logical notions to Theological Subjects, and of abolishing obsolete prayers, against Goclenius." At Francfort, 1596. Liber Apologeticus respondens chartis Ministrorum Ecclesiæ Bremensis. i. e. "An Apology to answer the Papers of the Church of Bremen." At Helmstad, 1585. Officina Locorum Theologicorum. i. e. "Collection of Theological Common-Topics." Explicatio Sententiæ in Epist. Canonica Job. Apostoli, Sanguis Jesu Christi Filii Dei mundat nos ab omni peccato. i. e. "An Explication of this sentence in St. John's canonical Epistle, The blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, cleanseth us from all sin." At Helmstad, 1581.

(8) Georgius Hornius, Hist. Philoſoph. lib. 6. cap. 12. pag. 321, 322. See the article NI-HUSIUS, remark [C].

(9) This book, written by Andrew Carolus, Abbot of St. George in the country of Wirtemberg was printed at Tubingen, in the year 1597.

(10) At Helmstad in 1585.

* He had been a Tanner.

HOFMAN (MELCHIOR) from a Tradesman * set up for a Preacher, and began to dogmatize in Livonia and other places, though he had not received from any person the

(a) Ex pellione in Theologastrum transmutatus. Mollerus, ubi infra, citat. (c).

the least power or authority to preach (a). He left Saxony, being very much discontented, and went into Holstein in the year 1527. He was appointed a Minister at Kiel by the King of Denmark, and supported himself in that post near two years, notwithstanding Luther's opposition [A]. He preached I know not what mixture of Zuinglianism and Fanaticism; and he seldom explained any thing to his audience but the construction of the Mosaical Tabernacle, the Visions of St. John's Revelation, and other subjects like these. He pretended that the last day would come in the year 1534. They who attempted to refute him either upon this article or upon any other, met with their match; for as he had a very ill tongue, he answered them in the most passionate manner [B]. He loaded Marquardus Schuldorpius with injuries, and cruelly charged him with the crime of incest [C]. The King of Denmark designing to prevent the ill consequences with which these controversies might be attended, ordered a conference to be held in the year 1529 (b), in which Hofman was confounded and silenced, and as he persisted in his opinions, was banished from the Duchy of Holstein. He went to Strasburg, where he published a false account of that conference [D]. He was imprisoned in the year 1532, after a public disputation with the Ministers. This made him lose his credit with some of his followers. He died in or about the year 1533 (c). He was not born in the Duchy of Holstein, as has been published by some [E].

(b) It was held at Flensburg.

(c) Taken from John Mollerus's Magoge ad Historiam Cberjonesi Cimbricae, Part 3. pag. 128, & seq.

(d) Argentina inclarefcere cepit. Freder. Spanhemius, De Originibus & Progressu Anabaptist. num. 22. pag. m. 211.

Several authors assert that Hofman began to be famous at Strasburg (d), and that he was followed by a crowd of disciples, and that going to Embden in the year 1528 [F], he published his Visions there with so wonderful a success, that he passed for

the

[A] He supported himself in that post notwithstanding Luther's opposition. Here follows what Luther wrote to a Minister of Keil (1). A Melchiore pellifice velim cavere vos omnes, ac curare apud Magistratus ne ad conciones admittatur, etiamsi literas Regis ostendet. A nobis enim recessit indignabundus, dum non volumus ejus somnia probare. Ad docendum neque valet, neque vocatus est. Hæc dicite nomine meo omnibus vestris, ut ipsum vitent ac tacere cogant. i. e. "I would have you all beware of Melchior the Tanner, and prevail with the Magistrates not to suffer him to preach, tho' he should shew the King's letters: for he went from us in a passion, because we would not approve his dreams. He is neither proper to teach, nor called to it. Tell this to your whole congregation, that they may avoid him, and force him to be silent." Luther would not have them hearken to this man, who set up for a Preacher without any capacity and calling. Francis Burchard Counsellor to the Dukes of Saxony did also advise to beware of that man (2).

(1) Luther. Ep. ad Wib. Prae-vest. anno 1528. See tom. 2. Epist. Lutheri à Joh. Aurifabro Francosurti ad Viadrum, anno 1597. edit. pag. 371. Mollerus, Magoge ad Hist. Cberjonesi Cimbricae, Part 3. pag. 129.

(2) In Epist. ad Petrum Suavenim, Concil. Danicum, A. 1528 scripta, quam exhibet J. Manlii Parrago Epist. Melanchth. Part 3. pag. 493, 494. Mollerus, ibid.

(3) Moller. ibid. pag. 130.

[B] He answered them in the most passionate manner. All his books were written in the vulgar tongue: His apology against Nicholas Ambisdorf, the first Minister at Magdeburg, was printed in the year 1528. This Minister had refuted his opinion concerning the end of the world. Opposuit ei Hofmannus apologiam amarulentissimam . . . in ista convitorum plaustra in Adversarium evomit (3). i. e. Hofman answered him in a most bitter apology . . . in which he loads his bitter adversary with injuries."

(4) Idem, ibid.

[C] He charged Schuldorpius with the crime of incest. The ground of this charge was that Schuldorpius had married his own niece. Marg. Schuldorpio, Kiloniensi, Parocho Slesvici. qui suam de Sacra Cæna Sententiam impugnavat, itidem scriptis, Kilonii anno 1528 impressis. respondit, & hominem, cum alias ob causas, tum ob matrimonium cum filia sororis, ope eloquentiæ suæ caninæ, misere exagitavit (4). i. e. "Marquardus Schuldorpius, of Kiel, and Minister of Sleswick, had refuted his opinion about the Lord's Supper; Hofman answered him in two writings published at Keil in the year 1528, and by means of his scurrilous eloquence, he abused him most wretchedly, amongst other reasons, because Schuldorpius had married his own sister's daughter." Schuldorpius in his defence urged amongst other arguments Luther's authority, from whom he produced a letter, in which Luther confessed that he had advised him to that match, and asserted that it was lawful, (since Abraham had married Sara, who was his sister or niece.) Utrique Schuldorpius mox reposuit Epistolam ad fideles Civitatis Kiloniensi Saxoniam eique adjecit Lutheri ad se literas, in eandem Dialectum transfusas, in quibus ille conjugio huic, cujus se suaforem fuisse fatetur, ingenti cum wapponia patrocinari, Abrahami, Saram ducentis, exemplo defendere istud non dubitat (5).

(5) Idem, ibid. pag. 131.

(6) His true name is John Bugenbagius. But they use to call him Pomeranus, because he was of Pomerania.

[D] He published a false account of this conference. He boasted that he had silenced Pomeranus (6), and asserted that the Secretaries of the conference were fal-sifiers (7). Pomeranus, in order to refute those slanders, published the acts of the conference in the most authentic manner; and added to them a refutation of Hofman's work, and an account of Heggus's conversion (8). This conversion was the fruit of the conference. Heggus had been one of our Hofman's seconds, and he acquired such knowledge in that conference, that it obliged him to forsake Hofman's sect. Parasitæ Hofmanni fuere Johan. à Campen, & Jac. Heggæ Dantiscanus ad saniozem mentem in colloquio hoc reducti (9). i. e. "Hofman's assistants were John of Campen, and James Heggus, who were converted at this conference." Hofman's other Second had done the same. Let us observe, that Pomeranus was not at the conference as an actor to dispute, but as one of the moderators under the King of Denmark's eldest son (10). He put an end to this meeting by an oration in which he refuted Hofman's arguments. Finem Colloquio oratione Bugenbagii adversus argumenta ipsius à Pomeranus imposuit (11).

(7) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 133.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, Mollerus, pag. 131, 132.

(10) Moller. ibid. pag. 131.

(11) Idem, ibid.

[E] He was not of the Duchy of Holstein, as has been published by some. Here follow Mollerus's words (12): Suevus ortu fuit, non autem Hofatus uti Conrad. Dietericus & Sebastianus Schmidius (1), falso sibi persuadent. i. e. "He was a native of Germany, and not of Holstein, as Conrad. Dietericus, and Sebastian Schmidius falsely imagine."

(12) In Analyti Periobæ Evangel. Dom. II. Adventus.

(13) In Diff. de Chiliasmo Apocalypico, pag. 9.

[F] Several authors assert . . . that he went to Embden in the year 1528. The arguments which Mollerus offers us, leave us no room to doubt but Hofman went from Saxony very much discontented (13). We ought therefore to believe, that they, who suppose that he went from Strasburg to Embden in the year 1528, are mistaken. Ottius observes, that several authors assert this, and yet he does not answer them. Embdam Argenterato obiisse Melchiorem Hoffmannum plures ajunt. Ergo non demum anno 1531 ed concessit nisi forte redierit, vel diutius ibi commoratus sit (14). We learn from these words, that some persons pretend that Hofman went to Embden in the year 1531. This, I think, is the true time when he was Minister at Embden; for since he published an account of the conference of Flensburg (15) at Strasburg, in the year 1529, it is a proof that he went to Strasburg when he was banished from Holstein. It is very probable, that he went from Strasburg to Embden, and returned afterwards to Strasburg. He was there in the year 1532. Take notice, that Mollerus promises us an account of the troubles he raised both at Strasburg and at Embden, after he was gone from Holstein (16). Is not this telling us, that he went to Embden after he had preached his idle fancies at Strasburg in the year 1529? Hoornbeek was in the right to say, that he returned from Embden to Strasburg, but not that he went from Strasburg to Embden in the year 1528 (17). This author observes, that when Hofman went from Embden, he left there one Trypma-

(13) An. 1527. Magdeburgo in Hofstatiâ delatus. Mollerus, Introd. ad Historiam Cberjonesi Cimbricae, pag. 128. See Kendorf, Hist. Lutheranae, lib. 2. pag. 122. makes him set out from Wittemberg.

(14) Johan. Henricus Ottius, Hist. Anabapt. ad ann. 1528, num. 1. pag. 45.

(15) It was held a little after Easter in the year 1529. See Mollerus, ubi supra, pag. 131.

(16) Tumultuum quos Hermannus post abitum ex Hofstatiâ, Argenterato, in Embden concitavit Anabaptistico-Embdenicorum. Idem, ibid. pag. 133.

(17) Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. baptist. pag. m. 362.

the first Patriarch of the Anabaptists in the Low-Countries, and in Lower-Germany [G]. He infatuated his followers to such a degree, that they took him for that Elias whom God is to send upon earth before the day of judgment. He returned to Strasburg, being in hopes to see a prophecy fulfilled, which related to him [H]: this prophecy had been delivered by a good old man in Friesland. Being at Strasburg he preached Anabaptism openly; and the disturbances he raised there occasioned the meeting of a Synod in June 1532. He was suffered to dispute with the Ministers, who refuted him in the strongest manner; but yet he continued to dogmatize, so that it was thought necessary to shut him up in a prison [I]; for it was feared, that there would soon arise very great disorders, because Hofman's followers asserted, that the City of Strasburg was to be the new Jerusalem, in which Christ's Kingdom was to be established; and that as Hofman was the Elias who was to come, so Polterman was the Enoch who was to assist him. When Hofman was in prison, they asserted, that he was to come out of it with a hundred and forty four thousand men sealed, who would anathematize the earth, and bear down before them all the obstacles the world should pretend to put in their way. Our Elias, and our Enoch, said they, are the two olive-trees, and the candlesticks mentioned in St. John's Revelation (e); no man will be able to hurt them, and if any man will hurt them, fire will proceed out of their mouth, and devour their enemies. When they saw that Hofman did not come out of prison at the time appointed by some Prophets, they were amazed; but to amuse them, he sent them word, that they should rest for two years, after the example of Ezra and Haggai, who were obliged to interrupt for two years the building of the Temple. He died in prison, and thus he disappointed all his disciples in their expectations (f). I shall mention some of his heresies [K]. There are writers who assert, that he began to dogmatize near the Rhine, after the defeat of the peasants in the year 1525 (g).

(e) See the 11th chapter of St. John's Revelation, ver. 4, 5.

(f) Taken from Frederic Spanheim, de Orig. & Progr. Anabaptism, pag. 211.

(g) Joh. Henricus Ottius, Hist. Anabapt. ad ann. 1525, num. 21. pag. 36.

HOLINSHED,

baptists. Cassander has been mistaken concerning the time when this fanatic was minister at Embden. Donec tandem, says he, sub ann. 1532 Melchior quidam Hofmannus, arte pellio, banc novam contagionem cum aliis quibusdam non minus perniciosis erroribus in Germania banc inferiorem & Belgicam invexit (18). i. e. "Till at last, about the year 1532, a certain man named Melchior Adam, a Tanner by trade, introduced this new infection, with some other errors not less pernicious, into Lower Germany, and the Low-Countries."

[G] He passed for the first Patriarch of the Anabaptists in the Low-Countries, and in Lower-Germany. This appears from Cassander's words, which we have just now quoted. Here follow two other witnesses: Huic Patriarchæ etiam eorum qui in inferiori Germania succreverunt, Anabaptistarum tradux adscribi solet. Thus speaks Frederic Spanheim (19): Qui huc Anabaptistica deliria attulit ex Germania superiori primus fuit Melchior Hofman. This is what Hoornbeek observes (20).

[H] He was in hopes of seeing a prophecy fulfilled which related to him. Whilst he was planting his gospel at Embden with great zeal, and re-baptized as many persons as he could, there was a good old man, who made him long to return to Strasburg. This old man was of his cabal; he prophesied, that the Magistrates of Strasburg would put Hofman in prison, but that at the end of six months the prisoner would be delivered, and would go and preach the Gospel over all the world, like another Elias, being attended with a great number of Prophets, and with the hundred and forty four thousand men sealed, mentioned in St. John's Revelation (21). Hofman having disputed publicly with the Ministers, June the 12th 1532, and having continued to spread his enthusiastical notions, after he had been refuted, was put in prison. When he saw the first part of the prophecy fulfilled, he became more arrogant. He shook off the dust from his shoes, threw his hat on the ground, and protested before God, that he would live upon nothing but bread and water, till he should shew the person that sent him. He was disappointed in his expectations, for he died in prison (22). There are a thousand instances which shew, that in the most chimerical predictions there have been some particulars, which proved true in the event. This has been a strong delusion, and nothing contributed more than this to mislead the visionaries and their adherents. It is therefore with regard to these matters, that we ought to say, the end crowns the work, and we must take care not to judge of the whole by a part only, ex ungue Leonem; we must wait for the conclusion, and mistrust the first successes. They are but a snare, and a dangerous allurements.

[I] It was thought necessary to shut him up in a prison. Spanheim, Hoornbeek, and several others assert, that Hofman disputed in June 1532, and that he was not imprisoned till after he had obstinately continued to dogmatize, after this dispute. But we shall now quote an author, who places this conference in June 1533, and who asserts that this fanatic was taken from prison in order to dispute with the Ministers. *Anno 1533 Mensis Junio die 11, Hofmannus Argentorati è vinculis ad publicam disputationem productus & admittitur: à quo tempore instaurationem Regni DEI ortam esse sui affirmabant. Idem Hofmannus * autoritatem * I suppose it should be authentic.*

prædictionum cujusdam verè deliri Leonardi Joest civis Argentinenfis & aliorum similium fanaticorum hominum, multa vana de urbe Argent. prædixit, &c. quæ tamen ab urbe non recepta, sed aqua & igni interdicebatur omnibus, qui eam sectam publicè privatimque tuebantur (23). i. e. "On the 11th day of June, in the year 1553, Hofman was carried from the prison at Strasburg, and admitted to a public disputation: His followers asserted, that the restoration of God's Kingdom began from that time. The same Hofman, depending on the prophecies of a certain Citizen of Strasburg, named Leonard Joest, who was really crazy, and of some other fanatics like him, foretold a great many silly things concerning the City of Strasburg, &c. which however were not minded by the Magistrates; for all the inhabitants were forbidden, upon pain of banishment, to protest that sect either publicly or privately." Ottius (24) admits this Chronology; whence it appears that a great many errors have crept into the accounts of those who wrote the History of Anabaptism.

He quotes a passage from Henry Urfinus (25), in which we are told, that Hofman prophesied that same year, that Strasburg would be the new Jerusalem, as the City of Rome was Babylon; that Strasburg would be besieged that same year; and that there would be a great slaughter, and that this man preferred his own predictions to all those of Isaiah, and Jeremiah, and that Matthias and his party applied to the City of Munster all those fine prerogatives of Strasburg, at which Hofman was very much displeased, when he knew it.

[K] I shall mention some of his heresies. He asserts, I. That the WORD was not united with the flesh taken from the Virgin Mary; his reason was, that all human flesh is defiled with sin, and consequently cursed. II. That Jesus Christ has but one nature only. III. That it is in man's power to be saved, and that we are saved or damned according to the good or bad use we make of our free-will. IV. That Pædo-baptism, or the christning of infants comes from God's enemy, and from man rather than from God (26).

(18) Cassander, Epist. Dedicat. Tractatus de Baptismo.

(19) Spanheim, de Orig. & Progr. Anabaptism, num. 22. pag. m. 211.

(20) Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. pag. m. 361.

(21) Chap. 7, and 14.

(22) Taken from Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. pag. 362.

(23) Ottius, in Hist. Anabapt. ad ann. 1533, num. 6. pag. 61. He quotes Revis in Historia Germanii. He should have quoted Nicolaus Blesdikius; for it is he that wrote the History of David George: Revis only published it.

(24) Ottius, ibid.

(25) Henricus Urfinus, Præfat. in Apocalyp. 14. fin.

(26) Taken from Spanheim, de Orig. & Progr. Anabapt. pag. 211.

HOLINSHED, or HOLINGSHED (RAPHAEL), famous for the Chronicles published under his name [A], was descended of a family of that name at Boseley in Cheshire, and was a Minister of the Church of England. He died at Bramcote in Warwickshire towards the latter end of the year 1580. After his death all or most of his Notes, Collections, Books, and Manuscripts came into the hands of Thomas Burdet Esq; of Bramcote (a).

(a) Wood, Ant. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 312. 2d edit. London 1721.

[A] Famous for the Chronicle published under his name.] The first edition of this work was printed at London 1577 in fol; and the second in 1587 in fol. In the first edition he was assisted by Mr. William Harrison, a native of London, educated at Westminster under Mr. Alexander Nowell in the latter end of the reign of King Henry VIII, or the beginning of Edward VI; and afterwards sent to Oxford and Cambridge, and at last domestic Chaplain to Sir William Brook Knight, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Baron of Cobham in Kent. He wrote An Historical Description of the Island of Britain; with a brief Rehearsal of the Nature and Qualities of the People of England; and such commodities as are to be found in the same; in three books, printed in the first and second volume of Holinshed's Chronicle. In the second edition of this Chronicle in 1587, Mr. John Hooker, alias Vowell, Chamberlain of Exeter, made several additions and improvements to it, and continued it to the year 1586. One of the Continuators of this Chronicle was the Reverend Mr. Abraham Fleming, a great number of whose papers are in the hands of Mr. Francis Peck, M. A. who at the end of the first volume of his Desiderata Curiosa promised to publish the following manuscripts written in Mr. Fleming's hand: 1. De Castrationibus Chronicorum quae Raphaelia Holingshedi nuncupantur; & imprimis de eorundem Censuris, quando Roberti Comiti Leicestriae, D. Thomae Bromley, Cancellario, & D. Gul. Cecil Thesaurario oblata, prout ea omnia Camdenus Flemingo retulit. 2. Censurae aliae diversorum hominum malevolentium, seu nimium subtilium in eadem Chronica; cum responsionibus Abrahami Flemingi. 3. The Council's Letter to Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, touching the Examination and Reformation of the Additions of the new Edition of Hollingshed's Chronicle, Thursday 1 Feb. 1586. 4. Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury's Letter to Thomas Randolph, Henry Killigrew Esq; and Mr. Hammond, touching the Examination and Reformation of the Additions to the new Edition of Hollingshed's Chronicle, on Thursday 1 Feb. 1588. 5. Abrahami Flemingi (qui praerat Typis & Praelo) de modo castrandi reformandique Chronica praedicta brevis & vera Relatio. In the curious Catalogue of the Library of Mr. Richard Smith (1) there is mentioned an Edition of Hollingshed's Chronicle in two Volumes in fol. 1587, with the addition of many sheets, that were castrated, being not thought fit, and so not allowed to be printed in the second Impression.

(1) Bibliotheca Smithiana, seu Catalogus Librorum in quavis Facultate insignis animum; quos in usum & Bibliothecae ornamentum multo ante sibi comparavit Vir clariss. & doctiss. Ricardus Smith Londinensis, pag. 276. edit. London T. 1682, in 4to

HOLYOKE, or HOLYOAKE (FRANCIS), who writes himself in Latin de sacrâ Quercu, was born at Nether Whitacre in Warwickshire about the year 1567, and studied in the University of Oxford about the year 1582 in Queen's College; but it does not appear, whether he ever took a degree. He taught school at Oxford, and in his own country; and became Rector of Southam in Warwickshire in February 1604. He was elected a Member of the Convocation of the Clergy in the first year of King Charles I's reign. Besides his Dictionary [A], he published a Sermon of Obedience especially unto Authority Ecclesiastical &c. on Heb. xiii. 17. preached at a Visitation of Dr. William Hinton, Archdeacon of Coventry. Oxford 1610 in 4to. He suffered extremely in the civil wars for

[A] His Dictionary.] It was printed at London, 1606 &c. in 4to. The 4th edition in 1633 at London in 4to is printed under the following title: Dictionarium Etymologicum Latinum, antiquissimum & novissimum, nunc demum infinitis penè Laboribus & continuis vigiliis compositum & absolutum à Francisco de Sacra Quercu. Or, *A Dictionary declaring the Originall and Derivation of all words used in any Latine Authors, with the reason of their Derivations and Appellations, never any in this Kinde extant before. Whereunto, besides the hard and most usefull words in Divinitie, Philosophie, Physicks, and Logicke, are added many thousand other words out of the Civill and Canon Lawes, Glossaries, Criticks, and other approved Authors, old and new; with their Greeke in more exactnesse than ever was in Calepine, Morelius, or any other; and also the Coines, Measures, Weights, and Greeke Roots, and many other usefull Additions, as will appear in the Epistle to the Reader, and better in the Work itselfe. Hereunto is also annexed the Proper Names, adorned with their Etymologies, illustrated and explained with Histories, Proverbes, Mythologies, &c. Together with the Chronologie of the Persons, and the beginning of noted Cities, and plantation of sundry Countries; the Geographie, and the Names both antient and new of the most remarkable places. Lastly, Rider's Dictionary, the English before the Latine, compiled by Rider, is augmented with many hundreds of words, both out of the Law, and out of the Latine, French, and other Languages, such as were and are with us in common use, but never printed until now, to the perfecting of the Worke. Now the fourth time newly corrected and very much augmented by the great Industrie and Paines of Francis Holy-Oke. This edition is dedicated to Dr. William Laud, then Bishop of London. There is likewise another Dedication to William Craven, Baron of Hamsted-Marshall dated from Southam. In the Preface to the Reader, which is dated from Queen's College in Oxford, our author observes that he had been charged* with compiling his work from other Dictionaries, and especially that of Thomasius; but that he had done nothing but what other Dictionary-Writers before him had done. Cooper, says he, translated his Dictionary from the Latin-German Dictionary of Tirifus of Zurich; and Thomasius first compiled his from Calepine and Cooper, and afterwards enlarged it from Junius's Nomenclatura and several Glossaries and Herbals. At last Dr. Philemon Holland, a very learned Physician, greatly augmented Thomasius's work from the best authors. Mr. Holyoke then informs us, that he was obliged to Dr. Thomas James for communicating several words collected from the Fathers; and to Mr. Robert Burton, Mr. Sixsmith Fellow of Brazen-Nose College, Mr. Watson Fellow of Lincoln-College, and Mr. Wethereld Fellow of Queen's College, for their several communications. To this edition are prefixed Latin and Greek poems in honour of the author, written by Dr. John Dove, Dr. John Budden, Dr. Thomas James, Mr. Robert Burton, Mr. William Fletcher, Dr. John Wall of Christ Church, Dr. John Assil Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Dr. Thomas Jackson President of that College, Dr. Thomas Clayton Regius Professor of Physick at Oxford, Dr. John Bambridge Savilian Professor of Astronomy, Mr. Ph. White, and Mr. Gerard Langbaine of Queen's College. The Dedication to that part of the work, intitled Dictionarium Etymologicum propriorum nominum, to Sir Clement Broockmorton, is dated at Southam in February 1611. Mr. Wood observes (1), that "that part of Rider's (1) Alben. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 577. 2d edit. London 1721. " Dictionary, which had the Latin before the English " was swallowed up by the greater attempts of " Francis Holyoke, who saith, that he designed and " contrived it so, before the Vocabularies or Dictionary of Becman, Funger, and Martin came out; " notwithstanding it appears, that he was beholden to " them, and made use of their materials in his Dictionary, that he published ann. 1606." H.

(a) Wood, Atb. for his attachment to the King; and died November the 13th 1653 in the eighty seventh year of his age, and was interred in St. Mary's Church at Warwick (a).
Oxon. vol. 2. col. 167. 2d edit. London 1721.

☉ HOLYOKE or HOLYOAKE (THOMAS) son of the preceding, was born in 1616 at Stony-Thorp near Southam in Warwickshire, and educated in Grammar Learning under Mr. White at Coventry; from whence he was sent in Michaelmas Term 1632 at the age of sixteen years to Queen's College in Oxford (a), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts July the 5th 1636 (b), and that of Master May the 16th 1639 (c), and became Chaplain of the said College. In the beginning of the civil wars,

(a) Wood, Atb. when Oxford became the Seat of King Charles and was garrisoned for his use, he was put into commission for a Captain of a Foot Company consisting mostly of Scholars. In this post he did great service, and had the degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred upon him by the favour of his Majesty, though no such matter occurs in the public Register of the University, which was then sometimes neglected (d). After the surrender of the gar-
Oxon. vol. 4. col. 544.

(b) Idem, Fest. rison of Oxford to the Parliament, he, by the name of Thomas Holyoke, without the addition of Master of Arts, Bachelor or Doctor of Divinity, obtained a licence from the University to practise Physic (e); whereupon settling in his own country, he exercised that Faculty with good success till the Restoration in 1660, in which year Thomas Lord Leigh, Baron of Stone-Leigh in Warwickshire, presented him to the Rectory of Whitnash near Warwick. He was soon after made Prebendary of the Collegiate Church of Wolverhampton in Staffordshire. In 1674 Robert Lord Brook conferred upon him the Donative of Breamour in Hampshire, (which he had by the marriage of his Lady,) worth about two hundred pounds per ann. but before he had enjoyed it a year, he died of a fever June the 10th 1675. His body was interred near that of his father in the Church of St. Mary in Warwick. His Dictionary was published after his death in 1677 in fol.

(c) Ibid. col. 279.

(d) Idem, Atb. Oxon. ubi supra.

(e) Idem, ibid. and Fest. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 60.

HONORIA, the sister of Valentinian III, drew upon her this Emperor's indignation by her dissoluteness, and she endeavoured to revenge herself by another crime: She sent a messenger to Attila to persuade him to conquer the Empire, and she promised to marry him. The authors differ a little in their accounts of this story. Some pretend that she did not abandon herself to lewdness, till she found that her design to marry that King of the Huns had miscarried [A]. Others assert, that she had led a dissolute life before ever she had any such thought [B].

[A] Some authors pretend, that she did not abandon herself to lewdness, till she found that her design to marry the King of the Huns had miscarried. A modern author, who quotes Sigonius and Marcellinus, relates, that Honoria being devoured by the flames of lust, sent an Eunuch to Attila, to offer herself in marriage to him, with the whole Empire: that Attila sent Embassadors to the Emperor Valentinian to demand Honoria even with threatenings; but that before they were returned to him, he fell in love with a young Lady of his own nation, that he married her, and killed himself on his wedding day with excessive drinking, and carefing his bride too much; that Honoria finding herself thus disappointed in her hopes, abandoned herself to her gallants, who got her with child, after which she was sent to Constantinople. Hæc libidine inflammata eunuchum legatum ad Attilam Hunnorum regem misit, conjugium & regnum ei offerens. Misit igitur Attila legatos ad Valentinianum, qui suasionibus minas adjicientes Honoriam petebant, sed priusquam legati Roma reverterentur, Attila . . . puellæ cujusdam . . . amore captus . . . nuptias cum ea celebravit . . . Honoria igitur cum spe sua frustraretur aliis se subternit: inde gravida facta, Constantinopolim mittitur (1).

 [B] Others assert that she had led a dissolute life, before ever she had any such thoughts. "Honoria, the Emperor Valentinian's sister, having prostituted herself to the steward of her household, was shamefully banished from the palace by her brother, and obliged afterwards to retire into the East to the Court of Theodosius; this inspired her with so violent a resentment, that finding no other means to be revenged, she sent secretly to Attila, to persuade him to invade Italy, the conquest of which would be easy for him, considering Valentinian's weakness, and the great confusion in which the affairs of the whole Empire were (2)." According to Bonfinius's account (3), she was in a Convent when she sent to found Attila; who finding that business went on very slowly, imagined that he was imposed upon; which determined him to marry the King of the Bactrians's daughter. Since Honoria was in a Convent, it is a proof that she had not led a chaste life.

(1) Christian. Matth. Theatre Histor. pag. m. 733.

(2) Maimbourg, Hist. de l'Asie lib. 11. pag. 6, 7. of the 3d vol. Dutch edit.

(3) Hist. Hungar. Decad. 1. lib. 7.

HONORIUS the Roman Emperor, and son of Theodosius. That I may not repeat what is to be found in Moreri, I shall only mention his marriages. He married successively Stilico's two daughters [A], who, it is said, died both, without having been known by their husband. Zosimus relates hereupon some very remarkable particulars [B], which

[A] He married . . . Stilico's two daughters. The first was named Mary, and the other Thermantia. Their mother Serena, who was possessed with ambition, did not wait till Mary was fit for an husband, but made haste to marry her with the Emperor; and after Mary's death, she was as much in haste to give Thermantia to the same Prince. It appears from the words, which I shall now transcribe, that they both died virgins. Stilico Comes, cujus filiae due Maria & Thermantia singulae uxores Honorii principis fuerant, utraque tamen virgo defuncta (1). And yet the Poet Claudianus asserts, that Honorius and Mary lay together (2). We shall see in the following remark what Zosimus relates.

