KILKENNY

Kilkenny is Ireland's largest inland city and was the second town of Leinster until the twentieth century. It is located 115 km south-west of Dublin and 48 km north of Waterford. The city straddles the River Nore and is the nodal point of a small plain, the ancient Mag Roigne, which forms the fertile heartland of Co. Kilkenny (Map 1). This plain developed on Carboniferous limestone overlain by several metres of glacial till and it stretches east and north to the Castlecomer Uplands, south to the Walsh Mountains, and west to the Slieveardagh Hills and the boggy zone that constitutes the boundary between the provinces of Munster and Leinster. The predominant soils are light textured, grey-brown podzolics suitable for a wide variety of arable crops and good pasturage. The city itself is sited on a bend in the south-flowing Nore, where the ground rises gradually on both sides to a height of just over 60 m. The east bank of the river has a gentle, almost imperceptible slope, while the west bank is somewhat steeper and more undulating. Five slight, well-drained knolls on the west bank were to play key roles in the topographical development of the city and these are occupied today by St Canice's Cathedral, St Mary's Cathedral, St Mary's Church, Kilkenny Castle and St Patrick's graveyard. Running into the Nore from the west is a small stream, the Breagagh, which formed the boundary between the boroughs of Irishtown and Kilkenny until they were amalgamated in 1843. Although it is a relatively insignificant stream in summer-time, the Breagagh (the name is derived from Irish bréagach, 'deceitful') can develop into a torrent after heavy rainfall and, prior to drainage works in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, it would have constituted a significant impediment for parts of the year.

The name Cill Chainnigh, 'Canice's church', provides clear evidence of the city's origin, although the church of Canice was not the earliest Christian foundation. That distinction belongs to St Patrick's Church, represented today by a D-shaped graveyard on the top of a low rise immediately south of the medieval town. First mentioned in the late seventh century as a martartech or house of relics, it is subsequently referred to as Domhnach Mór, 'large church', a placename which has been identified as being of fifth- or sixth-century origin.¹ The dedication to Patrick may be as old as the seventh century, but the martartech of Mag Roigne, the 'settled area of Rogen', was almost certainly established in the fifth century. By the seventh century, however, the influence of this church was eclipsed by the successful implantation of the cult of Canice. The new church was to give Kilkenny its name while the older foundation was forced to latch onto an Armagh lifeline. From the evidence in Tírechán's collectanea it is evident that these developments had occurred by c. A.D. 685.

Kilkenny's rise to ecclesiastical prominence as the principal church of the diocese of Ossory can be explained partly by the combination of geographical and economic factors that placed the settlement beside an important fording point and encompassed it with a fertile agricultural hinterland. It can also be explained by the historical factors that made the church of Canice into the successor of the martartech of Mag Roigne, but the key reason for the early development of Kilkenny was political. In the mid ninth century the Osraige produced a powerful and ambitious king, Cerball mac Dúnlainge (d. A.D. 888). Cerball's success was founded on his domination of the river valleys and, during the 870s and 880s, this made him the most powerful king in Leinster. The relevance of Cerball's rise to prominence, and that of his Mac Gilla Pátraic successors, lies in the fact that their lands, the fertile plain of central Kilkenny, became one of the major power centres in south-eastern Ireland. This growth in power, which commenced in the late ninth century and was consolidated in the tenth and eleventh centuries, effectively marks Kilkenny's beginnings as a town.

The church dedicated to Canice was established on a hill overlooking the major fording point of the Nore, later marked by Green's Bridge. Nothing is known of the form of the early church, but an examination of the modern street pattern suggests that it stood within a large enclosure (Map 6). The former existence of this enclosure is indicated by the curving alignment of Vicar Street, St Canice's Place, Dean Street and Thomas Street. There is no trace, however, of the continuation of this line on the north side, but the 1758 map of the city by John Rocque shows a lane (Drysdale's Lane) running north of the church as far as Troy's Gate; it may be that this lane preserved, at least in part, the outline of the earlier enclosure (Map 5). This delimits a space with maximum dimensions of 300 m by 225 m, or roughly 6.5 hectares. A pre-Anglo-Norman stone church evidently stood here because about a dozen stones decorated in Hiberno-Romanesque style have been found on the site. The surviving round tower dates to the eleventh or early twelfth century; it was built on top of an earlier cemetery, containing the burials of both adults and children. The nineteenth-century discovery of antler tines near the cathedral suggests the presence of manufacturing activity, such as the comb-making that was carried out in contemporary Dublin and Kildare.² Archaeological excavations at the junction of Irishtown and St Canice's Place revealed a layer of pre-Anglo-Norman debris 30 cm thick indicating that occupation extended southwards from the ecclesiastical enclosure.³ An extramural church dedicated to St Brigid is documented in the fourteenth century. It probably lay north-west of the enclosure, near the junction of Grange Road and Lord Edward Street where an extensive cemetery was discovered in the nineteenth century.⁴

By the twelfth century the Mac Gilla Pátraic kings of Ossory had a residence at Kilkenny in which they held court, and in which a deputy acted during their absence.⁵ Excavations at the castle have revealed evidence for bronze- and iron-working associated with a sod building predating the initial Anglo-Norman earthwork castle.⁶ The status of pre-Anglo-Norman Kilkenny is reflected in the fact that, after the Anglo-Norman invasion, St Canice's became the centre of a separate borough, significantly called Irishtown. Even in the late sixteenth century, its burgesses retained the tradition that Irishtown was the older settlement.⁷ In any event, by 1169, when the first Anglo-Normans arrived and were put up in its inns or 'ostels', Kilkenny had already become the largest and most important inland settlement in south-east Ireland. The land on which much of the new town of Kilkenny was to be built belonged to the bishop of Ossory and this gave him an influential say in events. The land had to be acquired legally, a new parish had to be established with his permission, and potential market rights had to be accommodated.

The Anglo-Normans established a castle at Kilkenny by 1173 and it would seem that at least one burgess had settled near it by 1176.⁸ Kilkenny formed part of the lordship of Leinster, granted to Richard fitz Gilbert de Clare, better known by the nickname Strongbow. On his death in 1176 it passed into the hands of the crown and there is little evidence of any interest in Kilkenny until the death of King Richard I, ten years after Strongbow's daughter and heiress, Isabella, had married William Marshal. In 1199, or shortly thereafter, Marshal appointed Geoffrey fitz Robert, Strongbow's brother-in-law, as seneschal of Leinster. In the course of reorganising the Leinster estates, fitz Robert gave the burgesses of Kilkenny their first documented privileges and fixed their annual rent at twelve pence, payable half at Easter and half on the feast of St Michael (29 September).⁹ William Marshal came to Kilkenny in 1207 at a time when the lordship of Leinster was in danger of breaking up and his Kilkenny charter was almost certainly issued with a view to ensuring the firm support of his principal Irish town. The 1207 charter formalised the privileges of an existing settlement in which certain operational structures were taken for granted.¹⁰

The concessions were designed primarily to protect the burgesses from arbitrary aristocratic or judicial pressures, but they also provided tax breaks and benefits in kind while fixing a permanent rent. In addition, they permitted the burgesses to establish their own weekly court, known as the hundred court, and to set the level of its fines; the burgesses, their sons, daughters and widows were entitled to contract marriages without the permission of the lord, unless they held land from him in chief; they could dispose of their burgages and personal possessions freely (except to members of religious orders); and while the number of burgesses was evidently limited they were empowered to increase the privileged population by creating free tenants. Economic interests were also looked after. The burgesses were entitled to form a merchant guild to regulate their business; they could seize the goods of persistent debtors and the trading licence of external merchants (specifically bakers and vintners) was limited to forty days. The lack of detailed regulations enabled the townspeople to develop the structure best suited to their needs and this process is exemplified in their 1231 decision to elect a principal officer, le sofreyne, and four provosts annually who, lest the lord of the town might feel challenged by such developments, 'were to be profitable to the lord and commonalty'.¹¹

The Anglo-Normans were attracted to Kilkenny because of the presence there of a settlement that was the focus for both overland and riverine routes. This settlement was under the authority of the bishop of Ossory, however, and it could not be sequestered or settled without invoking the wrath of the church. Partly for this reason but also because of the presence of a knoll, strategically placed overlooking a bridging point of the Nore 750 m south of the cathedral, the Anglo-Norman castle was built downriver from the older settlement. The castle formed the southern boundary of the new Anglo-Norman town, which was built between it and Irishtown. The new settlement was provided with its own parish, St Mary's, which was carved out of the existing parishes of St Canice and St Patrick (Fig. 3).¹² The parish boundary extended just beyond the medieval walled town on the west but lay within it on the south, a feature which would suggest that the southern half of Patrick Street lay outside the original boundary of the town but was incorporated during the thirteenth century. The area formed by St Mary's parish may itself have grown in two sections. The initial Anglo-Norman settlement appears to have stretched only from the castle as far as the present James's Street, because a deed of c. 1207 indicates that the land to the north belonged to the church at that time. This deed is an exchange of land between William Marshal and the bishop of Ossory, whereby the bishop received land at Aghaboe in return for giving Marshal the expanse of ground lying between James's Street and the Breaghagh River.¹³ The deed states specifically that the purpose of this exchange was to enable Marshal to enlarge his town. The new area was probably occupied between c. 1207 and c. 1231, when the foundation of the Franciscan friary in the north-east angle ended land development.

