TIN IN CANNED FRUIT AND VEGETABLES

Summary

The Food Standards Agency has recently completed a survey of tin in canned fruit and vegetables on sale in the UK. Canned foods make the biggest contribution to tin in the diet and previous surveys of canned foods have found high levels of tin in some products high enough to give a risk of stomach upsets in sensitive people. The Food Standards Agency has worked with industry and enforcement officials to find out the cause of contamination and to ensure measures are introduced to minimise the likelihood of high levels of tin in food. This survey was undertaken to provide up-to-date information on the levels of tin in canned foods and identify whether these measures are working. The key facts are:

- These survey results do not raise any general food safety concerns.
- Four hundred samples of tomato-based products and of other canned fruit and vegetables were analysed for tin.
- Tin concentrations in 99.5 percent of samples were below the regulatory limit of 200 milligrams per kilogram (mg/kg). One sample of spaghetti in tomato sauce and one sample of gooseberries were above this limit. The Food Standards Agency immediately informed the retailers and suppliers of these products who withdrew them from sale and issued notices in stores and in the national press to advise consumers to return any unused cans.
- Tin concentrations were similar, or lower, than those reported in previous surveys. This reflects that measures introduced by the industry, such as the increased use of fully lacquered cans for acidic foods, have been generally effective in controlling and reducing the amount of tin in canned foods.

- Dietary exposures to tin for average and high level consumers of canned fruit and vegetables are well within the safety guideline set by the Joint WHO/FAO Expert Committee on Food Additives.

Background

Health effects of tin in food

High concentrations of tin in food irritate the digestive tract and may cause stomach upsets in sensitive people at tin concentrations above 200 mg/kg, with an increased risk of effects at concentrations above 250 mg/kg. These effects, the symptoms of which include fever, headache, nausea, vomiting, diarrhoea, abdominal cramps and bloating, are short-term with recovery expected soon after exposure. There are no long-term effects associated with occasional intakes from tin in the diet even at the higher level.

To protect consumer health the UK *Tin in Food Regulations 1992*⁸ limit the maximum amount of tin in foods sold in the UK to 200 mg/kg. This limit is supported by the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT), which gives the Government independent expert advice on the safety of chemicals in food.

Tin in canned food

Although most foods contain very low concentrations of tin, usually below 10 mg/kg, canned foods can contain higher concentrations, which may increase with time as a result of the gradual dissolution into the food of the tin coating used on the inside of some food cans to protect the steel body of the can from corrosion. As a consequence, canned foods make the biggest contribution to dietary intakes of tin. In the 1997 Total Diet Study, which is the most recently reported of our regular surveys of metals in the UK diet, canned fruit and vegetables accounted for 94 percent of the average UK dietary exposure to tin of 1.8 mg/day.¹

Many factors can affect the amount of tin taken up by canned foods such as the type of food, the type of can, the canning procedure used and duration and conditions of storage. Foods packed in fully lacquered cans generally contain the lowest levels of tin. Under normal circumstances, the tin content of canned food remains well below the regulatory limit throughout its shelf life. However, tin dissolution can, under certain circumstances, become accelerated leading to unacceptably high levels of tin in canned food within its shelf life.

Relatively high concentrations of tin were found in some foods in a survey of tin in canned fruit and vegetables we carried out in 1997³ and a survey of canned tomato products in 1999⁴. This survey was carried out to update our information on tin in canned foods and to assess whether measures put in place by industry to prevent contamination with high levels of tin have been effective

Method

Analyses were carried out for the Food Standards Agency (FSA) by Campden and Chorleywood Food Research Association (CCFRA), which is accredited by the United Kingdom Accreditation Service (UKAS) for the determination of tin in food by the method used in this survey. CCFRA has taken part in all rounds of the Food Analysis Performance Assessment Scheme (FAPAS) for tin and has consistently performed well.

Four hundred samples of tomato-based canned products (spaghetti and other pasta in tomato sauce, tomato and tomato based soups, baked beans and tomato based cooking sauces), and other fruit (pineapples, grapefruit, gooseberries, rhubarb and apricots) and vegetables (mushrooms, celery, and asparagus) were taken. These products were selected either because they have been found to contain high levels of tin in previous surveys or because they have the potential to contain higher levels of tin.

The sample plan covered all the major products and brands, as well as smaller brands and retailer's own label, in proportions reflecting available market share data. Samples were collected from retailers across the country. Four cans of each sample were taken from the same batch, three analysed, and one held in reserve. This approach was taken because tin concentrations can vary considerably between individual cans in the same production batch.

A total of 1,200 cans were analysed. The results reported are the mean of the three cans analysed for each sample. Samples were homogenised and acid digested before being analysed in duplicate for tin using atomic absorption spectrometry. Full details of the methodology and quality control procedures are given in the contractor's final report, which is available from the FSA's library (see Further Information).

Results

The results of this survey are summarised in Table 1, which shows the mean and range of tin concentrations in each type of food analysed in this survey. In accordance with the Food Standards Agency policy for the release of brand names when reporting the results of food chemical surveillance,⁵ details about the individual samples are given in full in Annex 2 (which can be found at <http://www.food.gov.uk/multimedia/pdfs/tincannedfruitandvegstats.PDF>). It should be noted that the absence of any particular brand from this survey means only that the brand was not included in the survey. No further meaning should be read into the absence of any brand from this Food Survey Information Sheet.

