G. L. i. 62; bat er i einum stad, er madr hittir (viz. i), it is in one place that III. a demonstrative pron. may be added to the relat. particle, e. g. er beirra = quorum, er beim = quibus, er hans, er hennar = cujus; but this is chiefly used in old translations from Lat., being rarely found in original writings; pann konung, er undir honum eru skatt-konungar, that king under whom vassals serve, Edda 93; ekkja heitir sú, er búandi hennar (wbose busband) varð sótt-dauðr; hæll er sú kona kölluð er búandi hennar er veginn, 108; sú sam-stafa, er raddar-stafr hennar er náttúrlega skammr, that syllable, the vowel of which is naturally short, Skálda 179; sá maðr, er hann vill, that man who wishes, Grag. i. 19; sa madr, er hann skal fasta, 36; nema ein Gudrun, er hon zva gret, G. that never wailed, Gh. 40; bess manns, er hann girnisk, Hom. 54; sæl er sú bygghlaða ... er ór beirri ..., felix est illud borreum ... unde ..., Hom. 15; engi er hærri speki en sú, er í þeirri..., nulla melior est sapientia quam ea, quâ..., 28; varðveita bodorð hans, fyrir þann er vér erum skapaðir, ejusque mandata custodire, per quem creati sumus, 28; harda göfugr er hattr hófsemi, fyrir þá er saman stendr ..., nobilis virtus est valde temperantia, per quam ..., id.; elskendum Guo pann er svá mælti, Deum diligentibus qui ait, id.; skirn Grædara várs, er í þeirri, 56; er á þeim = in quibus, 52: rare in mod. writers, enginn kann að játa eðr iðrast réttilega þeirrar syndar, er hann þekkir ekki stærð hennar og ílsku, Vídal. i. 226. in the 14th century, the relat. pron. hverr was admitted, but by adding the particle er; yet it has never prevailed, and no relative pronoun is used in Icel. (except that this pronoun occurs in the N. T. and sermons, e.g. Luke xi. I, whose blood Pilate had mingled, is rendered hverra blodi Pilatus hafði blandað; an old translator would have said, er P. hafði blandað blóði þeirra): hvern er þeir erfðu, M. K. 156; hverjar er hón lauk mér, id.; af hverju er hann megi marka, Stj. 114; hvat er túkna mundi, Fms. xi. 12. V. the few following instances are rare and curious, er bú, er ek, er mér, er hón; and are analogous to the Germ. der ich, der du, I that, thou that; in Hm. l.c. 'er' is almost a superfluous enclitic, eyvitar fyrna er maðr annan skal, Hm. 93; sáttir þínar er ek vil snemma hafa, Alm. 7; ójafnt skipta er þú mundir, Hbl. 25; þrár hafðar er ek hefi, Fsm. 50; auði frá er mér ætluð var, sandi orpin sæng, Sl. 49; lauga-vatn er mér leiðast var eitt allra hluta, 50; ærr ertu Loki, er þú yðra telr, Ls. 29, cp. 21, Og. 12, Hkv. 2. 32; tröll, er þik bíta eigi járn, Ísl. ii. 364. This want of a proper relat. pron. has probably preserved Icel. prose from foreign influences; in rendering Lat. or mod. Germ. into Icel, almost every sentence must be altered and broken up in order to make it vernacular.

In the earliest and best MSS. distinction is made between eptir er (postquam), begar er (quum), meðan er (dum), síðan er (postquam), and on the other hand eptir (post), pegar (jam), medan (interdum), sidan (post, deinde); cp. medan's, sídan's, pegar's, above; but in most old MSS. and writers the particle is left out, often, no doubt, merely from inaccuracy in the MSS., or even in the editions, (in MSS. 'er' is almost always spelt & and easily overlooked): again, in mod. usage the particle 'at, ab,' is often used as equivalent to 'er,' meðan að, wbilst; síðan að, since that; þegar að, postquam, (vide 'at' V, p. 29.)

ER, 3rd pers. pres. is, vide vera.

ER, pl., and it, dual, spelt ier, O. H. 147 (twice), 205, 216 (twice), 227; [Goth. jus=ὑμει̂s; A.S. ge; Engl. ye, you; Germ. ibr; Swed.-Dan. I]:—ye, you. That er and not per is the old form is clear from the alliteration of old poems and the spelling of old MSS.: allit., ér munuð allir eiða vinna, Skv. 1. 37; it (σφώ) munut alla eiða vinna, 31; hlaðit ér jarlar eiki-köstinn, Gh. 20; lifit einir ér bátta ættar minnar, Hom. 4; æðra óðal en ér hafit, Rm. 45 (MS. wrongly þér); ér sjáið undir stórar yðvars Græðara blæða, Lb. 44 (a poem of the beginning of the 13th century). It is often spelt so in Kb. of Sæm.; hvers bíðit ér, Hkv. 2.4; þó þykkisk ér, Skv. 3. 36; börðusk ér bræðr ungir, Am. 93; urðu-2 it glikir, Gh. 3; ef it, id.; en ér heyrt hafit, Hým. 38; þá er (wben) ér, ye, Ls. 51; er it heim komit, Skv. 1. 42: ér knáttuð, Edda 103 (in a verse): in very old MSS. (12th century) no other form was ever used, e. g. er it, 623. 24; hat er er (that which ye) heyrit, 656 A. 2. 15; er brædr . . minnisk er, ye bretbren, remember ye, 7; treystisk er, 623. 32; hræðisk eigi ér, 48. In MSS. of the middle of the 13th century the old form still occurs, e.g. O.H., ér hafit, 52; ér skolu, 216; þegar er ér komit, so soon as ye come, 67; sem ér mynit, 119; ér hafit, 141; til hvers er ér erot, that ye are, 151; ef er vilit heldr, 166; er erot allir, ye are all, 193; sem ér kunnut, 196; sem ier vilit, 205; sem ér vitoð, as ye know, 165; ef ér vilit, 208; peim er ér sendod, those that ye sent, 211: the Heidarv. S. S.-ef ér, (Fms. xi.) 115, 123: Mork. 9, 63, 70, 98, 103, 106, passim. It even occurs now and then in Niála (Arna-Magn. 468)-ér erut, ye are, 223; hverrar liðveizlu ér þykkisk mest þurfa, 227: ér ertuð hann, Skálda 171; Farið-a ér, fare ye not, Hkr. i. (in a verse). It is still more freq. after a dental δ , l, h; in old MSS. that give h for δ it runs thus—vitop ér, hafip ér, skolup ér, megup ér, lifip ér, etc., wot ye, bave ye, shall ye, may ye, live ye, etc.; hence originates by way of diæresis the regular Icel. form ber, common both to old and mod. writers; vide þú, where the other forms will be explained. The etymology of this word is uncertain; the Icel. notion is to derive it from er- priv. and vida = vinna, to work, but it is scarcely right; Grimm, s. v. arbeit, suggests it to be akin to Lat. labor; Max Müller refers it to the root AR, to plough, Science of Language, p. 258, 3rd Ed.; but arfiði (Björn, p. 41) instead of erviði is a fictitious form, and the statement that in old Norse or Icel, it means ploughing rests only on a fancy of old Björn (Dict. l.c.), to which he was probably led by the similarity between Lat. arvum to Germ. and mod. Dan. arbeit, arbeide: in fact the Icel., ancient or modern, conveys no such notion; even in the old heathen poems the word is used exactly in the present sense, which again is the same as in Ulf.]:-toil, labour, and metaph. toil, trouble; in the allit phrase, e. en eigi eyrendi, toil but no errand, i. e. lost labour, pkv. 10, 11, Hkv. EYKT, eyko, f. three or half-past three o'clock P.M.; many commentaries have been written upon this word, as by Pal Vidalin Skýr., Finu Johnson in H. E. i. 153 sqq. note 6, and in Horologium, etc. The time of eyko is clearly defined in K. p. K. 92 as the time when the sun has past two parts of the 'útsuðt' (q.v.) and has one part left, that is to say, half-past three o'clock P. M.: it thus nearly coincides with the eccl. Lat, nona (three o'clock P.M.); and both eykt and nona are therefore used indiscriminately in some passages. Sunset at the time of 'eyko' is opposed to sunrise at the time of 'dagmál,' q. v. In Norway 'ykt' means a luncheon taken about half-past three o'clock. But the passage in Edda-that autumn ends and winter begins at sunset at the time of eykt-confounded the commentators, who believed it to refer to the conventional Icel. winter, which (in the old style) begins with the middle of October, and lasts six months. In the latitude of Reykholt—the residence of Snorrithe sun at this time sets about half-past four. Upon this statement the commentators have based their reasoning both in regard to dagmál and eykt, placing the eykt at half-past four P.M. and dagmál at half-past seven A.M., although this contradicts the definition of these terms in the law. The passage in Edda probably came from a foreign source, and refers not to the Icel. winter but to the astronomical winter, viz. the winter solstice or the shortest day; for sunset at half-past three is suited not to Icel., but to the latitude of Scotland and the southern parts of Scandinavia. The word is also curious from its bearing upon the discovery of America by the ancients, vide Fb. l. c. This sense (balf-past three) is now obsolete in Icel., but eykt is in freq. use in the sense of triborium, a time of three bours; whereas in the oldest Sagas no passage has been found bearing this sense,—the Bs. i. 385, 446, and Hem. l. c. are of the 13th and 14th centuries. In Norway ykt is freq. used metaph, of all the four meal times in the day, morning-ykt, midday-ykt, afternoon-ykt (or ykt proper), and even-ykt. In old MSS. (Grág., K. p. K., Hem., Heið. S.) this word is always spelt eykô or eykh, shewing the root to be 'auk' with the fem. inflex.

eyői-skógr, m. a wild 'sbaw' (wood), "thence came to mean the time of day at which this meal was taken. eccl. law dilates upon the word, as the Sabbath was to begin at 'hora nona; hence the phrase, eykt-helgr dagr (vide below). The word can have no relation to átta, eight, or átt, plaga coeli. At present Icel. say, at eykta-motum, adv. at great intervals, once an eykt, once in I. balf-past tbree; þá er eykð er útsuðrs-átt er three bours. deild í þriðjunga, ok hefir sól gengna tvá hluti en einn ógenginn, K. þ. EYRIR, m., gen. eyris, dat. and acc. eyri; pl. aurar, gen. aura, dat. aurum; a word prob. of foreign origin, from Lat. aurum, Fr. or, Engl. ore; (A.S. ora is, however, prob. Danish.) The first coins known in Scandinavia were Roman or Byzantine, then Saxon or English; as the old word baugr (q. v.) denoted unwrought, uncoined gold and silver, so eyrir prob. originally meant a certain coin: I. an ounce of silver or its amount in money, the eighth part of a mark; an eyrir is = sixty pennies (penningar) = three ertog; tuttugu penningar vegnir í örtug, þrír örtugar í eyri, átta aurar í mörk, 732. 16; silfr svá slegit at sextigir penninga görði eyri veginn, Grág. i. 500; penning, þat skal hinn tíundi (prob. a false reading, x instead of lx) hlutr eyris, 357; hálfs eyris met ek hverjan, I value each at a balf eyrir, Glum. F (eff), the sixth letter, was in the Gothic Runes, on the Bracteats, and on the stone in Tune, marked , a form evidently derived from the Greek and Latin; hence also comes the Anglo-Saxon F called feob, and in the Scandinavian Runes & called fé (=fee, money), sé veldr frænda rógi, Rkv. I. The Runic alphabet makes f the first letter, whence this alphabet is sometimes by modern writers called Fubork. The first six letters are called Freys-ætt, the family of Frey; perhaps the Goths called this Rune Frauja = Freyr, the lord. Only in very early Icel. MSS. is the old Latin form of f used: at the beginning of the 13th century the Anglo-Saxon form f (derived from the Rune) prevailed; and it was employed in printed Icel. books till about A. D. 1770, when the Latin f came into use. In very early MSS. It and It are very difficult to distinguish from 11 and 12. Emendations may sometimes be made by bearing this in mind, e. g. hóstú, Am. 95, should clearly be read hóftú = host þú, from hesja,-proving that this poem was in writing not later than about A. D. 1200, when the Anglo-Saxon letter was introduced.

A. Pronunciation.—At the beginning of a syllable always sounded as Engl. f; but as a medial and final, it is often pronounced and sometimes spelt v, especially after a vowel, so that in af, ef, lauf, gefa, hafa, grafa, lifa, lif, gröf, f is pronounced like the v, as in Engl. grave. Foreign proper names, Stefan (Stepben), etc., are exceptions, where f not initial has an aspirate sound. For the exceptional spelling of f as b vide introduction to B, (pp. 48, 49.) The Icel, dislike a double f sound, which is only found in a very few modern foreign words, such as kaffe, coffee; straff, Germ. strafe, punishment; koffort, a box (from French or Germ.); offur, an offer; skoffin, a monster; skeffa, a 'skep' or busbel; skuffa, a drawer; eff, the name of the letter itself, cp. Skalda 166.

B. SPELLING: I. as an initial the spelling never changes; as medial and final the form f is usually retained, as in alfr, kalfr, sjalfr, silfr, arfr, orf, úlfr, etc., af, gaf, haf, etc., although the sound is soft in all these syllables. Some MSS, used to spell fu, especially after an l, sialfuan (ipsum), halfuan (dimidium), etc.; in the 14th century this was common, but did not continue; in Swedish it prevailed, hence the mod. Swed. forms gifva, drifva, etc. II. the spelling with f is against the true etymology in many cases, and here also the spelling differs; this is especially the case with the final radical v or u (after a vowel or after l or r), which, being in some cases suppressed or obsolete, reappears and is differently spelt; thus, örfar, arrows (from ör); snjófar (nives), snow, and snjófa, to snow (from snjór); háfan (acc.), bigb (from hár); mjófan, tbin (from mjor); sæfar (gen.), the sea (from sær): the partly obsolete dat. forms ölvi, mjölvi, Mávi, bölvi, heyvi, hörvi, smjörvi, lævi from öl (ale), mjöl (meal), hey (bay), etc. are also spelt ölfi...heyfi, cp. e. g. Eb. 94 new Ed. note 8: so also adjectives, as orfan (acc. from orr), liberal: nouns, as völfa or völva, a prophetess. III. the spelling with pt in such words as, aptan, evening; aptr, after; leiptr, lightning; dript, drift; dupt, Germ. duft; heipt, cp. Germ. beftig; kraptr, Germ. kraft; aptari, eptri, = aftari, eftri, aft, behind; eptir, after; skipta, to shift; lopt, Germ. luft; kjöptr, Germ. kiefe; opt, often; nipt (from nefi), a sister; hapt, a baft, hepta, to baft; gipta, a gift; raptr, a rafter; topt, cp. Engl. toft, Dan. toft; skapt, Engl. sbaft, Dan. skaft; popta, Dan. tofte,-is against the sense and etymology and is an imitation of Latin MSS. The earliest MSS. and almost all Norse MSS. use ft, and so also many Icel. MSS., e. g. the Flateyjar-bók, Hauks-bók, etc.; pt, however, is the regular spelling, and hence it came into print. The present rule appears to be to use pt wherever both consonants are radicals, but ft if the t be inflexive—thus haft, part. from hafa, lift from lifa, hlift from hlifa; but in speaking pt and ft are both sounded alike, regardless of etymology, viz. both as ft or with a soft f sound; hence phonetic spelling now and then occurs in MSS., e. g. draft = drapt, from drepa, Fb. i. 149; efde = zpdi = zpti, from 2p2, to weep, Bs. i. 342; keysti, from kaupa, Greg. 50; steysti, from B. a digraph fp or pf occurs a few times in MSS., esptir, 673 A. 2; lopfti = lopti, Greg. 72 (vide Frump. 100), but it never came into use; it reminds one of the pf which in modern German is so frequent: fm = f or m, e.g. nafm = nafn or namn, Mork. 60 and N.G. L. passim; fft = ft also occurs in old MSS.

C. CHANGES.—The final soft Icel. f answers to Engl. f, ve, e.g. Icel. lif = Engl. life, but Icel. lifa = Engl. to live; gefa, to give; hafa, to bave; leifa, to leave. Again, the spurious Icel. f (B. II) usually answers to Engl. w or the like, e.g. örfar = Engl. arrow; snjófar = Engl. snow; már máfi, cp. Engl. mew; Icel. nær (the v is here suppressed), cp. Engl. narrow; Icel. levi, cp. Engl. lewd, etc. etc. In Danish the soft f is usually spelt with v, e. g. balv, kalv, bav, give, love, sove, = Icel. hálfr, kálfr, haf, gcfa, lofa, sofa, whereas the Swedes frequently keep the f. In German a final b answers to Icel. f: Germ. geben = Icel. gefa, Engl. give; Germ. kalb, erbe, - Icel. kalfr, arfi, etc., see introduction to B. Again, in German a final f or ff answers to Icel. and Engl. p, e. g. Germ. lauf = Icel. hlaup, Engl. leap; Germ. kauf = Icel. kaup, Engl. cheap; Germ. schiff = Icel. skip, Engl.

deep; Germ. baufen = Icel. hopr, Engl. beap; Germ. rufen = Icel. hropa; Germ. schaffen = Icel. skapa, Engl. shape; Germ. saufen = Icel. súpa, Engl. to sup; Germ. bofte = Icel. huppr, Engl. bip; Germ. greifen = Icel. gripa, Engl. to grapple, grip; Germ. gaffen = Icel. gapa, Engl. gape; Germ. offen = Icel. opinn, Engl. open; Germ. affe = Icel. api, Engl. ape; Germ. triefen = Icel. drjupa, Engl. drip; Germ. tropfen = Icel. dropi, Engl. drop. As to the use of the initial f, the Engl., Icel., Swed., and Dan. all agree; the High Germ. spelling is confused, using either f or v, but both of them are sounded alike, thus voll = Engl. full, Icel. full; vier = Engl. four, Icel. fjórir; vater = Engl. fatber, Icel. faðir, etc.: but fiscb = Engl. fisb, Icel. fiskr; fest = Engl. fast, Icel. fastr. This German v, however, seems to be dying out (Grimm, introduction to F). 2. for the change of fn and mn, see introduction to B: f changes to m in a few Icel. words, as himin, qs. hifinn, cp. Engl. beaven; helmingr, a balf, from halfr, balf.

D. Interchange.—The Greek and Latin p answers to Teutonic and Icel. f; thus, pater, paucus, piscis, πέντε, πῦρ, πῶλοι, pēcu, pellis, πίων, pinguis, plecto, pes, nod-ós, pallor, etc., cp. Icel. faðir, fúr, fiskr, fimm, furr, foli, fé, fell (feldr), feitr, flétta, fet and fótr, fölr, etc.; Lat. portare = færa, Engl. to ford; se-pelio = fela; πτερόν = fjöðr and fiðr; πνέω and πνεῦμα, cp. fnasa; Lat. per, pro, προ-, cp. fyrir; Lat. plenus, pleo, πλέον, πλέου, cp. fullr; πλοίον = fley; Lat. prior, πρώτος, cp. fyrir, fyrstr; Lat. primus, cp. frum-; Lat. plūres, plērique, πολλόε, πλείστοε, πολύε, = fjöl-, fjöld, fleiri, flestr; Lat. plicare = falda; Lat. prětium, cp. frídr, frídendi, etc. (vide Grimm). Again, where no interchange has taken place the word is usually borrowed from the Greek or Latin, e.g. forkr, Engl. fork, = Lat. furca; Icel. fals, falskr, = Lat. falsus; Icel. falki = Lat. falco, etc.