(1) Marcellin. Comes, in Chron. apud Barth. in Claud. pag. 766. edit. in 4to.

(2) Tyrus quæ factus Honorius ostro Carpebat teneros Maria cum Coniuge somnos. Claud. de Bello Gildonico, ver. 327.

markable particulars.] Serena, who could not resolve to delay her daughter Mary's marriage with the Emperor, nor consent that nature should suffer any violence by the consummation of Mary's marriage, who was not yet ripe, imagined a certain medium, which was to have Honorius debilitated. She found a woman who was very well skilled in that kind of fascination, and who put Honorius in such a condition, that when he lay with his young spouse he neither would nor could perform what is called the conjugal duty. Mary died in a short time, and with her maidenhead. Honorius courted sometime after Thermantia, Mary's sister. Ὁ ὁ βασιλεὺς Ὀνάρῳ ἀπὸ πωλλῶν Μαρίας ἀντὶ τῆς τελειότητος τῆς γαμειῆς τῆν εὐαίτης ἀδελφῆν Θερμαντίαν ἔτι οἱ δόθηαι πρὸς γάμον (3). Impera. 5. pag. m. 333.

[B] . . . Zosimus relates hereupon some very re-which are not to be met with in any other Historian; but he is justly charged with a very great contradiction [C], which is obvious to every reader of the meanest capacity.

tor autem Honorius, Maria conjugē jam pridem rebus humanis exempta, sororem ejus Thermanthiam sibi matrimonio junxi petebat. The father did not much like this match, but Serena desired it most passionately, in order to support her credit. The wedding was therefore concluded, but this marriage did not last long; for Thermanthia died soon after, having met with the same fate as her sister; that is to say, that she lay with a man who neither would nor could know her. The witch, whom Serena had before employed, repeated her enchantments. Zosimus does not relate this expressly; it is only a consequence which I infer from his words. Τὸ γάμου πρὸς τὴν Μαρίαν Ὀνορίου ἐπισκευή, γάμου, ἄρα εἶπε τὴν κόρη εἶσεν ἢ μητρε ὀρεῖσα, καὶ εἶτε ἀνα- γαλιῶσαι τὸν γάμον ἀνεχομένη, καὶ τὸ παρ' ἡλικίαν εἰς μέ- ξην ἐκδύσαι, φύσει αἰδέειν καὶ εἰδὼν ἔτερον εἶναι νομίζουσα, γυναικὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα θρασύτητι ἐπισκευήν περιελχούσα, πράτ- τει δὲ ταύτης τὸ συνίηαι μὴ τὴν θυγατέρα τῷ βασιλεὶ καὶ ἀμόλετον εἶναι. Τὸν δὲ μήτε εἶδεν μήτε δύνασθαι, τὰ τῷ γάμῳ προσήκουσα πράττειν. Ἐν τούτῳ τῆς κόρης ἀπειρή γάμου ἀποθανέσης, κούρας ἢ Σερηνὰ βασιλεὺς γο- νικὸς ἐπιθυμῶσα εἶναι τὴν μητρί τὴν τοσαύτην αὐτῇ δυνατείαν ἰλασθῆναι, τῇ θυγατρὶ θυγατρὶ συνίηαι τὸν Ὀνορίου Ἰ- κτινίου. ἢ δὲ γυναικὶ ταυτὶ μὴ ἢ κόρη μετ' εἰσελθὼν ταύτῃ τῇ θυγατρὶ παθεῖν (4). i. e. "When the mar- riage of Honorius and Mary was agreed upon, her mother Serena, who knew that her daughter was not yet of an age fit to be married, and who yet could not resolve to delay the wedding, though

" she was persuaded that it was forcing nature to ex- pose her so young to an husband; her mother, I say, met with a woman who knew how to remedy such things, and by her assistance she managed the business so, that her daughter lived indeed and lay with the Emperor, but he neither would nor could perform the functions of an husband. Soon after Mary dying a virgin, Serena, who very much desired that the Emperor should have children, left if he had none, she should lose her great power, found means to make him marry her other daughter, who also died soon after, meeting with the same fate as her sister had done."

[C] He is charged with a very great contradiction.] The reader has seen just now, that he asserts that Thermanthia died soon after her marriage; yet he tells us in the same book, that Honorius having put Stilico to death, sent Thermanthia back to her mother. Ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς Ὀνοριος τὴν μὴν γαμήλιον Θερμανθίαν παραδίδουσα τῇ βα- σιλεὶ θυγατρὶ τῇ μητρὶ προσέταται παραδίδουσα μηδὲν δὲ τῷ τοῦ ὑπορωμῆου (5): Imperator autem Honorius uxorem Thermanthiam augustali dejectam solio matri suae reddi jussit, nulla tamen idcirco suspitione gravatam. Stilico was killed the same year in which Honorius married Thermanthia, that is to say, under the Consulship of Bassus and Philip, in the year 408. As to Stilico's other daughter, she was married with the Emperor in the year 398, which was the year of the war against Gildo. See the passage quoted from Claudian (6).

(5) Idem, ibid. pag. 346. and in pag. 350. he mentions the presents which the Eunuchs received, who had conducted Thermanthia to her mother. (6) In the remark [A].

(4) Zosim. lib. 5. pag. m. 333.

HOOKE (ROBERT) an eminent English Mathematician and Philosopher in the seventeenth Century, was son of Mr. John Hooke (a), Minister (b) of Freshwater in the Isle of Wight. He was born there on Saturday July the 18th 1635, and baptized by his father on the 26th of that month (c). His father designing him for the Ministry, took some pains to instruct him; but his constitution being extremely infirm from his infancy, and he being subject to frequent pains of the head, his father laid aside all thoughts of making him a scholar. Being thus left to himself, he spent his time in making "little mechanical toys, in which, as he observes himself, he was very intent, and for the tools he had, successful; so that there was nothing he saw done by any mechanic, but he endeavoured to imitate, and in some particulars could exceed." His father observing by these indications his great inclination to mechanics, thought to put him apprentice to some easy trade, as that of a Watchmaker or Limner, he shewing most inclination to those or the like curious mechanical performances; for making use of such tools as he could procure, "and seeing an old brass clock taken to pieces, he attempted to imitate it, and made a wooden one that would go. Much about the same time he made a small ship about a yard long, fitly shaping it, adding its rigging of ropes, pullies, masts, &c. with a contrivance to make it fire off some small guns, as it was sailing cross a Haven of a pretty breadth. He had also a great fancy for drawing, having much about the same age copied several prints with a pen, that Mr. Hoskins (son of the famous Hoskins, Cowper's, master) much admired one not instructed could so well imitate them." These indications of a mechanic genius appeared in him when very young; for his father died in October 1648 (d). How he spent some of the following years of his life, we have no particular information; except that he was for some time with Sir Peter Lely the Painter, though probably not long, the smell of the oyl-colours increasing his head-ach (e). After this he was sent to Westminster-school, and lived with Dr. Busby, as a scholar in his house [A]. In 1653 (f) he went to Christ Church in the University of Oxford, and became Servitor to Mr. Goodman there (g). About the year 1655 he began to discover that admirable inventive genius, which afterwards appeared so conspicuous in his writings, which we shall give an account of in the note [B]. While he resided at Oxford, he assisted Dr. Thomas Willis, the Physician, in

(a) Wood, Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1039. 2d edit. London 1721. (b) Life of Dr. Robert Hooke, pag. 2. prefixed to the Posthumous Works of Dr. Hooke, edit. London 1705 in fol. Mr. Wood, ubi supra, says that he was Curate of that parish. (c) Life of Dr. Rob. Hooke, ubi supra. Mr. Wood says, that he was baptized on the 19th of that month. (d) Life of Dr. R. Hooke, ubi supra. (e) Ibid. pag. 3. (f) Ibid. Wood, ubi supra, says in 1650.

[A] Lived with Dr. Busby, as a Scholar in his house.]

Mr. Richard Waller tells us (1), that while he continued there, "he applied himself to Latin and Greek, in which he made a sufficient proficiency for the time; and had a competent knowledge; and at the same time got some insight into the Hebrew and some other Oriental languages. While he lived with Dr. Busby, he fell seriously upon the study of the mathematics, the Doctor encouraging him therein, and allowing him particular hours for that purpose. In this he took the most regular method, and first made himself master of Euclid's Elements, and thence proceeded orderly from that sure basis to "the other parts of the mathematics, and after to the application thereof to mechanics, his first and last mistress." Mr. Wood observes (2), that while he lived with Dr. Busby, he made himself master of the first six books of Euclid; and of his own accord learned to play 20 lessons on the organ; and invented thirty several ways of flying, as he and Dr. Wilkins of Wadham College have reported.

[B] Began to discover that admirable inventive genius, which afterwards appeared so conspicuous in his writings, which we shall give an account of in the note.] With regard to his philosophical writings at Oxford before the restoration and the establishment of the Royal Society,

(1) Life of Dr. Robert Hooke, pag. 3.

(2) Atb. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1039. 2d edit. 1721.

(b) Wood, ubi supra.

in his chymical operations; who recommended him to Mr. Boyle, whom he likewise served in the same affair, and explained to him Euclid's Elements and Des Cartes's Philosophy (b). November the 5th 1662 Sir Robert Moray proposed to the Royal Society a person,

Society, he writes thus in some manuscript notes of his. "At these meetings, which were about the year 1655, (before which time I knew little of them) divers experiments were suggested, discoursed, and tried with various successes, though no other account was taken of them but what particular persons perhaps did for the help of their own memories; so that many excellent things have been lost; some few only by the kindness of the authors have been since made public. Amongst these may be reckoned the Honourable Mr. Boyle's Pneumatic Engine and Experiments first printed in the year 1660; for in 1658 or 1659 I contrived and perfected the air-pump for Mr. Boyle, having first seen a contrivance for that purpose made for the same honourable person by Mr. Gratorix, which was too gross to perform any great matter." The Draught of this air-pump and all its parts, as it was afterwards published by Mr. Boyle, was in Mr. Waller's hands designed by Mr. Hooke, who informed Mr. Waller, that he was then sent to London by Mr. Boyle, to get the barrel and other parts of that engine, which could not be made at Oxford. "The same year, says Mr. Hooke, I contrived and made many tryals about the art of flying in the air, and moving very swift on the land and water, of which I shewed several designs to Dr. Wilkins, then Warden of Wadham College; and at the same time made a module, which by the help of springs and wings, raised and sustained itself in the air. But finding by my own tryals, and afterwards by calculation, that the muscles of a man's body were not sufficient to do any thing considerable of that kind, I applyed my mind to contrive a way to make artificial muscles; divers designs whereof I shewed also at the same time to Dr. Wilkins; but was in many of my tryals frustrated of my expectations." What is here mentioned of his attempts about flying, is confirmed by several draughts and schemes of his upon paper of the method, which might be attempted for that purpose, and of some contrivances for succedaneous wings, not unlike those of the bats, to the arms and legs of a man; as likewise of a contrivance to raise him up by means of horizontal vanes placed a little aslope to the wind, which being blown round, turned an endless screw in the center, which helped to move the wings, to be managed by the person by this means raised aloft. The schemes were in the hands of Mr. Richard Waller, with some few fragments relating thereto, but so imperfect, that he did not judge them fit for the public. But to return to Mr. Hooke's notes. "About this time having an opportunity of acquainting myself with astronomy by the kindness of Dr. Ward (3), I applied myself to the improving of the Pendulum for such observations; and in the year 1656 or 1657 I contrived a way to continue the motion of the Pendulum, so much commended by Ricciolus in his Almagestum, which Dr. Ward had recommended to me to peruse. I made some tryals for this end, which I found to succeed to my wish. The success of these made me further think of improving it for finding the longitude; and the method I had made for myself for mechanic inventions quickly led me to the use of springs instead of gravity for the making a body vibrate in any posture; whereupon I did first in great and afterwards in smaller modules satisfy myself of the practicableness of such an invention, and hoping to have made great advantage thereby, I acquainted divers of my friends, and particularly Mr. Boyle, that I was possessed of such an invention, and craved their assistance for improving the use of it to my advantage. Immediately after his Majesty's Restoration, Mr. Boyle was pleased to acquaint the Lord Brouncker and Sir Robert Moray with it, who advised me to get a patent for the invention, and propounded very probable ways of making considerable advantage by it. To induce them to a belief of my performance, I shewed a pocket-watch accommodated with a spring, applied to the arbor of the Ballance to regulate the motion thereof, concealing the way I had for finding the longitude. This was so well approved of, that Sir Robert Moray drew me up the form of a patent, the principal part whereof, viz. the description of the watch, so regulated, in his own hand-writing, I have yet by me; but the discouragement I met with in the management of this affair made me desist for that time." In confirmation of what is here related, Mr. Waller tells us (4), (4) Life of Dr. Robert Hooke, page 5. that he had met with a draught of an agreement between the Lord Brouncker, Mr. Boyle, and Sir Robert Moray, with Robert Hooke, M. A. to this purpose, that Robert Hooke should discover to them the whole of his invention to measure the parts of time at sea as exactly as they are at land by the pendulum-clocks invented by Monsieur Huygens. That of the profits to be made thereby not exceeding 6000 pound, Robert Hooke was to have $\frac{1}{4}$ of whatever was made more of it, not exceeding 4000 pound, Robert Hooke was to have $\frac{2}{3}$ of the rest, if more could be made of it, he was to have the $\frac{1}{2}$; and to be publicly owned the author and inventor thereof. This is the substance of one draught. There are some others, which differ only in the division of the profits. In pursuance of this design there were several papers drawn up, viz. the draught of an Act of Parliament to oblige all masters of ships to pay so much per tun for the use of this invention; as also a warrant to be granted by the King to Robert Hooke M. A. for a patent for the sole use of the said invention for fourteen years, and signed by his Majesty's command, William Morris. Thus far the matter then proceeded: and how it came to stop here, may be justly wondered; but to give the reader the best satisfaction we can in this matter, we shall transcribe a paragraph out of the postscript to his treatise of Helioscopes, printed in 1676. "This treaty with me had been finally concluded for several thousand pounds, had not the inserting of one clause broke it off, which was, That if after I had discovered my invention about the finding the longitude by watches (though in themselves sufficient) they or any other person should find a way of improving my principles, he or they should have the benefit thereof during the term of the patent, and not I. To which clause I could no ways agree, knowing it was easy to vary my principles an hundred ways; and it was not improbable but there might be some addition of conveniency to what I should at first discover, it being facile inventis addere; and judging it unreasonable to be deprived of the benefit of my inventions, in themselves sufficient, because others might vary them, or any other ways improve them, of which it was very probable they would have no thought, if they had not the advantage of being instructed by my discovery, it having been hid some thousands of years already, as indeed the effect hath made evident and certain, there having been nothing done by any body else upon that matter ever since. Upon this point our treaty was broken off, and I concealed the farther discovery of any of the other more considerable parts of my inventions for the regulating of time-keepers, as hoping I might find some better opportunity of publishing them together with my way of finding the longitude of places, for which I hoped to have some benefit, to repay all the labour, study, and charge I had been at for the perfecting thereof. Upon this I was told, that I had better have then discovered all, since there were others, that would find it out within six months. To which I answered, that I would try them one seven years; and it is now above twice seven, and I do not find it yet found out. Indeed Mr. Huygens hath made use of that part I discovered, and somewhat Mr. Leibnitz hath hit upon; but both of them are imperfect. About two years after [the breaking off the abovementioned treaty] I was alarmed by one of those, that had been concerned in it, who told me, he had news that the longitude was found out by a person of honour, by means of Mr. Huygen's pendulum clock, carried to sea, and bung to the under side of the deck of a ship by the help of a ball and socket. But upon his description of the thing I presently told him, "that person, who was willing to be entertained as a Curator by the Society, offering to furnish them every day when they met with three or four considerable experiments. This proposition being unanimously received, Mr. Hooke was named to be the person, and accordingly on the next day of their meeting November the 12th he was unanimously admitted Curator, with the thanks of the Society ordered to Mr. Boyle for dispensing with him for their use; and they ordered that Mr. Hooke should come and sit among them, and both bring in every day three or four of his own experiments, and take care of such others as should be recommended to him by the Society (i). From this time the Society's Journals gave sufficient testimonies of his performances. In 1663 he was nominated, among others, by the Chancellor of Oxford, to have the degree of Master of Arts conferred on him (k). The year following Sir John Cutler having founded a mechanic Lecture, he settled an annual stipend on Mr. Hooke for life, intrusting the President

(3) Dr. Seth Ward, Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, and afterwards Bishop of Sarum.

(i) Life of Dr. Hooke, pag. 9.

(k) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1039, 1040. and Fall Oxon. vol. 2. col. 156.

“ that that invention would do mine no harm; and indeed it was experimentally found useless to that effect “ not long after, upon a trial made of carrying one of “ the said clocks to sea in one of his Majesty's pleasure-boats in the year 1662. The invention indeed in “ itself was ingenious, and did much more than what “ Mr. Huygens did expect. But wanting a little addition (which I concealed, and Mr. Huygens hath “ not got yet that I hear of) it failed of the effect that “ was expected. Notwithstanding this, it was not long “ after published first in Low-Dutch, and immediately “ following in English, wherein what made for it “ was related, but what made against it was concealed, “ though they were both equally known. But on the “ other side all that I could obtain was a catalogue of “ difficulties, first in the doing of it; secondly, in the “ bringing it into public use; thirdly, in making advantage of it. Difficulties were propounded from the “ alteration of climates, airs, heats, and colds, temperature of springs, the nature of vibrations, the wearing of materials, the motion of the ship, and divers others. Next it would be difficult to bring it “ to use; for seamen know their way already to any “ part, and men would not be at the unnecessary charge “ of the Apparatus; and observations of the time could “ not well be made at sea, and they would no where “ be of use, but in the East and West India voyages, “ which were so perfectly understood, that every common seaman almost knew how to pilot a ship “ ther. And as for making any benefit, all people “ lost by such undertakings. Much had been talked “ about premiums for the longitude, but there never “ was any such thing; no King or State would ever “ give a farthing for it, and the like.” Our author suffering this invention to be undiscovered to the last “ gave some persons cause to question, whether he was ever possessor of it, and to doubt whether what in theory “ seemed very promising, would answer when put to the test of practice. Others indeed more severely judged that it was only a kind of boasting in him to assert that, which had not yet been performed, though attempted by many. However the matter is, it is certain that he persisted in the affirmation to the last, and not many weeks before his death told Mr. Richard Waller and other persons, that he knew a certain and infallible method to discover the true place of a vessel at sea, as to its East and West distance from the port departed from. Whether by watches, or other time-keepers, or by any other ways, it is known; though indeed by what is before mentioned, it should seem to be by watches, for the improvement of which he made many trials, and read several discourses. However, this matter produced the discovery of that most useful and practicable method of regulating pocket-watches by a spiral spring applied to the arbor of the balance, as they are now made without any considerable addition since; the account of which we shall transcribe from the postscript to his discourse of Helioscopes published in 1676. “ Finding, says he, in the Trans- “ actions (5), a passage inserted out of the French “ Journal des Sçavans about the invention of applying “ a spring to the balance of a watch for the regulating “ the motion thereof, without at all taking notice that “ this invention was first found out by an Englishman, “ and long since published to the world; I must beg “ the reader's patience, whilst I, in vindication of my “ own right against some unhandsome proceedings, do “ acquaint him with the state of the matter. About “ seventeen years since, being very inquisitive about

(5) Num. 112. pag. 272.

“ regulating the measure of time, in order to find the “ longitude, I did (from a Mechanical Algebra, which “ I was then master of) find out and perfect this “ contrivance, both as to the theory and experimental verification thereof, of which I then discoursed “ to several of my friends, but concealed the modus. “ About fifteen years since, viz. in the year 1660, I “ was in treaty with divers persons of honour for the “ discovery thereof upon proposed articles of encouragement. This I can prove by undeniable witnesses “ yet living, and I have still all the papers, articles, “ and transactions of this matter by me in their own “ hand-writing. In order to bring this treaty to “ pass, I was necessitated to discover something of my “ invention about measuring time, which was this “ way of applying springs to the arbor of the balance “ of a watch, for the regulating the vibrations thereof “ in all postures. And this I did to the end I might “ gain somewhat of belief to these noble persons, with “ whom I was to treat, that I had somewhat more “ than ordinary, and was not one of the heard-of pretenders to that invention, which effect it had. In the “ year 1664 I read several of my first Cutlerian Lectures “ upon this subject in the open hall at Gresham College, at which were present, besides a great number of the Royal Society, many strangers. I there “ shewed the ground and reason of that application of “ springs to a balance of a watch for regulating its “ motion, and explained briefly the true nature and “ principle of springs to shew the physical and geometrical ground of them. And I explained above “ twenty several ways, by which springs might be applied to do the same thing; and how the vibrations “ might be so regulated; as to make their durations “ either all equal, or the greater slower or quicker “ than the rest, and that in any proportion assigned. Some of these ways were applicable to lesser “ vibrations, others to greater, as of 2, 3, 4, 5, “ 6; or what number of revolutions were desired; the “ models of which I there produced, and I did at the “ same time shew wherein the aforesaid sea-clocks were “ defective. All these particulars were at several “ times discoursed of and tried before the Royal Society. I also, at the earnest desire of some friends; “ in the years 1664 and 1665, did cause some of “ the same watches to be made, though I was unwilling to add any of the better applications of the “ spring to them, as waiting a better opportunity for “ my advantage. Of all these things the Publisher of “ the Transactions was not ignorant, and Mr. Huygens “ might have heard of them, at least he might have “ read enough in the History of the Royal Society to have “ informed him in this matter. For in page 247 of “ that History, amongst other experimented inventions, “ there are recounted several new ways of Pendulum “ Watches for the pocket, wherein the motion is regulated by Springs, &c. Mr. Huygens might therefore, “ if he had pleased, have mentioned the first inventor; as he might also that of the circular Pendulum, which is mentioned in the same page of the “ aforesaid History. But though he would not own “ that he knew my published invention, yet I am sure, “ he hath manifested, that he knows no more than “ what I had formerly discovered, he having not in “ the least mentioned the other contrivance, without “ which the other part of the invention is but lame “ and imperfect. Wanting that, the said watches will “ not be exact, nor shew the longitude at sea or land; “ but on the contrary they will be subject to great “ qualities fidant, Council and Fellows of the Royal Society to direct and appoint him with respect to the subject and number of his Lectures. January the 11th 1664 he was elected by that Society Curator of Experiments for life, with an additional Salary to Sir John Cutler's annuity (l). During the recess of the Royal Society on account of the plague in 1665, he attended Dr. Wilkins and some other ingenious Gentlemen into Surrey, near Banstead Downs, where they made several Experiments (m). September the 19th 1666 he produced to the Royal Society a model for rebuilding the City of London destroyed by fire, with which the Society were well pleased; and Sir John Laurence, the late Lord Mayor, addressed himself to the Society, expressing the present Lord Mayor's and Aldermen's approbation of it, they preferring it before the model of the City Surveyor. It is said, that by one part of this model of Mr. Hooke's it was designed to have all the chief streets, as from Leaden-Hall-Corner to Newgate, and the like, to lie in an exact strait

(l) List of Dr. Hooke, pag. 10, 11.

(m) Ibid. pag. 11.

“ qualities of motion and carriage, and will be apt “ with many of these motions to be stopped. . . I for“ bear now to mention any farther the carriage of “ the writer of the Transactions in this affair.” Mr.
 Hooke's resentment to Mr. Oldenburg, the publisher of the Philosophical Transactions, appears strongly from this passage; and the reason of it was, that when Mr. Oldenburg inserted an extract of the Journal des Sçavans concerning Mr. Huygens's new invention of very exact and portable watches, he did not take notice, that this invention was first found out by Mr.
 Hooke, and long since published by him to the world.
 Mr. Oldenburg, on occasion of his advertising this very treatise of Helioscopes in the Philosophical Transactions for the year 1675, No. 118, undertakes to justify himself from any blame on this account by saying, “ It is “ certain the describer of helioscopes some years ago “ caused to be actually made some watches of this “ kind, yet without publishing a description of them
 “ in print to the world. And it is as true, that none “ of these watches succeeded, nor was any thing since “ done to amend the invention, until Mr. Huygens, by “ a letter to the Royal Society, communicated to them
 “ a contrivance of his very exact pocket-watches; for “ which intelligence the said Society thought fit to “ return him thanks, yet so as to intimate to him,
 “ that Mr. Hooke had some years ago invented a “ watch of the like structure. Not long after this “ came over a description of Mr. Huygens's invention, “ together with a delineation of the figure of the “ fame, which I produced at the public meeting of “ the Royal Society, where Mr. Hooke not only saw “ it, but took a copy of the figure itself at the same “ time . . . Which done, both figure and description “ were at Mr. Huygen's desire printed in the Transactions, No. 112; Mr. Hooke well knowing, that “ they were designed to be published in one of those “ tracts, and who might therefore, if he had desired
 “ notice should be taken at the same time of his earlier “ invention, have given the author of them some inti“ mation of it, which would certainly have been “ complied with, as hath been done upon other occa“ sions; witness several of the same tracts, wherein “ divers discoveries of this accuser have been formerly “ both printed and vindicated from the usurpation of “ others.” Mr. Hooke was highly provoked at
 Mr. Oldenburg's asserting, that none of his watches succeeded; and therefore in the postscript to his Lampas, printed at London 1677, he thus replies to it.
 “ The publisher of the Transactions in that of October
 “ 1675, endeavours to cover former injuries by accu“ mulating new ones . . . Otherwise he would not “ have affirmed, that none of my watches succeeded.
 “ For how could he be sure of a negative, whom I “ have not acquainted with my inventions, since I “ looked on him as one, that made a trade of intelli“ gence? Next, whereas he denies their being pub“ lished to the world in print, he prevaricates, and “ would have it believed they were not published to “ the world, though they were publicly read of in “ Sir John Cutler's Lectures; . . . and though they “ were made and shewn to thousands both English “ and foreigners, and writ of to many; and lastly,
 “ in the year 1666 published to the world in print
 “ in the History of the Royal Society.” Mr. Hooke likewise answers to what Mr. Oldenburg alleged about his taking a copy of Mr. Huygen's draught and description, and to some other particulars of his defence. But as he had insinuated, that Mr. Oldenburg was not faithful in the management of the Royal Society's intelligence, the latter obtained the following declaration from the Council of the Society, dated November 20, 1676. “ Whereas the publisher of the “ Philosophical Transactions hath made complaint to “ the Council of the Royal Society of some passages

 “ in a late book of Mr. Hooke, intitled, Lampas, &c.
 “ and printed by the Printer of the said Society, re“ flecting on the integrity and faithfulness of the said “ publisher in his management of the intelligence of “ the said Society: this Council hath thought fit to “ declare in the behalf of the publisher aforesaid, that “ they knew nothing of the publication of the said “ book; and farther, that the said publisher hath car“ ried himself faithfully and honestly in the manage“ ment of the intelligence of the Royal Society, and “ given no just cause of such reflection.” Mr. Richard Waller observes (6), that Mr. Hooke informed him, that about the year 1660, he having shewn a movement regulated by a spiral spring to the Lord Brounker, &c, and “ Mr. Huygens having for some time ap“ plied himself to invent several ways to regulate time“ keepers by the correspondence he held with Mr.
 “ Oldenburg, among other matters had notice of “ this, for which there was afterwards an application “ made to procure a patent. This is indeed possible, “ continues Mr. Waller; but whether it were so or not,
 “ I cannot determine. That Mr. Hooke had, many “ years before Huygens mentioned it, discovered the “ invention, is certain by what is related in the History of the Royal Society among several new inventions, “ in these words; There have been invented several kinds of pendulum watches for the pocket, wherein the motion is regulated by springs, &c. Now though “ this does not mention the springs being spiral, or “ fastned to the arbor of the balance, yet it appears
 “ it was so by what is related above; and a passage
 “ I have seen in a letter from Sir Robert Moray to “ Mr. Oldenburg, dated Oxon Sept. 30, 1665, clears “ it, in which are these words: You [meaning Oldenburg] will be the first that knows when his [that is Huygens's] watches will be ready; and I will therefore expect from you an account of them, and, if he imparts to you what he does, let me know it. To that purpose you may ask him, if he doth not apply a spring to the arbor of the balance, and that will give him occasion to say somewhat to you. If it be that, you may tell him what Hooke has DONE IN THAT MATTER, AND WHAT HE INTENDS MORE. Although I cannot be assured what Oldenburg wrote to Monsieur Huygens; yet it is probable their intimacy procured
 “ what he knew; and it is evident, that Huygens's “ discovery of this was first published in the Journal des Sçavans, and from thence in the Philosophical Transactions for March 25th, 1675, about ten years “ after that letter of Sir Robert Moray's, and near “ fifteen after Hooke's first discovery of it. To this “ I shall add what Mr. Oldenburg has printed, *Philos.
 Transact.* No. 118. It is certain the describer of Helioscopes [meaning Hooke] some years ago caused to be actually made some watches of this kind; which indeed (he there says) were unsuccessful. Which “ whether so or not, I cannot learn so many years
 “ after, though I am inclined to think that expression “ proceeded from passion; the invention and principle
 “ of Hooke's and Huygens's being both the very same “ as are now used.” Mr. Waller then remarks (7), (7) Ibid. pag. 7. that in the declaration of the Council of the Royal Society in behalf of Mr. Oldenburg, there is no contradiction to Mr. Hooke's being the first in that invention;

(6) List of Dr. Hooke, pag. 6.

