hörg-brjótr, m. a breaker of borgs, of a missionary king, Hallfred. HÖRGR, m., never f., for the form hörg (Landn. 111) is merely an error; [A. S. bearg; O. H. G. baruc]:—a beathen place of worship. Distinction is to be made between hof (temple) and horg; the hof was a house of timber, whereas the horg was an altar of stone (the hatimbraor in Vpm. is not literal) erected on high places, or a sacrificial cairn (like haugr), built in open air, and without images, for the horg itself was to be stained with the blood of the sacrifice; hence such phrases as, to 'break' the horgs, but 'burn' the temples. The horg worship reminds one of the worship in high places of the Bible. The notion of a 'high place' still remains in the popular Icel. phrase, það eru ekki uppi nema hæstu hörgar, only the bighest borgs jut out, when all lies under a deep snow. In provincial Norse a dome-shaped mountain is called borg (Ivar The worship on horgs seems to be older than that in temples, but was in after times retained along with temple worship, and then, it seems, specially reserved for the worship of the goddesses or female guardians (disir), Hervar. S. ch. I, Hdl. l. c., Edda l. c., cp. also Hörga-brúðr, f. the bride of the borgs, see Hölgi. Many of the old cairns and hows are no doubt horgs or high places of worship of the heathen age. A third way of worshipping is recorded, viz. a portable booth or tabernacle in which the god was carried through the land, mentioned in Tacit. ΙÍΙ

I is the ninth letter; in the old Runic alphabet it was called iss or ice (Skálda 176), and represented by (is köllum brú breiða of the Runic poem), a form borrowed from the Greek or Latin: but 'stunginn iss' () was in later Runes used to represent e.

A. PRONUNCIATION, SPELLING.—I is either a vowel (i), or consonant (j), called jod: these are here treated separately: i is sounded either short (i) or long (i), the short (i) like Engl. bill, prolonged with a breath; but it is almost certain that in olden times it was sounded short, as in Engl. wit. 2. the long (i) is sounded as 3. the j is sounded as Engl. y before a Engl. e or ee in evil, feet. vowel, jata, jaro, jól, as yata, yard, yole. The oldest writers bear witness to the use of i as a consonant; thus Thorodd says, -i ba er hann verör fyrir samhljóðanda settr, Skálda 164; and the second grammarian,-en ef hljóðstafr (vowel) er næstr eptir hann, þá skiptisk hann í málstaf (consonant), svo sem já, jörð eða jór, 170; and Olave Hvítaskáld, -i ok u hafa því fleiri greinir, at þeir eru stundum samhljóðendr, sem í bessum ordum, iarl and uitr, 176; but in syllables beginning with j (ja, jo, ju) in old alliterative poetry it always stands for the vowel, from the earliest poems down to the 15th century, e.g. jörð or ægiiðja-græna, Vsp. 58; viltú nokkut jötuninn eiga | ýtum görir hann kosti seiga, prymlur 2. 2; Ölmóðr haíði annan dag járnið þetta at sýna, Skíða R. 64, which, as now pronounced, would sound harsh, since in modern poetry syllables beginning with j cannot be used alliteratively with any other letter, cp. Pass. 37. 1, 10, 40. 8, 46. 3, 11, etc.; only in such words as eg (jeg), eta (jeta) can i serve both as a vowel and consonant, see Pass. 6. 2; but jeg in 5. 5, 10, (the verse 6 of the same hymn is a poetical licence); so also the name Jesús is now and then used alliteratively with a vowel, 47. 18, 21; the hymns of the Reformation follow the same usage. The pronunciation of j seems Reformation follow the same usage. therefore to have changed: in early times it was probably similar to Engl. e in ear, tear, bear; an additional proof of this is, that the oldest spelling was, as in Anglo-Saxon, ea, eo . . .; and Thorodd himself probably wrote ea, e.g. eafn, earn, earl, for jafn, jarn, jarl, see his words: in old poets ea sometimes makes two syllables, e.g. in the verse cited in Skálda 164 (of A.D. 1018); as also in the name Njáll (Niel), which is dissyllabic in the verses, Nj. ch. 136, 146. At a still earlier time was probably sounded purely as a vowel. II. in ancient MSS. i serves for both i and j; in MSS., esp. of the 15th century, j is used ornamentally for initial i, e.g. jnn = inn, as also in the double ij = i, e. g. tijd = tio, mijtt = mitt, the j was introduced into print only in the last year of the eighteenth century. 2. an i is often inserted in MSS... esp. after g, k, so as to mark the aspirate sound, e.g. gieta = geta, gizeta = gæta, kiær = kær, etc.: in inflexions it is also more correct to write eyjar, bæjar, than eyar, bæar:—ji is not written, but pronounced, e.g. vili (= vilji), but vilja.

B. Changes.—The i and e are exchanged in many root syllables, but i is usually the older, e the later if not the modern form, as, if and ef, brinna and brenna, tvinnr and tvennr, brimr and bremr, midil and meðal, snimma and snemma, gingu and gengu, fingu and fengu, tigr and tegr: the article varies between enn and inn:-the inflex. -endi and -indi:-Norse MSS. spell mek, bek, sek, = mik, bik, sik (e. g. Thom. Cd. Holm.); -ligr and -legr, gagnligt and gagnlegt: for the inflexive e and i see introduction to letter E (signif. B), p. 114:—i for y in old MSS. in firir, ifir, mindi, skildi, minni (mouth), minnast (to kiss, mouth):—i and u are interchanged in inflexion, as, morginn and morgunn, vandill and vöndull; but esp. in the adjective inflexions -igr and -ugr, blodigt and blóðugr, auðigr and auðugr. II. the j in most instances originates from an e, either through absorption or contraction, as in jor (q.v.), or through the dissolution or breaking of e, as in jord (q. v.); again, the i as initial is in most instances caused by absorption; as of n in i (in) and compds; of v or b in illr (evil) and compds; of d in some compds in i-from io :- in Gothic there is only a single word (eisarn, i. e. isarn = iron) with a III. by comparison with other Teutonic languages long i initial. it is seen that a radical initial i or j has in the Scandinavian been dropped in a few words, while it has been kept in Gothic, Saxon, and German, thus Icel. ar, Goth. jer, Engl. year, Germ. jabr; Icel. ungr, Goth. juggs, Engl. young; Icel. ok, Goth. juk, Engl. yoke, Germ. joch, Lat. jugum; Icel. ami, ömurligr, and O. H. G. jamar, Germ. jammer; Icel. upp, Goth. jup, Engl. up; Icel. ér (ye), Goth. jus; Icel. ostr (a cheese), cp. Engl. yeast: in two words, jarteign and jurt, both of them probably foreign, the j stands for w: on the other hand, because of the resolution or breaking of vowels (Gramm, p. xxix, bottom), words which in Engl. and Germ. begin with e are in Icel. often to be found under j, thus Icel. jörð (old Scot. yertb) = Engl. eartb, Germ. erde: there are also a few stray words, -jata (a manger) for eta, jeta for eta, jeg for eg (ek). Icel. i answers to Ulf. ei (risa, Goth. reisjan), to mod. Germ. ei in zeit, Engl. i as in time, Icel. timi; in early German the diphthongs ei and i were, as in Icelandic, distinguished (zît, îsarn, = mod. zeit, eisen).

mod. Dan, in a few words the Icel, short i is represented by an e, thus ∇ Vídal, passin, Icel. vio. lidr, vior, sior, bidja, limr, vinr, sin, = Dan. ved, led, ved, sed, bede, lem, ven, sene, probably owing to the fact that the old Danish pronunciation of i was not the same as the present Icelandic.

ID, f., the gen. idjar, Hkr. ii. 227, points to a root idi: [this root word with derivatives, which in cognate languages is of rare occurrence, seems prop. to mean a perpetual motion, cp. Swed. and poët. Dan. id]:-a doing; ord ok idir, words and deeds, Ni. (in a verse); ymissar idir. Sighvat; levfð ið, id.; tregnar iðir, sorrows, tears, Hom. I; þjóð veit binar idir, thy feats, Edda (in a verse); bví verdr eigi til idjar né verds haldit, it can neither be worked nor sold. Hkr. l. c.

IKORNI, a, m. a squirrel. This word is undoubtedly, as Grimm suggests (s. v. eichhorn), not of Teut. origin, but a popular corruption of the Gr. orki-oupos (=sbade-tail), from which word all mod. European languages have borrowed the name of this animal; A. S. acvern; early Dutch encoren; Dutch eekboren, eikboren, inkboren; O. H. G., mid. H. G., and Germ. eichorne, eichorn; Dan. egern; Swed. ickorn, ekorre: in the Romance languages, old Fr. escuriere; Fr. ecureuil; Ital. schiriuolo; whence Engl. squirrel. The word ikorni occurs in the heathen poem Gm., but the word is outside the metre, spoiling the flow of the verse, and was no doubt added afterwards; therefore, instead of 'Ratatöskr heitir íkorni | er renna skal, read 'Rata-töskr heitir | er renna skal.' Perhaps the ancient Scandin. name of the animal was toskr, akin to Engl. tusk, A.S. tux, from its sharp teeth, and then Rati (=the I. prefixed; climber?) would in the verse be the pr. name, toskr the appellative

 110, freq. in mod. usage; hoppa út á jörkum, to walk on the jarki: in the Færoic dialect jarki is used of the hand = handar-jaoar.
 jarkna-steinn, m. [prob. a for. word derived from the A.S. eorenanstan]:—a gem, it occurs only in the following poems, Vkv. 23, 33, Gkv.
1. 18, 3. 9, which may all have been composed by one man, who borrowed the word from the A.S.
 JABL, m., older form earl, [Hel. erl; A.S. eorl; Engl. earl]: this word had a double sense, one old and common to the Saxons as well as the earliest Scandinavians, one later and specifically Norse, which afterwards became English through the Norse and Danish invasion, and was finally established by the Norman Conquest.
     A. A gentle, noble man, a warrior, and collect. gentlefolk, as opp. to the churl folk or common people (karlar, buendr); thus the old poem Rigsmál distinguishes three classes, earls, churls, and thralls (jarla-ætt, karlaætt, þræla-ætt); so also in A.S. eorl and ceorl are almost proverbially opposed; in the old Saxon poem Heliand, 'erl' is used about a hundred times = a man. Prof. Munch suggested that the name of the Teutonic people Eruli or Heruli simply represents an appellative (warriors), which the Roman writers took to be a proper name. In the Scandin. countries this use of jarl is rare and obsolete, but remains in poët, phrases, in old saws, and in law phrases; oddar görva jarli megin, spears make the earl's might, Mkv.; rudda ek sem jarlar fordum mér til landa, I won me lands like the earls of yore, Glum. (in a verse): jarls yndi, an earl's delight = a man's delight, Hm. 96; jörlum öllum óðal batni, Gh. 21;
hladit ér, earlar, eikiköstinn, 20; ítrar jarla-brúðir, 'earl's-brides,' ladies, Gkv. 1. 3; alsnotrir jarlar, the gentle earls, 2; eggja ek yor, jarlar, Am.
54; jarla einbani, 'earl-slayer' = ἀνδροκτόνος, Em., Hkm.; karl-fólk ok jarla, churl folk and earl folk, Sighvat; eitt mein sækir hvern jarl, every earl (man) bas bis ill luck, Fb. ii. (in a verse): in the law, jarls jörð, an earl's estate, is opp. to konungs jord, a leng's estate, in the phrase, halfan rétt skal hann taka er hann kömr á jarls jörð, en þá allan ok fullan er hann kömr á konungs jörð, Grág. (Kb.) i. 192, for this is undoubtedly the bearing of this disputed passage; jarlmaor is opp. to bukarl, Fms. vii.
(in a verse); so also karlmaor (q. v.) in its oldest sense is opp. to jarl-maor, = cburl-man and earl-man; hiro-jarl = hiromaor, Fms. xi. 302, v.l.;
berg-jarl, poët. a 'crag-earl' = a giant, Edda (in a verse); bak-jarl, a 'back-earl,' an enemy in one's rear; of-jarl (q.v.), an 'over-earl,' an overbearing man.
     B. A chief, as a title, specially Norse and Danish. The Landnáma, which is almost our only source for the political and personal history of Norway before king Harald Fairhair and the settlement of Iceland, records several chiefs of the 8th and 9th centuries who bore an earl's name as a family dignity; İvarr Upplendinga-jarl (Upplönd, a Norse county), Asbjörn jarl Skerja-blesi, Eyvindr jarl, 317; Atli jarl Mjóvi af Gaulum (a Norse county), porkell Naumdæla-jarl (earl in Naumdale, a Norse county), 281; Grjótgarðr jarl í Sölva (a county), 297: and as a family title, the famous Háleygja-jarlar (the earls of the Norse county Hálogaland, whose pedigree from Odin was drawn out in the old poem Háleygja-tal; Hákon jarl Grjótgarðsson, etc.): so also the Mæra-jarlar, the earls of Mæri (a Norse county), the foremost of whom was Rögnvaldr Mæra-jarl, the forefather of the earls of the Orkneys (Orkneyja-jarlar) and the earls of Rouen (Rúðu-jarlar = the dukes of Normandy).
the Danish and Norse invasion the name appears in England, Bjartmár jarl in Ireland, Landn.; Hunda-Steinarr, an earl in England, id.; see also the Saxon Chronicle passim, where the very name indicates a Danish or Norse connexion. It is very likely that many of the earls of the Landnáma were sovereign chiefs, differing from kings only in title, for in old poetry

jartegn or jartein, later form jarteikn or even jarðteikn, but not so in good MSS.; in Thom. JAUR, adv., also spelt júr, Skálda 163 (Thorodd), Art. 126: in mod. usage proncd. double, jur-jor or jir-jor (sounded yer-yor), which word was at the end of the last century still used in the north of Iceland (Thingeyjar-sysla): [it is a compd particle, from jd = yea and r, which may be a pers. pron., analogous to the early Germ. ja ich! ja du! ja si! jå ir! Grimm's Gramm, iii. 765; other Teutonic languages have preserved this particle, although in a somewhat different sense, mid. H. G. jâra or jâr-ia, jâra-ja]: — yea, yes! with emphasis, yea, in sooth, yes indeed, yes certainly, as a reply to an expression of doubt or denial. Of this interesting particle only six instances are found in old writers: -three in O. H. L., biskup leit útar í kirkjuna ok sá hvar Ólafr stóð ok mælti, nú er konungr út kominn, þeir sögðu at hann var eigi út kominn.—Answer, Jaur, sagði biskup, sá er sannr konungr, er nú er út kominn, 10; hvat er nú um félag þat er konungrinn á með yðr? þeir drápu niðr höfði ok kváðusk ekki hans félag hafa.—Jaur, sagði hann, þér sögðusk víst vera hans félagar, 45; Maðr svarar, hví mælir þú þat?-Jaur, segir hann, þat var mér þá í hug, etc., 69; one in Thom. (the Norse Recension), ekki var ek þar nærri, ok því sá ek enga þessa hluti, ekki heyrða ek ok þat er þú segir í frá.--Jaur, segir hann, Gud þat veit, at ek em uruggr um þat at ek sá þik þar, 246; one in Valur B. 126 (spelt júr); and lastly, one in Thorodd, austr, earn, eir, Ast júr, eyrir, vín, Skálda 163. Gudmund Andreae mentions this particle as in use in his time, and as sounded jor-jur, e.g. er ekki dagr?-answer, jör-jur! viltú ekki þetta?-answer, jör-jur! but his derivation from Lat. jure is erroneous.

JOL, n. pl., in rhymes, golig, Jola, O. H. (in a verse); [A. S. geôl, sometimes used of the whole month of December, whereas December is also called ara geola = fore Yule, and January aftera geola = after Yule; the plur. in Icel. perhaps refers to this double month. The origin and etymology of the word Yule is much contested, and has been treated at length by Grimm (Gesch. der Deutschen Sprache), who tries to make out a relation between the Lat. Julus or Julius and the Teut. Yule, the one being a midsummer month, the other a midwinter month; like former etymologists, he also derives the word from hjól, a wheel, as referring to the sun's wheeling round at midwinter and midsummer time. The resemblance of the words is striking, as also the old northern celebration of the midsummer feast Jónsvaka (see below), which was in fact a kind of midsummer Yule.]