FALDR, m. [A. S. feald; Engl. fold; Germ. falte; O. H.G. fald; Dan. fold; Ital. falda, and faldetta (in Malta); Fr. fauvetta and faudage]: —a fold, of a garment, Str. 9, 13, l. 19, 21, where it is even spelt foldr; in Icel. hardly ever used in this sense.

B. the bem of a garment; hún gékk á bak til ok snart fald hans klæða, Luke viii. 44; og fald sinna kiæða stækka þeir, Matth. xxiii. 5; og báðu hann, að þeir mætti snerta að eins fald hans fata, Mark vi. 56; kyrtill hlaðbúinn í fald niðr, a kirtle laced down to the bems, Fms. iv. 337; allt i fald nior, Mag. II. a white linen bood, the stately national head-gear worn by ladies in Icel., of which drawings are given by Eggert Itin. pp. 24, 27, Sir Joseph Banks in Hooker's Travels, the account of the French expedition of the year 1836 sq., and in almost all books of travels in Iceland. In old Sagas or poems the fald is chiefly recorded in Ld. ch. 33 (the dreams of Guorun Osvifs datter), cp. Sd. ch. 25; in the Orkn. S. ch. 58 the two sisters Frakök and Helga, daughters of the Gaelic Moddan, wore a fald (þá hnyktu þar af sér faldinum, ok reyttu sik), 182. In the Rm. (a poem probably composed in the Western Isles, Orkneys) all the three women, Edda, Amma, and Modir, wore the fald; the words in bkv. 16, 19-ok haglega um höfuð typpum, and let us cleverly put a topping on bis bead, of Thor in bridal disguise—seem to refer to the fald. Bishop Bjarni, a native of the Orkneys (died A. D. 1222), gives the name of 'fald' to the belmet; Kormak, in the 10th century, speaks of the 'old falda.' In Normandy and Brittany a kind of 'fald' is still in use; it may be that it came to Icel, through Great Britain, and is of Breton origin; a French fald (Franseiskr, i.e. Britain?) is mentioned, D.N. In Icel, the fald was, up to the end of the last century, worn by every lady,-áðr sérhver fald bar frú | falleg þótti venja sú, a ditty. The ladies tried to outdo each other in wearing a tall fald; keisti faldr, the fald rose bigh, Rm. 26; falda hátt, Eb. (the verse); hence the sarcastic name stiku-faldr, a 'yard-long fald;' stifan teygja stiku-fald, pagnarmál 53, a poem of 1728; I Tim. ii. 9 is in the Icel. version rendered, eigi með földum (πλέγμασι) eðr gulli eðr perlum,—since with ancient women, and in Icel. up to a late time, braiding of the hair was almost unknown. In mod. poetry, Iceland with her glaciers is represented as a woman with her fald on; minn hefir faldr fengið fjúka-ryk og kám, Eggert: the sails are called faldar mastra, boods of the masts, faldar mastra blöktu stilt, Ülf. 3. 14; hestar hlés hvíta skóku falda trés, id., 10; faldr skýja, the folds of the clouds, poët., Núm. 1.11; faldr af degi, of the day break, 4. 86; vide krók-faldr, sveigr, a crooked fald. falda-feykir, m. a magical dance in which the falds flew off the ladies' heads, Fas. iii; cp. FIMT or fimmt, f. a number of five: fimtar-tala, u, f. a set of five or multiple of five (as fifteen, fifty, etc.), Bs. i. 190. 2. [Swed. femt = a kind of court], a law phrase, a summoning before a court with a notice of five days: a standing phrase in the Norse law, so that the verb fimta means to summon: so, fimtar-grio, n. pl. a truce during a fimt, N. G. L. i. 342, 351; fimmtar-nafn, n. a citation with a fimt's notice, 86; fimmtar-stefna, u, f. a citation before a court with a fimt's notice, K. A. 184: the phrase gera e-m fimt simply means to summon, N.G.L. i. 346, passim; one first is the shortest notice for summoning, five fimts the longest,-fimm fimtum hit lengsta, cf hann veit nær þing skal vera, 21:--the law provides that no summoning shall take place on Tuesday, because in that case the court-day would fall on Sunday, the day of summoning not being counted, N. G. L., Jb., and K. A. passim.—This law term is very curious, and seems to be a remnant of the old heathen division of time into fimts (pentads), each month consisting of six such weeks; the old heathen year would then have consisted of seventy-two fimts, a holy number, as composed of 2 × 36 and 6 × 12. With the introduction of the names of the planetary days (vide dagr) and the Christian week, the old fimt only remained in law and common sayings; thus in Hm. 73,—'there are many turns of the weather in five days (viz. a fimt), but more in a month, which would be unintelligible unless we bear in mind that a fimt just answered to our week; or verse 50, - among bad friends love flames high for five days, but is slaked when the sixth comes;' in a few cases, esp. in ecclesiastical law, sjaund (hebdomad) is substituted for the older fimt, N.G.L. passim; it is curious that in Icel. law (Grág.) the fimt scarcely occurs, as in Icel. the modern week seems to have superseded the old at an early time. Fimtar-domr, m. the Fifth High Court in the Icel. Commonwealth, vide dómr, Grág. p. p., etc.; the form of the word is irregular, as it means the Fifth Court (added to the four Quarter Courts) = domr hinn fimmti, as it is also called in Grág. p. p. ch. 24 sqq.; the old Scandin. law term fimt seems to have floated before the mind of the founders, as fimtardomr etymologically answers to Swed. femt, i. e. a court before which one has to appear a 'fimt' from the citation. Fimtardóms-eiðr, m. the oath to be taken in the Fifth Court, Grag. p. p. ch. 26, 27, Nj. 241; in Sturl. ii. 128 used of an oath worded as the oath in the Fifth Court. FINGR, m., gen. fingrar, mod. fingrs; dat. fingri; pl. fingr; a neut. fingr occurs in O.H.L. 73, 74, which gender is still found in Swed. dialects; the acc. pl. is in conversation used as fem., an Icel. says allar fingr, not alla fingr: [Goth. figgrs; A.S. finger, etc.; whereas Lat. digitus and Gr. δάκτυλος etymologically answer to Icel. tá, Engl. toe, Germ. zebe, a finger of the foot]:—a finger, Grág. i. 498, Hkr. ii. 380, 384, Magn. 518, passim: the names of the fingers—pumal-fingr, the thumb; visi-f., the index finger, also called sleiki-f., lick-finger; langa-tong, long-prong; græði-f., leechfinger, also, but rarely, called baug-f., digitus annuli; litli-f., the little finger. In the Norse law (N. G. L. i. 172) the fingers are taxed, from the thumb at twelve ounces, to the little finger at one ounce-not so in the curious lawsuit recorded in Sturl. i. ch. 18-27. Also a measure, a finger's breadth, Nj. 27, cp. MS. 732. 5: arithm. any number under ten, Alg. 362: botan., skolla-fingr, a kind of fern, lycopodium. fingra-jarn, n. a finger-iron, a thimble (?), Dipl. v. 18. fingr-heed, f. a finger's beight, as measure.

Grag. p. p. ch. 32 sqq., ch. 40, Nj. 240, and the Sagas and laws passim. In two passages, viz. Flóam. S. ch. 10 and Glúma ch. 24, fjörbaugsgarðr is used in the same sense as ping-helgi, q. v., viz. of the sacred boundary of a meeting, regarded by the heathens as a sanctuary, cp. Eb. ch. 4 fine; in the Edit. of Floam. S. the passage 'til Lons' is false, the probable reading being 'til Lopz,' i. e. Lopts; in the old MS. Vatnshyrna the shank of the p was prob. obliterated so as to make it look like n, and so one transcriber read 'Lóns,' another 'Jóns;' the reading 'Lopts' is born out by the historical context, cp. also Landn. 5, ch. 8; the word fjörbaugr is diffusely commented on in H. for-likast, ad, dep. [cp. Germ. vergleichen], to come to terms, Sturl. iii. 232: in mod. Icel. law, in all but criminal cases, the litigants have to appear (in person or by delegates) before two or more 'peace-makers' or umpires called forlikunar-menn,-usually the parson and one or more of the chief men of the parish; the office of the peace-makers is to try to bring about a friendly settlement called forlikan, and this meeting is often repeated; only after a forlikan has been tried in vain, can the case be taken before a law-court; by this judicious proceeding more than half the quarrels are nipped in the bud; there seems to be nothing like this in the old law, and the custom was probably borrowed from Denmark. There is a saying, 'a lean forlikan is better than a fat lawsuit.'

Hólm-fors, βαρου-φόροs = Icel. Báru-fors), whereas σκλαβινιστί it is called πραχ, i. e. porog or prag: Constantine in another passage states that the Russians were Teutonic or 'Franks:' the Gardar (Russia Minor) of that time was in fact a Scandin. country; even the name Russia is by some (P. A. Munch) explained as Scandin., afterwards adopted for the whole empire; it was still regarded so by the Byzantine authors of the 10th century, as opposed to Slavonic]:—a 'force,' waterfall, Landn. 291, 292; fors mikill er Sarpr heitir, Ó. FORVE, n. an απ. λεγ. in the eccl. law of the county Vikin or Borgarbing, a coast district in the south of Norway, N. G. L. i. 339, 363, where the law orders that a monster child (i. e. an abortion, a birth without human shape) shall be brought to a place 'forve,' and buried where neither man nor beast comes by; pat skal a forve (forre, v. l.) forra ok röyra (put in a cairn) þar er hvárki gengr yfir menn né fénaðr, þat er forve (forfue, v.l.) hins illa. In N.G.L. i. 13 it is ordered that felons (e.g. traitors, murderers, self-murderers, etc.) were not to be buried in consecrated soil, but in the 'flood-mark where sea and green turf meet;' cp. the curious story in Landn. 2. 19, where the Christian lady Auda ordered herself to be buried between high and low water mark (i fixdarmáli), as she would not rest in heathen earth; so, on the other hand, a monster child must not rest in Christian earth. Thus forve is probably derived from fyrva, q. v., to ebb, and denotes the flood-mark or beach in which the grave was to be dug; the concluding words, pat er forve hins illa, probably mean this place is the forve of the evil one, i. e. an unballowed place. The etymology given in H. E. i. 75 cannot be right.

for-veðja or for-veði, adj. a law term, forfeitable or forfeited, Vm. 16, Grág. ii. 234, N. G. L. i. 27 (Js. 124), 391.

FRAKKA, u, f. [A.S. franca], a kind of spear; Grimm thinks that the framea of Tacitus is merely a corruption of franca, a suggestion which seems to be almost certain; in northern poems and writers this word only occurs in Rm. 32, whence it was probably taken into Edda (Gl.); on the other hand, we have an Icel. frakki, a, m. a kind of weapon, in the compd hræ-f., a 'carrion-fluke,' i. e. the blade of a sword, Gisl. 7 (in a verse); and akkeris-frakki, a, m. an 'anchor-fluke (?), in a verse of 996, Fs. 92: again, the frakka of the Rm. was probably borrowed from A.S.

Frakki, a, m. a proper name, cp. Gullb.; Frakka-nes, n. a farm.

Frakkar, m. pl. the Franks, mod. the French; perhaps derived from the national weapon franca, as that of Saxons from seax, sax = gladius; Frakkland, n. the land of the Franks, as fixed by the peace of Verdun in 843, 1b. ch. 9 and Fins. i. ii, and in old poets (Hallfred):—in mod. language used for France.

frakki, 2, m. [Fr. fraque], a frock, coat, mod. word, borrowed from frakkr, adj. [Engl. and Germ. frank], this word never occurs in old writers, and in mod. usage only in the sense impertinent, intrusive.

FRAM, adv.—the Icel. has a triple adverbial form, fram, denoting the going to a place (ad locum); frammi, the being in a place (in loco); framan, the going from a place (a loco)—compar. framarr (mod. framar) or fremr, = Goth. framis; superl. framast (framarst) or fremst: proncd. with a double m = framm; and that such was the case in olden times may be seen from Fms. vi. 385 and Skálda 168, 171. This adv. with its compds and derivatives may be said to have been lost in Germ. as well as Engl., and at a very early time. Even Ulf. uses fram as a prep. in the sense of ano, like the A.S. and Engl. from, Swed. från: only in two passages Ulf. uses fram as adv., viz. Rom. xiii. 12, where he renders 'the night is far spent' (nottin er um lidin of the Icel. N. T.) by framis galeihan, which recalls to mind the Icel. fram-lidinn = deceased, past; and Mark i. 19, where mpoBalver is rendered by gaggan framis = Icel. ganga framarr or ganga fram; cp. also the Goth. compds framgabts = progress, Philipp. i. 25; fram-aldrs = stricken in years; fram-vigis = Icel. fram-vegis; fram-vairhis = further: in O. H. G. vram = ultra still occurs, but is now lost in Germ, as well as in Engl.: the Icel., on the other hand, makes a clear distinction between the prep. frá (from) and fram, on, forward, = Gr. πρόσω, Lat. porro, pro-; in some compds the sense from appears, e. g. framandi, a stranger, = Ulf. framabeis, prop. one who is far off or from far off; so also fram-liding, gone, past; ganga fram, to die.

II. fram is generally applied to any motion outwards or towards the open, opp. to inn, innar; thus fram denotes the outer point of a ness, fram á nes; Icel. also say, fram á sjó, towards the high sea, (but upp or inn at landi, landwards); also, towards the verge of a cliff or the like, fram á hamarinn (bergit), Eg. 583: when used of a house fram means towards the door, thus, fara fram i dyr (eldhús), but inn or innar í baðstofu (hence fram-bær), var hón ávalt borin fram ok innar, she was borne in a litter out and in, Bs. i. 343: of a bed or chair fram denotes the outside, the side farthest from the wall, horfir hon til bils, en bondi fram, she turned her face to the wall, but her bushand away from it, Vigl. 31. β. again, Icel. say, fram á dal, up dale, opp. to ofan dalinn, III. without motion, the fore part, opp. to aptr, binder part (cp. fram-fætr); aptr krókr en fram sem sporðr, Fms. ii. 179; madr fram en dýr aptr (of a centaur), 673. 2, Sks. 179; aptr ok fram, fore and aft, of a ship, Fms. ix. 310. As fróðr chiefly refers to historical knowledge, 'hinn Fróði' was an appellation given to the old Icel. chroniclers-Ari Fródi, Brandr Fródi, Sæmundr Fróði, Kolskeggr Fróði, who lived between 1050 and 1150 A.D. But the historians of the next age were seldom called by this name: Odd Munk (of the end of the 12th century) is only once called so, (Ing. S. fine); Snorri (of the 13th) twice, viz. Ann. 1241 in a single MS., and Sturl. iii. 98, but in a part of the Saga probably not written by Sturla himself; Sturla (who died in 1284) is never called by that name; and the only real exception is Styrmir 'Frodi' (who died in 1245), though he least deserved the name. Of foreign writers the Icel, gave the name Fródi to Bede (Landn. pref.), whom they held in great honour.

FROMB, adj., akin to framr, prob. borrowed from Germ. fromm, Low Germ. from; it seems to have come to Icel. with the Hanseatic trade at the end of the 15th century, and is found in the Rimur of that time, e.g. Skáld-Helga R. 3. 22; from Luther's Bible and the Reformation it became more freq. in the sense of righteous, pious, with the notion of guileless, fromr og meinlaus, and often occurs in the N. T. and hymns, e. g. Pass. 22. 2, 24. 9: it has however not been truly naturalized, except in the sense of bonest, i. e. not thievish, and ofromr, dishonest, thievish, (a euphemism); umtals-f., not slandering, speaking fair of other people. leiki, a, m. guilelessness, Pass. 16. 8. fróm-lyndi, f. id.

FRÓN, n. a poët. word = land, country, Lex. Poët. passim; scarcely akin to the Germ. frobn = demesne: in mod. poets and in patriotic songs fron is the pet name for Icel. itself, Núm. 1. 10, 8.9, 12.4, Snót 16; Icel. students in Copenhagen about 1763 were the first who used the word in this sense.

FRÚ, f., an older nom. sing. frauva, u, f., occurs Fms. x. 421, (Agrip); frouva, Stj. 47; frou, id.; fru is prop. a later contracted form from freyja; therefore the gen. in old writers is always fru (qs. fruvu); and the word is in the sing, indecl., thus, fru-innar, Fms. ix. 292; hann fekk frú Ceciliu, x. 3; móðir frú Ingigerðar, Landn. 240; frú Kristínar, Fms. ix. 8; slíkrar frou (sic) sem ek em, Str. 40, 47: in mod. usage gen. frúar, if used by itself or put after one's name, but indecl. if put before it in addressing any one, thus, Frú Kristínar, but Kristínar frúar; the gen, frúar occurs Fas. iii. 586, in a MS. of the 15th century; pl. frur, but older form fruvur or frovur, e. g. frovor, Edda (Arna-Magn.) i. 96 (Kb.); but Ob. frur, Hkr. i. 16: [freyja was origin. fem. of freyr, and prop. meant Lat. domina; Germ. frau; Dan. frue; no Goth. fraujo is found]:-a lady; in Icel. at present only used of the wives of men of rank or title, e. g. biskups-frú, amtmanns-frú; wives of priests are not called so: again, húsfreyja is more homely, Germ. bausfrau, Engl. bousewife, always of a married woman, vide e.g. the pjódólfr (Icel. newspaper): in the 14th century in Icel. frú was used of abbesses and wives of knights, but was little used before the 13th century: af hennar (the goddess Freyja) nafni skyldi kalla allar konur tignar (noble woman), svá sem nú heita fruvor, Hkr. l. c.; af hennar nafni er þat tignar-nafn er ríkis-konur (women of rank) eru kallaðar fruvor, Edda l. c.; Kolr hafði talat margt við frú eina ríka (of a foreign lady in Wales), Nj. 280: again, good housewives, such as Bergthora in Njála, are called hús-freyjur, but never frúr; thus, kenisk þó at seinna fari, húsfreyja, Nj. 69; gakk þú út, húsfreyja, þvíat ek vil pik fyrir öngan mun inni brenna, 200; búandi ok húsfreyja, Grág. i. 157; góð húsfreyja, Nj. 51; gild húsfreyja, Glúm. 349, Bs. i. 535:—the Virgin Mary is in legends called vár frú, our Lady; cp. jungfrú (pronounced

II. in the Rimur of the 15th century frygð is used of love, Lat. amores, Skald-H. 5. 38, passim; and frygougr, adj. amorous, Skáld-H. It is a bad word and quite out of use, and seems to have no connection with Germ. freude, which is a good Teut. word; the mod. frukt, n. bumble compliments, and frukta, ab, to make such compliments, in a bad sense, are perhaps akin, but they are slang words.

frýjan, f. = frýja, Fms. v. 55.