(7) Ibid. pag. 7.

strait line, and all the other cross streets turning out of them at right angles, and all the churches, public buildings, market-places, &c. in proper and convenient places. The rebuilding of the city, according to the Act of Parliament, requiring an able person to set out the ground to the several proprietors, Mr. Hooke was pitched upon and appointed one of the City-Surveyors, Mr. John Oliver a glass-painter being the other (n). In this employment he got most part of that estate, which he died possessed of, as was evident by a large iron chest of money found after his death, which had been locked down with the key in it, with a date of the time, by which it appeared to have been so shut up for above thirty years. In this was contained the greatest part of what he left behind him, which was to the value of many thousand pounds in gold and silver. "That he might by this place justly acquire a considerable estate, says Mr. Waller (o), I think (o) Life of Dr. Hooke, pag. 13. "cannot be denied, every particular person after the fire being in haste to have his concerns

(n) Ibid. pag. 13; and Wood, Ath. Oxon. ubi supra.

tion; and that it cannot be denied but that Mr. Hooke was frequently desired to perfect his inventions about watches and time-keepers, which, when urged, he as often promised, and when any new contrivance was by any person produced, he then shewed something of his own, either the same, or excelling it, which was a proof that he had tried the same before. Particularly when on the 9th of August 1666, Mr. Mercator shewed to the Society a watch of his own invention, representing the æquation of time to the approbation of the company, Mr. Hooke at the same time produced a new piece of watch-work of his own contrivance to measure time exactly both at sea and land, of which he was desired to bring in the description, which, though promised, was, it seems, never done. But to proceed to our author's other performances; in 1655 and 1656, there were many curious experiments, observations, and enquiries made at Oxford, and instruments for those purposes contrived, as particularly the Barometer, of which Mr. Hooke says, the first occasion of the invention was a suggestion of Mr. Christopher Wren, in order to find whether the hypothesis of Des Cartes for giving the reason of the tides from the pressure of the moon upon the air in its passage by the Meridian were true or not. About 1658 or 1659, he observes that he "contrived several Astronomical instruments for making observations both at sea and land, which I afterwards, says he, produced before the Royal Society." Some of these seem to be the instruments mentioned in his Astronomical Lectures published in his Posthumous Works (8). About the same time he contrived the Circular Pendulum, and the use of it for continuing the motion of another Pendulum, which he afterwards shewed to the Royal Society in 1663; about which time and afterwards there are several particulars relating to the Circular Pendulum entered into the Journals of that Society as his. A movement to this purpose is described in his Animadversions on the first part of the Machina Cœlestis, p. 68, Edit. London, 1674. In 1661 he published at London in 8vo. An Attempt for the explanation of the Phœnomena, observable in an experiment published by the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; in the XXXVth Experiment of his Epistological Discourse touching the Air; and the same year at London in 4to, A Discourse of a new Instrument lately invented by him to make more accurate Observations in Astronomy than ever were yet made, &c. May 14th or December 17th 1662, he read to the Society an Account of the Diversity of the Parts of water. November 26th, A brief Account of the Experiments tried with Glass-Balls, and a conjecture of the cause. December 10th, An Account of the Rarefaction of the Air; and Observables in the six branched Figures frozen in Urine; Figures observed in Waters frozen; Figures observed in snow: And of the difference of Gravity by removing the body further from the Surface of the Earth upwards. December the 24th he read a paper, of driving Water out of a Glass by its own Vapours. January 14th, 1663, he read an account of some Tryals for finding how much the pressure of Water is increased by the Descent of heavier, or the Ascent of lighter bodies therein; and An Account of an Experiment touching the different Weight of cold and warm water. January the 28th, he read an Account of some Tryals for finding out the Pressure of the parts of Water upon one another, and the elastical power of the Air. February the 11th he read a paper of the Refraction of Ice. February the 18th he read a Description of the Instrument for finding the Force of falling Bodies. May the

(8) See pag. 500, &c.

6th, 1663, he read Queries concerning the Condensation of Air, to be resolved by Experiments in the Compressing Engine. May the 13th he read a paper of Experiments proposed to be made in the Compressing Engine. And on the same day, or the 20th following, he read an Account of what happened to a Carp included in a vessel of Water, out of which the Air was pretty well exhausted. June the 3d he read a paper of the exhausting Air out of Water, which returns into Water again. July the 1st or 15th he shewed an Experiment touching the uniting and mixing of Air and Water. July the 22d he read a Description of the Water-raising-Engine presented by his Highness Prince Rupert to the Society, after the way of Cavallerius's Hydrocantisterium novum. September the 9th he read a Description of an Instrument for tryal of Gun-powder. February the 10th he read an Account of Experiments concerning the Weight of the Air, and the Proportion of the Weight of the Air to that of Water. April the 13th 1664, he read an Account of an Experiment of the rising of Water in the Bolt-head upon Immersion in cold, and falling thereof upon the Immersion of it in hot. April the 27th he shewed an Experiment for the Condensation of Spirit of Wine; and another for the Condensation of Water. June the 8th he read a brief Relation of some Observations made, and of the best information that could be had concerning the Effects of a Clap of Thunder and Lightning, which happened June the 7th, 1664, about four in the Afternoon at the Sign of the Post's Head in Piccadilly, London. In July he produced an experiment to shew the number of Vibrations of an extended string made in a determinate time, requisite to give a certain tone or note, by which it was found that a wire making two hundred seventy two vibrations in one second of time, sounded G Sol Re Ut in the scale of all Music (9). He made likewise other experiments of the division of a Monochord. November the 2d, he read an Account of a Viper's Teeth; and November the 23d an Account of opening a Viper. December the 14th he read Some Considerations about the most likely Way of settling an universal measure by the help of Pendulums. In 1665 he published his Micrographia: or some philosophical Descriptions of minute Bodies made by magnifying Glasses, with Observations and Enquiries thereupon. London &c. in folio. March the 21st 1664, he read a paper concerning gravity. About the same time he produced a very small quadrant for observing accurately to minutes and seconds. It had an area moving on it by means of a screw lying on the limb of the quadrant. Possibly this was the first ever made after that manner, though it is now sufficiently known and practised. A large one of this sort and of all its parts, with the rest of the Apparatus and manner of using it, is at large published by Mr. Hooke in 1674 in his Animadversions on Hevelius's Machina Cœlestis, p. 54. May the 23d 1666 he read a paper, "explicating (as is said in the Journals of the Royal Society) the inflexion of a direct motion into a curve by a supervening attractive principle, which was ordered to be registered. The discourse contained therein is an introduction to an experiment to shew that circular motion is compounded of an endeavour by a direct motion by the tangent, and of another endeavour tending to the center. To which purpose there was a Pendulum fastened to the roof of the room with a large wooden ball of Lignum Vitæ on the end of it: and it was found, that if the Impetus of the endeavour by the tangent at the first setting out was stronger than the endeavour to the center, there was generated such an elliptical

(o) Life of Dr. Hooke, pag. 13.

(9) Life of Dr. Hooke, pag. 100.

cerns expedited; so that, as I have been informed, he had no rest early and late from persons soliciting to have their grounds set out; which, without any fraud or injustice, deserved a due recompence in so fatiguing an employ." Mr. Oldenburg, Secretary of the Royal Society, dying during the Society's recess in 1677, Mr. Hooke was desired to take his place, and write down the minutes of what considerable matters pass, which he did on the 25th of October the same year (p). In the beginning of the year 1687 his brother's daughter Mrs. Grace Hooke died, who had lived with him several years, the concern for whose death he hardly ever wore off, being observed from that time to grow less active, and more melancholy and cynical (q). In December 1691 having received a warrant from Dr. Tillotson, Archbishop of Canterbury, for a degree of Doctor of Physic, he went on the 7th day of that month, and took the oaths before Sir Charles Hedges in Doctors Commons. About this time he was employed about the contriving

(p) Ibid. pag. 20.

(q) Ibid. pag. 24.

elliptical motion whose longest diameter was parallel to the direct endeavour of the body at the first impulse. But if that Impetus were weaker than that endeavour to the center, there was generated such an elliptical motion, whose shortest diameter was parallel to the endeavour of the body in the first point of the impulse. If both were equal, there was made a perfect circular motion. There was also made another experiment by fastening another pendulous body by a short string on the lower part of the wire, by which the greater weight was suspended, that it might freely make a circular or elliptical motion round the bigger, whilst the bigger moved circularly or elliptically about the center; the intention whereof was to explicate the manner of the moon's motion about the earth, it appearing evidently thereby, that neither the biggest ball, which represented the earth, nor the less, which represented the moon, were moved in so perfect a circle or ellipsis, as otherwise they would have been, if either of them had been suspended and moved singly; but that a certain point, which seemed to be the center of gravity of the two bodies (howsoever posited and considered as one) seemed to be regularly moved, in such a circle or ellipsis, the two balls having other peculiar motions in small epicycles about the said point." August the 1st 1666 he read his Observations of the Comet in 1664, afterwards printed in his Tracts, and intitled, Cometa. November the 21st he read an Account of Inclining Pendulums. September the 19th he produced a model for rebuilding the city of London destroyed by the great fire. January the 9th 1669 he was ordered by the Royal Society to prosecute his observations of the earth's parallax proposed by him formerly. A large account of the result of his observations therein was printed in his Attempt to prove the Motion of the Earth, London 1674. in 4to; being the first of his Cutlerian Lectures published. February the 28th following he first produced his reflecting Telescope, which is described, with the reason of the principle, in his treatise of Helioscopes printed in 1676. In a letter of Mr. John Collins, F. R. S. to a friend concerning Mr. Newton's reflecting telescope, communicated to us by the very ingenious William Jones Esq; F. R. S. we have the following passage. "Mr. Hooke finding Mr. Newton's reflecting telescope to gain esteem, did soon after put in a proposal in writing to the Royal Society in words to this effect. The perfection of telescopes, microscopes, scotoscopes, and burning-glasses, by figures as easily made, as those that are plain or spherical, whereby the light and magnitude of objects is prodigiously encreased, and whatsoever hath hitherto been attempted, or almost desired in dioptrics, and accomplished with a cypher containing the mystery: the which he disclosed to Lord Brouncker and Dr. Wren, who report plausibly of it. And what is done in this way, is performed by glass refraction. Mr. Hooke moreover affirmed, coram multis, that in the year 1664, he made a little tube, of about an inch long, to put in his fob, which performs more than any telescope of fifty feet long, made after the common manner: but the plague happening, which caused his absence, and the fire, whence redounded profitable employments about the city, he neglected to prosecute the same, being unwilling the glass-grinders should know any thing of the secret." March the 14th following he read to the Society a paper about making a lamp that shall always keep the surface of the oyle at the same height till it is spent. March the 21st he read a Description of a very easy and simple Instrument, but universal, for the Descriptions of all kinds of plain Deals, whether Horizontal, Mural, Inclined, Reclined, or Declined, together with a Declaration of the Principles and Reasons of it. June the 17th 1667 and afterwards he read several discourses of the causes, powers, and effects of Earth-quakes, affirming the great hills and mountains in the world to have been raised by them; of which subject he at several times afterwards made very many discourses and lectures, the greatest part of which are published in his Posthumous works. In July 1667 he tryed several experiments upon himself in an Exhausted Receiver large enough to contain a man. At this time he contrived a Micrometer of less charge and difficulty than that invented by Mr. Gascoigne with screws. This seems to be the same with that described in his Posthumous works p. 498. December 19 he exhibited to the Royal Society some Experiments concerning Respiration upon Fœtus's taken out of a mastiff bitch. December the 26th he brought in a farther description of a Sea-Barometer. The same year his Method for making an History of the Weather was printed in Sprat's History of the Royal Society, p. 173. January the 2d 1673 he proposed to the Royal Society some ways of discovering the various pressures of the air. January the 16th he produced his new contrivance of promoting the vibrations of pendulums, so as to prevent all checks, which he affirmed had not been provided against by any contrivance to that time. March the 12th he exhibited the description of an instrument for collecting the wind, or for making the slower motions of the air sensible. April the 9th 1668 he produced two instruments to promote the sense of hearing. May the 14th he shewed an experiment of the penetration of liquors in oyl of vitriol and fair water. May the 21st he gave an account of an experiment of statics to examine the incorporating of liquors. May the 28th he read an account of an experiment to shew the dilatation of bodies. June the 11th he communicated an observation about the feed of moss. He afterwards proposed to the Royal Society several methods of measuring of a degree of the earth, and invented several instruments; and, as is entered in the Journal of that Society, October the 28th 1669, he was of opinion, "that one of the exactest ways of measuring was, by making accurate observations of the heavens to a second by a perpendicular tube, and then to take exact distances by angles to a second also." This seems to be the method observed by the French not long after, as may be seen by a particular treatise of it published by Monsieur Picart, as likewise by what Du Hamel says in his History of the Academy of Sciences, pag. 98. It appears also by some notices and loose papers of Mr. Hooke, that he invented a sort of travelling calash for this purpose, which should describe upon a paper, not only the mensuration of the way gone over, but the several ascents and descents, together with the turnings and windings of the calash, or the points of the compass, upon which the person travelled, with other contrivances. There were also other models for measuring a degree proposed to be made in St. James's Park on the Canal, which were never prosecuted. In January 1672 he first proposed a drop of Mercury for an universal standard, which is described more at large in his Posthumous Works, pag. 472. In April following he shewed an experiment with a solution of copper to represent the appearance of clouds and other aerial meteors, by dropping into it several salts, &c. At the contriving and surveying the hospital near Hoxton, given by the will of Alderman Aske, and remarkable for the due proportion of its parts, and beauty of the whole. He was blamed for exceeding the sum at first proposed to be expended upon it; and he owned to Mr. Richard Waller, that it had far exceeded the first estimate, which he had given in of the charges, but not by his fault or mistake, but partly by new additions and alterations of the first design, and chiefly by his not procuring and agreeing with the workmen himself; which if he had done, as he said, he would have engaged that it should have come to little or no more than his first proposed sum. He also proposed, that there might be instituted in that place a mathematical school for boys to be instructed in the principles of Astronomy and Navigation; which at first was well approved of by the persons concerned in the management of that affair (r). On the 18th of July 1696 his Chancery-suit for Sir John Cutler's salary was determined in his favour to his great the same time he shewed the use of introducing the species into a dark room for painting, and contrived a box for that purpose. In March 1671 he shewed several experiments to explain the nature and cause of gravity. Particularly on the 9th of that month an experiment was made, in which some flower put into a void shallow glass with a large sloping brim and a pretty tall foot, was made to rise and ran over like a fluid, by the knocking on the edge of the glass, and also by the forcibly moving of one's finger round the edge of the same. Leaden bullets also being put into this glass did by knocking move it like a fluid. This was proposed to consider what might be the cause of gravity, and suggest an hypothesis to explicate the motion of gravity. The same year several discourses and papers past between him and Mr. Isaac Newton concerning a new theory of light and colours. About this time he made a proposition for perfecting all sorts of optic glasses, the secret of which was delivered in an anagram to the Lord Brouncker. Not long after this began a dispute between Monsieur Hevelius and Mr. Hooke concerning the preference of plain and telescopic sights for astronomical instruments, which was thus occasioned. Mr. Hooke by means of Mr. Oldenburg had recommended to Hevelius the application of telescopic sights to his exquisitely contrived and elaborated instruments, affirming that by them an angle might be taken to a much greater exactness than with plain sights, and gave him a short, but, as he thought, a sufficient information of the manner of applying them to the instrument; and intimated, that if any thing required a farther explanation, he was ready to give it. However Hevelius could not be prevailed with to make use of them; whether he thought himself too experienced to be informed by a young Astronomer, as he considered Mr. Hooke; or whether having made so many observations with plain sights, he was unwilling to alter his method, lest he might bring their exactness into question; or whether being by long practice accustomed to the use of them, and not thoroughly apprehending the use of the other, nor well understanding the difference, as Mr. Molyneux has observed in his Dioptrics, is indeed uncertain. Not long after came out the first Part of his Machina Cœlestis; and Mr. Hooke took occasion in his Cutlerian Lectures to read several discourses upon that book and the instruments therein described, which Lectures were printed in 1674 at London in 4to, under the title of Animadversions on the first Part of the Machina Cœlestis of the learned and deservedly famous Astronomer Johan. Hevelius, Consul of Dantzick. In this Treatise defending zealously the use of telescopic sights and their preference to plain sights, he happened to let fall some expressions, which gave offence to Hevelius; who several years after published his Annus Climactericus, which revived the dispute, and caused several learned men to interest themselves in the controversy. We shall here subjoin from Mr. Hooke's manuscripts what he wrote himself in answer to what some persons had written upon this subject. But for the better understanding of this, we shall observe, first, that Hevelius having sent his Annus Climactericus to the Royal Society, Dr. Wallis was desired to give an account of it, which was printed in the Philosophical Transactions Num. 175. pag. 1162, in which the Doctor having used some expressions, which Mr. Hooke thought reflected too severely upon him; and Mr. Molyneux not long after sending a letter to the same purpose, he wrote the following vindication of himself. "There having been lately read in a meeting of this honourable Society a letter from Mr. Molyneux, containing several reflections that concerned me, which, without some satisfactory answer, mult needs make me suffer in the opinion of those, who have not truly understood the matter of controversy; and the high esteem I have of the justice and judgment of this illustrious company, persuades me the rather to make my defence here. The objections in the letter were these. "That if it be true, which has been asserted, not only by some celebrated Astronomers, but chiefly by Mr. Hooke in his Animadversions, &c. the endeavours of Hevelius will be frustrated, and his vast charges to no more purpose than Tycho's, and all his splendid Apparatus but meer lumber. For upon this question as to plain sights, the price of his Astronomical labours of his whole life depends. But surely this were an event highly deplorable, not only to the party himself immediately concerned, but the whole Respublica Literaria. Secondly, mention is made of the slowness and smallness of what I had published, which was only a pamphlet, that asserted, that notwithstanding all this, yet merely for want of telescopic sights and some new kind of invented divisions on Mr. Hevelius's instruments, I went so far as to doubt, whether his observations could be true, and always the same to two or three minutes, and that the whole import of it besides this was nothing but the description of an instrument, which he never heard was put in practice. The third objection against me is, that though Monsieur Hevelius had earnestly requested from me or any one else, that I had telescopic instruments, to send him some distances of fixed stars observed by them; yet he could never be so happy as to obtain any from me, though afterwards he did from some others, &c. These and some other discourses spread abroad tacitly insinuate, that the publishing those Animadversions was a very ill action; and the learned in general have received a great prejudice thereby. It concerns me therefore to clear myself of this imputation. For answer then I say, First, If what I have published in those Animadversions be true and certain, then I desire to know whether it were better for the Respublica Literaria to be acquainted with it, or to remain possessed with the belief of some assertions of Monsieur Hevelius, which are really mistakes (not to say worse) though possibly till that time, wherein I published them, they were generally believed to be truths, as he has taken a great deal of pains to induce a belief of in the first Part of his Machina Cœlestis from pag. 293 to pag. 300. which I rather mention, because some persons have thought and asserted, that I was the first aggressor in print, the contrary to which those six pages assert. Secondly, Whether those deplorable events of lessening the price of Monsieur Hevelius's works, if that were true, when put into the balance, will outweigh the detesting a mistake, or discovery of a truth in a matter of so great moment in Natural Philosophy, as concerns the most considerable parts of knowledge in the theory of the Universe, especially of celestial bodies; for if truth be that, which is most prevalent with all philosophical spirits against any particular interest; then, great satisfaction, after it had made him uneasy for several years. In his Diary he shews his sense of it in these terms DOMSH GLISSA, which may be read thus : Deo opt. max. summus Honor, Gloria in secula seculorum Amen. I was born on this day of July 1635, and God has given me a new birth : may I never forget his mercies to me, whilst he gives me breath, may I praise him. His health was extremely broken a considerable time before his death, and his sight failed him. He died March the 3d 1703, being sixty seven years, seven months and thirteen days old. His corps was decently interred in the church of St. Hellen at London, being attended by all the members of the Royal Society then in town. As to his person, he was but despicable, being very crooked, and always pale and meagre. He wore his own hair of a dark brown colour, very long, and hanging neglected over his face, uncut and lank ; which about three years before his

(r) Ibid. pag.
25.

“ then, I hope, I shall prove I have not offended “ in that particular in my publication of those “ Animadversions. And Hevelius himself was of “ the same mind, when at the sixty first page
 “ of his Preface he writes, (speaking of his dis“ paraging some things of Tycho Brahe) in hoc “ negotio semper in cujusvis animo herere debet, a- “ micus Plato, amicus Aristoteles, sed magis tamen “ amica veritas. Nor do I find him so shy in pro“ claiming the mistakes of Tycho's observations, when “ it was made for his own reputation ; for in the “ thirty fourth page of his preface he says, that the “ greatest part of Tycho's observations differed from “ his own four, five, six, and even ten minutes. At “ the thirty ninth page he says, that of 780 in Tycho's “ catalogue there are but 260 which differ not less “ than two minutes ; but all the rest differ 3' 5' 10' “ 20' 30' 40' 45' 50', nay a whole degree from the “ truth, and that fifteen differ above a degree, and “ some many more, even to eight degrees in longi“ tude, and in latitude to thirteen whole degrees, “ sometimes in defect, sometimes in excess ; yet for all
 “ this Hevelius would be thought highly to value Tycho “ Brahe, and not to have made any reflections upon “ him. Nor has the detecting mistakes even in per“ sons of as great fame been looked upon so ill a “ thing, but rather a meritorious action, as might be “ instanced in Dr. Pell's short answer in a $\frac{1}{4}$ of a sheet “ of paper to Longomontanus's work, which had “ been the business of thirty years. Another instance
 “ may be of Phocildes upon Lansbergius, the learned “ Savilian Astronomic Professor against Bullialdus &c.
 “ all which authors were well esteemed for their detecting “ mistakes, and discovering truth. And as for any “ disrespectful or undervaluing sentiments I had of He“ velius or his performances, I hope what I have “ printed in my Animadversions will prevail with the “ unprejudiced to believe the contrary, where I say, “ p. 43, and 44 ; That I would not be understood by “ these Animadversions to undervalue the works and per- “ formances of a person so highly meriting the thanks of “ the learned world, for his great expence and vast pains, “ in performing a work so highly useful to astronomy and “ navigation, that I did not in the least doubt but that “ it would be a work of perpetual esteem, and much pre- “ ferable to any thing of the like kind yet done in the “ world ; and that he had gone as far as was possible
 “ for humane industry to go with instruments of that kind,
 “ which were as complete and exact as instruments with “ plain sights could be made ; and that he had calculated “ with all imaginable care and skill, and delivered “ them with the like candor and integrity. But yet “ that it was my opinion, that this ought not to discourage “ others from making use of telescope-sights, and to make “ better observations with instruments by that means “ more exact. This I hope may apologize for my “ writing those Animadversions. But in the next place,
 “ I must make some defence for what is said in them.
 “ This Gentleman says, I went so far as to doubt “ whether Hevelius's observations could be made true
 “ and always the same to two or three minutes. I
 “ with the place had been quoted where I said so,
 “ since I only said p. 7. that I believed it impossible “ for any one to distinguish with common sights any “ distance in the heavens to less than half a minute, “ and very few to a minute. And I am apt to be“ lieve there may be some instances even in Hevelius's “ catalogue, that will verify this assertion. And for “ any other assertion, which is really mine in that “ treatise, I do not doubt of satisfying any unpre“ judiced person by experiment if desired, which I say

“ is really my assertion ; for by mistake or otherwise,
 “ some things have been fathered upon me I never “ said, viz. that I should assert, that an instrument of “ a span radius might be made, that should perform “ observations sixty times more accurate than could be “ done with his best instruments. Which assertion is “ none of mine, and whoever have spread these fal“ sities, might have found better employment. I say “ indeed, that a very small instrument, curiously made,
 “ exactly divided and instructed with telescope-sights, “ will perform much better in all observations (except “ the sun) than the largest instruments without such “ sights, for the reason before alledged from the defect
 “ in our eyes, which cannot distinguish an angle less “ than half a minute ; nor is this a defect in my own “ eyes only (as Hevelius somewhere seems to hint)
 “ for the experiment may easily be tried with the best “ eyes. Nor is it any disparagement to Hevelius's “ observations to compare them with Tycho Brahe's, “ though I should have supposed them but of equal “ value ; since the mere repeating of his observations “ would be of great use in astronomy, these being al“ most one hundred years after his. For we must by “ such comparisons judge of many considerable en“ quiries concerning celestial bodies, which cannot by “ other means be so well detected, for which I refer “ to the 76th page of my Animadversions, viz. to know “ whether those celestial bodies, which are supposed to “ fixed, do not vary their positions to each other, and “ also their magnitudes, which I had good grounds to “ believe. As to the objection, that my pamphlet “ contained little besides the description of an instrument “ never put in practice. I conceive there may be se“ veral mistakes ; for I am of opinion, upon perusal
 “ there will be somewhat else in that treatise worth “ consideration. Next that there have been instru“ ments made, perfected, and used after that way by “ Sir Jonas Moore, by Mr. Gregory in Scotland, by “ Mr. Halley and many others ; I believe very few “ astronomical instruments since have been made with “ plain sights. And if the multitude of authorities “ were necessary, I could produce Auzout, Picart, “ Mariot, Romer, de la Hire, Montaneri, Gotignies,
 “ and others, not to name those of our own nation.
 “ As to my not returning the observations of certain “ distances of stars, which Hevelius desired, it is suffi“ ciently known what inconveniences we lay under in “ this place after the fire of London ; and had I found “ conveniences, yet the unkind reception those things “ found, which I sent him, was enough to deter me “ from such a compliance ; though he was sensible how “ I had often been ready to gratify his curiosity in “ many other particulars. But when his Machina “ Cælestis was published, I was obliged to write those “ Animadversions, in which, I hope, all unprejudiced
 “ readers will justify my procedure ; at least I am “ ready to prove any thing I have therein asserted.”
 We shall insert here an original letter of Mr. Hooke relating to the dispute between him and Hevelius, communicated by the learned William Jones Esq; F. R. S.

“ Sir,

“ I thank you very much for the opportunity you “ have given me of being any ways serviceable to a “ person, who has so highly obliged the learned world
 “ as the excellent Hevelius has both by the curious “ and learned pieces he has already published, and by “ those other great undertakings, which he has given “ them cause to hope for and expect from his indefa“ tigable endeavours. And in truth, Sir, upon the “ consideration of the subject he has designed, being “ ignorant his death he cut off, and wore a perriwig. He was of an active, restless, indefatigable genius even almost to the last, and always slept little to his death, seldom going to sleep till two, three, or four a clock in the morning, and seldom to bed, oftner continuing his studies all night, and taking a short nap in the day. His temper was melancholy, mistrustful and jealous, which more increased upon him with his years. He was in the beginning of his being made known to the Learned, very communicative of his philosophical discoveries and inventions, till some accidents made him, to a crime, close and reserved. He laid the cause upon some persons challenging his discoveries for their own, and taking occasion from his hints to perfect what he had not, which made him say, that he would suggest nothing till he had time to perfect it himself, which was the reason that many things are lost, which he affirmed that he knew. He had a piercing judgment into “ ignorant of what instruments he makes use of, and “ of what help that northern climate affords for that “ purpose, I have often wished, that he was furnished “ with as good optic glasses as are now in use in other “ parts of the world, and with some good method of “ making use of them for determining the diameters “ and parallaxes of the planets, and for finding the “ positions and distances of the smaller fixed stars, &c.

