city afterwards stood. It is probable, indeed, that in this, as in many other cases, the rise of a town upon the spot was mainly owing to the existence of a convenient passage across the river. There seems no reason to doubt that under the Roman government Ticinum had grown up into a considerahle municipal town befure the close of the Republic, though its name is not noticed in history. But it is mentioned by all the geographers, and repeatedly figures in history during the Roman Empire. It is included by Ptolemy among the cities of the Insubres, and would naturally be so reckoned, though not of Insubrian origin, as soon as the river Ticinus came to be considered as the boundary of that people. (Strab. v. p. 217 ; Plin. iii. 17. s. 21 ; Ptol. iii. 1. § 36.)

The earliest mention of Ticinum in history is on occasion of the death of Drusus, the father of Germanicus, when we are told that Augustus advanced as far as Ticinum to meet his funeral procession. (Tac. Ann. iii. 5.) Its name is also repeatedly mentioned during the civil wars of a.d. 69 , when its position on the great highroad that led from the foot of the Alps to join the Aemilian Way at Placentia, rendered it an important pust. It was the scene of a serious sedition among the troops of Vitellius, while that emperor halted there. (Id. Hist. ii. $17,27,30,68,88$.) At a later period it was at Ticinum that the emperor Claudius (the second of the name) was saluted with the imperial title, while he was commanding the garrison of the city. (Vict. Caes. 33, Epit. 34.) It was there also that Constantius took leave of his nephew Julian, whom he had just raised to the rank of Caesar. (Aumian. xv. 8. § 18.) From these frequent notices of Ticinum it seems probable that it had already risen under the Roman Empire into a flourishing municipal town, and derived importance from its position, the great highroad which formed the continuation of the Aemilian Way from Placentia to the foot of the Alps passing through Ticinum, until the increasing importance of Mediolanum, which became the secund capital of Italy, made it customary to proceed through that city instead of following the direct route. (Itin. Ant Pp. 283, 340, 347.)

But though Ticinum was undoubtedly a considerable town under the Ruman Empire, it was not till after the fall of that empire that it rose to the position it subsequently occupied. In A. D. 452, indeed, it had sustained a great calamity, having been taken and devastated by Attila (Jornand. Get. 42); but the Gothic king Theodoric, being struck with the importance of its powition, not only raised it from its ruins, but erected a royal palace there, and strengthened the city with fresh fortifications, until it became one of the strongest fortresses in this part of Italy. It consequently bears an important part in the Gothic wars, that people having made it their chief stronghold in the north of Italy (Procop. B. G. ii. 12, 25, iii. 1, iv. 32, &c.), in which the royal treasures and other valuables were deposited. At the time of the Lombard invasion, it offered a prolonged resistance to the arms of Alboin, and was not taken by that monarch till after a siege of more than three years, A. d. 570 (P. Diac. Hist. Lang. ii. 26, 27). It thenceforth lecame the residence of the Lombard kings, and the capital of the kingdon of Italy, and comtinued to hold this position till A. D. 774, when Desiderius, the last of the Lombard kings, was compelled to surrender the city to Chariemagne, after a bluckade of more than 15 months.

From this time Ticinum sank again into the condition of an ordinary provincial town, which it has retained ever since. Before the close of the Lombard peried we find that it was already designated by the name of Papia, from which its molern appellation of Pavia is derived. Paulus Diaconus calls it "Ticinus quae alio nonine Papia appellatur" (P. Diac. ii. 15); and the anonymous Geographer of havenna gives the same double appellation (Geogr. Kavenn. iv. 30). The most probable explanation of this change of name is that when Ticinum tecame admitted to the rights of a Roman municipium its inhabitants were enrolled in the Papian tribe, a fact which we learn from inscriptions (Gruter, Inscr. p. 1093. 7; Murat. Inscr. p. 1087. 1, p. 1119.4), and that in consequence of this the city came to be known as "Civitas Papia," in contradistinction to Mediolanum, which belonged to the Ufentine tribe. (Aldini, Antiche Lapuli Ticinesi, pp. 43-60.)

The modern city of Pavia contains no remains of antiquity except a few sarcophagi and inscriptions. These contirm the municipal condition of the city under the Ruman Empire, but are not in themselves of much interest.

TICINUS (Tikıyos: Ticino), a considerable river of Northern Italy, and one of the most important of the northern tributaries of the Padus. It has its sources among the high Alps, in the Mons Adula or Blont St. Gothard, and, where it first emerges from the Alpine valleys forms an extensive lake, called the Lacus Verbanus or Lago Maggiore. Where it issues from this again it is a deep, clear, and rapid stream, and flows through the level plains of Lombardy, with a course of above 60 miles, passing under the walls of Ticinum (Pavia), and discharging its waters into the l'adus or Po, about 3 miles below that city. (Strab. iv. p. 209, v. p. 217; Plin. ii. 103. s. 106, iii. 19. s. 23.) Throughout this lower part of its course (from the Lago Maggiove to the $P o$ ) it is navicable for vessels of considerable burden; but the extreme rapidity of the current renders the navigation inconvenient if not dangerous. Its banks are low and marshy, the river being bordered on each side by a belt of thickets and marshy woods. This character of its banks is noticed by Claudian (de VI. Cons. Ion. 194), while Silius Italicus alludes to the beautiful clearness of its waters. (Sil. Ital. iv. 82.)

The Ticinus appears to have been recognised at an early period as the boundary between the Insubrians and their neighbours the Libicii and Laevi (Liv. v. 34, 35). From its qeographical position it must always have presented a formidable barrier to any invaler alvancing into Italy after having crossed the Cuttian, Graisu or Pennine Alps, and for this reason its banks have been the scene of many successive battles. Even in the first descent of the Gaals into the plains of Northern Italy, we are told that they defeated the Etruscans in a battle near the river Ticinus (Liv. v. 34). But much the most celebrated of the contests which were fought on its banks was that between IIamibal and P. Scipio in b.c. 218, shortly after the descent of the Carthaginian general into ltaly. The precise scene of this action cannot, however, be determined; but it appears to have been fought on the W. or right bank of the Ticinus, at a short distance from the Padus, and probably not far from the site of Ticinum or Paria. Livy marks it more distinctly as being within 5 miles of a place called Victumrii (?); but as no other mention of this obscure name occars, this lends us no assistance.
(Liv. $x$ xi. 45.) The narrative of Polybius is far from clear and has given rise to considerable discussion. Scipio, who had hastened from Pisae into Cisalpine Gaul, on hearing that Hannibal had actually crossed the Alps and descended into the plains rf Italy, advanced to meet him, crossed the Padus by a bridge constructed for the occasion, and afterwards crossed the Ticinus in like manner. After this, Polybius tells us, "both generals advanced alung the river, on the side facing the Alps, the Rumans having the stream on their left hand, the Cartiaginians on their right" (iii. 65). It is clear that this is not consistent with the statement that the Komans had crossed the Ticinus *, as in ascending that river they would have had the stream on their right, unless we suppose "the river" to mean not the Ticinus but the l'adns, which is at least equally consistent with the general plan of operations. Hamibal was in fact advancing from the country of the Taurini, and no reason can be assigned why he should have turned so far to the N . as to be descending the Ticinus, in the manner supposed by those who would place the battle near liyerano or Burgo S. Siro. If we are to understand the river in question to be the Ticinus, the words of Polybius above quoted would necessarily require that the battle should have been fonght on the lef bank of the Ticinus, which is at variance with all the other particulars of the operations, as well as with the probabilities of the case. The battle itself was a mere combut of cavalry, in which the Roman hore was supported by a portion of their light-armed troops. They were, however, defeated, and Scipin at once retreated to the bridge over the Padus, leaving a small body of troops to break up that over the Ticinus. These troops, 600 in number, were cut off and made prisoners by Hannibal, who, however, pave up the attempt to pursue Scipio, and turned up the stream of the Padus, till he could find a point where he was able to construct a bridge of boats across it. (Pol. iii. 6.5, 66.) The account of Liry (which is based mainly upon that of Polybius, though he most have taken some points, such as the name of Victumvii, from other sources) agrees with the above explanation, though he certainly seems to have transferred what Polybius relates as occurring at the bridge over the Ticinus to that over the Padus. It appears also by his own account that there was considerable discrepancy among his authorities as to the point at which Hannibal eventually crossed the Padus. (Liv. xxi. 45-47.) It may therefore on the whole be assumed as probable that the battle was fought at a short distance W. of the Ticinus, and not close to the banks of that river: the circumstance that Scipio had encamped on the banks of the Ticinus just hefure, and advanced from thence to meet Hamibal will explain why the battle was always called the "pugna ad Ticinum" or "apud Ticinum."

Two other battles were foucht in the same neighbourhood before the close of the Koman empire: one

* Polsbius, indeed, does not distinctly say that the Romans crussed the Ticinus, but it is implied in his whole narrative, as he tells us that the consul ordered a bridge to be built over the Ticinus with the purpose of crossing that river, and afterwards relates their advance without further allusion to it (iii. 64, 65). But after narrating the defeat and retreat of Scipio, he says that Hannibal fullowed him as far as the bridge on the first river, which can be no other thin the Ticinus. (Ib. 66.)

in A.D. 270, in which the Alemanni, who had invaded Italy, were finally defeated by the Emperor Aurelian (Vict. Epit. 35): the other in A. D. 352, between the rival emperors Magnentins and Constantius. (Ib. 42.) [E. H. B.]

TIERNA (called by Ptol. $\Delta$ lepva, iii. 8. § 10), a town of Dacia on the Danube, opposite to the castle of Zernes (Old Orsova) in Moesia. In inscriptions we find it called Statio Tsieruensis (Murat. p. 332. 3; Griselini, i. p. 265); in the Digent (de Cens. i. 8), Colonia Zernensium; and in the Not. Imp. (c. 3). Trans Diernis.

TIFATA (rd Tiфarnud $\partial \rho \eta$, Dion Cass.: Monle di Madlitoni), a mountain ridge on the borders of Campania and Samnium, only about a mile from the city of Capua. It is one of the last outlying masses of the Apennines, and is a long, narrow ridge of no great elevation, but above 12 miles in length from E. to W., and presenting a bold and steep mountain front towards the Campanian plain, upon which it looks directly down. The naine was derived according to Festus from the woods of evergreen oak with which it was covered, "Tifata" being equivalent to "iliceta," though whether it was an Oscan or old Latin word, we are not told. (Fest. s. v. Tiffuta.) It is first mentioned during the war between the Samuites and Campanians which inmediately preceded the First Samnite War. On that occasion the Samnites in the first instance occupied the ridge itself with a strong force, and afterwards drew out their main arny into the plain below, where they scon defeated the Campanians in a pitched battle. (Liv. vii. 29.) Livy calls it on this occasion "Tifata, imminentes Capuae colles," and elsewhere "montem imminentem Capuse" (xxvi. 5), which well describes its character and situation. It was this opprirtune position with regard to Capua and the surrounding plain, that caused it to be selected by Hannibal as a post where he established his camp in B. c. 215, and from whence he long carried on his operations against the various cities of Campania. (Id. xxiii. 36, 37, 39, 43, xxvi. 5; Sil. Ital. sii. 487.) At a later period it was in the plain at the foot of Tifata that Sulla defeated the Marian general Norbanus, b. c. 83; and in gratitude for this victory, he consecrated a considerable tract of territory to Diana, the tutelary goddess of the mountain. (Vell. Pat. ii. 25.) We hence learn that that divinity had a celebrated temple on Tifata, and the "Dianae Tifatinae fanum" is noticed also in inscriptions found at Capua. From one of these we learn that the consecrated territory was again assigned to the goddess by Vespasian. (Orell. Inscr. 1460, 3055.) As the Tabula marks a station "Ad Dianae" near the W. extremity of the ridge, it is probable that the temple was situated in that neighbourhood. (Tab. Peut.) From the same authority we learn that Jupiter, who was worshipped on so many of the highest points of the Apermines, had a temple also on Tifata, to which it gives the name of Jovis Tifatinus. It is placed in the Tabula at the E. extremity of the ridge. (Tab. Peut.) Again in b.c. 48 the fastnesses of this mountain ridge afforded a shelter to Milo when driven from Capua. (Dion Cass. xlii. 25.) This is the last time its name is mentioned in history, and it is not noticed by any of the geographers : in the middle ages the name seems to have been wholly forgotten; and the mountain is now called from a neighbouring village the Monte di Maddaloni. But the descriptions of Livy and Silius Italicus leave no doubt of the identification. It is indeed, from its proximity to Capua and the abruptness with which it rises from the plain, one of the most striking natural features of this part of Campania

TIFERNUM (Tí申epvov) was the name of two cities or towns of Umbria, which were distinguished by the epithets Tiberinum and Metaurense (Plin. iii. 14. s. 19).

1. Tifernum Tiberinum, which appears to have been the most considerable place of the name, was situated on or near the site of the modern Città di Castello, in the upper vailey of the Tiber, about 20 miles E. of Arezzo. The Tifernates Tiberini are enumerated among the municipal conmunities of Umbria by Pliny (l. c.); but our principal knowledge of the town is detived from the epistles of the younger Pliny, whase Tuscan villu was situated in its neighbourhood. For this reason the citizens had chosien him at a very early age to be their patron; and in return for this honour he had built a temple there at his own expense. (Plin. Ep. iv. 1.) He afterwards adorned this with statues of the various Roman emperors, to which he in one of his letters begs leave to add that of Trajan (Ib. x. 24). From the circumstance that Pliny's villa itself was in Etruria (whence he always calls it his Tuscan villa), while Tifernum was certainly in Umbria, it is evident that the frontier of the two countries ran very near the latter place, very probably as that of the Tuscan and Roman States does at the present day, between Cittis di Castello and Borgo S. Sepolcro. The position of Tifernum on nearly the same site with the former of these cities seems to be well established by the inscriptions found there and reported by Cluverius (Cluver. Ital. p. 624; Gruter, Inser. p. 494. 5). But it was probably situated rather further from the Tiber, as Pliny describes it as being, like Perugia and Ocriculum, "not far" from that river (Plin. iii. 5. s. 9), while the modern Cittù di Castello almost adjoins its bauks.
The precise site of Pliny's Tuscan villa cannot be ascertained, as the terms in which he describes its position (Ep. v. 6) will apply to many localities on the undertalls of the Apennines in the upper valley of the Tiber. It is, however, most probable that it was situated (as snggested by Cluverius) in the neighbourhond of Borgo S. Sepolcro, about 10 miles N. of Cittic di Castello, rather than in the immediate vicinity of Tifernum. (Cluver. Ital. p. 590.)
2. Tifernum Metaurense was evidently, as its name implies, situated on the other side of the Apennines, in the valley of the Metaurus. Its name is mentioned only by Pliny among ancient writers ; but it is found in several inscriptions (in which the citizens are termed, as by Pliny, Tifernates Metaurenses), and the discovery of these at $S$. Angelo in Vado leaves no doubt that Tifernum occupied the same site as that town, near the sources of the Metaurus, about 20 miles above Fossombrone. (Forum Sempronii). (Cluver. Ital. p. 621 ; Orell. Inscr. $3049,3305,3902$.
It is uncertain which of the towns above mentioned is the Tifernum of Ptolemy (iii. 1. § 53); perhaps the first has the better claim. [E. H. B.]
TIFERNUS (фitєpvos, Ptol.: Biferno), one of the most considerable rivers of Samnium, which has its sources in the heart of that country, near Bovianum (Bojano), in a lufty group of mountains, now known by the same name as the river (Monte Biferno). This is evidently the same which is called by Livy the Tifernus Mons, which the Samaite army had occupied as a stronghold in B. c. 295. but notwithstanding the strength of the position, they were attacked and defeated there by the Roman consul L. Volumnius Flamma (Liv. x. 30, 31). Upon two other occasions daring the Samnite wars Livy speaks of Tifernus or Tifernum in a manner that would leave it uncertain whether this mountain fastness is meant, or a town of the same name (Liv. ix. 44, x. 14); but as we have no other mention of a town of Tifernum in Samnium, it is perhaps more probable that in all these cases the mountain of that name is meant. The group thus named is a part of that known collectively as the Monte Matese,- one of the most conspicuous mountain masses in Samnium. [Samnium.] The river Tifernus has a course of above 60 miles from its source to the Adriatic, in a general direction from SW. to NE. In the lower part of its course, after leaving the confines of Samnium, it constituted in ancient times the boundary between Apulia and the Frentani. (Mel. ii. 4. § 6; Plin. iii. 11. s. 16, 12. s. 17; Ptol. iii. 1. § 18, where the MSS. have $\Phi$ ítepvos ; but this is probably a mistake for Tipepvos.) [E.H. B.]

TIGAVA CASTRA (It. Ant. p. 38; Tigavae, Plin. v. 2. s. 1; Tıraüa, Ptol. iv. 2. § 26), a furtress in Mauretania Caesariensis, between Oppidum Novum and Malliana, variously identitiod with El-Herba, Cantara, Abd-el-Kader.

TIGRA (called Tira by Procopias, de Aed. iv. 7), a fortress in Moesia Inferior, near the Danube, and between Sexantaprista and Appiaria (Itin. Ant. p. 222). In the Not. Imp. it is called Tegra. Variously identified with Murotin and a place near Olughissar.

TIGRANOCERTA (rd Tirpanok $\in \rho \tau a$, Strab. xi. pp. 522, 532; Ptol. v. 13. § 22; $\dot{\eta}$ Tiүpanoкépта, Plut. Lucull. 25, \&c.). literally, the city of Tigranes, since кefra (kert, gerd, or karta) meant, in the Armenian dialect, city (Hesych. iii. p. 237). The later capital of Armenia, built by Tigranes on an eminence by the river Nicephorius, a city of considerable size and strongly fortified. It was in a great measure populated with Greeks and Macedonians, taken thither by force from Cappadocia and Cilicia. After Lucullus gained his victory over Tigranes before its walls, he caused a great part of the still unfinished town to be pulled down, and permitted its kidnapped inhabitants to return to their homes. Nevertheless, the town continued to exist, though we hear but little of it subsequently to this event. (Cf. Strab. $u$. cc. and xii. p. 539, xri. p. 747 ; App. Mithr. 67 ; Plut. Lucull. 25, sqq.; Tac. Ann. xii. 50, xiv. 24, xv. 4; Plin. vi. 9. s. 10.) It has been variously identified with the ruins of Sert on the Chabur, with Mejafurlin, and with Amid or Amadiah. (See Ainsworth, ii. p. 361 ; St. Martin, i. p. 173; Ritter, Erdk. x. p. 87, xi. p. 106, sqq. )

TIGRIS, a celebrated river of Asia. We find various forms of its name, both in Greek and Latin writers. The earlier and more classical Greek form is $\delta$ Tiypms, gen. Tirpytos (Herod. vi. 20; Xen. Anab. iv. 1. § 3; Arr. Anab. vii. 7, \&cc.), whilst the form $\delta$ Tirpis, gen. Tirpi $\delta o s$, and sometimes Tiypios, is more usual among the later writers. (Strab. ii. p. 79, xv. p. 728; Ptol. v. 13. § 7; Plut. Lucull. 22, \&c.) Ainongst the Romans the nom. is constantly Tigris, with the gen. Tigris and acc. Tigrin und Tigrim among the better writers (Virg. Ecl. i. 63; Lucan, iii. 261 ; Plin. vi. s. 9; Curt. iv. 5, \&ec.); but sometimes Tigridis, Tigridem (Lucan, iii. 256; Eutrop. ix. 18; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6. § 20, \&c.) According to Pliny, the river in the upper part of its course, where it flowed gently, was called Diglito; but lower down, where it moved with more rapidity, it bore the name of Tigris, which, in the Dedian language, signified an arrow (cf. Strab. xi. p. 529; Curt. iv. 9; Isid. Or. xii. c. 2, \&cc.) Josephus (Anf i. 1, 2, sq.) and Zonaras (Ann. i. 2) mention that it bore the name of Diglad; and in its earliest course it is still called Daghele, Didschle or Dadschla.

According to the general testimony of the ancients the Tigris rose in Armenia (Xen. Anab. ir. 1. § 3; Eratosth. ap. Strab. ii. p. 80; Plin. vi. 27. 8. 31; Ptol. l. c., \&c.). Diodorus, indeed, places its sources in the territory of the Uxii in Pervia (xvii. 67); but he has here confounded the Tigris with the Pasitigris. Herodotus (v. 52) observes that there were three rivers bearing the name of Tigris, but that they did not spring from the same source; one of them rising in Armenia, another in the country of the Matieni, whilst he does not mention the origin of the third. These two branches, which are not mentioned by any other ancient writer, are the more western and proper sources of the Tigris in Sophene, to the NE. of the cataracts of the Enphrates. The more eastern of them forms the little river Nymphius or Nymphaeus (now the Batman Su or river of Miafarakin.) The union of these two sources forms the main western arm of the Tigris, which flows for between 100 and 200 miles, first in a NE., then in a S., and lastly in an E. direction, before it joins the main eastern branch of the river, about 62 miles SE . of Tigranocerta. The authors subsequent to Herodotus do not notice his correct account of these sources, but confine themselves entirely to the eastern branch. According to Strabo (xi. pp. 521, 529) this rose in Mount Niphates, at a distance of 2500 stadia from the sources of the Euphrates. But Pliny, who has written in most detail concerning this castern branch, describes it as rising in a plain of Armenia Major, at a place called Elegosine (vi. 27. s. 31). It then flowed through the nitrous lake of Arethusa, without, however, mingling its waters with those of the lake, and after losing itself at a place called Zoroanda (near the present Hazur), under a chain of the Taurus (the Nimrad Dagh), burst again from the earth, and flowed through a second lake, the Thospites. After emerging from this, it again sank into the earth with much noise and foam (cf. Strab. xvi. p. $\mathbf{8 4 6}$; Prisc. Perieg. 913; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6. $\S 15, \& c$.), and, after a subterranean passage of 25 miles, reappeared at a place called Nymphaeam (cf. Justin, xlii. 3). The account of Strabo, however, varies very considerably from the preceding one of Pliny. The former writer mentions only one lake (xi. p. 529), the description of which entirely resembles Pliny's Arethusa, but which Strabo calls Arsene or Thopitis, meaning evidently the Thospites of Pliny, the present Wan in Tosp, on which is situated the town of Ardschisch, with which the Tigris is in reality quite unconnected. Subsequently the river approaches the Euphrates in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, forming in this part of its course the boundary between Assyria and Mesopotamia. Diodorus Siculus (ii. 11) and Curtius (v. 1) erroneously represent it as flowing through Media, which it does not even touch. Near Seleucia, it was connected with the Euphrates by means of canals (Arrian, Anab. vii. 7). After this, it again retires from the Euphrates, till at last, bending its course to the SW., it completely unites with that river, at a place called by Pliny (l. c.) Digha, 1000 stadia above their common embouchure in the Persian gulf. Many of the ancients were aware that the two rivers joined one another, and had a common mouth (Plin. ib.; Strab. ii. p. 79; Procop. B. P. i. 17, \&c.), whilst others were of opinion that the Euphrates had a separate embouchure (Onesicritus, ap. Strab. xv. p. 729 ; Arrian, Amab. l. c.; and Ind. 41 ; Nearch. p. 37, Huds.). But even those who recognised their junction were not agreed as to which stream it was that received the other, and whether their united course, now the Shat-elArab, should be called Tigris or Euphrates. Most writers adopted the former name, but Nearchus and Onesicritus preferred that of the Euphrates (cf. Arrian, Indic. 41). It is not impossible, however, that the Eaphrates may at one time have had a separate mouth (cf. Plin. L. c.; Ritter, Erdk. x. p. 27). There was also a difference of opinion as to the namber of mouths by which the united stream emptied itself into the Persian gulf. Its western mouths were entirely unknown to the ancient Greeks, as Antiochus Epiphanes was the first who caused the coast to the W. of the Tigris to be accurately surveyed; and amongst later conquerors, Trajan alone penetrated as far as this neighbourhood. Hence the ancient Greeks, as well as Pliny (l. c.), speak of only one mouth, the breadth of which is given by the latter at 10 iniles. Ptolemy, however, mentions two mouths (vi. 3. § 2) at a distance of $1 \frac{1}{2}$ degrees apart, which is confirmed by Onesicritus (ap. Philostorg. Hist. Eccl. iii. 7, 8), according to whom the island between these mouths was inhabited by the Meseni. But probably by the eastern mouth was meant that of the river Eulaeus, the present Karin, one arm of which unites with the Tigris, whilst the other falls into the sea by an independent mouth. This river was also called Pasitigris by the ancients (Пadicıरpıs, Strab. xv. p. 729), that is, "the little Tigris," from the old Persian word pas, signifying "small;" whence also among the modern Persians it bears the name of Didjlahi-Kucak, which means the same thing. Hence we may explain how the united stream of the Tigris and Euphrates itvelf was throughout its course called Pasitigris by some writers (Strab. l. c.; Plin. l.c.); whilst others regarded the Pasitigris- as quite a separate stream, rising in the territory of the Uxii, and disemboguing into the Persian gulf (Nearch. ap. Strab. l. c.; Arrian, Ind. 42; Diodor. xvii. 67; Curt v. 3, init). This last view would make it identical with the present Karún (cf. Kinneir, Mem. p. 59; Gosselin, Recherches, gr. ii. p. 86, sqq; Vincent, Peripl. iii. p. 67, not. \&c.). The other affluents of the Tigris were the Nicephorius or Centritis, the Zabatus or Lycus, the Bumadus, the Caprus, the Tornadotus or Torna, apparently the same as the Physcus of Xenophon (Anab. ii. 4. § 25), the Gyndes or Delas, the Choaspes, and the Coprates, which fell into the main stream after joining the Eulsens. All these rivers were on the left or eastern bank of the Tigris. The stream of the Tigris was very rapid, and according to Strabo (p. 529) from its very source; whilst Pliny (l. c.) more correctly ascribes this quality only to its lower course. It was, in fact, owing to the large quantity of water which the Tigris received by means of the canals which connected it with the Euphrates, none of which was returned through the same channels, owing to the bed of the Tigris being at a lower level. (Arrian, l. c.; Dion Cass. Inviii. 28; Strab. L. c.; Hor. Od. iv. 14, 46; Lucan, iii. 256, \&cc.) In ancient times many dams had been constructed in its course from Opis to its mouth, designed to retain its waters for the purpose of irrigating the adjoining districts (cf. Heeren, Ideen, i. 2. p. 171; Tavernier, Voyages, i. p. 185; Niebubr, Reise, ii. p. 243). These, however, were all cat through by Alexander, in order to improve the navigation, which began as high up as Opis (Arrian, l. c.; Strab. 739, sq.) Between Mosul and the confluence of the greater $Z a b$, and 3 hours' journey above the latter, there still remains an ancient dam of masonry thrown across the stream (Ritter, Erdhunde, x. p. 5, sqq.). TILADAE (Tı入ádat, Ptol. vii. 2. § 15), a race who lived under the Mons Maeandrus in Western India. They are probably the same as the Taluctae of Pliny (vi. 19. s. 22). [Taluctae.] [ウे.]

TILAVEMPTUS (Ti 1 aov́ $\neq \mu \pi$ тos: Tagliamento), a river of Venetia, which has its sources in the Alps, above 80 miles from the sea, and after travensing the broad plain of the Frioul, falls into the Adriatic sea between Aquileia and Concordia. (Plin. iii. 18. s. 22; Ptol. iii. 1. § 26.) It is the most considerable river in this part of Italy, and, like all the neighbouring rivers, is subject to be swollen by floods and winter rains, so that it leaves a broad bed of shingle, great part of which is dry at ordinary seasons. The name is found in Pliny and Ptolemy; and it is doubtless the same river which is described by Strabo, thongh without mentioning its name, as separating the territory of Aquileia from the province of Venetia, and which he says was navigable for 1200 stadia from its mouth. (Strab. v. p. 214.) This last statement is indeed a great exaggeration; but the valley of the Tagliamento is one of the natural openings of this part of the Alps, and was followed by the line of a Roman road, which proceeded from Aquileia by Julium Carnicum (Zuglio) over the pass of the Monte di Sta Croce into the valley of the Gail. [A1.PFS, p. 110.]

Pliny speaks (l.c.) of a "Tilaventum majus minusque," but it is impossible to say what river he meant to designate under the latter appellation. The name is written in the Tabula "Tiliabinte," while it assumes very nearly its modern form in the Gengrapher of Raveona. (Taliamentum, Geogr. Rav. iv. 36.)

TILENE, in Gallia. The name is File in the Table, or Filena as some say. D'Anville altered it to Tilene, and he finds the place on a road in the Table from Andomatunum (Langres) to Cabillonum (Challon-sur-Saone). The place is Til-leChiteau, the Tile Castrum of the eleventh century. Some documents of that time have Tiricastrum and Tricastel, and accordingly the place is vulgarly called Tré-château or Tri-château.

TIMA'VUS (Timavos: Tinao), a river of Venetia, flowing into the Adriatic sea between Aquileia and Tergeste, about 12 miles E. of the former city. Notwithstanding its classical celebrity, it is one of the shortest of rivers, being formed by copious sources which burst out from the rock at the foot of a lofty cliff, and immediately constitute a broad and deep river, which has a course of little more than a mile before it discharges itself into the sea. There can be no doubt that these sonrces are the outlets of some subterranean stream, and that the account of Posidonius (ap. Strab. v. p. 215), who says that the river after a course of some length falls into a chasm, and is carried under ground about 130 stadia before it issues out again and falls into the sea, is substantially correct. Such subterranean passages are indeed not uncommon in Carniola, and it is impossible to determine from what particular river or lake the waters of the Timavus derive their origin; but the popular notion still regards them as the outflow of a stream which sinks into the earth near S. Canzian, about 13 miles from the place of their reappearance. (Cluver. Ital. p. 193.) The number of the sources is variously stated : Virgil, in the well-known parsage in which he describes them (Aen. i. 245), reckons them nine in number, and this agrees with the statement of Mela; while Strabo speaks of seven; and this would appear from Servius to have been the common belief (Serv.ad Aex. l. c.; Mel. ii. 4. § 3), which is supported also by Martial, while Claudian follows Virgil (Mart. iv. 25. 6; Claudian, de V/. Cons. Hon. 198). Cluverius, on the other hand, could find but six, and some molern travellers make them only four. Strabo adds that, according to Polybius, all but one of them were salt, a circumstance which would imply some connection with the sea, and, according to Cluverius, who described them from personal observation, this was distinctly the case in his time; for though at low water the stream issued tranquilly from its rocky sources, and flowed with a still and placid current to the sea, yet at high tides the waters were swollen, so as to rush forth with much greater force and volume, and inundate the neighbouring meadows: and at such times, he adds, the waters of all the sources but one become perceptibly brackish, doubtless from some subterranean communication with the sea. (Cluver. Ital. p. 194.) It appears from this account that Virgil's remarkable expressions-

Polybius (ap. Strab. l. c.), the stream was called by the natives "the source and mother of the sea" communication with the sea has been choked ap, as no modern traveller alludes to the phenomenon described by Cluverius. The Timao is at present a very still and tramquil stream, but not less than 50 yards broad close to its source, and deep enough to be navigable for vessels of considerable size. Hence it is justly called by Virgil "magnus Timavas" (Ecl. viii. 6): and Ausonius speaks of the "aequoreus amnis Timavi" (Ciar. Urb. xiv. 34).

Lisy speaks of the "lacum Timavi," by which he evidently means nothing more than the basin formed by the waters near their source (Liv. xli. 1): it was close to this that the Roman consul A. Manlius established his camp, while C. Furius with 10 ships appears to bave ascended the river to the same point, where their combined camp was attacked and plundered by the lstrians. According to Strabo there was a temple in honour of Dioned erected near the sources of the Timarus, with a sacred grove attached to it. (Strab. v. p. 214). There were also warm springs in the same neighbourhood, which are now known as the Bagni di $S$. Gioranni.

TINGIS (Tíryis, Strab. iii. p. 140, and Tira, xvii. p. 827; in Ptol. iv. 1. § 5, Tiryıs Ka: $\sigma d \rho \in i a$ ), a very ancient city on the N. const of Mauretania. Mela (i. 5) calls it Tinge, Pliny (v. 1. s. 1) Tingi. It lay 60 miles $W$. of the promontory of Abyla (Itin. Ant. p. 9, \&c) and 30 miles from Belo on the opposite coast of Spain (Plin. L. c.). Meas and Pliny record the tradition of its foundation by Antaeus, whilst according to Plutarch it was founded by Sophax, a son of Hercules and the midow of Antacus (Sert. 9). In that neighbourhood was the fabled grave of Antacus, and his skeleton 60 cubits long (Strab. xvii. 829, cf. iii. p. 422). These mythic legends serve at least to indicate the great antiquity of the place. (Cf. Strab. l. c.; Solin. c. 45.) It was raised hy Augustus to the rank of a free city (Dion Cass. xlviii. 45), and in the time of Clandius became a Ruman colony (Plin. l. c.; Itin. Ant. 8,12 ) and the capital of the province of Tingitana. It was also a place of considerable trade. Now Tangier.
Ti'NIA (Tevéas: Timia), a small river of Umbria. falling into the liber, a few miles below Perusia. The name is given by the ancient gengraphers to the afluent of the Tiber (one of the first tributaries which that river receives), but at the present day the stream called the Timia loses its natne after its junction with the Topino, a more considerable stream. Four small rivers indeed bring down their united waters to the Tiber at this point: 1. the Maroggia, which rises between Todi and Spoleto, and brings with it the waters of the Clitunno, the ancient Clitumnts; 2, the Timia, which joins the Clitumnus near Mevania (Bevagna); 3, the Tropino, which descends from the Apennines near Nocera, and turns abruptly to the NW., after receiving the waters of the Timia; and 4, the Chiascio, which joins the Topino from the N. only 3 miles from the point where it falls into the Tiber. Though thus augmented from various quarters the Tinia was always an inconsiderable stream. Pliny speaks of it as navigable with difficulty even for boats, and Silius Italicus calls it "Timiae inglorius humor." (Sil. Ital. viii. 452; Plin. iii. 5. s. 9; Strab. v. p. 297.) [E. H. B.]

TINU'RTIUM, in Gallia is placed in the ltins. near the Suine, between Cabillonum (Challon) and Datisco (Micon). The Antonine Itin. marks M.P. xxi., leuzas xiiii. between Cabillonum and Tinurtimn, which is Tournus. The Table gives only xii., which appears to be nearer the truth. The two ltins. do not agree in the distance between Tinurtium and Matisco. Spartianus ( Vita Septim. Sereri, c. 11) sars that Severus defeated Clondius Albimes at Tinurtium, or Trinurtium. for the reading is perhaps doubtful. (Is Casaubon, in Aclium Spartianum notae). Dion (lxxv. c. 6), Herolian (iii. 7), and Eutropius (viii. 18) speak of Clodius Altinus being defeated by Severus at or near Lugdunum ( $L$ yon). The name Tinurtiuin appears to be sometimes iniswritten Tiburtium.

TIPARENUS, an island oft the cosist of Herminnis in Argolis, mentioned only by Pliny (iv. 12. s. 19). It is frequently identitied with Speizia; but Leake remarks that Tiparenus has no appearance of a Greek name, and conjectures that it is an error for Tricarenus, the same as the Tricrana of Pausanias (ii. 34. § 8) and the modern Trikhiri. TIRYNS (Típuvs: Eth. Tipúvelos: the name is perhaps connected with ríphis, Lepsius, Tyrrh. Pelasger, p. 13), one of the most ancient cities of Greece, liy a short distance SE. of Argos, on the right of the road leading to Epidaurus (Pans. ii. 25. § 8), and at the distance of 12 stadia from Nanplia. (Strab. viii. p. 373.) Its massive walls, which have been regarded with wonder in all ages, are said to b:tre been the work of the Cyclopes, and belong to the same age as those of Mycenae. (Paus. ii. 16. § 5, ii. $25 . \S 8$, vii. 25. § 6, ix. 36. § 5; Strab. l. c.; Plin. vii. 56. s. 57.) Hence Homer calls the city Tipuvs $\tau \in i x(\delta \in \sigma \sigma a$. (Il. ii. 559.) (Fragm. 642, ed. Bückh), and Pausanias says that the walls are not less worthy of admiration than the pyramids of Esypt (ix. 36. §5.) In another passage be describes the walls as consisting of wide ma-ses of stone ( $\dot{a} \rho \gamma \gamma_{i} \lambda(\theta o t)$, of such a size, that a yoke of oxen could not stir the least of them, the interstices being filled in with smaller stones to make the whole more compact and solid. (Paus. ii. 25. § 8.) The foundation of Tiryns ascends to the earliest mythical legends of the Argeia. It was said to have derived its name from Tiryns, the son of Argus (Paus. ii. 25. § 8), and to have been founded by Proetus. (Strab. viii. p. 372; Paus. ii. 16. § 2) According to the common tradition, Megapenthes, the son of Proetus, ceded Tiryns to Perseus, who transmitted it to his descendant Electryon. Alcmena, the daughter of Electryon, inarried Amphitryon, who would have succeeded to the crown, had he not been expelled by Sthenelus, king of Argos. Their son Hercules afterwards regained possessinn of Tiryns, where he lived for many years, and hence is frequently called Tirynthius by the poets. (Hes. Scut. 81 ; Pind. Ol. x. 37, Isthm. vi. 39; Virg. Aen. vii. 662; Ov. Met. vii. 410.) Although Tirgns was thus closely connected with the Heraclidae, yet the city remained in the hands of the old Achaean prpulation after the return of the Heraclidae and the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians. The strong fortress of Tiryns was dangerous to the neighbouring Dorian colony of Argos. After the dreadful defeat of the Argives by Cleomenes, their slaves took poosession of Tiryns and held it for many years, (Herod. vi. 83.) In the Persian War the Tirynthians sent some men to the battle of Plataea. (Herod. ix. 28.) Subsequently their city was taken by the Argives, probably about the same time as Mycenae, B. c. 468 . The lower city was entirely deatroyed; the citadel was dismantled; and the inhahitants fled to Epidaurus and Halieis, a town on the coast of Hermionis. (Strab. viii. p. 373 ; Ephorus, ap. Steph. B. s. v. 'A入teîs; Eustath. ad Hom. Ih ii. 559, p. 286,) It was probably owing to this circumstance that Stephanus B. (s. v. Tipuvs) was led into the mistake of saying that Tiryns was formerly called Halieis. The Tirynthisns, who did not succeed in effecting their escape, were removed to Argos. (Paus. ii. 25. § 8.) From this time Tiryns remained uninhabited; and when Pansanias visited the city in the second centary of our era, he saw nothing but the remains of the walls of the citadel, and beneath them towards the sea the so-called chambers of the daughters of Proetus. No trace of the lower city appears to have been left. The citadel was named Licymna, after Licymnius, son of Electryon, who was slain at Tiryns by Tleptolemus, son of Hercules. (Strab. vii. p. 373; Pind. Ol. vii. 47.) Hence Statius calls the marahes in the neighbourhood of Tiryns "stagna Licymnia." (Theb. iv. 734.) Theophrastus represents the Tirynthians as celebrated for their laughing propensities, which rendered them incapable of attention to serious business (ap. Athen. vi. p. 261, d.).

The rains of the citadel of Tiryns are now called Paled Anápli. They occupy the lowest and flattest of several rucky hills, which rise like islands out of the plain. The impression which they produce upon the beholder is well described by Col. Mure: "This colossal fortress is certainly the greatest curiosity of the kind in existence. It occupies the table summit of an oblong hill, or rather knoll, of small extent or elevation, completely encused in masses of enormons stones, rudely piled in tiers one above another, into the form alternately of towers, curtain walls, abutments, gates, and covered ways. There is not a fragment in the neighbourhood indicating the existence of suburb or outer town at any period; and the whole, rising abruptly from the dead level of the surrounding plain, produces at a distance an effect very similar to that of the hulk of a man-of-war floating in a harbour." The length of the summit of the rock, according to Col. Leake's measurement, is about 250 yards, the breadth from 40 to 80 , the height above the plain from 20 to 50 feet, the direction nearly $N$. and $S$. The entire circuit of the walls still remains more or less preserved. They consist of huge masses of stone piled apon one another, as Pausanias describes. The wall is from about 20 to 25 feet in thickness, and it had two entrances, one on the eastern, and the other on the southern side. "In its general design the fortress appears to have consisted of an upper and lower enclosure of nearly equal dimensions, with an intermediate platform, which may have served for the defence of the upper castle against an enemy in possession of the lower. The southern entrance led by an ascent to the left into the apper inclosure, and by a direct passage between the upper inclosure and the eastern wall of the fortress into the lower inclosure, having also a branch to the left into the middle platform, the entrance into which last was nearly opposite to the eastern gate. Besides the two principal gates, there was a postern in the western side. On either side of the great sonthern entrance, that is to say, in the eastern as well as in the southern wall, there were galleries in the body of the wall of singulur construction. In the eastern wall, where they are better preserved, there are two parallel passages, of which the outer has six recesses or niches in the exterior wall. These niches were probably intended to serve for the protracted defence of the gallery itself, and the galleries for covered communications leading to towers or places of arms at the extremity of them. The passage which led directly from the southern entrance, between the upper inclosure and the eastern wall into the lower division of the fortress, was abont 12 feet broad. About midway, there still exists an immense door-post, with a hole in it for a bolt, showing that the passage might be closed upon occasion. The lower inclosure of the fortreas was of an oval shape, about 100 jards long and 40 broad; its walls formed an acute angle to the north, and several obtuse angles on the east and west. Of the upper inclosure of the fortress very little remains. There is some appearance of a wall of separation, dividing the highest part of all from that next to the southern entrance ; thus forming four interior divisions besides the passages." (Leake.) The general appearance of these covered galleries is shown in the accompanying drawing from Gell's Itinerary. (Leake, Morea, vol. ii. p. 350, seq.; Mure, Tour in Greece, vol. ii. p. 173, seq.; Curtius, Peloponnesus, vol. ii. p. 388, seq.)

TITHOREA．［Neon．］
TITHRO＇NIUM（Titpóviov：Eth．Ti日p $\omega \boldsymbol{\nu} \iota \epsilon$ ús）， a frontier town of Phocis，on the side of Doris．Livy， who calls it Tritonon，describes it as a town of Doris （xxviii．7），but all other writers place it in Phocis． It was destroyed by the army of Xerxes together with the other Phocian towns．It is placed by Pau－ sanias in the plain at the distance of 15 stadia from Amphicleia．The site of Tithronium is probably in－ dicated by some ruins at Mulki below Verzaná，where a torrent unites with the Cephissus．（Herod．viii． 33；Paus．x．3．§ 2，x．33．§ 11 ；Steph．B．s．v．； Leake，Northern Greece，rol．ii．p．87．）
TITTHIUM．［Epidaurus，p．841，a．］
TITULCIA，a town of the Carpetani in His－ pania Tarraconensis，on the road from Emerita to Caesaraugusta（Itin．Ant．pp．436，438，\＆c．）It seems to be the same town called Titovania by Ptolemy（ii．6．§ 57）．Variously placed near Tor－ rejon，at Getafe，and at Bayona．［T．H．D．］

TIUS or TIUM（Tíos or Tíoy：Eth．Tiavós），a town on the coast of Bithynia，or，according to others， belonging to Paphlagonia．It was a Greek town situated at the mouth of the river Billaeus，and seems to have belonged to Paphlagonia until Prusias annexed it to Bithynia．（Memnon，17－19；Pomp． Mela，i．19；Marcian，p．70；Arrian，Peripl．P．E． p．14；Anon．Peripl．P．E．p．2．）In Strabo＇s（xii． pp．542， 543,565 ）time，Tius was only a small place but remarkable as the birthplace of Philetae－ rus，the founder of the royal dynasty of Pergamum． （Comp．Plin．vi．1．）There are coins of Tius as late as the reign of Gallieuus，on which the ethnic name appears as Ttavoi，Teiol，and Teiayoi．（Sestini， p． 71 ；Eckhel，ii．p．438．）

TLOS（T $\lambda \omega \bar{s}$ or $T \lambda \bar{\omega} s$ ），an ancient and important city of Lycia. It is not often mentioned by ancient writers, but we know from Artemidorus (ap. Sirab. xiv. p. 665) that it was one of the six cities forming the Lycian confederacy. Strabo only remarks further that it was situated on the road to Cibyra. (Comp. Plin. v. 28; Ptol. v. 3. § 5; Steph. B. s. v.; Hierocl. p. 659.) Until recently the site of this town was unknown, though D'Anville had correctly conjectured that it ought to be looked for in the valley of the Xanthus. Sir C. Fellows was the first modera traveller who saw and described its be.autiful remains, the identity of which is established beyond a doubt by inscriptions. These ruins exist in the upper valley of the Xanthus, at a little distance from its eastern bank, almost due north of the city of Xanthus, and about 5 miles from the village of Doover. They are, says Sir Charles, very extensive, consisting of extremely massive buildings, suited only for palaces; the design appears to be Roman, but not the mode of building nor the inscriptions. The original city must have been demolished in very early times, and the finely wrought fragments are now seen built into the strong walls, which have furtified the town raised upon its ruins. The theatre was large, and the most highly and expensively finished that he had seen; the seats not only are of marble, but the marble is highly wrought and has been polisthed, and each seat has an overhanging cornice often supported by lions' paws. There are also ruins of several other extensive buildings with columns; but the most striking feature in the place is the perfect honeycomb formed in the sides of the acropolis by excavated tombs, which are cut out of the rock with architectural ornaments, in the form of triangles, \&c., some showing considerable taste. (Fellows, Asia Minor, p. 237, full., Lycia, p. 132, foll., where some of the remains are tigured and a number of inscriptions given.)

TMAKUS. [DoDons, p. 783, b.]
TMOLUS ( $T \mu \bar{\omega} \lambda o s$ ), a mountain range on the south of Sardes, forming the watershed between the basins of the Hermus in the north and the Cayster in the south, and being connected in the east with Mount Messogis. It was said to have received its name from a Lydian king Timolus, whence Ovid (Met. vi. 16) gives this name to the mountain itself. Mount Tmolus was celebrated for the excellent wine growing on its slopes (Virg. Georg. ii. 97 ; Senec. Phoen. 602 ; Eurip. Bacch. 55,64; Strab. xiv. p. 637; Plin. v. 30). It was equally rich in metals ; and the river I'actolus, which had its source in Mount Tmolus, at one time carried from its interior a rich supply of gold. (Strab. xiii. pp. 591, 610, 625; Plin. xxxiii. 43; comp. Hom. ll. ii. 373; Aesch. Pers. 50; Hernd. i. 84, 93, v. 101 ; Ptol. v. 2. § 13; Dion. Per. 831.) On the highest summit of Mount Tmolus, the Persians erected a marble watch-tower commanding a view of the whole of the surrounding country (Strab. xiii. p. 625). The Turks now call the mountain Bouz Dagh. (Richter, Wallfahrten, pp. 512, 519.)
TMOLUS. a town of Lydia, situated on Mount Tmolus, which was destroyed during the great earthquake in A. d. 19. (Tac. Ann.ii. 47 ; Plin. v. 30; Euseb. Chron. ad Ann. V. Tib.; Niceph. Call. i. 17.) Some coins are extant with the inscription Tر $\mu \boldsymbol{\lambda}$ еít $\omega \nu$. (Sestini, p. 114.)

TOCAE (T $\hat{\kappa} \alpha a$ ), a very large city of Numidia, mentioned only by Diodorus ( $x \times 57$ ), is perhaps the sume as Tucca.

TOCHARI (Tóxapol, Ptol. vi. $11 . \S$ 6), a pouerful Scythian people in Bactriana, which also spread itself to the E. of the Jaxartes over a portion of Sogdiana, and even as far as the borders of Serica. (Plin. vi. 17. 8. 20 ; Amın. Marc. xxiii. 6. § 57.)

TOCOLOSIDA (Tuколо́бiסa, Ptol. iv. 1. § 14), the most southern place in the Roman possession in Mauretania Tingitana. (Itin. Ant. p. 23 ) Variously identified with Magilla, Fortin near Sidi Casseni, and Mergo or Amergo.
[T. H. D.]
TUCOSANNA (Tokoбávva, Ptol. vii. 2. § 2), a river which falls into the Bay of Bengal at its NE. end. It is probahly that now called the river of Arracan, which is formed by the junction near its mouth of three other rivers. (Lassen, Map of Anc. India.)

TODUCAE (Toঠoúkat, also $\triangle$ oûkaı or Toסoúk $\omega \nu$ es, Ptol. iv. 2. § 21 ), a people in Mauretania Caesariensis, on the left bank of the Ampraga. [T. H. D.]

TOE'SOBIS (Toíoobıs, Ptol.ii. 3. § 2), a river on the western const of Britannia Romana, now the Conecay.

TOGARMAH. [Armenia.]
TOGISONUS (Bacchigliune), a river of Venetia, mentioned only by Pliny, who describes it as flowing through the territory of Patavium, and contributing a part of its waters to the artificial canals called the Fossiones Pbilistinae, as well as to form the port of Brandulus (P'lin. iii. 16. s. 20.) The rivers in this part of Italy have changed their course so frequently that it is very difficult to identify them : but the most probable conjecture is that the Tugisonus of P'liny is the modern Bacchiglione, one arm of which still flows into the sea near the Porto di Brondolo, while the other joins the Brenta (Medoacus) under the walls of I'adiuaz (I'atavium).

TOLBIACUM, in North Gallia, on the road from Augusta Trevirorum (Trier) to Colonia Agrippina (Coligne). The distance of Tolbiacum from Colonia is avi. in the Antonine Itin. Tolbiacum is Zulpich, south-west of Bonn, on the direct road fmm Trier to Cologne. The words "vicus supernorum" or "vicus supenorum," which occur in the MSS. of the Itin. after the name "Tolbiaco," have not been explained. Several writers have proposed to alter them. Tacitus (Hist. iv. 79) places Tolbiacum within the limits of the territory of the Agrippinenses or the Colonia Agrippina.
TOLENTI'NUM or TOLLENTI'NUS (Eth. Tolentinas, ātis: Tolentino), a town of Picenum, in the valley of the Flusor or Chienti, about 12 miles below Canerinum (Camerino). It is mentined by Pliny among the municipal towns of Picenum, and its municipal rank is attested by the Liber Coluniarum, which mentions the "ager Tolentinus," and by inscriptions. (l'lin. iii. 13. s. 18; Lib. Col. pp. 226, 259; Orell. Inscr. 2474 ; Gruter, Inscr. pp. 194. 2.410.2.) The modern city of Tolentino, which retains the ancient site as well as name, is situated on the present highroad from Rome to Ancona : but as no ancient road descended the valicy of the Flusur, the name is not found in the Itineraries. [E. H. B.]

TOLE＇RICM（Todépiov，Steph．B．：Eth．Todepivos． Toleriensis：Valmontone？），an ancient town of Latium，the name of which occurs in the early Roman history，but which appears to have ceased to exist at an early periol．Its name is found in the list given by Dionysius of the thirty Latin cities which formed the learue in b．c． 493 （Dionys．r． 61，according to the Vatican MS．；Niebuhr，vol．ii． note 21）：and it is again mentioned among the places taken by Coriolanus at the head of the Volscian army in b．c． 486 （Dionys．viii． 17 ；Plut． Coriol．28）．According to the narrative given by Dionrsius，and by Plutarch who copies him，it was the first place attacked by Coriolanus in that cam－ paign，and its reduction was followed in succession by that of Bola，Labicum．Pedum and Corbio．It is singular that no mention of Tulerium occurs in the narrative of the same operations by Livy（ii．39）， and it seems probable that the name of Trebiam， which is found in that author（for which the best MSS．give Trebium），is a corruption for Tolerium，a name otherwise little known and therefore liable to alteration by copyists．（Cluver．Ital．p． 969 ； Bormann，Alt－Latinische Chorogruphie．p．2113．） The only other notice of Tolerium is fuund in Pliny， who enumerates the＂Tolerienses＂among the＂po－ puli＂of Latium who had formerly shared in the sacrifices on the Alban Mount，but were in his time utterly extinct（iii．5．s．9）．We have no account of the period of its destruction or tinal decay．The only clue to its position is that derived from the narratives above referred to，and it seems very doubt－ ful how far we are justified in drawing strict topo－ graphical inferences from such relations．It may， bowerer，be admitted as probable that Tolerium was situated in the same neighbourhood with Bola， Labicum，and Pedum；and the conjecture of Nibby， who would place it at Valmontone，derives at least some support from the circumstance that the latter town stands just at the source of the river Sacco， called in ancient times the Trerus or Tolerus ［Trerus］．The name of Valnontone，is of modern origin，but it in all probability occupies an ancient site：some vestiges of its ancient walls are still visible，as well as some remains of Roman date， while the scarped sides of the rocks which surround it，and render the position one of great natural strength， abound in ancient sepulchres．Gell，however，regards it as the site of Vitellia rather than Tolerium，a conjecture which has also much to recommend it． ［Vitellia．］Valmontone is 5 miles S．of Palestrina and about 3 miles beyond Lugmano，on the line of the modern Via Latina，and 26 from Rome．（Nibby， Dintorni，vol．iii．pp．370，377；Gell．Top．of Rome， p．436；Abeken，Mittel－Italien，p．76．）［E．H．B．］ TOLE＇TUM（Tஸ́入 $\boldsymbol{T} \boldsymbol{t o \nu}$, Ptol．ii．6．§ 57 ：Eth． Toletani，Plin．iii．3．s． 4 ；Orelli，Inscr．no．980）， the capital of the Carpetani，in Hispania Tar－ raconensis，situated on the Tagus，and on the road from Emerita to Caesaraugusta，and connected also by another road with Laminium．（Itin．Ant．pp．438， 446．）It was a very strong town，though only of moderate size，and famed for its manufacture of arms and steel－ware．（Liv． $\mathbf{x x x v} .7,22, ~ x x x i x, ~ 30 ;$ Grat．Cyneg．341；cf．Miñano，Diccion．viii．p．

TOLO＇SA or THOLO＇SA（To $\omega \dot{\omega} \sigma \sigma \alpha$, To $\lambda \omega \bar{\omega} \alpha$, Tóגuáa，Dion Cass．xxxviii．c．32：Eth．Tolosates， Tolosenses，Tolosani），in Gallia，is Toulouse，in the department of Haute－Garonne，on the right bank of the Garonne．

The identity of Toloss and Toulouse is easily proved from the Itineraries and other evidence．In Caesar＇s time Tolnsa was withiu the Roman Provincia． （B．G．i．10．）When Caesar is speaking of the inten－ tion of the Helvetii to migrate into the country of the Samtones，he remarks that the Santones are not far from the territory of the Tolosates，who are in the Provincia．He considered that it would be dan－ gerons to the Provincia if the warlike Helvetii，the enemies of Rome，should be so near to an open country，which produced a great deal of grail． The commentators have found some difficulty in Caesar＇s expression about the proximity of the San－ tones and the Tolosates，for the Nitiobriges and Petrocorii were between the Santones and the Tolo－ sates；but Caesar only means to say that the Hel－ vetii in the country of the Santones would be dan－ gerous neighbours to the Provincia．In Caesar＇s time Tolusa and Carcaso，both in the basin of the Garonne，were fully organised as a part of the Provincia；for when P．Crassus invaded Aquitania， he summoned soldiers from the muster－rolls of these towns to join his army．（B．G．iii．20．）Tolosa being situated on the neck of land where Gallia is narrowest［Gallia Transalpina，Vol．I．p．949］ and in a position easy of access from the west， north，and east，was one of the places threatened by the Galli in the great rising of в．c．52；but Caesar with bis usual vigilance protected the province on this side by placing a force at Tolosa．（B．G． vii．7．）
Tolosa was an old town of the Volcae Tectosages which existed probably many centuries before it was conquered by the Romans．A great quantity of gold and silver was collected there，the gold the produce of the auriferous region near the Pyrences， and both the precious metals the offerings of Gallic superstition．The treasure was kept in chambers in the temples，and also in sacred tanks．This is the story of Posidonius（Strab．iv．p．188），who had travelled in Gallia; and it is more probable than the tradition that the gold of Tolosa was the produce of the plunder of Delphi by Brennus and his men, among whom it is said there were some Tectosages (Justin, xxxii. c. 3) ; for it is very doubtful if any of Brennus' soldiers got back to Gallia, if we admit that they came from Gallia. Tolosa was in some kind of alliance with Rome (Dion Cass. xxxiv. 97) about B. c. 106 ; but the Teutones and Cimbri at this time had broken into Gallia, and fear or policy induced the Tolosates to side with them. Q. Servilius Caepio (consul B.c. 106) made this a pretext for attacking Tolosa, which he took and plundered of its treasures, either in B. c. 106 or in the following year. This act of sacrilege was supposed to have been punished by the gods, for Caepio was defeated by the Cimbri b. c. 105, and his army was destroyed. (Liv. Epit. 67 ; Orosius, v. 15; Gell. iii. 9.) The treasure of Tolosa never reached Rome, and perhaps Caepio himself laid hold of some of it. However this may be, the "Aurum Tolosanum" became a proverb. All who had touched the consecrated treasure came to a miserable end. It seems that there was inquiry made into the matter at Rome, for Cicero (De Nat. Deorrum, iii. 30) speaks of a "quaestio auri Tolosani."

The Tolosani or Tolosates were that division of the Tectosages which was nearest to the Aquitani. A place called Fines, between Tolosa and Carcaso, denotes the boundary of the territory of Tolosa in that direction, as this term often indicates a territorial limit in the Roman geography of Gallia [Fines]; and another place named Fines marks the boundary on the north between the Tolosates and the Cadurci.

Pliny (iii. 4) mentions Tolosa among the Op pida Latina of Narbonensis, or those towns which had the Latinitas, and, as Ptolemy (ii. 10. § 9) names it a Colonia, we must suppose that it was made a Colonia Latina. Tolosa maintained its importance under the Empire. Ausonius (Ordo Nob. Urb. xii.) describes Tolosa as surrounded by a brick wall of great circuit, and as a populons city, which had sent out inhabitants enough to found four other cities. The name Palladia, which Martial (Ep. ix. 101), Sidonius Apollinaris, and Ausonius give to Tolosa appears to refer to the cultivation of the liberal arts in this Gallic city -
" Te sibi Palladiae antetulit toga docta Tolosae."

TO'MARUS. [Dodona, p. 783, b.]
TOME'RUS (Tóm $\quad$ pos, Arrian, Ind. 24), a river, or rather torrent of Gedrosia, called Tonberos or Tomberos by Pliny (vi. 23. s. 25. § 93, ed. Sillig.), and Tubero by Mela (iii. 7). According to the distances in Arrian, this river is the Muklow or Hingul.

TOMIS or TOMI (T'́p/s, Strab. vii. p. 319; Ov. Tr. iii. 9. 33; Geogr. Rav. iv. 6, \&c.: T $\delta \mu a \iota$, Ptol. iii. 10. §8; Tomi, Plin. iv. 11. s. 18; Stat. S. i. 2, 255 ; Itin. Ant. p. 227, \&c.; in Mela, ii. 2, Tomoe: we also find the Greek form Toutús, Steph. B. 8. v.; Arrian, Per. P. Eux. p. 24), a town of Lower Moesia, on the Euxine, and the capital of the district of Seythia Minor (Sozom. H. Eccl. vii. 25; Hierocl. p. 637). It was situated at a distance of about 300 stadia or $\mathbf{3 6}$ miles from Istros or Istropolis (Anon. Per. P. Eux. p. 12; Itin. Ant. p. 227), but according to the Tab. Peut. 40 miles. It was a Milesian colony, and according to the legend the place where Medea cut up her brother's body, or where their father Aeëtes got together and buried the pieces ( $\mathrm{Ov} . l$ l. c.; Apollod. i. 9, 25; Hygin. Fab. 13.) The legend is no doubt connected with the name of the town, which, however, is still better known as the place of banishment of Ovid. Now Tomisvar or Jeni Pangola.

COIN OF TOMIS OR tomi.
 town of Sophene, in Armenia, was ceded by Lucullus to the Cappadocians. (Polyb. xxxiv. 13; Strab. xii. p. 535, xiv. pp. 663, 664; Steph. B. s. v.)

TONBEROS. [Tomerus.]
TONICE. [Niconis Dromus.]
TONOSA, a town of Cappadocia, 50 miles from Sebastia, still called Tonus. (It. Ant. pp. 181, 182, 212.)

TONSUS, or TONZUS (Tóvoos, Zos. ii. $22 . \S 8$; cf. Lampr. Elag. 7), the principal tributary of the Hebrus in Thrace. It rises in the Haemus : its general course for about 70 miles is almost due E.; it then makes a sudden bend to the S ., and, after a farther southerly course of nearly the same length, falls into the Hebrus, a short distance from Hadrianopolis. Now Tuncza or Toondja.

TOPI'RIS (Plin. iv. 11. s. 18; Tomipis or Tomppis, Ptol. iii. 11. § 13), or Topirus (It. Ant. p. 321 ; in p. 331, it is corrupted into Otopisus ; and in It. Hier. p. 603, into Epyrus; Tab. Peut.; Tóretpos, Hierocl. p. 634), a town in the SIV. of Thrace, a little NE. from the mouth of the Nestus, and a short distaoce W. of Abdera. In the time of Procopins (B. G. iii. 38) it was the first of the maritime cities of Thrace, and is described as distant 12 days' journey from Byzantium. Very little is known about this place. In later times it was called Rhusion ('Poviotov, Hierocl. l. c.; cf. Aposposm. Geo. in Hudson. iv. p. 42 ; and Anna Comn. p. 212), and was the seat of a bishopric. (Conc. Chalced.) Justinian rebuilt its walls, which had been demolished, and made them stronger than before. (Procop. de Aed. iv. 11.) According to Paul Lucas and Boudoue, the modern Tosbur occupies its site; but Lapie identifies it with Kara-Giuenzi.

TOREA'TAE. [Tormtae.]
TORECCADAE. [Toretae.]
TO'RETAE (Topetai, Steph. B. s. v.; Dionys. Per. 682; Plin. vi. 5; Mela, i. 2; Avien. Orb. Terr. 867) or TOREA'TAE (Topєâtal, Strab. xi. p. 495), a tribe of the Maeotae in Asiatic Sarmatia. Ptolemy (v. 9. § 9) mentions a Topetiky dкpd in Asiatic Sarmatia; and in another passage (iii. 5. § 25) he speaks of the Topeckádau as a people in Eurnpean Surmatia, who are perbaps the same as the Turetae or Toreatae.

TORNADOTUS, a small river of Assyria, mentioned by Pliny (vi. 27. s. 31), and a tributary of the Tigris. It is probably the same stream as that noticed by Xenophon under the name of the Physcus. (Anab. ii. 4. § 25.) It may be the modern Torna or Odorneh. Mannert (vi. 2. p. 317) takes it to be the same as the Adiabas of Ammianus (xxiii. 6); but the Adiabas is more likely to be that elsewhere called the Zabatus (now Záb).
[V.]
TORNATES, an Aquitanian people, whose name is presersed in Pliny (iv. 19). There is no indiration of their position, unless it be the name Tournai, a small town on the Arras, a branch of the Adour, and in the diocese of Tarbes, which, under the name of Turba, was the chief place of the Bigerriones. [Bigerriones.]
TORONAICUS SINUS. [Torone.]
TORO'NE (Topávi: Eth. Topavaios), a town of Chalcidice in Macedonia, situated upon the SW. coast of the peninsula of Sithonia. It was said to have derived its name from Torone, a daughter of Proeteus or Puseidon and Phoenice. (Steph. B. s. v. Topóvn.) It was a Greek colony, founded by the Chalcidians of Euboea, and appears to have been originally the chief settlement of the Chalcidians in these parts. Hence the gulf lying between the peninsulas of Sithonia and Torone was generally called the Toronaean, now the Gulf of Kassándhra.
 iii. 13. § 13; Topwиıкдs кбллоs, Strab. vii. p. 330; Scymn. Ch. 640; Toronaicum mare, Liv. xliv. 11; Toronaeus sinus, Tac. Ann. v. 10.) Like the other Greek cities in these parts, Torone furnished ships and men to the ariny of Xerxes in his invasion of Greece. (Herod. vii. 122.) After the Persian War Torone came under the dominion of Athens. In b.c. 424 a party in the town opened the gates to Brasidas, but it was retaken by Cleon two years afterwards. (Thnc. iv. 110, seq., v. 2.) At a later time it seems to have been subject to Olynthus, since it was recovered by the Athenian general Tinotheus. (Diodor. xv. 81.) It was annexed by Philip, along with the other Chalcidian cities, to the Macedonian empire. (I)iodor. xvi. 53.) In the war against Persens, в. c. 169, it was attacked by a Roman fleet, but without success. (Liv. xliv. 12.) Theophrastus related that the Eqyptian bean grew in a marsh near Torone (ap. Athen. iii. p. 72, d.); and Archestratus mentions a particular kind of fish, for which Torone was celebrated (ap. Athen. vii. p. 310, c.). The harbour of Torone was called Cophos (K $\omega \phi$ ós), or "deaf," because being separated from the sea by two narrow passages, the moise of the waves was never heard there: hence the proverb ксоф́́тєpus toû Topovalov $\lambda_{1} \mu$ évos. (Strab. vii. p. 330; Mela, ii. 3; Zenob. Prov. Graec. cent. iv. pr. 68.) This port is apparently the same as the one called by Thucydides (v. 2) the harbour of the Colophonians, which he describes as only a little way from the city of the Toronaeans. Leake conjectures that we ought perhaps to read $K \omega \phi \hat{\omega} \nu$ instead of Ko入oф $\omega \nu i(\omega \nu$. It is still called Kufó, and Tomne likewise retains its ancient name. (Leake, Northern Greece, vol. iii. pp. 119, 155, 455.)

TORYNE (Topúvn, Plut. Ant. 62; Topávn, Ptol. iii. 14. § 5), a town of Thesprotia in Epeirus, off which the fleet of Augustus was moored a short time before the battle of Actium, seems from the orter of the names in Ptolemy to have stood in one of the bays between the mouth of the river Thyamis and Sybota, probably at Parga. (Leake, Nurthern Greece, vol. i. p. 103, vol. iii. p. 8.)

TOXANDRI. These inhabitants of North Gallia are first mentioned by Pling (iv. 17) in a passage which has been interpreted several ways. Pliny's Belgica is limited on the north by the Scaldis (Schelde). [Galila Trans., Vol. I. p. 960.] Pling says: "A Scaldi incolunt extera Tuxaudri ${ }^{\text {pluribus }}$ nominibus. Deinde Menapii, Morini." D'Anville and others explain "extera" to signify begond the limits of the Schelde, that is, north and east of this boundary; and Claver places the Toxandri in the islands of Zeeland. D'Anviile supposes that they took a part of their territory from the Menapii, and that this newly acquired country was the Campen north of Brabant and the bishopric of Liège. This conjecture is supposed to be confirmed by the passage of Ammianus Marcellinus (xvii. 8), in which he says that Julian marched against the Franci named Salii, who had dared to fix themselves on Roman ground "apud Toxiandriam locum." The geographers who are best acquainted with the Netherlands fix Toxiandri locus at Tessender Lo, a small place in the Campen to the north of Brabant. Ukert (Gallien, p. 372) gires a different meaning to the word "extera." He remarks that Pliny, describing the north coast of Europe (iv. 14), says: "Toto autem hoc mari ad Scaldim usque fluvium Germanicae accolunt gentes," and he then enumerates the peoples as far as the Scaldis. Afterwards (c. 17) he adds "a Scaldi incolunt," \&c.; and a few lines further, a word a introrsus" is opposed to this "extera"; from which Ukert concludes that "extera" here means the coast country, a meaning which it has in two other passages of Pliny (ii. 67, iv. 13). After describing the nations which occupy the "extera," or coast, Pliny mentions the peoples in the interior, and in the third place the Germanic peoples on the Rhine. Accordingly Ukert concludes that we must look for the Toxandri in the neighbourhood of Ghent and Bruyes.

TRACANA (Tpdкava, Ptol. iii. 5. § 27), an inland city of European Sarmatia. [T. H. D.]

TRACHIS or TRACHIN (Tpayis, Herod., Thuc., et alii; Tpaxiv, Strab.: Eth. Tpaxivios). 1. A city of Malis, in the district called after it Trachinia. It stood in a plain at the foot of Mt. Oeta, a little to the N. or rather W. of Thermopylae, and derived its name from the rocks which surrounded the plain. It commanded the approach to Thermopylae from Thessaly, and was, from its position, of great military importance. (Herod. vii. 176; Strab. ix. p. 428; Steph. B. s. v.) The entrance to the Trachinian plain was only half a plethrum in breadth, but the surface of the plain was 22,000 plethra, according to Herodotus. The same writer states that the city Trachis was 5 stadia from the river Melas, and that the river Asopus issued from a gorge in the mountains, to the $S$. of Trachis. (Herod. vii. 198.) According to Thucydides, Trachis was 40 stadia from Thermopylae and 20 from the sea (Tbuc. iii. 92.) Trachin is mentioned in Homer as one of the cities subject to Achilles (Il. ii. 682), and is celebrated in the legends of Hercules as the scene of this bero's death. (Suph. Trach. passim.) It became a place of historical importance in consequence of the colo:y founded here by the Lacedaemonians in the sixth year of the Peloponnesian War. b. c. 426. The Trachinians and the neighbouring Dorians, who suffered much from the predatory incursions of the Oetaean mountaineers, solicited aid from the Spartans, who eagerly availed themselves of this opportunity to plant a strong colony in this commanding situation. They issued an invitation to the other states of Greece to joiu in the colony; and as many as 10,000 colonists, under three Spartan oecists, built and fortified a new town, to which the name of Heraclein was given, from the great hero, whose name was so closely associated with the surrounding district. (Thuc. iii. 92; Diod. xii. 59.) It was asually called the Trachinian Heracleia, to distin. guish it from other places of the same name, and by later writers Heracleia in Phthiotis, as this district was subsequently included in the Thessalian Phthiotis. ('Нраклеса 方 ev Tpaxıviq, Xen. Hell. i. 2. § 18: Diod. xii. 77, xv. 57 ; 'Нракле $\mathrm{\omega}$ тая ol iv Tpaxivi, Thuc. v. 51 ; 'H. ท̀ Tpaxiv кa入ounév $\pi \rho \delta \tau \in \rho o v$, Strab. ix. p. 428; Heraclea Trachin dicta, Plin. iv. 7. s. 14 ; H. $\phi \theta$ túriöos, Ptol. iii. 13. § 46.) The new colonists also built a port with docks near Thermopylae. It was generally expected that this city, under the protection of Sparta, would become a formidable power in Northern Greece, but it was attacked from the beginning by the Thessaliaus, who regarded its establishment as an invasion of their territory; and the Spartans, who rarely succeeded in the government of dependencies, dhplayed haughtiness and corruption in its administration. Hence the city rapidly dwindled down ; and in B. c. 420 the Heracleots were defeated with great loss by the neighbouring Thessalian tribes, and Xenares, the Lacedaemonian governor, was slain in the battle. Sparta was unable at the time to send assistance to their colony; and in the following year the Boeotians, fearing leat the place should fall into the hands of the Athenians, took possession of it, and dismissed the Lacedaemonian governor, on the ground of misconduct. (Thuc. v. 51, 52.) The Lacedaemonians, however, regained possession of the place; and in the winter of B. C. 409-408, they experienced bere another disaster, 700 of the Heracleots being slain in battle, together with the Lacedaemonian harmost. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. § 18.) But, after the Peloponnesian War, Heracleia again rose into importance, and became the head-quarters of the Spartan power in Northern Greece. In B. c. 399 Herippidas, the Lacedaemonian, was sent thither to repress some factious movements in Heracleia; and he not only put to death all the opponents of the Lacedaemonians in the town, bat expelled the neighbouring Oetaeans and Trachinians from their abodes. (Diod. xiv. 38; Polyzen. ii. 21.) In B. c. 395 the Thebans, under the command of Ismenias, wrested this important place from the Spartans, killed the Lacedacinonian garrison, and gave the city to the old Trachinian and Oetaean inhabitants. (Diod. xiv. 82.) The walls of Heracleia were destroyed by Jason, lest any wtate should seize this place and present him from marching into Greece. (Xen. Hell. vi. 4. § 27.) At a later time Heracleis came into the hands of the Aetolians, and was one of the main sources of their power in Northern Greece. After the defeat of Antiochus at Thermopylae, B. c. 191, Heracleia was besieged by the Roman consul Acilius Glabrio, who divided his army into four bodies, and directed his attacks upon four points at once; one body being stationed on the river Asopus, where was the gymnaxium ; the second near the citadel outside of the walls (extra muros), which was almost more thickly inhabited than the city itself; the thind towards the Maliac gulf; and the fourth on the river Melas, opposite the temple of Diana. The country around was marshy, and abounded in lofty trees. After a siege of twenty-four days the Romans succeeded in taking the town, and the Aetolians retired to the citadel. On the following day the consul seized a rocky summit, equal to the citadel in height, and separated from it only by a chasm so narrow that the two summits were within reach of a missile. Thereupon the Aetolians surrendered the citadel. (Liv. xxxvi. 24.) Leake remarks that it seems quite clear from this account of Livy that the city occapied the low ground between the rivers Karvunariá (Asopas) and Mavra-Néria (Melas), extending from the one to the other, as well as a considerable distance into the plain in a south-eastern direction. There are still some vestiges of the citadel upon a lofty rock above; and upon its perpendicular sides there are many catacombs excavated. "The distance of the citadel above the town justifies the words extra muros, which Livy applies to it, and may explain also the assertion of Strabo (l. c.). that Heracleia was six stadia distant from the ancient Trachis; for, although the town of Heracleia seems to have occupied the same position as the Trachis of Herodotus, the citadel, which, according to Livy, was better inhabited in the Aetolian War than the city, may very possibls have been the only inhabited part of Heracleia two centaries later." (Leake, Northern Greece, vol ii. pp. 26-29.)

2. Surnamed Phocica ( $\boldsymbol{\eta}$ Фwonch), a small city of Phocis, situated upon the confines of Boeotia, and on the road to Lebadeia. (Strab. ix. p. 423 ; Paus. x. 3. § 2.)

TRACHONI'TIS (Tpaxayitis, Luke, iii. 1; Joseph. Ant. xvi. 9, B. J. iii. 3; Plin. v. 18. s. 16; T $\rho$ ¿ $\chi \infty \nu$, Joseph. Ant. xiii. 16), according to Josephus, a portion of Palestine which extended in a NE direction from the neighbourhood of the sea of Galilee in the direction of Damascus, having the Syrian desert and Auranitis on its eastern frontier, Ituraea on the S ., and Gaulanitis on the W. It was considered as the northern portion of Peraea (Itpaia, i. e. חépav rov̂ 'Iopסavov, Judith, i. 9; Matth. ir. 25.) According to Strabo, it lay between Damascus and the Arabian mountains (xvi. p. 755); and from other authorities we may gather that it adjoined the province of Batanaea (Joseph. B. J. i. 20. § 4), and extended between the Regio Decapolitana (Plin. v. 15) as far S. as Bostra (Euseb. Onomast. s. -. Ituraea.) It derived its name from the rough nature тónos); and Strabo mentions two tpaxâves (xvi. p. 755, 756), which Burckhardt considers to be the summits of two mountain ranges on the road from Mekka to Damascus, near the village of Al-Kesence. (Travels, p. 115.) The inhabitants of Trachonitis are called by Ptolemy, oi TpaX $\bar{\nu} \boldsymbol{\nu}$ § 26), and they seemed to have maintained their character for remarkable skill in shooting with the bow and plundering (Joseph. B. J. ii. 4. § 2), for which the rocky nature of the country they inhabited, full as it was of clefts, and boles and secret fastnesses, was peculiarly well suited (Joseph. Ant xv. 10. § 1.) Trachonitis belonged originally to the tetrarchy of Philippus, the son of Herod the Great (Joseph. Ant. x xii. 8. § 1, B. J. ii. 6. § 3); but it subsequently formed part of the dominion of Herodes Agrippa. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. § 10, B. J. iii. 3. § 5; Philo, Opp. ii. p. 593.)

The whole district has been recently explored and examined with much care and judgment by the Rev. J. L. Porter of Damascus, who has shown that the ancient accounts of this province, properly weighed, coincide with remarkable accuracy with what we know of it now. According to him, it must have been to the NW. of Batanaea, and have extended alon; the stony tract at the base of the Jebel Haurán, as Kenath (now Kunawát) was a city of Trachon (Euseb. Onomast. 8. v. Canath), while the Targums extend it, though improbably, as far $S$. as Bumtra. Mr. Porter observes that the name is sometimes applied in a more general sense by ancient writers, so as to include the neighbouring provinces (as in Lube, iii. 1, where the "Region of Trachonitis" must be understood as embracing Batanaea and Auranitis; Joseph. Ant. xvii. 14. § 4.) He thinks, too, that the plain on the western side as far as the Hüj road was embraced in Trachonitis, and likewise that on the north to the Jebel Khiyirah, with a considerable section of the plain on the east, N. of Ard-al-Bathanyeh. The Argob of Numb. xxxiv. 15, 1 Kings, iv. 13, &cc., Mr. Porter considers to be the same district as Trachonitis, the latter being the Greek rendering of the Hebrew form. (Porter, Five Years in Damascus, ii. pp. 259-262, 268-272; Robinson, iii. p. 907; Russegger, iii. p. 279; Winer, Bibl. Realioörterbuch.)

TRAELIUS. [Tragilits.]

TRAENS or TRAÏS (Tpáels or Tpdevs, -evtos: Trionto), a river of Bruttium celebrated for the sanguinary defeat of the Sybarites on its banks by their rivals the Crotoniats, which led to the destruction of the city of Sybaris, в. c. 510. (lambl. Vit. I'yth. § 260.) It is singular that the banks of a stream which had been the scene of such a catastrophe should be again selected by the remnant of the Sybarites who were expelled from the new colony of Thurii shortly after its foundation [Thurir] for the site of their settlement. They, however, did not remain long, being expelled and put to the sword by the neighbouring barbarians, whom Diodorus by a remarkable anachronism calls Bruttians, apparently within a few years of their establishment. (Diod. zii. 22.) The name of the river is not found in any of the geographers, but there can be little doubt of its being the one still called the Trionto, which falls into the gulf of Tarentum a few miles E. of Rossano, and gives name also to an adjoining headland, the Capo di Trionto.

TRA'GIA (Tpayia), also called Tragiae (Tparías), Tragia, Tragaeae (Tparaiau), or Tragaea (Tparafa), a small island off the south coast of Samos, near which Pericles, in b. c. 440, defeated the Samians in a naval ongagement. (Thucyd. i. 116; Plin. iv. 71, v. 135; Plut. Per. 25; Strab. xiii. p. 635 ; Steph. B. s. v. Tparaia.) Respecting the Tragasaeae Salinae, see Halesion.

marked as 10 miles from Philippi. This is apparently a corruption of "Travio," since numeruus coins (one of which is figured below) have been found near Amphipolis with the inscription TRAIMI $\Omega$ N. Leake conjectures with much probability that the real name was Tragilus, and that in the local form of the name the $\Gamma$ may have been omitted, so that the TPAIAIIN of the coin may represent the Hellenic Tpari入iov. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 81 ; Leake, Nurthern Greece, vol. iii. p. 228.)

COIN OF TRAGILUS OR TRAELIUS.
TRAGU'RIUM (T payoúpiov, Strab., Ptol.; Tparupiov, Polyb.), an important town of Dalmatia, situated upon an island, which was separated from the mainland by an artificial canal. According to the Antonine Itinerary, it was distunt 16 miles from Pratorium and 13 from Salonae. Pliny calls it "Tragurium civium Komanorum," and says that it was celebrated for its marble. Its name is preserved in the-modern Trau. (Polyb. xxxii. 18 ; Strab. ii. p. 124, vii. p. 315 ; Ptol. ii. 17. § 14 ; Plin. iii. 22. 8. 26 ; Mela, ii. 3 ; It. Ant. p. 272 ; Tab. Peut.; Geogr. Rav. iv. 16.)

TRAGUS. [Caphyar.]
TRAIA CAPITA (Itin. Ant. p. 399), more correctly Tria Capita (Geog. Rav. v. 3), since it lay near the three mouths of the Iberus, a town of the Cosetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, between Dertosa and Tarraco. Variously identified with Tivisa and Torre del Aliga.

TRAJA'NI MUNIMENTUM, a fort or castle built by Trajan on the southern bank of the river Moenus, not far from its junction with the Rhenus. (Amm. Marc. xvii. 1.) The site is uncertain, nor is it known what the Munimentum really was. [L. S.] TRAJA'NI PORTUS. [OstIA.]
TRAJANO'POLIS (Tpaiavonodis), a town in Mysia, in the district occupied by the tribe of the Thraemenothyritae, on the frontiers of Phrygia. (Ptol. v. 2. §§ 14, 15.) The Cilician city of Solinus also for a time bore the name of Trajanopolis. [Seinnus.]
[L. 8.]
TRAJANO'POLIS (Tpaiavóтоגıs), an important town in the S. of Thrace, which was probably founded by or in honour of the emperor Trajan, abont the time when Plotinopolis was founded, to perpetuate the name of his wife Plotina. Its exact site appears to be somewhat doubtful. Some authorities describe it as situated on the right bank of the Hebrus, near the pass in the range of Mount Rhodope, through which that river flows, and about 40 miles from its mouth. Now this is the site of the modern Orikhova, with which accordingly it is by some identified. It would be difficult, however, to reconcile this with the various distances given in the Itineraries: e. g. Trajanopolis is stated to be 9000 paces from Tempyra, and 29,000 from Cypsela; whereas the site above mentioned is nearly equidistant from those assigned to Tempyra and Cypsela, being, however, more distant from the former. But this is only one example out of many showing how extremely imperfect is our knowledge of the geography of Thrace, both ancient and modern. In the map of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge Trajanopolis is placed on the Egnatian Way at a considerable dis－ tance W．of the Hebrus，and at a point which fulfils tolerably well the conditions of distance from the two places above mentioned．

Trajanopolis became the capital of the province of Rhodope，and continued to be a place of importance until the fourth century．It is remarkable，how－ ever，that it is not mentioned by Ammianus in his general description of Thrace（xxvii．4）；according to him，the chief cities of Rhodope were Maximiano－ polis，Maroneia，and Aenus．（Ptol．iii．11．§ 13 ； Hierocl．p． 631 ：Procop．de Aed．iv． 11 ；Const． Porph．de Caerim．ii． 54 ；Cantacuz．i．38，iii． 67. et alibi ；It．Ant．pp．175，322，332， 333 ；It． Hier．p． 602 ；Geog．Rav．iv． 6 ；cf．Mannert，vii． p．224．）

TRA'PEZLCS (T $\rho a \pi \epsilon \zeta$ Sous: Eth. Tpanє!̧óvtios: now Tarabosan or Trebizond), an important city on the coast of Pontus, on the slope of a hill, 60 stadia to the east of Hermonassa, in the territory of the Macrones (Anon. Peripl. P.E. p. 13), was a colony founded by the Sinopians, who formed many establishments on this coast. (Xenoph. Anab. iv. 8. §22; Arrian, Peripl. P. E. pp. 1, 3, 6; Scylax, p. 33.) It derived its name probably from its form, being situated on an elevated platform, as it were a table above the sea; though the town of Trapezus in Arcadia pretended to be the mother-city of Trapezus in Pontus (Paus. viii. 27. § 4). Trapezus was already a flourishing town when Xenophon arrived there on his memorable retreat; and he and his men were most hospitably treated by the Trapezuntians. (Xen. Anab. v. 5. § 10.) At that time the Colchians were still in possession of the territory, but it afterwards was occupied by the Macrones. The real greatnevs of Trapezus, however, seems to have commenced under the dominion of the Komans. Pliny (vi. 4) calls it a free city, a distinction which it bad probably obtained from Pompey during his war against Mithridates. In the reign of Hadrian, when Arrian visited it, it was the most important city on the south coast of the Euxine, and Trajan had before made it the capital of Pontus Cappadocicus, and provided it with a larger and better harbour. (Arrian, Peripl. P. E. p. 17; comp. Tac. Ann. xiii. 39, Hist. iii. 47 ; Pomp. Mela, i. 19: Strab. vii. pp. 309, 320, xi. p. 499, xii. p. 548; Steph. B. 8. v.) Henceforth it was a strongly fortified commercial town; and although in the reign of Gallienus it was sacked and burnt by the Goths (Zosim. i. 33; Eustath. ad Dion. Per. 687), it continued to be in such excellent condition, that in the reign of Justinian it required but few repairs. (Procop. de Aed iii. 7.) From the Notitia Imperii (c. 27) we learn that Trupezas was the station of the first Pontian legion and its staff. Sone centuries later $a$ branch of the imperial house of the Comneni declared themselves indeperdent of the Greek Empire, and made Trapezus the seat of their principality. This small principality maintained its independence even for some time after the fall of Constantinople; but being too weak to resist the overwhelming power of the Turks, it was obliged, in A. D. 1460, to submit to Mohammed II., and has ever since that time been a Turkish town. (Chalcond. ix. p. 263, foll.; Duc. 45; comp. Gibbon, Decline, c. xlviii. foll.) The port of Trapezus, called Daphnus, was formed by the acropolis, which was built on a rock running out into the sea. (Anon. Peripl. P. E. p. 13.) The city of Trebizond is still one of the most flourishing commercial cities of Asia Minor, but it contains no ancient remains of any interest, as most of them belong to the period of the Lower Empire. (Tournefort, Voyage au Levant, iii., lettre 17, p. 79, foll.; Fontanier, Voyages dans l'Orient, p. 17-23; Hamilton's Researches, i. p. 240.) The coins of Trapezus all belong to the imperial period, and extend from the reign of Trajan to that of Philip. (Eckhel, i. 2. p. 358; Sestini, p. 60.) [L.S.]

TRA'PEZU'S (Tpane§oûs, -oûytos: Eth. TpaneSoivetos), a town of Arcadia in the district Parrhasia, a little to the left of the river Alpheius, is said to have derived its name from its founder Trapezeus, the son of Lycaon, or from trapeza ( $\tau \rho \alpha \pi \in \zeta \alpha$ ), "a table," because Zeus here overturned the table on which Lycaon offered him human food. (Pans. viii. 3. §§ 2,3; Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.) It was the royal residence of Hippothous, who transferred the seat of government from Tegea to Trapezus. On the foundation of Megalopolis, in B. c. 371 , the inhabitants of Trapezus refused to remove to the new city ; and having thus ineurred the anger of the other Arcadians, they quitted Peloponnesus, and took refuge in Trapezus on the Pontus Euxeinus, where they were received as a kindred people. The statues of some of their gods were removed to Megulopulis, where they were seen by Pausanias. Trapezus stood above the modern Mavrid. (Paus. viii. 5. §4, 27. §§ 4-6, viii. 29. § 1, 31. §5; Herod. vi. 127 ; Steph. B. s. v.; Leake, Morea, vol. ii. p. 292; Ross, Reisen im Pehoponnes, vol. i. p. 90.)

TRAPEZUS MONS. [Taurica Chersonesus.]
TRA'RIUM (T $\rho \alpha \alpha^{\rho}(o y$ ), a town of Mysia, mentioned by Strabo in conjunction with Perperena (xiii. p. 607.) Tzetzes (ad Lycophr. 1141, 1159) mentions a mountain named Traron (T $\rho$ d $\rho o \omega \nu$ ) in the Troad.

TRASIMENUS LACUS* ( $\dot{\eta}$ Tpa $\sigma o u \mu$ év $\nu a$ or Lago di Perugia), one of the most extensive and important of the lakes of Etruria, situated between Cortona and Perusia. It is the largest of all the lakes of Etruria, being above 10 miles in length by 8 in breadth: and differs from all the other considerable lakes of that country in not being of volcanic origin. It is merely formed in a depressed basin, surrounded on all sides by hills of moderate elevation, and having no natural outlet. The hills on the N. side of the lake, which extend from Crotona to Perusia, are considerably more elevated than those that form the other sides of the basin, but even these scarcely rise to the dignity of mountains. The lake itself is of small depth, nowhere exceeding 30 feet, and its banks are almost everywhere low, flat, and covered with reeds. No considerable town was situated on its shores: Perusia, from which it derives its modern name of the Lago di Perugia, stands on a lofty hill about 10 miles to the E. of it; Clusium is situated about 9 miles to the SW. and Cortona between 6 and 7 to the NW. The highroad from Arretium to Perusia followed the northern shore of the lake for a considerable distance.

The lake Trasimenus derives its chief celebrity from the great victory obtained upon its shores by Hannibal over the Roman consul, C. Flaminius, B. c. 217, one of the greatest deferts sustained by the Roman arms during the whole course of their history. The circumstances of this battle are more clearly related and more readily understood with reference to the actual localities than those of any of the other great battles of Hannibal. The Carthaginian general, after crossing the Apennines, and effecting his toilsome march through the marshes of Etruria, had encamped in the neighbourhood of Faesulae (Pol. iii. 80, 82). Flaminius was at this time posted with his army at Arretium, and Hannibal, whose object was to draw him into a general battle, moved along the upper valley of the Arnus, and passing within a short distance of the consul's camp, advanced along the road towards Rome (i. e. by Perusia), laying waste the country as he advanced. Flaminius on this hastily broke up his camp, and followed the Carthaginian arny. Hannibal had already passed the city of Cortona on his left, and was advancing along the N. shore of the lake, which lay on his right hand, when, learning that Flaminius was following him, he determined to balt and await his attack, taking adrantage of the strong position which offered itself to him. (Pol. iii. 82; Liv. xxii. 4.) The hills which extend from Cortona to the lake, called by Livy the " montes Cortonenses," and now known as the Monte Gualandro, descend completely to the bank of the lake, or at least to the marshes that border it, at a point near the NW. angle of the lake, now marked by a village and a round tower called Borghetto. This spar of the hills completely separates the basin of the lake from the plains below Cortona, and it is not until after surmounting it that the traveller by the modern road comes in sight of the lake, as well as of the small plain or valley, shut in between its N. shore and the Gualandro, which was the actual scene of the catastrophe. "Arrived at the highest point of the road, the traveller has a partial view of the fatal plain, which opens fully upon him as he descends the Gualandro. He soon finds himself in a vale, enclosed to the left, and in front, and behind him by the Gualandro hills, bending round in a segment larger than a semicircle, and running down at each end to the lake, which obliques to the right and forms the chord of this mountain arc. The position cannot be guessed at from the plains of Cortona, nor appears to be so completely enclosed, unless to one who is fairly within the hills. It then indeed appears a place made as it were on purpose for a snare, 'locus insidiis natus.' (Liv. xxii. 4.) Borghetto is then found to stand in a narrow marshy pass close to the hill and to the lake, whilst there is no other outlet at the opposite turn of the mountains than through the little town of Passignano, which is pushed into the water by the foot of a high rocky acclivity. There is a woody eminence branching down from the mountains into the upper end of the plain nearer to the site of Passignano, and on this stands a village called

From this description of the localities by an eyowitness, which agrees almost exactly with that given by Livy (xxii. 4), the details of the battle are rendered perfectly clear. Hannibal occupied the hill last-mentioned with the main body of his troops, his heavy-armed African and Spanish infantry, while he sent round his light-armed troops to occupy the slopes of Monte Gualandro on his right, so as to threaten the left flank of the advancing Roman army, while he posted his cavalry and the Gaulish troops on the hills on the left between Borghetto and the present road. Flaminius advanced the next morning almost before daylight, while a thick fog rising from the lake still further concealed the position of the enemy. He therefore advanced through the pass, in ignorance of the bodies of troops that hung upon both his flanks, and, seeing only the array in front on the hill of Tuoro, began to draw up his forces for battle in the plain in front of them. But before he was able to commence the engagement, he found himself suddenly attacked on all sides at once: the surprise was complete, and the battle quickly became a mere promiscuons massacre. Flaminius himself fell early in the day, and numbers of the Roman troops were driven into the lake, and either perished in its waters or were put to the sword by the enemy's cavalry. A body of abont 6000 men haring forced their way through the enemy, occupied a hill on which there stood an Etruscan village, but finding themselves wholly isolated, surrendered the next day to Maharbal. Sixteen thousand Roman troops perished in this disastrous battle: the site of the chief slaughter is still marked by a little rivulet which traverses the plain, and is known at the present day by the name of the Sanguineto.* (Hobhouse, l.c.) The details of the battle are given by Polybius (iii. 83, 84) and Livy (xxii. 4-6). It is remarkable that in this instance the localities are much more clearly and accurately described by Livy than by Pulybius: the account given by the latter author is not incompatible with the existing local details, but would not be easily understood, unless we were able to correct it by the certainty that the battle took place on this particular spot. The narratives of Appian and Zonaras add nothing to our knowledge of the battle. (Appian, Annib. 9, 10; Zonar. viii. 25.) Numervus allusions to and notices of the memorable slaughter at the lake of Trasimene are fuund in the later Roman writers, but they have preserved no additional circumstances of interest. The well-known story related by Livy, as well as by Pliny and later writers, that the fury of the combatants rendered them unconscions of the shock of an earthquake, which occurred during the battle, is easily understood without any prodigy, such shocks being frequently very local and irregular phenomena. (Plin. ii. 84. s. 86, xv. 18. s. 20 ; Cic. de N. D. ii. 3,

* The name of Ossaja, a village on the road from Cortona to the lake, has been thought to be also connected with the slaughter of the battle, but this is very improbable. Oseaja is several miles distant from the lake, and on the other side of the hills. (Hobhouse, h.c.) It is probable moreorer that the modern name is only a corruption of Orsaja or Orsaria (Niebuhr, Lectures, rol. ii. p. 102.)