B. Yule, a great feast in the heathen time, afterwards applied to Christmas (as still in North. E.) In Icel. popular usage Yule-eve is a kind of landmark by which the year is reckoned, so that a man is as many years old as he has passed Yule nights, hafa lifað (so and so) margar Jóla-nætr; for the year counts from Yule night, whence the phrase, vera illa or vel & ar kominn, to become well or ill in the year; thus a person born shortly before Yule is 'illa á ár kominn,' for at next Yule he will be reckoned one year old, whereas one born just after it is 'vel á ár kominn.' The heathen Yule lasted thirteen days, whence are derived the names prettandi, the thirteenth = Epiphany, i. e. the 6th of January, as also the Engl. 'Twelfth-night;' it is however probable that the heathen feast was held a little later than the Christian (see hökunótt). The heathen Yule was a great merry-making, and tales of ghosts, ogres, and satyrs were attached to it, esp. the Jola-sveinar or 'Yule-lads,' a kind of goblins or monster satyrs, thirteen in number, one to each day of the feast, sons of the kidnapping hag Grýla (q. v.), whose names were used to frighten children with, see Isl. pjoos. i. 219, 220. As the night lengthens and the day shortens, the ghosts gain strength, and reach their highest at Yule time, see Grett. ch. 34-37, 67-70, Eb. ch. 34, Floam. S. ch. 22. The day next before Yule is called atfanga-dagr (q. v.) Jóla, when stores were provided and fresh ale brewed, Jóla-öl. Passages in the Sagas referring to Yule are numerous, e.g. Hervar. S. ch. 4, Hálfd. S. Svarta ch. 8, Har. S. Hárf. ch. 16 (in a verse), Hák. S. Goda ch. 12, 15, 19, O. H. ch. 151, Eb. ch. 31, Landn. 3. ch. 15 (in the Hb.), Bjarn. 51 sqq., Sturl. iii. 127. As for Yule games cp. the Norse and Danish Jule-buk, Jola-geit (Ivar Azsen) = a Yule goat, Dan.

Jule-leg = a Yule game.

JON, m. (Jonn, Fb.), a pr. name, contraction of the older dissyllabic Joann, John, Johannes, see 1b. 17: of the same origin are Johann, Johannes, Jens, which have come into use since the Reformation, whereas Jón or Jóan appears in Icel, at the middle of the 11th century, and soon afterwards became so popular that in the K. A. (of 1276) it is made to serve for M. M. (N. or M.) in the baptismal formula, as also in the law formula, yfir höfði Jóni, against M. M., see Njála. bók, f. John's book, the code of laws of 1281, named after John the lawyer (lögmaðr), who brought the book from Norway to Icel., Ann. II. St. John Baptist's Day (June 24) is in the 1281, Arna S. northern countries a kind of midsummer Yule, and was in Norway and Sweden celebrated with bonfires, dances, and merriment; and tales of fairies and goblins of every kind are connected with St. John's eve in summer as well as with Yule-eve in winter. The name of the feast varies,-Jóns-dagr, m., Jóns-messa, u, f., Jónsvöku-dagr, m. ibe day, mass of St. John = the 24th of June; Jons-nott, f., Jons-vaka, u, f., St. John's eve, 'John's-wake,' Rb. 530, Sturl. iii. 59, N.G. L. i. 340, 343, Fms. viii. 357, ix. 7: Jónsvöku-skeið, Fms. x. 49: Jónsvökuleyti, id. In Norway the feast is at present called Jonsoka = Jónsvaka, and the fires Jonsoku-brising (cp. the Brisinga-men of the Edda). The origin of this feast is no doubt heathen, being a worship of light and the sun, which has since been adapted to a Christian name and the Christian calendar. For the fairy tales connected with this feast, see Isl. bjods., which tales again call to mind Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream: Jonsmessu-öl, n. ale brewed for St. John's day, N. G. L. i. 137; b var sumar-tíð ok hátíð mikil Jónsvöku-nótt, Bær. 17. dagr, Jóns-messa are also used to signify the day or mass of the Icel. bishop John (died A.D. 1121), April 23 and March 3, see Bs.: Jonshofuo, Jons-skript, f. the head, tablet of St. John, B. jotun-uxi, a, m. 'giant-ox,' a kind of beetle, scarabasus,

K (kú) is the tenth letter of the alphabet; in the common Runes it was represented by | (kaun); the Anglo-Saxon k was called cean or cên = Germ. kien, a pine or fir-tree; but as this was not a Norse word, the Scandinavians represented it by the Norse word nearest in sound to it, kaun (a boil or scab), which bears witness of the Anglo-Saxon origin of the old Norse Runic poem.

B. PRONUNCIATION.—The k is sounded hard or aspirate, the pronunciation varying as that of g does, see p. 186; it is hard in kaldr, koma, kunna, aspirate in kel, kem, kenna, kið, kyssa, kæti, keyri, vekja, etc.; the only difference is that & has the same sound, whether initial or medial, kaka, kíkir, just as in English: in modern Danish the medial & has been softened into g, e.g. Icel. sök, vaka, líka, Engl. sake, wake, like, are in Danish sounded sag, vaage, lige, whereas Sweden and Norway as well as Iceland have kept the old pronunciation. 2. the letter k before t and s is sounded as g, thus okt and ogt, bykkt and bygt, sliks and sligs are sounded alike; and so k is now and then misplaced in MSS., e. g. lakt = lagt, heilakt = heilagt. The spelling and other points referring to k have already been treated under C, p. 93; for qu = kv see

C. Changes.—The change of initial kn into bn has been mentioned in the introduction to letter H $(B. II. 2. \gamma)$, where however 'hnefi' ought to be struck out of the list: for the changes of nk into kk see the intro-II. according to Grimm's law, the Teut. & duction to letter N. answers to the Gr. and Lat. g; thus Lat. genus, genu, gent-is, Gr. yeros = Icel. kyn, kné, kind, etc.: but in borrowed words no change has taken place, as in Keisari, kista, kerti, kjallari, = Lat. Caesar, eista, cera, cella; the words borrowed in that way are very numerous in this letter, but there are some slang or vulgar words, which seem not borrowed, and vet no change has taken place.

kaðall, m., dat. kaðli, [prob. like Engl. cable, borrowed from mid. Lat. capulum, caplum; the word perhaps denotes twisted ropes, for in olden times the Scandinavians made their cables of walrus skin, svoror]: -a cable, esp. as a naut. term, Fms. ii. 279, vii. 82, 283, O. H. 28, Fas.

KAUPA, kaupir, pret. keypti, part. keypt; [Ulf. kaupatjan = κολαφίζειν and kaupon = πραγματεύεσθαι, Luke xix. 13; A.S. ceapian; Old Engl. chop: North. E. coup: cp. Engl. cheapen, chaffer, couper, chap-man. etc. (see angr); Germ. kaufen; Dutch koopen; Swed. köpa; Dan. kjöbe; a word common to all Teut. languages. The derivation from Lat. caupona is hardly admissible, whereas Grimm's ingenious suggestion (Dict. iii, 198) connecting it with Goth, kaupatjan, which Ulf. uses = to strike in the face, is strongly borne out by the very form of the Icel. word; -- since, first, this word, although having au as its root vowel, follows the 2nd and not the 1st weak conjugation; secondly, the vowel changes in preterite and participle, which is characteristic of a verb with an inflexive or characteristic j; thirdly, the t in the preterite (so far as is known) is never spelt with o or b,-keypti, not keypoi or keypbi (see introduction to letter D, C. III. 2),—which indicates that the & is here radical and not inflexive. The Icel, word therefore represents in its tenses both the Gothic words,-kaupan in the present tense, kaupatjan in the preterite: the bargain was symbolized by 'striking,' hence the phrase 'to strike' a bargain, Dutch koopslagen.]

 kvið-maðr, m. a 'verdict-man,' juror, Grág. i. 54.
 KVIÐR, m., gen. kviðar, pl. kviðir, acc. pl. kviðu, [Ulf. qiss = -φημία, -λογία, as in ana-qiss = βλασφημία; piupi-qiss and waila-qiss = εὐλογία; missa-qiss = σχίσμα, etc.]:—prop. a saw, saying, speech, word, and hence in law a verdict given by neighbours; for the Engl. 'verdict' is indeed a kind of rendering of the Norse term; kvior Norna, the word of the Norns, weird, fate, death, kveld lifir madr ekki eptir kvið Norna, Hom. 31; ords-kvidr, a saw, proverb; mis-kvidr, 'saying-amiss,' false pleading. The old law makes a distinction between vætti (a witness) and kviðr (a verdict),--par er bæði fylgir einni sök vætti ok kviðr, þá skal vætti fara fyrr fram en kviðr, Grág. i. 47: before delivering his opinion each neighbour had to take an oath,—bat er mælt, áðr kviðr sé borinn, at þeir skulu eiða vinna allir áðr at dómi, 53. The old records mention various kinds of neighbours and verdicts: 1. in Norse law, heimis-kviðr (heims-kviðr, heimilis-k.) or a 'bome-verdict,' 2 verdict of neighbours, bearing some resemblance to the oath of compurgators; ten, or in lesser cases four or six, neighbours were to accompany the accused to the court, two of whom had to swear on the book, and the rest followed,-en þat er heims kviðr er tíu menn fylgja til móts, en sverja tveir menn á bók, en átta sanna þat, N.G.L. i. 311, cp. ii. 505; hafa með sér heimiliskviðar-vátta til þings, K. Á. 214; hann hafi heiman heimiliskviðar-vitni, 152; nema heimiliskviðar-vitni fylgi, Gþl. 193; þá skal með þessu heimiliskviðar-vitni sækja, N. G. L. i. 140 (heimskviðar-vitni, 337); þá skal með þessu heimiliskviðjar-vitni sækja, at einn skal bera en tveir sanna um þriggja aura mál, en um sex aura mál skal einn sanna en fjórir sverja, en þeir skulu vera fylkis-menn, N. G. L. i. 140, 316; en ef eigi kemr saga hins sára fram á fyrsta þingi né heimiliskviðar-vitni, þá ..., 160: similar were the 'sandemænd' (sootbmen) of the early Danish law; to this the old saw refers, hættr er heimiskvior, nema sér gódan geti, perilous is the home-verdict, unless one gets a good one, Sdm. 25. β. in Icel., unless the bjargkviðr (q. v.) be identical to heimis-kviðr, this sort of verdict is seldom mentioned; eigi skal heimis-kvið annan at henda, Grág. i. 361. 2. in Icel. law the tolftarkviðr (verdict of twelve), also called goða-kviðr (priest verdict), Grug. i. 168, viz. 2 body of twelve men, of whom eleven were to be summoned by the godi of the district, and he, being the twelfth of the number, had to deliver the final verdict. The verdict of twelve was only appointed for certain cases defined in the law, K. p. K. 168, v. l.; nú hefir maðr tólptar-kviðar kvatt, ok skal goði nefna þriðjungs-menn sína til kviðar þess með sér, ok er honum rétt hvárz þeir eru bændr eða grið-menn, hann skal ellefu menn nefna aðra en sik, Grág. i. 57, see the whole chapter 17 in b. b., as also the Grág. passim; ella kveðja til tylptarkviðar skal kveðja þann goða er sá er í þingi er sóttr er, Grág. i. 138; er goði er kvaddr tólptar-kviðar um þat er hann á eigi at skilja, þá..., 168, 207; nú koma menn til þings, ok málit í dóm, ok á Glúmr (in his capacity as godi) at bera tólptar-kvið, ... Glúmr berr af honum kviðinn ok únýtti málit, Glúm. ch. 18; tólptar-kviðr átti um at skilja, en hvárrgi þeirra Snorra né Arnkels þótti bera mega kviðinn fyrir hleyta sakir við sækjanda ok varnar-aðilja, var þú Helgi Hofgarða-goði kvaddr tylptar-kviðar, ... eptir þat bar Helgi af kviðinn, Eb. ch. 16, cp. also the passage in Lv. ch. 4, where a verdict of twelve seems to be meant. but the common popular verdict was the bua-kvior or neighbour-verdict, given by five, and in some cases by nine, neighbours (see bui), who had to be summoned either at home (kveðja búa heiman) or in certain exceptional instances in the court (á þingi); the instances in the Grág. and the Sagas, esp. the Nj., are almost endless: technical phrase, bera kvið, to give the verdict, Nj. 87, Grág. i. 57, passim; as also, bera af kviðinn, or, bera á kviðinn, to give a verdict for or against, (see bera B. I); rydja kvid or kvidu, prop. to 'clear the verdict,' i. e. to challenge the neighbours, Grag. i. 20; bjóða til ruðningar um kviðinn, Nj. 87, pas-Y. a special kind, egningar-kviðr, a kind of law quirk, Grág. i. 56: ironical, nú er getið um fyrir Þorkatli at honum þykkja ríkt bornir kviðirnir, Lv. 27. From the analogy of the Icel. customs, it can be inferred with certainty that along with the invasion of the Danes and Norsemen, the judgment by verdict was also transplanted to English ground, for the settlers of England were kith and kin to those of Iceland, carrying with them the same laws and customs; lastly, after the Conquest it became the law of the land. This old Scandinavian institution gradually died out in the mother countries, and came to an end in Icel. A. D. 1271-1281, with the fall of the Commonwealth, and the introduction of a Norse code of laws, whereas it was naturalised in England, which came to be the classical land of trial by jury.

It seems that in the Saga time (10th century) the cat was not yet domesticated, for passages such as Vd. ch. 28, Eg. S. Einh. ch. 10, and the story in Edda (Thor lifting the giant's cat) apply better to the wild cat or the martin cat; and the saying in Isl. ii. l. c. (sees the cat the mouse?) probably refers to the weasel and the field mouse; but that early in the 12th century the cat was domesticated even in Icel, is shewn by the story of the chess-players and the kittens leaping after a straw on the floor, told in Mork. 204, 205; for a curious legend of the genesis of the cat, see Maurer's Volks. 190; kattar sonr, a car's son (the ermine cat), a bastard, was a term of abuse, Hkv. 1.18:-2 nickname, Landn.; hvers son ertú?-Ek em Kattarson,-Hverr var sá COMPDS: kattar-auga, n. cat's eye, botan. köttrinn? T

L (ell) is the eleventh letter of the alphabet, and the first of the liquids. In the Runic alphabet on the Golden horn, as well as in the later Runes, it was represented by \(\bar{\mathbb{N}}\), called lögr, \(\mathbb{N}\), (lögr er pa\(\hat{\mathbb{O}}\) er fellr of fjalli, Runic poem; A.S. \(lagu \)), and was, as the form shews, evidently drawn from the Greek or Latin alphabet. In old MSS. a digraph \(\frac{\mathbb{D}}{\mathbb{O}}\) is often used for \(ll \), see Bs. i. 333 sqq.

B. The l is in Icel. sounded as in other Teut. languages; but ll, after a vowel and not combined with another consonant, had a peculiar sound, almost dlb, thus, gull, fall, hella, kalla, = gudlh, fadlh, hedlha, kadlha. This pronunciation is still observed in Icel. as well as in some provincial dialects of western Norway, Vorse-vangen, Sogn, Hardanger; in some other parts of Norway it is sounded as dd. There are no means of ascertaining with certainty whether the ancients sounded ll exactly as the Icel. at present do, or whether it was not more aspirate than dental (as llb).

2. the peculiar aspirate sound of l before a radical dental is mentioned Gramm. p. xxxvi. (II): thus holt, allt, gult, illt, hallt, etc. were sounded (and are still sounded) as holht, allt, gult, illt, hallt; as also in old writers before d, hold, kald, = holhd, kalhd, although in mod. pronunciation the aspirate sound is less perceived before a media than before a tenuis.

C. In some Icel. words the ll is due to assimilation, and answers to Goth. ll, Saxon and Germ. ld, e.g. Icel. gull = Goth. gull, Engl. and Germ. gold; it is however likely that originally these words were distinct in sound from those which had a radical ll, and it may be that the present peculiar sound of ll was due to this cause—that the sound of the assimilated ll prevailed and became universal, whilst the original radical ll sound was lost; though even in the earliest rhymes no distinction is to be perceived. 2. in much later times ll assimilated into ll in a few words, brálla = brálla; as also lr into ll in inflexions, holl = holr, stell = stelr, Gramm. p. xvi. (1. 3. α): in still later times rl changed into ll, jarl, karl, varla, etc., which in mod. pronunciation is sounded as jall, kall, valla, etc.; but this is not observed in writing, although it is so in early print, as also in MSS. of the 15th century.