 “ for then I could not doubt to receive from his judgment
 “ and diligence in the use of them better effects “ than have been hitherto produced by others. And “ in particular I have wished, that those sextants, at “ least, he makes use of for measuring the distances of “ stars, were furnished with telescopic sights, which is “ no small advantage for regulating and assisting the “ sight, which, if he desires it, I shall be most ready “ to gratify him with any information, that the small “ experience I have in those things, will furnish me
 “ with. The longest glass I have several times made “ use of, is a spherical lens convex on both sides of a “ sphere, whose radius is 60 foot, and the focus or “ length of the glass is near about the same length.
 “ It is made of a piece of glass of between $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$
 “ an inch thick, and between 5 and 6 inches over.
 “ It bears an aperture of about three inches, sometimes “ 4 or more, according to the uses I design it for.
 “ It discovers many things not visible thro’ a very good “ 36 glass; such as the shadow of the Satellites, and
 “ the verticity of Jupiter and Mars on their axes.
 “ Some make use of two convex eye-glasses; but I
 “ for the most part make use of but one, and a very “ convex lens, convex on both sides of a sphere of “ . . . inches radius. Sometimes I use such as are more “ shallow, but seldom any deeper. The method by “ which that I have made, was by the ordinary “ way in a very large dish, and wrought on the tool “ by the hand without any kind of engine till such “ time as it be exceeding bright and well polished,
 “ and have received the perfect figure of the scutella,
 “ in which it was wrought; otherwise the glass will “ be worth nothing; in the doing of which there is “ great difficulty. The tube I make use of, is about “ 66 or 68 feet in length, and consists only of two “ long square boxes or tubes made of very thin and “ light slit deal here and there bound together with “ very thin plates of iron, under which within the tube
 “ there are placed several square portions or cells, “ which serve to keep off the adventitious rays, and “ to keep the sides of the tubes square and steady.
 “ Each of these boxes are about ten inches square,
 “ and about 33 foot long. These two are thrust into “ a small square box in the middle about two or three “ foot long, made of thicker boards bound about with “ iron, and having two long boards fixed to them of “ about six foot high, and joined at the top by a “ piece interjacent between them. Over the top of “ which there is afterwards stretched a rope, that serves
 “ to set the tube strait, and to keep it from warping.
 “ This being done, the whole machine is hung by a “ handle after the manner of a pair of scales, the two “ ends of the tube near equally counterpoising each “ other; and by that handle it is drawn by a tackle “ up to any height desirable, by the strength of one “ man only, the whole tube not weighing at most above “ 200 pound weight, and when up it is manageable “ with the greatest facility imaginable. I have “ enquired the lowest rate any such object glass will “ be sold for, and find it will not be afforded for less “ than 25 pounds sterling, and the eye-glasses will cost “ 40 or 50 shillings more. If Mr. Hevelius desire any, “ upon his signifying his mind to me, I shall endeavour

“ to get him the best that can be made here, and at the “ lowest rate.” In 1672 our author read before the Royal “ Society an Account of some Experiments about Refractions
 “ and Colours. May 7, 1673, he read a paper concerning “ Arithmetical Instruments. January the 15th 1674, “ he shewed to the Royal Society a way to determine how “ small an angle the unassisted eye is able to discern; by “ which it was found, that none of the persons eyes present “ could observe a much less angle than of a minute.
 “ The reader may see a more ample account of this in “ his Animadversions upon Hevelius’s Machina Caelestis, “ pag. 8. From this time many magnetical experiments
 “ were made by him; and on the 19th of March following
 “ he proposed a theory of the variation, the substance “ whereof was this, That the magnet hath its peculiar “ poles distant ten degrees from the poles of the earth, “ about which they move, so as to make a revolution in “ three hundred and seventy years; whence the variation “ hath altered of late about ten or eleven minutes “ every year, and will probably continue to do so for some “ time, till it begins to grow slower and slower, and will “ at length be stationary and retrograde, and in probability “ may return. At the same time he proposed the “ making of a very easy and nice instrument to observe “ the variation of the variations of the needle in different “ parts of the world. What this instrument was, is “ difficult to be determined now; but the figure of an “ instrument something to that purpose may be seen in “ his Posthumous Works, pag. 486. February the 4th, “ 1673, several observations and discourses having been “ made in the Royal Society about the structure of the “ muscles of animals, Mr. Hooke said, “ That his “ observation was, that the fleshy part of a muscle “ consisted of an infinite number of exceedingly small “ round pipes, extended between the two tendons of “ the muscles, and seemed to end in them: which “ tendons in the muscles of beef boiled would be easily “ stript off from these pipes, and so leave the round “ ends of those pipes very distinct and visible. That “ the reason of the moving of a muscle might be “ from the filling or emptying of those pipes, whose “ sides seemed to be flexible like those of a gut.”
 “ He intimated likewise, that he knew a way of making “ succedaneous muscles for a man to supply the defect of “ his muscles for flying, and give one man the strength “ of ten or twenty, if required. March the 18th he made “ an experiment of a new property of light, having before “ read some discourses upon that subject. This experiment
 “ is published in his Posthumous Works, p. 186. In 1676
 “ he published his Description of Helioscopes, and some other “ Instruments, London, in 4to. and in 1677 his “ Lampas: Or a Description of some Mechanical Improvements “ of Lamps and Water-pipes. London, 1677, in 4to. The “ same year being chosen Secretary of the Royal Society “ in the room of Mr. Oldenburg, he shewed several “ experiments and instruments in order to explain the “ gravitation and alterations in the air by vapours, &c.
 “ contriving an air-pan to shew the different specific “ gravity of the air by a large thin ball of glass “ counter-poised. In February 1673, upon account of “ Monsieur Gallet’s observation of the oval figure of “ Mercury in the Sun, he gave several reasons for the “ prolated oval figure of the planets, some of which “ are printed in his Posthumous Works, pag. 355, with “ a demonstration thereof. He remarked, “ that “ all fluids on the surface would run into that shape,
 “ and that it was not improbable but that the water “ here about the earth might do so by the influence of “ the diurnal motion of the earth, which compounded “ with that of the moon, he conceived to be the cause
 “ of tides.” From this time he made microscopical “ observations

into the dispositions of others, and would sometimes give shrewd guesses and smart characters. From his youth he had been used to a collegiate or rather monastic life, which might be some reason of his continuing to live so like an Hermit or Cynic too penuriously, when his circumstances, as to estate, were very considerable, scarcely affording himself necessaries. He declared sometimes that he had a great project in his head as to the disposal of the most part of his estate for the advancement of natural knowledge, and to promote the ends and designs, for which the Royal Society was instituted; to build an handsome fabrick for the Society's use, with a Library, Repository, Laboratory, and other conveniences for making experiments; and to found and endow a perpetual Physico-Mechanic-Lecture of the nature of what himself read. But though he was often sollicitated by his friends to put his designs down in writing, and make his will as to the disposal observations on Animalcula in pepper-water and other feeds steeped in water, confirming Monsieur Liewenhoeck's assertions; and proposed some improvements of microscopes. Some proposals were made by him of instruments more accurate than those formerly invented for sounding the sea's depth, and bringing up any substances from the bottom, or any assigned depth; which were some years after more perfected. April the 25th, 1678, he shewed an experiment farther to explain the action of a muscle, "which was by a chain of small bladders fastened together, so as by blowing into one pipe, the whole might be successively filled, and by that means contracted, supposing the fibres of the muscles, which seemed like a necklace of pearl in the microscope, might be filled with a very agil matter, which he thought most likely to be air, which being included in so thin skins was easily wrought upon by heat, cold, or the acting properties of the liquors that pass between them, and so perform the lengthening and contracting of the muscles." The same year he published Lectures and Collections, &c. London, 1678, in 4to. The first lecture contains observations on the comet in April 1677. In August the same year he read several discourses, and shewed experiments in order to confirm his theory of springs and springing bodies, which are published in his book intitled Lectures de Potentia restitutiva: Or, of Springs, explaining the Power of Springing Bodies. London, 1678, in 4to. The sum of this hypothesis is comprized in a cypher at the end of his Description of Helioscopes, being the third of a decimate of inventions, which he there mentions, that he was master of; some of which he discovered himself, affirming that he had a century of the like useful inventions. Others of them Mr. Richard Waller had the good fortune to find out (10), who first transcribes what Mr. Hooke says of them, and then adds the decyphering of them. The second invention, which is the first cypher, is thus expressed: "The true Mathematical and Mechanical Form of all manner of arches for building, with the true butment necessary to each of them, a problem, which no architectonic writer hath ever yet attempted, much less performed: ab, ccc, dd, eeeee, f, gg, iiiiii, ll, mmmm, nnnn, oo, p, rr, sss, ttttt, uuuuuuu, x; which decyphered is these words; ut pendet continuum flexile, sic stabit continuum rigidum inuersum, which is the Linea Catenaria." The third is his Theory of Springiness in these letters, ce, iii, no, sss, tt, uu, which signifies ut tensio sic vis: this is the principle of his Theory of Springs. The ninth, which is the next cypher, is concerning a new sort of Philosophical Scales of great use in Experimental Philosophy, cde, ii, nn, oo, p, sss, tt, uu, Ut pondus sic tensio. The last is mentioned as a very extraordinary invention in Mechanics above the chimeras of perpetual motions for several uses; aa, a, b, cc, dd, eeeee, g, iii, l, mmm, nn, oo, pp, q, rrr, s, ttt, uuuuu; Pondere premit aer vacuum quod ab igne relictum est. This seems to be the same with the Marquis of Worcester's method of raising water by fire, and is the 68th of his century of inventions, published in the year 1663; and is the principle upon which Mr. Savery's engine for raising water is founded. In 1679 he printed this general title to his six Lectures before published, viz. Lectiones Cutlerianæ: Or, a Collection of Lectures, Physical, Mechanical, Geographical, and Astronomical, &c. together with an Index. He began likewise in October the same year to publish, in 4to, Philosophical Collections, containing an account of such Physical, Anatomical, Chymical, &c. Observations, as have lately come to hand. The last number of which was published in April 1682. February the 5th, 1679, he exhibited to the Royal Society an Account of the weight of Lead and Tin singly, or when melted together. In the beginning of the same year, and afterwards, he repeated several experiments to examine the use of the air in respiration, by including animals in common rarified and condensed air; as likewise concerning the necessity of the air to maintain fire, in order to illustrate his theory of fire further, viz. "That air is a menstruum that dissolves all fulfurous bodies by burning, and that without air no such dissolution will follow, though the heat applied be ever so weak;" which was tried particularly by a charcoal enclosed in an iron case with a screw stopper, which though violently heated, yet the coal was not burnt nor wasted when taken out. He made some experiments to explain the different gravitation of the air, and to shew that vapours press only according to their own gravity, and not according to the space, which they take up in the atmosphere. He shewed some contrivances to be added to the weather-cock, as an hygroscope; a contrivance to measure the quantity of rain, snow, or hail, fallen in a certain time, which engine was soon after perfected in all its parts, and set up in the Repository of the Royal Society. In July the same year he read before that Society a discourse concerning a way to help short sighted persons, which he called Myopibus Juuvenam. This is printed in his third Collection, p. 59. At the same time he gave his thoughts concerning the reason of the different apparent magnitude of the sun and moon in the meridian, and near the horizon, which he supposed to be a deception of the eye, as judging them, when near the horizon, to be further off than when nearer the zenith, because, as he alleged, the diameters measured were really the same in both places, or rather something less in the horizon than in the zenith, being removed a semidiameter of the earth further off. He made experiments of the mixtures of metals, particularly of copper and tin, in which there was observed a real penetration, the Compositum being specifically heavier than either of the metals before mixture; for whereas copper is to water as 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, and tin to water as 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, the Compositum was as 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1. In December the same year an experiment being suggested to try whether the earth moved with a diurnal motion or not, by the fall of a body from a considerable height, and it being alleged that it would fall to the east of the true perpendicular, Mr. Hooke read a discourse on that subject, wherein he explained what the line described by a falling body must be, supposed to be moved circularly by the diurnal motion of the earth, and perpendicularly by the power of gravity; and shewed that it would not be a spiral line, but an eccentric-elliptoid, supposing no resistance in the medium; but supposing a resistance, it would be an excentric-ellipti-spiral, which after many revolutions would rest in the center at last; and that the fall of the body would not be directly east, but to the south-east, and more to the south than the east. This was tried, and the ball was still found to fall to the south-east. The remainder of this year was spent in making experiments of the mixture of several metals. Among the rest Mr. Hooke took notice of the mixture of copper and tin of several particulars; as, first, "That the colour of the copper was quite destroyed, it appearing much of the colour of iron polished. Secondly, that the composition, though made of two very malleable metals, was yet very brittle and friable. Thirdly, that it bore disposal of his estate to his own liking in the time of his health, and after when himself and all others thought his end drew near; yet he could never be prevailed with to perfect it, still procrastinating it, till at last this great design proved an airy phantom, and vanished into nothing. Thus he died at last without any will or testament that could be found. He always expressed a great veneration for the Deity, as may be seen in a great many passages of his writings, and seldom received any remarkable benefit from God without thankfully acknowledging the mercy; he never made any considerable discovery in nature, or invented any useful contrivance, or found out any difficult problem, without setting down his acknowledgment to God, as many places in his Diary testify, frequently in these and the like words, abbreviated thus, DOMGM. He was a frequent studier of the Scripture in the originals. "To conclude, says Mr. Waller (s), all his errors and "blemishes were more than made amends for by the greatness and extent of his natural

(10) Life of Dr. Hooke, pag. 20, 21.

" and

(s) Ibid. pag.
28.

" bore a pretty good polish and reflexion. Fourthly, " that though copper is exceedingly hard to be melted, yet the mixture melted very easily. Fifthly, " that viewing the polished surface with a microscope, " it appeared very full of small holes in the metal." In April 1680 he produced a new invented level. In May he read a paper of observations upon an unusual sort of hail-stones, which fell on the 18th of that month. June the 27th, he read an account of the swimming of unmelted with melted lead. July the 8th, upon a debate in the Royal Society concerning the experiment of the Lord Bacon's of the internal motion of bodies, Mr. Hooke related, that he had observed, " that the motion of the glass filled with " water was observed to be vibrative, perpendicular " to the surface of the glass; and that the circular " figure changed into an oval one way; and that " the reciprocation presently changed it into an oval " the other way; which he discovered by the motion " of the undulation or rising of the water in the glass, " which was observed to be in four places of the surface in a square posture. The same glass being " struck on the edge with a viol-bow, this square " undulation was very plain; and there was also discovered another undulation, by which the water " was observed to rise in six places like an hexagon; " and upon further trials also in eight places like an octagon. Each of these gave their particular and " distinct sounds or notes, the 4 and 8 were octaves, " and the 6 and 4 were fifths." In November he read some observations which he had made of a comet then appearing; which, with other observations and discourses of other comets, are published under that title in his Posthumous Works, pag. 194. About this time he shewed a contrivance by a Statera to examine the attractive power of a magnet at several distances, and made many experiments with it. In April 1681, and afterwards, he read his lectures of Light and Luminous Bodies, which are published in his Posthumous Works, pag. 71, & seq. In July the same year, he shewed a way of making musical and other sounds by the striking of the teeth of several brass wheels, proportionally cut as to their numbers, and turned very fast round; in which it was observable, that the equal or proportional strokes of the teeth, that is 2 to 1, 4 to 3, &c. made the musical notes; but the unequal strokes of the teeth more answered the sound of the voice in speaking. In November he mentioned a new sea-quadrant for making observations more accurate than could be done by any instrument yet known. This is published at the end of his Posthumous Works. At the same time he first mentioned his new compasses for describing all sorts of spirals, as likewise of the rumb-lines. Soon after this he shewed and demonstrated a very expeditious way of drawing the rumb-lines exactly true upon a globe, by an instrument grounded upon the same principle with the other. He shewed also a very easy way of finding all the possible Foci of rays refracted by a plano-spherical lens; the convex side of which was turned towards the Focus; as also the quantity of rays that would pass through such a glass, whose convexity was of the full bigness of an hemisphere. In January 1681 he shewed an instrument to describe all sorts of Helixes upon a cone; by which he affirmed that he was able to divide any given length, though very short, into almost any assignable number of given parts, as suppose an inch into 100000 equal parts. This he conceived to be very useful for perfecting Astronomical and Geographical instruments. At the next meeting of the Royal Society he produced another instrument, by which he described a certain curve-line, which may be called an Invented Parabola, or Parabolical-Hyperbola, having these properties, that it is infinite both ways, and hath two asymptotes, as in an Hyperbola, &c. He shewed also a third instrument for exactly describing the spiral of Archimedes, by a new property thereof, and that as easily and truly as a circle, whereby not only any given arch might be divided into any number of equal parts, but a straight line given equal to the circumference of a circle. March the 1st he shewed a way, by the same instrument, of describing all varieties of eclipses. In the same year he read the remainder of his discourse of Light, and a lecture explaining the nature of memory, and how we came by the notion of time, printed in his Posthumous Works. From this time, or rather something before, he began to be more reserved than he had been formerly; so that though he often made experiments, and shewed new instruments and inventions, and read his Cutlerian Lectures, yet he seldom left any full account of them to be entered in the Journals and Registers of the Royal Society, designing, as he said, to fit them himself for the press, and then make them public, which he never performed. July the 4th, 1683, he read a paper to shew how high water will rise in any place; another concerning a rule to calculate the pressure of water in a pipe; and an account of an experiment shewing the way to find the time and comparative expansion of any metal when melted. July the 11th he shewed the Model of a new sort of Wind-Mill; and a Way to stay any great weight from falling down to the bottom, when the rope or chain, by which it is drawn, happens to break. July the 18th he shewed how to convert an horizontal circular Motion into a perpendicular, or any otherwise sloped circular Motion, and vice versa. October the 31st he shewed the Way of making of Glew, or transparent substance for taking the impression of Medals; and November the 7th another way with the same properties. November the 14th he shewed an Instrument to measure the Velocity of the Air or Wind, and to find the Strength thereof. November the 28th he exhibited Part of a Way-Wiser, for knowing the Way of a Ship at Sea. November the 5th he shewed an Instrument for the exact finding any desired part of any Weight given, being a proportional balance. December the 12th he shewed another Model of an Instrument for weighing. December the 19th he shewed Scales and Weights for triplicating any Weights small enough to be weighed by them. January the 9th, 1684, he shewed the Model of a Beam to find the aliquot or aliquant Parts of any ponderous part given. January the 16th he exhibited an Instrument for shewing the comparative weight of any two bodies, or any aliquot or aliquant parts of the ponderable bodies. January the 23d he shewed a stiliard of his invention. February the 6th he exhibited an Apparatus to try whether the magnetical Vertue in Steel might be excited and increased by any Body not accounted magnetical. February the 13th he shewed an Experiment to examine the Comparative Weight of Ice and Water. February the 20th he exhibited experiments to shew, 1. " That the bubbles " in ice are filled with air, which has the same property with common air. 2. That water, though it " is boiling hot, is yet ponderous enough to make a " piece of iron put into it swim and float upon it." February the 27th he exhibited experiments to examine the limits of heat and cold in water, as a liquid, beyond

“ and acquired parts, and more than common, if not wonderful sagacity, in diving “ into the most hidden secrets of nature, and in contriving proper methods of forcing “ her to confess the truth, by driving and pursuing the Proteus through all her changes
 “ to her last and utmost recesses. . . . There needs no other proof for this than the great “ number of experiments he made, with the contrivances for them, amounting to some “ hundreds; his new and useful instruments and inventions, which were numerous; his “ admirable facility and clearness in explaining the Phænomena of Nature, and demon“ strating his assertions; his happy talent in adapting theories to the Phænomena observ“ ed, and contriving easy and plain, not pompous and amusing experiments to back and “ prove those theories; proceeding from observations to theories, and from theories to “ further trials, which he often asserted to be the most proper method to succeed in the “ interpretation of nature. For these his happy qualifications he was much respected by “ the most learned Philosophers both at home and abroad; and as with all his failures he “ may be reckoned among the great men of the last age, so had he been free from them, “ possibly he might have stood in the front.” He contrived the building of the new Bethlehem at London, Mountague House in the parish of St. Giles’s in the Fields, the College

beyond which it becomes a spirituous body of air, or a solid of ice. March the 19th he shewed magnetical experiments tried with several rods of steel, by touching them on the loadstone. May the 5th 1687 he read a lecture of the Unequal Diurnal Motion of the Earth, printed in his Posthumous Works. In July he shewed an experiment of the communication of motion by a packthread extended a very considerable length, and afterwards running over a pulley, brought back to the place, near to which the other end was fastened; and it was found, that any addition of weight or motion given to the one end would be immediately sensible at the other end of the string, though it must pass in going and returning so great a length. There were other ways shewn of communicating motion, as by a long cane suspended by strings, or by wires distended a great length; in which it was observable that the sound was propagated instantaneously, even as quick as the motion of light, the sound conveyed by the air coming a considerable time after that by water. June the 20th 1688 he read a farther description containing several ways of making a portable Sea-Barometer, with the great uses of it in foretelling changes of the weather and storms. From this time for some years we find little done by him, except his reading the lectures founded by Sir John Cutler, several of which are printed in his Posthumous Works. Of these he read in December 1691 several relating to improvements of sounding instruments, which he called Nuntii inanimati ad fundum Abyssii emissarii. Thursday September the 8th 1692 he lets down an earthquake observed by himself 55 minutes past one a clock p. m. He remarks, that there was no wind, but rain all day. This earthquake was felt at the same time not only in most parts of England, but also in several parts of Germany. The same year he read a curious discourse describing the tower of Babel or Belus. In 1693 he read several lectures about earthquakes, and an explication of Ovid's Metamorphosis, printed in his Posthumous Works. March the 5th 1693 he read a lecture about the prolated spheroidal figure of the skin, and other phænomena thereof, of the Maculae and Faculae, &c. of making an helioscope by four reflex planes in a twenty four foot tube, or a telescope for planets and fixed stars, by two reflexions in a tube of forty foot with Monsieur Huygens's 120 foot glass. June the 27th 1698 he read a lecture upon Huygens's Cosmotheoros, and shewed a model of Saturn and his Ring. Mr. Hooke has the following papers printed in the Philosophical Transactions, viz. A Spot in one of the Belts of Jupiter observed in May 1664, Numb. I. p. 3. An Answer to the Considerations made by Monsieur Auxout upon Mr. Hooke's new Instrument for grinding of Optic Glasses, Numb. IV. p. 63. A Method by which a Glass of a small Plane-convex Sphere may be made to refract the Rays of Light to a Focus of a far greater Distance than is usual, Numb. XII. p. 202. A new Contrivance of a Wheel-Barometer much more easy to be prepared than that, which is described in his Micrography, Numb. XIII. p. 218. The particular Observations of the Planet Mars formerly intimated to have been made by Mr. Hooke in February and March last 1665, Numb. XIV. p. 239. Some Observations lately made at London concerning the Planet Jupiter, Numb. XIV. p. 145. A late Observation about Saturn June 29, 1666, Numb. XIV. p. 246. Directions for Observa- tions and Experiments to be made by Masters of Ships, Pilots, and other fit Persons in their Sea-Voyages, suggested partly by Sir Robert Moray, partly by Mr. Hooke, &c. Numb. XXIV. p. 433. More Ways for the same purpose of Mr. Townly touching the Invention of dividing a Foot into many thousand Parts, Numb. XXV. p. 459. An Experiment of preserving Animals alive by blowing through their Lungs, Numb. XXVIII. p. 539. A Description of an Instrument for dividing a Foot into many thousand Parts, and thereby measuring the Diameters of Planets to a great Exactness, &c. as it was promised, Numb. XXV. The Draught and Description of Mr. Hooke, Numb. XXIX. p. 541. Note to be observed, Numb. XXIX. p. 556. A Contrivance to make the Picture of any thing appear on a Wall, Cup-board, or within a Picture-Frame &c. in the midst of a light Room in the Day-time, or in the Night-time in any Room that is enlightened with a considerable number of Candles, Numb. XXXVIII. p. 741. Observations of some Spots in the Sun returned after they had passed over the Upper Hemisphere of the Sun, which is hid from us, according as was predicted (Numb. LXXV. p. 2253.) Numb. LXXVII. p. 2295. Observations of the Eclipse of the Moon September the 8th 1671, Numb. LXXVII. p. 2296. An Account of some Observations of the late Eclipse of the Moon January the 1st 1673, Numb. CXI. p. 237. Some Observations and Conjectures concerning the Chinese Characters, Numb. CLXXX. p. 36. A Description of an Invention whereby the Divisions of the Barometer may be enlarged many given proportions, Numb. CLXXXV. p. 241. Observationes nonnullæ Eclipsos nuperæ Solaris Maii 1. St. Vet. Obs. Hookio & Halleio, Numb. CLXXXIX. p. 370. His Posthumous Works were published by Mr. Richard Waller, Secretary of the Royal Society, at London 1705 in fol. and contained, I. A General Scheme or Idea of the present State of Natural Philosophy, and how its Defects may be remedied by a methodical Proceeding in making Experiments and collecting Observations, whereby to compile a Natural History, as the solid Basis for the Superstructure of true Philosophy. II. Lectures of Light, explicating its Nature, Properties, and Effects, &c. Though Mr. Hooke has not in these lectures treated of the several alterations and affections of the rays of light from Reflection, Inflection, and Refraction, &c. as his intention appears from several passages in his writings to have been; yet we meet here with several no less difficult than curious points explained, particularly that great problem of Memory, and how we obtain the ideas of Time and Duration. III. A Discourse of the Nature of Comets. To this is added A Discourse of Gravity. IV. Observations upon Dr. John Dee's Book of Spirits. V. Lectures and Discourses of Earthquakes and subterraneous Eruptions; explicating the Causes of the rugged and uneven Face of the Earth; and what Reasons may be given for the frequent finding of Shells and other Sea and Land Petrified Substances scattered over the whole Terrestrial Superficies. VI. Lectures concerning Navigation and Astronomy. And in 1726 there was printed at London 8vo a book under the following title: Philosophical Experiments and Observations of the late eminent Dr. Robert Hooke F. R. S. and Geom. Prof. Gresh. and other eminent Virtuoso's in his time. With Copper Cuts. Published by W. Derham F. R. S.

T.

(t) Wood, Ab. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1040. College of Physicians, and the Theatre joined to it, and the Monument upon Fish-street Hill; and was often used in designing other buildings (t).

HOOKER (RICHARD), a very learned and judicious English Divine in the latter end of the sixteenth Century, was born at Heavy-Tree near Exeter about the year 1553, according to Mr. Walton (a), or about Easter 1554, according to Mr. Wood (b). His parents were more remarkable for their virtue and industry, than extraction or riches (c); though his great grandfather John Hooker was Mayor of Exeter in 1490, and his grandfather in 1529 (d). His parents intended him for some trade; but his schoolmaster, who observed the pregnancy of his genius, persuaded them to continue him at school (e), till by the assistance of his uncle John Hooker, then Chamberlain of Exeter (f), and Dr. John Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, he was sent to the University of Oxford, and became one of the Clerks of Corpus Christi College in 1567 (g), Scholar December the 24th 1573 (b), Fellow of the College and Master of Arts in 1577 (i); Deputy-Professor of the Hebrew Language July the 14th 1579 in the room of Mr. Thomas Kingmill, whose studies had disordered his senses (k). In October the same year he was with Dr. John Reynolds and others expelled his College by Dr. John Barfoote, then Vice-President of the College, and Chaplain to Ambrose Earl of Warwick [A]; for what reason, is not known; but they were restored the same month. Not long after his taking Orders, he was appointed to preach at St. Paul's Cross in London [B] about the year 1581; and lodging at the house of Mr. John Churchman, was induced to marry his daughter Joan [C]; upon which he was obliged to quit his College; and on the 9th of December 1584 was presented by John Cheney Esq; to the Rectory of Drayton-Beauchamp in Buckinghamshire [D]; and the year following,

(a) Life of Mr. Richard Hooker. By Isaac Walton, printed with the Lives of Dr. John Donne, Sir Henry Walton, and Mr. George Herbert, pag. 1. 8. 4th edit. London 1675.
(b) Ab. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 302. 2d edit. London 1721.
(c) Walton, ubi supra.
(d) Isaac's Memoirs of Exeter, pag. 96, 115.
(e) Walton, pag. 159.

(f) Idem, pag. 160. Worthies of Devon. By John Prince, pag. 393. edit. London 1701, in fol.
(g) Wood, ubi supra.
(h) Walton, pag. 161.
(i) Idem, ibid.
(k) Wood, col. 302. and 330.
(l) Walton, pag. 172, 173.

[A] In OE. the same year he was with Dr. John Reynolds and others expelled his college by Dr. John Barfoote, then Vice-President of the college, and Chaplain to Ambrose Earl of Warwick.] We have some account of this affair in a letter written by Dr. Reynolds to Sir Francis Knolles, which was as follows (1). "I am sorry, Right Honourable, that I am enforced to make unto you such a suit, which I cannot move, but I must complain of the unrighteous dealing of one of our college, who hath taken upon him against all law and reason to expell out of our house both me and Mr. Hooker, and three other of our fellows for doing that, which by oath we are bound to do. Our matter must be heard before the Bishop of Winchester, with whom I do not doubt but we shall find equity. Howbeit, for as much as some of our adversaries have said, that the Bishop is already forestalled, and will not give us such audience as we look for; therefore I am humbly to beseech your Honour, that you will desire the Bishop by your letters, to let us have justice; tho' it be with rigour, so it be justice: our cause is so good that I am sure we shall prevail in it. Thus much I am bold to request of your Honour for Corpus Christi College sake, or rather for Christ's sake, whom I beseech to bless you with daily increase of his manifold gifts, and the blessed graces of his holy Spirit.

"is understood by all Churches professing the Gospel, by them all, and therefore even by our own also amongst others."

[C] Lodging at the house of Mr. John Churchman, was induced to marry his daughter Joan.] The Preachers at St. Paul's cross, besides their stipend, were allowed lodging and diet for two days before, and one day after the sermon, at a house called the Sunamite's House, then kept by Mr. Churchman, formerly a substantial Draper in Watling Street, but now reduced to poverty. To this house Mr. Hooker came very weary; but by the care of Mrs. Churchman was recovered from his fatigue and cold. "This, says Mr. Walter (4), was so gratefully apprehended by Mr. Hooker; that he thought himself bound in conscience to believe all that she said; so that the good man came to be persuaded by her, that he was a man of a tender constitution; and that it was best for him to have a wife that might prove a nurse to him; such a one as might both prolong his life, and make it more comfortable; and such a one as she could and would provide for him, if he thought fit to marry. . . He trusted her to choose a wife for him, promising upon a fair summons to return to London, and accept of her choice; and he did so in that or about the year following. Now the wife provided for him was her daughter Joan, who brought him neither beauty nor portion; and for her conditions, they were too like that wife's, which is by Solomon compared to a dropping house; so that the good man had no reason to rejoice in the wife of his youth, but too just cause to say with the holy Prophet, Wo is me that I am constrained to have my habitation in the tents of Kedar."

[D] Presented. . . to the Rectory of Drayton Beauchamp in Buckinghamshire.] While he resided upon this living, his two Pupils, Mr. Edwin Sandys and Mr. George Cranmer, took a journey to see him, and found him with Horace's Odes in his hand, tending his small allotment of sheep in a common field, which he told his pupils he was obliged to do then, his servant being gone to dine, and assist his wife in some necessary household business. When his servant came and released him, his two pupils attended him into the house, where their best entertainment was his quiet company, which was presently denied them, he being called to rock the cradle. The rest of their welcome was so like this, that they staid but till morning, which was time enough to discover and pity their tutor's condition; and they having, says Mr. Walton (5), in that time rejoiced in the remembrance, and then paraphrased on many of the innocent recreations of their younger days, and other like diversions, and thereby given him as much present comfort as they were able, they were forced to leave him to the company of his wife Joan, and

London Octob. Your Honour's in Christ
" 9, 1579. to command,
" John Reynolds."

[B] Appointed to preach at St. Paul's Cross in London.] In this first public appearance to the world, he was not so happy as to be free from exceptions against a point of doctrine delivered in his sermon; which was, that in God there were two wills, an antecedent, and a consequent will; his first will, that all mankind should be saved; but his second will, was, that those only should be saved, that did live answerably to that degree of grace, which he had offered or afforded them (2). This seemed to cross an opinion of Calvin, then taken for granted by many without examining it. Our author in his Answer to Master Travers's Supplication observes, that what he taught in this sermon "was not huddled in amongst other matters in such sort, that it could pass without noting; it was opened, it was proved, it was some reasonable time stood upon. I see not which way my Lord of London (3), who was present and heard it, can excuse so great a fault as patiently without rebuke or controulment afterwards, to hear any man there teach otherwise than the word of God doth, not as it is understood by the private interpretation of some one or two men, or by a special construction received in some few books, but as it

(1) Life of Mr. Richard Hooker. By Isaac Walton, pag. 172.
(2) Ibid. pag. 174.
(3) Dr. John Aylmer, Bishop of London.

(4) Pag. 275.
(5) Pag. 177.