The lake is now commonly known as the Lago di Perugia, though frequently called on maps and in guide-books the Lago Trasimeno. [E. H. B.]

ThAUSI (Tpaugoi, Herod. v. 3, 4; Thrausi, Liv. xxxviii. 41), a Thracian people, who appear, in later times at least, to have occupied the SE. offshoots of Mount Rhodope, to the W. of the Hebrus, and about Tempyra. Herodotus tells us that the Trausi entertained peculiar notions respecting human life, which were manifested in appropriate customs. When a child was born, his kinsfolk, sitting around him, bewailed his lot in having to encounter the miseries of inortal existence; whereas when any one died, they buried him with mirth and rejoicing, declaring him to have been freed from great evils, and to be now in perfect bliss.*

As to the Thrausi spoken of by Livy, see TemPTRA.

Suidas and Hesychius (s. v.) mention a Scythian tribe called the Trausi, who, according to Steph. B. (s. v.), were the same people as the Agathyrsi. The lest-named author speaks of a Celtic race also, bearing this appellation. On this slight foundation the strange theory has been built that the Thracian Trausi were the original stock of the Celts; and by way of supporting this notion, its propounders arbitrarily read Tpavooi instead of חpav̄бoc in Strabo, iv. p. 187, where Strabo expressly says that he was unable to state what was the original abode of the Prausi: had he been writing about the Thracian Trausi we may safely assume that no such ignorance would have been acknowledged. TREBA or TRE'BIA. 1. (Eth. Trebias, àtis: Trevi), a municipal town of Umbria, situated at the western foot of the Apennines, between Fulginium and the sources of the Clitumnus, about 4 miles from the latter. It is mentioned by Pliny among the manicipal cities of Umbria, and its name is found in an inscription among the "xv Populi Umbriae:" in both these authorities the name of the people is written Trebiates. The Jerusalem Itinerary, which places it on the Via Flaminia, 4 miles from Sacraria (at the sources of the Clitumnus) and 5 from Fulginium, writes the name Trevis, thus approximating closely to the modern name of Trevi. The modern town is still a considerable place standing on a hill which rises abruptly from the valley of the Clitumnus. (Plin. iii. 14. s. 19; Itin. Hier. p. 613; Orell. Inscr. 98).
2. (Tphba, Ptol.: Eth. Trebanus: Treci), a city of Latiom, in the upper valley of the Anio, abont 5 miles from the sources of that river and 10 above Subiaco. It is mentioned both by Pliny and Ptolemy, as well as by Frontinus, who calls it Treba Augusta (Plin. iii. 5. s. 9; Ptol. iii. 1. § 62; Fron-[^47]tin. de Aquaed. 93); and in an inscription, which proves it to have been a town of municipal rank under the Roman Empire. (Orell. Inscr. 4101.) But its narce is not mentioned in history, and it was apparently never a place of importance, for which its secluded position is alone sufficient to account. The ancient name and site are retained by the modern village of Trevi, a poor place, surrounded on all sides by lofty mountains.

TRE'BIA ( $\delta$ T $\rho \in$ Bíus: Trebbia), a considerable river of Gallia Cispadana, falling into the Padus about 2 miles W. of Placentia. From its proximity to the latter city Pliny designates it as "Trebias Placentinus." (Plin. iii. 16. s. 20; Strab. v. p. 217.) It has its sources in the Ligurian Apennines near Montebruno, and has a course of above 50 miles from thence to the Po. Throughout the greater part of this course it flows through a mountain valley, passing under the walls of Bobbio (celebrated in the middle ages for its convent, from which some of the most valuable MSS. of ancient authors have been derived), and does not emerge from the hills which form the underfalls of the Apennines till within about 12 miles of its mouth. For the remainder of its course it flows through the fertile plain of the Padus, and crosses the Via Aemilia about 3 miles W. of Placentia. It appears probable that the Trebia was fixed by Augustus as the western limit of the Eighth Region, and continued from that period to be regarded as the limit of Gallia Cispadana towards Liguria. This is not distinctly stated, but may probably be inferred from the circumstance that Placentia was situated in the Eighth Region, while Iria (Voghera), the next town to the W., was certainly in Liguria. (Plin. iii. 5. s. 7, 15. s. 20.) Like most of the rivers which flow from the Apennines, the Trebia varies very much according to the season: in summer it is but a scanty stream, winding through a broad bed of stones, but in winter and after heavy rains it becomes a formidable torrent.
The chief celebrity of the Trebia is derived from the battle which was fought on its banks in B.c. 218 between Hannibal and the Roman consul Sempronius, and which was the first of the decisive victories obtained by the Carthaginian general. Unfortunately the movements which preceded and led to this battle, and the exact site on which it occurred, are very difficult to determine. Scipio after his defeat on the Ticinus had recrossed the Padus and withdrawn to Placentia, where the presence of a Roman colony afforded him a secure stronghold. Hannibal on the other hand effected his passage of the Padus higher up, above its junction with the Ticinus, and then advanced along the right bank of the river, till he approached Placentia, and established his camp within 5 miles of that of Scipio. (Pol. iii. 66.) The defection of the Boian Gauls having soon after given the alarm to Scipio, he broke ap his camp and withdrew "to the hills that bordered the river Trebia." (Ib. 67.) In this movement, it is clear, from what we are told immediately afterwards that, he crossed the river Trebia (Ib. 68): his former camp therefore, though in the neighbourhood of Placentia, must have been on the W. side of the Trebia. In this new position, which was one of considerable natural strength (16.67), Scipio awaited the arrival of Sempronius with his army, who was advancing from Ariminum, and succeeded in effecting a junction with his colleague, without opposition from Hannibal. (Ib. 68.) The attention of the Carthaginian general had been apparently drawn off to the W. ; where the town of Clastidium was betrayed into his hands. Meanwhile Sempronius, who was newly arrived, after a short interval of repose, was eager for a general engagement, and his confidence was increased by a partial success in a combat of cavalry, in the plain between the Trebia and the Padus (ib. 69.) Hannibal, who on his side was equally desirous of a battle, took advantage of this disposition of Sempronius, and succeeded in drawing him out of his camp, where he conld not venture to attack him, into the plain below, which was favourable to the operations of the Carthaginian cavalry and elephants. For this purpose he sent forward a body of Numidian horse, who crossed the Trebia and approached the Roman camp, but, as soon as a body of Roman cavalry and light-armed troops were sent out against them, retreated skirmishing until they had recrossed the river. Sempronius followed with his whole army, and crossed the Trebia, not without difficulty, for the river was swollen with late rains, and was only just fordable for the infantry. His troops suffered severely from cold and wet, and when the two armies met in order of battle, early began to feel themselves inferior to the enemy : but the victory was decided by a body of 1000 foot and 1000 horse, under the command of Mago, the brother of Hannibal. which had been placed by that general in ambuscade, in the hollow bed of a stream which crossed the field of battle, and by a sudden onset on the rear of the Roman army, threw it into complete confusion. A body of about 10,000 Roman infantry succeeded in forcing their way through the centre of the enemy's line, but finding themselves isolated, and their retreat to their camp quite cut off, they directed their march at once towards Placentia, and succeeded in reaching that city in safety. The other troops were thrown back in confusion upon the Trebia, and suffered very heavy loss in passing that river; but those who succeeded in crossing it, fell back upon the boily already mentioned and made good their retreat with them to Placentia. Thither also Scipio on the following day repaired with that part of the Roman forces which had not been engaged in the battle. (Pol. iii. 70-74.)

From the riew above given of the battle and the operations that preceded it, which coincides with that of General Vaudoncourt (Campagnes dAnnibal en Italie, vol. i. pp. 93-130), it seems certain that the battle itself was fought on the left bank of the Trebia, in the plain, but a short distance from the foot of the hills; while the Roman camp was on the hills, and on the right bank of the Trebia. It is certain that this view affords much the most intelligible explanation of the operations of the armies, and there is nothing in the narrative of Polybius (which has been exclusively followed in the above account) inconsistent with it, though it must be admitted that some difficulties remain unexplained. Livy's narrative on the contrary is confused, and though based for the most part on that of Polybius, seems to be mixed up with that of other writers. (Liv. xxi. 52-56.) From his account of the retreat of the Roman army and of Scipio to Placentia after the battle, it semms certain that he considered the Roman camp to be situated on the left bank of the river, so that Scipio must necessarily cross it in order to arrive at Placentia, and therefore he must have conceived the battie as fought on the right bank : and this riew has been adopted by many modern writers, inclading Niebubr and Arnold: but the difticulties in its way preatly exceed those which arise on the contrary hypothesis. Niebubr indeed summarily disposes of some of these, by maintainiag, in opprsition to the distinct statements of Polybius, that Hannibal Land crossed the Padus below Placentia, and that Sempronins joined Scipiofrom Genus and not from Ariminam. Such arbitary assumptions as these are worthless in discussing a question, the decision of which mast rest mainly, if not entirely, on the authority of Polybius. (Niebuhr's Lectures on Roman History vol. ii. pp. 94-96; Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 94-101.) Cramer adopts the views of General Vaudoncourt. (Anct. Italy, vol. i. p. 82.)

The battle on the Trebia is alluded to by Lucan, and described by Silius Italicus : it is noticed also by all the epitonisers of Roman history ; bat none of these writers add anything to our knowledge of the details. (Lucan, ii. 46 ; Sil. Ital. ir. 484-666; Corn. Nep. Hann. 4 ; Eutrop. iii. 9 ; Oros. iv. 14 ; Flor. ii. 6. § 12.)

TREBULA (T $\rho$ gbouna: Eth. Trebulanas: Treglia), a city of Campania, situated in the district N. of the Vulturnus, in the mountain tract which extends from near Cajazzo (Calatia) to the Via Latina. Pliny terms the citizens "Trebulani cognomine Balinienses," probably to distinguish them from those of the two cities of the same name among the Sabines (Plin. iii. 5. s.9); but the Campanian town seems to have been the most considerable of the three, and is terned simply Trebula by Ptolemy, as well as by Livy. The tirst mention of the name occurs in B.c. 303, when we are told that the Trebulani received the Roman franchise at the same time with the Arpinates. (Liv. x. 1.) There seems no doubt that the Campanian city is here meant: and this is quite certain in regard to the next notice in Livy, where he tells us that the three cities of Compulteria, Trebula, and Saticula, which had revolted to Hannibal, were recovered by Fabins in B. c. 215. (Id. xxiii. 39.) The "Trehulanus ager" is mentioned also by Cicero among the fertile districts of Campania, which Kullus proposed to distribute among the poorer Roman citizens (Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 25); and we learn from Pliny that it was noted for its wines, which had rapidly risen in estimation in his day. (Plin. xiv. 6. 8. 8.) The Liber Coloniarum also mentions Trebula among the municipal towns of Campania. It appears to have received a fresh body of settlers under Augustus, but withnut attaining the rank of a colony. ( $L, i b$. Col. p. 238: Plin. iii. 5. s. 9; P'ol. iii. 1. § 68.) The site of Trebula, which was erronenusly fixed by Cluverius and some local writers to the $S$. of the Vulturnas, appears to be correctly identified by lical antiquarians with a place called Treglia or Tregghia, at the foot of the PizzoS. Salvatore, about 6 miles N. of the Vulturnus and 8 NE. of Capua. There are said to be considerable ancient remains upon the spot, which together with the resemblance of name would scem clearly to establish the position of the ancient city. (Romanelli, vol. iii. pp. 575, 576; Trutıa, Antichità Allifane. Diss. xxiii; Abeken, Mittel-Itulien, p. 99.)
[E. H. B.]
TREBULA (Tprbouna: Eth. Trebulanus), was the name of two cities or towns of the Sebines, apparently at no great distance from one another, which were called for the sake of distinction Trebula Mutusca and Trebula Sulfenas.

1. Trebela Mutusca, called by Virgil simply Mutiscae, while the full name is preserved to us by Pliny, the only author who mentions both places (" Irebulani qui cognominantur Dlutuscaei, et qui Suffenates," Plin. ri. 12. s. 17). Its site is clearly fixed at Monte Leome, sometimes called Monte Leone della Sitivina, a village about 2 miles on the right of the Via Salaria, between Osteria Nuova and Poggio S. Lorenzo. Here there are considerable ruins, including those of a theatre, of thermae or baths, and portions of the ancient pavement. Several inscriptions have also been found here, some of which hare the name of the people, " Ylebs Trebulana," "Trebulani Mutuscani," and "Trebulani Mut.," so that no doabt can remain of their attribution. (Chaupy, Maison dHorace, vol. iii. pp. 9396; Orell. Inscr. 923, 3442, 3963.) As this seems to have been much the most considerable place of the two, it is probably that meant by Strabo, who mentions Trebula without any distinctive adjunct bat in conjunction with Eretum (Strab. v. p. 228). The Liber Coloniarum also mentions a "Tribule, municipium" ( p .258 ) which is probably the same place. Martial also alludes to Trebula as situated among cold and damp mountain valleys ( v .72 ), but it is not certain which of the two places he here refers to. Virgil speaks of Mutusca as abounding in olives (" oliviferaeque Mutuscae," Aen. vii. 711), which is still the case with the neighbourhood of Monte Leome, and a village near it bears in consequence the name of Oliveto.

2. Trebula Suffenas, the name of which is known only from Piny, is of very uncertain site. Chaupy would place it at Rocca Sinibaldi, in the valley of the Turano, but this is mere conjecture. Guatiani on the other hand fixes it on a bill near Stroncone, between Kieti and Terni, where there are said to be distinct traces of an ancient town. (Chaupy, l.c.; Guattani Mon. della Sabina, vol. i. p. 190.) It is probable that the Tribula (Tpibu入a) of Dionysius, mentioned by him among the towns assigned by Varro to the Aborigines (Dionys. i. 14) may be the same with the Trebula Suffenas of Pliny. In this case we know that it could not be far from Reate.
TREIA (Eth. Treiensis: Rn. near Treja), a municipal town of Picenum, situated on the left bank of the river Potentia, about 9 miles below Septempeda (S. Severino) and 5 above Ricina. Pliny is the only gengrapher that mentions it; but it is probable that the Tpaiava of Ptolemy is only a corruption of its name. (Plin. iii. 13. s. 18; Ptol. iii. 1. § 52.) The Treienses are enumerated by Pliny among the manicipal communities of Picenum, and the municipal rank of the town is further attested by several inscriptions. (Orell. Inscr. 516, 3899.) It seems indeed to have been a considerable place. The Itinerary of Antoninus places it on the branch of the Via Flaminia which led direct to Ancona: it was 9 miles from Septempeda and 18 from Auximum. (Itin. Ant. p. 312.) Cluverius says that he could find no trace either of the place or the name; but the ruins were pointed out by Holstenius as still existing on the left bank of the rotenza, at the frot of the hill occupied by the village of Montecchio. The latter place has since adopted the ancient name of Treja, and having been augmented by the population of several neighbouring villages, is now become a considerable town. (Cluver. Ital. p. 738; Holsten. Not. al Cluv. p. 136.) [E. H. B.]

TREPONTIUM or TRIPUNTIUA, a place on the Appian Way near the entrance of the Pontine Marshes, 4 miles nearer Rome than Forum Appii. It is not mentioned as a station in the Itineraries, but we learn from an inscription of the time of Trajan that it was from thence the part of the road which was restored by that emperor began. This important work, as we are informed by another inscription, was continued for nineteen miles, a circumstance that explains the origin of the name of Decennoviem, which occurs at a later period in connection with the Pontine Marshes. Procopius calls the Decennoviom a ricer; but it is evident that it was in reality an artificial cut or canal, such as must always have accompanied the highroad through these marshes, and as we know already existed in the days of Herace from Forum Appii. The importance of this work will account for the circumstance that we find the Pontine Marshes themselves called by Cassiodorus "Decennovii Paludes." (Cassiod. Var. ii. 32, 33; Procop. B. G. i. 11.) The site of Trepontium is clearly marked at the distance of 39 miles from Rome, by the name of Torre di Treponti, together with the remains on the 3 ancient bridges, from which it derives its name (Chaupy, Maison d'Horace, vol. iii. pp. 387-392; D'Anville, Analyse de CItalie, pp. 184-187.)

The inscriptions above cited are given by Sir R. Hoare, Class. Tour, vol. i. pp. 97, 98; and by the Aboé Chaupy (b.c.). The name of Tpanbrroov, found in Strabo (v. p. 237) among the cities on the left of the Appian Way, can hardly be other than a corruption of Trepontium, but it is wholly out of place in that passage, and is supposed by Kramer to be an interpolation. [E. H. B.]

TRERES (T $\rho \hat{\eta} \rho \in s)$, a people repeatedly mentioned by Strabo, generally as a tribe of, or at least, as closely counected with, the Cimmerii, but in a few passages as Thracians. They are not named by Homer or Herodotus. Strabo was evidently undecided whether to regard them as a distinct race, or as identical with the Cimmerii, in whose company they several times made destructive inroads into Asia Minor. "The Cimmerii, whom they name Treres also, or some tribe of them, often overran the southern shores of the Euxine and the adjoining countries, sometimes throwing themselves upon the Paphlagonians, at other times upon the Phrygians, at the time when they say Midas died from drinking bull's blood. And Lygdamis led his army as far as Lydia and Ionia, and took Sardes, but perished in Cilicia. And the Cimmerii and Treres often made such expeditions. But they say that the Treres and Cubus [their leader] were at last driven ont [of Asia] by Madys, the king of the Scythians."* (Strab.i. p. 61). "Callisthenes states that Sardes was taken several times; first by the Cimmerians; then by the Treres and Lycians, as Callinus also shows; lastly in the time of Cyrus and Croesus." (Id. xiii. p. 627). "In olden times, it befel the Magnetes [the people of Magnesia on the Maeander] to be utterly destroyed by the Treres, a Cimmerian tribe." (Id. xiv. p. 647; see also xi. p. 511, sii. p. 573; Cimmerif, Vol. I. p. 623, seq.; Müller, Hist. Lit. Anc. Greece, pp. 108, 109; and cf. Herod. i. 6, 15, 16, 103.)

Various attempts have been made to fix the dates of these events; but the means of doing so appear to be wanting, and hence scholars have arrived at very different conclusions on the subject. Strabo infers from some expressions of Callinus that the destruction of Sardes preceded that of Magnesia, which latter occurred, he considers, after the time of that poet, and during the age of Archilochus, who alludes to it.

Thucydides (ii. 96) states that the kingdom of Sitalces was bounded on the side next to the Triballi by the Treres and Tilataei, who dwelt on the northern slope of Mount Scombrus (Scomius), and extender towards the W. as far as the river Oscius (Oescus). Whether this relative clause applies to the Treres as well as to the Tilataei is doubtful ; but the collocation of the words seems to confine it to the latter.

Strabo (i. p. 59) speaks of the Treres as dwelling with the Thracians; and says that the Treres, who were Thracians, possessed a part of the Troad after the time of Priam (xiii. p. 586).

Pliny does not mention the Treres as a Thracian people; but in the description of Macedonia (iv. 10. s. 17), says that they, with the Dardani and Pieres, dwelt on its borders ; it is not clear, however, which borders are meant. (Cf. Theopom. Frag. 313, where they are called Tpâpes; and Steph. B. p. 664, where also a district of Thrace inhabited by them is named Tpŷpos.)

It is possible that these Thracian Treres were the descendants of a body of the Cimmerian Treres, left N. of the Haemus when the main body advanced to Asia Minor: for there can be little doubt that Niebuhr's view respecting the course of their inroads is correct. "The general opinion, which is presupposed in Herodotus also, is that the Cimmerians invaded Asia Minor from the E., along the coasts of the Euxine. But it would seem that, on the contrary, they came through Thrace, for they make their first appearance in Ionia and Lydia. The former road is almost entirely impassable for a nomadic people, as the Caucasus extends to the very shores of the Eurine." (lect. Anc. Hist. i. p. 32, note.)

In confirmation of the conjecture above made, we may refer to the parallel case mentioned by Caesar (B. G. ii. 29), that the Aduatuci, a Belgian tribe, were the descendants of the 6000 men whom the Cimbri and Teutoni, on their march towards Italy, left behind them W. of the Rhine, to guard that part of their property which they were unable to take with them any farther.

TRERUS (Tpñpos, Strab.: Sacco), a river of Latium, and one of the principal tributaries of the Liris (Garigliano), into which it discharges its waters close to the ruins of Fabrateria. (Strab. v. p. 237.) Its name is mentioned only by Strabo, bat there is no doubt of its identification: it is still called the

TRETUM.

Tolero in the lower part of its course, near its junction with the Garigliano, but more commonly known as the Sacco. It has its sourres in the elevated plain which separates the mountains about Praeneste from the Volscian group; and the broad valiey through which it flows for above 40 miles before it joins the Garigliano must always have formed a renarkable feature in this part of Italy. Throughout its extent it separates the main or central ranges of the Apennines from the outlying mans of the Monti Lepini or Volscian mountains, and hence it must, from an early pericd, have constituted one of the natural lines of communication between the plains of Latium proper (the modern Campagna di Roma) and those of Campania. After the whole district had fallen under the power of Rome it was the line followed by the great highroad called the Via Latina. [Via Latina.]

TRES ARBORES, the Three Trees, was a Mutatio or relay for horses mentioned in the Jerusalem Itin. between Vasatae and Elusa (Eause). The site is unknown.

TRES TABERNAE, was the name of a station on the Via Appia, between Aricia and Forum Appii, which is noticed not only in the Itineraries (Itim Ant. p. 107; Tab. Peut.), but by Cicero and in the Acts of the Apostles. From the former we learn that a branch road from Antium joined the Appian Way at this point (Cic. ad Att. ii. 12) ; while in the latter it is mentioned as the place where many of the disciples met St. Paul on his journey to Rome. (Acts, xuviii. 15.) It was probably therefore a village or place of some importance from the traffic on the Appian Way. Its position would appear to be clearly determined by the Antonine Itinerary, which gives 17 miles from Aricia to Tres Tabernae, and 10 from thence to Forum Appii: and it is a strong confirmation of the accuracy of these data that the distance thas obtained from Forum Appii to Rome corresponds exactly with the true distance of that place, as marked by ruins and ancient milestones. It is therefore wholly unnecessary to change the distances in the Itinerary, as proposed by D'Anville and Chaupy, and we may safely fix Tres Tabernae at a spot about 3 miles from the modern Cisterna, on the road to Terracina, and very near the commencement of the Pontine Marshes. The Abbe Chaupy himself points out the existence of ancient remains on this spot, which be supposes to be those of the station Ad Sponsas mentioned only in the Jerusulem Itinerary. It is far more likely that they are those of Tres Tabernae; if indeed the two stations be not identical, which is very probable. This situation would also certainly accord better than that proposed by Chaupy with the mention of Tres Tabernae in Cicero, who there joined the Appian Way on his road from Antiun to his Formian villa, not to Rome. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 12, 13, 14: Chaupy, Maison dHorace, vol. iii. p. 3s3; D'Anville, Analyse do IItalie, P. 195; Westphal, Rüm. Kampagne, p. 69.)

TRETA (T $\rho \dot{\eta} \boldsymbol{i}$ a. Strab. siv. p. 683), in Cyprıs, called Tpitot in the Stadiasmus Maris Magni ( p . 285, ed. TREVA (Tp $\quad$ oúa), a town of the Saxones in north-western Germany (Pol. ii. 11. § 27), which must have been situated somewhere on the Trave, but as no further details are known, it is impossible to fix its site with any degree of certainty. [L. S.]

TREVENTUM or TEREVENTLA (Eth. Treventinas, Plin.; but inscriptions have Terventinas and Tereventinas: Trivento), a town of Samnium, in the country of the Pentri, situated on the right bank of the Trinius (Trigno), not far from the frontiers of the Frentani. Its name is not noticed in history, but Pliny mentions it among the municipal towns of Samnium in his time: and we learn from the Liber Coloniarum that it received a Roman colony, apparently under the Triumvirate (Plin iii. 14. s. 17 ; Lib. Colon. p. 238). It is there spoken of as having been thrice besieged (" ager ejus ... post tertiam obsidionem adsignatus est"), probably during the Social War and the civil wars that followed; but we have no other account of these sieges; and the name is not elsewhere mentioned. But from existing remains, as well as invcriptions, it appears to have been a place of considerable importance, as well as of municipal rank. The modern Trivento, which is still the see of a bishop and the capital of the surrounding district, stands on a hill above the river Trigno, but the ruins of ancient buildings and fragments of masonry are scattered to a considerable extent through the valley below it. (Romanelli, vol. ii. p. 473.) The inscriptions which have been discovered there are given by Mommsen (Inscr. R. N. pp. 269, 270).
TREVERI or TREVIRI (T $\rho \eta o u ́ t i f o l, ~ T \rho I 6 \eta \rho o l$, Ptol.). There is authority for both forms of the name. The position of the Treviri is determined by several passages of Caesar. The Treviri bordered on the Rhine (B.G.iii. 11, iv. 10), and south of them along the Khine were the Triboci or Tribocci. The Arduenna Silva extended through the middle of the territory of the Treviri from the Rhine to the commencement of the territory of the $\operatorname{Remin}(B . G . v .3)$. The Treviri were separated from the Germans by the Rhine (B. G. vii. 63, viii. 25); the Ubii were their neighbours on the opposite side of the Rhine (B. G. vi.29,35). In Caesar's time the Treviri differed little from the Germans in their way of living and their savage temper. Tacitus remariss (de Mor. Germ. c. 28) that the Treviri and Nervii affected a Germanic origin, and it is probable that the Treviri were mixed with Germars. but Caesar supposed them to be a Gallic people. Mela (iii. 2) calls them the most renowned of the Belgae. When Hieronymus speaks of the resemblance between the language of the Gulatae of Asia and of the Treviri, he means to say that the Treviri are Galli [Galatia, Vol. I. p. 93i]. Strabo (iv. p. 194) speaks of the Nervii as being German. He says: "The Nervii are neighbours of the Treviri, and they (the Nervii) are also a German people;" which remark about the Nervii being also German does not refer to the Treviri, but to the Triboci, whom he had just spoken of as a German nation which had settled on the Gallic side of the Bhinc.

It seems impossible to determine whether Caesar includes the Treviri among the Belgae or the Celtae. Some geographers include them in the Gallia of Caessar in the limited sense, that is, in the country of the Celtae, which lay between the Garonne and the Seine, and between the Ocean and the Rhiue. If this determination is correct, the Mediomatrici also of course belong to Caesar's Gallia in the limited sense. [Mediomatrici.]

The Treviri are often mentioned by Caesar, for they had a strong body of cavalry and infantry, and often gave him trouble. From one passage (B. G. vi. 32) it appears that the Segni and Condrusi, German settlers in Gallia, were between the Treviri and the Eburones ; and the Condrusi and Eburones were dependents uf the Treviri (B. G. iv. 6). Caesar constructed his bridges over the Rhine in the territory of the Treviri (B. G. vi. 9) ; and Strabo speaks of a bridge over the Khine in the territory of the Treviri. It appears then that the Treviri occupied a large tract of country between the Moss (Maas) and the Khine, which country was intersected by the lower course of the Mosella (Mosel), for Augusta Trevirorum (Trier), on the Dlosella, was the chief town of the Treviri in the Koman imperial period and probably a town of the Treviri in Caesar's time. It is not possible to fix the exact limits of the Treviri on the Rhine, either to the north or the south. When the Germans were settled on the west side of the Rhine by Agrippa and after his time, the Treviri lost part of their territory; and some modern writers maintain that they lost all their country on the Rhine, a conclusion derived from a passage of Pliny (iv. c. 17), but a conclusion by no means certain. Another passage of Pliny, cited by Suetonius (Calig. c. 8), says that Caligula was born " in Treveris, vico Ambiatino, supra Confluentes," and this passage places the Treviri on the Rhine. Ptolemy in his geography gives the Treviri no place on the Rhine: he assigns the land on the west bank of the river to the Germania Inferior and Germania Superior. The bishopric of Trier used to extend from the Maas to the Rhine, and along the Rhine from the Ahr below Andernach as far south as Bingen. The limits of the old country of the Treviri and of the diccese may have been the same, for we find many examples of this coincidence in the geography of Gallia. The rugged valley of the Ahr would be a natural boundary of the Treviri on the north.

Tacitus gives the Treviri the name of Socii (Ann. i. 63); and in his time, and probably before, they had what the Romans called a Curia or senate. The name of the Treviri often appears in the history of the war with Civilis (Tacit. Hist. iv.). The Treviri under the Empire were in that part of Gallia which was named Belgica, and their city Augusta Trevirorum was the chief place, and under the later emperors frequently an imperial residence. [Augusta Trevirorum.]

TKEVIDON, a place in Gallia, mentioned by Sidonius Apolinaris (Propempt.), the position of which is partly determined by the fact of the poet fixing Trevidon in the mountainous region of Central France, and partly by the existence of a place named Trece on the boundary of the old province of Revergue, and on a little river named Treresel. The mountain in which the Trevesel rises (Lesperou) is the "Vicinum nimis heu! jugum Ratenis"
of Sidonius. [Ruteni.]

THIACONTASCHOENUS (Tpıanovtá $\chi$ дoıvos, Ptol. iv. 7. § 32), a district so named by Ptolemy after the analogy of the Dodecaschoenus of Egypt, and forming the most northem part of Aethiopia on the W. side of the Nile, between the cataracts of that river and the Aethiopian mountains. [T. H.D.]
 Apost. Geog. Huds. iv. p. 43), a town in Upper Morsia, at the confluence of the sources of the Oescus, and the capital of the district called in late times Dacia Interior. It was situated in a fertile phain, and its site is identified with that of some extensive ruins S. of Sophia.
[J. R.]
TRIBALLI (Tpı6aлAoi), a Thracian people which appears to have been in early times a very widely diffused and powerful race, about the Danube; but which, being pressed upon from the N. and W. by various nations, became gradually more and more confined, and at length entirely disappeared from history. Herodotus speaks of the Triballic plain, through which flow dhe river Angrus, which fell into the Brongus, a tributary of the Ister (iv. 49). This is probably the plain of Kossovo in the modern Sertia.

Thucydides states (ii. 96) that on the side of the Triballi, who were independent at the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, the territories of Sitalces were bounded by the 1 reres and Tilataei, whose W. limit was the river Oscius (Oescus), which must therefore, at that time, have been the E. frontier of the Triballi. (Cf. Plin. iii. 29, iv. 17; Strab. vii. pp. 317, 318.) Strabo (vii. p. 305) informs us that the Triballi were much exposed to the inroads of migrating hordes driven out of their own countries by more powerful neighbours, some expelled by the Scythians, Bastarnae, and Sauromatae, from the N. side of the Danube, who either settled in the islands of that river, or crossed over into Thrace; others from the $W$., set in motion by the Illyrians.

The earliest event recorded of them is the defeat which they gave to Sitalces, king of the Odrysae, who made an expedition against them, b. c. 424, in which he lost his life (Thuc.iv. 101). In b.c. 376 the Triballi crossed the Haemus, and with 30000 men advanced as far S. as the territory of Abdera, which they ravaged without opposition. On their return, however, Joaded with booty, the people of Aldera took advantage of their careless and disorderly march, to attack them, killing upwards of 2000 men. The Triballi thereupon marched back to take revenge for this losis ; and the Abderites, having been joined by some of the neighbouring Thracians, gave them battle; in the midst of which thry were deserted by their treacherous allies and, being surrounded, were slain almost to a man. The Tribails then prepared to lay siege to Abdera which would now have been quite unable to resist them for more than a very short time; but at this critical moment, Chabrias appeared before the town with the Atherian floet, which had recently defeated the Lacedaemonian fleet at Naxos. Chabrias compelled the Triballi to retire from Ahdera, and garrisoned the city when he departed. (Diod. xv. 36). In b.c. 339, Philip II.. after raising the siege of Byzantium, marched to the Danube, where he defeated the Getae, and took much booty. On his return through the country of the Triballi, the lattor posted themselves in a defile, and refused to allow the Macedonian army to pass, unless Philip gave to them a part of the plunder. A tierce batlle easued, in which Philip was severely wounded, and would have been sinin, but for his son Alexander, who threw himself before his father, and thus saved his life. The Triballi were at length defeated, and probably professed submission to Philip, so long, at least, as he was in their country.
On Alexander's accession to the throne, he thought it necessary to make his power felt by the barbarians on the frontiers of his kingdom, before he quitted Europe for his great enterprise against the Persian empire. Accordingly, in the spring of B. c. 335, he marched from Amphipolis in a northeasterly direction, at the head of a large force. In ten days he reached the pass by which he intended to cross the Haemus, where a body of Thracians had assembled to oppose his progress. They were defeated, and Alexander advanced against the Triballi, whose prince, Syrmus, having had timely information of Alexander's movements, had already withdrawn, with the old men, women, and children into an island of the Danube, called Peuce, where many other Thracians also had sought refuge. The main force of the Triballi posted themselves in woody ground on the banks of the river Lyginus, about 3 dars' march from the Danube. Having ventured out into the open plain, however, they were completely defented by the Macedonians, with a loss of 3000 men. (Arrian, Anab. i. 2.)

Alexander then marched to the Danube, npposite to l'euce; but he was unable to make himself master of that island, because he had few boats, and the enemy were strongly posited at the top of the strep sides of the island. Alexander therefore abandoned the attempt to take it, and crossed the Danube to make war on the Getae. It would appear, howerer, that he had made sufficient impression on the Triballi to induce them to apply to him for peace, which he granted before his return to Macedonia It was probably some time after these events that the Tri balli were attacked by the Autariatae, a powerful Illyrian tribe, who seem to have completely subdued them, great numbers being killed, and the survivors driven farther towards the east. (Strab. vii. pp. 317, 318.) Hence, in b. c. 295, the Gauls, with ouly 15,000 foot and 3000 horse, defeated the combined forces of the Triballi and Getae (Just. xxv. 1.) When the Romans began to extend their dominion in the direction of the Danube, the Triballi were a small and weak people, dwelling about the confluence of the Oescus with the Danube, near the town Oescus (cf. Ptol. iii. 10. § 10, viii. 11. § 6).

Pliny (vii. 2) states that, according to Isigonus, there were people among the Triballi who fascinated by their look, and destruyed thoee whom they gazed upon too lone, especially with angry eyes : adults were more liable to be injured by them than children. This is probably the same superstition as the modern one respecting the "evil eye," which is peculiarly prevalent among the Slavonian races. (Arrian, Anal. i. 1. § 4, 2. § 4, seqq., 3. § 3, seq., 4. § 6 , v. 26. § 6, vii. 9. § 2 ; Steph. B. s. v.; Marinert, vii. p. 25. seqq.]
[J. $\mathrm{R}_{0}$ ]
TRIBOCI or TRIBOCCI, a German people in Gallia. Schneiler (Caesar, B. G. i.51) bas the form "Triboces" in the accusative plural. Pliny has Tribochi, and Strabo Tribocchi (Tpi&iкхot). In the passage of Caesar (B. G. iv. 10) it is said that all the Mis. have "Tribucorum" (Schneider, note).

The Tribuci were in the army of the German king Ariovistus in the great batile in which Caesar defeated him; and though Ciacoar dues not say that they were Germans, his narrative shows that he considered them to be Germans. In another passage (B. G.iv. 10) Caesar places the Triboci on the Rhine between the Mcdiomatrici and the Treviri, and he means to place them on the left or Gallic side of the Rhine. Strabo (iv. p. 193), after mentioning the Sequani and Mediomatrici as extending to the Rhine, says, "Among them a German people has settled, the Tribocchi, who have passed over from their native land." Pling also (iv. 17) and Tacitus (German. c. 28) say that the Tribocci are Germans. The true conclusion from Caesar is that he supposed the Tribocci to be settled in Gallia before в. c. 58 .

Ptolemy (ii. 9. § 17) places the Tribocci in Upper Germania, but he incorrectly places the Vangiones between the Nemetes and the Tribocci, for the Nemetes bordered on the Tribocci. However he places the Tribocci next to the Rauraci, and he names Breuconagus (Brocomagus) and Elcebus (Helcebus) as the two town of the Triboci. D'Anville supposes that the territory of the Tribocci corresponded to the diocese of Strassburg. Saletio (Seltz or Setz), we may suppose, belonged to the Nemetes, as in modern times it belonged to the diocese of Speier; and it is near the northern limits of the diocese of Strassburg. On the south towards the Rauraci, a place named Markelsheim, on the southern limit of the diocese of Strassburg and boriering on that of Basle, indicates a boundary by a Teutonic name (mark), as Fines does in those parts of Gallia where the Roman tongue prevailed. The name of the Tribocci does not appear in the Notit. Provinc., though the names of the Nemetes and Vangiones are there; but instead of the Tribocci we have Civitas Argentoratum (Strassburg), the chief place of the Tribocci. Ptolemy makes Argentoratum a city of the Vangiones. [G.L.]

TBI'BOLA (T $\rho \cdot 6 \delta \lambda \alpha$, App. Hisp. 62, 63), a town of Lusitania, in the mountainous regions S . of the Tagus, probably the modern Trevoens. [T.H.D.]

TRibulidM. [Trilurium].
TRIBUNCI, a place in Gallia, which we may assume to have been near Concordia, for Ammianns (xvi. 12), after speaking of the battle near Strassburg, in which Chnodomarius, king of the Alemanni, was defeated by Julian, says that the king hurried to his camp, which was near Concordia and Tribunci. But neither the site of Concordia nor of Tribunci is certain. [Concordia.]
TRICARA'NUM. [Phlius, p. 602, a.]
TRICASSES, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis. (Plin. iv. 18.) In Ptolemy (ii. 8. § 13) the name is Tricasii (Tpıctatot), and their city is Augustobona (Airyourcobova). They border on the Parisii. The name appears in the form Tricassini in Ammianus (xvi. 1) and in an inscription. In the Notit. Provinc. the name Civitas Tricassium occurs; and the name of the people has been transferred to the town, which is now Troyes on the Seine, the chief town of the French department of Aube. Caesar does not mention the Tricasses, and his silence has led to the conjecture that in bis time they were comprised within the powerful state of the Senones. [G. L.]

TRICASTI'NI (Tpiкa $\sigma \tau \iota \nu o i$ ), a Gallic people between the Rhone and the Alps. Livy (v. 34) describing the march of Bellovesus and his Galli into Italy, says they came to the Tricastini: "The Alps next were opposed to them;" from which it is inferred that the Tricastini were near the Alps. But nothing exact can be inferred from the narrative, nor from the rest of this confused chapter. In the description of IIannibal's march (Liv. xxi. 34) it is said that Hannibal, after settling the disputes of the Allobroges, being now on his raad to the Alps, did not make his march straight forward, but turned to the left into the territory of the Tricastini; and from the country of the Tricastini he went through the uttermost part of the territory of the Vocontii into the country of the Tricorii, and finally reached the Druentia (Ihurance.) It would be out of place to examine this question fully, for it would require some pages to discuss the passages in Livy. He means, however, to place the Tricastini somewhere between the Allobroges and part of the border of the Vocontian territory. The capital of the Vocontii is Dea Vocontiorum, or Die in the department of Drome; and the conclusion is that the Tricastini were somewhere between the Isara (Iscre) and the Druna (Drome). This agrees with the position of Augusta Tricastinorum [Augusta Tricastinorum ] as determined by the Itins.

Ptolemy (ii. 10. § 13) places the Tricastini east of the Segallauni, whose capital is Valentia, and he names as the capital of the Tricastini a town Nueomagus, which appears to be a different place from Augusta Tricastinorum. D'Anville places the Tricastini along the east bank of the Rhone, north of Arausio (Orange), a position which he fixes by his determination of Augusta Tricastinorum: and he adds, " that the name of the Tricastini has been preserved pure in that of Tricastin." But the Tricastini of Livy and Ptolemy are certainly not where D'Anville places them.
TRICCA (Tрікк $\boldsymbol{\eta}$ : Eth. Tрıккаîos: Trikkala), an ancient city of Thessaly in the district Histiaeotis, stood upon the left bank of the Peneius, and near a small stream named Lethaeus. (Strab. ix. p. 438, xiv. p. 647.) This city is said to have derived its name from Tricca, a daughter of Peneius. (Steph. B. s. v.) It is mentioned in Homer as subject to Podaleirius and Machaon, the two sons of Asclepius or Aesculapius, who led the Triccaeans to the Trojan War (Hum. Il. ii. 729, iv. 202); and it possessed a temple of Asclepius, which was regarded as the most ancient and illustrions of all the temples of this god. (Strab. ix. p. 437.) This temple was visited by the sick, whose cures were recorded there, as in the temples of Asclepius at Epidaurus and Cos. (Strab. viii. p. 374.) There were probably physicians attached to the temple; and Leake gives an inscription in four elegiac verses, to the memory of a "god-like physician named Cimber, by his wife Andromache," which he found upon a marble in a bridge over the ancient Lethaeus. (Northern Greece, vol. iv. p. 285.) In the edict published by Polysperchon and the other generals of Alexander, after the death of the latter, allowing the exiles from the different Greek cities to return to their homes, those of Tricca and of the neighbouring town of Pharcadon were excepted for some reason, which is not recorded. (Diod. xviii. 56.) Tricca was the first town in Thessaly at which Philip V. arrived after his defeat on the Aous. (Liv. xxxii. 13.) Tricca is also :nentioned by Liv. xxxvi. 13 ; Plin. iv. 8. s. 15 ; Ptol. iii. 13. § 44 ; Them. Orat. xxvii. p. 333.

Procopius, who calls the town Tricattús (Tpicdrrous), says that it was restored by Justinian (de Aedif. iv. 3); but it is still called Tricca by Hierocles ( p 642) in the sixth century, and the form in Justinian may be a corruption. In the twelfth century it already bears its modern name (Tpíkкa入a, Anna Comn. v. p. 137, ed. Paris.; Eustath. ad Il. ii. p.
330.) Trikkala is now one of the largest towns in this part of Greece. The castle occupies a hill projecting from the last falls of the mountain of Khassiá; but the only traces of the ancient city which Leake could discover were some small remains of Hellenic masonry, forming part of the wall of the castle, and some squared blocks of stone of the same ages dispersed in different parts of the town. (Leake, Northern Greece, vol. i. p. 425, seq., vol. iv. p. 287.)

TRICCIA'NA, a place in Pannonia, in the valley called Cariniana (It. Ant. p. 267). It is probably the same as the Gurtiana noticed in the Peut. Table, as the difference in the statements about the distances amounts only to 2 miles.
TRICESIMAE, in Gallia, one of the places mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus (xviii. 2) in the list of those places along the Rhenish frontier which Julian repaired. Ammianus mentions Tricesimas between Quadriburgium and Novesium. [Quadriburgium.]
[G. L.]
TRICESIMUM, AD, in Gallia. D'Anville observes that the ancient Itins. contain many positions with similar names, which names of places are derived from the distances which they indicate from the principal towns; for the distances within the dependent territory were measured from the principal towns. This Tricesimum is measured from Narbo (Narbonne), as the Jerusalem Itin. shows, on the road to Toulouse, through Carcassonne. Trebes on the canal of Languedoc may represent the name; and Tricesimum may be near that place. [G. L.]

TRICHO'NIS LACUS. [Aetolia, p. 64, a.]
TRICHO'NIUN (Tpixaviov: Eth. Tpixavicús), a town of Aetolia, from which the lake Trichonis derived its name. [Respecting the lake, see Vol. I. p. 64, a.] Its position is uncertain. Leake places it $S$. of the lake at a place called Gavala, and Kiepert, in his map E. of the lake. But since Strabo mentions it along with Stratus as situated in a fertile plain, it ought probably to be placed N. of the lake (Strab. x. p. 450; Pol. v. 7 ; Steph. B. s. v.). It was evidently a place of importance, and several natives of this town are mentioned in history. (Pol. iv. 3, v. 13, xvii. 10; Paus. ii. 37. § 3; Leake, Northern Greece, vol. i. p. 155.)

TRICOLO'NI. [Megalopolis, p. 309.]
TRICO'MIA (Tpiкшнia), a place in the eastern part of Phrygia, on the road from Dorylaeum to Apamea Cibotus (Ptol. v. 2.§ 22; Tab. Peut.), is placed by the Table at a distance of 28 miles from Midaeum and 21 from Pessinus.

TRICORII (Tpısopiot), a people between the Rhone and the Alps. Hannibal in his march from the Rhone to the Alps passed into the country of the Tricorii, as Livy says [Tmicastini]. Strabo (iv.

- pp. 185, 203) says in one passage that above the Cavares are "the Vocontii and Tricorii and Iconii and Meduli," from which we leam that he considered the Tricorii as neighbours of the Vocontii; and in another passage ho says, "after the Vocontii are the Iconii and Tricorii, and next to them the Meduli, who occupy the highest summits of the Alps." Some geographers conclude that the Tricorii must be on the Drac, a branch of the Isire, in the southern part of the diocese of Grénoble, But if the Tricorii were in the valley of the Drac, we do not therefore admit that Hannibal's march to the Alps was through that valley.

TRICORNE'NSII. [Tricormium.]
 Tincolvia Castra (lem. Bieros. p. 564), a town

TRICORYTHUS [MARATROT.]
TRICRANA (Tpiкpava), an island off the coast of Hermionis in Argolis (Paus. ii. 34. § 8), perhaps the same as the Tiparenus of Pling. [Tiparexis.] TRICRE'NA. [Phenecs, p. 595, a] TRIDENTI'NI (Tpidevtivot), an Alpine tribe occupsing the southern part of Rhaetia, in the north of Lacus Benacus, about the river Athesis. (Strab. iv. p. 204; Plin. iii. 23.) They, with many other Alpine tribes, were subdued in the reign of Augustus.
TRIDENTUM or TRIDENTE (Tpioifute: Trento or Trent), the capital of the Tridentini in the south of Rhaetia, on the eastern bank of the Athesis, and on the highroad from Verona to Veldidena. (Plin. iii. 23; Justin, xx. 5; It. Ant. pp. 275, 281 ; Paul. Diac. i. 2, iii. 9, iv. 42, v. 36; Flor. iii. 3; Ptol. iii. 1. § 31 ; Tab. Peut.) The town is said to have derived its name from the trident of Neptune, which is still shown fixed in the wall of the ancient church of S. Vigil. The place seems to have been made a Roman colony (Orelli, Inscript. Nos. 2183, 3744, 3905, 4823). Theodoric the Great surmunded Tridentum with a wall, of which a considerable portion still exists. (Comp. Pallhausen, Beschreib. der Röm. IIeerstrasse von Verona nach Augsburg, p. 28, foll.; Benedetto Giovanelli, Diccorso sopra un' Iscrizione Trentina, Trento, 1824, and by the same author, Trento, Citta de' Rezj e Colonia Romana, Trento, 1825.)

TRIE'RES (Tpitipns, Polyb. v. 68; Strab. xvi. p. 754), a small fortified place in Phoenicia, on the northern declivity of Lebanon, and about 12 miles distant from Tripolis. It is in all probability the same place as the Tridis of the Itin. Hierosol (p. 583). Lapie identifies it with Enty, others with Belmont.
TRIE'RUM (Tpihpoev or Tpinpoy axpoy, Ptol. iv. 3. § 13), a headland of the Regio Syrtica in Africa, Propria. Ritter (Erdk: i. p. 928) identifies it with the promontory of Cephalae mentioned by Strabo (xvii. p. 836), the present Cape Cefalo or Mesurata. Ptolemy indeed mentions this as a separate and adjoining promontory; but as Cefalo still exbibits three points, it is possible that the ancient names may be connected, and refer only to this one cape. (See Blaquiere, Letters from the Mediterraneas, i. p. 18; Della Cella, Viaggio, p. 61.) [T. H. D.]

TRIFANUM. [VEscia.]
TRIGABOLI. [Padus.]
TRIGISAMUM, a town of Noricum, mentioned only in the Peuting. Table, as situated not far from the mouth of the river Trigisamus (Trasen), which flows into the Danubius. It still bears the name of Truismaur. (See Muchar, Norikum, vol. i. p. 269.)

TRIO＇CALA（T $\quad$ obка入a：Eth．Triocalinus：Ru． near Calatabellotta），a city of Sicily，situated in the interior of the island，about 12 miles from Thermae Selinuntiae（Sciacca）．As the name is cited by Stephanus of Byzantium（who writes the name Tpiкa入a）from Philistus，it is probable that it was a Siculian town or fortress as early at least as the time of the elder Dionysius；but no notice of it is now found in history until the second Servile War in Sicily in B．c．103－100．On that occasion Triocala was selected，on account of its great na－ tural strength and other advantages，by Tryphon， the leader of the insurgents，as his chief stronghold： he fortified the rocky summit on which it was situated，and was able to hold out there，as in an impregnable fortress，after his defeat in the field by L．Lacullus．（Diod．xxxvi．7，8．）The circum－ stances of its fall are not related to us，but Silius Italicus aliudes to it as having suffered severely from the effects of the war．（＂Servili vastata Triocala bello，＂xiv．270）．Cicero nowhere notices the name among the municipal towns of Sicily，but in one passage mentions the＂Triocalinus ager＂ （Verr．v．4）；and the Triocalini again appear in Pliny＇s list of the municipal towns of Sicily．The name is also found in Ptolemy，but in a manner that gives little information as to its position． （Plin．iii．8．s．14；Ptol．iii．4．§ 14．）It was an episcopal see during the early part of the middle ages，and the site is identified by Fazello，who tells us that the ruins of the city were still visible in his time a short distance from Calatabellotta，a town of Saracen origin，situated on a lofty hill about 12 miles inland from Sciacca；and an old church on the site still preserved the ancient appellation． （Fazell．de Reb．Sic．x．472；Cluver．Sicil．p． 374）．

TRITON ( $\delta$ Tpítuv notauós, Ptol. iv. 3. § 19, \&cc.), a river of Libya, forming, according to Ptolemy, the boundary of the Regio Syrtica towards the W. It rose in Mount Vasalaetus, and, flowing in a nurtherly direction, passed through three lakes, the Libya Palus, the lake Pallas, and the lake Tritonitis ( $\dot{\eta}$ Tpitwitis $\lambda_{i \mu \nu \eta, I b .) ; ~ a f t e r ~ w h i c h ~ i t ~ f e l l ~ i n t o ~ t h e ~}^{\text {in }}$ sea in the innermost part of the Syrtis Minor between Macomada and Tacape, but nearer to the butter.

The lake Tritonitis of Ptolemy is called, however, by other writers Tritunis (ì Tpitwyis $\lambda_{i}$ uv $\quad$, Herod. iv. 179). Herodotus seems to confound it with the Lesser Syrtis itself; but Scylax (p. 49), who gives it a circumference of 1000 stadia, describes it as connected with the Syrtis by a narrow opening, and as surrounding a small island,-that culled by Herodotus ( $i b .178$ ) Phla ( $\Phi \lambda \lambda^{\prime}$ ), which is ulso mentioned by Strabo (xvii. p. 836), as containing a temple of Aphrodite, and by Lionysius. (Perieg. 267.) This lake Tritonis is undoubtedly the present Schilkah-el-Lovdjah, of which, according to Shaw (Travels, i. p. 237), the other two lakes are merely parts; whilst the river Triton is the present ELHammah. This river, indeed, is no longer connected with the lake (Shaw, Ib.); a circumstance, however, which affords no essential ground for doubting the ideutity of the two streams; since in those regions even larger rivers are sometimes compelled by the quicksands to aiter their course. (Cf. Ritter, ErdRunde, i. p. 1017). Scylax (l. c.) mentions also another island called Tritonos (Tpiculos) in the Syrtis Minor, which last itself is, according to biin, only part of a lirge Sinus Triwnites (Tpitavitys кól

Some writers confound the lake Tritonis with the lake of the Hesperides, and seck it in other districts of Libys; sometimes in Mauretania, in the neighbourhood of Muant Atlas and the Atlantic Ocean, sometimes in Cyrenaica near Berenice and the river Lathon or Lethon. The latter bypothesis is adopted by Lacan (ix. 346, seq.), the furmer by Diodorus Siculus (iii. 53), who also attributes to it an island inhabited by the Amazons. But Strabo (l. c.) especially distinguishes the lake of the Hesperides frum the lake Tritonis.

With this lake is connected the question of the epithet Tritogeneia, applied to Pallas as early as the days of Homer and Hesiod. But though the Libyan river and lake were much renowned in ancient times (cf. Aeschyl. Eum. 293; Eurip. Ion, 872, seq.; Pind. Pyth. iv. 36, &c.), und the application of the name of Pallas to the lake connected with the Tritonis seems to point to these African waters as having given origin to the epithet, it is nevertheless most probable that the brook Triton near Alalcomense in Bueotia has the best pretensions to that distinction. (Cf. Pausan. ix. 33. § 5 ; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod i. 109, iv. 1315; Miiller, Orchomenos, p. 355 ; Leake, Northern Greece, vol. ii. p. 136, seq.; Kruse, Helles, vol. ii. pt. 1 p. 475 . [I. H. D ]

TRITON (Tpitav, Diod. v. 72), a iver of Crete at the source of which Athene was said to have been iorn. From its connection with the Gmphalian piain, it is identified with the river discharging TRIVICUM (Trevico), a town of Samnium. in the country of the Hirpini, not far from the fronticrs of Apulia. Its name is known to us only from Horace, who slept there (or at least at a villa in its immediate neighbourhownl) on his well-known journey to Brundusium. (Ho.. Sat. i. 5. 79.) It appears therefore that it was situated on the Via Appia, or the line of road then frequented from Rume to Brundusium. But this was not the same which was followed in later times, and is given in the Itineraries under that name, a circumstance which has given rise to much confusion in the topography of this part of Italy. [VIA Appia.] There can be no doubt that Trivicum occupied nearly, if not exactly, the same site with the modern Tretico: the ancient road appears to have passed along the valley at the foot of the hill on which it was situated. It was here that stowi the villa to which Horace alludes, and some remains of Roman buildings, as well as of the pavement of the ancient road, still visible in the time of Pratilli, served to mark the site more accurately. (Pratilli, Via Appia, iv. 10. p. 507; Rumanelli, vol. ii. p. 350.) It probably never was a municipal town, as its name is not mentioned by any of the geographers.

TRILMPILI'NI, an Alpine people of Northern Italy, who are mentioned by Augustus in the inscription in which he recorded the final subjugation of the Alpine tribes (ap. Plin. iii. 20. s. 24). It appears from Pliny that the whole people was reduced to slavery and sold together with their lands. According to Cato they were of Euganean race, as well as their neightuurs the Camuni, with whon they are repeatedly mentioned in common. (Plin. l.c.) Hence there is little doubt that they were the inhabitants of the district still called Val Trompia, the upper valley of the Mella, and separated only by an intervening ridge of mountains from the Val Cumonica, the land of the Camuni.

TROAS (T $\rho \omega a \dot{s}$, Tpoín, Tpola, or 'lııàs $\gamma \dot{\eta}$ ), the territory ruled over by the ancient kings of Troy or llium, which retained its ancient and venerable namo even at a time when the kingdom to which it had originally belonged had long ceased to exist. Homer himself nowhere describes the extent of Troas or its frontiers, and even leares us in the dark as to how far the neighbouring allies of the Trojans, such as the Dardanians, who were governed by princes of their own, of the family of Priam, were true allies or subjects of the king of llium. In later times, Trous was a part of Mysia, comprising the coast district on the Aegean from Cape Lectum to the neightourhood of Dardanus and Abydus on the Hellespont; while inland it extended about 8 geographical miles, that is, as far as Mount Ida, so as to embrace the south coast of Mysia opposite the island of Lesbos, together with the towns of Assus and Antandrus. (Hom. Il. xxiv. 544; Herod. vii. 42.) Strabo, from his well-known inclination to maynify the empire of Troy, describes it as extending from the Aesepus to the Caicus, and his view is adupted by tho Scholiast on Apollouius Rhudius (i. 1115). In its proper and more limited sense, however, Troas was an undulating plain, traversed by the terminal branches of Ida running out in a north-western direction, and by the small rivers Satniois, Scamander, Simots, and Thymbrius. This plain gradually rises towards Mount Ida, and contained, at least in later times, several flourishing towns. In the Iliad we hear indeed of several towns, and Achilles boasts (Il. ix. 328) of having destroyed eleven in the territory of Troy; but they can at best only have been very small places, perhaps only open villages. That Ilium itself must hare been far superior in strength and population is evident from the whole course of ovents; it was protected by strong walls, and had its acropolis. [Ilium.]

The inhabitants of Troas, called Troes (Tpêes), and by Roman prose-writers Trojani or Teucri, were in all probability a Pelasgian race, and seem to have consisted of two branches, one of which, the Teucri, had emigrated from Thrace, and become amalgamated with the Phrygian or native population of the country. Hence the Trojans are sometimes called Teucri and sometimes Phryges. (Herod. v. 122, vii. 43; Strab. i. p. 62, xiii. p. 604; Virg. Aen i. 38, 248, ii. 252, $571, \& \mathrm{sc}$.) The poet of the Iliad in several points treats the Trojans as inferior in civilisation to his own countrymen; but it is impossible to say whether in such cases he describes the real state of things, or whether he does so only from a natural partiality for his own countrymen.
According to the common legend, the kingdom of Troy was overturned at the capture and burning of Ilium in B. c. 1184 ; but it is attested on pretty good authority that a Trojan state survired the cataxtrophe of its chief city, and that the kingdom was finally destruyed by an invasion of Phrygians who crossed over from Europe into Asia. (Xanthus, ap. Strab. xiv. p. 680, xii. p. 572.) This fact is indirectly confirmed by the testimony of Homer himself, who makes Poseidon predict that the posterity of Aeneas should long continue to reign over the Trojans, after the race of Priam should be extinct.

TROEZEN (Tporsty), a city in "Massilia of Italy," as Stephanus (s. v.) says, if his text is right; but perhaps he means to says "a city of Massilia in Italy." Eustathius (ad Il. p. 287) says that it is in "Massaliotic Italy." Charax is Stephanus' authority. This brief notice adds one more to the list of Massaliotic settlements on the coast of the Mediterranean : but we know nothing of Tmezen. [G. L.]

TROEZEN (Tporsty ; also TporStivn, Ptol. iii.
 ऽnvia, Eurip. Mod 683; ì Tpor§nvls भ̂. Thuc. ii. 56), a city of Peloponnesus, whose territory formed the south-eastern corner of the district to which the name of Argolis was given at a later time. It stood at the distance of 15 stadia from the const, in a fertile plain. which is described below. (Strab. viii. p. 373.) Few cities of Peloponnesus boasted of so remote an antiquity ; and many of its legends aro closely connected with those of Athens, and prove that its original population was of the Ionic race. According to the Troezenians themselves, their country was first called Oraea from the Egyptian Orus, and was next named Althepia from Al:hepus, the son of Poseidon and Leis, who was the daughter of Orus. In the reign of this king. Poseidon and Athena contended, as at Athens, for the land of the Trnezenians, but, through the mediation of Zeus, they became the joint guardians of the country. Hence, says Pausanias, a trident and the head of Athens are represented on the ancient coins of Troezen. (Comp. Mionnet, Suppl. iv. p. 267. § 189.) Althepus was succeeded by Saron, who built a ternple of the Saronian Artemis in a marshy place near the sea, which was hence called the Phoebaean marsh ( (oi\&aia $\lambda i \mu \nu \eta$ ), but was afterwards named Saronis, because Saron was buried in the ground belonging to the temple. The next kings mentioned are Hyperes and Anthas, who fronded two cities, namel Hypereia and Antheia. Aëtius, the son of Hyperes, inherited the kingdom of his father and uncle, and called one of the cities Poseidunias. In his reign. Troezen and Pittheus, who are called the sons of Pelops, and may be regarded as Achaean princes, settled in the country, and divided the power with Aëtius. But the Pelopidas soon supplanted the earlier dynasty ; and on the death of Troezen, Pittheus united the two Ionic settlements into one city, which he called Troezen after his brother. Pittheus was the grandfather of Theseus by his daughter Aethra; and the great national hero of the Athenians was born and educated at Troezen. The close connection between the two states is also intimated by the legend that two important demi of Attica, Anaphlystus and Sphettus, derived their names from two sons of Troezen. (Paus. ii. 30. §§ 5-9.) Besides the ancient names of Troezen already specified, Stephanus B. (8. v. Tpor $\$$ h $\nu$ ) mentions Aphrodisias, Saronia, Poseidonias, Apollonias and Anchanis. Strabo likewise says (ix. p. 373) that Troezen was called Poseidouia from its being sacred to Poeeidan.

At the time of the Trojan War Troezen was subject to Argos (Hom. 12 ii .561 ) ; and apon the conquest of the Peloponnesus by the Dorians, it received a Dorian colony from Argos. (Paus. ii. 30. § 10.) The Dorian settlers appear to have been received on friendly terms by the ancient inhabitants, who continued to form the majority of the population; and although Troezen became a Doric city, it still retained its Ionic sympathies and traditions. At an early period Troezen was a powerful maritime state, as is shown by its founding the cities of Halicarnassus and Myndus in Caria. (Paus. ii. SO. §8; Herod. vii. 99 ; Strah. viii. p. 374.) The Troezenians also took part with the Aclameans in the foundation of Sybaris, bat they were eventually driven out by the Achaeans. (Aristot. Pol. v. 3.) It has been conjectured with much probability that the expelied Troezenians may have been the chief founders of Poseidonia (Paestum), which Solinus calls a Doric colony, and to which they gave the ancient name of their own city in Peloponnesas. [Paestum.]

In the Persian War the Troezenians took an active part. After the battle of Thermopylae, the harbour of Troezen was appointed as the place of rendezvous for the Grecian fleet (Hervd. viii. 42); and when the Athenians were obliged to quit Atticm upon the approach of Xerzes, the majority of them took refuge at Truezen, where they were received with the greatest kinduess by the semi-Ionic population. (Herod. viii. 41 ; Plut. Them. 10.) The Troezenians sent 5 ships to Artemisium and Salamis, and 1000 men to Plataeae, and they also fought at the battle of Mycale. (Herod. viii. I, ix. 28, 102.) After the Persian war the friendly connection between Athens and Troezen appears to have continued; and during the greatness of the Athenian empire before the thirty years' peace (B. c. 455) Troezen was an ally of Athens, and was apparently garrisoned by Athenian troope ; but by this peace the Athenians were compelled to relinquish Truezen. (Thuc. i. 115, iv. 45.) Before the Peloponnesian War the two states became estranged from one another; and the Troezenians, probably from hostility to Argos, entered into close alliance with the Lacedaemolians. In the Peloponnesian War the Troezenians remained the firn allies of Sparta, although their country, from its maritime situation and its proximity to Attica, was especially exposed to the ravages of the Athenian fleet. (Thuc. ii. 56, iv. 45.) In the Corinthian War, B. c. 394, the Troezenians fought upon the side of the Lacedaemonians (Xen. Hell. iv. 2. § 16) ; and again in B. c. $3: 3$ they are numbered among the allies of Sparta against Athens. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 3.) In the Macedonian period Troezen passed alternately into the hands of the contending powers. In B. c. 303 it was delivered, along with Argos, from the Macedonian yoke, by Denetrius Poliorcetes; but it soon became subject to Macedonia, and remained so till it was taken by the Spartan Cleonymus in b. c. 278. (Polyaen. Strat. ii. 29. § 1 ; Frontin. Strat. iii. 6. § 7.) Shortly afterwards it again became a Macedonian dependencs ; but it was united to the Achaean League by Aratus after he had liberated Corinth. (Paus. ii. 8. § 5.) In the war between the Achaean League and the Spartans, it was taken by Cleomenes, in s. c. 223 (Polyb. ii. 52 ; Plut. Cleom. 19) ; but after the defeat of this monarch at Sellasia in B. C. $2: 21$, it was doubtless restored to the Achaeans. Of its subrequent history we have no information. It was a place of importance in the time of Strabo (riii. p. 373), and in the second century of the Cbristian era it continued to possess a large number of public buildings, of which P'ausanias has given a detailed account. (Pans. ii. 31, 32.)

According to the description of Pausanias, the monuments of Troezen may be divided into three classes, those in the Agora and its neighbourhond, those in the sacred inclosure of Hippolytus, and those upon the Acropolis. The Agora seeins to have been surrounded with stoae or colonnades, in which stwod marble statues of the women and children who fled for refuge to Troezen at the time of the Persian inrasion. In the centre of the Agora was a temple of Artemis Soteira, said to have been dedicated by Theseus, which contained altars of the infernal gods. Behind the temple stood the monument of Pittheus, the founder of the city, surmounted by three chairs of white marble, apon which he and two assessors are said to have administered justice. Not far from thence was the temple of the Muses, founded by Ardalus, a son of Heplinestus, where Pittheus himself was said to have learnt the art of discourse; and before the temple was an altur where sacrifices were offered to the Muses and to Sleep, the deity whom the Troezenians considered the most friendly to these goddesses.

Near the theatre was the temple of Artemis

Lsceia, founded by Hippolytus. Before the temple there was the very stone upon which Orestes was purified by nine Troezenians. The so-called tent of Orestes, in which he took refuge before his expiation, stood in front of the temple of Apollo Thearius, which was the most ancient temple that Pausanias knew. The water used in the purification of Orestes was drawn from the sacred fountain Hippocrene, struck by the hoof of Prgasus. In the neighbourhood was a statue of Hermes Polygius, with a wild olive tree, and a temple of Zeus Soter, said to have been erected by Aëtius, one of the mythical kings of Truezen.

The sacred enclusure of Hippolytus occupied a large space, and was a most conspicuous object in the city. The Troezenians denied the truth of the ordinary story of his being dragged to death by his horses, but worshipped him as the constellation Auriga, and dedicated to him a spacious sanctuary, the foundation of which was ascribed to Diumede. He was worshipped with the greatest honours; and each virgin, before her marriage, dedicated a lock of her hair to him. (Eurip. Hippol. 1424 ; Paus. ii. 32. § 1.) The sacred enclosure contained, besides the temple of Hippolytus, one of Apollo Epibaterius, also dedicated by Dimmede. On one side of the enclosure was the stadium of Hippolytus, and above it the temple of Aphrodite Calascopia, so called because Phaedra beheld from this spot Hippolytus as he exercised in the stadiun. In the neighbourhood was shown the tomb of lhaedra, the monument of Hippolytus, and the house of the hero, with the fountain called the Herculean in front of it.

The Acropolis was crowned with the temple of Athena Polias or Sthenias; and upon the slupe of the mountain was a sanctuary of Pan Lyterius, so called because be puta stop to the plague. Lower down was the temple of Isis, built by the Halicarnassians, and also one of Aphrodite Axcraea.

The ruins of Troezen lie west of the village of Dhamala. They consist only of pieces of wall of Hellenic masonry or of Roman brickwork. dispersed over the lower slopes of the height, upon which stoud the Acropolis, and over the plain at its fiom. The Acropolis occupied a rugged and lofty bill, commanding the plain below, and presenting one of the most extensive and striking prospects in Greece. There are in the plain several ruined churches, which probably mark the site of ancient temples; and several travellers have noticed the remains of the temple of Aphrodite Calascopia, overlooking the cavity formerly occupied by the stadium. The chief river of the plain flows by the ruins of Troezen, and is now called Potami. It is the ancient Taurius, afterwards called Hyllicus (Paus. ii. 32. § 7), fed by several streams, of which the most important was the Chrysorrhoas, flowing through the city, and which still preserved its water, when all the other streams had been dried up by a nine years' drought (Pans. ii. 31. § 10.)

The territory of Troezen was bounded on the W. by that of Epidaurus, on the SW . by that of Hermione, and was surrounded on every other side by the sea. The most impurtant purt of the territory was the fertile maritime plain, in which Troezen stood, and which was bounded on the south by a range of mountains, terminating in the promontories Scyllaeum and Bucephala, the most easterly points of the Peloponnesus. [Scyllarim.] Above the promontory Scyllaeum, and nearly due E. of Troezen, was a large bay, protected by the island of Calaureia, named Pogon, where the Grecian fleet was ordered to assemble before the battle of Salamis (Herod. viii. 42; Strab. viii. p. 373.) The porttown, which was named Celenderis (Paus. ii. 32. § 9), appears to have stood at the western extremity of the bay of Pogon, where some ancient remains are found. The high rocky peninsula of Methata, which belonged to the territury of Troezen and is united to the mainland by a narrow isthmus, is described in a separate article. [Methana.] There were formerly two islands off the coast of Troezen, named Calaureia and Sphaeria (afterwards Hiera), which are now united by a narrow sandbank. (Leake. Morea, vol. ii. p. 442. seq.; Boblaye, Recherches, fc. p. 56; Curtius, Peloponnesos, vol. ii. p. 431, seq.)

TROGI'LIUM (TpaciiAiov), a promontory formed by the western termination of Mount Mycale, opposite the island of Samos. Close to this promontory there was an island bearing the same name. (Strab. xiv. p. 636 ; Steph. B. s. v. Tpórııos, according to whom it was also called Trogilia; Act Apost. xx. 15, where its name is Trogyllion.) Pling (v.31.s.37) speaks of three islands being called Trogiliae, their scparate names being Philion, Argennon, and Sandalion.

TROGI'LIUN, a town of Lusitania, according to Luitprand (Adversaria, § 30, ap. Wessel. ad Itin. p. 438), the same place which Pliny (iv. 35) calls Castra Julia. It is incontestably the Turcalion of the Geogr. Rav. (iv. 35) and the modern Truxillo. (Cf. Florez, Esp. Sagr. xiii. p. 114, and Ukert, ii. pt. i. p. 395.)
TROGI'TIS (Tpocyitıs), a small lake in Lycaonia, mentioned only by Strabo (xii. p. 568), and probably the same as the one now called Ilghun.
 Diodor. iii. 14; Strab. xvii. pp. 786. 819 ; Agatharchid. ap. Phot. p. 454, ed. Bekker; Plin. ii. 70. s. 71 $\chi^{\text {copa }}$, Diodor. i. 30 ; Pul. iv. 7, 27.) Under the term Troglolytae the ancients appear to have included various races of men. For we meet with them in Mauretania (Strab. xvii. p. 828) ; in the interior of Libya east of the Garamantes, along the Arabian shore of the Red Sea, as well as on the opposite coast of Aethiopia and Aegypt, and on both in such numbers that the districts were each of them named "Regio Troglodytica;" and even on the northern side of the Caucasus (Strab. xi. p. 506). The Caucasian Troglodytae were in a higher state of civilisation than their eastern namesales, since they cultivated corn.

But the race most commonly known as Troglodytae inhabited either shore of the Red Sea, and were probably a mixture of Arabian and Aethiopian blood. Their name, as its composition imports ( $\tau \rho \operatorname{có}^{\prime} \lambda \eta, \delta i 0_{0}$ ), was assigned to them because they either dug for themselves cabins in the lime and sandstone hills of that region, or availed themselves of its natural caverns. Even in the latter case, the villages of the Troglodytae were partly formed by art, since long tunuels, for the passage or stabling of their herds, were cut between village and village, and the rocks were honeyconibed by their dwellings. Bruce saw at Gojam in Nubia a series of such caverns, inhabited by herdsmen, and witnessed the periodical passuge of the cattle in Senuaar from the lowlands to the hills. The same cause led to similar migrations in ancient times, via., the appearance of the gadfy in the mar:hes, immediately after the cessation of the periodical rains.

The accounts of the Regio Troglodytica that extended from the Sinus Arsinoites to Berenice may be assuined as applicable to the Troglodytae generally. The catacombs of Naples will perhaps give the most accurate image of their dwellings. The Ababdeh, who now inhabit this region, exbibit many of their peculiar manners and customs. Their language was described by the Greeks as a shriek or whistle, rather than as articulate speech; a portion at least of them were serpent-eaters. (Herod. iv. 183.) But their general occupation was that of herdsinen.

Agatharchides of Cnidos is the earliest writer who mentions the Troglodytae (ap. Photium, p. 454, ed. Bekker). According to him and Strabo (xvii. p. 786) animal food was their staple diet; and they eat not only the flesh but also the bones and hides of their cattle. Their drink was a mixture of milk and blood. Since, however, only the older and sicklier beasts were slaughtered for food, it may be presumed that the better animals were reserved for the Aegyptian and Aethiopian markets. The hidex supplied their only article of raiment; but many of them went naked, and the women tattooed their bodies, and wore necklaces of shells. The pastoral habits of the Trogiodytae rendered thern so swift of foot as to be able to run down the wild beasts which they hunted; and they must have been acquainted with the use of weapons, since they were not ouly hanters, but robbers, against whom the caravans passing from the interior of Libya to Berenice on the Red Sea were obliged to employ a guard of sol-Peut.), about 25 miles from Berenice. Trogludytae also served among the light troops in the amny of Xerxes, в. $\mathbf{c} .480$, and acted as guides to the carivans, since the Ichthyophagi whom Cambysea employed as explorers of Meroe were a tribe of Troglodytae. (Herod. iii. 19.) Among the common people a community of women existed : the chiefs alone, who may have been of a superior race, having wives appropriated. For the abstraction or seduction of a chieftuin's wife an ox was the penalty. During their retirement in caverns they seem to have lived peacenbly together, but as soon as they sallied forth with their herds into the pastures they were incessantly at war with one another, on which occasions the women were wont to act as mediators. They practised the rite of circuincision, like the Arabians and Aethiopians generally. According to Agatharchides the Troglodytae differed as much from the rest of mankind in their sepulchral customs as in their habitations. They bound the corpse neck and heels together, affixed it to a stake, pelted it with stones amid shouts of laughter, and when it was quite covered with stones, placed a horn upon the mound, and went their ways. But they did not always wait for natural death to perform this ceremony, since, accounting inability to procure a livelihood among intolerable evils, they strangled the aged and intirn with an ox-tail. Their civilisation appeared so low to Aristotle (Hist. Anim. viii. 12) that he describes the Troglodytse as pignies who, mounted on tilly horses, waged incessant wars with the cranes in the Aethiopian marshes. A tribe on the frontiers of Abyssinia, called Barnagas by the natives, corresponds, according to modern accounts, with the ancient Troglodytae. (Vincent, Commerce and Narigation of the Ancients, vol. ii. p. 89.) [W. B. D.] TROICLS MONS (Tpwiкду д oos, Strab. xvii. p. 809 ; Steph. B. s. v. ; Tpouıoù $\lambda l \theta o u$ ópos, Ptol. iv. 5. § 27), was a long range of hills east of the Nile, which threw out several abrupt spurs intw the Heptanomis of Aegypt. TRO'SSULUM, a town of Etruria, which, according to a story current among the Romans, was taken by a body of cavalry alone, unsupported by infantry; an exploit thought to be so singular, that the Roman knights were for some time called Trossuli on accuant of it. (Plin. xxxiii. 2. s. 9; Festus, s. v. Trossuli, p. 367.) No other mention is found of it; and it was probably a small place which had disappeared in the time of the geographers, but Pliny teils us (l. c.) that it was situated 9 miles from Volsinii, on the side towards Rume. It is said that the name was still retained by a place called Trosso or Vicdo di Trosso, about 2 miles from Monte Fiascone, as late as the 17th century, but all trace of it is now lost. (Holsten. Not. ad Cluver. p. 67; Dennis's Etruria, vol. i. p. 517.)

Bene detto. It gave name to a town which was situated at its mouth, and is called by Pliny Truentum, but more commonly Castricm Truentinum. Though one of the most considerable of the rivers of Picenum, the Truentus has very much the character of a mountain torrent, and is only navigable for ahout 5 miles near its mouth. TUBANTES or TLBANTII (ToúGavtol or Toufártiot), a German trile which was allied with the Chernsci, and seems originally to have dwelt between the Rhine and Yessel; but in the time of Germanicus they appear in the country south of the Lippe, that is. the district previously occupied by the Sigambri (Tac. Ann. i. 51, xiii. 55, foll.) They seem to have followed the Cherusci still farther to the south-east, as Ptolemy (ii. 11. § 23) places them on the south of the Chatti, near the Thuringer Wald, between the rivers Fulda and Werra (Comp. Tac. Germ. 36). In the end we find them again as a member of the confederacy of the Franks. (Nazarius, Paneg. Const. 18.) The name Subattii in Strabo (vii. p. 292) is probably only an error of the transcriber, whence Kramer las changed it into Toubḋtiol. (Wilhelm, Germanien, p. 130.) [L.S.]

The latter is still called Tebourba; the former is variously identified with Tubersole and Zaghonan. Pling (v. 4. s. 4) writes the name Tuburbis. (Itin. Ant. pp. 44, 48; Tab. Peut.) [T.H.D.]

TLBLSUPTLS (Toubovgountos, Toubuv́aum. тos, or Toubov́aımeos, Plol. iv. 2. §̧31, viii. 13. § 12), a town of Mauretania Cresariensis, 18 miles SE. of Saldae. (Jtin. Ant. p. 32.) According to Ammianus Marcellinus it was situated close to Mons Ferratus (xxix. 5. § 11). From Pliny (v. 2. s. 1) we learn that it was a Roman colony since the time of Augustus. It was onice a place of some importance, but afterwards declined, though even at a late period it seems to have had a Roman garrison (Not. Imp., where it is called Tubusubdus). Variously identitied with Burg, Bordj, Ticla, and a place on the Ijebel A froun.

TUCABA (Toúка6a, Ptol. iv. 6. § 25), a place in the interior of Libya.

TUCCA (Tои̂кка, Ptol. iv. 2. § 28). 1. A town of Mauretania Caesariensis. Ptolemy places it in the interior; but according to Pliny (v. 2. so 1) it was on the sea, at the mouth of the river Ampsaga (Cf. Tab. Peut.)
2. A town in the district of Byzacium in Africa Proper. (Ptol. iv. 3. § 32.) Firom inscriptions found in a village still called Dugga it may be inferred that the place should be more correctly called Tugga. According to the Itin. Ant. (pp. 47, 49, 51) it las 50 miles $N$. of Sufetula, the modern Sbailha or Sfaith, and ulso bore the name of Terebentina or Terebinthina. probably from its being situated in a neighbourhood abounding with the Terebinth tree. Tucca was a fortified town. (Procop. de Aed. vi. 5.) It is probably the same place called Tuccabori by St. Augustin (adv. Donat. vi. 24.) (Cf. Wessel. ad Ilin. p. 48.)
3. A town of Numidia. (Ptol. iv. 3. § 29.)

TUCCI (Toûkкı, Ptol. ii. 4. § 11), a town of Hispania Baetica, between Ilipla and Italica (Itin. Ant. p. 432.) According to Pliny (iii. 3. s. 3) it

TUDE (Toûbaı and Toùvoaı, Ptol ii. 6. § 45), a fort or castle of the Gruii or Gravii, in Hispania Tarraconensis, E. of Limia, and on the road from Bracara to Asturica. (Itin. Ant. p. 429.) It is called Tyde by Pliny (iv. 20. 8. 34), and according to an ancient tradition it was the seat of an Aetolian colony under Diomed; a tale probably occasioned by the similarity of its name to that of Tydeus. (Sil. Ital. iii. 367, xvi. 369; Plin. l. c.; Avien. Descr. Orb. 650.) It is the modern Tuy. [T. H. D.]

TUDER (Toûjep: Eth. Tudertinus: Todi), one of the most considerable cities of Umbria, situated on a lofty hill, rising above the left bank of the Tiber, about 26 miles S . of Pernsia and 18 W . of Spoletium. There is no doubt that it was an ancient Uinbrian city, but no mention of the name occurs in history previous to the Roman conquest. Silius Italicus tells us that it was celebrated for the worship of Mars (Sil. Ital. iv. 222, viii. 462), and notices its position on a lofty hill. (Id. vi. 645.) The first notice of it in history is on occasion of a prodigy which occurred there at the time of the invasion of the Cimbri and Teatones (Plut. Mar. 17 ; Plin. ii. 57. s. 58); and shortly after we learn that it was taken by Crassus, as the lieutenant of Sulla, during the wars of the latter with the partisans of Marius. (Plut. Crass. 6.) It received a colony ander Augustus, and assumed the title of "Colonia Fida Tuder," probably in consequence of some services rendered during the Perusian War, though its name is not mentioned by Appian. (Plin. iii. 14. 8. 19; Lib. Colon. p. 214 ; Murat. Inscr. pp. $1111.4,1120$. 3; Orell. Inscr. 3726.) It appears from inscriptions to have been a flourishing and important town under the Roman Empire, and is mentioned by all the geographers among the chief towns of Umbria. (Strab. v. p. 227; Plin. l.c.; Ptol. iii. 1. § 54.) It was not situated on the Flaminian Way, but the Tabula gives a line of road, which led from Ameria to Tuder, and thence to Perusia. (Tab. Peut.) Its great strength as a fortress, arising from its elevated position, is already alluded to by Strabo (l. c.), and rendered it a place of importance during the Gothic Wars, after the fall of the Western Empire. (Procop. B. G. ii. 10, 13.) It is again mentioned as a city under the Lombards (P. Diac. iv. 8); and there can be no doubt that it continued throughout the middle ages to be a considerable city. It is now much docayed, and has only about 2500 inhabitants, bat still retains the title of a city.

Considerable ancient remains still attest its former consideration. Among these the most remarkable are the walls of the city, some portions of which are apparently of great antiquity, resembling those of Perusia, Volaterrae, and other Etruscan cities, but they are in general more regular and less rude. Other parts of the walls, of which three distinct circuits may be traced, are of regular masonry and built of travertine. These are cortainly of Roman date. There are also the remains of an ancient building, called by local antiquarians the temple of Mars, but more prubably a basilica of Roman date. Numerous coins and other small objects have been found at Todi: anong the latter the most interesting is a bronze statue of Mars, now in the Musco Gregoriano at Rome. The coins of Tuder, which are numerons, belong to the class called Aes Grave, being of brass and of large size, resembling the earliest coinage of Volaterrae, Iguvium, Scc. They all bave the name written in Etruscan characters trtere, which we thus learn to have been the native form of the name.

TUGIENSIS SALTUS, a part of the chain of Mount Orospeda, which derived its name from the town of Tugia, and in which, according to Pliny (iii. 1. s. 3), the Bretis had its source, whence it would appear to be the same branch called by others Mons Argentarius. [Cf. Ornspeda.] [T. H. D.]

TUICIAE or TERICIAE, as some read it, in Gallia Narbonensis, between Glanum [Glantic] and Aquase Sextiae (Aix). It is placed in the Table between Glanum and Pisavae, xi. frmm Glanum and xv. from Pisavae. D'Anville fixes Tuiciae or Tericiae, as he reads the name, about Aiquières or Aureille. This second name, as he observee, seems to have some relationship to that of the Roman read described in the Antonine Itin. ander the name of Via Aurelia as far as Arelate (Arles). It is said that there are many remains at a place named Jean.Jean about a mile from Aiquieres. [G. L.]

TULISU'RGIUM (Tounıooúpyiov), a town in Germany, probably belonging to the country of the Dulgibini. (Ptol. ii. 11. § 28.) Not to mention other conjectures as to its modern representative, Zeas (Die Deutschen, p. 7) and Wilbelm (Germanien, p. 46) are of opinion that the reading in Ptolemy is wrong, and that we should read Teutiboúpyion, which they regard as the place from which the Teutoburgiensis Saltus derived its name; and it is accordingly believed that the remains of an ancient wall, now called the Hünenring, on Mount Grotenburg, near Detmold, marks the site of the ancient Teutoburgium. But all this is no more than a plausible conjecture.

TULLUM.
TULLUM (Toú入入ov), in Gallia Belgica, is one of the cities of the Leuci, who bordered on the Mediomatrici. (Ptol. ii. 9. § 13.) Nasium is the other city [Nasium]. The Notitia of the Provinces of Gallia mentions Tullum thus: "Civitas Leucorum Tallo." Toul, which is Tullum, has preserved its name instead of taking the name of the people, like most other capital towns. Toul is in the department of the Meurthe.

TUNES (Túms, Polyb. i. 30; Toúvis, or Túvis, Strab. xvii. p. 834, &ec.), a strongly fortified town, once of some importance, in the Roman province of Africa. According to Polybius (xiv. 20), who is fullowed by Livy (xxx. 9), it was 120 stadia or 15 miles from Carthage, from which it lay in a SW. direction; but the Tab. Peut., in which it is written Thunis, places it more correctly at a distance of only 10 miles from that city. It is said to have been situated at the mouth of a little river called Catada, in the bay of Carthage, but there are now no traces of any such river. On the present state of Tunis, see Blaquière, Lett. i. p. 161, seq.; Ritter Erdkunde, i. p. 914, seq.
TUNGRI (Toírpou), are placed by Ptolemy (ii. 9. §9) east of the Tabullas river, and their chief place is Atuacutum, which is Aduatuca or Tongern [Aduatica]. Tacitus (German. c. 2) says. "Those who first crossed the Rhine and expelled the Galli, are now called Tungri, but were then named Germani." Tacitus speaks of the Tungri in two other passages (Hist. ir. 55, 79); and in one of them he appears to place the Tungri next to the Nervii. The name of the Eburones, whom Cacsar attempted to annihilate [Eburones], disappears in the later geography, and the Tungri take their place. (Plin. iv. 31.) D'Anville observes (Notice, ${ }^{f c}$.) that the name of the Tungri extended over a large tract of country, and comprehended several peoples; for in the Notit. of the Provinces of Gallia, the Tungri divide with the Agrippinenses all Germania Secunda; and there is some evidence that the bishops of Tongern had once a territory which bordered on that of Reims.

Ammianus (xv. 11) gives the name of the people, Tungri, to one of the chief cities of Germania Secunda; the other is Agrippina (Cologne). This shows that Tongern under the later Empire way a large place. Many Roman remains have been dug up there ; and it is said that the old Roman road may still be traced through the town.

TURCAE (Toupkol, Suid. s. v.), a Scythian people of Asiatic Sarmatia, dwelling on the Palus Maeotis, which appears to be identical with the 'İpкаu of Herodotus (iv. 22, &c.). The various hypotheses that have been started respecting the Turcae only show that nothing certain is known respecting then. (Cf. Mannert, iv. p. 130; Heeren, Ideen, i. 2, pp. 189, 281, 307 ; Schaffarik, Slav. Alterth. i. p. 318, &c.) Humboldt (Central-Asien, i. p. 245, ed. TURDETA'NI (Toupöyravol, Ptol. ii. 4. § 5, sce.), the principal people of Hispania Baetica; whence we find the name of Turdetania (Touporvtavia or Touprutania) used by Strabo (iii. p. 136) and Stephanus Byz. (p. 661) as identical with Baetica. Their territory lay to the W. of the river Singulis (now Xenil), on both sides of the Baetis as far as Lusitania on the W. The Turdetani were the most cirilied and polished of all the Spanish tribes. They cultivated the sciences; they had their poets and historians, and a code of written laws, drawn up in a metrical form (Strab. iii. pp. 139, 151, 167; Polyb. xxxiv. 9). Hence they were reudily disposed to adopt the manners and customs of their conquerors, and became at length alinost entirely Romans; but with these characteristics we are not surprised to find that they are at the same time represented by Livy (xxxiv. 17) as the most unwarlike of all the Spanish races. They possessed the Jus Latii. Some traits in their manners are noted by Diodorus Sic. (r. 33), Silius Italicus (iii. 340, seq.), and Strabo (iii. 164). Their superior civilisation was no doubt derived from their intercourse with the Phoenicians whose colony of Tartessus lay in their neighbourhood. [T. H. D.]

TURDULI (Toupסoũлoc, Ptol. ii. 4. § 10), a people in Hispania Baetica, very nearly connected with the Tardetani, and altimately not to be distinguished from them. (Strab. iii. p. 139; Polyb. xxxiv. 9). They dwelt to the E. and S. of the Turdetani, down to the shores of the Fretum Herculeum. A branch of them called the Turduli Veteres appears to bave migrated into Lusitania, and to have settled to the S. of the Durius; where it is probable that in process of time they became amalgamated with the Lusitaniuns (Strab. iii. p. 151 ; Mela, iii. 1. § 7 ; Plin. iii. 1. s. 3, iv. 21. s. 35; cf. Florez, Esp. Sagr. ix. p. 7). [T. H. I.]

TURNACUM or TORNACCM, a city of North Gallia, is first mentioned in the Roman Itins. In the Notit. Imp. mention is made of a military force under the name of Numerus Turnacensium; and of a "Procurator Gynaecii Tornacensis Beigicae Secundae." This procurator is explained to be a superintendent of some number of women who were employed in making clathing for the soldiers. Hieronymus about A. D. 407 speaks of Turnacum as one of the chief towns of Gallia; and Audoenus, in his life of S. Eligius (St. Eloi) in the seventh century, says of it, " quas quondam regalis extitit civitas." Turnacum was within the limits of the ancient territory of the Nervii. The Flemish name is Doornick, which the French have corrapted into Tournai. Tournai is on the Schelde, in the province of Hainault, in the kingdon of Belgium.
There are silver corns of Turnacum, with the legend dvrnacos and drrnacvs. On one side there is the head of an arned man, and on the other a horseman armed. On some there is said to be the legend ivbso rex. Numerous Roman medals have been found at Tournai, some of the time of Augustus and others as late as Claudius Gothicus and Tetricus, and even of a later date. The tomb of Childeric I., who died A. 1. 481 , was discovered at Tournai in the seventeenth century, and a vast quantity of gold and silver medals, and other curious things; among which was the golden ring of Childeric, with his name on it, childirici regis. Such discoveries as these, which have been made in various places in Belgium, show how little we know of the Roman history of this country. TU'RONES, TU'RONL, TURO'Nil. Some of Cacsar's troops wintered in the country of the Turones after the campuig' of B. C. 5 ( (B. G. ii. 35). The Turnnes are mentioned again (B. G. viii. 46), where we learn that they bordered on the Carnutes; and in another place (vii.4) they are mentioned with the Pictones, Cadurci, Aulerci, and other states of Western Gallia. When Vercingetorix (в. с. 52) was rousing all Galiia against Caesar, be ordered the Turnnes to join him. The contingent which they were called on to furnish against Caesar, during the siege of Alesia was 8000 men (vii. 75). But the Turones never gave Caesar much trouble, though Lncan calls them "instabiles" (i. 437), if the rerse is cenuine.

In Ptolemy (ii. 8. §14), the name is Toupoyteis, and the capital is Caesarodunum or Tours on the Loire. In the insurrection of Sacrovir in the time of Tiberius, the Turonii, as Tacitus calls them (Ans iii. 41, 46), rose against the Romans, bat they were soon put down. They are in the Lugdunensis of Ptoleiny. The chief part of the territory of the Turones was south of the Loire, and their name is the origin of the provincial name Touraine. Ukert (Gallien, p. 329) mentions a silver coin of the Turoni. On one side there is a female head with the legend "Turonos," and on the other "Cantorix" with the ficure of a galloping horse.