The Survey shows that levels of tin in each type of food sampled, with one exception, are lower than those reported in previous surveys^{3,4,6}. Tin concentrations for tomato soup were slightly higher but still well within the legal limit. The average tin concentration in all 400 samples tested in this survey was 44 mg/kg. This is lower than the mean concentration of tin in canned fruit and vegetables we reported in 1997 of 58 mg/kg.³ Also, the mean concentration of tin in canned tomatoes and tomato products from this survey of 47 mg/kg, is lower than that reported in the 1999 survey on tin in canned tomato products⁴ of 63 mg/kg.

As expected, tin concentrations in products packed in fully lacquered cans, which have no exposed tin on the inside of the can, had a lower mean tin content (less than 5 mg/kg, 166 samples) than those packed in unlacquered or partially lacquered cans (59 mg/kg, 234 samples). Other factors such as headspace (the atmosphere above the food i.e. space not in contact with food) and vacuum were less significant, but for some types of product appeared to have a contributing effect on tin concentration. This is discussed in full in the contractor's report, which is available from the FSA's library (see Further Information).

Products with elevated tin concentrations

Two of the 400 samples tested were found to contain tin concentrations above the regulatory limit of 200 mg/kg for tin in food. One sample of gooseberries contained an average of 212 mg/kg (two out of the three cans making up the sample exceeded the regulatory limit). One sample of spaghetti in tomato sauce contained a mean tin concentration of 292 mg/kg (all three of the cans tested exceeded the regulatory limit).

The FSA issued press releases to inform consumers and Food Hazard Warnings to alert enforcement bodies about the results. The retailers/suppliers of the products were informed immediately and voluntary recalled the affected batches of products which were withdrawn from sale. The European Commission was alerted about those batches of products that had been exported to other member states. Retailers of the affected products were invited to submit brief statements on these results for inclusion in this Information Sheet, and the statements received are reproduced in Annex 1.

Long-term exposure to tin in the diet -What this means for consumers

The Joint Expert Committee on Food Additives of the Food and Agriculture Organization and the World Health Organization (JECFA) has recommended a Provisional Tolerable Weekly Intake (PTWI) for tin of 14 mg/kg body weight /week to protect against the risk of any chronic (long-term) health effects.¹ This is equivalent to 120 mg/ day for a 60 kg person. The PTWI is an estimate of the amount of a substance that can be ingested weekly over a lifetime without appreciable risk to health. Dietary intakes of tin for consumers of the foods tested in this survey have been estimated and compared to this guideline.

It was assumed that all canned fruit and vegetables contain tin at the mean concentration reported for this survey (44 milligrams per kilogram) and that all other foods contain tin at the mean concentrations found in the 1997 TDS.² Using this, together with data on the patterns and amounts of different foods eaten by UK consumers from the National Dietary and Nutritional Survey of British Adults (NDNS),⁹ it is possible to estimate dietary intakes.

The data from the NDNS allow exposures to be estimated for average consumers as well as for high level consumers who eat above-average quantities of particular foods.

Total dietary intakes of tin estimated on this basis were 3.6 mg/day for an average adult consumer, and 7.5 mg/day for a high level adult consumer. These dietary intakes remain well below the PTWI for tin which is equivalent to 120 mg/day for a 60 kg person. Therefore, dietary intakes estimated using the concentrations of tin found in this study pose no long-term health concern to consumers.

Conclusions

This survey of tin in canned fruit and vegetables revealed that all but two of the four hundred retail samples tested contained tin at levels below the regulatory limit of 200 mg/kg set by the UK Tin in Food Regulations 1992. One sample of spaghetti in tomato sauce and one sample of gooseberries were found to be above this limit.

The FSA immediately informed the retailers and suppliers of results for the two products found to be above the legal limit. The retailers/suppliers acted voluntarily to recall and withdraw affected batches from sale. The FSA issued press releases to inform consumers and Food Hazard Warnings to alert the enforcement authorities of these results. The European Commission was informed of those batches which had been exported to other member states.

These survey results do not raise any long term food safety concerns for consumers as chronic health effects are not expected even at the high tin concentrations found in the above two products.

Annex 1. Statements from retailers

J Sainsbury plc

"In June 2001 the Food Standards Agency alerted Sainsbury's to slightly elevated levels of tin detected in some samples of our canned gooseberries. We reviewed the information provided by the FSA together with information held by our supplier, which indicated that there was no widespread problem. Purely as a precautionary measure we voluntarily recalled the product and withdrew remaining stocks from sale".

H. J. Heinz Company Ltd.

"As one of the world's leading food manufacturers, Heinz remains totally committed to a programme of continuous improvement with respect to standards for quality control, recipe preparation, ingredients and packaging.

As soon as we were alerted to the preliminary results from the FSA tin surveillance programme, we immediately initiated a full investigation. When this identified isolated batches of Heinz Spaghetti in Tomato Sauce cans that may have contained levels of tin, albeit in trace amounts, but above required levels, we immediately implemented a voluntary national recall as a precautionary measure. No other Heinz products were affected.

A detailed investigation of the issue has concluded that this was a one-off incident arising from a processing fault. Manufacturing products using this process has ceased.

As part of the investigation we also undertook a comprehensive and rigorous review of all elements of our canned tomato-based products. This has re-confirmed their shelf-lives to ensure that there is no risk of recurrence of elevated tin levels beyond our exacting standards. We remain committed to minimizing traces of tin.

All Heinz products remain completely safe to eat and consumers can continue to have complete confidence in all Heinz varieties"