All words having a radical initial b (bl) are to be sought for under H; see the introduction to that letter.

and æstera Liva); it remains in the Engl. Leet = the law court of the hundred]:-the Leet, a meeting which in the Icel. Commonwealth was held shortly after midsummer, fourteen nights after the dissolution of the Althing; the Leet was the third and last public meeting (Vár-þing. Albingi, Leib); at the Leet the new laws and licences of the past Althing were published, as also the calendar of the current year, etc. At the time of the Grágás, 12th and 13th centuries, the Leet was held where the vár-þing or fjórðungs-þing used to be held, and lasted a day or two (tveggja nátta Leið, Nj. 168, Fs. 75), and was held in common by all the three godar of the quarter (sam-leid). But in the Saga time (10th century) the Leets appear to have been a kind of county assemblies; this may be inferred from the records of the Sagas, as also from local names indicating small county 'Leets,' different from the sam-leið of the Grágás. For the Grágás, see esp. Þingsk. Þ. Kb. ch. 61 (p. 111 Ed. 1853). For the Sagas, Glúm. ch. 25, Lv. ch. 2, 3; líðr nú á surnarit, ríðr hann til Leiðar ok helgar hana, Band. 9, 10, Þorst. LYRITR, m., or better lyritr or lyrittr, gen. lyritar (but lyrits, Grág. ii. 233), dat. lyriti, plur. lyritar, N. G. L. ii. 94, Jb. 193; the quantity cannot be ascertained because the vellums do not distinguish between long and short vowels; it is spelt with one t throughout the Grág. (Kb.); the alliterative phrase lagalyritr, as also the invariable spelling in the Grágás, shew that the word had no initial b. Former attempts at an etymology, from læ and rifta (Björn á Skarðsá), hlýrar and réttir (Pál Vídal.), lygi and rift (Fritzner), must be dismissed; the spelling lyristar, which once or twice occurs in Norse MSS, of the 14th century (N.G.L. i. 394, ii. 94, v.l. 19), is probably a mere corruption. Lyritr is a compd word from lög, law, and rör or reyr, a landmark, which word in the old Swed. law exactly answers to lyrit in the Norse law; lyrit is thus qs. lý-ryr-ti, by assimilation and by weakening the y into i, lyritti; the t being inflexive: its literal sense, therefore, is a lawful ror or landmark. In Sweden there were often five mark-stones, but it is added (Schlyter iii. s. v. rör)-furi stenar oc þri steuar mughu rör heta = four stones and even three stones may be called vor, i.e. make a 'law-ror,' a lawful landmark, a lyrit; this, we believe, is the etymology of this much-contested word. About the gender (masc., not fem.) there can be no doubt, from the numerous instances in the Gragas; but in the 13th century the word began to become neuter, thus we have lyritit, Grag. (Kb.) i. 103, lines 14 and 21, but lyritinn several times in the same page: nom. lyriti in Grág. (Sb.) ii. 226; and efalausu lyriti, Nj. passim.

I. prop. when the boundary of a field or estate B. SENSE: was to be drawn, the law prescribed that a mark-stone (mark-steinn) should be raised on the spot, and three other stones laid beside it; these three stones were called landmark-stones (lyrit-steinar or lyritar); by their number and position they were distinguished from all other stones in the field, see N. G. L. ii. 94, cp. note 19 (Jb. 193). II. metaph. in the Icel. law, a full title of possession, lawful claim to right or property; thus defined by Konrad Maurer-'Lyrit bedeutet in der Gragas und in den ältern Sagas das volle Eigentums-recht, oder auch den Bann, der dem Grundeigentumer zum Schutze seines Eigentumes, dem Goden aber Kraft seiner Amtsgewalt zusteht:' the earliest kind was probably the land-lyrit or 'land-ban;' this law term was originally borrowed from the mark-stones themselves, and then came to mean a full tile to land, field, pasture, or estate, Grag. ii. 224, 225: - eignar-lyritr, full lawful possession, a legal title of ownership; hafa eignar-lyrit fyrir landi, 204, 222.

or neighbours to deliver a sentence or verdict in a case, and thus quashing the suit. A Godi alone, by virtue of his office, was entitled to stop a court in this way, whether personally or by one of his liegemen, so that if any one else wished thus to stop a suit, he had first to go to his liegelord (Godi) and be authorised by him to do so; cp. the phrases, taka lyrit af Goda, selja lyrit, ef Godi færir lyrit sinn sjálfr fram, and similar law phrases, Grág. i. 109-111, cp. esp. p. p. ch. 38; neglect of this was contempt of court, punishable by the lesser outlawry. The word lyritr occurs at every step in the Grágás, esp. in the phrase, verja lyriti, or verja e-t lyriti, to defend through a lyrit, i. e. to put under veto, to vindicate one's right, forbid, or the like; eigi vardar hagabeit, nema lyriti sé varið, Grág. il. 224; verja lyriti haga, 225; þótt maðr veri fleirum lyriti (dat.), 226, Nj.; láta lyrit koma fyrir sök, to stop on a case, Grág. i. 109; kaupa land laga kaupi ok lyritar, to buy land by a lawful bargain and with full title of possession, ii. 213; eptir þat nefndi Þorkéll sér vátta, ok setti (varði?) þeim lyriti, ok fyrirbauð þeim at dæma, Lv. 31; ok er únýt stefna hans eðr lyriti (lyritr?), Grág. ii. 226; hann (the Goði) skal nefna sér vátta, áðr hann færi lyrit fram, í þat vætti, at ek ver lyriti, goða-lyriti, löglyriti fullum dómendum at dæma um sök þá...enda skal hann svá verja kviðmönnum lyriti, at bera kviðu um hann, i. 111; ek ver lyriti mínum, löglyriti dómendum at dæma, id.; færa lyrit sinn fram, to utter one's veto, id.; fara med land-lyriti, ii. 225. COMPDS: lyritareior, m. a 'lyrit-oath,' a kind of oath of compurgation in the Norse, but not in the old Icel. law; it was an oath of three, viz. of the person who took the oath, with two compurgators, in remembrance of the three lyrit stones, which gave the name to this oath of compurgation; nú skal lyritar-eið svá vinna, sjálfr skal hann vinna, ok annarr jafnréttismadr,...sá skal enn þriði, er ..., N. log-madr, m. [old Swed. lagman; the president of the supreme court tables of the law, Th. 10. formerly held in Orkney was called the lagman]: - 'law-man.' ancient Scandinavian kingdoms each legal community or state (lög) had its own laws, its own parliament (lögbing), and its own 'law-man' (laghmann, lögmaðr); the lagman was the first commoner and the spokesman of the people against the king and court at public assemblies or elscwhere; he was also the guardian of the law, and the president of the legislative body and of the law courts. As in the heathen time laws were not written, the lagman had to say what was the law of the land in any case of doubt; in the general assemblies, at least in Iceland, he had to 'say the law (from memory) to the assembled people from the Law-hill (Lögbergi); hence in the Icelandic Commonwealth he was called lög-sögumaðr (q.v.), the 'law-speaker,' 'law-sayer,' 'speaker of the law,' and his office lög-saga or lög-sögn = 'law-speaking:'

1. Sweden and Gothland in olden times were the classical lands of lagmen, for the whole kingdom was a confederation of commonwealths, each with its parliament, lawspeaker, and laws, who were all of them united under one king; see the various records in the old Swedish laws, Sveriges Gamla Lagar, as edited by Schlyter, as also the classical account given of lagman Thorgny in O. H. ch. 60 sqq.—i hverri þessi deild landsins er sitt lögþing, ok sin lög, yfir hverjum lögum er lögmaðr,... þat skulu lög vera sem hann réð upp at kveða; en ef konungr, eða jarl, eða byskupar fara yfir land ok eigu þing við buendr, þá svarar lögmaðr af hendi búenda . . .; aðrir lögmenn allir skulu vera undir-menn þess lögmanns er á Tíunda-landi er, O.H. 65. in Norway the political institutions of the old patriarchal ages were greatly disturbed through the wars and conquest of Harald Fairhair; the ancient laws of Norway too have been preserved in a much more fragmentary state than those of Sweden; of some of the most interesting laws only the eccl. section has been preserved, often in Icelandic transcripts or abridged. The most interesting records of the lagmen are therefore not to be found in the Norse laws, but in the Sagas, e. g. the debates in the Hák. S. Gamla, ch. 71-80, 85-97 (in the Flatey book), as also in the pinga-pattr in Fms. vii. 123-150, and in stray passages in the Icelandic Sagas, in such phrases as lögmenn ok konungt, lögmenn ok dómendr, lenda menn ok lögmenn ok alla alþýðu, Eg. 352. in the later Middle Age in Norway, and in Icel. after 1280, the lagman was a justice, who presided in the court lögrétta, at the lögbing (II), cp. Jb. passim. 4. in the Icelandic Commonwealth, the officer whose duties have been described above was specially called lögsögumaðr, and lögmaðr is only used = lagamaðr = a lawyer, - þat er ok, at lögsögumaðr skal svá görla þáttu alla upp segja, at engi viti einna miclogi görr, en ef honum vinsk eigi fróðleikr til þess, þá skal hann eiga stefnu við fimm lögmenn (lawyers, men skilled in law), en næstu dægr áðr, eðr fleiri, Grág. i. 2, 3; þat skal allt hafa er finnsk á skræ þeirri er Hafliði lét göra...en þat eitt af annarra lögmanna fyrirsögn (of other lawyers) er eigi mæli því í gegn, 7; Njáll var lögmaðr svá mikill (so great a lawyer), at eingi fannsk hans jafningi, Nj. 30. At the union with Norway (A.D. 1272) the lögsögu-maðr of the Commonwealth was replaced by two lagmen of the Norse kind, so that in the Sagas composed after that date (e.g. the Grettla) or in Sagas preserved in later transcripts, the terms were now and then confounded, and 'lögmaðr' was, by way of anachronism, used of the lögsögu-maðr of the old Commonwealth, cp. Grett. 64, 115, 173, 191 new Ed., Nj. 24, 164, 237 (v. l.), Eg. 597, 1sl. (Gunnl. S.) ii. 208, 238, 256, Bs. i. (Hungrv.) 62, Fms. iv. 115, 176, where the O. H. edition has the true reading, being made from a velβ. two instances are recorded lum of the Commonwealth time. referring to the 10th century in Iceland, where a lögmaðr occurs as a kind of county sheriff or officer, viz. in the Hav. S. (begin.) and the Svarfdæla S. ch. 10; but both records seem to be spurious and adapted to the state of things in Norway, for neither Saga is preserved in its pure original state, but remoulded after the union; see Maurer's Entstehung des Isl. Staates, Beiträge, 136 sqq. In Scandinavia during the Middle Ages, as the power of the king increased, so that of the old lagman sank, and at last died away. In England it is preserved in the Speaker of the House of Commons, whose very name recalls to mind the lawspeaker of the old Scandinavian communities. II. a pr. name, Lög-maör, Orkn. M

(emm), the twelfth letter of the alphabet, was in the oldest Runic inscriptions (the Golden horn, the stone in Tune) figured , and in the later common Runes Φ and Φ , whence later, the top being left open, Ψ and Ψ ; all these forms being clearly derived from the old M. Its ancient name was maor (a man)—'maor er moldar-auki,' in the Runic poem; but the likeness of \to a man with uplifted hands is merely accidental.

B. Spelling, Changes.—The m is sounded as in English and other Teutonic languages: it is usually single in the words fim = five, um = umm, fram = framm, but erroneously, for it is sounded double, agreeably with the etymology. Changes: 1. peculiar to the Northern languages is the interchange of mn and fn when both letters are radical; thus, namn, nemna, = nafn, nefna; samn, samna, = safn, safna; jamn = jafn; somna, sömn, = sofna, svefn; hemna = hefna; stamn = stafn; stomn = stofn; hramn = hrafn: the oldest Icelandic vellums frequently use the me, in namn, samna, hramn, jamn, but more rarely in other instances, as omn, Blas. 46; emni, Arna-Magn. 302. 3; somna, MS. 623. 34; sömninum, O. H. L. 82, 83; sjömn, Pd. 14; it is still sounded instead of fn before d, as in hefnd, proncd. hemd, Hom. 7, 18; stemdi = stefndi: the fn has prevailed in the Icel., and is used in the Editions, as also in modern usage: on the other hand, the Swedish has throughout adopted the mn; thus, Swed. bamn = Icel. höfn, Engl. baven; Swed. lämna = Icel. lifna, Dan. levne; Swed. ämne = Icel. efni; each language has taken its course without regard to etymology, for in some of the words f is radical, in others m. 2. otherwise m and f seldom interchange, as in the threefold form of the particle of, um, umb; himinn, himneskr, and hifinn, hifneskr; nema (nisi), cp. Goth. niba; hvilmt and hvilft, q.v.; as also Mal-kólfr = Mal-kolmr, þjálfi and þjálmi, skelmir and skelfir. II. in vellums m is dropped in the 1st pers. plur. of verbs before the pron. vér, vit, thus höfu vér, eigu vit, but in mod. usage eigum vit; hence comes the Norse form mér (plur.), mit (dual), by an anastrophe of the v and substitution of the final m from the preceding verb: in öllu-megin, báðu-megin, etc., see megin. In old vellums the A.S. M is used to mark a double m, thus frami frammi; in most cases a medial or final m is marked by a stroke above the line. The Rune Ψ is often used for the word maor.

MAN, n., does not occur in plur. unless it be in gen. pl. mana, Stor. 13 (m in MS.); [man is an ancient word only used in old laws and poetry, it remains in the compd man-sal, and in the Icel. local name Man-heimar; 'man' (ἀνδράποδον), being neuter and having but one n, is prob. of different origin from mann (ανθρωπος, ανήρ), which is masc. and has a double final n. The etymology of this word is lost in the remotest antiquity; it appears in the O. H. G. mana-boubit = a bondman's bead, a 'serf's bead;' (Grimm in R. A. expresses a doubt as to the current etymology of Lat. man-cipium from manu-capere; perh. man and caput?). In early Swed. law the word occurs twice or thrice, næmpnæ man, næmpnæ quicfæ, Schlyter i. 134; in Gutalagen-kauper tu mans man i garth thin (i.e. mans-mann = a bondman, cp. mans-manna and mansmaor, see Schlyter's Glossary).]

B. A bondman, prob. originally of prisoners of war who were sold as slaves (Irish in the west, Finns and Slaves in the east), see Ld. ch. 12, O. T. (Fms. i. ch. 92); svá ok ef hann vill í mani gjalda, tvá aura fyrir einn, ok á hann lausn á maninu en næstu misseri ef hann hefir upp alit, Grág. i. 396; kaupa man ok gefa frelsi, N.G.L. i. 5, 6; ok þat fé skal hálft vera í gulli ok i silfri en hálft i mani hérrænu (native bondmen) eigi ellra en fertogu, né yngra en fimmtán vetra, 88; mans leiga, 224; ok heimta hann sem annan mans-mann, K. p. K. 58; mani austrænu, eastern slaves, Hornklofi; máttkar meyjar at mani hafðar, Gs. 1, 15; er þú man keyptir, 8; hálfa aðra alin fyrir frjálsgjafa, penning veginn fyrir man-manna, N.G.L. i. 347; næst kirkju-garði skal grafa man-manna, 345; maðr manna, no doubt false for man-manna, 388; er hann réttlauss við hann ok hans konu ok man hans allt, 36, Am. 66; þar kom mart man falt, þar sá Loðinn konu nokkura er seld hafði verit mansali, Fms. i. 185: allit., mold ok man, N.G.L. iii. 92, v.l. II. a girl, maid, as also in a worse sense, a mistress, for bondwomen often became their master's mistresses (see Ld. ch. 12), so that this sense grew out of the preceding one; líki leyfa ens ljósa mans, Hm. 91; í myrkri skal við man spjalla, 81; et horska man, 101; et manunga man, 163; pat et unga man, þat et mjallhvíta man, Alm. 6, 7; bjarthaddað man, Skv. 1. 33; harðúðigt man, 27; fóstr-man, a bondwoman nurse, 3. 67; mans at kosta, Hbl. 16; hvé ek at andspilli komumk ens unga mans, Skm. 11; hve ek fyrir-banna manna glaum mani, manna nyt mani, bow I ban ber from all concourse with men, 34; Ylfinga man, Hkv. 2. 3; Yggjar man, the beloved of Ygg (Odin) = the Earth, Lex. Poet.; Hédins man = Hilda, the beloved of Hedin, Fms. ix. (in a verse); bjarnar man, a giantess, Stor. 13. It is probable that in some law phrases the obsolete 'man' has been replaced by the common 'mann,' e. g. in gefa manni frelsi (mani? cp. manfrelsi), N. G. L. i. 5: as also in mana-kaup in the Swed. law, see Schlyter's introd. to the 10th vol. of Sver. Gamla Lagar. COMPDS: man-frelsi, n. a granting of freedom to a bondman, manumission (as a vow), Orkn. 198, 200, Grag. i. 357, where it is wrongly spelt mannfrelsi. Man-heimar, m. pl. (thus pronounced on the spot, not Mann-heimar, as it is often spelt), the name of a farm in western Icel.; the local legend attributes the name to English captives kept there by lady Olof, for having slain her husband, during the English trade (1467). But at that time the word man had become quite obsolete, and so the name must be older, prob. dating from the time at Fróða meyjar fullgóliga mólu, Edda 81 (in a verse); hann tók klæði Pof the first settler Geirmund, who had been a freebooter in the British waters before he came to Icel.; he may have had his household of bondmen at this farm, see Sasn i. 353 (foot-note). kynni, n. pl.; góð m., luck in love affairs, Hbl. 31. man-manna. n. [early Swed. mans-man], a bondman, Grag. i. 271, Eg. 89, K. b. K. man-söngr, m. a love song, Eg. 325, Bs. i. 165, Edda 16; esp. in the old law a kind of love libel, liable to outlawry, Grag. ii. 150, Fb. iii. 242: in mod. usage the lyrical introduction to the epic rhapsodies or ballads (rimur) is called mansongr, for originally they were addressed to the poet's lady-love, Skáld H. 6. 1, Skíða R. 1, and in countless instances, e. g. Ulf. 1. 8, 2. 8, 3. 8, 4. 8, 5. 7, 7. 9, 9. 11, cp. 11. 10. mansöngs-drápa, u. f., -kvæði, n., -vísa, u. f. a love encomium, love song, love ditty, Eg. 5, Bs. i. 165, Fb. iii. 241, 242, Ölk. 36, Fs. 60, 87.