The town also began to expand on the east and south (Map 6). An Augustinian monastery, linked by a bridge to Irishtown, was founded on the east bank of the Nore before 1202; a new bridge was built before 1223 and a settlement, known simply as St John's, grew up along the present John Street. On the south side of the town, in the neighbourhood of St Patrick's Church and stretching along Patrick Street, was the borough of Donaghmore, first referred to in c. 1245. This was a central part of the manor of Donaghmore, itself part of the episcopal lands of Ossory, and it was administered by the dean, hence the townland name, Deansground. The borough of Donaghmore had its own market place and market cross, probably located at the junction of New Street and Patrick Street, while the references to St Patrick's Outer Gate suggest that the settlement was enclosed.¹⁴ The dean had a manorial residence or castle, located close to the churchyard.¹⁵ Nothing survives of medieval St Patrick's Church, but the fine series of thirteenth- and fourteenth-century tombs preserved in the graveyard suggests that it was richly patronised. Flemingstown (Latin villa Flamingorum) is mentioned on a number of occasions in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and it appears to have been Flemish in origin.¹⁶ The settlement was located south of Kilkenny Castle in the vicinity of Bennettsbridge Road, and probably extended into the present Castle Park. It was abandoned by 1625, but the earthworks and paved roads that survived at that time greatly impressed David Rothe who described the site as formerly a strongly fortified place with a stone gate, indicating that Flemingstown was also an enclosed suburb.¹⁷ There may have been other suburbs to the west of the town, particularly in the thirteenth century, focused on the Dominican priory and the churches of St James and St Nicholas, as detailed below.

* * *

The Hightown was based along a single north-south street, High Street, with two others, Walkin Street and James's Street, running from it at right angles towards the west, and a back street, now known as St Kieran's Street, running diagonally on the east. On the south side, High Street intersected Patrick Street, Castle Street (now The Parade) and Rose Inn Street, forming a junction that became known in the later middle ages as Crockker's Cross. By the early fourteenth century the street surfaces were paved and a civic ordinance of 1335 required every householder to clean the pavement beside his house twice a week, while another prohibited the stacking of turf, grain and wood against the frontage, presumably because it impeded traffic.¹⁸ High Street, which is broader in the middle than at either end, functioned as the principal market place and it was near the later tholsel (sixteenth century) that the market cross was constructed in 1335. Subsidiary markets also existed and spaces behind the house frontages, as well as houses themselves, were let to vendors on market day.¹⁹ The proliferation of markets promoted price variation and in 1334 all fishermen, for instance, were required to sell in the main market place and only there.²⁰ The custom house or tholsel, where stallage was paid on market day, is first evidenced in 1307 but was probably in existence a century before. It was prominently located near Crockker's Cross and was the venue for the hundred court and the town council, as well as functioning as the town treasury in which important documents were stored.²¹

Until recently, many of the properties along High Street and Parliament Street (the relatively modern name of the northern end of medieval High Street) preserved the long, narrow burgage plots characteristic of medieval towns (Map 2). Along the west side of High Street these plots extended back from the street frontage as far as the town wall, while on the east side some lay between High Street and St Kieran's Street; further north, presumably reflecting the plan of the c. 1207–31 extension, the plots stretched between the street and the river. These regularly arranged plots were the backbone of the Anglo-Norman town plan. William Marshal's 1207 charter stipulated that the property of free tenants had to be 20 feet (6.1 m) wide, which presumably records what was perceived as a minimum burgage width. The relatively small number of plots along High Street conforming to this measurement today may indicate that few free tenants or poor burgesses lived within the town, but it may also be attributable to the amalgamation of neighbouring plots over the years. Each plot was held by a burgess and on it he built a house for his family, usually with a shop on the street frontage, and behind it there was space for outhouses, sheds, yards, gardens or orchards. The charter of 1207 permitted the burgesses to draw timber from the lord's woods outside the town and it is likely that this provided the main building material for the initial houses. Within a short time, however, houses were constructed both of stone and of timber.²² A surviving thirteenth-century cross-beam derives from a substantial structure with walls 1.3 m thick and having a room at least 5.45 m wide.²³ The problem of providing light to the interior was solved by creating an alleyway on one side and, doubtless, it is to this mode of construction that the large number of lanes that still characterise the medieval core of Kilkenny may be attributed. In 1307 the burgage rent of the Hightown amounted to £11 15s 4d, indicating a total of 235½ burgages and suggesting a burgess population of (say) 236.²⁴ It is difficult to use this figure to provide an estimate of the overall population because the number of free tenants, family dependants, household staff and servants is unknown; it may have been about 1,000 — a conservative estimate — or as high as 2,000 if servants and household staff lived within the Hightown.

Established before 1173, initially as an earthwork, the castle played a critical role in the affairs of the town into modern times. The present stone structure was begun in the early thirteenth century, probably in the aftermath of William Marshal's visit in 1207. It was of quadrangular plan with massive, circular corner towers, and a twin-bastioned entrance gate placed in the south wall so as to prevent direct access from the town. The castle was protected by a fosse, filled up during the seventeenth century but originally 8 m deep, and was defended by a towered enceinte wall, almost certainly with an outer fosse, indicating that the defences occupied over twice the area of the present building.²⁵ The castle was the administrative centre of one of the most important Anglo-Norman manors in south-east Ireland and passed from the Marshals to the de Clares in 1248, to the Dispensers in 1317, before being sold to James Butler, third earl of Ormond, in 1391. Apart from being an aristocratic residence and the administrative centre of the manor of Kilkenny, the castle was one of the principal places in which justice was dispensed. It was the seat of the seneschal's court for Kilkenny and an important gaol. Directly south and south-west were its orchard, two gardens and several meadows; below the castle, across the river, in the grounds of the later Kilkenny College, were its great park and dovecote while, on the River Nore, a fishery and a weir adjoined the castle mills.

The defences of the Hightown enclosed a roughly rectangular area with maximum dimensions of 800 m by 350 m and a perimeter of about 1.45 km, enclosing an area of about 28 hectares (Fig. 1). On the northern side the town wall was bounded by the Breaghagh River, while on the western side it hugged a ridge of high ground for much of its length before turning eastwards to link up with the castle defences. The west wall seems to have been perceived as the most important because, with four mural towers and two turrets, it was the most strongly fortified. The north wall was defended only by a turret at the north-east corner while, apart from the angle tower known as Talbot's Bastion (which it shared with the west wall), the south wall had neither towers nor turrets presumably because of its proximity to the castle. There is no evidence for the existence of a river wall beside the Nore. The steep scarp between the castle and John's Bridge formed a formidable natural barrier, while the absence of a wall north of John's Bridge may be explained either because the river provided sufficient defence or because a wall would have obstructed access to quays and landing platforms. There were seven gatehouses. The wall was constructed of locally quarried limestone and survives to a height of 4.5 m in places; it would have been higher originally and topped with a crenellated wall-walk. Additional defence was provided by arrow embrasures at or just above ground level in the south and west walls, and loops in the north wall. The wall itself averaged 1.2 m to 1.4 m in thickness and there was an external fosse, between 4 m and 5.5 m wide, and averaging 1.5 m in depth.²⁶ The surviving stone fabric is almost entirely thirteenth-century in date. The recent redating of the castle's architectural phases indicates that the arrow embrasures on the south and west walls, and the mural tower known as Talbot's Bastion, were built during the first third of the century; in addition, the discovery of Saintonge ware embedded in the mortar of the north wall shows that it too was constructed in the thirteenth century.²⁷ The earliest surviving murage grant dates from shortly after 1248 and grants continued to be made until 1460. Only a fragment of one gatehouse, the Black Freren Gate, survives and it is not sufficiently diagnostic for dating purposes. Illustrations of the other gatehouses indicate that they were rectangular structures of fifteenth- or sixteenth-century date that presumably replaced earlier buildings.²⁸ Although the town defences were substantially inferior in quality to those of the castle, the construction of the wall was the largest civic architectural undertaking of the medieval townspeople.

St Mary's was the parish church of the medieval Hightown and Rothe was probably correct when he said that it began as a chapel for those living near the castle.²⁹ By 1205 it was sufficiently well established for the bishop of Ossory to convene an ecclesiastical court there.³⁰ Throughout the middle ages the town council maintained the church and an annual contribution of 4d was collected from each hall and a halfpenny from each stall or shop for this purpose. The patronage and upkeep of St Mary's were visible signs of the pride and wealth of the burgesses; its tombs and chapels reflected their status and it was an important venue for civic ritual. Both the church and its bell tower, which was evidently spacious, were used for meetings of the council and the hundred court, while in the sixteenth century, if not before, St Mary's was one of the locations in which the town plays were performed.³¹ The wealthiest burgesses were allowed rights of burial within the church while the remainder of the population were interred in the churchyard; the reverence with which the churchyard was viewed is evident in the ordinance of 1337 that rewarded anyone who killed pigs found there.³² Although gradually reduced in size since the eighteenth century, and functioning today as a parish hall, St Mary's was a large medieval parish church with a long chancel, transepts with several side-chapels, and an aisled nave.