(m) Idem, pag.
178, 179.

by the recommendation of Dr. Edwin Sandys Archbishop of York was chosen Master of the Temple in the room of Mr. Richard Alvey, B. D. deceased (m). In this station he had a contest with Mr. Walter Travers, a Puritan Minister, and Lecturer of the Temple, who was silenced by order of Archbishop Whitgift; upon which he appealed to the Privy Council, but without success; and his petition was answered by Mr. Hooker [E]. He laid the foundation of his book concerning the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, while he was at the Temple; but finding it no fit place to finish what he had there designed, he solicited the Archbishop for a remove from that station [F]; who in

1591

“and seek themselves a quieter lodging for next night. But at their parting from him, Mr. Cranmer said, Good Tutor, I am sorry your lot is fallen in no better ground as to your parsonage, and more sorry that your wife proves not a more comfortable companion after you have wearied yourself in your restless studies.” To whom the good man replied, My dear George, if Saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I that am none ought not to repine at what my wife Creator hath appointed for me; but labour (as indeed I do daily) to submit mine to his will, and possess my soul in patience and peace.” At their return to London Mr. Edwin Sandys acquaints his father, who was then Archbishop of York, with his Tutor's sad condition; and accordingly that Prelate recommended our author in 1585 to the place of Preacher to the Temple.

[E] Mr. Travers appealed to the Privy Council, but without success; and his petition was answered by Mr. Hooker.] Mr. Travers had charged Mr. Hooker very severely for his charitable opinion of Papists dying in their superstitions. He said, that it encouraged evil affected men to continue still in damnable ways, and others weak in faith to suffer themselves to be seduced to the destruction of their souls. To this Mr. Hooker answered, that they who were present at that speech of his could justify, that nothing passed his lips more than was contained in their writings, whom for soundness of doctrine, learning, and judgment Mr. Travers not only allowed, but honoured. That what he had said, was only this: I doubt not but that God was merciful to save thousands of our fathers living heretofore in Popish Superstition, in as much as they sinned ignorantly. And even this, he said, was spoken in a sermon, the greatest part of which was against Popery. Mr. Travers had disliked, that Mr. Hooker had termed God a permissive and no positive cause of the evil, which the schoolmen called Malum Culpæ. Secondly, that to the objections of those, who said, If I be elected, do what I will, I shall be saved; Mr. Hooker had answered, that the will of God in this point was not absolute, but conditional, i. e. to save the elect believing, fearing, and obediently serving him. Thirdly, that to stop the mouths of such as repined against God for rejecting castaways, he had taught, that they were not rejected, no not in the purpose and counsel of God, without a foreseen worthiness of rejection, going (though not in time, yet in order) before. “For if God's electing do in order (as needs it must) presuppose the foresight of their being that are elected, though they be elected before they be, not only the positive foresight of their being, but also the permission of being miserable, because election is through mercy, and mercy doth always presuppose misery; it followeth, that the very chosen of God acknowledge, to the prejudice of the riches of his exceeding free compassion, that when he in his great determination set it down, those shall live and not die, they lay as ugly spectacles before him, as lepers covered with dung and mire, as ulcers putrified in their father's loins, miserable, worthy to be held in detestation. . . And shall any forsaken creature be able to say unto God, thou didst plunge me into the depth, and assign me unto endless torments, only to satisfy thine own will, finding nothing in me, for which I could seem in thy sight so well worthy to feel everlasting flames?” When he saw, that Mr. Travers carped at these things, only because they lay not open, he promised at some convenient time to make them as clear as the light, both to him and all others. When he was asked, what his grounds were, he answered, that St. Paul's words concerning this case were his grounds. The next demand of Mr. Travers was, what author Mr. Hooker followed in expounding of St. Paul, and gathering that doctrine out of his words against the judgment, as he said, of all churches and all good writers? Mr. Hooker answered, that he was well assured, that to controul this over-reaching speech, the sentences, which he might have cited out of church-confessions, together with the best learned monuments of former times, and not the meanest of our own, were more in number than perhaps he would willingly have heard of. But that Mr. Travers had given him at that time great cause to think, that alledging of other men's words, to shew their agreement with our author's, would as much have displeased Mr. Travers, as the thing itself, for which it had been alledged. “For he knoweth, says Mr. Hooker, how often he hath in public places bitten me for this, although I did never in any sermon use many of the sentences of other writers, and do make most without any, having always thought it meetest, neither to affect nor to condemn the use of them.” And when Mr. Travers had disliked the using of human authority, in preaching, Mr. Hooker alledged that, which under no pretence in the world might be disallowed, namely reason, not meaning thereby my own reason, as now it is reported, but true found divine reason; reason whereby those conclusions might be out of St. Paul demonstrated, and not probably discoursed of only; reason proper to that science, whereby the things of God are known.” Mr. Travers excepted also against Mr. Hooker, because in one of his sermons, the latter had asserted, that the assurance of things, which we believe by the word, is not so certain as of that we perceive by sense. To this Mr. Hooker answers: “And is it certain? Yea, I taught, as he himself, I trust, will not deny, that the things, which God doth promise in his word, are surer unto us than any thing we touch, handle, or see. But are we so sure and certain of them? If we be, why doth God so often prove his promises unto us, as he doth by arguments taken from our sensible experience. We must be surer of the proof than of the thing proved; otherwise it is no proof. How is it then if ten men do all look upon the moon, every one of them knoweth it as certainly to be the moon as another; but many believing one and the same promises, all have not one and the same fullness of persuasion? How falleth it out, that men being assured of any thing by sense, can be no surer of it than they are; whereas the strongest in faith that liveth upon the earth, hath need to labour, and strive, and pray, that his assurance, concerning heavenly and spiritual things, may grow, increase, and be augmented?” With regard to Mr. Travers's reflection upon him for asserting in one of his sermons, that he doubted not but God was merciful to save thousands of our fathers living heretofore in Popish superstitions, in as much as they sinned ignorantly; Mr. Hooker in his answer professes this to be his judgment, and declares his reasons for this charitable opinion, as follow. He first states the question about Justification and Works, and how the foundation of faith without works is overthrown; and then proceeds to discover that way, which natural men, and some others, have mistaken to be the way, by which they hope to attain true and everlasting happiness. And having discovered the mistaken, he directs to that true way, by which alone everlasting life is attainable, and these two ways he demonstrates thus: “That the way of nature; this the way of grace. The end of that way, salvation merited, presupposing the righteousness of men's works; their righteousness a natural ability to do them; that ability the goodness of God, which created them in such perfection. But the end of this, salvation bestowed upon men as a gift, presupposing not their righteousness, but the forgiveness of their unrighteousness, justification; their (*) Idem, pag.

209, 210.

1591 presented him to the Rectory of Boscomb in Wiltshire (*). July the 17th the same year he was instituted into the Prebend of Nether-Haven in the Church of Salisbury (o). He continued at Boscomb till he had finished four books of his Ecclesiastical Polity [G], which were entered into the Register Book in Stationer's Hall the 9th of March

(o) Festi Eccles. Anglic. By John La Noue Gant.

“ their justification, not their natural ability to do good, but their hearty sorrow for not doing, and unfeigned belief in him, for whose sake not doers are accepted, which is their vocation; their vocation the election of God, taking them out of the number of lost children; their election a mediator, in whom to be elected; this mediation inexplicable mercy; this mercy, supposing their misery, for whom he vouchsafed to die, and make himself a mediator.” He declares likewise, that “ there is no meritorious cause for our justification but Christ; no effectual but his mercy; and that we deny the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, we abuse, disannul, and annihilate the benefit of his passion, if by a proud imagination we believe we can merit everlasting life, or can be worthy of it.” This belief he asserts to be destructive of the very essence of our justification; and he makes all opinions bordering upon this to be very dangerous. “ Yet nevertheless, says he, considering how many virtuous and just men, how many saints and martyrs have had their dangerous opinions, among which this was one, that they hoped to make God some part of amends by voluntary punishments, which they laid upon themselves; because of this or the like erroneous opinions, which do by consequence overthrow the merits of Christ, shall men be so bold as to write on their graves, Such men are damned; there is for them no salvation? St. Austin says, Errare possum, Hæreticus esse nolo. And except we put a difference betwixt them, that err ignorantly, and them that obstinately persist in it, how is it possible that any man should hope to be saved? Give me a Pope or a Cardinal, whom great afflictions have made to know himself, whose heart God hath touched with true sorrow for all his sins, and filled with a love of Christ and his Gospel, whose eyes are willingly open to see the truth, and his mouth ready to renounce all error, this one opinion of merit excepted, which he thinketh God will require at his hands, and because he wanteth, trembleth, and is discouraged, and yet can say, Lord cleanse me from all my secret sins; shall I think because of this or a like error, such men touch not so much as the hem of Christ's garment? If they do, wherefore should I doubt but that virtue may proceed from Christ to save them? No, I will not be afraid to say to such a one: You err in your opinion; but be of good comfort; you have to do with a merciful God, who will make the best of that little, which you hold well; and not with a captious sophister, who gathereth the worst out of every thing, in which you are mistaken. But it will be said, continues our author, the admittance of merit in any degree overthroweth the foundation, excludeth from the hope of mercy, from all possibility of salvation. To this he answers: “ What though they hold the truth sincerely in all other parts of Christian faith; although they have in some measure all the virtues and graces of the spirit; although they have all other tokens of God's children in them; although they be far from having any proud opinion that they shall be saved by the worthiness of their deeds; altho' the only thing that troubleth and molesteth them be a little too much dejection, somewhat too great a fear arising from an erroneous conceit, that God will require a worthiness in them, which they are grieved to find wanting in themselves; although they be not obstinate in this opinion; although they be willing and would be glad to forsake it, if any one reason were brought sufficient to disprove it; although the only cause, why they do not forsake it ere they die, be their ignorance of that means, by which it might be disproved; although the cause, why the ignorance in this point is not removed, be the want of knowledge in such as should be able and are not to remove it: Let me die, if ever it be proved, that simply an error doth exclude a Pope or Cardinal in such a case utterly from the hope of life. Surely I must confess, that if it be an error to think that God may be merciful to save men even when they err, my greatest comfort is my error. Were it not for the love I bear to this error, I would never wish to speak or to live.”

[F] Solicited the Archbishop for a removal from that station. After the publication of his Answer to Mr. Travers's Supplication, he grew daily into greater repute with the most learned and wise of the nation; but it had a contrary effect with many persons in the Temple, who were zealous for Mr. Travers and his scheme of church-discipline; so that though Mr. Travers had left the place, yet the seeds of discontent could not be rooted out of that society by all the excellent sense and mild conduct of Mr. Hooker. Upon this he requested of the Archbishop to be removed from thence, and spake to this purpose: “ When I lost the freedom of my Cell, which was my College, yet I found some degree of it in my quiet country-parsonage. But I am weary of the noise and oppositions of this place; and indeed God and nature did not intend me for contentions, but for study and quietness. My particular contests with Mr. Travers here have proved the more unpleasant to me, because I believe him to be a good man; and that belief hath occasioned me to examine mine own conscience concerning his opinions; and to satisfy that, I have consulted the Scripture and other laws both human and divine, whether the conscience of him, and others of his judgment, ought to be so far complied with as to alter our frame of church-government, our manner of God's worship, our praising or praying to him, and our established ceremonies as often as his and others tender consciences shall require us. And in this examination I have not only satisfied myself, but have begun a treatise, in which I intend a justification of the laws of our Ecclesiastical Polity; in which design God and his holy angels shall at the last great day bear me that witness, which my conscience now does, that my meaning is not to provoke any, but rather to satisfy all tender consciences; and I shall never be able to do this, but where I may study and pray for God's blessing upon my endeavours, and keep myself in peace and privacy, and behold God's blessing spring out of my mother earth, and eat my own bread without oppositions; and therefore, if your grace can judge me worthy of such a favour, let me beg it, that I may perfect what I have begun.”

[G] His Ecclesiastical Polity. He sent the manuscript of it to the Lord Treasurer Burleigh with a letter dated at London March the 13th 1592, and published by Mr. Strype (6). The first four books of this work were printed at London 1594 in fol. and the fifth book was published by itself at London 1597 in folio; to which was prefixed an Epistle Dedicatory to Archbishop Whitgift, which in the later editions is put before the whole work. At the end of his edition of his first four books he subjoined this advertisement to the reader. “ I have for some causes thought it at this time more fit to let go these first four books by themselves, than to stay both them and the rest, till the whole might together be published. Such generalities of the cause in question as are here handled, it will be perhaps not amiss to consider apart, by way of introduction unto the books, that are to follow concerning particulars.” This work was read with admiration in this Kingdom, and their fame spread itself into foreign nations (7). Mr. Camden wished (8), that “ for (7) Walton, pag. 212. “ they were turned into the universal language.” Mr. Strype tells us (9), that “ it is a just Discourse of the Ecclesiastical state of this Church, built upon reason and judgment, managed with admirable clearness and conviction, and with a strain of great learning and modestly withal accompanying it; designed for a vindication of the Church of England, as it stood reformed.”

(6) Num. 17. Appendix to B. 4. of the Life of Archbishop Whitgift.

(8) Annals of Elizabeth, ad ann. 1599.

(9) Life of Archbishop Whitgift, B. 4. c. 9. pag. 400.

(p) Walton, pag. 211. March 1592, but not published till 1594 (p). In 1595 he surrendered Boscomb to Dr. Caldwell Bishop of Salisbury, and was succeeded in it by Mr. Benjamin Ruffel, who was instituted into it on the 23d of June. July the 7th, the same year he was presented to the Rectory of Bishops-Bourne near Canterbury; in which living he continued till his death without any addition of dignity or profit (q). Mr. Walton observes (r), that his complection was sanguine with a mixture of choler; but that his motion was slow even in his youth, as well as his speech, never expressing an earnestness in either of them, but an humble gravity suitable to the aged. He was of mean stature, and stooping, (q) Idem, ibid.

(r) Pag. 158.

“ reformed at first and established by Law, against those that so much and so intemperately cried out for another platform of government, which that most judicious Divine did happily refute.” In 1599 it was attacked by a pamphlet in 4to, intitled, A Christian Letter of certain English Protestants, unfeigned Lovers of the present State of Religion, authorized and professed in England, unto that reverend and learned man Mr. Hooker, requiring resolution in certain Matters of Doctrine contained in his five Books of Ecclesiastical Polity. This was answered in a piece intitled, A just and temperate Defence of the five Books of Ecclesiastical Polity, &c. against an uncharitable Letter of certain English Protestants, London 1603 in 4to. written by William Covel D. D. Our author proposed to have published eight books of his Ecclesiastical Polity, and Mr. Walton observes (10), that he lived to finish the three last; but whether we have them as finished

(10) Pag. 233.

(11) Ibid.

by himself, is a question. Mr. Walton tells us (11), that he had been informed by one, who very well knew Mr. Hooker and the affairs of his family, that about a month after his death, Archbishop Whitgift sent one of his Chaplains to inquire of Mrs. Hooker for the three remaining books of the Ecclesiastical Polity written by her husband; of which she would not or could not give any account; and that about three months after that time the Bishop procured her to be sent for to London, where she was examined by some of the Privy Council concerning the disposal of those books. But by way of preparation for the next day's examination the Bishop invited her to Lambeth, and after some friendly questions she confessed to him, “ that one Mr. Charke and another Minister, who lived near Canterbury, came to her, and desired that they might go into her husband's study, and look upon some of his writings; and that there they burnt and tore many of them, affuring her that they were writings not fit to be seen; and that she knew nothing more concerning them.” Her lodging was then in King-street in Westminster, where she was found next morning dead in her bed, and her new husband suspected and questioned for it, but declared innocent of her death. Dr. John Spencer, who was of the same college with Mr. Hooker, and betwixt whom there was so firm a friendship, that they continually advised together in all their studies, and particularly in what concerned those Books of Polity (12), had delivered into his hands (it is said, by Archbishop Whitgift) the rough draughts of the three last books, to be made as perfect as might be by him, who both knew Mr. Hooker's hand-writing, and was best acquainted with his intentions. “ And a fair testimony of this, says Mr. Walton (13), may appear by an epistle first and usually printed before Mr. Hooker's five books (but omitted I know not why, in the last impression of the eight printed together in the year 1662, in which the Publishers seem to impose the three doubtful books of Mr. Hooker) with these two letters J. S. at the end of the said epistle, which was meant for this John Spencer.” In this epistle we find the following words. “ There is a purpose of setting forth the three last books also, their Father's Posthumi. For as in the great declining of his body spent without study, it was his ordinary petition to Almighty God, that if he might live to see the finishing of these books, then Lord let thy servant depart in peace (to use his own words) so it pleased God to grant him his desire; for he lived till he saw them perfected. And though like Rachel he died as it were in the travel of them, and hastened death upon himself by halting to give them life; yet he held out to behold with his eyes these parvus ingenii, these Benjamins, sons of his right hand, though to him they were Benonies, sons of pain and sorrow. But some evil disposed minds, whether of malice or covetousness, or wicked blind zeal, it is “ uncertain, as if they had been Egyptian midwives, as soon as they were born, and their father dead, smothered them, and by conveying away the perfect copies left unto us nothing but old unperfect and mangled draughts, dismembered into pieces, and scattered like Medea's Abfirtus; no favour, no grace, not the shadows of themselves almost remaining in them. Had the father lived to see them brought forth thus defaced, he might rightfully have named them Benonies, the sons of sorrow. But seeing the importunities of many great and worthy persons will not suffer them quietly to die and to be buried, it is intended that they shall see them as they are. The learned and judicious eye will yet perhaps delight itself in beholding the goodly lineaments of their well-set bodies, and in finding out some shadows and resemblances of their father's face. God grant that as they were with their brethren dedicated to the Church for messengers of peace; so in the strength of that little breath of life, that remaineth in them, they may prosper in their work, and by satisfying the doubts of such that are willing to learn, may help to give an end to the calamities of those our civil wars.” Mr. Walton observes (14), that this epistle of Dr. Spencer was written and first printed within four years after the death of Mr. Hooker, in which time all diligent search had been made for the perfect copies, and then allowed to be not recoverable, and therefore endeavoured to be completed out of Mr. Hooker's rough draughts. “ And I do profess, continues Mr. Walton, by the faith of a Christian, that Dr. Spencer's wife, who was my aunt, and sister to George Cranmer, told me forty years since in these or in words to this purpose; “ that her husband had made up or finished Mr. Hooker's last three books; and that upon her husband's death-bed, or in his last sickness, he gave them into her hand, with a charge they should not be seen by any man, but be by her delivered into the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, which was Dr. Abbot, or unto Dr. King, then Bishop of London; and that she did as he enjoined her.” Mr. Walter conceives, that from Dr. Spencer's, and no other copy, there have been divers transcripts, as particularly that in Sir Thomas Bodley's library, in that of Bishop Andrews, in the Lord Conway's, in the Archbishop of Canterbury's, in Archbishop Usher's, and many others; and most of these, says Mr. Walton (15), pretended to be the author's own hand, but much disagreeing, being indeed altered and diminished, as men have thought fittest to make Mr. Hooker's judgment suit with their fancies, or give authority to their corrupt designs. For proof of part of this Mr. Walton produces the following testimonies. Dr. Barnard, sometime Chaplain to Archbishop Usher, in his Clavi Trabales, printed in 1661, declares, that in his search and examination of that Prelate's manuscripts, he found the three written books, which were supposed to be the sixth, seventh, and eighth books of Mr. Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity; and that in the said books, now printed as Mr. Hooker's, there are so many omissions, that they amount to many paragraphs, and cause many incoherencies. Dr. Barnard sets down the omissions at large. Mr. Fabian Philips attested under his own hand, that Dr. Sanderson Bishop of Lincoln, a little before his death, affirmed to him that he had seen a manuscript asserted to be the hand-writing of Mr. Hooker, in which there was no mention made of the King or Supreme Governor's being accountable to the people.” Dr. Henry King, Bishop of Chichester, in a letter to Mr. Izaak Walton dated at Chichester November the 17th 1664, and prefixed to Mr. Walton's Life of Mr. Hooker, observes, that “ Dr. John Spencer, after the death of Mr. Hooker, was so careful to preserve his unvaluable sixth, seventh, and eighth books of Ecclesiastical Polity, and his other writings, that

(12) Idem, pag. 234.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Pag. 235.

(15) Pag. 236.

ing, his face full of heat-pimples, occasioned by his inactivity and sedentary life; of so bashful a disposition, that as in his younger days his pupils might easily look him out of countenance, so neither then, nor in his elder years did he ever willingly look any man in his face. He was short or weak sighted, and where he fixed his eyes at the beginning of his sermon, there they continued till it was ended: His dress was very mean (s). But the reputation of his writings and sanctity of life was so eminent, that he was universally admired, and visited by a great many men of learning (t). His sermons were neither long nor earnest, but uttered with great zeal and an humble voice; and the design of them was to shew reasons for what he advanced, and with these reasons such a kind of Rhetoric, as rather convinced and persuaded, than frightened men into piety (u). Besides his Ecclesiastical Polity he wrote some other pieces [H]. He died at Bishops-Bourne November the 2d 1600 [I], in the forty sixth year of his age, and was interred in the Church there, where a monument has since been erected to his memory by Sir William Cowper. He left four daughters, Alice, Cecily, Jane, and Margaret [K],

(s) Idem, pag. 217, 218.

(t) Idem, pag. 217.

(u) Idem, pag. 219, 220.

(16) Dr. John King Bishop of London.

“ that he procured Henry Jackson, then of Corpus Christi College, to transcribe for him all Mr. Hooker’s remaining written papers, many of which were imperfect, for his study had been rifled or worse used by Mr. Charke and another of principles too like his. But these papers were endeavoured to be compleated by his dear friend Dr. Spencer, who bequeathed them as a precious legacy to my father (16), after whose death they rested in my hands, till Dr. Abbot, then Archbishop of Canterbury, commanded them out of my custody, by authorizing Mr. John Barkeham to require and bring them to him to his palace in Lambeth; at which time, I have heard, they were put into the Bishop’s library, and that they remained there till the martyrdom of Archbishop Laud; and were then by the brethren of the faction given with all the library to Hugh Peters, as a reward for his remarkable service in those sad times of the Church’s confusion. And though they could hardly fall into a fouler hand, yet there wanted no other endeavours to corrupt and make them speak that language for which the faction then fought, which indeed was to subject the sovereign power to the people.” In 1648 there was published at London in 4to, Of the Lawes of Ecclesiastical Politie; the sixth and eighth Books. By Richard Hooker. A Work long expected, and now published according to the most authentic Copies. To this is prefixed the following advertisement to the reader. “ Here is presented unto thee two of the three so long expected and much desired books of learned Mr. Hooker’s Ecclesiastical Polity; viz. the sixth and the eighth, as they were preserved in the hands of those mirrors of learning, Dr. Andrews late Lord Bishop of Winchester, and the present Dr. Usher, Lord Archbishop of Armagh, with great hopes the seventh would have been recovered, that they might have been published to the world’s view at once; but endeavours used to that purpose have hitherto proved fruitless. And hearing that some erroneous, if not counterfeit copies are abroad, hath occasioned the publishing of these, to prevent as much as may be any addition of abuses to the abused author; and also that he, which so much desired the unity of the Church, might have the divided members of his labours united.” In this edition the several copies compared before the publication were that in Sir Thomas Bodley’s library at Oxford, that in the Archbishop of Canterbury’s library, that in Bishop Andrews’s library, two copies in Archbishop Usher’s possession, and one in the hands of the Lord Viscount Conway. These two books with an addition of a seventh was published by Dr. John Gauden, successively Bishop of Exeter and Worcester, at London 1662 in folio under this title: The Works of Mr. Richard Hooker, (that learned, godly, and eloquent Divine) vindicating the Church of England as truly Christian and duly reformed, in eight Books of Ecclesiastical Polity, now compleated, as with the sixth and eighth, so with the seventh, &c. out of his own MSS. never before published. With an Account of his holy Life and happy Death. The eighth book is commonly supposed to have been first published, together with the sixth and seventh, by Dr. Gauden; but, as we observed before, the sixth and eighth books, were printed at London in 1648; nay, all the eight books, with certain tractates and sermons, and the author’s life, were published in two volumes in folio in 1617, as the title-page informs us.

[H] Besides his Ecclesiastical Polity he wrote some other pieces] I. Answere to a Supplication preferred by Mr. Walter Travers to the Honourable Lords of the Privie Council. Oxford 1612 in 4to. II. Causes of Contention concerning Church-Government. Oxford 1641 in 4to. III. A Discourse of Justification, Works, and how the Foundation of Faith is overthrowen; on Abak. i. 4. Oxford 1612 in 4to. IV. A Sermon of the Nature of Pride; on Abak. ii. 4. Oxford 1612 in 4to. V. A Remediè against Sorrow and Feare, delivered in a Funeral Sermon, on John xiv. 27. Oxford 1612 in 4to. VI. Of the Certaintie and Perpetuitie of Faith in the Elea, especially of the Prophet Abakkuk’s Faith: A Sermon on Abak. i. 4. VII. Two Sermons upon Part of St. Jude’s Epistle, viz. vers. 17, 18, 19, 20, 21. Oxford 1614 in 4to. All these Sermons were published by Mr. Henry Jackson, Fellow of Corpus Christi College Oxford, with Wickliff’s Wicket; and reprinted without Wickliff’s Wicket at London 1632 in folio at the End of the Five Books of Ecclesiastical Polity, and again at the End of the Eight Books, London 1682 in fol. VIII. A Sermon on Mat. h. vii. 7. found in the Study of Dr. Andrews, Bishop of Winchester. Published by Mr. Isaac Walton at the End of his Life of Dr. Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln. London 1678 in 8vo.

[I] He died at Bishops-Bourne November the 2d 1600.] His sickness was occasioned by a cold taken in his passage by water between London and Gravesend, from the malignity of which he never recovered. During his illness he was employed in his study, and said often to Dr. Saravia, that “ he did not beg a long life of God for any other reason, but to live to finish his three remaining books of Polity.” It is thought, that he hastened his own death by his application to compleat that work. About a month before his death he began to lose his appetite, and then to have an averfeness to all food, so that he seemed for some weeks to live by the smell of meat only; and yet he still studied and wrote. A few days before his death, his house was robbed, of which being informed, he asked, are my books and written papers safe? and being answered, that they were, his reply was, then it matters not, for no other loss can trouble me (17). There were different accounts concerning the time of his death. (17) Walton, pag. 225, 226. Camden (18) tells us, that he died in 1599. In the (18) Annals of Elizabeth, ad Cowper his death is placed in 1603. But both these accounts are undoubtedly erroneous; for it is attested under the hand of William Somner, Register to the Archbishop for the Province of Canterbury, that our author’s will was dated October the 26th 1600, and proved the 3d of December following. And Archbishop Laud has fixed his death on the 2d of November 1600 in the following words, which he wrote with his own hand in the title-page of Mr. Hooker’s Ecclesiastical Polity; Richardus Hooker, vir summis doctrinæ doctibus ornatus, de Ecclesiâ præcipuè Anglicanâ optime meritus, obiit Novemb. 2. circiter horam secundam post-meridianam, anno 1600.

[K] He left four daughters, Alice, Cecily, Jane, and Margaret.] One of his elder daughters was married to one Chalinor, sometime a Schoolmaster in Chichester. Margaret, his youngest daughter, was married to Ezekiel Clark, B. D. Rector of St. Nicholas in Harbledown near Canterbury, and by him had a son, Ezekiel, Rector of Waldron in Suffex, and a daughter. His other daughters died before they were marriageable (19).

(19) Walton, T. pag. 231, 232.

to each of whom he gave one hundred pounds; and left his widow sole executrix. It appeared by his inventory, that his estate (a great part of which consisted of books) came to 1092 l. 9 s. 2 d. (w). He had a sister, Elizabeth Harvey, who lived to the age of 121 years, and died in September 1663 (x).

☞ HOOPER (GEORGE), a very learned Writer [A], and Bishop of Bath and Wells, was born at Grimley in Worcestershire November 18 1640, and was son of George Hooper Gent. by Joan his wife, daughter of Edmund Giles of White Lady Aston Gent. (a). His father removed to Westminster for the better education of his son, who was educated in the school there, and in 1656 elected thence a Student of Christ Church in the University of Oxford. January the 16th 1662 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in 1664 that of Master of Arts. He applied himself with great vigour to the study of Philosophy, Mathematics, the Greek and Roman Antiquity, and Oriental Languages, in the last of which he was encouraged by Dr. Pocock, by whose affluence

(w) Idem, pag. 231.

(x) Idem, pag. 232.

(a) The memoirs, from which this article is compiled, were communicated by our author's daughter Mrs. Prowle.