TURRIS LIBYSSONIS (Húpyos Mi&borcovos, Ptol.: I'orto Torres), a cown of Sardinia, and apparentiy one of the most considerable in the island. It is situated on the N. coast about 15 miles E. of the Gorditanian promontory (the Capo del Falcone), and on the spacious bay now culled Golfu dell' Asinara. Pliny tells us it was a Koman colony, and we may probably infer from its name that there was previously no town on the spot, but merely a fort or castellum. (Plin. iii. 12. s. 17.) It is noticed also by Ptoleny and in the Itineraries, but without any indication that it was a place of any importance. (Ptol. iii. 3. § 5; Itin. Ant. p. 83.) But the ancient remains still existing prove that it must have been a considerable town under the Roman Empire; and we learn from the inscriptions on ancient milestones that the principal road through the island ran directly from Caralis to Turris, a sufficient proof that the latter was a place much frequented. It was also an episcopal see during the early part of the middle ures. The existing port at l'orto Torres, which is almost wholly artificial. is based in great part on Roman foundations; and there exist also the remains of a temple (which, as we learn from an inscription, was dedicated to Fortune, and restored in the reign of Philip), of thermae, of a basilica and an aqueduct, as well as a bridge over the adjuining small river, still called the Fiume T'urritano. The ancient city continued to be inbabited till the 11 th century, when the greater part of the population migrated to Sassari, about 10 miles inland, and situated on a hill. This is still the second city of the island. (De la Marmora, Voy. en Sardaigne, vol. ii. pp. 363, 46s472; Snrth's Sardinia, pp. 263-266.) [E. H. B.]

TÜLUM (Eth. Turinus: Turi) a town of Apulia, mentioned ouly by Pliny, who enumerates the Turini among the towns of that province. (Plin. iii. 11.s. 16.) The name is writen Tutini in our present text of Pliny; but it is probable that we shouid read Turini, and that the site is marked by the present village of Turi, near Conversano, about 6 miles W. of Polignano. (Romatheli, vol. ii. p. 180.)

TURUNTUS (Toupoûrtos, Ptol. iii. 5. § 2), a river of European Sarmatia which fell into the Northern Ocean, and which, according to Marcian ( p .55 ), had its source in the Rhipsean mountains, but Ptolemy seems to place it in Mount Alaunus or Alsnus. Mannert (iv. p. 258) takes it to be the Windaw.

TUSCA'NIA (Eth. Tuscaniensis: Tascanella), a city of Southern Etruria, situated about 12 miles NE. of Tarquinii. It is mentioned only by Pliny, who enumerates the Tuscanienses among the municipal communities of Etruria, and in the Tabula, which places it on the Via Clolia, between Blers and Saturnia, but in a manuer that would afford little clue to its true position were it not identified by the resemblance of name with the modern Toscanella. (Plin. iii. 5. s. 8; Tab. Peut.) The name is found in an inscription, which confirms its municipal rank. (Murat. Inscr. p. 328.) But it appears to have been in Roman times an obscure town, and we find no allusion to it as of ancient Etruscan origin. Yet that it was so is rendered probable by the tombs that have been discovered on the site, and some of which contain sarcophagi and other relics of considerable interest; though none of these appear to be of very early date. The tombs have been carefully examined, and the antiquities preserved by a resident antiquary, Sig. Campanari, a circumstance which has given some celebrity to the name of Toscanella, and led to a very exaggerated estimate of the importance of Tuscania, which was apparently in ancient times never a place of any consideration. It was probably during the period of Etruscan independence a dependency of Tarquinii. The only remains of ancient buildings are some fragments of reticulated masonry, undoubtedly of the Roman periud. (Dennis's Etruria, vol. i. pp. 440-460.)

TUSCULA'NUM. [Tusculum, p. 1243, b.]
TU'SCULUM (Toúrкounov, Ptol. iii. 1. § 61; Tov́ $\sigma \kappa \lambda o y$, Strab. v. p. 237 ; Toú $\sigma \kappa \lambda o s$, Steph. B. p. 673: Eth. Tusculanus, Cic. Balb. 20; Liv. iii. 7, Scc.: Adj. Tusculus, Tib. i. 7. 57; Stat. Silv. iv. 4. 16: Tusculanensis, Cic. Fam. ix. 6 : Frascati and Il Tuscolo), a strong and ancient city of Latium, lying on the hills which forin a continuation of Mount Albanus on the W. When Dionysius of Halicarnassus (x. 20) places it at a distance of 100 stadia, or 121 miles, from Rome, he does not speak with his accustomed accuracy, since it was 120 stadia, or 15 miles, from that city by the Via Latina. Josephus (Ant. xviii. 7. S 6) places the imperial villa of Tiberius at Tusculum at 100 stadia from Rome, which, however, lay at some distance to the W. of the town. Fextus (s.v. Tuscos) makes Tusculum a diminutive of Tuscus, but there is but slight authority to comect the town with the Etruscans. According to common tradition, it was founded by Telegonus, the son of Ulysses and Circe; and hence we find its name paraphrased in the Latin puets as "Telegoni moenia" (Ov. Fast. iii. 91, iv. 71 ; Prop iii. 30. 4; Sil. It. xii. 535) and "Circaen moenia" (Hor. Epod. i. 30); and the hill on which it stood called "Telegoni juga parricidae" (Id. Od. iii. 29. 8), "Circaeum dorsum" (Sil. It. vii. 691), and "Telegoni jugera" (Stat. Silv. i. 3. 83). Thus Tusculun did not clain so remote an origin as many other Latin cities; and, as being founded a generation after the Trojan War, Virgil, a learned antiquary, consistently omits all notice of it in his Aeneid. The author of the treatise entitled Origo Gentis Romanae mentions that it was made n dependency or colony of Alba by Latinus Silvius (c. 17. § 6). After the destruction of Alba by Tullus Hostilius it appears to have recovered its independence, and to have become a republic under the government of a dictator.

But to descend from these remote periods to the more historical times. In the reign of Tarquinius

TUSCULUM.

Superbus, who courted the friendship of the Latin cities, Octavius Mamilius of Tusculum was the furemost man of all the race, tracing his descent from Ulysses and Circe. Him Tarquin conciliated by the gift of his daughter in marriage, and thus obtained the powerful alliance of his fannily and connections. (Lir. i. 49; Dionys. iv. 45.) The genealogical pretensions of the gens Mamilia are still to be seen on their coins, which bear on the obverse the head of Mercury, and on the reverse Ulysses in his travelling dress and with his dog. The alliance of Mamilius with Tarquin, however, was the main cause of the Latin War. After his expulsion from Rome, and unsuccessful attempt to regain his crown by means of the Etruscans, Tarquin took refuge with his son-in-law at Tusculum (Liv. ii. 15), and by his assistance formed an alliance with the confederacy of the thirty Latin cities. ( 16.18 ). The confederate army took up a position near Lake Regillus, a small sheet of water, now dry, which lay at the foot of the hill on which Tusculum is seated. This was the scene of the famous battle so fatal to the Latins, in B. C. 497. Mamilius, who commanded the Latin army, was killed by the hand of Titus Herminius; Tarquinius Superbus himself, who, though now adranced in years, took a part in the combat, was wounded; and the whole Latin army sustained an irretrievable defeat (ib. 19, 20; Dionys. vi. 4, seq.).

After the peace which ensued, the Tusculans remained for a long while the faithful allies of Rome; an attachment which drew down on their territory the incursions of the Volsci and Aequi, B. C. 461, 460. (Liv. iii. 7: 8.) In B. c. 458, when the Homan capitol was seized by the Sabine Appius Herdonius, the Tusculans gave a signal proof of their love and fidelity towards Rome. On the next morning after the arrival of the news, a large body of them marched to that city and assisted the Rumans in recovering the capitol; an act for which they received the public thanks of that people (ib. 18; Dionys. x. 16); and soon afterwards, Lacius Mamilius, the Tusculan dictator was rewarded with the gift of Roman citizenship. (Liv. ib. 29.) In the following year the Romans had an opportunity of repaying the obligation. The Aequi had seized the citudel of Tusculum by a nocturnal assault. At that time, Fabius with a Roman army was encamped before Antium; but, on hearing of the misfortune of the Tusculans, he immediately broke up his camp and flew to their assistance. The enterprise, however, was not of such easy execution as the expulsion of Herdouius, and several months were spent in combats in the neighbourhood of Tusculam. At length the Tusculans succeeded in recapturing their citadel by reducing the Aequi to a state of famine, whom they dismised after compelling them to pass unarmed under the yoke. But as they were flying homewards the Roman consul overtook them on Mount Algidus, and slew them to a man. (Ib. 23; Dionys. x. 20.)

In the following year, the Aequi, under the conduct of Grucchus, ravaged the Labican and Tusculan territories, and encamped on the Algidus with their booty. The Roman ambassadors sent to exportulate with them were treated with insolence and contempt. Then Tit. Quinctius Cincionatus was chosen dictator, who defeated the Aequi, and caused them, with their commander Gracchus, to pass ignominiously under the yoke. (Liv. ib. 25-28.) Algidus became the acene of a struggle between the Homans and Aequi on two or three subsequent occasions, as in B. C. 452 and 447. ( lb .31 , 42.) In the latter battle the Romans sustained a severe defeat, being obliged to abandon their camp and take refuge in Tusculum. After this, we do not again hear of the Tosculais till B. c. 416. At that period, the Romans, suspecting the Labicans of having entered into a league with the Aeqni, charged the Tusculans to keep a watch upon them. These suspicions were justified in the following year, when the Labicans, in conjunction with the Aequi, ravaged the territory of Tusculum and encamped apon the Algidus. The Roman army despatched aguinst them was defeated and dispersed, owing to the dissensions among its chiefs. Many of these, however, together with the élite of the army, took refuge at Tusculum; and Q. Servilius Priscus, being chosen dictator, changed the face of affairs in eight davs, by mating the enemy and capturing Labicum. (Id. iv. 45-47.)
This steady friendship between Tuscalum and Rome, marked for so many years by the strongest tokens of mutual goodwill, was at length interrupted by an occurrence which took place in e. c. 379. In that year the Tusculans, in conjunction with the Gabinians and Labicans, accused the Praenestines before the Roman senate of making inroads on their lands; but the senate gave no heed to their complaints. Next year Camillus, after defeating the Volscisns, was surprised to find a number of Tusculans among the prisoners whom he bad maia, and, still more so when, on questioning them, be found that they had tuken up arms by public consent. These prisoners he introdaced before the Roman senate, in order to prove how the Tusculacs had abandoned the ancient alliance. So war was declared against Tusculum, and the conduct of it entrusted to Camillus. Bat the Tuscalans would not accept this declaration of hostilities, and opposed the Roman arms in a manner that has scarcely been paralleled before or since. When Camillus entered their territory he found the peasants engaged in their usual avocations; prorisions of all sorts wero offered to his army; the gates of the town were standing open; and as the legions defiled through the streets in all the panoply of war, the citizens within, like the countrymen without, were seen intent upon their daily business, the schools resounded with the hum of pupils, and not the slightest token of hostile preparation could be discerned. Then Camillus invited the Tusculan dictator to Rome. When he appeared before the senate in the Curia Hostilia, not only were the existing treaties with Tusculum confirmed, but the Roman franclise also was shortly afterwards bestowed upon it, a privilege at that time but rarely conferred.

It was this last circumstance, however, together with their unshaken fidelity towards Ronse, that drew down upon the Tusculans the hatred and vengeance of the Latins; who, in the year B. c. 374 , having burnt Satricum, with the exception of the temple of Matuta, directed their arms against Tusculum. By an unexpected attack, they oblained possession of the city; but the inhabitants retired to the citadel with their wives and children, and despatched messengers to Rome with news of the invasion. An army was sent to their relief, and the, Latins in turn became the besieged instead of the besiegers; for whilst the Romans encompassed the walls of the city, the Tusculans made sorties upon the enemy from the arx. In a short time the lomans took the town by assault and slew all the Latins. (Ib. 33.) Servius Sulpicius and L. Quinctius, both military tribunes, were the Roman commanders on this occasion; and on some rare gold coins, still extant, of the former family, are seen on the obverse the heads of Castor and Pollux, deities peculiarly worshipped at Tusculam (Cic. Div. i. 43; of. Festus, &.v. Stroppus), and on the reverse the inage of a city with the letters trscyL on the gate.

From this period till the time of the great Latin war we have little to record of Tusculum except the frustrated attempt of the Veliterni on its territory (Liv. iv. 36) and the horrible devastations committed on it by the Gauls, when in alliance with the Tiburtines, in B.c. 357. (Id. vii. 11.) After their long attachment to Rome we are totally at a loss to conjecture the motives of the Tusculans in joining the Latin cities against her. The war which ensued is marked by the weil-known anecdote of Titus Manlius, who, being challenged by Geminus Mettius, the commander of the Tusculan cavalry, attacked and killed him, against strict orders to the contrary; for which breach of military discipline he was put to death by his father. (Id. viii. 7.) The war ended with the complete subjugation of the Latins ; and by the famous senatusconsultum regulating the settlement of Latium, the Tusculans were treated with great indulgence. Their defection was ascribed to the intrigues of a few, and their right of citizenship was preserved to thein. (I6. 14.) This settlement took place in B. C. 335. In 321 the Tusculans were accused by the tribune, M. Flavins, of haring supplied the Veliterni and Privernates with the means of carrying on war against Rume. There does not appear to have been any foundation for this charge; it seems to have been a mere calumny; nevertheless the Tusculans, with their wives and children, having pat on mourning habits, went in a body to Rome, and implored the tribes to acquit them of so odious an imputation. This spectacle moved the compassion of the Romans, who, without further inquiry, acquitted them unanimously; with the exception of the tribe Pollia, which voted that the men of Tusculum should be scourged and put to death, and the women and children sold, agreeably to the laws of war. This rote remained indelibly imprinted on the memory of the Tusculans to the very latest period of the Roman Republic; and it was found that scarce one of the tribe Papiria, to which the Tusculans belonged, ever voted in favour of a candidate of the tribe Pollia. (Ib. 37.)

Tusculum alwars remained a municipinm, and some of its families were distinguished at Rome. (Id. vi. 21-26; Orell. Inscr. 775, 1368, 3042.) Among them may be mentioned the gens Mamilia, the Porcia, which produced the two Catos, the Fulvia, Coruscania, Juventia, Fonteia, &ce. (Cic. p. Planc. 8, p. Font. 14; Corn. Nep. Cat 1; Val. Max. iii. 4. §6.)

Hannibal appears to have made an unsuccessful attempt apon, or perhape rather a mere deinonstration against, Tusculum in B. c. 212. (Liv. xxvi. 9 ; ef. Sil. It. xii. 534.) In the civil wars of Marius and Sulla, its territory seems to have been distributed by the latter. (Auct. de Coloniis.) Its walls were also restored, as well as during the wars of Pompey. We have no notices of Tusculum under the Empire. After the war of Justinian and the inronds of the Lombards, Tusculum regained even more than its ancient splendour. For several centuries during the middle ages the counts of Tusculum were supreme in Rome, and could almost dispose of the papal chair. The ancient city remained entire till near the end of the 12th century. At that period there were constant wars between the Tusculans and Komans, the former of whom were supported by the German emperors and protected by the popes. According to Romualdus, archbishop of Salerno (apud Buronium, vol. xix. p. 340), the walls of Tusculum were razed in the pontificate of Alexander III. in the year 1168; but perhape a more probable account by Richard de S . Germano (ap. Muratori, Script. t. vii. p. 972) ascribes the destruction of the city to the permission of the German emperor in the year 1191.

Towards the end of the Republic and beginning of the Empire, Tusculum was one of the favourite resorts of the wealthy Romans. Strabo (v. p. 239) describes the hill on which it was built as adorned with many villas and plantations, especially on the side that looked towards Rome. But though the air was salubrious and the country fine, it dres not appear, like Tibur, to have been a favourite resort of the Roman poets, nor do they speak of it much in their verses. The Anio, with its fall, besides other natural beauties, lent a charm to Tibur which would have been sought in rain at Tusculum. Lacullus seems to have been one of the first who built a villa there, which seens to have been on a magnificent scale, but with little arable land attached to it. (Plin. xviii. 7. s. 1.) His parks and gardens, bowever, which were adorned with aviaries and fishponds, extended to the Anio, a distance of several miles; whence he was noted in the report of the censors as making more use of the broom than the plough. (Ib. and Varr. R. R. i. 13, iii. 3, seq.; Columella, i. 4.) On the road towards Rome, in the Vigna Angelotti, is the ruin of a large circular mausoleum, 90 feet in diameter inside, and very much resembling the tomb of Caecilia Metella on the Via Appia. It evidently belongs to the last period of the Republic; and Nibby (Dintorni, p. 344) is inclined to regard it as the sepulchre of Lucullus, mentioned by Plutarch (Vit. Luc. 43), though that is commonly identified with a smaller mausoleum between Frascati and the Villa Rufinella. Besides the villa of Lucullus, we hear of those of Cato, of Cicero and his brother Quintus, of Marcus Brutus, of Q. Hortensius, of T. Anicins, of Balbus, of Caesar, of L. Crassus, of Q. Metellus, &c. It would now be vain to seek for the sites of most of these; though it may perhaps be conjectured that Cato's stood on the hill to the NE. of the town, which seems to hare been called Mons Porcius from it, and still bears the name of Monte Porzio. So much interest, however, is attached to the villa of Cicero (Tusculanam), as the favourite retirement in which he probably composed a great portion of his philosophical works, and especially the Disputations which take their name from it, that we shall here present the reader with the chief particulars that can be collected on the subject. Rospecting the site of the villa there have been great disputes, one school of topographers seeking it at Grotta Ferrata, another at the Villa Rufinella. Both these places lie to the W. of Tusculum, but the latter nearer to it, and on an eminence, whilst Grotta Ferrata is in the plain. We have seen from Strabo that the Roman villas lay chiefly on the W. side of the town; and it will be found further on that Cicero's adjoined those of Lucullus and Gabinius, which were the most splendid and remarkable, and must therefore have belonged to those noticed by Strabo. The scholiast on Horace (Epod. i. 30) describes Cicero's as being "ad latera superiora" of the Tusculan hill; and if this anthority may be relied on, it dispuses of the claims of Grotta Ferratu. The plural " latera " also determines us in favour of the W. side of the town, or Villa Rufinella, where the hill has two ridges. At this spot some raluable remains were discovered in 1741 , especially a beantiful nosaic, now in the Museo Pio Clementino. The villa belonged originally to Sulla (Plin. xxii. 6. 8. 6). It was, as we have said, close to that of Lu cullus, from which, in neighbourly fashion, Cicero was accustomed to fetch books with his own hand. (IVe Fin. iii. 2.) It was likewise near that of the consul (iabinius (pro Iom. 24, post Ren. 7), which also strod on the Tusculan hill (in Pis. 21), probably on the site of the Villa Falcomieri. In his oration pro Sestio (43), Cicero says that his own villn was a mere cottage in comparison with that of Gabinius, though the latter, when tribune, had described it as "pictam," in order to excite envy against its owner. Yet from the particulars which we learn from Cicero himself, his retirement must have been far from deficient in splendour. The money which he lavished on it and on his villa at Pompeii brought him deeply into debt. (Ep.ad Att. ii. 1.) And in another letter (Ib. iv. 2) he complains that the consuls valued that at Tusculum at only quingentis millibus, or betwen $4000 l$. and 5000 . This would be indeed a very small sum, to judge by the description of it which we may cullect from his own writings. Thns we learn that it contained two gymnasia (Div. i. 5), an upper one called Lyceum, in which, like Aristotle, he was accastomed to walk and dispute in the morning (Tusc. Ihisp. ii. 3), and to which a library wan attached (IViv. ii. 3), and a lower one, with shady walks like Plato's garden, to which he gave the name of the Academy. (Tusc. Disp. ii. 3.) The latter was perhaps on the spot now occupied by the Casino of the Villa Rufinella. Both were adorned with beantiful statues in marble and bronze. (E.p. ad Att. i. 1. 8, 9, 10.) The rilla likewise contained a little atrium (atriolum, $I b$. i. 10, ad Quint. Fr. iii. 1), a small portico with exedria (ad Fam vii. 23), a bath (lb. xiv. 20), a covered promerade ("tecta ambulatiuncula," ad Att. xiii. 29), and an horologium (oul fam xvi. 18). In the excarations made in the time of Zuzzeri, a sun-dial was discovered here, and placed in the Collegio Romano. The villa, like the town and neighbourhood, was supplied with water by the Aqua Crabra. (De Leg. Agr. iii. 31.) But of all this magnificence scarce a vestige remains, unless we may regard as such the ruins now called Scuola di Cicerone, close to the ancient walls. These consist of a long corridor with eight chambers, forming apparently the ground floor of an upper building, and if they belonged to the villa they were probably granaries, as there is not the least trace of decoration.

We will now proceed to consider the remains at Frascati. Strabo) (v. p. 239) indicates where we mast look for Tusculum, when he describes it as situated on the high ridge connected with Mount Albanus, and serving to form with it the deep valley which stretches out towards Mount Algidas. This ridge was known by the name of the Tusculani Colles. We have already seen that Tusculum was conpmed of two distinct parts, the town itself and the arx or citadel, which was isolated from it, and seated on a higher point; so elerated, indeed, that when the Aequi had pussession of it, as before narrated, they could descry the Roman army defiling out of the gates of Rome. (Dionys. x. 20.) It was indeed on the very nut. or pinnacle, of the ridge, a point isolated br cliffs of great elevation, and approachable only by a very steep ascent. According to Sir W. Gell (Topogr. gec. p. 429) it is 2079 French feet above the level of the sea. Hero a few traces of the walls of the citadel remain. from which, and from the shape of the rock on which the town stood, we may see that it formed an irregular oblong, about 2700 feet in circumference. There must have been a gate towards the town, where the ascent is less steep; and there are also vestiges of another gate on the E. side, towards La Molara, and of a mad which ran into the Via Latina. Under the rack are caves, which probably served for sepulchres. The city lay immediately under the ary, on the W. side. Its form was a narrow oblong approaching to a triangle, about 3000 feet in length, and varying in breadth from about 1000 to 500 feet. Thus it is represented of a triangnlar shape on the coins of the gens Sulpicia. Some vestiges of the walls remain, expecially on the N . and S. sides. Of these the ancient parts consist of large quadrilateral pieces of local tufo, some of them being 4 to 5 feet long. They are repaired in places with opus incertum, of the age of Sulla, and with opus reticulatum. Including the arx, Tusculum was about $1 \frac{1}{2}$ mile in circunference. Between the town and the citadel is a large quadrilateral piscina, 86 feet long by 67\& broad, divided into three compartments, probably intended to collect the rain water, and to serve as a public washingplace. One of the theatres lies immediately under this cistern, and is more perfect than any in the vicinity of hone. The scena, indeed is partly destroyed and covered with earth; but the benches or rows of seats in the carea, of which there are nine, are still nearly entire, as well as the steps cut in them for the purpose of commodious descent. There are three flights of these steps, which consequently divide the cavea into four compartments, or cumei. The spectators faced the W., and thus enjoyed the magnificent prospect over the Alban valley and the plains of Latium, with home and the sea in the distance. Abeken (Mittel-Italien, p. 200), considers this theatre to belong to the early times of the E:mpire. Sir W. Gell, on the other hand, pronounces it to be earlier. (Topngr. of Rome, p. 429.) Near this edifice were discovered in 1818, by Lucien Buonaparte, the beautiful bronze statue of Apollo and those of the two Rutiliae. The last are now in the Vatican, in the corridor of the Museo Chiaramonti. At the back of this strncture are vestiges of another theatre, or odeum; and at its side two parallel walls, which bounded the street leading to the citadel. On the W. of the theatre is an ancient road ingood preservation, leading to one of the gates of the city, where it is joined by another raad. Clase to the walls near the piecina is an ancient cistern, and at its side a small fountain with an inscription; a little further is a Roman milestone, recording the distance of 15 miles. Besides these objects, there are also remains of a columharium and of an amphitheatre, but the latter is small and not of high antiquity. Many fragments of architecture of an extremely ancient style are strewed around. Within the walls of the town, in what appears to have been the principal street, several inscriptidns still remain, the chief of which is one on a kind of pedestal, recording that the object to which it belonged was sacred to Jupiter and Liberty. Other inscriptions found at Tusculum are preserved in the Villa Rufinella. One of them relates to M. Fulvius Nobilior, the conqueror of Aetolia; another to the poet Diphilos, mentioned by Cicero in his letters to Atticus (ii. 19).

Near the hermitage at Camaldoli was discovered in 1667 a very ancient tomb of the Furii, as recorded by Falconieri, in his Inscrr. Athleticae, p. 143, seq. It was cut in the rock, and in the middle of it was a sarcuphagus, about 5 feet long, with a pedimentshaped cover. Round it were twelve urns placed in loculi, or coffins. The inscriptions on these urns were in so ancient a character that it bore a great resemblarice to the Etruscan and Pelasgic. The form of the $P$ resembled that in the sepulchral inscriptions of the Scipios, as well as that of the $L$. The diphthong OV was used for V, and P for $\mathbf{F}$. The inscriptions on the urns related to the Furii, that on the sarcophagus to Luc. Turpilius. There were also fragments of fictile vases, commonly calied Etruscan, and of an elegant cornice of terra cotta, painted with various colours. (Nibby, Lintorni, iii. p. 360.)

We shall only add that the ager Tusculanus, though now but scantily supplied with water, formerly contributed to furnish Rome with that element by means of the Aqua Tepula and Aqua Virgo. (Front. Aq. 8, seq.)

TUSCUM MARE. [Tyrrhinum Mare.]
TUTA'TIO, a place in Noricum of uncertain site (It. Ant. p. 277 ; Tab. Peut., where it is called Tutastio.)
TU'THOA (TovOda), a river of western Arcadia, flowing into the Ladon, on the confines of Thelpusa and Heraea. It is now called Langadhia, and joins the Ladon opposite to the small village of Renési. (Paus. viii. 25. § 12 ; Leake, Morea, vol. ii p. 95, Peloponnesiaca, p. 223.)

TU'TIA, a small stream in the neighbourhood of Rome, mentioned only by Livy and Silius Italicus, who inform us that Hannibal encamped on its banks, when he was commencing his retreat from before the walls of Rome. (Liv. $x \times v i .11$; Sil. Ital. xiii. 5.) Livy places it 6 miles from the city, and it is probable that it was on the Salarian Way, by which Hannibal subsequently commenced his retreat: in this case it may probably be the stream now called the Fiume di Conca, which crosses that road between 6 and 7 miles from Rome, and has been supposed by Gell and Nibby to be the Allia. [Allia.] Silius Italicus expressly tells us that it was a very small stream, and little known to fame. The nume is written Tuia in many editions of that poet, but it appears that the best MSS. both of Silius and of Livy have the form Tutia [E. H. B.]

TU'TIA (Toutria, Plut. Sert. 19), a place in the territory of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis not far from Sucro, the scene of a hattle between Pompey and Sertorius (Plut. l. c.; Florus, iii. 22.) It is thought to be the modern Tous. But perhaps the conjecture of Ukert (ii. pt. i. p. 413) is correct that in both these passages we shonld read Turia.

TUTICUM. [Equus Tuticus.]
TUTZIS (It. Anton. p. 162), a small fortified town in Aethiopia, situated 12 miles N. of Tachompso, upon the western side of the Nile. The ruins of Tutzis are suppnsed to be near, and NW. of the present village of Gyrseh. (Belzoni, Travels, vol. i. p. 112.)

 also called Thyana or Thiana, and originally Thoana, from Thuas, a Thracian king, who was believed to have pursued Orestes and Pylades thus far, and to have founded the town (Arrian, Peripl. P. E. p. 6; Steph. B. s. v.). Report said that it was built, like Zela in Pontus, on a causeway of Semiramis; but it is certain that it was sitnated in Cappadocia at the foot of Mount Taurus, near the Cilician gates, and on a small tributary of the Lamus (Strab. xii. p. 537, xiii. p. 587.) It stood on the highruad to Cilicia and Syria at a distance of 300 stadia from Cybistra, and 400 stadia (according to the Peut. Table 73 miles) from Mazaca (Strab. l.c.; Ptol. v. 6. § 18 ; comp. Plin. vi. 3; It. Ant. p. 145). Its situation on that road and close to so important a pass must have rendered Tyana a place of great consequence, buth in a commercial and a military point of view. The plain around it, moreover, was extensive and fertile, and the whole district received from the town of Tyana the name of Tyanitis (Tuavitis, Strab. l.c.). From its coins we learn that in the reign of Caracalla the city became a Roman colony; afterwards, having for a time belonged to the empire of Palmyra, it was conquered by Aurelian, in A.d. 272 (Vopisc. Aurel. 22, foll.), and Valens raised it to the rank of the capital of Cappaducia Secunda (Basil. Magn. Epist. 74, 75; Hierocl. p. 700; Malala, Chron.; Not. Imp.) Its capture by the Turks is related by Cedrenus ( $p$. 477). Tyana is celebrated in history as the native place of the famous impostor Apollonius, of whom we have a detailed biography by Philostratus. In the vicinity of the town there was a temple of Zeus on the borders of a lake in a marshy plain. The water of the lake itself was cold, but a hot well, sacred to Zeus, issued from it (Pbilostr. Vit. Apoll. i. 4; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6; Aristot. Mir. Ausc. 163.) This well was called Asmabaeon, and from it Zeus himself was surnamed Asmahaeus. These details about the locality of Tyana have led in modern times to the discovery of the true site of the ancient city. It was formerly believed that Kara Hissar marked the site of Tyana; for in that district many ruins exist, and its inhabitants still maintain that their town once was the capital of Cappadocia. But this place is too far north to be identified with Tyana; and Hamilton (Researches, ii. p. 302, foll.) has shown most satisfactorily, what others had conjectured before him, that the true site of Tyana is at a place now called Kiz Hissur, south-west of Nigdeh, and between this place and Erekli. The ruins of Tyana are considerable, but the most conspicuous is an aqueduct of granite, extending seven or eight miles to the foot of the mountains. There are also massy foundations of several large buildings, shafts, pillars, and one handsome column still stanaing. Two miles south of these ruins, the hot spring also still bubbles forth in a cold swamp or lake. (leake, Asia Minor, 61; Eckhel, iii. p. 195; Sestini, p. 60.) [L. TYLE (Tu入 $\eta$, Polyb. iv. 46), a town of Thrace, on the coast of the Euxine, where the Gauls established a seat of government ( $\beta a \sigma$ ( $\lambda \subset i 0 \nu$ ), and which Reichard identifies with Kilios. Steph. B. (p. 670) calls it Túdis, and places it on the Haemus. [J. R.]

TYLISSUS, a town of Crete (Plin. iv. 20), the position of which can only be conjectured. On its ancient coins are found on the reverse a young man holding in his right hand the bead of an ibex or wild goat, and in his left a bow. These types on the coins of Tylissus led the most distinguished numismatist of the last century (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 321) to fix its situation somewhere between Cydonia and Elyrus, the bow being common on the coins of the one, and the ibex's head on those of the other, of these two cities. Höck (Kreta, vol. i. p. 433) and Torres Y. Ribera (Periplus Cretae, p. 324) adopt this suggestion of Eckhel, and place Tylissus on the S. coast at the W. extremity of the island near the modern Sélino-Kastéli. (Pashley, Travels, vol. i. p. 162.)
[E. B. J.]
TYLUS or TYRUS (Túnos, Ptol. vi. 7. § 47; Tópos, Strab. xvi. p. 766 ; Steph. B. a. v.), an island in the Persian gulf, off the coast of Arabia. It has been already mentioned that according to some traditions, this island was the original seat of the Phoenicians, who named the city of Tyre after it when they had settled on the coasts of the Mediterranean. [Phoknicua, p. 607.] Pliny describes the island as abounding in pearls. (Plin. vi. 28. s. 32 , xii. 10 . s. 21 , xvi. 41. s. 80 ; Arrian, Amab. vii. 20 ; Theophr. Hist. Plant. iv. 9, v. 6 )

TYMANDUS (Tú $\mu a v \delta o s: ~ E t h . ~ T \nu \mu a \nu \delta \eta \nu \delta s)$, a place in Phrygis, between Philomelinm and Sozopolis. (Conc. Chalced. pp. 244, and 247: in this pnssage the reading Mavonvề ad入ts is corrupt; Hierocl. p. 673, where the name is miswritten Túnardoos.) It is possible that Tymandos may be the same as the Dymas mentioned by Livy (xxxviii. 15), for which some MSS. have Dimas or Dinias.
TYMBRES, a tributary of the Sangarins, in the north of Phrygia (Liv. xxxviii. 18), is in all probability the same river as the one called by Pliny (vi. 1) Tembrogius, which joined the Sangarius, as Livy says, on the borders of Phrygia and Galatia, and, flowing in the plain of Dorylaenm, separated Phrygia Epictetus from Phrygia Salutaris. It seems also to be the same river as the Thyaris and Bathys mentioned in Byzantine writers. (Cinnamus, v. 1. p. 111 ; Richter, Wallfahrten, p. 522, foll.) [L. S.]

TYMPHAEA, TYMPHAEI. [TYMPHE.]
TYMPHE (Tv $\phi \phi$ ), a mountain on the confines of Macedonia. Epeirus, and Thessaly, a part of the range of Pindus, which gave its name to the district Tymphafa (Tujpala), and to the penple, the Truphari (Tuppaiol, Steph. B e. v.). As it is stated that the river Arachthas rose in Mt. Tymplie, and that Aeginium was a town of the Tymphaei (Strab. vii. pp. 325, 327), Mt. Tymphe may be identified with the summits near Métrono, and the Tymphaei may be regarded as the inhabitants of the whole of the upper valley of the Peneius from Métrovo or Kalabaika. The name is written in some editions of Strabo, Stymphe and Stymphaei, and the form Stymphaea alen occurs in Arrian (i. 7); but the orthogruphy without the $s$ is perhaps to be preferred. The question whether Stymphalis or Stymphalia is the same district as Tymphaea has been discussed elsewhere. [Stymphalis.] Pliny in one passage calls the Tymphaei an Aetolian people (iv. 2. 5. 3), and in another a Macedonian (iv. 10. s, 17), while Stophanus B. describes the mountain as Thesprotian, and Strabo ( $l$ c. c.) the people as an Epirotic race.

Stephanus B. mentions a town Tymphaea, which is probably the same place called Trampya (Tpauzúa) by others, where Polysperchon, who was a native of this district, murdered Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great. (Lycophr. 795 ; Diodor. 2x. 28, with Wesseling's note ; Steph. B. s. e. Tpau*ía.) (Leake, Northern Greece, vol. i. p. 422, vol. ii. pp. 275, 276.)

TYMPHRESTUS. [Pindus.]
TY'NDARIS (Tuvסapls. Strab.; Tuvi̊dplov, Ptol. : Eth. Tuvסapitys, Tyndaritanus: Tindaro), a city on the N. coast of Sicily, between Mylae (Milazzo) and Agathyrna. It was situated on a bold and lofty hill standing out as a promontory into the spacious bay bounded by the Punta di Milazzo on the E, and the Capo Calavà on the W., and was distant according to the Itineraries 36 miles from Messana. (It Ant. p. 90 ; Tab. Peut.) It was a Greak city, and one of the latest of all the cities in Sicily that could claim a purely Greek origin, haring been founded by the elder Dionysins in B. C 39.5. The original settlers were the remains of the Messenian exiles, who had been driven from Naupactus, Zacynthus, and the Peloponnese by the Spartans after the close of the Peloponnesian War. These had at first been established by Dionysius at Messana, when he repeopled that city [Messana] ; but the Spartans having taken umbrage at this, he transferred them to the site of Tyndaris, which had previously been included in the territory of Abacaenum. The colonists themelves gave to their new city the name of Tyndaris, from their native divinities, the Tyndaridae or Dioscuri, and readily admitting fresh citizens from other quarters, soon raised their whole popalation to the number of $\mathbf{5 0 0 0}$ citizens. (Diod. xiv. 78.) The new city thus rose at once to be a place of considerable importance. It is next mentioned in $\mathbf{R}$. C. 344, when it was one of the first cities that declared in farour of Timoleon after his landing in Sicily. (Id. xvi.69.) At a later period we find it mentioned as espousing the cause of Hieron, and supporting him during his war against the Mamertines, B. C. 269. On that occasion he rested his position upon Tyndaris on the left, and on Tauromenium on the right. (Diod. $x$ xii. Exc. H. p. 499.) Indeed the strong position of Tyndaris rendered it in a strategic point of view as important a post upon the Tyrrhenimn, as Tauromenium was apon the Sicilian sea, and hence we find it frequently mentioned in subsequent wara In the First Punic War it was at first dependent upon Carthage; and though the citizens, alarmed at the progress of the Roman amms, were at one time on the point of rovolting to Rome, they were restrained by the Carthaginians, who carried off nll the chief citizens as hostages. (Diod. xxiii. p. 502.) In b. c. 25\%, a sea-fight took place off Tyndaris, between that city and the Liparaean islands, in which a Rornan fleet under C. Atilius obtained some advantage over the Carthaginian fleet, but withoat any decisive result. (Poly. i. 25 ; Zonar. viii. 12.) The Roman fleet is described on that occasion as touching at the promontory of Tyndaris, but the city had not yet fallen into their hands, and it was not till after the fall of Panormus, in B. c. 254, that Tyndaris expelled the Carthaginian garrison, and joined the Roman alliance. (Diod. xxiii. p. 505.) We hear but little of Tyndaris under the Roman government, but it appears to have been a flourishing and considerable city. Cicero calls it "nobilissima civitas" (Verr. iii. 43), and we learn from him that the inhabitants had displayed their zeal and fidelity towards the Romans upon many occasions. Among others they supplied naval forces to the armament of Scipio Africunus the Younger, a service for which he requited them by restoring them a statue of Mercury which had been carried off by the Carthaginians, and which continued an object of great veneration in the city, till it was again carried off by the rapacious Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 39-42, v. 47.) Tyndaris was also one of seventeen cities which had been selected by the Roman senate, apparently as an honorary distinction, to contribute to certain offerings to the temple of Venus at Firyx. (Ib. v. 47 ; Zumpt, ad loc. ; Diod. iv. 83.) In other respects it had no peculiar privileges, and was in the condition of an ordinary municipal town, with its own magistrates, local senate, \&cc., bat was certainly in the time of Cicero one of the most considerable places in the island. It, bowever, suffered severely from the exactions of Verres (Cic. Verr. ll. cc.), and the inhabitants, to revenge themselves on their oppressor. publicls demolished his statue as soon as he had quitted the island. (Ib. ii. 66.)

Tyndaris again bore a considerable part in the war between Sextus Pompeius and Octavian (b. c. 36). It was one of the points occupied and fortified by the former, when preparing for the defence of the Sicilian straits, but was taken by Agrippa after his naval victory at Mylae, and became one of his chief posts, from which he carried on offensive warfare against Pompey. (Appian, B. C. v. 105, 109, 116.) Subsequently to this we hear nothing more of Tyndaris in history ; but there is no doubt of its having continued to subsist throughout the period of the Roman Empire. Strabo speaks of it as one of the places on the $\mathbf{N}$. cosst of Sicily which, in his time, still deserved the name of cities; and Pliny gives it the title of a Colonia. It is probable that it received a colony under Augastus, as we find it bearing in an inscription the titles of "Colonia Augusta Tyndaritanorum." (Strab. vi. p. 272 ; Plin. iii. 8. 8. 14; Ptol. iii. 4. § 2 ; Orell. Inscr. 955.) Pliny indeed mentions a great calamity which the city had sustained, when (be tells us) half of it was swallowed up by the sea, probably from an earthquake having caused the fall of part of the hill on which it stands, but we have no clue to the date of this event; (Plin. ii. 92. s.94.) The Itineraries attest the existence of Tyodaris, apparently still as a considerable place, in the fourth century. (Itim. Ant. pp. 90, 93; Tab. Peut.)

The site of Tyndaris is now wholly deserted, but the name is retained by a church, which crowns the most elevated point of the hill on which the city formerly stood, and is still called the Madonna di Tindano. It is 650 feet above the sea-level, and forms a conspicuous landmark to sailors. Considerable ruins of the ancient city are also visible. It occupied the whole plateau or summit of the hill, and the remains of the ancient walls may be traced, at intervals, all round the brow of the cliffs, except in one part, facing the sea, where the cliff is now quite precipitous. It is not improbable that it is here that a part of the cliff fell in, in the manner recorded by Pling (ii. 92. s. 94). Two gates of the city are also still distinctly to be traced. The chief monuments, of which the ruins are still extant within the circuit of the walls, are: the theatre, of which the remains are in imperfect condition, but sufficient to show that it was not of large size, and apparently of Roman construction, or at least, like that of Tauromenium, rebuilt in Roman times upon the Greek foundations; a large edifice with two handsome stone arches, commonly called a Gyinnasium, but the real purpose of which is very difficult to determine; several other edifices of Roman times, but of wholly uncertain character, a mosaic pavement, and some Roman tombs. (Serra di Falco, Antichità della Sicilia, vol. v. part vi.; Smyth's Sicily, p. 101 ; Hoare's Classical Tour, vol. ii. p. 217, &cc.) Numerous inscriptions, fragments of sculpture, and architectural decorations, as well as coins, vases, &cc. have also been discovered on the site.

TYNDIS (Túrois, Ptol. vii. 1. § 16), a river of India intra Gangem, which flowed into the Bay of Bengal. There is great donbt which of two rivers, the Manades (Mahanáda) or the Mresolus (Godávery), represents this stream. According to Mannert it was the southern branch of the former river (v.l. p. 173). But, on the whole, it is more likely that it is another name for the Godávery.

 a town of Triphylia in Elis, mentioned by Strabo along with Hypana It was taken by Philip in the Social War. It was situated in the mountains in the interior of the country, but its exact site is uncertain. Leake supposes it to be represented by the ruins near Platian $\dot{a}$; but Boblaye supposes these to be the remains of Aepy or Aepium [AkPY], and that Typaneas stood on the hill of Makrysia. (Strab. viii. P. 343 ; Polyb. iv. 77-79 ; Steph. TYRA'CIA or TYRACI'NA (Tupaxiva, Steph. B : Eth. Tyraciensis, Plin.), a city of Sicily, of which very little is known. It is noticed by Stephanus as "a small but tlourishing city;" and the Tyracienses are nentioned by Pliny among the manicipal commanities of the interior of Sicily. (Steph. B. s. v.; Plin. iii. 8. s. 14.) It is doubtful whether the "Tyracinus, princeps civitatis," mentioned by Cicero (Verr. iii. 56) is a citizen of Tyracia or one of Helorus who bore the proper name of Tyracinus. In either case the name was probably derived from the city: but though the existence of this is clearly established, we are wholly without any clue to its position.

Several writers would identify the Trisacia (Tpivaxia) of Diodorus (xii. 29), which that writer describes as having been one of the chief towns of the Siculi, until it was taken and destroyed by the Syracusans in B. C. 439, with the Tyracinae of Stephanus and Tyracia of Pliny. Both names being otherwise unknown, the readings are in both cases uncertain: but Diodorus seems to represent Trinacia as having been totally destroyed, which would sufficiently account for its not being again

TYRANGI'TAE (Tuparyeitai, Tuparүє́tal, or Tvpєүе́тац, Strab. vii. p. 289, &c.; Ptol. iii. 5. § 25), literally, the Getae of the Tyras, an immigrant tribe of European Sarmatia dwelling E. of the river Tyras, near the Harpii and Tagri, and, according to Ptolemy, the norihern neighbours of Lower Muesia. Pling (v. 12. s. 26) calls them, with more correct orthography, Tyragetae, and represents them as dwelling on a large islund in the Tyras. [T. H. D.]

TYRANNOBOAS (Tupayyo8bas), an emporiun on the western coast of Bengal between Mandagara and Byzantium, noticed by the author of the Periplus (p. 30.) It cannut now be identified with any place.

TYRAS ( $\delta$ Túpas, Strab. ii. p. 107), one of the principal rirers of European Sarmatia. According to Herodotus (iv. 51) it rose in a large lake, whilst Ptolemy (iii. 5. § 17, 8. § 1, \&cc.) places its sources in Mount Carpates, and Strabo (l. c) says that they are unknown. The account of Herodotus, however, is correct, as it rises in a lake in Gallicia. (Georgii, Alce-Geogr. p. 269.) It ran in an easterly direction parallel with the Ister, and formed part of the boundary between Dacia and Sarmatia. It fell into the Pontus Euxinus to the NE. of the mouth of the Ister; the distance between them being, according to Strabo, 900 stadia (Strab. vii. p. 305, seq.), and, accordiug to Pliny (iv. 12. s. 26), 130 miles (froun the Pseudustoma). Scyinnus (Fr. 51) describes it as of easy navigation, and abounding in tish. Ovid (ex Pont. iv. 10.50) speaks of its rapid course. At a later period it obtained the name of Danastris or Danastus (Amm. Marc. xxxi. 3. § 3; Jornand. Get. 5; Const. Porphyr. de Adm. Imp. 8), whence its mixlern name of Dniester (Neister), though the Turks still call it Tural. (Cf. Herod. iv. 11, 47, 82; Sylax, p. 29; Surab. i. p. 14; Mela, ii. 1, \&c.; also Schaffarik, Slav. Allerth. i. p. 505.) The form Túpis is sometimes found. (Steph. B. p. 671; Suid. s. v. Exívar and Hoceióćvios.) [T. H. D.]

TYRAS (Tópas, Ptol. iii. 10. §16), a town of European Sarmatia, situated at the mouth of the river just dercribed. (Herod. iv. 51 ; Mela, ii. 1.) It was originally a Milesian colony (Scymn. Fr. 5.5; Anon. Peripl. P. Eux. p. 9); althugh Ainmianus Marcellinus (xxii. 8. §41), apparently from the similarity of the name, which be writes "Tyros," ascribes its foundation to the Phoenicians from Tyre. Pliny (iv. 12. s. 26 ; cf. Steph. B. p. 671) identities it with an older town named Ophiuxa (" geluis pollens Ophiusa venenis," Val. Flacc. vi. 84). Puleny, however (l.c.), makes them two different towns; and places Ophiusa somewhat more N., and towards the interior. Scylax knows only Ophiusa, whilst the later writers, on the other hand, kuew only Tyras. (Cf. Neumann, Die Hillenen im Shytherlande, p. 357, seq.) It probably lay on the site of the prosent Ackermann. (Clarke, 7 ravels, ii. p. 124; holl, Reisen in Sudrusland, i. 167.) [T. H. D.]

TYRUS.

TYRIAEUM (Tupiaiov: Eth. Tyrienses), a town of Lyc:unia, which according to Xenophon ( $A$ mio. i. 2. § 24) was 20 parasangs west of Iconium, and according to Strabo (xiv. p. 663) on the eastern frontier of Phrygia, and probably on the road from Synnada to Laodiceia, and between the latter and Philomelium. Near this town Cyrus the Younger reviewed his forces when he marched against his brother. (Comp. Plin. v. 25 ; Hierocl. p. 672 ; and Conc. Chalced. p. 401, where the name is written Tupdiov.) It is possible that Tyriaeum may be the same town as the Totarion or Tetradion of Ptolemy (v.4. § 10), the Tyrasion in the Conc. Chaked (p. 669), and the Tyganion of Anna Comnena (xv. 7, 13). Its site seems to be marked by the modern Ilgun or Ilyhun. (Hamilton, Researches, ii. p. 200; Kiepert in Franz, Fumf Inschriften, p. 36.) [L. S.]

TYRICTACA (Tvpuctdкø or Twpırdкn, Pwol. iii. 6. § 4), a town in the Chersonesus Taurica. (Cf. Anun. Peripl. P. Eux. p. 4., where it is written Tvpıoтák $\eta$.) Dubois de Montperreux identifies it with some ruins found on lake Thurbach. (Voy. autour du Caucuse, v. p. 247.) [T. H. D.]

TYRISSA (Túpı $\sigma \sigma a$, Ptol. iii. 13. § 33 : Eth. Tyrissaeus, Plin. iv. 10. so 17), a town of Emathia in Macedonia, placed by Ptolemy next to Europus.

TYRRHE'NIA, TYRRHE'NI. [ETRURLA.]
 ros), was the uame given in ancient times to the part of the Mediterranean sea which adjoins the W. coast of Italy. It is evident from the name itself that it was originally employed by the Greeks, who universally called the people of Etruria Tyrrhenians, and was merely adopted from them by the Romans. The latter people indeed frequently used the term Tuscum Mare (Liv. v. 33; Mel. ii. 4. § 9), but still more often designated the sea on the W. of Italy simply as "the lower sea," Mabe Infriem; just as they termed the Adriatic " the upper sea" or Mare Superum. (Mel. ii. 4. § 1 ; Plin. iii. 5. 8. 10; Liv. l. c.) The name of Tyrrhenum Mare was indeed in all probability uever in use among the Romans, otherwise than as a mere geographical term; but with the Greeks it was certainly the habitual designation of that portion of the Mediterranean which extended from the coast of Liguria to the N. coast of Sicily, and from the mainland of Italy to the islands of Sardinia and Corsica on the W. (Pulsb. i. 10, 14, &ec.; Strab. ii. p. 122, v. p. 211 , &c. ; Dionys Per. 83; Scyl. §§ 15, 17 ; Agathem. in. 14.) The perive at which it came intu use is uncertain; it is not found in Herodotus or Thucydides, and Scylax is the earliest author now extant by whon the name is mentioned. [E. H. B.]

TYRRHINE: [OGyRIS.]

TYRSUS. [Thyrsus.]
TYRUS (Típos, Herod. ii. 44, &c. : Eth. Túplos, Tyrius), the most celebrated and important city of Phoenicia. By the Israelites it was called Tsor (Jush. xix. 29, &c.), which means a rock but by the Tyrians themselves Sor or Sur (Thewiuret. in E'zek. axvi.), which appellation it still retains. For the initial letter $t$ was substituted by the Greeks, and from them adopted by the Romans; but the latter also used the form Sara or Sarra, said to be derived from the Phoenician name of the purple fish; whence also the adjective Siarra-nus. (Plaut. Tric. 2, 6, 58; Virg. Georg. ii. 506; Juv. x. 38; Gell. xiv. 6, Scc.) The former of these etymologies is the preferable one. (Shaw, Travels, ii. p. 31.) The question of the origin of Tyre has been already discussed, its commerce, manufactures and colonies described, and the principal events of its history narrated at sume length [Phornicia, p. 608, seq.], and this article will therefore be more particularly devoted to the topngraphy, and to what may be called the material history, of the city.

Strabo (x ri. p. 756) places Tyre at a distance of 200 stadia from Sidon, which pretty nearly agrees with the distance of 24 miles assigned by the Itin. Anh (p. 149) and the Tab. Peuting. It was built partly on an island and partly on the mainland. According to Pliny (v. 19. s. 17) the island was 22 stadia, or 24 miles, in circumference, and was originally separated from the continent by a deep channel the of a mile in breadth. In his time, however, as well as leng previously (cf. Strab. l. c.), it was connected with the mainland by an isthmus formed by the mole or causeway constructed by Alexander when he was besieging Tyre, and by subsequent accumulations of sand. Some authorities state the channel to have been only 3 stadia (Scylax, p. 42) or 4 stadia broad (Diodor. Sic. xrii. 60; Cart. iv. 2); and Arrian (Anab. ii. 18) describes it as shallow near the continent and only 6 fathoms in depth at its deepest part near the island. The accretion of the isthmus must have been considerable in the course of ages. William of Tyre describes it in the time of the Crusades as a bow-shot across (xiii. 4); the Père Roger makes it only 50 paces (Terre Sainte, p. 41); but at present it is about $\ddagger$ of a mile broad at its narrowest part, near the island.

That part of the city which lay on the mainland was called Palae-Tyrus, or Old Tyre; an appellation from which we necessarily infer that it existed previously to the city on the island; and this inference is confirmed by Ezekiel's prophetical description of the siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, king of $\mathrm{Ba}-$ bylon, the particulars of which are not suitable to an island city. Palae-Tyrus extended along the shore from the river Leontes on the N ., to the fountain of Ras-el-Ain on the S., a space of 7 miles; which, however, must have included the suburbs. When Strabo says (xvi. p. 758) that Palae-Tyrus was 30 stadia, or 3 miles, distant from Tyre, he is probably considering the southern extremity of the former. Pliny (l. c.) assigns a circumference of 19 miles to the two cities. The plain in which Palae-Tyrus was situated was one of the bruadest and most fertile in Phoenicia. The fountain alove mentioned afforded a constant supply of pure spring water, which was received into an octagon reservoir, 60 feet in diameter and 18 feet deep. Into this reservoir the water gushes to within 3 feet of the top. (Maundrell, Journey, p. 67.) Hence it was distributed through the town by means of an aqueduct, all trace of which has now disappeared (Robinson, Palest. iii. p. 684.) The nusual contrast between the bustle of a great seaport and the more tranquil operations of rural life in the fertile fields which surrounded the town, presented a striking scene which is described with much felicity in the Dionysiaca of Nonnus ( 40,327, sqq.).
The island on which the new city was built is the largest rock of a belt that runs along this part of the coast. We have no means of determining the origin of the island city ; but it must of course have arisen in the period between Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander the Great. The alterations which the coast has undergone at this part render it difficult to determine the original size of the island. Maundrell (p. 66) estimated it at only 40 acres; but he was guided solely by his eye. The city was surrounded with a wall, the lieight of which. where it faced the mainland, was 150 feet. (Arrian, Anab. ii. 18.) The foundations of this wall, which must have marked the limits of the island as well as of the city, may still be discerned, but have not beent accurately traced. The measurement of Pliny before cited must doubtless include the subsequent accretions, both natural and artificial. The smallness of the area was, however, compensated by the great height of the houses of Tyre, which were not built after the eastern fashion, but story upon storr, like those of Aradus, another Phoenician island city (Mela, ii. 7), or like the insulae of Rome. (Strab. l. c.) Thus a much larger population might be accommodated than the area ceems to promise. Bertou, calculating from the latter alone, estimates the inhabitants of insular Tyre at between 22,000 and 23,000. (Topogr: de Tyr, p. 17.) But the accounts of the capture of Tyre by Alexander, as will appear in the sequel, show a population of at least double that number; and it should be recollected that, from the maritime pursuits of the Tyrians, a large portion of them must have been constantly at sea. Moreover, part of the western side of the island is now submerged, to the extent of mure than a mile; and that this was once occupied by the city is shown by the bases of columns which may still be discerned. These remains were much more considerable in the time of Benjamin of Tudela, in the latter part of the 12 th century, who mentions that towers, markets, streets, and halls might be observed at the bottom of the sea (p.62, ed. Asher).
voL. IL.

Insular Tyre was mach improved by king Hiram, who in this respect was the Augustus of the city. He adjed to it one of the islands lying to the N. , by filling up the intervening space. This island, the outline of which can no longer be traced, previously contained a temple of Baal, or, according to the Greek way of speaking, of the Olympian Jupiter. (Joseph. c. Apion, i. 17.) It was by the space thus gained, as well as by substructions on the eastern side of the island, that Hiram was enabled to enlarge and beautify Tyre, and to form an extensive public place, which the Greeks called Eurychorus. The artificial groand which Hiram formed for this purpose may still be traced by the loose rabbish of which it consists. The frequent earthquakes with which Tyre has been visited (Sen. Q N. ii. 26) have rendered it difficult to trace its ancient configuration; and alterations have been observed even since the recent one of 1837 (Kenrick, Phoenicia, p. 353, &c.).

The powerful navies of Tyre were received and skeltered in two roadsteads and two harbours, one on the N ., the other on the S . side of the island. The northern, or Sidonian roadstead, so called because it looked towards Sidon (Arrian, ii. 20), was protected by the chain of small islands already mentioned. The harbour which adjoined it was formed by a natural inlet on the NE. side of the island. On the $\mathbf{N}$., from which quarter alone it was exposed to the wind, it was rendered secure by two sea-walls running parallel to each other, at a distance of 100 feet apart, as shown in the annexcl plad. Portions of these walls may still be traced. The eastern side of the harbour was enclosed by two ledges of rock, with the assistance of walls, having a passage between them about 140 feet wide, which formed the mouth of the barbour. In case of need this entrance could be closed with a boom or chain. At present this harbour is almost choked with sand, and only a small basin, of about 40 yards in ${ }^{\text {diameter, can be }}$ traced (Shaw, Travels, vol. ii. p. 30); bat in its original state it was about 300 yards loug, and from 230 to 240 yards wide. Part of the modern town of Sur, or Sour, is built over its soutbern portion, and only vessels of v ry shallow draught can enter.

(From Kenrick's " Phoenicia.")

A. Northern harbour.
B. Supposed limit of ancient harbour
C. Tract of loose sand.
D. Southern, or Egyptian, harbour.
E. Southern, or Egyptian, roadstead.

FF. Isthmus formed by Alexander's mole.
GG. Depression in the sand.
H. Northern, or Sidonian, roadstead.
ar. Portions of inner sea-wall, visible above water.
bb. Ancient canal.

1. Entrance of northern harbour.

2, 2. Original line of sea-wall.
3,3. Outer wall, now below water.
4, $4,4,4$. Line of rocks, bordered on the E. by a wall, not of ancient construction.
5. Ledge of rocks projecting 90 feet into the sea.

The southern roadstead was called the Egyptian, from its lying towards that country, and is described by Strabo (l. c.) as unenciosed. If, however, the researches of Bertou may be relied upon (Topogr. de Tyr, p. 14), a stupendous sea-wall, or breakwater, 35 feet thick, and running straight in a SW. direction, for a distance of 2 miles, may still be traced. The wall is said to be covered with 2 or 3 fathoms of water, whilst within it the depth is from 6 to 8 fathoms. Bertou admits, however, that this wall has never been carefully examined; and if it had existed in ancient times, it is impossible to conceive how so stuperdous a work should have escaped the notice of all the writers of antiquity. According to the same authority, the whole southern part of the island was occupied by a cothon, or dock, separated from the roadstead by a wall, the remains of which are still visible. This harbour, like the northern one, could be closed with a boom; whence Chariton (vii. 2. p. 126, Reiske) takes occasion to compare the security of Tyre to that of a house with bolted doors. At present, however, there is nothing to serve for a harbour, and even the roadstead is not secure in all winds. (Shaw, ii. p. 30.) The northern and southern harbours were connected together by means of a canal, so that ships could pass from one to the other. This canal may still be traced by the loose sand with which it is filled.

We have already adverted to the sieges sustained by Tyre at the hands of Shalmaneser, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, and Antigonus. [Phosmicta, pp. 610-613]. That by Alexander was so remarkable, and had so much influence on the topography of Tyre, that we reserved the details of it for this place, as they may be collected from the narratives of Arrian (Anab. ii. 17-26), Diodorus Siculus (xvii. 40-45), and Q. Curtius (iv. 4-27). The insular situation of Tyre, the height and strength of its walls, and the command which it possessed of the sea, seemed to render it inpregnable; and hence the Tyrians, when summoned by Alexander to surrender, prepared for an obstinate resistance. The only method which occurred to the mind of that conqueror of overcoming the difficulties presented to his arms by the site of Tyre, was to connect it with the mainland by means of a mole. The materials for such a structure were at hand in abundance. The deserted buildings of Palae-Tyrus afforded plenty of stone, the mountains of Lebanon an inexhaustible supply of timber. For a certain distance, the mole, which was 200 feet in breadth, proceeded rapidly and successfully, though Alexander's workmen were often harassed by parties of Tyrian troops, who landed in boats, as well as by the Arabs of the Syrian desert. But as the work approached the island, the difficulties increased in a progressive ratio. Not only was it threatened with destruction from the depth and force of the current, often increased to vislence by a southerly wind, but the workmen were also exposed to the missiles of the Tyrian slingers and bowmen, aimed both from vessels and from the battlements of the city. To guard themselves from these attacks, the Macedonians erected two lofty wooden towers at the extremity of the mole, and covered them with hides as a protection against fire. The soldiers placed on these towers occasioned the Tyrians considerable annoyance. At length, however, the latter succeeded in setting fire to the tcwers by means of a fire-ship filled with combustibles; and afterwards, making a sortie in their boats, pulled up the stakes which protected the mole, and destroyed the machines which the fire had not reached. To complete the discomfiture of the Macedonians, a great storm arose and carried away the whole of the work which had been thus locsened.

This misfortune, which would have damped the ardour of an ordinary man, only incited Alexander to renew his effurts with greater vigour and on a surer plan. He ordered a new mole to be constructed, broader than the former one; and in order to obviate the danger of destruction by the waves, he caused it to incline towards the SW., and thus to cross the channel diagonally, instead of in a straight line. At the same time he collected a large fleet from Sidon, whither he went in person, from Soli, Mallus, and other places; for, with the exception of Tyre, all Phoenicia was already in the hands of Alexander. He then made an incursion into Coelesyria, and chased away the Arabs who annoyed his workmen employed in cutting timber in Antilibanus. When he again returned to Tyre with his fleet, which he had joined at Sidon, the new mole had already made great progress. It was formed of whole trees with their branches, covered with layers of stone, on which other trees were heaped. The Tyrian divers, indeed, sometimes succeeded in loosening the structure by pulling out the trees; but, in spite of these efforts, the work proceeded steadily towards completion.

The large fleet which Alexander had assembled struck terror into the Tyrians, who now confined themselves to defensive measures. They sent away the old men, women, and children to Carthage, and closed the mouths of their harbours with a line of triremes. It is unnecessary to recount all the incidents which followed, and we shall therefore confine ourselves to the most important. Alexander had caused a number of new machines to be prepared, under the direction of the ablest engineers of Phoenicia and Cyprus. Some of these were planted on the mole, which now very nearly approached the city; others were placed on board large vessels, in order to batter the walls on other sides. Various were the devices resorted to by the Tyrians to frustrate these attempts. They cut the cables of tho vessels bearing the hattering rams, and thus sent them adrift; but this mode of defence was met by the use of iron mooring chains. To deaden the blows of the battering engines, leathern bags filled with sea-weed were suspended from the walls, whilst on their summit were erected large wheel-like machines filled with soft materials, which being set in rapid motion, either averted or intercepted the missiles hurled by the Macedonians. A second wall also was commenced within the first. On the other hand, the Macedonians, having now carried the mole as far as the island, erected towers upon it equal in height to the walls of the town, from which bridges were projected towards the battlements, in order to take the city by escalaile. Yet, after all the labour bestowed upon the mole, Tyre was not captured by means of it. The Tyrians annoyed the soldiers who manned the towers by throwing out grappling hooks attached to lines, and thus dragging them down. Nets were employed to entangle the hands of the assailants; masses of red hot metal were hurled amongst them, and quantities of heated sand, which, getting between the interstices of the armour, caused intolerable pain. An attempted assault from the bridges of the towers was repulsed, and does not appear to have been renewed. But a breach was made in the walls by battering rams fixed on vessels; and whilst this was assaulted by means of ships provided with bridges, simultaneous attacks were directed against both the harbours. The Phoenician fleet burst the boom of the Egyptian harbour, and took or destroyed the ships within it. The northern harbour, the entrance of which was undefended, was easily taken by the Cyprian fleet. Meanwhile Alezander had entered with his troops through the breach. Provoked by the long resistance of the Tyrians and the obstinate defence still maintained from the roofs of the houses, the Macedonian soldiery set fire to the city, and massacred 8000 of the inhabitants. The remainder, except those who found shelter on board the Sidonian fleet, were sold into slavery, to the number of 30,000 ; and 2000 were crucified in expiation of the murders of certain Macedonians during the course of the siege. The lives of the king and chief magistrates were spared.

Thus was Tyre captured, after a siege of seven months, in July of the year B. c. 332. Alexander then ordered sacrifices and games in honour of the Tyrian Hercules, and consecrated to him the battering ram which had made the first breach in the walls. The population, which had been alnost destroyed, was replaced by new colonists, of whom a considerable portion seen to have been Carians. The subsequent fortunes of Tyre have already been recorded. VABAR, a river of Mauretania Caesariensis, which fell into the sea a little to the W. of Saldae. Ptolemy (iv. 2. §9) mentions it under the name of Obabap as if it had been a town; and Maffei (Mus. Ver. p. 463) thought that he had discovered such a place in the name of Bavares, in an African inscription (cf. Orelli, Inscr. no. 529). In Pliny (v. 2. s. 1) and Mela (i. 6) the name is erroneously written Nabar. It is probably the present Buberak.

It. iii. 259; Oúára, Ptol. iv. 3. § 28; Bá $\mathbf{\gamma a}$, Procop. de Aed. vi. 5), an important town and place of considerable commerce in the interior of Numidia, lying a long day's journey SW. of Utica. Pliny (v. 4) calls it Vagense Oppidum. It was destroyed by Metellus (Sall. J. 69); but afterwards restored and inhabited by the Romans. Justinian surrounded it with a wall, and named it Theodoria, in honour of his consort. (Procop. L.c.; cf. Strab. xvii. p. 831; Sall. J. 47, 68; Plut. Mar. 8. p. 409.) Now Bayjah (Begia, Beggia, Bedsja) in Tunis, on the borders of Algiers. (Cf. Shaw, Travels, i. p. 183.) Vaga is mentioned by the Geogr. Nub. (Clim. iii. 1. p. 88) under the name of Bagia, and by Leo Afric. (p. 406, Lorsbach) under that of Beggia, as a place of considerable commerce.
2. A town in Byzacium in Africa Proper, lying to the S. of Ruspinum (Hirt. B. Afr. 74). This is probably the "aliud Vagense oppidum" of Pliny (l.c.).

VACCAEI (Oи̇аккаî̀t, Ptol. ii. 6. §50), an important people in the interior of Hispania Tarraconensis, bounded on the W. by the Astures, on the N. by the Cantabri, on the E. by the Celtiberi (to whom Appian, Hisp. 51, attributes them), and on the S. by the Vettones and the river Durius. Hence their district may be considered as marked by the modern towns of Zamora, Toro, Pulencia, Burgos, and Valladolid. Their chief cities were Pallantia (Palencia) and Intercatia. According to Diodorus (v. 34) they yearly divided their land for tillage among themselves, and regarded the produce as common property, so that whoever kept back any part for himself was capitally punished. (Cf. Liv. xxx. 7, xl. 47 ; Polyb. iii. 14; Strab. iii. pp. 152, 162; Plin. iii. 3. s. 4 ; Plut. Sert. 21.) [T. H. D.]

VADA, a place on or near the Rhine, in North Gallia. Tacitus (Hist. v. 21) in his history of the war of Civilis speaks of Civilis attacking on one day with his troops in four divisions, Arenacum, Batavodurum, Grinnes, and Vada. The history shows that Grinnes and Vada were sonth or on the south side of the stream which Tacitus calls the Rhenus. [Grinnes.]

VADA SABBATA ( ${ }^{2} a \delta d \tau \omega \nu$ Oũaסa, Strab.; Ed́s6ata, Ptol.: Vado), a town and port on the seacoast of Liguria, about 30 miles $\mathrm{W}^{\text {P }}$. of Genna. It was situated on a bay which affords one of the best roadsteads along this line of coast, and seems to have been in consequence mach frequented by the Roman fleets. In B.c. 43 it was the first point at which M. Antonius balted after his defeat at Mutina, and where he effected his junction with Ventidius, who had a considerable force under his command. (Cic. ad Fum. xi. 10, 13.) D. Bratus, in his letter to Cicero, speaks of it as " inter Apenninum et Alpes," a phrase which obviously refers to the notion commonly entertained that this was the point of demarcation between the two chains of mountains, a view adopted also by Strabo (iv. p. 202). A pass led into the interior across the Apennines from Vada to Aquae Statiellae which was probably that followed by Antony. Brutus speaks in strong terms of the rugged and difficult nature of the roads in all directions from this point, ( $l \mathrm{lb}$.) : but at a later period a regular road was constructed across the mountains from Vada to Aquae Statiellae, as well as in both directions along the coast. (Itin. Ant. p. 295; Tab. Peut.) Under the Roman Empire we learn that Vada continued to be a place of considerable trade (Jul. Capit. Pert. 9,13); and it is still mentioned as a port in the Maritime Itinerary (p. 502). Some doubt has arisen with regard to its precise position, though the name of Vado would seem to be obviously derived from it; but that of Sabbata or Sabatia, on the other hand, is apparently connected with that of Savona, a town with a small but secure port abrut 4 miles N ． of Vado．Livy indeed mentions Savo（undoubtedly the sume with Sarona）as a sea－port wwin of the Lignrians，where Mago established hinself during the Second Punic War（Liv．xxviii．46）；but the name does not occur again in any writer，and hence Cluverius supposed that this was the place afterwards called Silbata．There seems，however， no doubt that Sabbata or Sabatia，Vada Sabbata，or Vada Sabatia，and Vada simply（as the name is written by Cicero），are all only different furms of the same name，and that the Roman town of Vada was situated on，or very near，the same site as the pre－ sent Vado，a long straygling fishing village，the bay of which still affords an excellent roadstead．The distinctive epithet of Sabbata or Sabatia was evi－ dently derived from its proximity to the original Ligurian town of Ssvo．

VADIMO＇NIS LACUS（ $\dot{\eta}$ Ò̇d $\delta \mu \infty \nu \lambda i \mu \nu \eta$ ，Po－ lyb．：Laghetto di Bassano），a small lake of Etruria， between the Ciminian hills and the Tiber，celebrated in history as the scene of two successive defeats of the combined Etruscan forces by the Romans．In the finst of these battles，which was fought in в．c． 309，the Etruscans had raised a chosen army，eurolled with peculiar solemnity（lege sacrata）；but though they fought with the utmost valour and obstimacy， they sustained so severe a defeat at the hands of the Roman Consul Q．Fabius Maximus，that，as Livy remarks，this disastrous day first broke the power of Etruria（Liv．ix．39）．The second battle was fought near 30 years later（в．c．283），in which the allied forces of the Etruscans and Gauls were totally defeated by the consul P．Cornelius Dolabella．（Polyb． ii． 20 ；Eutrop．ii． 10 ；Flor．i．13．）But though thus celelirated in history，the Vauinmonian lake is a very trifling sheet of water，in fact，a mere pool or stagnant pond，now almost overgrown with reeds and bulrushes．It was doubtless more extensive in ancient times，though it could never have been of any importance，and scarcely deserves the name of a lake．But it is remarkable that the younger Pliny in one of his epistles describes it as a circular basin abounding in floating islands．which bave now all disappeared，and probably have contributed to fill up the ancient basin．Its waters are whitish and highly sulphureous，resembling，in this respect，the Aquae Albulae near Tibur，where the phenomenon of thut－ ing islands still occasionally occurs．（Plin．Ep．viii．

20．）It enjoyed the reputation，probably on account of this peculiar character，of being a sacred lake．But the apparent singularity of its having been twice the scene of decisive conllicts is sufficiently explained by its situation just in a natural pass between the Tiber and the worded heights of the Cimivian forest， which（as observed by Mr．Dennis）must always have constituted a natural pass into the plains of Central Etruris．The lake itself，which is now called the Laghetto di Bassano from a neightouring village of that name，is only a very short distance from the Tiber，and about 4 miles above Orte，the ancient Horta．（Dennis＇s Etruria，vol．i．pp．167－ 170．）

VAGIENNI（Bayicyvoi），a Ligurian tribe，who inhabited the region N．of the Maritime Alps，and S．of the territory of the Taurini．According to Pliny they extended as far to the W．as the Mons Vesulus or Monte liso，in the main chain of the Alps（Plin．iii．16．s．20），while their chief town or capital under the Roman rule，called Augusta Vagiennorum，was situated at Bene，between the rivers Stura and Tanaro，so that they must have occupied an extensive territory．But it seems im－ possible to receive as correct the statement of Vel－ leius（i．15）that the Roman colony of Eporedia （Ivrea）was included within their limits．［Epo－ redia．］It is singular that Pliny more than once speaks of them as being descended from the Caturiges，while at the same time he distinctly calls them a Ligurian tribe，and the Caturiges are commonly reckoned a Gaulish one．It seems pro－ bable，however，that many of the races which in－ habited the mountain valleys of the Alps were of Ligurian origin；and thus the Caturiges and Segusiani may very possibly have been of a Li－ gurian stock like their neighbours the Taurini， though subsequently confounded with the Gauls． We have no account of the period at which the Vagienni were reduced under the Roman yoke， and their name is not found in history as an inde－ pendent tribe．But Pliny notices them as one of the Ligurian tribes still existing in his time，and their chief town，Augusta，seems to have been a flourishing place under the Roman Empire．Their name is sometimes written Bagienni（Urell．Inscr． 76），and is found in the Tabula under the corrupt form Bugitenni．（Tab．Peut．）［E．H．B．〕

VALE'NTIA (Eth. Valentinus: Nuragus), a town in the interior of Sardinia, SE. of Usellis. It seems to have been a considerable place, as the Valentini are one of the few names which Pliny thought it worth while to mention among the Sardinian towns. Ptolemy also notices the Valentini among the tribes or "populi" of the island, and there can be little doubt that the Valeria of the same author is only a false reading for Valentia. (Plin. iii. 12. s. 17 ; Ptol. iii. 3. §§ 6, 7.) Its remains are still visible at a village called Nuragus, near the town of Isili, about 12 miles from the ruins of Usellis. VALE'NTIA (O $\dot{u} a \lambda \epsilon \nu \tau i a$, Ptol. ii. 6. § 62), a considerable town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on the river Turium, at a distance of 3 miles from its mouth, and on the road from Carthago Nova to Castulo. (Plin. iii. 3. s. 4; Vib. Seq. p. 18; Itin. Ant. p. 400.) Ptolemy (l.c.) erroneously attributes it to the Contestani. It became at a later period a Roman colony (Plin. l.c.), in which apparently the consul Junius Brutus settled the soldiers of Viriathus. (Liv. Epit. lv.) Pompey destroyed it. (Epist. Pomp. ap. Sallust, ed. Corte, p. 965 ; cf. Plut. Pomp. 18.) It must, however, have been restored soon afterwards, since Mela mentions it as being still an important place (ii. 6), and coins of it of a late period are preserved. (Cf. Florez, Med. ii. p. 610, iii. p. 125; Mionnet, i. p. 55, Suppl. i. p. 110; Sestini, p. 209; Eckhel, i p. 60.) The town still bears the same name, but has few antiquities to show.

VALE'NTIA (Ovjarevtía), in Gallia Narbonensis, a colonia in the territory of the Cavari, as Pliny says (iii. 4); but D'Anville proposes to alter the meaning of this passage of Pliny by placing a full stop between "Cavarum" and "Valentia." However, Valentia (Valence) was not in the country of the Cavari, but in the territory of the Segallauni, as Ptolemy (ii. 10. § 12) says, who calls it "colonia." Valence is a town on the east bank of the Rhone, a few miles below the junction of the Isire. In the middle ages it was the capital of the Valentinois, and in the fifteenth century it became the seat of a university.

VALLIS PENNINA, or POENINA, as the name is written in some inscriptions, is the long valley down which the Rhone flows into the Lake of Geneva. In the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces all the inhabitants of this valley are included in the name Vallenses, for we read "Civitas Vallensium, hoc est, Octodurum." [Ocrodurus.] But there were four peoples in the Vallais, as it seems, Nantuates, Veragri, Seduni, and Viberi. The name Vallis Pennina went out of use, and it was called Pagus Vallensis. The name Vallis is preserved in that of the canton Wallis or Vallais, which is the largest valley in Switzerland. [Gallia Transalpina, Vol. I. p. 950; Rhodanus.] [G.L.]

VALLUM ROMANUM. Under this title we propose to give a short account of the remarkable work constructed by the Romans across our island, from near the mouth of the Tyne on the E. to the Solway Frith on the W., and of which considerable remains still exist. The history of the formation of this line of fortification is involved in a good deal of obscurity, and very different opinions have been entertained respecting its anthors; and neither the Latin writers nor the inscriptions hitherto fuund among the ruins of the wall and its subsidiary works are sufficient to settle the disputed points, though they suggest conjectures more or less probable.

The origin of the barrier may have been the forts and stationary camps which Agricola (A.. . 79) caused to be erected in Britain (Tac. Agr. 20); but the account which Tacitus gives of this measure is so vague that it is quite impossible to found any certain conclusion on his words. In A.D. 120, Hadrian visited Britain, where he determined on fixing the boundary of the Roman Empire considerably to the S . of the most N. conquests of Agricola. He chose this boundary well, as it coincides with a natural one. The Tyne flows almost due E., just S., and nearly parallel to the $55^{\circ} \mathrm{N}$. lat., for more than two thirds of the breadth of the island. The valley of the Tyne is separated from that of the Irthing, a branch of the Eden, by the N. extremity of the great chain of hills sometimes called the Backbone of England; and the Irthing, with the Eden, completes the boundary to the Solway Frith. In order to strengthen this natural frontier, Hadrian, as we are informed by Spartianus, "drew a wall (murus) $\mathbf{8 0 , 0 0 0}$ paces in length, to divide the barbarians from the Romans;" which wall followed the same general direction as the line above indicated.

Eutropius (viii. 19) states that the Emperor Septimius Severus, who was in Britain during A. D. 208-211, constructed a rampart (vallum) from sca to sea, for the protection of the Ruman provinces in the S. of the island.

Now, as will be seen from the following description, the lines of works designated by the general name, Roman Wall, consist of two main parts, a stone wall and an earthen rampart ; and most writers on the subject have regarded these as two distinct, though comected, works, and belonging to two different periods; the earthwork has generally been ascribed to Hadrian, the stone wall to Severus. Such is the opinion of Horsley, whose judgment, as Mr. Bruce emphatically admits, is always deserving of the highest consideration. Mr. Bruce himself expresses an opinion, founded on repeated and careful examination of all the remuins of the wall, "that the lines of the barrier are the scheme of one great military engineer. . . . . The wall of Hadrian was not a fence such as that by which we prevent the straying of cattle; it was a line of military operation, similar in its nature to the works which Wellington raised at Torres Vedras. A broad belt of cuuntry was firmly secured. Walls of stone and earth crossed it. Camps to the north and south of them broke the force of an enemy in both directions; or, in the event of their passing the outer line, enabled the Romans to close upon them both in front and rear. Look-nut stations revealed to them the - movements of their foes; beacons enabled them to communicate with neighbouring garrisons; and the roads, which they always maintained, assisted them in concentrating their forces upon the points where it might be done with the best effect. Such, I am porsuaded, was the intention of the Roman wall, though some still maintain that the muras and vallum are independent structures, the productions of different periods" (pp. ix. x. Pref. 2nd ed.)

We confess that the reasoning here does not seem to us to be very conclusive. Grant that the system of defence has consistency and unity, yet it by no means follows that the whole was executed at one time. The earliest works were probably detached stationary camps; the next step would naturally be to connect them together by a wall, whether of earth or stone; and if experience should afterwards prove that this barrier was insufficient, it would be an obvious proceeding to strengthen it by a parallel fortification. The common opinion, therefore, that Agricola commenced the defensive line, Hadrian strengthened it, and Severus completed it, appears to be probable in itself, and is supported by the little that we find upon the subject in the classical writers. If we may assume that the words murus and callum were used by Spartianus and Eutropius in their strict signitications, it would seem that the stone wall was the work of Hadrian, the earthen rampart of Severus. That some portion of the burrier was executed under the direction of the latter, is rendered still more probable by the fact that the Britons called the wall gual Sever, gal Sever, or mur Sever, as Camden states. It has been designated by various names in later times; as the Picts' Wall, the Thirl Wall, the Kepe Wall; but is now generally called the Roman Wall.

The following description is taken almost entirely from Mr. Bruce's excellent work, mentioned at the end of this article.

The barrier consists of three parts: (i.) a stone wall or murus, strengthened by a ditch on its northern side; (ii.) an earthen wall or vallum, south of the stone wall; (iii.) stations, castles, watchtowers, and roads: these lie for the most part between the stone wall and the earthen rampart.

The whole of the works extend from one side of the island to the other, in a nearly straight line, and comparatively close to one another. The wall and rampart are generally within 60 or 70 yards of each other, though the distance of course varies according to the nature of the country. Sometimes they are so close as barely to admit of the passage of the military way between them; while in one or two instances they are upwards of half a mile apart. It is in the high grounds of the central region that they are most widely separated. Here the wall is carried over the highest ridges, while the rampart runs along the adjacent valley. Both works, however, are so arranged as to afford each other the greatest amount of support which the nature of the country allows.

The stone wail extends from Walloend on the Tyne to Burness on the Solway, a distance which Horsley estimates at 68 miles 3 furlongs, a measurement which almost exactly coincides with that of General Roy, who gives the length of the wall at $68 \frac{1}{2}$ miles. The vallum falls short of this length by about 3 miles at each end, terminating at Nexccastle on the E. side, and at Drumburgh on the W.

For 19 miles out of Newcastle, the present highroad to Carlisle runs upon the foundations of the wall, which pursues a straight course wherever it is at all possible, and is never curved, but always bends at an angle.

In no part is the wall perfect, so that it is difficult to ascertain what its original beight may have been. Bede, whose monastery of Jarrow was near its eastern extremity, and who is the earliest authority respecting its dimensions, states that in his time it was 8 feet thick and 12 high. Sir Christ. Ridley, writing in 1572, describes it as 3 yards broad, and in some places 7 yards high. Samson Erdeswick, a well-known antiquary, visited the wall in 1574, when he ascertained its height at the $W$. end to be 16 feet. Camden, who saw the wall in 1599, found a part of it on a hill, near Carvoran, to be 15 feet high and 9 broad. Allowing for a battlement, which would probably soon be destroyed, we may conclude that the average height was from 18 to 19 feet. The thickness varies from 6 to $9 \frac{1}{2}$ feet.

The wall was everywhere accompanied on its northern side by a broad and deep fosse, which may still be traced, with trifling interruptions, from sea to sea, even where the wall has quite disappeared. It traverses indifferently alluvial soil and rocks of sandstone, limestone, and basalt. Thus, on Tapper Moor, enormous blocks of whinstone lie just as they were lifted out of the fosse. East of Heddon on the Wall, the fosse is 34 feet wide at the top, 14 at the bottom, and about 9 deep. In some places it is 40 feet wide at the top, and in others 20 feet deep.

Hodgson, in his History of Northumberland (iii. p. 276), states a fact curious if true: "A little W. of Portgate, the earth taken out of the fosse lies spread abroad to the N. in lines, just as the workmen wheeled it out and left it. The tracks of their barrows, with a slight mound on each side, remain unaltered in form." It is scarcely credible, however, that slight elevations of earth, and superficial traces in it, should, for more than a thousand years, have successfully resisted the constant operation of the natural agencies which are sufficient to disintegrate the hardest rocks.
The Vallum, or earth wall, is uniformly S. of the stone wall. It consists of three ramparts and a fosse. One rampart is close to the S . edge of the ditch. Of the other two, which are considerably larger, one is situated N ., the other S . of the ditch, at the distance of about 24 feet from it. These larger ramparts are even now, in some places, 6 or 7 feet high. They are composed of earth, in which masses of stone are often imbedded, for the sake of which they are sometimes quarried. The fosse of the vallum was probably smailer than that of the murus.

No outlets through the S . lines of fortification have been discovered; so that the gateways of the stations appear to have originally been the only means of communication with the country.

At distances averaging nearly 4 miles, stationary camps were erected along the line. Some of these, though connected with the wall, were evidently built before it.

The stations are four-sided and nearly square, bat somewhat rounded at the corners, and contain an area averaging from 3 to 6 acres, though some of them are considerably larger. A stone wall, about 5 feet thick, encloses them, and was probably in every instance strengthened by a fosse and one or more earthen ramparts. The stations usually stand upon ground with a southern inclination.

The great wall either falls in with the N. wall of the stations, or else usually comes up to the N. cheek of their E. and W. gateways. The vallum in like manner generally approaches close to the S . wall of the stations, or comes up to the $S$. side of the E. and W. portals. At least three of the stations, however, are quite detached from both lines of fortification, being to the S . of them. These may have been erected by Agricola.

Narrow streets intersecting one another at right angles traverse the interior of the stations; and abundant ruins outside the walls indicate that extensive suburbs were reqnired for the accommodation of those connected with the soldiers stationed in the camps. The stations were evidently constructed with exclusive reference to defence; and bence no traces of tesselated pavements or other indications of luxury and refinement have been discorered in the mural region.

According to Horsley, there were 18 stations on the line of the wall, besides some in its immediate vicinity ; but Hodgson reduces the number to $\mathbf{1 7}$, beliering that in one instance Horsley mistook a mere temporary encampment for a station.

VALLUM ROMANUM.

In ascertaining the number and names of the stations, our principal literary authority is the No titia Imperii, supposed to have been compiled about the end of the reign of the emperor Theodesius the younger. The 69 th section of this docuinent contains a list of the prefects and tribanes under the Duke of Britain : the portion relating to our subject is headed, "Item per lineam Valli," and contains the names of 23 stations, evidently arranged in their order from E. to W. The heading, however, manifestly implies, not, as it seems sometimes to have been interpreted, that all the stations were actually on the line of the wall, but that they were along it, that in parallel to, or at no great distance from it. It is clear, therefore, that as remains of stations exist both to the N. and to the S. of the wall, as well as actually on its line, nothing but the remains thenselves can enable us to name the stations with certainty.

Now the first 12 stations mentioned in the Notitia have been accurately identified by means of inscriptions found in the ruins of the stations. Of these we subjoin a list, with the ancient and modern names, taken chiefly from the plan prefixed to Mr. Bruce's work:-

All these are on the actual line of the wall, except Vindolana and Magna, which are a little to the S of it.

West of Amboglanna no evidence has yet been discovered to identify any of the stations ; and it is to be feared that many antiquities which might have enabled us to do so have been destroyed; for it appears that the country people, even quite recently, regarded stones bearing inseriptions as "unlucky," calling them "witch-stones," the evil influence of which was to be extirpated by pounding them to powder. Besides this, stone is scarce in that part of the country ; and hence the materials of the wall and stations have been extensively employed in the construction of dikes and other erections in the neighbourhood.

It appears from the plan already referred to that there were stations at the places now called Cambeck Fort, Stanwix, Burgh, Drumburgh, and Borrness; the first a littie to the S., all the rest on the line of the wall.

Of the remaining eleven stations mentioned in the Notitia, the plan identifies Alionis with Whiticy Castle, some miles S. of the wall. Mr. Bruce plares Bremetenracum a little W. of the village of Brampton; Petriana, he thinks, is probably the same as Canbeck Fort.

It is possible that something may yet be done to elucidate what is still obscure in connection with theso most interesting monuments of Roman Britain ; and the Duke of Northumberland had, in 1853, given directions to competent persons to make an accurate and complete survey of the whole line of the barrier, from sea to sea. Whether any results of this investigation have vet been published, we are not aware.

Of the identified stations the most extensive and important are Vindobala, Cilurnum, Procolitia, and Borcovicus. At the finst, great numbers of coins and other antiquities have been found. The second has an area of 8 acres, and is crowded with ruins of stone buildings. A great part of the rampart of Procolitia is entire, and its northern face, which is formed of the main line of wall, is in excellent preservation. Borcovicus, however, surpasses all the other stations in magnitude and in the interest which attaches to its remains. It is 15 acres in extent, besides a large suburb on the $S$. Within it no less than 20 streets may be traced ; and it seems to have contained a Duric temple, part of a Doric capital and fragments of the shafts of columns having been discovered in it, besides a great number of altars, inscriptions, and other antiquities.

The remaining portions of this great fortification may be briefly described.

The Castrila, or mile-castles as they are called, on account of being usually a Roman mile from one another, are buildings about 60 or 70 feet square. With two exceptions, they are placed against the S. face of the wall ; the exceptions, at Portgate and near Aesica, seem to have projected equally N. and S. of the wall. The castella have usually only one entrance, of very substantial masonry, in the centre of the S. wall ; but the most perfect specimen of them dow existing has a N. as well as a S. gate.

Between each two castella there were four smaller buildings, called turrets or watch-towers, which were little more than stone sentry-boxes, about 3 feet thick, and from 8 to 10 feet square in the inside.

The line of the wall was completed by military roads, keeping up the commnnications with all its parts and with the southern districts of the island. As these were similar in their construction to other Roman roads, it is not necessary to say more respecting them in this place.

The following works contain detailed information of every kind connected with the Roman Wall :Horsley's Britannia Romana; Warburton's Vallum Komanum, 4to. Lond. 1753 ; W. Hutton's History of the Roman Wall, 1801 ; Roy's Military Antiquities of the Romans in Britain; the 3rd vol. of Hoigsun's History of Northumberland; and lastly, The Roman Wall; an Historical and Topographical De. scription of the Barrier of the lotcer Isthmus, 9 cc . VANDALI, VANDALII, VINDILI, or VANDULI (Ovavסaiol, Bayס̄̄̀ol, BayסiAot), a powerful branch of the German nation, which, according to I'rocopius (Bell. Goth. i. 3), originally occupied the country about the Palus Maeotis, but afterwards inhabited an extensive tract of country on the south coast of the Baltic, between the rivers Vistula and Viadrus, where Pliny (iv. 28) mentions the Burgundiones as a tribe of the Vindili. At a somewhat later period we find them in the country north of Bohemia, about the Rieseng-hirge. which derived frum them the name of Vandalici Montes (Oivavסadıкd üp $\rho$; Dion Cass. Iv. 1.) In the great Marcomannian war, they were allied with the Marcomanni, their southern neighbours, and in conjunction with them and the Quadi attacked Pannonia. (Jul. Capitol. M. Aurel. 17; Eutrop. viii. 13; Vopisc. Prob. 18 : Dexippus, Exc. de Leg. p. 12.) In the reign of Constantue they again appear in a different country, having established themselves in Moravia, whence the emperur transplanted them into Pannonia (Jornand. Get. 22), and in the reign of Probus they also appear in Dacis. (Vopisc. Prob. 38.) In A. D. 406, when most of the Roman troops had been withdrawn from Gaul, the Vandals, in conjunction with other German tribes, crossed the Rhine and ravaged Gaul in all directions; and their devastations in that country and afterwards in Spain have made their name synonymous with that of savage destroyers of what is beautiful and venerable. Three years later they established themselves in Spain under their chief Godigisclus. Here again they plundered and ravaged, among many other places, Nova Carthago and Hispalis, together with the Balearian islands. At last, in A. D. 429, the whole nation, under king Genseric, crossed over into Africa, whither they had been invited by Bonifacius, who hoped to avail himself of their assistance aqainst his calumniators. But when they were once in Africa, they refused to quit it. They not only defeated Bonifacius, but made themselves masters of the whole province of Africa. This involved them in war with the Empire, during which Sicily and the cuasts of Italy were at times fearfully ravaged. On orie occasion, A. D. 455, Genseric and his hordes took possession of Rome, which they plundered and sacked for fourteen days. And not only Rome, but other cities also, such as Capua and Nola, were visited in a similar way by these barbarians. Afterwards various attempts were made to subdue or expel them, but without success, and the kingdom of the Vandals maintained itself in Africa for a period of 105 years, that is, down to A.D. 534, when Belisarius, the general of the Eastern Empire, succeeded in destroying their power, and recovered Africa for the Einpire. As to the nationality of the Vandals, most German writers claim them for their nation (Zeuss, Die Deutschen, p. 57; Wilhelm, Germanien, p. 87); but Dr. Latham (on Tac. Epilcg. p. Ixxxviii. foll.) and others prefer regarding them as a Slavonic people, though tieir arguments are chiefly of an etymological nature, which is not always a safe guide in historical inquiries. VANGIONES (Oujarrioves). There were Vangiones in the army of Ariovistus when Caesar defeated him. (B.G. i. 51.) Caesar means to say that they were Germans, but he does not say wheti,er they were settled in Gallia. Pliny and Tacitus (Ann. xii. 27, Germ. c. 28) also describe the Vangiones as Germans and settled on the left bank of the Rhine, where they are placed by Ptoleny (ii. $9 . \S 17$ ); but I'tolemy makes a mistake in placing the Nemetes north of the Vangiones, and making the Vangiones the neighbours of the Tribocci, from whom in fact the Vangiones were separated by the Nemetes. In the war of Civilis (Tacit. Hist. iv. 70), Tutor strengthened the force of the Treviri by levies raised among the Vangiones, Caracates [Caracatrs], and Tribocci. The territory of the Vangiones seems to have been taken from that of the Mediomatrici. Their chief town was Borbetomagus (Wormis). [Borbetomagus.]