FRÝNN or frýniligr, adj.; this word is never used but as compounded with the prefix ú- (except Fas. ii. 351 in a bad and late Saga), viz. ú-frynn or ú-fryniligt = frowning. The sense as well as the etymology of frynn is somewhat dubious; there is the Germ. frôn or frobn or fran; but that word seems purely German and is by Grimm supposed to be qs. fro min = my lord (vide Hel.); neither does Icel. frynn or Germ. frobn correspond properly as to the root vowel (cp. e. g. Germ. lobn = lcel. laun): on the other hand there is the Engl. frown, which in form answers to the simple frynn, but in sense to the compd ú-frynn; as no similar word is found in A. S. (nor in Germ. nor in Hel.), frown is most likely a Scandin. word; and we suppose that the Icel. prefix syllable ú- is not in this instance = un-, that is to say, negative, but = of-, that is to say, intensive (= too, very, greatly); the original forms of-frynn, of-fryniligr were contr. and assimilated into ofrynn, ofryniligr, meaning very frowning, and these compds then superseded the primitive simple word; this is confirmed by the freq. spelling in MSS. with 'of-,' e. g. ofrynn, O. H. 144; all-ofrynn, Eg. Cod. Wolph.; heldr ofrynn, O. H. 167; but yet more freq. with 'ú-,' e. g. Orkn. 440, Boll. 358, Fær. 50, Fms. i. 40, Fb. i. 73; the ckki frým, Fas. l. c., is again a variation of úfrým: the statement by Björn that frynn is = bland, affable, is a mere guess by inference from the compd. frýs, n. the snorting of a horse.

FRÝSA, t, (hon frýsti ferliga, Sams. 9), mod. að, to snort, whinny, of a horse, Greg. 49, Karl. 3, 4, Fas. i. 60 (where better fnysa, q. v.); akin are fryssa, ad, and frussa, to sport.

frysing, f. = frys, Fas. iii. 441.

FRÆ, n. (not fræ, as even Eyvind Skaldaspillir rhymes frævi and ævi), sometimes in old MSS. spelt freo or frjó (q. v.), but less rightly; old dat. frævi, mod. fræi; [Ulf. fraiv = σπέρμα; Swed. and Dan. frö; not found in Germ., Saxon, or Engl.; it is therefore a Gothic-Scandinavian word]:-seed, 677. 11, Rb. 78, 655 xxx. 2; chiefly used of vegetables, sæði of animal seed; varpa síðan fræi í fold fyrirmyndan um sjálfs míns compos: fræ-korn, n. a hold, Bb. 3. 54; very freq. in mod. usage. grain of seed, 673 A. 2, Gbl. 351, Fms. i. 92. fræ-mælir, m. a measure of seed, N. fyl-merr, f. = fylhross, Grág. i. 504. fylvingar, f. pl. nuts, Edda (Gl.), Gisl. 109 (in a verse), pd. 14. fyndinn, adj. [finna], funny, facetious: fyndni, f. facetiousness, wit. fyroar, m. pl. [A. S. fyro = troops], poët. men, warriors, Lex. Poët. FYRIR, prep., in the Editions spelt differently; in MSS. this word is usually abbreviated either f (i. e. firir), or f, fur', fvr' (i. e. fyrir); in some MSS. it is idiomatically spelt with i, fir, e. g. Arna-Magn. 382 (Bs. i. 263 sqq.); and even in the old Miracle-book Arna-Magn. 645 (Bs. i. 333 sqq.), just as ifir is written for yfir (over); in a few MSS. it is written as a monosyllable fyr, e. g. D. I. i. 475, Mork. passim; in Kb. (Sæm.-Edda) occurs fyr telia, Vsp. 1; fyr norðan, 36; fyr dyrum, Gm. 22; fyr vestan ver, Hkv. 2.8; in other places as a dissyll. fyrir, e. g. Hm. 56, Gm. 54, Skm. 34, Ls. 15, Am. 64, Hkv. 2. 2, 19 (quoted from Bugge's edition, see his preface, p. xvi); fyr and fyrir stand to one another in the same relation as ept to eptir, and to undir, of (super) to yfir: this monosyllabic form is obsolete, save in the compds, where 'for-' is more common than 'fyrir-;' in some cases both forms are used, e.g. for-dæming and fyrir-dæming; in others only one, but without any fixed rule: again, the forms fyri, fyre, or fire, which are often used in Edd., are just as wrong, as if one were to say epti, undi, yfi; yet this spelling is found now and then in MSS., as, fyre, O. H. (facsimile); fire, Grág. Sb. ii. 288 (also facsimile): the particles i and a are sometimes added, i fur, Fms. iv. 137; í fyrir, passim; á fur, Haustl. 1. [Ulf. faur and faura; A. S. fore and for; Engl. for and fore-; Germ. für and vor; Dan. for; Swed. för; Gr. #po-, παρά; Lat. pro, prae.]

II. (cp. fyrir, acc., C. IX), in a neg. or priv. sense; a -snjallr. few words occur even in the earliest poems, laws, and writers, e.g. forað, -átta, -dæða, -nám, -næmi, -sending, -sköp, -verk, -veðja, -viða, -vitni, -ynja, -yrtir; those words at least seem to be original and vernacular: at a later time more words of the same kind crept in: writers of the 13th and 14th centuries, e. g. for-bob, -bænir, -djarfa, -dæma (fyrir-dæma), -taka (fyrir-taka), -bóttr; fyrir-bjóða, -fara, -göra, -koma, -kunna, -lita, -muna, -mæla, -vega, -verða. 2. introduced in some words at the time of the Reformation through Luther's Bible and German hymns, and still later in many more through Danish, e.g. for-brjóta, -drifa, -láta, -líkast, -merkja, -nema, -sorga, -sóma, -standa, -svara, -bénusta, and several others; many of these, however, are not truly naturalised, being chiefly used in eccl. writings:—it is curious that if the pronoun be placed after the verb (which is the vernacular use in Icel.) the sense is in many cases reversed; thus, fyrir-koma, to destroy, but koma e-u fyrir can only mean to arrange; so also fyrir-mæla, to curse, and mæla fyrir, to speak for; for-bænir, but bidja fyrir e-m, etc.; in the latter case the sense is good and positive, in the former bad and negative; this seems to prove clearly that these compds are due to foreign influence.

G (gé) is the seventh letter. In the old Gothic Runic alphabet (Golden horn) it is represented by X, which was probably taken from the Greek X. The later common Runic alphabet had no g, and made the tenuis k (μ , called Kaun) serve for both; still later, g was distinguished simply by a dot or stroke, μ or μ , and this character was called 'Stungiun Kaun,' i. e. dotted or cut Kaun, just as the name of Stunginn Tvr was given to cut or dotted t

A. In Scandinavia the letter g begins many fewer words than in German or Saxon, mainly because the prefixed particle ge- is absent. In the fragments of Ulf., although so little is left, ga- is prefixed to about three hundred words, mostly verbs and nouns; in the Anglo-Saxon at least three or four thousand such words are recorded, and in modern German still more: indeed the number is so to say endless, as it can be put to almost any verb. In Icel, the only traces of this prefix are. in a few words retaining g before the liquids l and n (gl and gn): gl in the word glikr, similis (and derivatives); glikr is now obsolete, and even in very old MSS, of the 13th or even the 12th century both forms, glikr and likr, glikendi and likendi, glikjast and likjast, occur indiscriminately: but in older poems gl is the only form. B. gn in gnadd, gnaga. gnauda, gnegg, gneisti, gnípa, gnísta, gnolla, gnógt, gnúa, gnúpr, gnyðr, gnæðingr, gnöllra, gnötra (q. v.), and some poët, words, as gnat, etc. But in mod. usage, in gn and gl, the g is dropped both in spelling and pronunciation, nadd, naga, nauda, hnegg, neisti, nipa . . . núpr, nyðr or nior, nædingr, nöllra, nötra; the gn in these words is almost constantly used in very old MSS., but even at the end of the 13th and in the 14th century the MSS., e.g. Hb., begin to drop the g, vide p. 206 sqq.: the exceptions are few, e.g. Icel never say nýja for gnýja, but the word itself, although known, is almost obsolete; so also in modern writers gnótt and gnægtir (abundance) often occur: but the sound gn may be said to be almost extinct. The Danes, Swedes, and Norse still keep the g before n, e. g. Dan. gnave, Swed. gnaga; whereas in glikr the has been dropped, and the word has become in Swed. lik, etc.; in Dan, lig, lige, ligning, etc. II. in two Icel, words the prefixed g has hardened into a radical consonant, so that its proper sound is no longer perceived, viz. granni (and compds), a neighbour, prop. one of the next bouse, Goth. garazna = \(\gamma \) \(\text{eirov} \), qs. g-ranni, from rann, domus; and greida, explicare, = Goth. garaidian. The Scandinavian tongues have furthermore done away with the Saxon and German prefix to passive participles, and no trace of them remains even in the earliest writers or poems. The modern English has followed the same law as the Scandinavian in gn, for though it still appears in Engl. words (as gnaw, gnasb), it is hardly sounded. The participial prefix remained long in southern England (see Morris's Specimens), but weakened into y or i till at last it dropped altogether.

B. Pronunciation.—It is sounded hard, soft, or aspirate; hard, as in Engl. gate, gold; soft, as in Swed. dag, Germ. tag, or mod. Gr. γ , but lost in Engl.; aspirate also lost in Engl. I. hard. initial before a hard vowel, garor, gull, gott, etc.; and before a consonant, glaor, grata; but the prefixed g, in the instances A. I. above, was prob. always sounded soft. 2. as final after consonants, as sorg, belg, ung, höfgi, or if double, as in egg. II. soft, never as initial (unlike mod. Greek, in which γ is sounded soft throughout), but only as final or sometimes as medial: 1. if single after a vowel, as dag, hug, log, 2. between two vowels if the latter is hard, lega, ligum, veg, stig. vega, vegum, dögum; but in case both the vowels, or even only the last, are soft (an i vowel) the g sound is lost, and it is eliminated altogether or assimilated to the preceding vowel, which thus becomes a diphthong; the same is the case if j follows g; thus syllables and words such as bagi and bæi, dagi and dæi, degi and deigi, cygja and eyja or eya, lagi and lægi or læi are all sounded alike; in olden times there must have been a difference of sound, as old MSS. never confound the spelling in words like those above, whereas in modern letters written by uneducated people, nothing is more frequent than to see, um dæinn for um daginn, or á definum for a deginum, and the like; the poets also rhyme accordingly, e. g. segi-hncigi, Pass. 38. 13; segja-deyja, 25; segja-beygja, 25. 12; drygja-nýja, 30. 3; eigið-dregið, 7. 10; deyja-teygja, 16. 13, etc.; even MSS, of the end of the 15th century frequently give seigia for segja (to say), e.g. Arna-Magn. 556 A, see the pref. to Isl. ii. p. vi: as a medial, before d the g is sounded hard almost all over Icel., and the d soft (sagði); yet in the peninsula of Snæfells Sýsla many people still reverse this rule, and say sagdi, lagdi, bygdi, bygd, sounding the g soft but the d hard; in the east of Icel. people say bregoa, sagoi, pronouncing go both soft; this is no doubt the best pronunciation, and accords well with the modern English said, laid, and the like. the aspirate g is sounded, 1. as initial before a soft vowel or j, gefa, gæta, geyma, geir, gjöld. 2. as final, a double g(gg) or g after a consonant is sounded as aspirate in all instances where a single g is lost göfgi, engi, mergiar, elgiar, engia. Between two consonants the g is not pronounced, thus fylgdi, morgna, fylgsni, bólgna are sounded as fyldi, morna, fylsni, bólnar,

C. Spelling.—Here is little to notice: I. in old MSS, the aspirate g as initial is frequently marked by the insertion of i after it, thus giæta, giefa, = gæta, gefa, but this is not now used. old Norse MSS.,—and, by way of imitation, in some Icel.,—the soft g before a vowel is frequently marked by inserting b after it, thus dagh, deghi, vegha, sagha; in the Middle Ages many foreign MSS. expressed soft sounds in this way, and so they wrote $db = \delta$, gb = soft g, $tb = \beta$, whence comes the th in modern English; we also find gh in words such as Helghi, Fb. pref.; probably the g was in olden times sounded soft in rg. lg, which agrees with the change in English into boly, sorrow, etc.; ngb = ng also occurs, e.g. erlinghi, Fb. i. 537, denoting a soft sound of ng as in modern Danish and Swedish. In MSS, we now and then find a spurious g before j and a vowel, e.g. devgja, meygja, for devja, meyja, because the sound was the same in both cases.

D. Changes.—The hard and aspirate g, especially as initial, usually remains in modern foreign languages, gate, ghost, give, get, except in Engl. yard, yarn (Icel. gard, garn), etc., where the Anglo-Saxon had a soft g sound. Again, 1. the soft g after a vowel takes a vowel sound, and is in English marked by w, y, or the like, day, say, saw, law, bow, way, low, = lcel. dag, segja, sög, lög, bogi, veg, lág, etc.: and even a double g, as in lay, buy, = Icel. leggia or liggia, byggia. before or after a consonant, thus, Engl. said, rain, gain, sail, tail, bail, fowl, etc., = Icel. sagði, regn, gagn, segl, tagl, hagl, fugl; Engl. sorrow, follow, fellow, worry, borrow, belly, = Icel, sorg, fylgia, felagi, vargt, byrgi. belgr. In Dan. lov, skov, vej answer to Icel. lög, skóg, veg, whereas Sweden and Norway have kept the g, Swed. lag, skog, väg.

E. INTERCHANGE.—Lat. b and Gr. x answer to Icel, and Teut. g. but the instances of such interchange are few, e.g. Lat. bostis, bortus, bomo, boedus, beri, = Icel. gestr, garor, gumi, geit, gær; Lat. bio, Gr. χάοs, cp. Icel. giá, gina; Gr. χθέs = gær; χήν = gáss, χολή = gall, etc. GABB, n. mocking, mockery, Fms. vii. 17, 59, ix. 385, Sturl. i. 155.

GANDR, m.:—the exact sense of this word is somewhat dubious; it is mostly used in poetry and in compds, and denotes anything enchanted or an object used by sorcerers, almost like zauber in Germ., and hence a monster, fiend; thus the Leviathan of northern mythology is called Jörmun-gandr, the great 'gand;' or Stordar-gandr, the 'gand' of the earth: a snake or serpent is by Kormak called gandr or gandir, Korm. ch. 8: wildfire is hallar g., a worrier of balls, and selju g., a willow-worrier, Lex. Poët .: the wolf Fenrir is called Vonar-gandr, the monster of the river Von, vide Edda. compos: Gand-alfr, m.a pr.name, a wizard, bewitched gand-fluga, u, f. = galdrafluga, a 'gand' fly, gad-fly, a kind gand-rekr, m. a gale brought about by ie), Edda (Gl.) The compd spá-gandar in Vsp. seems to mean 'spae-gbosts' or spirits of divination.

Some commentators render gandr by wolf, others by broom; but the sense no doubt lies deeper. Gunnar Palsson (died 1793) says that gandr is used in Icel. of the helm of a ship; but no such word is known, at least in the west of Icel.

N. G. L. in the section Hiros-skra, or the law (rules) for the king's men, and Sks. 257 sqq. As the gestir were lower in rank than the hirômenn, a recruit had often to serve his apprenticeship among them, e.g. var hann i gestasæti, be was seated among the guests, i. e. was held in small repute, Fas. i. II. a stranger, guest, Lat. bospes, but keeping the old notion of a stranger, prop. an accidental guest, chance comer, and is distinguished from bods-madr, an invited guest, or the like; hence the allit. phrase, gestr ok gangandi, a guest and ganger, since with the ancients the poor had to go from house to house (cp. gangleri); this is to be borne in mind, if one would understand old sayings such as, Guð elr gesti, God feeds guests, Bs. i. 247; or many passages in the old heathen poem Havamál, e. g. órir gestr við gest, guest quarrels with guest, Hm. 31; gestr at gest hædinn, guest mocking guest, 30, which reminds one of Hom. Od. xviii. I-33; gest bu ne geyja ne a grind hrekir (scoff not at a guest, nor drive bim to the door), get bu valudum vel, Hm. 136, where gestr (a guest) and valaor (a vagrant) are used synonymously; ganga skal, skala gestr vera æ í einum stað, 34. In olden times there were no public hostelries, and all entertainment was (as it still is in Icel.) private bounty; a fine instance of a munificent hostess of the heathen age is recorded in Landn.,-Geirríðr sparði ekki mat við menn, ok lét göra skála sinn of þjóðbraut þvera, hón sat á stóli ok laðaði úti gesti, en borð stóð inni jafnan ok matr á, 2.13. After the introduction of Christianity, when churches were built and endowments given, the donors often imposed the duty of 'feeding guest and ganger for a night' (ala gest ok ganganda), Dipl. i. 169, 174; or, þar er ekki gesta eldi skylt (it is not required to feed guests), ala hvern at ósekju er vill, 200; ala þurfa-menn ok þá er fara skylda-erinda, 201, cp. 273 passim: - gener. a visitor, guest: gosta-oldi, n. sbelter for guests, D.1. Þjóðs. i. 558. III. as pr. names, Landn., freq.; also in compds, por-gestr, Heim-gestr, God-gestr, Hleva-gastir on the Golden horn (Bugge's reading), and Gr. Εενο-φών, Εενο-φάνηε. Gestr is a name of Odin = the Traveller, Edda, Vhm., Gm., Hervar. S. ch. 15 (Gestumblindi). It is curious to notice that whereas with the Romans bostis came to mean a foe, with the Teutons (as with the Gr. févos) the equivalent word became a term of friendship, used of a friend staying at one's house.

gest-risinn, adj. bospitable, Greg. 32, Bs. i. 101, 1 Tim. iii. 2, Tit. i. 8, I Pet. iv. 9, passim. gest-risni, f. bospitality, 655 v. 2, Bs. i. 81, 830, Rom. xii. 13, Heb. xiii. 2, passim.

geysingr, m. impetuosity, Finnb. 354, Fas. i. 157, Isl. ii. 347, Fms. xi. 81. Geysir, m. the name of a famous hot spring in Iceland. Foreign writers often use geysir as an appellative; but the only Icel. words for hot springs are hver (a cauldron, bot well) and laug (a bot bath). The present Geysir is never mentioned in old writers, and it seems from a record in the Icel. Annals that the great hot wells in the neighbourhood of Haukadale were due to the volcanic eruptions of 1294, when old hot springs disappeared and those now existing came up,—hjá Haukadal kómu upp hverir stórir en sumir hurfu þeir er áðr höfðu verit; unfortunately the end of Arna S. (the bishop), the sole historical work of that time, is lost. The word geysir = a gusber must be old, as the inflexive -ir is hardly used but in obsolete words (læknir a leach, hellir a cave, etc., are exceptional); it was probably borrowed from some older hot spring. A pretty legend, referring to the 'moving' of springs when defiled with innocent blood, is recorded in Isl. pjóðs. ii. 112, 113; this tale could not have sprung up unless a change in the place of the hot springs had been observed. geytlan, f. gluttony, Róm. 306, (an ἄπ. λεγ.)