[A] A very learned writer.] This appears from his writings, of which we shall give the reader a catalogue. He published the following sermons, viz. 1. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor at Guildhall Chapel, October 30, 1681, on Gal. v. 22, 23. London, 1682, in 4to. 2. A Sermon preached before the King at Whitehall Novem. 5, 1681, on Mat. xxii. 21. London, 1682, in 4to. 3. A Sermon preached before the Queen at Whitehall, Sunday, January 25, 1690, on Luke xvi. last verse. London, 1691, in 4to. 4. A Sermon preached before the King and Queen at Whitehall, January 14, 1694, on Jobn vii. 17. London, 1694, in 4to. 5. A Sermon preached before the King, January 20, 1695, on Jobn iii. 20. 6. A Sermon preached before the House of Commons, April 4, 1701, on Phil. iii. 20. 7. A Sermon preached before the House of Lords, January 20, 1702, on the Martyrdom of King Charles I, on 2 Cor. x 3, 4. 8. A Sermon on the Day of Thanksgiving for the Peace, July 7, 1713, on Psal. cxxii. 7. His other writings are as follow. I. The Church of England free from the Imputation of Popery. printed in 1682, and bound up with the London Cases. II. A fair and methodical Discussion of the first and great Controversy between the Church of England and the Church of Rome, concerning the Infallible Guide. In three Discourses; whereof the first is introductory, and states the points, which are preliminary to this and all the other controversies between the two churches. The second considers at large the pretences to modern Infallibility, and shews them to be groundless. The third, by the help of the former, briefly examines the pretended rational account of the Roman Catholics concerning the Ecclesiastical Guide in Controversies of Religion, and detects its artifice. The two first parts were licenced by Dr. Maurice in 1687; but the third was never printed. III. The Parson's Case under the present Land-Tax, recommended in a Letter to a Member of the House of Commons, 1689. IV. A Discourse concerning Lent. In two Parts. The first, an Historical Account of its Observation. The second, an Essay concerning its Original: This subdivided into two Repartitions, whereof the first is preparatory, and shews, that most of our Christian Ordinances are derived from the Jews. And the second conjectures, that Lent is of the same Original. The Imprimatur is dated Feb. 5, 1694. In the Vth section of the Xth Chapter of the first part he recapitulates the substance of that part in the following manner. "And thus have we viewed the practice of Lent through the first 400 years. We have seen in the last of these centuries, when Christianity came to be more openly professed under the Christian Emperors, and abounded in writers, many express and undeniable testimonies of the general observation, though in a different manner, of the forty season, then commonly so called from forty days. In the next age above it, the third, and as high too as the middle of it, a time that affords us not many authors, and when there was little occasion to speak of this matter, we have however a very punctual account of their strict manner of keeping the Passion Week, from one of the greatest men of the church (1), who happened to be consulted about a nicety of ending this Lent. And that there was great strictness in the Holy Week, equal to any that was used after, may well induce us to imagine, that these men had not left the devotion of all the preceding weeks to be added by the very next generation; especially when we find the forty season expressly mentioned in Origen,

" a master of this Dionysius, as consecrated to fasting. " For that place of Origen, though we have it only " from the version of Ruffinus, and he none of the " most exact translators; yet certainly, if he was not " the worst that ever was, is much more likely to " be truly rendered than wrong, there being no rea- " son to fasten the falsity on this word more than on " any other of the sentence, nor any wonder to find " that spoke of now, which not long after was cele- " brated so much." But to proceed, we have seen " further from Tertullian, an author to be reckoned " to the second Century as well as to the third, that the " days, in which our Lord was taken away, Good Friday " and the Holy Saturday at least, if not the whole week, " were, in the opinion of the church of his time, to be " fasted by all from Apostolical Authority; and that no " other days were to be fasted necessarily, and as by di- " vine precept, but as discretion only, and as Christians " should think fit in godly prudence. Upon the account of " which discretionary uncertainty the argument he was en- " gaged in made it not proper for him to say any more con- " cerning them, nor to tell us the several customs of sever- " al Churches about that arbitrary part of Lent; though " it may otherwise be collected even from him, that there " was then such an additional time observed. But to go " yet higher and nearer to the Apostolical age, about the " year 190, and not 90 from the death of St. John, Irenæus " a venerable and now a very old Bishop, who had conversed " familiarly with the great Polycarp, as Polycarp had " with St. John and other Apostles, has happened to let us " know, though incidentally only, the various observation of " his time; that some thought they ought to fast one, some " two, and some more days, and some forty; as we have " learned too in the general both from him and the Bishops " of almost the whole Church currently with him, that some " such Ante-Paschal Fast had been all along observed in all " places, up to the time of the Apostles themselves. The " second Part is an Essay concerning the Original of Lent, " subdivided into two Repartitions; in the first of which " Repartitions our author endeavours to shew, that most " of the antient Christian Ordinances were derived from " the Jews. For this purpose he observes first, that it is " not dishonourable for Christian Ordinances to be borrowed " from the Jews. " Among the antient Heretics, says " he (2), some, it is known, read our Saviour and " his Gospel, but rejected the Mosaic Law, and " blasphemed its God. And there may be many now " (tho' more innocent) who, at this distance from the " rise of Christianity, may either have lost the remem- " brance of its Original, and forgot that the last cove- " nant has any dependence on the first; or else in pride " of our great privileges may scornfully overlook the " dispensation of Moses as a beggarly element, and in " the vanity of a neighbour-nation may think it a " disparagement to the Christian Religion to be thought " of Jewish extraction. And there may seem to have " been more cause given for this conceit from some " learned books of late, which have treated concern- " ing the Jewish and the Egyptian antiquities, and " which have been misunderstood so far by some to " the prejudice of the old Testament, that those, " who have not considered the matter well, may look " upon it as very dishonourable to Christianity, to bor- " row any thing from that nation, which is suspected to " have borrowed so much of all its neighbours, and " to have robbed even the Religion of the Egyptians. " But they need not fear, for truth can never suffer " from truth; and if it shall indeed appear, that the " Mosaic Religion was conformable to the worship of " their

(1) Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria.

(2) Part 2. Re- pat. 1. cap. 1. pag. 153. 6^o seq.

assistance he became a great master of the Arabic tongue, the knowledge of which he made great use to explain several obscure passages of the Old Testament. In 1669 he drew up a short Treatise in Mathematics, which Mercator desired to have from him, in order to publish it; but it still remains among his manuscripts. In 1672 he became Chaplain to Dr. Morley Bishop of Winchester, who soon after gave him the Rectory of Havant, which being an unhealthy place, he resigned it for that of Woodhey in Hampshire, where he succeeded Bishop Ken. July the 9th 1673 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. Archbishop Sheldon being acquainted with Mr. Hooper's character, prevailed

“ their eastern neighbours, it may notwithstanding no “ less maintain its divine authority. Knowledge, we “ know, as well as Empire, began in that part of “ the world; and there the many traditions concern“ ing God, descended from Noah and others of his “ inspired sons, were lodged and preserved; blended,
 “ we may think, and much corrupted with many “ falsities and superstitions; variously too by its va“ rious depositaries, the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Pha“ nicians, Arabians, &c. Now all these had some“ thing of the same Religion, as they had of the “ same Language, but in a different dialect and man“ ner; and what if God was pleased, by the mini“ stry of Moses, to reform it from the many addi“ tions, impious or immoral, with which it had been “ severally adulterated, retaining some indifferent “ customs innocently introduced, insinuating others in “ opposition to the more dangerous errors, and di“ recting some eminent parts of the whole to a fur“ ther prospect of another and more perfect revela“ tion yet to come; and all these Laws, for the use “ of a peculiar people, to reduce into one code, and “ authorize by a new sanction.” *Such a Reformed Religion we may suppose that of the Jews to have been;
 and need not therefore be afraid, if our Religion be found to be a further Reformation of that Judaism; a sixth Mr. Selden frequently gives it, but to be understood, not as if it were a purgation of the old from any error, but as it is the completion and perfection of it according to the original design. And as certainly as our blessed Saviour and his Apostles were of Hebrew lineage, so certain it is, that our Religion is grafted on the Jewish.
 Neither do the expressions only and allusions of the Gospel relate to the customs of the Law, not well otherwise to be understood; but some of its chief instruments are known to be derived thence. For as before many of the Mosaic Rites were unquestionably designed to prefigure our Saviour; so some of them were afterwards taken into his service, always to minister unto him; not admitted only for the present out of condescension to the natives or pro-felyte Jews, of whom then the greatest number of converts consisted; but some formally adapted, and others laudably continued, for perpetuity.* He instances then in such ordinances, as are mentioned in Scripture, as Baptism, which was a rite, by which, as well as by others, profelytes were admitted into Judaism; and tells us, that Christian Baptism, as expressed in the new Testament, is an imitation of it. In the third chapter he informs us of the nature of the Paschal Sacrifice, and the description which the Jewish Traditions give of that supper, agreeably, says he, to the History in the Gospels of our Lord's Supper, and to the nature of it. In the fourth chapter he shews, that the Church of Christ succeeds to the Church of the Jews; that the Officers of the one were raised from the officers of the other. In the fifth chapter he describes the Ex-communicates of the Jews and their condition; and the condition of the Mourners among the Jews compared with that of the Excommunicate; and observes, that their Excommunicates were restrained from the liberty, not only of civil conversation, but of religious communion: and that excommunication is mentioned in the New Testament as practised by the Jews and Christians. In the sixth he mentions the circumstances relating to baptism, under five heads, practised in the Church of Christ in the second Century; and shews, that all these were agreeable to Jewish custom:
 and first in general, as to the persons baptized and baptizing, and the solemn time of baptism; and in particular, secondly, as to the distinction and instruction of its Candidates; thirdly, as to the action of baptism; fourthly, its confirmation; and fifthly, the sequel and close of the whole ceremony. In the seventh chapter, he takes notice of several particulars practised in the Lord's Supper by the primitive Christians, which varied from those of the Paschal Supper; and these particulars shew our Lord's Supper to have succeeded the Paschal in its general nature, as a memorial of thank. He describes a Jewish offering of praise and thanks, with the feasting upon it; and shews, that the Christian Eucharist answered to it, and in what manner; and takes notice of a tradition of the Jews, that in the days of the Messiah only the Eucharistical Sacrifice should remain. In the eighth chapter he shews, that the distinction of Clergy and Laity is specified by Tertullian; that of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, by him, (Irenaeus also being his leader, for the Apostolical authority of Bishops,) and by Ignatius as the other, at least of the Laity and Clergy, by St.

 Clemens of Rome. He observes, that the first distinction was derived from the language of the Old Testament; the offices of the second from those of the Jewish Sanhedrim, and likewise of the Temple; the Upper Parts of our Churches being also supposed to answer the Temple Courts, of the Priests and the Altar.
 In the ninth chapter he shews, that the sentence and effects of Excommunication were the same with Christians as with Jews; and the relaxation of it alike; and observes their agreement in the estimate of the Guilt of Sins, and the appointments of penance. In the tenth chapter he takes notice of a parallel of Christian rites mentioned by Tertullian, and of those usages mentioned by Origen, particularly about prayer, 1. Disposition of mind. 2. Posture of body. 3. Direction of the face. 4. Times of daily prayer. 5.
 Matter and method. He represents the antient order of Christian prayer, and the order of the Jewish, and compares them; and gives a parallel of some few other usages. In the eleventh chapter he answers the second prejudice against a Jewish Origination of Lent from want of authority in the Talmudical writings, by shewing, 1. That these traditional accounts were not without some antient foundations of their own.
 2. That they are confirmed in many points by collateral evidence. 3. That they were not borrowed by the Jews from foreign authors. In the same chapter he answers the third prejudice against such an origination, from the novelty of it. In the first chapter of the second Repartition he observes, that our Easter was kept for some time with the Jewish Passover; that the notification of Easter by Paschal Letters agrees with the practice of the Jews; and that the Ante-Paschal Preparation of Christians answers to a like preparation of the Jews before their days of expiation.
 In the second chapter he compares the sacrificial performance on the Jewish expiation day, with that of our Saviour on his passion day. In the third chapter he observes, that the devotional duty of the Jews on their expiation day is practised by Christians on the passion day; and compares some circumstances of the eves of those days. In the fourth chapter he shews, that there was a penitential season with the Jews preparatory to their expiation day; and that some certain days next before it were kept uniformly by all; more also generally, though in various numbers; and forty by many; but the first of the forty universally observed; and that forty days were a solemn space of penitence in the Jewish discipline; and he compares the Christian Lent with the Jewish. In the fifth chapter he remarks, that this origination of Lent is very probable, and its observation a testimony to our Lord's expiatory sacrifice. However, that the consideration of that expiatory sacrifice is a good reason for our observing the passion day, and likewise some preparatory time before it. V. In the Philosophical Transactions for October 1699 there is a piece of our author's intitled, prevailed with Bishop Morley to permit his Chaplain to remove to Lambeth; but that Bishop still retained a sincere affection for him, and sent for him to attend him in his last sickness. In 1675 the Archbishop collated him to the Rectory of Lambeth, and not long after to the Præcentorship of Exeter, which was an option of the Archbishop. July the 3d 1677 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity. The same year he was sent into Holland to attend the Princess of Orange as her Almoner, there being another Chaplain for the family. In this station he was directed to regulate the performance of Divine Service in her Highness's Chapel according to the usage of the Church of England; which he did in so prudent and decent a manner as to give no offence. He continued there about one year, when he desired leave of the Princess to return to England on the account of his intended marriage, which she with much regret consented to upon a promise of his return; which he performing staid about eight months longer, when her Highness permitted him to return home. In 1680 upon the death of Dr. Allestree he was offered the place of Divinity Professor in Oxford, but declined it. About the same time he was made Chaplain to King Charles II. In 1685, the evening before the execution titled, A Calculation of the Credibility of human Testimony, consisting of these four propositions. First, concerning the credibility of a report made by single successive reporters, who are equally credible. Secondly, concerning concurrent testifications. Thirdly, concerning the credit of a reporter for a particular article of that narrative, for the whole of which he is credible in a certain degree. Fourthly, concerning the truth of oral or written tradition in whole or in part successively transmitted, and also co-attested by several successions of transmitters. VI. New danger of Presbytery, 1703. VII. Marks of a defenceless cause, VIII. The Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower House of Convocation vindicated. IX. De Valentianorum Heresi Conjectura, quibus illius Origo ex Ægyptiaca Theologia deducitur. London 1711 in 4to, pagg. 27. In the beginning of this piece, our author observes, that the Christian doctrine was not delivered at first to all the heathens in its native purity and simplicity. It was corrupted by some men for some private ends, and adapted to the superstitions of the Gentiles. Thus we read in the Scriptures, that the new inhabitants of Samaria corrupted the doctrine of Moses. It is well known, that a Persian was the author of Manicheism. The heresy of Marcion proceeded from an opinion which generally prevailed among the Eastern Nations, that there were two eternal principles, one of good, and the other of evil; and that all the confusion observable in this world was occasioned by their perpetual struggling. According to this doctrine, Marcion acknowledged two Gods, authors of the old and new Testament. He believed, that the former, being an ill principle, gave laws to the Jews, a Nation, which was always hated, especially in the time of that heretic. But the latter, said he, being a good principle, and desiring to overthrow the Empire of his rival, sent Jesus Christ into the world, who gave better laws to mankind, and brought them into a state of happiness. After these observations our author proceeds to the doctrine of Valentinus. He believes, that though it appears to us monstrous and extravagant, the Egyptians had a different notion of it. That heretic is said to have been a native of Egypt; and it is not improbable, that he adapted the Christian Religion to the opinions of his countrymen. This conjecture our author endeavours to prove in the sequel of his discourse. In the first place, he gives a very exact account of the doctrine of Valentinus; and in order to render it more intelligible, he has added a genealogical table of the Æones, &c. mentioned by that heretic and his followers. He then enquires into the origin of the Valentinian System, and compares it with the Egyptian Theology. X. An inquiry into the state of the ancient Measures, the Attick, the Roman, and especially the Jewish. With an Appendix concerning our old English money and measures of content. London 1721 in 8vo. In the preface he tells us, that upon the perusal heretofore of two very curious tracts, which were published about the same time in the year 1684, the one by Dr. Cumberland, late Bishop of Peterborough, and the other by Dr. Edward Bernard, first printed with Dr. Pocock's Commentary on Hosea; and upon reading the Roman Foot and Denarius of Mr. John Greaves, by them most justly celebrated; he began to enquire more nearly into the state of the old Hebrew Measures, and going upon the sure foundation of Mr. Greaves, and in the method of Bishop Cumberland, and assisted by the copious informations of Dr. Bernard, he cast his thoughts into the following scheme. First having the nature in general of the several measures of Length, Content, and Weight, and their convenient relation one towards another, he laid down the English measures, as those, to which he was to reduce the Jewish, for his clearer understanding of them. And then, because the knowledge of the Jewish measures was chiefly to be had from the accounts of them, that are given us by men of different ages and nations; and it was as necessary to have their several measures adjusted to the English; he was obliged to take into his notice some of the modern, but more especially those, which had been used in old time by the Athenians and Romans. And thus provided he was in the last place to produce and compare the most probable informations, which have been given us of those Jewish measures, and to form thence as clear and as certain account of them as he could. And accordingly his Inquiry consists of four parts. The first treats of Measures in general, and particularly of the English, and some other modern ones, as the present Roman, the Spanish, the Holland, and the Egyptian. The second takes a view of the Attic Measures, for the sake of those Greek authors who are to be consulted. The third inspects the Roman, which could not be so well understood without the Attic, for the sake of the Latin writers. The fourth considers the Jewish Measures themselves. To the whole is subjoined an Appendix concerning the denominations and computation of the English money and measures of content. In this Appendix he observes (3), that, (3) Pag. 468, in his opinion, "all the old English measures of content, which we received from the Saxon, were in all probability derived to them from the Saracens, as well as our money;" and he remarks (4), that (4) Pag. 473, "with regard to the names of vessels, which are known in Spain and Italy, such as Pipe, Butt, Barrel, &c. he should look for them in the Mediterranean, and there among those Eastern people, from whence the goods contained in them came. For considering that all mensuration of weight appears plainly to be Phœnician; and that measures of content, even of water, were highly necessary to them for their provision in their voyages by land as well as sea; and that of liquids, wine and oil were the original products of that coast; (not only the word Wine, but the fabulous names of Bacchus, Semele, and Silenus with his Asi, attesting to such an original :) one may be thence inclined to think, that the Phœnician names of vessels were carried to the Greek Islands along with their contents; and that the Saracens afterwards, when they were masters of that sea, readily took up the words they found of the Oriental Language, as well as imposed new from the same. This is what may be conjectured from many of the Levant vessels, not only those that hold water, but those that swim in it; for they sometimes borrow names one from the other. And it may not therefore be improper to enquire after them in the South-East, notwithstanding the Saxons, Danes, and Normans have been potent navigators in their time, and may be presumed to have brought in upon our island their Germanick appellations." Dr. John Arbuthnot in the Preface to his

tion of the Duke of Monmouth he received by the Earl of Rochester a message from the King, immediately to attend the Duke. When he came to the Tower, and acquainted the Duke with his Majesty's order, he received it with some confusion and surprize; but the Doctor assuring him, that he was charged with no particular commission, the Duke told him, that he was very welcome and acceptable to him; and after much free conversation with him, said, that he would see him in the morning as soon as he was up. The Doctor sat up all night, and in the morning the Duke told him, that he was sure he had made his peace with God. Much time was spent to desire his Grace to consider the nature and foundation of such a full persuasion, which the Doctor very faithfully laid before him with as great plainness and decency, as the Duke's firm adherence to this belief would admit of, in which he persisted to his last moment. In the morning the Duke was attended by the Bishops of Ely and Bath and Wells, and Dr. Tenison, who with Dr. Hooper accompanied him to the scaffold, where the Bishop of Ely chiefly discoursed with the Duke, and pressed him to own the truth of the doctrine of Non-resistance, and confess himself guilty of rebellion. In 1691, upon the promotion of Dr. John Sharp to the Archbishopric of York, Queen Mary, during the King's absence in Holland, ordered the Earl of Nottingham to send for Dr. Hooper to come to her, when she offered him the Deanery of Canterbury, of which he had not the least expectation; for he never directly or indirectly made interest for any one preferment. He asked her Majesty, which of his two livings he should resign; who told him, that though the King and she never gave two livings to one man, yet they never took them away, and ordered him to keep both. But when the Queen would not name one, he resigned Woodhey. In 1698 the Prince and Princess of Denmark were very desirous to have had him Præceptor to the Duke of Gloucester; but the King appointed Bishop Burnet for that service. In 1701 he was chosen Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation; and the same year was offered the Primacy of Ireland by the Earl of Rochester, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In 1702 he was by the Queen's express command, though contrary to his inclination, made Bishop of St. Asaph, in which See he continued about half a year, and generously refused the usual mortuaries or pensions paid by the Clergy in Wales to their new Bishops, saying, that they should never pay so dear for the sight of him. In 1703 he had the like order to remove to the See of Bath and Wells, which he earnestly requested her Majesty to dispense with, not only on account of the great expence of such a sudden translation, and a reluctance to remove, but also out of regard to his old friend Dr. Ken, the deprived Bishop of that See, for whom he begged that Bishopric, which the Queen readily granted; but Bishop Ken desired to be excused, and never ceased to importune Bishop Hooper to accept it, and from that time stiled himself, late of Bath and Wells. But before Bishop Hooper could be prevailed with to accept this Bishopric, he requested the Queen to permit him to hold the Præcentorship of Exeter in Commendam, with a dispensation for non-residence, for the sole benefit of Bishop Ken; which her Majesty readily consented to, commending Bishop Hooper for making that proposal to her. But the then Bishop of Exeter objecting against it, the Queen, to satisfy him, desired Bishop Hooper to resign it, saying, that she would take care of the deprived Bishop, and then ordered him a pension of two hundred pounds per ann. which was punctually paid him out of the Treasury to the time of his death. By his steady, wise, and courteous conduct he gained the affections of the Gentry and Clergy of his Diocese, of which he was fully possessed; and in return no offers could make him think of a translation from them. For he often refused a seat in the Privy Council, and could not be persuaded to accept of the Bishopric of London on the death of Bishop Compton, nor of the Archbishopric of York on the death of Archbishop Sharp. He sat in the See of Bath and Wells twenty four years and six months, and died at Barkely in Somersetshire, whither he sometimes retired, on the 6th of September 1727, and was interred in the Cathedral of Wells under a marble monument erected to his memory [B].
Dr.

(5) Printed at London 1727 in 4to.
his Tables of ancient coins, weights, and measures, explained and exemplified in several Dissertations (5), gives a great character of the author's Inquiry, and tells us, that "if one considers the uniformity of the whole design, accuracy of the calculations, sagacity of the conjectures, skill in restoring and comparing passages of antient authors, and the incomparable learning that shines through the whole, it excels very far all that ever was published upon the subject."

(6) Page 19, and 40.
And he stiles this work an ingenious Inquiry (6). XI. De Patriarchæ Jacobi Benedictione, Gen. XLIX. Conjecturæ: Published by the Reverend Mr. Hunt of Hart-Hall in Oxford, with a preface and notes collected out of the Arabic manuscripts in the Bodleian Library. The Bishop had kept this piece by him above forty years, and shewn it to Dr. Pocock, as appears from a letter of the Bishop written to the Doctor on that occasion. He put it into Mr. Hunt's hands just before his death, with directions to print it in the manner Mr. Hunt has done; and it was printed soon after at the expence of Mrs. Prowse, the Bishop's daughter. The impression consisted only of a hundred copies, which were chiefly designed for presents to friends. Among the manuscripts which he left behind him, he gave leave to have published a Latin Sermon preached in 1672, when he took his degree of Bachelor of Divinity, and a Latin Tract on Divorce.

[B] A marble monument erected to his memory.] The epitaph inscribed on it is as follows.

" In hoc sacrario cineres suos requiescere voluit
" Reverendus admodum Præsul
" GEORGIUS HOOPERUS, S. T. P.
" Magnum Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Decus.
" Scientias quippe maximè reconditas,
" Mathesin universam,
" Antiquitates patrias exterasq;
" Linguas pœne omnes, quotquot aut oriens protulit aut occidens,

" Jus

Dr. Thomas Coney published a character of him (b) soon after his death [C].

(b) In Mist's Journal of October 21, 1727, and at the end of the Doctor's Twenty five Sermons, London 1730 in 8vo.

- “ Jus Civile, Municipale, Canonicum, “ Elegantiorum Literarum venustate temperaverat :
 “ Theologiam vero
 “ A fiduâ facti Codicis & primævorum patrum lectione, “ Quæsi alias omnes scientias ignorare maluisset,
 “ Totam penitus hauserat, “ Sanio rem haud dubiè amplexus.
 “ Summo tamen Eruditionis Amore semper incensus,
 “ Non in studiis se totum tradidit,
 “ Ut arduis negotiis impar,
 “ Aut hominum ignarus,
 “ Aut difficilis, inconcinnus, asper evaderet.
 “ Inerat enim illi
 “ Comitæ Aulis Principum dignâ
 “ Christiana Simplicitas condita ;
 “ Ingenium non ad Literas magis
 “ Quam ad res agendas habile & versatile ;
 “ Mira in conciliandis sibi hominibus solertia,
 “ Sed Animarum saluti unice intenta.
 “ Ita cum artes doctrinasq; longè distitas conjungerat, “ Semisq; honoribus par
 “ Nullum unquam ambiret
 “ Aditum sibi ad famam eximiam,
 “ Ad primarios tum in Republicâ quam Ecclesiâ viros,
 “ Ad Regiarum denique pientissimarum “ Mariæ & Annæ patrocinium, “ Virtute solâ patefecit.
 “ Itaq; ab illâ Decanatu Cantuariensi,
 “ Ab hac Insulâ primo Sancti Asaphensi, “ Deinde Bathone-Wellensi ornatus est.
 “ Quo in munere amplissimo
 “ Cum Gregi suo fideliter invigilaret, “ Inopes occulto plerumq; munificentia fonte,
 “ Sed perenni, ubere, latè fluenti reficeret,
 “ Presbyteros suos indulgentiâ paternâ sveret,
 “ Impugnatos quosq; etiam ruri latentes,
 “ In lucem & splendorem nec opinantes evocaret,
 “ Bonorum omnium Amorem & Observantiam meruit, “ Posteris morum exemplar pulcherrimum reliquit.
 “ Obiit VI Septembris A. D. M.DCC.XXVII.
 “ Etatis LXXXVII.”

[C] Dr. Thomas Coney published a character of him soon after his death.] The Doctor tells us, that his learning was not shattering and superficial but solid and universal; and his talents so great in every distinct part of knowledge, that the masters of each faculty have thought their profession to be the Bishop's peculiar study. The Lawyer might suppose him bred to the Bar, and conversant in nothing but Statutes and Reports. The Casuist might think his whole time spent in Canons and Schools; and the Divine, in Fathers and Councils. The Antiquary might tie him down to Medals and Charters; and the Linguist fancy him always poring upon Lexicons, or else the several Eastern Languages could not be so familiar to him as Latin and Greek. The Philosopher found no sciences out of the reach of his comprehensive genius; nor the Masters of polite Literature, any graces in the Classics, which had escaped his observance. Yet in all these several attainments, his surprising excellency was, that the variety of learning did not distract his thoughts, nor the intenseness of study four the facetiousness of his humour. He so tempered the crabbedness of the Mathematics with the politeness of the Orator, the legends of the Rabins with the fidelity of the Fathers, and the occurrences of Modern History with the transactions of Antiquity, that he was as delightful in his conversation, and as entertaining in his friendships, as he was profound in his knowledge, and ornamental in his life. With regard to the character of a gentleman, his accomplishments were so great, as not only to excel those of his own profession, but to be a match for such as had made conversation and ceremony their sole and ultimate study. It is observable, that much study makes men pettish and morose; that a recluselife is an impediment to conversation; and that learning itself is imperious and dogmatical. But in our Prelate all these acquisitions had the quite contrary effects. His study was to promote good manners; his retirement, to make a more glorious appearance; and his learning, to propagate affability and condescension. The private course of his life would force any one to confess, that he was far from affecting popularity, or doing any thing for noise and ostentation. But his appearance was so venerable, his conversation so endearing, and his demeanor so uncommon, as to render him the most popular and noted Prelate of his order. But in the midst of these civilities and accomplishments, it is still remarkable, that the gravity of the Bishop kept the ascendant of the Gentleman; and that his principles were too stiff to bend to any company. His zeal and integrity were inviolable; and truth was never lost in a crowd of words. His sincerity was no sufferer by his complaisance; nor was the Courtier too hard for the Christian. He looked upon himself as married to his Diocese; and notwithstanding his numerous acquaintance and extended friendships in other parts of the Kingdom, he confined his preferments to his own children, the residing Presbyters of his proper Diocese. Nepotism had no share in his favours, and relations were kept at a distance. The laborious Clergyman would find himself surprized into a preferment, whilst he was sweating at his duty. The modest and humble man would be dignified in his obscurity, without the fatigue of attendance, or the formality of a petition. The care of his Parish was the best recommendation of a Pastor to this vigilant Prelate; and the continuance in his duty the most obliging requital that could be made him. Where the service was great and the congregation numerous, some marks of distinction were certainly placed, and the Minister was seasonably advanced, to secure an higher reverence to his person and a kinder acceptance of his labours. Every one of his Clergy had the favour of a son, the access of an equal, and the reception of a friend. No angry looks did intimidate the petitioner, no tedious formalities protract business, nor any imperious Officers insult the Clergy. T.

HOORNBECK (JOHN), Professor of Divinity in the Universities of Utrecht and Leyden, was one of the most illustrious Divines in Holland in the seventeenth Century. He was born at Harlem (a) in the year 1617, and studied there till he was fifteen or sixteen years old, when he was sent to Leyden, where he made a considerable progress in the Sciences, under the learned Professors, that University was provided with. Having spent two years in that City, he went to study at Utrecht in the year 1635, whence he returned to Leyden the next year. He was admitted a Minister in the year 1639, and went to perform the functions of his office secretly at Cologne. He acquitted himself of all the duties of his post with a great deal of piety and prudence, and was never discouraged by the dangers to which he was exposed in a City, where most of the inhabitants were zealous Papists. He returned into Holland in the year 1643, and was the same year promoted (b) to the degree of Doctor of Divinity with great applause the 21st of December. The proofs he gave of his great learning were such, that he was chosen to fill the Chair of Divinity Professor, which had been vacant at Utrecht since Schotanus's death. He chose to accept that post rather than any of the employments, that were offered him in other Cities [A]. In July 1644 he was installed Professor of Divinity

(a) John Hoornbeek, his grandfather, retired thither with his wife, in the year 1584, leaving Flanders, his native country, for the sake of his Religion.

[A] Several employments were offered him in other cities.] In February 1644 the Church of Maestricht would have him for her Minister. That of Graft in North-Holland called him in March that same year, and

(b) In the University of Utrecht.

Divinity at Utrecht, and the next year he was chosen also Minister in ordinary of the Church of that city. How difficult soever the functions of these two employments were, yet he acquitted himself of them with great diligence and care [B], which rendered his noble talents so useful to the public, that it made him universally beloved and esteemed. But lest he should sink under so many labours, the Magistrates discharged him of part of his pastoral functions. He was chosen to exercise the same employments at Leyden, which he had at Utrecht, and accepted them in the year 1654. He was a great ornament to that celebrated University till he died September the 1st 1666. He deserved to live much longer; but we ought rather to wonder that so laborious a man as he was [C] lived about forty nine years, than that he did not live longer. The great number of books which he published [D] are a most evident proof of his great application and extensive learning.

and the Chair of Divinity Professor in the illustrious school of Harderwyck (1) was offered him in the month of May following (2). It is very glorious for a man thus to be wished for in several places at the age of twenty seven.