Norse marmæle, Ivar Aasen:—prop. a 'sea-mannikin,' a kind of sea goblin or sea dwarf, in the Norse fairy tales. The marmennil is now and then hooked by fishermen; being a soothsayer, he tells them what is to happen. The classical passages in old Icel. writers are the Halfs S. ch. 7 and the Landn. 2, ch. 5; for mod. times see Maurer's Volks. 31, 32, as also Isl. þjóðs. i. 131-134. Inseparable from these tales is the merman's 'laughter;' he generally laughs thrice, e.g. the king kisses the queen, beats his dog, and stumbles over and curses the mound, at each of which the merman laughs; and being asked why, he says that he laughs at the king's foolishness, for the queen is false, but the dog is true and will save his life, and in the mound there is a hidden treasure; hence, bá hló marbendill, then the merman laughed, has in Icel, become proverbial of a sudden, unreasonable, and spiteful fit of laughter. The coincidence with the English legend of Merlin the 'wild man' in the romance of Merlin, (edited by the Early Engl. Text Soc. 1869, p. 434,) is very striking; and one is tempted to suggest that the name Merlin may have been borrowed from the Norse sea goblin (who in Norwegian tales is said to be the bastard of the sea monster hafstramb and a mermaid), and tacked on to the Welsh legend: even the word has a Norse or Teutonic sound: Merlin may well be shortened from the dimin. mer-mann-lin, mer-m'lin, merlin: according to the Pref. to this Engl. romance the name is not found attached to the Welsh legend till the 12th century. COMPDS: marmendilssmíði, n. the mermannikin's work = millepora polymorpha. marmendils-pari, a, m. the merman's weed = corallina officinalis, Maurer's Volks.

mio-garor, m. [in Cumberland three farms, High-garth, Middle-garth, Low-garth], the 'mid-yard,' 'middle-town,' i. e. the earth, a mythol. word common to all ancient Teut. languages; thus Ulf. renders the Gr. olkovuhern by midjungards; Hel. calls the earth middil-gard; the A.S. homilies instead of earth say middan-geard (meddlert, Jamieson), and use the word as an appellative; but the Icel. Edda alone has preserved the true mythical bearing of this old Teut. word.—The earth (Midgard), the abode of men, is seated in the middle of the universe, bordered by mountains and surrounded by the great sea (úthaf); on the other side of this sea is the Ut-gard (out-yard), the abode of giants; the Midgard is defended by the 'yard' or 'burgh' As-gard (the burgh of the gods), lying in the middle (the heaven being conceived as rising above the earth). Thus the earth and mankind are represented as a stronghold besieged by the powers of evil from without, defended by the gods from above and from within; see Vsp. 4, Gm. 41, Edda 6, 25, 26, 35: mankind is said to abide 'undit Midgardi,' under the Midgard, Hbl. 23; mest manna-val und Midgardi, Hdl. 11, 16, Fms. vi. 423 (in a verse); um allan Midgard, Blanda. In old Icel, translations of legends Leviathan is rendered by Midgardsormr, Nidrst. 3, Post. 686 C. 2. The god Thor is called Miogaros-veorr, m. = the boly one of M., Vsp.; miogaros verjandi. the defender of Midgard, Edda 53; cp. port hefir varðan Midgarð af þrek. Edda (in a verse). II. Miðgarðr, as a local name, Icel. map.

MINN, f., min, n., mitt, poss. pron.:—in the possessive pronouns minn, pinn, sinn (meus, tuus, suus), mod. usage pronounces i long (i) before one consonant, but short (i) before a double consonant, and accordingly all modern editions of old writers make a distinction in the root vowel, thus, minn, minnar, minni, minna, but min, minir, minar, minum; af f6, Fms. vii. 197; illr af mat en mildr af gulli, Hkr. i. 140:—hinn whereas the ancients pronounced i throughout, as is seen from Thorodd, in minna (meorum), Skálda 163; and still more clearly from rhymes, mitt and hviti, Bjarn. 63; minn (meum) and sina, Arnor (Orkn. 104); mitt, fritt, and mitt, sitt, Völs. R. 136, 137. As late as the 14th century, in the corrections by the second hand of the Flatey-book, mijtt = mitt; the older vellums do not distinguish between i and i; cp. also the cognate languages: [Goth. meins; A.S. and O. H.G. min; Engl. mine; Germ. mein ; Dan. mîn.]

B. Mine and my = Lat. meus, in countless instances: the possessive pronoun is usually put after the noun, brodir minn, fadir minn; for the sake of emphasis only can it stand before, minn hamar, pkv. 3; minn dróttinn, Skm. 3; minn Sigurðr, Gkv. 1. 18; míns málvinar, 20; mínu bölvi, id.; mínir bræðr, 2. 3; minn herra, Fms. vii. 197; mínar eru sorgirnar þungar sem bly, Sturl. (in a verse): in eccl. writers, perhaps influenced by Luther's Bible, this use has increased, and is freq. in the N. T., Pass., Vidal.; in popular speech, however, the old usage still holds good, (cp. Engl. mother mine, etc.) 2. in addressing, my dear! Jon minn! Sigrior min! modir min! barnio mitt! etc. II. as neut. subst. mitt; [Gr. τὸ ἐμόν; Lat. meum]:—mine, my part; skal ek ekki mitt til spara, mine, all I bave, Nj. 3; malit hefi ek mitt, I bave done my sbare, Gs. 16. After the death of Balder the Ragnarök (the last day of the heathen mythology) set in. Balder's death was also symbolical of the victory of darkness over light, which comes every year at midwinter. The mistletoe in English households at Christmas time is no doubt a relic of a rite lost in the remotest heathenism, for the fight of light and darkness at midwinter was a foreshadowing of the final overthrow in Ragnarök. The legend and the word are common to all Teutonic people of all ages. MISTR, n. MJÖL, n., dat. mjölvi (mod. mjöli), gen. pl. mjölva; in mod. usage also sounded mel (as kjöt and ket); [Engl. meal; Germ. mebl]:-meal, flour; fullr af mjölvi, Mar.; skip hlaðit af malti ok mjölvi, Eg. 81; var hlaðit skreið í annann en mjölvi í annan, Eb. 268; mjöl ok við, Nj. 4, Fs. 143; mjöl ok smjor, 197: poët., Fróda mjöl, Frodi's meal = gold, COMPDS: mjöl-belgr, -sekkr, -poki, m. a meal-Edda (in a verse). bag, -sack, -poke, Fas. i. 127, Bárð. 170, Nj. 181. mjöl-kaup, n. pl. purchase of meal, Fbr. 10, Gbl. 352. mjöl-kýll, n. = mjölbelgr, Nj. 227. mjöl-leyfi, n. a meal-licence, viz. licence to export meal, Hkr. iii. 96. mjöl-sáld, n. a meal-riddle, Sturl. i. 23. miöl-skuld, f. rent to be paid in meal, Sturl. ii. 64. mjöl-vægr, adj. estimated by mjöl-vætt, f. a weight (40 lbs.) of its value in meal, Grag. i. 505. meal, Bs. i. 137.

MJÖLL, f., gen. mjallar, dat. mjöllu, Rm. 26, Völs. R. I. 3; [perh. akin to mjöl, although with a double 1]:-fresh powdery snow; sá snjór er hvítastr er, ok í logni fellr, ok mjöll er kallaðr, Bárð. 2 new Ed.; görðisk ill færðin ok var mjöllin djúp, Fms. v. 179; vaða mjöll, Sighvat (Fb. iii. 240); mjöllin var laus, ok rauk hón, Fb. i. 579; sjórinn rauk sem mjöll, the sea 'reeked,' or broke in spray, like mjöll, Vígl. 22; cru þeir kasaðir í mjöllinni, Fs. 143: poët., haus-mjöll, floating bair, Skálda (in a verse); sjóð-m., the snow of the crucible = silver; svan-m., the swan-drift' = the waves, Lex. Poët. II. a pr. name of a lady, mjalla-hvítr, adj. = mjallhvítr, white as drifted snow.

Mjölnir, m., in the vellums spelt mjollnir, with o and ll (see Bugge in the foot-note to Vpm. 51); the ll seems to indicate that the n is radical, for if it were inflexive, it would be mjolnir (with one 1): [therefore the derivation from mala or mola (to crush), though probable, is not certain; the word may be akin to Goth. milbma = cloud, Swed. moln, Dan. mulm; cp. provinc. Norse molnas (Ivar Aasen) = to grow dark from bands of cloud arising]:—the name of Tbor's bammer, Edda passim, Ls.

MJÖT, f, [Ulf. mitals = μέτρον; Ο. H. G. mez; Germ. masz]:measure; kann ck mala mjot, I know the measure of words, how to make a speech, Höfudl. 20; bess kann madr mjöt, a man knows the measure of that, Bugge's Hm. 60 (see foot-note as to the reading in Cod. Reg.); mjötuðr, from Vsp. the preceding poem, seems to have been in the transcriber's mind, and so he first wrote mjotype and then dotted the v, denoting that the last three letters were to be struck out. A fem, mjotud would, it is true, agree with the Goth. mitahs, but it does not suit the rhythm, in which a monosyllable is required.

mjötuör, m., spelt mjotviðr, Vsp. 2, which form can only be an error ofan mjaðmir, Eb. 240; hjó á mjöðmina, Nj. 253; mjöðm ok herðar- hof the transcriber, for both passages, verses 2 and 47, represent the same word: [A. S. meto's: Hel. metod: by which word the A. S. homilies, as T well as the Heliand, denote God, prop. the 'Meter,' Dispenser]; the word itself is of heathen origin: in the Icel. it only occurs in old poets, and there in but a few passages, all of which agree, if rightly interpreted, with the A.S. use of the word. It occurs twice in the Vsp.; in verse 47,-Leika Mims synir, en mjötuðr kyndisk, but the meotud is kindled, lighted, where it seems to be applied to the god Heimdal, (the dawn in the Eastern sky, the morning star? see Prof. Bergmann in his Ed. of Gm. 1871, p. 169); in verse 2,-níu man ek heima, níu iviðjur, mjötuð mæran fyrir mold nedan, I mind the nine abodes, the nine giantesses (the nine mothers of Heimdal?), the worthy Dispenser beneath earth: this 'meotud beneath earth' seems here to represent the god of the nether world, the Pluto of the Northern mythology, with whom all things above originated (Heimdal?); somewhat similar views are expressed in the Platonic Dialogue Axiochus, ch. 12 and 13. sá er hann með mönnum mjötuðr, such a guardian (belper) is be among II. metaph. and in an evil sense, weird, bane; miotuor is glossed by bani (a bane), Edda (Gl.) ii. 494; mjötuor Heimdals, the bane of Heimdal = the bead; Heimdalar höfud heitir sverð ... sverð heitir manns-mjötuðr, a sword is the bane of men, Edda 55, from a myth that Heimdal was pierced by a head (used as a bolt): nema mjötuðr spilti, unless death spoiled ber, unless she died, Og. 14; ef mer meirr m. malrum gæfi, if death would give me more time for speech (says the dying Brynhild), Skv. 3. 71; sá manns mjötuðr, this bane of men, of a charmed, poisoned sword, Fas. i. (in a verse). The word is found only in the above passages; the explanation given in Lex. Poët. can hardly be the true one. For Hm. 60 see mjöt above.

MORĐ, n. [Ulf. maurhr = φύνος; A.S. morδ and morδar; Engl. murther, murder; Germ. and Dan. mord; cp. Lat. mort-is]:-a murder, Fær, 187; in ancient times murder (morð) and manslaughter (vig) are distinguished; if the killer, after the deed, had immediately, at the next or at least at the third house, confessed what he had done (lysa vigi, vig-lysing, N. G. L. i. 61), the deed was manslaughter (vig), and the doer was liable to indictment according to the law, but the deed might, with the consent of the prosecutors and relations of the slain, be atoned by weregild. On the other hand, if the vig-lysing either did not take place or was stealthily performed (Glum. ch. 27), the deed was murder; and the killer was called mord-vargr, and was out of the pale of the law; en bat er morð ef maðr leynir eða hylr hræ ok gengr eigi í gegu, Grag. (Kb.) i. 154; drepa mann a mord, N.G.L. i. 158; hence the phrase to kill a man and then murder bim, i.e. conceal the deed. In one instance the distinction is made threefold, viz. vig, laun-vig, and mord, i.e. laun-vig or secret manslaughter, if no vig-lysing took place, but the perpetrator left the weapon in the wound or some other evidence that he was the culprit, en þat vóru kölluð launvíg en ekki morð, er menn létu vápn eptir í beninni standa, Gísl. 22. To slay a man asleep or feloniously was also called moro; so also to put a man to death during the night, nátt-víg eru morð-víg, Eg. 417; kallit ér þat eigi morð-verk at drepa menn um nætr? O. H. 117; heiti þat níðings verk eða morð ef menn drepask um nætr, Fms. vii. 206: burying alive also was mord, K. b. K. 26, passim. For the formula of the vig-lysing see Grág. Vsl. ch. So in Lat. phrases, in manu parentis, manumissio, etc., used of minors, slaves. In Norse the word is used in a special sense.]

B. In the ancient laws and customs matrimony was a bargain (brúð-kaup), hence the phrase to buy a wife, kaupa konu; the wooing was often performed by a deputy, and at the espousals (festar) a sum was agreed on, which the bridegroom was to pay for his bride. This sum was called mundr; and this transaction between the damsel's father or guardian and the other party was called mundar-mál or mund-mal, e. g. Nj. ch. 2, Mördr (the father) svarar, hugsað hefi ek kostinn, hón (i. e. my daughter, the damsel) skal hafa sextigi hundraða, ok skal aukask priðjungi í þínum garði: hence the phrases, kaupa mey mundi, to buy a maid by mund; mey mundi keypt; gjalda mund, Skv. 1. 30, Fm. 41, N. G. L. i. 27, 48, Am. 93, and passim. No marriage was lawful without the payment of mund, for even if the wedding had been lawfully performed, without such previous payment of mund the sons of such a wedlock were illegitimate, and were called hornung (q. v.),-hann kallaði ykkr frillu-sonu,-Húrekr sagði at beir mundi vitni til få at móðir þeirra var mundi keypt, Eg. 40; the least amount of mund in Norway was twelve ounces, called the poor man's mund (öreiga mundr), N. G. L. i. 27, 54; in Iceland it was a mark, sá maðr er eigi arfgengr er móðir hans er eigi mundi keypt, mörk eða meira fé, Grág. (Kb.) i. 222. On the wedding night the stipulated mund became the wife's personal property, and thus bears some resemblance to the 'morning-gift' (morgun-gjöf) of the later legislation; þá er hjú koma í eina sæing, at þú er konu heimill mundr sinn ok svá vextir af fé því öllu er henni er mælt í mundar-málum, Grág. i. 370. The wife herself or her parents might, in case of divorce after misconduct, call on the husband to pay up the mund and the heiman-fylgja (q.v.) of which he had the charge, Grág. Festab. ch. 51; ella mun ek láta nefna mér vátta nú þegar, ok segja skilit við þik, ok mun ek láta föður minn heimta mund minn ok heimanfylgju, Gisl. 16 (p. 32 in Mr. Dasent's Gisli the Outlaw), cp. also Yngl. S. ch. 17; nefndi Mörðr (the father) sór vátta, ok lýsti fésök á hendr Rúti (the husband) um fémál dóttur sinnar ok taldi níutigi hundraða fjár, lýsti hann til gjalda ok útgreiðslu, Nj. 15 and Dasent's Burnt Njal (l.c.), the Sagas mundar til höuðs á Gesti, Ísl. ii. 305; mun hann ekki lengi m. atgeir- passim, as also Grág., esp. the section Festap. ch. vii. sqq. The mundr answering to it in the modern law, nor perhaps in the old Greek or Roman customs; hence Tacitus speaks of it as something strange, dotem non uxor marito, sed maritus uxori affert, Germ. ch. 18. On the other hand, the Teutonic rites of marriage call to mind the ancient patriarchal times as described in Gen. xxiv and xxix. The etymological connection between mundium = tutelage and the Norse word is not altogether clear. In modern Icelandic usage heiman-mundr is erroneously used instead of heiman-fylgja, q. v.