-GI (or -ki after t or s), a particle suffixed to nouns and adverbs.

A. In a positive sense [Lat. -que], ever, Lat. -que, -cunque: the pronoun hverr (quis) through all cases, answering to the Lat. quis-que: out of the Laws we can nearly make a full paradigm:-nom. hverr-gi or hver-gi, Lat. quis-que, qui-cunque, Grag. Kb. i. 14, 31, 45, 85, 171 (twice), 183, 195, 221, ii. 7, 23, 82, 101: nom. and acc. neut. hvat-ki (quod-que), i. 34, 155, 162, 183, 244, ii. 77, 140, 154, Jómsv. 15, lb. 3; also hvártki, id., Grag. Kb. i. 61 (twice): gen. hvers-kis (cujus-que), 238: dat. hverjun-gi (cui-que), 31, 156: acc. masc. hvern-gi (quem-que), 147, 155, 221, 225, 245, ii. 47, 66: abl. hvc-gi or hví-gi, bowever, i. 147, 195, ii. 64, 101, 128, 151, Jómsv. 14:—plur. acc. neut. hver-gi (quae-que): dual dat. sing. hvárun-gi megin, on both sides (of a river), Grág. Kb. ii. 93: -even in historical prose, því at hit næsta sumar gat hvergi ber á Islandi, the following summer every man gathered berries in Iceland (to make some kind of wine), Bs. i. 135, (or are we to read hvar-gi, everywhere?). with adverbs; hvert-ki (quocun-que modo), Grag. ii. 50; nær-gi, wbenever (ubi-cunque), i. 191; hvar-gi, wberever, 25, 166, 240, ii. 128, 212.

B. In a negative sense, with a few pronouns, adjectives, adverbs, and rarely in old poems with substantives: 1. with nouns, in the pr. name Lopt-ki, an απ. λεγ., Ls. 19: with appellatives, borf-gi, no need, an &r. Aey., Hky. Hjörv, 39; freq. in mann-gi, no man, cp. Lat. nēmo, Ib., the first guilds in Norway were instituted by king Olave (1066-1093).

eigi, B. beeded not, iv. 110; geyma til, id.; geymit per til vel (mark which is even used in mod. writers and poets; væt-ki, naught; vettu-gi (dat.) and vetter-gis (gen.), Vsp.: with adjectives, ein-gi (q.v.), none, a common word; otherwise rare, sjálf-gi, 'self-not,' i.e. not oneself, Ls. 29, an απ. λεγ.: with a dat, case of langr, bá löngu-gi, then not for a long time, Konr. (MS.): with pronouns, in the dual, hvarr-gi, neither, Lat. neuter, Grág. Kb. i. 46, ii. 93, 151; gen. hvárs-kis (neutrius), freq.; dat. hvárungi (neutri), i. 215; hvarum-gi, ii. 63: neut. hvaru-gi, 216; hitt-ki, ne illud quidem, Hm. 21, 23; pat-ki, Hbl. 6; pat-ki at ek fá (not even that I get) mála minn falslausan, Mork. 83. 2. with adverbs, only in poetry or laws or very old prose; svá-gi, not so, Grág. Kb. ii. 99, Mork. 83; bá-gi, then not; bey-gi, though not, qs. bó-gi; zva-gi, never: again, hver-gi (q. v.), nowbere; ei-gi (q. v.), not; aldri-gi (q. v.), never; hvar-ki (q. v.), neither, are common words in prose and in speech. The negative -gi can never be suffixed to verbs (vide '-at,' p. 2); therefore byo-gi, non jubeo (in Islands-vaka 61, a poem of the last century, Fél. i. 236), is a spurious imitation of the old idiom; neither can -at be put to nouns; ráð-at hann kunni, Jónas 105, ought therefore to be ráð hann kunni-t, issue be knew not.

C. In an indefinite sense; in a few instances -gi seems to be used almost like Latin quidem with a preceding negative; eigi miklo-gi minna, ne multo quidem minus, Heidar. S., Isl. ii. 360; eigi storu-gi meiri, ne multo quidem majora, 386; engi miklo-gi gört ..., nemo multo quidem plus ..., Grag. i. 209; cp. also the adverbs öllun-gis or öldun-gis, quite, altogether (allr, -gi); einun-gis, only, solely (einn, -gi), both formed from dat. sing.: the obsolete vil-gi (qs. vel-gi) is ambiguous, being used both in a neg. sense = not well, and posit. = well, bene quidem, cp. Bs. i. 393, note; Hm. 66, málun-gi, is doubtful ;-prob. byrftig-at málun-gi mat should be read, -at being taken not as a prep. but as a negative verbal suffix, and -gi as a positive suffix; Icel. now say, hann á ekki málungi matar, be does not know where to look for his next meal.

The negative -gi is peculiar to Scandin., and no traces of it are found in any Saxon nor German idioms; whereas, as a positive suffix, it is common to all Teutonic tongues, and remains in the Engl. many and any; 'many' being qs. man-y = man-ever, 'bomo-cunque,' Goth. manags, and 'any' qs. ane-y = every-one; so also is the g in Icel. margr and hvárigr, which are remnants—the former of the positive, the latter of the negative -gi.

GIKKR, m., pl. ir, [Dan. gjæk = jester], a pert, rude person. compbs: gikks-håttr, m. pert manner. gikks-ligr, adj. pert, rude; the saying, hver sem glettist við gikkinn fær af honum hnykkinn, wbo meddles with a 'gik' will get a kick.

GIL, n., gen. pl. gilja, dat. giljum, [Gbyll or Gill in North. E. and Scot. local names]:—a deep narrow glen with a stream at bottom, like the Gr. χαράδρα; brooks and tributary streams flowing through clefts in the fell side to the main river at the bottom of a vale are in Icel, called gil; very freq. in local names, İsfirðinga-gil, Branda-gil, Hauka-gil, Hrafna-gil, Hellra-gil, Gilj-á, pver-gil, vide Landn.; (a chasm without water or with stagnant water is not gil, but gjá; also gljúfr, a deep chasm forming the bed of a river), Valla L. 223, Hrafn. 7, Eg. 766, Ld. 218, Krók. 64, COMPDS: Gils-bakki, a, m., prop. gilda, t, to be worth so and so, only in mod. usage, esp. in metaph. and impers. phrases, mig gildir einu, I do not mind; lattu big einu g., never mind: hvað sem gildir, at any price; hirt aldrei hvað sem gildir, at hætta á ósatt mál, Pass. 13. 2.

GILDI, n. [gjalda; Ulf. gild = tribute, Luke xx. 22, Mark xii. 14; A. S. gild; Hel. geld; Frank. cbalta; Germ. geld = money; it remains in Old Engl. weregild]:-payment, tribute; this sense is very rare, as gjald (q. v.) is the common word; chiefly used in compds, as nef-gildi, bead-tax; baug-gildi, q. v.; skatt-gildi, a tax; skulda-gildi, payment of debts, Grug. i. 302. 2. recompense; in the saying, æ sér til gildis gjöf (mod. æ sér gjöf til gjalda), Hom. 146. 3. value; al-gildi, full-g., half-g., wbole, full, balf value; id-gildi or i-gildi, equivalence; hon er karlmanus-igildi. worth, value, esteem; the phrase, vera i miklu, litlu, engu gildi, to be in great, small, no repute; an Drottins rada er adstod manns i engu minsta gildi, Pass. 9. 2: freq. in mod. usage, but rare in old writers, pegar ér komizt í gildi við höfðingja eðr kærleika, Finnb. 266. II. a banquet, feast, [cp. Dan. gilde; so called from the fee paid?], Eg. 20 sqq., Edda 45, 57, Fb. i. 283, Ghl. 178, freq. in old poems; the poetical mead is called Gauta g., Kormak; or gildi Grjótaldar, the cheer of the Giants; gefa úlfum gildi, to feast the wolves, Lex. Poët.; to this seems to belong the passage in Vsp. 27, hvárt skyldi Æsir afrað gjalda eðr skyldi goðin öll gildi eiga, where the eiga gildi means to bold a feast, with the notion of making a league or peaceful agreement, as opp. to gjalda afrad (q. v.), to pay tribute as a badge of submission. III. in a technical sense, a guild, throughout England and Scandinavia during the Middle Ages;

Ólafr konungr lét setja Mikla-gildi í Níðarósi, ok mörg önnur í kaup- Tit seems however better to derive it from the verb beginnan. Engl. begin, stödum, en adr voru hvirfings-drykkjur (but before there were drinkingbouts), Fms. vi. 440: the guilds were secular brotherhoods or trades' unions (and often became political clubs); they assumed the names of saints or sacred things, as Kross-g., Cross-guild; Olafs-g., St. Olave's guild (in Norway); Knúts-g., St. Canute's guild (in Denmark), and so on: in Icel. this sense rarely occurs, mælti at einhverr vildis-manna ætti at hefja gildit, Sturl. i. 20; ok var gildit at Ólafs messu hvert sumar, 23; cp. also gildis-fundr, m. a guild-meeting, mentioned in Sturl. i. 58; and gildis-bændr, m. pl. guild-franklins, guild-brothers, 23, (about the middle of the 12th century); but guilds never took root in Icel.: gildisskáli, 2, m. a guild-ball, Fms. viii. 160, ix. 22, D. Grett. 148; Icel. now say gildr of a man, digr of things; but in compds, mittis-digr, not mittis-gildr; to use digr and digrask (q. v.) for gildr and gildna is now thought rude; but in olden times only digr was used in that sense, e. g. Olafr Digri, porbjörg Digra (a lady); the passage referred to, Grett. 148, comes near the mod. sense of that word, but is not to be so understood.

L. i. 8, passim: in mod. usage Icel. distinguish between gjöf and gáfa, using the latter of the gifts of nature, gifts of mind, cleverness, but gjöf in a material sense. The ancients were fond of exchanging gifts, which were either a part of hospitality or tokens of friendship; the former were munificent, the latter might be small, Hm. 51: at a feast (wedding, funeral, or the like) the host used to make gifts to all his more honoured guests at departure; the technical phrase for this was, leysa menn út með gjöfum, to dismiss with rifts: voru allir menn med gjöfum brott levstir; hence útlausnir, detarture from a feast, Sturl. iii. 268: a departing friend or visitor had to be dismissed with a gift (kynnis-gjöf, Fms. vi. 358). The gifts consisted chiefly of weapons and costly clothes; but favourite gifts were a steed (Bjarn. 55, 58) or oxen of a fine breed (Sturl. i. 106), hawks, tents, sails, white bears (O. H. ch. 114, Fms. vi. ch. 72-75, 100, Hung. ch. 2), in short anything that was rare and costly, gorsimi, metfé. Again, friends had to exchange gifts, so as to cement their friendship, cp. Havamal passim,-vápnum ok váðum skulu vinir gleðjask; gefendr ok endrgefendr erusk lengst vinir, 40; gjalda gjöf við gjöf, 41; geði skaltú við hann (viz. the friend) blanda ok gjöfum skipta, 43; glík skulu gjöld gjöfum, 45; sytir æ glöggr við gjöfum, 47. Gifts were obligatory, and were a token of grace and goodwill on the part of giver and receiver. A gift when received was called the 'nautr' of the giver, e.g. a ring or sword presented by a king was konungs-nautr. The instances in the Sagas are very many, e. g. Eg. ch. 36, 81, Ld. ch. 7, 27, 43, 45, Sturl. passim, Glum. ch. 6, 25, Vapn. p. 19, Hrafn. 23, Lv. ch. 14, 15, O. H. ch. 114, Har. S. Gilla ch. 16, Hung. ch. 13, 17, Pals. bresta i gleri, to be sbivered, to break into sbivers, Hým. 29,—the reading of Kb., 'i tvau,' is a gloss on the obsolete phrase:—glæs also occurs twice or thrice in A. S. poetry, but not in the oldest, as Beowulf, vide Grein. For window-panes glass is of much later date, and came into use with the building of cathedrals: a Danish cathedral with glass panes is mentioned in Knytl. S. ch. 58 (year 1085); in Icel. the first panes brought into the country were probably those presented by bishop Paul to the cathedral at Skalholt in the year 1195; the ancient halls and dwellings had no windows in the walls, but were lighted by louvres and by round openings (gluggr) in the roof, covered with the caul (of a new-born calf, called skjall or likna-belgr) stretched on a frame or a hoop and called skjár: these are still used in Icel. farms; and Icel. distinguish between the round small caul windows (skjár or skjá-gluggar) and glass windows (gler-gluggar):—hall sem gler, slippery as glass, of ice, Nj. 144: in eccl. and later writings, Hom. 127, Sks. 424, Vm. 21, Fas. iii. 393: in the saying, sjaldan brýtr gæfu-maðr gler. GLIMA, u, f. [this word occurs neither in Germ. nor in Saxon, nor yet in the mod. Scandin. tongues (of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark), and the origin is not known]:—wrestling, a favourite national sport with the Icel. people, in old as well as in modern times, answering to the Gr. πάλη: glimu-brogo, n. pl. wrestling-tricks, vide brago II. 2: to the technical terms there mentioned, add, hnykkr, hælkrókr, sveifla, etc.: glimu-félagi, a, m. a wrestling-match, Háv. 41: glimu-færr, adj. able-bodied as a wrestler, Finnb. 328: glimu-galdr, m. a 'wrestlerspell,' to charm one's legs and make them steady, Isl. þjóðs. i: glímumaor, m. a wrestler: glimumann-liga, adv. like a good wrestler, nimbly, Fas. iii. 502: glimu-völlr, m. the wrestling-ring. The earliest match recorded is that of Thor and the giantess Elli (Age),-for the tale vide Edda 33; freq. in the Sagas, Sturl. iii. 20, 268; glenz ok glimur, Fms. i. 149 sqq., 182, iii. 187, 188, Grett. and Finnb., Kjaln. passim, Eg. ch. 40; leikr (sport) and glima are often used synonymously, as Ld. ch. 45. The glima was a popular game at any meeting or festival, where many young and active men met together: thus at the banquet in Reykhólar (1119) the guests amused themselves by dancing, glimur, and story-telling, Sturl. i. 23; at the parliament (albing) there was a palaestra, Fanga-brekka ('wrestling-brink'); in Glum. ch. 13 a fight is recorded between the Northerners and Westerners assembled there; as also in Grett. ch. 75 (in the parliament at Hegranes); in Gunnl. ch. 11 the crew of the ships in harbour made up a glima. The mod. Icel. bænda-glima is just the same, as it was practiced in the college at Hólar, and later in the school at Bessastadir, as also at fishing-stations and wherever young men came together; the young men are divided by lot into two parties, which are then drawn up in a row, each having their leader or 'bondi' (whence the name); the bændr pair off their men against one another to wrestle in the arena or defile between the two ranks, one after another; if the one side was weaker in number, or the one bondi had lost all his men, he might challenge his antagonist, and their match decided the game, Eggert Itin. ch. 518. The bænda-glima at college and school was by far the best-played, and much stress was laid on nimble and graceful movements. 65 In Hom. 24 scurrilitas is rendered by glima. glima, d, to wrestle, Landn. 185, Fms. iii. 187, Sturl. iii. 268, Finnb. 222.

GOD, n. pl. [all the Teutonic languages have this word in common; Ulf. guha, n. pl., Gal. iv. 8; guda, id., John x. 34, 35; and Guh, m.; A. S. godu, n. pl., and God, m.; O. H. G. Cot: in mod. languages masc.; Engl. God; Germ. Gott; Dan.-Swed. Gud].

A. HISTORICAL REMARKS.—In heathen times this word was neuter, and was used almost exclusively in plur., as were also other words denoting Godhead, e. g. regin or rögn = numina, q. v.; and bönd, höpt, prop. = bonds, and metaph. gods:—this plur, usage seems not to refer to a plurality of gods, but rather, as the Hebrew אלהים, to the majesty and mystery of the Godhead; it points to an earlier and purer faith than that which was current in the later ages of the Scandinavian heathendom; thus the old religious poem Völuspá distinguishes a twofold order of gods,—the heavenly powers (regin or ginn-heilög goð) who had no special names or attributes, and who ruled the world, like the Moipa or Aloa of Gr. mythology;—and the common gods who were divided into two tribes, Æsir (Ases) and Vanir, whose conflict and league are recorded in Vsp. 27, 28, and Edda 47. II. after the introduction of Christianity, the masculine gender (as in Greek and Latin) superseded the neuter in all Teutonic languages, first in Gothic, then in Old High German and Anglo-Saxon, and lastly in the Scandinavian languages; but neither in Gothic nor in Icel, did the word ever take the masc, inflexive r or s, so that it remains almost unique in 2. in Scandinavian the root vowel was altered from o to u as also in the oldest MSS, of the 12th century; sometimes however it is written $\bar{g}b$, in which case the root vowel cannot be discerned. in Icel, the pronunciation also underwent a change, and the g in Guð (God) is now pronounced gw (Gwud), both in the single word and in those proper names which have become Christian, e. g. Guðmundr pronounced Gwudmundr, whence the abbreviated form Gvendr or Gvondr. The old form with o is still retained in obsolete words, as godi, godoro, vide below, and in local names from the heathen age, as Goo-dalir; so also Gormr (q. v.), which is contracted from God-ormr not Gud-ormr. On the other hand, the Saxon and German have kept the root vowel III. in old poems of heathen times it was almost always used without the article; gremdu eigi god at ber, Ls.; aor ver heilög god blótim, Fas. i. (in a verse); ginnheilög God, Vsp. passim; godum ek þat þakka, Am. 53; með goðum, Alm.; in prose, en goð hefna eigi alls þegar, Nj. 132.

2. with the article goð-in, Vsp. 27: freq. in prose, um hvat reiddusk goðin þá er hér brann hraunit er nú stöndu vér á, Bs. i. (Kr. S.) 22; eigi cru undr at goðin reiðisk tölum slíkum, id.; Hallfredr lastadi eigi godin, po adrir menn hallmælti þeim, Fms. ii. 52; allmikin hug leggr þú á goðin, Fs. 94; eigi munu goðin þessu valda, Nj. 132, passim. 3. very seldom in sing., and only if applied to a single goddess or the like, as Ondor-gods (gen.), Haustl. 7; Vanagoð, of Freyja, Edda; enu skírleita goði, of the Sun, Gm. 39. after the introduction of Christianity, the neut, was only used of false gods in sing, as well as in pl., Sólar-goð = Apollo, Orrostu-goð = Mars, Draumagod = Morpheus, Bret. (Verel.); and was held up for execration by the missionaries; gör þik eigi svá djarfa, at þú kallir goð hinn hæsta konung er ek trúi á, Fb. i. 371. Yet so strongly did the neut, gender cleave to the popular mind that it remains (Grág. Kb. i. 192) in the oath formula, goð gramt = Goð gramr; and Icel. still say, í Guðanna (pl.) bænum. gudir, masc. pl., as in A. S. gudas, is freq. in eccl. writers, but borrowed from the eccl. Lat.