The existence of two extramural churches is known from a single reference recording that Bishop Richard de Ledrede (1317–60) demolished the churches of St James and St Nicholas in order to build a new palace. St James's was almost certainly located outside St James's Gate, probably near James's Green, and may well have functioned, like its Dublin counterpart, as a gathering point for pilgrims to Compostela. Given its extramural location St Nicholas's may have been on the site of St Rock's graveyard, which is first mentioned in 1623. Both churches served suburban populations that had evidently declined by the mid fourteenth century when the bishop ordered their demolition.

The Dominican priory, now popularly known as the Black Abbey, was established outside the town walls c. 1225 by William Marshal the younger. The surviving remains — consisting of a nave with a south aisle, probably thirteenth-century in date, a south transept constructed c. 1300, a crossing tower inserted in 1527, a fifteenth-century west tower, and a fragment of the claustral buildings' west range — form a small part of the original complex that occupied an area of almost one hectare and was bounded by a precinct wall.³³ Although it did not play as prominent a role in the affairs of the town as did St Mary's, it enjoyed, none the less, a high level of favour and patronage from the town council and burgesses. In 1334 the Dominicans were given the privilege of having their own keys to the nearby town gate so that they could have access when they wished; in 1353 the council granted them the rent from two houses to provide bread and wine for the celebration of masses; and from 1405 the friary's chapter house, evidently one of the more spacious rooms in Kilkenny, was used for the annual election of the town's first officer, the sovereign.³⁴

The Franciscan friary lay within a one-hectare precinct occupying the north-eastern corner of the Hightown, bounded on the north by the Breaghagh River and on the east by the Nore. The site is low-lying and on soft alluvial soil subject until recently to severe winter flooding. References to the

'angled lane leading to the Friars Minor' suggest that access to the church during the medieval period was via Jenkin's Lane, now the southern part of The Ring, while a bridge over the Breaghagh gave access, through Grey Freren Gate, from Irishtown. The founder appears to have been Richard Marshal, lord of Kilkenny from 1231 to 1234, but the first definite reference to the Franciscans at Kilkenny does not occur until 1245.³⁵ The surviving remains consist of the thirteenth-century choir with an east end added in the 1320s, and a belfry started in the 1340s but left unfinished until the fifteenth century because of the Black Death.³⁶

* * *

On the east bank of the Nore and linked with the Hightown via John's Bridge was the suburb of St John's. This functioned throughout the middle ages as a separate ward with its own annually-appointed provost who was responsible to the sovereign of the Hightown for its administration. In the inquisition carried out after the death of Joanna de Clare in 1307 the burgage rent of St John's was valued at £4 13s 11d, suggesting that there were 94 burgesses and a population of between 400 and 650.³⁷ The suburb occupied a roughly quadrilateral area based on the principal axis of John Street. By 1570 a stone wall with at least one defensive turret existed on the north side.³⁸ Excavations have uncovered the remains of a wall, with a substantial base batter, which stood to a height of at least 6 m, and in places it may have been built upon earlier earthwork defences.³⁹ Two gatehouses are documented, St John's Outer Gate and St Michael's Gate, but there may also have been some form of gate at the junction of John Street and John's Bridge.

The suburb of St John's was dominated by the Augustinian priory of St John the Evangelist. The Augustinians were initially placed beside Green's Bridge, on a hill opposite St Canice's Cathedral, which suggests that the foundation may have had a pre-Anglo-Norman origin. All that is known with certainty, however, is that the Augustinians were there before the death of Bishop Felix O'Dullany in 1202. Nine years later they moved to what was a rapidly developing suburb, under the patronage of the Marshals, on the east side of John's Bridge. The parish of St John's was created, the Augustinians were appointed to maintain it, and their priory church was to function as the parish church.⁴⁰ The monastic precinct comprised almost 2 hectares and stretched along the western side of the burgages from Michael Street to the River Nore. The surviving church remains consist of the early thirteenth-century chancel with a Lady Chapel, built c. 1280 and known from the continuous run of its windows as 'the lantern of Ireland'.⁴¹ The small fragment of the claustral buildings north-west of the church indicates that the town wall was located further to the north than has generally been supposed. After its abandonment by the Augustinians, the site at Green's Bridge became St Maul's Church. The exact foundation date of the leper hospital of St Mary Magdalen, situated in Maudlin Street on the east side of the suburb, is unclear but it was in existence by 1327. The late fifteenth-century Magdalen Castle still survives, isolated now in a forest of houses, but an old engraving shows that it protected the gate leading into the hospital enclosure, which included St Stephen's churchyard — presumably the cemetery — within its bounds.⁴² In 1352 the hospital was funded by urban rents and its master was responsible to the sovereign of the Hightown.⁴³ Its internal spatial arrangements are unknown, but by the late sixteenth century it was the practice to keep the best chamber for burgesses with leprosy.

* * *

From the early years of the thirteenth century, if not before, Kilkenny was a twin-town consisting of Irishtown and the Hightown. The date at which the dwellers of Irishtown received burges status is unknown. The occupants of Irishtown may have been burgesses before 1169 and it is possible that the solitary burgage evidenced at Kilkenny before 1176 was in Irishtown. In 1398 the burgage rent for Irishtown was £9 per annum, although the document points out that it used to be £11 5s 1½d, which would suggest that there were between 180 and 225 burgesses, and a population that may have been as low as 800 or as high as 1,500.⁴⁴ Irishtown was protected by its own walls and by the late middle ages, when their course can be charted quite accurately, they did not contain the entire area of the pre-Anglo-Norman ecclesiastical enclosure. The late medieval defences encompassed a roughly sub-rectangular space, 380 m by 260 m in extent, with a perimeter of about 600 m and occupying an area of about 10 hectares. As in the Hightown, there is no evidence for an eastern river wall or a southern, Breaghagh wall. No mural towers are known but there were four gates (Fig. 1).

The street plan consisted of an east-west curving route, following the line of the pre-Anglo-Norman enclosure. At right-angles was a short street known simply as Irishtown while, to the east, the curving route was linked by Green Street with Green's Bridge and with the main roads leading east and north from Kilkenny. The principal market place was at the junction of Irishtown and St Canice's Place, where weekly markets were held from at least as early as 1245. Archaeological excavation has shown that the southern side of Dean Street consisted of open marshy ground until it was reclaimed in the thirteenth century.⁴⁵ St Brigid's Church, mentioned already in relation to the pre-Anglo-Norman town, presumably catered for a suburban population prior to its demolition in the middle of the fourteenth century. West of Irishtown was an area of open ground, similar to the short course at Waterford,⁴⁶ used for archery practice and still retaining its ancient name, The Butts.

Irishtown was dominated by St Canice's Cathedral. The new Gothic replacement of the former Romanesque church was initiated by the diocese's first Anglo-Norman bishop, Hugh de Rous (1202–18). Building work continued throughout the thirteenth century. The east end was begun before de Rous's death, the nave was built between the 1240s and the 1260s, while the Lady Chapel was added in the 1280s; the building is one of the finest medieval churches in Ireland and still preserves the unity of its thirteenth-century design.⁴⁷ It was the largest church in Ossory and was the setting for imposing ceremonies on major feast-days, such as Palm Sunday and Easter, when the sovereign and council of the Hightown were expected to attend. The surviving burial monuments reflect a patronage that was derived, until the sixteenth century, from the Irishtown élite. The thirteenth- and fourteenth-century tombs commemorate ecclesiastics, principally bishops and cathedral canons, or prominent lay people such as John Talbot, a former sheriff of the cross of Kilkenny who died c. 1385, or Richard Forestal, a burgess of the Hightown who died c. 1400. During the sixteenth century, however, the cathedral became a regional show-piece as the burial place of the earls of Ormond and of other important landowners in the Kilkenny area such as the Graces, lords of Courtstown, the Shortalls, lords of Ballylarkin, and the Purcells of Foulksrath.⁴⁸