Muspell, n. the name of an abode of fire; in the old mythology peopled by Muspells lýdir, the men of Muspell, a bost of fiends, who are to appear at Ragnarok and destroy the world by fire; the prose in Edda 3 may have been derived from some lost verses of the Völuspá, for the name appears at the end of that poem (Vsp. 51) as if it were already known; it occurs nowhere else in the Norse mythical songs, except in Ls. 42 (muspells-megir). Muspells-heimr, the abode of Muspell, Edda 4. This interesting word was not confined to the Norse mythology, but appears twice in the old Saxon poem Heliand—mutspelli cumit on thiustra naht, also thiof ferit, m. comes in dusky night, as a thief fares, i. e. but the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, 2 Pet. iii. 10; and, mutspellis megin obar man ferit, the main of m. fares over men, see Schmeller's Edition; a third instance is in an Old High German poem on the Last Daydår ni mac denne mac andremo helfan vora demo muspille = there no man can belp another against the muspell-doom. In these instances muspell therefore stands for the day of judgment, the last day, and answers to Ragnarok of the Northern mythology. The etymology is doubtful, for spell may be = the weird, doom, = Lat. Fatum; or it may be = spoil, destruction; the former part mut or muod is more difficult to explain. The Icel, mus is an assimilated form.

möpurr, m. [for. word], a maple-tree, Edda (Gl.)

MÖRÐB, m., gen. marðar, dat. merði, [Engl. marten; Germ. marder; Dan. maard]:—a marten; in Edda (Gl.) mörðr is wrongly put among the names of rams, for the marten is not known in Icel. name, Landn., Nj.; from that Saga originated in popular usage, by way of metonomy, moror = a backslider (as a 'Judas'). maroar-skinn, n. a marten's skin; see maroskinn.

MÖRK, f., gen. sing. merkr, pl. merkr, [a word common to all Teut. languages]:—a mark, in weight equal to eight ounces or half a pound; twenty merkr make a fjórðung, q.v.; eighty merkr = a vætt; þat er lögpundari at átta fjórðungar eru í vætt, en tuttugu merkr skolu í fjórðungi vera, Grág. i. 499. 2. a mark, by weight or value, of gold and silver, eight ounces (átta aurar) go to a mark, 732. 16; mörk silfrs, mörk gulls, þrim mörkum gulls, Fms. vii. 235, Grág., Sagas passim; mörk vegins silfrs, O. H. L. 23; gullhringa ok stóð mörk hvárr, Eg. 464: often used absol. so that the standard can only be seen from the context, verdr hann útlagt þrem mörkum, Grág. i. 16, 132; varðar honum þat sex merkr, tólf merkr, 319; varðar þat þriggja marka sekð, 499; hversu mikit fé er þetta? hann sagði hundrað marka, Nj. 4; Aðalsteinn vill gefa skilling manni hverjum frjálsbornum, en mörk sveitar-höfðingja hverjum, Eg. 280; hann skal gjalda hálfa mörk fyrir eyri, Grág. i. 208; þrjú hundruð hundraða eptir forngildu marka-tali, Dipl. v. 20; svá mikit ofa-fé at trautt kom marka-tali á, Fær. 11; hann var svá auðigr af gulli at engi vissi marka-tal, Fms. vi. 176; merkr-kaup, a purchase to the amount of a mork, Gpl. 497; merkr-þjófr, a theft to the value of a mark, N.G. L. i. 326; merkr stykki, a piece amounting to a mark, H. E. ii. 188. As to the standard, the value of a mörk varied at different times and in different countries, see esp. Mr. Dasent's Essay in Burnt In Icel, the confusion was made still greater, by the fact that (as remarked s. v. eyrir) the word mork was also used of the wadmal standard (the ell of wadmal), and so the law speaks of a mörk vaðmála, Grag. i. 500; mörk sex . . . álna aura, etc., K. b. K. 70, 172, but this is a contradiction in terms, for mork is a weight, not a measure: the real meaning is often only to be made out by the context, e.g. in questions of weregild the weighed mark is no doubt meant. II. of fluid, a pint, viz. half a pottr; in mod. usage all fluids and vessels holding fluids are thus measured, tveggja, þriggja . . . marka askr.

MORK, f., gen. markar, but merkr, Fas. ii. 512; dat. mörk: pl. markir, Fs. 100, O. (with the art. moskon) in O. H. L. 74.—pa mun (= munu?) eigi gott þola moskon þin (= moskvinn þinn?). mösmar, m. pl. treasures, Rm. 35.

MÖSURR, m. [O. H. G. masar; mid. H. G. maser; Early Engl. maser]:—a maple-tree, 'spot-wood,' Fb. i. 548. COMPDS: mosur-bolli, 2, m., -skál, f., -ker, [Old Engl. maser-bowl], n. a bowl or vessel of maple, Fms. vi. 184, Karl. 53, Vm. 58, Dipl. iii. 4; such bowls are frequentioned in inventories of churches, Vm. 58; cp. mid. H. G., where maser is even used of a chalice, a maple-wood cup. mösur-tré, n. a maple-tree, Fms. iii. 135.

möttul-band, n. a mantle-tie, fastening it round the neck. Fb. i. 131, Fms. vii. 201, Flóv. 31.

MÖTTULL, m., dat. möttli; [no doubt from Lat. mantile, = a bandtowel or napkin; whence the word came into the Romance languages. Ital. mantello; Span. mantilla; Fr. manteau; Engl. mantle; thence into the Teutonic, O. H. G. mantal]:—a mantle; occurring as early as in Kormak, but not used elsewhere by old poets, although freq. in the Sagas, Fms. i. 211, ii. 280, xi. 275, Fs. 60, Nj. 28, Fb. i. 20, ii. 131. Fær. 264, 266; the möttull was worn by both men and wornen; skikkja, which is the genuine Norse word, seems to be synonymous with mottull; thus skikkja, Fagrsk. 115 (line 25), is called mottull, 117 (line 24): the möttull was prob. a short light mantle, fastened by strings (tuglar) round the neck, whence it was called tugla-mottull, Fb. ii. 130, Fær. 263, or möttull á tuglum, and it seems usually to have been of foreign cut and of costly foreign stuff (a purple mantle is mentioned in Fagrsk. 1. c.) as a pr. name of a Finnish king, Fb. iii.

möttul-skaut, n. a mantle-skirt, Korm. 214 (as also the verse). Fms. vi. 243.

N (enn), the thirteenth letter, is in the old Runes represented on the Golden horn by the character +, on the stone in Tune by +, and in the later Runes by + or +, all derived from the Lat.-Gr. \wedge ; it was called nauð (need, A. S. neâd), nauð görir neppa kosti, Runic poem. In ancient MSS. the capital N or the A.S. H is used to mark a double n, thus, may, keya, = mann, kenna.

PRONUNCIATION.—The n is sounded as in other Teut. languages; but nn after a diphthong has a peculiar sound like dnb, thus steinn hreinn = steidnh hreidnh; whereas, after a single short vowel the sound is as usual, hann, mann; this ndb sound does not seem to be ancient, as may be seen from rhymes such as, seinn þykki mér sunnan, Sighvat: a confusion between rn and nn first appears in MSS. of the 15th century; e. g. eirn hreim, = einn hreinn, and so in early print: before t the n is aspirate, vint = vinht, cp. introduction to letter L.

CHANGES.—The nn before r in olden times was often changed to and sounded as ô, not only in maôr, suôr (=mannr, sunnr), öðrum, aðrir, aðrar (from annarr), miðr (= minnr), in which cases it is still sounded so; but also in saor, muor, bruor, fior, meor, uor, guor, kuor, = sannr...kunnr; tveðr = tvennr, gryðri = grynnri, Bs. i. 342, 349; sadrar = sannrar, Greg. 23, Likn. 3: it is so used in rhymes by the poets; in all these latter instances the nn has reappeared in mod. usage; cp. Engl. mouth = munnr, but sunna (the sun). May not the change of the participles in -iôr into -inn (Gramm. p. xxiv, col. 2) be due to the same phonetic principle, but in inverted order? The n is elided in jamn-mikit, sounded and spelt jam-mikit; jam-góðr = jamn-góðr:--nn or n for nd, in sunz = sunds, lanz = lands, munnlaug = mundlaug; bundnir, sounded bunnir and spelt so, Edda i. 240. In some words the nn is due to assimilation, as that of zn in rann, Goth. razna; but often of nb or nd in the cognate Teut. languages, thus Icel. nenna, Goth. nanhjan; finna, Engl. find. For the absorption of final and medial n see Gramm. p. xxx, col. 1.

For words with a radical b (bn) see under H. -NA, a suff. demonstr. particle, see Gramm. p. xxxviii, col. 2 (III); esp. freq. in mod. usage in the words hér-na, þar-na, ha-na, nú-na, svá-na (proncd. svo-na or so-na), q. v., Band. 18; as also þér-na, Fms. vi. 422; bat-na, MS. 623. 19; bess-na, Fas. ii. 147; viò-na, Fms. iii. 73; gærna, vi. 254: with verbs rarely, var-na, Fas. ii. 174: part. spurt-na, Fb. i. 433: and lastly in the pers. pron. ha-nn, hó-n.

NABBI, a, m. [Engl. knob; North. E. and Scot. nab], a small protuberance on the skin or on greensward; nabba-þýfi, fjalls-n., D. N. iii. 861, freq. in mod. usage: the name of a dwarf, Hdl. 7.

NADDR, m. a stud, nail; knébjargir með stálhörðum nöddum, Sks. 405; nadda á umgjörðinni, Fms. vi. 212; hann hnitar saman penninginn, ok eru tuttugu naddar á, Gísl. 14; nadda borð, a 'stud-board,' poët. for a shield from its being ornamented with metal studs, see Fms. vii. 323: in poetry, nadda él, róg, as also nadd-él, -fár, -skúr, -regn, -hríð, -veor, = a battle, Lex. Poët. nadd-göfugr, adj. 'stud-glorious,' an epithet of Heimdal, Hdl. 34, with reference to the beams of dawn (studs of light?); as an epithet of a giant, the father of Men-gloo, Gg. 14.

NADB, m., and naora, u, f.; the r is radical, naors, naori, an irreg. dat. nöðri, Edda 97 (in a verse); [Ulf. nadrs = ξχιδνα, Luke iii. 7; A. S. nædre; O. H. NAFN, often spelt namn, n.; [Ulf. namo; common to all Teut. languages without the n, which has been preserved in the Norse; Dan. navn; Swed. namn; Lat. nomen; Gr. ovoua]:—a name; af hans nafni tók nafn Britannia, Fms. xi. 416; spyrja e-n at nafni, Nj. 6; gefa namn, Grág. i. 101; at nafni, by name, passim; kalla á namn e-s, 623. 24; 1 nafni e-s, in one's name, id., passim; skirnar-nafn, a baptismal name; auk-nafn, a nickname. For the ancient ceremony, even of the heathen age, of sprinkling infants with water and giving them a name see the remarks and references given s. v. ausa, (to which add Dropl. 25, ok mun ek ekki við þér sjá, þvíat þú jóst mik vatni.) Proper names were either single as Steinn or compound as Hall-steinn, por-steinn, Vé-steinn, Hásteinn, Her-steinn, Gunn-steinn, see porst. hv. 46, Eb. 126 new Ed. (Append.); for giving names to infants see Vd. ch. 13, Nj. ch. 14, 59, Ld. ch. 13, Eb. ch. 7, 11, 12, and the Sagas passim. The ancient Teutons and Scandinavians used but one name, for nicknames are rare or of later date, and perh, came into use through contact with foreigners, as with the Gaelic tribes in the west, for in the Landn, such names abound in Icel., though they were afterwards disused; the law makes it a case of outlawry to 'give names,' ef maðr gefr manni nafn annat en hann eigi áðr ok varðar fjörbaugs garð, ef hann reiðisk við, Grág. (Kb.) ii. 182, see however nafnfestr below. For illustration see lists of names subjoined to the Editions of the Sagas, Landn., Bs., Fms., Fb. iii, Espól. Annals; a list of nicknames, Fb. iii. 657-663. Worthy of note is the desire of the men of old to live again in a new name, cp. Vd. ch. 3, Fb. ii. 7-9, and many other instances; one who falls short of the man he is named after is said to kafna undir 2. gramm. a noun, Skálda 180. NE or né, a negative conjunction. The Goth, makes a distinction between ni = A. S. ne, O. H. G. ni; and the compound particle nib, from ni + the suffix ub, O. H. G. nob, Germ. noch, Lat. nec, of which Icel. né is a contr. form; etymologically, therefore, the single particle ought to be written ne and the compound ne; but this distinction is not made. The particle ne is not found out of composition except in ancient poetry; it is found as a prefix in the compounds neinn, nekkverr, nema (q. v.), qs. ne-einn, ne-hverr, ne-ifa.

This ancient 'nosetax' was also imposed by the Norsemen on conquered countries, and the name gave rise to strange legends; thus, king Thorgisl, the Norse conqueror of Ireland (A.D. 830-845), is, by an Irish chronicler, said to have levied a tax of an ounce on each hearth, the penalty for defaulters being the loss of their nose. Prof. Munch, Norg. Hist. i. 440, has traced the origin of this legend to the simple fact that the king imposed a 'nosetax' or poll-tax on the conquered Irish, just as Harold Fairhair afterwards did in Norway.

neiting, f. a denial, Hom. 11, Th. 8: gramm. the negative, Skálda 200.

NEKKVERR, indef. pron.; this word is a compound of the negative particle né (q. v.) and the pronoun hverr, qs. nih-hverr, ne-hverr, nekkverr; the double k (in the oldest MSS, often represented by eq) may be due to the final b of the particle, as the compd was formed at a time when the final b had not been absorbed into né: [Dan. nogen; Swed. ndgon.]

A. THE FORMS: this pronoun has undergone great changes. The earliest declension is the same as that of hverr, see Gramm. p. xxi; nekkverr, nekkver, Bs. i. 353, Greg. 13, 26, 33, Grág. ii. 205, 206, 304, Fms. x. 389, 393: gen. nekkvers, nekkverrar, passim: dat. nekkverjum, nekkverju, nekkverri, Greg. 16, 79, Eluc. 27, Bs. i. 352: acc. nekkvern, nekkverja, Grág. i. 41, ii. 251, 270, 313, Fms. x. 381, 390, 391, Greg. 15, Bs. i. 337, 344 (line 14), 352: nom. pl. masc. and fem. nekkverir, nekkverjar, Grág. ii. 205, Bs. i. 355: gen. nekkverra, Greg. 23, 28, and so on. The word then underwent further changes, a. by dropping the j; nekkveru, Grag. ii. 281; nekkverar, Fms. x. 381; nekkverum, β. by change of the vowels; nakkverr 382; nekkvera, 393, 415. or nekkvarr, or even nakkvarr, nakkvat, see below; nakkvert, Bs. i. 342 (line 12); nakkvara, O. H. 62, 116; nakkvars, Fms. vii. 388, xi. 29, Edda 48; nakkvarir, Fms. vii. 337, Mork. 169; nakkvarar, Fms. vii. 328, Greg. 9; nakkvarra (gen. pl.), D. I. i. 185; nakkvarrar, O. H. 116; nakkverrar (gen. fem. sing.), Bs. i. 393.