(App.) 126 new Ed. (from the Hauks-bók), that men of the olden time used to call their sons and daughters after the gods (Goð-, Þór-, Frey-, Ás-); and it was thought that a double (i.e. a compound) name gave luck and long life, esp. those compounded with the names of gods; menn höfðu mjök þá tvau nöfn, þótti þat líkast til langlifis ok heilla, þótt nokkurir fyrirmælti þeim við goðin, þá mundi þat ekki saka, ef þeir ætti eitt nafn, though any one cursed them by the gods it would not burt if they bad 'one' name, i. c. if they were the namesakes of the gods, Eb. l.c.; -we read 'eitt nafn' for eitt annat nafn' of the Ed. and MS. In Fb. i. 23, the mythical king Raum is said to have had three sons, Alf, Björn, and Brand; the first was reared by the Finns, and called Finn-Alf; Björn by his mother (a giantess), and called Jötun-Björn; and Brand was given to the gods, and called Goð-Brand (Guð-brandr, whence Guðbrands-dalir, a county in Norway); cp. also Eb. ch. 7.

For the Christian sense of God and its compds vide s. v. Guo.

goddi, a, m. [cp. Germ. götze], a nickname, Ld. GODI, a, m. [Ulf. renders lepeve by gudja (ufar-gudja, abumista-gudja, it is still made to rhyme with o, Goos, boonum; Goo, roonar, Sighvat; etc.), leparela by gudjinassus, lepareveur by gudjinos; an Icel. gydi, gen, gydja, would answer better to the Goth, form, but it never occurs, except that the fem. gydja = goddess and priestess points not to godi, but to a masc, with a suppressed final i, gydi; a word coting occurs in O. H. G. glossaries, prob. meaning the same; and the form gubi twice occurs on Danish-Runic stones in Nura-gubi and Saulva-gubi, explained as godi by P. G. Thorsen, Danske Runem.; (Rafn's explanation and reading of Nura-gubi qs. norðr á Gauði, is scarcely right): with this exception this word is nowhere recorded till it appears in Icel., where it got a wide historical bearing]:-prop. a priest, sacerdos, and hence a liege-lord or chief of the Icel. Commonwealth.

A. HISTORICAL REMARKS.—The Norse chiefs who settled in Icel., finding the country uninhabited, solemnly took possession of the land (land-nam, q.v.); and in order to found a community they built a temple, and called themselves by the name of godi or hof-godi, 'templepriest; and thus the temple became the nucleus of the new community, which was called godoro, n.:-hence hof-godi, temple-priest, and holdingi, chief, became synonymous, vide Eb. passim. Many independent godar and godord sprang up all through the country, until about the year 930 the albingi (q. v.) was erected, where all the petty sovereign chiefs (godar) entered into a kind of league, and laid the foundation of a general government for the whole island. In 964 A.D. the constitution was finally settled, the number of godord being fixed at three in each ping (sbire), and three ping in each of the three other quarters, (but four in the north); thus the number of godar came to be nominally thirtynine, really thirty-six, as the four in the north were only reckoned as three, vide Ib. ch. 5. On the introduction of Christianity the godar lost their priestly character, but kept the name; and the new bishops About the year 1004 obtained seats in the Lögrétta (vide biskup). there were created new godar (and godord), who had to elect judges to the Fifth Court, but they had no seats in the Lögrétta, and since that time the law distinguishes between forn (old) and ny (new) godord; -in Glum, ch. I the word forn is an anachronism. It is curious that, especially in the 12th century, the godar used to take the lesser Orders from political reasons, in order to resist the Romish clergy, who claimed the right of forbidding laymen to be lords of churches or to deal with church matters; thus the great chief Jon Loptsson was a sub-deacon; at last, about 1185, the archbishop of Norway forbade the bishops of Icel. to ordain any holder of a godord, unless they first gave up the godorð, fyrir því bjóðum vór biskupum at vígja eigi þá menn er godorð hafa, D. I. i. 291. In the middle of the 13th century the king of Norway induced the godar to hand their power over to him, and thus the union with Norway was finally brought about in the year 1262; since that time, by the introduction of new codes (1272 and 1281), the name and dignity of godar and godoro disappeared altogether, so that the name begins and ends with the Commonwealth.

B. Duries.—In the albingi the godar were invested with the Lögréttu-skipan (q. v.), that is to say, they composed the Lögrétta (the Legislative consisting of forty-eight members—on the irregularity of the number vide 1b. ch. 5), and were the lawgivers of the country; secondly, they had the domnesna (q. v.), or right of naming the men who were to sit in the courts, vide domr:—as to their duties in the quarter-parliaments (vár-þing) vide Grág. Þ. Þ. and the Sagas. The authority of the godar over their liegemen at home was in olden times somewhat patriarchal, vide e.g. the curious passage in Hænsab. S. ch. 2; though no section of law relating to this interesting part of the old history is on record, we can glean much information from the Sagas. It is to be borne in mind that the godar of the Saga time (roth century) and those of the Grágás and Sturlunga time (12th and 13th centuries) were very different; the former were a kind of sovereign chiefs, who of free will entered into a league; the latter had become officials, who for neglecting their duties in parliament might be fined, and even forfeit the godord to their liegemen, vide Grág. p. p. Neither ping (q. v.) nor godord was ever strictly geographical (such is the opinion of Konrad Maurer), but changed from time to time; the very word godoro is defined as 'power' (veldi), and was not subject to the payment of tithe, K. p. K. 142. The godoro could be parcelled out by inheritance or by sale; or they might, as was the case in the latter years of the Commonwealth, accumulate in one hand, vide esp. Sturl. passim, and Grág. The liegemen (þingmenu) were fully free to change their lords (ganga í lög með goða, ganga ór lögum); every franklin (þingmaðr) had in parliament to declare his þingfesti, i. c. to name his liegeship, and say to what godi and bing he belonged, and the godi had to acknowledge him; so that a powerful or skilful chief might have liegemen scattered all over the country. But the nomination to the courts and the right of sitting in the legislative body were always bound to the old names, as fixed by the settlement of the year 964; and any one who sought the name or influence of a godi had first (by purchase, inheritance, or otherwise) to become possessor of a share of one of the old traditionary godord; see the interesting chapter in Nj. The three godar in one bing (sbire) were called sam-godar, joint-godar: for the sense of allsherjar-godi vide p. 17.

he especially worshipped, as Freys-Godi, Hrafn., Gísl., whence Freysgyolingar, q.v.; (the or-gooi is dubious); more frequently the name referred to the liegemen or county, e. g. Ljósvetninga-Goði, Tungu-Goði, etc.; but in the Saga time, godi was often added to the name almost as a cognomen, and with some, as Snorri, it became a part of their name (as Cato Censor in Latin); hann varðveitti þá hof, var hann þá kallaðr Snorri Goði, Eb. 42; seg, at sú sendi, er meiri vin var húsfreyjunnar at Fródá en Godans at Helgafelli, 332. got, n. spawning. gota, u, f. spawn. Goti, a, m., pl. Gotnar, the Goths; hence Gotland, n. Gotland; Gotneskr, adj. Gothic, Lex. Poët.; Gota-veldi, n. the Gothic empire, (of the island Gotland, A.D. 1319.) The name of the Goths with compds occurs freq. in Scandin. history, esp. in Sagas referring to the mythical age; and distinction is made between Ey-Gotar, the Island-Goths, i. e. the inhabitants of the Danish Isles, and Reið-Gotar or Hreð-Gotar in the south of Sweden. According to Jornandes and the late Norwegian historian P. A. Munch, a race of Gothic origin, speaking a dialect closely akin to that of Ulfilas, lived in parts of Scandinavia during the 3rd and 4th centuries of our era; Munch even supposes that Ermanarik (Jörmunrekr) was a Scandinavian-Gothic king, and lived in the 4th century, and that the Runic monuments on the Golden horn, the stone in Tune, the Bracteats, etc., are of this and the subsequent period; on this interesting question see Munch's Norske Folk's Hist., vol. i, and several essays by the same. GUD, m.; the plur, used to render the Lat. dii is gudir; [for etymology and changes of this word see p. 207]:-God.

A. Though the primitive form God rhymes with bod (bidding), stoð (belp), and many other words, the second form Guð rhymes with no single word, so that in hymns the poets are wont to use incomplete rhymes, as braud (bread), naud (need); and exact rhymes can only be obtained by the last syllables of derivatives, e.g. Idranin blidkar aptur Guð | ei verður syndin tilreiknuð, Pass. 40. 4; or Upphaf alls mesta ófögnuðs | áklögun ströng og reiði Guðs, 3.14; Svo er nú syndin innsigluð | iðrandi sála kvitt við Guð, 50. 14; but these rhyme-syllables can only occur in trisyllabic words (Gramm. p. xv):—the following are examples of incomplete rhymes, Vinir ber enga veittu stod | svo vinskap fengi eg við sannan Guð, Pass. 3. 7; Födurlegt hjarta hefir Guð | við hvern sem líðr kross og nauð, 3. 16; Herra minn þú varst hulinn Guð þá hæðni leiðst og krossins nauð, 40. 16; as also in the hymn, Til þín Heilagi Herra Guð | hef eg lypt sálu minni | af hug og hjarta í hverri neyð | hjástoð treystandi þinni, Hólabók 108, rendering of Ps. xxv; Luther's hymn, Ein feste burg ist unser Gott, is in the Icel. rendering, Ovinnanlig borg er vor Guð | ágæta skjöldr og verja | hann frelsar oss af allri nauð, Hólabók 182; Fyrir valtan veraldar auð | set þina trú á sannan Guð | sem allt skapaði fyrir sitt boð, 208 (in Hans Sachs' hymn); hugsjúkir eta harma braud | hollari fæðu gefr Gud | sér ljufum þá þeir sofa, 124, Ps. cxxvii. 2.

(which is also the answer to a greeting or to thanks); Guds fridi! or vertu i Guds fridi, be in God's peace! is the usual farewell; and the answer is, Guð veri með þér, God be with thee! Guð hjálpi þér, God belp thee! Germ. belf Gott! Engl. God bless you! (to one sneezing); Guð varðveiti þig, God ward thee! (to one playing with dangerous things); biddu Guð fyrir þér! (denoting wonder), pray God! gáðu að Guði, beed God! take beed! fyrir Guds skuld, for God's sake! ef Gud lofar, proncd. as one word (ef-gudlogar, changing f into g), God willing, a common phrase when speaking of plans for the future, eg skal koma á morgun, ef-guòlogar, I will come to-morrow, God willing (from James iv. 13-15), occurs in Skálda (Thorodd) 165, as also, ef Guð vill, if God will (less freq.); Gudi sé lof, God be praised! This was a favourite way of settlement at the time of the Commonwealth, and suited well the sagacious and law-abiding spirit of the men of old: nor did the institution of the Fifth Court make any change in this; the gord was even resorted to in public matters, such as the introduction of Christianity in A.D. 1000. Good and leading men acted the part of public peacemakers (e.g. Njál in the 10th, Jón Loptsson in the 12th century); until at last, in the 13th century, the king of Norway was resorted to, but he misused the confidence put in him.

görvir, m., poët. a doer, maker, Lex. Poët.

götóttr, adj. [gat], full of boles. GOTVA, 20, [akin to gata, a way dug or bored through; the characteristic v is preserved in Goth. gatvo = platea]:—to dig, bury; götvaðr (part.), buried (in a cairn), Isl. ii. 280; götva þeir hann þar í grjótinu. they cast stones over him, Gisl. 72, Gkv. 18: in mod. usage, upp-gotva. to discover, (freq.)

götvaðr, m. one who buries, i. e. a slayer, Bkv. 10, (dub.) götvan, f., in upp-götvan, discovery, (freq. in mod. usage.)

götvar, f. pl. [A. S. geatwe, Grein], a board (?); geirrotu götvar, the treesure of Bellona, armour, weapons, Edda (in a verse), Yt. 21: gotvar seems prop. to mean bidden treasures, board.

H (há) is the eighth letter. In the old Runic alphabet it was represented by N and M, which are used indiscriminately (but never H or B): N and M both occur on the Golden horn, the former once, the latter twice. This Rune was no doubt borrowed from the Greek or Latin. In the later common Runic alphabet this character was replaced by * (rarely *), which we may infer was taken from the Greek x (the g of the old Runic alphabet) marked with a perpendicular stroke down the middle, rather than from the Latin (see Ritschl's essay in the Rheinisches Museum, 1869, p. 22); yet the old form is now and then found on the oldest of the later monuments, e.g. the stones from Snoldelöv, Höjetostrup, and Helnzes (Thorsen 15, 17, 335), on which monuments the * is used for a: in some inscriptions * serves both for b and soft g. The name of the Rune b was Hagall or Hagl, an Anglo-Saxon form, explained as meaning bail, hagl er kaldast korna (bail is the coldest of grains), in the Norse Runic poem; cp. bagl byo hwitust corna in the Anglo-Saxon poem, which is the prototype of the Norse. These names in the Anglo-Saxon and Norse poems are in no way derived from the form of the Rune, but are merely alike to the modern rhymes in English ABC books, - B is a Baker' or the like. The Hagall was the first of the second group of Runes, Hnias, which was therefore called Hagalsett, the family of Hagal (cp. introduction to F).

A. PRONUNCIATION AND SPELLING .- H is sounded as in English bard, bouse: the aspirate is still sounded in bl, br, bn much as in the Welsh Il, rb: the bu is in the west and north of Icel, sounded as ku; but in the south and east the distinction is kept between by and ky (hver a kettle and kver a quire, hvölum whales and kvölum torments), as also in writing; and bu is sounded like wb in Northern English; in a small part of eastern Icel. it is sounded like Greek x (hvalr as xalr, hvað as xab), and this is probably the oldest and truest representation of the bu II. the b is dropped, 1. in the article inn, in, it, for hinn, hin, hit, which is often spelt so in old MSS. β. in the personal pronoun hann, hun if following after another word, e. g. ef 'ann (ef hann), ef 'un (ef hun), þó 'onum (þó honum), látt' 'ann vera (láttu hann vera), sego' 'enn' ad koma (segou henni ad koma); this is the constant pronunciation of the present time, but in writing the b is kept: whereas, at the beginning of a sentence the b is sounded, e.g. hann (hón) kom, be (she) came, but kom 'ann? (if asking the question). y. in a few words such as álfa and hálfa, óst and hóst (cp. hósta), ökulbrækr and hökul-2. in the latter part of such compounds as have nearly become inflexions, as ein-ardr for ein-hardr: in -úd, -ýdgi, -ygd (Gramm. p. xxxiii, col. 1); elsk-ogi, var-ugi, öl-ogi, from hugr; örv-endr, tröll-endr, gramendr, from hendr; litar-apt = litar-hapt: in -ald = hald, handar-ald, haf-ald; lik-amr = lik-hamr, hár-amr = hár-hamr; skauf-ali, rang-ali, from hali; at-zfi = at-hzfi, and perhaps in auð-œfi, ör-œfi, from hóf or hœfi; and-œfa = and-hoefa, to respond; hnapp-elda = hnapp-helda: in pr. names in -arr, alli, eiðr, eiðr, eidr, for -harr = herr, -halli, -heiðr, -hildr, (Ein-arr, Þór-alli, Ragn-eiðr, Yngv-ildr, etc.)

In a few words, as hjúpr, and derivatives from jupr, hilmr and ilmr, hopa and opa, b seems to have been added. In some of the cases above cited both forms are still heard, but the apocopate are more usual. III. b is neither written nor sounded as final or medial, and has in all such cases been absorbed by the preceding vowel or simply dropped (see Gramm. p. xxx, col. 1). some MSS., especially Norse, use a double form gb and tb to mark a soft or aspirate sound, e.g. sagha and saga, thing and ping; especially in infexive syllables, -itb = -it, etc.

V. a curious instance of spelling (as in Welsh) rb for br is found occasionally in Runes, e.g. Rhruulfr for Hrulfr, Thorsen 335; to this corresponds the English spelling wb for bw, in white, wheat, whale, where, whence, why, whelp, whine, whet, whirl, wharf, wheel, while, whim, = Icel. hvitr, hveiti, hvalr, hvar, hvaðan, hvé, hválpr, hvína, hvetja, hvirfill, hvarf, hvel, hvíld,

B. REMARKS, CHANGES, ETC.—In Icel. b is used as an initial letter most largely next to s; in modern Teutonic languages it has been greatly reduced through the dropping of the aspiration before the liquids l, n, r, and before v, whereby all words in bl, bn, br, and bv have been transferred to the liquids and to ν (see Gramm. p. xxxvi, signif. II. β); the b in these words is essential to the etymology, and was in olden times common to all Teutonic languages, but in Scandinavia it was lost about the 11th or 12th century, so that not a single instance of bl, bn, br is on record in any MS. written in Norway; though old Norwegian poets of the 10th century used it in alliteration, so it must have been sounded at that time; b in bl, bn, br is therefore a test of a MS. being Icelandic and not Norse. In modern Icel. pronunciation the b aspirate has been lost in two or three words, as leiti for hleyti, a part, a word which was borrowed from Norway about the 14th century; rót which, a roof: it is a matter of course that the b is dropped in words which were borrowed from the English not earlier than the 12th century, e. g. iávzzer, Early Engl. lauerd (lord), but A. S. blaford.

b has been added in a few words to which it does not rightly belong, viz. in hneiss and hneisa for neiss and neisa; hnysa for nysa; hreifr (glad) for reifr; hniðra (to lower) for niðra (niðr); hlykkr (and hlykkjóttr), a curve, for lykkr (cp. lykkja, a noose); hrjóta for rjóta, to snort; hlad, a lace, cp. Lat. laqueus; hnestla for nestla, a loop. B. in a few instances both forms are used to form double words, in hrifa and rifa, Lat. rapere; hrasa and rasa, to stumble; rata (= Goth. vraton), to find the way, but hrata, to fall (cp. Vsp. 52); hrjá and rjá, to vex. 2. the b seems to be a suba. for an old v, in hrekia, to toss about, to wreck, akin to Goth. vrekan, Icel. reka; in hreidr, a nest, Dan. rede, cp. Engl. wreath, Goth. β . in modern pronunciation b is a substitute for g in the words hneggja, hnegg, for gneggja, gnegg; bver-hnipt for bver-gnipt. v. for k in hnifr, hnúi, hnefi, hnöttr, hnútr, hnörr, hnakkr, hnjúkr, hnoða, hnappr, for knifr, knúi, knefi..., knoba, knappr; this spelling is found in MSS. of the 15th century, e. g. the Hrokkinskinna passim (see letter K). In all these cases the b is etymologically wrong; in some of the words above (as in hneisa) it is found even in very old MSS, e.g. the Mork.; but the true etymology is seen from the alliteration in old poems, e.g. Hm. 48, 140, Hom. 26 (raut, reginkunni); Stor. 13 (Nýsumk hins | ok hygg at því); Edda 105 (reifr gékk herr und hlífar | hizig...); but not so in modern poets, e. g. Hröktu því svo og hrjáðu þig | Herra minn ílsku-þjóðir, Pass. 9. 9; Forvitnin holdsins hnýsir þrátt | í Herrans leyndar-dóma, 21. 2; Nær eg fell eor hrasa hér | hæstur Drottinn vill reidast mér, 5. 6. the Gothic has a special sign for bu, viz. w, which thus answers to wb in English, e. g. wan = wben. 2. when followed by an o or u, the v in bu is dropped, e. g. hót booting, hóta to boot, cp. Goth. wota and wotjan; as also in hót = hvat wbat, hóll from hváll, hjól and hvel, hólf and hválf, horfinn, hurfu, hyrfi for hvorfinn, hvurfu, hvyrfi.