Medieval economic life in and around the town was diverse. The hinterland of Kilkenny consists of excellent corn-growing country and throughout the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the right to grind corn was reserved exclusively to the lords of the manors of Irishtown and Kilkenny. In the charter of 1207 William Marshal granted the burgesses the right to grind corn 'at my mills for a reasonable toll'.⁴⁹ This suggests that by 1207 there was more than one mill in the town. One hundred years later, in the extent carried out after the death of Joanna de Clare, the lords of Kilkenny possessed six mills. By the close of the middle ages the Dominicans and the Franciscans had their own mills, at Black Mills and Grey Friars (later St Francis' Abbey) Mills respectively, but these were not present in the thirteenth century. This is evident from the grant of 1274 in which Gilbert de Clare exempted the Dominicans from paying toll when their corn was ground at his mills and permitted them the privilege of having their corn ground before that of anyone else, and even before his own corn unless it was already on the millstone.⁵⁰ The first changes in this lordly monopoly occurred in 1399 when the earl of Ormond granted the use and profits of four mills to William Archer, carpenter, in return for constructing and repairing the mills.⁵¹ These mills were to remain in the hands of Archer's descendants for over two centuries and it is as a result of this connection that the townlands of Archersgrove, Archersleas and Archerstreet Lot received their names. By 1434 the Town (later known as Jenkin's) Mill and the Maudlin Mills (named from their proximity to, rather than ownership by, the hospital of St Mary Magdalen) were in the hands of Walter Shirelok and shortly afterwards the Maudlin Mills became the property of St John's Priory (Fig. 1).⁵² It is likely that, at or about this time, the Dominicans and the Franciscans were permitted to construct their own water mills, which are first recorded in the dissolution documents. Bishop's Mills belonged to the lord of Irishtown and, although they are not documented until 1398, they probably originated in the thirteenth century, if not in pre-Anglo-Norman times.⁵³

There is little evidence for baking, but archaeological excavations uncovered an oven in Dean Street that was presumably used for this purpose.⁵⁴ In 1307 the prisage of ale, consisting of six flagons from every brewery in the town, was worth 100s to the lord of Kilkenny.⁵⁵ Most brewing was probably for domestic consumption, but alehouses were evidently popular and one of the local authority's principal concerns throughout the period was the standardisation of drinking measures in these alehouses so as to ensure that customers were treated fairly.⁵⁶ A late fourteenth-century invoice incidentally enumerates five alehouse owners, three of whom were women, while one was also in the business of supplying bread.⁵⁷ Private brewing remained characteristic of the town until the beginning of the seventeenth century and, if the will of John Rothe is anything to go by, brew-houses were positioned together with other outbuildings some distance back from the street frontage.⁵⁸ Wine taverns are mentioned in the 1207 charter, but the absence of any further specific references suggests that they were replaced by alehouses.⁵⁹ Wine was imported through New Ross and Inistioge, from where it was carried by riverboat to Kilkenny.⁶⁰ Finds of Saintonge pottery indicate that Bordeaux wine was being imported in the thirteenth century.⁶¹ The town (or common) forge is first mentioned in 1307 when it was worth 2s a year. Although initially part of the property of the lord of the town, ownership had passed to the townspeople by the early fifteenth century.⁶² The forge was located in the centre of the Hightown, near Crockker's Cross. It is unclear whether all blacksmiths had to work at the common forge or whether individual forges were permitted, but not until the early years of the sixteenth century is there evidence for more than one smith in the town.⁶³

Primary production was also a feature of the urban economy. The long gardens at the rear of the burgage plots enabled the burgesses to grow vegetables and herbs, as well as to plant orchards for apples, pears and other fruit. At the end of the fifteenth century, gardens within and without the town were extensively planted with madder, which was a lucrative crop.⁶⁴ From the late sixteenth century onwards, when visitors' accounts become available, the gardens and orchards of Kilkenny are consistently highlighted as a remarkable feature of the townscape.⁶⁵ The most prominent orchards seem to have been the earl of Ormond's Great Orchard, situated to the south of the castle, and Prior's orchard, part of the possessions of the Augustinian priory, where a type of dessert pear known as a bon chrétien appears to have been cultivated.⁶⁴ Gardens were often rented and the names of several have been preserved.

On the outskirts of the town, in all directions, were fields some of which were privately owned while others formed part of the commonage. Some of these fields were used by the burgesses to grow corn which they harvested and stacked prior to bringing it to the mills for grinding.⁶⁵ On both sides of the river, north and south of the town, were the inches — low-lying meadows subject to winter flooding but providing good summer grazing.⁶⁶ The extent of the medieval burgagery is unknown, but in 1640 it comprised almost 4,200 hectares and extended for a radius of about 3 km from the town.⁶⁶ At least three greens were used from an early date for holding fairs. The principal one seems to have been on the east side of the town, later known as John's Green; on the west side were Walkin's Green and James's Green, which formed part of the commonage until the eighteenth century and are still green spaces today.⁷⁰

Not all of the ground in the immediate vicinity of the town was agriculturally fertile, however, because in 1393 Oliver Knaresburgh held the common turbarry and paid an annual rent of 6d for the right to cut turf there. North of the town were woods which, as late as the seventeenth century, produced oak timbers large enough for building purposes, while to the south was the common quarry from which burgesses could remove building stone freely.⁷¹ Use of the commonage was strictly controlled. Digging was prohibited and tenants were required to keep the land 'playne [i.e. open] and grene' so that it could be used for shooting and other pleasures. The targets presumably included both fowl and game, and the murage grants indicate that there was a trade in birds and in the skins of fox, squirrel, badger, hare, rabbit and deer.⁷² Pigeons were kept both for their meat and for their eggs, but the number of dovecotes seems to have been small. Fish were also an important item of food and fishermen lived and traded in the town.⁷³ There is evidence for the sale of salmon and eel, which could have been caught locally, as well as hake, herring and salted conger eel during the fifteenth century.⁷⁴ The fishing weirs, beside the Castle Mills and the Stone Mills, belonged to the lord of the town and were a significant source of revenue.⁷⁵ The range of products sold in the fifteenth century included corn, oats, barley, peas, onions, hens, geese, pigs, sheep, cattle, flour, butter, cheese and eggs, as well as more exotic commodities such as almonds, cumin, figs, mustard, pepper, raisins and salt. Horses were bought and sold in the town and the provision of stabling and fodder was an important activity.⁷⁶

The late medieval town witnessed both positive and negative developments. Burgesses with pretensions to gentility took care to record their memorials in French at St Mary's and at the friaries and, as late as 1324, when Bishop Richard de Ledrede denounced Lady Alice Kyteler as a heretic and sorceress, he read the charges in French, Latin and English, so that their content might be understood by all.⁷⁷ Kilkenny was a favoured venue for meetings of parliament and of the king's council, one or other of which convened in the town on at least thirty-four occasions between 1277 and 1425.⁷⁸ Such assemblies were a major source of revenue for the local economy, as surviving receipts show.⁷⁹ The most famous (or infamous) of these gatherings was the parliament of 1366, presided over by Lionel, duke of Clarence, which promulgated the statute of Kilkenny. The urban culture of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries remained vehemently hostile to the Gaelic Irish and viewed them as 'natural enemies'. This attitude is typified by the case of 1344 in which the seneschal of Kilkenny ruled that, because Adam Omolgan was an Irishman, his murder within the burgagery of the town did not have to be punished.⁸⁰ The harshness of these attitudes appears to have ameliorated somewhat by the late fifteenth century, when burgesses and craftsmen with Gaelic Irish names are recorded. A key factor in the process of gaelicisation may have been the purchase of Kilkenny by the earl of Ormond in 1391. This broke the contact with English-based lords and brought in a family that had built up a power-base by the skilful management of the Gaelic Irish in the marches of Wicklow and Tipperary. The earl was a fluent Irish speaker and one of his first acts, on arriving in Kilkenny, was to contravene the statute of Kilkenny by imposing the maintenance of his kerns for twelve weeks on the townspeople. Within a year, kerns were living in the town, much to the distress of some sections of the population.⁸¹

In general, the fourteenth century in Kilkenny was a period of economic recession. The severest epidemic was undoubtedly the Black Death, which arrived in 1348 and was graphically described by the Franciscan, Friar Clyn, the major chronicler of local affairs who was one of its victims. The statute of labourers of 1349 was carefully copied into the town's oldest corporation book, the Liber primus.⁸² It prohibited the payment of wages higher than was customary in the years 1340–46 to servants and labourers who sought to exploit their own scarcity value after the Black Death. Together with the statute of labourers of 1351, these are the only parliamentary acts transcribed into the town book and their presence suggests that Kilkenny experienced a labour shortage. Topographical evidence for population decline is present in the form of deserted suburbs, in the demolition of extramural churches, and in the presence of waste or abandoned plots, up to fifty years later in some instances.⁸³ In the countryside around Kilkenny, depopulation was accompanied by a Gaelic revival that, by the end of the fourteenth century, effectively cut off the overland routes between Kilkenny and Dublin.⁸⁴

Throughout the fifteenth century the Liber primus demonstrates a functioning urban community. In fact it was a period of urban consolidation characterised by subtle social and economic changes, reflected topographically by redevelopment and rebuilding. There is evidence of a demand for building space within the walls, but no sign of suburban expansion while, during the second half of the century, both major bridges and almost all the town gates, mural towers, churches and religious houses were modified or rebuilt.⁸⁵ From the late fifteenth century onwards an oligarchy of about fifteen families began to develop that would control the town until 1650. A member of the Rothe family, for instance, was sovereign on eighteen occasions between 1440 and 1544; the Archers held the position sixteen times between 1434 and 1544, while the Shees were sovereigns on seven occasions between 1493 and 1544. Dynastic supremacy was perpetuated by inter-familial marriages and, when the dissolution of the monasteries brought new land onto the market, these families were excellently poised to take advantage of the speculative opportunities. In 1539 the sovereign and burgesses wrote to Thomas Cromwell asking that they might be granted the two friaries and the hospital of St Mary Magdalen, and in 1543 their request was acceded to.⁸⁶ The acquisition of this new land made possible the first suburban development for over two hundred years and during the second half of the sixteenth century there is evidence for the laying out of house-plots on lands that had formerly belonged to the religious houses, particularly in Maudlin Street and Black Mill Street (Map 6).⁸⁷