VARI)ULI (OÚapסounol, Ptol. ii. 6. §§ 9, 66; Báp§ounoc, Strab. iii. p. 162; where we also learn that at an earlier period they were called Bapountau), a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, who dwelt westward of the Vascones. as far as the N. coast (in the present Guipuscoa and Alaca). (Mela, iii. 1; Plin. iii. 3. s. 4, iv. 20. s. 34.) [T. H. D.]
VARGIO'NES (Oviapríaves), a German tribe, between the eastern bank of the Rhenus and Mons Abnoba, that is, perhaps between the Ruhr and the Rauhe Alp. (Ptol. ii. 11. §9.) [L.S.]

VARIA. 1. (Oidapia: Vicovaro), a town of the Sabines, situated in the valley of the Anio, on the right bank of the river, about 8 iniles alove Tibur. The name is corruptly written in most editions of Strabo Valeria (Oivalffia). for which there is no doubt that we should read Varia (Ovapia, Strab. v. p. 237; Kramer, ad loc.). Strabo there calls it a Latin city, as well as Carseoli and Alba, both of which were certainly Aequian towns, and subsequently included in Latium. But Horace speaks of it as the town to which the peasantry from his Satine farm and the neighbouring villages used to resort (Hor. Ep. i. 14. 3 ), in a manner that certainly seems to imply that it was the municipal centre of that district, and if so, it must have then been reckoned a Sabine town. It is not mentioned by Pliny, but according to his limitation was certainly included among the Sabines, and not in Latium. It was probably never a large place, though the remains of the ancient walls still extant prove that it must at one time have been a fortified town. But it early sank into a mere village; the old commentator on Horace calls it "Oppidum in Sabinis olim, nune vicus " (Schol. Cruq. ad l. c.): and bence in the middle ages it came to be calied Vicus Varia, whence its modern appellation of licoraro. It is still a considerable village of above $\mathbf{1 0 0} 0$ inhabitants, standing on a hill to the left of the Via Valeria, and a short distance above the Anio, which flows in a deep valley beneath. The Tabula and the old commentary on Horace both place it 8 miles above Tibur, which is very nearly exact. (Tab. Peur. Comm. Cruq. l.c.)
2. Pliny mentions among the cities of Calabria a place called Varia, " cui cognomen Apulae" (iii. 11. s. 16) ; but the name is otherwise unknown, and it is probable that we should read " Lria :" the place meant being apparently the rame that is called by other writers Hyria or Uria [Hymi]. [E. H B.]

VA'RIA (Ovapia, Strab. iii. p. 162: Oidipeia, Ptol. ii. 6. §55), a town of the Berones in Hispania Tarraconeusis, situated on the Iberus, which here began to be navigable (Plin. ii. 3. s. 4), and where also the main road through Spain crossed the river, between Calagurra and Tritium. (Itin. Ant. p. 393, where, under the name of Verela, the sane town is undoubtedly meant.) Usually identified with Varea (cf. Florez, Cantabr. p. 198), though some have sought it at Logruño, and others at $\mathbb{M} u$ rillo de Rio Leza.

VARIA'NA (Bapıd́a), a town in Lower Muesia on the Danube, was the garrison of a portion of the fifth legion and of a squadron of horse. (It. Ant. p. 220; Procop. de Aed. iv. 6 ; Notit. Imp., where it is called Varimiana and Varina.) Its site is marked by the town of Orcaja or Orcava. [L. S.]

VahianaE, a place in Pannonia, on the road running along the left bank of the Sarus from Siscia to Sirnium. (It. Ant. pp. 260, 265.) Its evact site is only matter of conjecture.

VARI'NI, a German tribe mentioned by Pliny (iv. 28) as a branch of the Vindili or Vandali, while Tacitus (Germ. 40) speaks of them as belonging to the Suevi. But they must have occupied a district in the north of Germany, not far from the coast of the Battic, and are probably the same as the Pharodini ($apootivoi) of P'toleny (ii. 11. § 13), in the country between the Chalusus and Suebus; it is highly probabie, also, that the Varni (Ouápvor) of Procopius (B. Goth. ii. 15, iii. 35, iv. 20, &c.) are the same people as the Varini. The Viruni (Otipouvor) of Ptoiemy (ii. 11. § 17), who dwelt north of the Albis, seem to have been a branch of the Varini. (Comp. Cassiod. Var. iii. 3, where they are called Guarni; Wersebe, Beschreib. der Gan zuischen Elbe, Saule, gic. p. 70.) [L. S.]

Vakisti. [Narisci.]
VARLS (Obapos), a river which the ancient geographers make the boundary of Gallia and Italia, as it is now the boundary of France and Italy. (Mela, ii. 4 ; Ptol. ii. 10. § 1.) It is only the lower part of the Var which forms the boundary between Italy and France. The river gives its name to the French department of Var, the eastern limit of which is the lower course of the river Var. The larger part of the Var is in the Sardinian territory. It is only the mouth of the Var which Ptoleny names when he fixes the limit between Italy and Gallia Narbonensis. D'Anville remarks on the line of Lucan (:. 404) -
"Finis et Hesperiae promoto limite Varus" - that he alludes to the extension of the houndary of Italy westward from the summit of the Alpis Maritima, which is Italy's natural boundary. He adds that the dependencies of the province of the Alpes Maritimae comprehended Cemenelium (Cimiez) and its district, which are on the Italian side of the Var and east of Nicaea (Nizaa). [Cemenelium]. But D'Anville may have mistaken Lucan's meaning, who seems to allude to the extension of the boundary of Italy from the Rubicon to the Varus, as Vibius Sequester says: "Varus nunc Galliam dividit, ante Rubicon" (ed. Oberl.). However, the critics are not agreed about this pas:age. (D'Anville, Notice, fic.; Ukert, Gallien, p. 81.)

VASADA (Ójá $\sigma a \delta a$ ), a town of Lycaonia, a little to the south-west of Laudiceia (Ptol. v. 4. § 10 ; Hierocl. p. 675 ; Conc. Chalced. p. 674, where it is miswritten Oö́a $\alpha a$; Conc. Const. iii. p. 6.5, where it bears the name of 'Aácaja). Its site is probably marked by the ruins near Channur Chanah, between Ihyun a:d Ladik. (Hamilton,

Vasatae. [Cossio or Cossium.]
VASATES. It is probable that the name Vnsarii in Ptoleny (ii. 7. § 15) should be Vasatii, as D'Anville says, and so it is printed in some Greek texts. But Ptolemy makes them border on the Giabali and places them farther north than Bordeaux, though he names their chief town Cossiun. The Vocates are enumerated by Caesar (B. G. iii. 23, 27) annong the Aquitanian peoples who submitted to $P$. Crassus in b. c. 56. [Cossio or Cossicm.] [G.L.]

VA'SCONES (Oúá $\sigma \kappa \omega \nu \in s$, Strab. iii. $\mu \mathrm{p} .155$, the NE. part of Hispania Tarracouensis, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, and stretching as far as the N. coast, in the present Navarre and Guipuscoa. Their name is preserved in the modern one of the Basques; although that people do not call themselves by that appellation, but Euscaldunac, their country Eiscaleria, and their language Euscara. (Ford's Handbook of Spain. p. 557; cf. W. v. Humboldt, Lintersuch. 太c. p. 54.) They went into battle bareheaded. (Sil. Ital. iii. 358.) They passed among the Romans for skilful sonthayyers. (Lamp. Alex. Sev. 27.) Their principal town was Pompelo (Pamplona). (Cf. Malte-brun, Mocurs et Usinges des anciens Habitans d Espagne, p. 309.) [T.H.D.]

VA'SCONCM SALTUS, the W. offshoot of the Pyrenees, running along the Mare Cantabricum, and named after the Vascones, in whose territory it was. (Plin. iv. 20. s. 34; Auson. Ep. 15.) It may be more precisely defined as that portion of the chain now called Sierra de Orcamo, S. de Augana, and S. Sejos, forming the E. part of the Cantabrian chain.

VASIO (Oìactóv: Eth. Vasiensis), a town of the Vocontii in Gallia Narbonensis, and the only town which Ptolemy (ii. 10. § 17) assigns to them. Vasio is mentioned by Mela (ii. 5) as one of the richest towns of the Narbonensis; and Pliny (iii. 4) names Vasio and Lucus Augusti as the two chief towns of the Vocontii. The ethnic name Vasiensis appears in the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces (Civitas Vasiensium), and in inscriptions. The place is Vaison in the departonent of Vaucluse, on the Oureze, a branch of the Rhone. It is now a small, decayed place; but there are remains which show that it may have been what Mela describes it to have been. The ancient remains are spread over a considerable surface. There is a Roman bridge of a single arch over the Ouvize, which still forms the only communication between the town and the faubourg. The bridge is built on two rocks at that part of the river where the mountains which shut in the bed of the river approach nearest. There are also the remains of a theatre; the semicircle of the cavea is clearly traced, and the line of the prosernium is indicated by some stones which rise above the earth. There are also the remains of a quay on the banks of the river which was destroyed by an inundation in 1616. The quay was pierced at considerable intervals by sewers which carried to the river the water and filth of the town: these sewers are large enough for a man to stand in upright. There are also traces of the aqueducts which brought to the town the waters of the great spring of Groscuu.

VATRENUS (Santerno), a river of Gallia Cispadana, one of the southern tributaries of the Padus. It had its sources in the Apennines, flowed under the walls of Forum Cornelii (Imola), and joined the southem branch of the Padus (the Spineticum Ostium) not far from its mouth, for which reason the port at the entrance of that arm of the river was called the Portus Vatreni. (Plin. iii. 16. s. 20.) The Santerno now flows into the Po di Primaro (the moklern representative of the Spinetic branch), above 16 miles from its mouth: bat the channels of both are in this part artificial. In this lower part of its course it must always have been more of a canal than a river, whence Martial uses its name as typical of a sluggish stream. (Martial, iii. 67. 2.)
[E. H. B.]
UBERAE, a nation in India extra Gangem, mentioned by Pliny (vi. 19. s. 22). It possessed a large town of the same name. It is not pussible to determine its exact position; but, from the names of other nations mentioned by Pliny in connection with the Uberae, it is probable that this people lived near the mouths of the Brahmaputra.
[V.]
U'BII (OÚtor), a German people who in Caesar's time lived on the east bank of the Rhine and opposite to the Treviri, for Caesar having made his bridge in the country of the Treviri passed over into the country of the Ubii. Owing to their proximity to the Rhine they were somewhat more civilised than the other Germans, being much visited by merchants and accustomed to Gallic manners (B. G. iv. 3, 18, vi. 29, 35). The Sigambri were the neighbours of the Ubii on the north. The Suevi were pressing the Ubii hard, when the Ubii applied to Caesar for help: they gave him hostages, and offered to supply him with a large number of boats to cross the river, from which we may infer that they were accustomed to navigate the Rhine. (B. G. iv. 16.) In the time of Augustus (Strab. iv. p. 194), the nation crossed the Rhine, and Agrippa assigned them lands on the west bank of the river, the policy of the Romans being to strengthen the Rhenish frontier against the rest of the Germans. (Tacit. Germ. c. 28, Annal. xii. 27; Sueton. Aug. c. 21.) In the new territory of the Ubii was Colonia Agrippina (Cöln), and hence the people had the name of Agrippinenses, which was one of the causes why the Germans east of the Rhine hated them. They were considered as traitors to their country, who had assumed a new name. (Tacit. Hist. iv. 28.) North of the Ubii on the west side of the Rhine were the Gugerni [Gugerni]; and south of them were the Treviri. [Colonin Agrippina; Ara Ubiorim.]

UCENI, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, who are mentioned in the trophy of the Alps quoted by Pliny (iii. 20), and placed between the Meduli and Caturiges. The site of these people is uncertain. D'Anville supposes that they were in that part of the mountain region of the Slps which contains the bnurg dOisans. But other gengraphers place them in the district of Oze, or near Hucez, buth of which places are on the right bank of the river Ronamehe, which flows into the Drac, a branch of the Isere. (Ukert, Gallien, p. 317.) [G. I.]

UCETIA, in Gallia Narbonensis, north of Nimes. This place is known only from the Roman remains which have been discovered there, and from the inscription veetias on a stone found at Nimes. The place is Uzes, north of the river Gardon, from which place the water was brought to Nimes by the aqueduct over the Gardon. [Nemavsus] Ucetia appears in the Notitia of the Provinces of Gallia under the name of Castrum Uceciense. Ucetia was a bishopric as early as the middle of the fifth century.

VECTA or VECTIS (OimkTis, Ptol. ii. 3. § 33), an island on the S . coast of Britannia Rumana, lying oppasite to the Portus Magnus (Portsmouth). It was known to the Romans before their conquest of Britain, through the Massiliots, who had bere a station for their tin trade. (Diod. v. 22, 38.) At that time the channel between the island and the mainland become almost dry at ebb tide, so that the Britons carried their tin in carts to the island. It was first conquered by Vespassian, in the reign of Claudius. (Suet. Vesp.4.) Now the Isle of Dight. (Cf. Itin. Ant. p. 509 ; Eum. Pan. Const. 15 ; Mela, iii. 6; Plin. iv. 16. s. 30 .

VEDINUM (Udine), a city of Venetia, mentioned only by Pliny (iii. 19. s. 23) among the municipalities of that country. It was situated in the plain of the Carni, 11 miles W. of Cividale (Forum Julii), and 22 NNW. of Aquileia. In Pliny's time it was apparently an inconsiderable place, but rose into importance in the middle ages, and is now a flourishing and populous city, and the capital of the whole province of the Friuli. Many MSS. of Pliny write the name Nedinates, which has been adopted both by Harduin and Sillig, but it is probable that the old reading Vedinates is correct. [E. H. B.]

VEDRA (Ovi $\delta \rho \rho$, Ptol. ii. 3. § 6), a river in the N. part of the E. coast of Britannia. The name would lead us to the conclusion that it is the Wear (Cainden, p. 944), yet Horsley (p. 103) and others have taken it to be the 7 yne.

VEGISTUM (OJ́értatov), or, as some rewi, Vetestum (Oíétectov), a town of Galatia, in the territory of the Tolistobogi, between Mounts Didymus and Celaenus (Ptol. v. 4. § 7), is perhaps the same place as the Vetissum of the Peutinger Table. [L. S.]

VEII (Oùniut, Strab. v. p. 226; Oùıol, Dionys. H. ii. 54 : Eth. Veientes, Cic. Div. i. 44; Liv. i. 15. &c.: Adj. Veius (trisyl.), Propert. iv. 10. 31), an ancient and purely Tuscan city of Etruria. According to Festus (ap. P. Diac. s. v.) Veia was an Oscan word, and signitied a waggon (plaustrum); but there is nothing to show that this was the etymology of the name of the town.

Among the earlier Italian topographers, a great diversity of opinion prevailed respecting the site of Veii. Nardini was the first writer who placed it at the present lsola Farnese, the correctness of which view is now universally admitted. The distance of that spot northwards from Rome agrees with the distance assigned by Dionysios of Halicarnassus (l.c.) to Veii, namely, "about 100 stadia," which is contirmed by the Tabula Peut., where it is set down at 12 miles. In Livy, indeed (v. 4), it is mentioned as being " within the 20th milestone ;" but this is in a speech of App. Claudius, when the orator is using round numbers, and not solicitous about strict accuracy; whilst the two writers before cited are professedly giving the exact distance. Nor can the authority of Eutropius (i. 4), who places Veii at 18 miles from Rome, be admitted to invalidate the testimony of these authors, since Eutropius is notoriously incorrect in particulars of this description. There are other circumstances which tend to show that Isola Farnese is the site of ancient Veii. Thus the Tab. Peuting. further indicates that the city lay on the Via Cassia. Now following that roxd for a distance of about 12 miles from Rome, the locality not only exactly corresponds with the description of Dionysius, but also the remains of city walls aud sepulchres, and traces of ruads in various directions, have been found there. Moreover at the same spot were discovered, in the year 1810, stones bearing inscriptions which related exclusively to Veii and the Veientines.

We know little of the history of Veii but what concerns the wars it waged with the Romans. It is called by Eutropius (i. 20), "civitas antiquissima Italiae atque ditissima," and there can be no doubt that it was in a flourishing state at the time of the foundation of Rome. At that period the Etruscan, or Veientine, territory was separated from the Latin by the river Albula, afterwards called Tiberis; and consequently neither the Mons Vaticanus nor Janiculensis then belonged to the Romans. (Liv. i. 3.) To the SW. of Rome it extended along the right bank of the Tiber down to the sea, where it contained some Salinae, or salt-works, at the mouth of the river. (Dionys. ii. 55.) The district immediately opposite to Rome seems to have been called Septem Pagi (Ib.). On the N . of Rome the territory of Veii must at one time have extended as far as Mount Soracte, since the ager Capenatis belonged to it, Capena being a colony of Veii (Cato, ap. Serv. Aen. vii. 697); though in the history of the wars between Rume and Veii, Capena appears as an independent city. [Capena, Vol. I. p. 504.] On the NW. it may probably have stretched as far as the Mons Ciminus ; but here, as well as more to the S ., its limits are uncertain, and all we know is that in the latter direction it must have been bounded by the territory of Caere. (Cf. Müller, Etrusker, ii. 2. p. 1, &c.) The ager Veiens is stigmatised by Horace and others as producing an execrable sort of red wine (Sat. ii. 3. 143; cf. Pers. v. 147 ; Mart. i. 103.9 , ii. 53. 4, &c.). We learn from Dionysius (ii. 54) that the city was of about the same size as Athens, and therefore nearly as large as Rume within the walls of Servius. [Roma, Vol. II. p. 756.]

The political constitution of Veii, like that of the other Etruscan cities, seems originally to have been republican, though probably aristocratically republican, with magistrates anuually elected. It was perhaps their vicinity to ambitious and aspiring Rome, and the constant wars which they had to wage with that city, that induced the Veientines to adopt the form of an elective monarchy, in order to avoid the dissensions occasioned by the election of annual magistrates under their original constitution, and thus to be enabled, under a single leader, to act with more viguur abroad; but this step procured them the illwill of the rest of the Etruscan confederacy (Liv. v. 1, cf. iv. 17). Monarchy, however, does not appear to have been permanent among them; and we only know the names of two or three of their kings, as Tolumnius (ib.), Propertius (Serv. Aen. vii. 697), and Morrius (lb. viii. 285).

The first time that the Veientes appear in history is in the war which they waged with Romulus in order to avenge the capture of their colony, Fidenae. According to the narrative of Livy, this war was terminated by one decisive battle in which Romulus was victorious (i. 15); but Dionysius (ii. 54, seq.) speaks of two engagements, and represents the Komans as gaining the second by a stratagem. Both these writers, however, agree with regard to the results of the campaign. The loss of the Veientines was so terrible, both in the battle and in the subsequent flight, in which numbers of them were drowned in attempling to swin the Tiber, that they were constrained to sue for peace. The terms imposed upon them by Rumulus show the decisive nature ot his victory. They were compelled to surrender that part of their territory in the neighbourhood of Rome called Septem Pagi, probably from its containing seven villages ; to give up the salt-works which they possessed at the month of the Tiber; and to provide 50 hostages as security for the due execution of the treaty. On these cunditions they obtained a peace for 100 years, with the resturation of their prisoners ; though such of the latter as proferred to remain at Rome were presented with the freedom of the city and lands on the left bank of the Tiber. The district of Septem Pagi thus acquired probably comprehended the Vatican and Janiculan hills, and became the seat of the 5 th Koman tribe, the Romilia or Romulia (Varr. L. L. v. 9. §65, Müll.; Paul. ap. Fest. s. v. Romulia Trib.)

This peace seems to have lasted about 60 or 70 years, when war again broke out between the Veientines and Romans in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, and this time also on account of Fidenae, which appears to have becone a Roman coluny after its capture by Romulus. The cause of the war was the treacherous conduct of the Fidenates during the Koman struggle with Alba. When called to account, they refused to give any explanation of their conduct, and procured the assistance of the Veientines. Tallus crossed the Anio (Teverone) with a large army, and the battle which took place at a spot between that river and the town of Fidenae was the most obstinate and bloudy which hat yet been recorded in the Roman anuals. Tullus, however, gained a signal victory over the Fidenates and their allies the Veientines. The battle is remarkable for the rows made by Tullus, of twelve salian priests, and of temples to Pavor and Pallor. These were the second set of Salians, or those attached to the worship of Quirinus [cf. Romi, p. 829]; and the appropriateness of the vow will be perceived when we consider that the Fidenates, in their answer to the Romans, had asserted that all their engagements towards Rome had expired on the death of that deified bero. (Liv. i. 27 ; Dionys. iii. 23 , siq.)

The war was renewed under Ancus Marcius by forays on both sides, which, however, seem to have been begun by the Veientines. Ancus overthrew them in two pitched battles, the last of which was decisive. The Veientines were obliged to surrender all the tract on the right bank of the Tiber called the Silva Maesia. The Roman dominion was now extended as far as the sea; and in order to secure these conquests, Ancus founded the coling of Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber. (Liv. i. 33; Dionys. iii. 41.)

The next time that me find the Veientines in collision with Rome, they had to contend with a leader of their own nation. L. Turquinius, an emigrant from Tarquinii to kome, had distinguished himself in the wars of Ancus Marcius against Veii, and was now in possession of the Ruman sovereignts. The Veientines, however, on this occasion did not stand alone, but were assisted by the other Etruscan cities, who complained of insults and injuries received from Tarquin. The Veientines, as usual, were discomfited, and so thoroughly, that they did not dare to leave their city, but were the helpless spectators of the devastation committed on their lands by the Romans. The war was terminated by Tarquin's brilliant victory at Eretus, which enabled him to claim the sovereignty of all Etruria, leaving, however, the different cities in the enjoyment of their own rights and privileges. It was on this occasion that Tarquin is said to have introduced at Konne the institution of the twelve lictors and their fasces, emblems of the servitude of the twelve Etruscan cities, os well as the other Etruscan insignia of royalty. (Dionys. iii. 57 : Flor. i. 5.) It should be observed that on this subject the accounts are very various; and some have even doubted the whole story of this Etruscan conquest, because Livy does not mention it. That historian, however, when he speaks of the resumption of the war under Servius Tullius, includes the other Etruncans with the Veientines, as parties to the truce which had expired ("bellum cum Veientibus (jam enim indatiae exierant) aliisque E.truscis sumptum," i. 42), although the Etruscans had not been concerned in the last Veientine war he had recorded. (Ct. Dionys. iv. 27.) This war under Servius Tullius was the last waged with the Veientines daring the regal period of Bome.

When the second Tarquin was expelled from Rome, the Etruscars endeavoured to restore him. Veii and Tarquinii were the two most furward caties in the league formed for this purposis. The first battle, which took place near the Siivia Arsia, was bloody but indecisive, though the Romans claimed a dubious victory. But the Etruscans having obtained the assistance of Porsena, Lars of Clusium, the Romans were completely worsted, and, at the peace which ensued, were compelled to restore to the Veientines all the territory which had been wrested from them by Romulus and Ancus Marcius. This, however, Porsena shortly afterwards restored to the Romans, out of gratitude for the hospitality which they had displayed towards the remnant of the Etruscan anny after the defeat of his son Aruns at Aricia. (Liv. ii 6-15; Dionys. v. 14, sqq.; Plut. Publ. 19.)

The Veientines could ill brook being deprived of this territory; but, whilst the influence of Porsena and his family prevailed in the Etruscan League, they remained quiet. After his death the war again broke out, B. c. 483. For a year or two it was a kind of border warfare characterised by mutual depredations. But in B.c. 481 , after a general congress of the Etruscans. a great number of volunteers joined the Veientines, and matters began to assume a more serious aspect. In the first encounters the Roinans were unsuccessful, chiefly through a mutiny of the soldiers. They serm to have been disheartened by their ill saccess; them army was inferior in number to that of the Veientines, and they endeavoured to decline an engagement. But the insults of the enemy incensed the Roman soldiery to such a degree that they insisted on being led to battle. The contest was long and bloody. Tho Etruscans at one time were in possession of the $1 \mathrm{lo}-$ man camp; but it was recovered by the valour of Titus Siccius. The Romans lost a vast number of officers, amongst whom were the consul Manlius, Q. Fabius, who had been twice consul, together with many tribunes and centurions. It was a drawn battle; yet the Romans claimed the victory, because during the night the Etruscans abandoned their camp, which was sacked by the Romans on the following day. But the surviving consul, M. Fabius Vibulanus, on his return to Rome, refused a triumph. and abdicated his office, the duties of which he was prevented from discharging by the severity of his wounds. (Dionys. ix. 5. sqq.; Liv. ii. 42-47.)

Shortly after this, the Veientines, finding that they were unable to cope with the Romans in the open field, adopted a most annoying systern of warlare. When the Roman army appeared, they shut themselves up within their walls; but no sooner had the legions retired, than they came forth and scoured the country up to the very gates of Rome. The Fabian family, which had given so many consuls to Rome, and which had taken so prominent a part in the late war, now came forward and offered to relieve the commonwealth from this harassing annoyance. The whole family appeared before the senste, and by the mouth of their chief, Caeso Fabius, then consul for the third time, declared, that, as a continual rather than a large guard was required for the Veientine war, they were willing to undertako the duty and to maintain the majesty of the Roman name, without calling upon the state for either soldiers or money. The senate thankfully accepted the offer. On the following morning 306 Fabii met in the vestibule of the consul's bouse. As they passed through the city to the place of their destination, they stopped at the capitol and offered up vows to the gods for the success of their enterprise. Then they passed out of Rome by the right arch of the Porta Carmentalis, and proceeded straight to the river Cremera, where there was a spot that seemed adapted by nature as a fortress for their little garrison. It appears, however, that the Fabii were accompanied by their clients and adherents, and the whole band probably amounted to 3000 or 4000 . (Dionys. ix. 15; P. Diac. s. v. Scelerata Porta.) The place which they chose as the station of their garrison was a precipitous hill which seemed to have been cut and isolated by art; and they farther strengthened it with entrenchments and towers. The spot has been identified with great probability by Nardini, and subsequently by other topographers, with a precipitons hill about 6 miles from Rome, on the left of the Via Flaminia, where it is traversed by the Cremera (now the Valcha), and on the right bank of that stream. It is the height which commands the present Osteria della Valchette. (Nibby, Dintorni di Roma, vol. iii. p. 399 ; Dennis, Etruria, vol. i. p. 43.)

The position here taken up by the Fabii not only enabled them to put a complete stop to the marauding expeditions of the Veientines, but even to commit depredations themselves on the territory of Veii. The Veientines having made many vain attempts to dislodge them, at length implored the succour of the Etruscans; but the Fabii on their side were supported by a consular army under Aemilins, and the Veientines and their allies were defeated. This success rendered the Fabii still more enterprising. After occupying their fortress two years with impunity they began to extend their excursions; and the Veientines on their side sought to draw them onwards, in which they at length succeeded. By a feigned flight, they enticed the Fabii into an ambuscade and slew them, 13th Feb. в. c. 476. (Ov. Fast. ii. 195, sqq.; Liv. ii. 48-50; Dionys. ix. 16-19; Florus, i. 12, &c.)

Elated with this success, the Veientines, united with the Etruscans, now marched towards Rome and pitched their camp on the Janiculan hill, at a distance of only 6 stadia from the city. Thence passing the Tiber, they penetrated as far as the ancient temple of Hope, which stood near the modern Porta Maggiore. Here an indecisive artion took place, which was renewed at the Porta Collina with the same result; but two encagements of a more decisive character on the Janiculan hill obliged the allied army to retreat. In the following year the Veientines allied themselves with the Sabines, bat were completely defeated under the walls of their own city by the consul Pub. Valerius. The war was brought to a termination in the following year. in the consulship of C. Manlius, who concluded with them a truce of 40 years, the Veientines engaging to pay a tribute in corn and money. (Liv. ii. $51-54$; Dionys. ix. 23, sqq.)

But such terms were merely nominal, and in a few years hostilities were renewed. We hear of some forays made by the Veientines in b.c. 442 (Liv. iv. 1); but there was no regular war till seren years later, when the Veientines, who were at that time governed by Lars, or King, Tolumnius, excited the Roman colony Fidenne to rebel; and in order completely to compromise the Fidenates, Tolumnius ordered them to slay the Roman ambassadors who had been despatched to demand an explanation. Both sides flew to arms; one or two obstinate engagements ensued; but the allies who had been joined by the Falisci also, were nverthrown in a decisive battle under the walls of Fidenae, in which Tolumnius was killed by the Roman military tribune, A. Cornelius Cossus. (Liv. iv. 17-19; cf. Propert. iv. 10. 22, sqq.)
Three years afterwards, Rome being afflicted with a serere pestilence, the Veientines and Fidenates were emboldened to march upon it, and encamped before the Porta Collina; but on the appearance of a Roman army under the dictator Aulus Servilius, they retreated. Servilius having parsued and routed them near Nomentum, marched to Fidenae, which he at length succeeded in taking by means of a cuniculus or mine. (Liv. iv. 22.)

Although the Veientines obtained a truce after this event, yet they soon violated it, and began to commit depredations in the Roman territory, b.c. 427 ; and even defeated a Roman army whose operations had been paralysed through the dissensions of the three military tribunes who commanded it. The Fidenates now rose and massacred all the Ror man colonists, and again allied themselves with the Veiertines, who had also enlisted a great number of Etruscan volunteers in their service. These events occasioned great alarm at Rome. Mamercus Aemilius was created dictator, and, marching against the enemy, encamped in the peninsula formed by the confluence of the Anio and the Tiber. Between this spot and Fidenae a desperate battle was fought: stratagems were employed on both sides; but at length the allies were completely defeated, and the Komans entered the gates of Fidenae along with the flying enemy. The city was sacked and destroyed and the inhabitants sold as slaves; but on the other hand the Romans granted the Veientines a truce of 20 rears. (Liv. iv. 31-35.)

At the expiration of this truce, the Romans resolved to subdue Veii, as they had done Fidenae, and it was besieged by an army commanded by six military tribunes. At this news the national assembly of the Etruscans met at the fane of Voltnmna, to consider what course they should pursue. The Veientines had again resorted to the regal form of government; but unfortunately the person whom they elected for their king, though rich and powerful, had incurred the hatred of the whole Etruscan nation by his oppressions and imperious manners, but expecially by his having hindered the performance of certain sacred games. The Etruscans consequently declared that, unless he was deposed, they should afford the Veientines no assistance. But the latter were afraid to adopt this resolution, and thus they were abandoned to their fate. Nevertheless, they contrived to prolong the siege for a period of ten years, during which the Romans were several times discomfited. It is worthy of remark that it was during this siege that the Roman soldiers, being obliged to pass the winter out of Rome, first received a fixed regular stipend. The Capenates, the Falisci, and the Tarquinienses in vain endeavoured to reliere the beleaguered city.

The length of the siege had begun to weary the Romans, when, according to the legend, the means of its capture was suggested by an extraordi. nary portent. The waters of Lake Albanus swelled to such an extent that they threatened to inundate the surrounding country. The oracle of Delphi was consulted on the cocrasion, and the response involved not only the immediate subject of the application, but also the remoter one of the capture of Veii. According to the voice from the sacred tripod, that city would be taken when the waters of the lake were made to flow off without running directly into the sea; and the prophecy was confirmed by the revelation of a Veientine haruspex made during the interval of the embassy to Delphi. All that we can infer from this narrative is that the formation of the emissary for draining the Alban lake was contemporary with the siege of Veii [cf. Albanes Lacus, Vol. I. p. 29]: the rest must be referred to the propensity of the ancients to ascribe every great event to the intervention of the gods; for we have already seen that Fidenae was captured by means of a cuniculus, a fact which there does not appear to be any valid reason to doubt, and therefore the emissary of the lake cannot be regarded as having first suggested to the Romans the method of taking a city by mine.
The honour of executing this project was reserved for the dictator M. Furius Camillus. Fortune seemed to have entirely deserted the Veientines: for though the pleading of the Capenates and Falisci on their behalf had made some impression on the national assembly of the Etruscans, their attention was diverted in another direction by a sudden irruption of the Cisalpine Gauls. Meanwhile Camillus, having defeated some bodies of troops who endeavoured to relieve Veii, erected a line of forts around it, to cut off all communication with the surrounding country, and appointed some corps of miners to work continually at the cuniculus. When the mine was completed, he ordered a picked body of his most valiant soldiers to penetrate through it, whilst he himself diverted the attention of the inhabitants by feigned attacks in different quarters. So skilfully had the mine been directed that the troops who entered it emerged in the temple of Juno itself, in the highest part of the citadel. The soldiers who guarded the walls were thus taken in the rear; the gates were thrown open, and the city soon filled with Romans. A dreadful massacre ensued; the town was sacked, and those citizens who had escaped the sword were sold into slavery. The image of Juno, the tutelary deity of Veii, was carried to Rome and pompously installed on Mount Aventine, where a magnificent temple was erected to her, which lasted till the abolition of paganism. (Liv. v. 8, 12, 13, $15-22$; Cic. Div. i. 44, ii. 32; Plut. Cam. 5, sq.; Flor. i. 12.)

Veii was captured in the year 396 в. c. Its territory was divided among the citizens of Rome at the rate of seven jugera per head. A great debate arose between the senate and the people whether Veii should be repopulated by Roman citizens, and thus made as it were a second capital; but at the persuasion of Camillus the project was abandoned. But though the city was deserted, its buildings were not destroyed, as is shown by several facts. Thus, after the battle of the Allia and the taking of Rome by the Gauls, the greater part of the Romans retired to Veii and fortified themselves there; and when the Gauls were expelled, the question was mooted whether Rome, which had been reduced to ashes, should be abandoned, and Veii converted into a new eapital. But the eloquence of Camillus again decided the Romans for the negative, and the question was set at rest for ever. This took place in s. C. 389. Some refractory citizens, however, who disliked the trouble of rebuilding their own houses at Rome, took refuge in the empty ones of Veii, and set at nought a senatusconsultum ordering them to return; but they were at length compelled to come back by a decree of capital punishment against those who remained at Veii beyond a day prescribed. (Liv. v. 49, sqq., vi. 4.)

From this time Veii was completely deserted and went gradually to decay. Cicero (ad Fam. xvi. 9) speaks of the measuring of the Veientine territory for distribution; and it was probably divided by Caesar among his soldiers in b. c. 45. (Plut. Caes. 57.) Propertius also describes its walls as existing in his time; but the space within consisted of fields where the shepherd fed his flock, and which were then under the operation of the decempeda (iv. 10. 29). It is, however, rather difficult to reconcile this chronology, unless there were two distributions. Cuesar aliso appears to bave planted a colony at the ancient city, and thas arose the second, or Roman, Veii, which seems to have heen considerable enough to sustain an assault during the wars of the triumvirs. The inhabitants were agnin dispersed, and the colony was not re-erected till towards the end of the reign of Augustus, when it assumed the name of municipium Augustum Veiens, as appears from inscriptions. (Cf. Auct. de Coloniis.) When Florus, who flourisbed in the reign of Hadrian, asserts (i. 12) that scarcely a vestige remained to mark the epot where Veii once stood, he either writes with great carelessness or is alluding to the ancient and Etruscan Veii. The existence of the manicipium in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius is attested by several monuments discovered in its ruins; and some inscriptions also found there show that it was in existence at least as late as the reign of Constantius Chlorus. The monuments alluded to consist partly of sculptares relating to those emperors and their families, and partly of inscriptions. Amongst the latter the most important is now preserved in the Capitoline Museum at Rome, recording the admission of Cains Julius Gelotes, a freedman of Augustus, to the office of an Augustalis, by the centumviri of Veii. It is dated in the consulship of Guetulicus and Calvisius Sabinus, A. U.c. $779=$ B. c. 26 , or the 13th year of the reign of Tiherius. It is published by Fabretti (Inscr. p. 170), but more correctly from the original by Nibby in his Dintorni di Roma (rol. iii. p. 409). The accents are worthy of note. Among the centumvirs whose names are subscribed to this decree are those of two of the Tarquitian family, namely, M. Tarquitius Saturninus and T. Tarquitius Rufus. This family, which produced a celebrated writer on Etruscan divination (Macrob. Sat. iii. 7), seems to have belonged to Veii and to have enjoyed considerable importance there, as two other inscriptions relating to it have been discovered. One of these records the restoration of a statue erected in honour of M. Tarquitius Saturninas by the 22nd Legion; the other is a tablet of Tarquitia Prisca dedicated to her husband M. Saenius Marcellus. (Nibby, Ib. p. 410, sq.) The family of Priscus is the most celebrated of the Gens Tarquitia. One of these was the accuser of Statilius Taurus in the reign of Claudias, and was himself condemned under the law of repetundae in the reign of Nero. (Tac. Ann. xii. 59, xiv. 44.) There are various coins of the Tarquitii. (Eckhel, D. N. V. p. 322.) After the era of Constantine we have no notices of Veii except in the Tab. Peutingeriana and the Geographer of Ravenna. It was probably destroyed by the Lombards. At the beginning of the 11 th century a castle was erected on the precipitous and isolated hill on the S . side of Veii, which was called la Isola, and is now known by the name of the Isola Farnese.

Sir William Gell was the first who gave an exact plan of Veii in the Memorie delCIstituth (Fasc. i.), and afterwards in bis Topography of Rome and its lüinity. He traced the vestiges of the ancient walls, which were composed of irregular quadrilateral masses of the local tufia, soine of which were from 9 to 11 feet in length. Mr. Dennis, however, failed to discover any traces of them (Etruria, vol. i. p. 15), and describes the stone used in the fortitications of Veii, as being cut into smaller pieces than usual in other Etruscan cities. These remains, which are principally to be traced in the N. and E., as well as the streams and the outline of the cliffs, determine the extent of the city in a manner that cannot be mistaken. They give a circumference of about 7 miles, which agrees with the account of Dionysius, before referred to, when he compares the size of Veii with that of Athens. It has been debated whether the isolated ruck, called the Isola Farnese, formed part of the city. Nibby (Dinturni, vol. iii. p. 424) and uthers are of opinion that it was the arx or citadel. On the other hand Sir William Gell and Mr. Dennis hold that this could not have been the case; and it must be confessed that the reasons advanced by the latter (vol. i. p. 42, note 5) appear decisive; namely, 1, the Isola is separated from the city by a deep glen, so that, had it been the citadel, Camillus by its capture would not have obtained immediate possession of the town, as we learn from Livy's narrative, before referred to, that be did: 2, the remains of Etruscan tombs ou the Isola show that it must have been a cemetery, and consequently without the walls. The two authorities last cited identify the citadel with the hill now called the Piazza d'Armi at the SE. extremity of the town, in the angle formed by the junction of the stream called Fosso de' due Fossi with that called Fosso di Formello. These two streams traverse the southern and eastern boundaries of ancient Veii. The latter of these streams, or Fosso di Formello, is thought to be the ancient Cremera. The other rivulet rises at La Torretta, about 12 miles from Rome. Near Veii it forms a fine cataract, precipitating itself over a rock about 80 feet high. From this spot it runs in a deep channel among precipices, and separates the Isola from the rest of Veii. It then receives the Rivo del Pino or della Stortu, whence its name of Fosso de' due Fossi. After joining the Fusso di Formello, or Cremera, the nnited stream is now called La Valca, and falls into the Tiber about 6 miles from Rome, near the Via Flaminia.

Topographers have discovered 9 gates, to which they have assigned imaginary names from local circumstances. It would be impossible to explain the exact sites of these gates without the assistance of a plan, and we shall therefore content ourselves with enumerating them in the order in which they occar, premising only that all writers do not call them alike. The westernmost gate, called the Porto de' Sette Pagi, from its being supposed to have led to the district called the Septem Pagi, is situated near the Ponte dell Isola. Then proceeding round the S. side of the city, the next gate occurs near the Fosso dell' Isola; and, from its leading to the rock of Isola, which, as we have seen, was thought by some topographers to be the ancient citadel, has been called the Porta dell' Arce. The next gate on the E. is the Porta Campana; and after that, by the Piazza $d^{\prime}$ Armi, is the Porta Fudenate. Near this spot was discovered, in 1840, the curious staircase called La Scaletta. Only eight steps of uncemented masonry, seated high in the cliff, remain, the lower part having fallen with the cliff. After passing the I'uzza ${ }^{\prime}$ A Armi, in traversing the northern side of the city by the valley of the Cremera, the gates occur in the following order: the Purta di Pietra Pertusa; the Porta delle Ars Muzie; the Porta Capenate; the Porta del Colombario, so named from the columbarium near it; and lastly the Porta Sutrina, not far from the Ponte di Formello.

The Dunicipium Veiens, which sncceeded the ancient town, was undoubtedly smaller ; for Roman sepulchres and columbaria, which must have been outside the Municipium, have been discovered within the walls of Etruscan Veii. It was perhaps not more than 2 miles in circumference. On the spot probably occupied by the Forum, were discovered the colossal heads of Augustus and Tiberius, and the colossal statue of the latter, crowned with oak and in a sitting posture, which are now in the Vatican, in the corridor of the Museo Chiavamonte. Several other fragments of statues have been found, as well as 24 marble columns, 12 of which now adorn the Piazza Colonnu at Rome, and the rest are employed in the Chapel of the Sacrament in the new Basilica of St. Paul.

The remains of Etruscan Veii are portions of the walls, the bridge near the Porta di Pietra Pertusa, the bridge, or tunnel, called Ponte Sodo, and the tombs and sepulchral grottoes. Of the walls we have already spoken. The remains of the bridge consist of a piece of wall about 20 feet wide on the bank of the stream, which seems to have formed the pier from which the arch sprung, and some large blocks of hewn tufo which lie in the water. The piers of the bridge called Ponte Formello are also possibly Etruscan, but the arch is of Roman brickwork. The Ponte Sodo is a tunnel in the rock through which the stream flows. Nibby (Dintorni, vol iii. p. 433), describes it as 70 feet long, 20 wide, and 15 high : but Mr. Dennis, who waded through it, says that it is 240 feet long, 12 to 15 wide and nearly 20 high (Etruria, vol. i. p. 14). It is in all probability an Etruscan excavation, or has at all events been enlarged by art. An ancient road ran over it ; and from above it is scarcely visible. No trace remains of the cuniculus of Camillus. The vicinity of Veii abounds with tombs excavated in the rock, and sepulchral tumuli, some of which are Roman. Among the tombs is a very remarkable one, discovered in the winter of 1842, and still open to inspection. It consists of a long passage in the tumulus, or mound, called Poggio Michele, leading to a door in the middle of the mound, and guarded at each end by sculptured lions. This is the entrance to a low dark chamber, hewn out of the rock, the walls of which are covered with paintings of the most grotesque character, consisting of horses, men, sphinxes, dogs, leopards, \&c. On either side a bench of rock, about $2 \frac{1}{2}$ feet high, projects from the wall, on each of which, when the tomb was first opened, a skeleton reposed ; but these soon crumbled into dust. One of them, from the arms lying near, was the remains of a warrior ; the other skeleton was probably that of his wife. On the floor were large jars containing human ashes，and also several small vases of the most archaic Etruscan pottery．Within was another smaller chamber also containing cinerary urns．A complete description of this remarkable sepulchre will be found in Mr．Dennis＇s Etruria（vol．i．ch．2）．

VELEIA（Eth．Veleias，ātis：Ru．near Monte－ polo），a town of Liguria，situated on the frontiers of Gallia Cisalpina，about 20 miles S．of Placentia （Piacenza），in the hills which form the lower slopes of the Apennines．The Veleiates are mentioned by Pliny among the Ligurian tribes；and in another pas－ sage he speaks of＂oppidum Veleiatium，＂which was remarkable for the longevity of some of its inhabitants （vii．49．s．50）．He there describes it as situated ＂circa Placentiam in collibus，＂but its precise site was unknown until its remains were discovered in 1760．From the mode in which these are buried， it seems certain that the town was overwhelmed by a vast landslip from the neighbouring mountain． Systematic excavations on the spot，which have been carried on since 1760 ，have brought to light several buildings of the ancient city，including the amphi－ theatre，a basilica，the forum，and several temples： and the great number of bronze ornaments and im－ plements of a domestic kind，as well as statues． busts，\＆cc．，which have been discovered on the spot． have given celebrity to Veleia as the Ponpeii of Northern Italy．Unfortunately the great weight of the superincumbent mass has crushed in the build－ ings，so that all the upper part of them is destroyed， and the larger statues have suffered severely from the same cause．The inscriptions found there attest that Veleia was a flourishing municipul town in the first centuries of the Roman Empire．One of these is of peculiar interest as containing a detailed account of the investment of a lirge sum of money by the em－ peror Trajan in the purchase of lands for the main－ tenance of a number of pror children of both sexes． This remarkable document contains the names of numerous farms and villages in the neighbourhoud of Veleia，and shows that that town was the capital of an extensive territory（probably the same once beld by the Ligurian tribe of the Veleiates）which was divided into a number of Pagi，or rural districts． The names both of these and of the various＂fundi＂ or farms noticed are almost uniformly of Roman oricin，－thus affording a remarkable proof how completely this district had been Romanised before the period in question．The Tabula Alimentaria Trajana，as it is commonly called，has been re－ peatedly published，and illustrated with a profusion of learning，especially by De Lama．（Tarola Alimen－ taria Veleiute detta Trajana，4to．Parma．1819．） A description of the ruins and antiquities bas been published by Antolini（Le Rorine di Velija，Milano， 1819）．The coins found at Veleia are very numerous， but none of them later than the time of Probus： whence it is reasonably inferred that the catastrophe which buried the city occurred in the reign of that emperor．

VELIA（＇ré入ך or＇Eגє́a：Eth．＇re入ítทs or ＇Eגєárทs，Veliensis：Castelr a Mare della Brucen）， one of the principal of the Greek colonies in Sruth－ ern Italy，situated on the shores of the Tyrrhenian sea，about midway between Posidonia and Prxns． There is some uncertainty respecting the correct form of the name．Strabo tells us that it was ori－ ginally called Hyele（＇ré $\lambda \eta$ ），but was in his day calied Elen（＇E入є́a），and Diogenes Laertius also snys that it was at first called Hyele and afterwards Elea． （Strab．vi．p．252；Diog．Laert．ix．5．§ 28；Steph． B．s．v．）But it is certain from the evidence of its coins，which uniformly bear the legends＇rEAH and ＇rEAHTתN，that the name of Hyele continued in use among the people themselves as long as the city continued；while，on the other hand，the name of＇Enea is already found in Scylax（p．4．§ 12），and seems to have been certainly that in use among Attic writers from an early period，where the Eleatic school of philosophy rendered the name familiar． Strabo also tells us that some authors wrote the name Ele（ ${ }^{(E \lambda \eta}$ ），from a fountain of that name；and this form，compared with＇rein $\eta$ and the Latin form Velia，seems to show clearly that the diversity of names arose from the Aeolic Dicamma，which was probably originally prefixed to the name，and was re－ tained in the native usage and in that of the Romans， while it was altorether dropped by the Attics．（Miin－ ter，Velia，p．21．）It is not improbable that the name was derived from that of the neighbouring river，ti：e Hales of Cicero（Alento），of which the name is written＇E入éns by Strabo and Be入éa by Stephnnas of Byzantium．（Cic．ad Fam．vii．20；Strab．vi．$p$－ 254．）Others，however，derived it from the marshes $(\tilde{\epsilon} \lambda \eta)$ at the mouth of the same river．

There is no trace of the existence of any town on the site of Velia before the establishment of the Greck colony there，and it is probable that this，like most of the Greek colonies in Southern Italy，was founded on a wholly new site．It was a colony from Phocaea in Ionia，and derived its origin from the voluntary ex－ patriation of the inhabitants of that city in order to avoid falling ander the Persian yoke, at the time of the conquest of Ionia by Harpagus, B. c. 544. The Phocaean emigrants proceeded in a body to Corsica, where they had already founded the colony of Alalia about 20 years before; and in the first instance established themselves in that island, but, having provoked the enmity of the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians by their piracies, they sustained such severe Inss in a naval action with the combined fleets of these two powens, that they found themselves compelled to abandon the colony. A part of the emigrants then repaired to Massilia (which was also a Phocaean colony), while the remainder, after a temporary halt at Rhegium, proceeded to found the new colony of Hyele or Velia on the coast of Lucania. This is the account given by Herodotus (i. 164167), with which that cited by Strabo from Antiochus of Syracuse substantially agrees. (Strab. vi. p. 254.) Later writers have somewhat confused the narrative, and have represented the foundation of Massilia and Velia as contemporaneous (Hygin. ap. A. Gell. x. 16; Ammian. Marc. xv. 9. § 7); but there is no doubt that the account above given is the correct one. Scylax alone represents Velia as a colony of Thurii. (Scyl. p. 4. § 12.) If this be not altogether a mistake it must refer to the admission at a later periud of a body of fresh colonists from that city; but of this we find no trace in any other author. The exact date of the foundation of Velia cannot be determined, as we do not know how long the Phocaeans remained in Corsica, but it may be placed approximately at about 540 в. c.

There is no doubt that the settlers at Velia, like those of the sister colony of Massilia, followed the example of their parent city, and devoted thenselves assiduously to the cultivation of commerce; nor that the city itself quickly becaine a prosperous and flourishing place. The great abundance of the silver coins of Velia still in existence, and which are found throughout the S. of Italy, is in itself sufficient evidence of this fact; while the circumstance that it became the seat of a celebrated school of philosophy, the leaders of which continued through successive generations to reside at Velia, proves that it must have been a place of much intellectual refinement and cultivation. But of its history we may be said to know absolutely nothing. Strabo tells us that it was remarkable for its good government, an advantage for which it was partly indebted to Parmenides, who gave his fellow-citizens a code of laws which the magistrates from year to year took an oath to obey. (Sirab. vi. p. 254 ; Diog. Laert. ix. 3. § 23.) But the obscure story concerning the death of Zeno, the disciple of Parmenides, who was put to death by a tyrant named Nearchus or Diomedon, would seem to show that it was not free from the same kind of violent interruptions by the rise of despotisms as were common to most of the Greek cities. (Diog. Laert. ix. 5; Cic. Tusc. ii. 22.) Strabo also tells us that the Eleans came off victorious in a contest with the Posidonians, but of the time and circumstances of this we are wholly ignorant; and he adds that they maintained their ground against the Lucanians also. (Strab. l.c.) If this is correct they would have been one of the few Greek cities which preserved their national existence against those barbarians, but their name is not found in the scanty historical notices that we possess of the wars between the Lacanians and the cities of Magna Graecia. But the statement of Strabo is in some degree confirmed by the fact that Velia was certainly admitted at an early period (though on what occasion we know not) to the alliance of Rome, and appears to have maintained very friendly relations with that city. It was from thence, in common with Neapolis, that the Rumans habitually derived the priestesses of Ceres, whose worship was of Greek origin. (Cic. pro Balb. 24 ; Val. Max. i. 1. § 1.) Cicero speaks of Velia as a well-known instance of a " foederata civitas," and we find it mentioned in the Second Punic War as one of those which were bound by treaty to contribute their quota of ships to the Roman fleet. (Cic. l. c.; Liv. xxvi. 39.) It eventually received the Roman franchise, apparently in virtue of the Lex Julia, в. c. 90. (Cic. l. c) Under the Roman government Velia continued to be a tolerably flourishing town, and seems to have been from an early period noted for its mild and salubrious climate. Thus we are told that P. Aemilius was ordered to go there by his physicians for the benefit of his health, and we find Horace making inquiries about it as a substitute for Baiae. (Plut. Aemil. 39 ; Hor. Ep. i. 15. 1.) Cicero's friend Trebatius had a villa there, and the great orator himself repeatedly touched there on his voyages along the coast of Italy. (Cic. Verr. ii. 40, v. 17, ad Fam. vii. 19, 20, ad Att. xvi. 6, 7.) It appears to have been at this period still a place of some trade, and Strabo tells us that the poverty of the soil compelled the inhabitants to turn their attention to maritime affairs and fisheries. (Strab. vi. p. 254.) It is probable that the same cause had in early times co-nperated with the national disposition of the Phocaean settlers to direct their attention especially to maritime commerce. We hear nothing more of Velia under the Roman Eimpire. Its name is found in Pliny and Ptolemy, but not in the Itineraries, which may, however, probably proceed from its secluded position. It is mentioned in the Liber Coloniarum (p. 209) among the Praefect urae of Lucania; and its continued existence as a municipal town is proved by inscriptions. (Mommsen, Inscrip. K. N. 190, App. p. 2.) It became an episcopal see in the early ages of Christianity, and still retained that dignity as late as the time of Gregory the Great (A. D. 599). It is probuble that the final decay of Velia, like that of Paestum, was owing to the ravaces of the Saracens in the 8th and 9 th centuries. The bishopric was united with that of Capaccio, which had succeeded to that of Paestum. (Münter, Velin, pp. 69-73.) During the middle ages there grew up on the spot a fortress which was called Castell' a Mare della Brucca, and which still serves to mark the site of the ancient city.

The ruins of Velia are situated on a low ridge of hill, which rises about a mile and a half from the mouth of the river Alento (the ancient Hales), and half a mile from the coast, which here forms a shallow but spacious bay, between the headland forned by the Monte della Stella and the rocky point of Porticello near Ascea. The mediaeval castle and village of Custell' a Mare della Brucca occupy the point of this hill nearest the sea. The outline of the ancient walls may be traced at intervals round the hill for their whole extent. Their circuit is not above two miles, and it is most likely that this was the old city or acropolis, and that in the days of its prosperity it had considerable suburbs, especially in the direction of its port. It is probable that this was an artificial basin, like that of Metapontum, and its site is in all probability marked by a marshy pool which still exists between the rains of the ancient city and the month of the A leato. This river itself, however, was sufficient to afford a ehelter and place of anchorage for shipping in ancient times (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 7), and is still resorted to for the same parpose by the light vessels of the country. No other rains exist on the site of the ancient city except some masses of buildings, which, being in the reticulated style, are unquestionably of Roman date: portions of aqueducts, reservoirs for water, &cc. are also visible. (The site and existing remains of Velia are described by Münter, Velia in Lucanien, 8vo. Altonn, 1818, pp. 15-20, and by the Duc de Luynes, in the Arnali dell' Instituto, 1829, pp. 381-386.)

It is cartain that as a Greek colony Volia never rooe to a par with the more opulent and flourishing cities of Magna Graecia. Its chief celebrity in ancient times was derived from its celebrated school of philosophy, which was nuiversally known as the Eleatic school. Its founder Xenophanes was indeed a native of Colophon, but had established himself at Velia, and wrote a long poem, in which he celebrated the foundation of that city. (Diog. Laert. ix. 2. § 20.) His distinguished successors Parmenides and Zeno were both of them born at Velia, and the same thing is asserted by some writers of Leacippus, the founder of the atumic theory, though others represent him as a native of Abdera or Melos. Hence Diogenes Laertius terms Velia "an inconsiderable city, but capable of producing great men" (ix. 5. § 28).

COIN OF VELLA.
VELINUS (Velino), a considerable river of Central Italy, which bas its sources in the lofty group of the Apennines between Nursia (Norcia) and Interocrea (Antrodoco). Its actual source is in the immediate neighbourhood of the ancient Falacrinum, the birthplace of Verpasian, where an old charch still bears the name of Sta Maria di Fonte Velino. The upper part of its course is from N. to S.; but near Antrodoco it turns abruptly to the W., pursues that direction as far as Rieti, and thence flows about NNW. till it discharges its waters into the Nar (Nera) about 3 miles above Terni (Interamna). Just before reaching that river it forms the colebrated cascade now known as the Falls of Terni or Cascala delle Marmore. This waterfall is in its present form wholly artificial. It was first formed by M'. Curius Dentatus, who opened an artificial channel for the waters of the Velinus, and thus carried off a considerable part of the Lacus Velinus, which previously ocenpied a great part of the valley below Reate. There still romained, bowever, as there does to this day, a considerable lake, called the Lacus Velinus, and now known as the Lago di Pie di Lugo. It was on the banks of this lake that the villa of Axins, the friend of Cicero and Varro, was situated. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15; Varro, R.R. ii. 1, 8.) Several smaller lakes still exist a little bigher up the valley: hence wo find Pliny spoaking in the plural of the Velmint Lacus (Plin. iii. 12. s. 17: Tac. Ann. i. 79; Vib. Seq. p. 24.) The character and conformation of the lower ralley of the Velinus are fully described in the article Reate. Pliny bas made a complete confusion in his description of the Nar and Velinus. [Nare] The latter river receivea near Rieti two considerable streams, the Salto and the Turano: the ancient name of the first is unknown to us, bat the second is probebly the Tolenus of Ovid. (Fast vi. 565.) It flows from the mountain district once occapied by the Aequiculi, and which still retains the name of Cicolano.

VELITRAE (OJ̇é入ıtpas: Fth OU̇e入ıtpands, Veliternus : Velletri), a city of Latium situated on the sonthern slope of the Alban hills, looking over the Pomptine Marshes, and on the left of the Via Appia. There can be no doubt that it was included within the limits of Latium, as that name was usually anderstood, at least in later times : but there is great uncertainty as to whether it was originally a Latin or a Volscian city. On the one hand Dionysius includes the Veliterni in his list of the thirty cities of the Latin League, a document probably derived from good authority (Dionys. v. 61). On the other hand both Dionysius himself and Livy represent Velitrae as a Volscian city at the earliest period when it came into collision with Rome. Thus Dionysius, in relating the wars of Ancus Marcins with the Volscians, speaks of Velitrae as a city of that perple which was besieged by the Roman king, but submitted, and was received to an alliance on favourable terms. (Id. iii. 41.) Again in B. c. 494, just about the period when its name figures in Dionysias as one of the Latin cities, it is mentioned both by that anthor and by Livy as a Volscian city, which was wrested from that people by the consul P. Virginius (Id. vi. 42 ; Liv. ii. 30). According to Livy a Roman colony was sent there the same year, which was again recruited with fresh colonists two years afterwards. (Liv. ii. 31, 34.) Dionysius, on the contrary, makes no mention of the first colony, and represents that sent in B. C. 492 as designed to supply the exhausted population of Velitrae, which had heen reduced to a low state by a pestilence. (Dionys. rii. 13, 14.). It appears certain at all events that Velitrae received a Roman colony at this period; but it had apparently again fallen into decay, as it receired a second body of colonists in B. c. 404. (Dind. xiv. 34.) Even this did not suffice to secure its allegiance to Rome : shortly after the Gaulish war, the Roman colonists of Velitrae joined with the Volscians in their hostilities, and after a short time broke out into open revolt. (Liv. vi. 13, 21.) They were indeed defeated in B. c. 381, together with the Praenestines and Volscians, who supported them, and their city was taken the next year (ib. 22, 29); bat their history from this time is a continued succession of outbreaks and hostile enterprises against Rome, alternating with intervals of dubious peace. It seems clear that they had really assumed the position of an independent city, like those of the neighbouring Volscians, and though the Romans are said to have more than once taken this city, they did not again restore it to the position of a Roman colony. Thus notwithstanding its capture in B. c. 380, the citizens were again in arms in 370, and not only ravaged the territories of the Latins in alliance with Rome, but even laid siege to Tusculum. They were quickly defeated in the field, and Velitrae itself in its turn was besieged by a Roman army; bat the siage was protracted for more than two years，and it is not quite clear whether the city was taken in the end． （Liv．vi．36，37，38，42．）In B．c． 358 they again broke out，and ravaged the Roman territories，but we hear nothing of their punishment（Liv．vii．15）：and in B．C．340，on the outbreak of the great Latin War， they are represented as among the first to join in the defection．It is evident indeed that they were at this time still a powerful people ：their troops bore an important part in two successive campaigns， but shared in the general defeat of the Latins on the banks of the Astura，b．c．338．（I．iv．viii．3，12， 13 ； Fast．Capit．）After the close of the war they were selected for the severest punishment，on the especial ground of their having been originally Roman citizens． Their walls were destroyed，and their local senators transported beyond the Tiber，under a severe pe－ nalty in case of their return．Their place was，how－ ever，supplied by a body of fresh colonists，so that the city continued to be not less populous than be－ fore．（Liv．viii．14．）

From this time Velitrae sank into the condition of an ordinary municipal town，and we hear little of it in history．It is mentioned incidentally on occasion of some prodigies that occurred there（Liv．xxx．38， xxxii．1，9），but with this exception its name is not again mentioned till the close of the Republic．We hear，however，that it was a flourishing municipal town，and it derived some celebrity at the commence－ ment of the Empire from the circumstance of its having been the native place of the Octavian family， from which the emperor Augustus was descended． The Octavii indeed claimed to be descended from the ancient Roman family of the same name；but it is certain that both the grandfather and great－grand－ father of Augustus were merely men of equestrian rank，who held municipal magistracies in their native town．（Suet．Aug．1， 2 ；Dion Cass．xlv．1．）Ac－ cording to the Liber Coloniarum，Velitrae had received a fresh body of colonists in the time of the Gracchi ；but it continued to retain its municipal rank until the reign of Claudius，when it received a military colony，and from this time assumed the title of a Colonia，which we find it bearing in inscrip－ tions（Lib．Colon．p． 238 ；Zumpt，de Col．p． 383 ； Orell．Inscr．1740，3652）．No mention of the city occurs in history under the Roman Empire，bat its naine is found in the geographers，and inscriptions textify that it continued to exist as a flourishing town down to near the close of the Empire．（Strab． จ．p． 237 ；Plin．iii．5．s． 9 ；Sil．Ital．viii． 376 ； Nibby，Dintorni，vol．iii．p．450．）It appears to have subsequently suffered severely from the ravages of the barbarians，but continued to subsist through－ out the middle ages：and the modern city of Velletri still occupies the site of the ancient one，though it has no remains of antiquity．Its position is very similar to that of Lanuvium（Civita Laviniu）， on a projecting rock or spur of hill，standing out from the inore elevated group of the Alban hills，and rising like a headland above the plain of the Pomp－ tine Marshes，which lie stretched out beneath it． The inscriptions which have been discovered there have been published by Cardinali（Inscrizioni Antiche Veliterne，4t．Roma，1823）．From one of these we learn that the ancient city possessed an amphitheatre， which was repaired as late as the reign of Valen－ tinian，but no traces of it are now visible．It had also temples of Apollo，Hercules and Mars，as well as of the Sabine divinity Sancus．（Liv．xxxii．1．）

a wine of great excellence，inferior only to the Faler－ nian（Plin．xiv．6．s．8）． ［E．H．B．］
VELLLAVI or VELAUNI，a people of Gallia． In the passage of Caesar（B．G．vii．75）some editions have Velauni，but it is certain that what－ ever is the true form of the name，these Velauni are the Vellaioi（OÚє $\lambda \lambda$ aiot）of Strabo（p．190）．The Gabsli and Velauni in Cressr＇s time were subject to the Arverni．In Ptolemy（ii．7．§ 20）the name is Velauni（Oviélauvou），but he puts them next to the Auscii．which is a great mistake．D＇Anville says that the diocese of $P u i$ represents their ter－ ritory ；but that this cannot be said of the small province of Vellay，which was annexed to Languedere． in the ante－revolutionary division of France．In the Notit．of the Prorinces of Gallia，the capital of the Vellavi is Civitas Vellavorum［Revessio］．［G L．$]$

VELTAE（Ov̀＇́入taц，Ptol．iii．5．§ 22），a people of European Surmatia，dwelling on both banks of

VEMA'NIA, a town of Vindelicia, on the road between Augusta Vindelicorum and Brigantium (It.Ant. pp. 237, 251, 259; Tab. The place now occupying the site is called Wangen. [L. S.]

VENAFRUM (Ȯ̇évaфpov: Eth. Venafranus: Venafro), an inland city of Campania, situated in the upper ralley of the Vulturnus, and on the Via Latina, 16 miles from Casinum and 18 from Teanum. (Itin. Ant. p. 303.) It was the last city of Campania towards the N., its territory adjoining on the W., that of Casinum (S. Germano), which was in. cluded in Latium, in the more extended sense of that name, and that of Aesernia on the NE., which formed part of Samnium. It stood on a hill rising above the valley of the Vulturnus, at a short distance from the right bank of that river. (Strab. $\mathbf{\nabla}$. p. 238.) No mention is found in history of Venafram before the Roman conquest of this part of Italy, and it is uncertain to what people it originally belonged ; but it is probable that it had fallen into the hands of the Samnites before that people came into collision with Rome. Under the Roman government it appears as a flourishing manicipal town: Cato, the most ancient author by whom it is mentioned, notices it as baving manufactures of spades, tiles, and ropes (Cato, R. R. 135) : at a later period it was more noted for its oil, which was celebrated as the best in Italy, and supplied the choicest tables of the great at Rome under the Empire. (Hor. Carm. ii. 6. 16, Sat. ii. 4. 69 : Juv. v. 86; Martial, xiii. 98; Strab. v. pp. 238, 242; Varr. R. R. i. 2. § 6; Plin. xr. 2. 8. 3.)

The only occasion on which Venafrum figures in history is during the Social War, b. c. 88, when it was betrayed into the hands of the Samnite leader Marius Egnatius, and two Roman colorts that formed the garrison were put to the sword. (Appian, B. C. i. 41.) Cicero more than once alludes to the great fertility of its territory (Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 25, pro Planc. 9), which was one of those that the tribune Rullus proposed by his agrarian law to divide among the Roman citizens. This project proved abortive, but a colony was planted at Venafrum under Augustus, and the city continued henceforth to bear the title of a Colonia, which is found both in Pliny and in inscriptions. (Plin. iii. 5. s. 9 ; Lib. Col. p. 239; Zumpt, de Colom. p. 347; Mommsen, Inscr. R.N.4643, 4703.) These last, which are very numeroas, sufficiently attest the flourishing condition of Venafrum under the Roman Empire : it continued to subsist throughout the middle ages, and is atill a town of about 4000 inhabitants. It retains the ancient site as well as name, but has few vestiges of antiquity, except the inscriptions above mentioned and some shapeless fragments of an edifice supposed to have heen an amphitheatre. The inscriptions are published by Mommsen. (Inscr. R. N. pp. 243-249.)

VE'NEDAE (Oíধvéסar, Ptol. iii. 5. § 19), or VENEDI (Tac. Germ. 46; Plin. iv. 13. s. 27), a considerable people of European Sarmatia, situated on the N . declivity of the mountains named after them, and along the Sinus Venedicus about the river Chronos, and as far as the E. bank of the Vistula. They were the northern neighbours of the Galindae and Gythones; but Tacitus was doubtful whether he should call them Germans or Sarmatians, though they more resembled the former than the latter in some of their customs, as the building of houses, the carrying of shields, and the habit of going on foot, whilst the Sarmatians travelled on horseback or in waggons. They sought a precarious livelihood by scouring the woods and mountains which lay between the Peucini and the Fenni. Whether they were the forefathers of the Wends is very problematical. (Cf. VE'NERIS PROMI. [HISPANIA, Vol. I. p. 1084.]
VE'NETI (Oiévetor), a Celtic people, whose country Caesar names Venetia (B. G. iii. 9). The Veneti lived on the coast of the Atlantic (B. G. ii. 34), and were one of the Armoric or Maritime states of Celtica. On the south they burdered on the Namnetes or Nannetes, on the cast they had the Redones, and on the north the Osismii, who occupied the most western part of Bretagne. Strabo (iv. p. 195) mado a great mistake in supposing the Veneti to be Belgae. He also supposes them to be the progenitors of the Veneti on the coast of the Hadriatic, whom others supposed to be Paphlagonians; however, he gives all this only as conjecture. The chief town of the Veneti was Dariorigum, afterwards Veneti, now Vannes [Dabioriocm.] The river Filaine may have been the southern boundary of the Veneti.

Caesar (B.G. iii. 9) describes the coast of Venetia as cut up by aestuaries, which interrupted the communication by land along the shore. Most of the towns (1b. 12) were situated at the extremity of tongues of land or peninsulas, so that when the tide was up the towns could not be reached on foot, nor could ships reach them during the ebb, for the water was then too shallow. This is the character of the coast of the French department of Morbihan, which correspunds pretty nearly to Caesar's Venetis. On this coast there are many bays and many " lingulae " as Caesar calls them (Pointes). The most remarkable peninsula is Quiberon, which runs out into the sea near 10 miles, and is insulated at high water. The Veneti commanded the sea in these parts, and as the necessities of navigation often drove vessels to their ports, they made them pay for the shelter. The Veneti had trade with Britain, with Devonshire and Corncall, the parts of the island which were nearest to them. They were the most powerful maritime state on the Atlantic.

Their vessels were made nearly flat-bottomed, in order that they might the better take the ground when they were left dry by the ebb. The heads were very high, and the sterns strung built, to stand the violence of their seas. The material was ouk. Instead of rupes they had chain cables, the use of which has been revived in the present century. Strabo (iv. p. 195) writes as if the ropes of the rigging were chains, which is very absurd, and is contraticted by Caesar, who says that the yards were fasiened to the masts by ropes, which the Romans cut asunder in the sea-fight with the Veneti (iii. 14). Instead of sails they used skins and leather worked thin, either because they had no flax and did nut know its use, or. ax Caesar supposes it to be more likely, because flaxen sails were nut suited for the tempests of that comst.

The Veneti rose against the Romans in the winter of $\mathbf{8 . c}$. 57 , and induced many other neighbouring states to join them, even the Murini and Menapii. They also seut to Britain for help. Caesar, who was absert in Italy during the winter (b.c. $57-$ 56), sent orders to build ships on the Loire, probably in the territury of the Andes, Turones and Carnutes, where his legions were quartered, and the ships were fluated down to the Occan. He got his ruwers from the Provincia. In the meantime he came himself into Gallia. He protected his rear arainst attack by sending Labienus to the country of the Treviri, to keep the Belgae quiet and to stop the Germans from crossing the Khine. He sent P. Crassus with twelve cohurts and a large body of cavalry into Aquitania to prevent the Celtae from receiving any sid from these parts; and he kept the Unelii [Unklı, ], Curisulites and Lexovii in check by sending Q. Titurius Sabinus int those parts with three legi.ns. D. Brutus commanded Caenar's fleet and the Gallic ships furnished by the Pictunes and Santrnes, and other states that had been reduced to obedience.

Caesar began the campaign by besieging the Venetian towns that were situated on the estremities of the tongues of land; but as the Veneti had abundance of ships, they removed them elves by water from one town to another, when they could nolonger resist the besieger. They did this during a great part of the summer, and Caesar could not prevent it, for he had not yet got together all his ships. After taking several of their towns he waited for the remainder of his fleet. The Veneti with about 220 of their best equipped ships came out of port to meet the Romans. The Roman ships could not do the Gallic slips any damage by driving the heads of their vessels against them, for the Gallic ships were too high at the prow and too strong; nor couid the Romans have attacked them by raising wooden frameworks on their decks, tor the Gallic ships were too high. The only advantage that the Roman ships had was in the oars, which the Gallic shipe had not. They could only trust to their sails. The Romans at last fixed sharp hooks at the end of long porles, and laying hold of the enemy's rigging with them, and then putting their own vessels in motion by the oars, they cut the ropes asunder, and the yards and sails falling down, the Venetian ships were usele.x. Everything now depended on courage, in which the Kumans had the advantage; and the men were encouraged by the presence of Caesar and the army, which occupied all the hills and higher ground which conmanded a view of the sea. The Roman ships got round the Venetian, two or three about each, for they had the advantage in number of vessels, and the men began to buard the enemy. Some ships were taken and the rest tried to sail away, but a dead calm came on and they could not stir. A very few ships escaped to the land at nichictial. The battle lasted frum the forth hour in the morning to sunset. Thus was destroyed the first naval puwer that was formed on the coast of the Atlantic. The Veneti lost their ships, all their young men of fighting age, and most of their men of mature age and of rank. They surrendered unconditionally. Caesar put to death all the members of the Venetian state assembly, on the ground that they had violated the law of nations by imprisoning Q. Velanius and T. Silius, who had been sent into their country in the previous winter to get supplies for the Romnan troops who were quartered along the Loire ( B. G. iii. 7, 8). The rest of the people were sold by auction; all, we must suppose, that Caesar could lay hold of. Thus the territury of the Veneti was nearly depopulated, and an active commercial people was swept from the earth. The Veneti never appear again as a powerful state. When Vercingetorix was rousing all Gallia to come against Caesar at Alesia (b.c. 52), the contingent of all the Armoric states, seven or eight in number, was only 6000 men (B.G. vii. 75).

Dion Cassius (xxxix. 40-43) has four chapters on the history of this Venetian war, which, as usual with him, he puts in confusion, by misunderstanding Caesar and making his own silly additions. [G. L.]

VENETIA (OÚeveria: Eth. Ovévétos or "Evetos, Venetns), a province or region of Northern Italy, at the head of the Adriatic sea, extending from the foot of the Alps, where those mountains descend to the Adriatic, to the nouths of the Padus, and westward as far as the river Athesis (Adige), or the lake Benacus. But the boundaries of the district seem to have varied at diffierent times, and there is some difficulty in deternining them with accuracy. In early times, indeed, before the Roman conquest, wo hare no account of the exact line of demarcation between the Veneti and the Cenomani, who adjoined them on the W., though according to Livy, Verona was a city of the latter people (v. 35). After the Roman conquest, the whole of Veuetia was at first included as a part of Cisalpine Gaul, and was not separated from it till the time of Augustus, who constituted bis Tenth Region of Venetia and Istria, but including within its limits not only Verona, but Brixia and Cremona also (Plin. iii. 18. s. 22, 19. s. 23), both of which were certainly cities of the Cenomani, aud seem to have continued to be commonly considered as belonging to Cisalpine Gaul. (Ptol. iii. 1. § 31.) Some authors, however, extended the appellation of Venetia still further to the W., so as to include not only Brisia and Cremona, but Bergomum also, and regarded the Addua as the boundary

VENETIA.
(P. Diac. Hist. Lang. ii. 14). But in the later period of the Roman Empire the Athesis seems to have been generally recugnised as the W. boundary of Venetia, though not so strictly as to exclude Verona, the greater part of which was situated on the right bank of the river. Towards the N. the boundary was equally indefinite: the valleys and southern slopes of the Alps were occupied by Rhaetian and Euganean tribes; and it is probable that the limit between these and the Veneti, on their S. frontier, was always vague and arbitrary, or at least determined merely by nationality. not by any geographical boundary, as is the case at the present day with the German and Italian races in the same region. Thus Tridentum, Feltria, and Belunum, were all of them properly Rhaetian towns (Plin. iii. 19. 8. 23), though included in the Tenth Region of Augustus, and for that reason often considered as belonging to Venetia.

On the E. the limits of Venetia were more definite. The land of the Carni, who occupied the greater part of the modern Frioul, was generally considered as comprised within it, while the little river Formio ( Kisano), a few miles S . of Tergeste, separated it from Istria (Plin. iii. 18. s. 22.) Several authors, however, regard Tergeste as an Istrian city [TERgeste], and must therefore have placed the boundary either at the Timavus, or where the Alps come down so close to the sea, between that river and Tergeste, as to prevent the road being continued along the coast. There can be no doubt that this point forms the natural boundary of Venetia on the E., although the Formio continued under the Roman Einpire to constitute its political limit.

The physical peculiarities of the region thus limited are very remarkable. The greater part of Venetia is, like the neighbouring tract of Cisalpine Gaul, a broad and level plain, extending, without interruption, to the very foot of the Alps, and furrowed by numerous streams, which descend from those mountains with great rapidity and violence. These streams, swollen by the melting of the Alpine snows, or by the torrents of rain which descend upon the mountains, as soon as they reach the plain spread themselves over the country, forming broad beds of sand and pebbles, or inundating the fertile tract on each side of their banks. Continually stagnating more and more, as they flow through an almost perfoctly level tract, they form, before reaching the sea, considerable sheets of water; and the action of the tides (which is much more perceptible at the head of the Adriatic than in any other part of that sea or of the Mediterranean) combining to check the outflow of their waters, causes the formation of extensive salt-water lagunes, communicating with the sea only through narrow gaps or openings in the long line of sandy barriers that bounds them. Such lagunes, which occupy a great extent of ground S. of the present mouth of the Po [Panus], are continued on from its N. bank to the neighbourhood of Altinum; and from thence, with some interruptions, to the month of the Isonzo, at the head or inmost bight of the Adriatic. So extensive were they in ancient tines that there was an uninternipted line of inland navigation by these lagunes, which were known as the Septem Maria, from Ravenna to Altinum, a distance of above 80 miles. (Itin. Ant. p. 126.) Great physical changes have naturally taken place in the course of ages in a country so constituted. On the one hand there is a constant tendency to the filling up of the lagunes with the silt and mud brought down by the rivers, which converts them first into marshes, and eventually into firm land. On the other hand the rivers, which have for ages been confined within artificial banks, keep pushing on their mouths into the sea, and thus creating backwaters which give rise to fresh lagunes. At the same time, the rivers thas confined, from time to time break through their artificial barriers and force new channels for themselves: or it is found necessary to carry them off by new and artificial outlets. Thos all the principal streams of Venetia. from the Adige to the Piave, are at the present day carried to the sea br artificial canals; and it is doabtful whether any of them have now the same outlet as in ancient times.

In the eastern portion of Venetin, from the Piare to the foot of the Alps near Aquileia, these physical characters are less marked. The const is indeed bordered by a belt of marshes and lagunes, bat of no great extent: and within this, the rivers that descend from the Alps have been for the most part left to wander unrestrained through the plain, and have in consequence formed for theniselves bruad beds of stone and shingle, sometimes of sarprising extent, through which the streams in their ordinary condition roll their diminished waters the triting volume of which contrasts strangely with the breadth and extent of their deposits. Such is the character especially of the Tagliamento, the largest river of this part of Italy, as well as of the Torre, the Natisone, and other minor streams. The irregularity of their channels, resulting from this state of things, is sufficiently shown by the fact that the rivers Turrus and Natiso, which formerly flowed under the walls of Aquilein, have now changed their conrse. and join the Isonzo at a distance of more than 4 miles from that city. [Aquilikia.]

Of the history of Venetia previous to the Roman conquest we know almost nothing. It was occupied at that time by two principal nations, the Vene:t from whom it derived its name, in the W., and the Carni in the E.; the former extending from the Athesis to the Plavis, or perhaps to the Tilavemptus, the latter from thence to the borders of Istria. But the origin and affinities of the Veneti themselres are extremely obscure. Arcient writers represent them as a very ancient people (Polyb. ii. 17), but at the same time are generally agreed that they were not the oricinal inhabitants of the tract that they occupied. This was reported by tradition to have been held in the earliest ages by the Euganeans (Livi. 1), a perple whom we still find lingering in the valleys and un. derfalls of the Alps within the historical periol, but of whose origin and affinities we know absolutely nothing. [Euganei.] In regard to the Veneli themselves it cannot fail to be remarked that we meet with three tribes or nations of this name in other parts of the world, besides those of Italy. viz the Gaulish tribe of the Veneti on the ccast of Armorica; the Venedi or Veneti of Tacitus, a Sarmatian or Slavonian tribe on the shores of the Baltic; and the Heneti or Eneti, who are mentioned as existing in Paphlagonia in the time of Homer. (Iliud, ii. 85.) The name of this last people dues not subsequently appear in history, and we are therefore wholly at a loss as to their ethnical aff. nities, but it is not improbable that it was the resemblance or rather identity of their name with that of the Italian Veneti (according to the Greek form of the latter) that gave rise to the strange story of Antenor having migrated to Venetia after the siege of Troy, and there founded the city of Patavium. (Liv. i. 1; Virg. Aen. i. 242 ; Serv. ad loc.) This legend, so generally adopted by the Romans and later Greeks, seems to have been current as early as the time of Sophocles. (Strab. xiii. p. 608.) Some writers, however, omitted all mention of Antenor, and merely represented the tribe of the Heneti, after having lost their leader Pylaemenes in the Trojan War, as wandering through Thrace to the head of the Adriatic, where they ultimately established themselves. (Id. xii. p. 543; Scymn. Ch. 389.) Whether there be any foundation for this story or not, it is evident that it throws no light upon the national affinities of the Italian Veneti. The other two tribes of the same name would seem to lead our conjectures in two different directions. Frum the occurrence of a tribe of Veneti anong the Transalpine Ganls, just as we find among that people a tribe of Cenomani and of Senones, correspnnding to the two tribes of that name on the Italian side of the $A l p s$. it would seem a very natural inference that the Veneti also were a Gaulish race, who had migrated from beyond the Alps. To this must be opposed the fact that, while a distinct historical tradition of the successive migrations of the Gaulish tribes in the N. of Italy has been preserved and transmitted to us (Liv. v. 34, 35). no trace is recorded of a similar migration of the Veneti; but, on the contrary, that people is uniformly distinguished from the Gauls: Livy expressly speaks of them as occupying the sume tract which they did in his time not only befure the first Gaulish migration, but before the plains of Northern Italy were occupied by the Etruscans (Ib. 33); and Polybius emphatically, though brietly, describes them as a different people from the Gauls their neighbours, and using a different language, though resembling them much in their manners and habits (ii. 1i). Strabo also speaks of them as a distinct people from the Gauls, though he tells us that one account of their origin derived them from the Gaulish people of the same name that dwelt on the shores of the ocean. (Strab. iv. p. 195, v. p. 212.) But there is certainly no ground for rejecting the distinct statement of Polybius, and we may safely acquiesce in the conclusion that they were not of Celtic or Gaulish origin.

On the other hand the existence of a tribe or people on the sonthern shores of the Baltic, who were known to the Romans (through their German neighbours) as Venedi or Veneti, a name evidently identical with that of the Wenden or Wends, by which the Slavonian race in general is still known to the Germans, would lead us to regard the Italian Veneti also as probably a Slavonian tribe : and this seems on the whole the most plausible hypothesis. There is nothing improbable in the circumstance that the Slavonians may at an early period have extended their migrations as far as the head of the Adriatic, and left there a detached branch or offshoot of their main stock. The commercial intercourse of the Veneti with the shores of the Baltic, a traffic which we find already established at a very early period, may be the more readily explained if we suppose it to have been carried on by tribes of the same origin. Herudotus indeed represents the Veneti as an Illyrian tribe (i. 196, v. 9) ; but it seems probable that the name of Illyrians was applied in a vague sense to all the mountaineers that occupied the eastern coasts of the Adriatic, and some of these may in ancient times have been of Slavonian origin, though the true Illyrians (the ancestors of the present Albanians) were undoubtedly a distinct people.

Of the history of the Veneti as an independent people we know almost nothing ; but what little we do learn indicates a marked difference between them and their neighbours the Gauls on one side, and the Liburnians and Illyrians on the other. They apprear to have been a commercial, rather than a warlike, people : and from the very earliest dawn of history carried on a trade in amber, which was brought overland from the shores of the Baltic, and exchanged by them with Phoenician and Greek merchants. Hence arose the fables which ascribed the production of that substance to the land of the Veneti, and ultimately led to the identification of the Eridanus of Northern Europe with the Padus of Northern Italy. [Eridanus.] Herodotus mentions a peculiar custom as existing among the Veneti in his day, that they sold their daughters by auction to the highest bidder, as a mode of disposing of them in marriage (i. 196). We learn also that they habitually wore black garments, a taste which may be said to be retained by the Venetians down to the present day, but was connected by the poets and mythographers with the tables concerning the fall of Phaeiton. (Scymn. Ch. 396.) Another circumstance for which they were distinguished was the excellence of their horses, and the care they bestowed on breeding and training them, a fact which was appraled to by many as a proof of their descent from Antenor and "the horsetraining Trojans." (Strab. v. pp. 212,215.) It is clear that they were a people considerably more adranced in civilisation than either the Gauls or the Ligurians, and the account given by Livy (x. 2) of the landing of Cleonymus in the territory of Patavium (b.c. 302) proves that at that period Patavium at least was a powerful and well organised city. Livy indeed expressly contrasts the Veneti with the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Istrians, "gentes ferae et magna ex parte latrociniis maritimis infames." (Il.) On this occasion we are told that the citizens of Patavium were kept in continual alarm on account of their Gaulish neighbours, with whom they seem to have been generally on unfriendly terms. Thus at a still earlier period we are inforned by Polsbius that the retreat of the Senonian Gauls, who had taken the city of Rome, was caused by an irruption of the Venetians into the Gaulish territory (ii. 18). It was duubtless this state of hostility that induced them, as soon as the Roman arms began to make themselves felt in Northern Italy, to conclude an alliance with Rome against the Gauls (8.c. 215), to which they appear to have subsequently adhered with unshaken fidelity. (Polyb. ii. 23, 24.) Heuce while we afterwards find the Romans gradually carrying their arms beyond the Veneti, and engaged in frequent hostilities with the Carni and Istrians on the extreme verge of Italy, no trace is found of any collision with the Venetians. Nor have we any account of the steps by which the latter passed from the condition of independent allies to that of subjects of the Roman Republic. But it is probable that the process was a gradual one, and grew out of the mere necessity of the case, when the Romans had conquered Istria and the land of the Carni, in which last they had established, in B. c. 181, the powerful colony of Aquileia It is certain that before the close of the Republic the Veneti had ceased to have any independent existence, and were comprised, like the Gaulish tribes, in the province of Gallia Cisalpina, which was placed under the authority of Caesar, B. c.
59. The period at which the Veneti acquired the Roman franchise is oncertain : we are only left to infer that they obtained it at the same time as the Transpudane Gauls, in B. C. 49. (Dion Cass. xii. 56.)

Under the Roman Empire, Venetia (as already mentioned) was included, together with Istria, in the Tenth Region of Augustus. The land of the Carni (Carnorum regio, Plin. iii. 18. 8. 22) was at this time considered, for administrative purposes, as a part of Venetia; though it is still described as distinct by Ptoleny (iii. 1. §§ 25, 26); and there is no doubt that the two nations were originally separate. But as the population of both districts became thoroughly Romanised, all traces of this distinction were lost, and the naines of Venetia and Istria alune remained in use. These two continued to form one province, and we meet with mention, both in inscriptions and in the Notitia, of a " Corrector Venetiae et Histriae," down to the close of the R,man Eimpire. (Notit. Dign. ii. p. 65; Bïcking, ad loc. p. 441 : Orell. Inscr. 1050, 3191.) The capital of the united provinces was Aquileia, which rose under the Roman Empire to be one of the most flourishing cities of Italy. Its importance was derived, not fromits wealth and commercial prosperity only, but from its situation at the very entrance of Italy, on the highroad which became the great means of communication between the Eastern and Western Empires. The same circumstance led to this part of Venetia becoming the scene of repeated contents for power between rival emperors. Thus it was before Aquileia that the Einperor Maximin perished in A.D. 238; it was on the banks of the river Alsa (Avsa) that the vounger Constantine was defeated and slain. in A.D. 340; aysain, in 388, the contest between Masimus and Theodosins the (ireat was decided in the same neighbourhood; and in 425, that between the usurper Joannes and the generals of Theodosius II. [Apcileia.] Finally, in A.d. 489, it was on the river Sontius (Isonzo) that Odoacer was defeated by the Guthic king Theodoric. (Hist. Miscell. xvi. p. 561.)

It seems certain that Venetia had become under the Roman Empire a very opulent and flourishing province: besides Aquileia, Patavium and Verona were provincial cities of the first class; and many uther towns such as Concordia, Altinum, Forum Juli, &cc., whose names are little known in history, were nevertheless opulent and considerable municipal towns. But it suffered with peculiar severity from the inroads of the barbarians before the close of the Empire. The passage across the Julian Alps from the valley of the Sare to the plains of Aquileia, which presents few natural difficulties, became the highway by which all the barbarian nations in succession descended into the plains of Italy: and hence it was Venetia that felt the first brunt of their fury. This was experially the cane with the invasion of Attila in A. D. 452, who, having at length reduced Aquileia atter a long siege, razed it to the ground; and then, advancing with feartul rapidity, devastated in like manner the cities of Concordia, Altinum, Pataviun, Vicentia, Verona, Brixia, and Bergonum, not one of which was able to oppose any effectual resistance. (Hist. Miscell. xp. p. 549.) The expression of the chromicler that he levelled these cities with the ground is probably exnggerated; but there can be no doubt that they suffered a blow from which three of theon at least. Concordia, Altinum, and Aquileia, never recovered. In the midst of this devastation many fagitives from the ruined cities took refuge in the extensive lagnnes that bordered the consts of Venetia, and established themselves on some small islands in the midst of the waters, which had previously been inhabited only by fishermen. It was thus that the refugees from Aquileia gave origin to the episcopal city of Grado, while those from Patavium settled on a spot then known as Rivus Altus, in the midst of the lagunes formed by the Meduacus, where the new colony gradually grew up into a wealthy city and a powerful republic, which retained the ancient name of the province in that of Venezia or Venice. "This emigration (observes Gibbon) is not attested by any coutemporary evidence ; bat the fact is proved by the event, and the circumstances might be preserved by tradition." (Decl. and Fall, ch. 35, note 55.) A curious letter of Cassiodoris (Var. xii. 24), written in A. D. 523, describes the islands of Venetia as inhabited by a population whose sole occupation and resource was derived from their fisheries : and it is remarkable, that he already appears to confine the appellation of Venetia to these islands, an usage which had certainly become prevalent in the time of Paulus Diaconus, who says, in speaking of the ancient province, "Venetia enim non solum in paucis insulis, quas nunc Venetias dicimus, constat " (ii. 14). It is clear. therefore, that the transfer the name of the province to the island city, which has continued ever since, was established as eariy as the eighth century.
The original land of the Veneti, as already observed, was almost entirely a plain. The underfalls of the Alps, and the hills that skirt the foot of that range, were for the most part inhabited by tribes of mountaineers, who were of the same race with the Khaetians and Euganeans, with whom, so far as wo can discover, the Veneti themselves had nothing in common. But a portion of this district was comprised within the limits of the province of Venetia, as this came to be marked out under Augustus; so that the boundary line between Venetia and Khaetia was carried apparently from the head of the Lake Benacus (Lago di Garda) acruss the valley of the Athesis (Adige) to the ridge which separates the valley of the Plavis from that of the Meduacns, so as to exclude the Val Sugana, while it included the whole valley of the Piace (Ilavis), with the towns of Feltria and Belonum, both of which are expressly ascribed by Pliny to the Tenth Region. Thence the boundary seems to have followed the ridge which divides the waters that fall into the Adriatic from the valleys of the Drave and Gail, both of which streams flow eastward towards the Danube, and afterwards swept round in a semicircle, till it nearly touched the Adriatic near Triesto (Tergeste).
Within these limits, besides the anderfalls of the Alps that are thrust forward towards the plain, there were comprised two distinct gmupe of hills, now known as the Colli Euganci and Monti Berici, both of them wholly isolated from the neighbouring ranges of the Alps, and, in a geological sense, unconnected with them, being both clearly of volcanic origin. The name of the Euganean hills, applied to the more southerly of the two groups, which approaches within a few miles of Patarium (Podora), is evidently a relic of the period when that peoplo possessed the graater part of this country, and is doubtless derived from a very early time. The appellation is not nuticed by any ancient gengrapher, but the nane of Lugraneus Collis is given by Lucan to the hill above the baths of Aponus, one of the group in question; and Hartial gives the name of "Euganeae Orae" to the hills near the town of Ateste (Este), at the southern extremity of the same range. (Lucan. vii. 192 ; Martial. x. 93). There can, therefure, be no doubt that this beautiful range of hiils was known in ancient times us the Euganei Colles.