G. The word hafa is in the Icel., as in other Teut. languages, used as an auxiliary verb with a part. pass. of another verb, whereby a compound preterite and pluperfect are formed as follows: transitive verbs with acc. the participle also was put in acc., agreeing in gender, number, and case with the objective noun or pronoun; this seems to have been a fixed rule in the earliest time, and is used so in all old poems down at least to the middle of the 11th century, to the time of Sighvat (circ. A.D. 990-1040), who constantly used the old form, - att is an apostrophe for atta in the verse O.H. 81: 1. references from poets, Gm. 5, 12, 16; bá er fordum mik fædda höfðu, Vsp. 2; hverr hefði lopt lævi blandit eðr ætt jötuns Oðs mey gefna, 29; þær's í árdaga áttar höfðu, 60: ek hafða fengna konungs reiði, Ad. 3; en Grjótbjörn um gnegðan hefir, 18; mik hefir marr miklu the earliest Old High German glossaries to Latin words.

The old form was first lost in the strong verbs and the weak verbs of the first conjugation: in the earliest prose both forms are used, although the indecl, is more freq. even in the prose writers, as Ib., the Hoidarv. S., the Miraclebook in Bs., Njála, O. H., (Thorodd seems only to use the old form,) as may be seen from the following references, Björn hafði særða þrjá menn, Nj. 262; hann mundi hana hafa gipta honum, 47; hann hafdi bá leidda saman hestana, 264: ek hefi sendan mann, Isl. (Heidarv. S.) ii. 333; ek hefi senda menn, id.: hafa son sinn or helju heimtan. Bs. (Miracle-book) i. 337; en er þeir höfðu niðr settan sveininn, 349; hann hafði veidda fimm tegu fiska, 350: er þér hefir illa neisu görva, O. H. 107: þá hefi ek fyrri setta þá í stafrófi, Skálda (Thorodd) 161; þar hefi ek við görva þessa stafi fjóra, id.; hafa hann samsettan, 167: goda fylgd hefir þú mér veitta, þorst Síðu H. 2: sagði, at Ólafr konungr hafði sendan hann, Bs. i. 11: þyri, er hertogi haíði festa nauðga, Fms. x. 393 (Ágrip): hefi ek þá svá signaða ok magnada, v. 236: hefir sólin gengna tvá hluti, en einn úgenginn, K. p. K. 92 (Lund's Syntax, p. 12). β. again, neut. indecl., hana hafði átt fyrr boroddr, Isl. ii. 192: hon hafdi heimt huskarl sinn . . . , Isl. (Heidarv. S.) ii. 330; hann hefir ekki svá vel gyrt hest minn, 340; hefir þú eigi séð mik, 341; hve hann hafði lokkat hann, id.; gistingar hefi ek yðr fengit, 343: þeir höfðu haft úfrið ok orrostur, Íb. 12; hann hafði tekið lögsögu, 14: stafr er átt hafði Þorlákr, Bs. (Miracle-book) i. 340; er þær höfðu upp tekit ketilinn ok hasit ..., 342; göngu es hann hasoi gingit, 344; es sleggjuna hafði niðr fellt, 346; sem maðr hefði nýsett (hana) niðr, id.; jartein þá er hann þóttisk fingit hafa, 347; hafði prestrinn fært fram sveininn, 349: hjálm er Hreidmarr hafdi átt, Edda 73: hafa efnt sina heitstrenging, Fms. (Jómsv. S.) xi. 141: slíkan dóm sem hann hafði mér hugat, O. H. 176, etc. passim:—at last the inflexion disappeared altogether, and so at the present time the indecl. neut. sing. is used throughout; yet it remains in peculiar instances, e.g. konu hefi eg mér festa, Luke xiv. 20, cp. Vidal. ii. 21. 67 This use of the inflexive part. pass. may often serve as a test of the age of a poem, e.g. that Sólarljóð was composed at a later date may thus be seen from verses 27, 64, 72, 73, 75, 79; but this test is to be applied with caution, as the MSS, have in some cases changed the true forms (-inn, -ann, and -it, -an being freq. abbreviated in the MSS, so as to render the reading dubious). In many cases the old form is no doubt to be restored, e. g. in vegit to veginn, Fm. 4, 23; buit to buinn, Hkv. Hjörv. 15; borit to borinn, Hkv. 1. 1; beðit to beðinn, Fsm. 48; orðit to orðin, Qg. 23; roðit to roðinn, Em. 5; brotið to brotinn, Vkv. 24, etc.: but are we to infer from Ls. 23, 26, 33, that this poem is of a comparatively late age? II. the indecl. neut. sing. is, both in the earliest poems and down to the present day, used in the 1. with trans. verbs requiring the dat. or gen.; ek hefi fengit e-s, hann hafði fengit konu; hafa hefnt e-s, Fms. xi. 25; sú er hafði beðit fjár, þkv. 32; stillir hefir stefnt mér, Hkv. Hjörv. 33, and 2. in the reflex. part. pass.; beir (hann) hafa so in endless cases. 8. in part, of intrans, neut, verbs, (hefir) látisk, farisk, sagsk, etc. e.g. þeir þær (hann, hón), hafa (hefir) setið, staðit, gengit, legit, farit, komit, verit, orðit, lifað, dáit, heitið . . ., also almost in every line both 4. in trans, verbs with a neut. sing, in objecof prose and poetry. tive case the difference cannot be seen.

The compound preterite is common to both the Romance and Teutonic languages, and seems to be older in the former than in the latter; Grimm suggests that it originated with the French, and thence spread to the Teutons. That it was not natural to the latter is shewn by the facts, that a. no traces of it are found in Gothic, nor in B. in the

y. remains are left in poetry of a primitive uncompounded preterite infinitive, e.g. stóðu = hafa staðit, mundu, skyldu, vildu, etc., see Gramm. p. xxv, col. 2. We may here note a curious dropping of the verb hefir, at ek em kominn hingat til lands, ok verit adt (baving been) langa hrid utan-lands, O. H. 31, cp. Am. 52; barn at aldri, en vegit slíka hetju sem Þorvaldr var, Glúm. 382. On this interesting matter see Grimm's remarks in his Gramm. iv. 146 sqq.

hélt konungr Erling fyrir tryggvan mann, Fms. ix. 399. deem, be of opinion; the old writers seem not to use the word exactly in this sense, but near to it come such phrases as, hón hélt engan hans jafningja innan hirðar hvárki í orðum né öðrum hlutum, i. e. sbe beld bim to be above all men, Ld. 60; halda menn hann fyrir konung, Fb. i. 216; still closer, halda menn at Oddný sé nú betr gipt, Bjarn. 12 (but only preserved in a paper MS.): this sense is very freq. in mod. usage, to bold, mean, eg held það; eg held ckki, I tbink not; (hence hald, y. phrases, halda mikit upp á e-n, to bold one in much esteem, love, Stj. 33; halda af e-m, id., Fas. i. 458, ii. 63, 200, iii. 520, esp. 4. to bold on, keep freq. in mod. usage, (upp-á-hald, af-hald, esteem.) up; halda varnir, to keep up a defence, Sks. 583; halda vorð, to keep watch, Eg. 120, Grág. i. 32, 264; halda njósn, Eg. 72, 74, Fms. xi. 46; halda tal af e-m, to speak, communicate with one, ii. 88. 5. to bold, be valid, be in force, a law term; á sú sekt öll at halda, Grág. i. 89; á þat at h. allt er þeir urðu á sáttir, 86; enda á þat at h. með þeim síðan, ii. VI. 10 bold, comprise; sólar-öld heldr tuttugu ok átta ár, Rb. 510; h. skor (of weight), Grág. i. 500. In some instances the use of dat, and acc. wavers, e.g. halda

In most of these instances the acc. is the correct case, and the dat. is due either to careless transcribers or incorrect speaking: in some instances an enclitic um has been taken for a dative inflexion, thus e.g. sáttum haldi in Stor, I. c. is to be restored to satt um haldi; eidum haldit in Bkv. I. c. to eid (for eida) um haldit; in others the prep. um has caused the confusion, as 'halda njósn um at' has been changed into halda njósnum at. But in the main the distinction between the use of dat, and acc, is fixed even at the present time: the acc. seems to represent the more primitive usage of this verb, the dat. the secondary.

Hamingja and fylgja or fylgju-kona (Hallfred S. ch. 11) seem to be nearly synonymous, as also gæfa, gipta, auðna, heill; but hamingja is the most personal word, and was almost symbolical of family relationship. Edda 6, which form is still heard in southern Icel. (in and about Reykjavík): Ulf. baban; A.S. bæn; Engl. bang; O. H. G. baban; Germ. bangen; Dan. bænge; Swed. bange]:-to bang, Lat. pendere: a. to bang, be suspended; hvers manns alvæpni hékk yfir rúmi hans, Eg. 88; vápn sín, er þar héngu hjá þeim, 377; þetta it stóra sverð er uppi hangir, Fas. iii. 120; hann hefir nú tvá daga á krossi hangit, 625. 79. S. ch. 7;—whence Odin is called hanga-guo, hangadróttinn, hanga-týr, the god or lord of the banged, Edda 14, 49, Lex. Poët.; varðat ek fróðr und forsum | fór ek aldregi at göldrum | .. nam ek eigi Yggjar feng und hanga, I became not wise under waterfalls, I never dealt in witchcraft, I did not get the share of Odin (i.e. the poetical gift) under the gallows, i. e. I am no adept in poetry,]d. 3 (MS., left out in the printed edition). According to another and, as it seems, a truer and older myth, Odin himself was represented as hangi, hanging on the tree Ygg-drasil, and from the depths beneath taking up the hidden mystery of wisdom, Hm. 139; so it is possible that his nicknames refer to that; cp. also the curious tale of the blind tailor in Grimm's Märchen, No. 107, which recalls to mind the heathen tale of the one-eyed Odin sitting under the gallows.

HANN, pers. pron. masc, be; fem. HON or HUN, she; for the pronunciation of this word see introduction to letter H; as to the inflexion see Gramm, p. xxi; in the MSS, the word is usually abbreviated h = hann; h° or hō = hón; hm = hánum; har = hennar; hi or he = henni: the old dat. masc. was hánum, as shewn by rhymes, mána vegr und hánum, Haustl.; but in Icel. it was no doubt sounded honum, by way of umlaut; it was then sounded honum with a long vowel, and lastly honum with a short vowel, which also is the mod. form: the old MSS, often spell hanum in full; the spelling hönum in old printed books recalls the old form honum; from Pass. Q. 7 it may be seen that in the middle of the 17th century the dative was sounded precisely as at present. 2. sing. fem. hón (bo in mod. Norse, boo in Lancashire) seems to be the older form; the MSS. use both forms hón and hún, but the former is the usual one; it was prob. sounded hon, which again points to a long root vowel, hann, hana? [Cp. Ulf. is; Germ. er; A. S., Engl., and Hel. be; old Fris. bi; in the Scandin. idioms with a suffixed demonstrative particle, vide Gramm. p. xxviii; Dan. and Swed. ban, bun, etc.]

B. As this word appears almost in every line only special usages need be mentioned, as, ef maor færir ómaga fram ok beri fé undir hann (acc., sc. ómagi), eðr eigi hann (nom., the same) fé, þá skal hann (nom., sc. maðr) beiða hann (acc., sc. ómagi) með vátta, at hann (nom., the same) seli hánum (dat., sc. maðr) fjár-heimting á hönd þeim mönnum er hann (nom., sc. ómagi) á fé undir, Grág. i. 279; here the context is very perplexing, chiefly owing to the identity of acc. and nom. sing. masc., but also because the pron. is sometimes demonstr., sometimes reflexive; in the latter case an Icel. would now say ser instead of hanum: so also, bá skal hann beiða samþingis-goða, at hann fái honum (i. e. sibi) mann, 10: again, skal hann selja sókn ok vörn ef hann vill, ok svá varðveizlu fjár síns þess er hann á hér eptir, 146; þá skal hón ráða við ráð frænda sins (ber) nokkurs, 307; Gunnarr kenndi féit at þat var hit sama sem hann (i.e. Njal) hafði honum (i.e. to Gunnar) greitt, II. the pers. pron. is often prefixed to a pr. name, as a sign of familiarity; farit upp til hestsins ok gætið hans Kols, Nj. 56; edr hverr madr er hann Gunnarr, what sort of a man is Gunnar? 51; ok hleypr á hann Þorkel upp, 114; ok leitið ér at honum Höskuldi, go and look after Hoskuld, 171; sæmd er ek veitta honum bórólfi bróður þínum, Eg. 112; segir hann Pálnir, Fms. xi. 47; hón Íngibjörg, 49; hann Gísli, Grett. HEIDINN, adj. [A. S. baden; Engl. beathen; O. H. G. beidan; Germ. beide and beidnisch; Dan. bedensk; this word is prob. derived not from heidr, a beath, but from Gr. Edvinde as used in the N. T.; Ulf. in a single passage, Mark vii. 26, renders γυνή Έλληνίε by qino baifno; it is even possible that the eccl. paganus, which, according to Du Cange, only appears after A. D. 365, may be merely a translation of the Teutonic word under the notion that baihan was derived from baihi = a beath, open country (Gr. άγρόε, Lat. pagus): then, as baibi was pronounced much like εθνος, the true etymology of heidinn was lost; and so the long vowel and the aspirated initial may be accounted for. To the worshippers of Thor and Odin the name beathen was unknown; Christians were the first that used the word, and we meet with it first in Hkm. of Eyvind, who speaks of heidin god, beathen gods; heidinn stallr, a beathen altar, Kristni S., by the missionary porvald, A.D. 982; it is also used by Hallfred and Sighvat; heidinn domr, beathendom, Sighvat; heidnar stjörnur, beathen stars, Sol.: the verse in Isl. ii. 50 is spurious (as are all the verses of that Saga); so also the verses in Landn. 84 (Hb.), and in Bergbúa-þáttr, where the word heidinn is put into the mouth of a ghost and a giant, in songs which are merely a poetical fiction of later times. The word helding for wolf is curious: probably it is merely a metaph. phrase from heiðinn, gentilis, and if so, it gives an additional evidence to the age of the poem Atla-kviða; which poem, from its nickname the 'Greenlandish,' cannot be older than the discovery of Greenland, A. D. 985]:—beathen, gentilis, ethnicus, the Sagas passim, esp. Nj. ch. 101-106, Kristni S., O. T., O. H., etc.: a child not christened was in olden times called heathen, N.G.L. i. 340; heiðit morð, the murder of an infant not christened, 339: in mod. Icel. usage, a boy or girl before confirmation is called heathen; this improper use of the word is caused by a confusion between baptism and confirmation: so in Norway a woman between child-birth and churching is called heathen (Ivar Aasen).

D. 1277 knights and barons were created in Norway, to whom the title of Herra was given; Herra Rafn, Herra porvaror, Herra Sturla, etc., Arna S., Laur. S., Ann. passim: the bishops and abbots were also so styled, e.g. Herra Arngrímr (an abbot), Bs. ii. After the Reformation, Herra became an integral part of the style of bishops, as Sira of priests, Herra Guðbrandr, Herra borlákr, Herra Oddr, etc., and can only be applied to the Christian name; cp. the ditty in which the old woman addresses the bishop by Sira, and is rebuked for her rudeness, Sælir verið þér, Sira minn, I sagða eg við Biskupinn; | ansaði mér þá aptr hinn, | þú áttir að kall' 'ann Herra pinn. In mod. usage Herra is often applied to any person whatever, but only in writing; for in conversation the Icel, has no equivalent to the Engl. Mr. or Germ. HERSIR, m. [akin to herad and herr], a chief, lord, the political name of the Norse chiefs of the earliest age, esp. before the time of Harold Fairhair and the settlement of Iceland: respecting the office and authority of the old hersar the records are scanty, as they chiefly belonged to the prehistorical time; they were probably not liegemen, but resembled the godar (vide godi) of the old Icel. Commonwealth, being a kind of patriarchal and hereditary chiefs: in this matter the old Landnáma is our chief source of information; - Björn Buna hét hersir ágætr í Noregi, son Veðrar-Gríms hersis í Sogni, móðir Gríms var Hervör dóttir Þorgerðar Eylaugs-dóttur hersis ór Sogni, Landn. 39; Arinbjörn h. ór Fjörðum, 66; Asi h., 76, 303, and another of the same name, 109; Ketill Veor h. af Hringaríki, 94; Hrólfr h. af Ögðum, 48, 126; Ketill Raumr hét h. ágætr í Raumsdal, 173; Gormr h. ágætt í Svíþjóð, 195; Grímr h., 204; Þorsteinn Höfði h. á Hörðalandi, 228; Þórir Haukneft h., 237; Úlft Gildir h. á þelamörk, 292; Veðr-Ormr h., 314; Arinbjörn h., Eg., Ad. 3; Vigfúss h. af Vörs, Glum.; Klyppr h. a Hördalandi, Fb. i. 19; Dala-Gudbrandr h., O. H. 106; Björn h. á Örlandi, Eg. 154; Þórir h. í Fjörðum, 155, cp. Rm. 36; hann var sem konungt væri yfir Dölunum, ok var þó h. at nafni, O. H. I. c., cp. Fb. i. 23; hersar hafa verit fyrri frændr minir, ok vil ek ekki bera hærra nafn en þeir, Fms. i. 299: it is also prob. that by agætr and göfugr (q. v.) the Landnama means a hersir. At the time of Harold Fairhair the old hersar gradually became liegemen (lendir menn) and were ranked below a jarl (earl), but above a holdr (yeoman), the scale being konungr, jarl, hersir, höldr, buandi, see the record in Hkr. i. 80 (Har. S. Hárf. ch. 6), as also Edda 93; the name then becomes rare, except that hersir and lendr maor are now and then used indiscriminately, heita beir hersar eða lendir menn, Edda l.c. The old Norse hersar were no doubt the prototype of the barons of Normandy and COMPDS: hersis-heiti, n. the title of a h., Edda Norman England. hersis-nafn, n. id., Fb. i. 23. (Ht.)