[B] He acquitted himself of his new employment with great diligence and care. I kept the particular account of it for this remark, in which I shall make use of the author's words, who wrote our Hoornbeck's life. In utraque autem statione (3) per decennium fere perseveravit, tanta eruditionis, eloquentiæ, pietatis, & diligentiae fama; omnibusque ordinibus adeo gratus, ut nullus in majori fuerit existimatione, non Ultrajecti solum, sed in toto Belgio. Nempe assiduus erat in docendo, predicando, concionando, legendo, disputando, regendo, præfiscendo, catechisationibus habendis, membris Ecclesiæ, imprimis ægris visitandis. Quibus artibus optimis certe, Magistratus Trajectini gratiam adeo meruit, & inivit, ut Magistratus optimus suo proprio motu, non petentem, nec forte cogitantem, liberaverit dimidia parte oneris Pastoralis, servato tamen integro honore & honorario. i. e. "He continued almost ten years in these two employments, with such a reputation of learning, eloquence, piety, and diligence, and so much beloved by persons of all ranks, that no person was so much esteemed as he, not only at Utrecht, but through all the United Provinces. For he made it his constant care to teach, to pray, to preach, to read, to hold disputations, to visit his flock, and especially the sick, and catechize the youth. These commendable arts gained him the favour of the Magistrates of Utrecht, so that they exempted him from one half of his pastoral functions, though they suffered him to enjoy all the honours and prerogatives of them, and continued to pay him his whole salary." If you will see the character of a good pastor, read what follows. *Membra Ecclesiæ frequenter invisebat, pios animabat, ignaros docebat, malos corripiebat, hereticos confutabat, afflictos solabatur, ægros recreabat, infirmos roborabat, ægestos erigebat, pauperibus subveniebat, omnes denique juvabat pro eorum statu & conditione, omnibus aderat in omnibus, omnibus se omnia faciebat, gravibus gravem, hilaribus hilarem, afflictis condolentem, doctis doctum & Doctorem, plebi Pastorem, errantibus ducem ut in viam reduceret veritatis. i. e. "He often visited the members of his Church; he encouraged the pious, instructed the ignorant, reproved the wicked, refuted the heretics, comforted the afflicted, refreshed the sick, strengthened the weak, cheered up the drooping, assisted the poor; in a word he was useful to all, in whatsoever state or condition they were; he was ready to help all that wanted his assistance; he made himself all things to all; he was grave with the grave, cheerful with the cheerful, mournful with the afflicted, learned and a Doctor; with the learned, a pastor to his flock, and a guide to lead those that erred into the paths of truth." Here follows the character that is given of him with regard to his diligence in his functions as a Professor. Studiofos vero Theologia velut filios omni cura complectebatur, laboresque suos præcipuos iis impendebat; non lectiones solum in eorum gratiam habebat, sed frequentia Collegia omnis generis, atque Disputationes ordinarias & extraordinarias, ex quibus resultarunt tot vasta & egregia volumina ad institutionem juvenutis, imo ad usum omnium, sed imprimis ad conversionem hereticorum (4). i. e.*

"He took as much care of the Students in Divinity as if they had all been his own children; his chief labours were spent for them; he used to read not only public lectures for them, but even private Lectures upon several subjects, and to hold ordinary and extraordinary disputations, which have produced so many large and excellent volumes, useful not only for the instruction of youth, but also for the use of all men, and especially for the conversion of heretics."

[C] So laborious a man as he was. This the reader may know already, by the particulars related in the foregoing remark, but it will still better appear from the following passage: it relates to the time when he was Divinity Professor and Minister at Leiden. Curam Ecclesiæ suo jure poterat in Collegas derivare, quia primario Pastori (5) ab ea immuni adjunctus, cum eo labores, honores, præmia, & privilegia omnia ex decreto sapientissimi Magistratus æqualiter distribuerebat. Sed ab Ecclesiæ cura, membrorumque & ægrorum visitatione dispensari noluit, contra vero, cum dimidias tantum Pastoris vires demandatas haberet, integras voluit implere, zelo & diligentia stupenda in homine alias occupatissimo, imo non tam onerato quam oppresso, & tantum non fatigante sub multiplici onere, cui plures simul juncti vix essent pares. Concionabatur in Templo, legebat in Academia, præsedebat in Consistorio, Catechisationes instituebat in Choro, Collegia habebat in domo, scribebat in musæo, sepe in lecto, membra Ecclesiæ visitabat in ædibus, ægros etiam & pestiferos, curam ad omnes & ad omnia extendebat (6). i. e. "He had a right to leave the care of the Church to his colleagues; for being an assistant to the first pastor, who was discharged from that care, he might share with him all the labours, honours, profits and privileges, by a decree of the most prudent Magistrates. But he would not be discouraged from the care of the Church, and of visiting his flock and the sick. On the contrary, though he was intrusted but with one half of the pastoral functions, yet he would perform them all. Which shewed a wonderful zeal and diligence in a man who was otherwise extremely busy, and rather oppressed than loaded, and almost sinking under the variety of his labours, to which several other persons joined together had hardly been equal. He preached in the Church, read lectures in the University, was Moderator in the Consistory, explained the Catechism in the Choir, had private lectures at home, wrote in his study, and often in bed, visited the members of his Church at their houses, even the sick, and them that had got the plague; he extended his care to all men and all things."

[D] The great number of books which he published. They may be reduced to these five classes; Didactical, Polemical, Practical, Historical, and Oratorical. Those of the first class are, Institutiones Theologicae, i. e. "An Introduction to Divinity, in 8vo." Irenicum de studio Pacis & Concordiæ, i. e. "A Treatise of Peace and Concord," in 4to. De Consociatione Evangelica inter Reformatos & Evangelicos, i. e. "Of an Evangelical Union between the Reformed and the Lutherans," in 4to. Those of the second class are as follows. Socinianismi confutati Tomi tres, i. e. "A Refutation of Socinianism," in three volumes in 4to. Pro convincendis & convertendis Judæis Lib. VIII (7). i. e. "Of convincing and converting the Jews, in eight books," in 4to. De Conversione Gentilium, Judæique. But Libri duo, i. e. "Of the Conversion of the Heathens, in two books," in 4to. Examen Bullæ Urbani VIII Jesuitissis, Imaginibus & Festis, i. e. "An Examination of Pope Urban VIII's Bull concerning Jesuits, Images and Holy-days," in 4to. Examen Bullæ Innocentii X de Pace Germaniæ, i. e. "An Examination

(5) It was Professor Heidanus.

(6) Ex Vita Joas. Hoornbecki.

(7) This is certainly the book which Mr. Baillet, tom. 2. of the Anti, pag. 38. in calls Disp. Anti. it is not thus intitled. Some author, who for shortness sake, quoted it thus, may have misled Mr. Baillet.

(1) A city of Guelderland.

(2) Taken from John Hoornbeck's Life prefixed to his book De Conversione Isidorum.

(3) That is to say, his post of Professor, and that of Pastor in ordinary.

(4) Ex Vita Joas. Hoornbecki.

(c) See a list of them in his Life.

learning. He understood many languages [E], and had a share in the friendship of the most excellent Divines of his time (c). He never departed one inch from the most strict orthodoxy; and he was not less commendable for those qualities of the heart which make up the character of an honest man, than for his wit and his learnings. You may see a particular account of all this in his life (d). He left children worthy of him [F], which is passing a great encomium upon them.

"mination of Pope Innocent X's Bull concerning the Peace of Germany." Epistola ad Duræum de Independentissimo, i. e. "Letters to John Dury concerning the Opinions of the Independents," in 8vo. Commentarius de Paradoxo Weigeliano, i. e. "Remarks upon Weigel's Paradoxes," in 12mo. Apologia pro Ecclesia Christiana bodierna, contra Libellum, ad Legem & Testimonium, &c. i. e. "A Vindication of the present Christian Church, against the Book intitled, 'To the Law and to the Testimony, &c.'" in 8vo. De observando à Christianis Præcepto Decalogi quarto, i. e. "Of the Obligation under which the Christians are to keep the fourth Commandment," in 12mo. De Episcopatu, i. e. "Of Episcopacy." The books of the third class are, Theologia præctica Tomi duo, i. e. "Two Volumes of Practical Divinity," in 4to. De Peste, i. e. "Of the Plague," in 12mo. Those of the fourth are, Summa Controversiarum, i. e. "A Sum of Controversies," in 8vo. Miscella vetera & nova, i. e. "Ancient and Modern Miscellanies." I refer to the fifth class the Orationes variae Inaugurales, Valedictoriae, Rehorales, & Funebres, i. e. "Various orations delivered upon his installation, when he took his leave, when he resigned the Rectorship, and funeral orations." I do not give the titles of his Dutch works, which consist of several treatises.

[E] He understood many languages.] The Author of his Life has the following expressions: Linguis si spectes, novis plurimas doctarum & vulgariarum, Latinam, Græcam, Hebraicam, Chaldaicam, Syriacam, Rabinicam, Belgicam, Germanicam, Anglicam, Gallicam, Italicam, Arabicam & Hispanicam Rudimenta attigit (8). i. e. "As for the languages, he understood a great many, both of the learned and vulgar tongues, as the Latin, Greek, Hebrew; Chaldaic, Syriac, Rabinical, Dutch, German, English, French, and Italian tongues; he understood also the principles of Arabic and Spanish languages."

[F] He left children worthy of him.] He married at Utrecht in the year 1650 Ann Bernard. By this marriage he became related to several illustrious men, as, for instance, to Constantine l'Empereur (9), Divinity Professor (10), and to Jodocus Hondius (11) a very famous Geographer, grand-father to Henry Hondius, who was killed when he was fighting very bravely for the service of his own country in Admiral Tromp's ship, which he commanded. Our John Hoornbeek left two sons. ISAAC HOORNBECK, formerly a famous Counsellor at the Hague, and at present Pensionary to the city of Rotterdam (*); and HENRY EMILIUS HOORNBECK, one of the Commissioners for receiving the Taxes in the province of Holland.

(d) It is prefixed to his treatise, De Conversione Indorum, & Gentilium, and has been written by David Stuart. I have extracted this article from it.

(8) In Vita Hoornbecki.
(9) Ann Bernard's grand-mother by her father's side was called Joan l'Empereur, and was aunt to Constantine l'Empereur, and to John l'Empereur Minister at the Hague.
(10) First at Harderwyk, and then at Leyden.
(11) He was Ann Bernard's grand-father by her mother's side.
(*) In 1720 he was made Counsellor-Pensionary, Keeper of the Scales, and Stadtholder of the Fiefs belonging to Holland and West-Friesland, &c. He died at the Hague June 17, 1727, in the 71st year of his age. Addit. to the 2nd. edition.

HORATIUS (PUBLIUS) surnamed Cocles, did a very noble action, whilst the city of Rome his native place was besieged by King Porfenna. As his article is very good and pretty full in Moreri's Dictionary (a), I shall give but a very short article of him, and I shall dwell only upon the difference there is in the several accounts of the ancient Historians with regard to a particular circumstance, which ought to have been related without any variety [A].

(a) Of the Paris edition.

[A] I shall only dwell upon the difference there is . . . with regard to a particular circumstance, which ought to have been related without any variety.] There are some Historians, who assert, that Horatius, having cast himself into the Tiber, after he had opposed the enemies, till the bridge was broken down behind him, swam to the opposite shore, notwithstanding the weight of his arms, without receiving the least wound. But others relate, that he received such a blow on his thigh, that he continued lame ever after. Livy supposes evidently that he was not wounded. Cunctati aliquandiu sunt (Hetrusci) dum alius alium, ut prælium incipiant, circumspiciant. Pudor deinde commovit aciem, & clamore sublato undique in unum hostem tela conjiciant, quæ cum in objecto CUNCTA scuto hæssissent, neque ille minus obstinatus ingenti pontem obtineret gradu, jam impetu detrudere conabantur virum, cum simul fragor rupti ponderis, simul clamor Romanorum alacritate perfecti operis sublatus, pavore subito impetum sustinuit. Tum Cocles, Tiberine pater, inquit, te sancte precor, hæc arma & hunc militem propitio flumine accipias. Ita sic armatus in Tyberim desiluit: multisque SUPERINCIDENTIBUS TELIS INCOLUMIS ad suos tranavit, rem ausus plus famæ habituram ad posteros quam fidei (1). i. e. "The Hetrusci stood still for a while, considering who should first begin the battle. But shame put at last the army in motion; and with a great outcry they all shot their arrows against one single enemy, which he received on his shield, continuing unmoved to defend the bridge with the utmost courage; upon which they endeavoured to rush upon him all together, with a design to fling him down; but the cracking of the bridge, which that moment was broken down, together with the shoutings of the Romans, when they perceived the work completed, struck the enemy with terror, and stopped the enemy's fury. Whereupon Cocles addressing himself to the God of the Tiber, prayed him thus; O Tiberine father, let thy propitious streams kindly receive these weapons and this soldier;

(1) Titus Livius, lib. 2. Decad. 1. cap. 10.

having said this, he flung himself thus armed into the river, and notwithstanding the arrows which on all sides were shot at him, he swam ashore without being wounded; thus he dared to attempt an action, which will gain more reputation than credit with posterity." We may be certain that all they, who do not expressly assert that he was wounded, suppose the same thing with Livy; for their design was to raise our admiration for this Roman's great courage. Now this action is more wonderful still, and more glorious if he had been wounded, than if he had not. Whence it follows, that since neither Florus (2) nor (3) Seneca mention any wound, it is a proof that they were persuaded he received none. Valerius Maximus asserts so positively that Cocles was not wounded, that we ought to believe the negative was grounded on some tradition. Ut patriam periculo imminenti liberatam vidit, armatus se in Tiberim misit: cujus fortitudinem Dii immortales admirati, INCOLUMITATEM SINCERAM ei præstiterunt. Nam neque altitudine dejectus, quassatusve, neque pondere armorum pressus, nec ullo vortice circuitu æsus: nec telis quidem, quæ undique congeriebantur, LESUS, TUTUM natandi eventum habuit (4). i. e. "As soon as he saw that his country was free from the imminent danger to which it had been exposed, he flung himself, armed as he was, into the Tiber. The immortal Gods admiring his courage, preserved him entirely from all wounds; for he was neither hurt nor bruised, though he fell from a very great height. Nor was he oppressed by the weight of his arms, nor whirled about by the swiftness of the stream, nor even wounded by the arrows which on every side were shot at him: thus he swam safe to shore." But there are three famous Historians, who followed another tradition. Dionysius of Halicarnassus gives a very particular account of that battle, and he asserts expressly, that Horatius was wounded through the thigh with a spear, and that this wound pained him so much, that he could hardly stand upon his legs, when he

(2) Florus, lib. 1. (and not, as Moreri has it, lib. 5; this author's work contains but 4 chapters) cap. 10.

(3) Seneca, Epistolæ, p. m. 464.

(4) Val. Max. lib. 3. cap. 2. num. 1. pag. m. 241, 242.

☞ HORNECK (Dr. ANTHONY), a learned and pious Divine of the seventeenth Century, was born at Baccharach in the Lower Palatinate in 1641. His father was Recorder or Secretary of that place. Our author was sent to Heidelberg, where he applied himself to the study of Divinity under Dr. Spanheim, afterwards Professor at Leyden. At nineteen years of age he came over to England, and was entered into Queen's College in Oxford December the 24th 1663; and by the interest of Dr. Barlow, Provost of that College, he was made Chaplain of it soon after his entrance (a). December the 21st 1663 (b) he was incorporated Master of Arts from the University of Wittemberg. Soon after this he became Vicar of Allhallows in Oxford, where he continued two years. In 1665 he removed into the family of the Duke of Albemarle, and was Tutor to his Grace's son, then Lord Torrington. The Duke presented him to the Rectory of Doulton in Devonshire, and procured for him a Prebend in Exeter. In 1669, before he married, he went over into Germany to see his friends; and after his return was chosen Preacher of the Savoy [A], where he continued about twenty six years till he died (c). In 1693 he was collated to a Prebend in Westminster; and the year following resigned his Prebend of Exeter; and on the 28th of September the same year he was admitted to a Prebend in the Cathedral of Wells (d). He was likewise Chaplain to King William and Queen Mary. He published several works [B]. He died January the

(a) Life of Anthony Horneck, D. D. By Richard [Kidder] Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, pag. 3. 4. edit. London 1698.

(b) Wood, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 154. says it was March the 15th.

(c) Life of Dr. Horneck, pag. 4, 5, 6.

(d) Ibid. pag. 21, 22, 23.

(5) Dionys. Halicarn. lib. 5. cap. 23, 24.

(6) Plutarch. in Valerio, pag. 106.

(7) Idem, ibid. pag. 105.

(8) Οὐ μὲν τὸ σκίλον τῶ Ὁρατίου καὶ τῶν ἑλλήνων τῶ Μάκκ. Non perennis Horatii, & manuum Mutii, Dio, lib. 45. pag. m. 325.

(9) See above the remark [F] of the article FULVIA, in the 2d a-linea.

(10) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 8. ver. 646.

(11) Plutarch. de Fortuna Alexand. Orat. 2. pag. 331, B.

(12) Polyb. lib. 6. cap. 53.

heard the bridge was broken down (5). This Historian adds, 1, that it was thought he would soon die of his wounds; 2, that as soon as it was known he would recover, they bestowed noble rewards upon him, but that he could never obtain the Consulship, nor any military employment, because he had continued lame ever since that battle. Plutarch relates that they raised a brazen monument to him in the temple of Vulcan, to comfort him under his misfortune of being lamed by that wound (6). Plutarch had observed a little before, that Horatius swam to the city, being wounded in his thigh, Δόρατι θυρήνῃ βεβλήμενον τὸν ἰχθυίῳ (7). i. e. "Wounded in his thigh by an Hetruscan dart." Dion Cassius asserts, that Tully, in an oration delivered before the Senate against Mark Anthony, swore by Horatius's thigh, and Mucius's hand (8). I know that this direct oration, which Dion gives us, is not like any of Tully's Philippic Orations (9); but Dion who composed it, would not have made use of such an oath, if there had not been a tradition, that Horatius had been wounded in his thigh, whilst he defended his country against Tarquin's friends. Let us mention a fourth witness, and quote Servius's words. Solus Cocles postilem impetum sustinuit, donec à tergo pons solveretur à sociis, qua soluto se cum armis precipitavit in Tiberim, & licet læsus esset in coxa, tamen ejus fluentia superavit. Unde est illud ab eo dictum, cum ei in comitiis coxæ vitium objiceretur, per singulos gradus admovent triumphi mei (10). i. e. "Cocles alone resisted the enemy's attack, till the bridge was broken down behind him, and then he flung himself headlong into the Tiber with his arms on, and though he was wounded in his hip, yet he swam to shore. This occasioned a witty saying of his, for as they objected his lameness to him in an assembly of the people, he answered, every step I make calls my triumph to my mind." You see that the tradition of Horatius's wound was supported by this circumstance of a witty saying of his, when they objected his lameness to him. It is pretended that Alexander made use of this thought, in order to comfort the King his father, who grieved at his being lame through a wound he had received in a battle (11).

If we have reason to wonder, that with regard to Horatius's story, two inconsistent traditions, namely, that he had been, and had not been wounded, should have been followed even by the most celebrated writers, what shall we say of Polybius (12), who supposes, that this brave and intrepid Roman lost his life in the Tiber? Shall we say, that this also was grounded upon a tradition? and shall we infer from thence, that ancient history is so dark and uncertain, that for the most part we do not know which side of a question to chuse between those that assert, and those that deny the same facts; and that both the affirmative and the negative appearing to be equally supported by credible authority, even with regard to such particulars, the truth or falshood of which could be most easily determined, we can have no certainty with regard to the less remarkable events recorded in history? Shall we, I say, draw such inferences? I would rather advise the reader to make use of these observations in order to strengthen his mind against the custom, which prevails, of reading without attention, and believing without examining. Observe that the different opinions there are concerning Horatius's face, are not so surprizing, but yet it is a proof of the uncertainty of History. Some assert that Horatius was perfectly beautiful (13); others say that he was surnamed Cocles, . . . because his nose was extremely flat, and so deeply sunk in his head, that there was nothing between his eyes, and that his eye-brows joined: so that the people intending to call him cyclops, mistook the name, and called him Cocles (14).

[A] After his return was chosen Preacher of the Savoy.] The maintenance of this place is small, and precarious; and whatever it was to him at his first taking it, when there were persons of considerable quality inhabiting there, who were very kind to him, yet afterwards when his family increased, and his necessities were greater, it could not be called a complete maintenance. But whatever it was first or last, he could not be persuaded to keep his living in Devonshire; nor could he ever be prevailed with afterwards, whatever offers were made him, to accept of any living to hold in conjunction with it. He was irconcilable to pluralities and to non-residence, and would upon occasion declare his abhorrence of them with some considerable warmth (1).

[B] He published several works.] I. The great Law of Consideration: Or, a Discourse, wherein the Nature, Usefulness, and absolute Necessity of Consideration in order to a truly serious and religious Life, are laid open. London, 1676, in 8vo. It has been several times reprinted with Additions and Corrections. II. A Letter to a Lady revolved to the Romish Church. London, 1678, in 12mo. III. The happy Ascetick: or the best Exercise. London, 1681, in 8vo. To this is subjoined A Letter to a Person of Quality concerning the holy Lives of the primitive Christians. The third edition of The happy Ascetick, and of this letter is corrected and enlarged, with Prayers at the end of each Exercise. IV. Delight and Judgment: Or a Prospect of the great Day of Judgment, and its Power to damp and imbitter sensual Delights, Sports, and Recreations. London, 1683, in 12mo. V. The Fire of the Altar: or certain Directions how to raise the Soul into Holy Flames, before, at, and after the receiving of the blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; with suitable Prayers and Devotions. London, 1683, in 12mo. To this is prefixed A Dialogue between a Christian and his own Conscience, touching the true Nature of the Christian Religion. VI. The Exercise of Prayer: or a Help to Devotion; being a Supplement to the Happy Ascetick, or Best Exercise, containing Prayers and Devotions suitable to the respective Exercises, with additional Prayers for several Occasions. London, 1685, in 8vo. VII. The first Fruits of Reason: or, a Discourse shewing the Necessity of applying ourselves betimes to the serious Practice of Religion. London, 1685, in 8vo. VIII. The Crucified Jesus: or a full Account of the Nature, End, Design, and Benefit of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, with necessary Directions, Prayers, Praises,

(13) Dion. Hal. cap. 22.

(14) Plutarch. in Valerio, pag. 105.

(1) Life of Anthony Horneck, D. D. By Richard Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, pag. 6.

the 31st 1696, and was interred in Westminster-Abbey, where a monument was erected by his friends to his memory. He was a man of exemplary character, and great learning. He had applied himself to the Arabic from his younger years, and retained it in a good measure to the last. He had very good skill in Ecclesiastical History, in Controversial Divinity, and Casuistry (e).

(e) Ibid. pag. 40, 41.

Praefix, and Meditations, to be used by Persons, who come to the holy Communion. London, 1686, in 8vo. IX. Questions and Answers concerning the two Religions; viz. that of the Church of England, and of the Church of Rome. X. An Answer to the Soldier's Question, What shall we do? XI. Several single Sermons. XII. Fifteen Sermons upon the fifth Chapter of St. Matthew. London, 1698, in 8vo. XIII. He translated out of High Dutch into English A wonderful Story or Narration of certain Swedish Writers, printed in Mr. Joseph Glanvil's Sadducismus Triumphatus; in the second edition of which book is a Preface to The wonderful Story of the Swedish Witches more correct and full; where also is an addition of a new relation from Sweden translated by Dr. Horneck out of High Dutch: XIV. He translated likewise from French into English, An Antidote against a careless Indifferency in Masters of Religion; being a Treatise in opposition to those, that believe that all Religions are indifferent, and that it imports not what men profess. Wherein the vulgar Objections of Atheists, Sceptics, Libertines, Latitudinarians, &c. are succinctly answered. London, 1693, in 8vo.

with an Introduction, by Dr. Horneck. He collected and published likewise, Some Discourses, Sermons, and Remains of Mr. Joseph Glanvil, London, 1681, in 4to, to which he added a short Preface, as also another larger before a book intitled, The true Interest of Families: or Directions how Parents may be happy in their Children, and Children in their Parents, &c. London, 1690, in 12mo, written by James Kirkwood, Rector of Astwick in Bedfordshire. XVI. He wrote in conjunction with Dr. Gilbert Burnet, The last Confession, Prayers, and Meditations of Lieutenant John Stern, delivered by him on the Cart immediately before his Execution, to Dr. Burnet. Together with the last Confession of George Borolky, signed by him in the Prison, and sealed up in the Lieutenant's Packet. With which an Account is given of their Deportment, both in the Prison, and at the place of their Execution, which was in the Pall-Mall, on the 10th of March, in the same place, in which they had murdered Thomas Thynn, Esq; on the 12th of February before, in the year 1681. London, 1682, in Folio. H.

HORROX (JEREMIAH), an eminent English Astronomer in the seventeenth Century, was born at Texteth near Liverpoole in Lancashire about the year 1619 [A]. From a school in the country, where he had made himself master of Grammar Learning, he was sent to Emanuel College in Cambridge, and spent some time there in academical studies. About the year 1633 he began to apply himself to the study of Astronomy; but living at that time with his father at Toxteth, in very moderate circumstances, and being destitute of proper books and other assistances for the prosecution of this study, he could not make any very considerable progress in it. He spent some of his first years to no purpose in the writings of Lansbergius, neglecting the works of Tycho, Kepler, and other excellent writers. But in 1636 he contracted an acquaintance and friendship with Mr. William Crabtree, who was engaged in the same studies, and who lived at Broughton near Manchester; and they carried on a correspondence by letters with each other, and sometimes wrote to Mr. Samuel Foster, Professor of Geometry at Gresham College in London. Mr. Horrox having now obtained a companion in his studies, assumed new vigour, and procuring Astronomical instruments and books, applied himself to the making of observations; and by Mr. Crabtree's advice laid aside Lansbergius, whose tables he found to be very erroneous, and his hypotheses inconsistent. He was pursuing his studies with great vigour and success, when he was cut off by sudden death January the 3d 1640, in the twenty second or in the entrance of the twenty third year of his age (a). What we have extant of his writings shew how great a loss the world had of him [B].

(a) Dr. John Wallis's Epistola Nuncupatoria, prefixed to Horrox's Opera posthuma, edit. London 1673 in 4to.

HORSTIUS

[A] Born... about the year 1619.] Dr. Wallis tells us (1), that at his death on January the 3d 1640 he was but in the twenty second or in the beginning of the twenty third year of his age.

[B] What we have extant of his writings shew how great a loss the world had of him.] He had just finished his Venus in Sole visa a little before his death; for it appears from a letter of his to Mr. Crabtree dated October the 3d 1640, that this book was not then finished, and he intimates that he was resolved to put the last hand to it before he took his journey to see him. And in another letter to Mr. Crabtree dated December the 19th following, he fixes upon the 4th of January to set out upon this journey; but died the day before, as appears from what Mr. Crabtree wrote on the backside of Mr. Horrox's last letter. Our author made his observations of Venus in Sole at Hool near Liverpool, as is evident from his letters, which from June 1639 to July 1640 are dated at Hool, though the preceding and subsequent letters are dated at Toxteth; but this circumstance is omitted in Hevelius's edition of that book, who published it at Dantzick 1662 in fol. with some works of his own under the following title: Johannis Hevelii Mercurius in Sole visus Gedani Anno Christiano MDCLXI. d. III. Maii St. N. cum aliis quibusdam rerum Caelestium observationibus variisque Phaenomenis. Cui annexa est Venus in Sole pariter visa anno 1639 d. 24 Novemb. St. V. Liverpooliae a Jeremia Horroxio, nunc primum edita notisque illustrata &c. Besides this work he had begun another, in which he proposed these two things; first, to refute Lansbergius's Hypotheses, and to shew how inconsistent they were with each other and the Heavens; and secondly to draw up a new system of Astronomy agreeable to the Heavens from his own observations and those of others, retaining for the most part the Keplerian Hypotheses, but changing the numbers, as the observations required. He seems to have finished the first part, as far as was necessary, except reducing his papers into order. But the second part is wanting; though it appears from his letters to have been almost finished; for he had proceeded so far in the correction of all the Tables, as to begin Ephemerides for several years to come. His papers came into the hands of Dr. John Worthington, Master of Jesus College in Cambridge, who was contemporary with Mr. Horrox at Emanuel College, and found them, together with his Venus in Sole visa, among Mr. Crabtree's papers. Dr. Wallis published them with some other pieces at London 1673 in 4to under the following title: Jeremiae Horroccii Liverpooliensis Angli, ex Palatinatu Lancastriae, Opera Posthuma; viz. Astronomia Kepleriana defensa & promota. Excerpta ex Epistolis ad Crabtraeum suum. Observationum Caelestium Catalogus. Lunae Theoria nova. Accedunt Gulielmi Crabtraei, Manchesteriensis, Observationes Caelestes. In calce adjuvantur Johannis Flamstedii, Derbiiensis, de Temporis Aequatione

HORSTIUS (JAMES) Professor of Physic in the University of Helmstadt, was born at Torgaw May the 1st 1537 (a). He took his degree of Master of Arts in the University of Frankfort on the Oder, in the year 1556 (b), and of Doctor of Physic in the year 1562 (c). They offered him in several places the office of public Physician, and he exercised it successively at Sagan and at Suidnitz in Silesia, and at Iglaw in Moravia, till the year 1580, when he was made Physician in ordinary to the Archduke of Austria (d). He continued in that post during four years, after which he was promoted to the Chair of Physic Professor in the University of Helmstadt. The oration he delivered at his installation is very good, it is intitled, De remoris discentium Medicinam & earum remediis (e). i. e. "Of the Difficulties which attend the study of Physic, and of the means to remove them." He acquitted himself worthily of his functions, and published some books [A], which kept up the reputation he had already gained. I have not been able to discover in what year he died; I only know that he was still living in the year 1595, and that he was then Decanus (or the eldest Professor) of the Faculty of Physic at Helmstadt, and Vice-Rector-Magnificus of the University. This I learn from some verses that were written on his Anagram, and which are to be found at the end of a book intitled, Jacobi Horstii Epistolæ Philosophicæ & Medicinæ; i. e. "James Horstius's Philosophical and Physical Letters." It was printed at Leipzig in 8vo in the year 1596. We ought, in his commendation, to take notice of a particular, which will appear very surprizing, though perhaps unjustly; it is, that he joined devotion with the knowledge and practice of Physic. He carefully prayed God to bless his prescriptions, and he published a form of prayers upon this subject [B]. He married his first wife in the year 1562, and lost her in the year 1585 (f), having got ten children by her (g). He married again in the year 1587 (h). He was brother to GREGORY HORSTIUS, who died May the 10th 1592, and who had been seven times Burgomaster of the City of Torgaw,

(a) Jacob. Horstii, Epist. Philosophicæ & Medicinæ. pag. 41.
(b) Ibid. pag. 48.
(c) Ibid. pag. 77.
(d) Ibid. pag. 199.