The rivers of Venetia are numerous, but, for the reasons already mentioned, not always easy to identify. Much the largest and most important is the Athesis (Adige), which at one period formed the boundary of the province, and which, emerging from the Alps, near Verona, sweeps round in a great curve till it pours its waters into the Adriatic only a few miles $N$. of the mouths of the Padus. The next river of any magnitude is the Menvicus or Brenta, which flows under the walls of Putavium, and receives as a tributary the Bacchiglione, apparently the Meduacus Minor of Pliny. After this (proceeding pastwards) comes the Silis (Sele), a small stream flowing by the town of Altinum: next, the Plavis (Fiare), a much more important river, which rises in the Alps above Belunum (Bellono), flows past that city and Feltria (Feltre). and enters the sea a few miles E. of Altinum: then the Liquentia (Livenza), and the Romatinus (Lemene), a small river flowing under the walls of Concordia. Next to this comes the Tilavemptus (Tagliamento), the most inportant of the rivers of the $E$. portion of Venetia, having its sources in the high ranges of the $A l$ is above Juliuin Carnicum, whence it traverses the whole plain of the Carni, nearly in a direct line from N. to $S$. Beyond this come several minor streams, which it is not easy to identify with certainty: such are the Varanus and Anassus of Pliny, probably the Stella and the torrent of Cormor; and the Ausn, which still bears the name of $A u s a$. E. of these, again, come three considerable streams, the Turrcs, Nariso, and Sontius, which still preserve their ancient names, as the Turre, Nutisone, and Isonzo, but have undergone considerable changes in the lower part of their course, the Natiso having formerly flowed under the walls of $A$ puileia, about 4 miles W. of its present channel, while the Isonzo, which now unites with it, originally followed an independent channel to the sea, near Monfulcone. The Isunzo receives a considerable tributary from the E., the Wippach or Vipao, which descends from the elevated table-land of the Karst, and was known in ancient times as the Fiuvirs Frigides. It was by the valley of this river that the great highroad from the banks of the Danube, after crossing the dreary highlands of Carniole, descended to Aquileia and the plains of Venetiat. On the ext eme contines of the province the little river Timaves must be mentioned, on account of its classical celebrity, though of no geographical importance ; and the Formio (Risano), a few miles S. of Tergeste, which, from the time of Pliny, constituted the limit between Venetia and Istria. (1 Plin. iii. 18. s. 22.)

The cities and towns of Venetia may now be entimerated in geographical order. Farthest to the W., and situated on the Athesis, was the important city of Verona. Considerably to the E. of this was Vicentia, and beyond that again, Patavicim. S. of Vicentia, at the southern extremity of the Euganean hills, was Atestr: (Este). On the border of the lagunes, at their N. extremity, was Aitincm, and 30 miles farther to the F., Concomina. Inland from these lay Oritergicm and Tarvisium, both of them considerable towns; and on the slopes of the hills forming the lowest underfalls of the Alps, the smaller towns of Acelium (Asolo) and Cencta (Ceneda), the name of which is found in Agathias and Paulus Diaconus (Agath. Hist. Goth. ii. 8 ; P. Diac. ii. 13), and was in all probability a Roman town, though not mentioned by any earlier writer. Still farther inland, in the valley of the Plavis, were Felthia and Belunum. E. of the Tilavemptus, and therefore included in the territory of the Carni, were Aquileia, near the sea-coast; Fontim Julif, N. of the preceding; Vedincos ( $V$ dine), farther to the W.; and Juitum Carniccm, in the upper valley of the Tilaventptus, and in the midst of the Alps. Tengeste, on the E. side of the bay to which it cave its name, was the last city of Venetia, and was indeed by many writers considered as belonging to Istria [Tergeste].

Besides these, there were in the land of the Carni several smaller towns, the names of which are mentioned by Pliny (iii. 19. s. 23), or are found for the first time in Paulus Diaconus and the Geographer of Ravenna, but were in all probability Roman towns, which had grown up under the Einpire. Of these, Flamonia ( I'lin.) is probably Flagogna, in the valley of the Tagliamento; Osopum (P. Diac. iv. 38) is still called Osopo, and Glemona, Gemona, higher up in the same valley; and Artemia, Artegma, a few miles SE. of the preceding. Cormones (ib.) is still called Cormons, s small town between Cicidale and Gradisca; and Pucints (Plin., Ptol.) is Duino, near the sources of the Timarus.

The other obscure names mentioned by Pliny (l.c.), and of which he himself says, "quas scrupulose dicere non attineat," were apparently for the most part mountain tribes or communities, and cannot be determined with any approach to certainty.

Venetia was traversed by a great line of highroad, which proceeded from Ayuileia to Verona, and thence to Mediolanum, and formed the great highway of communication from the latter city to the Danube and the provinces of the Eastern Empire. It passed through Concordia, Altinum, Patavium, Vicentia, and Verona. From Patavinm a branch struck off through Ateste and Anneianum (probably Legnago on the Adige) to join the Aemilian Way at Mutina. A still more direct line of communication was established from Altinuin to Ravenna by water, through the lagunes and artiticial canals which communicated from one to another of these sheets of water. This line of route (if such it can be called) is briefly indicated by the Antonine Itinerary ("inde [a Ravenna] navigantur Septem Maria Altinum usque," p. 126) ; while the stations are given in dotail by the Tabula; but from the fluctuations that the lagunes have undergone, few of them can be identified with any certainty.

VENETICAE INSULAE, in Gallia, mentioned by Pliny (iv. 19), are the numerous small islands along the coast of Venetia, or the modern department of Morbihan. The largest is Belle-ile. The others are Houat, Hedic, Grouin, and some others. Perhaps the peninsula of Quiberon may be included [Veneti ; Vinibilis].

VENETUS LACUS. [Brigantinus Lacus.]

VENIA'TIA, a place in Gallaecia in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Bracara to Asturica. (Itin. Ant. p. 423.) Variously identified with Vinhaes, Varzana, and Reqiejo. [T. H. D.]

VENICO'NES (OÚєvikwves, P'tol. ii. 3. § 14), a

VENNENSES. people on the E. coast of Britannia Barbara, S. of the estuary of the Tuaesis (Murray Frith), in Forfarshire and Aberdeenshire.
[T. H. D.]
VENNENSES, a tribe of the Cantabri in Hispania Tarraconensis. (Plin. iii. 3. s. 4.) [T.H.D.]
 people in the NW. part of Hibernia, between the promontories Borenm and Vennicnium. [T. H. D.]

VENNI'CNIUM PROM. (Ò̀єvviкvıò áкрov, Ptol. ii. 2. § 2), the most northerly headland of Hibernia, usually identified with Malin Head; but Camden (p. 1411) takes it to have been Rame's Head.
[T. H. D.]
VE'NNONES (Ỏ̇'́vyoves or Oúlyvoves), a tribe of Rhaetia (Ptol. ii. 12. § 3), or according to Strabo (iv. pp. 204, 206), of Vindelicia. They are described as the wildest among the Rbaetian tribes, and are no doubt the same as the Vennonetes who, according to Pliny (iii. 24), were mentioned among the nations of the Alpine Trophy. They seem to have inhabited the district about the sources of the Athesis, which bore the name of Venonesgowe or Finesgowe as late as the eleventh century. (Von Hormayr, Gesch. Tirols, i. 1. p. 35.)
VENONAE, a town in Britannia Romana apparently belonging to the Coritavi, at which the road from London to the NW. part of Britain separated, one branch proceeding towards Deva, the other taking a NE. direction towards Lindum and Eboracum. There was also another branch to the SW. towards Venta Silurum, so that the two main roads which traversed the whole island must have crossed here. (Itin. Ant. pp. 470, 477, 479.) Variously identified with Highcross, Claybrook, and Wigston Parva.
[T. H. D.]
VENOSTES, probably a branch of the Vennones, a Rhaetian tribe, were mentioned in the Alpine Trophy, of which the inscription is quoted by Pliny (iii. 24). In the middle ages their district bore the name of Venusta Vallis. (Zeuss, Die Deutschen, p. 237.)
VENTA, the name of several towns in Britannia Romana. 1. Venta Belgarum (Oи̃є vтa, Ptol. ii. 3. § 28), in the SW. of Britain, on the road from Londinium to Calleva and Isca Dumnoniorum. (Itin. Ant. p. 478, &c.; Geogr. Rav. v. 31.) Now Winchester, where there are some Roman remains. (Camden, p. 138.)
2. Venta Silurum on the W. coast of Britannia Romana, on the road from Londinium to Isca Silurum, and near the estuary of the Sabrina. (Itin. Ant. p. 485.) Now Caer Went in Monmouthshire, where there are traces of the ancient walls, and where Roman antiquities are (or were) occasionally found. (Camden, p. 713.)
3. Venta Icenorum, a town of the Iceni, on the E. coast of Britannia Romana (Ptol. ii. 3. § 21), to which there was a road from London. (Itin. Ant. p. 479.) Most probably Caistor, on the river Wensum, a little S. of Norwich, which probably rose from the ruins of Caistor. Here are traces of Roman remains. (Camden, p. 460.)
[T. H. D.]
VE'NTIA (Ovievtia), in Gallia Narbonensis, a town of the Allobroges, mentioned only by Dion Cassius (xxxvii. 47) in his history of the war between the Allobroges and C. Pomptinus the governor of Gallia Provincia (B.c. 62). Manlius Lentinus, a legatus of Pomptinus, came upon this town, but was driven from it. The place appears to be near the Isara (Isère) from Dion's narrative, and D'Anville following De Valois supposes it to be

VENUSIA.
Vinai, between Moirenc and S. Marcellin, at some distance from the bank of the Isère. As Ventia is unknown otherwise, it may be a blunder of Dion, and the place may be Vienna.
[G. L.]
VENTISPONTE, a town in Hispania Baetica (Hirt. B. Hisp. 27), which appears from still extant inscriptions to have been not far from Puente de Don Gonzalo. (Ukert, ii. pt. i. p. 368.) It appears on coins under the name of Ventipo. (Florez, Med. ii. p. 617 ; Eckhel, i. p. 31 ; Mionnet, i. p. 27 ; Sestini, p. 92.)

VENUSIA (Oùevovaia: Eth. Venusinus: Venosa), a city of Apulia, situated on the Appian Way, about 10 miles S . of the river Aufidus. It nearly adjoined the frontiers of Lucania, so that, according to Horace, himself a native of the place, it was doubtful whether it belonged properly to Lucania or to Apulia, and the territory of the city, as assigned to the Roman colony, included a portion of that of both nations. (Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 34, 35.) This statement of Horace leaves it doubtful to what people Venusia originally belonged, though it is more probable that it was an Apulian city, and that it received only an accession of territory from Lucania. Later writers, indeed, distinctly assigned it to Apulia. (Plin. iii. 11. s. 16; Ptol. iii. 1. §73; Lib. Colon. p. 210.) But no mention of it is found in history till the occasion of its capture by the Roman consul L. Postumius, in B. c. 262 (Dionys. Exc. Vales. p. 2335), when we are told that it was a populous and important town. A large part of the inhabitants was put to the sword, and, shortly afterwards, a Roman colony was established there by order of the senate. (Dionys. l. c. ; Vell. i. 14 ; Hor. l. c.) The colonists are said to have been 20,000 in number, which must be either a mistake or an exaggeration; but there seems no doubt that the new colony became a populous and flourishing place, and was able to render important services to the Roman state during the Second Punic War. It was at Venusia that the consul Terentius Varro took refuge with 700 horse after the great defeat at Cannae (b. c. 216), and where he was gradually able to gather around him a force of about $\mathbf{4 0 0 0}$ horse and foot. The Venusians vied with one another in showing them the utmost attention, and furnished them with clothing, arms, and other necessaries. (Liv xxii. 49, 54 ; Polyb. iii. 116, 117.) Again, at a later period of the war, when so many of the Roman colonies proved unable to satisfy the repeated demands of the senate, the Venusians were among those who continued steadfast, and declared themselves ready to furnish the troops and supplies required of them. (Liv. xxvii. 10.) It was after this, through several successive campaigns, the head-quarters of the Roman commanders in Apulia. (Ib. 20, 41 ; Appian, Annib. 50.) But the colony suffered severely from all these exertions, and, in B. c. 200, after the close of the war, it was found necessary to recruit its exhausted strength with a fresh body of colonists. (Liv. xxxi. 49.) From this time Venusia seems to have always continued to be a flourishing town and one of the most considerable places in this part of Italy. It bore an important part in the Social War, having early joined in the outbreak, and became one of the principal strongholds of the allies in the south of Italy. (Appian, B. C. i. 39, 42.) In the second year of the war its territory was ravaged by the Roman praetor Cosconius, but we do not learn that the city itself fell into his hands. (Ib.52.) At all events it did not suffer severely, as it is afterwards mentioned by Appian as one of the most flourishing cities of Italy (Ib. iv. 3) ; and Strabo also notices it as one of the few cities in this region which retained their consideration in his time (v. p. 250). It received a colony of veterans under the Triumvirate (Appian, B. C. iv. 3; Zumpt, de Colon. p. 332), and seems to have retained the rank of a Colonia under the Empire, as we find it bearing that designation both in Pliny and in inscriptions. (Plin. iii. 11. s. 16 ; Orell. Inscr. 867 ; Mommsen, Inscr. R. N. 735, 745.) Its position on the Appian Way donbtless contributed to its prosperity, and it is mentioned more than once by Cicero as a customary halting-place in proceeding from Rome to Brundusium. (Cic. ad Att. v. 5, xvi. 5.) It appears indeed that the great orator had himself a villa there, as one of his letters is dated "de Venusino" (ad Fam. xiv. 20). But the chief interest of Venusia is undoubtedly derived from its having been the birthplace of Horace, who was born there in the consulship of L. Manlius Torquatus and L. Aurelius Cotta, к. c. 65. (Hor. Carm. iii. 21. 1.) The works of the poet abound in allusions to the neighbourbood of his native city, the fountain of Bandusia, the forests of Mount Vultur, \&c. But it does not appear that he ever resided there in the latter years of his life, having lost his paternal estate, which was confiscated in the civil wars. (Id. Ep. ii. 2.)

We hear nothing of Venusia under the Roman Empire, but it is certain from the Liber Coloniarum, which mentions it among the Civitates Apuliae, and from the Itineraries, that it continued to exist as a city, and apparently one of the most considerable in this part of Italy. (Ptol. iii. 1. § 73 ; Lib. Colon. pp. 210, 261; Itin. Ant. pp. 104, 113, 121 ; Tab. Peut.) This is further confirmed by inscriptions, in one of which it is called "splendida civitas Venusinorum." (Mommsen, I. R. N. 706.) It retained the same consideration throughout the middle ages, and is still an episcopal city with about 6000 inhabitants. Its antiquities have been illustrated with a profusion of erudition by Italian writers, but it has few ancient remains of much interest ; though fragments of ancient edifices, mosaic pavements, &c. have been found on the site, as well as numerous inscriptions. These last have been collected and published by Mons. Lupoli, in his Marmora Venusina

(added as an appendix to the Iter Venusinum, 4to. Neapoli, 1797), and more recently by Mommsen, in his Inscriptiones Regni Neapolitani (pp. 39-48). Concerning the antiquities of Venusia in general, see the work of Lupoli above quoted, and that of: Cimaglia (Antiquitates Venusinae, 4to. Neapol. 1757.)
[E. H. B.]
VEPITENUM or VIPITENUM, a place in the district occupied by the Venostes in Rhaetia, between Veldidena and Tridentum. (It. Ant. pp. 275, 280 ; Tab. Peut.) Its modern representative is, in all probability, the town of Sterzing on the Eisach, at the foot of the Brenner.
VERAGRI (Ȯdáparpoi). The Veragri are placed by Caesar (B.G. iii. 1, 6) in the Valais of Switzerland between the Nantuates and the Seduni, [Nantuates; Seduni]. Their town was Octodurus (Martigny), whence the Veragri are called Octodurenses by Pliny [Octodurus]. Dion Cassius (xxxix. 5), using Caesar as he generally used him, says that the Veragri extended from the territory of the Allobroges and the Leman lake to the Alps; which is not true. Strabo (iv. p. 204) mentions the Varagri, as he calls them, between the Caturiges and the Nantuatae ; and Pliny (iii. 20) between the Seduni and the Salassi: the Salassi are on the Italian side of the Alps in the Val d Aosta. Livy (xxi. 38) places the Veragri among the Alps and on the road to the pass of the Penuine Alps, or the Great St. Bernard, which is correct. He says that the pass was occupied by half German tribes. [G. L.]

VERBANUS LACUS ( $\dot{\eta}$ Oí $\rho 6 \alpha \nu o ́ s ~ \lambda i ́ \mu \nu \eta$ : Lago Maggiore), one of the principal lakes of Northern Italy, formed by the river Ticinus, where it first issues from the valleys of the Alps. (Plin. iii. 19. s. 24.) It is the largest of the three great lakes of Northern Italy, whence its modern name of Lago Maggiore; though Virgil appears to have considered the Larius as the largest, as he calls it, " Te , Lari maxime," and singularly enough does not mention the Verbanus at all. (Georg. ii. 159.) Strabo, by a strange mistake, describes the river Addua as flowing from the Lake Verbanus, and the Ticinus from the Larius (iv. p. 209): this may, perhaps, be an error of the copyists, but is more probably an accidental blunder of the author. He gives the length of the lake at 400 stadia, or 40 geog. miles, which is somewhat below the truth, the actual length being 46 geog. miles: its breadth does not exceed 4 or 5 miles, except in one part, where it expands to a width of from 8 to 10 miles. [E. H. B.]

VERBICAE or VERBICES (Ovéfetкau or Ovi $\rho$ (ikes, Ptol. iv. 1. § 10), a people of Mauretania Tingitana.

Verbigenus pagus. [Helvetir, Vol. I. p. 1041.]

VERBINUM, in Gallia, is placed by the Itins. on a road from Bagacum (Bavai) to Durocortorum (Reims). Duronum is between Bagacum and Verbinum [Duronum]. All the several distances between Bagacum and Durocortorum do not agree in the Antonine Itin. and the Table. The sum total of these distances in the Table is $53 \mathrm{M} . \mathrm{P}$., and the Itin., though it makes the several distances amount to $63 \mathrm{M} . \mathrm{P}$., still gives the sum total at $53 \mathrm{M} . \mathrm{P}$. But these must be Gallic leagues, as D'Anville shows. He supposes Verbinum to be Vervins, which in fact is the same name as Verbinum. The table writes it Vironum. Vervins is in the department of Aisne, about 20 miles NE. of Laon. [G. L.] VERCELLAE (OU̇єpкє́入лaı, Ptol. iii. 1. § 36; Odepкéлдoı, Strab. v. p. 218 ; Bepкéлдau. Plat. Mar. 25: Vercelli), the chief city of the Libici. in Gallia Cisalpina. It lay on the W. bank of the Sessites (Sesiu); but perhaps the ancient town should be sought at Borgo Vercelli, about 2 miles from the modern city. In the time of Strabo it was an unfortified village (l.c.), but subsequently became a strong and not unimportant Reman municipium. (Tac. Hist. i. 70 ; cf. De clar. Orator. 8 ; also Orell. Inscr. 3044, 3945.) Here the highruad from Ticinum to Augusta Praetoria was crossed by a road running westwards from Mediolanum. (Itin. Ant. pp. 282. 344, 347, 350.) At the beginning of the 5 th century it was rapidly falling to decay. (Hieron. Epist 17.) There were some gold mines at a place called Ictimuli, or Vicus Ictimulorum, in the district of Vercellae (Strab. L.c.; Plin. xxxiii. 4. s. 21), which must have been of considerable importance, as the last cited authority mentions a law forbidding that more than 5000 men should be employed in thein. The true position of these mines has, however, been the subject of some dispute. The question is fully discussed by Durandi in his treatise Dell' antica Condizione del Vercellese. The city was distinguished for its worship of Apollo, whence it is called Apoilineae Vercellae by Martial (x. 12. 1); and there was in its vicinity a grove, and perhaps a temple sacred to that deity (Stat. Silv. i. 4. 59), which is probably to be sought at a small place called Pollone, at the foot of the Alps. (Cf. Cic. Fam. xi. 19; Plin. iii. 17. s. 21 ; Bellini, Antichità di Vercelli.)

VEREASUECA, a harbour belonging to the town of Argenomescum, in the territory of the Cantabri, in Hispania Tarraconensis. (Plin. iv. 20. s. 34.) Probably Puerto de S. Martin. (Cf. Florez, Esp. Sagr. xxiv. p. 44.)
VERFLA. [Varia.]
VERETUM (Oífpךtov, Strab., Ptol.: Eth. Veretinus: Sta Maria di Vereto), a town of Calabria. in the district or territory of the Sallentines, and within a few miles of the Iapygian promontory. Strabo tells us that it was formerly called Baris, and describes it as if it were a seaport town; but both Pliny and Ptolemy rank it among the inland towns of the Sallentines; and there seems no doubt that its site is marked by the old cluurch of Sta Haria di Vereto, the name of which is found on old maps. between the villages of Salve and Roggiano, about 6 miles from the Capo di Leuca, and 10 from Ugento, the correct distance given in the Tabula from Uxentum to Veretum. (Strab. vi. p. 281; Plin. iii. 11. s. 16; Ptol. iii. 1. § 76; Tab. Peut.; Galateo, de Sit. Japyg. p. 99; Holsten. ad Cluver. p. 283; Romanelli, vol. ii. p. 35.) The "ager Veretinus" is mentioned also in the Liber Coloniarum (p. 262) among the "civitates Calabriae," and doubtless comprised the whole district as far as the Iapyginn promontory.

VERGAE. [Brittir.]
VERGELLUS, a rivulet or torrent, which crossed the field of Lattle of Cannae. It is not indeed mentioned by either Livy or Polybius in their circumstantial accounts of the battle. but it is noticed by both Florus and Valerius Maximus in connection with a story that seems to have been current among the Romans, that its course was choked up by the dead budies of the slain, to surh an extent that the Carthaginian troups crossed over them as a bridge. (Flor. ii. 6. § 18; Val. Max. ix. 2, Ext. § 2.) The same incident is alluded to by other writers, but without mentioning the name of the stream. (Sil. Ital. viii. 668; Lucian, IIial. Mort. 12. § 2.) The stream meant is prubably a rivulet which falis into the Aufidus on its right bank between Cannae and Canusium, and is wholly dry in summer.
[E. H. B.]
VErgENTUM, a place in Hispatia Baetica, with the surname of Julii Genias. (Plin. iii. 1. s. 3.) Now Gelves or Gines.
[T. H. D.]
VERGI'LIA (Óúfpyinia, Ptol. ii. 6. § 61 : Eth. Vergilienses, Plin. iii. 3. s. 4), a torn of the Bantetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis. It has been iden. tified by some writers with Murcia. (1)Anville, Geogr. Anc. i. p. 31 ; Mentelle, Esp. Anc. p186.)
[T. H. D.]
VERGICM, a fortress in Hispania Tarraconensis (Liv. xxxiv. 21). Reichard, but perhaps without adequate grounds, identifies it with the present Berga.
VERGOANUM. [LRRINa.]
VERGUNNI, the name of an Alpine people mentioned in the Truphy of the Alps (Plin. iii. 20). They are supposed to be represented by the name Vergons or Vergon, letween Senez [SAnitium] and Glandives, and about half-way between these two places.
[G. L.]
VERISA (Btipiaa), a town in the interior of Pontus, on the road from Sebastopolis to Sebastia. (It. Ant. pp. 205, 214 ; Basil. Magn. Epist. ult.) Its site is yet uncertain, some identifying it with Cora, others with Baulus.
[L. S.]
VERLU'CIO, a place in Britannia Romana, on the road from Isca Silurum to Calleva (Itin. Ant. p. 486), and apparently in the territory of the Dobuni. It has been variously identified with the village of Lechham on the Avon, with Westbury. Spy J'ark, and Whetham.
[T. H. D.]
VERNEA, a fort in Rhaetia, on a steep height above the banks of the river Athesis, not far from Tridentum, where its site is still marked by the Dos di Trent. (Cassiod. Var. iii. 48 ; Paul. Diac. iii. 31, where it is called Ferruge; Pallhausen, Beschreib. der loöm. Heerstrasse von Verona nach Augsisrg, p. 28.)
VERNODUBRUM, a river of Gallia Narbonensis mentioned by Pliny (iii. 4) after the Tecuin, which is the Tichis [Tichis] of Mela. Pliny does not mention the Telis or Tetis (Tet), and it has been conjectured that he gives the naine of Vernodubrum to the Telis. But there is a river Gly or Ag'y, north of the Tet and not far from it, which flows into the Mediterranean past Riresaltes, and a branch of the Gly is still named Verdouble or Verdondre, which is certainly the Vernodubram. (D'Anville, Notice. ${ }^{\circ} \mathrm{c}$.)
[G. L.]
VERNOSOL, in Aquitania, is placed in the Antonine Itin. on a road from Benehamum [Brneharvism] to Tolosa (Tonlouse). This circuitous rad run through Lugdunum Convenarum and Calagorris Vernosol is between Calagorris (Cazères) and Toulozse. Vernosol is Vernose.
VERODUNENSES. This name does not occur in any document earlier than the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces, which was probably drawn up at the commencement of the fifth century of our era. Civitas Verodunensium in the Notitia is the capital of a people, and is named last in the first of the two Belgicae. The name Virodunum occors in the Antonine Itin. and so the name is written on some medals. It is placed on a route from Darocortorum (Reims) to Divulurum (Metz). In the middle age writings it is Viredunum, Viridunum, and Virdunum, which last abbreviated form comes nearest to lerdun, which is the capital of the Verodunenses. Verdun is west of Metz, in the department of Meuse, and on the Meuse or Mans. There was a place named Fines [Fines. No. 13] between Virodunum and Divolurum, which prubably marked the limit between the Verodunenses and the Mediomatrici.
VERODUNHM. [-proninenses.]
VEROLA'MIUM and VERULA MIUM (Oipo入dyoov, Ptol. ii. 3. § 21), the capital of the Catyeuchlani in Britannia Romana, on the road from Londitium to Lindum and Eboracum. (Itin. Ant. pp.471, 476, 479.) It was probably the residence of Cassivellaunus, which was taken by Cuesar (B. Gall. v. 21), and subsequently became a considerable Roman municipium, (Tac. Ann. xiv. 33.) It is Old Verulam, near St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire, which latter town rose from its ruins; and its celebrated abbey charch is said to be built in great part of Roman bricks. (Camden, p. 350, seq.) [T. H. D.]

VEROMANDUI (Ovefouávסues, Ptol. iii. 9. § 11), a Belgic people, who in B.c. 57 were supposed to be able to raise 10,000 fighting men (Caesar, $B$. G. ii. 4); unless Caesar's text means that they and the Velocasses together mustered this number [Velocasses]. They juined the Nervii and the Atrebates in the attack on Caesar's army on the Sabis (Sambre). The Veromandui attacked the eleventh and eighth legions, which were in Caesar's centre, and they were driven back to the river. They are not mentioned again in the Commentaries.

The Veromandui had the Ambiani and the Atrebates on the west, and the Suessiones on the south. On the north they were neighbours of the Nervii. Their chief town was afterwards Augusta Veromanduorum, St. Quentin, on the Somme, in the department of Aisne, and in the old division of France named Vermandois. The name Civitas Veromanduorum occurs in the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces. [Augusta Vehomanduorum.] [g.L.]

VEROMETUM, a town of the Coritani in Britannia Romana, between Ratae and Margidunum. (Itin. Ant. pp. 477, 479, where it is also called Vernometum.) Camden (p. 575) places it at Burrough Hill, near Willoughby on the Wold, in the S. part of Nottinghamshire.
[T. H. D.]
 Strab. iv. p. 206, v. p. 213; Bepóvø, Prucop. B.G. ii. 29, iii. 3, &c.; and Befwra, $I l$. iv. 33 : Eth. Veronensis: Verona), an important town in Gallia Transpadana, seated on the river Athesis ("Verona Athesi circumflua," Sil. 1t. viii. 595), and chiefly on its W. bank. There is some difficulty in determining whether Veruna was a city of the Euganei or of the Cenomani, from the little knowledge which we possess of the respective boundaries of those peoples, and from the confusion which prevails upon the subject in ancient authors. By Ptolemy (l.c.), who does not mention the Euganei, it is ascribed to the Cenomani; and Catullus (Ixvii. 34), in a passage, however, which has been banished by some editors as not genuine, Brixia, which undoubtedly belonged to the Cenomani, is styled the mother city of Verona Pliny, on the other hand (iii. 19. s. 23), gives Verona partly to the Rhaeti and partly to the Euganei, and Strabo (l. c.) attributes it to the former. Some have sought a solution of this difficulty by assuming that the city belonged originally to the Euganei, but was subsequently occupied by the Cenomani, referring to

Livy, v. 35. (Cf. Justin, xx. 5.) We know little or nothing of the early history of Verona. Under the Roman dominion it became a colony with the surname of Augusta, and one of the finest and most flourishing cities in that part of Italy (Tac. $\boldsymbol{H}$. iii. 8; Itin. Ant. p. 128 ; Strab. v. p. 213 ; Grut. Inscr. p. 166. 2.) The surrounding country was exceedingly fruitful, producing good wine, excellent apples, and abundance of spelt (alica, Plin. xviii. 11 . s. 29, xiv. 1. s. 3, xv. 14. s. 14; Cassion. V'ur. xii. 4). The Rhaetian wine also is praised by Virsil. (G. ii. 94; cf. Strab. iv. 206; Suet. Oct. 77.) The situation of Verona rendered it a great thoroughfare and the centre of several highroads (Itin. Ant. Ip. 128, 174, 275, 282 ; Itin. Hier. p. 558.)

Verona was celebrated in history for the battle fought by Marius in the Campi Raudii, in its neighbourhood, againt the Cimbri. (Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Florus, iii. 3.) From an inscription still extant on one of its gates, now called the Porta de' Borsari, the walls of Verona appear to have been newly erected in the reign of the emperor Gallienus, a. in. 265. It was besieged by Constantine on his march from Gaul to Rome, and, though obstinately defended by Ruricius Pompeianus, obliged to surrender at discretion. (Paneg. Vet. ix. 9, sqq.) It was likewise the scene of the victory of Theodoric over Odoacer. (Jornand. Get. 57.) Theodoric made it one of his residences, and often held his court there: a representation of his palace is still extant upon a seal. (Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, vol. v. p. 22, ed. Smith.) It was at Verona that the splendid wedding took place between king Autharis and Theudelinda. (Procop. B. G. iii. 5 ; Paul. Diac. iii. 29.) But, more than by all these events, Verona is illustrious as having been the birthplace of Catullus (Ovid. Amor. iii. 15. 7; Mart. x. 103; Plin. xxxvi. 6. s. 7); though it is exceedingly doubtful whether the remains of a villa on the Lago di Garda, commonly called the villa of Catullus, could really have belonged to him. The honour sometimes claimed for Verona of having given birth to the architect Vitruvius Pollio arises from a mistaken interpretation of the inscription on the arch of the Gavii, formerly existing at Verona, but pulled down in the year 1805. The inscription related to the great arehitect's less celebrated namesake, Vitruvius Cerdo. (Descriz. di Verona, pt. i. p. 86.) Some are of opinion that the elder Pliny also was born at Verona, but it is more probable that he was a native of Comum. In the life of him ascribed to the pen of Suetonius, he is styled Novocomensis; and when he calls himself in his Preface the conterrancus of Catullus, that epithet by no means necessarily inplies that he was the fellow-citizen of the poet, but rather that he wats merely his fellow-countryman, or from the same province.

The amphitheatre at Verona is s very striking monument of antiquity. Although not nearly so large as the Colosseum, it is in a much better state of preservation, owing to the pains which have always been taken to keep it in repair. It is also of a more costly material than the Roman amphitheatre; for whilst the latter is built of travertino, that at Verona is of marble, from some quarries in the neighbourhood. The substructions are of Roman brickwork. The date of its erection cannot be ascertained, but it must undoubtediy have been posterior to the time of Augustus. A great part of the external arcade was thrown down by an earthquake in the year 1184. Its form is elliptical, the larger diameter being 513 feet externally and 248 internally; the smaller one, 410 feet externally and 147 feet internally. The banks or rows of seats are at present 45 in number, but, from the repairs and alterations which the building has undergone, it is not certain whether this was the original number. It is estimated that it would afford seats for about 22,000 persons.

There are also a few remains of a Roman theatre, on the left bank of the Adige, at the foot of the hill immediately under the castle of S. Pietro It appears from two decrees of king Berengarius, dated in 895 and 913, that the theatre was then regarded as of the highest antiquity, and had in great part gone to ruin ; on which account its destruction was allowed. (Descriz. di Verona, pt. ii. p. 108, sqq.)

We have already alluded to the ancient gate called the Porta de' Borsuri. It is evidently older than the walls of Gallienus, the elevation of which in the space of 8 months is recorded upon it; since a previous inscrip:ion has been erased in order to make roon for the new one. It is a double gate, of a very florid style of architecture, concerning the merits of which architects have held widely different opinions. The walls of Gallienus, to judge of them from the vestiges which still remain, were of a construction sufficiently solid, notwithstanding the shortness of the time in which they were erected. The other remains of antiquity at Verona, as the Porta de' Leoni, the baths, &c., do not require any particular description in this place.

The chief works on Verona and its antiquities are the splendid ones of Count Scip. Maffei, entitled Verona Illustrata, and Museum Veronense. Onuphrius Panvinius also described its remains (Antiq. Veron. lib. viii. Pat. 1668). Some account of them will likewise be found in the Descrizione di Verona e della sua Provincia, by Giovambatista da Pertico, 8vo. Verona, 1820.

VERONES. [Berones.]
VERRUCINI, a Gallic people near the Alps in the Provincia. Pliny (iii. 4) says: "Regio Camatullicurum, dein Suelteri, supraque Verrucini." [Camatulisci; Suelteri.] There is nothing to guide us in fixing the position of the Verrucini, except their position with respect to these two other tribes, and the fact that there is a place named Vérignon, between Dragnignan and Riez. Draguignan is in the department of Var, and Riez is on the site of Reii [Reil Apolinnarfs].
VERRUGO or VERRUCA ( ${ }^{\text {E }}$ phouka, Diod. : Colle Ferrof), a town or fortress in the territory of the Volsci, which is repeatedly mentioned during the wars of the Romans with that people. The name first occurs in b. c. 445, when we are told that the place had been recently occupied and fortified by the Romans, evidently as a post of offence against the Volscians; a proceeding which that people resented so much that it became the occasion of a fresh war. (Liv. iv. 1.) We do not know at what period it fell again into the hands of the Volscians, but in B. c. 409 it was recovered and again garrisoned by the Romans. (Ib. 55, 56; Dind. xiv. 11.) It, however, fell once more into the hands of the Volscians in B. c. 407 (Liv. iv. 58), and apparently continued in their possession till B. c. 394, when it was again occupied with a garrison by the military tribune $\mathbf{C}$. Aemilius, but lost soon after in consequence of the defeat of his colleague Sp. Postumius. (Liv. v. 28; Diod. xiv. 98.) From this time it wholly disappears from history. It is very doubtiul whether it ever was a town, the manner in which it is mentioned by Liry, in connection with the Arx Carventana, seeming to prove that it was a mere fort or stronghold, garrisoned and fortified, on account of its natural strength and adrantageous position. Its site cannot be determined with any certainty, but from the name itself there can be no doubt that it was situated on a projecting knoll or peak; hence its site has been sought by Nibby (followed by Abeken) at Colle Ferro, near Segni; Colle Sacco, in the same neighbourhood, has as plausible 2 claim. (Nibby, Dintorni, vol. iii. p. 473; Gell, Top. of Rome. p. 458; Abeken, Mittel-Italien, p. 75.) [E. H. B.]

VERTACOMICORI, a pagus of the Vocontii in Gallia Provincia, to whom Pliny (iii. 17) attributes the foundation of Novaria in Gallia Cisalpina [Novarla]. The name seems to be preserved in Vercors, a district in the old country of the Vocontii, in the northern part of the diocese of the [Dea Vocontionum]. In some middle age documents the name appears in the abbreviated form Vercorium, which is the next step to Vercors (D'Anville, Notice. fc.).
[G. L.]
VERTERAE, a town of the Brigantes in Britannia Romana. (Itin. Ant. pp. 467, 476.) Variously identified with Brough in Westmoreland and Bowes.
[T. H. D.]
VERTINAE (Oífptivar: Vercino), a small town of Brattium, mentioned only by Strabo (vi. p. 254), who places it in the interior of that country. Its name is still retained by the village of Verzino, abuat 7 miles NW. of Strongoli, the ancient Pe telia.
[E. H. B.]
VERUBIUM (Oúepoubloun, Ptol. ii. 3. § 5), a promontory on the N. coast of Britannia Barbara, most probably Noss Head.

VERVES ( $\Theta$ viepoveís, Ptol. iv. $1 . \S 10$ ), a perple of Mauretania Tingitana.
[T. H. D.]
VERULAE (Eth. Verulanus: Veroli), a city of the Heruici, but included in Latium in the more extensive sense of that name, situated in the Apennines N. of the valley of the Sacco, between Alatrium and the valley of the Liris. It was apparently one of the chief cities of the Hernici, and was certainly a member of the Hernican League: but its name is not mentioned separately in history till the final war of that people with Rome, in b.c. 306. On that occasion the citizens of Verulae, together with those of Alatrium and Ferentinum, took part against the Anagnians, and refused to join in the hostilities against Rome. For this reason they were rewarded after the termination of the war by being left in possession of their own laws and magistrates, which they preferred to receiving the Roman "ciritas." (Liv. ix. 42, 43.) The period at which they ultimately became Roman citizens is uncertain. Florus raguely asserts that a triumph had been celebrated over the people of Verulae (Flor. i. 11. § 6) but this is probably a mere rhetorical flourish: there is no occasion known in history to which it can be referred. Under the Roman dominion Verulae became a quiet and somewhat obscure country town. According to the Liber Coloniarum it received a body of colonists in the time of the Gracchi, and again under the reign of Nerva. But it is probsble that it always retained its municipal rank. It is mentioned by Pliny among the municipal towns of the Fifth Region (Plin. iii. 5. s. 9), bat is not again noticed in history. Its secluded position probably rendered it a place of small importance. The ancient site is still occupied by the modern town of Veroli, which retains also some portions of the ancient walls in the polygonal or Cyclopean style (Westphal, Röm. Kamp. p. 87; Abeken, MittelItelien, p. 147.)

VERLLAMIUM. [Vrrolamum.]
VERURICM (OÚєpoípiov, Ptol. ii. 5. § 7), a town in the N. part of Lusitania, perhaps S. Vincent de Beira.
[1. H. I.]
VESASPE (Oj $\sigma \sigma d \sigma \pi \eta$, Ptol. vi. 2. § 12), a town in Media Atropatene, perhapy the same as the present Cushin.

VESCELIA, a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tanaconensis (Liv. $x \times x$. 22), perhaps Vilches. (Lkert, ii. pt. i. p. 413.)
[T. H. D.]
VESCELLIUM or VERCELLICM, a town of the Hirpini, of uncertain site. Its name is mentioned by Livy (xxiii. 37) as having been recovered by the practor M. Valerius, after it had revolted to the Carthaginians. The reading in Livy is very uncertain, but Pliny also mentions the Vescellani among the municipal communities of the Hirpini. (Plin. iii. 11.s. 16.)
[E. H. B.]
VESCI FAVENTIA (Oथ̈є $\sigma \kappa เ s$, Ptol. ii. 4. § 11), a town in Hispania Baetica, between Singili and Astigi. (Plin. iii. 1. s 3.)
[T. H D.]
VESCIA (Eth. Vescinus), a city of Latium, in the most extended sense of that name, but originally a city of the Ausones, situated in a plain to the S . of the Liris (Garigliano). Livy in one passage tells us distinctly that the Ausones had three cities, Ausona, Minturnae, and Vescia, all of which were betrayed into the hands of the Romans by a party within their walls, and the inhabitants put to the sword in b. c. 314. (Liv. ix. 25.) The name of Vescia is mentioned also about 25 years before as affording shelter to the remains of the Latin arnny defeated by the consuls Manlius and Decius in в.c. 340. (Id. viii. 11.) But after the capture of the city in 314, no mention of it again occurs, and it is probable that it never recovered from that calamity. Minturnae indeed is the only one of these three citiey which again appears in history; but the "ager Vescinus" is repeatediy mentioned (Liv. x. 20, 21, 31), and would seem to have extended from the banks of the Liris as far as the extreme point of the ridge of Mount Massicus. The Roman colony of Sinuessa, which was situated just where that ridge abuts upon the sea, is expressly said to have been planted "in saltu Vescino." (Liv. x. 21.) But all trace of the city seems to have been lont. Pliny does not even notice the name among the extinct cities of Latium and Campania, and we are wholly without a clue to its precise situation.
[E. H. B.]
VEsCITANIA, a district in Spain mentioned only by Pliny (iii. 3. s. 4). [Osca.] [T. H. D.]

Vesdiantil. [Vemiantif.]
VESERIS, a river of Campania, the name of which is known only in connection with the great battle fought with the Latins by T. Manlius Torquatus and P. Decius Mus, b. c. 340 . That battle is described by Livy as having been fought "haud procul radicibus Vesuvii montis, qua via ad Veserim ferebat" (viii. 8), an expression which would leave us in doubt whether Veseris was the name of a town or of a river. In another passage he refers to the same battle as having been fought "ad Veserim" (x. 28); and Cicero also twice notices it as "pugna ad Veserim" or "apud Veserim." (Cic. de Fin. i. 7, de Off. iii. 31.) Valerius Maximus uses the latter vol 1.
phrase (vi. 4. § 1). The only anthor whose expressions are free from ambiguity is Aurelius Victor, who distinctly speaks of that celebrated battle as having been fought "apud Veserim fluvium" (de Vir. $1 l l .28$ ), and adds that the Romans had pitched their camp on its banks (" prasitis apud Veserim fluvium castris," Ib. 26). The authority of Victor is not indeed worth much on points of detail, but there is no reason to reject it in this instance, as it is certainly not at variance with the phrases of Livy and Cicero. The Veseris was probably a small stream, and is not mentioned on any other occasion, or by any geographer, so that it is wholly impossible now to identify it.
VESIO'NICA, a town of Uinbria mentioned only by Pliny, who names the Vesionicates among the municipal communities of that country. (Plin. iii. 14. s 19.). It is supposed to be represented by Civitella di Benezzone, in the upper valley of the Tiber, 7 miles SE. of Perugia. (Cluver. Ital. p . 627.)

VEsóntio (Oúlabutiov, Ptol. ii. 9. § 21 : Besangon), in Gallia, the chief city of the Sequani. The name occurs in Dion Cassius (xxxviii. 34, lxiii. 24), where Reimarus has writen Beqovtiona for the Msis. reading Oí $\epsilon \sigma 0 \nu T i \omega v a$, without any reason. In Ausonius (Gratiarum Act.) the form Visontio occurs, and he spraks of a "municipalis schola" in the place. The orthography of the word varied, as we might expect; and other forms occar in Ammianas. D'Anville says that the name is Vesant on a milestone which bears the name of Trajan, and was found at Mandeure [Epamanduontrim, in which article the name is incorrectly printed Vesont].

When Caesar (в. c. 58) was marching through the country of the Sequani towards the German king Arioristus, he heard that the German was intending to occupy Vesontio, but Caesar got there before him (B. G. i. 38.) He describes the town as nearly surrounded by the Doubs [Duris], and he says that the part which was not surrounded by the river was only 600 Ronnan feet wide. This neck of land was filled by an eminence, the base of which on each side was washed by the river. There was a wall along this neck of land, which made it a strong fortress, and the wall connected the heights with the town. Caesar's description is exact except as to the width of the neck of land, which D'Anville says is about 1500 Roman feet; and accordingly either Caesar was mistaken, or there is an error in his text in the numerals, which is always a possible thing. Vesontio when Caesar took it was well supplied with everything for war, and its position made it a strong place. Caesar set out from Vesontio to fight the German king, whom he defeated in the plain between the Vosges and the Rhine. The battle-field was only 5 miles from the Rhine (B.G.i. 53, in which passage the true reading is " milia pasuum...circiter quinque," not "quinquaginta.") In the winter of B. c. 58-57 Caesar quartered his men among the Sequani, and we may assume that Vesontio was one of the places where be fixed his troops.

Vesontio has been several times sacked and destroyed by Alemanni, by Huns, and others. It is a town built on the ruins of former towns. The ground has been raised above 20 feet, and where it has been dug into, Roman remains, medals, and other antiquities have been discovered.

The modern town of Besançon consists of two parts. The upper town, once called La lille, is built on the peninsula, and the citadel stands on the steep rock which Caesar describes as occupying the neck of land, where the river does not flow. The lower town is on the other side of the river opposite to the peninsula, with which it is connected by a stone bridge, the foundations of which are Roman.
There is a Roman triumphal arch witha single passage. The date of its construction does not appear. This arch which was nearly hidden by rubbish and buildings has been partially ancovered and restored within the present century. It is decorated with sculptures. There are some remains of tho aqueduct which supplied Vesontio with water from a distant source. It was constructed of a soft stone. It terminated in the town in a vast reservoir of an oval form, which was covered by a roof supported by columns. The water was distributed from the reservoir all through the town: and in many parts of Besanţon there have been found traces of the conduits which conveyed the water to the private houses. VESPERIES, a town of the Varduli in Hispania Tarraconensis. (Plin. iii. 20. s. 34.) It is identified with the present Bermeo. (Cf. Mentelle, E:sp. Mod. p. 37.)
VESTINI (Oúnotivor), a people of Central Italy, who occupied a mountainous tract extending from the coast of the Adriatic to the lofty mountains near the sources of the Aternus. Here they met the Sabines, whose territory bounded them on the W.; thence they were bounded by the high mountain range which forms the southern barrier of the valley of the Aternus, and separated them from the Aequi and Marsi; while towards the S. and E. the river Aternus itself, from the point where it takes the sudden bend towards the NE., became the limit of their territory, and their frontier towards the Peligni and Marrucini. Along the coast of the Adriatic they held only the narrow space between the mouth of the Aternus and that of the Matrinus, a distance of about 6 miles; the latter river apparently forned the northern limit of their territory from its mouth to its source, and thence to the high ridge of the Central Apennines their exact frontier cannot be traced. But it is almost immediately after passing the point where the Vestini adjoined the Praetutii on the one hand and the Sabines on the other, that the chain of the Apennines rises abruptly into the lofty group or mass, of which the Monte Corno (commonly called the Gran Susso ditalia) is the highest summit. This mountain is the most elerated in the whole range of the Apennines, attaining to a height of 9500 feet; and those immediately adjoining it are but little inferior, forming a rugged and irregular mass of mountains, which is continued without interruption by a range of inferior but still very considerable elevation, in a SE. direction. This range is almost continuous with the equally lofty ridge of the Monte Morrone, the two being separated only by the deep and narrow gorge below l'opoli, through which the Aternus finds its way to the sea. Hence the territory of the Vestini is naturally divided into two distinct regions, the one consisting of the apper valley of the Aternus, W. of the lofty mountain range above described, the other of the tract on the E . of the same mountains, sloping gradually thence to the sea. This last district is very hilly and rugged, but has the advantage of a far milder climate than that of the basin of the Aternus, which is a bieak and cold upland region, having much analogy with the valley of the Peligni (of which it may be considered in some degree as a continuation), but from its considerable eleration above the sea (23:0 feet in its upper part) suffering still more severely from cold in winter. The Vestini, however, did nut occupy the whole of the valley of the Aternus; Amiternum, near the sources of that river, which was one of the oldest aboles of the Sabines, having continued, even in the days of Pliny, to belong to that people, and though Ptolemy assigns it to the Vestini, it is probable that in this, as in many similar cases, he was guided by geographical viers rather than the real ethnical distribution of the tribes. (Strab. v. p. 228 ; Plin. iii. 12. s. 17 ; l'tol. iii. 1. §59.) But the precise line of demarcation between the Vestini and the Sabines, cannot now be determined.

No author has left to us any distinct statement concerning the origin and affinities of the Vestini, but there seems to be no reason to doabt that they were, in common with the other tribes by which they were surrounded, a Sabine race. It would indeed have been alinost impossible for that people to have extended themselves to the $S$., and sent forth their numerous colonies, the Peligni, the Samnites, &cc, had not the valley of the Aternus been already occupied by a kindred and friendly race. The closer connection which we find subsisting between the four tribes of the Vestini, Marrucini, Peligni, and Marsi, may be also taken as a strong presumption of their common origin, and there seem good reasons for supposing them all to have been derived from a Sabine stock. The first mention of the Vestini in history occurs in b. c. 324, when they concluded an alliance with the Samnites against Rome. It was feared that their example would be speedily followed by the Marrucini, Yeligni, and Marsi, but this was not the case, and the Vestini, unsupported by their allies, were unable to resist the Roman arms : they were defeated and dispersed by the consul D. Junius Brutns, and took refuge in their fortitied towns, of which Cutina and Cingilia were successively taken by assault. (Liv. viii. 29.) From this time we hear nothing more of the Vestini till b. C. 301, when they concluded a treaty with the Romans, which appears to have been an alliance on favourable terms (Id. x. 3); and from this time the Vestini became the faithtul allies of the rising republic. In the enumeration of the forces of the Italian allies in B. c. 225, Polybius mentions the Vestini, together with the Marsi, Marrucini, and Frentani (the Peligni being omitted), and estimates their joint contingent at 20,000 foot and 4000 horse soldiers (ii. 24); but we have no means of judging of the proportion furnished by each nation.

Nu other mention is found in history of the Vestini, with the exception of casual notices of their troops serving as auxiliaries in the Roman armies (Enuius, Ann. Fr. viii. 6 ; Liv. xliv. 40), until the outbreak of the Social War, in B. c. 90. On this occasion they followed the example of the Marsi and Peligni, as well as of their more inmediate neighbuurs the Picentines, and were among the first to declare themselves in insurrection acainst Rome. Liv. Epit. Isxii.; Oros. v. 18; Aplian, B. C. i. 39.) There can be no doubt that throughout that contest they furmished their contingent to the armies of the Marsi; but their name is not specially mentioned till towards the close of the war, when we learn that they were defeated and reduced to subinission, apparently somewhat sooner than the other conticio-rates. (Liv. Epit. Ixxv., Ixxvi.; Appian, B. C. i. 52 ; Oros. v. 18.) There is no doubt that they at this tine received the Roman franchise, and henceforth became merged in the ordinary condition of Ruman citizens. Hence we hear nothing more of thein in history. though it is evident that they retained their existence as a separate tribe, which is recognised by all the geographers, as well as by inscriptions. (Strab. v. p. 241 ; Plin. iii. 12. s. 17 ; Ptol. iii. 1. § 59 ; Orell. Inscr. 4036.) From the last source we learn that they were enrolled in the Quirinian tribe. Their territory wis included in the Fourth Region of Augustus (Piin. l.c.), but in the later division of Italy it was separated into two, the maritime district being united with Picenum, while the inland portion or valley of the Aternus was included (together with the Sabines and Peligni) in the province of Valeria. (Lib. Colon. pp. 227, 228; Bingham's Eccles. Antiq. ix. ch. 5, sect. 3.) We learn from Juvenal that they continued to retain their primitive simplicity and rustic habits of life even under the Roman Empire. (Juv. xiv. 181.) Silius Italicus speaks of them as a race, hardy and warlike, and habituated to the chase: their rugged mountains were doubtless still the refuge of many wild animals. (Sil. Ital. viii. 513.) The more inland parts of their territory abounded in excellent upland pastures, which produced a kind of checse that was highly esteemed at Kome. (Plin. xi. 42. s. 97 ; Martial, xiii. 31.)

The most important physical feature of the territory of the Vestini is the Monte Corno or Gran Sasso d' Italia, which, as already observed, is the lighest summit of the Apennines. This was identified by Cluver, who has been followed by most later writers, with the Cunarus Mons of Servins (ad Aen. x. 185). But Silius Italicus (viii. 517) places the Mons Fiscellus, a name much better known, among the Vestini ; and though this is opposed to the statement of Pliny that that mountain contains the sources of the Nar, there seems much reason to believe that Pliny has here confounded the Nar with its tributary the Velinus [Nar], which really rises in a group closely connected with the Gran Sasso, and that it was therefore that remarkable mountain range which was known to the ancients as the Mons Fiscellus.

The following towns are noticed by ancient writers as belonging to the Vestini. Pinna, now called Civita di Penne, appears to have been the chief of those which were situated on the eastern slope of the mountains. Lower down, and only a few miles from the sea, was Angulus, now Civita S. Angelo. Aternum, at the mouth of the river of the same name, now Pescara, was the seaport of the Vestini, and, being the only one along this line of cosst for some distance, served also as that of the Marrucini. In the valley of the Aternus were: Peltuinum (Ansedonin), about 14 miles S. of Aquila; Avein, the remains of which are still visible at Fossa, about 6 miles S. of Aquila; and Pitinum, still called Torre di Pitino, about 2 miles E. of the same city, which must have immediately adjoined the territory of Amiternum. Furconius, the ruins of which are still visible at Civita di Bagno, a little to the S. of Aquila, though an important place in the early part of the middle ages, is not mentioned by any writer before Paulus Diaconus (llist. Lang. ii. 20), and was certainly not a municipal town in the time of the Romans. Prifernum (mentioned only in the Tab. Peut.) is of very ancertain site, but is supposed to have been near Assergio. Aquila, the present capital of this district, is a wholly modern city, having been founded by the emperor Frederic II. in the 13th century, when its population was gathered together from the surrounding towns of Amiternum, Aveia, Furconium, &c., the complete desolation of which apparently dates from this period. Aufina, which according to Pliny (iii. 12. 8. 17) was in his time united for municipal purposes with Peltuinum, still retains the name of ofena. Cetina and Cingilia, two towns of the Vestini mentioned by Livy (viii. 29), are wholly unknown, and the sites assigned to them by Rumanelli, at Civita Aquana and Civita Retenga respectively, are merely conjectural.

The topography of the Vestini is specially illustrated in the work of Giovenazzi (Della Cittit an Aveja nei Vestini, 4to. Roma, 1773), as well :s by Romanelli (vol. iii. pp. 241-284). [E. H. B.]

VESUBIA'NI, a people mentioned in the inscription of the arch of Susa. The resemblance of name has led geographers to place the Vesubiani in a valley through which runs a torrent called Vesubia, which falls into the Var. The Esubiani, who are mentioned in the inscription of the Trophy of the Alps (Pliny, iii. 211) seem to be the same as the Vesubiani, for the only difference is a V. But D'Anville places the Esubiani on the Ubaye and the Ubayette, which two streams unite abore Barcelonette in the department of Basses-Alpes. [G. L.]

VESULUS MONS (Monte Viso), one of the most lofty summits of the Alps, which, from its prominent position near the plains of Italy, and its great superiority in height over any of the neighbouring peaks, is one of the most conspicuous mountains of the whole Alpine range as viewed from the Italian side. Hence it is one of the very few individual summits of the Alps of which the ancient name can be identified with certainty. It is mentioned by both Pliny and Mela as containing the sources of the Padus; and the former adds that it was the highest summit of the Alps, which is a mistake, bat not an unnatural one, considering its really great elevation ( 12,580 feet) and its comparatively isolated position. (Plin. iii. 16. s. 20; Mela, ii. 4. § 4.) Virgil also mentions the forests of "the pine-clad Vesulus " as affording shelter to numerous wild boars of the largest size. (Virg. Aen. x. 708 ; Serv. ad loc.)
VESUNNA (Ó̇écouva), according to Ptolemy (ii. 7. § 12) the capital of the Petrocorii, a people of Aquitauia. In inscriptions the name is written Vesunua. The place occurs in the Itins., and its position is Perigueux, in the old province of Périgord, which name as well as Périgueux is a memorial of the name of the people, Petrocorii. But it is said that the remains of the old town are still called $L a$ Vésone. Périgueux is on the Ille, a branch of the Dordogme, and it is the capital of the department of Dordogue.
There is no Roman city in France of which we know so little that contains so many remains as Peirigueux. Foundations of ancient buildings, mosaics, statues, and ruins of edifices show its former magnitude. The tour de lésone, a round building. constructed of small stones and of rough materials, is supposed to have been the cella of a temple, or a tomb, as some conjecture. It is about 200 feet in circumference. There were seven bridges at Vesunna, four of which have been repaired or rebuilt. There are some remains of an amphitheatre of large dimensions. Several aqueducts supplied the town with water. There are also remains of a Roman citadel. On a hill which commands Vesunna, and is separated from it by the river Ille, there are the remains of a Roman camp, which is called Camp de Cesar, though Caesar never was there; but some of his successors may have been. There are several other Roman camps about Périgueux. Several Roman roads have been traced leading to Périgueux. Vesunna seems to have been an important position in Aquitania during the imperial government of Rome. There is a French work on the antiquities of VEsome by M. Wlgrin de Tailleffer, 2 vols. 4to. 1821, Périgueux.
[G. L.]
VESUVIUS MONS (Oúєбoúios, or Oúє $\sigma o v i 6 ı o s: ~$ Monto Vesturio), sometimes also called by Latin writers Veseves, and Vesvius or Vesbius (Bé́. 6ıos, Dion Cass.), a celebrated volcanic mountain of Campania, situated on the shore of the gulf called the Crater or Bay of Naples, from which it rises directly in an isolated conical mass, separated on all sides from the ranges of the Apennines by a broad tract of intervening plain. It rises to the height of 4020 feet, and its base is nearly 30 miles in circumference.

Though now celebrated for the frequency as well as violence of its eruptions, Vesuvius had in ancient times been so long in a quiescent state that all tradition of its having ever been an active volcano was lost, and until after the Christian era it was noted chiefly for the great fertility of the tract that extended around its base and up its sloping sides (Virg. Georg. ii. 227 ; Strab v. p. 247), a fertility which was in great measure owing to the deposits of fine volcanic sand and ashes that had been thrown out from the mountain. There were not indeed wanting appearances that proved to the accurate observer the volcanic origin and nature of Vesuvius: hence Diodorus speaks of it as "bearing many signs of its having been a burning mountain in times long past" (Diod. iv. 21); but though he considers it as having on this account given name to the Phlegraean plains, he does not allude to any historical or traditional evidence of its former activity. Strabo in like manner describes it as "surrounded by fields of the greatest fertility, with the exception of the summit, which was for the most part level, and wholly barren, covered with ashes, and containing clefts and hollows, formed among rocks of a burnt aspect, as if they had been eaten away by fire; 80 that a person would be led to the conclusion that the spot had formerly been in a state of conflagration, and had craters from which fire had burst forth, but that these had been extinguished for want of fuel" (v. p. 247). He adds that the great fertility of the neighbourhood was very probably owing to this cause, as that of Catana was produced by Mount Aetna. In consequence of this fertility, as well as of the beauty of the adjoining bay, the line of coast at the foot of Vexuvius was occupied by several flourishing towns, and by numbers of villas belonging to wealthy Roman nobles.

The name of Vesuvius is twice mentioned in history before the Christian era. In B. c. 340 it was at the foot of this mountain that was fought the great battle between the Romans and the Latins, in which P. Decius devoted himself to death for his country. (Lir. viii. 8.) The precise scene of the action is indeed uncertain, though it was probably in the plain on the $N$. side. Livy describes it as " haud procal radicibus Vesuvii montis, qua via ad Veserim fercbat;" but the situation of the Veseris is wholly uncertain. [Vmseris.] Again, at a lnter period (b. c. 73) we are told that Spartacus, with the fugitive slares and gladiators under his command, took refuge on Mount Vesuvius as a stronghold, and by a sudden sally from it defeated the Roman general Claudius Pulcher, who had been sent against him. (Flor. iii. 20. § 4; Plut. Crass. 9; Appian, B. C. i. 116; Vell. Pat. ii. 30; Oros. v. 24; Frontin. Strat. i. 5. § 21.)

But it was the fearful eruption of the 24th of August, A. D. 79, that first gave to Vesuvius the celebrity that it has ever since enjoyed. That great catastrophe is described in detail in a well-known letter of the younger Pliny to the historian Tacitus; and more briefly, but with the addition of some fabulous circuinstances, by Dion Cassius. (Plin. Ep. vi. 16, 20; Dion Cass. Ixvi. 21-23; Vict. Epit. 10.) It is remarkable that in recording this, the earliest eruption of the mountain, Pliny particularly notices the form assumed by the cloud of ashes that, rising from the crater in a regular column to a considerable height, afterwards spread out laterally so as to form a head like that of a stone-pine: an appearance which has been observed in many subsequent eruptions. The other phenomena described are very much the same as are common to all similar eruptions: but the mass of ashes, sand, and pumice thrown out was 80 vast as not only to bury the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii at the foot of the volcano under an accumulation many feet in depth, but to overwhelm the more distant town of Stabiae, where the elder Pliny perished by suffocation, and to overspread the whole bay with a cloud of ashes such as to cause a darkness more profound than that of night even at Misenum, 15 miles distant from the foot of the mountain. (Plin. l.c.) On the other hand the outflow of lava was inconsiderable, and if any streams of that kind broke out at this time they probably did not descend to the inhabited regions: at least we hear nothing of them, and the prpular notion that Herculaneum was overwhelmed by a current of lava is certainly a mistake. [Hrrcutanevm.] So great and unexpected a calamity naturally excited the greatest sensation, and both the poets and the prose writers of Rome for more than a century after the event abound with allusions to it. Tacitus speaks of the Bay of Naples as "pulcerrimus sinus, ante quam Vesuvius mons ardescens faciem loci verteret." (Ann. iv. 67.) Martial, after descanting on the beauty of the scene when the mountain and its neighbourhood were covered with the green shade of vines, adds:-
"Cuncta jacent flammis et tristi mersa favilla"
(iv. 44);
and Statins describes Vesuvius as "Aemula Trinacriis volvens incendia flammis."
(Silv. iv. 4. 80.)
(See also Val. Flacc. iii. 208, iv. 507 ; Sil. Ital. xvii. 594 ; Flor. i. 16. § 5.)

A long interval again elapsed before any similar outbreak. It is probable indeed that the mountain continued for some time at least after this first eruption to give signs of activity by sending forth smoke and sulphurous vapours from its crater, to which Statius probably alludes when he speaks of its summit still threatening destruction (" necdum lethale minari cessat apex," Silv. iv. 4. 85). But the next recorded eruption, and probably the next of any magnitude, coccurred in A. D. 203, and is noticed by Dion Cassius (lxxvi. 2). This is probably the one alluded to by Galen (de Meth. v. 12), and it seems certain from the description given by Dion Cassius of the state of the mountain when he wrote (under Alexander Severus) that it was then in a state of occasional, but irregular, activity, much resembling that which exists at the present day. (Dion Cass. Ixvi. 21.) The only other eruption that we find mentioned under the Roman Empire occarred in A. D. 472 under the reign of Anthemius. (Marcellin. Chron. ad ann.) A fourth, which took place in the reign of Theodoric king of the Goths (A. D. 512), is noticed by buth Cassiodurus and Procopius, who describe in considerable detail the phenomena of the mountain. It appears certain that these later eruptions were accompanied by the discharge of streams of lava, which caused great mischief to the surrounding country. (Cassiod. Ep. ir. 50; Procop. B. G. ii. 4, iv. 35.)

VESUVIUS MONS.

It would be foreign to onr subject to trace the history of the mountain through the middle ages, but it may be mentioned that its eruptions seem to have been far more rare and separated by longer intervals than they have been for more than two centuries past; and in some instances at least these intervals were periods of perfect quiescence, during which the mountain was rapidly losing its peculiar aspect. Even as late as 1611 , after an interval of little more than a century, the sides of the mountain were covered with forests, and the crater itself was overgrown with shrubs and rich herbage. (Daubeny on Vulcanoes, p. 225.)

At the present day Vesuvius consists of two distinct portions: the central cone, which is now the most elevated part of the mountain; and a ridge which encircles this on three sides at some distance, and is separated from it by a level valley or bollow called the Atrio del Cavallo. This outer ridge, of which the highest point, nearits N.extremity, is called Monte Somma, was probably at one time continuous on all sides of the circle, but is now broken down on the S. and W. faces: hence the appearance of Vesuvius as viewed from Naples or from the W. is that of a mountain having two peaks separated by a deep depression. This character is wholly at variance with the description given by Strabo, who tells us that the summit was nearly lerel, but with clefts and fissures in it, from which fire appeared to have formerly issued (v. p. 247). Hence it is probable that the mountain was then a single truncated cone, and that the aast crater-like bollow of which the Atrio del Cavallo forms part, was first created by the great eruption of A. D. 79, which blew into the air the whole mass of the then existing summit of the mountain, leaving the present ridge of Monte Somma standing, enclosing a vast crater, within which the present cone has gradually formed. (Daubeny on Vulcanoes, p. 215; Lyell's Principles of Geology, p. 365, 8th edit.) It has indeed been frequently assumed from the accounts of the operations of Spartausus already mentioned (Flor. iii. 20; Plut. Crass. 9) that the mountain had even then a crater, within which that leader and his band were enclosed by the Roman general: but it is rery doubtful whether the passages in question bear out this interpretation, which seems at variance with the account given by Strabo, whose description has every appearance of being derived from personal observation.

VETERA. [Castra Vetera.]
VETTONA (Fith. Vettonensis: Bettona), a municipal town of Umbria, situated about 5 miles E. of the Tiber, between Perusia and Mevania. It is mentioned by Pliny among the municipalities of Umbria, and its name is fuund also in an inscription among the "xy Populi Umbriae;" while another mentions it in connection with Perusia, from which it was only about 10 miles distant, as measured on the map, though the Tabula calls it 14 miles from that city and 20 from Tuder. (Plin. iii. 14. s. 19; Orell. Inscr. 95, 98: Tab. Peut.) Vettona continued in the middle ages to be a city of considerable importance, but it was destroyed by the Perugians in 1352. The ancient site is, however, still marked by the village of Bettona, about a mile from the left bank of the Tinia. [E. H. B.]

VETTONES (Oiét Óvétтoves, Ptol. ii. 5. § 9), one of the principal penples of Lusitanis. (Caes. B. C. i. 38 ; Plin. iv. 21. s. 38 ; Grut. Inscr. p. 383. 7.) Strabo alone (l. c.) assigns them to Hither Iberia, or the Provincia Tarraconensis. We find their country called Vettonia by Prudentius (Hymn. in Eulal. v. 186) and in an inscription. (Orelli, no. 3664.) It was watered by the Tagus, and separated by the Durius from Asturia on the N. On the W., where their boundary corresponded very nearly with that of modern Portugal, they adjoined the proper Lusitani. On the E. they neighboured on the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, and their boundary would be described by a line drawn from the modern Simancas in a SW. direction over Prente del Arzobispo to Truxillo. On the S. they were bounded by the province of Baetica, so that their country comprehended a part of Estremadura and Leon. Their principal towns were Salmantica (Salamanca), Cecilionicum (Baños?), Capara (las Ventas de Capara), Sentice (in the neighbourhood of Los Santos), Cottaeobriga (Almeida), Augustobriga (Ciudad Rodrigo?), &c. In their country grew the herba Vettonica (Plin. xxv. 7. s. 46), still known under the name of betony; an account of which is given in the treatise De Herba Betonica, ascribed to Antonius Musa.
VETULO'NIA or VETULO'NIUM (OíєTou入w'vtov, Ptol. iii. 1. § 49: Eth. Vetulonienses), one of the twelve principal cities of the Etruscan confederation (Dionys. iii. 51 ; Plin. iii. 5. s. 8). Yet we hear nothing of its political history; and all we know respecting it is, that it was reputed to be the town in which the Etruscan insignia of magistracy, afterwards adopted by the Romans, such as the lictors, fasces, sella curulis, toga praetexta, &c., as well as the trumpet, were first used. (Sil. It. viii. 483, sqq.; cf. Dionys. iii. 61; Strab. v. p. 220; Mlacr. S. i. 6; Flor. i. 5; &c.)

The destruction of Vetulonia, and the silence of history respecting it, have caused even its site to be a matter of doubt. Thus it has been sought at or near Viterbo (Annio, Antiqq. Var. Volum.), at Massa Marittima, the ancient Massa Veternensis (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11. § 25), or in a dense wood 5 miles to the W. of that town (Ximenes, ap. Inghirami, Ricerche di Vetulonia, p. 62; cf. Targioni-Tozzetti, Vinggi in Toscana, iv. p. 116); on the site of Vulci (Luc. Buonaparte, Ann. Inst. 1829, p. 188, sqq.; and Valeriani, Mus. Chius. i. p. 68); on the hill of Castiglione Bermardi, near Monte Rotondo (Inghirami, Ricerche di Vetulonia, Ambrosch), and at Orbetello (Ermolao Barbaro, ap. Dempster, Etrur.
$4 \times 3$

Reg. ii. 56). But till very recently the opinion most commonly adopted was that of Leandro Alberti, an antiquary of the 16th century, who placed it on Monte Calvi (Descriz. d' Italia, p. 27), in a wood called Selva di Vetleta; and who has been followed by Cluverius (Ital. Ant. ii. 2. p. 472), by Müller (Etrusker, i. p. 211), \&c. It is now, however, generally admitted that Vetulonia is to be identified with the remains of a city, discovered in 1842 by Sig. Pasquinelli, an Italian engineer, at Magliano, a village between the Osa and the Albegna, and 8 or 10 miles to the N. of Orbetello. To Mr. Dennis (Cities and Sepulchres of Etruria, vol. ii. ch. 48), however, is to be assigned the credit of first identifying these remains as those of the lost Etruscan city. Their site agrees with what we learn respecting that of Vetulonia. Iliny and Ptolemy (ll.cc.) agree in placing the latter among the inland colonies of Etruria; yet Pliny (ii. 103. s. 106) also describes it as being not far from the sea, and as having hot springs, the Aquae Vetuloniae, in its neighbourhond. Now, all the necessary conditions are fulfilled by the remains alluded to. The circuit of the walls, about $4 \frac{1}{2}$ miles, shows it to have been an important city; its situation with regard to the sea agrees with the account of Pliny; and near Telamoraccio, at a distance of only 200 or 300 yards from the coast, and in the vicinity of the newly found city, warm springs still exist. For other reasons which led Mr. Dennis to the opinion which he formed, the reader is referred to his work before cited, and to his paper in the Classical Museum, vol. ii. p. 229, seq. For coins of Vetulonia, see Eckhel, vol. i.pt. i. p. 94. [T. H. D.]

UFENS (Ufente), a river of Latium, rising at the foot of the Volscian mountains, and flowing through the Pontine Marshes, whence its course is slow and stagnant, and it is described by both Virgil and Silius Italicus, as a sluggish and muddy stream. (Virg. Aen. vii. 801 ; Sil. Ital. viii. 382.) Claudian also calls it "tardatus suis erroribus Ufens." (Prob. et Ol. Cons. 257.) It joins the Amasenus (still called Amaseno) during its course through the marshes to the sea at Terracina, but the present channels of both rivers are artificial, and it is uncertain whether they united their streams in ancient times or not. The name is corrupted by Strabo into Aufidus (Aర́øiסos, v. p. 233), but he correctly describes it as one of the chief agents in the formation of the Pontine Marshes. The ancient form of the name was Oufens, whence the Roman tribe Oufentina derived its name, being composed originalls of citizens settled in the territory and neighbourhood of Privernum (Fest. 8. v. Onfentina, p. 194).

 bonensis, on the road from Nemausus through Ugernum and Tarascon to Aquae Sextiae ( $A i x$ ). Strato (ir. p. 178) has described this road. The genitive vgerni occurs in an inscription fomd at Nimes. Ugernum is represented by Beaucaire. The Table marks the distance from Nemausus (Nimes) to Ugernum xv., which is near the truth. In the last century the Roman road betwren Nemausus and Ugernum was discovered with several milestones on it in their original position, and numbered, as it seems, from Nemausus the ancient capital of the district. These milestones gave the opportunity of ascertaining the length of the Roman mile. The name of Beaucaire is a corruption of the middleage name of Bellum-quadrum. If any trace of the name Ugernum exists, it is in the name of Gernegue, the lower part of Tarascon, which is on the opposite side of the river, for Beaucaire and Tarascon stand face to face. But in order to admit this, we must suppose that Gernegue represents an island Gernica, which, according to a middle-age docament, was between Beaucaire and Tarascon, and that by some change in the river the island has become part of the mainland on the east side of the river; and it is said that this fact about the island is certain. UGIA (Ofyıa, Ptol. ii. 4. § 12), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica, on the road from Cades to Corduba. (Itin. Ant. p. 410.) It is probably the town called Urgia by Pliny (iii. 1. 8. 3), with the surnames of Castrum Julium or Caesaris Salutariensis, and possessing the Jus Latii. Now Las Cabezas, where there are some antiquities. (Cf. Ukert, ii. pt. i. p. 356.)

VIA AEMILIA ( $\dot{\eta}$ Aipi入la $\delta 8 \delta s$ ), one of the most celebrated and important of the Roman highways, and the first that was constructed by them in Nurthern Italy. The period of its first construction is clearly marked by Livy, who tells us that M. Aemilius Lepidus, the consul of B.C. 187, after having effectually subdued the Ligurians, carried a highroad from Placentia to Ariminum, that it might there juin the Flaminian Way ("Viam ab Placentia, ut Flaminiae committeret, Ariminum perduxit," Liv. xxxix. 2). Strabo indeed gives a different view of the case, and speaks of the Aemilian Way as constructed in the first instance ouly from Ariminum to Bononia, and thence sweeping round the marshes, and skirting the roots of the Alps to Aquileia (v. p. 217). But there is every reason to suppose that this last branch of the road was not constructed till long afterwards; and there is no doubt of the correctness of Livy's statement that the original Via Aemilia, and the only one that was generally recognised as such, was the line of road from Ariminum to Placentia. It was this celebrated highway-which is still in use at the present day, and, being carried the whole way through a level plain, preserves almost a straight line during a course of 180 miles-that became the means of carrying Roman civilisation into the heart of Cisalpine Gaul; and so great was its influence upon the population that it traversed, that the whole district between the Apennines and the Padus, constituting the Eighth Region of Augustus, and commonly called by geagraphers Gallia Cispadana, came to be known as Aemilia, and was eventually constituted into a province under that name. The period at which this took place is uncertain, but the appellation was doubtless in popular use long before it became an official designation; and as early as the tirst century we find Dartial employing the expressions, "Aemiliac de regione viae," and even "tota in Aemilia" (Martial. iii. 4. 2, vi. 85. 6)As indeed all the principal towns of the district (with the single exception of Ravenna) were situated on the Via Aemilia, the use of this designation seems extremely natural.

We have no account of the period at which the Via Aemilia was continued from Placentia to Mediolanum, though there is little doubt that it would take place sonn after the complete subjugation of tin Transpadane Gauls. Nor do we know with any certainty whether the name of Via Aemilia was ever applied in common usage to this portion of the road, or to the branches that led from Dlediolanum to the foot of the Alps, as well as from that city by Verona to Patavium. But as Strabo distinctly applies the name to the branch that led by Patavium to Aquileia, we may here most conveniently include all the principal highroads of the N. of Italy under one view in the present article.

1. The main or trunk line of the Via Aemilia from Ariminum to Placentia. The stations on this road are thus given in the Antonine linerary, where they are repeated more than once (1pp. 99, 126, 287); and, from the direct line of the roud, the distances are suljject to no duabt :-

From Ariminum (Rimini) to Caesena (Cesent) - - xx. m. r.
Faventia (Faenza) - - - xxiv.
Forum Cornelii (Imola) - - $\mathbf{x}$.
Bononia (Bolugna) - - xxiv .

Megium (Reggio) - - - - xvii.
Yarma (Parma) - - - xviii.
Fidentiola (Burgo S. Donino) xv.
Placentia (I'iacenza) - - - xxiv.
The same line is given more in detail in the Jerusalem Itinerary (p. 615, &c.), with which the Tabula substantially agrees; but the distances are more correctly given iu the latter.

The stations enumerated are:-

The general agreement in the distances above given (which are those of the Tabula) with those of the Antonine Itinerary, though the division is different, sufficiently shows the accuracy of the two. The distances in the Jerusalem Itinerary are, for this line of route, generally less accurate. Some obscure Mutationes mentioned in the one document, and not in the other, have been omitted in the above list.
2. Continuation of the Via Aemilia from Placentia to Mediolanum. This line is summarily given in the Antonine Itinerary thus:-

From Placentia to Laus
Pompeia (Lodi Vecchio) - xxiv. M.p.
Thence to Mediolanum (Milan) xvi.
The same distances are thus divided in the Jerusalem Itinerary:-

| Ad Kotas | - | - | - |

The intermediate stations are unknown, and are expressly called mere Muiationes, or places for changing horses.
3. From Mediolanum to Augusta Praetoria, at the foot of the Alps, the distances, as given in the Antonine Itinerary, are :-

The same authority gives a circuitous line of route from Mediolanum to Vercellae (where it rejoins the preceding) by

4. From Mediohanum to Aquileia. The stations given in the Itinerarics are as follows:-

Med. to Argentia - - - x. m. P. Yons Aureoli (Pontirolo) x. Bergamum (Rergamo) - xiii. Brixia (Brescia) - - xxxviii.(xxxii.) Sirmio (Sermione) - xxii. Verona (Verona) - - xxii. Vicentia (Vicenza) - - xxxiii. Patavium (Padova) - xxvii. (xxii.) Altinum (Altino) - - Exxiii. Concordia (Concordia) - $x \times x i$. Aquileia (Aquileia) - xxxi.
(In the above line of route the minor stations (Mutationes) given in the Jerusalem Itinerary are omitted. For an examination of them, and a careful comparison of all the Roman roads through Cisalpine Gaul, see Walckenaer, Gévgraphie des Gaules, vol. iii. pp. 2-13.)
5. From Bononia to Aquileia. This is the road of which Strabo expressly speaks as a continuation of the Via Aemilia (v. p. 21\%), but it is probable that he did not mean to say that it branched off directly from Bononia; at least the only line given in the Itineraries turns off from the main line of the Via Aemilia at Mutina, and thence proceeds to Vicus Serninus (?) - - $\quad$ xxiii. м. p.

Vicus Varianus (Bariano, on the N. bank of the Po) - xx.
Anneianum (Legnago ?) - - xvii.
Ateste (Este) - - - - $x$.
Patavium (I'adora) - - - xxv.
whence it folluwed the same line to Aquileia as that given above. Another line of road, which though more circuitous was probably more frequented, led from Mutina by Colicaria (an uncertain station) to Hustilia (Ostiglia), where it crossed the Padus, and thence direct to Verona (xxx. MI. P.). (Itin. Ant. p. 282.)
6. From Placentia to Dertona, where it communicated with the road constructed by Aemilius Scaurus across the Apemines to Vada Sabata. (Strab. v. p. 217.) The stations on this short line were:From Placeutia to

& \text { livia (Voghera) - - - xvi. } \\
& \text { Dertona (Tortona) }-\quad-\mathrm{x} . \quad .
\end{aligned}

The first station, Comillomagus, or Camiliomagus, as the name is written in the Tabula, is unknown, but must have been situated a short distance to the W. of Broni.
7. Lastly, a branch of the Via Acmilia led from Placentia to Ticinum (Pavia), whence it was carried westwards to Augusta Taurinorum (Turin) and the foot of the Cottian Alps. This was therefore one of the great highroads leading to Gaul. But the stations on it, as given in the Tabula, are very confused, and can only partially be restored by the assistance of the Antonine Itinerary, which nowhere gives this road in its entirety. At Ticinum it was joined by another road leading from Mediolanum to that city. The stations, as given in the Jerusalem Itinerary (p. 556), are as follows :-

Ticinum

The rest of the route over the Cottian Alps is given in the article Alpes. [E. H. B.]
VIA AEMILIA SCAURI, is the name given, for the sake of distinction, to a road which was constructed by Aemilius Scaurus long after the more celebrated Via Aemilia above described. Strabo, the only author who distinctly mentions the two, says that Aemilius Scaurus, after having drained the marshes on the S . side of the Padus, constructed the Aemilian Way through Pisae and Luna as far as Sabata, and thence through Dertona. (Strab. v. p. 217.) Whether " the other Aemilian Way," as Strabo calls it, had been already continued from Placentia to Dertona, or this also was first effected by Scaurus, we know not ; but it is clear that the two were thus brought into connection. The construction of this great work must be assigned to the censorship of M. Aemilius Scaurus, in B.c. 109, as we learn from Aurelius Victor (Vir. Ill. 72), who, however, probably confounds it with the more celebrated Via Aemilia from Placentia to Ariminum. But a comparison of the two authors leaves no doubt as to the road really meant. The name seems to have gradually fallen into disuse, probably on account of the ambiguity arising between the two Viae of the same name ; and we find both the coast-road from Pisae to Vada Sabata, and that across the mountains from the latter place by Aquae Statiellae to Dertona, included by the Itineraries as a part of the Via Aurelia, of which the former at least was in fact a mere continuation. Hence it will be convenient to discuss the stations and distances along these lines, under the general head of Via Aurelia. [E. H. B.]

VIA AMERINA, is the name given in an inscription of the time of Hadrian (Orell. Inscr. 3306) to a line of road, which must obviously be that leading direct from Rome to Ameria. This, as we learn from the Tabula, branched off from the Via Cassia at Baccanae (Baccano), and proceeded through Nepete and Falerii to Ameria. The stations and distances as there given are:-

Rome to Baccanae - - - xxi. m. p.
Nepete (Nepi) - - - ix.
Falerii (Sta Maria di Falleri) - - - v.
Castellum Amerinum - xii.
Ameria (Amelia) - - ix.
The sum of these distances ( 56 miles) agrees precisely with the statement of Cicero, who, in the oration Pro Sexto Roscio Amerino (c. 7. § 18), observes that it was 56 miles from Ameria to Rome.

According to the Tabula a prolongation of the same road led from Ameria to Tuder, and thence by a circuitous route through Vettona and Perusia to Clusium, where it rejoined the Via Cassia. The first station to Ameria is omitted : thence to

The distance from that city to Clusium is again omitted.
[E. H. B.]
VIA APPIA ( $\bar{\eta}$ 'A $\pi \pi i a \quad \delta \delta \delta \sigma^{\prime}$ ), the greatest and most celebrated of all the Roman highways in Italy, which led from Rome direct to Brundusium, and thus became the principal line of communication with Greece, Macedonia and the East. Hence it became, in the flourishing times of the Roman Empire, the most frequented and important of the Roman roads, and is called by Statius "regina viarum." (Silv.ii. 2. 12.) Martial also calls it "Appia . . . Ausoniue maxima fama viae" (ix. 102). The former author terms it " annosa Appia," in reference to its great antiquity (Ib. iv. 3. 163.) It was indeed the earliest of all the Roman highways, of the construction of which we have any definite account, and very probably the first of all that was regularly made as a great public work; the Via Salaria, Tiburtina, \&c., having doubtless long been in use as mere natural roads, before they were converted into solidly constructed Viae. There must in like manner have always been some kind of road communicating from Rome with Alba and Aricia: but it is evident, from the perfectly straight line followed by the Via Appia from a point very little without the gates of Rome to Aricia, that this must have been a new work, laid out and executed at once. The original construction of the Via Appia was undoubtedly due to the censor Appius Claudius Caecus, who commenced it in B. c. 312, and completed it as far as Capua before the close of his censorship. (Liv. ix. 29 ; Diod. xx. 36; Frontin. de Aquaed. 5; Orell. Inscr. 539.) From Capua it was undoubtedly carried on to Beneventum, and again at a subsequent period to Brundusium; but the date of these continuations is unknown. It is evident that the last at least could not have taken place till after the complete subjugation of the south of Italy in B.c. 266, and probably not till after the establishment of the Roman colony at Brundusium, B.c. 244. Hence it is certainly a mistake when Aurelius Victor speaks of Appius Claudius Caecus as having carried the Appian Way to Brundusium. (Vict. Vir. Ill. 34.) The continuation and completion of this great work has been assigned to various members of the Claudian family; but this is entirely without authority.

Strabo distinctly speaks of the Appian Way as extending, in his time, from Rome to Brundusium; and his description of its course and condition is important. After stating that almostall travellers from Greece and the East used to land at Brundusium, he adds: "From thence there are two ways to Rome, the one adapted only for mules, through the country of the Peacetians, Daunians, and Samnites, to Beneventum, on which are the cities of Egnatia, Caelia, Canusium, and Herdonia; the other through Tarentum, deviating a little to the left, and going round about a day's journey, which is called the Appian, and is better adapted for carriages. On this are situated Uria (between Brundusium and Tarentum) and Venusia, on the confines of the Samnites and Lucanians. Both these roads, starting from Brundusium, meet at Benerentum. Thence to Rome the rond is called the Appian, passing through Caudium. Calatia, Capua, and Casilinuin, to Sinuessa. The whole distance from Rome to Brundusium is $\mathbf{3 6 0}$ miles. There is yet a - third road, from Rhegium, through the Bruttians and Lucanians, and the lands of the Simnites to Campania, where it joins the Appian; this passes through the Apennine mountains, and is three or four days' journey longer than that from Brundusium." (Strab. v. p. 283.) It is not improbable that the first of these branches, which Strabo distinctly distinguishes from the true Appian Way, is the Via Numicia or Ninucia (the reading is uncertain). mentioned by Horace as the alternative way by which it was customary to proceed to Brundusium. (Hor. Ep. i. 18. 20.) But Strabo gives us no information as to how it proceeded from Herdonia, in the plains of Apalia, through the mountains to Beneventum. It is, however, probable that it followed nearly the same line as the high road afterwards constructed by Trajan, through Aecae and Equus Tuticus. This is indeed one of the principal natural passes through this part of the Apennines, and is still followed, with little deviation, by the modern highroad from Naples to Brindisi and Taranto. But it is worthy of remark, that Horace and his companions in their journey to Brundusium, of which he has left us the poetical itinerary (Sat. i. 5), appear not to have followed this course, but to have taken a somewhat more direct route through Trivicum, and a small town not named (" oppidulum quod versu dicere non est"), to Canusium. This route, which does nut agree with either of those mentioned by Strabo, or with those given in the Itineraries, was probably disused after that constructed by Trajan, thruugh Equus Tuticus and Aecae, had become the frequented line. It was to that emperor that the Appian Way was indebted for many improvements. He restored, if he was not the first to construct, the highroad through the Pontine Marshes from Forum Appii to Tarracina (Dion Cass. Ix viii. 15; Hoare, Class. Tour, vol. i. p. 28) ; and he at the same time constructed, at his own expense, a new line of highruad from Beneventum to Brundusium (Gruter, Inscr. p. 151. 2), which is andoubtedly the Via Trajana celebrated by coins. (Eckhel, vol. iv. p. 421 .) It is probable (as already pointed out) that he did no more than render practicable for carriages a line of route previously existing, but accessible only to mules; and that the Via Trajana coincided nearly with the road described by Strabo. But from the time that this road was laid open to general traffic, the proper V ia Appia through Venusia to Tarentum, which traversed a wild and thinly-peopled country, seems to have fallen much into disuse. It is, however, still given in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 120) though not as the main line of the Appian Way. The latter appellation seems indeed to have been somewhat vaguely used under the Empire, and the same Itinerary bestows the name on the line, already indicated by Strabo (l. c.). that proceeded S. through Lucania and Brattium to Rhegium, on the Sicilian Strait, a route which never went near Beneventum or Brundusium at all.

The Appian Way long survived the fall of the Western Empire. That portion of it which passed through the Pontine Marshes, which was always the most liable to suffer from neglect, was restored by Theodoric (Gruter. Inscr. p. 152. 8); and Procopius, who travelled over it 40 years later, speaks with admiration of the solidity and perfection of its construction. "The Appian Way (says he) extends from Rome to Capua, a journey of five days for an active traveller. Its width is such as to admit of the passage of two waggons in contrary directions. The road itself is worthy of the highest aduiration, for the stone of which it is composed, a kind of mill-stone, and by nature very hard, was brought by Appius from some distant region, since none such is found in this part of the country. He then, after having smoothed and levelled the stones, and cut them into angular forms, fitted them closely together, without inserting either bronze or any other substance. But they are so accurately fitted and joined together, as to present the appearance of one compact mass naturally united, and not composed of many parts. And nutwithstanding the long period of time that has elapsed, during which they have been worn by the continual passage of so many carriages and beasts of burden, they have neither been at all displaced from their original position, nor have any of them been wurn down, or even lost their polish." (Procop. B. G. i. 14.) The above description convers an accurate impression of the appearance which the Appian Way must have presented in its most perfect state. The extraordinary care and accuracy with which the blocks that composed the pavement of the Roman roads were fitted together, when first laid down, is well seen in the so-called Via Triumphalis, which led to the Temple of Jupiter, on Mons Albanus. [ALbanus Mons.] But it is evident from many other examples, that they became much worn down with time; and the pavement seen by Procopius had doubtless been frequently restored. He is also mistaken in supposing that the hard basaltic lava (silex) with which it was paved, had to be brought from a distance: it is found in the immediate neighbourhoul, and, in fact, the Appian Way itself. from the Capo di Bore to the foot of the Alban Hills, runs along a bank or ridge composed of this lava. Procopins also falls into the common mistake of supposing that the road was originally constructed by Appius Claudias such as he beheld it. But during the long interval it had been the object of perpetual care and restoration; and it is very doubtful how far any of the great works along its line, which excited the admiration of the Romans in later ages, were due to its original author. Caius Gracchus in particular had bestowed great pains upon the improvement of the Roman roads; and there is much reason to believe that it was in his time that they first assumed the finished appearance which they ever afterwards bore. (Plut. C. Gracch. 7.) Caesar also, when a young man, was appointed "Curator Viae Appiae," which had become a regular office, and laid out large sums of money upon its improvement. (Plut. Caes. 5.) The care bestowed on it hy successive emperors, and especially by Trajan, is attested by numeruus inscriptions.

It is very doubtful, indeed, whether the original Via Appia, as constructed by the censor Appius, was carried through the Pontine Marshes at all. No mention is found of his draining those marshes, without which such a work would have been impossible; and it is much more probable that the road was originally carried along the hills by Cora, Norba, and Setia, by the same line which was again in use in the last century, before the Pontine Marshes had been drained for the last time by Pius VI. This conjecture is confirmed by the circumstance that Lucilius, in describing his journey from Rome to Capua, complains of the extremely hilly character of the road in approaching Setia. (Lucil. Fragm. iii. 6, ed. Gerlach.) Even in the time of Horace, as we learn from his well-known description of the journey to Brundusium, it was customary for traveilers to continue their route from Forum Appii by water, embarking at that point on the canal through the Pontine Marshes (Hor. Sat. i. 5. 11, &c.). But the very existence of this canal renders it probable that there was at that time a road by the side of it, as we know was the case in Strabo's time, notwithstanding which he tells us that the canal was much used by travellers, who made the voyave in the night, and thus gained time: (Strab. v. p. 233.)

It will be convenient to divide the description of the Appian Way, as it existed nuder the Roman Empire, and is given in the Itineraries, into several portions. The first of these from Rome to Capua was the main trunk line, upon which all its branches and extensions dependect. This will require to be described in more detail, as the most celebrated and frequented of all the Roman highways.

1. From Rome to Capua.

The stations given in the Antonine Itinerary are:From Rome to Aricia (Lariccia) - - xvi. m.p.

The abore stations are for the most part well known, and admit of no doubt. Those in the neighbourhond of the Pontine Marshes have indeed given rise to much confusion, but are in fact to be easily determined. Indeed, the line of the road being almost perfectly straight from Rome to Tarracina renders the investigation of the distances a matter of little difficulty.