HINN, HIN, HIT, the article, an enclitic, which therefore can never serve as an accentuated syllable in a verse, either as rhyme or in alliteration. In good old MSS. (e. g. Cod. Reg. of Sæm.) it is hardly ever spelt with the aspirate, but is written inn, in, it or io, or enn, en, et or eo, and thus distinguished from the demonstr. pron. hinn; but in the Editions the prob. spurious aspirate has been generally prefixed: an indecl. inu or hinu occurs often in later MSS. of the 14th century, e. g. the Fb.; but as it has not been heard of since and is unknown in the modern language, it simply seems to be a Norwegianism, thus, inu sömu orð, Th. 2; hinnu fyrri biskupa (gen. pl.), H. B. When there was no adjective the article became a suffix to the noun (see Gramm, pp. xix, xx), a usage common even in early prose, but extremely rare in poetry; the reason is, not that the poems were composed before the suffixed article had come into use, but that the metres themselves in which all the old poems were composed are older than that usage, and are not well adapted to it, so that the absence of the article became traditional. The old poem Harbardsljóð makes an exception, no doubt not from being later than all other poems, but from being composed in a peculiar metre, half verse and half prose; thus in that single poem alone there are nearly twenty instances, or about twice or thrice as many as in all the other poems together :- váginn, Hbl. 2, 13, 15; sundit, 1, 3, 8, 13; verðinum, 4; eikjunni, 7; skipit, id.; stöðna, landit, id.; leiðina, 55; höfuðit, 15; bátinum, 53; veggsins, stokksins, steinsins, 56; matrinn, 3: other solitary instances are, godin öll, Vsp. 27 (prob. somewhat corrupt); eiki-köstinn, Gh. 20; vömmin vár, Ls. 52. in prose, old and modern, the suffixed article occurs at every step; only one or two instances are worth noticing as peculiar to the Icelandic: as vocative in addressing; konan, O woman! mjöonannan, id., Sighvat (in a verse of A. D. 1018, and so in mod. usage); elskan! hartao! heillin! \ 38; this usage scarcely occurs except in old poetry.

Od. xxii. 35: also with another word, barnio gott, good child! pruonapussinn, thou monster giant! Midgards-ormrinn! Fas. i. 373. esp. if with a possessive adjective following, as in Gr. ουμός, τουμόν, τάμά, etc.; elskan mín, ástin mín, hjartað mitt, góðrinn minn ! hér er nú ástin mín, bere is my darling! Sturl. ii. 78, of a father presenting a darling child to a friend; and so in mod. usage: as abuse, hundrinn binn, thou dog! Isl. ii. 176; þjófrinn þinn ! Fms. vii. 127; dyðrillinn þinn ! ii. 279; hundinum binum i vi. 323: this use is not confined to the vocative, e. g. konan mín biðr að heilsa, my wife (kona mín is never used); maðrinn minn, my busband; biddu foreldrana þína (ask thy parents) að lofa þér að fara; augun hans, bis eyes, Pass. 24. 4; hugrinn vor og hjartað sé, our mind and beart (cp. Gr. τῷ ἐμῷ θυμῷ), 43. 5; svo hjartað bæði og málið mitt mikli samhuga nafnið þitt, 10. 7; gef þú að móður-málið mitt, 35. 9; bókin mín, my favourite book, my own book; as also, fáðu mér hattinn minn, vetlingana mina, skona mina, give me my bat, gloves, sboes; tungan i ber, augun i ber, thy tongue, thy eyes; höfuðið á mer, fætrnir á mer, my bead, my feet; hendrnar á þér ('á mér, á þér 'are here equivalent to a possessive, see p. 37, C. IV), thy bands, cp. Homer, τὰ σὰ γούνατα; hestana þina, Gr. ίππους τούς σούς: similar is the instance, vömmin vár, the sins of ours, Ls. 52; this may be a remnant of a time when the article was used separately, even with an indefinite adjective. double article, one suffixed to the noun and the other prefixed to the word in apposition; hirðin sú in Danska, Fms. vi. 323; þau in stóru skipin, viii. 384 and passim: again, when a noun is put in the genitive after another noun the former has no article; as the Engl. phrase 'the fish of the sea and the fowl of the air' is in Icel. 'fiskar sjavarins og fuglar loptsins: but this belongs to the syntax; see also Grimm's D. G. iv. 432.

C. Special Changes, in mod. usage: I. the demonstr. pron. sá, sú, það has in speech generally taken the place of inn, in, it; thus, sá gamli maðr, sú gamla kona, það gamla skáld; sometimes the article is dropped altogether, e. g. á fimta degi, on the fifth day (= á enum fimta degi); a somu stundu, in the same bour; even in old writers this is found, með sömu ætlan, Bs. i. 289; á níundu tíð dags, Stj. 41, (but rarely); yet the old form is often retained in writing. II. in case A. II. the article may be dropped; þann gamla mann, þá gömlu konu, það gamla skáld, bú armi, etc.; sá ráða-góði, sá goðum-líki, sá ágæti Odysseifr, sú vitra Penelopa, sá Jarokringjandi Pósidon, Od. passim (in Dr. Egilsson's III. in case A. III. 1. the article is also dropped, Knútr translation). Ríki, Haraldr Hárfagri; even old writers (esp. in later vellums) omitted it now and then, Hálfdan Svarta, Fms. i. 1; Haraldr Grænski, 90; Haraldr Hárfagri, 192; Öttarr ungi, Hdl.: even in the Sæm. Cod. Reg., Völs-ungr ungi, Skv. 3. 1, 3.

IV. in case A. III. 2. the pronouns sá, sú, ungr ungi, Skv. 3. 1, 3. bao, and hinn, hin, hit may be used indiscriminately, although the former V. lastly, in case B. the suffixed article has gained is more usual. ground, and is in modern prose used more freq. than in ancient.

Conclusion.—The old poetical language, with the sole exception of a single poem, had no article in the modern and proper sense; in every instance the 'inn, in, it' bears the character of a demonstrative pronoun, preceding an adjective and enhancing and emphasising its sense, like the pers. pron. hann, q. v.; but it is never attached to a single substantive; when the adjective was placed in apposition after a noun, the pronoun came to stand as an enclitic just after the noun, and was sounded as if suffixed thereto; at last it was tacked as an actual suffix to single nouns standing without apposition, and thus the true suffixed article gradually arose, first in speech, then in writing; whereas at the same time the old pronominal enclitic (A. I-III) gradually went out of use, and was either dropped or replaced by the stronger demonstrative pronoun 'sá, sú.

HLAUT, f. (not n.); the gender is borne out by the genitive tein hlautar, Vellekla; as also by the dat. hlautinni, Landn. (App.) 336, in an old transcript of the lost vellum Vatnshyrna (see Kjaln. S. Isl. ii. 403, where hlautinn):—the blood of sacrifice, used for soothsaying; this word is prob. to be derived from hlutr (hlautr), as an abbreviated form, for hlaut-blóð = sanguis sortidicus, and refers to the rite, practised in the heathen age, of enquiring into the future by dipping bunches of chips or twigs into the blood, and shaking them; those twigs were called teinar, hlaut-teinar, hlaut-vior, blot-spann, q.v.; the act of shaking was called hrista teina, to sbake twigs, Hým. I; kjósa hlautvið, to choose lot chips, Vsp. In Vellekla the true reading is prob. hann (earl Hakon) valdi (from velja, MS. vildi) tein hlautar, meaning the same as kjósa hlautvið in Vsp., an emendation borne out by the words 'felldi blotspun' (Fagrsk. l.c.) in the prose text, which is a paraphrase of the verse; the explanation of the passage in Lex. Poët. is no doubt erroneous. It was also called fella blotspan, see that word, p. 71. The walls of the temple inside and out, the altars, and the worshippers were sprinkled with the blood, the flesh of the slain cattle was to be eaten (whereas the blood was this rite is described in Hkr. Hák. S. Góða ch. 16: en blóð þat allt er þar kom af (i. e. from the slain cattle) þá var þat kallat hlaut ok hlautbollar þat er blóð þat stóð í, ok hlaut-teinar, þat var svá gört sem stöklar (bunebes); með því skyldi rjóða stallana öllu saman, ok svá veggi hofsins útan ok innan, ok svá stökkva á mennina; en slátr (the meat) skyldi hafa til mann-fagnaðar: the passages in Eb. ch. 4, p. 6 new Ed., in Kjaln. S. ch. 2, and in Landn. (App.), are derived from the same source as the passage in Hkr., but present a less correct and somewhat impaired text; even the text in Hkr. is not quite clear, esp. the phrase, þat var gört sem stökkull, which prob. means that the hlaut-teinar were bound up in a bunch and used for the sprinkling. The blood-sprinkling mentioned in Exod. xii. 22 illustrates the passage above cited; cp. hleyti, hljóta, and hlutr.

HLERI, a, m. or hlöri, but hleði in Korm. 10, Ísl. ii. 113; that hleri or hlöri is the better form is borne out by the mod. usage as well as by the derived hler and hlera:—a sbutter or door for bedrooms and closets in old dwellings, which moved up and down in a groove or rabbet, like windows in Engl. dwellings, and locked into the threshold: the passage in Korm. A. A lot; the ceremony of drawing lots was like that described in Homer; each party marked his lot (skera or marka hluti), which was then thrown into a sheet (lap of a garment, bera or leggja hluti í skaut), and a third person came and drew a lot out; (it was not thrown out by shaking.) This drawing of lots was originally a sacred ceremony; it was used in sacrifices (by way of augury, see below), in sharing booty or an inheritance; in law the order in which suits came on was decided by lot, in banquets the seats of honour were so assigned (e. g. who was to sit next to the daughter of the house), etc. Many words in the language refer to this old rite, and the ceremony is thus described: en hluti skyldi skera ok i skaut bera, Fms. vii. 140; kom þat ásamt með þeim at hluti skyldi bera í skaut,... skyldi því hvárir-tveggju una sem hlutr segði, vóru þá hlutir markaðir; þá mælti Norðbrikt til Gyrgis: 'lát mik sjá hversu þú markar þinn hlut at vit markim eigi báðir einn veg;' hann gerði svá; síðan markaði Norðbrikt sinn hlut, ok kastaði í skaut ok svá báðir þeir; síðan gékk sá maðr at er til (upp, v. l.) skyldi taka, ok tók upp annan hlutinn milli fingra sér...; síðan var at hugat þeim hlutinum ok kenndu þar allir mark Gyrgis, vi. 136, 137: hverr maor er sök hesir með at fara i dóm, þá skal hlut bera í skaut, einn, þótt hann hafi fleiri sakar í dóm þann, hverr maðr skal merkja hlut sinn ok bera alla saman i skaut, ok skal maðr taka fjóra hluti senn upp, Grág. i. 37; bjóða til hlutfalla ok bera þar hluti í skaut, 74; menn báru þá hluti sína í skaut ok tók jarlinn upp; ... svá sagði hlutr til, at Egill skyldi sitja hjá jarls-dóttur um kveldit, Eg. 247; en matter, Fms. ix. 448.

The game is best described in Fridp. S. ch. 3, and in one of the riddles in Hervar. S. (where however the rhymed replies are not genuine): 'Who are the maids that fight about their unarmed lord, the dark all day defending, but the fair slaying?' The players were two, as in chess; there was only one king (hnefi), here called the 'unarmed lord;' the pieces (töflur) were white and red, the white attacking, the red defending the hnefi; bat er hneftafl, enar dökkri verja hnefann, en hinar hvítari sækja, Fas. i. 474; þat er huninn i hneftafli, 476: pieces made of silver are recorded in Gullp. holm-ganga, u, f. 'bolm-gang, bolm-going,' a duel or wager of battle fought on an islet or 'holm,' which with the ancients was a kind of last appeal or ordeal; and wherever a Thing (parliament) was held, a place was appointed for the wager of battle, as the holm in the Axe River in the albingi. The holmganga differed from the plain einvigi or duel, as being accompanied by rites and governed by rules, whilst the latter was not,-pvíat á hólmgöngu er vandhæfi en alls eigi á einvígi, Korm. 84. The ancient Icel. Sagas abound in wagers of battle, chiefly the Korm. S. ch. 10 and passim: some champions were nicknamed from the custom, e. g. Hólmgöngu-Bersi (Korm. S.), Hólmgöngu-Starri, Hólmgöngu-Máni, Holmgöngu-Hrafn, Landn. About A.D. 1006 (see Timatal), the holmganga was abolished by law in the parliament, on account of the unhappy feud between Gunnlaug Snake-tongue and Skald-Hrafn, Gunnl. S. ch. 11, cp. Valla L. ch. 5 (þá vóru af tekin hólmgöngu-lög öll ok hólmgöngur), referring to about A. D. 1010; a single instance however of a challenge in the north of Icel. is recorded after this date (about the year 1030-1040), but it was not accepted (Lv. S. ch. 30); the wager in Lv. ch. 17 was previous (though only by a few years) to the fight between Gunnlaug and Rafn. It is curious that Jon Egilsson, in his Lives of Bishops (written about A.D. 1600, Bisk. Ann. ch. 36, Safn i. 64), mentions a wager of battle between the parties of the two bishops, Jon Arason and Ogmund, on the old holm in the Axe River A.D. 1529; but the whole is evidently a mere reproduction of the tale of the Horatii in Livy. Maurer thinks that the two important acts of legislation, the institution of the Fifth Court in 1004 and the abolition of the ordeal of holmganga a few years later, are closely connected, as the institution of the new court of appeal made the decision by battle superfluous. In Norway, if we are to believe Grett. S. ch. 21 (bá tók Eirekr af allar hólmgöngur í Noregi), the hólmgongur were abolished about the year 1012. It is very likely that the tournaments of the Norman age, fought in lists between two sets of champions, sprang from the heathen holmganga, though this was always a single combat. For separate cases see the Sagas, Korm. S. l. c., Gunnl. S. l. c., Eg. ch. 57, 67, Nj. ch. 24, 60, Landn. 2, ch. 13, 3, ch. 7, Rd. ch. 1, 19, Gísl. init., Glúm. ch. 4, Valla L. l. c., Hallfr. S. ch. 10. A curious kind of duel in a tub is recorded in Floam. S. ch. 17, called kerganga, perhaps akin to the mod. Swed. fight in a belt. For England see Sir Edmund Head's interesting notes to Glum. co. boo, n. challenging to h., Valla L. 214, Fas. ii. 475. compos: hólmgönguhólmgöngu-lög, n. pl. the law, rules of h., Korm. 86, Valla L. 213. holmgongu-maor, holmgongu-staor, m. pl. the law, rules of h., Korm. 86, Valla L. 213. holmgongu-staor, m. a place where h. is fought, Fms. i. 150. holmgongu-svero, n. a sword used in h., Fas. i. 515.

HREINN, m. [the word is prob. of Finnish origin. From the words of king Alfred, (þa deor he håtað hranas, Orosius i. 1, § 15, Bosworth's Ed.), it seems that the king knew the name only from Ohthere's tale; and when Egil in his poem on king Athelstan (if the verse be genuine) calls Northern England hreinbraut, the reindeers' track, the phrase is prob. merely poët, for a wilderness. There is however a curious passage in Orkn. (448) where the hunting of reindeer in Caithness is recorded; the Icel. text is here only preserved in a single MS.; but though the Danish translation in Stockholm (of the year 1615) has the same reading, it is probably only a mistake of the Saga; for it is not likely that the Norsemen carried reindeer across the sea; the present breed was introduced into Icel. by the government only a century ago]:—a reindeer, Hm. 89, K. p. HREPPR, m.: - this word remains in 'the Rape of Bramber' in Sussex, and is undoubtedly Scandinavian, being probably derived, as Pal Vidalín suggested, from hreppa, and thus originally meaning a share, allodium; it may be that the proper name Hrappr (Landn.) is akin (=a yeoman, master of a Rape?); for the bad sense of that name (= a traitor) is a metonyme, borrowed from the person of that name in the Njála. After the introduction of Christianity, all Icel. was, for the maintenance of the poor, divided into poor-law districts called hreppar, which still exist, being in most cases, though not always, identical with the sokn or parisb; and it is remarkable that the district round the Bishop's seat at Skalholt bears the local name Hreppar, indicating that this division had the Bishop's house as its nucleus. The occurrence therefore of this name in the Landn. is an anachronism; as probably are also the few instances in which hreppr is used as an appellative in records of the heathen age, e.g. Lv. l.c. It is not known when the division into Rapes took place; perhaps it took place gradually during the 11th century; vera á hrepp, koma a hreppinn, to be or become a pauper. In the Gragus a special section (and as it seems one of the oldest) is called um Hreppa-skil, Kb. ii. 171-180; 'um Hreppa-lög,' Sb. i. 443-458. Twenty franklins at least constituted a lawful Rape, Kb. ii. 171. (These remarks are partly due to Konrad Maurer.) compos: hrepps-domr, m. a Rape court, Grág. i. 245, 448. hreppa-log, n. pl. the laws and rules of a Rape, Hreppa-maor, m. a man from the district Hreppar, Grág. i. 443. hrepp-stjóri, a, m. a 'Rape-steerer,' overseer, Jb. 186, Vm. 116: in each Rape in Icel. the best yeoman is chosen as hreppstjóri by the sheriff (amtmaðr) or, as in former days, by the parishioners, but he is not paid; he has, jointly with the parish priest, to manage the business of the Rape, esp. to see to the maintenance of the poor, fix the poor-rate of each franklin, and, as there are no poor-houses, to arrange the distribution of the poor (úmagar) among the parishioners. In the days of the Commonwealth there was a committee of five members, called hreppstjórinarmenn (q. v.), which discharged the duties of the present hreppstjóri; með ráði heima-prests ok hreppstjóra, Vm. 116. This word does not occur in the Grágás, but only after A. D. 1281; for the reading hreppstjóri in the D. I. i. 199 (in a deed supposed to be of A. D. 1150) is only found in a mod. transcript, and the original prob. had hreppstjórnarmenn (pl.)