Apart from the reallocation of church lands, the reformation appears to have had little impact in Kilkenny. This was due to the absence of both an active policy of reform and competent ministers to carry it out. Some, if not all, parish churches fell into decay. By the close of the sixteenth century, counter-reformation priests, many of them members of the old civic families, returned to the town, sometimes openly but often privately. By 1608, when the Jesuits had established themselves, there were sixteen Catholic priests in the town; by 1613 the number had increased to twenty-seven, including three Franciscans who had built a new friary the year before. In c. 1618 the Cistercians inaugurated a novitiate; by 1622 the Dominican community numbered eight; by c. 1635 a friary of Discalced Carmelites was set up, while in 1614 and again in 1624 Kilkenny was the venue for provincial synods.⁸⁸ By contrast, in 1615, only four ministers of the established church, including the bishop and the dean of Ossory, officiated in Kilkenny.⁸⁹

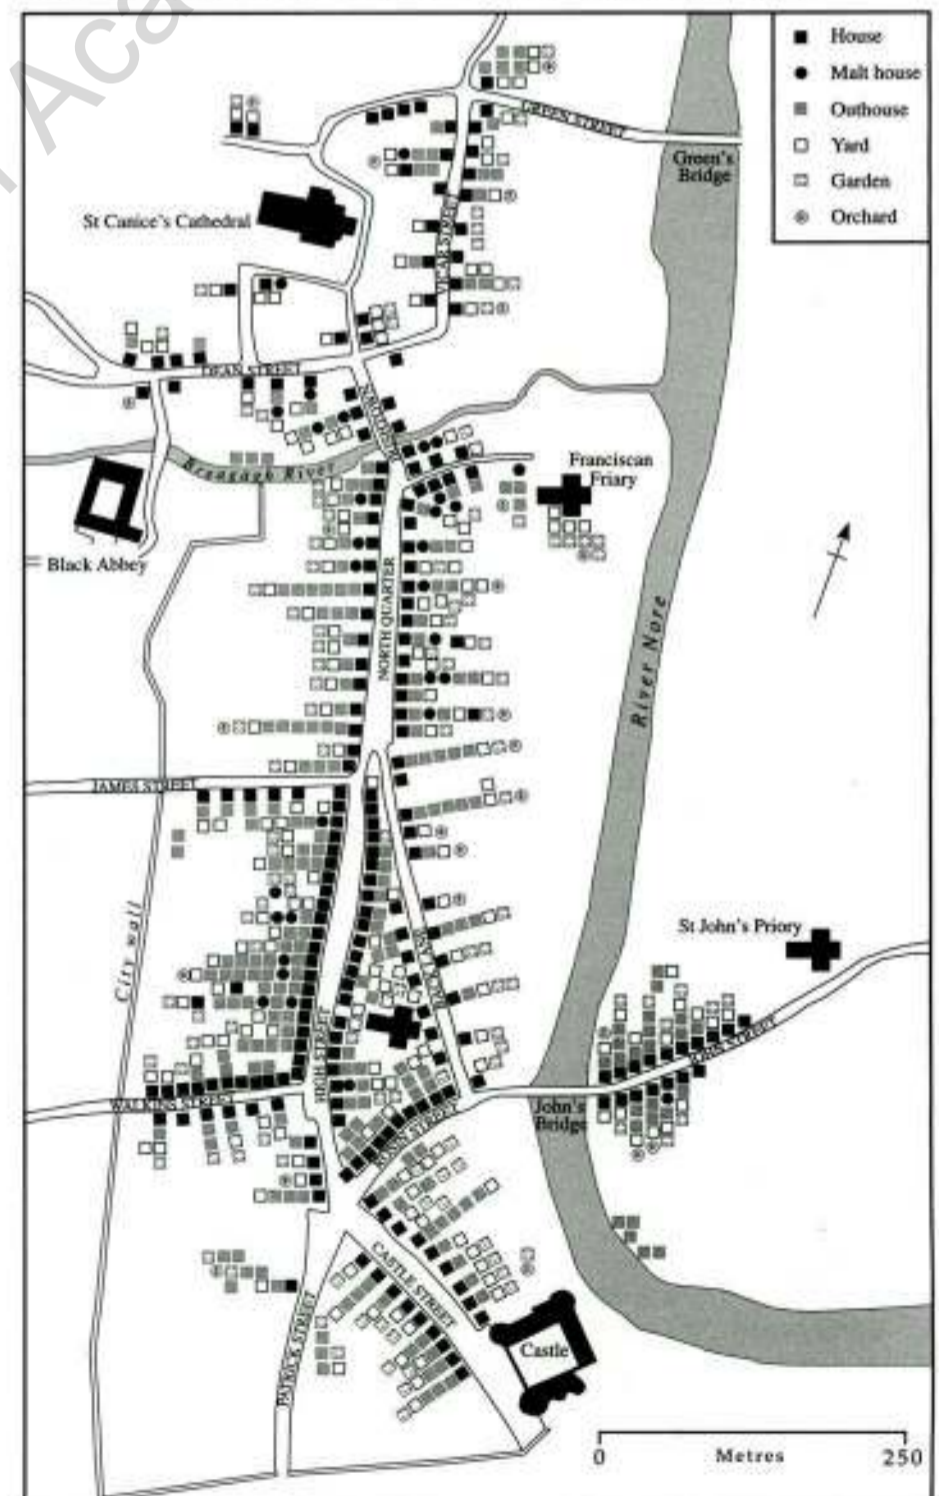

Fig. 2 Land use in Kilkenny, 1654, based on the Civil Survey (after A. Byrne).

The survival and revival of Catholicism was due mainly to the protection that it received from Thomas Butler, tenth earl of Ormond, who succeeded to the title in 1546 and died in 1614.⁹⁶ An important patron of the arts, he introduced English renaissance building styles to the south-east. The mansions that he constructed at Kilkenny Castle and at Carrick-on-Suir in the 1560s were the inspiration for the housing of the urban merchant class.⁹⁷ The remains of about ten such houses survive. Rothe House, built between 1594 and 1610, provides an almost unique insight into the living conditions of the wealthy urban middle class.⁹⁸ In 1654 the Civil Survey listed thirty houses with more than twelve rooms, 147 houses with between five and twelve rooms, and 131 houses with fewer than five rooms. Seventy houses (or 22% of the total) occupied an area of 130 square metres or more, while the largest covered almost 300 square metres.⁹⁹

The dissolution of the monasteries impacted on the poor since several of the religious houses both treated the sick and looked after the old and the infirm. The hospital of St Mary Magdalen was maintained, albeit deprived of its lands, because it was in effect a retirement home for elderly burgesses. In 1582 Sir Richard Shee established an almshouse for six 'honest, poor, unmarried men' and six widows of fifty years of age or more. The men were housed on the first floor, the women on the ground floor, and the provision of separate entrances, one at the front, the other at the rear, meant that there could be no accidental encounters between them.¹⁰⁰ In 1608 Stephen Luker established the hospital of St Mark and, in his will of 1614, Thomas Butler left money to establish another almshouse, the hospital of Our Blessed Saviour, later known as the Ormonde Poorhouse.

From at least the 1580s the burgesses had made representations that Kilkenny should be raised to the dignity of a city and in 1609 it was accorded this status. The city consisted of both Irishtown and the Hightown, although the corporations remained separate, and it was licensed to have three market days — on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Saturdays — and three annual fairs, each of three days' duration, on the vigil of the feast days of St Patrick (16 March), St John the Baptist (23 June) and St Canice (10 October). The first officer was styled mayor, and the council consisted of eighteen aldermen.¹⁰¹ In 1642 the city became the venue for the Catholic Confederation of Kilkenny. During the following years there was a Catholic renaissance reflected in the quality of the stone tombs erected between 1642 and 1648. The old parish churches, many of which were in disrepair, were rebuilt, the Dominicans regained their former friary, the Capuchins established a new one, the Jesuits founded a college and novitiate, the Franciscans opened a nunnery, and Bishop Rothe established a college in Rose Inn Street.