(e) You will find it in pag. 530, &c. of the book I have quoted.

(f) Ibid. pag. 77.
(g) Ibid. pag. 330.
(h) Ibid. pag. 363.

sione Diatriba, Numeri ad Lunæ Theoriam Horroccianam. A great many of our author's papers were carried to Ireland by his brother Jonas Horrox, who had prosecuted the same studies, and died there, by which means they are supposed to be lost; and others of his writings were burnt by the soldiers during the civil wars. Others likewise came into the hands of Mr. Jeremiah Shakerly, who by the assistance of them formed his British Tables, published at London in 1653; and these papers, after Mr. Shakerley's voyage to the East Indies, where he died, remained for some time in the possession of Mr. Nathaniel Brooks, a Bookseller at London, but were destroyed in the great fire at London in September 1666.

Let us observe that he suffered himself to be grossly imposed upon with regard to that pretended golden tooth. It was only an imposture, and if you have a mind to know how the cheat was found out, you may consult Van Dale in the last chapter of his first book De Oraculis (12). He observes, that our James Horstius took this golden tooth for a great prodigy, which ought to be a comfort to those Christians, who were oppressed by the Turks; that is to say, that it was a good omen of the downfall of the Ottoman Empire. I have seen a letter which this Physician wrote to David Chytræus February the 7th 1595, in which he speaks of the presages of meteors. He asserts that the comet which was seen in the year 1556, and which appeared at Constantinople, when it was no longer visible in Germany, might very well produce its dangerous effects in the year 1596, and that the new star in the constellation of Cassiopea would not then be idle (13), and that the golden tooth would also be sure to act its part. Dens aureus, dens pueri &c. (14). He does not conclude without censuring the security of mankind, nor without earnest wishes.

(12) Pag. 423. edit. 1700.
(13) Stella prope Cassiopeam nec tunc scribitur. Jac. Horstius, Epist. Philosophicæ & Medicinæ. pag. 521.

[A] He published some books.] The first, if I am not mistaken, was a commentary In Librum Hippocratis de corde. i. e. "On Hippocrates's Book upon the Heart," which was printed in the year 1563 (1). In the year 1576 he published a treatise Qualem virum Pharmacopolam esse conveniat. i. e. "Of the Qualities which make up the Character of a good Apothecary (2)." He had already published in the German tongue a treatise of the Qualities of a good Physician; and in the year 1580 he published a book upon the same subject in Latin, and dedicated it to the Bishop of Olmutz (4). He published a German translation of Lemnius's book De occultis Naturæ miraculis, i. e. "Of the hidden miracles of Nature," in the year 1579, and added a great many observations to it (5). In 1580 was printed his book De morbo epidemico febrili Catharrali per totam Europam grassante (6). i. e. "Of the epidemical Catharrick fever, which raged through all Europe." And in the year 1583 he printed a treatise of the Plague in the German tongue, and in 1587 a book De Vite vinifera (8), i. e. "Of the Wine-bearing Vine," and in 1593 a book De Noctambulis, i. e. "Of Persons who walk in their Sleep (9)." In 1595 was published his dissertation upon the golden tooth of a child in Silesia (10). You will find in Lindenius renovatus (11), that his Disputationes Catholicæ de rebus secundum & præter naturam, i. e. "Catholic Disputations of things according to and against nature," were printed at Wittemberg, in the year 1630, with Gregory Horstius's Compendium medicarum Institutionum, i. e. "An Abridgment of Physic Institutions," and that the abridgment of his Herbarium, sive de selectis plantis & radicibus Libri duo; i. e. "Two Books concerning choice Plants and Roots," made by the same Gregory, was printed at Marpurgh in the year 1630.

[B] He prayed God to bless his prescriptions, and he published a form of prayers upon this subject.] Thus it was that he signalized himself at his first entering upon his post of Professor of Physic in the University of Helmstadt. This book was the present the University received from him. Helmstadium ubi venisset, Librum dicitum, &c. (15). It must be observed in honour to the Physicians, that several of them gave him thanks for publishing those prayers, and confessed that their art stood very much in need of God's assistance (16). See what a Physician of the city of Ratibon wrote to him. Mittis ad me libellum medicorum, &c. (17). Amongst the letters that were written to him upon this subject, there is one in which he is told, that very few Physicians in Bohemia followed the advice he gave, to call upon the name of God, but that a great many old women made use of charms and enchantments. Cum paucis optime Horsti, habes, &c. (18). Matthew Drefserus, Professor of Eloquence at Leipzig, did very much commend him for his piety and prayers, and told him, that he had known a Physician, who never undertook any cure, nor prescribed any thing without saying the Lord's prayer. De precum medicarum formulis &c. (19).

(14) Idem, ibid.
(15) Ibid. pag. 282.
(16) Vide Jac. Horstii, Epist. Philosophicæ & Medicinæ. pag. 283, & seq.
(17) Vide eund. ibid. pag. 284.
(18) Ibid. pag. 290.
(19) Ibid. pag. 293.

Compare this work with the remark [C] of the article KIRSTENIUS, and read (20) the pious letter which James Horstius wrote to a Minister at Berlin. He seems to be determined to compose a treatise of Christian Physic (21). I must add, that the bill or advertisement.

(20) Ibid. pag. 294 & seq.
(21) Binis literis tuis, quibus me &c.

(1) Epist. Philosophicæ & Medicinæ. Jacobi Horstii, pag. 79.
(2) Ibid. P. 153.
(3) In the year 1570, ibid. pag. 127.
(4) It is amongst his Philosophical and Physical Letters, pag. 209, & seq.
(5) Ibid. pag. 189.
(6) Ibid. pag. 203.
(7) Ibid. pag. 257.
(8) Ibid. pag. 354.
(9) Ibid. pag. 435.
(10) Ibid. pag. 323.
(11) In pag. 485, of the edition published in the year 1686.

(i) It is prefixed to the book intitled, Jacobi Horstii Epistole Pbilosophicæ & Medicinæ. Torgaw, and was a man of great merit, as we learn from his Elogy, written by Reineccius (i). The book which I have quoted, contains a particular, which deserves, I think, to be related [C].

(22) Ibid. pag. 493, & seq. vertisement, in which he exhorted the students duly to celebrate St. Michael's Day in the Angel's honour (22), is a very devout piece.

To conclude, I do not believe there ever was a Book of Devotion but what sold better than these Prayers, which Horstius wrote for the Physician's use.

(23) Ibid. pag. 11.

[C] His letters contain a particular which deserves to be related.] Jerom Nymnam, a Minister, and Horstius's brother-in-law (13), wrote him a letter dated from Torgaw March the 10th 1556, in which he desired him (24) to let him know whether a certain story, which Sabinus had lately told at Wittemberg, were true or not. The story was, that a certain Gentleman of the Marquisate of Brandenburg, near Standel, having repulsed a poor woman who desired him, for God's sake, to abate something of the price of the corn she intended to buy of him, the piece of money she gave him for it was changed into a snake, by an unknown person, whom that Gentleman met with in his way, and that the snake had twisted itself round the Gentleman's neck, and would not leave it. Horstius, who was then at Francfort upon the Oder, answered (25) his brother-in-law, that he knew nothing of this story, and that if he heard any thing of it, he would write it to him. We have here an instance of the uncertainty of common reports. Prodigies often make much more noise in distant countries, than in that where it is pretended they happened. This is a mark of falsity; for true facts are known with more certainty in the places where they happen, than any where else. They, who design to tell false stories, must take care not to tell them too near the place where they suppose the stories happened; they do not always take such a precaution, and yet they find credit, but then they run a greater risk of being found out.

(25) Ibid. pag. 54.

(a) He was the son of George Horstius, one of the Magistrates of the City of Torgaw.

HORSTIUS (GREGORY) nephew (a) of the preceding, gained such a reputation in the practice of Physic, that he was usually called the Æsculapius of Germany (b). He was born at Torgaw in the year 1571, and was admitted Master of Arts at Wittemberg in the year 1601 (c), and commenced Doctor of Physic at Basil in the year 1606.

(c) Lindenius renovat. pag. 359.

(b) Konig. Biblioth. pag. 413.

He was that same year made Professor of Physic in the University of Wittemberg; he left that City at a year's end, and went to Soltwedel in the Electorate of Brandenburg, to be the City-Physician there. He did not continue long in that City, for he accepted the Physic-Professor's Chair, which the Landgrave of Hesse offered him in the University of Giessen, in the year 1608, and the next year he was made first Physician to that Prince. Being tired at last with leading a single life (d) he married in the year 1615. The great reputation he had gained made the Magistrates of Ulm offer him the post of first Physician to that City, which he accepted, and he performed the functions of it with great applause from the year 1622 till the year 1636, in which he died. He left four sons [A] and two daughters by his first wife. He lost her in November 1634; and finding too much trouble in the care of a family, he married again in June 1635. He met with very great comfort in this second match [B]; but the gout, which he had

(d) Solitaria vita per se sibi privato quoque invigilare curatio fuit. i. e.

"Being tired with leading a single life, he imagined he might also take care of his own particular affairs."

Joh. Daniel Dietericus, in Oratione funebri Gr. Horstii, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. pag. 67, & seq.

(1) Paulus Freher. in Teatro, pag. 1366.

[A] He left four sons by his first wife] Three of them were Physicians, and the other an Apothecary (1). JOHN DANIEL HORSTIUS, the eldest of them all, was born at Giessen, and was Professor of Physic in the University of Marburg, and afterwards in that of his native place, and Physician to the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstad, and lastly to the city of Francfort. He was admitted under the name of Pbænix, a Fellow of the Society of Inquirers into Nature. He published a great many books, and died January the 27th, 1685, at the age of threescore and eight years (2). Here follow the titles of some of his works. Physica Hippocratea, Takenii, Helmontii, Cartesii, Espagnet, Boylei, aliorumque recentiorum Commentis illustrata. i. e. "The Natural Philology of Hippocrates, illustrated with a Commentary from Takenius, Van Helmont, Des Cartes, Espagnetus, Boyle, and other moderns." At Francfort 1682, 8°. Decas Observationum & Epistolarum Anatomicarum, quibus singularia scitu digna, lacteorum nempe thoracicarum, & vasorum lymphaticorum natura, embryonisque per os nutritio, atque alia rariora exponuntur. i. e. "A Decad (or ten books) of Anatomical Observations and Letters, in which some particulars worthy to be known are explained; namely, the nature of Lacteal veins in the Thorax, and of the lymphatic vessels; and the manner how the fetus takes its nourishment by its mouth in the womb, with other more curious particulars." At Francfort 1636, in 4to. Pharmacopœa Galeno-Chemica Catholica. i. e. "An Universal Pharmacopœy or Dispensary, Galeno-Chemical." At Francfort 1651, in folio. He gave a new edition with corrections and additions, of Pauli Zachie Questiones Medico-Legales. i. e. "Paul Zachias's medical questions with regard to the Law." At Francfort 1666, in folio; and of Lazarus Riverii Opera Medica Universa; i. e. "All Lazarus Riverius's Physical Works;" at Francfort, 1674, in folio (3). GREGORY HORSTIUS, the youngest of his brothers, was born at Ulm, September the 20th 1626. He commenced Doctor of Physic at

(2) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1615.

(3) Taken from Lindenius renovatus, pag. 564, 565.

Padua, Fortunius Licetus presiding at his Disputation, May the 11th, 1650. He was admitted a Fellow of the College of Physicians at Ulm, and declared public Professor of Physic in the year 1653. He died May the 31st, 1661, and left some children behind him (4). He is the author of a treatise De Mania, i. e. "Of Madness," and he promised Historiam Zibethi (5). i. e. "The History of Civet."

(4) Paulus Freherus in Teatro, pag. 1389.

(5) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1661.

[B] Finding too much trouble in the care of a family, he married again. . . He met with very great comfort in this second match.] He had lived less comfortably with his first wife, if we may credit the author of his funeral oration. Huic optima consorti suæ, dum fata Deusque sinebant, ex veteri formula felicissimè convixit, & optimè cohabitavit. Quid autem hic Archibater noster gloriosus, concessit ne illorum in numerum, qui blanda veners detenti, omnem Musis remittunt nuntium? Nullatenus, sed potius domesticis, privatisque omnibus scitè adornatis, famæ suæ gloriam & calamo, & ore, & praxi expandere, & diffundere satagit (6). We see in the latter part of this passage, that Horstius did not follow the example of a great many other men, who indulge themselves so much in the pleasures of the nuptial bed, that they bid the Muses farewell for ever. Horstius took care to spread his reputation more and more, by his writings, by his discourses, and by his practice. As to his happiness with his second wife, here follows what the same author tells us of it. Is . . . posteaquam secunda, quæ vocant, expleisset vota, . . . jamque conjugalem lineam ex animi sententia duceret, amantissimè ab amantissima marito habitus, domique ac foris felix, optata iuvare gauderet: ecce! malo arbitrio, quod multo antè non semel fortiter sustinendo repulerat, irruadit (7). (7) Idem, ibid. i. e. "When he had married his second wife, living most lovingly with the most loving spouse, being happy both at home and abroad, and having a considerable portion with her, he fell sick of the gout, which he had long before more than once suffered with patience, and courageously overcome." What I shall now quote relates both to his first and more than once vigorously resisted, coming again upon him, and being attended with several dangerous symptoms, carried him to the grave August the 9th 1636. He was eminently possessed of three chief qualities of a good Physician; namely, honesty, learning, and successfulness (e) [C], as it is related at length in his funeral Oration. He published

(6) Joh. Daniel Dietericus, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. folio (e)

(7) Idem, ibid. pag. 67, 68.

(e) Taken from his Funeral Oration, delivered by Joh. Daniel Diettericus, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. pag. 67. & seq.

(8) Idem, Ibid. pag. 5. before the end. I quote it thus, because but few pages of this funeral Oration are numbered.

to his second marriage (8). Quando autem factum ut Anno 1634: suavisimam hanc ipsius tori sociam maligna febris deestuarer, in hoc infelix fuit, quod se-vam illam declinare nesciens, mense Novembri miseram viduitatem colere fuerit coactus: qua in cum sex Liberos Pater & occupatissimo functionis muneri & molestissima rei familiaris curæ vix non succumberet, divina adlucente gratia, ad vota secunda accedens, Præclarissimi Medici Fingerlini p. m. relictae viduæ (9), matrimoniale addixit fidem, hoc ipso iterum titulo felicitatis privatae redonatus, quod hæc castissimis illius amoribus mira morum amabilitate respondebat: ita ut charitate Conjugem, sedulitate Ministram præstaret. i. e. "It happened in the year 1634 that the most dear partner of his bed was taken ill of a malignant fever, which he not being able to cure, he became a widower in November that same year; and being a father of six children, and having a great deal of business, he almost sunk under the care of his domestic affairs. So that he determined to marry again, and took for his second wife the widow of a most eminent Physician, named Fingerlinus; because he found that her most agreeable behaviour answered the modest love he had for her: she was a tender spouse by her affection for him, and a servant by her care and diligence."

(9) The author had observed that Horstius had married a maiden to his first wife, who was Hedwig Stammiæ. Interca, says he, pag. 69. & maritalem conditionem exsolatus, HEDWIGEM STAMMIAM Virginem leetissimam consarrati-one sibi sacrosanc-ta cupulat.

[C] He was eminently possessed of the three chief qualities of a good Physician; namely, honesty, learning, and successfulness. I omit what relates to the two first of these qualities, and I shall only observe, that with regard to the third, his Panegyrist asserts, that the good success of our Horstius's prescriptions was not an effect of chance, but of the attention with which he examined the nature of the distempers, &c. On this occasion that author casts a very severe reflection upon those Quacks, who boast that they have cured thousands and thousands, and who by their impudent bragging extort a great deal of money from unwary persons. He applies to them what a certain Poet replied to a man who was at once a Chirurgion and a Physician. I do not wonder at it, said the Poet, for you kill a great many persons both with your own hand, and with poison. Ea est Empiricorum, Thalmudicorum, & Bullatorum Medicorum indoles & natura, ut mucosam suam praxin pro admiranda felicitate venditantes, sapissime animos Magnatum & Divitum (utpote hoc censu facile se defraudari patientium) à verò Medicorum vultu & cultu abalienent, egregiam spem & verè prodigiöse suæ curæ (quippe illa ipsa excidium denunciant) expectationem concitando: qua supersticiosa, splendidisque straphis suffulta infelicissima felicitate Microcosmum argento simul, & sanguine emungere sceleratissime norunt: quibus Plagiariis interim Poëtæ apprimè adaptari convenit,

Es Medicus, simul Chirurgus,
Cur? mittis stygiam viros ad Orcum,
Et manu simul, & simul veneno:

Nequaquam autem hujusmodi felicitatis excessum in Defuncto nostro, velut absoluto Practici Exemplo, quæremus: quin potius fortunam illius in Praxi integram & illibatam, cumulatissimo rationis & experientie instructu partem demirabimur, &c. (10).

I shall take this opportunity to observe, that there are some persons who believe, that the successfulness of a Physician is something, which does not depend from his learning and knowledge. This is Joubert's opinion. "If a person recovers, says he (11), the Physician is judged to be a very able man, though his prescriptions were nothing to the purpose: on the contrary, the Physician is thought to be an ignorant man, if the patient dies, or lingers a great while under a distemper, which the vulgar imagines could be easily cured. Moderate persons will not think that Physician the more or the less learned for it; if they know that he has the reputation of learning amongst the men of letters, but they will say, that he has no success with his patients, and consequently, that he is not a good Physician; for they always judge from the event. It is certain that there is good and bad luck in every thing, or, as the Italians express it la buona è la mala sorte; and it is a Physician's happiness never to be called to a Patient that is to die of his distemper; for he gets neither fame nor friends by prescribing for such patients; and yet he is not to be blamed; and if he has done his duty, he ought to be as much esteemed, as if the patient had recovered. . . It is indeed a great advantage to be successful in one's undertakings, but such a happiness does not depend on learning and ability; it is a particular favour from God, to be called only to such patients as are to recover, and with regard to whom God blesses the remedies and renders them successful; as also not to be called by them, who are to die, and with whom nothing succeeds well. It is therefore a very wrong way to judge of Physicians by their success, which is owing to a particular luck and to God's blessing, rather than to a man's learning (12)." A Flemish Physician, who has translated Joubert's first book of popular errors into Latin, and added a commentary to it, was not of that opinion, and asserted, that the Physicians happiness consists only in their learning and skill, and that their unhappiness is owing only to their ignorance. Huic equidem Jouberti sententiæ non subscribam; quin potius ad Cratonis &c. [(13)]. He has also quoted a passage from Paracelsus, in which the same thing is asserted. I believe, that he goes a little too far, and that there are Physicians, who sometimes cure or kill their patients, though they cannot be justly commended or blamed for it. How learned and experienced soever they may be, they do not always know the true cause of a distemper, and they prescribe according to the rules of their art, a remedy, which becomes pernicious, because there is something in the patient's constitution, which it is not in their power to discover. Such a particular disposition of the body, the patient's fancy affected after a certain manner, some secret passions, &c. are capable to produce some effects, which the most learned and most experienced Physicians would never expect. The efficacy of those unknown causes may be such, that a remedy, prescribed rashly, ignorantly, foolishly, will cure the distemper, and that a remedy prescribed according to all the rules of art, will kill the patient. There is therefore good and bad luck here, which does not depend upon the learning or ignorance of the Physician; and a man cannot be charged with ignorance, for not knowing the hidden passions of the heart, or the strange qualities of a certain constitution, and for not foreseeing how they will prevent the effects of the remedies he prescribed. A Physician is reckoned to commit blunders through ignorance, only when he does not know those things, which study and practice ought to have acquainted him with. The question is, whether there be some Physicians, who, through a prerogative peculiar to themselves, do by chance and yet often hit upon the very remedy that will cure, and whether the contrary happens to others by an ill-luck peculiar to them? Or else, the question is this; are there Physicians who are called just when the patient is predestinated to be cured? And are there others, who are called just when the patient is predestinated to die? Joubert seems to have been of that opinion, and to have called this a particular favour or blessing from heaven, or the want of a divine favour. Crato ridicules such an opinion. This controversy is much of the same nature with that which I have mentioned in another place (14); whether there be an happiness and a misfortune annexed to certain persons, or whether the one be always the effect of a man's prudence, and the other of his imprudence? The ancients were not of this last opinion; for when they reckoned up the qualities of a good General, they gave fortune a place by itself, and distinguished it from the knowledge in the art of war. Ego sic existimo, says Tully, in summo Imperatore quatuor has res inesse oportere, scientiam rei Militaris, virtutem, auctoritatem, felicitatem (15). i. e. "I am of opinion that these four things are requisite in a General; the knowledge of the military art, courage, authority, and happiness." He shews afterwards,

(12) Ibid. pag. 35.
(13) Joannes Bourgeois, in Scholii, ad cap. 7. Jouberti, de Erroribus Vulgi, pag. 105, 106.
(14) In the remark [K] of the article TIMOLEON.

(10) Dieterici, Orat. fun. Gr. Horstii, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. in the page after the leaf marked (e) 5.

(11) Joubert, Errours Populaires, liv. 1. chap. 7. pag. m. 33. 34.

(15) Cicero pro Legge Manilia, cap. 10. pag. m. 35. tom. 3.

(f) See the remark [E].

lished a great many books [D], which have been very much esteemed. Two of his sons have also published some books (f).

terwards, that these four qualities met most eminently in Pompey. Reliquum est ut de felicitate quam præstare DE SE IPSO nemo potest, meminisse, & commemorare de altero possumus: sicut æquum est homini de potestate deorum, timide & pauca dicamus. Ego enim sic existimo: Maximo, Marcello, Scipioni, Mario, & ceteris magnis imperatoribus, NON SOLUM propter virtutem, sed etiam propter fortunam, sæpius imperia mandata atque exercitus esse commissos. Fuit enim profecto quibusdam summis viris quedam ad amplitudinem, & gloriam, & ad res

(16) Cicero, pro lege Manilia, cap. 16. pag. 53. tom. 3.

magnas bene gerendas divinitus adjuncta fortuna (16). i. e. "We come now to speak of the other's (Pompey's) happiness, which a man can never have OF HIMSELF; but it is proper we should speak modestly and sparingly of the power of the Gods. I am of opinion, that Fabius Maximus, Marcellus, Scipio, Marius, and others, were so often placed at the head of our armies, not only because of their courage, but also on account of their happiness. For some great men were certainly assisted by fortune, when they gained so much glory and reputation, and performed such noble actions."

(17) Dieterici, Oratio Fun. Gr. Hortii, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. folio (e) 2.

[D] He published a great many books.] I believe that he begun with his Institutiones Logicæ, which he published, when he read private lectures on Philosophy at Wittemberg, about the year 1601 (17). He published in the same city in the year 1607 his treatise De Natura Humana (18). His Dissertatio de natura Amoris, additis Resolutionibus de cura Furoris amoris, de Philtris, atque de pulsu Amantium; i. e. "A Dissertation of the nature of Love, on Philtris, and on the "Lover's pulse:" this book, I say, was printed at Gießen in 4to, in the year 1611. He published in the same city his work De tuenda Sanitate Studioforum & Literatorum; i. e. "Of preserving the health of Students and men of Letters;" in 4to. and in 1619, the treatise De causis similitudinis & dissimilitudinis in sexu, respectu parentum &c. cui annexa est Resolutio Quæstionis de diverso partus tempore, imprimique quid de septimestri & octimestri partu sentiendum; i. e. "Of the causes why children are not like their parents &c. to which is added a solution of the question concerning the time of the women's delivery, and what we ought to think of their being delivered at the seventh, or eighth month;" in 4to. I refer the reader to Lindemius renovatus (19), where he shall meet with a particular account of the titles and editions of all this Physician's writings. I shall only observe, that there was a new edition of it published after his death, in one volume in folio, at Nuremberg in the year 1660, at Gauda (Tergou) in three volumes in 4to, in the year 1661.

(18) Idem, ibid. folio (e) 3.

(19) Pag. 359, etc.

HORTENSIA, sister to Hortensius the Orator. Thus a modern author names her (a): but, as he himself owns in another place (b), Valeria is the name which Plutarch gives to Hortensius's sister. See therefore VALERIA, for there is no reason why we should ascribe to Hortensius, two sisters of different names.

(a) Glandorp, pag. 465.

(b) Idem, pag. 865.

HORTENSIA daughter of Hortensius the Orator, shewed her self worthy of such a father by the eloquence she displayed, when she pleaded the cause of the Roman Ladies before the Triumviri, who had sentenced fourteen hundred of them to declare the estates they possessed; intending afterwards to tax them at pleasure, towards defraying the expenses of the war. The Triumviri were Mark Anthony, Octavius and Lepidus. These had declared at first, that all such women as did not give in a faithful and exact inventory of their estates should be fined; and that all persons impeaching others, who made such concealments, should be rewarded for their discoveries. The Ladies had recourse to the intercession of such among them as might have some interest with the Triumviri, and met with a gracious reception from Octavius's sister, and Mark Anthony's mother; but Fulvia, wife to the latter, shut her door against them, whereupon they resolved to address the Triumviri. Hortensia spoke in the name of all the rest, and made a very fine speech, which Quintilian has mentioned with applause (a). The Triumviri were so brutal as to be displeased with the Ladies, for the rigour they shewed in addressing them, and thereupon ordered their officers to turn them out of Court [A]. Upon this order the whole assembly murmured, which prevented the officers from putting it in execution, whereupon the Triumviri suspended the affair till the next day. The result was, that only four hundred women should be obliged to discover all their possessions (b). By this we are enabled to form a much more just idea of that incident than from Moreri's account, even from Valerius Maximus, whose words are quoted below [B].

(a) Quinti Hortensii filie oratio apud Triumviros habita legitur non tantum in sexus bonorem. Quintil. Instit. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(b) Ex Appiano, lib. 4. Bell. Civil.

HORTENSIUS

[A] The Triumviri . . . ordered their officers to turn them out of Court.] Instead of this, Jacobus Philippus Bergamensis, whom Prosp. Mandosius (1) copies, relates, that Hortensia's eloquence was so much admired by the auditors, that they imagined it was her father who spoke, and that it forced the Triumviri, not only to grant whatever they desired, but to bestow the highest applauses on them. He has committed two other errors, first in asserting that Hortensia wrote many things; and secondly, in saying that the Roman Ladies were taxed, because the necessity of the times required it; whereas it was owing rather to the tyrannical avarice of the Triumviri. How many errors do authors fall into, from their desire of applauding those on whom they write!

(1) In Biblioth. Roman. Cent. 2. num. 88.

[B] From Moreri's account, or . . . from Valerius Maximus, whose words are quoted hereunder.] He says that the Senate had laid a severe tax on the Roman women, . . . and that Hortensia alone undertook the cause of all the women. I. It was the Triumviri, and not the Senate, who laid this heavy tax, in case a tax was laid. II. It was not to affect all the women of Rome, but only the most wealthy; it was a tax on persons who were in flourishing circumstances. III. Hortensia was indeed the only woman who spoke, but she was not the only one who acted for the women, or undertook their cause; for all who were concerned in that affair, went in a body to solicit the mothers, sisters, and wives of the Triumviri; after which they went to the Court where they were assembled, on which occasion, as in deputations of every kind, one spoke in the name of all the rest. I take no notice of Moreri's omissions, nor of the false citation from Appian of Alexandria, which was taken into the Dutch edition, with a small alteration that may impose upon the reader. That error is owing to the Printers. Moreri had certainly writ, li. 4. belli civil. instead of which the Printers of Lyons put li. 4. b. li. civil.; and those of Holland li. 4. b. li. civil. So small a mistake has been sufficient, on many occasions, to make people imagine, that an author had wrote several books which he had never so much as dreamt of. Who would not believe, seeing Ovid cited in elog. at the close of the article Hortensius the Orator, both in the Dutch edition and the preceding one, but that Ovid had wrote a Poem entitled Elogia? Every reader does not guess that instead of in elog. it should be in elog. a citation a little too general, with submission to Vol-

HORTENSIUS, the name of a Plebeian family in Rome, taken, in all probability, from their devoting themselves to gardening, as that of Fabius, Lentulus, &c. sprung from a like original. Antonius Augustinus had no reason to rank this family among the Patricians [A], since we find, in the Fasti, one LUCIUS HORTENSIUS, Tribune of the People, the year of Rome 331. He charged Sempronius Atratinus, Consul the preceding year, with having attacked the Volsci rashly; but his four colleagues, who were present at the battle in question, desired Hortensius so very earnestly to drop the impeachment, that after having done all that was possible, on his side, to oblige them to allow him to proceed in it; he at last complied with their desires, when he found they were firmly determined to lay aside the ensigns of their dignity, all the time the trial should last. He would not let the people see their Tribunes in that condition, nor quite ruin a Consul, who at least had gained the love of his soldiers. Non videbit plebs Romana sordidatos Tribunos suos. C. Sempronium nihil moror quando hoc est in imperio consecutus ut iam carus esset militibus (a). We find, above an hundred years after, one QUINTUS HORTENSIUS who was Dictator [B]. He brought back the people who had retired to the Janiculum; and enacted a Law, viz. that thenceforward all the Romans should be obliged to obey the ordinances of the people [C]. He died in his office (b), which no one had done before (c). Moreri has committed strange mistakes with regard to this Dictator [D]. He

(a) Liv. lib. 4. cap. 42. See also Valer. Maxim. lib. 6. cap. 5.

(b) Livius, in Epit. lib. 11.

(c) August. de Civ. Dei, lib. 3. cap. 17.