The Jerusalem Itinerary (p. 611) subdivides the same distance as follows:
Rome to Ad Nonum (mutatio) - - ix. M.p. Aricia (civitas) - - - vii. Spunsaeor Ad Sponsas (mutatio) xix. Appii Forum (do.) - - - vii. (sii.?)
AdMedias (do.) - - ix. Tarracina (civitas) - - - x. Fundi (do.) - - - - xiii. Formiae (do.) - - - - xii. Minturnae (do.) - - - - ix. Sinuessa (do.) - - - - ix. Pons Campanus (mutatio) - ix.
Ad Octavum (do.) - - ix. Capua (civitas) - - - viii.
The intermediate stations were (as they are expressly called in the Itinerary itself) mere Mutationes, or posthouses, where relays of horses were kept. The deiermination of their position is therefore of no interest, except in connection with the distances given, which vary materially from those of the other Itinerary, though the total distance from Rome to Capua ( 12.5 miles) is the same in both.

The Appian Way issued from the Porta Capena, in the srrian walls of Rume, about half a mile outside of which it separsted from the Via Latina, so that the two roads pased through different gates in the walls of Aurelian. That by which the Via Appia finally quitted lione was kuown as the Porta Appia; it is now called the Porta S. Sebastiono. The first milestone on the road stood about 120 yards outside this gate; the distances always continuing to be measured from the old Porta Capena. The buildings and tombs which bordered the Via Appia in that portion of it which lay between the two gates, are described in the article Roma, p. 821 . It was apparently in this part of its course, just ontside the original city, that it was spanned by three triumphal arches, erected in honour of Drusus (the father of the emperor Claadius), Trajan, and L. Verus. One only of these still remains, just within the Porta S. Schastiano, which, from its plain and unadorned style of architecture, is probably that of Drusus. Outside the Porta Appia the road descends to a small stream or brook, now called Acquataccia, which it crosses by a bridge less than half a mile from the gate: this trifling stream is identified, on good grounds, with the river Almo, celebrated for the peculiar sacred rites with which it was connected [Almo]. A short distance beyond this the road makes a considerable bend, and ascends a bank or ridge before it reaches the second milestone. From that point it is carried in a straight line direct to the remains of Bovillae at the foot of the Alban Hills, running the whole way along a slightly elevated bank or ridge, formed in all probability by a very ancient current of lava from the Alban Mount. This long, straight line of mad, stretching across the Campagna, and bordered throughout by the remains of tombs and ruins of other buildings, is, even at the present day, one of the most striking features in the neighbourhood of Rome, and, when the edifices which bordered it were still perfect, must hare constituted a magnificent approach to the Imperial City. The whole line has been recently cleared and carefully examined. It is described in detail by the Car. Canina (in the Annali dell' Instituto di Corriopondenza Archenlogica for 1852 and 1853; and more briefly by De.jardins, Essai sur la Topngraphic du Latiun, 4to. Paris, 1854, pp. 92-130. We can here mention only some of the most interesting of the numerous monuments that have been thus brought to light, as well as those previously known and celebrated.

On the right of the rand, shortly after crossing the Almo, are the remains of a vast sepulchre, which now serve to support the tavern or Osteria dell Acquataccio; this is clearly identified by the inseriptions discovered there in 1773, as the monument of Abascantius, a freedman of Domitian, and of his wife Priscilla, of which Statius has left us in one of his puems a detailed description (Stat. Silv. v. 1). On the left of the road, almost exactly 3 miles from Rome, is the most celebrated of all the monuments of this kind, the massire sepulchre of Caecilia Metella, the daughter of $Q$ Metellus Creticus, and wite of Crassus the triumvir. Converted into a fortress in the middle ages, this tower-like monument is still in remarkable preservation, and, from its commanding position, is a conspicuous object from all points of the surrounding country. It is popularly known as the Capo di Bove, from the bucranium which appears as an ornament in the frieze. (A view of this remarkable monument is given in the article Rona, p. 822.) Before reaching the Capo di Bore, the road passes some extensive remains of buildings on the left, which appear to have formed part of an imperial villa constracted by the emperor Maxentiua, attached to which are the remains of a circus, also the work of the same emperor, and which, from their remarkably perfect condition, have thrown much light on the general plan of these edifices. [Rosma, $p$. 844.]

Proceeding onwards from the tomb of Caecilia Metella, the road is bordered throughout by numerous sepulchres, the most remarkable of which is the tomb of Servilius Quartus, on the left, abont $\mathbf{3} \mathbf{3}$ miles from Rorne. The remarkable preservation of the ancient rad in this part of its course, shows the accuracy of the description above cited from Procopius ; but it is remarkable that this, the greatest and most frequented highway of the Roman empire, was only just wide enough to aulmit of the passage of two carriages abreast, being only 15 feet bruad between the raised crepidines which bordered it. After passing a number of obscure tombs on both sides of the way, there occurs, just beyond the fith mile from Rome, a remarkable enclosure, of quadrangular form, surrounded by a low wall of Alban stone. This has frequently been supposed to be the Campns Sacer Horatiorum, alluded to by Martial (iii. 47) as existing on the Appian Way, and which preserved the memory of the celebrated combat between the Horatii and Curiatii. This was believed to have been fought just about 5 miles from Kome (Liv. i. 23), which would accord well with the position of the enclosure in question; but it is maintained by modern antiquaries that this, which was certainly of a sacred character, more probably served the purposes of an Ustrinum, or place where the bodies of the dead were burned, previously to their being deposited in the numerous sepulchres that lined both sides of the Appian Way. These still forn a continuous cemetery for above two miles farther. The most massive of them all, which must, when entire, have greatly exceeded even that of Caecilia Metella in magnitude, and from its circular form is known as the Casal Rotondo, occurs near the 6 th mile from Rome, on the left of the Via Appia. From a fragment of an inscription found here, it is probable that this is the tomb of Dessala Corvinus, the friend of Augustus and patron of Tibullus, and is the very monument, the massive solidity of which is more than once referred to by Martial ("Messalue sasa," viii. 3. 5; "marmora Messalae." x. 2. 9). Somewhat nearer Rome, on the same side of the road, are extensive ruins of a different description, which are ascertained to be those of a villa of the Quintilii, two brothers celebrated for their wealth, who were put to death by Commodus (Dion Cass. Ixxii. 5), after which the villa in question probably became an imperial residence.

Sume remains of a small temple, just 8 miles from Kome, have been supposed to be those of a temple of Hercules, consecrated or restored by Domitian at that distance from the city (Martial, iii. 47. 4, ix. 65. 4, 102. 12); but though the site of the temple in question is clearly indicated, it appears that the existing remains belong to an edifice of earlier date. Exactly 9 miles from Rome are the ruins of a villa of imperial date, within which is a large circular monument of brick, supprised with good reason to be the tomb of Gallienus, in which the emperor Flavius Severus also was buried. (Vict. Eipit. 1x.) Close to this spot must have been the station Ad Nonum mentioned in the Jerusalem Itinerary (l. c.). The road is still bordered on brith sides by tombs; but none of these are of any special interest. At the Osteria delle Fratocchie (between 11 and 12 miles from Ronse) the ancient Via is joined by the modern road to Albano: it here commences the ascent of the Alban Hills, which continues (though at first very gradually) for above 3 miles. A little farther on are the remains of Bovillae; the principal ruirs of which lie a short distance to the right of the road. [Bovillase.] The Tabula marks that place as a station on the Via Appia, but erroneously places it 10 miles from Rome, while the real distance is 12 miles. Thence the road (still retaining its straight line) ascended the hill to *Albano, nearly on the site of the Adbancm of Domitian, which, as we learn from Martial, was just 14 miles from Rome. (Martial, ix. 65. 4, 102. 12.) The remains of the imperial villa border the ruad on the left for some distance before reaching the modern town. Two miles farther was Aricia, which is correctly placed by both the Itineraties 16 miles from Rome. The station was probably below the town, outside of the walls, as the Via Appia here deviates from the straight line which it has pursued so long, and descends into the hollow below the city by a steep slope known as the Clivus Aricinus. A little farther on it is carried over the lowest part of the valley by a causeway or substruction of massive masonry, one of the most remarkable works of the kind now extant. [Aricia.]

The remainder of the road will not require to be described in such detail. From Aricia it was continued, with a slight deviation from the direct line, avoiding the hills of Genzano and those which bound the Lake of Nami, on the left, and leaving Lanuvium at some distance on the right, till it descended againintothe plain beyond the Alban Hills and reached the station of Tres Tabernae. An intermediate station, Sub Lanuvio, indicated only in the Tabula, must have been situated where a branch road struck off to the city of Lanuvium. The position of Tres Tabernae has been much disputed, but without any good reason. That of Forum Appii, the next stage, is clearly established [Fonum Arrin], and the 43rd milestone of the ancient road still exists on the spot; thus showing that the distances given in the Antonine Itinerary are perfectly correct. This being established, it is clear that Tres Tabernae is to be placed at a spot 10 miles nearer Rome, and about 3 miles beyond the modern Cisterna, where there are still ruins of ancient buildings, near a mediaeval tower called the Torre dinnibale. The ancient parement is still visible in many places between Aricia and Tres Tabernae, and no doubt can exist as to the course of the rond. This was indeed carried in a perfectly straight line from the point where it descended into the phan, through the P'ontine Marshes to within a few miles of Terracina. The position of thie station Ad Sponsas, mentioned in the Jerusalem Itinerary, cannot be determined, as the distances there given are incorrect. We should perhaps read sii. for vii. as the distance from Forum Appii, in which case it must be placed 2 miles nearer Rome than Tres Tabernae. Between the latter station and Forum Appii was ThironTicm, at which commenced the canal navigation called Decennovium from its being 19 miles in length. The site of this is clearly marked by a tower still called Torre di Tre Ponti, and the 19 miles measured thence along the canal would terminate at a point 3 miles from Terracina, where travellers quitted the canal for that city. An inscription records the paving of this part of the road by Trajan. The solitary posthouse of Mesa [^49]is evidently the station Ad Medias of the Jernsalem Itinerary. A short distance from Terracina the Via Appia at length deviated from the direction it had so long pursued, and turning to the left ascended the steep hill on which the ancient city stood [Tarracina], while the modern road is carried round the foot of this hill, close to the sea. The distance of Tarracina from Rome is correctly given at 61 miles in the Antonine Itinerary.

From Terracina the line of the ancient road may still be traced distinctly all the way to Fondi, and is flanked by ruins of villas, dilapidated tombs, &cc., through a great part of its course. It first ascended the hill above the city as far as the convent of San Francesco, and afterwards descended into the valley beneath, joining the modern highroad from Rome to Naples about 3 miles from Terraciva, just before crossing the frontier of the Papal States. The narrow pass at the foot of the mountains, which the road here follows, between the rocks and the marshy lake of Fomdi, is the celebrated defile of Lautclafe, or Ad Lautulas, which more than once bears a conspicuous part in Roman history. [Lautular.] The distance from Tarracina to Fundi is overstated in the Antonine Itinerary: the true distance dnes not exceed 13 miles, as correctly given in the Jerusalem Itinerary. From Fundi to Formiae (Mola di Gaëtu), a distance of 13 miles, the road passed through a rugged and mountainous country, crossing a complete mountain pass: the substructions of the ancient way are in many places rtill visible, as well as portions of the pavement, and numerous ruins of buildings, for the most part of little interest. The bridges also are in several instances the ancient ones, or at least rest upon ancient substructions. The ruins of Formiae and of the numerous villas with which it was adorned line the shores at Mola di Gaïta, and bound the road for a space of more than 2 miles: other ruins, principally sepulchral, are scattered along its line almost all the way thence to Minturnae. The ruins of this latter city stand on the right bank of the Liris (Garigliano), a short distance from its month, and abont a mile and a half below the village of Traghetto. The line of the ancient road from Mola thither is clearly traced and susceptible of no doubt: the distance is correctly given as 9 miles. Here the Via Appia crossed the Liris, and was continued nearly in a straight line through a level and marshy district along the sea-const to Sinuesss, the ruins of which are found near the village of Mondragone. The distance of 9 miles between the two (given in both ltineraries) is somewhat less than the truth. It was at Sinuessa that the Appian Way finally quitted the coast of the Tyrrhenian sea (Strab. v. p. 233), and struck inland towards Capun. passing by the stations of Pons Campanus and Ad Octavuin But this part of its course has not been very distinctly traced, and there is some difficulty as to the distances given. The three subdivisions of the Jerusalem Itinerary would give 26 miles for the total distance from Sinuessa to Capua; and the coincidence of this sum with the statement of the Antonine Itinerary, as given by Wesseling, is a strong argument in favour of the reading xxvi. M. P. instead of $x$ vi. adopted by Pinder. The latter number is certainly too small, for the direct distance between the two points is not less than 21 miles, and the road must have deviated from the straight line on account of the occurrence of the marshes of the Savo, as well as of the river Vulturnus. It is probable, therefore, that it made a considerable bend, and that the distance was thus prolonged: but the question cannot be settled until this part of the road has been more accuravely traced than has hitherto been done. The distances given in the Tabula are too inaccurate to be of any use; but it appears probable from that document that the Pons Campanus was a bridge over the little river Savo, and not, as might have been suspected, over the Vulturnus, which the Appian Way did not cross till it arrived at Casilinum, 3 miles from Capua. It was here that it united with the Via Lating (Strab. v. p. 237; Tab. Peut.)

The total distance from Rome to Capua (if we adopt 26 miles as that from Sinuessa) was therefore 131 miles. This portion of the Via Appia as far as Minturnae has been traced with much care by West phal (Römische Kampagne, pp. 22-70), as well as by Chaupy (Maison dHorace, rol. iii. pp-365-461) and Sir R. Hoare (Chassical Tours, vol. i. pp. 81-148); but all these accounts are deficient in regard to the portion between Minturnae and Capua.

Several minor branches or cross lines parted from the Via Appia during this first portion of its course. Of these it may suffice to mention: 1. The ViA Arneatina, which quitted the Via Appia at a short distance begond the Almo, just after passing the Osteria dell' Acquataccio: it proceeded in a nearly straight line to Ardea, 23 miles from Rome. [Ardea.] 2. The Via Antiatina, which branched off from the Appian Way just before reaching Bovillae, and proceeded direct to Antium, 38 miles from Rome. It probably followed nearly the same line as the modern road, but its precise course has not been traced. 3. The Via Setina quitted the Appian Way, shortly after passing Trepontiom, and procceded in a direct line to Setia (Sezze) : considerable portions of the ancient pavement still remain. 4. A branch road, the name of which is unknown, diverged from the Via Appia at Minturnae, and proceeded to Teanum ( 18 miles distant) on the Via Latina, whence it was continued through Allifae and Telesia to Beneventum. [Via Latina.] 5. The Via Domitiana, constructed by the emperor of that name, of which Statius has left us a pompous description. (Silv. iv. 3.) It was a continuation of the coast-road from Sinuessa, being carried across the Vulturnus close to its mouth by a bridge which must really have been a work of great difficulty ; thence it followed clusely the line of coast as far as Cumae, whence it struck across to Puteoli. The road communicating between that city and Neapolis was previously in existence. The distances on this road, as given in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 12:), are:-
thence to Cumae - ri.
Puteoli - iii.
Neapolis -
There was also a direct road from Capua to Neapolis (Tab. Peut.), passing through Atella, which was midway between the two cities.
2. From Capua to Beneventum.

This portion of the road may be very briefly dispored of. From Capua it was continued along in the plain as far as Calatia, the site of which is fixcd at Le Galazze, near Maddaloni ; it then entered the Apennines, and, passing through the valley of Arienso, commonly supposed to be the celebrated valley of the Caudine Forks, reached Caudium, which must hare been situated about 4 miles beyond Arpaja, on the road to Beneventum. The distances given along this line are :-

From Capua to Calatia - - vi. m. P.
Ad Novas - - - in.
Caudium - Caudium - - - ix.
Beneventum - (Itin. Ant. p. 111; Jtin. Hier. p. 610; Tab. Peut.) It was at Beneventum, as above shown, that the two main branches of the Appian Way separated : the one proceeding by Venusia and Tarentum to Brundusium; the other by Equus Tuticus and Canusium to Barium, and thence along the coast of the Adriatic. We proceed to give these two branches separately.
3. From Beneventum to Brundusium, throngh Venusia and Tarentum.

The line of this road is given in the Antonine Itinerary ( $p .120$ ) as well as in the Tabula; but in this last it appears in so broken and confused a form that it would be unintelligible without the aid of the other authority. But that this line was the original Via Appia is proved not only by the distinct testimony of Strabo, and by incidental notices which show that it was the frequented and customary route in the time of Cicero (Cic. ad Att. v. 5, 7), but still more clearly by an inscription of the time of Hadrian, in which the road from Beneventum to Aeculanum is distinctly called the Via Appia. The greater part of the line from Beneventum to Venusia, and thence to Tarentum, was carried thruugh a wild and mountainous country; and it is highly probable that it was in great measure abanduned after the more convenient line of the Via Trajana was opened. It appears that Hadrian restored the portion from Beneventam to Aeculanum, but it is doubtful whether he did so farther on. Nevertheless the general course of the road can be traced, though many of the stations cannot le fixed with certainty. The latter are thus given in the Antonine Itinerary :-

From Beneventum to

Aeculanum, or Eclanum as the name is written in the Itineraries, is fixed beyond a doubt at Le Grotte, near Mirabella, just 15 miles from Beneventum, where a town grew up on its ruins in the middle ages with the name of Quintudecimum. [ArculaNum.] The site of Romulea is much less certain, but may perhaps be placed at Bisaccia, and the station Sub Romulea in the valley below it. The Pons Aufidi is the Ponte Sta Venere, on the road from Lacedugna to Venosa, which is unquestionably an ancient bridge, and the distance from Venusia agrees with that in the Itinerary, which is confirmed also in this instance by the Tabula. The latter authority gives as an intermediate station between Sub Romulea and the Pons Aufidi, Aquilonia, which is probably Lacedogna; but the distances given are certainly incorrect. In this wild and mountainous country it is obviously impossible at present to determine these with any accuracy. From Venusia again the Via Appia appears to have passed, in as direct a line as the nature of the country will allow, to Tarentum; the first station, Silvium, may probably be placed at Garagnone, and the second, Plera, or Blera, at or near Gravina; but both determinations are very uncertain. Those of Sub Lupatia and Canales are still more rague, and, until the course of the ancient road shall have been traced upon the spot by some traveller, it is idle to multiply conjectures.

From Tarentum to Brundusium the Antonine Itinerary gives 44 M. P., which is nearly correct ; but the intermediate stations mentioned in the Tabula, Mesochoron, Urbius, and Scamnum, cannot be identitied. Urbius may perhaps be a corruption of Urium or Hyrium, the modern Oria, which is nearly midway between the two cities.

Besides the main line of the Via Appia, as above described, the Itineraries mention several branches, one of which appears to have struck off from Ve . nusia to Potentia, and thence to have joined the highroad to Rhegium, while another descended from Venusia to Heraclea on the gulf of Tarentum, and thence followed the E. coast of the Bruttian peninsula. These lines are briefly noticed in the articles Lucania and Bhutrif, but they are very confused and uncertain.
4. From Beneventum by Canusium and Barium to Brundusium.

It was this line of road, first constructed by Trajan, and which was originally distinguished as the Vin Trajana, that became after the time of that emperor the frequented and ordinary route to Brundusium, and thus came to be commonly considered as the Via Appia, of which it had in fact taken the place. Its line is in consequence given in all the Itineraries, and can be traced with little difficulty. It passed at first through a rugged and mountainous country, as far as Aecae in Apulia, from which place it was carried through the plains of Apulia to Barium, and afterwaris along the sea-coast to Brundusium: a line offering no natural difficulties, and which had the advantage of passing through a number of considerable towns. Even before the construction of the Via Trajana it was not uncommon (as we learn from the journey of Horace) for travellers to deviate from the Appian Way, and gain the plains of Apulia as speedily as possible.

The first part of this road from Beneventum to Aecae may be traced by the assistance of ancient milestones, bridges, &c. (Mommsen, Topogr. degli Irpini, in the Bullet. dell Inst. Arch. for 1848, pp. 6, 7.) It proceeded by the villages of Paduli, Buonalbergo, and Casalbore, to a place called $S$. Eleuterio, about 2 miles S. of Castelfranco, which was undoubtedly the site of Equus Tuticus, a much disputed point with Italian topographers. [Eques Turices.] This is correctly placed by the Antonine Itinerary 21 miles from Beneventum; the Jerusalem Itinerary, which makes it 22 miles, divides the distance at a station called Forum Novum, which must have been situated at or very near Buonalbergo. From Equus Tuticus, the road followed a NE. direction to Aecae (the site of which is clearly known as that of the modern Troja), and thence turned in a direction nearly due E. to Herdonia (Ordona). The object of this great bend was probably to open a communication with Luceria and the other towns of Northern Apulia, as well as perhaps to avoid the defile of the Cervaro, above Bovino, through which the modern road passes. At Aecae the Via Trajana descended into the great plain of Apulia, across which it was carried in a nearly straight line to Barium (Bari). The remainder of its course presents no difficulties, and the stations are, for the most part, well-known towns. The whole line is thus giren in the Antonine Itinerary (pp. 112, 116):-

| Equas Tuticus (S. Eleuterio) | P. |
| :---: | :---: |
| Aecae (Troja) - | - xviii.* |
| Herdonia (Urdona)- | - xviii. |
| Canusium (Canusa) - | - xxvi. |
| Rubi (Ruro) - - | xxii |
| Butuntum (Bitonto) | - xi. |
| Barium ( Bari) | - xi. |
| Turres (?) | xx |
| Egnatia (Torre di Gnazia)- | xvi. |
| Speluncae (?) - . - | xx |
| Brundusium (Erindisi) - | - sviii. |

The two stations of Turres between Barium and Egnatia, and Speluncae between Egnatia and Brundusium, cannot be identified; it is evident from the names themselves that they were not towns, but merely small places on the coast so called. The Jerusalem Itinerary has two stations, Turres Aurelianae, and Turres Juliae, between Egnatia and Barium, but, from the distances given, neither of these can be identified with the Turres of the Antonine Itinerary. The other intermediate stations mentioned by the same authority are unimportant Mutationes, which can be identified only by a careful survey on the spot.

The Tabula gives (though in a very confused manner) an internediate line of route, which appears to have been the same as that indicated by Strabo (v. p. 283), which quitted the coast at Egnatia, and proceeded through Caelia to Brundusium. The stations given are:-

It is cercain that the Via Trajana was continued, probably by Trajan himself, from Brundusium to Hydruntum (Otranto), and was thence carried all round the Calabrian peninsula to Tarentum. The road from Brundusium to Hydruntum passed through Lupiae (Lecce), in the interior of the peninsula, which is correctly placed 25 miles from each of the above cities. (Itin. Ant. p. 118.) The stations on the other line, which is giren only in the Tabula, are as follow:-
M. $P$.

Hydruntum to Castrum Minervae (Castro) viii.

| :---: |
|  |  |
|  |  |
|  |  |
|  |  |
|  |  |
|  |  |

The above distances appear to be correct.
Lastly, a branch struck off from the Via Trajana at Barium which proceeded direct to Tarentum. It is probable that this came to be adopted as the most convenient mode of reaching the latter city when

* This distance must be above the truth: the direct distance is not more than 8 miles.
the original Via Appia had fallen into disuse. The distance is correctly given as 60 miles. (Itim Ant. p. 119.)

Besides the above, which may be considered as all in some degree branches of the Via Trajana, there was another line, probably constructed at a late period, which struck across from Equas Tuticus to Venusia, so as to form a cross communication between the Via Trajana and the old Via Appia. This is set down in the Antonine ltinerary (p. 103) as part of a long line proceeding from the N. of Italy to the S.; but the intermediate stations between Equus Tuticus and Venusia cannot be determined.
5. From Capua by Nuceria to Rhegium.

This line of road is indicated by Strabo in the passage above cited ( $\mathrm{v} . \mathrm{p} .283$ ) as existing in his time, but he certainly did not include it under the name of the Via Appia. It seems, however, whave subsequently come to be regarded as such, as the Antonine Itinerary puts it under the heading, "Ab Urbe Appia via recto itinere ad Columnam" (Itin. Ant. p. 106.)*, and inasmuch as it was a continuation of the original Appian Way, it was, strictly speaking, as much entitled to bear the name as the Via Trijana. Strabo does not tell us whether it was passable in his day for carriages or not, and we have no account in any ancient author of its construction. But we learn the period at which it was first opened from a remarkable inscription discovered at La Polla, in the valley of Liano, which commemorates the construction of the road from Khegium to Capua, and adds the distances of the principal towns along its course: unfortunately the first line, containing the name of the magistrate by whom it was opened, is wanting: and the name of M. Aquilius Gallus, inserted by Gruter and others, is a mere conjecture. There is little doubt that the true restoration is the name of P. Popilius Laenas, who was praetor in b.c. 134, and who, after clearing the mountains of Lucania and Bruttium of the fugitive slaves who had taken refuge in them, appears to have first constructed this highroad through that rugged and mountainous country. (Dommsen, Inscr. R. N. 6276; Ritschl. Mon. Epigr. pp. 11, 12.) There is, therefure, no foundation whatever for the name of Via Aquilin, which has been given by some modern writers (hamanelli, Cramer, \&c.) to this line of road: it was probably at first called Via Popilan, after its author, who, as was usual in similar cases, founded at the same time a town which bore the name of Foru:n Popilii, and occupied the site of La Pulla [Fort'm Popilit]; but no mention of this name is foond in any ancient author, and it seems to have been unknowu to Strabo. The distances given in the inscription above mentioned (which are of the greatest value, from their undoubted authenticity), are:-
M. $\mathbf{P}$.

From Capua to Nuceria - - $1 \times x i i i$.

| [Forum Popilii] - - li.Muranum |  |

| Consentia | xlix |

The point designated as "Ad Fretum ad Statuan" is evidently the same as the Columna of the Itineraries, which marked the spot from which it was

nsual to cross the Sicilian straits. The total distance from Capua to Rhegium, according to the above description, is 321 miles. The Antonine Itinerary makes it 337 miles. It is difficult to judge how far this discrepancy is owing to errors in the distances as given in our MSS., or to alterations in the line of road; for though it is evident that the road given in the ltinerary followed generally the same line as that originally constructed by Popilius, it is probable that many alterations had taken place in particular parts; and in the wild and mountainous tracts through which the greater part of it was carried, such alterations must frequently have been rendered necessary. The determination of the particular distances is, for the same reason, almost impossible, without being able to trace the precise course of the ancient road, which has not yet been accomplished. The stations and distances, as given in the Antonine Itinerary, are as follow:-

M. P.

From Capua to Nola - - - exi. (xix.)* Nuceria (Nocera) - xvi.* (xiv.)
Ad Tanaruin - - xxv.
Ad Calorem - - - xxiv. In Marcelliana - - xxv.
Caesariana - - $x$ xi.
Nerulum (LaRotonda) sxiii. Sub Murano (near Murano) - - - xiv.
Caprasiae (Tarsia) - xxi.

Ad Turres - - $\mathbf{x}$ viii.
Vibona (Monte Leone) xxi.
Nicotera (Nicotera) - xviii.
Ad Mallias - - . xxiv.
Ad Columnam - - xiv.
The stations between Nuceria and Nerulum cannot be determined. Indeed the only points that can be looked upon as certain, in the whole line from Nuceria to Rhegium, are Sub Murano, at the font of the hill on which stands the town of Murano, Consentia (Cosenza), Vibo Valentia (Monte Leone), and Nicotera, which retains its ancient name. Nernlum and Caprasiae may be fixed with tolerable certainty by reference to these known stations, and the distances in this part of the route appear to be correct. The others must remain uncertain, until the course of the road has been accurately traced.

At Nerulum the alove line of road was joined by one which struck across from Venusia through Potentia (Potenza) to that place. It was a continuation of the cross-road already noticed from Equus Tuticus to Venusia; this line, which is given in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 104), was called, as we learn from the inscriptions on milestones still extant, the Via Herculia, and was therefore in all probability the work of the Emperor Maximianus. (Mommsen, I. R.N. p. 348.) The stations mentioned in the Itinerary (l.c.) are: -

* Both these distances are overstated, and should probably be corrected as suggested by the numbers in parentheses. The same distances are given in the Tab. Peut. thus:-

| Capus to Suessula  Nola  Ad Teglanum  Nuceria |
| :---: |
|  |  |
|  |  |

From Venusia to Potentia (Potenza) xxiv. Acidii (?) - - xxiv. Grumentum (Sapo$\stackrel{\text { nara })}{\text { Semuncla (?) - - }}$ ( xxviii. Nerulum - - - xvi.
None of the above stations can be identified, except Potentia and Grumentum, and the distances are in some cases certainly erroneous. The same line of route is given in the Tabula, but in a very confused and corrupt manner. The stations there set down are wholly different from thase in the Itinerary, but equally uncertain. Anxia (Anzi), between Potentia and Grumentum is the only one that can be identified.

The principal work on the Via Appia is that of Pratilli (Della Via Appia, fol. Napoli, 1745); but, unfortunately, little dependence can be placed upon it. Parts of the route have been carefully and accurately examined by Westphal, Chaupy, and other writers already cited, but many portions still remain to be explored; and accurate measurements are generally wanting. Nor does there exist any map of the kingdom of Naples on which dependence can be placed in this respect.

Via aquilia. [Via Aprla, No. 5.]
Via alideatina. [Ardea.]
VIA AURELIA, one of the principal highways of Italy, which led from Rome to I'isae in Etruria, and thence along the const of Liguria to the Maritime Alps. It was throughout almost its whole extent a maritime road, proceeding, in the first instance, from Rome to Alsium on the Tyrrhenian sea, whence it followed the coast-line of Etruria, with only a few trifling deviations, the whole way to Pisae. The period of its construction is quite uncertain. Its name sufficiently indicates that it was the work of some magistrate of the name of Aurelins; but which of the many illustrious men who bore this name in the latter ages of the Republic was the anthor of it, we are entirely uninformed. We know with certainty that it was in use as a well-known and frequented highway in the time of Cicero, who mentions it as one of the three roads by which he might proceed to Cisalpine Gaul ("ab infero mari Aurelin," Phil. xii. 9). It may also be probably inferred that it was in existence as far as Pisae, when the road was carried from that city to Vada Sibata and Dertona, the construction of which is ascribed by Strabo to Aemilius Scaurus, in b.c. 109 (Strab. v. p. 217). [Via Aemilia Scacri.] This continuation of the Aurelian Way seems to have been commonly included under the same general name as the original road; though, according to Strabo, it was properly called the Aemilian Way, like its more celebrated namesake in Cisalpine Gaul. It was apparently not till the reign of Augustus that the line of road was carried along the foot of the Maritime Alps, from Vada Sibata to Cemenelium, and thence into Gaul. It is certain, at least, that the ancient road, of which the traces are still visible, was the work of that emperor; and we know also that the Ligurian tribes who inhabited the Maritime Alps were not completely reduced to subjection till that period. [Liguria.] The Itineraries, however, give the name of Via Aurelia to the whole line of road from Rome to Arelate in Gaul ; and though little value can be attached to their authority on this point, it is not improbable that the name was frequently used in this more extended sense ; just as that of the Vin Appia was applied to the whole line from Rome to Brundusium, though originally carried only as far as Capua.

The stations from Rome, as far as Luna in Etruria, are thus given in the Antonine Itinerary ( $\mathrm{p} .290, \mathcal{\& c}$.) : Lorium (near Castel Guido) - xii. m. P. Ad Turres (Monteroni)) - - $\quad$. Pyrgi (Sta Severa) - - $\mathbf{x i i}$. Castruin Novum (T.di Chiaruccia) viii.

The stations thence along the coast of Liguria as far as the river Varus have been mentioned in the article Liguria; and the distances along this part of the line, in both the Antonine Itinerary and the Tabula, are so confused and corrupt that it is useless to attempt their correction. Even of that part of the Via Aurelia above given, along the coast of Etruria, several of the stations are very uncertain. and some of the distances are probably corrupt. From Rome to Centum Cellae, indeed, the road has been carefully examined and the distances verified (Westphal, Köm. Kamp. pp. 162-169); but this has not been done farther on: and as the road traversed the Maremma. which was certainly in the latter ages of the Roman Empire, as at the present day, a thinlypeopled and unhealthy district, several of the stations were probably even then obscure and unimportant places. The Tabula, as usual, gives a greater number of such stations, several of which may be identified as the points where the road crossed rivers and streams whose names are known. But the route is given very confusedly, and the distances are often incorrect, while in some cases they are omitted altogether.

The distances between Populonium and Pisae, as well as those between Centum Cellae and Cosa, are in many cases unintelligible; and it is often impossible to say to which of the stages they are meant to refer.

The Via Aurelia (in the more extended sense of the term, as used in the Itineraries) communicated with Cisalpine Gaul and the Via Aemilia by two different routes; the one, which according to Strabo was constructed by Aemilius Scaurus at the same time that he continued the Via Aurelia to Vada Sabata, led from that place across the Apennines to Aquae Statiellae, and thence to Dertona, to which place the Via Aemilia had probably already been prolonged. (Strab. v. p. 217.) The other, which was known as the Via Postumia, and was therefore probably constructed at a different period, led from Dertona across the mountains direct to Genua. Both these lines are given in the Antonine Itinerary and in the Tabula; though in the former they are confused and mixed up with the direct line of the coast-road. [LiguRIA.]

VIa Canda'Via. [Via Egnatia.]

VIA CASSIA, was the name given to one of the principal highroads of Italy which led from Rome through the heart of Etruria to Arretium, and thence by Florentia to Luca. The period of its constraction, as well as the origin of its name, is unknown. We learn only from a passage of Cicero that it was a well-known and frequented highway in his time, as that orator mentions it as one of the three roads by which he could proceed to Cisalpine Gaul. (Cic. Phil. xii. 9.) In the same passage, after speaking of the Flaminian Way as passing along the Upper Sea, and the Aurelian along the Lower, he adds : "Etruriam discriminat Cassia." Hence it is clear that it was the principal road through the centre of that province, and is evidently the same given in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 285), though it is there erroneously called the Via Clodia. But indeed the oc currenee of the Forum Cassii upon this line is in itself a sufficient proof that it was the Cassian and not the Clodian Way. The stations there set down, with their distances, are as follow:- M.P.
From Kome to Baccanae ( Baccano) - - xxi.
Sutrium (Sutri) - - - xij.
Forum Cassii (near Vetralla) - - - -
Volsinii (Bolsena) - - Exviii.
Clusium (Chiusi) - - - $\quad$ xx.
Ad Statuas - - - xii.
Arretium (Arezzo) - - xxv.
Ad Fines - - - - xxv.
Florentia (Firenze) - - xxv.
Pistoria (Pistija) - - xxv.
Luca (Lucca) - . . - XXV.

The Via Cassia branched off from the Via Flaminia just after crossing the Tiber by the Milvian Bridge, 3 miles from Rome. It then ascended the table-land, and proceeded over a dreary and monotonous plain to Baccanae (Baccano), situated in the basin or crater of an extinct volcano. Two intermediate small stations are given in the Tabula: Ad Sextum, which, as its name imports, was situated 6 miles from Rome, and therefore 3 from the Pons Milvius ; and Veii, 6 miles farther : bat it is probable that the ancient Via Cassia, like the modern highroad, passed by, but not through, the ancient city ; so that the station indicated was probably that where the road turned off to Veii, near the Isola Farnese. The Via Clodia separated from the Cassia about 3 miles beyond the station Ad Sextum, and struck off through Careiae (Galera) and Sabate (Bracciano) to Forum Clodii. The Tabula again gives an intermediate station, between Sutrium and Forum Cassii, called Vicus Matrini, the ruins of which are still visible 7 miles beyond Sutri; and that of the Aquae Passeris, now called the Bagni di Serpa, 12 miles beyond Furum Cassii. The stations given in that document can thus be identified as far as Clusium. They are : -

| Ad Sextum | vi. M. P. |
| :---: | :---: |
| Veii (near Isola Farnese) | vi. |
| Baccanae (Baccano) | ix. |
| Sutrium (Sutri) | xii. |
| Vicus Matrini | - (omitted, but should be vii.) |

Forum Cassii (Vetralla) should be vii.) iv.

Aquae Passeris (Bagni di Serpa) xi.
Volsinii (Bolsena) - - ix.
Ad Palliam Fluvium (R. Paglia) Clusium (Chiusi) - - ix.
But from Clusium to Florentia the names of the stations are wholly unknown, and cannot be identified, with the exception of Arretium ; and the entire route is given in so confused a manner that it is impossible to make anything of it.

Livy tells us that C. Flaminius, the colleague of M. Aemilius Lepidus in b.c. 187, after having effectually reduced the Ligurian tribes that had infested the territory of Bononia, constructed a road from Bononia to Arretium (Liv. xxxix. 2). But it is remarkable that we never hear anything more of this line of road, which would seem to have fallen into disuse; though this pass across the Apennines, which is still traversed by the modern highroad from Florence to Bologna, is one of the easiest of all. Cicero indeed might be thought to allude to this route when he speaks of proceeding into Cisalpine Gaul by the Via Cassia (l.c.); but the absence of any allusion to its existence during the military operations at that period, or on any other occasion, seems to prove conclusively that it had not continued in use as a military highway.
(For a careful examination and description of the portion of the Via Cassia near Rome, see Westphal, Röm. Kamp. pp. 147-153; Nibby, Vie degli Antichi, pp. 75-82.)
[E. H. B.]
VIA CIMINIA, a name known only from an inscription of the time of Hadrian (Orell. Inscr. 3306), was probably a short cut constructed across the range of the Ciminian hills, leaving the Via Cassia to the left, and following nearly the same line as the modern road over the same hills. (Holsten. Not. ad Cluv. p. 67.) [Ciminus Mons.] [E. H. B.]

VIA CLODIA, was the name of a highroad that branched off from the Via Cassia, to the left, about vol. II.

10 miles from Rome, near the inn of La Storta, where remains of the ancient pavement, indicating its direction, may still be seen. The name of the Via Clodia is known to us only from the Itineraries, and from inscriptions of imperial date (Orell. Inscr. 822, 3143); but from the form of the name there can be no doubt that it dates from the republican period, though we have no account when or by whom this line of road was constructed. The Itineraries indeed seem to have regarded the Via Clodia as the main line, of which the Via Cassia was only a branch, or rather altogether confounded the two; but it is evident from the passage of Cicero above quoted, that the Via Cassia was, properly speaking, the main line, and the Clodia merely a branch of it. At the same time, the occurrence of a Forum Clodii on the one branch, as well as a Forum Cassii on the other, leave no doubt which were the true lines designated by these names. The course of the Via Clodia as far as Sabate (Bracciano) admits of no doubt, though the distances given in the Tabula are corrupt and uncertain ; but the position of Forum Clodii is uncertain, and the continuation of the line is very obscure. It appears indeed to have held a course nearly parallel with that of the Via Cassia, through Blera, Tuscania, and Saturnia; but from the latter place the Tabula represents it as proceeding to Succosa (Sub Cosa), which would be an abrupt turn at right angles, and could never have been the direction of the principal line of road. It is probable that this was either carried up the valley of the Ombrone to Siena (Sena Julia), or proceeded across the marshy plains of that river to join the Via Aurelia. But this is mere conjecture. The stations, as given in the Tabula (the only one of the Itineraries in which the true Via Clodia is found), are as follow :-

A Roma Foro Clodii, m. p. xxxii.
If this distance be correct, Forum Clodii must be placed either at or a little beyond Oriuolo, which is 6 miles beyond Sabate (Bracciano). The distance of Oriuolo from Rome by the line of the Via Clodia (as measured on Gell's map), somewhat exceeds 31 miles. But the distance from Blera must, in that case, be greatly overstated ; the actual distance from Oriuolo to Bieda being scarcely more than 10 miles. (Westphal, Röm. Kampagne, pp. 154-158; Dennis's Etruria, vol. i. p. 273: but the distances there cited, in the note from the Tabula, are incorrect.)
[E. H. B.]
Via domitiana. [Via Appia, No. 1.]
VIA EGNA'TIA ( $\grave{\eta}$ 'Eyvatia dóśs, Strab. vii. p. 322, seq.), a Roman military road, which connected Illyria, Macedonia, and Thrace. We are almost totally in the dark with regard to the origin of this road. The assumption that it was constructed by a certain person named Egnatius, who was likewise the founder of the town Egnatia, or Gnatia, between Barium and Brundusium, on the coast of Apulia, is a mere conjecture, which cannot be supported by any authority. We may, however, make some appruximation towards ascertaining the date of its construction, or, at all events, that of a portion of it. Strabo, in the passage cited at the head of this article, says that Polybius estimated the length of the ria, between the coast of the Adriatic and the city of Thessalonica, at 267 Roman miles; whence it appears that this portion of it at least was extant in the time of Polybins. Consequently, as that historian flourished in the first half of the 2nd century $\boldsymbol{e} . \mathrm{C}$., we may infer with tolerable certainty that the road must have been commenced shortly after the rednction of Macedonia by the Romans in B. c. 168. Whether the eastern portion of the road, namely, that between Thessalonica and Cypsela, a town 10 miles beyond the left, or E., bank of the Hebrus, was also completed in the time of Polybius, is a point which cannot be so satisfactorily ascertained. For although Strabo, in the same passage, after mentioning the length of the road, from its commencement to its termination at Cypseia, proceeds to say that, if we follow Polybius, we must add 178 stadia to make up the number of Roman miles, because that writer computed 8 stalia and 2 plethra, or $8 \frac{1}{3}$ stadia, to the Roman mile, instead of the usual computation of exactly 8; yet Strabo may then be speaking ouly of the historian's general practice, without any reference to this particular road. And. on the whole, it may perhaps be the more probable conclusion that the eastern portion of the road was not constructed till some time after the Romans had been in possession of Macedonia.

According to the same geographer, who is the chief authority with regard to this via, its whole length was 535 Roman miles, or 4280 stadia; and although the first portion of it had two branches, namely, one from Epidamnus or Dyrrachium and another from Apollonia, yet, from whichever of those towns the traveller might start, the length of the road was the same. Into the accuracy of this statement we shall inquire further on. Strabo also mentions that the first part of the rond was called in Candavium ( $6 \pi /$ Kavóoovias), and this name frequently occurs in the Roman writers. Tbus Cicero (ad Att. iii. 7) speaks of travelling "per Candaviam," and Caesur (B.C. iii. 79) mentions it as the direct route into Macedonia. It does not, however, very clearly appear to how much of the road this name was applicable. Tafel, who has written a work on the Via Eguatia, is of opinion that the appellation of Candavia may be considered to extend from the commencement of the via, including the two branches from Dyrrachium and Apollonia, to the town of Lychnidus. (De Via mil. Rom. Egnatia, Proleg. p. xcix. Tabing. 1842.) Bat this limitation is entirely arbitrary, and unsupported by any authority; and it would perhaps be a juster inference from the words of Strabo to assume that the name "Candavia" was applicable to the road as far as Thessalonica, as Col. Leake appears to have done. (Northern Greece, vol. iii. p. 311.) The point to be determined is, what does Strabo mean by "the first part?" The road in its whole extent he says is called "Via Egnatia," and the first part "in Candaviam" ('H $\mu \dot{e} \nu$ oilv $\pi \hat{a} \sigma \alpha$ 'Eyvatia ка入єitau.
 from what follows it is evident that he contemplated the division of the parts at Thessalonica, siuce he gives the separate measurement as far as that town, which is just half the whole length of the road.

We will consider the ruad as far as Thessalonica, or the Via Candavia, first, and then proceed to the remainder of the Egnatian Way. Strabo (L.c. and p. 326) lays down the general direction of the road us follows: After passing Mount Candavia, it ran to the towns of Lychnidus and Pylon; which last, as its naine implies, was the border town between Illyria and Macedonia. Hence it proceeded by Barnus to Heracleia, and on through the territory of the Lyncestae and Eordaci through Edessa and Pella to Thessalonica. The whole extent of this line, as we have already seen, was 267 Roman miles; and this computation will be found to agree pretty accurately with the distance between Dyrrachium and Thessalonica as laid down in the Antonine Itinerary. According to that work, as edited by Parthey and Pinder (Berlin, 1848), who have paid great attention to the numbers, the stations and distances between those two places, starting from Dyrrachium, were as follow (p. 151):-

The difference of 2 miles probably arises from some variation in the MSS. of the Itinerary. It should be ohserved, however, that, according to Wesseling's edition (p. 318, seq.), the distance is 11 miles more, or 280 miles, owing to variations in the text. According to the Tab. Peut. the whole distance was 279 miles, or 10 more than that given in the Itinerary; but there are great discrepancies in the distances between the places.

The last-named work gires 307 miles as the sum of the distances between Apollonia and Thessalunica; or 38 miles more than the route between Dyrrachium and the latter town. Buth these routes united, according to the Itinerary, at Clodiana; and the distance from Apollonia to Clodiann was 49 miles, while that from Dytrachium to the sanie place was only 33. This accounts for 16 miles of the difference. and the remainder, therefore, mast be sought in that part of the road which lay between Clodiana and Thessalonica. Here the stations are the same as those given in the route from Dyrrachium, with the exception of the portion between Lychnidus and Heracleia; where, instead of the single station of Niciss, we have two, viz., Scirtiana, 27 miles from Lychnidus, and Castra, 15 miles from Scirtiana And as the distance between Castra and Heracleia is stated at 12 miles, it follows that it was 11 miles fartber from Lychnidus to Heracleia by this route than by that through Nicias. This, added to the 16 miles extra length to Clodiana, accounts for 27 miles of the difference; but there still remain 11 miles to make up the discrepancy of 38 ; and, as the stations are the same, this difference arises in all probability from variations in the MSS.

According to the Itin. Hierosol. (p. 285, seq., Berlin ed.), which names all the places where the horses were changed, as well as the chief towns, the tntal distance between Apollonia and Thessalonica was 300 miles; which differs very slightly from that of the Itinerary, though there are several variations in the route.

Now, if we apply what has been said to the remark of Strabo, that the distance from Thessalonica was the same whether the traveller started from Epidamnus (Dyrrachium) or from Apollonia, it is difficult to perceive how such could have been the case if the junction of the two branches existed in his time aiso at Clodiana; since, as we have already seen, it was 16 miles farther to that place from Apollonia than from Dyrrachium according to the Itin. Ant.; and the Itin. Hierosol. makes it 24 miles farther. Indeed the maps would seem to show that if the two branches were of equal length, their junction must have taken place to the E. of Lake Lychnitis; the branch from Dyrrachium passing to the N. of that lake, and that from Apollonia to the S. But, although Burmeister, in his review of Tafel's work (in Zimmerman's Zeitschrift für die Alterthumswissenschaft, 1840, p. 1148). adopted such an hypothesis, and placed the junction at Heracleia, it does not appear that the assumption can be supported by any authority.

Clodians, where the two branches of the Via Egnatia, or Candavia, united, was seated on the river Genusus (the Tjerma or Skumbi). From this point the valley of the river naturally indicated the course of the road to the E. (Leake, Northern Greece, vol. iii. p. 312.)
We will now proceed to consider the second, or eastern, portion of the Egnatian Way, viz., that between Thessalonica and Cypsela.

The whole length of this route, according to Strabo, was 268 Roman miles; and the distances set down in the Itin. Ant. amount very nearly to that sum, or to 265, as follows. (Pind. and Yarth. p . 157 ; Wess. p. 330, seq.)

| Apollonia - | 36 | miles. |
| :---: | :---: | :---: |
| Amphipolis | - 32 |  |
| Philippi - | - 32 | " |
| Acontisma | - 21 |  |
| Otopisus (Topirus) | - 18 | " |
| Stabulum Diomedis | - 22 |  |
| Maximianopolis - | - 18 | " |
| Brizice or Brendice | - 20 |  |
| Trajanopolis | - 37 | " |
| Cypsela - | - 29 | n |

Another route given in the same Itinerary (Wess. p. 320, seq.) does not greatls vary from the above, but is not carried on to Cypsela. This adds the following stations:-Melissurgis, between Thessalomica and Apollonia, Neapolis, between Philippi and Acontisma, Cosintas, which according to Tafel (pars ii. p. 21) is meant for the river Cossinites, between Topirus and Maximianopolis, and Milolitum and Tempyra, between Brendice and Trajanopolis. The Itin. Hierosol. makes the distance only 250 miles.

Many remains of the Egnatian Way are said to be still traceable, especially in the neighbourhood of Thessalonica (Beaujour, Voy. militaire dans ['Empire Othoman, vol. i. p. 205.)
VIA FLAMINIA ( $\dot{\eta}$ Фладıvia $88 \delta \mathrm{~s}$ ), one of the most ancient and important of the highroads of Italy, which led from Rome direct to Ariminum, and may be considered as the Great North Road of the Romans, being the principal and most frequented line of communication with the whole of the north of Italy. It was also one of the first of the great highways of which we know with certainty the period of construction, having been made by C. Flaminius during his censorship (в. с. 220), with the express purpose of opening a free communication with the Gaulish territory, which he had himself reduced to subjection a few years before. (Liv. Epit. xx.) It is therefore certainly a mistake, when Strabo ascribes it to C. Flaminius (the son of the preceding), who was consul together with M. Aemilius Lepidus, the author of the Aemilian Way, in B. c. 187, and himself constructed a road from Bononia to Arretinm. (Liv. xxxix. 2 ; Strab. v. p. 217.) It is certain that the Flaminian Way was in existence long before, and its military importance was already felt and known in the Second Punic War, when the consul Sempronius proceeded by it to Ariminum, to watch the movements and oppose the advance of Hannibal. (Liv. xxii. 11.) Throughout the period of the Repablic, as well as under the Empire, it was one of the best known and most frequented of the highways of Italy. Cicero, in one of the Philippics, says there were three ways which led from Rome to Cisalpine Gaul: the Flaminian by the Upper Sea (the Adriatic), the Aurelian by the Lower, and the Cassian through the midst of Etruria (Phil. xii. 9). During the contest between the generals of Vespasian and Vitellius (A. D. 69) the military importance of the Flaminian Way was fully brought out, and it was felt that its possession would be almost decisive of the victory. (Tac. Hist. i. 86, iii. 52, \&c.) Tacitus alludes to the extent to which this great highway was at this period frequented, and the consequent bustle and crowding of the towns on its conrse (Ib. ii. 64). Most of these, indeed, seem to have grown up into flourishing and populous places, mainly in consequence of the traffic along the line of road.

So important a highway was naturally the object of much attention and great pains were taken not only to maintain, bat to restore and improve it. Thus, in B.c. 27, when Augustus assigned the care of the other highways to different persons of consular dignity, he reserved for himself that of the Via Flaminia, and completely restored it throughout its whole length from Rome to Ariminum, a service which was acknowledged by the erection of two triumphal arches in his honour, one at Rome, the other at Ariminum, the latter of which is still standing. [Arimmum.] Again, at a later period, Vespasian added materially to the convenience of the road by constructing a tunnel through the rock at a place called Intercisa, now kuown as Il Furlo, a work which still subsists in its integrity. [Intercisa.] This remarkable passage is particularly noticed by the poet Clandian, who has left us a general description of the Flaminian Way, by which the emperor Honorius proceeded, in A. D. 404, from Ravenna to Rome. (Claudian, de VI. Cons. Hon. 494-522.) Indeed, it is evident that in the latter ages of the Empire, when the emperors for the most part took up their residence at Mediolanum or Ravenna, the Flaminian Way, which constituted the direct line of communication between those cities and Rome, must have become of still greater importance than before.

One proof of the important influence exercised by this great line of highway, is afforded by the circumstance that, like the Aemilian Way, it gave name to one of the provinces of Italy in the later division of that country under the Empire; though, by a strange confusion or perverseness, the name of Flaminia was given, not to the part of Umbria which was actually traversed by the Via Flaminia, but to the eastern portion of Gallia Cispadana, which should naturally have been included in Aemilia. [Italia, p. 93.]

There is no doubt, from the description of Claudian above cited, compared with the narrative in Tacitus of the movements of the Vitellian and Vespasian armies in A. D. 69, that the main line of the Via Flaminia continued the same throughout the Roman Empire, but we find it given in the Itineraries with some deviations. The principal of these was between Narnia and Forum Flaminii, where the original road ran direct from Narnia to Mevania, while a branch or loop made a circuit by Interamna and Spoletium, which appears to have come to be as much frequented as the main line, so that in both the Antonine and Jerusalem Itineraries this branch is given, instead of the direct line. Another route given in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 311) follows the line of the old Flaminian Way as far as Nuceria, but thence turns abruptly to the right across the main ridge of the Apennines, and descends the valley of the Potentia to Ancona. Though given in the Itinerary under the name of the Via Flaininia, it may well be doabted whether this route was ever properly so called. Before enumerating the stations and distances alnng this celebrated line of road, as recorded in the different Itineraries, it will be well to give a brief general description of its course, especially of that part of it nearest to Rome.

The Via Flaminia issued from the gate of the same name, the Porta Flaminia, which was situated nearly on the same site as the modern Porta del Popolo, but a little farther from the Tiber, and was carried thence in a direct line to the Pons Milvius (Ponte Molle), where it crossed the Tiber. This celebrated bridge, which so often figures in Roman history, was reckoned to be 3 miles from Rome, though only 2 from the Porta Flaminia, the distances being as usual computed from the ancient gate, the Porta Ratumena. After crossing the Tiber, the Flaminian Way turned to the right, keeping pretty close to the river, while the Via Cassia, which diverged from it at this point. ascended the table-land and proceeded nearly due N. The line of the Via Flaminia is here distinctly marked by the remains of several ancient sepulchres, with which its course was studded on both sides, like the Via Appia and Latina, for some miles from the gates of Rome. The number of such sepulchres on the line of the Via Flaminia $1 s$ particularly noticed by Juvenal (i. 171). One of these, which was discovered in the 17th century at a place called Grotta Rossa, obtained much celebrity from being supposed to be that of the family of Ovid, though in reality it belonged to a family of the name of Nasonius, which could bave no connection with the poet, whowe cognomen only was Naso.

Six miles from the Milvian Bridge (at a place now called Prima Porta) was the station of Saxa Rubra, or Ad Rubras as it is called in the Itineraries, which, from its proximity to Rome, and its position on the great northern highway, is repeatedly mentioned in history. [Saxa Rubra.] It was here that the Via Tiberina parted from the Flaminia, and, turning off to the right, followed closely the valley of the river, while the main line of the more important highway ascended the table-land, and beld nearly a straight course to the station of Rostrata Villa, which is placed by the Antonine Itinerary 24 miles from Rome. The exact site of this cannot be identified, but it mast have been a little short of Rignano. It is not mentioned in the Tabula or Jerusalem Itinerary, both of which, on the contrary, give another station, Ad Vicesinum, which, as its name imports, was situated 20 miles from Rome, and, therefore, 11 from Ad Rubras. It mast therefore have been situated a little begond the Monse di Guardia, but was evidently a mere Mulatio, or station for changing horses, and no ruins mark the site. But the course of the Via Flaminia can be traced with certainty across this table-land to the foot of Soracte, by portions of the ancient pavement still existing, and ruined tombs by the roadside. The next station set down in the Jerusalem Itinerary and the Tabula is Aqua Viva, 12 miles beyond Ad Vicesimum, and this is identified beyond a doubs with the Osteria dell' Acqua Vica, which is just at the required distance ( 32 miles) from Rome. Thence the ancient road proceeded direct to the Tiber, leaving Civita Castellana (the ancient Fescennium) on the left, and crowsed the Tiber a little above Boryhetto, where the remains of the ancient bridge are still visible, and still known as the Pile di A mpesto. Thence it proceeded in a straight line to Ocriculum, the ruins of which are sitnated below the modern town of Otricoli. Ocriculum was 12 M. P. from Aqua Viza, or 44 from Rome, according to the detailed distances of the Jerusalem Itinerary, which are exactly correct. The Antonine Itinerary makes the distance in one place 45, in another 47 miles. (Itin. Ant. pp. 125, 311; Itin. Hier. p. 613. For a detailed examination of this first portion of the Via Flaminia, see Westphal, Römische Kampagme, pp. 133-145; Nibby, Vie deghi Antichi, pp. 5i74.)

The remainder of the route must be more briefly described. From Ocriculum it led direct to Narnia ( 12 miles), where it crossed the Nar by the famous bridge, the ruins of which are still the ndmiration of travellers, and. quitting altogether the valley of the Nar, crossed the hills nearly in a straight line due N. to Mevania (Bevagna), passing by a station Ad Martis (16 M. P.), and thence to Mevania (16 M.P.): whence it proceeded to Fornm Flaminii, at the foot of the Apennines. But the distances here hare not been examined in detail, and most of the Itineraries (as already mentioned) give the circuitous or loop line (nearly coinciding with the modern road) by Interamna and Spoletium to Forum Flaminii. The stations on this road were according to the Itin. Ant.:-

\begin{aligned}
& \text { Interamna (Terni) - - - viii. M. P. } \\
& \text { Spoletium (Spoleto) - - - xviii. } \\
& \text { Forum Flaminii - }- \text { xviii. }
\end{aligned}

but the Jerusulem Itinerary, which gives them in greater detail, makes the total distance somewhat greater. The stations as there set down are :-

The position of Forum Flaminii is well ascertained at a place called S. Giovanni in Forifiamma, where its ruins are still visible. This is, however, little more than 2 miles from Fuligno, but is correctly placed by the Itineraries 12 miles from Nuceria (Nocera). There can be no doubt that the foundation of the town of Foram Flaminii was contemporary with the construction of the highroad itself: it was judiciously placed just at the entrance of the Apennines, where the passage of those mountains may be considered to have commenced. Thence the highway followed nearly the same line as the modern road from Foligno to Fano, skirting the main ridge of the Apennines, and the principal stations can be identified without difficulty. It passed by Helvillum (Sigillo), crossed the central ridge of the Apennines at La Schieggia (probably Ad Ensem of the Tabula), and descended into the valley of the Cantiano, a tributary of the Metaurus, passing by Cales or Calles (Cagli), Intercisa (the Passo del Furlo), and emerging into the valley of the Metaurus at Forum Sempronii (Fossombrone), whence it descended the course of that river to Fanum Fortunae (Fano) on the Adriatic, and thence along the coast to Ariminum (Rimini), where it joined the Via Aemilia.

We may now recapitulate the distances as given, first, in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 125):-

From Rome to

| From Rome |  |  |  |
| :--- | :--- | :--- | :--- |
| Rostrata Villa - |  |  |  |
| Ocriculum (Otricoli) | - | - | xxiv. m. P. |
| Narnia (Narni) | - | - | xii. |
| Ad Martis (near Massa) | - | - | xvi. |
| Mevania (Bevagna) | - | - | xvi. |
| Nuceria (Nocera) | - | - | - |
| (viii. |  |  |  |
| Helvillum (Sigillo) | - | - | - |
| xiv. |  |  |  |
| Calles (Cagli) | - | - | xxiii. |
| Forum Sempronii (Fossombrone) xviii. |  |  |  |
| Fanum Fortunae (Fano) | - | - | xvi. |
| Pisaurum (Pesaro) - | - | - | viii. |
| Ariminum (Rimini) | - | - | xxiv. |

These distances are all approximately correct. The stations are given more in detail in the Jerusalem Itinerary (p.613), as follow :-

From Rome to

Fanum Fugitivi (Monte Somma) - $\quad \mathbf{x}$.
Spoletium (Spoleto)
Sacraria (Le Vene) - - - viii.
Trebia (Trevi) - - - - iv.
Fulginium (Foligno) - - - v.
Forum Flaminii (S. Gio. in Forifiamma)
Nuceria (Nocera) - - - xii.
Ptaniae, probably Tadinum (Gualdo) viii.
Herbellonium (?) - - - vii.
Ad Ensem (La Schieggia) - - x.
Ad Calem (Cagli) - - - xiv.
Intercisa (Il Furlo) - - - ix.
Forum Sempronii (Fossombrone) - ix.
Ad Octavum - - - - ix
Fanum Fortunae (Fano) - - viii.
Pisaurum (Pesaro) - - - viii.
Ariminum (Rimini) - - - xxiv.
The whole distance from Rome to Ariminum according to this Itinerary is therefore 222 miles, while the Antonine (following the more direct line) makes it 210 miles. The Tabula adds nothing to our knowledge of this route; and the distances are much less correct than in the other two Itineraries.

The branch of the Flaminian Way which struck off from the main line at Nuceria and crossed the Apennines direct to Ancona, is thus given in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 311):-

From Nuceria to Dubii (?) - - - viii. M. P.

Prolaqueum (Pioraco) - - viii.
Septempeda (S. Severino) - - xv.
Treia (Ru. near Treia) - - ix.
Auximum (Osimo) - - xviii.
Ancona - - - xii.
Thence a road was carried along the coast by Sena Gallica to Fanum Fortunae, where it rejoined the main line of the Via Flaminia. The stations were:-

| Ad Aesim fl. (R. Esino) | - | - | viii. m. P. |
| :--- | :--- | :--- | :--- |
| Sena Gallica (Sinigaglia) | - | - | xii. |
| Ad Pirum (?) | - | - | viii. |
| Fanum Fortunae (Fano) | - | - | viii. |

All the above distances appear to be at least approximately correct. (For a full and careful exmination of the line of the Via Flaminia, and the distances of the stations upon it, see D'Anville, Analyse Géographique de l'Italie, pp. 147162.) [E. H. B.]

VIA LABICANA ( $\dot{\eta}$ पa6ıkavो̀ $\delta \delta \dot{6}$ ) was one of the highroads that issued from the Porta Esquilina at Rome. It was evidently originally nothing more than a road that led to the ancient city of Labicum (16 miles from Rome), but was subsequently continued in the same direction, and, after sweeping round the E. foot of the Alban hills, it joined the Via Latina at the station Ad Pictas, in the plain between them and the Volscian mountains. (Strab. v. p. 237.) This route was in many respects more convenient than the proper Via Latina, as it avoided the ascent and descent of the Alban hills: and hence it appears to have become, in the later ages of the Empire, the more frequented road of the two; so that the Antonine Itinerary gives the Via Labicana as the regular highroad fromRome to Beneventum, and afterwards gives the Via Latina as falling into it. (Itin. Ant. pp. 304, 306.) But this is decidedly opposed to the testimony of Strabo (l.c.), and the usage of the Augustan age, which is generally followed by modern writers. Hence the Via Labicana will be here given only as far as the point where it joins the Latina.

The stations set down in the Antonine Itinerary are merely -

From Rome to Ad Quintanas - - xv. M. P.
Ad Pictas - - $\mathbf{x}$.
The Tabula subdivides the latter stage into two; viz., Ad Statuas, iii. M. P., and thence to Ad Pictas, vii. ; thus confirming the distance in the Itinerary. The station Ad Quintanas was undoubtedly situated at the foot of the hill on which stands the village of La Colonna, occupying the site of the ancient Labicum. The line of the ancient road from Rome thither followed nearly the same course, though with fewer windings, as the modern road to Palestrina and Valmontone. It is described in the article Labicum.
VIA LATINA ( $\bar{\eta} \boldsymbol{\Lambda} \alpha \tau เ \nu \grave{\eta}$ d $\delta$ ós) was one of the principal of the numerous highroads that issued from the gates of Rome, and probably one of the most ancient of them. Hence we have no account of the time of its construction, and it was doubtless long in use as a means of communication before it was paved and converted into a regular highroad. Some road or other must always have existed between Rone and Tusculum; while again beyond the Alban hills the valley of the Sacco (Trerus) is one of the natural lines of communication that must have been in use from the earliest times. But it is not probable that the line of the Via Latina was completed as a regular road till after the complete reduction of both the Latins and Volscians under the Roman authority. It is true that Livy speaks of the Via Latina as if it already existed in the time of Coriolanus (ii. 39), but he in fact uses the name only as a geographical description, both in this passage and again in the history B. C. 296, when be speaks of Interamna as a colony "quae via Latina est" (x.36). Neither passage affords any proof that the road was then in existence; though there is no doubt that there was already a way or line of communication. The course of the Via Latina is, indeed, more natural for such a line of way than that of the more celebrated Via Appia, and must have offered less difficulties before the construction of an artificial road. Nor did it present any such formidable passes in a military point of view as that of Lautulae on the Appian Way, for which reason it was the route chusen both by Pyrrhus when he advanced towards Rome in b. c. 280, and by Hannibal in B. c. 211. (Liv. xxvi. 8, 9.) On the latter occasion the Carthaginian general seems certainly to have followed the true Via Latina across Mount Algidus and by Tusculum (Liv. L.c.) ; Pyrrhus, on the contrary, turned aside from it as he approached Praeneste, which was the farthest point that he reached in his advance towards Rome.

Whatever may have been the date of the constraction of the Via Latina, it is certain that long before the close of the Republic it was one of the best known and most frequented highways in Italy. Strabo speaks of it as one of the most important of the many mads that issued from the gates of Rome ( $\mathrm{v} . \mathrm{p} .237$ ), and takes it as one of the leading and most familiar lines of demarcation in describing the cities of Latium. (lb.) It was, however, in one respect very inferior to its neighbour the Via Appia, that it was not capable of any considerable extension, but terminated at Cusilinum, where it joined the Via Appia. (Strab. l. c.) There was, indeed, a branch road that was continued from Teanum by Allifae and Telesia to Beneventum; but though this is given in the Itineraries in connection with the Via Latina (Itin. Ant. pp. 122, 304), it certainly was not generally considered as forming a part of that road, and was merely a cross line from it to the Appian. On the other hand, the main line of the Via Latina, which descended the valley of the Sacco, received on its way the two subordinate lines of road called the Via Labicana and Via Praenestina, which issued from Rome by a different gate, but both ultimately joined the Via Latina, and became merged in it. (Strab. l.c.) Such at least is Strabo's statement, and doubtless was the orditary view of the case in his time. But it would seem as if at a later period the Via Labicana came to be the more frequented road of the two, so that the Antonine Itinerary represents the Via Latina as joining the Labicana, instead of the converse. (Itin. Ant. p. 306.)

The stations, as given in the Itinerary just cited, are as follow:-

VIA LATLNA.

Fregellanam (Ceprano) - xiv. M.p. Fabrateria (S. Giovanni in Caricu)
iii.

Aquinum (Aquino) - - viii.
Casinum (S. Germano) - vii.
Teanum (Teano) - - xxvii.
Cales (Calvi) - - - vi.
Casilinum (Capoua) - - vii.
Capuas (Sta Maria) - - iii.
(The four last stages are supplied from the Tabula. The Antonine Itinerary gives only the branch of the road that led, as above noticed, to Beneventum.)

It will be observed that, in its course, as above set down, from Rome to Ferentinain, the Via Latina did not pass through any town of importance, the stations given being mere Mutationes, or places for changing horses. But, on account of the importance of this line of road, it will be necessary to describe it somewhat mere in detail.

The Via Latina issued from the Porta Capena together with the Via Appia. It was not till about half-way between that gate and the later Purta Appia (Porta di S. Sebastiano), that the two seperated, and the Via Latina pursued its own course through the gate in the walls of Aurelian that derived from it the naine of Porta Latina. From this gate (now long closed) to a point 2 miles from the Porta Latinn, where it crosses the modern road from Rome to Albano, the line of the ancient raad may be readily traced by portions of the pavement, and ruins of sepulchres, with which the Latin Way, as well as the Flaminian and A ppian (Juv. Sat. i. 171), was bordered. From that point the roud may be seen proceeding in a perfectly straight line, which is marked from distance to distance by tombe and other ruins, to the foot of the Tusculan hills. The only oue of these ruins which deserves any notice is that commonly caliad the temple of Fortuna Muliebris, which is in reality a sepulchre of imperial times. About 9 miles from the Porta Capena is a farm or hamlet called Morrena, near which are the extensive remains of a Roman villa, supposed to be that of Lucallus; and about a mile farther must be placed the station Ad Decinum, the 10 miles being undoubtedly reckoned from the Yorta Capena. Almost immediately from this point began the ascent of the Tusculan hills: the road still preserved nearly its former direction, learing Grotta Ferrata on the right, and the citadel of Tusculum on the left; it then passed, as it is described by Strabo (v. p. 237), between Tusculam and the Alban Mount, following the line of a deep valley or depression between them, till it reached the foot of Mount Algidus, and, passing through a kind of notch in the ridge of that mountain, at a place now called La Cava, descended to the station Ad Pictas in the plain below. The course of the ancient road may be distinctly traced by remains of the pavement still risible at intervals ; the second station, Ruboraria (if the distance of six miles given in some MSS be correct), must have stood near the ruins of a mediaeval castle called Molara. Thence to Ad Pictas the di-tance is stated at 17 miles, which is certainly grently above the truth. It was at this station that the Via Labicana joined the Latina; and frum this circumstance, compared with the distances given thence to Ferentinam, we may place the site of Ad Pictas somewhere near the Osteria di Mezza Seloa, about 10 miles beyond Roboraria. Strabo calls it 210 stadia 26 f miles) from Rome, but it is not clear whether he measured the distance by the Via Latina or the Labicana (v. p. 237). The actual distance of Ferentinum (concerning which there is no doubt) from Roine is 49 miles; and the Compitum Anagninum is correctly placed 8 miles nearer the city, which would exactly agree with the point on the present highroad where the branch to Anagnia still turns off. Both the Itinerary and the Tabula place Ad Pictas 15 miles from the Compitum Auagninum, and this distance would fix it 10 miles from Roboraria, or 26 from Kome, thus agreeing closely with the statement of Strabo. We may, therefore, feel sure that the position above assigned to Ad Pictas, a point of importance, as that where the two roads joined, is at least appruximately correct.
The nest stations admit of no doubt, and the distances are correct. It was at the Compitum Anagninum, 15 miles beyond Ad Pictas, that the Via Praenestina joined the Latina, which was carried thence down the ralley of the Sacco, nearly in the line of the present highroad, by Ferentinum and Frusino, both of which still retain their ancient names, to Fregellanuin (Ceprano) on the Liris, whence it turned S. to Fabrateria Nova (the ruins of which are still risible at $S$. Giovanni in Carico), on the right bank of the Liris. Here it crossed that river by a bridge, of which the ruins are still extant, whence the course of the ancient road may be traced without difficulty through Aquinom, Casinum, Teanum, and Cales to Casilinum on the Vulturnus, where it fell into the Via Appia. Portions of the ancient pavement, sepulchres, and other ruins mark the line of the ancient way throughout the latter part of its course. At a station given in the Tabula under the name of Ad Flexum ( 9 miles from Casinum) a branch road turned off to Venafrum, whence it ascended the valley of the Vulturnus to Aesernia, and thence into the heart of Sainnium. The Antonine Itinerary represents the Via Latina as following this cross-road, and making a bend round by Venafrum, but there can be no doubt that the regular highroad proceeded direct to Teanum. The remains of the ancient raad may be distinctly traced, proceeding from Teanum nearly due N. through Cajanello and Tora to $S$. Pietro in Fine, which was probably the site of the station Ad Flexum. This would be 18 miles from Teanum. The Tabula gives the distance as viii., for which there is no doubt we should read $x$ viii.

The branch of the Via Latina, already alluded to, which was carried to Beneventum, quitted the main road at Teanum, crossed the Vulturnus to Allifae, and thence was carried up the valley of the Calor by Telesia to Beneventum. The distances are thas given in the Antomine Itinerary ( p .304 ): -

Teanum to Allifae (Alife) - - xvii. m.p. Telesia (Telese) - - xxv. Beneventum - - xvii.

via laurentina. [Laurentum.]
Via nomentana. [Nomentum.]
VIA OSTIENSIS, was, as its name imports, the road leading from Rome to Ostia, which must naturally have been an extremely frequented route when the city was at the height of its prosperity. It followed in its general direction the left bank of the Tiber, but outting off the wore considerable bends and windings of the river. It issued from the Porta Ostiensis, now called the Porta S. Paolo, from the celebrated basilica of St. Panl, about $1 \frac{1}{2}$ mile outside the gate, and situated on the line of the ancient road. Three miles from Rome it passed through a village, or suburb, known as the Vicus Alexandri (Ammian. xvii. 4. § 14): it was at this point that the Via Laurentius struck off direct to Laurentum, 16 miles distant from home [Laubentum]; while the Via Ostiensis, turning a little to the right, pursued thencetorth nearly a straight course all the way to Ostia. On this line, 11 miles from Rome, is the Osteria di Mala Fede, where a road branches off to Porcigliano, which undoubtedly follows the same line as that mentioned by the younger Pliny, by which his Laurentine villa could be approached as conveniently as by the Via Laurentina. (Plin. Ep. ii. 17.) Five miles farther the highroad reached Ostia, which was 16 miles from Rome. (Itin. Ant. p. 301.) [Ostia].
Via pol'ilia. [Via Apria, No. 5.]
VIA PURTUENSIS, was the road that led from Rome to the Portus Trajani, or the new port of the city constructed under the Empire on the right bank of the Tiber. [Ostia.] The name could not, of course, have come into use until after the construction of this great artificial port to replace the natural harbour of Ostia, and is only found in the enumeration of the Viae in the Curiosum Urbis and Notitia (pp. 28, 29, ed. Preller). But the line of the road itself may still be traced without difficulty. It issued from the Porta Portuensis, in the walls of Aurelian, and followed, with little deviation, the right bank of the Tiber, only cutting off the minor windings of that river. The Antonine Itinerary places the city of Portus 19 miles from Rome (p. 300); but this is certainly a mistake, the real distance being just about the same as that of Ostia, or 16 miles. (Nibby, Dintorni, vol. iii. p. 624.) From Purtus a road was carried along the coast by Firegenae ( 9 miles) to Alsium ( 9 miles), where it joined the Via Aurelia. (Itim. Ant. p. 300.)
VIA POSTUMIA, was, as we learn from an inscription (Orell. Inscr. 3121), the proper name of the road that crossed the Apennines direct from Dertona to Genus. But it appears to have fallen into disuse ; at least we do not find it mentioned by any ancient writer, and the road itself is included by the Itineraries under the general name of the Via Aurelia. It has therefure been considered more convenient to describe it in that article. [E. H. B.]

VIA PRAENESTINA ( $\dot{\eta}$ חpaiveativt dobs, Strab.), was the name of one of the highrouds that issued from the Porta Esquilina at Rome, and led (as its name implies) direct to Praeneste. The period of its construction is unknown; but it is evident that there must have been from a very early period a highway, or line of communication from Rome to Praeneste, long before there was a regular paved road, such as the Via Praenestina ultimately became. The first part of it indeed, as far as the city of Gabii, 13 miles from Rome, was originally known as the Via Gabina, a name which is used by Livy in the history of the early ages of the Republic (Liv. ii. 11), but would seem to have afterwards fallen into disuse, so that both Strabo and the Itineraries give the name of Via Praenestina to the whole line. (Strab. v. p. 238; Itin. Ant. p. 302.) In the latter period of the Republic, indeed, Gabii had fallen very much into decay, while Praeneste was still an important and Hourishing town, which will suf.

VIA SALARIA.

ficiently account for the one appellation having become merged in the other. A continuation of the same rad, which was also included under the name of the Via Praenestina, was carried from the foot of the hill at Praeneste, through the subjacent plain, till it fell into the Via Latina, just below Anagnia.

The stations on it mentioned in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 302) are:-

From Rome to Gabii - - - . xii. M. P.
Praeneste
Sub Anagnia - - xiv.

The Tabula gives the same distances as far as Praeneste, which are very nearly correct. Strabo reckons it 100 stadia ( $12 \frac{1}{2}$ miles) from Rome to Gabii, and the same distance thence to Praeneste. The continuation from Praeneste to Sub Anagnia is given only in the Antonine Itinerary, but the distance is overstated; it does not really exceed 18 miles.

The Via Praenestina issued from the Porta Esquilina at Rome, together with the Via Labicana (Strab. v. p. 237) : it passed through the Porta Praenestina in the later circuit of the walls, now called Porta Maggiore; and separated from the Via Labicana immediately afterwards, striking off in a nearly direct line twwards Gabii. About 3 miles from Rome it passed the imperial villa of the Gordians, the magnificence of which is extolled by Julius Capitolinus (Gordian. 32), and is still in some degree attested by the imposing and picturesque ruins at a spot called Torre dei Schiavi. (Niibby, Dintorni, vol. iii. pp. 707-710.) Nine miles froin Rome the road is carried over the valley of a small stream by a viaduct of the most massive construction, still known as the Ponte di Nona: and 3 miles farther it passes the still existing ruins of the city of Gabii. Thence to Praeneste the line of the road was not so direct : this part of the Campagna being intersected by deep gullies and ravines, which necessitated some deviations from the straight line. The road is however clearly marked, and in many places retaius its ancient pavement of basaltic lava. It is carried nearly straight as far as a point about 5 miles beyond Gabii, where it passes throagh a deep cutting in the tufo rock, which has given to the spot the name of Cavamonte : shortly afterwards it turns abruptly to the right, leaving the village of Gallicano (the probable site of Penum) on the left, and thence follows the line of a long narrow ridge between two ravines, till it approaches the city of Praeneste. The highroad doubtless passed only through the lower part of that city. Portions of the ancient pavement may be seen shortly after quitting the southern gate (Porta del Sole), and show that the old road followed the same direction as the modern one, which leads through Cavi and Paliano, to an inn on the highroad below Anagni, apparently on the very same site as the station Sub Anagnia (or Compitum Anagninum, as it is called in another route) of the Itinerary.
(Westphal, Köm. Kamp. pp. 97-107; Nibby, Dintorni di Roma, pp. 625-630.) [E. H. B.]

VIA SAILARIA ( $\grave{\eta}$ Eajapla d $\delta \dot{\prime}$ s, Strab.), one of the most ancient and well-known of the highroads of Italy, which led from Rome up the valley of the Tiber, and through the land of the Sabines to Reate, and thence across the Apennines into Picenum, and to the shores of the Adriatic. We have no acconnt of the period of its construction as a regular road, but there can be little doubt that it was a frequented ronte of communication long before it was laid down as a regular highway : and the tradition that its name was derived from its being used by the Sabines to carry into their own country the salt that they obtained from the Roman salt-works at the mouth of the Tiber, in itself seems to point to an early age. (Fest. e. v. Salaria.) It was indeed, with the exception of the Via Latina, the only one of the great Roman highways, the naine of which was not derived from that of its first constructor. But it cannot be inferred from the expressions of Livy that the battle of the Allia was fought " ad undecimum lapidem," and that the Gauls on a subsequent occasion encamped "ad tertiam lapidem via Salaria trans pontem Anienis" (Liv. v. 37 , vii. 9 ), that the regular road was then in existence, though there is no doubt that there was a much frequented line of communication with the land of the Sabines. We learn from the latter passage that a bridge had been already constructed over the Anio ; and it is probable that the Via Salaria was constructed in the first instance only as far as Reate, and was not carried across the mountains till long afterwards. Even in the time of Strabo there is no evidence that it reached to the Adriatic : that author speaks of it merely as extending through the land of the Sabines, but as not of great extent (ou improbable that it had then been carried to the Upper Sea. But the Itineraries give the name of Salaria to the whole line of road from Kome to Castrum Truentinum on the Adriatic, and thence to Adria

The Salarian Way issued from the Porta Collina of the ancient city together with the Via Nomentana (Strab. 6. c.; Fest. 8. v. Salaria); bat they diverged immediately afterwards, so that the one quitted the outer circuit of the city (as bounded by the walls of Aurelian) through the Porta Salaria, the other through the Porta Nomentana Between 2 and 3 miles from Rome the Via Salaria crossed the Anio by a bridge, called the Pons Salarius, which was the scene of the memorable combat of Manlius Torquatus with the Gaul. (Liv. vii. 9.) The present bridge is ancient, though not strictly of Roman date, having been constructed by Narses, to replace the more ancient one which was destroyed by Totila. On a hill to the left of the road, just before it descends to the river, is the site of the ancient city of Antrmana, and a hill to the right of the road immediately after crossing the river is worthy of notice, as the spot where the Gauls encamped in B. c. 361 (Liv. L. c.), and where Hannibal pitched his camp when he rode up to reconnoitre the walls of Rome. (Id. xxvi. 10.) Between 5 and 6 miles from Rume, after passing the Villa Spada, the road passes close to Castel Giubileo, a fortress of the midile aqes, which serves to mark the site of the ancient Fidenae. From this point the road is carried through the low grounds near the Tiber, skirting the foot of the Crustumian hills, which border it on the right. Several small streams descend from these hills, and, after crossing the road, discharge themselves into the Tiber ; and there can be no doubt that one of these is the far-famed Allia, though which of them is entitled to claim that celcbrated appellation is still a very disputed point. [Allia.] The road continued to follow the valley of the Tiber till, after passing Monte Rotondo, it turned inland to Eretum, the site of which is probably to be fised at Grotta Marozza and is marked in the Itineraries as 18 miles from Rome. Here the Via Nomentana again fell into the Salaria. (Strab. v. p. 228.) Hence to Reate the latter road traversed a hilly country, but of no great interest, following nearly the same line as the modern road from Rome to Rieti. The intermediate station of Ad Novas or Vicus Novus, as it is called in the Antonine Itinerary is still marked by ruins near the Osteria Nuova, 32 miles from Rome, and 16 from Rieti. Here an old church still bore at a late period the name of Vico Nuovo.

VIA SALARIA.

The stations on the original Vis Salaria, from Rome to Reate, are correctly given, and can clearly be identified.

$\begin{array}{lll}\text { Eretum (Grotta Marozza) } & \text { - xviii. м. p. } \\ \text { Vicus Norus (Ost. Nuova) } & \text { - xiv. }\end{array}$ Vicus Norus (Ost. Nuova) - xiv. Reate (Rieti) - - - - xvi.
From Reate the Via Salaria (or the continuation of it as given in the Itineraries) proceeded nearly due E. by Cutiliae, which is identified by its celebrated lake, or rather mineral springs, to Interocrea (Antrodoco), situated at the junction of two natural prases or lines of communication through the central Apennines. The one of these leads from Interocrea to Amiternum, in the upper valley of the Aternus, and was followed by a cross-road given in the Tabula, but of which both the stations and the distances are extremely confused : the other, which is the main valley of the Velinus, and bears nearly due N., was ascended by the Via Salaria as far as Falacrinum, 16 miles from Interocrea, and near the sources of the Velinus. Thence that road crossed the ridge of the Apennines and descended into the valley of the Tronto (Truentus), which river it followed to its mouthat Castrum Truentinum, passing on the way by the strongly situated city of Asculum (Ascoli). The distances on this line of route are thus correctly given in the Antonine Itinerary (p. 307):

From Reate to

From this last point two roads branched off, the one turning N., and proceeding along the coast of the Adriatic to Ancona; the other proceeding S . along the same coast to Castrum Norum (near Giulia Nuova), and thence to Adria (Atri). The latter branch is given in the Itinerary as a part of the Via Salaria; but it is clear that neither of them properly belonged to that highway, both being in fact only portions of the long line of road which followed the coast of the Adriatic continuously from Anconato Brundusium, and which is given in the Antonine Itinerary in connection with the Via Flaminis (Itin. Ant. pp. 313-316). (The course of the Via

VIA TIBERINA, a name found in inscriptions, and noticed by the Notitia and Curiosum among the roads that issued from the gates of Rome, was in all probability the road that quitted the Via Flaminia at Sasa Rubra, and followed the right bank of the Tiber until it rejoined the Via Flaminia, between Acqua Viva and Borghetto. The existence of such a road is known from remains of it still visible; and it is the only one to which the name of Via Tiberina can well be applied. (Westphal, Röm. Kamp. pp. 134,138 .)

 of the most celebrated and important of the Roman highways, which led from Rome, or, more strictly speaking, from Tibur, to the lake Fucinus and the land of the Marsi, and thence was subsequently continued to the Adriatic, at the mouth of the Aternus. The period of its construction is uncertain. It has indeed been frequently supposed to have derived its name from, and to have been the work of, M. Valerius Maximus, who was censor with C. Junius Bubulcus in в.c. 307 ; but the expression of Livy, that the two constructed roads "per agros," would certainly seem to refer to cross-roads in the neighbourhood of Rome; and it is very improbable that the construction of so celebrated a highway as the Via Valeria should not have been more distinctly stated. (Liv. ix. 43.) The Via Valeria, indeed, was properly only a continuation of the Via Tiburtina, which led from Rome to Tibur ; and though the Itineraries include the whole line of route under the name of the Via Valeria, it appears that the distinction was still kept up in the time of Strabo, who distinctly speaks of the Valerian Way as beginning from Tibur, and leading to the Marsi, and to Corfinium, the metropolis of the Peligni (Strab. v. p. 238). The expressions of the geographer would naturally lead us to conclude that the Via Valeria was in his time carried as a regular highway as far as Corfinium ; but we learn from an inscription, that this was not the case, and that the regularly constructed road stopped short at Cerfennia, at the foot of the Mons Imeus or Forca di Caruso, a steep and difficult pass, over which the highway was not carried till the reign of Claudius, who at the same time continued it to the month of the Aternus. (Orell. Inser. 711.) It appears that the portion thus added at first bore the name of the Via Claudia Valeria (Inser. l.c.); but the distinction was soon lost sight of, and the whole line of route from Rome to the Adriatic was commonly known as the Via Valeria. (Itin. Ant. p. 308.) It will be convenient here to adopt the saine usage, and consider the whole course of the road under one head.

The Via Tiburtina, as the road from Rome to Tibur was properly called, must andoubtedly have been of very ancient origin. There must indeed have existed from the earliest ages of Rome a frequented highway or communication between the two cities; but we are wholly ignorant as to the time when a regularly made road, with its solid pavement and all the other accessories of a Roman via, was constructed from the one city to the other. The road as it existed in the time of the Roman Empire may be distinctly traced by portions still remaining of the pavement, or by sepulchres and fragments of ancient buildings, so that no doubt can exist as to its precise course. It quitted the original city by the Porta Esquilina, passed through the Porta 'Tiburtina (now Porta S. Lorenzo) in the walls of Aurelian, and then proceeded nearly in a straight line to the Anio, which it crossed by a bridge about 4 miles from Rome. This bridge, now called the Ponte Mammolo, is in its present state the work of Narses, having been restored at the same time as those on the Via Saluria and Nomentana, after their destruction by Totila, A. d. 549. From this bridge the ancient road followed very nearly the same line as the modern one as far as the Lago di Tartaro, a small lake or pool of sulphureous waters, similar in character to the more considerable pool called the Solfatara or Aquae Albulae, about 2 miles farther on, and a mile to the left of the highroad. Leaving this on the left, the Via Tiburtina proceeded almost perfectly straight to the Ponte Lucano, at the foot of the hill of Tivoli, where it recrossed the Anio. There can be no doubt that this bridge retains its ancient name of Pons Lucanus, though this is not mentioned by any ancient author; but the origin of the name is evident from the massive sepulchre of the Plautian family (a structure not unlike the celebrated tomb of Caecilia Metella on the Appian Way), which stands clase to the bridge, and which was constructed by M. Plautius Lucanus, who was censor together with Tiberius in the reign of Augustus. From the inscription on an ancient milestone it appears that this part of the road was constructed by him at the same time; andit is probable that the original Via Tiburtina was carried from the Lago di Tartaro in a different direction, bearing away more to the left, so as to leave the Aquae Albulye on the right; while the road constructed by Plautius, like the modern highroad, passed between that lake and Tibur. The 14th milestone was found near the spot where the road crosses the artificial chanuel that carries off the waters of the lake. From the Ponte Lucano the ancient road ascended the hill of Tibur by a very steep and straight ascent, passing through or under a portion of the vaulted snbstructions of the so-called villa of Maecenas. [Tibur.]

The Itineraries all agree in stating the distance of Tibur from Rome at 20 miles; but it in reality little exceeds 18 by the direct road, which crossed the Ponte Lucano, as above described. The Tabula gives the Aquae Albulae as an intermediate station, but places it 16 M. P. from Rome, though the true distance is only 14.

From Tibur the Via Valeria ascended the valley of the Anio, passing by the town of Varia ( Vicovaro), 8 miles from Tibur, to a point marked by an inn, now called Osteria Ferrata, 5 miles beyond V'icovaro and 13 from Tivoli. This point, where the Anio makes a sudden bend, is evidently the site of the statiou Ad Lamnas of the Tabula, whence a side road struck off to the right, ascending the upper valley of the Anio to Sublaqueum (Subiaco), whence the road derived the name of Via Subiacensis, by which it is mentioned by Frontinus (de Aqueduct. 15). The road is given in the Tabula, but in so confused a manner that it is impossible to make it out. Sublaqueum was in reality 48 miles from Rome by this route, or 28 from Tibur.

The. Via Valeria, on the other hand, turned to the left at the Osteria Ferrata, and crossed the hills to Carseoli, the ruins of which are still visible at some distance nearer livine than the modern village of Carsoli. Thence it ascended a steep mountainpass, where portions of the ancient ruad, with its pavement and substructions, are still visible, and descended again into the basin of the Lake Facinos. After passing by, rather than through, Alba Fucensis, it was carried along the N. shore of the lake to Cerfennia, the site of which is clearly identified at a spot just below the village of Coll Armeno. [Cfrfennia.] Here, as already mentioned, the original Via Vaieria terminated; but the continuation of it, as constructed by Claudius, and given in the Itineraries, ascended the steep mountain-pass of the Mons Imeus, and thence descended into the valley of the Aternus, on the banks of which, near its confluence with the Gizio, stood the city of Corfinium. Three miles from that city was a bridge over the Aternus (near the site of the present town of Popoli), which constituted an important military position. [Aternus.] Below this point the river flows throagh a narrow pass or detile, through which the Via Va. leria also was carried. The station Interpromium, marked in the Itineraries as 12 miles from Corfinium, must be placed at the Osteria di $S$. Valentino, below the village of the same name. Thence the rand descended the valley of the Aternus to its moath, which is correctly placed by the Itineraries 21 miles from Interpromium, and 9 beyond Teate (Chieti).

The distances given in the Antonine Itinerary from Rome to this point are as follow:-

Rome to Tibur (Tivoli) - - xx. M. p. Carseoli (Ru. near Carsoli) xxii. Alba Fucentia (Alba) - xxv. (xxii.) Cerfennia (Sta Felicita) xxiii. (xiin.) Corfiniuin (S. Pelino) - xvi. (xvii.) Interpromium (Ost. di S. Valentino) - - xi. (xii.) Teate (Chicti) - - xvii. (xii.)
The distances stated in parentheses are the corrections suggested by D'Anville, who examined the whole of this line of route with much care, and are confirmed by the discovery of ancient milestones, which leave no doubt as to the actual distances. The general correctness of the result thus obtained is confirmed by a statement of Pliny (iii. 5. s. 6), in which he estimates the breadth of Italy in its central part, as measured from the months of the Tiber to that of the Aternus at 136 miles. Here the mention of the Aternus leaves little doubt that the measurement was taken along the Via Valeria. Nuw the corrected distances above given amount to 118 miles from Rome to Teate, or 125 miles to the mouth of the Aternus; and if to this be added 16 miles from Rome to Ostia, the result is 141 miles, agreving, within 5 miles, with the statement of Pliny.
(For a full examination of this whole line of ronte, see D'Anville, Analyse Géogr. de I'Italie, pp. 170182, and Kramer, Der Fuciner See, pp. 59-62. The Via Tiburtina and the first part of the Valeria are also described and examined by Westphal, Rom. Kamp. pp. 108-121, and Nibby, Vic degli Ansicini, pp. 96-104)

The proper termination of the Via Valeria, as continued by Claudius, was undonbtedly at the mouth of the Aternus. But the Antonine Itinerary continues it on to Hadria, which it places at 14 MIP . from Teate; but this distance is much below the truth : we should perhaps read 24 M.P. The probatility is, that at the mouth of the Aternus it fell into the line of road previously existing along the const of the Adriatic, and which, withont belonging properly to any of the three highways that proceeded from Rome to that sea, served to connect the Valerian. Salarian, and Flaminian Ways. Fur this reason it may be useful to set down here the stations and distances along this line of coast, from the mouth of the Aternus to Ancona. They are thus given in the Antonine ltinerary (p. 313):-

The Via Valeria, like the Aemilia and Flaminia, gave name to one of the later divisions or provinces of Italy under the Roman Empire, which was called Valeria. Ptolemy in another passage (ii. 11. § 15) mentions, according to the common reading, a river 'Iaסovo, which some regard as a tributary of the Viadus, and others as 2 name of the upper Viadus; but Wilberg, the latest editor of Ptolemy, treating 'Laסov́a as a corrupt reading, has altered it to Oviáoos.