Six months after the execution of Charles I in January 1649, a parliamentary army under the control of Oliver Cromwell landed at Dublin. In March 1650, after a siege lasting one week, Kilkenny surrendered. In 1654 an order was issued to clear Kilkenny and to transplant its citizens to Connacht.¹⁰² The city was surveyed and valued with a view to reallocating its properties. The resulting document, the Civil Survey, provides an insight into the building fabric and appearance of the city.¹⁰³ It is incomplete, but the surviving fragment lists over 200 residential buildings, 63% of which were stone-built with roofs of slate; 16% had stone walls and thatched roofs, while 21% were constructed of wattles and clay and were also thatched; almost all houses had an associated yard (Fig. 2). The stone houses, and also the largest houses, were concentrated in Castle Street and High Street (including the later Parliament Street). Patrick Street had surprisingly few stone houses, but this may reflect the incomplete nature of the record rather than the reality on the ground. The majority of the wattle and clay houses were located on the lanes and side streets off High Street. Gardens were evenly spread across the city, but there was a concentration of orchards between the axis of Parliament Street/St Kieran Street and the Nore. Outhouses, brew-houses, malt houses, bakeries and kilns were also widely dispersed. The tanneries were located in Irishtown and John Street, but there were none in the Hightown. Cattle, horses, pigs and poultry were kept in the city. Although the stables and cow sheds were fairly evenly dispersed, poultry houses were confined to the Hightown and, while there was only one pigsty in Parliament Street, there were seven in Patrick Street.¹⁰⁴

In the poll tax of 1660 the city's taxpayers were enumerated at 1,311, of whom 359 were New English. When children and the very poor are included, the total population was probably double this.¹⁰⁵ The majority of the English (220) lived within the walls of the Hightown, where they constituted just over half (50.05%) the population. The settlers were concentrated in High Street and Castle Street, where they formed 73% of the population, whereas in Patrick Street and Parliament Street they formed 30%. In Irishtown the settlers were 40% and in John Street 35% of the total.¹⁰⁶ Outside the walls of the Hightown there were 147 people, only three of whom were English; outside the walls of St John's there were 144 people, six of whom were English, while outside the walls of Irishtown there were 225 people, only ten of whom were English. This pattern indicates that it tended to be the larger, wealthier and more secure stone-built properties within the walls that were occupied by the settlers.

The city's fortunes improved with the Restoration. James Butler, now duke of Ormonde, transformed the castle and had a substantial impact on the appearance of the city. With the exception of the hall and gallery built in the 1580s, Kilkenny Castle had remained a largely medieval fortress and the duke set about converting it into a French-style château. Parapets were demolished, ornamental cornices and tall chimneys were added, large multi-paned and rusticated windows were punched through the 3.5-m-thick walls, tall conical roofs with campaniles were placed on the towers, the huge moat was filled in, and formal terraced gardens were laid out.¹⁰⁷ A tree wilderness, cut through with avenues and vistas lined with Scotch pine, was planted to the south of the castle and can clearly be seen in Francis Place's view of c. 1698 (Plate 1).¹⁰⁸ The duke had the east side of Castle Street demolished to create The Parade, a new formal approach to the castle that integrated it directly with the city.¹⁰⁹ He established a new grammar school in c. 1666; he upgraded overnight accommodation by introducing at least one experienced innkeeper from Britain; and, in 1676, he enhanced the corporation's civic regalia by replacing their lost great mace with a new one of silver.¹¹⁰

The Restoration also brought Catholic priests back to the city. There were twelve in 1660 and fourteen in 1662, while a Franciscan priest had already returned in 1658.¹¹¹ By 1667 there were four parish chapels, a Jesuit chapel, a Capuchin friary, a Dominican house, a Franciscan house, and five schools, one of which was Jesuit run. Ormonde communicated to the mayor his wish that mass should not be celebrated within the walls of the city. By 1678 all four parish chapels were located immediately outside the walls, but by 1683 the rebuilding of chapels within the walls provoked a reissue of the ban and prompted Ormonde to wonder how 'they can be so mad as to do so extravagant a thing in my town, and where I so often reside'.¹¹² The placing of Catholic chapels outside the walls provided an impetus to extramural development and initiated the ribbon development that was such a distinctive feature of the eighteenth-century city and is clearly visible on Rocque's map of 1758 (Maps 5, 6).

The continuing tension between the new élite and the Catholic middle class was graphically expressed by the mayor when he complained in 1708 that 'the protestants of this city are but a handful faced with an inveterate and implacable enemy'.¹¹³ The construction, commencing in 1698, of an infantry barracks in the old St John's Priory, and of cavalry barracks in the former Franciscan friary, increased the élite's sense of security. In the census of 1702 there were 292 protestant families and 715 Catholic ones in the city, making a total of 1,007 families and a population of perhaps 5,000.¹¹⁴ Despite the increase in population since 1660, the corporation pointed out in 1704 that there were many vacant houses in the city.¹¹⁵ In 1731 protestant families formed less than 20% of the total number of inhabitants and the protestant population probably reached a peak in the 1730s or 1740s, declining gradually thereafter. By 1800 the protestant population constituted 5% of the total. The decline of the protestant percentage has been attributed to the fact that population growth throughout the eighteenth century was due to migration from the city's rural, Catholic hinterland, whereas immigration from England was negligible.¹¹⁶

The foundation of Kilkenny's prosperity was its rich agricultural hinterland and, in particular, the sale of cattle and grain. Proximity to the market increased the price of land, and farms in the neighbourhood of Kilkenny were rarely larger than 20 hectares. Its position made Kilkenny's market an obvious collection point and both Tighe and Lewis stated that the spring cattle fairs, which were attended by graziers from all over Ireland, regulated the prices at all others.¹¹⁷ Writing in 1802, Tighe reported that:

The market of Kilkenny is well supplied with every article, with sea fish in plenty from Dungarvan, and with all kinds of garden stuff and fruit in the season; even peaches, melons, grapes and pineapples; as the produce of several gardens are sold besides that of Mr Robertson's hot houses and nursery; the cultivation of vegetables by market gardeners has increased three or four fold, within these twenty years. No regular meat market is held at any other town [in Co. Kilkenny], though meat is occasionally sold.¹¹⁸

Sheep were raised in the vicinity of the city and 2-pound (0.9 kg) cheeses were a regular feature at the market. Pigs were usually bred by small farmers and cottiers, but it was not until the nineteenth century that bacon stores and bacon yards became a feature of the cityscape. The only quantitative estimate of the city's trade is provided by William Chapman in his 1787 report on the proposed canal linking Kilkenny with Thomastown. He indicates that an average of 15,162 tons of agricultural produce, 89% of it cereals, passed southwards annually from Kilkenny, plus 3,000 tons of local coal, 1,000 tons of marble and 200 tons of tallow and hides. In return 3,000 tons of timber and iron, 2,000 tons of imported sea coal, and 1,000 tons of oil, wine, spirits, salt and raw materials came northwards to the city.¹¹⁹ The low estimate of imported goods presumably reflects the fact that most of Kilkenny's needs were supplied by Dublin rather than by Waterford.¹²⁰

The city shared in the agricultural slump after 1815 which, exacerbated by the failure of the corn crop in 1816, occasioned a famine in 1817.¹²¹ None the less Kilkenny's markets, warehouses and mills remained the busiest in the county and, between 1826 and 1835, 34% of all county wheat sales and 45% of oat sales were made within the city.¹²² An agricultural depression in the mid 1830s reduced prices by about one-quarter and, while there was little change in the number of corn stores after this date, the number of working mills declined.¹²³ By the end of the century several mills had been converted into saw mills while Archers Grove Mills (the medieval Stone Mills) became derelict.

In addition to being a marketing centre, Kilkenny developed other economic roles. In 1654 there were four tuck mills for fulling cloth, but this was still an ancillary activity because two corn mills were also present at each site. Frieze — a rough, heavy woollen cloth — was manufactured during the second half of the seventeenth century, but competition from Carrick-on-Suir forced the weavers to produce worsted, a finer quality fabric. The woollen industry, and blanket manufacturing in particular, was the city's main source of employment throughout the eighteenth century. Most of the wool sold at the Kilkenny markets went to Cork or Carrick-on-Suir, while the wool used to manufacture the upmarket Kilkenny blankets was a lamb's-wool brought from Dublin. Towards the end of the century the Castle Mills, which had functioned for almost six hundred years principally as grain mills, were converted to woollen mills, and the Maudlin Mills became woollen mills before 1792. In his review of the industry in 1800, Tighe states that there were fifty working looms providing employment for about 780 people, or 5% of the entire population. Teasels were used for raising the nap on blankets and Tighe adds that seven or eight acres of teasels were cultivated, chiefly in gardens near the city wall.¹¹⁸ By 1821 eleven woollen manufacturers directly employed 765 people, who are said to have had nearly 2,500 dependants.¹¹⁹ By this time the value of the city's woollen output was up from £32,500 in 1800 to £84,000 in 1821.¹²⁰ In 1831 the rise in the price of wool gave a new impetus to blanket manufacturing, but it was short-lived and by 1837 only 600 worked in the woollen business.¹²¹ By 1841 the Ormonde Woollen Mills could no longer afford to employ weavers.¹²² They revived in the 1880s and struggled on until destroyed by fire in 1969.