7. the a of nakk through the influence of the v was changed into o (nokk), and then into o, and the final va into vo, and in this way the word became a regular adjective, nökkvorr or nokkvorr, nokkvor, Mork. 57, Fms. x. 261; nokkvot, Bs. i. 393; nokkvoð, Mork. 62, Fms. x. 383, 391; nokkvors, passim; nokkvoru, Nj. 34, Fms. x. 393, 394; nokkvorum, 305; nokkvorrar, Edda i. 214; nokkvorn, 210; nokkvorir, Fms. vi. 5, x. 294. 8. the v dropped out; nokkorr, nokkurr, nokkorr, nokkor, Vsp. 33 (Bugge), Greg. 9, 8. the ν dropped Grág. (Kb.) i. 66, 75, 208, ii. 3, Mork. 168, O. H. 224, Grág. i. 1, ii. 366, Nj. 267, Fms. ix. 276, x. 135; nokkoð, Hkv. 2. 5; nokkort, Grág. i. 460; nokkorum, Skv. 3. 58 (Bugge), Grág. i. 45, 361, Fms. ix. 370, Nj. 7; nokkoru, Fms. i. 1, x. 420, Grág. ii. 129, Nj. 41, Eg. 394, Hkr. iii. 160; nökkorn, Fms. x. 409; nokkorn, xi. 6, Nj. 6, Mork. 205, Ld. 30; nokkorir, Mork. 205; nokkorar, Nj. 252, Fms. x. 388; see Gramm. e. finally in mod. usage we have contracted forms before a vowel, thus nokkrir, nokkrum, nokkrar, except that the gen. pl. and gen. fem. sing. are still pronounced as trisyllables, nokkurrar, nokkurra; these contracted forms have erroneously crept into Editions from paper MSS.

etc. All the above forms occur confusedly even in very old MSS., Dipl. i. 7. Sti. 177. and even the latest form nokkorr occurs in vellums as old as Cod. Reg. of the elder Edda, in the Mork., Greg., Grág. (Kb.) In addition to the above, there are mixed forms, nekkurr, 623. 41; nekkorar, Fms. x. 388: nekkers, Grág. (Kb.) 22; nökkurja, 623, 50; nakkor, B.K. 124; nokkverja, Fms. xi. 6; nauceverjar, navegveriom, Mork. 62, 64, II. nakkvat, n. subst., answering to hvat (q. v.), O. H. 72, Bs. i. 344, 348, 350, 353, Am. 32, Bugge. 2. nokkvi (Lat. aliquanto), an obsolete dat. (subst.) answering to hví; svá nökkvi. Hallfred (Fs. 80); i nökkvi, in aught, Hom. 43; af nökkvi, for aught, Fs. 04 (v. l.), Fms. iii. 27; noqvi, Hkv. 2. 26 (Bugge); nökkvi ofarr, Fms. vii. 304 (in a verse); nökkvi síðarr, ix. 533 (in a verse): in prose, nökkvi yngri, xi. 96; neykvi nær sanni, Hkr. iii. 360; nekkvi réttligar, 677. 11; nökkvi helst, Fms. xi. 78, MS. 677. 6; véla e-n í nökkvi, Grág. ii. 22, 367; því nökkvi, 129; nær sanni nökkvi, Fms. x. 420; neykvi, Am. 26 (Bugge); framast nekkvi. III. the neut, sing, is thus distinguished: nakkvat, nokkvoð, nokkuð (answering to hvat), are often used as a substantive, but nekkvert, nokkvort, nokkurt (answering to hvert), as an adjective. The primitive hverr has partly undergone the same metamorphosis as the compd nehverr, and in western Icel. is sounded kyur, and in mod. Norse dialect kor, shewing the complete change.

B. THE SENSE: the negative particle, the first part of the compound, has quite lost its force, as is the case with neinn, q.v.; but the word is used in negative sentences = any; & ongum bæ fannsk nökkurr maðr, Fms. ix. 355, and so freq. in mod. usage. single and without a preceding negative; ef nökkurr maðr veit eigi, if anybody know not, Grág. ii. 209; er nökkverr Guð sem vár. NÍD, n. [Ulf. neib = φθόνος; A. S. nîð; O. H. G. nid; Germ. neid; Dan.-Swed. nid]: -contumely, Vsp. 56; segja e-m nio, Akv. 35. particularly as a law term, a libel, liable to outlawry:-of a libel in verse, yrkja, kveða níð um e-n, Nj. 70; ef maðr kveðr níð um mann at lögbergi ok varðar skóggang, Grág. (Kb.) ii. 184: the classical passages in the Sagas are Hkr. O. T. ch. 36, cp. Jómsv. S. ch. 13 (Fms. xi. 42, 43), Kristni S. ch. 4, Nj. ch. 45, Bjarn. 33 (the verse). Another and even graver kind of níð was the carving a person's likeness (tré-níð) in an obscene position on an upraised post or pole (níð-stöng), for an instance of which see Bjarn. 33; ef maðr görir níð um annan ok varðar þat fjörbaugsgarð, en þat er níð ef maðr skerr tréníð manni eðr rístr eða reisir manni nióstöng, Grág. i. 147; when the post was set up, a horse's head was also put up, and a man's head was carved on the pole's end, with dire Runes and imprecations; all this is described in a lively manner in Eg. ch. 60 and Vd. ch. 34, Landn. 4. ch. 4, Rd. ch. 25. The beina-kerlinga-visur of mod. times are no doubt a remnant of the old niostong; -certain stone pyramids (varða) along mountain-roads are furnished with sheeps' legs or horses' heads, and are called beina-kerling (bone carline); one of the most noted is on the Kaldadal, as one passes from the north to the south of Iceland, it is even marked in the map; a passing traveller alights and scratches a ditty called beina-kerlinga-visa (often of a scurrilous or even loose kind) on one of the bones, addressing it to the person who may next pass by; for a specimen see Bjarni 193, as also in poems of Jon porláksson, for there hardly was a poet who did not indulge in these poetical licences. In popular legends the devil always scratches his writing on a blighted horse's bone.

norðr-ljós, n. [Dan. nordlys], the northern lights, polar light, aurora borealis, in mod. usage only in plur.; an ancient description of the northern lights is given in the Sks. ch. 19 (by a Norwegian writer). From the words-eða þat er Grænlendingar kalla norðrljós, Sks. 74-it appears that the Icel, settlers of Greenland were the first who gave a name to this phenomenon; the author of the Sks. also describes the northern lights as they appeared in Greenland.

Noregt, m., gen. Noregs; a later Noregis also occurs in Laur. S.; [mod. Norse Norge, sounded Norre :- Norway, passim; that the word was sounded Noregr with a long vowel is seen from rhymes in Vellekla (10th century), Nóregr, fóru; as also Nóregs, stórum, Sighvat (in a poem of 1038 A.D.); the full form Norð-vegr (with δ and w) never occurs in vernacular writers, but only in the Latinised form, Northwagia, which was used by foreign writers (North Germans and Saxons); even the v (Nor-vegr) is hardly found in good vellums, and is never sounded. The etymology of the latter part = vegr is subject to no doubt, and the former part nor is prob. from nordr, qs. the north way; yet another derivation, from $n \delta r = a$ sea-loch, is possible, and is supported by the pronunciation and by the shape of the country, a strip of land between sea and mountains, with many winding fjords. The popular but false etymology of the ancients is from a king Nór (Orkn. ch. 12), as Rome from Romulus:-Noregs-höfdingi, -konungr, -menn, -riki, -veldi, the ruler, king, men, kingdom of Norway, Grag, ii. 401, Fms. vii. 293, Bs. i. 720, Sturl. ii. 55, Nj. 8, Isl. ii. 234, passim.

O, the fourteenth letter, is in the oldest Runes, on the stone in Tune, and on the Golden horn figured by $\mathbf{\hat{\chi}}$, which was evidently taken from the Greek $\mathbf{\hat{\Omega}}$; the later common Runic alphabet in earlier monuments has no δ , but uses u or au instead, e.g. on the Jellinge stone in Denmark. Afterwards the Rune $\mathbf{4}$, \mathbf{k} , or $\mathbf{4}$, $\mathbf{4}$, appears under the name of δ ss in the Runic poems— δ ss or flestra ier δa (= fjar δa) = all firths bave an oss (mouth). The form was evidently taken from the A. S. Runic B, which stands for a, and in A.S. is called os, which answers, not to Norse oss (ostium), but to ass (= ans, i.e. the heathen gods); but the Norsemen or Danes in borrowing the Rune seem to have misinterpreted its name or mistranslated it from ignorance of the phonetic laws existing between the A.S. and the Norse. The | in Scandinavian Runic inscriptions is therefore a mark of later date (11th or 12th century).

B. Pronunciation.—The o is either short (o) or long (b); the former (o) is sounded like Engl. o in cod, the latter (d) as in Engl. no, note; but the rules given at the beginning of the introduction to letter A (p. 1) apply equally to this letter, bod being sounded bawth, but kross in North. E. cross.

C. Changes.—In most of the oldest vellums o instead of u is used throughout in inflexions, -o, -or, -om, -on, -oô, -ot, -osk, -oll, -onn, instead of -u, -ur, -um...-unn (Gramm. p. xxxv, col. 1, A); afterwards both forms are used indiscriminately, till in the 15th century the u prevailed, and has kept its place ever since; whether there was a difference in sound, and what, we are unable to state. 2. so also in a few root words, god, goll, fogl, oxi, skolu, monu, hogr, togr, monr (Dan. mon), smogoll, = guð, gull, fugl, uxi, skulu, munu, hugr, tugr, munr, smugull; on the other hand, is sonr (a son), but sunr the older form. 8. a and o or u interchange in the inflexions, fagnaðr, fognoðr, fögnuðr; kallan, kollon, köllun. 4. ú has changed into ó in the prefixed negative, ó-vitr for n-vitr (unwise). 5. jú into jó, njóta, originally njúta; ljós, Swed. ljús: forms like mjókr for mjúkr, dókr for dúkr may also be found in II. \acute{a} , the vowel-change of \acute{a} (see vellums, but are very rare. p. 1), is frequently spelt o (tor, nott, = tor, nott), but was in sound different from o proper, and has since disappeared from the language, although remains of this 'umlaut' still exist in nótt, ól, spónn (= nott, ol, sponn), but this o is sounded exactly like common o. So also o and o are confounded in MSS., bornom = bornom = bornom. For the absorption of consonants see Gramm. p. xxx, col. I, and the words themselves.

Owing to the inability of the Scandinavian languages to sound v (w) before a vowel of the u class, several root words, which in dictionaries of the cognate languages (Germ., Engl.) begin with w, are in the Icelandic to be found under o, as okr, ord, orka, ormr, Odinn, odr, ósk, ómr; as also j, in ok (jugum), ostr, and ok the conjunction.

obláta or oblát, f. [Lat. word], a sacramental wafer, oblát, acc., 625. 192; oblátu buðkr, Vm. 6.

odd-hagr, adj. skilled in wood-carving, Bs. i. 143, Fas. i. 292.

odd-hending, f. a metrical term, when the first rhyming syllable stands at the head of a verse; thus in baf-lödur skeflir the syllable 'haf' is an oddhending, Edda (Ht.) 121: in mod. usage, in Ballads (Rimur), it means two rhyming syllables in the first, and one in the second line, three being an odd number of rhyme syllables—thus, sveipaor mund | á silki hrund | sat eg undir kvendi is an oddhending.

odd-hendr, adj. written in the metre oddhending, Edda 139.

odd-hvass, adj. sbarp-pointed, Bs. ii. 172.

oddi, a, m. a triangle, a point or tongue of land, Landn. 294, v.l.; vaxinn með þremr oddum, Fms. x. 272. II. metaph. from the triangle, an odd number, opp. to even; ein er bæn, eða þrjár, fimm, eða sjau, því er bæna tal í odda, en eigi í jafna tölu, at sú tala er í odda er, merkir eining, ok má eigi deila i tvá hluti jafna, 625. 187: hence the metaph. phrase, standask i odda, to be at odds (Shakesp.), quarrelling; stóðsk allt í odda með þeim Þormóði ok Gesti, Fb. ii. 204 (skarsk í odda, Fbr. 81 new Ed. less correct); hefir nú ok í odda staðizk með oss um hríð, Ísl. ii. 180. III. freq. in local names, of a tongue of land; Oddi, Odda-staor, whence Odda-verjar, m. pl. the men from Oddi :-- as a pr. name, Oddi, Stjörnu-Oddi = Star-Oddi, Oddi the astronomer, an Icelander of the 12th century skilled in astronomy, from whom proceeded the computation called Odda-tal, n. the calculus of Oddi, Rb. 6. COMPDS: odda-maor, m. [Dan. op-mand, qs. 'oddmand']:-the third man, who gives the casting vote, the odd man (third, fifth...): as in the saying, oddamaðr er opt inn þriði, | jafntrúr skal sá beggja liði, Mkv.; hvárt sem tveir megu eða fleiri göra sátt, enda verða peir eigi ásáttir, þá er rétt at þeir taki sér oddamann, Grág. i. 485; þeir conceit; því at hón verðr eigi svá mikil, at þar muni of þitt allt i liggu.

🕈 skyldi sjálfir semja sættir sínar, en Rafn vera oddamaðr, ef þá skildi á, odda-tala, u, f. an odd number. Sturl. iii. 179.

ODDR, m. [A. S. ord; Germ. ort = 'point' of land, spot, place, but in early Germ. = Lat. cuspis; Dan.-Swed. od, odd]:-a point of a weapon, Am. 59, Karl. 506, K. p. K. 96, and in countless instances, kniis-oddt, nálar-o., als-o., spjóts-o. (but blóðrefill of a sword): the allit. phrase, oddr ok egg, Hom. 33; med oddi ok eggju, with point and edge, at the sword's point, by force, Nj. 149, Grág. ii. 13; ætla ek at sækja oddi ok eggju frændleifð mína, O. H. 32; brjóta odd af oflæti sínu, to break the point of one's pride, to bumble oneself, Nj. 94: poët. a point, spear, folvar oddar, Hkv. 1. 52; sedja ara oddum, 2. 7; oddar gorva jarli 2. a spur, which in olden times had a single point, megin, see jarl. see Worsaae, No. 356. II. metaph. the front; hann hafði yxnum skipat í odd á liði sínu, Fms. x. 404. 2. a leader; hann var oddr ok æsir fyrir þessum úfriði, Fms. viii. 57, v. l. III. a pr. name, Oddr as well as Oddi: in compds, of men, Odd-bjorn, Odd-geirr, Odd-leifr, Odd-marr; of women, Odd-björg, Odd-frior, Oddkatla, Odd-laug, Odd-leif, Odd-ný, and in the latter part bor-oddr, Arn-oddr, Landn.

odd-viti, a, m. a leader, chief, who marches ahead, Hkv. Hjörv. 10, Hkv. 2. 10, O. H. 61, 214, Niorst. 108.

OF, prep. with dat. and acc., the form varies; umb is an obsolete and rare form, hence um, sounded umm, which is far the most common form in old writers, and has altogether superseded both umb and of: [the 'of' answers nearest to Ulf. uf; O. H. G. oba; Germ. ob; Gr. ὑπό; Lat. sub; Sansk. upa.] Most of the oldest vellums, as also the poets, prefer to use 'of,' yet not all, for the Cod. Reg. of Sæm. Edda in nine cases out of ten writes um, so also did the Cod. Acad. primus (the Kringla) of the Hkr.; and this is important, for these two vellums are our chief sources for old poetry; on the other hand, the Cod. Reg. of the Snorra Edda prefers 'of.' Among other vellums the old fragment of the Orkn. S. (Arna-Magn. No. 325) mostly uses 'of,' as of nóttina, Orkn. 110; of hans daga, 178; of Jól, 180; of daga þeirra bræðra, 182; but also 'um.' e. g. ofan um sik, ofan um hann, id. The word will be given in full under letter U, so that a few references may suffice here: in the sense over, Lat. super, with dat. and acc., a. jord grar of sgztum barma, Eg. (in a verse); brann of fylki, Yt.; of svírum, Hornklon; dik flæði of líkum, Fms. xi. 191; sjár þýtr of árum, vi. (in a verse); of bý breiðum, Lex. Poët. β. with acc., of nýt regin, Vþm. 13: of dróttmögu, II; of liðu, Sdm. 9; of sumar, Vsp. 40; of garð risa, Gs.; of lopt ok lög, Hkv.; úlfr gengr of ynglings börn, Eg. (in a verse); vestr fór ek of ver, Höfuðl. I; liggja of ungan Mörukára, Fms. vi. (in a II. in a causal sense = Lat. ob; of sanna sok, for a just sake, justly, Fms. ii. 322 (in a verse); of minna, for a less cause, Glum. (in a verse); of litla sök, Lex. Poët.; of sannar deildir, id.; of minni sorgir, Korm. (in a verse).