Vibi fordic. [Forum Vibir.]
VIBINUM, or VIBONIUM ('I6ผ́viov: Bovino), a town of Apulia, in the interior of that country, $i$ miles S. of Aecae (Troja) and 15 from Luceria. Its correct name is given by Pliny, who enumerates the Vibinates among the municipal communities of A pulia, and by inscriptions which are still extant at Bovino, an episcopal town situated on one of the lower slopes of the Apennines, on the right of the river Cervaro (Cerbalus). (Plin. iii. 11. s. 16; Holsten, Not. ad Cluver. p. 272.) There is no doubt that it is the place of which the name is corruptly written in Ptolemy, Vibarnum (OílGapvov, iii. 1. § 72), and which is calied by Polybius Vibonium ('I6ف́viov, for which we should probably read Oúı6óviov, Schweigh. ad loc.). The latter author distinctly places it among the Daunian Apulians, and mentions that Hannibal established his camp there, and thence laid waste the territory of Arpi and other neighbouring cities. (Polyb. iii. 88.)
[E. H. B.]
VIBIONES (Oùti'inves or 'leíwhes, Ptol. iii. 5. § 23), a people of European Sarmatia, on the N. side of Mount Borlinus, probably on the river Itor or Jeviza in Volhynia.
[T. H. D.]

VICUS AQUARIUS.
vibo, vibo valentia. [Hipponium.]
VIBONENSIS SINUS, another name of the Hipponiates Sinus. [Hipponium.]

VICENTIA or VICETIA (Oünceria: Eth. Vicentinus: Vicenza), a city of Venetia in the N. of Italy, situated between Patavium and Verona, and distant 22 miles from the former and 33 from the latter city (Itin. Ant. p. 128 ; Itin. Hier. p. 559). No mention is found of Vicentia before the Roman conquest of this part of Italy, and the earliest record of its existence is an inscription of the republican period which informs as that the limits between its territory and that of the Atestini were fixed and determined ly the proconsul Sex. Atilius Saranns in b.c. 136. (Orell. Inser. 3110.) It is also incidentally mentioned as one of the municipal towns in the $\mathbf{N}$. of Italy, in b.c. 43. (Cic. all Fam. xi. 19.) Strabo notices it as one of the minor towns of Venetia, and Tacitus tells us that it was taken by Antonius, the general of Vespasian, on his advance from Patavium to Verona, in a manner that sufficiently proves it not to have been a town of any great importance. (Tac. Hist. iii. 8 ; Strab. v. p. 214.) But it always continued to be a municipal town, and the younger Pliny mentions a cause in which the Vicentini were engaged before the Roman Senate in defence of their municipal rights. (Plin. Ep. v. 4, 14.) We learn also from Suetonius that it was the birthplace of the grammarian Remmins Palaemon. (Suet. Gramm. 23.) It is noticed also by both Pliny and Ptolemy, as well as in the Itineraries, and evidently continued till rear the close of the Roman Empire, to be a municipal town of some consideration, though very inferior to its opulent neighbours, Verona and Patavium. (Plin. iii. 19. s. 23 ; Ptol. iii. 1. § 30 ; Orell. Inscr. 3219). It suffered severely in common with most of the cities of Venetia from the invasion of Attila (A.d. 452), by whom it was laid waste with fire and sword (Hist. Miscell. xv. p. 549), but it recovered from this catastrophe, and appears agnin under the Lombards as a considerable city of Venetia (P. Diac. ii. 14, v. 39). During the middle ages it became for some time an independent republic, and is still a populous city with about 30,000 inhabitants, but has no remains of antiquity.

The name is written in inscriptions Vicetia, which has been restored by recent editors as the true reading buth in Pliny and in Tacitus, but it is certain that before the close of the Roman Empire the naine Vicentia (which has been retained in the modern Vicenza) was already in use.
VICIANUM, a place in Moesia (Tab. Peut.), probably the Bep̧ava of Procopius (de Aed. iv. 4. p. 281), and the present Nova Berda. [T. H. D.]

VICTO'RIA (Oи̇ıктwia, Ptol. ii. 3. § 9), the most eastern place belonging to the Damnonii in Britannia Barbara. Camden (p. 1190) thinks that it is Bede's Caer Guidi, and that it stood on Inchkeith Island, in the Frith of Forth; but Horsley is of opinion that it is Abernethy, near Perth. [T.H.D.]

VICTO'RIAE MONS, a mountain in Hispania Citerior, near the Iberus. (Liv. xxiv. 11.) [T. H. D.]

VICTO'RIAE PORTUS, a haven belonging to Juliobriga, a town of the Cantabri in Hispania Tarraconensis. (Plin. iv. 20. s. 34.) Now Suntonna. (Cf. Floret, Esp. Sagr. xxiv. p. 9.) [T. H. D.]

VICTUAVIAE. [Ticinus].
Vicus alexanidil. [Via Ostiensis.]
Vicus ambiatinus. [Ambiatinus.]
VICUS AQUA'RIUS, a place in the territory of the Vaccaei in Hispania Tarraconensis. (Itim, Ans.
p. 439.) Variously identified with Villafafila and Villasecco.
[T. H. D ]
Vicus aquensis. [Aquar Convenarum.]
VICUS CAECI'LIUS, a place in Lasitania belonging to the Vettones, on the raad from Augusta Emerita to Caesarangusta. (Itin. Ant. p. 434.) Variously identified with Naralconcejo and S. Estoran.
[T. H. D.]
VICUS CUMINA'RIUS, a place of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, somewhat S. of the Tagus, and E. of Toletum. Probably the modern St. Cruz de la Zarza, which is still renowned fur its cumin. (Morales, Antig. p. 77; Florez, Esp. Sagr. v. p. 22.) Others have identified it with Ocaña and Bayona.
[T. H. D.]
VICUS DOLUCENSIS, in Gallia. The name occurs only on an inscription found at Halinghen, near Boulogne, the ancient Gesoriacum [Gesorincum]. Vicus Dolucensis may be the old name of Halinghen. (Ukert, Gallien.)
[G. L.]
VICUS HE'LENAE, in Gallia, mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris (Major. Carm. 5. 216), in the country of the Atrebates; but geographers disagree about the site. Some place it at Hedin or Hesdin, on the Canche, but that river is in the country of the Morini. Others fix it at a place called Lens, and others in other places. (Ukert, Gallien.) [G. L.]

VICUS ICTIMULORUM. [Ictimulr.]
VICUS JULII or ATURES, in Aquitanis. The name Civitas Aturensium occurs in the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces. The name Atures also occurs in Sidonius Apollinaris (ii. ep. 1). In the passage of Tibullus, cited under Aturus [Vol. I. p. 336] "Atur" is said to be a correction of Scaliger, the MSS. having Atax : -
"Quem tremeret forti milite victus Atur ;"
but the great critic is probably right.
At the councll of Agde (Agatha), A. D. 506, there is a subscription by a bishop "de civitate Vico Juli," and the same name occurs in Gregory of T.surs. D'Anville affirms that Atures and Vicus Julii are the same place, relying on a Notice, where we read "Civitis Adtorensium Vico Juli." The name of the river Atur was also given to a people Atures, who have given their name to the town of Aire, which is on the Adour. (D'Anville, Notice. fe.)
[G. L.]
VICLS JULIUS, in Gallia, is mentioned only in the Notitia of the Empire as a post under the orders of the general residing at Mogontiacum (Mainz). It is placed between Tabernae (Lhein-Zabern) and Nemetes (Speier). D'Anville supposes Vicus Julius to be Germersheim, at the place where the Queich enters the Rhine.
vicus mathini. [Via Cassia.]
Vicles noves. [Via Salaria.]
VICUS Spacorim. [spacorum Vices]
VICUS Variancs. [Via aemilla, No. 5.]
VIDRUS (Ovidoos), a small const river in the west of Germany, between the Rhenus and the Amisia (Ptol. ii. 11. § 1 : Marcian. p. 51), is probably the same as the Wecht.
VIDUA (Oiviסova, Ptol. ii. 2. § 2), a river on the N. coast of Hibernia; according to Camden (p. 1411), the Crodagh. Others identify it with the Culmore.
VIDUBIA or VIDUBIO, in Gallia, appears in the Table on a road from Andematumum (Langres) t"Cabillio, which is Cabillomun (Chilon sur-Saone). The ruad passes through File or Tile [Tile] to Vi-dubia. The distance in the Table between Tile and Chalon, 39 leagues, is correct : and it is 19 from Tile to Vidubia D'Anville fixes Vidubia at St Bernard, on the little river Vouge, a branch of the Saône. (D'Anville, Notice, frc.)
VIDUCASSES, a Celtic people in Gallia Lagdunensis. Pliny (iv. 18) mentions them before the Bodiocasses, who are suppused to be the Baiocasses [Balocasses]. Ptoleng (ii. 8. § 5) writes the name Oúıסoukaíбtot or Ouitoukd $\sigma \sigma t o$, for we must assume them to be the Viducasses, though be places the Viducassii next to the Osismii, and the Veneti between the Viducassii and the Lexovii. But the Viducasses are between the Baiocasses and the Lexovii. The boundary between the Viducasses and the Baiocasses is indicated by a name Fins (Fines), which often occurs in French geography.

There is a place named Vieux SW. of Caon, in the department of Calvados, some distance from the left bank of the river Orne. This place is mentioned in the titles or muniments of the neighbouring abbey of Fontenai, on the other side of the Orne, under the name of Videocae or Veocae, of which Vieux is a manifest corruption, as D'Anville shows, like Tricasses, Trecae, Troies, and Durocasses, Drocae, Dreux. There is or was a stone preserved in the chiteau of Torigni, in the arrondissement of Saint $L \hat{0}$, in the department of Manche, which contains the inscription ordo civitatis vidveas. This marble, which was found at Vieux in 1580, is said to be the pedestal of a statue placed in the third century of our aera in honour of T. Sennius Solemnis. In the excavations made at Vicux in 1705 were found remaius of public baths, of an aqueduct, a gyinnasium, fragments of columns, of statues, and a great number of medals of the imperial period, besides other remains. Inscriptions, of the date $\boldsymbol{A} . \mathrm{d} .238$, found on the spot show that this city had temples and altars erected to Diana, to Mars, and to Mercury. (Nouveaux Essass sur la Ville de Caen, par M. L'Abbé Delarue, 2 vols. Caen, 1842, cited by Richard et Hocquart, Guide du Voyageur.)

The name of this old town is unknown, but the remains show that it was a Roman city, probably built on a Celtic site; and several Roman roads branch off from it. Some geographers suppose it to be the Araegenus or Araegenue of the Table, which D'Anville would fix at Bayenx. But the site of Araegenus is doubtful. [Augustonurus.] [G. L.]

VIENNA (Oúuéva, Oúüèva: Eth. Viennensis: Vienne), a city of the Allobroges (Ptol. ii. 10. § 11) in Gallia Narbonensis, on the east bank of the Rhone; and the only town which Ptolemy assigns to the Allobroges. Stephanus (s. v. Bievros) gives this form of the word and an Ethnic name Biévios, and he suggests also Bievvijocos and Bievvaios from a form Biévvŋ. He has preserved a tradition about Vienna being a Cretan colony from Biennus in Crete; and accordingly, if this were true, its origin is Hellenic. Dion Cassius (xlvi. 50) has a story ahout some people being expelled from Vienna by the Allobroges, but he does not say who they were. [Lugdunum.]

The position of Vienna is easily fixed by the name and by its being on the Roman road along the east side of the Rhone. There is a difficulty, however, as D'Anville observes, in the Antonite Itinerary, which makes Vienna xxiii. from Lagdunum, and adds the remark that by the shorter cut it is xvi. The number xvi. occurs also in the Table. It is remarked, too, that Seneca (De Morte Claudii, c. 6) says that Claudius was burn at Lugdunum (Lyon), "ad sextum decimum lapidem a Vienna." The real distance from Vienna to the Rhone at Lyon is about 17 M. P.; but D'Anville suggests that the territory of Lugdunum may have had a narrow strip on the south side of the Rhone. There can be no road of 23 M . P. from Lugdunum to Vienna, unless it be one on the west bank of the Rhone. Strabo (iv. pp. 184, 186) makes the distance between Lugdunum and Vienna 200 stadia or 20 M. P., which is too much.

Vienna is first mentioned by Caesar (B. G. vii. 9), and only once mentioned. He had crossed the $C \epsilon$ vennes into the Auvergne in the depth of winter, and he went again over the mountains to Vienna to meet a newly-levied cavalry force, which some time before he had sent on thither. Under the Empire Vienna was a great city, and there was rivalry and enmity between it and Lugdunum. (Tacit. Hist. i. 65.) Mela speaks of it as a flourishing place: and under the Empire it was a Colonia (Plin. iii. 4 ; Tacit. Hist. i. 66), before the time of Claudius, who speaks of it in his Oratio(super Civitute Gallis danda); "Orratissima ecce Colonia valentissimaque Viennensium, quam longo jam tempore senatores huic curiae confert." (J. Lipsius, Excurs. ad Tacit. Ann. lib. xi.) This passage shows that Vienna had already supplied members to the Roman senate, and it must have been a Romana Colonia Martial (vii. 88) calls it "pulcra":-
"Fertur habere meos, si vera est fama, libellos, Inter delicias pulcra Vienna suas."
So Pliny says that his works were in the booksellers' shops at Lugdunum. [Luqdunum.] These facts present a curious contrast between the book trade in a French provincial town under the Empire and at the present day, when a man would not find much. Vienus was also noted for the wine (Martial, siii. 107) that grew in the neighbourhood; and some of the best wines of the Rhone are still made about Vienne. This town afterwards gave name to the subdivision of Narbonensis named Viennensis.

The nodern town of Vienne is in the department of Isère, on the little river Gère, which flows through Vienne to the Rhofne. The modern town is in the narrow valley of the Gire, and extends to the banks of the Rhone. The Roman town was placed on two terraces in the form of amphitheatres. There still exist the foundations of the massive Roman walls above 19,000 feet in circuit which enclosed Vienna. These walls, even in the weakest parts, were about 20 feet thick; and it appears that there were round towers at intervals. There are at Vienne the remains of some arcades, which are supposed to have formed the entrance to the Thermae. They are commonly called triumphal arches, but there is no reason for this appellation. One of the arcades bears the name of the emperor Gratian. There is a temple which M. Schneider has conjectured to have been dedicated to Augustus and Livia, if his deciphering of the inscription may be trusted. This is one of the best preserved Roman monuments of its kind in France after the Maison Carrée of Nimes [Nemausus]. It is now a Museum, and contains some valuable ancient remains and inscriptions. This building is of the Corinthian order, with six columns in front and eight on each side; the columns are above 3 feet in diameter, and 35 feet high, including the base of the capitals.

There is a singular monument near lienne, sometimes called Pontius Pilate's tomb, there being a tradition that Pilate was banished to Vienna. But even if Pilate was sent to Vienna, that fact will not prove that this is his monument. It is a pyramid supported on a quadrangular construction, on the sides of which there are four arcales with semicircular arches at the top; and there are columns at each of the angles of the construction. Each side of the square of this basement is about 21 feet long, and the height to the top of the entablature of the basement is nearly 22 feet. The pyramid with its smaller base rests on the centrul part of the quadrangular construction ; it is about 30 feet high, and the whole is consequently about 52 feet high. The edifice is not finished. It has on the whole a very fine appearance. There is a drawing of it in the Penny Cyclopaedia (art. Vienne), made on the spot in 1838 by W. B. Clarke, architect.

The remains of the amphitheatre have been found only by excavation. It was a building of great magnitude, the long diameter being above 500 feet and the smaller above 400 feet, which dimensions are about the same as those of the amphitheatre of Verona. It has been used as a quarry to build the modern town out of. Three aqueducts supplied Vienna with water during the Roman period. These aqueducts run one above another on the side of the hill which borders the left bank of the Gère, and they are nearly parallel to one another, but at different elevations. The highest was intended to supply the amphitheatre when a naumachia was exhibited. There are also remains of a fourth aqueduct large ennugh for four persons to walk in upright and abreast. These aqueducts were almost entirely constructed under ground, with a fall of about one in a thousand, and for the most part lined inside with a red cement as high up as the spring of the arches.
The Roman road, sometimes called the Via Do. mitia, ran from Arelate (Arles) along the E. side of the river to Lugdunum (Lyon). Where it enters Vienne, it is now more than 3 feet below the surface of the ground, and this depth increases as it goes farther into the town. It is constructed of large blocks of stone. Another road went from Vienna to the Alpis Graia (Little St. Bernard) through Bergintrum; and it is an interesting fact to find that several villages on this road retain names given to them in respect of the distance from Vienne: thus Septème is 7 miles, Oytier 8 miles, and Diémoz 10 Roman miles from Vienne. Another road led from Vienne through Culato (Grenoble) to the Alpis Cottia (Mont St. Geniere). (See Richard et Hocquart, Guide du Voyngeur, for references to modeni works on the antiquities of Vienne, and particularly M. Mermet's work, 8 vo. Vienne, 1829, which contains the answers to a series of questions proposed by the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres; also the references in Ukert, Gallien, p. 453.)
VIGESIMUM, AD. 1. A station in Gallia Narbonensis, the distance of which from a given point determined its name, as we see in the case of other names of places derived from numerals. [Duodecimum, An; Vienna.] The place is xx. M. P. froin Narbo (Narbonne) on the road to Spain, and may be at or near a place called La Palme.
2. There is another Ad Vigesimum which occurs in the Itin. of Bordeaux to Jernsalem, on the road from Toulouse. These numerals show that such cities had the privilege of reckoning their roads from the capital to the limit of their territories, where a Fines often occurs. [Fines.] (D'Anville, Notice, fc.)
[G. L.]
VILLA FAUSTINI, a place of the Iceni in Britannia Romana, on the road from Londinium to the northern boundary wall. (Itin. Ant. p. 474.) Camden (p. 438) identifies it with St. Edmund's Bury; but others have placed it near Thetford, at Wulpit, and at Tornham Parva.
[T. H. D.]
VIMINA'CIUM (Oúyıvdкıov, Ptol. iii. 9. § 3), an important town of Moesia Superior, lying somewhat $E$. of the month of the Margus, and connected with Constantinople by a highroad which passed through Naissus. (Itin. Ant. p. 133 ; Itin. Hierosol. p. 564.) It was the head-quarters of the Legio vir. Claudia. (Ib.; cf. Eutrop. ix. 13 ; Procop. de Aed iv. 6. p. 287 ; Theophyl. i. 5, viii. 12, \&c.) By the later Greeks the name is written $B \mu \iota \nu d \kappa c o \nu$. Variously identified with Ram or Rama, and Kostolacz. (Cf. Marsili, Danub. ii. p. 10 ; Mannert, vii. p. 78.)
VIMINA'CIUM (Oủıцıעdкıov, Ptol. ii. 6. § 50), a town of the Vaccaei in Hispania Tarraconensis, to the E. of Pallancia. (Itin. Ant. pp. 449, 453.) Identified with Valderaduci or Beceril. [T. H. D.]

VINCEIA, a town of Moesia Superior, between Mons Aureus and Margum, and 6 miles from the former. (Itin. Ant. p. 132) In the Itin. Hierosol. (p. 564) it is called Vingeius or Vingeium. Lapie identifies it with Semendria. [T. H. D.]

Vincum. [Bingium.]
VINDA (Oìvoía, Ptol. v. 4. § 7), a place in Galatia, between Pessinus and Ancyra, near the modern Ilidja. (It. Ant. pp. 201, 202.) [L. S.]

VINDALUM, or VINDALIUM (Oüi ${ }^{2} \delta a \lambda o \nu$ ), in Gallia Narbonensis, a place where Domitius Ahenobarbus defeated the Allobroges, B. c. 121. [Gallia Transalpina, Vol. I. p. 954.] Strabo (iv. p. 185) says that Vindalum is at the confluence of the Sulgas [Sulgas] and the Rhône. Florus (iii. 2) names this river Vindalicus or Vindelicus. The Sulgas is the Sorgue. D'Anville, relying, as he often does, on a mere resemblance of name, would place Vindalium at Vedene, which is about a mile from the junction of the Sorgue and the Rhône. Others would place Vindalium at Port de la Traille, the place where the Sorgue joins the Rhone. [G. L.]

VINDANA PORTUS (Oíl $\left.\nu \delta a \nu a \quad \lambda_{i} \mu \not \subset \nu\right)$, a bay on the north-west coast of Gallia (Ptol. ii. 8. §1), and placed by Ptoleny between the mouth of the Herius [Herius] and the Promontorium Gobaeum. D'Anville sapposes the Vindana to be the bay of Morbihan, at the bottom of which was the capital of the Veneti, now Vannes. Other geographers have made other guesses : the bay of Douarnez, the mouth of the Blaret, and others still.

VINDELEIA (Oن̇єvסé入 $\epsilon 1 a$, Ptol. ii. 6. § 53), a town of the Autrigones in Hispania Tarraconensis, between Virovesca and Deobriga. (Itin. Ant. p. 454.) Probably Pancorbo.
VINDELI'CIA (Oviıdeגкia or Bıгסєגкia), the most western of the four Danubian provinces of the Roman empire. In the time of Augustas, it formed a distinct province by itself, but towards the end of the first century after Christ it was united with Rhaetia. At a still later period the two countries were again separated, and Rhactia Proper appears under the name Rhaetia Prima, and Vindelicia under that of Rhaetia Secunda. We have here to speak only of the latter or Vindelicia, as it appears in the time of Augustus, when it was bounded on the north by Germania Magna, that is, by the Danube and the Vallum Hadriani or Limes, on the west by the territory of the Helvetii, on the south by Rhaetia, and on the east by Noricum, from which it was separated by the river Oenns (Inn). The line of demarcation between Vindelicia and Rhaetia is not mentioned anywhere, but was in all probability formed by the ridge of the Rhaetian Alps. Vindelicia accordingly embraced the northeastern parts of Switzerland, the south-eastern part of Baden, the southern part of Wurtemberg and Bavaria, and the northern part of Tirol (Ptol. ii. 12. § 1,13 . § 1 , viii. 7. § 1 ; Sext. Ruf. 8 ; Agathem. ii. 4.) The country is for the most part flat, and only its pouthern parts are traversed by offshoots of the Rhaetian Alps. As to the products of Vindelicia in ancient times, we have scarcely any information, though we are told by Dion Cassius (liv. 22) that its inhabitants carried on agricultare, and by other authors that the country was very fertile. (Solin. 21 ; Isid. Orig. i. 4.) The chief rivens of Vindelicia are : the Danube, the upper part of which flowed through the conntry, and farther down formed its boundary. All the others are Alpine rivers and tributaries of the Danube, such as the Ilargus, Guntia, Licus, Virdo, Isarcs, and the Oenus, which separated Vindelicin from Noricum. The Lacus Brigantinus in the soathwest also belonged to Vindelicia.

The inhabitants of Vindelicia, the Vindelici, were a kindred race of the Rhaeti, and in the time of Augustus certainly Celts, not Germans, as some have supposed. Their name contains the Celtic root Vind, which also occurs in severul other Celtic names, such as Vindobona, Vindomagus, Vindonissa, and others. (Zeuss, Die Deutschen, p. 228, foll.; Diefenbach, Cellica, ii. 1. p. 134, foll.) Others, without assuming that the Vindelicians were Germans, believe that their name is connected with the German Wenden, and that it was used as a general designation for nations or tribes that were not Germans, whence the modern Wend and also the name of the Vandali or Vindili. (Comp. Horat. Carm. iv. 4. 18 ; Strab. iv. pp. 193, 207, vii. pp. 293, 313; Tac. Ann. ii. 17, Hist. iii. 5 : Suet. Aug. 21 ; Vell. Pat. ii. 39 ; Plin. iii. 24.) After their subjugation by Tiberius, many of them were transplanted into other countries. (Strab. vii. p. 207 ; Dion Cass. liv. 22.) The principal tribes into which, according to Strabo, Pliny, and Ptolemy, the Vindelici were divided, were: the Brigantif, Runicatar, Leuni, Consuantae, Benlauni, Breuni, and Licatif. Their more important towns were : Augusta Vindelicorum, their capital, Reginum, Arbor Felix, Brigantium, Vemania, Campodunum, Abodiacum, Abusina, Quintiama Castra, Batava Castra, Vallatum, Isinisca, Pons Oeni, and a few others, which are treated of in separate articles. (Comp. Rayser, Der Oberdonaukreis Bayerns unter den Römern, Augsburg, 1830; J. Becker, Drusus und die Vindelicier, in Schneidewin's Pliloloyus, v. p. 119, foll.)
VINDENAE, a place in Upper Noasia, on the road from Nnissus to Scodra. (Tab. Peut.) [T. H. D.]
 ii. 2. §8), a little river on the E. coast of Hibernia, perhaps that which falls into Strangford Buy ; but Camden (p. 1403) places it more to the N. near Carrick fergus.
[T. H. D.]
Vindili. [Vandala.]
VINDILIS INSULA, on the Atlantic const of Gallia, is mentioned in the Maritime Itin. after Uxantis and Sina or Sena. Middle age documents prove that the island of Belle-fle was once named Guedel, and this is the name Vindilis, the interchange of Gu or G and W or V being common. [Vapincum.] Though this is the only evidence, it is sufficient, for the names agree, and Belle-ile is not likely to have been omitted in the Itin., when smaller islands along the coast are mentioned. [G.L.]

VINDINUM. [SUINDINum.]
VINDIUS MONS (Ö̈ıvঠiov boos, Ptol. vii. 1. § 28), a chain of mountains in Hindostán, extending NE. and SW. nearly, along the N. bank of the Namadus (now Nerbudda), in lat. $21^{\circ}$, long. $117^{\circ}$ $30^{\prime}$. They are now known by the name of the Vindhya Ms., and form the principal watershed of the Ner. buchla and Tapti, which flow into the Indian Ocean, a little to the N. of Bombay, and of the Soane and Andomati, which are great tributaries of the Ganges. [V.]

VI'NDIUS or VINNIUS (OÙí סıò öpos, Ptol. ii. 6. § 21), a mountain in Hispania Tarraconensis, which ran in a W. direction from the Saltus Vasconum and formed the boundary between the Cantabri and the Astures. It formed, therefore, the W. portion of the Cantabrian chain. The Iberus had its source in it.
VINDOBALA, a station on the wall of Hadrian in Britain, which was garrisoned by the Cohors I. Frixagorum. Camden (p. 1090) identifies it with WallsEnd; whilst Horsley (p. 105) and others take it to be Rutchester. (Not. Imp.; Geo. Rav. v. 31.) [Vallum Romanum.]
VINDOBO'NA or VENDOBONA (Óuı $\llcorner\delta \delta 6 o u v a:$ Vienna), a town on the Danube in Upper Pannonia, was originally a Celtic place, but afterwards became a Roman municipium, as we learn from inscriptions. (Grater, Inscript. p. 4.) This town, which according to Ptolemy (ii. 15. § 3) for some time bore the name of Juliobona ('Iovגıóbova), was situated at the foot of Mons Cetius, on the road running along the right bank of the river, and in the course of time became one of the most important military stations on the Danube; for after the decay of Carnuntum it was not only the station of the principal part of the Danubian fleet, but also of the Legio x. Gemina. (It. Ant. pp. 233, 248, 261, 266 ; Tab. Peut.; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 16 ; Agathem. ii. 4 ; Jornand. Get. 50, where it is called Vindomina.) Vindobona suffered severely during the invasion of the Huns under Attila, yet continued to be a flourishing place, especially under the dominion of the Longobards. (Jornand. l.c.) It is well known that the emperor M. Aurelius died at Vindobona (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 16, Epit. 18; comp. Fischer, Brevis Notitia Urbis Vindobonae, Vindobonae, 1767; Von Hormayr, Geschichte Wiens, i. p. 43, foll.; Muchar, Norikum, vol. i. p. 166, foll.) [L. S.]

VINDOGLA'DIA, a place in Britannia Romana, probably in the territory of the Belgae on the road from Venta Belgarum to Isca Dumnoniorum. (Itin. Ant. pp. 483, 486.) The Geogr. Rav. (v. 31) calls it Bindogladia. Some place it at Pentridge, near Old Sarum, where are remains of Roman fortifications. Camden, however (p. 61 ). identifies it with Winburn, and Horsley (p. 472) with Cranburn. [T. H. D.]
VINDOLANA, a station on Hadrian's boundary wall in Britain, where the Cohors Iv. Gallorum lay in garrison. (Not. Imp.) By the Geo. Rav. (v. 31) it is called Vindolanda. Camden (p. 1087) identifies it with Old Winchester, Horsley (p. 89, &c.) with Little Chesters. [Vallum Romantum.] [T.H.D.]
 nensis, one of the two cities which Ptolemy (ii. 10. § 10) assigns to the Volcae Arecomici. There is nothing to determine the position of Vindomagus, except the fact that there is a town Vigan, where some remains have been found. Le Vigan is NW. of Nismes, and on the southern border of the Cévennes.
VINDOMIS or VINDOMUM, a place belonging probably to the Belgue in Britannia Romana on the road from Venta Beigarum to Callera. (Itin. Ant. pp. 483, 486.) Horsley (p. 459) identifies it with Farnham; others have sought it at $E$. Sherborne, and at Whitchurch.
VINDOMORA, a town of the Brigantes in the N. part of Britaunia Romana. (Itin. Ant. p. 464.) It is commonly identified with Ebchester at the NW. boundary of Durham (Horsley, p. 398), where there are remains of a fort, and where Roman antiquities have been discovered. (Cf. Camden, p. 1086; Philos. Trans. No. 278.)

VINDONISSA, in Gallia, is mentioned by Tacitus (Hist. iv. 61, 70). It was the station of the twenty. first legion, A.d. 71, which entered Rhaetia from Vindonissa. The place is Windisch, in the Swiss canton of Aargau, near the junction of the Aur, Reuss, and Limmath. Vindonissa was once a large place, and many Roman remains and coins have been found there. In the Bürlisgrube there are traces of an amphitheatre, and on the road from Brauneckberg to Königsfelden the remains of an aqueduct The name of the xxi. Legion has been discovered in inscriptions found at Windisch. Near Windisch is the former convent and monastery of Königsfelden, where some of the members of the Habsburg family are buried. Several Roman roads help to fix the position of Vindonissa. The Table places it at the distance of xxii. from Augusta Rauracorum (Augst) [Augesta Rauraconum] ; and another road went from Vindonissa past Vitodurum [Vitodercm] to Arbor Felix in Rhaetia. Vindonissa is named Vindo in a Panegrric of Constantine by Eumenius, and Castrum Vindorissense in Maxima Sequanorum in the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces. When Christianity was established in these parts, Vindonissa was the see of the first bishopric, which was afterwards removed to Constanz. In the third and fourth centuries Vandals and Alemanni damaged the town. The Huns afterwards ravaged Vindonissa, and Childebert king of the Franks destroyed it in the sixth century. VINIOLAE, a place of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis, between Acatucci and Mentesa Bastia. (Itin. Ant. p. 402.) Variously identified with Hinojares and as a place on the river Borosa. [T.H.D.] VINNIUS. [Vindics.]
VINO'VIA (in Ptol. Oùıvvoúiov, ii. 3. § 16), a town of the Brigantes in the N. of Britannia Romana. (Itin. Ant. p. 465.) Now Binchester near Bishop Auckland, with remains of Roman walls and other antiquities. (Camden, p.945.) In the Not. Imp. and by the Geogr. Rav. (v. 31) it is called Vinonia.
VI'NTIUM (Oủivtion: Vence), in Gallia Narbonensis, the chief town of the Nerusii. [Nerusir.] Inscriptions have been found at Vence with the words civit. vint. ; and in the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces it is placed in the Alpes Maritimae under the name of Civitas Vintiensium or Venciensium. Vence is in the department of Var, near the river Var. (D'Anville, Notice, $q$ c.) [G. L.] VI'NZELA (Oviv(ena), a town of Gulatia, in the territory of the Tectorages. (Ptol. v. 4. § 8.) A second town of the same name is mentioned by Ptolemy (V. 5. § 8) in the south-east of Pisidia. [L. S.]

Violvascensis PaGus. [Martiails.]
VIPITENUM, a town in Rhaetia belonging to the Venostes, situated between Veldidena and Tridentum. (Jtin. Ant. pp. 275, 280.) Some place it in the Ober-Wipthal; others identity it with Sterzing on the Eisach, at the foot of the Brenner.
VIPOSCIANA, a place in Mauretania Tingitana, on the road from Tocolosida to Tingis. (Itin. Ant. p. 23.) Mannert (x. pt. ii. p. 487) supposes that it is the place called Prisciana by Mela (iii. 10. sab fin.), and Птiokiava or חıokidva by Ptolemy (iv. 1. § 14). The same author identifies it with Mergo, whilst Lapie takes it to be Soe-el-Arba, and Graberg di Hemso, Dar-el-Hhamara [T. H. D.]

VIRACELLUM (Bıрáкe入лov, Ptoi.), a town of Etruria, mentioned only by Ptolemy (iii. 1. § 47), who places it among the inland towns in the NW. corner of that country. It is supposed by Cluverius to be represented by Verrucols or Verrucchia in the mountains between the Serchio and the Magra (Cluver. Ital. p. 75), but the identification is very doubtful.
VIRDO (the Wertach), a small river in the territory of the Licatii in Vindelicia, a tributary of the Licus, which it joins a little below Augusta Vindelicorum. (Paul. Diac. Langob. ii. 13 ; Venant. Fort. Vita S. Mart. iv. 646, where it is less correctly called Vindo or Vinda).

VIRITIUM (Ovipitiov), a place in northern Germany, mentioned only by Ptolemy (ii. 11. § 27), was probably in the territory of the Sidini, on the site of the modern town of Wrietzen on the Oder. (Wilhelm. Germanien, p. 275.)
VIROCO'NIUM (Oúlpok $\delta v i o v, ~ P t o l . ~ i i . ~ 3 . ~ § ~ 19), ~(, ~$ a town of the Cornavii in Britannia Romana, on the road from Deva to Londinium, with a by-road from Maridunum. (Itin. Ant. pp. 482, 484.) It is the town called Urinconium in another route of the Itinerary (p. 469). Now Wroxeter, with ruins and antiquities. (Camden, p. 652.) [T. H. D.]

VIRODUNUM. [Verodenenses.]
VIRomagus. [Bromagus.]
VIROSIDUM (Not. Imp.), a fort or castle at the N. boundary of Britannia Rumana and in the territory of the Brigantes, the station of the Cohors vi. Nerviorum. Camden (p.1022) places it near Warncik Cumberland; whilst others seek it on the S. coast of Solucay Frith, and at Preston. [T. H. D.]

VIROVESCA (Ovi poúк $\sigma \alpha$, Ptol. ii. 6. §53), a town of the Autrigones in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Pompelo to Asturica (Itin. And. pp. 394, 450,454 ; Plin. ii. 3. s. 4). It is the modern Briviesca. (Cf. Florez, Esp. Sagr. xxiv. p. 10, xxvii. p. 13.) Coins in Sestini (p. 211). [T.H.D.]

VIROVIACUM, in Gallia, in the Table, Virovinum, is placed on a route from Castellum (Cassel) to Turnacum (Tournay). The Antonine Itinerary fixes it xvi. from each place. The distances in the Table do not agree; but the site is certain. It is Werwic or Vervoick, a large village on the Lys, 3 leagues from Lille in the Fronch department of Nord. In 1514 a medal of C. Julius Catesar was dug up at Werwic, and some time afterwards other medals of the time of the Antonini. There is a tradition also of the remains of an ancient edifice having been seen here, and a fragment of a statue (Bast, Recueil diAntiquités Romaines et Gauloises trourées dans la Flandre proprement dite, Gand, 1804.) [G. L.]

VIRUEDRUM (Ov́ıpouєठ $\rho o u ̀ \mu$ áкроу, Ptol. ii 3. §5), a promontory on the N. coast of Britannia Barbara, and the most N. point of the island. It is apparently the present Dungsby Head. (Camden, p. 1280.)
Viruni. [Varimi.]
VIRU'NUM (Oüipouvov). 1. One of the most important towns in the interior of Noricum, south of Noreia, and on the road from Aquileia to Lauriacum. (Plin. iii. 27 ; Ptol ii. 14. § 3 ; Steph. Byz. s. v. Bépouvos ; Suid. s. v. Bqpoúviov; It. Ant. p. 276 ; Tab. Peut., where it is called Varunum.) But notwithstanding its importance, which is attested by its widely scattered remains about the village of $\mathbf{M a}$ riasaal near Klagenfurt, no details about it are known, except, from inscriptions, the fact that it was a Roman colony, with the surname of Claudia (Gruter, Inscript. p. 569; Orelli, Inscript. no. 1317, 5074 ; comp. Muchar, Norikum, vol. i. p. 271 .)
2. A town in the country of the Sidini in Germania, of unknown site, and mentioned only by Ptolemy (ii. 11. § 27).
VIkUS (Oúipou ésbonaĺ, Ptol. ii. 6. § 3), a river in the N. part of the W. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis. Variously identified with the Landrove and the Allones.
[T. H. D.]
VISBU'RGII (Oúroboúpyoo), a tribe in the southeast of Gennany, about the sources of the Vistala, and placed by Ptolemy (ii. 11. § 21) near the Quadi, in the district to which Tacitus (Germ. 43) assigns the Gothini.
[L. S.]
VISO'NTIUM (Oútбóvтıoy, Ptol. ii. 6. § 54), a town of the Pelendones in Hispania Tarraconensis, perhaps Vinneza or Binoesca.
[T. H. D.]
VISPI (OJi $\sigma \pi \sigma i$ ), a tribe in the south-west of Germany, is mentioned only by Ptolemy (ii. 11. § 10); nothing certain can be said as to the precise district they iubabited.
[L. S.]
VI'STULA, VISTILLUS (OJıбтodia, Ovíбtovinas: Vistula or Weichsel), one of the great rivers of Germany, separating, according to Ptolemy (viii. 10. § 2 ; comp. ii. $11 . \S 4$, iii. 5. § 5), Germany from Sarmatia, while Pomp. Mela (iii. 4), who calls the river Visula, describes it as forming the boundary between Scythia and Sarmatia. It cannot be expected that either Grecks or Romans stould have possessed much information about this distant river. Ptolenny says that it had its origin in the Hercynia Silva, and discharged itself into the Sarmatian ocean (the Baltic), and Marcianus (p. 53) ascribes to it a course of from 18.50 to 2000 stadia in length. This is all the information to be gathered from the ancient authors. (Comp. Plin. iv. 27. s. 28; Solin. 20 ; Geogr. Rav. iv. 4 ; Amm. Marc. xxii. 8, where it is called Bisula; Jornand. Get. 3.) Jornandes in two passages (Get. 5 and 17) speaks of a river Viscla, which some geographers regard as identical with the modern Wishoka, a tributary of the Vistula, but it is probably no other than the Vistula itself, whose modern German name Weichsel seems to be formed from Viscla.
VISURGIS (Oüítoupyis, Bícoupyts, OJíaoup. ros, or Oúlocoipytos: Weser), one of the principal rivers in north-western Germany, which was tole. rably well known to the Romans, since during their wars in Germany they often advanced as far as its banks，and at one time even crossed it；but they seem to have been unacquainted with its sonthern course，and with its real origin；for it is formed by the confluence of the Werra and the Fulda，while Ptolemy（ii．11．§ 1）imagined that it had its sources in Mons Melibocus．Marcianus（p．51） states that its length amounted to from 1600 to 1780 stadia．The Visurgis flowed into the German Ocean in the country of the Chauci．（Comp．Pomp． Mela，iii． 4 ；Plin．iv． 27 ；Tac．Ann．i．70，ii． 9 ； Vell．Pat．ii． 105 ；Sidon．Apoll．Carm．xxiii． 243 ； Strab．vii．p．291；Dion Cass．xliv．33，lv．1，2，8， lvi．18．）

Vite＇LLIA（Bited入ía，Steph．B．：Eth．Bite入－ dîvos，Vitelliensis），an ancient town of Latium， which was，however，apparently situated in the territory of the Aequi，or at least on their imme－ diate frontiers，so that it is hard to determine whether it was properly a Latin or an Aequian town．But the circumstance that its name is not found in the list of the cities of the Latin League given by Dionysius（v．61）is strongly in favour of the latter supposition．Its name is first mentioned by Livy（ii．39）in the account of the celebrated campaign of Coriolanus，whom he represents as taking Vitellia at the same time as Corbio，La－ bicum，and Pedum：but in the more detailed nar－ ratives of the same campaign by Dionysius and Plutarch，no notice is found of Vitellia．The name is again mentioned by Livy in b．c． 393 ，when the city fell into the hands of the Aequi，who surprised it by a night attack（Liv．v．29．）He there calls it＂Coloniam Romanam，＂and says it had been settled by them in the territory of the Aequi；but we have no previous account of this circumstance； nor is there any statement of its recovery by the Romans．A tradition preserved to us by Suetonius recorded that the Roman colony was at one time entrusted to the sole charge of the family of the Vitellii for its defence（Suet．Vitell．1）；but there can be little doubt that this is a mere family legend．All trace of Vitellia，as well as Tolerium and other towns in the same neighbourhood，dis． appears after the Gaulish invasion，and the only subsequent mention of the name occurs in the list given by Pliny（iii．5．s．9）of the cities of Latium which were in his time utterly extinct．The site is wholly uncertain，though it seems probable that it may be placed in the same part of Latium as Tolerium，Bola，Labicum，and other towns on the frontiers of the Aequian territory．It has been placed by Gell at Valmontone，a place which in all probability occupies an ancient site，and this would do very well for Vitellia，but that it is equally suitable for Tolerium，which must be placed some－ where in the same neighbourhood，and is accord－ ingly fixed by Nibby at Valmontone［Tolerium．］ The latter writer would transfer Vitellia to Civitella （called also Civitella d＇Olevano），situated in the mountains between Olevano and Subiaco；but this seems decidedly too far distant from the other cities with which Vitellia is connected．It would be much more plausible to place Vitellia at Valmontone and Tolerium at Lugnano，about 3 miles NW．of it， but that Lugnano again would suit very well for the site of Bola，which we are at a loss to fix elsewhere［BoLa］．The fact is that the deter－ mination of the position of these cities，which dis－ appeared in such early times，and of which no re－ cord is preserved by inscriptions or other ancient monu－ vol．II．

It was enlarged and adorned by Justinian, whence it obtained the name of Justiniana Secunda. (Procop. de Aed. iv. 1, Goth. iv. 25.) It is commonly identified with the present Giustendil; but Leake (Northern Grecce, iii. p. 475) takes that town to represent the ancient Pantalia or Pautalia in Thrace.

ULTERIOR Por'tis. [Itius Portus.]
ULUBRAE (Eth. Ulubrensis), a small town of Latium on the borders of the Pontine Marshes. It is not mentioned in history precious to the establishment of the Roman dominion, but is noticed repeatedly by Latin writers of the best period, though always as a pror and decayed town. a condition which appears to have resulted from its marshy and unhealthy position. Hence Cicero jestingly terns its citizens little frogs (ranınculi, Ep. ad Fam. vii. 18), and both Horace and Juvenal select it as an almost proverbial example of a deserted and melancholy place. (Hor. Ep. i. 11.30 ; Juv. x. 101.) Still it appears from the expressions of the latter, that it still retained the rank of a manicipal town, and had its own local inagistrates; and in accordance with this, we find the Ulubrenses enmmerated by Pliny among the municipal towns of the First Region. (Plin. iii. 5. s. 9.) The same thing is attested by inscriptions (Orell. Inscr. 121-123), and the discovery of these at the place now called Cixterna, about eight miles from Velletri, and 3.5 from Rume, immediately at the entrance of the Pontine Marshes, leaves no doubt that Ulubrae was situated somewhere in that neighbourhod. But the village of Cisterna (called in the middle ages Cisterna Nermis), does not appear to accupy an ancient site, and the exact position of Ulubrice is still undetermined. UMBRANICI, a penple of Gallia Narbonensis, who had the Jus Latii. (Plin. iii. 4.) There is no further notice of these perple who had this political privilege, except the occurrence of the name Umbranira or Umbranicia in the Table. [G. L.]
 Gpikós), was one of the principal divisions of Central Italy, situated to the E. of Etruria, and extending from the valley of the Tiber to the shores of the Adriatic. The name was, however, at different periods applied within very different limits. Umbria, properly so called, may be considered as extending only from the Tiber, which formed its W. linit through the greater part of its course, and separated Uinbria from Etruria, to the great central range of the Apennines from the sources of the Tiber in the $\mathbf{N}$. to the 3onti della Sibilla in the S. But on the otber side of this range, sloping down to the Adriatic, was an extensive and fertile district extending from the frontiers of l'icenum to the neighbourhood of Ariminum, which had probably been at one time also occupied by the Umbrians, but, before it appears in Kooman history, had been conquered by the Gaulish tribe of the Senones. Hence, ufter the expulsion of these invaders, it became known to the homans as "Gallicus ager," and is always so termed by historians in reference to the earlier period of Roman history. (Liv. xxiii. 14, xxxix. 44 ; Cic. Brat. 14, scc.) On the division of Italy into recions by Augustus, this district was again united with Umbria, both being included in the Sixth Region. (Plin. iii. 14. s. 19.) But even Pliny, in describing this union, distinguishes the "ager Gallicas" from Umbria Proper ("Jungitur his sexta regio Umbriam complexa agrumque Gallicum circa Ariminum, ${ }^{\text {P }}$ Ib.): it is evident therefore that the name of Umbria did not at that time in common usage include the territory on the shores of the Adriatic. In like manner Ptolemy desienates the const from Ancona to Ariminum (termed by Pliny the "Gallica ora") as "the land of the Senones" (Ptol. iii. 1. § 22), a term which had certainly become inappropriate long before his time. It was according to Pliny (l. c.) this portion of the Gaulish territory which was properly designated as Gallia Togata, a name afterwards extended and applied to the whole of Cisalpine Gaul. (Hirt. B. G. viii. 24 ; Cic. Phil. viii. 9, \&c.) It was not, therefore, till a late period that the name of Unbria came into general use as including the whole of the Sixth Region of Augustus, or the land from the 'liber to the Adriatic.
Umbria, in this more extended sense of the name, was trounded on the $W$. by the Tiber, from a point near its source to a little below Ocriculum, which was the most southern city included within the province. Thence the E. frontier ascended the valley of the Nar, which separated Umbria from the land of the Sabines, almost to the sources of that river in the great central chain of the Apennines. Thence it followed a line nearly parallel with the main ridge of those mountains, but somewhat farther to the E. (as Camerinum, Matilica, and other tow us situated on the E. slopes of the Apennines were included in Umbria), as far as the sources of the Aesis (Esino), and then descended that river to its month. We know that on the coast the Aesis was the recognised boundary between Umbria and Picenum on the S., as the little river Rubicon was between Uimbria and Gallia Cisalpina on the N.

From the mouth of the latter stream the frontier must lave followed an irregular line extending to the central range of the Apennines, so as to include the upper valleys of the Sapis and Bedesis; thence it rejoined the line already traced from the sources of the Tiber.

All ancient authors agree in representing the Unbrians as the most ancient people of Italy (Plin. iii. 14. s. 19; Flor. i. 17; Dionys. i. 19), and the traditions generally received described them as originally spread over a much more extensive region than that which ultimately retained their name, and occupying the whole tract from sea to sea, including the territories subsequently wrested from them by the Etruscans. That people, indeed, was represented as gaining possession of its new settlements step by step, and as having taken not less than 300 towns from the Umbrians. (Plin. l.c.) This number is doubtless fabulous, but there seems to be good reason for regarding the fact of the conquest as historical. Herodotus, in relating the Lydian tradition concerning the emigration of the Tyrrhenians, represents the land as occupied, at the time of their arrival, by the Umbrians. (Herod. i. 94.) The traditions reported by Dionvsius concerning the settlements of the Pelasgians in Italy, all point to the same result, and represent the Umbrians as extending at one period to the neighbourhood of Spina on the Adriatic, and to the mouths of the Padus. (Dionys. i. 16-20.) In accordance with this we learn incidentally from Pliny that Butrium, a town not far from Ravenna, was of Umbrian origin. (Plin. iii. 15. 8. 20.) The name of the river Umbro ( Om brone), on the coast of Etruria, was also in all probability a relic of their dominion in that part of Italy. On the whole we may fairly assume as a historical fact, the existence of the Umbrians at a very early period as a great and powerful nation in the northern half of Central Italy, whowe dominion extended from sea to sea, and comprised the fertile districts on both sides of the Apennines, as well as the mountains themselves. According to Zenodotus of Troezen (ap. Dionys. ii. 49), the powerful race of the Sabines itself was only a branch or offshoot of the Umbrians; and this statement is to a great extent confirmed by the result of recent philulugical researches. [Sabini.]

If the Umbrians are thus to be regarded as one of the most ancieft of the races established in Italy, the question as to their ethnological affinities becomes of peculiar interest and importance. Unfortunately it is one which we can answer but very imperfectly. The ancient authorities upon this point are of little value. Most writers, indeed, content themselves with stating that they were the most ancient people of Italy, and apparently consider them us Aborigines. This was distinctly stated by Zenodotus of Troezen, who bad written a special history of the Umbrian people (Dionys. ii. 49); and the same idea was probably conveyed by the fanciful Greek etymology that they were called Ombricans or Ombrians, because they had survived the deluge caused by floods of rain ( $\delta \mu 6 \rho o l$; Plin. iii. 14. s. 19). Some writers, however, of whom the earliest seems to have been one Bocchus, frequently quoted by Solinus, represented the Umbrians as of Gaulish origin (Solin. 2.§ 11 ; Serv. ad Aen. xii. 753 ; Isidor. Orig. ix. 2); and the same view has been maintained by several modern writers, as the result of philological inquiries. Researches of this latter kind have indeed of late years thrown much light upon the affinities of the Umbrian language, of which we possess an important monument in the celebrated tables of Iguvium. [lguvium.] They have clearly established, on the one hand its distinctuess from the language of the neighbouring Etruscans, on the other its close affinity with the Oscan, as spoken by the Sabellian tribes, and with the old Latin, so that the three may fuirly be considered as only dialects of one and the same family of languages. [Italia, p. 86.] The same rescarches tend to prove that the Umbrian is the most ancient of these cognate dialects, thus confirming the assertions of ancient writers concerning the great antiquity of the nation. But, while they prove beyond a doubt that the Uinbrian, as well as the nearly related Oscan and Latin, was a branch of the great Indo-Teutonic family, they show also that the three formed to a great extent a distinct branch of that family or an independent group of languages, which cannot with propriety be assigned to the Celtic group, any more than to the Teutonic or Slavonic.

The history of the Umbrians is very imperfectly known to us. The traditions of their power and greatness all point to a very early period; and it is certain that after the occupation of Etruria as well as of the plains of the Padus by the Etruscans, the Umbrians shrunk up into a comparatively obscure mountain people. Their own descendants the Sabines also occupied the fertile districts about Reate and the valley of the Velinus, which, according to the traditions reported by Dionysius, had originally been held by the Umbrians, but had been wrested from them by the Pelasgians (1)ionys. ii. 49.) At a much later period, but still before the name of the Umbrians appears in Ruman history, they had been expelled by the Senonian Gauls from the region on the shores of the Adriatic. Livy indeed represents them as having previously held also a part of the territory which was subsequently occupied by the Boians, and from which they were driven by the invasion of that people (Liv. v. 35).

It was not till the Romans had carried their arms beyond the immediate neighbourhood of the city, and penetrated beyond the barrier of the Ciminian forest, that they came into contact with the Umbrians. Their first relations were of a friendly nature. The consul Fabius having sent secret envoys through the land of the neighbouring Etruscaus into Umbria, received from the tribe of the Camertes promises of support and assistance if he should reach their country. (Liv. ix. 36.) But the Uinbrian people seem to have been divided into different tribes, which owned no common government and took different lines of policy. Some of these tribes made cominon cause with the Etruscans and shared in their defeat by Fabius. (Ib. 37.) This disaster was followed by two other defeats, which were sustained by the Uinbrians alone, and the second of these, in which their combined forces were overthrown by the consul Fabius near Mevania (b.c. 308), appears to have been a decisive blow. It was followed, we are told, by the submission of all the Umbrian tribes, of whom the perple of Ocriculum were received into the Roman alliance on peculiarly favourable terms. (Liv. ix. 39, 41.)

From this time we bear no more of hostilities with the Uimbrians, with the exception of an expedition against a mere marauding tribe of mountaineers (Liv. x. 1), till b. c. 296, when the Samnite leader Gellius Egnatius succeeded in organising a general confederacy against Rome, in which the Umbrians and Senomian Gauls took part, as well as the Etrus-calls and Samnites. (Liv. x. 21.) Their combined forces were, however, overthrown in the great battle of Sentinum (Ib. 26, 27; Polyb. ii. 19); and this is the last time that the Umbrians, as a people, appear in arms against the Roman power. We are indeed told in the epitome of Livy that the Umbrians were again defeated, and reduced to submission at the same time as the Sallentines, in b.c. 266 (Liv. Epit. xv.); but there seems no doubt that this refers only to the outlying tribe or people of the Sarsinates (on the N. of the Apennines, and adjoining the Boian Ganls), as the Fasti, in recording the events of the year, mention both consuls as triumphing only "de Sarsinatibus" (Fast. Capit.) We have no account of the terms on which the Umbrians were received into submission, or of the manner in which they passed, like their neighbours the Etruscans, into the condition of dependent allies of Rome: it is certain only that the different tribes and cities were, according to the usual Roman policy, admitted on very different tarms. Ocriculum, as already mentioned, enjoyed special privileges; and the same was the case with the Cumertes, who. even in the dars of Cicern, retained a peculiarly favoured pasition, and had a treaty which secured them a nominal independence and equality. (Liv. xxviii. 4.5 ; Cic. pro Balb. 20.) The ferile district of the "Gallicns ager" was in great part occupied by Roman colonies. of which Sena Gallica was founded as early ns в. C. 289 , Ariminuin in в. c. 268, and Pisaurum in в. c. 183. But besides these, a considerable part of that territory was dividel among Roman citizens, by a law of the tribune. C. Flanninius, in b. c. 232. (Cic. Brut. 14.) The other Umbrians continued in the position of dependent allies of Lhome, and appear to have remained uniformly faithful to the powerful republic. Thus, in B. c. 282 , we are told that they were solicited by the envoys of the Tarentines (Dion Cass. Fr. 14t), hat apparently without effect : nor does it appear that their coustancy was for a moment shaken by the successes of Hannibal: and before the close of the Second Punic War we find them coming forward with the offer of volunteers for the army of Scipio. (Liv. xxviii. 45.) In the Social War they are said to have for a time broken out into revolt, and were defeated in a battle by the legate C. Plotius; but it is probable that the defection was a very partial one, and the Romans wisely secured the fidelity of the Umbrians as well as of the Eitruscans by bestowing on then the Roman franchise, в. c. 90 . (Liv. Epit. Ixxiv.: Orss. r. 18; Appisn. B. C. i. 49.)

From this time the name of the Unibrians as a nation disappears from history, though it continued, as already mentioned, to be well known as one of the territorial divisions of Italy. (Tac. Hist. iii. 41, 42; Jul. Capit. Gordiani, 4; &e.) In the early ages of the empire it was still one of the districts which supplied the most numerous recruits to the praetorian cohorts. (Tac. Ann. iv. 5.) As long as the division of Italy into regions subsisted, the name of Umbria continued to be npplied to the sixth region: but from an early period, certainly long before the time of Cunstantine, it was united for administrative purposes with Etruria, and its name seems to have becone gridually merged in that of the more important province. Thus Servius tells us that Uinbria was a part of Tuscia (Serr. ad Aen. xii. 753), and the Liber Coloniaram includes the ancient Uinbrian cities of Hispellum, Tuder. Ameria. &c., among the "Civitates Tusciace" (Lib. Colon. p. 224.) On the other hand, the district $E$. of the Apennines, the ancient Ager Gallicus, was now again separated from Umbria, and became known by the name of Picenum Annonarium. (Mommsen, de Lib. Col p. 211.)

Of the Umbrians as a nation during their perind of independence we know almost nothing. We learn only that they enjoved the repatation of brave and hardy warriors; and the slight sesistance that they opposed to the Roman arms was probably owing to their want of political orgarisation. So far as we learn, they appear to have been divided into several tribes or "populi," such as the Camertes, Sarsinates. &c., each of which foliowed its own line of policy without any reference to a common anthority. No trace is found in history of the existence among them of any national learue or council such as existed among the Etruscans and Latins; and even where the Umbrians are spoken of in general terms, it is often doubtful whether the whole nation is really meam

The physical characters of Umbria are almont wholly determined by the chain of the Apernines. which. as already described, enters the prowince near the sources of the Tiber, and extends thenre without interruption to the lufty gronp of the Monti della Sibilla (the ancient Mons Fiscellus) at the sources of the Nar, and on the confines of Picenum and the land of the Sabines. The Apennines do not rise in this part of the chain to so great an elevation as they attain farther sonth, bat their principal summits within the Umbrian territory range from 4000 to 5500 feet in height; while their namemas ramifications fill up a space rarying from 30 to 50 miles in breadth. A very large portion of Umbria is therefore a mountain country (whence it is termed " montana Umbria" by Martial. iv. 10), though less rugged and difficult of access than the central regions of Italy farther to the $\mathbf{S}$. On the W. the mountain district terminates abruptly on the edge of a broad valley or plain which extends from near Spoleto to the neighbourhood of Perugia, and is thence continued up the valley of the Tiber as far as Citta do Castello. But beyond this plain rises another gronp of hills, connected with the main chain of the Apennines by a ridge which separates Spoleto from Terni, and which spreads out through almost the whole extent of country from the valley of the Nar to that of the Tiber. It is on the outlying hills or underfalls of this range that the ancient Umbrian cities of Tuder and Ameria were placed. The bmad valley between this grmup and the main mass of the central Apennines is a fertile and delightful district, and was renowned in ancient times for the richness and luxuriance of its pastures, which were watered by the streams of the Tinia and Clitumnus. Here we find within a short distance of one another the towns of Treba, Hispellum, Mevania, and Assisium. This district may accordingly be looked on as the heart of Umbria properly so called.

On the E. of the central chain the Apennines descend more gradually to the sea by successire stages, throwing off like arms long ranges of mountains, sinking into hills as they approach the Adriatic. The valleys between them are furrowed tiy numerons streams, which pursue nearly parallel courses from SW. to NE. The most considerable of these are the Aesis (Esinn), which formed the established limit hetween Umbria and Picenam; the Sena, which flowed under the walls of Sena Gallica (Sinigagliu): the far more celebrated Metatiris, which entered the sea at Fanum Fortnnae (Fim.); the Pisauni's, which gave name to the city of pi - saurum (Pesaro); the Crcstcmius, now called the Conca; and the Ammines (Marecchia), which gave its name to the celebrated city of Ariminum, and seems to have been regarded by Pliny as the northern boundary of Uimbria, though that limit was certainly marked at an earlier period by the farfamed though trifling stream of the Rubicos. The river Sapis also flowed through the Uinbrian territory in the upper part of its course, and gave name to the Sapinia Tribus, mentioned by Livy as one of the divisions of the Uimbrian nation.

All the waters which descend on the W. of the Uinbrian Apenuines discharge themselves into the Tiber. Nune of them are considerable streams, and the Tinia and Clitumnus are the only two the ancient names of which have been preserved to us. The Nak, a much more important river, the sources of which are in the Sabine territory, seems to have formed the boundary between Umbria and the land of the Sabines, through a considerable part of its course; but it entered the Umbrian territory near Interamna (Terni), and traversed it thence to its junction with the Tiber.

Two principal passes crossed the main chain of the Apennines within the limits of Uinbria, and served to maintain the communication between the two portions of that country. The one of these was followed by the main line of the Flaminian Way, which proceeded alınost due N. from Furum Flaminii, where it quitted the valley of the Clitumnus, and passed by Nuceria, Tadinam, and Helvillum, to the crest of the mountain chain, which it crossed between the last place and Cales (Cagli), and descended by the narrow ravine of the Furlo (Intercisa) intw the valley of the Metaurus, which it then followed to the Adriatic at Fano (Fanum Furtunae). This celebruted ruad continued throughout the period of the Roman Empire to be the main line of communication, nut only from the plains of Unbria to the Adriatic, but from Kume itself to Ariminum and Cisalpine Gaul. Its military importance is sufficiently apparent in the civil war between Vitellius and Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. i. 86, iii. 50, 52, &cc.) Another lane of roand given in the Antonine Itinerary, quitted this main line at Nuceria, and, turning abruptly to the E., crossed a mountain pass to Prolaqueuin (Pioracu), in the valley of the Potenza, and descended that valley to Septempeda in Picenum (S. Severino), and thence to Ancona. This pass has been in modern times wholly abandoned. The present road from Kome to Ancona turns to the E. from Foligno (Fulginium) and crosses the mountain ridge between that place and Cainerino. descending to Tolentino in the valley of the Chienti (Flasor).

The towns of Uimbria were numerous, though few of them were of any great importance. I. On the W. of the Apennines, and beginning with those nearest to Rome, were: Ocriculum, near the left bank of the Tiber; Narnia and Intehamna, on the banks of the Nar; Ameria and Carsulaf, a few miles w the N. of Narnia; Tuder, on 2 hill on the left baik of the Tiber; Spoletium, in the hills which separate the valley of the Marogyia from that of the Nar; Trebi, Devinia, Hispeliusi, Fulginium, and Assisium, all situated in or bordering on the broad valles above mentioned; Arva and Tifernum Tiberinum in the apper valley of the Tiber, and Iquvien in the mountains at a short distance frum it. Vesionica was probably situated at Cicitclla di Bemezzone. also in the valley of the Tiber. On the Flaminian Way, exactly at the entrance o! the mountains, stod Fontem Fi.iminir, and higher up, on the same line of ruad, Nuceiba, Tadinum, and Helvilicis.
2. On the t . of the central ridge of the A pennines, but still high upamong the mountains, were situated Camerincm, near the sources of the Flusor; Prolaquevm ( Pioraco), near those of the Potentia; Pitulem (liwo). in the same valley; Matilica and Atridius, both in the upper valley of the Aesis; Sintintem, in a lateral branch of the same valley; Tuficum and Suasa, both of them in the valley of the Cesano; Calles (Cagli), on the Flaminian Way; Tifernum Metaurevse and Urbinum Metaurense, both of them in the upper valley of the Metaurus; Forum Sempronil (Fussombrone), lower down in the same valley; Unibinum Hortense ( Crbino), between the valleys of the Metaurus and the Pisaurus; Sestinim (Sestino), near the sources of the latter river; Pitinum linsaurense, probably at Piagnino in the same valley; Sarsina, in the upper valley of the Sapis; and Msvaniola, which is fixed by Cluverius, on the faith of inscriptions discovered there, at Galeata, in the upper valley of the Bedesis or Ronco (Cluver. Ital. p. 623), and is therefure the most northerly town that was included in Umbria.
3. Along the coast of the Adriatic were the important tuwhs of Sena Gallica, Fanum Furtunae, Pisaurum, and Ariminum. To the above munt be added Aesis or Arsitim (Jesi), on the left bank of the river of the same name, and Ostra, the ruins of which are said to exist between the rivers Cesano and Nigolo. (Abeken, Mittel-Italien. p. 41.)
In addition to the abuve long list of towns, the position of which can be assigned with tolerable certainty, the following obscure names are enumerated by Pliny among the towns or communities of Umbria still existing in his time: the Casuentillani, Dolates surnamed Sulentini, Forujulienses surnamed Concubienses, Forobrentani, Pelestini, Vindinates, and Viventani. The above towns being totally unknown, the correct form and orthography of the names is for the most part uncertain. The same is the case with several others which the same writer enumerates as having in his day ceased to exist. (Plin. iii. 14. 8. 19.) Strabo also mentions a place called Laroluin as being situated on the Flaminian Way, in the neighbourhoud of Narnia and Ocriculum (v. p. 227), which is otherwise wholly unknown, and the name is probably corrupt.

Of the natural productions of Uinbria the most celebrated were its cattle, especially those of the valley of the Clitumnus [Clitumncs] ; but its mountain tracts afforded also pasturage to flocks of sheep, which were driven soutliwards as far as Metapontum and Heraclea. (Varr. R.R. ii. 9. § 6.) The luwer prortions of the country abounded in fruit-trees, vines, and olives : but when Propertins terms his native Umbria "terris fertilis uberibus," this can be anderstood only of the tracts on the W. of the Apennines, of which he is there speaking (Prupert. i. 22.9), not of the more extensive mountain regions.

The name of Umbria is still given to one of the provinces of the Papal States, of which Spoleto is the capital ; but this is merely an official designation, the name having been wholly lust in the inidde ages, and being no longer in use as a popnlar appellation.
UMBRO (Ombrone), a river of Etruria, and next to the Arnus the most considerable in that country. It rives in the hills between Siena and A rezon, and has a course of above 50 miles in a SSW. direction till it flows into the Tyrrhenian sea, about 16 miles N. of the promontory of Monte Argentaro. Pliny terms it a navigable river (" navigiorum capax"), and Rutilius describes it as forming at its mouth a tranquil and secure port. (Plin.iii. 5. 8. 8 ; Rutil. Itin. i. 337-340.) It flows near the modern city of Grosseto, and within a few miles of the ruins of Rusellae. The name of Itmbro is considered to be connected with the Umbrians, who held this part of Italy previous to its conquest by the Etruscans : and according to Pliny, the coast district extending from its mouth to Telanion, was still known as the "tractus Umbriae." (Plin. L.c.) [E. H. B.]
UNELLI or VENELI (Ò̇éve入ol), one of the Armoric or maritime states of Gallia. (B. G.ii. 34, iii. 11.) Caesar mentions them with the Veneti, Osismi, Curiosolitae, and other maritime states. The Unelli and the rest submitted to P. Crassus in b.c. 57; but in b.c. 56 it was necessary to send a force again into the country of the Unelli, Curiosolitae, and Lexovii. Q. Titurius Sabinus had the command of the three legions who were to keep the Unelli and their neighbours quiet. The commander of the Unelli was Viridorix, and he was also at the head of all the forces of the states which had joined the Unelli, among whom were the Aulerci Eburovices and the Lexovii. The force of Viridovix was very large, and he was joined by desperate men from all parts of Gallia, robbers and those who were too idle to till the ground. The Roman general entrenched himself in his camp, and made the Galli believe that he was afraid and was intending to slip away by night. The trick deceived the Galli, and they attacked the Roman camp, which was well placed on an eminence with a sloping ascent to it abnut a mile in length. On the Galli reaching the homan camp exhausted by a rapid march up the hill and encumbered with the fascines which they carried for filling up the ditch, the Romans sallied out by two gates and punished the enemy well for their temerity. They slaughtered an immense number of the Galli, and the cavalry pursuing the remainder let few escape. This clever feat of arms is told clearly in the Commentaries.

The Unelli sent a contingent of 6000 men to attack Caesar at the siege of Alesia. (B. G. vii. 75.)

Ptolemy (ii. 8. § 2) names Crociatonum the capital of the Veneli. [Crociatonum.] The people occupied the peninsula of Cotantin or Cotentin, which is now comprehended in the department of La Manche, except a small part which is included in the department of Calvados.

UNSINGIS, according to a reading in Tacitus (Ann. i. 70), a river in the north-west of Germany; but the correct reading in that passage is ad Amisium, as Ritter has shown in his note upon it, Unsingin being only a conjecture of Alting manufactured out of the modern naine of a river called Unse or Hunse.

VOCARIUM or VACORIUM (Ouakólov), a place in Noricum, on the great road leading from Augusta Vindelicorum to Aemona. (Ptol. ii. 14. § 3 ; Tobl. Peut.) Its exact site is matter of conjecture only.

Vocates. [Vasates.]
VOCE'TIUS MONS. This name occurs in Tacitus (Hist. i. 68), and nowhere else. The history shows that Tacitus is speaking of the conntry of the Helvetii. The Vocetius is conjectured to be that part of the Jura which is named Boetzberg. The road from Bite runs through the Frickthal over the Bötzberg to Buden and Zürich. The Helvetii fled from Caecina (A. d. 70) into the Vocetius, where many were caught and massacred. Aventicum, the chief city (caput gentis), surrendered to Caecina. [Aventicum.] It has been proposed to write Vogesus for Vocetius in the passage of Tacitus; but there is no reason for the alteration.

VOCONII FORUM. [FORUM Voconir.]
VOCO' NTII (Oúкdvtior), a people of Gallia Narbonensis, between the Rhoine and the Alps. The only city which Ptolemy (ii. 10. § 17) assigns to them is Vasio [Vasio]. On the north they bordered on the Allobruges, as we learn from Caesar's march (B. G. i. 10). Strabo places the Cavares west of the Vocontii, but he has not fixed the position of the Cavares well [Cavares]. The position of the Vocontii, and the extent of their country, are best shown by looking at the position of Vasio, which was in the south part of their territory, and of Inta [Dea], which is in the vorth part, and Lucus Aagusti, which lies between them [Lucus Augusti].

In the Notitia of the Gallic Provinces we find both Civitas Deentium and Civitas Vasiensium or Vasionensium.
The Vocontii were between the Iseire and the Durance, their southern linit being probably a little south of Vaison. D'Anville supposes that the Vocontii occupied the dioceses of Vaison and Lie, and also a part of the country comprised in the diocese of Gap [Vapincum], and a part of the diocese of Sisteron, which borders on Vaison. Pliny (iii. 4) calls the Vocontii a "Civitas foederata," a people who had a "fuedus" with Rome; and besides the chief places, Vasio and Lucus Augusti, he says they have nineteen small towns. Pliny (ii. 58) mentions that he had been in the country of the Vocontii, where he saw an aerolite which had lately fallen ("delatum" should perhaps be "delapsum"). The Vocontii uccupied the eastern part of the department of Drime, which is a mountainous country, being filled with the lower offists of the Alps, and containing numerous valleys drained by mountain streams. Part of the country is fitted for pasture. Silius Ital. (iii. 466) has:"Tum faciles campos, jam rura Vocontia carpit;"
for he makes Hannibal pass through the Vocontii to the Alps, as Livy (xxi. 31) does.- [G. L.]

VODGORIACUM, in Gallia, is the first place in the Itins. on the rad from Bagacum (Bavai) to Aduatuca (Tongern). This remarkable Roman road is called the Chaussie de Branehaut, or the Haut Chemin. The distance of Vodgoriacum from Bagacum is xii., and the place is supposed to be Foudrei or Vaudre. (D'Anville, Notice, gc.) [G.L.]

VOGESUS. [Vosegus.]
VOLANA. [SAmnium]
VOLANDUM, a castle in Armenia Major, lying a day's journey W. of Artaxata. (Tac. Anrn. xiii. 39.)
VOLATERRAE (Ȯ̇o入aréppau: Eth. Volaterranus: Volterra), one of the most important and powerful of all the Etruscan cities. It was situated on a lofty hill, rising atove the valley of the Cecina, about 5 miles N. of that river and 15 frum the sea. Strabo has well described its remark. able situation on the summit of a hill, which ripuired a steep ascent of 15 stadia from whatever side it was approached, while the summit itself presented a level surface of considerable extent, bounded on all sides by precipices, and crowned by the walls of the ancient city. (Strab. v. p. 223.) The hill on which it stands is, according to modern measurements, more than 1700 English feet in height above the sea, and completely overlooks all the surrounding beights, so that the position of the city is extremely crmmanding. It is indeed the most striking instance of the kind of position which the Etruscans seem to have generally preferred for their cities.

There can be no doubt of the great antiquity of Volaterrae, nor that it was, from the earliest period of Etruscan history with which we have any acquaintance, one of the twelve principal cities of the Eiruscan confederation: this conclusion, to which we should be irresistibly led by the still existing prinfo of its ancient greatness, is confirmed by the earliest notice of it that we find in history, where it appears as one of the five Etruscan cities which furnishod support to the Latins in their war with 'Tarquinius Priscus. (Dionys. iii. 51.) But from this time we find no subsequent mention of Volaterrae in history till a much later period. Its remoteness from Rone will indeed sufficiently account for the fact that its name never fikures in the long protracted wars of the Romans with the southern Etruscans; but even after the Roman anns had been carried inth the heart of Etruria, and the cities of l'erusia and Arretium took active part in the wars, we find no mention of Volaterrae. In B. c. 298, however, we are told that the Roman consul L. Scipio wis encountered near Volaterrae by the combined forces of the Etruscans (Liv. x. 12), among which there is little doubt that those of the Volaterrans themselves were included, though this is not expressly stated. But we do not again find their name noticed in the extant accounts of these wars, and the te:ms on which they were finally reduced to submission by the Romans are unknown to us. We learn only that in common with most of the Etruscans they were received on the forting of dependent allies, and they appear among the "socii" who in the Second Punic War came forward to furnish supplies for the fleet of Scipio, B. c. 205. On that occasion the Volaterrans provided materials for shipbuilding as weli as corn. (Liv. xxviii. 45.) From this time we hear no more of Volaterrae till the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, when the city espoused the cause of the former, and from its great natural strength became the last stronghold of the Marian party in Etruria, and indeed in Italy. It was hesieged by Sulla himself long atter every other city in Italy had submitted, and did not surrender till after a siege or rather blockade of two years' duration. (Strab. v. p. 223; Liv. Epit. Ixxxix.; Cic. pro Rosc. Amer. 7, pro Caec. 7.) As a punishment for its obstinacy, its territory was contiscated by the conqueror; but it appears that it was never actually divided, and the citizens who had survived the calamities of the war remained in possession of their lands, as well as of the rights of Roman citizens, which had been doubtless conferred upon them in common with the other Etruscans by the Lex Julia in b. c. 89. (Cic. pro Iom. 30, ad Fam. xiii. 4, 5, ad Att. i. 19.) It appears that another attempt was made to dispossess them by an agrarian law in the consulship of Cicero, but this calamity was averted from them by the effiorts of the gieat orator, to whom the citizens in consequence became warmly attached (Id. ad Fam. xiii. 4), and it appears prubable that Caesar subsequently confirmed them in the possession both of their lands and municipal privileges. (lb.)

Volaterrae, however, certainly received a colony under the Triumvirate (Lib. Col. p. 214), but does not appear to have retained the title of a Colonia: it is expressly included by Iliny among the municipal towns of Etruria. (Plin. iii. 5. s. 8; Ptol. iii. 1. § 48.) We find no inention of the name in history under the Roman Empire; but it is certain that the city continued to exist ; and it appears again, after the fall of the Western Empire, as a place of importance during the wars of the Goths with Narses (Agath. B. G. i. 11). It continued to subsist throughout the middle ages, and still retains the title of a city and its episcopal see; though it has little more than 4000 inhabitants, and occupies only a small portion of the are:t of the ancient city. The latter is clearly marked out, having comprised the whole level surface of the hill, a very irregular space, above a mile and a half in length and more than 1000 yards in its greatest breadth: the whole circuit of the ancient walls is above three miles and a quarter. Very large portions of these walls are still visible, and these massive fortifications are incontestably the finest specimens of the kind now existing in Etruria: they resemble in their general style of construction those of Faesulae and Cortona, but are composed of a different material, a soft, arenaceous limestone, which composes the whole sammit of the hill on which Volterra stands. This stone, however, like the macigno of Fiesule and Cortona, lends itself readily to the horizontal structure, and is wholly distinct from the hard Apemine limestone of which the polygomal walls of Cosa and other cities are composed. These walls may be traced, at intervals, all round the brow of the hill, following the broken and irregular outlines of its summit, and frequently taking advautage of projecting points to form bold salient angles and outworks. Two of the ancient gates are still preserved; of which the one called the I'orta all Arco still serves as the principal entrance to the city. It is of very massive conistruction, but regularly built, and surmounted liy an arch of perfectly regular form and structure, adorned with three sculptured beads, projecting in relief from the keystone and two of the principal voussoirs. The antiquity of this arch has been a subject of much dispute among antiquarians; some maintaining it to be a specimen of genuine Etruscan architecture, others ascribing it to the Roman period. The arguments in favour of the latter view seem on the whole to prejonderate; though there is no reason to duubt that the Etruscans were acpuainted with the true principles of the construction of the arch. (Dennis's Etruria, vol. ii. pp. 146-150; Micali, Antichi Popoli Ifaliani, vol. iii. pp. 4, 5.*) The other gate, on the N. side of the Etruscan walls, now known as the Porta di Diana or Portone, is of similar plan and construction to the P'orta all Arco; but the arch is wanting.

No other remains of ancient edifices are now extant on the site of Volaterrae, except some portious of Tbermae, of Roman date and little interest ; but the sepulchres which have been excavated on all sides of the city, but particulatly on the N . slope of the hill, have yielded a rich harvest of Etruscan antiquities. Among these the most conspicuous are the sepulchral urns, or rather chests, for ashes, resembling sinall sarcophagi, and generally formed of alabaster, a matarial which is quarried in the immediate neighbourhood. Many of them are adorned with sculptures and bas-reliefs, some of them parely Etruscan in character, others taken from the Greek mythology, and there is no doubt that many of them belong to a period long after the fall of Etruscan independence. The inscriptions are for the most part merely sepulchral, and of little interest; bat those of one family are remarkable as preserving to us the original Etruscan form (Ceicna) of the well-known family of the Caecinae, who figure frequently in Roman history [Cakcina, Biogr. Dict.]. Indeed, the first of this family of whom we have any knowledge - the Aulus Caecina defended by Cicero in b.c. 69 - was himself a native of Volaterrae (Cic. pro Caec. 7). His son was the anthor of a work on the "Etruscan discipline," which is frequently referred to as a valuable source of information in regard to that department of antiquities (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 6 ; Plin. i. Arg. Lib. ii ; Senec. Nat Quacst ii. 39).

There is no doubt that Volaterrae in the days of its independence possessed an extensive territory. Straho distinctly tells us ( $\mathbf{v}$. p. 223) that its territory extended down to the sea-coast, where the town of Vada, or as it was called for distinction's sake, Vada Volatrrrana, constituted its sea-port. It was not indeed a harbour or port in the strict sense of the word ; bat a mere roadstead, where the shoals, from which it derived its name, afforded a good anchorage and some shelter to shipping. Hence it was, in the Roman times, a frequented station for vessels proceeding along the const of Etruria (Cic. pro Quinct. 6: Plin. iii. 5. s 8; Itin. Marit. p. 501); and Ratilius, in particular, has left us an exact description of the locality (Ratil. Itin. i. 453-462). The site is still marked by a mediaeval tower on the const, called Torre di Vada.

The coins of Vulaterrae are numerous, and belong to the class called Aes Grave, from their large size and weight; but they are distinguished from all ather Etruscan coins of this class by their having the name of the city in full; whence we learn that the Etruscan form of the name was Felatriri, or Velatiery, as on the one of which a figure is annezed.

COIK OF VOLATERRAE

VOLCAE, a people of South Gallia, divided into .Volcao Arecomici and Volcae Tectosages (Oidincou

Ptolemy says that the Tectosages occupied the most western parts of the Narbonensis, and that these are their cities: Illiberis, Ruscino, Tolosa Colonia, Cessero, Carcaso, Baeterrae, and Narbo Colonia. Next to them and extending to the Rhóne he places the Arecomici, or Aricomii, as the name is in Pt.stany's teat; and be sxugns to the Arecomii only Vindomagns [Vimbomagus] and Nemansas Colonia (Nismes). These two nations occupied all the Provincia from the Rhone to its western limits; and if Livy is not mistaken (xxi. 26), at the time of Hannibal's invasion of Italy, the Volceo had also possessions east of the Rhome.

The Cebenna (C'évennes) formed a natural boundary between the Volcae Arecumici and the Gabali and Rateni. As to the limits between the Tectosages and the Arecomici there is great difficulty; for while Ptolemy assigns Narbo to the Tectosages, Strabo (iv. p. 203) says that Narbo is the port of the Arecomici; and it is clear that he supposed the Arecomici to have possessed the greater part of the Provincia, which is west of the Rhome, and that be limited the country of the Tectosages to the part which is in the basin of the Garonne. He makes the Tectosages extend also northwards to the Cévennes, in the western prolongation of this range. The chief city of the Arecomici was Nemausus [Nemausus]; and the chief city of the Tectosages was Tolosa; and if Narbo belonged to the Arecomici, we must limit the Tolosates, as already observed, to the basin of the Garome. [Narbo; ToLosa.]

There is some resemblance between the names Volcae and Belgae, and there is some little evidence that the Volcae were once named Belcae or Belgas. But it would be a hasty conclusion from this rosemblance to assume a relationship or identity between these Volcse and the Belgae of the north of Gallia. There was a tradition that some of the Volcas Tectosages had once settled in Germany about the Hercynia Silva; and Caesar (B.G. vi. 24) affirms, but only from hearsay, that these Volcae in his time still maintained themselves in those parts of Germany, and that they had an honourable character and great military reputation. He adds that they lived like the other Germans. The Tectosages also were a part of the Gallic inraders who ontered Macedonia and Greece, and finally fixed themselves in Asia Minor in Galatia [Galatia]. With the Roman conquest of Toloss ended the fame of the Volcae Tectosages in Europe. [G. L.]

VOLCARUM STAGNA. [Stagna VolcaRUM.]

VOLCEIUM or VOLCENTUM (Etk Voleentanus, Plin.; Volceianus, Inecr.: Buccino), a municipal town of Lucania, situated in the mountains W. of Potentia, a few miles from the valley of the Ta nager. The name is rariously written by ancient authors. Livy mentions the Volcentes as a people who in the Second Punic War revolted to Hannibal and received a Carthaginian garrison into their town, but, in B. c. 209, returned to the Roman allinnce. (Liv. xxvii. 15.) There can be no doubt that these are the same people as the Volcentani of Pliny, who are enumerated by that anthor among the municipal communities of the interior of Lucania (Plin. iii. 10. s 15), and it is certain that the Ulci er Volci of Ptolemy (OŻגкoc, Ptol. iii. 1. § 70) refers to the same place, the correct name of which, as we learn from inscriptions, was Volceii or Vulceii, and the people Volceiani. (Mommsen, Incor. R N. pp 15, 16.) The discovery of these inscriptions at Buccino leaves no doubt that this town occupies the site of the Lucanian city of Volceii. (Romanelli, vol. i. p. 422 ; Holsten. Nut. ad Cluver, p. 290.) It appears to have been a considerable manicipal town under the Roman Empire, and is one of the "Praefecturae Lucanise" mentioned in the Liber Coloniarum ( p .800 ).

VOLCI (Oúb入kou, Ptol. : Eth. Volciens : Ru. near Ponte della Badia), a city of Etruria, situated in the plain on the right bank of the river Armina (Fiora), alout 8 miles from its mouth. Very little mention is found of it in history. The name of the city is known from Ptolemy as well as from Pliny, who enumerates, among the municipal towns of Etruria, the "Volcentini cognomine Etrusci," an appellation evidently used to distinguish them from the people of Volcentum in Lucania. (Plin. iii. 5. s. 8; Ptol. iii. 1. § 49.) The name is quoted also by Stephanus of Byzantium, who writes it "Oגcıov, from Polybius. (Steph. B. s. v.) But the only indication that they liad once been a powerful people, and their city a place of importance, is found in the Fasti Capitolini, Which record a triumph in the year в.c. 280 over the Volsinienses and Volcientes (Fast. Capit. ad ann. 473). This was one of the last struggles of the Etruscans for independence, and it was doubtless in consequence of the spirit shown on this occasion by the Volcientes that the Romans shortly afterwards (in B. c. 273) established a colony at Cosa, in their territory. (Vell. Pat. i. 14; Plin. iii. 5. s. 8.) It is expressly stated on this occasion by Pliny, that Cosa was a dependency of Volci (Cosa Volcientium), a statement which has been ignored by those modern writers who have represented Cosa as an independent and important Etruscan city. But while this is very doubtful in the case of Cosa, the evidence, though scanty, is conclusive that Volci was such; and there is even reason to suppose, from a monument discovered at Cervetri, that it was at one time reckoned one of the twelve chief cities of the Etruscan League. (Ann. d. Irst. Arch. 1842, pp. 37-40.)

But notwithstanding these obscure hints of its greatness, the name of Volci was almost furgotten, and its site unknown, or at least regarded as uncertain, when the first discovery of its necropolis in 18.2 led to subsequent researches on the sput, which have brought to light a number of painted vases greatly exceeding that which has been discovered on any other Etruscan site. The unprecedented number, beauty, and variety of these woiks of art have given a celebrity in modern times to the name of Volci which is probably as much in excess of its real importance in ancient times as in the somewhat parallel case of Pompeii. It is impossible here to enter into any detailed account of the result of these excavations. It is calculated that above 6000 tombs in all have been opened, and the contents have been of the most varied kind, belonging to different periods and ages, and varying from the coarsest and rudest pottery to the finest painted vases. The same tombs have also yielded very numerous objects and works of art in bronze, as well as delicate works in gold and jewellery; and after making every alluwance for the circumstance that the cemetery at Volci appears to have enj"yed the rare advantage of remaining undisturbed through ages, it affords incontestable proof that it must have belonged to a wealthy and populous city. The necropolis and its contents are fully described by Mr. Dennis (Etruria, vol. i. pp. 397-427). The results of the excavations, in regard to the painted vases discovered, are given by Gerhard in his Rap. porto su i Vasi Volcenti, published in the Annali dell' Instituto for 1831. It is remarkable that only one of the thousands of tombs opened was adorned with paintings similar to those found at Tarquinii, and, in this instance, they are obviously of late date.

plored since these discoveries have uttracted so much interest to the spot. It stood on the right bank of the river Armina, just below the point where that stream is spanned by a noble bridge, now called the Ponte della Badia, undoubtedly a work of Roman times, though the foundations may be Etruscan. The few remaining relics of antiquity still visible on the site of the city, which occupied a platean of about 2 miles in circumference, are also of Roinan date, and mostly belong to a late period. Inscriptions also have been discovered, which prove it to have continued to exist under the Roman Empire; and the series of coins found there shows that it was still in existence, at least as late as the fourth century of the Christian era. In the middle ages it seems to have totally disappeared, though the plain in which it stocd continued to be known as the Pian di Voci, whence Hulstenius correctly inferred that this must have been the site of Volci. (Holsten. Not ad Clucer. p. 40.) The necropolis was, for the most part, on the other side of the river; and it is here that the excavations have been carried on most diligently. The site of Volci (which is now wholly uninhabited) is about 8 miles from Montalto, a small town at the mouth of the Fiora, where that river was crossed by the Via Aurelia. (Dennis, l.c.) an ancient people of Central Italy, who bear a prominent part in early Roman history. Their territory was comprised within the limits of Latium as that naine was employed at a late period, and under the Koman Empire ; but there is no doubt that the Volscians were originally a distinct people from the Latins, with whom, indeed, they were almost always on terms of hostility. On the other hand they appear as coustantly in ulliance with the Aequi; aud there is little doubt that these two natinns were kindred races, though always distinguished from each another as two separate peoples. We have no statement in any ancient writer as to the ethnic origin or affinities of the Volscians, and are left almost wholly to conjecture on the subject. But the remains of the language, few and scanty as they are, afford nevertheless the safest foundation on which to rest our theories; and these lead us to regard the Volscians as a branch of the same family with the Umbrians and Oscans, who formed the aboriginal population of the mountain tracts of Central Italy. It would appear, indeed, as if they were more closely connected with the Umbrians than either the Sabines and their Sabellian offshoots, or the Oscans properly so called ; it is probable, therefore, that the Volscians had separated at a still earlier period from the mnin stock of the Unibrian race. (Mommsen, Unter-ltul. Dialekt. pp. 319-326; Schwegler, Röm. Gesch. vol. i. p. 178.) The only notice of their language that occurs in Roman authors, also points to it distinctly as different from Oscan (Titinius, ap. Fest. v. Obscum, p. 189), though the difference was undoubtedly that of two cognate dialects, not of two radically distinct languages.

When the Volscians first appear in Roman history, it is as a powerful and warlike nation, who were ulready established in the pissession of the greater part at least of the territory which they subsequently occupied. Their exact limits are not, indeed, to be determined with accuracy; and it is probable that they underwent considerable fluctuations during their long wars with the Latins and Romans. But there seems no doubt that from a very early period they held the whole of the detached mountain group S. of the Tolerus (Sacco), termed by modern geographers the Monti Lepini, together with the ralley of the Liris, and the mountain district of Arpinum, Sora, and Atina. Besides this they were certainly masters at one time of the plains extending from the Volscian Apennines to the sea, including the Pomptine Marshes and the fertile tract that borders on them. This tract they had, according to Cato, wrested from the Aborigines, who were its earliest possessors (Cato ap. Priscian. v. p. 668).

The tirst mention of the Vulscians in Roman history is in the reign of the second Tarquin, when they appear as a numerous and warlike perople. It is clear that it was the great extension of the Roman power under its last king (which must undoubtedly be admitted as a historical fact), and the supremacy which he had assumed over the Latin League, that first brought him into collision with the Volscians. According to the received history he marched into their country and took their capital city, Suessa Pometia, by assault. (Liv. i. 53 ; Dionys. iv. 50 ; Cic. de Rep. ii. 24.) The tradition that it was the spoils there obtained which enabled him to build the Capitel at Rome, sufficiently proves the behef in the great power and wealth of the Volscians at this early period ; and the foundation of the two colonies of Circeii and Signia, both of which are expressly ascribed to Tarquin, was doubtless intended to secure his recent conquests, and to impose a permanent check on the extension of the Volscian power. It is evident, moreover, from the first treaty with Carthage, preserved to us by Polybius (iii. 22), that the important cities of Antium and Tarracina, as well an Circeii, were at this time subject to Tarquin, and could not, therefore, have been in the hauds of the Vulocians.

Bnt the dissolution of the power of Tarquin, and the loss of the supremacy of Rome over the Latins, seem to have allowed the Volscians to regain their former superiority ; and though the chronology of the earliest years of the Republic is hopelessly confused, we seem to discern clearly that it was the increasing pressure of the Volscians and their allies the Aequians upon the Latins that caused the latter people to conclude the celebrated treaty with Rume under Sp . Cassius, B. c. 493, which became the frundation of the permanent relation between the two states. (Liv. ii. 33 ; Dionys. vi. 95.) According to the received annals, the wars with the Volscians had already recommenced prior to this period; but almost immediately afterwards occurs the great and sudden development of their power which is represented in a legendary form in the history of Coriolanus. Whatever may have been the origin of that legend, and however impossible it is to receive it as historically true, there is no doubt that it has a historical foundation in the fact that many of the Latin cities at this period fell successively into the power of the Volscians and their allies the Aequians; and the two lines of advance, so singularly mixed up in the received narrative of the war, which represents all these conquests as made in a single campaign, appear to represent distinctly the two separate series of conquests by which the two nations would respectively press on towards Rome. (Niebahr, vol. ii. pp. 95, 259 ; Schwegler, Röm. Gesch. vol. ii. pp. 274, 275.)*

It is impossible here to give more than a very brief outline of the long series of wars with the Volscians which occupy so prominent a place in the early history of Rume for a perived of nearly two centuries. Little historical value can be attached to the detaik of those wars as they were preserved by the annalists who were copied by Livy and Dionysius ; and it belongs to the historian of Rome to endeavour to dispel their confusion and reconcile their discrepancies But in a general point of view they may be divided (as remarked by Niebuhr), into four periods. The first of these would comprise the wars down to b. C. 459, a few years preceding the Decenvirate, including the conquests ascribed to Coriolanus, and would seem to have been the period when the Volscians were at the height of their power. The second extends from B. c. 459 to 431 , when the dictator $A$. Postumius Tubertus is represented as gaining a victory over the allied forces of the Volscians and Aequians (Liv. iv. 26-29), which appears to have been really an important success, and proved in a manner the turning point in the long struggle between the tro nations. From this time till the captare of Rome by the Gauls (b. c. 390) the wars with the Volscians and Aequians assume a new character ; the tide had turned, and we find the Romans and their allies recovering one after another the towns which had fallen into the hands of their enemies. Thus Labicum and Bola were regained in b. c. 418 and 414, and Ferentinum, a Hernican city, but which had been taken by the Volscians, was again wrested from them in B.c. 413. (Liv. iv. 47, 49, 51.) The fontier fortresses of Verrugo and Carventum were indeed taken and retaken; but the capture of Anxur or Tarracina in B.c. 399, which from that period

[^52]continued constantly in the hands of the Romans mast have been a severe blow to the power of the Volicians, and may be considered as marking an era in their decline. Throughout this period it is remarkable that Antium, one of the most powerful cities of the Volscians, continued to be on peaceful terms with Rome; the war was carried on almost exclusively upon the NE. frontier of the Volscians, where they were supported by the Aequians, and Ecetra was the city which appears to have taken the lead in it.