In 1701 the Huguenot William Crommellin, a brother of Louis Crommellin who established a linen manufactory at Lisburn in 1698, was settled in the city by the second duke of Ormonde. The business proved unsuccessful and appears to have ceased by 1709. Shortly before 1763, Bishop Pococke founded the Lintown Weaving School on Green's Hill, in which Catholic boys between the ages of twelve and sixteen were taught linen weaving, reading and writing, and 'were instructed in the principles of the protestant religion'. The school had a factory attached to it, but by 1825 its educational function had ceased, the 'boys' were found on investigation to be adults, and the school had become a money-making venture for the master.¹²³ It ceased producing linen in 1839. Bleach greens were established on both sides of the Nore at a short distance from the city in the 1780s and 1790s and there are surviving illustrations of flax set out to dry in the grounds of Kilkenny College.¹²⁴ Despite these endeavours, the linen industry remained unsuccessful because there was no incentive to grow flax in an area where corn flourished.¹²⁵

Throughout the middle ages the Black Quarry functioned as the common quarry of the town but, by the eighteenth century, it was in private hands. The quarry provided the best quality limestone locally, which when polished had a distinctive dark black colour. This polished limestone, or 'marble', became the basis of an important eighteenth- and nineteenth-century industry. Throughout the eighteenth century, Kilkenny was synonymous with coal, although the mines were located 20 km north of the city. The first pits were sunk near Castlecomer shortly after 1700 and coal was marketed at Kilkenny.¹²⁶ The trade in coal was substantial and by the middle of the eighteenth century the northern part of High Street was named Coal Market (now Parliament Street). At least twelve coalyards are evidenced in the nineteenth-century city and in 1758, when John Rocque showed the pillars of Kilkenny's industry in the cartouche of his map (Map 5), it was marble, coal and wool that he selected.

Ironworking increased in importance from the middle of the seventeenth century as new sources of ore were discovered near Castlecomer.¹²⁷ The iron gates for Kilkenny Castle were manufactured locally in 1682 and were judged to be as good as London workmanship of the period.¹²⁸ A factory for manufacturing iron nails was established in 1773, but only towards the close of the eighteenth century are individual smithies referred to. In the course of the nineteenth century four foundries worked both iron and brass, while a copper manufactory is referred to in James's Street in 1815. The census of 1841 lists 5 iron founders, 59 blacksmiths, 1 farrier, 38 nailers, 19 whitesmiths (i.e. tinsmiths) and 27 braziers or coppersmiths. In 1846 at least nineteen forges and four foundries operated in the city, but by 1856 the numbers had dropped to six forges and two foundries. The 1881 census lists 6 iron founders, 38 blacksmiths, 11 nailers and 2 whitesmiths, and these figures are much the same in the 1891 census; by contrast there were only two braziers or coppersmiths in 1881, dropping to one in 1891.

One of the major industrial changes of the post-medieval period was the shift from private brewing, a traditional right of the town's freemen, to commercial brewing, and in the course of the eighteenth century rewards were offered for information leading to the closure of private breweries.¹²⁹ Two malt houses are mentioned in the Civil Survey of 1654 and at least five others are recorded shortly after the Restoration, suggesting that public or common brewing was a feature of the urban economy during the second half of the century. In 1691 at least one brewer, Miles Lyons, and two maltsters were operating in the city. The first brewery that can be linked directly with a family is Archdeakin's (later James's Street) brewery, established in 1702 in what was almost certainly a pre-existing brewing premises. Smithwicks, the best-known Kilkenny brewers, acquired Brennan's distillery in 1827 and established St Francis' Abbey Brewery. In 1787 there were ten breweries in the city, by 1824 the number had declined to five, and in 1837 it had fallen to four. There was evidently a flurry of activity in the years immediately following because by 1839 the number had increased to eight, but the expansion was short-lived. In 1841 there were five breweries and by 1856 there were only two — St Francis' Abbey (Smithwicks) and James's Street (Sullivans). Smithwicks and Sullivans managed to survive the contracting domestic market by expanding their markets to England and Wales. The development of the British tied-house system, however, which linked individual public houses with specific brewers, forced Irish breweries out of the British market and James's Street Brewery closed by the beginning of the First World War. Its premises were acquired by Smithwicks. In contrast with brewing, which has a long history in Kilkenny, distilling seems to have been practised, at least officially, for little more than sixty years. In 1782 there were eight distillers and the last mention is in 1846 when Richard Hyland had a distillery in Friary Street. Most of the distilleries were short-lived and no more than two operated at any one time during this period. The longest-lived was the John's Street Distillery, which functioned from at least 1787 until 1844 when it was destroyed by fire.

In 1654 four tanneries were listed in the Civil Survey, two of which were located in Irishtown and the other two in St John's. By 1800 there were eight tanneries, the largest of which had twenty vats and twenty-eight smaller tanning pits, termed handlers, and employed eight men. In total the eight tanneries operated eighty vats and 170 handlers, and employed thirty-five men; each vat processed thirty to forty hides while each handler, which contained a weaker tannic solution, processed sixteen to twenty hides.¹³⁰ This meant that between 5,000 and 7,600 hides could be processed at any one time. The Ordnance Survey map of 1841 shows three tanneries, at Bateman's Quay, Dean Street and Vicar Street, while in the census of that year only five tanners were employed in the city; there were, however, fourteen skinners, five leather-dressers and eleven curriers. In 1841 footwear was the largest industry in the city with a total of 537 persons (all but fifty-nine of whom were male) employed in boot and shoe manufacturing.¹³¹ Many lived close to Green's Bridge in the area known as Broguemaker's Hill, a placename first recorded in 1840. In 1884 only one tannery remained in the city, at Thomas Street, and by 1894 it had closed.

The city lay on the main road between Dublin and Cork, and road improvements turned it into a busy coaching centre. The first coach service to Dublin must have commenced about 1730, since in 1779 the Royal Garter Inn was described as having been the stagecoach pick-up point for the past fifty years.¹³² By the 1770s there was a daily service to Dublin, giving the city a more regular postal service than that of many other inland towns. The first Kilkenny-based coach-maker is attested in 1786. The failure, despite many efforts, to build a canal that would make the city accessible from the sea had an enduring impact. It led to the development of rival market places, notably Bagenalstown on the Barrow and Clonmel on the Suir, from which it was cheaper to ship goods to Dublin and Waterford.

By the late 1840s, when the railways arrived, most of Kilkenny's manufacturing industries were in decline. A parliamentary act of 1845 enabled the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway to construct a line between the two cities, but it was not until 1864 that the connection with Waterford was achieved. The Great Southern and Western Railway built the line between Dublin and Carlow in 1846, and extended it to Kilkenny in 1850. From Kilkenny (Lavistown) Junction, the Great Southern and Western Railway trains had to travel over the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway track and this was such a source of contention that in 1867 the Great Southern and Western Railway laid a second line. Disagreement between the companies meant that cattle and other goods had to be off-loaded from one wagon and placed on another, and the Great Southern and Western Railway scheduled its services so that it was quicker to get to Dublin from Waterford via Limerick than via Kilkenny.¹³³ This situation eased when the Great Southern and Western Railway absorbed its rival in 1900. The location of the railway station appears to have been governed by two factors. Firstly, a line on the western side of the Nore could not have come close without bisecting the parkland of Kilkenny Castle and, secondly, the open fields on the eastern edge of the city allowed plenty of opportunity to expand, as in 1867 when a line was opened linking it with Maryborough (Portlaoise).¹³⁴

Between 1790 and 1840, small private schools and academies flourished in the city. These gradually increased in numbers until the mid-1830s, when they declined as a result of government reform and investment in public education. Several Catholic schools existed in the early eighteenth-century city, but not until later that century did they become a prominent feature. Burrell's Hall opened as the diocesan college in 1783; a year later two free schools, catering for poorer Catholics, were set up in Chapel Lane; in 1800 the Presentation convent school was established, initially for twelve girls, but by 1818 it had expanded to 300 girls. This group of schools was located in the same area (as were the later Christian Brothers' schools at Tilbury Place and James's Street), forming a sector of Catholic education around St Mary's Cathedral and the bishop's palace.¹³⁵ Architecturally the schools were unpretentious but, with the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act in 1829, their topographical profile was heightened as they developed into huge complexes. Together with the construction of the new St Mary's Cathedral, between 1843 and 1857, as the largest and most prominent building in the city, these developments proclaimed the arrival of the Catholic middle class as a powerful force in city life. A similar confidence is displayed in the neo-Tudor design of St Kieran's College, the new diocesan college, built in 1836.

The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries saw the development of important service industries such as banking, insurance and printing.¹³⁶ A book trade existed in Kilkenny in the 1590s, but libraries are not recorded until the late seventeenth century.¹³⁷ Booksellers and circulating libraries first appeared in the eighteenth century but, with the exception of the Kilkenny Circulating Library Society, little is known of their history.¹³⁸ Other leisure interests that developed in the eighteenth century included bowling and tennis, while the opening of the club house in Patrick Street in 1797 provided a social forum in which men could meet. From the 1780s until the 1820s, however, the principal social event was the annual theatre season. The performances were produced originally by visiting companies, but the foundation of the Kilkenny Players initiated a phase of gentleman actors. Visiting companies performed in the tholsel or courthouse, but the gentleman players constructed their own theatre on The Parade in 1805. For the next fourteen years the Kilkenny season was one of the highlights of the Irish social calendar.¹³⁹ A more enduring cultural group was the Kilkenny Archaeological Society, which became a national organisation within a decade of its foundation in 1849 because of its vigorous campaign for the preservation of Ireland's ancient monuments. In 1890 it was designated the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland and, within a few years, moved its headquarters and museum to Dublin.