OF and um, an enclytic particle, chiefly placed before verbs or participles, seldom before nouns; it is obsolete, and occurs only in old poetry and now and then in the oldest prose; the spelling varies, for here too the Cod. Reg. of Sæm. Edda, as also the Kringla, mostly preter um, so as to take examples from the poem Hm., um skodask, um skygnask, 1; um getr, 8; um á (owns), 9; þylsk hann um, um getr, 17; um farit, 18; sins um máls, 21; um gelr, 29; um þörf, 38; um getr, 58, 65; um dvelr, 59; um viðrir, 74; um lagit, 84; um vakin. 100; um komin, um sofin, 101; um kominn, 104; um gaf, 105; um geta, 123; um heilli, 129; um reist, 145; um stendr, 154; um kann, 163: of gat, 140; of alinn, 72; of kom, 145; of vitaor, 100; of blotio, 145: vf, vf booit, 67; vf heimtir, 14: thus in this single poem 'um' occurs about twenty-four times, 'of' five times, and 'vf' twice: for the other poems see Bugge's Edition: on the other hand, of traddi, Gh. 2; of prumir, Gm. 8; of hyggi, 34; at ek öllum öl yðr of heita, Hým. 3: of geta, 4; of teknir, 14; of heitt, 32:—in prose, ef maðr má eigi of koma, Grag. ii. 209; of förlar, Kb. 14; of telrat, 178; er heðan of sér. Isl. (Heidarv. S.) ii. 387; en er of set eigi ljos, but you see not the light, 645. 81; at eigi of sá á miðli, Ib. 11; má of rannsaka, 677. 6; þó at báðum of göri, 2; ok af því of eykr eigi atkvæði, Skálda (Thorodd) 165; sem menn of bera megu, Hom. (St.); at hann megi jafníuss of vera, id., and passim in that old vellum, see Fritzner's Dict. s. v.; ef pri um náir, Grág. (Kb.) 209; ef þeir um sitja, 74; um ves, 76; um taki. 89; um göra (twice), 109; um telrat, 194; um býðr, 230; um komi. 234; ef sól um sæi, if the sun was to be seen, ch. 29. before nouns; sins um máls, Hm. (see above); um þörf, 38; as hans of dólgr, Skv.; Baldrs of barmi, Haustl.; öll of rök, Alm. 9; of skopt. kinsmen, Edda (Gl.), Lex. Poët.; of tregi, Gkv. 1. 3 (thus Bugge in two words); þórs of rúni, Haustl.; of kúgi, an oppressor, Fms. vii. (in 2 verse); with adjectives, of reior, Skm.: it remains in some old sayings or phrases, an er illt um gengi; um seinan, Nj. 91.

ofn-stofa, u, f. an 'oven-closet,' close stove, batb-room, Fms. vi. 440, where it is stated that king Olave the Quiet (1066-1093) was the first who introduced ovens or stoves (ofn-stofa) into the hall instead of the old open fires, see eldr (II); these stoves served for bathing and for heating the rooms; hann lét ok fyrst göra ofnstofur ok steingólf vetr sem sumar. The account of the death of the Berserkers in Eb. ch. 28, referring to the 10th century, may therefore be an anachronism and not an historical fact, for it is reported as extraordinary for Iceland that a bishop of Holar (a Norseman) in the year 1316 built a 'stone-oven' (brick-oven)
in his house, Laur, S. I. c.

OK, copulative conj.; the mod. form is og, which appears in the 15th century MSS., but the word is usually in the MSS. written thus J. The Runic inscriptions mostly have auk, which diphthongal form has in the conj. been changed into ok, but is retained in the adverbial auk = etiam. As neither the stone in Tune nor the Golden horn happens to all those, and (whom) they had got hold of, Fms. xi. 14.

The particle ok is characteristic of the Scandinavian languages, as distinguished from the Germ. und, Engl. and; although this is more apparent than real, for the identity of ok with the Goth. copulative particle jab and ub, Hel. jac, has been conclusively demonstrated by Grimm, who also makes out an identity between Goth. ub, standing for bu, and Gr. ual, Lat. -que; the metathesis of ub for bu is analogous to Lat. ac = Gr. wai. Grimm farther supports this etymology by comparing the Teutonic compounds ne-hu, Icel. contr. né, with Lat. ne-c = ne-que, which proves the identity of both the suffixed particles, the Lat. c or que and the Teut. ub. The Goth. jab is a compound = $j\hat{a}$ -ub = 'immo-que;' the Norse ok, too, is prob. a compound particle, the j being dropped, and then ja-ub contracted into aub = auk; the final guttural b (sounded as χ), instead of being absorbed by the preceding vowel, was hardened into the tenuis k. The negative verbal suffix -a and -a0, the nominal suffix -gi, and the copula ok will thus all be derived from one root,—one of the many instances of the Protean transformations of particles, even the negative and positive being interwoven into the same word.

A. And, a copula between two or more nouns; i upphasi skapaði Guð himinn ok jörð, Edda (pref., Gen. i. 1); ríki ok konungdóm, Fms. i. 23; mikill ok sterkr, Nj. 2; væn kona ok kurteis ok vel at sér, 1; dætr prjár ok sonu prjá, 30. If the nouns are many the usage may vary:-the nouns may be paired off, eldr ok vatn, jarn ok malmr, Edda 36; or the copula is only put to the last, eldr, vatn, járn ok málmr; or, if emphatic, it may be reiterated, eldr ok vatn ok járn ok málmr; or ok may be left out altogether, málmr, steinar, jörðin, viðirnir, sóttirnar, dýrin, fuglarnir, eitrormar, Edda l. c. 2. bæði ok, bæði er hann vitr ok framgjarn, 3. in comparison, as, and, = Lat. ac, atque; med jöfnum Nj. 6. skildaga ok Hrólfr Kraki görði, Fb. ii. 137; samr maðr ok áðr, the same man as before, i. 364; hafa með sér sín epli, ok bera saman ok hin, and compare them and the others, Edda 46; hen var he úlik ok fyrt, Fms. i. 185; þat er mjök sundrleitt ok Kristuir menn göra, it differs much from what Christians do, x. 171; á sömu leið ok fyrr, i. 253; samsumars ok Steingerör gékk frá Bersa, Korm. 160; jamvandhæfr ok fjörbaugsmaðr, Grág. i. 89. 4. of an adversative character, and yet, but; mörgum sárum ok engum stórum, Fins. x. 370; þeita eru áheyrilig boð, ok újafnlig, Nj. 77; úsællig kona ertú, ok (bus yet) ekki svá at eigi megi sæma við slíkt, Fms. vii. 167.

5. the particle ok connects 5, the particle ok connects together the parts of the sentence; be mælti Frigg, ok spurði, then spoke Frigg, and asked, Edda 37; at þú bættir ráð þitt, ok bæðir þér konu, thou shouldst mend thy condition, and take thee a wife, Nj. 2:-it is used to mark the progress of a speech or sentence, fellusk Asum orðtök ok svá hendr, ok så hverr til annars, ok vóru allir með einum hug til þess er unnit hafði verkit; Loki tók Mistiltein, ok sleit upp, ok gékk til þings...; Höðr tók Mistiltein, ok skaut at Baldri; Æsir tóku lík Baldrs, ok flutta til sjávar, Edda 37; sendu þeir Ívar til hans, ok skyldi hann vita, Fms. II. in the old law (the Grag.) the apodosis or conclusion is X. 27. headed by ok, then, as in the standing phrase, ok veror hann útlagr, ok vardar þat ... marka útlegð, and be sball pay, i. e. then be sball . . .; þeir menn er sakir eigu, ok skulu þeir ganga til dóms..., and so in every III. in some ancient epic poems the ok is page of the Grágás. as an historical particle put at the head of sentences or verses in a manner which closely resembles the use of the Hebrew 1; the old Yt. is in this respect remarkable,—ok sikling, I; ok salbjartt, 2; ok sá brann, 3; ok Visburs, ok allvald, 4; ok landherr, 5; ok ek þess opt fregit hafðak, 6; ok allvald, 7; ok þat orð, 8; ok hnakkmars, 10; ok varð hinn, 11; ok Hagbarðs, 12; ok þrálifr...ok sveiðuðs, 13; ok lofsæll, 14; ok Austmarr, ok við aur, ok dáðgjarn, 16; ok ljóshömum, 18; ok ofveg, ok sá frömuðr, 19; ok Ingjald, ok sjá urðr, 20; ok Skæreið, 22; ok nú liggr, 23: ok launsigr, ok budlung, 24; ok um ráð, ok launsigr, 25; ok niokvisl, 26; - so used about thirty times in this single poem; in other poems less freq., but yet it occurs, e.g. in the fragments of Vellekla, see also the references given s.v. auk (III).

IV. the placing the copula before both the parts to be joined is curious; this only occurs in a few instances in old poetry; ok einnar atta, 'and' one eight, i. e. one plus eight = nine, Hd. (composed about 986 A.D.); ok harar hamljót, 'and boary scraggy' = boary and scraggy, Haustl.; ok Sörli þeir Hamdir, 'and Sorli Hamdir' = S. and H., Bragi; ok atta enni-tungl fjögur höfuð, 'and eight eyes four beads,' i.e. four beads and eight eyes, id.; ok hörga blothus, Rekst.; ok svá jarlar Ólafar, = jarlar ok svá Óláfar, Sighvat; ok hringa hlínar óþurft mína, the woe of her and myself, Kormak; ok há grasi viði = há grasi ok viði, Gm. 17; ok Elfar Gandvikr miðli, Edda (Ht.) 1.

V. used as an interjection; þá skalt fara i Kirkjubæ—Ok, hvat skal ek þangat? Nj. 74; ok skaltú enn þora at mæla jöfnum orðum við mik, 656 B. 10: akin to this is the mod. usage in exclamations, wrath, wonder, indignation, og, hvað er nú að tarna! og, hvernig ætli þú látir! og, ekki nema það! the following are prob. ellipt.; segdú mér þat..., ok ek vilja vita, tell thou me that, and I wish to know = that which I want to know, Skm. 3; ætlar jarl at höggva þessa menn alla, ok þeir höfðu nú höndum á komit,

O- or u-, the negative prefix before nouns and verbs, [Goth., Engl., and Germ. un-; Dan. and Swed. û-, the nasal being absorbed. The Icel. at a very early date changed this ú into ó, for the very oldest and best vellums use o, not only the Greg., Eluc., 1b., the Miracle-book (Bs. i. 333 sqq.), but also the Grag., the Cod. Reg. of the Sæm. Edda, etc.; in later vellums of the better kind & and o are used promiscuously; till about the union with Norway the u prevailed, and is chiefly used in vellums of the 14th century; but in the 15th the o again took its old place, and has been retained ever since, agreeably with the usual pronunciation. The b is therefore the proper Icel. form, e.g. 6-vitr = Engl. unwise; that it was sounded thus even in the 12th century is also shewn by the treatise of the second grammarian (Gramm. p. i, col. 1),—o eor ú þat skiptir orðum, svá sem er satt eðr ó-satt (ú-satt), Skálda 171. This change of spelling in the MSS. about (or a little before) the union with Norway cannot have been owing to any change in pronunciation, but was simply a Norwegianism, as were many other cases, e. g. the dropping the b before liquids, contrary to the Icel. pronunciation. On the other hand, as for the rest of Scandinavia, the u has been retained in Denmark and in the east of Norway; but \dot{o} in the west and north of Norway (see Ivar Aasen's Dict.), as also in mod. Swed. (e. g. o-möjlig = Germ. un-möglicb). In early Swed. (in the laws) u and o are used indifferently. The Orkneys seem to have followed the Icel., to judge from a rhyme in the poem Jd. composed by bishop Bjarni (died A.D. 1222), a native of the Orkneys,-6-teitan mik sútar, the metre of which requires a half rhyme, a rule followed strictly throughout that poem.

B. Of the compds with u- or δ -, all but a few words are from un-; these exceptional words appear to be contractions, either, ör-, where we have such double forms as ör-sekr and ó-sekr, N.G.L. i. 379; ör-viti and ó-viti, ó-verðr and ör-verðr, ó-vænn and ör-vænn, örhæfi and ú-hæfa, ör-keypis and ó-keypis, ú-dæmi qs. ör-dæmi (?), ó-bóta qs. ör-bóta (?), ó-birgr and ör-birgr; perh. also ú-helgi qs. ör-holgi, ú-heilagr qs. ör-heilagr; cp. also such words as ú-megin and ör-megna, ú-synja qs. In some of these instances doubt may arise, for a double set of compds might have sprung up. On the other hand, the great number of compds with ur-, er- in German and Saxon, and the scarcity of such words in the Norse tongue, lead to the conclusion that many of these compds in the course of time have been lost or replaced by u-; cp. also of-allt and á-valt, (of-saka and á-saka, of-brýði and á-brýði, of-munir and á-munr, af-vöxtr and á-vöxtr, af-burðr and of-burdr?). Since in most Editions the spelling with ú- has been adopted in these classes of words, they must be sought for under that head.

δδα-got, n. burry, flurry.δδα-kapp, n. = όδαönn,

OĐAL, n., pl. ôðul; in Norse MSS, it is usually contracted before a vowel (whence arose the forms öðli eðli), and owing to a peculiarity in the Norse sound of δ an r is inserted in contracted forms, örðla, orðlom, N. G. L. passim: [akin to aðal, öðli, eðli, =nature; öðlask = adipisci; öðlingr, q. v.; A. S. εδel = patrimony; it is also the parent word of Germ. edel, adel, =noble, nobility, for the nobility of the earliest Teut. communities consisted of the land-owners. From this word also originated mid. Lat. allodium, prob. by inverting the syllables for the sake of euphony (all-od = od-al); oðal or eibel is the vernacular Teut. form, allodium the Latinised form, which is never found in vernacular writers; it may be that the transposition of syllables was due to the tb sound in oðal; and hence, again, the word feudal is a compd word, fee-odal, or an odal held as a fee or fief from the king, and answering to heið-launað óðal of the Norse law (heið = fee = king's pay), N. G. L. i. 91.]

B. Nature, inborn quality, property, = adal, edli, ödli, q. v.; this seems to be the original sense, þat er eigi at réttu mannsins óðal, Sks. 326 B; bat er helzt byrjar til farmanns odals, a seaman's life, 52; bat er kaupmanna ódal (= mercatorum est), 28; jörlum öllum ódal batni, Gh. II. 2 law term, an allodium, property beld in allodial tenure, patrimony. The condition which in the Norse law constitutes an odal was either an unbroken succession from father to son (er afi hefir afa leift) through three or more generations, N.G.L. i. 91, 237, Gpl. 284; or unbroken possession for thirty or more years, N.G.L. i. 249; or sixty years, Gbl. 284; or it might be acquired through brand-erfo (q. v.), through weregild, barn-fóstr (q. v.); and lastly heið-launað óðal, an allodial fief, was granted for services rendered to the king, see N. G. L. i. 91: the odal descended to the son, and was opp. to útjarðir (out-lands), and lausa-fé (movables), which descended to the daughter, Gpl. 233; yet even a woman, e. g. a baugrygr (q. v.), could hold an odal, in which case she was called óðals-kona, 92, jörð komin undir snúð ok snældu = an estate come under the rule of the spindle, N. G. L. i. 237; the allit. phrase, arfr ok óðal, 31, Gbl. 250; brigða óðal, N. G. L. i. 86; selja óðal, to sell one's óðal, 237. The oðal was in a certain sense inalienable within a family, so that even when parted with, the possessor still retained a title (land-brigo, máldagi á landi). In the ancient Scandin. communities the inhabited land was possessed by free obalsmen (allodial holders), and the king was the lord of the people, but not of the soil. At a later time, when the small communities were merged into great kingdoms, through conquest or otherwise, the king laid hold of the land, and all the ancient odals were to be held as a grant from the king; such an attempt of king Harold Fairhair in Norway and the earls of Orkney in those islands is recorded in Hkr. Har. S. Harf. ch. 6, Eg. ch. 4, cp. Ld. ch. 2, Orkn. ch. 8, 30, 80 (in Mr. Dasent's Ed.); cp. also Hák. S. Goða ch. 1. Those attempts are recorded in the Icel. Sagas as acts of tyranny and confiscation, and as one of the chief causes for the great emigration from the Scandinavian kingdoms during the 9th century (the question of free land here playing the same part as that of free religion in Great Britain in the 17th century). The attempt failed in Norway, where the old odal institution remains in the main to the present day. Even the attempts of king Harold were, according to historians (Konrad Maurer), not quite analogous to what took place in England after the Conquest, but appear to have taken something like the form of a land-tax or rent; but as the Sagas represent it, it was an attempt towards turning the free odal institution into a feudal one, such as had already taken place among the Teutons in Southern Europe. ODINN, m., dat. Odni; [A.S. Wodan; O. H. G. Wodan, in the Old High German song Phol ende Wodan vuoron zi holza; in the Norse the w is dropped, whence Odinn]: -Odin, Wodan, the name of the founder of the ancient Northern and Teutonic religion, who was afterwards worshipped as the supreme god, the fountain-head of wisdom, the founder of culture, writing, and poetry, the progenitor of kings, the lord of battle and victory; so that his name and that of Allfoor (Allfather, the father of gods and men) were blended together. For Odin as an historical person see esp. Yngl. S., the first chapters of which were originally written by Ari the historian, who himself traced his pedigree back to Odin. For the various tales of Odin as a deity see the Edda and the old poems; for the legends explaining how Odin came by his wisdom, how he was inspired, how he pawned his eye in the well of Mimir, see Vsp. 22; how he hung in the world-tree Yggdrasil, Hm. 139 sqq.; and the most popular account, how he carried away the poetical mead from the giant Suptung, etc., see Hm. 104-110, and Edda 47-49; for his travelling in disguise in search of wisdom among giants and Norns, Vpm., Gm., Vsp. For Odin's many names and attributes see Edda (Gl.) The greatest families, the Ynglings in Sweden, Skjöldungs in Denmark, and the Háleygir in Norway, traced their pedigrees back to Odin, see the poems Yt., Ht., Langfedgatal. In translations from the Latin, Odin was, strangely enough, taken to represent Mercury; thus, kölluðu þeir Pál Óðin, en Barnabas por, they called Paul Odin, but Barnabas they called Thor, is an ancient This seems to rendering of Acts xiv. 12, cp. Clem., Bret., and passim. have originated with the Romans themselves; for Tacitus says, 'deorum maxime Mercurium colunt,' by which he can only mean Wodan; the Romans may have heard the German tales of Wodan's wonderful travels, his many assumed names and disguises, his changes of shape, his eloquence, his magical power,—tales such as abound in the Edda,—and these might make the Romans think of the Greek legends of Hermes: accordingly, when the planetary week days were adopted from the Lat., 'dies Mercurii' was rendered into A.S. by Wodansdag, in Engl. Wednesday, in Dan. Onsdag, in Norse Odins-dagr, Orkn. 386, Fms. ix. 282: Odins-nott, f. Wednesday night, N. G. L. i. 17. In a single instance Athens is rendered by Obins-borg, and the Athenians by Obins-borgar-menn, Post. 645. 90; the name can only have been formed from the Greek name pronounced with the th sound, perhaps by the Northmen at Constantinople, who may have associated the name, thus sounded, with Odin's supposed travels from the east to Sweden, and his halts at various places, which were afterwards called after him, as recorded in Yngl. OL, f. a strap; var höfuðit komit á ólina, Bs. i. 314; the ó, which is kept throughout all the cases, is a remains of the old umlaut; for the references see ál.