HUNDRAD, n. pl. hundrud; the form hund- (q.v.) only occurs in 2 few old compd words: [Goth. bunda, pl.; A.S. bund; O.H.G. bunt; the extended form in Hel. and old Frank. bundered; Germ. bundert; Dan. bundrede; Swed. bundra; the inflexive syllable is prob. akin to -ræðr in átt-ræðr]:—a bundred; the Scandinavians of the heathen time (and perhaps also all Teutonic people) seem to have known only a duodecimal hundred (= 12 X 10 or 120); at that time 100 was expressed by tíu-tíu, cp. Ulf. taibun-taibund = ten-toen y; Pal Vídalín says, -hundrað tólfrætt er sannlega frá heiðni til vor komið, en hið tíræða er líkast að Norðrlönd hafi ekki vitað af fyrr en Kristni kom hér og með henni lærdómr beirrar aldar, Skýr. s. v. Hundrað (fine): but with the introduction of Christianity came in the decimal hundred, the two being distinguished by adjectives, -tólfrætt hundrað = 120, and tírætt hundrað = 100. But still the old popular duodecimal system continued in almost all matters concerned with economical or civil life, in all law phrases, in trade, exchange, property, value, or the like, and the decimal only in ecclesiastical or scholastic matters (chronology, e.g. lb. ch. 1, 10). At the same time the word in speech and writing was commonly used without any specification of tírætt or tólfrætt, for, as Pal Vídalín remarks, every one acquainted with the language knew which was meant in each case; even at the present time an Icel, farmer counts his flocks and a fisherman his share (hlutr) by the duodecimal system; and everybody knows that a herd or share of one hundred and a half means 120 + 60 = 180. In old writers the popular way of counting is now and then used even in chronology and in computation, e.g. when Ari Frode (Ib. ch. 4) states that the year consists of three hundred and four days (meaning 364); the census of franklins given by the same writer (where the phrase is hundrud heil = wbole or ull bundreds) is doubtless reckoned by duodecimal, not decimal hundreds, Ib. ch. 10; and in the census of priests and churches taken by bishop Paul (about A. D. 1200) 'tiræð' is expressively added, lest duodecimal hundreds should be understood, Bs. i. 136. The Landn. (at end) contains a statement (from Ari?) that Iceland continued pagan for about a hundred years, i.e. from about 874-997 A.D. In the preface to Olafs S., Snorn states that two duodecimal hundreds (tvau hundruð tólfræð) elapsed from the first colonisation of Iceland before historical writing began (i. e. from about A.D. 874-1115): levies of ships and troops are in the laws and Sagas counted by duodecimal hundreds, e.g. the body-guard of king Olave consisted of a hundred hiro-men, sixty house-carles and sixty guests, in all'two hundred' men, i. e. 240, Mork. 126; the sons of earl Strut-Harald had a hundred men, of whom eighty were billetted out and forty returned, Fms. xi. 88, 89; hálft hundrað, a balf bundred = sixty, Mork. l. c. a division of troops = 120; hundrads-flokkr, Fms. vi. (in a verse). in indef. sense, bundreds, a bost, countless number, see hund-, as also in the adverb. phrase, hundrudum, by bundreds (indefinitely), Fms. vi. 407, bior. 275, 524: in mod. usage as adjective and indecl., except the pl. in -uo, thus hundruð ásauðum, Dipl. iv. 10.

B. As value, a bundred, i.e. a hundred and twenty ells of the stuff wadmal, and then simply value to that amount (as a pound sterling in English). All property, real as well as personal, is even at present in Icel. taxed by hundreds; thus an estate is a 'twenty, sixty, hundred' estate; a franklin gives his tithable property as amounting to so and so many hundreds. As for the absolute value of a hundred, a few statements are sufficient, thus e.g. a milch cow, or six ewes with lambs, counts for a hundred, and a hundrad and a kugildi (cow's value) are equal: the charge for the alimentation of a pauper for twelve months was in the law (Jb. 165) fixed to four hundred and a half for a male person, but three hundred and a half for a female; cp. also the phrase, það er ekki hundrað í hættunni, there is no bundred at stake, no great risk! In olden times a double standard was used,—the wool or wadmal standard, called hundrað talið = a bundred by tale, i. e. a hundred and twenty ells as stated above, and a silver standard, called hundrað vegit, a bundred by weight, or hundrad silfrs, a bundred in silver, amounting to two marks and a half = twenty ounces = sixty örtugar; but how the name hundred came to be applied to it is not certain, unless half an örtug was taken as the unit. It is probable that originally both standards were identical, which is denoted by the phrase, sex alna eyrir, six ells to an ounce, or a hundred and twenty ells equal to twenty ounces (i. e. wadmal and silver at par); but according as the silver coinage was debased, the phrases varied between nine, ten, eleven, twelve ells to an ounce (N.G.L. i. 80, 81, 387, 390, passim), which denote bad silver; whereas the phrase 'three ells to an ounce' (þriggja álna eyrir, Sturl. i. 163, passim, or a hundred in wadmal equal to half a hundred in silver) must refer either to a double ell or to silver twice as pure: the passage in Grág. i. 500 is somewhat obscure, as also Rd. 233: the words vegin, silfrs, or talin are often added, but in most cases no specification is given, and the context must shew which of the two standards is there meant; the wool standard is the usual one, but in cases of weregild the silver standard seems always to be understood; thus a single weregild (the fine for a man's life) was one hundred, Njála passim. 2. the phrases, hundrad fritt, a bundred paid in cattle, Finnb. 226; tolf hundrud morend, twelve bundred in dark striped wadmal, Nj. 225; hundrað í búsgögnum ok í húsbúningi, Vm. 65; hundraðs-gripr, hestr, hross, kapall, hvíla, sæng, rekkja, psaltari, etc., a beast, a borse, a bed, etc., of a bundred's value, Am. 2, 10, Vm. 25, 39, 60, 153, Jm. 3, 30; hundrads-umagi, a person whose maintenance costs a bundred, Vm. 156; hundrads virdi, a bundred's value, 68. For references see the Sagas and laws passim, and for more information see Mr. Dasent's Essay in Burnt Njal.

C. A bundred, a political division which in olden times was common to all Teut. nations, but is most freq. in old Swedish laws, where several hundreds made a herad or shire; cp. the A.S. and Engl. bundred, Du Cange bundredum; old Germ. bunderti, see Grimm's Rechts Alterthumer; the centum pagi of Caesar, Bell. Gall. iv. ch. 1, is probably the Roman writer's misconception of the Teut. division of land into bundreds; this is also the case with Tacit. Germ. ch. 12: cp. the Swed. local names Fjaðrunda-land, Attundaland, and Tíunda-land, qs. Fjaðr-hunda land, Atthunda land, Tihunda land, i. e. a combination of four, eight, ten hundreds. The original meaning was probably a community of a bundred and twenty franklins or captains. This division is not found in Icel.

HVERR, m., pl. hverar: I. a cauldron, boiler; hver kringlóttan af eiri, Stj. 564; heyrði til höddu er Þórr bar hverinn, Skálda 168, Hym. 1, 3, 5, 9, 13, 27, 33, 34, 36, 39 (of a boiler); hefja af hvera, Gm. 42, = mod. taka ofan pottinn; in Gkv. 3, 6, 9, 10, ketill and hver are synonymous: hver-gætir, m. a cauldron-keeper, cook, Am. 58: hvera-lundr, m. a cauldron groove, Vsp. 39: Hver-gelmir, II. metaph. m. local name of the northern Tartarus, the abyss, Edda. in volcanic Icel. this word was taken to express the bot springs, and it is so used to the present day (in pl. often hverir), Sd. 191, Grett. 141 (hverar), Bs. i. 322, Ann. 1294, and freq. in local names. In the west the largest hverar are those in Reykjahólar, Eggert Itin. 382; in the north the Reykja-hver; Hvera-vellir in the wilderness Kjöl, 637; Reykjadals-hverar, among which the largest is the Uxa-hver, and Badstofu-hver, 640, 641. In the east there are only a few, see Itin. 798; whereas the south is very rich in such springs, especially the neighbour- two, by twos, Fms. iv. 299; pridja hvert ar, every three years, austr (we turn our faces towards the east) ba er vér bidjum fyrir oss, Hom. Thood of Haukadal (Geysir, Strokkr), see Ann. 1294; Grafar-hver, 890; Reykjaness-hverar, 895, (whence Hver-hólmr, the name of a holm); the springs in Krisuvik, 897; the hverar in Reykja-holt and Reykja-dalr: they are found even in glaciers, as in Torfa-jökull, 766. hvera-fuglar, m. pl. fabulous birds, Eggert Itin. 890. hvera-hella, u, f. = hverahrúðr, ltin. 142. hvera-hrúðr, m. the tophus or tuf-stone deposited by bot springs, Itin. 145. hvera-leir, m. a kind of lime, Itin. 127. hvera-sly, n. the soft pulp deposited by bot springs, Itin. 109. hvera-steinar, m. pl. a kind of tuf-stone, ltin. 660. hvera-vatn, n. water from a hver. For old dried up hverar see Itin. 295; cp. also the remarks s.v. Geysir and Ann. 1294. From hvera-lundr in Vsp. an Icel. origin of this poem is suggested by Prof. Bergmann in his Poèmes Islandaises, Paris 1838, p. 183, as the verse seems to refer to volcanic agencies.

> HVERR, pron. interrog. and indef.; at the present day proncd. hvur, with u throughout, and in mod. printed books usually spelt hvor, a form no doubt derived from the dual hvarr (hvorr), used in a plur. sense: for its declension, see Gramm. p. xxi; an acc. hverjan, Hým. 39; hverjan morgin, Vsp. 22, Fb. ii. 71 (in a verse); hverjan dag, Vpm. 11, 18, 23, 41, Gm. 8, 14, 20, 29; hverjan veg, Vpm. 18; whence the contracted form hvern. [The Gothic has a threefold interrog. pron., a sing. bwas, bwo, bwa; a dual, bwahar; and a plur. bwarjis, bwarja, bwarjata. To the first of these pronouns answers the old Icel. form hvar, A.S. bwa, Scot. wba; Engl. wbo, Swed. bo, Dan. bvo, cp. Lat. quis; but this pronoun is defective, and remains only in the neut. hvat, q.v., Ulf. bwa, A. S. bwat, Engl. what, Germ. was, Dan.-Swed. bvad, Lat. quid: the dat. masc. hveim is obsolete, Goth. bvamme, Engl. wbom, Dan. bvem: the dat. hví (see hvat II, III): a nom. masc. hvar (hva-r) seems to be used a few times in old MSS. (e. g. Kb. of the Grágás), but it is uncertain, as the word is usually abbreviated hir or hir: a gen. sing. hves (Goth. bwes, North. E. whese) occurs, hves lengra, how much farther? Hom. (St.) 50; til hves, to what? 65: possibly the an. hey. hos, Ls. 33, is a remnant of the old gen. To the Goth, dual answers the Icel, hvárr (hvaðarr), q. v. To the Goth, plur, answers the Icel. hverr, with characteristic j, which is used in sing, and plur, alike. In the neut, sing, the two forms, hvat and hvert, are distinguished thus, that hvat (hvað) is interrog., hvert indef., e. g. hvad barn, what bairn? but hvert barn, every bairn.]

B. Eccl. use of the word white: I. at the introduction of Christianity, neophytes in the week after their baptism used to wear white garments, called hvíta-váðir, f. pl. white weeds, as a symbol of baptism cleansing from sin and being a new birth; a neophyte was called hvít-váðungr, m. a 'wbite-weedling,' one dressed in wbite weeds, Niorst. Sweden, but above all Gothland, remained in great part heathen throughout the whole of the 11th century, after the neighbouring countries Denmark and Norway had become Christian, and so we find in Sweden Runic stones referring to Swedes who had died in the white weeds, some abroad and some at home; sem varð dauðr í hvítaváðum í Danmörku, Baut. 435; hann varð dauðr í Danmörku í hvítaváðum, 610; þeir dó í hvítaváðum, 68; sem dó í hvítaváðum, 271; hann varð dauðr í hvítaváðum, 223, 497. Pentecost, as the birthday of the church, seems to have been specially appointed for christening and for ordination, see Hungry, ch. 2, Thom. 318; hence the following week was termed the Holy Week (Helga Vika). Hence, Pentecost derived its name from the white garments, and was called Hvita-dagar, the White days, i.e. Whitsun-week: frá Páskadegi inum fyrsta skulu vera vikur sjau til Drottins-dags í Hvítadögum: Drottinsdag í Hvítadögum skulu vér halda sem hinn fyrsta Páskadag, K. p. The name that at last prevailed was Hvita-sunna, u, f. Whitsun, i. c. White-sun, D. N. ii. 263, 403: Hvitasunnu-dagr, m. Wbitsunday, Fb. ii. 546, Fms. viii. 63, v.l.: Hvitasunnudags-vika, u, f. As the English was the mother-church of that of Norway and Iceland, the Icelandic eccl. phrases are derived from the English language. See Bingham's Origg. s. vv. White Garments, and Dominica in Albis, where however no reference is given to Icel. In modern Denmark and Norway the old name has been displaced by Pindse, i. e. Pfingsten, derived from the Greek word, whereas in Icel., as in Engl., only the name Hvitasunna is known. In Denmark the people make a practice of thronging to the woods on Whitsun morning to see the rising of the sun, and returning with green branches in their hands, the trees being just in bud at that season.

B. [Engl. and Dutch baven; Germ. bafen; Dan. bavn; Swed. bamn]: -a baven, barbour, Fms. xi. 74, Eg. 79, Hkr. iii. 248, Grág., etc.: eccl., sælu-höfn, lífs-h., passim: sometimes spelt hafn, Isl. ii. 398: as also in local names, Höfn, Landn.: Hafnar-menn, m. pl., Sturl. ii. 91; Kaupmanna-höfn, Copenbagen; Hraun-höfn, Eb., etc. COMPDS: hafnaraustr, m. pumping in barbour, Jb. 407. hafnar-búi, a, m. a law term, a barbour-neighbour, i. e. the member of a kind of naval court composed of persons summoned from a harbour, Grág. ii. 401. hafnardyrr, n. pl. doors, entrance of a baven, Fms. xi. 88. hafnar-kross, m. a cross-shaped hafnarmark, q.v. hafnar-lykill, m. HÖFUÐ, n., dat. höfði; gen. pl. höfða, dat. höfðum; in Norse MSS. often spelt hafuð, Anecd. 4 (without umlaut); the root-vowel seems in very early times (8th century) to have been a diphthong; thus Bragi uses the rhymes, laufi—haufði, and rauf—haufuð, Edda; the old ditty with a half rhyme, höfðu vér í haufði, Hkr. i. 104, would be faulty unless we accept a diphthong in the latter word: in good old MSS. (e. g. Sæm. Cod. Reg.) the word is always spelt with a or au, never o, and probably never had a diphthongal sound; the Norse spelling havuð however points to a short vowel; and later Icel. MSS. spell o or ω, e. g. Hb. in Vsp. l. c. It is probable that the short vowel originated in the contracted form, as haufði sounds hard; [cp. Goth. baubiþ; A. S. beáfod; Engl. bead; Hel. bôbid; O. H. G. boupit; mid. H. G. boubet; mod. G. baupt; Dan. bôved; Swed. bufvuð; Ormul. bæfedd (the single fmarks a preceding long vowel); thus all old Teut. languages except the Icel. agree in the length of the vowel, whereas Lat. cāput, Gr. κεφλή have a short root vowel.]

HÖFUNDR, m., gen. ar; the masc. inflex. -undr reminds one of the Gothic (Gramın. p. xxxii. B. V); in old writers the word is found only four times, always in the sense of a judge, and referring chiefly to Gothland in Sweden; Höfundr (a mythol. pr. name) var manna vitrastr, ok svá réttdæmr, at hann hallaði aldri réttum dómi, ... ok af hans nafni skyldi sá höfundr heita í hverju ríki er mál manna dæmdi, Fas. (Hervar. S.) i. 523, cp. 513: as also in Hrólfs S. Kraka (referring to Gothland), höfundr einn var þar til settr at skora þetta mál með sannindum, settusk margir í þetta sæti, ok kallaði höfundr öngum sæma, þórir gengr seinastr ok sezk hann þegar í stólinn; höfundr mælti, þér er sætið hæfiligast, ok muntu dæmdr til þessarar stjórnar, Fas. i. 58: sigr-hösundr, the judge of victory, the Lord of battle, a name given to Odin by Egil, Stor. 21: lastly in Thorodd, skald eru höfundar allrar rynni eða máls-greina, sem smiðir málmgripa (?), eðr lögmenn laga, the poets are judges in all matters of grammar and syntax, as smiths in work-manship, and lawyers in law, Skalda (Thorodd) 164; this passage as well as the preceding is erroneously rendered in the earlier translations, as also II. an author, originator; the revival of this in Lex. Poët. ancient word, in quite a different sense, is curious; it does not occur in any of the earliest glossaries of the 17th century nor in the Bible nor in Vidalin, but, as it seems for the first time, in the Lexidion Islandico-Latinum, published at Copenhagen A.D. 1734, as a rendering of the Latin auctor, and was probably inserted by some learned philologer (Jon Oiafsson?) from the passage in Skálda, by a mistake. 2. by the end of the century it came to be used = a writer, and is now freq. in that sense, either rit-höfundr or singly; but still in 1781, in the preface to Fel. of that year, ritsmior (writ-smith) and höfundr are both used, shewing that the latter was not yet settled, though at present the use of this word is quite fixed.

höku-nótt, f. mid-winter night, about the time of Epiphany, when the heathen Yule began; a άπ. λεγ.: hann setti þat í lögum at hefja Jólahald sem Kristnir menn . . ., en áðr var Jóla-hald hafit Hökunótt, þat var miðsvetrar-nótt (thus in Fms. i. 32, l.c.), ok ha'din þriggja (þrettán?) nátta Jól, Hkr. i. 138 (Hák. S. Aðalst. ch. 15). The Scot. bogmaney, = the last day of the year or a feast given on that day, is a remnant of this ancient word. The heathen Yule seems among the Scandinavians to have been celebrated about three weeks later than Christmas; but the Norse king Hakon, who had been brought up in Christian England, altered the time of the festival, so as to make it correspond with the English Yule or Christmas; and so the heathen hökunótt came to represent our Christmas Eve. The etymology is not known.

S. bæleo, Germ. beld, whence mod. Swed. and Dan. bjälta and belt, see halr]:—a Norse law term, a kind of bigber yeoman, like the statesman of Westmoreland, i.e. the owner of allodial or day syng land, mod. Norse odelsbonde; the höld is to be distinguished from a hersir (q. v.) or a lendr maor, who held land in fee from the king, see the interesting story in Har. S. Harðr. ch. 62 (Fms. vi. 278); the höld is thus defined, så er hældr er hann hefir óðöl at erfðum tekit bæði eptir föður ok móður, þau er hans forellrar (forefathers) hafa átt áðr fyrir þeim, N.G.L. ii. 146; hölda tvá eða bændr ina beztu, i. 251. In old Norway the churchyards were divided into four parts; in the first were buried the lendir menn, next them the hölds and their children (hölds-lega), then the freed men (leysingjar), and lastly the thralls (man, q.v.) nearest to the wall; the höld had right to twice as much as the simple franklin, and half as much as the lendr maðr, e.g. bóandi hálvan annan eyri, höldr þrjá aura, lendr maðr sex aura, jarl tólf aura, konungr þrjár merkr, N. Hölgi, a, m. a pr. name, in the Hb. spelt Hælgi; this is the old Norse form, whereas the old and mod. Icel. form is Helgi, and of a woman, Helga, u, f., Landn.; prob. contracted from Hálogi, cp. the Dan. In earlier times it seems to have had a more general sense, which remains in a verse of Kormak, Korm. 42:—in the mythology and old poems 'hall' is also used of the hall of gods, giants, Vpm., Hým., Lv.; Val-höll, Valballa, the ball of the slain, of Odin, Gm., Edda: as also Guds holl, God's ball = the beaven, Geisli; dags höll, days' ball, the sky; höll fjalla, mountain ball, the sky; lifs höll, life's ball, the breast, Lex.