The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries also witnessed the establishment, usually on the urban periphery, of public institutions such as infirmaries, fever hospitals, workhouses and a gaol, as well as public utilities such as the City Gas Works.¹⁴⁰ In 1841 the city's housing stock consisted of 248 first-class houses, 940 second-class houses, 1,179 third-class houses and 690 fourth-class houses, making a total of 3,357 structures. Grouping the third- and fourth-class houses together, 60% of the houses in the city were essentially mud cabins. Houses of high value were concentrated on Parliament Street, High Street and Patrick Street (Map 8). The population reached a height of 23,741 in 1831, but did not recover from the impact of the cholera epidemic in the following years. By 1841 the population had declined to 19,071 and, although it had risen slightly by 1851, this was only because thousands of starving people sought to survive the famine years by taking refuge in the workhouse. By 1891 the population had dropped to 11,048.

In retrospect the decline of Kilkenny in the second half of the nineteenth century may be traced to the failure to build a canal in the 1770s and 1780s. The loss of trade meant that there was little local capital and the city's woollen mills and blanket manufactories functioned only for as long as they could pay exploitatively cheap wages. Once tariffs were raised and mass-produced English goods flooded the market in the 1830s, the woollen industry was unable to adapt. Demographically, Kilkenny's population did not recover from the 7% loss it endured during the cholera epidemic of 1832, a loss accentuated during the famine years of 1845–8. It was perhaps the psychological trauma of the famine and the absence of any economic revival in its aftermath that directed minds towards emigration and for the next 150 years the city continued to lose more people than it gained. Population decline continued throughout the first half of the twentieth century, reaching a low of 10,046 in 1926; for the next twenty years it stabilised around the 10,000 mark and in the 1950s it climbed to 12,000; by the 1970s the population had returned to late eighteenth-century levels, but it still remains short of the early nineteenth-century figures.

Except for a week-long siege of Kilkenny Castle, the city was largely unaffected by the War of Independence (1919–21) or the subsequent Civil War (1922–3).¹⁴¹ The castle itself gradually fell into decay as declining rents and the new political climate made the city unattractive as a residence for the Butler family.¹⁴² In 1935 the contents of the castle were auctioned and the family moved from Ireland. The principal industries remained the same as those of the 1830s — brewing, shoemaking, woollen manufacturing and iron-working — but they were practised on a much smaller scale. The foundation in 1965 of the Kilkenny Design Workshops, a government-sponsored body charged with promoting good design in Irish industry, attracted artists and craftspeople who played an active role in the life of the city, and who were largely behind the launching, in 1974, of the annual Kilkenny Arts Week. The new Kilkenny Archaeological Society, founded in 1945, also proved to be a progressive, far-sighted force. The reconstruction of Rothe House in 1963–5 highlighted the importance of the city's architectural heritage and the members campaigned with steady success for the conservation of the urban fabric. The society prepared the way for the tourism industry of the 1980s and 1990s, which led to the restoration of Kilkenny Castle and the Shee Alms House. The restored castle, presented together with its parkland to the citizens of Kilkenny in 1967 by Arthur Butler, 6th marquess of Ormonde, is now one of the major tourist attractions of south-eastern Ireland. The development of the city as a tourist centre brought its own problems and, in the 1990s, the construction of hotel complexes, shopping malls and high-rise car parks — designed to service the expanding numbers of visitors — resulted in the obliteration of much of the city's historic fabric. It is still too soon to know, but the most far-reaching undertaking in the twentieth century may have been the expansion of Smithwicks Brewery and the promotion of Kilkenny Ale, a beverage that has made the city a household name to virtually every adult in north-western Europe.

Topographical Information

The following information relates not to any single administrative division or the sheet lines of any particular map, but to the built-up area of Kilkenny at each of the dates referred to.

All grid references used are derived from the Irish National Grid. This grid appears at 100 m intervals on Map 3. In the Topographical Information grid references are included where possible for features not named on either Map 2 or Map 3: they are given in eight figures (the last four figures respectively of the eastings and northings shown on Map 3) and indicate the approximate centre of the feature in question.

The entries under each heading, except for Streets, are arranged in chronological order by categories: for example, all mills are listed before all forges, because the oldest mill pre-dates the oldest forge.

In general, dates of initiation and cessation are specified as such. Where these are unknown, the first and last recorded dates are given, and references of intermediate date are omitted except where corroborative evidence appears necessary. Features originating after 1900 are listed only in exceptional cases. In source-citations, a pair of years joined by a hyphen includes all intervening years for which that source is available: thus 1841–1999 (OS) means all Ordnance Survey maps from 1841 to 1999 inclusive.

The list of early spellings in section I is confined to the earliest and latest examples noted of the variants deemed to be the most significant. Where necessary the earliest noted attestation of the commonest spelling in each of these categories is also given.

Street names are listed in alphabetical order. The first entry for each street gives its present-day name according to the most authoritative source, followed by its first identifiable appearance, named or unnamed, on a map or in another record and the various names subsequently applied to it in chronological order of occurrence. For names remaining unchanged on successive Ordnance Survey maps, only the first occurrence of the Ordnance Survey spelling is cited.

The section on residence is not intended to embrace more than a small fraction of the town's dwelling houses. The main criteria for inclusion are (1) contribution to the townscape, past or present; (2) significance in defining critical stages in the history of urban or suburban housing; (3) abundance of documentation, especially for houses representative of a large class of dwellings. Biographical associations are not in themselves a ground for inclusion.

Abbreviated source-references are explained in the bibliography on pages 27–8 or in the general list inside the back cover.

NOTE ON MAPS 1 AND 2

The two halves of Map 1, divided by a north-south line passing near Kilkenny city, come from one inch maps in two different styles. The name and boundaries of parishes and baronies are included exclusively on the right-hand part (sheet published in 1894), while the church-with-tower symbol at Burnchurch and the railway symbol N.N.W. of Kilkenny are introductions characteristic of the later style employed on the left-hand part (sheet published in 1900).

Map 2, Kilkenny in c. 1842, is derived from the Ordnance Survey 1:1056 manuscript plan of Kilkenny (1841), the Ordnance Survey 1:1056 manuscript municipal boundary plan (1843), together with the published 1:10,560 Ordnance Survey maps of Co. Kilkenny, first edition, sheet 19 and the 1:1056 manuscript valuation plan of c. 1850. The reconstruction has been adjusted to the planimetry of the published 1:500 town plan (1871) where this exists and elsewhere is that of the published 1:2500 plan (surveyed in 1900). Solid lines represent features still extant in 1871 or 1900 respectively, while dotted lines indicate that, since the feature had by then disappeared, its exact position cannot be determined.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This study arose from a trip to the German medieval towns of Bad Münstereifel and Zulpich in the company of Anngret Simms in November 1978. Had I known then the amount of time it would take to complete, it is probable that I would never have started it, and without the assistance and support of many individuals, it could not have been concluded. Mr Cólín Ó Drisceoil painstakingly garnered much of the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century topographical information from newspapers and corporation records. Mr Edward Bourke and Mr Ronan Furlong provided a great deal of help at an early stage with the maps. In more recent years, Ms Patricia Ryan and Mr Michael Potterton have, in their respective ways, lived with the text and I am grateful to them both for their many helpful suggestions and improvements.

In Kilkenny, thanks are due to the Kilkenny Archaeological Society at Rothe House and to Kilkenny Corporation, in particular to the former mayor, Mr Tony Patterson, and to Mr Donal O'Brien, town clerk, for their support. I am deeply indebted to the late Mrs Margaret Phelan who encouraged my early interest in Kilkenny, and grateful to Mr Liam Brady and Mrs Margery Brady for patiently answering queries over many delightful lunches.

Dr Katharine Simms and Mr Charles Doherty provided comments on Kilkenny's early history and placenames. Much helpful assistance was provided by Ms Catherine Nugent in the National Archives of Ireland and by Mr Pat Scanlon in the Valuation Office. Dr Nicola Figgis identified Thomas Mitchell as the artist of the previously unattributed c. 1760 view of Kilkenny and has kindly permitted use of this information in advance of her own publication. At the National Gallery of Ireland, Dr Sighe Bheathnach-Lynch and Mr Adrian Le Harivel provided every help and assistance. Thanks are also due to Mr Noel Kavanagh of Bord Fáilte, Mr Paul Ferguson and Mr John Kennedy.

In the Royal Irish Academy, it is a pleasure to thank Professor George Huxley, Dr Peter Harbison, Dr Eamon Ó hÓgain, Ms Siobhán O'Rafferty, Ms Bernadette Cunningham and Ms Patricia McCarthy; research assistants Ms Angela Murphy, Mr Tom O'Donnell and Ms Ciara O'Rourke; and Mrs Mary Davies, former cartographic editor, for her work on Kilkenny over the years and more recently for her help with the editing of the topographical information.