Óláfr, m. Olave, an old and favourite pr. name; the oldest form seems to have been Aleifr, from Anleifr, as seen from rhymes, e.g. Aleifr is made to rhyme with reifum, kleif, or the like, Hallfred passim; and, on the other hand, Alafr with stála, hála, Eg. (in a verse), Fms. vi. (in a verse): then the ei was changed into a, Alafar frið gafu, Sighvat: then the initial \dot{a} into \dot{o} , and Olásr is made to rhyme with soil in a poem of the end of the 11th century: lastly, the medial \acute{a} into a, Olafr. This Norse name is rendered by Anlaf in the Saxon Chron., and by Amlabh in the Irish Chroniclers; thus Righ Amlabh = king Olave the White in Dublin, see pref. p. iv: in local names, Olafs-dalr, -fjörör, -vik, Landn.: Olass-dælir, m. pl. the men from Olave-dale, Gullh. The answering fem. pr. name is Alof (the still older Aleif, qs. Anleif, is not recorded), mod. Olof, Landn. 2. compds referring to St. Olave; Olafs-gildi, -kirkja, -messa, -dagr, -vaka, = St. Olave's guild, church, mass, day, vigil, Sturl. i. 23, ii. 99, Vm. 24, Fms. ix. 8, 341, x. 14; Olafs korn, sab, skot, tollr, a tithe in corn to St. Olave, N. G. L. i. 142, 346, 460; Olafs minni, see minni, ii. 445; Olafs Saga, St. Olave's Saga, Vm. 20; Ólafs skript, 21; Ólafs súð, the name of a ship, Ann. 1360. Church, Bridge, etc., still exist in London, Norfolk, and Suffolk.)

op-ligr, adj. weeping; med opligum tarum, with weeping tears, Greg. 39. OR or or, written with o in older vellums, or now and then even with y, yr; in later MSS. with u, ur, which in mod. Icel. is sounded long, ter. In other Teut, languages this prep. has been lost as an independent word; only the Goth, has $us = k\kappa$, $d\pi\delta$, and the O. H. G. ar, ir, ur, which in mid. H. G. was lost and replaced by the adverb aus, O. H. G. uz, answering to Icel. út, Engl. out, a word altogether different from ór, see Grimm's Dict. s. v. er; ur, however, survived as a prefixed particle in a countless number of compds, in A.S. â-, in O.H.G. ar-, ir-, in mid. H. G. and Germ. er -; causal verbs are formed by means of this prefixed particle, e.g. Goth. us-wahjan, A.S. â-weccan, Engl. to awaken, O. H. G. ar-wechan, Germ. er-wecken. In the Scandin. languages, on the other hand, the independent prep, has been preserved in its fullest extent, whereas the prefixed particle is rare, mostly with adjectives, and is sounded and spelt ör-, e.g. or-endr = exanimis; seldom er-, for erlendr (q. v.) is different; or- or ur- seems to belong only to words of later formation, as ór-lausn, ór-skurðr, úr-kast, úr-þvætti, refuse; úr-hættis, out of time (from skera or, kasta ur). These compds will be given under the head of or- and ur-. The quantity of the root-vowel in the particle or, ur is an unsettled question; the German and Saxon forms er-, ar-, as also the Icel. prefixed ör-, seem to indicate a short, the present Icel. pronunciation úr- a long, vowel. The MSS. in these cases give no help; in this Dictionary it has been assumed as long (δr) in deference to the majority of Editions and the present Icel. spelling and pronunciation.

A. Out of, from; as remarked in the introduction to the prep. af, the prep. of (p. 3, col. 2) denotes from the inside of a thing (out of which), and in most cases corresponds to i, so that the same case which goes with of would also go with i, (and thus it answers to i with dat., see i A. [Ivar Aasen fiske-bjorn = fish-bear], a kind of crab, Lat. oniocus: óska-björn is evidently a corruption from the Latin oniscus, which then gave rise to the legend that whosoever possessed the 'oniscus óska-byrr, m. a wind to one's might have a 'wish' (ósk) granted. mind, a fair wind to one's beart's content, Hkv. 2.30; the word may have a mythical bearing, as in the tale of Odd the Archer, who had but to hoist the sail to have a fair wind whithersoever he wished—a popular legend analogous to Homer's Od. x. 6ska-sonr, m. an adopted son, Edda 13, Fas. ii. 242. Oska-steinn, m. a 'wisb-stone,' is the globe-formed ovarium of the oniscus; for another record see Maurer's Volks. 182; it is also called Pétrs-vadsteinn, q.v. óska-stund, f. the 'wish-bour,' for in the popular belief there is a point of time as short as the twinkling of an eye, recurring, some say, every day, others every week, or every year; and whatsoever one wishes at that moment comes to pass: hence the phrase, pú hefir hitt óskastundina, thou hast hit on the 'wish-bour,' when a person has a piece of luck. Akin to this is the legend of three wishes granted to one by some good fairy; hence the phrase, eiga sér ósk, to own a wish; eina vildi eg eiga mér óskina svó góða, a ditty, Maurer's Volksagen.

P (p6), the fifteenth letter, was not figured in the old Runic alphabet, in which the bjarkan (β) was made to serve for both b and p; it is found only in very late Runes, as e.g. the Runic alphabet of the Danish king Waldemar (died A.D. 1241), where it is figured H or as a dotted B (B), Skálda 177, and the Arna-Magn. Runic MS. II. the p is in Icel. sounded as in Engl., pina = pain, hlaupa = leap.

B. REMARKS.—As all words with p initial have been borrowed at different times from foreign languages, the number of them goes on decreasing the farther we go back into antiquity; this is also the case in other Teutonic languages; the vocabulary in Ulf. presents about seven p words,-paida, plapja, plats, plinsjan, pungs, prangan, pund; the old A. S. poems about the same number,—plega, plegjan, pæd, pund, pynd, pyt, pad, peord (while the oldest and best, Beowulf, has none), see Grein. ancient Icelandic or Norse poems of the heathen age have still fewer than the A.S.; the first words we meet with are penningr, a penny, Bragi; pundari, Egil (see ljóð-pundari); -- which, with some other words beginning with p, are from the heathen age. Along with the introduction of Christianity many such words came in, chiefly through the English, e. g. prestr, pína, pínsl, páskar, páfi, pistill, prédika: through trade from the Norman-English, prúðr, prýði, páll, pallr, pell, poki, partr: and lastly, through the English trade with Iceland in the 15th and 16th centuries, prenta, puor, petti, peisa, etc.; some few words, too, have since been adopted from the mod. Danish. A few words may be traced to Gaelic, and a few have been traced to the Chudic (Finnish); the scantiness of such words, however, shews better than anything else how very small indeed was the influence these languages had on the Norse, all the more so as the Finnish vocabulary abounds with p words. The letter p in an Icelandic Dictionary stands quite apart from all the other letters, for it is made up of a motley collection of words, incoherent and broken, containing no roots, no great verbs, particles, or such words as make the stock of a genuine vocabulary. The absence of initial p in the Teutonic language genuine vocabulary. The absence of initial p in the Teutonic language is not due to any inability to pronounce it, but to causes inherent to the parent language of the Teutonic as well as the classical languages, for in Greek and Latin the letter b, which, according to Grimm's law, answers to the Teutonic p, stands exactly in the same predicament as pin the Teutonic; there is no single instance of 'lautverschiebung' from a Gr.-Lat. b to a Teut. p (Curtius); no word beginning with p is formed by 'ablaut,' and only a few are derived by 'umlaut' (pryoi, pyngja, pæla). For other details see the introduction to letters B and F

PADDA, u, f. [A. S. pada; Dutch padde; Engl. paddock]:—a toad; ormar, eblur, froskar, ok pöddur, snakes, lizards, frogs, and toads, Fms. x. 380; myss ok ormar, edlur ok pöddur, O. PALLE, m. [the etymology of this word, as also the time when and place whence it was borrowed, is uncertain; the true Norse word is bekkr or flet; pallr may be of Norman origin, although it is frequently used in the Sagas referring to the Saga time (10th century); even the benches in the legislative assembly on the alping were called pallar, not bekkir; but this cannot have been so originally. The word itself is, like pall, probably from Lat. palus, pala = stipes, Du Cange; Engl. pale, palings; in the Icel. it is used of bigb steps (Lat. gradus), esp. of any bigb floor or dais in old dwellings, sometimes = flet (q. v.) or = lopt (q. v.), and into use in the 15th or 16th century.

astly of the benches in the hall = bekkr (q.v.) The adoption of the word was probably connected with the change in the floor and seats of the halls, as mentioned in Fagrsk. ch. 219, 220, which arrangement of benches was adopted from Norman England, and is in fact still seen in English college-halls, with the raised high floor at the upper end. In Icel, the ladies were then seated on this dais (hé-palir, bver-palir), instead of being placed, according to the older custom, on the left hand along the side walls, see below, II. 2. As the Sagas were written after this had taken place, so the use of the word, e.g. in the Njála (ch. 34 and often), may be an anachronism.]

Q (kú), the sixteenth letter, was in old vellums chiefly or only used in the digraph qu, perhaps under the influence of the Latin; it was afterwards disused in MSS. of the 15th century, but was reintroduced in printing (even Björn Halldórsson's Dict. has a special Qu), until of late it has been discarded, and k is used throughout. All words beginning with Qu are therefore to be sought for under k.

R (err), the seventeenth letter, had in the old Runes two forms; one as initial and medial (radical), R; the other as final (inflexive), Y or A. Of the last two, Y is used in the old Runes (stone in Tune, the Golden horn) in the words gastir, holdingar, wiwar, as these inscriptions have now finally been read and settled by Prof. Bugge of Christiania; A is used in the common Runes; and its name was reid,—reid kveda rossum versta, in the Runic poem.

B. PRONUNCIATION, SPELLING.—The pronunciation is as in Italian or in mod. Gr. (rb), and this still survives in Norway and Sweden, whereas the Danes have adopted a guttural r, which an Icelandic throat is unable to produce. In ancient times radical and inflexive r were perhaps different in sound, as may be inferred from the spelling on the old Runic monumen s, as well as from comparison; for the inflexive r was in the Gothic a sibilant (s), so that the Runic Y and A may well have represented a sound intermediate between r and s. II. the inflexive r is assimilated in words such as heill; steinn, lauss; dropped in nagl, fors, son, vin, see the Gramm.:—the ancient writers have a double r in nouns and adverbs, such as sarr, storr, ferr, síðarr, optarr, meirr; even against etymology, as in hárr (bigb), márr (a mew). In mod. usage a final rr is never sounded. Again, in gen. and dat. fem. and gen. plur. and in compar., in words such as peirri, peirrar, peirra, færri, fárra, the mod. sound and spelling is rr, where the ancients seem to have sounded one r only, beiri, beirar, beira, færi, fára, which pronunciation is said to be retained in eastern Icel.; the Editions, however, have mostly adopted rr. The spelling of the vellums is often dubious, as in them a double r is written either dotted (r) or with a small capital R, but mostly without a fixed rule:-Noise vellums often give rs for ss (mersa = messa, persi = pessi, e. g. in the Hauksbók).

C. Changes. — As the Icel. cannot sound w before r, a set of words which in Engl. and even mod. Dan. and Swed. begin with w, in Icel. belong to r; thus, rangr, rong, rata, reini, reitr, reista, reka, rida, rita, reidr, rindill, risi, rist, röskr, róg, rugl, rölta, qs. wrangr....wrölta. In a few words the r has been dropped after a labial, thus Icel. vixl =A.S. wrizl, Icel. beisl = A.S. bridels, Lat. frenum, Icel. bauta-steinn qs. brautar-steinn; Icel. vá qs. vrá, Hm 25, Skv. 3. 29; or a false r is inserted, as in the Icel. abristir = Engl. beestings, Goth. beist, Germ. beistmileb; bræla and bæla, bál; analogous are Engl. pin and prin, speak and A. S. spræcan, Germ. sprechen, Icel. freta, Lat. pedo:-in a few Norse vellums δr for δ is used before s, l, n, $o\delta rla = \ddot{o}\delta la = \delta \delta ala$, $\ddot{o}\delta rlask =$ öðlask, Guðrs = Guðs, heiðrnir = heiðnir, liðrsemd = liðsemd, soðrla = söðla, ráðrleitni = ráðleitni, e. g. the O. H. L. (see the pref. to Prof. Unger's Ed. p. ix), owing to an inability of sounding ol, ds. Again, metathesis has taken place in rage, rass, = arge, ars.

All words having a radical initial b (br) are to be sought for under rít, f., pl. rítr, qs. vrít, [from ríta, from the 'written' or carved ring on old shields]:—a sbield, but obsolete and only used in poetry, Korm., Edda (in a verse), passim; himins rít = beaven's disk, i. e. the sun, Lex. Poët.

RÍTA, pres. rít, rítr, rítr; pret. reit, the 2nd pers. does not occur; pl. ritu; subj. riti; imperat. rit; part. ritinn; the earliest writers use the strong conjugation; thus in the treatise of Thorodd, ek rit, 165, l. 26, 166, ll. 22-24, 168, l. 10; rit'k=rit ek, 166, l. 36; þú ritr, 161, l. 2 from the bottom, 168, l. 19; ek reit, 168, l. 4: part. ritnir, ritin, ritnum, 161, 168-168: in the other instances the weak form seems merely due to the transcriber of the Cod. Worm, of the 14th century, and the old forms ought to be restored; thus, pres. ritar, 160, l. 3 from the bottom, 165, l. 1; pret. ritada, ritadir, 164, l. 31; part. ritad, ll. 3, 32, etc.; infin. rita for rita, l. 3: Ari also uses the strong form, Ib. 4, Hkr. i. 48: in the pref. to Landn. for ritad read ritid (?); reit, Hkr. iii. 347. In writers of later times, as also in later transcripts of old writers, the weak form (ek rita, ritar, ritar, ritada, ritad) prevails; thus in the pref. to O. H., pres. rita (once), pret. ritada (five times), ritadi, 248; ritadar and ritudu, Sturl. i. 107, Fms. x. 371; ritad, Knytl. S. ch. 1, 21, 95, Hungrv. ch. 1; and so on: the part ritinn remained longest, thus, eptir sögu Þjóðólfs var fyrst ritin æfi Ynglinga, Hkr. Frissb. (pref.), Fms. vii. 156, Grag. i. 76, Symb. (fine). The Norse vellums seem to know the weak form only, e. g. ritadi, Sks. 563 B. The root to this word is well known in the Scandin. languages in derived words, as reitr, reita, rit (q. v.), yet the verb itself, at least in the sense 'to write,' seems to have been adopted from the A.S., as it nowhere occurs on the Runic stones or in old poets, and always means writing on parchment, rista being used of writing on stone; the original form is vrita: [A. S. writan; Engl. to write; Germ. reissen; O. H. G. rizan = to scratch; Scot. rit or ret; cp. also Ulf. writs = nepaia, Luke xvi. 17.]