The capture of Rome by the Gauls marks the commencement of the fourth pericd of the Volscian Wars. It is probable that their Aequian allies sutfered severely from the same invasion of the barbarians that had so nearly proved the destruction of Kone [Aequi], and the Volscians who adjoined their fruntier, may have shared in the same disaster. But on the other hand, Antium, which was evidently at this period a powerful city, suddenly broke off its fisendly relations with Rome; and during a period of nearly 13 years (b. c. $386-374$ ), we find the Volscians enyaged in almost perpetual hostilities with Rome, in which the Antiates uniformly took the lead. The seat of war was now transferred from the Aequian frontier to the southern foot of the Alban hills: and the towns of Velitrae and Satricum were taken and retaken by the Volscians and Romans. Sonn atter the conclusion of peace with the Antiates we hear for the first tine of Privernum, as engaging in hostilities with Rome, b. c. 358, and it is remarkable that it comes forward single-handed. Indeed, if there had ever been any political league or bond of union among the Volscian cities, it would seem to lave been by this time completely broken up. The Antiates ayain appear repeatedly in arms; and when at length the general defection of the Latins and Campanians bruke out in B. c. 340, they were among the first to join the enemies of Rome, and laid waste the whole sea-coast of Latium, almost to the walls of Ostia. But they shared in the defeat of the Latin armies, buth at Pedum and on the Astura: Antium itself was taken, and received a colony of Romans within its walls, but at the same time the citizens themselves were admitted to the Roman franchise. (Liv. viii. 14.) The people of Fundi and Furmiae, both of them probably Vulscian cities, received the Roman franchise at the same time, and Tarracina was soon after occupied with a Roman colony. The Priverrates alone ventured once more to provoke the hostility of the Romans in b. c. 327, but were severely punished, and their city was taken by the consul C. Plautius. Nevertheless, the inhabitants were admitted to the Roman Civitas ; at first, indeed, without the right of suffrage, but they soon afterwards obtained the full franchise, and were enrolled in the Ufentine tribe. The greater part of the Volscians, however, was included in the Pomptine tribe.

Of the fate of the cities that were situated on the borders of the valley of the Trerus, or in that of the Liris, we have scarcely any infurmation; but there is rearon to suppose that while the Antiates and their neighbours were engaged in hostilities with home, the Volscians of the interior were on their side fully uccupied with opposing the advance of the Samnites. Nor were their efforts in all cases successful. We know that both Arpinum and Fregellae had been wrested from the Volscians by the Samnites, before the Romans made their appearance in the contest (Liv. viii. 23, ix. 44), and it is probable that the other cities of the Vulscians readily touk shelter under the protection of Rome, for security against their common enemy. It seems certain, at all events, that before the close of the Second Samnite War (B. c. 304), the whole of the Volscian people had submitted to the authority of Kome, and been admitted to the privileges of Roman citizens.

From this time their name disappears from history. Their territory was comprised under the general appellation of Latium, and the Volscian people were merged in the great mass of the Koman citizens. (Strab. v. pp. 228, 231 ; I'lin. iii. 5. s. 9 ; Cic. pro Ball. 13.) But a rude and simple mountainpeople would be naturally tenacious of their customs and traditions; and it is clear, from the manner in which Juvenal incidentally alludes to it, that even under the Roman Empire, the name of the Volscians was by no means extinct or forgotlen in the portion of Central Italy which was still occupied by their descendants. (Juv. Sat. viii. 245.)

The physical geography of the land of the Volscians will be found described in the article Latium. Of the peculiar characters of the people themselves, or of any national customs or institutions that distinguished them from their Latin neighbours, we know absolutely nothing. Their Listory is a record only of the long struggle which they maintained against the Roman power, and of the steps which led to their ultimate subjugation. This is the only memory that bas been transmitted to us, of a people that was for so long a periud the most formidable rival of the Ruman Republic.

VOLSINIENSIS LACUS ( $\dot{\eta} \pi \in \rho$ OU Onowious $\lambda(\mu \nu \eta$, Strab. v. p. 226: Lago di Bolsena), a considerable lake of Etruria, scarcely inferior in size to that of Trasimene. It took its name from the town of Vulsinii, which stood on its NE. shore; but it was also sometines called Lacus Tarquiniensis, as its western side adjoined the territory of Tarquinii. (Plin. ii. 96.) Notwithstanding its great sice, it is probable, from the nature of the surrounding hills and rocks, that it is the crater of an extinct volcano (Dennis, Etruria, vol. i. p. 514). In this lake the river Marta has its source. It abounded in fish, and its sedgy shores harboured large quantities of water-fowl, with which articles it supplied the Roman narkets. (Strab. L.c.; Colum. viii. 16.) It contained two islands, of which, as well as of the lake itself, wonderful stories were related by the ancients. They were remarked to be ever changing their forms (Plin. l.c.), and on one occasion during the Second Punic War its waters are said to have flowed with blood. (Liv. xxvii. 23.) The shores of the lake were noted for their quarries (Plin. xxxivi. 22. s. 49.) In a castle on one of the islands queen Amalasontha was murdered by order of her husband Theodatus. (Procop. B. Goth. i. c. 4, p. 23, ed. Bunn.) VOLSINII or VULSINII (Oúo入 $\sigma$ iviol, Strab. v. p. 226; Ó̇o入 $\sigma(\nu t o \nu$, Ptol. iii. 1. § 50: Bolsena), an ancient city of Etruria, situated on the shore of a lake of the same dame (Lacus Volsiniensis), and on the Via Clodia, between Clusium and Forum Cassii. (Itin. Ant. p. 286; Tab. Peut.) But in treating of Volsinii we must distinguish between the Etruscan and the Koman city. We know that the ancient town lay on a steep height (Zonaras, $A n n$. viii. 7 ; cf. Aristot. Mir. Ausc. 96); while Bolsena, the representative of the Roman Volsini, is situated in the plain. There is considerable difference of opinion as to where this height should be sought. Abeken (Miftelitalien, p. 34, sey.) louks for it at Monte Fiuscone, at tne southern extremity of the lake; whilst Müller (Etrusker, i. p. 451) neeks it at Orvieto, and adduces the name of that place=Urbs Vetus. "the old city," as an argument in farour of his view : but Mr. Dennis (Etruria, vol. i. p. 508) is of opinion that there is no reason to believe that it was so far from the Roman town, and that it lay on the summit of the hill, above the amphitheatre at Bolsena, at a spot called Il Piazzano. He adduces in support of this hypothesis the existence of a good deal of broken pottery there, and of a few caves in the cliffs below.

Volsinii appears to have been one of the most powerful cities of Etruria, and was doubtless one of the 12 which formed the Etruscan confederation, as Volsinii is d signated by Livy (x. 37) and Valerius Maximus (ix. 1. extern. 2) as one of the "capita Etruriae." It is described by Javenal (iii. 191) as seated among well-wooded hills.

We do not hear of Volsinii in history till after the fall of Veii. It is possible that the success of the Roman arms may have excited the alarm and jealousy of the Volsinienses, as their situation might render them the next victims of Roman ambition. At all events, the Volsinienses, in conjunction with the Salpinates, taking advantage of a famine and pestilence which lad desolated Rome, made incursions into the Roman territory in B.c. 391. Bat they were easily beaten: 8000 of them were made prisoners; and they were glad to purchase a twenty years' truce on condition of restoring the booty they had taken, and furnishing the pay of the Roman ariny for a twelvemonth. (Liv. จ. 3i, 32.)

We do not again hear of Volsinii till the year R. c. 310 , when, in common with the rest of the Etruscan cities, except Arretium. they took part in the siege of Sutrium, a city in alliance with Rome. (Liv. ix. 32.) This war was terminated by the defeat of the Etruscans at lake Vadino, the first fatal shock to their power. (Ib. 39.) Three years afterwards we find the consul P. Decius Mus capturing several of the Volsinian fortresses. (Ib. 41.) In 295, I. Postumius Megellus ravaged their territory and defeated them under the walls of their own city, slaying 2800 of them; in consequence of which they, together with Perusia and Arretium, were glad to purchase a forty years' peace by the payment of a heavy fine. (ld. x. 37.) Not more than fourteen years, however, had elapsed, when, with their allies the Vulcientes, they again took up arms against R.one. But this attempt ended apparently in their final subjugation in в. c. 280 . (Liv. Ep. xi.: Fast. Cons.) Pliny (xxxiv. 7. s. 16) retails an absurd story, taken from a Greek writer called Metrodorus Scepsius, that the object of the Romans in capturing Volsinii was to make themselves masters of 2000 statues which it contained. The story, however, saffices to show that the Volsinians had attained to a great pitch of wealth, luxury, and art. This is confirmed by Valerius Maximus (l.c.), who also adds that this luxury was the cause of their ruin, by making them so indolent and effeminate that they at length suffered the management of their commonwealth to be usurped by slaves. From this degrading tyranny they were rescued by the Rumans. (Flor. i. 21 ; Zonarus, L c.; A. Victor, Vir. Illestr. 36 : Oros. iv. 5.)

The Romans, when they tonk Volsinii, razed the town. and compelled the inhabitants, as we have already intimated, to migrate to another spot. ( $70-$ naras, l. c.) This second, or Roman, Volsinii cone tinued to exist under the Enpire. It was the birthplace of Sejanus, the minister and favourite of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. iv. 1, vi. 8.) Juvenal (x. 74) alludes to this circumstance when he considers the fortunes of Sejanus as dependent on the favour of Nursia, or Norsia, an Etruscan goddess much worshipped at Volsinii, into whose temple there, as in that of Jupiter Capitolinus at Rone, a nail was annually driven to mark the years. (Liv. vii. 3; Tertull. Apol. 24.) According to Pliny, Volsinii was the scene of some supernatural occurrences. He records (ii. 54) that lightning was drawn down from heaven by king Porsenna to destroy a monster called Volta that was ravaging its tervitory. Even the commonplace invention of hand-mills, ascribed to this city, is embellished with the traditional prodigy that some of them turned of themselves! (Id. xxxvi. 18. 8. 29.) Indeed. in the whote intercourse of the Romans with the Etruscans, wo see the ignorant wonder excited by a cultivated people in their semi-barbarons conquerors.

From what has been already said it may be inferred that we should look in vain for any traces of the Etruscan Volsinii. Of the Roman city, however, some remains are still extant at Bolsena. The most remarkable are those of a temple near the Florence gate, vulgarly called Tempio di Norzia But the remains are of Roman work; and the real temple of that goddess most probably stood in the Etruscan city. The amphitheatre is suall and a complete ruin. Besides these there are the remains of some baths, cippi, sepulchral tablets, a sarcophagus with reliefs representing the triumpla of Bacchus, &c.

VOLUBILIANI. [Volebilis.]
VOLUBILIS (Oúo入oubidis, Ptol. ir. 1. § 14), a town of Mauretania Tingitana, seated on the river Subur, and on the road from Tocolosida to Tingis, from the former of which plices it was only 4 miles distant. (Itin. Ant. p. 23.) It lay 35 miles SE. from Banasa, and the same distance from the const (Plin. v. 1. s. 1; Mela, iii. 10.) It was a Rumau colony (Itin. Ant. l.c.) and a place of some innportance. Ptolemy calls the inlabitants of the surrounding district, Volubilani (Oivoloubidavoí, iv. 1. § 10). In the time of Leo Africanus (p. 279, ed. Lonbach) it was a deserted town between Fez and Mequince, bearing the name of Valili or Gualili, the walls of which were 6 Italian miles in circumference. That position is now occupied by tho town of Zanitat-Mtula-Iriss, on mount Zarhom. At some distance to the NW. are the splendid rains of Kassr Faraun (Pharaoh's castle), with Roman inscriptions; but to what ancient city they belong is unknown. (Cf. Mannert, x. pt. ii. p. 486 ; Graberg di Hemsö, p. 28; Winnner, Gemälde von Afrihn. i. p. 439.)

VOLUCE (probably the Oíé $\begin{gathered}\text { oura of Ptol. ii. } 6 . ~\end{gathered}$ § 56), a town of the Pelendones in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Cuesaraugusta, and 25 miles W. of Numantia. (ltin. Anf. p. 442.) Variously identified with Veluchaz (Velache), Valecha, and Cahtañazor. [T. H. D.]

VORDELiSES, in Gallia Narbonensis, an ethnic name which occurs in an inscription found at Apt, the site of Apta Julis [Arta Juina]. The inscription states that the "Vordenses pagani" dedicate this monument to their patronus, who is designated "IIII vir" of the Colonia Apta. The place is supposed to be Gordes, which is contignous to the diocese of $A p t$, and in that of Caraillon. The change of Vord into Gorl is eavily explained. [VApinctm.] (D'Anville Notice. fc ) [G. L.]

VOREDA, a town of the Brigantes in Britannia Romana, on the road from Cataracton to Luguvallium. (Itin. Ant. p. 467.) It is variously identitied with Ohl l'enrith, Whelp Castle, and Coal Hills. By the Geogr. Rav. (v. 3I) it is called Bereda.

VORGA'NIUM (Óvoprdyıon), in Gallia Lugdunensis, the capital of the Osismii [Osismit], a Celtic people in the north-west part of Bretagne (Ptol ii. 8. § 5). This seems to be the same place as the Vorginum of the Table; and it appears on a route which leads from the capital of the Namnetes through the capital of the Veneti, and ends on the const at Gexncribate, or Gesshrivate, as some would.write it. Between the capital of the Veneti and Vorginum is Sulis, supposed to be at the junction of the Suel and the Blavet [Sutis]. From Sulis to Vorginum the distance is marked xxiiii., and this brings us to a place named Karhez (D'Anville). But all this is very uncertain. Others fix Vurginum at a place named civemené
VORO'GIUM, in Gallia, is placed in the table on a road from.Augustonemetum (Clermont Ferrand) through Aquae Calidae (Vichy) to Ariolica (Avrill). The distance is marked viii. from Aquae Calidae, and xiiii. from Vorocium to Ariolica. There is a place named Vouroux, which is the same name as Vormium. Vouroux is near the small town of Varennes, and somewhat nearer to the banks of the Allier. The direct distance from the springs of Vichy to Varennes is somewhat less than the Itin. diotance of viii. Gailic leagues, but the 8 leagues are not more than we may assign to the distance from Vichy to Varennes along the river. Bat the Itin. distance from Vorogium to Ariolica is somewhat too large compared with the real distance. (D'Anville, Notice. &c.)

VOSALIA. [Vobava.]

VOSAVA or VOSAVIA, in North Gallia, is placed by the Table on the Roman road along the west bank of the Rhine, and between Bontobrice or Baudubrica (Boppart) [Bavioobrica] and Bingium (Bingen). It stands halt-way between these places and at the distance of viiii. Vosava is Oberreesel on the Rhine, north of Bingen; and it is alunost certain, as D'Anville sugges's, that the name is erroneously written in the Table, and that it should be Vosalia.
[G. L.]
VO'SEGUS (Vogesen, Vasgau, Vosges). The form Vosegus has better authority than Vogesus (Schneider's Caesar, B. G.iv. 10) ; and the modern name also is in favour of the form Vosegus. Lucan is sometimes quoted as authority fur the form Vogesus :

"Castraque quae Vogesi curvam super ardua rupem Pugaaces pictis cohibebant Lingonas armis."
(Pharsal. i. 397.)
The name is Boogicov in the Greek version of the Commentaries.

Caesar says that the Mosa (Mans) rises in the Vosecus, by which he means that the hills in which the Muas rises belong to the Vosges. But be says no more of this range. The battle with Ariovistus, B. c. 58 . was fought between the southern extremity of the Voages and the Rhine, but Caesar (B. G. i. 43, 48) gives no name to the rance ander which Ariovistus encamped in the great plain between the Vosges and the Rhine. D'Anville observes that an inscription in honour of the god Vosegus was found at Berg-Zabern on the confines of Alsace and the Palatinate, which proves that the name Vosegus extended as far as that place. It seems likely that the name was given to the whole range now called Vosges, which may he considered as extending from the deprexsion in which is formed the canal of the Rhine and Rhine, between Beffort and Altkirch, to the bend of the Rhine between Mainz and Bingen, a distance of above 170 miles. The range of the Vosges is parallel to the Rhine. The hilly country of the Faucilles in which the Maas rises is west of the range to which the name of Vosges is now given. The Vosges are partly in France. ard partly in Rhenish Bararia and Hesse Darmstart.

The territory of the Sequani originally extender to the Rhine, and the southem part of the Vosges was therefore included in their limits. North of the Sequani and west of the Vosges were the Leuci and Mediomatrici; and east of the Vosges and between the Vosges and the Rhine were the Rauraci, Triboci, Nemetes, Vangiones, and Caracates.

In the Table the Silva Vosagus is marked as a long forest on the west side of the Rhine. Pliny (xvi. 39) also speaks of the range of the Vosegus as containing timber.

UR, a castle of the Persians mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxv. 8), in his account of the war between Julian and the Persians. It must have been situated in Mesopotamia, at no great distance from Hatra ( $A l$-Hathr). It has been generally supposed that Ur is the same place as that mentioned in Genesis (xi. 28); but the recent researches of Colonel Rawlinson have demonstrated that the Ur whence Abraham started was situated in the S. part of Babylonia, at a place now called Muqeher. (Journ. Roy. As. Soc. 1855.)

URANO POLIS (Oípavórodis), a town in the peninsula Acte of Chalcidice in Macedonia, of which we know nothing, except that it was fiunded by Alexarchus, the brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia (Athen. iii. p. 98; Plin. iv. 10. 8. 17). As Pliny does not mention Sane in his list of the towns of Acte, it has been conjectured by Leake that Uranopolis occupied the site of Sane. (Northern Greece, vol. iii. p. 149.)

URANO'POLIS (Olpavbmodis), a town of Pisidia, in the district of Cabalia, to the north-west of Termessus, and south-east of Isionda. (Ptol. v. 5. § 6.)
URBA, 2 town of Gallia, in the territory of the Helvetii. It is placed in the Antonine Itin. between Lacus Lausonius and Ariolica [Ariolica], xviii. from Lacus Lausonius and xxiiii. from Ariolica. Urba is Orbe in the Swiss Canton Waadt or Pays de Vaud, on the road from the Lake of Nicufchatel to the Lake of Genera, and on a hill nearly surrounded by the river Orbe.

URBANA COLONIA, mentioned by Pliny only (xiv. 6. s. 8), was a colony founded by Sulla in a part of the territory of Capua, adjoining the Falernus ager. From its name it would appear probable that it was a colony of citizens from Rome itself, who were settled by the dictator in this fertile district. It is doubtfal whether there ever was a town of the name, as no allusion is found to it as such, and the district itself was reunited to that of Capua before the time of Pliny. (Plin. l. c.; Zumpt, de Col. p. 252.)

URBIGENUS PAGUS. [Helveti, Vol. I. p. 1041.]

URBINUM (Oúpeivov), was the name of two cities or municipal towns of Umbria, situated within a short distance of each other, which were distinguished by the epithets Hortense and Metaurense. (Plin. iii. 14. s. 19.)

1. Urbinum Hortense (Urbino), apparently the more considerable of the two, and for that reason frequently called simply Urbinum, was situated on a hill between the valleys of the Metauras and the Pissurus (Foglia), rather more than 20 miles from the Adriatic. It is mentioned by Pliny among the municipal towns of Umbria, and is incidentally noticed by Tacitus as the place where Fabius Valens, the general of Vitellius, was put to death, in A.d. 69, after he had fallen into the hands of the generals of Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. iii. 62.) Its municipal rank is confirmed by numerous inscriptions, which prove it to have been a town of some importance. (Orell. Inscr. 3714 ; Gruter, Inscr. p. 337. 8, p. 392. 1, &ec.) Procopius also notices it during the Gothic Wars, and correctly describes it as situated on a steep and lofty hill; it was at that time a strong fortress, but was besieged and taken by Belisarius in A. d. 538. (Procop. B. G. ii. 19.) From this time it seems to have continued to be a place of consideration, and in the middle ages became the seat of government of a race of independent dukes. It is still a considerable city, and one of the capitals of the delegation of Urbino and Pesaro, but has no remains of antiquity, except the inscriptions above noticed.
2. Uhbinum Metaurense (Urbania), was situated, as its name imports, in the valley of the Metaurus, on the right bank of the river, about 6 miles below S. Angelo in Vado (Tifernum Metaurense), and 9 from Urbino. Its municipal rank is attested by an inscription, in which the inhabitants are termed Urvinates Mataurenses, as well as by Pliny (Gruter, Inscr. p. 463. 4; Plin. iii. 14. s. 19); but it seems never to have been a place of much importance. In the middle ages it fell into complete decay, and was replaced by a village called Castel Durante, which, in 1625, was enlarged and raised to the dignity of a city by Urban VIII., from whon it derives its present name of Urbraia. (Cluver. Ital. p. 620; Rampoldi, Diz. Top. vol. iii. p. 1278.) [E. H. B.]

URBS SALVIA (Oúpba ミanovia, Ptol. iii. 1. § 52: Eth. Urbis Salviensis or Urbisalviensis: Urbisaglia), a town of Picenum, mentioned by Pliny among the municipal towns of that district. (Plin. iii. I3.
s. 18.) It was situated on a hill above the valley of the Flusor (Chienti), about 2 miles from the right bank of that river, and 7 miles $\mathbf{E}$. of Tolentinum. The testimony of Pliny to its municipal rank is confirmed by the Liber Coloniarum, which mentions the "ager Urbis Salviensis," as well as by an inscription (Lib. Col. p. 226; Orell. Inscr. 1870); and it seems $t$, have been a flourishing town until it was taken and destroyed by Alaric, a calamity from which it never recovered, so that it still lay in ruins in the time of Procopius. (Procop. B. G. ii. 16.) Dante also notices it in the 13 th century as in complete ruins (Par. xvi. 73); but the name has always survived, and is still attached to the modern L'rbisaglia, which is, however, a mere village, dependent on Macerath. The Itineraries give two lines of crossroads which passed throngh Urbe Salvia, the one from Septempeda (S. Severino) to Firmum (Fermo), the other from Auximum through Ricina and Urbs Salvia to Asculum. (Itin. Ant. p. 316; Tab. Peut.)
URBS VETUS (Orvieto), a city of Etruria mentioned by Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Jang. iv. 33) together with Balneum Kegis (Bagnaréa) in the same neighbourhood. No mention of either name occurs in any writer before the fall of the Roman Empire, but it is probable that the Urbiventum (Oipsibeviov) of Procopius, which figures in the Gothic Wars as a fortress of some importance, is the same place as the Urbs Vetus of P. Diaconas. (Procop.B.G. ii. 20.) There is no doubt that the modern name of Orvicto is derived from Urbs Vetus; but the latter is evidently an appellation given in late times, and it is doubtful what was the original name of the city thus designated. Niebuhr supposes it to be Salpinum, noticed by Livy in b. c. 359 (Liv. v. 31 ; Niebuhr, vol. ii p. 493) [SALPinem], while Italian antiquaries in general identify it with Herbanum. [Henbanima.] But both suggestions are mere conjectures. [E.H. B.]

URCESA (Oथ́pкєба or Oйpкаıба, Ptol. ii. 6 § 58), a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis. According to some, the modern Requena, whilst others identify it with Veles or Orgas. (Coins in Sestini p. 212.)
[T.H.D.]
URCI (Plin. iii. 3. s. 4 ; O 0 ркп, Ptol. ii. 6. § 14), a town of the Bastetani in Hispania Tarraconersis, on the borders of Baetica, or according to another boundary line, which makes the latter reach as far as Barca, in Baetica itself, on a bay named after it, and on the road from Castulo to Malaca (Mela, ii. 6, where the editions incorrectly hare Urai and Virgi; Itin. Ant. p. 404.) Variously identified with Abruceña, Puerto de Agrailas, and Alsoduz. Ukert, however (ii. pt. i. p. 352), would seek it in the neighbourhood of Almeria.
[T. H. D.]
URCITANUS SINUS, a small bay either on the $S$. coast of Hispania Tarrnconensis or in Baetica, named after the town of [rci. It was separated by the Promontorium Charidemi from the Sinus Masiesiens on the E. (Mela, ii. 6.) Now the bay of AL meria.
UllGAO, a town in Hispania Baetica, on the road from Corduba to Castulo (Itin. Ant. p. 403), with the surname of Alba. (Plin. iii. 1. s. 3.) In the editions of the Itinerary it is called Urcao and Vircao; and according to inscriptions in Grater (ccxlix. 3, cexliii. 6), it was a municipium, with the name of Albense Urgavonense. Must probably Arjona. (Cf. Murales, Ane. p. 74; Florez, Esp. Sayr. xii p. 379.)

USI＇PETES or USI＇PI（Oи̇ $i \pi \pi \epsilon \tau \alpha \iota$ ，Oй $\sigma \iota \pi \alpha \iota$ ），a German tribe，mostly mentioned in conjunction with the Tencteri，with whom they for a long time shared the same fate，until in the end，having crossed the lower Rhine，they were treacherously attacked and defeated by Julius Caesar．（Caes．B．G．iv．4， \＆c．；Appian，de Reb．Gall． 18 ；comp．Tencteri．） After this calamity，the Usipetes returned across the Rhine，and were received by the Sigambri，who as－ signed to them the district on the northern bank of the Luppia，which had previously been inhabited by the Chamavi and Tubantes，and in which we hence－ forth find the Usipetes as late as the time of Tacitus． （Ann．xiii．55，Hist．iv．37，Germ．32；Dion Cass． liv．32，foll．）Afterwards the Usipetes are met with farther sonth, opposing Germanicus on his return from the country of the Marsi. (Tac. Ann. i. 50, 51 ; comp. Dion Cass. xxxix. 47 ; Plut. Caes. 22.) In Strabo (vii. p. 292) they appear under the name of Oöriroc, and Ptolemy (ii. 11. § 10) mentions a tribe of the name of OUíanoi, whom some believe to be the same as the Usipetes ; but if this be correct, it would follow that the Usipetes migrated still farther sonth, as Ptolemy places these Vispi on the upper Rhine; bot as no other authority places them so far south, the question is altogether uncertain. About the year A. D. 70, the Usipetes took part in the siege of Moguntiacum (Tac. Ann. xiii. 54), and in A. D. 83 a detachment of thein is mentioned as serving in the Roman army in Britain. (1d. Agric. 27.) Afterwards they disappear from history. (Comp. Zeuss, Die Deutschen, p. 88 ; Wilhehn, Germanien, p. 139.)

UTICA (ท̀ 'Irúkๆ, Polyb. i. 75 ; Ptol. iv. 3. § 6 ; Oútiky, Dion Cass. xli. 41 ; Eth. Uticensis; Liv. xxix. 35 ; Caes. B. C. ii. 36), a colony founded by the Tyrians on the N. const of Zeugitana in Africa. (Vell. Pat. i. 2; Mela, i. 7; Justin. xviii. 4, \&c.) The date of its fourdation is said to have been a few years after that of Gades, and 287 years before that of Carthage. (Vell. Pat. L. c.; Aristot. Mirab. Ausc. 146; Gesenius, Monum. Script. Linguaeque Phoenic. p. 291 ; Sil. Ital. Pun. iii. 241, sqq. \&cc.) Its name signified in Phoerician, "ancient," or "noble" (yתיקה, Gesen. ib. p. 420, and Thes. Ling. Heb. p. 1085). Utica was situated near the mouth of the river Bagradas, or rather that of its western arm, in the Bay of Carthage, and not far from the promontory of Apollo, which forms the western boundary of the bay. (Strab. xvii. p. 832; Liv. l. c.; Ptol. L a; Appian, B. C. ii. 44, seq.; Procop. B. V. ii. 15, \&ec.) It lay 27 miles NW. of Carthage. (Itin. Ant p. 22.) The distance is given as 60 stadia in Appian ( $P u n .75$ ), which is probably an error for 160 ; and as a day's sail by sea. (Scylax, Geogr. Min. i. p. 50, ed. Huds.) Both Utica and Tunes might be descried from Carthage. (Strab. L c. ; Polyb. i. 73 ; Liv. $x \times x .9$ 9.) Litica possessed a good harbour, or rather harbours, made by art, with excellent anchorage and numerous landing places. (Appian, l. c.; cf. Barth, Wanderungen durch die Kustenlinder des Mittelmeers, pp. 111. 125.) On the land side it was protected by steep hills, which, together with the sea and its artificial defences, which were carefully kept up, rendered it a very strong place (Liv. xxix. 35; App. Pun. 16, 30, 75; Diod. $x$ x. 54; Plut.Cat. Min. 58.) The surrounding country was exceedingly fertile and well cultivated, and produced abundance of corn, of which there was a great export trade to Rome. (Liv, xxp. 31.)

The hills behind the town, as well as the district near the present Porto Farina, contained rich veins of various metals; and the coast was celebrated for producing vast quantities of salt of a very peculiar quality. (Plin. $x \times x i .7$. s. 39 ; Caes. B. C. ii. 37 ; Polyb. xii. 3, seq. ; Diod. xx. 8, \&c.) Among the buildings of the town, we hear of a temple of Japiter (Plut. Cat. Min. 5) and of one of Apollo, with its planks of Numidian cedar near twelve centuries old (Plin. xvi. 40. s. 79); of a foram of Trajan, and a theatre outside the city. (Tiro Pmsper, ap. Morcelli, Afr. Christ. iii. p. 40 ; Caes. B. C. ii. 25.) The toinb and statue of Caw on the sea-shore were extant in the time of Plutarch (16. 79). Shaw (Travels, vol. i. p. 160, seq.) has the merit of having first pointed out the true situation of this celebrated city, the moot important in N. Africa after Carthage. Befure the time of Shaw, it was sought sometimes at Biserta, sometimes at Porto Farina; but that learned traveller fixed it near the little miserable Lnuar, which has a holy tomb called Boo-shatter; and with this view many writers have agreed (Falbe, Recherches sur IEmplacement de Carthage, p. 66; Barth, Wanderungen, foc. p. 109 ; Semilasso, pp. 39, 46; Ritter, Afrika, p. 913, \&c.) Since the Roman times the muddy stream of the Bagradas has deposited at its mouth a delta of from 3 to 4 miles in extent, so that the innermest recess of the Bay of Carthage, on which ancient Utica was situated, as well as the eastern arm of the river itself, have been converted into a broad morass, in which traces are still visible of the quays which formerly lined the shore, and of the northern mole which enclosed the harbour. More towards the E., at the margin of the chain of hills which at an earlier period descended to the sea, may be discerned blocks of masonry belonging to the ancient town wall. On the declivity of the hills towards the SE. are the remains of six cisterns, or reservoirs, 136 feet long, 15 to 19 feet broad, and 20 to 30 feet deep, covered with a remarkably thin arched roof. These are connected with an aqueduct, which may be traced several miles from Buo-shatter, in the direction of the hills: but its most remarkable remains are a treble row of arches by which it was carried over a ravine. These reservoirs may probably have served to furnish water for a naumachia in the neighbouring amphitheatre, which is hollowed out of the hills, and is capable of containing about 20,000 persons. The ancient site of the city is coverel with ruins. Near its centre rises the highest summit of the chain of hills on which stood the citadel and, probably, also the ancient temple of Apollo. The ruins of other temples and castles have been discovered, as well as the site of the senate honse (Plut. Cat. Min. 67), which has been thought to be determined by the excaration of a number of statues. These are now preserved in the museum at Leyden.

In the course of time, as is asual with such connections, Utica became severed from the mother-city, and first appears in history as independent of it. In the first commercial treaty between Rome and Carthage, in the year 509 в. c., Utica was probably included in it among the allies of the Carthaginians (Polyb. iii. 22) ; in the second, in B. c. 348, it is expressly natned (ib. 24 ; Diodor. xvi. 69, who however confounds the two treaties), as well as in the alliance concluded by Hannibal with Philip of Macedon in the Second Punic War, b. c. 215 (Polyb. viii. 9). Subsequently, however, Utica appears to have thrown off her depeudence upon, or perhaps we should rather call it her alliance with, Carthage, and, with other cities of N. Africa, to have joined the Sicilian Agathocles, the opponent of Carthage; to have afterwards revolted from that conqueror, but to have been again reduced to obedience (Diod. xx. 17, 54 : cf. Polyb. i. 82). In the First Ponic War, Utica remained faithful to Carthage; afterwards it joined the Libyans, but was compelled to submit by the victorious Carthaginians (Polyb.ib. 88: Diod. Fr. xxv.). In the Second Punic War also we find it in firm alliance with Carthase, to whose fleets the excellent harbour of Utica was very serviceable. But this exposed it to many attacks from the Romans, whose freebooting excursions were frequently directed against it from Lilybaeum, as well av to a more regular, but fruitless siege by Scipio himself (Liv. xxv. 31, xxvii. 5, xviii. 4, xxix. 35, xxx. 3, &c. ; Polyb. xiv. 2 ; Appian, Punic. 16, 25, 30). In the third war, however, the situation of Carthare being now hopeless, the Uticenses indulged their ancient grudge against that city, and made their submission to Rome by a separate embassy (Polyb. xxxvi. 1 ; Appian, Pun. 75, 110, 113). This step greatly increased the material prosperity of Utica. After the destruction of Carthage, the Romans presented Utica with the fertile district lying between that city and Hippo Diarrhytus. It became the chief town of the province, the residence of the Roman governor, the principal emporiun for the Roman commerce, and the port of debarcation for the Roman armaments destined to act in the interior of Africa. Owing to this intimate connection with Rome, the name of Utics appears very frequently in the later history of the republic, as in the accounts of the Jugurthine War, of the war carried on by Pompey at the head of Sulla's faction, against the Marian party under Domitius and his ally the Numidian king Iarbas, and in the struggle between Caesar and the Pompeians, with their ally Juba. It is unnecessary to quote the numerous passages in which the name of Utica occurs in relation to these events. In the last of these wars, Utica was the scene of the celebrated death of the younger Cato, so often related or adverted to by the ancients (Plut. Cat. Min. 58, seq.: Dion Cass. xliii. 10, sqq.; Val. Max. iii. 2. § 14; Cic. pro Ligar. 1, &c. ; cf. Dict. of Biogr. Vol. I. p. 649). Augustus presented the Uticenses with the Roman ciritas, partly as a reward for the inclination which they had manifested for the party of his uncle, and partly also to indemnify them for the rebuilding of Carthage (Dion Cass. xlix. 16 ; cf. Sext. Rufus, Brev. 4). We know nothing more of Utica till the time of Hadrian, who visited N. Africs in his extensive travels, and at whose desire the city changed its ancient constitution for that of a Roman colony (Spartian. Hadr. 13; Gell. N. Att. xvi. 13). Thus it appears in the Tab. Peut. with the appellation of Colonia, as well as in an inscription preserved in the museam of Leyden (Col. Jul Ael. Hadr. Utic., ap. Janssen, Mus. Lugd. Batav. Inser. Gr. et Lat.). Septimius Severus, an African by birth, endowed it, as well as Carthage and his birthplace Leptis Magna, with the Jus Italicum. We find the bishops of Utica frequently mentioned in the Christian period from the time of the great Synod under Cyprian of Carthage in 256, down to 684, when a bishop of Utica appeared in the Council of Toledo. The city is said to have witnessed the martyrdom of 300 persons at one time (cf. Morcelli, Afi. Christ. i. p. 362, ii. p. 150 ; Munter, Primod. Eccl. Afr. p. 32 ; Augustin, c. Donat. vii. 8). Utica probatily fell with Carthage, into the hands of the Vandals under Genseric in 439. Subsequently it was recovered by the Byzantine emperors, but in the reign of the Chalif Abdelmalek was conquered by the Arabians under Hassan ; and though it appears to have been again recovered by John the prefect or patrician, it finally sank under the power of the Saracens during the reign of the same Chalif, and on its second capture was destroyed (cf. Papencordt, die Vandal Herrschaft in Afr. p. 72, sq., 151, sq. ; Weil, Gesch. der Chalifer, i. p. 473, sqq. ; Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, vi. 3.50, sqq. ed. Smith). The remains of its marbles and columns were carried away in the preceding century, to serve as materials for the great mosque of Tunis (Semilasso, p. 43.)

Several coins of Utica are extant bearing the heads of Tiberius or Livia; a testimony perhaps of the gratitude of the city for the rights bestowed upon it by Augustus (cf. Mionnet, Med. Ant. vi. p. 589 ; Supp. viii. p. 208).

UTIS or VITIS (Montone), a river of Gillia Cisalpina, which rises in the Apennines, flows under the walls of Forli (Forum Livii), and subsequently by the city of Ravenna, and enters the Adriatic about 5 miles from that city. At the present day it joins the Ronco (the Bedesis of Pliny), before reaching the latter city, but in ancient times it probably discharged its waters by a separate channel into the lagunes which at that time surrounded Ravenna. The name is written Vitis by Pliny (iii. 14. s. 19), but it is probable that Utis or Utens is the more correct form, which is found in Livy. According to that author it at one time formed the boundary between the Boian and Senonian Gauls. (Liv. v 35.)

VULTUR MONS (Munte Voltore), one of the most celebrated mountains of Southern Italy, sitaated on the confines of Apulia, Lucania, and the country of the Hirpini. It commences about 5 miles to the S. of the modern city of Melf, and nearly due W. of Verosa (Venusia), and attains an elevation of 4433 feet above the level of the sea. Its regular conical form and isolated position, as well as the crater-like basin near its summit, at once mark it as of volcanic origin; and this is confirned by the nature of the rocks of which it is composed. Hence it cannot be considered as properly belonging to the range of the Aprennines, from which it is separated by a tract of hilly country, forming as it were the buse from which the detached cone of Monte Voltore rises. No ancient author alludes to the volcanic character of Mount Vultur; but the mountain itself is noticed, in a well known passage, by Horace, who must have been very familiar with its avpect, as it is a prominent object in the view from his native city of Venusia. (Carm. iii. 4. 9-16.) He there terms it " Vultur Apulus," though he adds, singularly enough, that he was without the limits of Apulia (" altricis extra limen Apuliae") when he was wandering in its woods. This can only be explained by the circumstance that the mountain stood (as above stated) on the confines of three provinces. Lucan also incidentally notices Mt. Vultur as one of the mountains that directly fronted the plains of Apulia (Lucan, ix. 185.)

The physical and geological characters of Mount Vultur are noticed by Romanelli (vol. ii. p. 233), and more fully by Daubeny (Description of Volcanoes, chap. 11).

VULTURNUM (Ȯ்u入入тoūpvov: Castel Volturno), a town of Campania, situated on the sex-coast at the mouth of the river of the same name, and on its $S$. bank. There is no trace of the existence of any town on the site previous to the Second Punic War, when the Romans constructed a fortress (castellum) at the month of the river with the object of securing their possession of it, and of establishing a magazine of corn for the use of the army that was be-ieging Capua. (Liv. xxv. 20,22.) It is probable that this continued to exist and gradually grew into a town; but in B. c. 194, a colony of Roman citizens was established there, at the same time with Liternum and Puteoli. (Id. xxxiv. 45; Varr. L. L. v. 5.) The number of colonists was in each case but small, and Vulturnum does not appear to have ever risen into a place of much importance. But it is noticed by Livy as existing as a town in his time (" ad Vulturni ostium, ubi nunc urbs est." $\times x v .20$ ), and is mentioned by all the geographers. (Strab. v. p. 238; Plin. iii. 5. s. 9: Mel. ii. 4. § 9; Ptol. iii. 1. §6.) We learn also that it received a fresh colony under Augustus (Lib. Colon. p. 239), and retained its colonial rank down to a late period. It became an episcopal see before the close of the Roman Empire, and appears to have continued to subsist down to the 9 th century, when it was destroyed by the Saracens. In the 17 th century a new fortress was built nearly on the ancient site, which is called Castel Volturno or Castelf a Mare di Volturno. But from the remains of the ancient city still visible it appears that this occupied a site somewhat nearer the sea than the modern fortress. Several inscriptions have been found on the spot, which attest tie colonial rank of Vuiturnum as late as the age of the Antonines. (Mommsen, I. R. N. 35353539.)
[E. H. B.]
VULTURNUS (Oioudroùpvos: Volturno). the most considerable river of Campania, which has its sources in the Apennines of Samnium, about 5 miles $S$. of Aufidena, flows within a few miles of Aesernia on its left bank, and of Venafrum on its right, thence pursues a SE. course for about 35 miles, till it receives the waters of the Calor (Calore), after which it turns abruptly to the WSW., passes under the walls of Casilinum (Capoua), and tinally discharges itself into the Tyrrhenian sea about 20 miles below that city. Its mouth was marked in ancient times by the town of the same name (Vulturnum), the site of which is still occupied by the modern fortress of Castel Volturno [Vulturnum]. (Strab. v. pp. 238, 249; Plin. iii. 5. s. 9 ; Mel. ii. 4. § 9.) The Vulturnus is s deep and rapid, but turbid stream, to which character we find many allnsions in the Roman prets. (Virg. Aen. vii. 729; Orid. Het. xv. 714 ; Lucan. ii. 423; Claudian. Paneg. Prob. et Ot. 256; Sil. Ital. viii. 530.) A bridge was thrown orer it close to its mouth by Dumitian, when he constructed the Via Dumitia that led from Sinuessa direct to Cumae. (Stat. Silv. iv. 3. 67, &cc.) From the important position that the Vultarnus orrupies in Campania, the fertile plains of which it traverves in their whole extent from the foot of the Aprennines to the sea, its name is frequently mentioned in history, especially during the wars of the Romans with the Cuinpanians and Samnites, and again daring the Second Panic War. (Liv. viii. 11, x. 20, 31, 2xii. 14, &c.; Polyb. iii. 92.) Previous to the construction of the bridge above mentioned (the remains of which are still visible near the modern Castel Volturno), there was no bridge over it below Casilinum, where it was crossed by the Vis Appia. It appears to have been in ancient times navigable for sinall vessels at least as far as that city. (Liv. xxvi. 9; Stat. Silv. iv. 3. 77.)

Its only considerable tributary is the Calor. which brings with it the waters of sereral other streams, of which the most important are the TAmarus and Sabatus. These combined streams bring down to the Vultumus almost the whole waters of the land of the Hirpini; and hence the Calor is at the point of junction nearly equal in magnitude to the Vultumus itself. [E. H. B.]

VUNGUS, VICUS, in North Gallia, is placed by the Antonine Itin. on the road from Durocortoruin (Reims) to Augusta Trevirorum (Trier). Vungns is between Durocortorum and Epoissum (Iptsch, Ivois), or Epusum [Eroisscim], and marked xxii. leugae from each place. The direction of this road from Reims is to the passage of the Mars or Meuse at Mouson; and before it reaches Irois it brings us to a place named Vonc, near the river Aisne, a little above Attigni. This is a gwod exsmple, and there are many in France, of the old Gallic names continaing unchanged. Flodoard, in his history of Reims, speaks of "Municipium Vongum," and the "Piyus Vongensis circa Axonnae ripas." The Axonua is the Aisne. The Roman road may be traced in several places between Reims and Vonc; and there is an indication of this road in the place named Vau dEtré (de strata), at the passage of the river Suippe.

UXAMABARCA (Oí $\xi \mu \mu a \dot{\rho} \rho \kappa \alpha$, Ptol. ii. 6. § 53), a town of the Autrigones in Hispania Tarraconensis. (Murat. Inscr. p. 1095. 8.) Ckert (ii. pt. i. p. 446 ) identifies it with Osma in Biscaya. [T. H. D.]

UXANTIS INSULA, for so the name should be read in the Maritime Itin., is I'liny's Axantos (iv. 30), an island off the Atlantic coast of Gallia. Uxantis is Ouessant, or Ushant, as the English often write it, a small island belonging to the department of Finistere, and nearly is the latitude of Brest.

UXELLODU'NUM, in Gallia. In b. c. 51 Drappes a Senon and Lucterius a Cadurcan, who had given the Romans much trouble, being pursued by C. Caninius Rebilus, one of Caesar's legates, took refuge in Uxeilodunum, a town of the Cadurci (B. G. viii. 32-44): Uxellodunum was in a position naturally strong, protected by rocks so steep that an armed man could hardly climb up, even if no resistance were made. A deep valley surrounded nearly the whole elevation on which the town stood, and a river flowed at the bottom of the valley. The interval where the river did not flow round the steep sides of this natural fortress was only 300 feet wide, and along this part ran the town wall. Clowe to the wall was a large spring, which supplied the town during the siege, for the inhabitants could not get down the rocks to the river for water without risk of their lives from the Roman missiles. Caninius began his blockade of Uxellodunum by making three camps on very high ground, with the intention of gradually drawing a vallum from each camp, and surrounding the place. On the river side his camps were of course separated from the town by the deep valley in which the river flowed; he may have planted two camps here and one on the land side of Uxellodunum.

The townsmen remembering what had happened at Alesia the year before, sent out Lucterius and Drappes to bring supplies into the place. Lacterius and Drappes took all the fighting men for this purpose except 2000, and they collected a large quantity of corn; but as Lucterius was attempting to carry it into the town by night, the Romans surprised him, and cut his men to pieces. The other jurt of the force which had gone out was with Diappes about 12 miles off. Caninius sent his cavalry and light German troops against Drappes to surprise him, and he followed with a legion. His success was most complete. Drappes was taken prisoner and his force destroyed or captured. Caninius was now enabled to go on with his circumvallation without fear of interruption from without, and C. Fabius arriving the next day with his tronps undertook the blockade of part of the town.

Caesar hearing the news about Usellodunum and resolving to check all further risings in Gallia by one signal example more, hurried to the place with all his cavalry, ordering C. Calenus and two legions to follow hin by regular marches. He found the place shat in, but it was well supplied with provisions, as the deserters told him; and there remained nothing to do but to cut off the townsmen from the water. By his archers and slingers, and by his engines for discharging missiles (tormenta) placed opposite those parts of the town where the descent to the river was easiest, he attempted to prevent the enemy from coming down to the river to get water. His next operation was to cut them off from the spring, and this was the great operation of the slege on which depended the capture of the town. Caesar dealt with his enemies as a doctor with a disease - he cut off the supplies. (Frontinns, Strat. iv. 7. 1.) He moved his vineae towards that part of the town where the spring lay under the wall, and this was the isthmus which connected the hill fort with the open country. He also began to construct mounds of earth, while the townsmen from the higher ground annoyed the Romans with missiles. Still the Ku mans pushed on their vinese and their earthworks, and at the same time began to form mines (cuniculi) to reach the source of water and draw it off. A mound of earth 9 feet high was constructed, and a tower of ten stories was placed upon it, not high enough to be on a level with the top of the wall, but high enough to command the summit level of the spring. Thas they prevented the enemy from reaching the spring, and a great number of cattle, horses, and men died of thirst. The townsmen now tumbled down blazing barrels filled with fat, pitch, and chips of wood, and began a vigorous onset to prevent the Romans from quenching the flames; for the burning materials being stopped in their descent by the vineae and mounds, set the Roman works on fire. On this Caesar ordered his men to scale the heights on all sides and to divert the defendants from the land side by a feint of attacking the walls. This drew the enemy from the fire; and all their furce was empluyed in manning the walls. In the meantime the Romans put out the fire or cut it off. The obstinate resistance of the enemy was terminated by the spring being completely dried up by the diversion of the water through the subterraneous passages which the Romans had constructed; and they surrendered after many of them had died of thirst. To terrify the Galli by a sigual example, Caesar cat off the hands of all the fighting men who remained alive.

The attack and defence of Uxellodunum contain a full description of the site. This hill-fort was surrounded by a river on all sides except one, and on this side also the approach to it was steep. It is agreed that Uxellodunum was somewhere either on the Oltis (Lot) or on the Duranius (Dordogne). D'Anville places it at Prech $d$ Issolu, on a small stream named the Tourmente, which flows into the Dordogne after passing Puech $d$ Issolu. He was informed by some person acquainted with the locality that the spring still exists, and we may assume that to be true, for Caesar could not destroy the source: he only drew off the water, so that the besieged could not get at it. D'Anville adds that what appeared to be the entrance of the place is called in the country le portail de Rome, and that a hill which is close to the Puech, is named Bel-Castel. But this distinguished geographer had no exact plan of the place, and had not seen it. Walckenaer (Gérg. des liaules, i. p. 353) aftirms that the plan of Puech dIssolu made by M. Cornuau, at the request of Turgot does not correspond to the description in the Gallic War, for the river Tourmente washes only one of the four sides of this hill; he also says, that nothing appears easier than to turn the river towards the we.t on the north side of the town, and to prevent its course being continued to the south. But the author of the eighth book of the Gallic War says that Cresar could not deprive the defenders of Uxellodunum of the water of the river by diverting its course, "for the river flowed at the very foot of the heights of Uxellodunum, and could not be drawn off in any direction by sinking ditches." There is a plan of Capdenac in Caylus' Antiquités (tom. $\begin{aligned} \\ \text {. }\end{aligned}$ pl. 100, p. 280), and Walckenaer observes that this also corresponds very imperfectly with the doscription. The researches of Champollion (Nouvelles Recherches sur Uxellodunum), which are cited by Walckenaer, appeared in 1820 . Walckenaer makes some objection to Capdenac, on grounds which are not very strong. He says that the Lot is above 300 feet wide where it surrounds Capdenac, and one cannot conceive how archers placed on one bank could have prevented the besieged from getting water on the other side. If the archers and slingers were on the river in boats or rafts, which is likely enough, this objection is answered, even if it be true that an archer or slinger could not kill a man at the distance of 300 feet. Walckenaer makes sone other objections to Capdenac, but they are mainly founded on a misunderstanding or a perversion of the Latin text.

It is possible that we have not yet found Uxellodunam, but a journey along the banks of the Lot, for that is more probably the river, might lead to the discovery of this interesting site of Cuesar's last great military operation in Gallia. The position of the place, the attack, and the defence, are well described; and it cannot be difficult to recognise the site, if a man should see it before his eyes. Nothing could be easier to recognise than Alesia. It is impossible for any man to doubt about the site of Alesia who has seen Alise [Mnndubir]. In the case of Uxellodunum, we have not the help of a corresponding modern name, unless it be a place not yet discovered.

UNENTUM (OÉgevtov, Ptol.: Eth. Uxentinus: Ugento), a town of Calabria, in the territory of the Sallentines, situated about 5 miles from the sea. coast, and 16 from the lapygian Promontory (Capo di Leuca). It is mentioned by both Pliny and Ptolemy among the inland towns which they assign to the Sallentines, and is placed by the Tabula on the raad from Tarentum to the extremity of the peninsula. (Plin. iii. 11. s.16; Ptol. iii. 1. § 76; Tab. Peut.). The name is corruptly written in the Tabula Uhintum, and in Pliny the MSS. give Ulentini, for which the older editors had substituted Valentini. Hence Ptolemy is the only authority for the form of the name (though there is no doubt that the place meant is in all cases the same); and as cwins have the Greek legend OZAN, it is doubtful Whether Uxentum or Uzentam is the more correct form. The site is clearly marked by the modern town of Ugento, and the ruius of the ancient city were still visible in the days of Galateo at the frot of the hill on which it stands. (Galateo, de Sit. Iapyg. p. 100; Romanelli, vol. ii. p. 43.) Many tombs also have been found there, in which coins, vases, and inscriptions in the Messapian dialect have been discovered.

U'XII (Oひ̧̃ıo!, Arrian, Anab. iii. 17; Strab. xi. p. 524, xv. pp. 729, 744), a tribe of ancient Persis, who lived on the northern borders of that province between Persis and Susiana, to the E. of the Pasitigris and to the W. of the Oroatis. They were visited by Alexander the Great on his way from Susa; and their capital town, Uxia (Strab. xr. p744), was the scene of a celebrated siege, the details of which are given by Arrian and Curtius. It has been a matter of considerable discussion where this city was situated. The whole question has been carefully examined by the Baron de Bode, who has personally visited the localities he describes. (Geogr. Journ. xiii. pp. 108-110.) He thinks Lxia is at present represented by the ruins near ShilaftohiSuleiman in the Bakhtyari Mountains, to the E. of Shuster.

UZ, a district of Western Asia, to which the prophet Job belonged. (Job, i. 1.) It cannot be certainly determined where it was; bence, learned men have placed it in very diflerent localities. Winer, who has examined the question, inclines to place it in the neighbourhond of Edom, adjoining Arabia and Chaldasea (Biblisch. Realuörterb. f. e. $l_{z}$.) The people are perhaps represented in classical geography by the Aügitas or Aifitas of Ptolemy (v. 19.§2), a tribe who lived on the borders of Babylonia. In Genesis x. 23, Uz is called the son of Aram : hence Josephus says, Oüoos кrí̧̧ı

$\mathbf{X}$.

XANTHUS ( $\Xi d \nu$ Oos: Eth. इav*los), the greatest and most celebrated city of Lycia, was situated according to Stratu (xiv. p. 666) at a distance of 70 stadia from the mouth of the river Xanthus, and according to the Stadinsmus ( $\$ 247$ ) only 60 stacia. Pliny (v. 28) states the distance at 15 liuman mites, which is mach too great. (Comp. Steph. B. s. r.: Ptol. v. 3. § 5 ; Mela, i. 15 ; Polyb. xxvi. 7.) This famous city was twice destroved, on each of which occasions its inhabitants defended themselves with undaunted valour. The first catavtrophe betell the city in the reign of Cyrus, when Harpagus besieged it with a Persian army. On that occasion the Xanthians buried themselves, with all they poisessed, under the ruins of their city. (Herod. i. 176.) After this event the city must have been rebuilt ; for during the Roman civil wars consequent upon the murder of Caesar, Xanthus was invested by the army of Brutus, as its inhabitants refused to open their gates to him. Brutus, after a desperate struggle, trok the city by assault. The Xanthians continued the fight in the streets, and perished with their wives and children in the flames, rather than submit to the Romans. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 34 ; Appian, B. C. iv. 18, foll.) After this catastrophe, the city never recovered. The chief buildings at Xanthus were temples of Sarpedon (Appian, l. c.), and of the Lycian Apollo. (Diod. v. 77.) At a distance of 60 stadia down the river and 10 stadia from its mouth, there was a sanctuary of Leto on the bank of the Xanthus. (Strab. l.c.) The site of Xanthus and its magniticent ruins were first discovered and described by Sir C. Fellows in his Excursion in Asia Minor, p. 225, foll. (comp. his Lycia, p. 164, foll.) These ruins stand near the village of Koonik, and consist of temples, tombs, triumphal arches, walls, and a theatre. The site, says Sir Charles, is extremely romantic, upon beautiful hills, some crowned with rocks, others rising perpendicularly from the river. The city does not appear to have been very large, but its remains show that it was highly ornamented, particularly the tombs. The architecture and sculptures of the place, of which many specimens are in an excellent state of preservation, and the inscriptions in a peculiar alphabet, have opened up a page in the history of Asia Minor previously quite unknown. The engravings in Fellows' works furnish a clear idea of the bigh perfection which the arts must have attained at Xanthus. (See also Spratt and Forbes, Travels in Lycia, i. p. 5 , and ii., which contains an excellent plan of the site and remains of Xanthus; E. Braun, Die Marmorwerke von Xanthos in Lykia, Khein. Mus. Neue Folge, vol. iii. p. 481, foll.)

A large collection of marbles, chiefly sepulchral, discovered at Xanthus by Sir C. Fellows, and brought to England in 1842 and 1843, has been arranged in the British Museum. Of these a full account is given in the Supplement to the Penny Cyclopaedia, vol. ii. p. 713, toll.

XANTHUS (Eávoos), an important river in the W. of Lycia, which is mentioned even in Homer ( 1 .ii. 877, v. 479), and which, according to Strabo (xiv. p. 665), was anciently called Sirhes, that is in Phoerician and Arabic "reddish yellow," so that the Greek name Xanthus is only a translation of the Semitic Sirbes or Zirba. The Xanthus has its sources in Mount Taurus, on the frontiers between Lycia and Pisidia, and flows as a navigable river in a SW. direction through an extensive plain ( $\Xi \alpha \nu \theta o v$ $\pi \in \delta i o y$, Herod. i. 176), having Mount Bragus on the W. and Massicytes on the E., towards the sea, into which it discharges itself about 70 stadia S. of the city of Xanthus, and a little to the NW. of Pinara (Herod. l. c.; Ptol. v. 3. § 2 ; Dion.  p. 4 : Bay of Augusta), a spacious harbour on the E. coast of Sicily, between Catana and Syracuse. It is remarkable that this, though one of the largest and most inportant natural harbours on the coasts of Sicily, is rarely mentioned by ancient authors. Scylax, indeed, is the only writer who has preserved to us its name as that of a port. Strabo speaks of the Xiphonian Promontory ( $\tau \boldsymbol{\tau} \boldsymbol{\tau} \hat{\eta} \mathrm{s}$ Eıゆ vias àкршти́pıov, vi. p. 267), by which he evidently means the projecting headland near its entrance, now called the C'apo di Santa Croce. Diodorus also mentions that the Carthaginian fleet, in B. c. 263 touched at Xiphonia on its way to Syracuse (eis authors allude to the existence of a town of this name, and it is probably a mistake of Stephanus of Byzantium, who speaks of Xiphonia ss a city (s. v.). The harbour or bay of Augusta is a spacious gulf, considerabily larger than the Great Harbour of Syracuse, and extending from the Capo di Santa Croce to the low peninsula or promontory of Magnisi (the ancient Thapsus). But it is probable that the port designated by Scylax was a much smaller one, close to the modern city of Augusta, which occupies a low peninsular point or tongue of land that projects from near the N . extremity of the bay, and strongly resembles the position of the island of Ortygia, at Syracuse, except that it is not quite separated from the mainland. It is very singular that so remarkable and advantageous a situation should not have been taken advantage of by the Greek colonists in Sicily ; but we have no trace of any ancient town on the spot, unless it were the site of the ancient Megara. [Megara.] The modern town of Aupusta, or Agasta, was fuunded in the 13th century by Frederic II.

XOIS (ヨd́s, Strab. xvii. p. 802; Ptol. iv. 5. § 50; Eóns, Steph. B. s. v.), a town of great antiquity and considerable size, was situated nearly in the centre of the Delta, upon an island formed by the Sebennytic and Phatnitic branches of the Nile. It belonged to the Sebennytic Norne. The 14th dynasty, according to Manetho, consisted of 76 Xoite kings. This dynasty inmediately preceded that of the shepherd kings of Aegypt. It seems probable, therefure, that Xois, from its strong position among the marshes formed by the intersecting branches of the river, held out during the occupation of the Delta by the Hyksos, or at least compromised with the invaders by paying them trihute. By some geographers it is supposed to be the Papremis of Herodotus (ii. 59, iii. 12). Champollion ('Egypte sous les Pharaons, vcl. ii. p. 214) believes its site to have been at Sakhra. which is the Arabian synonyme of the Cuptic Xeos and of the old Aegyptian Shhoo (Niebuhr, Travels, vol. i. p. 75.) The road from Tamiathis to Memphis passed through Xois.

Rhod. i. 6 ; ; Catull. Ixiii. 287 ; Steph. B. s. v. Euvia). Xynia, having been deserted by its inhabitants, was plundered by the Aetolians in r. c. 198 (Liv. xxxii. 13). In the following year Flamininus arrived at this place in three days' march from Heraclea (Liv. xxxiii. 3; comp. Liv. xxxix. 26). The lake of Xynias is now called Taukli, and is described as 6 miles in circumference. The site of the ancient city is marked by some remains of ruined edifices upon a promontory or peninsula in the lake. (Leake, Northern Greece, vol. i. p. 460, vol. iv. p. 517.)

There can be no doubt that it is now represented by the Greater $Z a i b$, a river of considerable size, which, rising in the mountains on the confines of Armenia and Kurdistin, flows into the Tigris a little to the $\mathbf{S}$. of the great mound of Nimrúd (Tavernier, ii. c. 7; Layard, Nineveh and its Remuins, i. p. 192.) ZACATAE (Zakdrau, Ptol. v. 9. § 16), a people of Asiatic Sarmatia.

ZACYNTHUS (Zdxuveos: Eth. Zaxivetios: Zante), an island in the Sicilian sea, lying off the western coast of Peloponnesus, opposite the promon. tory Chelonatas in Elis, and to the S. of the island of Cephalleuia, from which it was distant 25 miles, according to Pliny, (iv. 12. s. 19) but according to Strabo, only 60 stadia (x. p. 458). The latter is very nearly correct, the real distance being 8 English miles. Its circumference is statod by Pliny at 36 M. P., by Strabo at 160 stadia ; but the island is at least 50 miles round, its greatest length being 23 English miles. The island is said to have been originally called Hyrie (Plin. L. c.), and to have been colonized by Zacynthus, the son of Dardanus, from Psophis in Arcadia, whence the acropolis of the city of Zacynthus was named Psophis. (Paus, viii. 24. § 3 ; Steph. B. 8. v.) We have the express statoment of Thucydides that the Zacynthians were a colony of Achaeans from Peloponnesus (ii. 66). In Homer, who gives the island the epithet of "woody" ( $\dot{\Delta} \lambda \boldsymbol{H} \in 15$ and $\dot{u} \lambda \eta \in \sigma \sigma a$ ), Zacynthus forms part of the dominions of Ulysses. (Il. ii. 634, Od. i. 246, ix. 24, xvi. 123, 250 ; Strab. x. p. 457.) It appears to have attained considerable importance at an early period; for according to a very ancient tradition Saguntum in Spain was founded by the Zacynthians, in conjunction with the Rutuli of Ardea (Liv. xxi. 7 ; Plin. xvi. 40. s. 79 ; Strab. iii. p. 159.) Bocchus stated that Saguntum was founded by the Zacynthians 200 years before the Trojan War (ap. Plin. l.c.) In consequence probably of their Achaean origin, the Zacynthians were hostile to the Lacedaemonians, and hence we find that fugitives from Sparta fled for refuge to this island. (Herod. vi. 70, ix 37.) In the Peloponnesian War the Zacynthians sided with Athens (Thuc. ii. 7, 9); and in в. c. 430 the Lacedaemonians made an unsuccessful attack upon their city. (Ib.66.) The Athenians in their expedition against Pylus found Zacynthus a convonient station for their fleet. (Id. iv. 8, 13.) The Zacynthians are enumerated among the autonomous allies of Athens in the Sicilian expedition. (Id. vii. 57.) After the Peloponnesian War, Zacynthus seems to have passed under the supremacy of Sparta ; for in B. c. 374, Timotheus, the Athenian commander, on his return from Corcyra. landed some Zacynthian exiles on the island, and assisted them in establishing a fortitied post. These must have belonged to the antiSpartan party; for the Zacynthian government applied for help to the Spartans, who sent a fleet of 25 sail to Zacynthus. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 3 ; I) iodor. xv. 45, seq.; as to the statements of Diodorus, see Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. x. p. 192.) The Zacynthians assisted Dion in his expedition to Syracuse with the view of expelling the tyrant Dionysius, R.c. 357. (Diod. xvi. 6, seq.; Plut. Dion, 22, seq.) At the time of the Roman wars in Greece we find Zacynthus in the possession of Philip of Macedon. (Polyb. v. 102.) In b. c. 211 the Roman praetor M. Valerius Laevinus, took the city of Zacynthas, with the exception of the citadel. (Liv. xxvi. 24.) It was afterwards restored to Philip, by whom it was finally surrendered to the Romans in B. c. 191. (Id. xxxvi. 32.) In the Mithridatic War it was attacked by Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, but he was repulsed. (Appian, Mithr. 45.) Zacynthus subsequently shared the fate of the other Ionian islands, and is now subject to Great Britain.

The clief town of the island, also named Zacynthus (Liv. xxvi. 14 ; Strab. x. p. 458 ; Ptol. iii. 14. § 13), was situated upon the eastern shore. Its site is occupied by the modern capital, Zante, but nothing remains of the ancient city, except a few columns and inscriptions. The situation of the town upon the margin of a semi-circular bay is very picturesque. The citadel probably occupied the site of the modern castle. The beautiful situation of the city and the fertility of the island have been celebrated in all ages ( $\kappa a \lambda \alpha$ $\pi \delta \lambda / s$ à ZákvvOos, Theocr. Id. iv. 32; Strab., Plin., ll. cc.). It no longer deserves the epithet of "woody," given to it by Homer (l. c.) and Virgil (" nemorosa Zacynthos," Aen. iii. 270) ; but its beautiful olivegardens, vineyards, and gardens, justify the Italian proverb, which calls Zante the "flower of the Levant."

The most remarkable natural phenomenon in Zante is the celebrated pitch-wells, which are accurately described by Herodotus (iv. 195), and are mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 15. s. 51). They are situated about 12 miles from the city, in a small marshy valley near the shore of the Bay of Chieri, on the SW. coast. A recent observer has given the following account of them: "There are two springs, the principal surrounded by a low wall; here the pitch is seen bubbling up under the clear water, which is about a foot deep over the pitch itself, with which it comes out of the earth. The pitch-bubbles rise with the appearance of an India-rubber bottle until the air within bursts, and the pitch falls back and runs off. It produces about three barrels a day, and can be used when mixed with pine-pitch, though in a pure state it is comparatively of no value. The other spring is in an adjoining vineyard; but the pitch does not bubble up, and is in fact only discernible by the ground having a burnt appearance, and by the feet adhering to the surface as one walks over it. The demand for the pitch of Zante is now very small, vegetable pitch being preferable." (Bowen, in Murray's Handbook for Greece, p. 93.)

agency at work in the island ; to which it may be added that earthquakes are frequent.

Pliny mentions Mt. Elatus in Zacynthus ("Mons Elatus ibi nobilis," Plin. l. c.), probably Mt. Skopo, which raises its curiously jagged summit to the height of 1300 feet above the eastern extremity of the bay of Zante. (Dodwell, Tour through Greece, vol. i. p. 83 , seq.)

 Polyb. v. 44 ; Ptol. vi. 2. § 4 ; Strab. xi. p. 522), the central portion of the great chain of mountains which, extending in a direction nearly N. and S. with an inclination to the W. at the upper end, connects the mountains of Armenia and the Caucasus with those of Susiana and Persis. It separates Assyria from Media, and is now represented by the middle and southern portion of the mountains of Kurdistán, the highest of which is the well known Rowandiz. Near this latter mountain was the great highroad which led from Assyria and its capital Nineveh into Media, and, at its base, was in all probability the site of the pass through the mountains, called by Ptolemy aí $\tau v \hat{v}$ Záypov $\pi u ́ \lambda a u(v i .2 . ~ § 7)$, and by Strabo, $\dot{\eta}$ M $\eta \delta \iota \kappa \grave{\eta} \pi u ́ \lambda \eta$ (xi. p. 525). ZAITHA or ZAUTHA (ZavӨá, Zosim. iii. 14), a small town or fortified place in Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, to the SE. of Circesium. He adds that it was celebrated for the monument erected by the soldiers to the emperor Gordianus. ZALE'CUS (Z ${ }^{2} \lambda \eta \kappa \sigma o s$, or $\mathrm{Z} \dot{\alpha} \lambda \iota \sigma \kappa o s$, in Ptol. v. 4. § 3), a small river on the coast of Paphlagonia, discharging itself into the Euxine at a distance of 210 stadia west of the Halys. (Marcian. p. 73.) At its mouth there was a small town of the same name, about 90 stadia from Zagorus, or Zigorum (Anon,

Peripl．P．E．p．9）；and this place seems to be the same as the one mentioned in the Peut．Table under the corrupt naine of Halega，at a distance of 25 Roman miles from Zacoria．Hamilton（Researches， i．p．298）identifies the site of Zalecus with the modern Alatcham，where some ruins and massive walls are still seen．

ZAMA（Z $\dot{\alpha} \mu a \mu \epsilon i \zeta \omega \nu$, Ptol．iv．3．§ 33），a town of Numidia，situated five days＇journey to the SW． of Carthage．（l’olyb．xv．5；Liv．xxx．29．）It lay between Sicca Veneria and Suffetula，and bore the name of＂Regia；＂whence we find it erroneourly written Zamareigia in the Tab．Peut．Zama is par－ ticularly remowned as the scene of Scipio＇s victory over Hannibal in 201 b．c．It was a very strong place，and hence adopted as a residence by Juba， who brought his harem and his treasure hither，as to a place of safety．（Hirt．B．Afr．91；Vitruv． viii．3．（or 4．）§ 24．）Strabo represents it as de－ stroyed by the Romans，and as being in a ruinous state in his time（xvii．pp．829，831）．But it must have been subsequently restored，since Pliny（v． 4. s．4）mentions the Zamense oppidum as a free city． It also appears in the Tab．Peut．，and a bishop of Zama is mentioned by St．Augustine．（De Civ． ／ lei ，vii．16．）In an inscription in Gruter（364．1） Zama Regia appears with the title of a colony（Col． Aclia Hadriana）；thongh it is not mentioned as a colony in any of the ancient writcrs．It is the pre－ sent Jama，SE．of Kess．（Cf．Dion Cass．xlviii． 23：Sall．J．60，61．）

ZELA（ $\tau \dot{\alpha} \mathrm{Z} \hat{\eta} \lambda a$ ），a town in the interior of Pontus， on the left bank of the Iris，towards the Galatian fron－ tier，was believed to have been erected on a mound constructed by Semiramis．（Strab．xii．p．561，comp． pp． $51 \%, 559$. ）It seems to have originally been a place consecrated to the worship of the goddess Anaitis, to whom a temple was built there by the Persiasos in commemoration of a victory over the Sacae. The chief priest of this temple was regarded as the sovereign of Zela and its territory ( $\mathrm{Z} \eta \lambda \hat{\eta} \tau 15$ ). Notwithstanding this, however, it remained a small place until Pompey, atter his victory over Mithridates, raised it to the rank of a city by increasing its population and extending its walls. Zela is celebrated in history for a victory obtained in its vicinity by Mithridates over the Romans under Triarius, and still more for the defeat of Pharnaces, alrout which Caesar sent to Rome the famous report "Veni, Vidi, Vici." (Plin. vi. 3; Appian, Mithrid. 89 ; Plut. Caes. 50 ; Dion Cass. xlii. 47, where the place is erroneously called Zeicia; Hirt. Bell. Alex. 73, where it is called Ziela; Ptol. v. 6. § 10 Hierocl. p. 701 ; Steph. B. s. v.) Zela was situated at a distance of four days' journey (according to the Peut. Table 80 miles) from Tavium, and south-east of Amasia. The elevated ground on which the town was situated, and which Strabocalls the mound of Semiramis, was, according to Hirtius, a natural hill, but so shaped that it might seem to be the work of human hands. According to Hamilton (Researches, i. p. 306), is a black-coloured isolated hill rising out of the plain, and is now crowned with a Turkish fortress, which still bears the name of Zilleh.

ZELDEPA. [Zaldapa.]
ZELEIA (Zé̀ $\overline{\text { Z }}$ ia). a town of Troas, at the foot of Mount Ida and on the banks of the river Aesepus, at a distance of $\mathbf{8 0}$ stadia from its mouth. It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 824, iii. 103), who calls it a huly town. (Comp. Strab. xii. p. 565, xiii. pp. 585, 587, 603 ; Steph. B. s. v.) Arrian (Anab. i. 13) mentions it as the head-quarters of the Persian army before the battle of the Granicus: it existed in the time of Strabo ; but afterwards it disappears. Some travellers have identified it with the modern Biga, between Bozaegee and Sorricui. [L.S.]

ZEIETTIS. [Zela.]

ZENOBII INSULAE (Znvobiou $\nu \eta \sigma i a$, Ptol. vi. 7. § 47), seven small islands lying in the Sinus Sachalites, at the entrance of the Arabian Gulf. (Cf. Arrian. Per. M. Eryth. p. 19.)

ZENODO'TIUM (Zquoסótıov, Dion Cass. xl. 12; Strph. B. s. v.), a strong castle in the upper part of Mesopotamia, which was held by the Parthians during the war between them and the Romans under Crassus. It is called by Plutarch, Zenodotia (Crase. c. 17). It cannot be identified with any modern site, but it was, probably, not far distant from Edessa.
[V.]
ZENO'NIS CHERSONESUS (Z थncos, Ptol. iii. 6. § 4), a point of land on the N. cosst of the Chersonesus Taurica in European Sarmatia, probably the narrow tongue of Arabat, between the Sea of Azof and the Putrid Sea. [T.H.D.]
ZE'PHYKE, a small island off the promontory Sammonium in Crete. (Plin. iv. 12. s. 20.)

ZEPHY'RIA. [Halicarnassus.]
 number of promontories, as 1 . At the western extremity of the peninsula of Myndus in Caria, now called Gumichle or Angeli. (Strab. xiv. p. 658.)
2. On the coast of Cilicia, between Cilicia Tracheia and Pedias, a little to the west of the town of Anchiale. (Strab. xiv. p. 671.) It contained a fort of the same name, and was 120 stadia fron Tarsus, and 13 miles east of Suli. (Stadiasm. § 157 ; Tab. Peut. ; comp. Scyl. p. 40 ; Ptol. v. 8. § 4 ; Liv. xxxiii. 20 ; Plin. v. 22 ; Hierocl. p. 704.) When Pliny (xxxiv. 50) states that the best molybdaena was prepared at Zephyrium, he no doubt alludes to this place, since we know fiom Dioscorides (v. 100) that this mineral was obtained in the neighbouring hill of Corycus, and that there it was of excellent quality. Leake (Asia Minor, p. 214) looks for it near the mouth of the river Mertin.
3. On the coast of Cilicia, near the mouth of the river Calycadnus. (Strab. xiv. p. 670 ; Ptol. v. 8. § 3.)
4. A town on the coast of Paphlagonia, 60 stadia to the west of Cape Carambis. (Arrian, Peripl. P. E. p. 15 ; Anon. Peripl. P. E. p. 6 ; Ptol. v. 4. § 2.)
5. A town and promontory on the coast of Pontus, in the country of the Mosynoeci, 90 stadia to the west of Tripolis. (Ptol. v. 6. § 11 ; Arrian, Peripl. P. E. p. 17 ; Scylax, p. 33; Anon. Peripl. P. E. p. 13; Tab. Peut.) The cape still bears the name of Zafra or Zefreh, and Hamilton (Researches, i. p. 261) regards the modern Kaik Liman as occupying the site of the ancient Zephyrinm. [L. S.]
 Capo di Bruzzano), a promontory on the E. coast of the Bruttian peninsula, between Locri and the SE. corner of Bruttium. It is mentioned principally in comection with the settlement of the Locrian colonists in this part of Italy, whose city thence derived the name of Locri Epizephyrif. According to Strabo, indeed, these colonists settled in the first instance on the headland itself, which had a small port contiguous to it, but after a short time removed to the site of their permanent city, about 15 miles farther N. (Strab. vi. pp. 259, 270.) The Zephyrian Promontory is mentioned by all the geographers in describing the coast of Brutt:um, and is undoubtedly the same now called the Capo di Bruzano, a low but marked headland, about 10 miles N. of Cape Spartivento, which forms the SE. extremity of the Bruttian peninsula. (Strab. l. c.; Plin. iii. 5. s. 10 ; Mel. ii. 4. § 8 ; Ptwl. iii. 1. 10 ; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [E. H. B.]

ZEPHY'RIUM (Zєфúpiov Kкpov, Ptol. iii. 17. § 5). 1. A promontory on the $E$. part of the N. coast of Crete, near the town of Apollonia. Now Ponta di Tigani.
2. A promontory on the W. coast of Cyprus, near Paphos, probably the cape which closes the bay of Baffio to the W. (1'tol. v. 14. § 1 ; Strab. xiv. p. 683.)
3. A promontory in the E. part of Cyrenaica, 150 stadia to the W. of Darnis. (Strab. xvii. p. 799, who attributes it to Marmarica; Ptol. iv. 4. § 5; Stadics. M. Magni, §§ 47, 48.) Now Cape Derne.
4. Another promontory of Cyrenaica, with a harbour. (Strab. xvii. p. 838.)
5. A promontory near Little Taposiris in Lower Aegypt, having a temple of Arsinoë-Aphrodite. (Strab. x xii. p. 800.) Hence that goddess derived the epithet of Zephuritis ( $Z \in \phi v \rho i \tau i s$, Athen. vii. p . 318, d.; Callim. Ep. 31 ; Steph. B. s. v.).
6. A town of the Chersonesus Taurica, mentioned only by Pliny (iv. 12. s. 26).
[T. H. D.]
ZERNES (Zépvns, Pmcop. de Aed.iv. 6. p. 288), a fortress in Upper Moesia, apparently the present Old Orsova, at the mouth of the Tzerna. [T.H.D.]

ZERYNTHUS (Zípul $0 o s$, Lycophr. 77; Steph. B. s. v.), a town of Thrace not far from the borders of the Aenianes. It contained a cave of Hecate, a tem-

ZEUGITANA REGIO，the more northern part of the Roman province of Africa．Pliny seems to be the earliest writer who mentions the name of Zeugitana（v．4．s．3）．A town of Zeugis is mentioned by Aethicus（Cosmogr．p．63），and a Zeagitanus，ap－ parently a mountain，by Solinus（＂a pede Zengi－ tano，＂c．27），which is perhaps the same as the Mons Ziguensis of Victor（de Persec．Vandal．iii．）， the present Zow－wan；and according to Shaw （Travels，i．p．191，sq．），if the existence of a town or mountain so named is not altogether problema－ tical，the province probably derived its name from either one or the other．The district was bounded on the S．by Byzacium，on the W．by Numidia，from which it was dirided by the river Tusca（now Zaine）， and on the N．and E．by the Mare Internum．After the time of Caesar it appears to have been called Provincia Vetus，or Africa Propria，as opposed to the later acquired Numidia．（Dion Cass．xliii．10； Plin．l．c．；Mela，i．7．）Strabo mentions it only as $\dot{\eta}$ Kap $\chi \eta \delta o \nu i a$ ，or the province of Carthage（vi．p． 267，\＆c．）．It embraced the modern Frigeah（which is doubtless a corruption of the ancient name of Af－ rica）or northern part of the kingdom of Tunis． Zeugitana was watered by the Bagradas，and was a very fertile country．There were no towns of im－ portance in the interior，but on the coast we find Siagul，Neapolis，Curubis，Aspis or Clupea，Carpis， Tunes，Carthago，Castra Cornelia，Utica，and Hippo Diarrhytus．For further particulars concerning this province see Africa．

ZEUGMA．1．（亡ev̂ $\gamma \mu a$, Ptol．v．15．§ 14），a town founded by Seleucus Nicator，in the province of Cyrrhestica，in Syria．It derived its name from a bridge of boats which was here laid across the Euplirates，and which in the course of time became the sole passage ocer the river，when the older one at Thapsacus， 2000 stadia to the S．，had become impracticable，or at all events very dangerous，owing to the spreading of the Arabian hordes．（Plin．v． 24. s． 21 ；Strab．xvi．p．746；Steph．B．s．v．）Zeugma lay on the right bank of the Euphrates，opposite to Apamea， 72 miles SW．of Samosata， 175 miles NE． of the maritime Seleucia，and 36 miles N．of Hiera－ polis．（Plin．l．c．，and v．12．s．13；Strab．xvi．p． 749；Tab．Peut．）It was therefore opposite to the modern Bir or Biredsjik，which occupies the site of the ancient Apamea．（Cf．Ritter，Erdlkunde，x．p． 944，seq．）In the time of Justinian，Zeugma had fallen into decay，but was restored by that emperor． Procop．de Aed．ii．9，p．237，ed．Bonn．）（Cf．

ZIRIDAVA (Zıpióava, Ptol. iii. 8. § 8), a town in Dacia, most probably Szereka on the Broosch (cf. Katancsich. Istri Accolae, ii. p. 296). [T.H.D.]

ZIRINAE (Tab. I'eut.; Zetpıvia, Steph. B. p. 287; Zernae, with various readings, in It. Ant. p. 322), a town in Thrace, on the Hebrus. between Trajanopolis and Plotinopolis. Reichard places it on the site of Zernits ; but Lapie identifies it with Termalitza.

ZITHA, or 7EITHA (Zei日a, Ptol. v. 18. § 6), a small place in Mesupntamia near the Euphrates, noticed by Ptoleny. It is in all probability the same as the Sitha of Zosimus (iii. 15).

ZITHA (Zeita, I'tol. iv. 3. § 12), a promontory in Africa I'ropria between the two Syrtes and W. of Sabuthra. On it lay the place called Pons Zitha.
[T. H. D.]
ZOARA (Zodpa, Steph. B. s. v.), a small town at the southern end of the Lacus Asphaltites in Judaea, to which Lot escaped from the burning of Sodom. (Gen. xiv. 2, 8, xix. 22.) Josephus, in describing the same lake, states that it extends $\mu$ é $\rho \mathrm{\rho}$ Zodip $\nu$ 'Apabias (iv. c. 27). During the latter times of the Kuman Empire, there was a guard maintained in that part of the country, a corps of native mounted bowmen ("Equites sagittarii Indigenae Zoarae"), who were under the command of the Dux Palaestinse. (Notit. Imper.)

ZORLANAE (Tab. Peut. ; in Geog. Rav. v. 12, Strolanae), a place in Thrace, on the road from Siracellae to Aenus.
[J. K.]
ZOKOANDA (Plin. vi. 27. s. 31), a place on the range of Mount Taurus, where the Tigris fell into a cavern, and reappeared on the other side of the mountain; perhaps the spot discovered by Rich, 11 leagues from Julamerik, where an eastern tributary of the Tigris suddenly falls into a chasm in the mountain. (Kich, Koordistan, i. p. 378; cf. Ritter, Erdk. x. p. 86, seq.; D'Anville, l'Euphr. et le Tigre, p. 74.)
[J. K.]
ZOSTER. [Attica, p. 330, b.]
ZUCHABBARI (Zouxásfapi, Ptol. iv. 3. § 20), a mountain at the $S$. borders of the Regio Syr-
[T. H. D.]

ZUCHABBARI. [Succabar.]
ZUCHIS' (Zoũxıs, Strab. xvii. p. 835), a lake 400 stadia long, with a town of the same name upon it, in Libya, not far from the Lesser Syrtis. Stephanus B. (p. 290) mentions only the town, which, according to Strabo, was noted for its purple dyes and salt fish. It seems to be the place called Xou§is by Itolemy (iv. 3. § 41.)
[T. H. D.]
ZUGAR (Zuizap, Ptol. iv. 3. §40), a town of Africa Propria, between the rivers Bugradas and Triton.
[T. H. D.]
ZUMI (Zטїцоı), a German trihe occupying a district in the neighbourhood of the Lugii, are mentioned by Strabo (vii. p. 209), the only author that notices them, as having been subdued by Maroboduas.
ZUPHONES(Zoúфक्ves, Diod. xx.38), a Numidian tribe in the vicinity of Carthage. [T. H. D.]

ZURMENTLM (Zoúp $\mu$ evtov, Ptol. iv. 3. § 37), a town of Byzacium, in Africa Propria, lying to the S. of Hadrumetum.
[T. H. D.]
ZUROBARA (Zoupóbapa, Ptol. iii. 8. § 9), a town of Dacia, situated where the Marosch falls into the Theiss.
[T. H. D.]
ZUSIDAVA (Zovalסava, Ptol. iii. 8. § 8), a town of Dacia, probably on the site of the ruins called Tschetatic de Pömunt, below Burlau (cf. Ukert, iii. pt. ii. p. 621 ).
[T. H. D.]
ZYDRE'TAE (Zvঠ̈p̄̃at or Zuঠpeital, Arrian, Peripl. Pont. Eux. p. 11), a people of Colchis, on the coast of the Pontus Euxinus, on the S. side of the Phasis, and between the Machelones and the Lazi.
[T. H. D.]
ZYGANTIS (Zuyavtis, Hecat. Fr. ap.Steph. B. p. 290), a town of Libya, whose inhabitants were noted for their preparation of honey. Hence Klausen (ad Hecat. p. 134) identifies them with the Gyzantes of Herodotus (iv. 194), on the W. side of the lake Tritonis, of whom that historian relates the same thing.
[T. H. D.]
ZYGENSES (Zureis, Ptol. iv. 5. § 22), a people on the coast of the Libyan Nomos in Marmarica.
[T. H. D.]
ZYGI (Zuyol, Strab. xi. p. 496), a wild and savage people on the Pontus Euxinus in Asiatic Sarmatia, and on the heights stretching from the Caucasus to the Cimmerian Bosporus. They were partly nomad shepherds, partly brigands and pirates, for which latter vocation they had ships specially adapted (cf. Id. ii. 129, xi. 492, xvii. 839). Stephanus B. (p. 290) says that they also bore the name of Zuypiavoi ; and we find the form Zygii (Zúrior) in Dionysius (Perieg. 687) and Avienus (Descrip. Orb. 871 ).
[T. H. D.]
 town in Pontus, in the neighbourhood of Colchis. Stephanus B. (p. 290) conjectures that it was in the territory of the Zygi, which, however, does not agree with Strabo's description.
[T. H. D.]
ZYGRIS (Zuypis, Ptol. iv. 5. §4), a village on the coast of the Libyan Nomos in Marmarica, which seems to have given name to the people called Zsgritae dwelling there (Zvypitah, Ptol. ib. § 22.)

ZYGRITAE. [Zygris.]
ZYMETHUS (Zú $\mu \eta \theta o s$, Ptol.iv. 4. § 11), a town in the interior of Cyrenaica.
[T. H. D.]

Maenius is represented as crelebrating a triumph over the Lavinians, together with the Antiates and Veliterni, where it appears certain from Livy's narrative that the Lanuvians are the people really meant: a remarkable instance at how carly a period the confusion between the two names hud arisen.

[^11]:    * The name is written in many MSS. LinternUM, and it is difficult, in the absence of inscriptions, to siy which form is really the more correct; but Liteincim seems to be supported, on the whole, by the best MSS., as well as by the Greek form of the name as found both in Strabo and Ptolemy. (Tzschucke, ad Mel. ii. 4. § 9.)

[^12]:    * The position assigned to Buon Riposo on Gell's map does not accord with this description of the site given by Nibby; but this part of the map is very imperfect. and evidently not derived from personal observation. Gell's own account of the situation of Bum Riposo (p. 185), though less precise, agrees with that of Nibby.

[^13]:    * The numbers on all the roads from Emerita to Olisipo are vers corrnpt: they do not agree with the totals given at the head of each route; and many of them are evidently too shurt.

[^14]:    * This ditch must have terminated in a katavothra, probably in one of the katavóthra on the W. side of the plain at the foot of the Maenalian mountains. On the other side of these mountains is the village and river named Helisson; and as the Elisphasii are not mentioned in any other passage, it has been proposed to read 'Enıббovtion instead of 'Eлıбфабiんv. (Ross, p. 127.) Leake has conjectured, with some probability, that Elisphasii may be the corrupt ethnic of Elymia ('Envuia), a place only mentioned by Xenophon (Hell. vi. 5. § 13), who places it on the confines of Orchomenus and Mautineia. Although Leake places Elymia at Levidhi, on the NW. frontier of Mantinice, he conjectures that the whole plain of Alcimedon may have belonged to it. (Leake, Peloponnesiaca, p. 380.)
    $\dagger$ Leake imagines that Phoezon was situated on a side road, leading from the tombs of the daughters of Pelias. But hoss maintains that Phoezon was on the high-road to Tegea, and that Pausanias has ouly mentioned by anticipation, in viii. 11. § 1, the altar forming the boundary between Mantinice and Tegeatis, the more proper place for it being at the close of § 4.

[^16]:    On this occasion Thucydides (iv. 66) calls Megara $\dot{\eta}$ arvo adics, in contradistinction to the port-town. This expression cannot refer to the acropolis of Megara, as some critics interpret it.

[^17]:    * Of the other four parts Strabo mentions Pylus, Bhium, and Hyameitis ; but the passage is corrupt, and the name of Mesola should probably be added to complete the number. (Müller, Dorians, vol. i. p 111, transL) Stephanus B. calls Mesola, a city of Messene, one of the five (e. v. Mé $\delta \lambda a$ ); and Strabo in another passage (viii. p. 361) describes it as lying towards the gulf between Taygetus and Messenia; and as the hatter name can only apply to the western part of the country, Mesola was probably the district between Taygetus and the Pamisus. Pylus apparently comprehended the whole western const. Rhiom is the soathern peninsula, opposite Taenarum. (Strab. viii. p. 360.) The position of Hyameitis, of which the city was called Hyameia ('Tduecc, Steph. B. s. v.), is quite uncertain.

[^29]:    * It has been conjectured that this was probably the same statue mentioned by Cicero (de Div. i. 12, Cat. iii. 8), and described as having been struck by lightning; but this can hardly be the case, as the image described by Cicero stood in the Capitol. A bronze statue answering Cicero's description is still preserved in the Capitoline Museum at Rome, which is regarded by Niebuhr as a genuine relic (Hist. vol. i. p. 210), and has been immortalised in the verse of Byron. A modern critic finds it a production too clumsy for the state of Roman art at the time assigned by Livy, and thinks that the holes in the hind-leg of the wolf were not produced by lightning, but arise from a defect in the casting. (Braun, Ruins and Museums of Rome, p. 81.) Fabius Pictor, however, who mentions this statue in the passage cited from his work by Dionysius (l.c.), expressly remarks the primitive maлaias Épraaias,-though considerably less than a century must have elapsed between his time and the date of its erection. It was rude, therefore, even when compared with the state of Roman art towards the end of the third century в. c., though it had been erected only at the beginning of that century. Mommsen is inclined to believe that the Capitoline wolf is the genuine one erected by the Ogulnii and described by Livy, from the circumstance of its baving been found near the arch of Severus. (De Comitio Rom., in the Annali dell' Instituto, 1844, vol. xvi. p. 300.) Whoever has seen the group will perhaps at all events agree with Winckelmann that the twins are evidently of a different period from the wolf.

This corresponds remarkably well with the mesusurements given by Strabo, as above.

[^35]:    * There is much obscurity in this part of Grecian history, and the statement of Nepos has been considered inconsistent with several passages in Greek authorities, who are undoubtedly of incomparably greater weight than the unknown compiler of the hiographical notices which pass under the name of [^37]:    * Some modern writers mention a fifth tribe, the Aegeidae, because Herodotns (iv. 149) speaks of the Aegeidae as a great tribe ( $\phi u \lambda \phi$ ) in Sparta; but the word $\phi u \lambda t$ seems to be here used in the more general sense of family, and there is no evidence that the word Acgeidae was the name of a place, like the other four mentioned above.

[^38]:    ＊There was also a small town，Apelaurus，which is mentioued by Livy as the place where the Achae－ ans under Nicostratus gained a victory over the Macedonians under Androsthenes，в．c．197．（Liv． sxsiii．14．）

    $\dagger$ The argunent against this, urged by Cavallari, and derived from the existence of numerous tombs, especially the great necropolis of the catacombs, in this part of the city, which, as be contends, must have been withcut the walla, would prove too much, as it is certain that these tombs were ultimately included in the city; and if the ordinary custom of the Greeks was deviated from at all, it may have been so at an earlier period. In fact we know that in other cases also, as at Agrigentum and Tarentum, the custom was violated, and persons babitually baried within the walls.

The Tabula gives 9 miles from Reate to Cutiliae, and 7 thence to Interocrea : if these distances be adopted the result is 99 miles, leaving a discrepancy of only one mile. In either case the approximation is sufficient to show the general correc:ness of the Itineraries.
